people. Well, Sir, as an illustration, let me refer to the article of coal oil, the duty upon which is the most shameful feature of the tariff on our statute-book. That is the duty which is more felt by the poorer classes of the people, than perhaps, any other portion of the tariff. Kerosene is an indispensable article for the great masses of our people; although the Minister of Finance said a couple of years ago that it was a luxury, and that the poor people could do without kerosene. How did he expect the poor farmer to light his house? Did he expect him to go to the woods and collect some pitch pine and make a torch of it, and keep that burning in his cabin, filling it with smoke? Is that what he expects? Sir, it is the poorer class of the people, the farmers, the labourers and the artisans who have to use this kerosene oil. And yet we find, Mr. Speaker, that there is a duty on kerosene oil all over Canada, of over 100 per cent. It may look astounding, but such is the fact. But the strangest thing I find in connection with this duty, is that the people in every province of Canada do not pay the same amount of duty on kerosene.

The Government should be prepared to remedy this evil so far as regards Prince Edward Island. There is not a family there which does not use 12 or 15 gallons of oil per annum, for which they have to pay from 24 to 25 cents per gallon, and on this oil they are mulcted in a duty at the rate of 158 per cent. Perhaps the Finance Minister will explain how it occurs that Prince Edward Island has to pay 158 per cent while British Columbia pays only 39 per cent. I have perused the accounts, and I fail to see that the Government expect to receive anything from the McGreevy-Connolly swindle or from the money expended on the Tay Canal, or from the $4,000,000 squandered in New Brunswick on the branch railway and the Fredericton bridge, and from the $3,000,000 loaned to the Quebec Harbour Commission. I expected the Government would have submitted some estimate and asked a vote for building a tunnel from Prince Edward Island. Previous to the last elections the Government, which included Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper, promised to carry on that work immediately. Sir John Macdonald wrote to Senator Howlan, who was to be a Government candidate in Prince County, which I represent, a letter dated 6th February, 1891, which was just before the general elections, as follows:—

If, as I believe, the country will continue to give us its confidence, the Ministry will, under my guidance, take the matter up without delay.

I am not here to blame Sir John Macdonald; he did not have the opportunity to carry out his promise, for he died. But there has been a Government here, and this inaction is certainly not due to lack of members of the Cabinet, for there are now, I believe, sixteen Ministers, and the Cabinet, instead of decreasing, has increased since Sir John Macdonald's day. There is no protection to keep men out of the Cabinet—they go in as a free entry. I am sorry the Secretary of State is not in his seat, because I have a little to say to him. On the Saturday previous to the elections of 1891, which took place on 5th March, the Secretary of State was very anxious to get across to the island, for he thought he could do wonders there. He went to Amherst and telegraphed from there to Donald Ferguson, now Senator, who was at that time a candidate for Queen's County. The telegram was dated 28th February, 1891, and ran as follows:—

I regret that it is impossible for me to go to the island, as the "Stanley" cannot cross, and I dare not attempt the capes. I am satisfied myself that a tunnel can be made for $6,000,000, and you may rely upon all the aid I can give to that important and necessary work.

Could any promise be more solemn than that, or more enticing, or more calculated to induce people to believe the promise. The people feel the want of a tunnel. On two or three occasions this session, six, seven and even eight days have elapsed without even a mail from the island. We have been told by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and by the Postmaster General that they have given full power to the agent of the Marine Department in Charlottetown and inspector of post office, Mr. Brecken, to act as he might think proper. I do not know how they have acted or what powers have been given them, but we are worse used and more abused than we were under the Mackenzie Government, and there is a worse winter service than there was with the "Northern Light," which was abused by the Tories, north, south, east and west. I was in Parliament in 1874-5-6-7-8 under the administration of Mr. Mackenzie, and I never remember being more than two or three days without receiving letters from home. Such is not the case now. What is the reason? The Government have been petitioned to place the "Stanley" on the route from Summerside to Cape Tormentine. I may perhaps ask that these petitions be brought down, but if the Department of Marine is as slow as the Department of Finance, I shall never obtain them. How long is it since the Finance Minister promised a map of the borings in the Straits. The Finance Minister, by the answers he gave me the other day, showed that he knew nothing about the borings or about how much the Government paid for them. He told us that in 1892 there was no money paid, whereas that is the very year engineer Palmer was engaged by the Government down there. He had a contract for $12,000 to do the work, but the Government thought that Mr. Palmer was going too fast and that he would give them such information that they could not conscientiously back out of their promises, and so they dismissed him. They kicked him, they scratched him, they robbed him, and he came to Ottawa as a beggar without a cent in his pocket. They spent $7,000 or $8,000, and yet the Minister of Finance tells me that in 1892 they did not spend one cent. My question was on the Order paper for a couple of days, and he had full time to prepare an answer to it. How can we believe him in other things when we cannot believe him in that. He said that altogether only $6,000 was spent on the borings, when I know there must have been in the vicinity of ten or twelve thousand expended. Now, Sir, the Government have no more idea of building that tunnel than I expect this building to fly in the air, unless the great comet that is expected one of these days falls on it. They keep it as a stalking horse for political purposes. They try to delude the people with it on the eve of an election. Well, that duplicity did not work in 1891, and I can assure them it will be a failure in 1896. It is discreditable to them to be fooling, by sending down a few of their friends from Ottawa to pretend they are boring when they are not boring at all. The Minister could not tell me how many borings were done last fall, and still he has the political effrontery to try and delude the people. Why is he not a man and say "yes" or "no" at once? I would give him credit if he did. The bogus estimate made by the Secretary of States (Sir Charles Tupper) that the tunnel would cost $6,000,000, is nothing but a farce. Is there any man in his senses who believes that a tunnel ten miles long is going to be built for $6,000,000. We have other tunnels in this country, and we know from past experiences that $6,000,000 would not look at it. I believe myself that the Secretary of State was not honest, that he was not sincere, and that he did not believe that $6,000,000 would build that tunnel. With him it is any port in a storm, and anything to beat me in my county. That was one of the means used against me, and there were other means so despicable that I will not refer to them. Now, Sir, this Government has rolled up the public debt to an extent that would frighten anybody. It is a well known fact that the interest we have to pay on that debt is something over one-third of the total revenue. My friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) told us the other day, that $40,000,000 would be required to carry on the government of the country, and I believe that will be the case if this Government remains in power. I am a little doubtful that they are going to succeed in passing these Estimates, and they do not look to me to have the courage and ability to pass them. It is very unfair for the Government to ask this House to give them supplies up to the 30th June, 1897, and thus to legislate eighteen months ahead. Where is the bête noire in that? The Government are very wise in their generation, or they believe they are; and I suppose their idea is that the House will not be prorogued on the 25th of April, but will die out a natural death. Suppose they have their Estimates up to the 30th June, 1897, they may not have an election until July or August, or until whatever time it suits them. They will be defeated at the polls, say in July, and then they will not call the House to meet. They will say: Oh, we are not bound to take what the newspapers say; this man who was put down as Liberal will support the Government; we will wait until the House meets, and so they will not call Parliament until March, 1897. In the meantime they would be spending the public money without possessing the confidence of the people. They will endeavour to bribe some members if they can because they are adepts at that kind of work. Do you mean to tell me that the Opposition are so blind that they cannot see their dodge? Do you mean to tell me that we are going to allow them to pass the Estimates? I am speaking for no one but myself now; I am not speaking for my respected leader, but I say, Sir, that if I have the power, as far as my vote and voice and argument goes, I will endeavour to keep the Government from passing those Estimates. It is unconstitutional for the Government to ask us to give them estimates so much in advance, to squander, and to pilfer, while they do not possess the confidence of the people. There is not one member in the Cabinet to-day who could open his constituency and go to his people. It is true that the Secretary of State was elected the other day in Cape Breton, but who would not be elected under similar circumstances. Why, Sir, a bare pole, or a Chinaman could have been elected in the same way. Let not the Conservatives be overjoyed at the result of that election. They are overrating their success there. Sir, it is no victory. Mr. McKeen himself, who was a very humble member and a very nice man, got a bigger proportion of the vote than the Secretary of State, notwithstanding the fact that the Secretary of State was backed and propped up by all the influences due and undue, that could be scared up in Cape Breton. He accused the Liberals here of spending $25,000 in that election, and, when he was brought to book, what did he say? "Some one told me so." Well, Sir, I will tell you what some one told me. Some one told me that the Secretary of State spent $40,000. And I will tell you what somebody else told me. Somebody else told me that he stated that he had a telegram from the Rev. Mr. Murray, saying that he would vote for him, and endorsing his policy upon the Manitoba school question, and that, when the Secretary of State was brought to book, he had no such telegram. Some person told me that. I do not say it is the case; but I believe that it was proved that it was all bogus. These are the things that were resorted to in order to elect the Secretary of State. We know very well that there are in that county, perhaps, a thousand votes of coal miners, who depend on employment at the mines for their bread and butter. We know that the chief manager of these mines is Mr. McKeen, and we know that Mr. McKeen did all he could for the Secretary of State. I find no fault with him for that, as long as he did it honestly and honourably and above board. The chances are that every one of those miners voted for the Secretary of State, and that would be enough to give him the majority which he very unfairly and unjustly received at the hands of the electors of the county of Cape Breton. The Conservatives also rejoice at the result of the election in Northumberland. But there is not one Liberal in this House to-day who believed, or expected, that the Hon. Peter Mitchell was going to be elected. The people are not so fond of having outsiders to represent them, and that is where Mr. Mitchell made a mistake. He had not been living in the county for about twelve years, and the other man is a young business man who lives in the county and has large interests there, and the people preferred him to Mr. Mitchell. But I believe that, if a Liberal had offered, and all things had been equal between him and Mr. Robinson, he would have been elected very easily. Look at the result of the recent by-elections. Look at the result in Antigonish. Look at the result in Verchères. North Ontario, of course, has returned a Conservative, but it was only through a misunderstanding between the Liberal candidate and the Patron of Industry candidate. What did Cardwell do? It did not return a Government candidate. What did Montreal Centre do? What did Jacques Cartier do? What did Charlevoix do? What did West Huron do? It was not Mr. Cameron the electors voted for. They voted against the National Policy. It was not Mr. McShane the electors in Montreal Centre voted for; it was against the National Policy. Montreal Centre is supposed to be one of the most intelligent constituencies in the Dominion; it is a portion of the commercial capital of Canada. No doubt, the gentleman who opposed Mr. McShane was a man that no person could say anything against. I have not had the honour of his acquaintance, but, from what I know of him, he is a man of unblemished character. But I have it from private information, that several gentlemen in Montreal Centre voted against Dr. Hingston with great reluctance, because they loved him; but the principle he espoused they looked upon as a curse to the country, and, therefore, they voted for Mr. McShane. The result would be the same in any other constituency that might be opened to-day. The proof of that is in the fact that there are at present three vacancies in this House. There are about 100,000 people in Canada to-day who are not represented in this House. There are vacancies in Missisquoi, in Pontiac and in Soulanges. These three constituencies were all represented by Conservatives, but the Government is afraid to open them. They have the hardihood to deprive the electors of Soulanges, Missisquoi and Pontiac of being represented in this House because they are afraid of losing those constituencies. But it is only a question of time when they will lose them at the general election, when the jury of this country will meet together and pass a verdict on the misdoings of the present Government.

As I said before, the Government have not dealt well with the people of Prince Edward Island. They know that in 1885, when the Island was under a Conservative government, a delegation was sent from there to England to make a demand on the Government of Canada for $5,000,000 for the non-fulfilment up to that time of the terms of confederation. Lord Granville did all he could; he encouraged the delegates; but the correspondence shows that the then High Commissioner in London, now the Secretary of State here, did all he could to influence the British Government to give the demand of the Prince Edward Island delegates the go-by. They came back, and Lord Granville told the Government of Canada of that day that they were morally obliged to do something to relieve the people of Prince Edward Island of the wrongs that were perpetrated upon them. But the Government of Canada have not thought fit to do it. They have not thought fit even to give us the best winter communication that can be got. Why, Sir, the other day the Government boat left Cape Tormentine, on the New Brunswick side, and went across to Cape Traverse, on the Prince Edward Island side, and it had to leave 100 mail bags, because it had not accommodation at Cape Tormentine to carry them. There were four or five other boats there, but the Government would not engage one of them to carry the mails. A friend who wrote to me about that time, stated that it took seventeen days for a letter to go from Montreal to Prince Edward Island. Is that very becoming, or what the people of Prince Edward Island have a right to expect? Is that the way the Government is going to create the harmony which it is absolutely necessary should exist between the different provinces? Sir, if it is, I cannot understand it. It is the bounden duty of the Government to promote a good understanding among the different provinces, but what does the Government do to achieve this object? They have been asked to try the experiment of winter navigation between Summerside, one of the finest harbours in Prince Edward Island, and Cape Tormentine, and they have not done it. In fact, they will do nothing to help Prince County. They are helping King's county because that county sends two Conservatives here. I suppose that is the reason that they can find a large amount of money to expend on breakwaters in that county, and I am very glad that they are able to do that much, and I believe they will succeed in making a good harbour there. I find the contract has been let to a firm at Ottawa. I do not know whether it has been let by private contract or after tenders were called for, but we will find that out one of these days. But when I come to look at my county, I find an insignificant amount allowed for all the piers and breakwaters, 30 in number, in that county. Tignish breakwater, alone, requires $5,000 to make it safe and in fit condition. When I asked the Minister of Public Works to do something for this breakwater, he replied that he had no money; but if he thought he could gain a vote down there, he would soon find the money. If the money were required for some foolish expenditure, if it were required to be thrown into the bottom of the River St. Lawrence, where the contract could be made the means of stealing over a million of dollars; if it were required to throw into the river from the Curran Bridge, where $250,000 were wasted; if it were required to build the Tay Ditch or the Haggart Ditch, there would be plenty forthcoming. But when it is required to rebuild a wharf at West Point, which the Government have allowed to be carried away by their neglect during the past five or six years, it is not forthcoming, although they paid the island $5,000 for that wharf and have never since put a stone or a log into it. They begrudge the people of West Point any accommodation. West Point is fifteen miles away from railway accommodation, but while this wharf was in existence it gave the people there great facility for transport of produce by small vessels, loading at this wharf for Miramichi or Shediac. The Government cannot put their hands on their breasts and say we have done wrong and will now do right, but will go on punishing the people of Prince County as much as they can; but the day is soon coming when they will no longer have the opportunity of doing injustice to my constituents. I am sorry that the people of my county have not thought proper to send an abler representative here than myself, but if the Government wait before they will do me justice and my people justice until I change my political coat, they will wait, 'per omnia sæcula sæculorum.' I thank you very much, Sir, and the House, and I trust that I have brought home to the Ministers a conviction of the necessity of doing justice to my constituents.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 24th February, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved :

That Mr. Stubbs be added to the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE—SEDUCTION AND ABDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 73) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, for the purpose of making more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction. He said: The first section of this Bill proposes to amend section 181 of the Criminal Code in the sense of increasing the age of consent from sixteen years to eighteen years. Section 2 proposes to amend section 183 of the Criminal Code, by making the male liable for the consequences of seduction under promise of marriage, from the age of eighteen instead of from the age of twenty-one years as at present. Section 3 amends section 283 of the Criminal Code by substituting the words "twenty-one" for the word "sixteen" in cases of abduction.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LIVE STOCK EXCLUSION BILL—IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

Mr. GRIEVE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Government to the following article which appears in the Ottawa "Citizen" this morning:—

London, Feb. 22.—The first note of opposition to the Government Live Stock Exclusion Bill comes from the Right Hon. Herbert Gardner, the late Minister of Agriculture, who protests in the "Times" against the irrevocable exclusion of Canadian live stock. The letter will probably arouse hostility to the Bill in the Commons, though the Conservative Ministers claim that Canada does not really object, desiring to develop the dead meat trade.

Has the attention of the Government been called to this article, and if so, does the article express the views of the Government upon this question?

Mr. FOSTER. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I would say, that the attention of the Government has not been called to the article. I read it myself personally.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is an exceedingly important question, and it would be well if the Government would give their views upon it.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 63) to amend the Act incorporating the International Radial Railway Company.—(Mr. Masson.)

IMPERIAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Coatsworth for second reading of Bill (No. 64) to incorporate the Imperial Life Assurance Company of Canada.

Mr. McLEOD. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Coatsworth) asked me, in the Banking and Commerce Committee, if I would explain this Bill as objection was made to it. I may say it is just an ordinary Act incorporating a life insurance company. I have looked over the Bill myself and I find it contains only the ordinary provisions.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would repeat the question the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) put the other day. If this is an ordinary Bill containing the ordinary provisions, why did they not make application under the general Act, instead of coming to Parliament for a special statute? What are the exceptional privileges they want by this special statute?

Mr. McLEOD. I do not know of any general Act. They cannot be incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act, because insurance companies are excepted.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no general Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

HAMILTON BLAST COMPANY.

Mr. McKAY moved second reading of Bill (No. 69) to incorporate the Hamilton Blast Furnace Company (Limited).

Mr. LAURIER. Explain.

Mr. McKAY. The object of the Bill is to put on a better basis the Hamilton Smelting Works Company, which has recently commenced operations. The original promoters of the enterprise were Americans; but it has lately been put into the hands of a company composed entirely of Canadians, who are citizens of Hamilton.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was the original charter a special Act of Parliament?

Mr. McKAY. No, it was an Ontario Act. The company wish to carry on their operations all over the Dominion, for the purpose of developing iron mines and for similar purposes. They are going into more extended operations than were contemplated when the first Act was passed, and they now find it necessary to have an Act of this kind.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

BREAKWATER AT COAL MINES, N.S.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness) asked:

Whether it is the intention of the Government to pay for labour performed for ballasting crib-work on breakwater at Coal Mines, Mabou, Inverness, N.S., for M. McFayden, Esq., Government foreman of that work in 1893 and 1894? If not, why not?

Mr. OUIMET. All the engagements made for the department by Mr. McFayden in above years have been discharged and paid for. Some rock ballasting was, however, done at the breakwater at Coal Mine Point, by the Mabou Coal and Gypsum Company, for which the department agreed to pay $200 to the latter. And this sum was paid to a representative of the company, less $27, for work not executed by the company. On being informed that the men employed by the company on the work undertaken by them were not paid, the president of the company, in answer to a letter written to him by the department, holds himself ready to pay over the said sum when called upon to do so. The department has taken no responsibility for labour which it has not fully discharged.

THE DOMINION REFORMATORY.

Mr. MULOCK asked:

1. What steps, if any, have been taken for the establishment of the Dominion Reformatory, for which a vote was passed last session?
2. If a site has been purchased, where is the site and what is the amount of the purchase money?
3. Have plans of the building been prepared and approved of?

4. What amount has been spent on any account in connection with the proposed reformatory, and to whom?

5. Have such moneys been paid?

6. Has any arrangement been made with the Ontario government for first offenders, when sent to the reformatory, being kept apart from other offenders? If so, what?

7. What is the estimated total cost of the land, buildings, furnishings, and all other expenses connected with the establishment of the reformatory?

Mr. OUIMET. A site has been purchased, and tenders have been called for, for the construction of one wing. 2. The site purchased is described as follows in the deed of sale: All that certain parcel or tract of land and premises situate, lying and being in the township of Lochiel, Glengarry county, composed of all that part of lot No. 38, 3rd concession of said township, lying south of the highway or public road traversing said lot westerly from the Military Road (commonly called the Fourth Concession Road), containing (said parcel) one hundred acres, more or less. The price paid was $5,000. 3. Yes. 4. The total amount expended up to date, including the price paid for the farm, is $6,211.92. 5. Yes. 6. No. 7. As above stated, the cost of the lot is $5,000, the estimated cost of the wing to be constructed is about $100,000, and no estimate has yet been made of furnishings and other expenses which will be attended to as the work proceeds, the more so as it is intended that a large portion of the work required will be executed by convict labour.

W. J. POUPORE, CONTRACTOR.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) asked:

Has one W. J. Poupore, at the present time, a contract with the Crown, as represented by the Department of Railways and Canals, or with the Crown, as represented by the Department of Public Works of Canada?

Is one W. J. Poupore a member of a certain firm of contractors known as Poupore & Fraser, or under any other name, that has a contract with the Crown, through the Department of Railways and Canals, for certain work at Morrisburg or Coteau Landing, or in the neighbourhood of either places, in connection with the canals and locks and other works in said vicinity, that are being constructed at the instance of the Government of Canada?

Has the said W. J. Poupore, or any firm of contractors of which he is or was a member, filed a claim or claims for extras, or any other claim, arising out of any contract, or for the alleged price and value of work and materials, with the Minister or officers of the Department of Public Works, or of Railways and Canals, or against the Crown, as represented by the Minister of said departments, or the officials thereof; and if any such claim has been so filed, what is the amount and nature of said claim, and of every such claim so filed?

If the said W. J. Poupore has not at present a contract, or is not a member of a firm having a contract with either of the departments aforesaid, or the Ministers or officials thereof, or with the Crown, as represented by either of said departments, or the Ministers or officials thereof, has the said W. J. Poupore, or any firm of contractors of which he is or was a member, had within the past twelve months any such contract or contracts, and when did the said W. J. Poupore sell or assign his interest in said contract or contracts; to whom was the assignment made, and what was the consideration, if any, and what security did the Crown or its representative exact for the due performance of said contract or contracts, so assigned by the said W. J. Poupore, or in which the said W. J. Poupore assigned his interest?

What sums of money have been paid to said W. J. Poupore, or the firm or firms of which he was a member, on account of Government works on the Rivière du Lièvre, province of Quebec, and at Morrisburg and Coteau Landing, or in the neighbourhood thereof, and what further sums are now being claimed by the said W. J. Poupore, or by firms of contractors of which he is or has been a member, in connection with, or relating to said works; and what further sums of money have been at any time claimed in connection with said works by the said W. J. Poupore, or by firms of contractors of which he is or has been a member, or by any person or persons to whom any such claim has been assigned, and if any such assignment has ever been made?

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. W. J. Poupore and associates have a contract with the Crown, as represented by the Department of Railways and Canals. Mr. W. J. Poupore is a member of the firm of contractors known as Messrs. Poupore & Fraser, who have contracts on the Rapide Plat (Morrisburg) Canal and also a contract on the Soulanges Canal, near Coteau Landing, for works being constructed at the instance of the Government of Canada. I am not aware of Mr. W. J. Poupore, or the firm of Poupore & Fraser, having filed any claim or claims for extras, or any other claim arising out of any contract, or for the alleged price and value of work and materials, except such as have been disposed of from month to month as the work progressed. The amount of money paid to said firm of Poupore & Fraser, on account of the contract for section No. 11, on the Soulanges Canal, is $79,760; amount paid on sections 1 and 3 of the Rapide Plat Canal is $802,210; one claim only is in for a further sum. The sum of $4,000 is claimed for dams on section No. 3 of the Rapide Plat Canal. Mr. Poupore informed me that he had assigned his contract, but the assignment has not been filed in the department.

Mr. OUIMET. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. Mr. Poupore has no contract with the Department of Public Works. 2. This question only refers to the Department of Railways and Canals. 3. Yes, Mr. Poupore has filed, in connection with his contract for the construction of a lock and dam at Rivière du Lièvre, a claim for $60,871.74, in addition to the total amount returned in the department's final estimates. 4. Mr. Poupore has no contract at present with the Department of Public Works. 5. The amount paid to Mr. Poupore and Company, in connection with Government works on the Rivière du Lièvre, is $185,873.96. 6. The amount yet claimed by Mr. Poupore, in connection with these works, is, as stated in answer to No. 3, $60,871.74.

SCHOONER "MARY E. HARLOW."

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne) asked :

Has the attention of the Government been called to the fact of the loss of the schooner "Mary E. Harlow" on the 2nd day of February, and that said loss is said to have been caused by the non-flashing of the light on Little Hope Island? Is it the intention of the Government to cause inquiry to be made into the cause of said loss and into the efficiency of the light at Little Hope?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The attention of the Government has been called to the fact of the loss of the schooner "Mary E. Harlow" by the member who put the question, but no report has yet been received by the Department of Marine and Fisheries in regard to the wreck. Inquiry, however, is being made as to the cause of said loss and into the efficiency of the light at Little Hope.

ST. LOUIS vs. THE QUEEN.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Edgar) asked :

Has the Supreme Court given a decision in respect of a claim made by Mr. St. Louis, the contractor, in connection with the Curran Bridge against the Government?

What was the amount of Mr. St. Louis' claim?

Has it been allowed in whole or in part, and to what amount in favour of Mr. St. Louis?

Mr. DICKEY. The Supreme Court of Canada has given a decision in respect of a claim made by Mr. St. Louis, contractor, against the Government, in connection with the Curran Bridge. The judgment was given on the 18th February instant. Amount of Mr. St. Louis' claim was $63,642.29. The claim has been allowed to the extent of $61,842.29, with interest and costs.

TAY CANAL—CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) asked :

1. Have any claims been made by the owners of land in the vicinity of the Tay Canal for damages sustained, or alleged to have been sustained, by them by the flooding of land through or by reason of the construction or maintenance of said canal?

2. If any such claims have been made to the Government or the Minister in charge, what is the nature of the claim and who are the claimants?

3. Have any of the said claims, or any part thereof, been paid out of any moneys voted for that or any other purpose?

Mr. HAGGART. Claims have been made by owners of land in the vicinity of the Tay Canal for damages alleged to have been sustained by flooding, on account of the obstruction and maintenance of said canal. The claims are for flooding of lands and damages to bridges. The claimants' names are : John Matthews, Richard Booth, W. R. McLean, Jas. Wilson, Robert Wilson, Daniel McKay, George Groom, Daniel McNaughton, John Beveridge, William Beveridge, W. J. McLean, Thomas McVeity, Joseph Moody, Richard Frizell, Richard Bolton, Alonzo Kane, Jas. Kane, William Frizell, W. J. Spaulding, Dawson B. Kerr, J. H. Kerr, Chas. Foster, Jno. J. Armstrong, Jas. Moor, Ebenezer Frizell, William Grimsby, David McLean, Jas. Armstrong, W. J. McLean. None of the said claims, or any part thereof, has been paid out of any moneys voted for that or any other purpose. No part of the appropriation made by Parliament in sessions of 1894-95 or 1895-96, for damages and repairs on the Rideau Canal, has been expended in paying damages, or part thereof, for lands flooded by reason of the construction or maintenance of the Tay Canal.

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN BANDA AND RAILWAY STATION.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Mulock) asked :

1. Has the contract for mail service between Banda and Railway Station been recently renewed?

2. If so, when, for what time, and at what rate and with whom?

3. What was the cost under the previous contract?

4. Were any tenders asked for before such renewal?

5. Has the renewal contract been executed?

6. If renewed, was any effort made to secure the performance of such service at any less rate than that in the former contract, and, if so, what are the particulars of such effort?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : 1. Yes. 2. On 12th December, 1895, for four years, $210 per annum, with the present contractor, Wm. Bell. 3. $210 per annum. 4. No. 5. No. 6. No.

FREE TRANSMISSION OF NEWSPAPERS BY MAIL.

Mr. DEVLIN asked :

Has the "Mail and Empire" newspaper, of Toronto, complied with all requirements of the statutes in regard to free transmission by mail? Did it furnish the Post Office Department with a copy of its list of subscribers? If so, when? If not, why not?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The "Mail and Empire," of Toronto, has complied with all the requirements of the statutes in regard to free transmission by mail. The list of subscribers is inspected by an official from the Toronto post office at least once a month.

Mr. DEVLIN asked :

Has the newspaper "La Presse," of Montreal, furnished the Post Office Department with a copy of the list of its subscribers? If so, when? Is such lists now in possession of the department? Whose names, and how many are upon the list?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. "La Presse," of Montreal, has complied with all requirements of the statutes in regard to free transmission by mail. The list of subscribers is inspected by an official from the Montreal post office from time to time.

JOHN MCGAHEY.

Mr. DEVLIN asked :

Is John McGahey now a member of the Dominion Police Force? Were charges made against him, and, if so, was he given an opportunity of explaining such charges at the time of his suspension or dismissal? Did he ask for an investigation, and, if so, was it granted? If not, why not?

Mr. DICKEY. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. No, nor was he ever such. He was employed temporarily on two different occasions, in 1892 for three months, and from January, 1893, to March, 1895. 2. No charges were made against him. 3. He asked for an investigation, but it was not granted. 4. It was not granted because there were no charges to investigate. He was employed from day to day, and his services were dispensed with, when they were no longer required.

SALT PORK IMPORTATIONS.

Mr. BORDEN asked :

What is the value of the total importation of salted pork into Canada during the first six months of the present fiscal year, viz., from 1st July to 31st December, inclusive?

What amount of duty was collected thereon, and what quantity remained in bond on 31st December?

Mr. WOOD. The value of the total importations of salt pork imported into Canada for consumption during the first six months of the current fiscal year was $132,508. 2. Duty was collected thereon to the amount of $52,681.62. 3. The quantity remaining in warehouse on 31st December, 1895, was 487,072 pounds.

ALGOMA ELECTION, 1891.

Mr. AMYOT asked :

1. What is the date of the return made by the returning officer for the district of Algoma, at the general elections, in 1891?

2. On what date does that report show that the election of George Hugh Macdonell, Esq., for the said electoral district, at the said election, took place?

3. On what date did the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery receive the said return?

4. On what date was the said return published by the said Clerk in the "Canada Gazette"?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. The return made by the returning officer for the electoral district of Algoma at the general elections in 1891 bears no date. 2. The vote took place on the 18th May, 1891. 3. The return to the writ was received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on the 3rd June, 1891. 4. The notice announcing the election of Geo. Hugh Macdonell, Esq., as member to represent that electoral district in the House of Commons, was published in the "Canada Gazette" on the 6th June, 1891.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Has the Department of Public Works received a petition from the inhabitants of Tignish, P.E.I., asking the department to repair the Tignish breakwater, P.E.I., immediately?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes. Mr. Edward Hackett forwarded to the department, on the 3rd February inst., a memorial from the committee appointed at a public meeting held at Tignish, recommending that certain improvements and repairs be made to the breakwater at that place.

THE WRECK OF THE "SAN PEDRO."

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries answer the question regarding the wreck of the "San Pedro," which was dropped through misunderstanding? The hon. Minister, I understood, agreed to answer without notice.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I brought the answer here, but have not it by me at the moment. I will be ready to answer the question tomorrow.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. FLINT moved :

He said: On Wednesday, the 12th instant, I made a few observations leading up to the arguments that could be drawn from the report of the commission on the liquor traffic in favour of the adoption of the resolution now before us. As some time has elapsed since the matter was brought forward, I deem it scarcely necessary to apologize for referring briefly to the line of argument taken on that occasion. I endeavoured to show—very inadequately, of course, in consequence of the shortness of the time to which I had limited myself—that in no quarter was there any serious question raised as to the complete jurisdiction of this Parliament to carry out the spirit of this resolution; in other words, that, notwithstanding the vast mass and great variety of legal argument and decision that has been had on the various phases of the liquor traffic, as it might be dealt with, municipally, provincially, or federally, no jurist had seriously contended that the power of absolute prohibition did not lie with the Dominion Parliament. The matter is now before Her Majesty's Privy Council, and the absence of their decision must be deemed very regrettable. The case, as presented, deals almost entirely, if not absolutely so, with the nature and details of the jurisdiction of the provincial parliaments to regulate or restrain the liquor traffic. It has been contended with some force that the powers of the provincial legislatures in that regard go sufficiently far to effectually prohibit the traffic within each province. It is not necessary for the discussion of this resolution that that line of argument should be taken up here or that that matter should be discussed here. If this Parliament has unquestioned power, then, I hold, this Parliament should act upon that power, and carry out the wishes of the people, or of the majority of the people, if it believes that those wishes are based upon sound constitutional and economic principles. In order to make still more clear this position, I would read one or two extracts from the observations made by the judges upon the case which is now, or recently has been, before the Privy Council, their decision of which we are now awaiting. That case, in the form of three questions, was laid before the Supreme Court of Canada, all of these questions relating to the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature. But, during the argument of that case, and in the rendering of opinion of the judges of our Supreme Court, we find a few observations strongly in the line which I have assumed as the basis of the argument here. His lordship, the chief justice, said :

I answer the third and fourth questions in the negative, because the prohibition of the manufacture and importation would affect trade and commerce, and so must belong to the Dominion ; and further, for the reason that prohibition to that extent would affect the revenue of the Dominion derived from the customs and excise duties.

His Lordship Justice Gwynne, in the course of a more lengthy and thorough argument upon the whole range of these various questions of jurisdiction, summed up so clearly the nature of the decisions in the leading cases relating to this topic, that I make no apology for reading it at some length here. His lordship observed :

The subject which we have now under consideration is the right of absolutely prohibiting the carrying on of the trades of manufacturing, importing and selling spirituous liquors, the right, in fact, of declaring by legislative authority that these trades or some or one of them, shall not be carried on ; that the carrying of them on shall be absolutely unlawful. This subject does not admit of two aspects. Between pronouncing the carrying on of a particular trade to be absolutely unlawful, and prescribing the manner in which, and the persons by whom, that trade, being unlawful, shall be carried on there is a vast difference. Fredericton vs. the

Queen (1), and Russell vs. the Queen (2), are cases dealing with the former of such subjects—

That is, with total prohibition.

—and Hodge vs. the Queen (3), and Sulte vs. Three Rivers (4), are cases dealing with the latter.

That is, the regulation and licensing of the liquor traffic.

In Fredericton vs. the Queen (1), and Russell vs. the Queen (2), the question was as to jurisdiction in the case of prohibition. In the former of those cases this court held that the provincial legislatures had not under section 92 any jurisdiction to pass the Act then under consideration, the purpose of which was to legislate upon that subject ; and that by force of section 91, item 2, the Dominion Parliament had expressly exclusive jurisdiction to pass it. In Russell vs. the Queen their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, while expressing no opinion as to the applicability of section 91, item 2, held that there was nothing in section 92 conferring on the provincial legislatures jurisdiction to pass the Act in question, the sole purpose of which was in relation to the absolute prohibition of the trade. In Hodge vs. the Queen on the other hand they held that the provincial legislatures had exclusive jurisdiction over the regulation of the manner in which and the persons by whom the trade, being a lawful one, might be carried on, a subject-matter as different as it is possible to conceive from jurisdiction legislatively to declare the carrying on of the trade to be absolutely unlawful.

Here, then, we have an illustration of the application of the language of their lordships in the passage above extracted from their judgment in Hodge vs. the Queen, namely, if we regard the traffic in intoxicating liquor in the aspect of total jurisdiction of the carrying on of the trade, that is to say, eliminating it from the category of lawful trades, in that aspect the jurisdiction is exclusively in the Dominion Parliament.

His lordship, Mr. Justice Sedgewick, referring to the same phase of the question, reviewed one of these cases in the following words :—

(g.) The cases decided in the Privy Council, in my view, practically conclude the question. Russell vs. the Queen (1) decided that the Canada Temperance Act, a prohibitory Act, was such an Act as the Dominion Parliament might properly pass.

And Mr. Justice King, in the same case, made these observations :

The Dominion Parliament, having in 1883, passed a general licensing Act applicable to the entire country, this, with an amending Act of 1884, was held ultra vires upon a reference of the subject to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Then with regard to prohibition, the Canada Temperance Act (1) is a local option prohibitory Act.

After describing the Act, he observes :

In the city of Fredericton vs. the Queen (2), the Act was held valid, chiefly as relating to the subject of trade and commerce. In Russell vs. the Queen (3), it was sustained on other grounds. Their Lordships, approaching the subject from the side of provincial powers, held that the provisions of the Act did not fall within any of the classes of subject assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures. It was, therefore, in their opinion, at least within the general, unenumerated and residual powers of the general Parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures.

These quotations sum up in judicial language the state of the case, so far as it has gone at the present time, and for any one who has looked carefully throughout the decisions relating to this subject, there is no reason to suppose that as regards the competency of this Parliament, the anticipated judicial decision of the Privy Council will make any alteration in that matter. It is expected that there will be a more clear and definite decision as to the powers, duties and privileges of the local parliaments. On a previous occasion, when I had the honour of addressing the House on this subject, I alluded to the nature of the popular support which the demand upon Parliament for a prohibitory measure, had received, and, at the time, I endeavoured, briefly, to answer several of the most frequently-repeated objections which are made as to the advisability of Parliament taking any action in that regard. Parliament, however, having approached this subject in 1894, with a desire to ascertain more clearly and definitely than had, up to that time, been officially ascertained, the position of the prohibition question, from economic, historic and other standpoints, acceded to the appointment of a Royal Commission, the report of which, in many volumes, has already been distributed. Although many objected to the appointment of that commission, and none more than myself, yet I am willing to admit that they have, although at great expense, accumulated a large amount of valuable information, which information, no doubt, when carefully examined, will throw a flood of light upon all the phases of this very interesting and important question. The evidence is very voluminous, and it would be impossible, even within any ordinary time, for a person engaged in ordinary occupations, without devoting himself almost solely to the study of that evidence, to analyse it in order to report upon it in a fair and intelligible manner; to sift casual opinions from those opinions which are based upon careful study and reasonable deduction, and in order to classify the various points of evidence brought together in these five bulky volumes. The commissioners, however, have endeavoured fairly and adequately to sum up some of the more salient features of that evidence, in their report. I do not propose to read at any length from this report, because it is in the hands of hon. members, and a great deal of time could be taken up in mere cursory quotations from many of its more pointed arguments. But it would only be fair to the commissioners who have laboured, I think, conscientiously, to bring forward, in as clear a form as possible, the information which was placed before them, that some reference should be made to that report during the course of this debate. Although the quotations that I may make must necessarily be fragmentary, yet I think they will throw considerable light upon this resolution, and will be found to be altogether in favour of its adoption. Upon page 9, the commissioners, after referring at great length to the quantities of spirits which are manufactured in Canada, covering a number of years, and to the quantity of materials used in the manufacture of liquor, make this pregnant admission:

Deducting from the total of $2,382,765, the value of the Indian corn, hops and malt imported, the remainder would represent the sum of $1,596,343, which is a reasonable estimate of the interest of the agricultural classes of the Dominion in the materials made use of annually in, and in connection with, the manufacture of spirituous and malt liquors in Canada.

An argument has always been pressed by those who did not think that a prohibitory liquor law would be beneficial, that in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, in addition to other interests which are affected, the agricultural interests had a large share, and are in some measure bound up with it. I think this statement will completely dissipate any notions any hon. gentlemen may have had, that the agricultural interests are largely affected by the manufacture of intoxicating liquors in this country. If the sum of about $1,500,000 represents the interest of the agricultural classes of the Dominion in the manufacture of spirituous and malt liquors used in Canada, then, of course, we can see that the total prohibition of the liquor traffic would have scarcely any perceptible effect upon the interests of the agricultural classes. This is entirely without taking into consideration the disastrous effects which the use of intoxicating liquors have upon such portion of those classes that consume them. The commissioners inform us as to the number of people employed in connection with the manufacturing of spirituous and malt liquors. These figures are interesting and important, because I think the argument to be deduced from them follows largely on the same line. The census returns show that there are employed in connection with distilleries 404 persons, with breweries 1,865, and with malt houses 45. If to those numbers are added the number of people employed in making barrels used in breweries and distilleries, the number being 60, the total number employed is given as 2,374. These figures include office staff, but exclude those engaged in feeding cattle. Consequently we see that, as regards labour, only 2,374 persons in Canada would be directly affected. I am not now alluding to incidental labour connected with other phases of the traffic, which will be alluded to later. No one will pretend for an instant to say that of the number of 2,374 persons thus injured, the large majority would not be immediately re-engaged in some other employment more profitable to the community at large, more beneficial to the general interests of the state and not less conducive to their own personal welfare. The commissioners on page 11 sum up the total amount paid for Canadian products of all kinds which they think would be included in the manufacture of spirituous and malt liquors. The total amount is said to be of the value of $5,039,506. From this is deducted $1,028,671 for imported materials, leaving $4,123,500 as the sum paid for wages, fuel, transportation, taxes, and so on. So we have the interest, not of the agricultural class, but the interest of all other classes combined that are connected directly with the manufacture of spirituous and malt liquors in Canada summed up by the majority of the commissioners, who are not favourable to a prohibitory law, as involving $4,000,000 per annum. No hon. gentleman can seriously argue that the complete loss of this expenditure of money would do any material injury to the people of Canada at large, when he takes into consideration the fact that a large proportion of this amount would be immediately made use of for some other purpose or in some other occupation more beneficial to the general interests. Statistics given in respect to the amount of capital invested in brewing and distilling establishments are as follows:—Capital invested in distilleries, $7,064,000; breweries, $8,311,453; malt houses, $223,500; total, $15,588,953. This represents a total amount of capital invested in distilleries, breweries and malt houses in Canada, placed at fifteen and a half millions, a large sum taken by itself, but compared with the general industries of the Dominion one of comparative insignificance. Even assuming that the liquor traffic was not admitted to be injurious in almost all its direct and indirect effects, and that it was innocuous, the amount of capital invested, fifteen and a half millions, taken by itself might seem large, and he who would strike down, or those who would legislate its destruction might seem to be striking at an important industry of the state which would materially affect its general prosperity. But let us compare this capital with the capital invested in some other of our trades, and we will see that it is comparatively unimportant. In books and stationery in 1891 the capital invested was $10,000,000; in vegetable foods alone, over $31,000,000; in animal foods, nearly $43,000,000; in furniture, houses and buildings, over $18,000,000; in leather, boots and shoes, nearly $19,000,000; in lighting apparatus, gas and electric, $21,000,000; in machines, tools and implements, nearly $56,-

000,000; in vegetable preparations, &c., about $79,000,000; in textile fabrics, over $43,000,000. Comparing the number of employees and amount of wages connected with the liquor traffic and in these industries I have named, the disproportion in their relative importance seems still as great, if not greater. While the manufacture of spirits and malt liquors requires the employment of 2,374 men, with a capital invested of something over fifteen millions, the number of employees in connection with books and stationery is nearly 10,000, with a wage list of $3,876,343 per annum; carriages and sleighs, 1,462 hands, with a wage list of $5,369,946. Chemicals, with only a capital of $4,000,000, employs 2,845 persons, with a wage list of about $1,000,000; and so it is with all these various trades with the details of which I will not trouble the House. But we see that the manufacture of liquor, not only as regards its capital but as regards the number of employees and the amount of wages paid, is one of the most insignificant as well as one of the most useless industries in the whole world. Its destruction could not injuriously affect for any long period of time any considerable number of people. The commissioners, on page 35 of their report, afford us some information as to the quantity of spirits and malt used in Canada. These figures have been repeatedly given in discussions in this House, but for the information of those who have not paid special attention to them, and particularly for the information of the constituencies, they will bear repetition. Almost all statisticians, both amateur and professional, agree largely in the correctness of this statement:

Taking an average of the quantities of wine, spirits and malt liquors entered for consumption in the five years ending 1893, but excluding cider and native wines, and taking an average of the retail prices, the calculation shows the sum of $39,879,854, to be paid for liquor by the consumers. As more than one-half of this amount is paid for spirits to which, it is well understood, a large addition of water is made before they are vended to the public, the total amount paid is probably considerably in excess of the sum just mentioned.

The amount of revenue received by the Dominion Government is also given at $7,101,557. The commissioners then recapitulate the various items to which they have previously referred, as follows:—

Capital invested in breweries, distilleries and malt houses	$15,588,953
Value of real estate occupied by vendors of liquors, estimated by the trade to be $70,000,000, but which is probably nearer	38,000,000
There are in addition, fixtures, &c., estimated by the trade at what seems an excessive valuation, viz.	21,000,000
There is an extensive stock of liquor always on hand in distilleries and elsewhere, and credit to a large extent has to be given to the retail vendor. These conditions probably lead to the employment of a large amount additional, temporarily obtained from bankers, of which no estimate has been attempted

The brewers and distillers disburse, in wages and for material required, payment of municipal taxes, &c., &c., a sum estimated at.....	$5,039,906
There is paid for imported liquors, including ocean freights, &c.	1,901,897
For federal excise and customs duties, licenses, &c.	7,101,557
For licenses, &c., provincial and municipal	1,353,465
For wages of those engaged in the retail and wholesale trade, a sum estimated at	10,500,000

Commenting upon these figures and upon evidence given by men of intelligence and experience in various walks of life, in regard to the effect of the liquor traffic upon the general welfare; among other observations, the commissioners say:

That many and grievous evils and much wretchedness and misery are caused by over-indulgence in the use of intoxicants, does not admit of controversy. It is impracticable to reach the number of individuals in the community who are guilty of such over-indulgence, and who thereby inflict injury upon themselves and their families, and dissipate means which might and should be applied to worthier objects. Considering, however, the repeated offences committed by those who so offend, the proportion of them to the total population of the Dominion, the undersigned believe to be comparatively small, and probably smaller in Canada than in any other country in regard to which it has been practicable to obtain information.

How much of the crime, poverty, and insanity of the country is to be attributed to the use of intoxicating liquors, cannot be accurately determined from any information accessible to the commissioners.

Here I may remark, that, throughout the commissioners' report, we find the complaint that they are unable to find precise and definite data upon all these various points, and they are obliged, in the absence of these statistics, to rely upon the volunteered testimony of various persons who have studied the question from various stands, point and in their own way. They quote with approval, however, the statements prepared for the United States Census Bureau for 1890, and the statistics of homicide, where they refer to the cause of crime. The commissioners, apparently, approve of this statement, and it is one which with proper modifications might not be disapproved of by the strongest advocate of a prohibitory liquor law. As to the causes of crime, the report of the United States Census Bureau says: Ignorance is a cause of crime; ignorance of a trade is a cause of crime; idleness is a cause of crime; intemperance is a cause of crime. And this report says:

All of these causes, and others which might be named, are in fact only contributory causes whose operation is secondary and indirect. External circumstances facilitate or hinder the commission of crime. They operate as a stimulant to the criminal impulse or as a check upon it. But the root of crime is not in circumstance, but in character.

Now, this remark, I think, is open to argument, and I feel that I will be supported by the study and experience of every hon. gentleman who has given this subject thought, when I say that intemperance is not only directly the cause of crime, in itself, but that intemperance is the cause of ignorance; the cause of the ignorance of a trade, and the cause of idleness. In other words, underlying these causes of crime, which are here given as secondary, in every portion of the world where intoxicating liquors are used, and in proportion to the quantity in which they are used, all the secondary causes of crime are brought into operation, and, consequently, if ignorance or idleness is the cause of crime, we should go back of that and find what caused the ignorance, what caused the idleness, what caused the failure of individual character, and what caused the conditions which led to a large amount of crime. I submit it candidly to the House, that the statements of the most profound jurists, and the statements of experienced officials, dealing with the criminal classes, are largely in support of the theory, that, in every civilized country, intemperance is the greatest, the most general and fundamental of all causes of crime. Passing from these phases, with which the commissioners have dealt at considerable length, a large portion of their report is taken up with a review, historic and economic, of the progress of restrictive legislation in the various countries of the world. To follow these would, of course, be entirely out of place here, because they do not lead, superficially, at any rate, to any very definite conclusion. Strong contentions are made in some states that prohibitive and restrictive legislation have been fruitful of benefit, while others have contended, that the laws have been evaded, and that the benefit is more apparent than real. But, I think, a careful and candid study would show, in those states where legislation of the most restrictive character possible within the limits of the jurisdiction of the various states has been had, large majorities of the most thoughtful and best people—those who are generally considered the most devoted to the general welfare—are strongly in favour of supporting this restrictive legislation. The state of Maine is alluded to frequently by some as a flagrant example of the failure of prohibitory legislation, and by others as a shining light to all the world of the grand results of such legislation. At any rate, if the verdict of popular approval is to be taken as any evidence in favour of the adoption of that class of legislation, I think we can see that the people of the state of Maine, who are certainly as intelligent, as well-educated and as public-spirited as the people of any other commonwealth of the same size on this continent, are strongly wedded to the legislation they have. But, Sir, their legislation is not as complete as this Parliament has the power to enact. Prohibitory legislation in Maine is, in fact, restricted largely by its state character, and largely by the interfering power possessed by the general legislature, which, to a certain degree, hampers the full and efficient operation of the law. At any rate, the traffic there has been driven from publicity; it has been relegated to holes and corners; and the abounding prosperity of the state, by no means blessed with the resources that the Dominion of Canada has, proves that a prohibitory liquor law has by no means injured the general interests of the people. One illustration alone may be given. While the state of Maine, with a population of something under 700,000, if I am not mistaken, has in its savings banks nearly $60,000,000, the whole Dominion of Canada, with a population of something like 5,000,000, has nothing like as large an amount deposited in its Government savings banks. This taken with other statistics which are easily accessible, proves that, whatever effect a prohibitory liquor law may have, it does not affect the means the people have of securing and storing up wealth.

The conclusion of the commission's report is very weak and very general in its character. They not only do not recommend a prohibitory liquor law, but, so far as I can gather, they recommend very little of anything. They call the attention of the Government to the great lack of precise statistics; they refer to the lack of information accessible to students of this question, and they intimate that they think the claims to compensation on the part of those engaged in the manufacture and the traffic of intoxicating liquors should be considered. Their general remarks simply refer to the necessity of legislation in regard to the treatment of habitual drunkards, and of restrictive arrangements with regard to the licensing of saloons; and they make some moral reflection of a very general nature, but none of which come within the line of duty of this Parliament. Consequently, I think we are forced to conclude, notwithstanding the large amount of evidence accumulated by the commissioners, and the value of the information they have given us, that the conclusions at which they have arrived are very unsatisfactory. At any rate, they recommend nothing that this Parliament can carry out. Their recommendations, if they are worth anything at all, are recommendations to local and provincial parliaments, which must be developed by them within the lines of their jurisdiction. Consequently, so far as this Parliament is concerned, while the facts adduced by the royal commission are of importance as shedding light on this subject, their recommendations are practically that this Parliament should do nothing whatever in connection with the subject.

It is a pleasure, then, to pass from this very vague and inconclusive attempt at settling the question reached by the commissioners, to the strong, well-argued and pointed report of the dissenting commissioner, the Rev. Dr. McLeod. His report is quite lengthy, but it deals clearly and unmistakably with the question of prohibition upon the lines within which this Parliament has power to act. He quotes, on page 530, from Sir Leonard Tilley:

Sir Leonard Tilley, for forty years in public life, a member of the Government of Canada for many years, and for twelve years Governor of the province of New Brunswick, says: "I have been fifty-five years a teetotaler and pretty actively identified with the whole movement, and everybody who has watched it must see the deleterious effects the traffic has, morally, socially, physically, and in every other way upon the people. When we consider the expenditure that takes place for intoxicating beverages, and what should also be considered, the loss of time and other losses indirectly connected with it, the effect upon the human system in weakening and destroying it, and also in the production of crime and poverty, the consideration of the business results is one of secondary importance. For myself, I have never changed my opinion as to the beneficial results that would follow from the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages, except to have it strengthened."

No excuse is necessary for introducing the name of that eminent man in this discussion. Sir Leonard Tilley is not only a humanitarian in his feelings, but a practical statesman, and one who has deservedly had great weight in the councils of his country and in the councils of his party; and I think a calm and clear statement from a man of his character must carry great weight with the members of this House and with the people of this country. I quote from another man, eminent in another sphere of life, but one whose words should have great weight with all thinking men. Sir William Dawson says:

My own interest is the most important one to me in Canada. In regard to other interests, I think there are only two that have come under my cognizance which it will be worth saying anything about. One is that to which I have just referred, namely, the interests of the students. I have always felt it my duty, as have other officers of the university, to set an example of total abstinence to students and to do everything possible to prevent them from falling into bad habits in that respect. But we have been greatly hampered by the existence of drinking places within easy reach of the university. That is one point. The other is in regard to pauperism. I have had occasion to institute inquiries in regard to the pauperism of Montreal. I can confidently say that nearly all the want and destitution prevailing in this city is, directly or indirectly, attributable to the liquor traffic.

The dissenting commissioner sums up the loss and the cost to the people of the country at large resulting from the liquor traffic, in a very clear and lucid manner. I will not quote what he says at length, but I would commend it to all gentlemen who wish to study this question. The cost of the liquors consumed in Canada is estimated at $39,979,328. He adds to this the other losses—the cost of prisons, the loss of labour, the depreciation of the wage-earning capacity of the wage-earning classes, and the various other items of loss that can reasonably be brought within the scope of the disasters caused to the people by this traffic; following largely the lines of arguments that are frequently made on this subject; and he estimates the total loss to the people of Canada of productive labour at $76,288,000 per annum, and the total net loss to the country directly and indirectly at $134,000,000. If the liquor traffic should be abolished, if the habits of the people in this regard could be completely reformed, and capitalized, we would see what an enormous capital wealth there would be placed to the credit of the people of the Dominion, the money expended in this traffic saved and at least—from seventy million dollars to one hundred million dollars per annum, representing an enormous capital, or the interest of an enormous capital, which is now completely dissipated, and worse than dissipated, as far as any benefit to the state is concerned. The dissenting commissioner concludes his views on the subject committed to him by remarks strongly favourable to absolute prohibition, which, I think, will be accepted generally as absolutely correct. The fourth subject of inquiry of the commission was as to the effect which the enacting of a prohibitory liquor law would have in respect of social conditions, agricultural business, industrial, and commercial interests, of the revenue requirements of municipalities, province and Dominion, and also as to the capability of efficient enforcement. He said:

The effect that prohibition would have upon the social conditions of the community, can, to some extent, be inferred from the results that have already been obtained, and from the fact that such prohibition would remove the cause of evils that now exist. The mere "enactment" of a law could not be very effective beyond the educating influence that must be exercised upon the community in reference to evil by the effect of legislation against that evil. Respect for law will also be cultivated by the bringing of law into harmony with right principles.

It is impossible, in face of the facts already set out, to come to any other conclusion than that the effect of prohibition on the social condition of the people would be good, the extent of the benefit conferred by it varying with the thoroughness of the enforcement of the law. * *

The effect that prohibition would have upon agricultural business is not at first sight so clear. The liquor traffic furnishes a market for certain kinds of agricultural produce, and it is frequently assumed that if the traffic were abolished, the agriculturist would suffer. Looking into this, it is seen to be a less serious matter than it is made to appear. * * *

The following results in relation to agricultural business would be likely to accompany agriculture prohibition:—

Mr. FLINT.

1. The first effect would be to impel agriculturists to produce material for export rather than for the domestic manufacture of liquor.

2. The wealth of the country would be increased by the amount of grain accruing from the exportation of this product instead of its destruction.

3. The increased national wealth, being to some extent in the hands of a class of the community now impoverished through intemperance, would be likely to raise the general standard of living, thus leading to an increased home consumption of the finer classes of agricultural produce. This would naturally compel the feeding of this stock upon Canadian produce, which would be a benefit to agricultural interests.

4. If the distilling business were terminated, there would be likely a falling off or a complete stoppage of the importation of foreign grain now used for distilling, and the refuse of which is taken for feeding stock, a large part of which stock finds its way to a foreign market. This would naturally compel the feeding of this stock upon Canadian produce, which would be a benefit to agricultural interests.

5. To the extent to which the agricultural classes are now consumers of intoxicating liquors, that class would be benefited by their savings through the termination of the liquor traffic. Increased sobriety, meaning improved habits, would tell favourably upon agricultural as well as other interests. What benefits the country at large must benefit the farmer.

He deals in the same way with the various industrial interests. He quotes, among others, Mr. George Gooderham, of the firm of Gooderham & Worts, Toronto, whose distillery is the largest in Canada, and who said that his firm employed 150 men. Mr. Gooderham admitted that he did not know of any business in Canada, employing the same amount of capital, and having such an enormous output, which gives employment to so few people.

The effect that prohibition would have, in respect of the revenue requirements of the municipalities, provinces and the Dominion, is an important consideration, though not by any means the most important. He deals with the municipal revenue, the provincial revenue, and the Dominion revenue. And here I may make a remark which is always made, and I think correctly made, with reference to this aspect of the question, namely, that there would be a temporary and immediate loss of a considerable amount of revenue. But if what has been said of the evils and the general character of the evils of intemperance be true, and what can be reasonably argued as to the almost immediate effect of a proper enforcement of a prohibitory liquor law, then we can easily see that the loss of revenue to the Dominion would be rapidly made up. At any rate, you have the authority of many practical men on this point, whose opinions have been previously quoted here. We have the authority of such men as Mr. Gladstone, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir Alexander Galt, Sir Leonard Tilley, and our present Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), as well as of other publicists and economists of eminence, all pointing in the same direction, that the loss of revenue will be temporary and trifling, compared with the substantial benefit and the large opportunities for revenue that will be derived from other sources. The dissenting commissioner, of course, from the line that I have briefly quoted, concludes that a prohibitory law would affect all the good results claimed for it by its advocates. The objection that it could not be enforced has been fully disposed of. Those who have faith in the law-abiding character of the people of Canada, those who know that we are not in the habit, in this country, of nullifying laws constitutionally enacted, and who believe that if a prohibitory liquor law were placed on the statute-book, it would receive the support, not only of those who have earnestly and ardently pressed for its adoption, but the support of the vast bulk of the law-abiding community, have faith in the possibility of a practical enforcement of such a law. To believe otherwise, would be to argue that our people are not true to the institutions of their country. We do not believe that. Granted that the legislature, moved by the arguments which have been placed before it by the commission, and from time to time from other sources, should see fit to place, within a reasonable period of time, a judicious and well-considered prohibitory law upon the statute-books, supported, as it must be, by the bulk of the community, we can have no doubt that that law would receive a hearty support. It is, after all, the only logical and adequate remedy. All other laws, beneficial as they may have been in various ways, and viewed from various standpoints, have so far proved ineffectual as a complete remedy for the evils connected with the liquor traffic. Prohibition, then, is the only adequate remedy. And it is in a line completely with our general system of legislation. When we find that certain evils arise which affect adversely the industries of our country, which tend to injure our opportunities for progress, development and advancement, we legislate in such a way as to destroy these influences. And it is along this line we should legislate with regard to the liquor traffic. A prohibitory liquor law would not only be reasonable and in a line with all our principles of legislation, but I believe would be consonant with the general trend of public sentiment. There can be no doubt that the churches, as a rule, are favourable to it. There can be no doubt that their moral and intellectual influence will be strongly cast in its support, there can be no doubt large masses of the community, in various portions of the Dominion, are deeply interested in the passage of legislation of this kind. It is true they are not congregated in any one particular district, but are spread throughout all portions of the Dominion. But they are active and energetic in pressing upon the attention of their representatives the vital importance of this question to the welfare of the country. This, Sir, would be a truly remedial measure. We have seen the whole Dominion roused over the question of remedying what may be claimed to be the grievance of a minority in a province. But the grievances of any minority in connection with education are trifling in comparison with the grievances the country as a whole suffers through the liquor traffic, grievances the country is likely to continue to suffer if that traffic is allowed to continue its course unchecked. Let us, then, endeavour to meet the wishes of those who ask for a complete remedy for these great evils, such a complete remedy as would be given by an Act of this Parliament prohibiting the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors except for medicinal, sacramental and mechanical purposes. These are purposes that every one recognizes as wise and proper to be conserved. It is only as regards beverage purposes that the advocates of prohibition ask this Parliament to act; and I think that now as Parliament is going before the people, it could not go before them under more glorious auspices than with a resolution such as this, passed not by one party, urged forward not by one party, but by men of all political parties rallying together to show that we wish to remedy this grievance, one of the greatest grievances the country has ever suffered from or is ever likely to suffer from in the future.

Mr. CRAIG. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, the House will not expect me to say anything new upon this question, a question that has been brought before the House session after session for a great many years. I have heard one objection made to this resolution—that the same reason exists for opposing it as existed last year, and that is that the decision of the Privy Council as to the respective rights of the Dominion and the provinces has not yet been given. No doubt that will be, in the minds of some hon. members, an objection. But, whether the resolution is carried or not, I think, perhaps, it may not be amiss that this subject is brought before the House, and, being brought before the House, is thereby brought to the attention of the country as well. Why do I second this resolution, Mr. Speaker? First of all to show where I stand personally. On this question I give no uncertain sound. I do not pretend that I am better than other people because I am a total abstainer; but I am a prohibitionist in my own practice, and I believe that prohibition, if it could be enforced, and if it could be carried in this country, would be a great benefit to the country. And I second this resolution not only to show where I stand personally, but to speak for those who are asking for prohibition. There are some who ask for prohibition who have no votes in the elections for this House, many of whom have done a great deal of work for this cause. I refer to the temperance women of this country. They have a claim to be heard. While they may feel disappointed that they have not seen prohibition carried into effect, I am sure that they cannot be disappointed when they look around and see the great results of their self-denying labour. I am sure we must all admit that the members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union have done great good in this country. They are earnest, they are self-denying and, though they are subject to a great deal of criticism, yet I am satisfied that those who will consider the results of their efforts must believe that those efforts have been largely blessed.

But, Sir, I speak not only for the women who are working for the cause of temperance but for those women who are suffering from the results of intemperance—women who have drunken husbands, women whose sons have been led away into drinking habits. There are such women all over this country, and they are asking us to-day to pass this resolution, they are asking us to adopt a prohibitory law; they are looking forward eagerly to the time when the temptations of drink will be removed from the paths of their husbands who now spend for the gratification of the passion for drink the money that should go to the support of their families, from the paths of their sons who now cannot go to their employment without being tempted to enter the open door of the saloon. I have said that these women have no votes though there are many people who hold that they should be given votes. But as they have not the power which the vote confers, there is all the more reason that we should give earnest consideration to this question in which they are so vitally interested. While all men are interested in this question the women of this country are far more deeply interested, for, while men may suffer from this evil the women suffer from it far more.

But, Sir, I not only speak for the women who advocate the cause of temperance and the women who suffer from the results of intemperance on the part of husbands and sons, but I speak for the temperance men of this country. I speak for most of the ministers of our churches, men, whom, I am sure, we all respect. I think I may say that I speak for a majority of the bishops and priests of the Roman Catholic Church throughout the Dominion. I was glad to notice that, a short time ago, in the United States, the bishops had taken a strong stand on this question. We know that their labours are constantly put forth to lessen the evils of the great curse of intemperance. I speak not only for the ministers, but I speak for a great many of our best citizens—I may say for the majority of our best citizens. And here let me say that I think great harm has been done by some advocates of temperance who are a little too earnest and go so far as to denounce those who do not see their way to advocate prohibition. I would be the last man to denounce those who do not go as far as I do. There are many men in this country who believe in temperance and practice temperance and yet who do not believe in prohibition. They object to prohibition for various reasons—some of which I hope to refer to before sitting down—and I think it is a great mistake for advocates of prohibition to denounce these men and to say they are not friends of the temperance cause. I myself have seen cases in which the cause of temperance has been retarded by the denunciations indulged by some of those whom I call extremists on this question.

I have spoken of those who favour this proposed law, let me for a moment or two refer to those who object to it. I take first those who are connected with the business. We are not surprised that these men should object to prohibition: it is only natural that they should object, for they are making their living, some of them are making fortunes out of this business. They say that this is a legitimate business. So it is. While I may say that it is a business that works great evil, they do not look at that side of the case. They say: This is a legitimate business and we object to Parliament interfering with it.

Then, I think, perhaps, there is some natural objection on the part of governments. We find that the Dominion Government derives a large revenue from this business, and they naturally object to prohibition because it would take this revenue from them. I suppose any government would take that view, no matter what side of politics would be in power. This is not a party question in this country, and we find that governments always look at it in that light, and are averse to enacting prohibitory laws because they would deprive them of a large amount of revenue. We find that not only does the Dominion Government derive a large revenue from the business, but we find that provincial governments derive a large revenue from it, and we find also that municipalities also derive large revenues. Therefore, we find that there is a large money influence opposed to the cause of prohibition. But, Sir, there are others who oppose it because they have no sympathy at all with temperance. I am glad to think there are not many men of that kind in this country to-day. I am very glad to say that the temperance cause has made great strides, and while we might have found thirty or forty years ago a great many who would say distinctly that they had no sympathy with temperance, to-day there are not many who would say so. But there are some to-day who oppose this proposition, and oppose it very firmly, who have sympathy with the temperance cause, and have sympathy, I may say, with prohibition, but they object to it for various reason. There are some who say there is no necessity for a prohibitory law, that temperance sentiment has advanced and is advancing rapidly, and that instead of a prohibitory law helping this sentiment and helping the temperance cause, it would tend to retard it, and throw it back. Well, Sir, I have no doubt these men are sincere, but I think they are mistaken. They say that the temperance cause has rapidly advanced, and so it has; but I would ask these men: why has the temperance cause advanced so rapidly in the last twenty or thirty years? I say it is just because of the efforts of those men and women who to-day are asking for prohibition. It is these men and women who have brought about this great increase in the temperance sentiment in the country; and now they say: we have got to the point where we think the country is ready for prohibition. Well, Sir, there are many who do not agree with them, who think that we must continue, as in the past, to work for temperance, to advocate temperance, trusting all the time to moral suasion. Then there are some who object to a prohibitory law on the ground that it is an interference with individual liberty, that it would be trespassing on the rights of the individual for the state to say that a man must not drink certain articles, or that he must not sell them. Well, all I can say is this, that in this matter the state has already interfered. The state does control the liquor business to-day. The state does not allow the liquor business to be carried on the same as the grocery business, or the same as the dry goods business, or the same as any other kind of business in the country. We say the liquor business shall be carried on only in certain hours, under certain restrictions. We do restrict it in many ways, and we believe we have a perfect right to control it. So I think that argument is taken out of the way altogether. And not only does the state control the liquor business in many ways, but in a great many other things the state restricts individual liberty when this restriction is for the good of the community; so I think these precedents take away this argument altogether. But, Sir, others object because of the loss of revenue. Well, I have no doubt there would be a loss of revenue, that has been admitted already by the mover of this resolution. There would be a loss of revenue, I do not know exactly what amount, but I think about $7,000,000. We have to look that in the face, that must be considered; and I would just say to all those in this country who are advocating prohibition, that they cannot get rid of this difficulty, they cannot throw it lightly aside and say: oh, it will be made up; but they must consider this question, and they must be willing that it should be considered. True, it has been said by men eminent in the financial affairs of this country, by Sir Leonard Tilley, and I believe by the present

Finance Minister, at one time, that this loss of revenue would be made up if a prohibitory law was put on the statute-book. However, there is no doubt that this question must be considered. It is an objection made by opponents of a prohibitory law, an objection that I would not at all minimize. To me it is one of the great objections. It cannot be taken out of the way by merely casting it aside. It must be considered carefully, and it would be well for those of us who advocate prohibition, to try and show in what practical way this loss of revenue could be made up. But there is another objection urged, and that is that the time has not yet come. Now, Sir, this is an argument that will always be urged; this is an argument that, I suppose, can hardly be met in any way by logic, because it can constantly be said that the time has not come. Well, I would ask, When will the time come? It has been said by some that the time will come when the people of this country send men here who are prepared to vote for a prohibitory law. I suppose the time will come then, and I suppose that the time will not have come until the people in this country make up their minds to send men to Parliament who are in favour of prohibition, until they elect representatives to come here pledged to support prohibition. But until that time, whether the country is ready or not, a prohibitory law will not be placed on the statute-book. But, Sir, there is another difficulty urged, and that is that prohibition could not be enforced. Well, I admit there would be a great difficulty in enforcing this law. I admit it would be more difficult to enforce this law than it is to enforce a great many laws. Now, I think the reason is this: we know that if a prohibitory law was passed, making it a crime to sell liquor, and, I suppose, a crime to drink liquor, a great many people would not think it was a crime at all, except in a legal sense. They would think it was perfectly right, if they could get it without being detected. Now, we all agree that stealing is a crime, there is no difference of opinion about that; but all in this country would not agree that drinking liquor, or even selling liquor, was a crime, even though a prohibitory law was placed on the statute-book. A great many men would look on it as tyranny, and it would be a very difficult thing, as has been found under the Scott Act, to find witnesses to prove the crime, and to enforce the law. There is no doubt that it would be difficult, but, at the same time, I believe there would be an immense improvement. It is not argued by those who argue in favour of prohibition that a prohibitory law would entirely stop the traffic. That is not argued, but it is argued that it would stop it in a great degree. I have heard it said that it would put a stop to at least three-fourths of the drinking in this country. If that result were brought about, I think a prohibitory law would amply repay its passage. If three-fourths of the drinking were done away with in this country by the passage of such a law, then I would be prepared to advocate that law, even although it was difficult to enforce. These are some of the principal objections raised by those who are opposed to the passage of a prohibitory law. Now, why do we advocate a prohibitory law—those of us who are in its favour? I intend to give a few of the reasons. The first reason is this: because we consider that the use of intoxicating liquors is one of the greatest evils of the country, and a great injury to the state. Now, I think that is a proposition that will not be disputed by anybody, even by those who are opposed to prohibition. I think all members of this House will agree that intoxicating liquor is a great curse to this country. I know there are persons who drink moderately, and that many such men say that the liquor does not hurt them at all. But when we look out abroad in this country and see the great evil done by the improper use of intoxicating liquors, when we see that many men are ruined by it, we must all admit that it is a great evil. We cannot deny that it causes a great deal of suffering. I have already referred to women suffering from drunken husbands and sons. That is a matter which appeals to our sympathy—the suffering being caused entirely by intoxicating liquors. Its use is not only the cause of a great deal of suffering, but of a great deal of poverty. The charitable institutions in our cities and towns are called into requisition in a large measure by the use of intoxicating drink, and I am satisfied most of the families that require to be assisted through the winter are brought into that condition by its use. But not only does it cause a great deal of poverty, but it causes a great deal of crime. It is said that 60 per cent of the crime in this country and in all countries is attributable to the use of intoxicating liquors. If by prohibition we could reduce crime by 60 per cent it would amply repay all the inconvenience and loss of revenue that might arise from the enactment of such a measure. Not only does intoxicating liquor cause a great deal of crime, but it also causes a great many accidents. We often find, in perusing the newspapers, that accidents are caused by some man holding a responsible position indulging in drink, and being incapable of performing his duties. Not only for the reasons I have given do I support a prohibitory law, but I hold that intoxicating liquor is a great waste. Not only is it a waste of food, which all admit, because the grain used in making the liquor is not only wasted but absolutely worse than wasted, but there is a great waste of labour in its manufacture. Not only so, but some of the brightest men, who would prove of great service to the country, are ruined by indulging in intoxicating drink. So the use of intoxicating liquor involves great waste of men, of food and of labour.

We do not expect that a prohibitory law would put a stop entirely to the use of intoxicating liquor, but I claim that such a law would remove the temptation from our young men and our boys. I am not so severe on the men engaged in the business as are some other people, because no doubt there are many respectable tavern and hotelkeepers throughout the country; but there are some hotelkeepers, I must say, who abuse the trust reposed in them, who sell liquor to boys, to men already drunk, to men whom they know are spending the last cent they have for the support of their families. I am glad to say that all the hotelkeepers are not men of that kind, but such conduct affords one of the strongest arguments, to my mind, in favour of prohibition. For such men I have no sympathy, they are a curse to a community, and hotelkeepers who sell liquor to boys in their teens are unworthy of any consideration whatever. But I want the temptation removed from our young men. I think it quite possible if a prohibitory law were passed and enforced, we could have a generation growing up in this country that would not be accustomed to strong drink, and from what we know of the subject, and from the teachings of scientific men, the country would be supplied with as many able and capable men as it is to-day, for we are now satisfied that there is no necessity in order to build up a man that he should indulge in this liquor. The treating habit is one of the greatest curses of this country. It is not so bad, perhaps, for a moderate drinker who wishes to take a drink, to go and have a drink alone, but it does seem astonishing that a man should want to take with him half a dozen others, and should even seek to induce men to drink who would not otherwise do so. I reprobate that system most thoroughly, and while it might seem selfish for a man to go and take a drink by himself, if he wants a drink, let him go and do so. The treating habit is undoubtedly one of the greatest sources of intemperance in this country.

I have gone hurriedly over some of the difficulties in connection with this question, and some of the reasons why I advocate prohibition, but I admit that the question is a most difficult one to deal with. I do not think it is one that can be dealt with off-hand. It has been talked over and considered for many years, and a royal commission has been appointed and reported: I do not know whether all the members have read the report of the commission, but I must confess I have not yet found time to go all through it, although, no doubt, there is a great deal of information in it as to the working of prohibitory laws in other countries, and as to the advantages of those laws, and as to their defects. But we must admit, and I admit it frankly, that this question of a prohibitory law is a most difficult one for any parliament to deal with. I claim that a prohibitory law must have a great majority behind it, not only of those who vote, but of all who have votes in this country. It was a great weakness in the Scott Act that it required for its adoption only a majority of the votes cast. It would have been far better if it had required a majority of the votes of all those entitled to vote, because in some cases very little interest was taken in the elections, and the majority of the votes was not represented. The law must have a great majority behind it to be effective. It is no use placing such a law on the statute-book by a bare majority—in fact, I would be opposed to it. While I am in favour of prohibition, I do not want a law placed on the statute-book unless there is a great majority in favour of it. It is claimed by those who have studied the question, that the great majority of the people are in favour of such a law. The only way to show it is for the people to send representatives here to vote for such a measure. Some of those who are earnest in advocating the adoption of a prohibitory law entertain the idea that it is a simple matter, that all there is to be done is to pass a law containing a few clauses, stating that intoxicating liquor shall not be sold or manufactured. But, instead of such being the case, it is a most difficult question, and the framing of a law is a most difficult matter. People have this idea, because, perhaps, they have not considered the question, and not considered the difficulties. There is one question which must be considered in framing a measure of this kind, and that is the enforcement of the law. Some of those who want the law forget this altogether; they think the law would enforce itself; they say that all to be done is to put the measure on the statute-book and it will enforce itself. I do not agree with that view. There would have to be arrangements for enforcing the law, or it would be a perfect farce. It may be said that the provinces would enforce the law. But if the provinces did not, where would the prohibitory law be? Then it would be altogether ineffective, and would become the laughing-stock of the community. So, in framing such a law in this Parliament, we must make some provision for the enforcement of the law, and that is a subject that would require a great deal of consideration. Then Sir, another question which will have to be considered, is the time at which this law should come into force. Some believe that this law should come into force immediately after it has passed; some think it should come into force three years after its passage, and some believe that it should not come into force until five years after. All these contentions would have to be carefully considered, I have no opinion to offer upon that point, but when the law is before the House, no doubt we will have a thorough consideration of that question. But, Sir, there is one question which I have considered a little, and that is the question of compensation. I know that some advocates of prohibition utterly scout the idea of compensation. Well, I must say, I do not agree with them. I have said in this House before, and I repeat again—because I do not wish to be misunderstood, and I do not wish to claim credit for any opinion I do not entertain—I believe that there should be compensation. How it is to be done, I do not know, but I lay it down as my opinion that a prohibitory law will never be carried in this Parliament unless the principle of compensation is embodied in that law. I believe that it should be a fair compensation. I believe that these men who are engaged in this manufacture, are engaged in a legitimate business. They are engaged in a business from which the state derives considerable revenue. They have their capital invested and locked up in plant, and buildings, and other things connected with the trade, and I hold it would be a most unfair thing to wipe out their capital entirely, for the good of the country, for the great good of the country as we claim, without our being willing to pay something for it. I am reminded just now of what was done in Great Britain when slavery was abolished in the West Indies. Compensation was given to the slave owners, although a great many of course would not think that was right. As we all believe, and as is universally believed now, slavery was entirely wrong, but yet, compensation was given to the slave owners for the loss they sustained by the passage of the Anti-Slavery law. So, Sir, if the time ever does come, and I hope it will come, when a prohibitory law shall be passed in this Parliament, I for one shall advocate compensation, and I think the general sense of the community when they examine into the question, will decide that compensation should be given to those engaged in this business. Of course, how far that would go will be a matter for consideration, but I am merely laying down the general principle. There is another point which must be considered in framing this law. The resolution excepts the use of liquor for medicinal, mechanical and sacramental purposes. Now, Sir, as the mover of this resolution (Mr. Flint) has said, we all agree that these exceptions should be made, but at the same time, these exceptions would have to be carefully safeguarded in any prohibitory law. If they were not carefully safeguarded, the question of manufacture might be left quite open. A great deal of liquor might be disposed of under the head of medicinal and mechanical purposes, if precautions were not taken to prevent it. My object, Sir, is to show all those who are in earnest in advocating a prohibitory law, that it is not a simple matter. It is not merely necessary to draft a law, saying that this traffic shall be prohibited, to cause the whole matter to be accomplished by writing out a few clauses ; but there are a great many things to be considered in drawing this Bill. There are a great many questions to be considered with regard to its enforcement, and with regard to the exceptions that would have to be made.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to see prohibition brought about. I believe it would be of great benefit to this country, but, Sir, I want to see it done intelligently. I want people to do it with their eyes open. I want it to be done with a proper guarantee that it will be enforced. I want it to be done with a due consideration of all the objections that are urged against it. I hold that it would be a great evil, and that it would retard the progress of the temperance cause for many years, if a prohibitory law were passed in one Parliament and repealed in the next. In order to prevent that, I wish that careful consideration should be given to this matter. As I said before, it should be done intelligently, and above all, it should be done with a great majority of the people behind it. If it is done in that way, and if the Bill is drawn carefully, and with a due regard to these considerations, then, Sir, it will be a success. I hope to see the day when such a prohibitory law will pass this Parliament ; but unless it is such a law as I have indicated, I am not anxious to have a prohibitory law at all.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to say a few words, Sir, upon this question which has been so ably presented by the mover (Mr. Flint) and by the seconder (Mr. Craig). This is a question of very great importance ; one that should engage the earnest attention of this House, but one, I fear, that does not engage the attention of the House to the extent it ought to do. We know that the question has received wide and serious consideration in the country, and that the mind of the public is alive to the importance of the prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. When the ideal society of the future exists, we shall no doubt have a society where intemperance and immorality will be unknown, and it is the duty of this House to provide laws which will conduce to the welfare of the inhabitants of the country. No evil exists in Canada or in the civilized world of the magnitude of this evil of intemperance ; no evil does so much to sap the foundations of society, and to render men miserable ; no evil does so much to promote vice as the evil of intemperance. The question, it is said, is hedged and surrounded by difficulties. It is true that no question of public policy is of such transcendent importance as the one which the House is considering at this moment. It is said that difficulty exists with regard to the loss that would be inflicted upon the revenue of the country by the abolition of this traffic. It is true that such a loss would be inflicted upon the revenue, but, Sir, it is a matter well known to statisticians, that over forty millions—probably fifty millions—of the money of the people of Canada is annually squandered in intoxicating liquors. Surely, if a large proportion of the entire amount of this sum can be saved to the country, it will be an easy matter to provide for the loss of revenue that would be entailed by the operation of a prohibitory liquor law.

A still more serious consideration is the fact, that from three to five thousand men annually go down to drunkards' graves in this Dominion, and that is a matter of infinitely more importance than the loss of revenue. The seconder of this motion (Mr. Craig) tells the House that we want to proceed in the matter slowly. I suppose that he fully realizes the difficulties that would surround the framing, the passing, and the enforcing of a law of this kind. We certainly have proceeded slowly thus far. The Government understand perfectly well the policy of going slowly. When the discussion of this question of prohibition had reached a stage in this House, where it was necessary for the Government to say "yea" or "nay," when it was necessary for the Government to take some definite action, what was the course that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and his colleagues took ? It was to refer the question to a commission, a dilatory motion, a motion for the purpose of securing delay. Month after month and year after year passed, while we waited for the report of that commission—a report that is perfectly useless, a report that had no bearing on the question the people will be called upon to decide. No man requires a commission to inform him whether whisky is an evil or not, whether the consequences entailed upon the people of the country by this vice, are evil or not. It does not require a commission to inform the country whether or not it is desirable to put an end to the ravages of this monster. But we had the commission, and the commission has reported. It has reported just in time to save the Government the necessity of taking definite action on this question. The seconder of this motion tells us that we want to go slowly. He tells us that he is in favour of compensation—that will be one of the aspects of the question to be considered. He is in favour of very careful provisions. He is in favour of having everything done intelligently. He is in favour of a law backed up by the great majority of the people. He is right in all these positions except the one with regard to compensation, which is open to debate. Now, what is the position at the present moment of the two great parties in this country in regard to this question ? It is admitted that we cannot have legislation this session. My hon. friend, who is a supporter of the Government, realizes fully that we must proceed slowly in this matter. We all recognize the great evil which this legislation seeks to cope with. How is it to be met? What party in this country is to be entrusted with the task? What may we reasonably expect from the party now in power, if they are elected to fill the Treasury benches again—the party who gave us the royal commission? They have staved off action on the question time and again. The party who are represented on the Treasury benches by a former advocate of prohibition, who has now not a word to say, who is completely dumb on the question? We have nothing to expect from the party at present in power on the line of prohibition, if they are returned to power again. What is the position of the other great party on the question? That party is pledged, not to grant a prohibitory law, but to submit the question of granting a prohibitory law to the people of this country. They are pledged to ascertain, in the first place, whether the majority of the people of Canada are in favour of such a law or not—a perfectly proper course to take; an indispensable course to take, if we hope to pass a law which will be effectively enforced. Let the people of this country judge of this matter on its own merits, isolated from every other political issue. Let them take into consideration the question of compensation, the question of the loss of revenue, and all the other difficulties that surround it; let them know all the consequences of a prohibitory law; and then they will be able to decide on the matter intelligently. If they then decide in favour of a prohibitory law, we shall have a majority of the people standing back of the law, and that will secure its enforcement. Until we ascertain whether a majority of the people are in favour of such a law or not, we shall be proceeding, if we do proceed to legislation, in advance of the steps we ought to take. So far as I am concerned, I will vote in favour of this resolution. I will vote for prohibition at any time. I am in favour of prohibition. But I take this view of the case, that we want to proceed cautiously and intelligently. We want to lay the foundations securely; we want to ascertain whether public sentiment backs us or not; and, when we find that public sentiment does back us, then let us proceed according to the mandate of that public sentiment and pass a law which the Government will be justified in enforcing. This resolution calls for an expression of the opinion of this House. As a member of this House, I am ready to express my opinion. My opinion is, that the liquor traffic is a great evil. My opinion is, that prohibition should be enacted by this House. It cannot be done this session, I suppose. If the Government introduce a prohibitory law, I will vote for it; but I do not expect they will ask us to vote one way or the other. It is my opinion that such a law should be passed. It is my opinion that such a law will one day be passed, and passed by a party that will deal honestly with this question, and not as the party now in power have done. If the electors place in power at the coming elections the party who are pledged to submit to the people for their mandate the question whether a prohibitory law should be passed or not, then the question will be in the hands of the people, and, if they decide that a prohibitory law should be passed, then it will be placed on the statute-book. I repeat, that I will vote for this resolution, and I will vote for prohibition, whenever it is submitted; but I reserve the right to my opinion as to the best course to take to secure a law that will be supported by the people and will be effective.

Mr. LACHAPPELLE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it has been said every time the question under discussion was brought up before this House—and, if my memory serves me, I think this is the fourth time it is brought up before Parliament—it has been said that the people of the province of Quebec were hostile to prohibition. I am not here to-day to speak on behalf of the province of Quebec, and if I rise now, it is only to give my own personal opinion on the question, an opinion which agrees presumably with that of the province of Quebec. No doubt, Mr. Speaker, everybody admits the alarming increase within the last few years of the evils of which the drink habit is the cause. No doubt we all look upon intemperance as the greatest scourge that ever desolated humanity. It is a very serious evil and it is our duty to do everything in our power to check the ravages caused by that plague. We all grant that, and we all desire to take the necessary means to abate the existing evil, and to apply a remedy to so serious an evil. The only thing is that we are not agreed as to the means to be adopted. Thus, on the one hand we see hon. gentlemen, who, like the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), brings down for the third time, I think, a motion which tends to have enacted by the House a complete prohibition of the drink-traffic, as a means of uprooting the evils caused by drunkenness, or to prevent the excessive use of alcoholic liquors. Such is the remedy the hon. gentleman proposes for our adoption. On the other hand, we see a great many citizens, philanthropists and legislators who hold quite a contrary opinion, and declare that prohibition cannot be the most efficacious remedy against the terrible evil of alcoholism. No doubt, Sir, there is, on both sides, the same sincerity and the same desire to find out a solution for this social problem, the most important problem which has ever required the attention of well-meaning men, a problem which takes the precedence over all other questions. All those who have at heart social reform, have given this question their most serious consideration. Such is, to my mind, the best way of explaining the differences of opinion mentioned. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it can hardly be expected that this House will be a unit on the question now under discussion. It is not to be wondered at, Sir, if some hon. gentlemen are not ready to agree that prohibition is the most radical and the best remedy for the evils of alcoholism. I am going to undertake, Sir, to give the different grounds of my hostility to prohibition as a remedy for the evils of drunkenness, and I know that my views on the matter are shared by a large number of citizens. And in order the better to define my position, I purpose to take as exhaustive a view as possible of alcoholism. Alcoholism, it must be remembered, is a disease of quite modern growth, and till the year 1850, it was practically unknown, in the modern acceptation of the word. Alcoholic liquors were then largely used and the indulgence in those liquors was not looked upon as physically injurious, and was even considered as somewhat conducive to human health, so much so that a celebrated school of philosophers, that of Salerno, taught as one of its maxims that it was good for the health to get tipsy once a month. It is idle to say, Sir, that such a doctrine would not, nowadays find many supporters, and that another school might also say that the rule laid down by the school of Salerno is rather stringent.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) What is your opinion, as a medical man?

Mr. LACHAPELLE. (Translation.) I will give you my opinion later on. Till 1850, Mr. Speaker, alcoholism was not looked upon as a danger; the use of intoxicants was not really considered as injurious to public health, because the drink habits had not yet given rise to all the evils, the effects of which are now visible, and because people did not believe that inebriety could produce as pernicious results as those which are now on record. This is accounted for by the fact that the spirituous liquors which were then drunk and retailed consisted of pure alcohol or spirit of wine. Alcohol was then made from wine or manufactured from grapes and other fruits. Whence arise then all the evils which are now on record? They are to be traced back to the change brought about by the manufacture of alcohol. Alcohol of wine is almost fallen into disuse, and there has been substituted for it a chemical product which constitutes a deadly poison. To that cause then, Sir, must be traced back the evils complained of and the very existence of alcoholism, which is the greatest scourge of the community. Those chemical compounds are the main source of all the evils, the visible effects of which are everywhere multiplying themselves and increasing in intensity. One finds on sale now all kinds of strong drinks. They manufacture now quite a variety of alcoholic drinks, which go by the name of alcohol for mechanical purposes. This trade alcohol is not only made use of for beverage purposes; it is also entering into the arts and manufactures and is used as beverages on a footing of equality with pure alcohol, made from fruit. This trade alcohol enters into the manufacture of a variety of drinks, which constitute the common beverage alcohol of commerce. What difference is there, Sir, between this common commercial alcohol and alcohol made from fruit? The difference lies in the fact that the former is highly intoxicant, and constitutes a deadly poison. From practical observation, the effects of commercial alcohol are beyond all comparison more active than those of alcohol of wine. Such is the physiological experience acquired in laboratories, and which medical men avail themselves of in the treatment of that disease. What does experience teach us in that respect? Experience teaches us beyond all doubt that the various trade alcohols are highly intoxicant. Repeated experiments leave no room for doubt on that score. Experiments have been made upon animals, which no longer leave any room for doubt as to whether those alcohols are dangerous or not, and it has been ascertained they are extremely so. Scientists have selected to experiment upon the pig, an animal, it must be confessed, which bears a close resemblance to man. They have intoxicated that animal and ascertained the effects produced upon it by the trade alcohols in question, which are so injurious to human health. They might likewise have experimented upon a frog, a mouse, a rabbit, a hare, but they selected the animal in question on various grounds which it would be idle to mention here, and have ascertained the effects produced by small doses of alcohol injected into its stomach. A very small dose having provoked alcoholic exhilaration in a marked degree; a larger dose brought about the stage of somnolency, habitual enough to that animal, and a stronger dose brought about convulsions, till death took place. From experimental observation, medical men have, therefore, gathered evidence to the effect that the alcohols in question were highly intoxicant. Experiments made with pure alcohol might give somewhat similar results, but the necessary quantity to bring about the same result would be, if I may use a mathematical expression, in the ratio of six to a hundred; that is to say, if six grams of trade alcohol were sufficient to provoke convulsions, it would require one hundred grams of pure alcohol to produce a similar effect. Observation has brought out the conclusion that those products of the laboratory, called trade alcohols were entering into the manufacture of the most part of liquors and were the cause from which sprang that disease, unknown till 1850, which goes now under the name of alcoholism. Inebriety was well known, and when a man drank excessively, it happened, then as now, that he fell into a state of intoxication of more or less intensity and duration. But inebriety, unless it were excessive, hardly left any traces; whilst now, although inebriety be just as common as formerly, still the prevailing form of disease is chronic alcoholism, which is quite different from inebriety, and is attendant upon an irresistible and insatiable thirst for alcoholic drinks. Such is the disease known as alcoholism; as I said, the indulgence in those adulterated substances, those trade alcohols, which enter into mostly all the beverages, result in the disease known as chronic alcoholism. To those alcohols are chiefly due the evils which the mover and seconder of this motion have denounced on such good grounds. But, in my opinion, it is not so much acute as chronic inebriety which is to be dreaded. Now, from these preliminary notions, certain conclusions may be drawn, so as to allow the legislator to suggest some useful reform. Alcoholism, as clearly shown, resulting from the use of commercial alcohols, which are highly intoxicant, the reform should consist in levying a heavy tax on those chemical products. In my opinion, such a reform is highly desirable and quite practicable, inasmuch as it would prevent those commercial alcohols from entering into the manufacture of liquors, for beverage purposes. Those commercial alcohols are obtained entirely from vegetable substances, from fruit, and their intoxicant properties are so much the more deleterious as the raw material from which they are obtained are less assimilable. For instance, wood spirits or methylic alcohol, which is produced in the distillation of wood, has intoxicant properties a hundred times more powerful than those of ethylic or common alcohol. Now, medical men, conversant with all the phases of the question, have come to the conclusion that the disease known as alcoholism results from chemical products, and that it was unknown, when pure alcohol was retailed. To prevent those manufactured alcohols from being sold to the consumer, is the only radical means of uprooting the evil. It is on such statistics that we rely to say that there is a remedy to be found for this evil, outside of prohibition, and we ask the prohibitionists whether, in their opinion, to prohibit the use of these manufactured alcohols for beverage purposes is not a more efficacious remedy than the prohibition of all liquors, which has been attempted in several places and finally dropped. I am not perfectly conversant with the matter, Sir, but I know that in a number of cases, total prohibition was put into operation. I know several municipalities in the province of Quebec where they tried that system, and where they refused to grant licenses for taverns. They resorted to such a radical proceeding for the purpose of uprooting the evil of intemperance. No good has resulted from it. In all the municipalities where this attempt at coercion was resorted to, the results show that the closing of taverns was no remedy for the evil of intemperance; for, in all those localities, drunkenness has been on the increase. Therefore, they soon came back to the licensing system. I am in favour of placing the saloons under more stringent regulations. Such, in my opinion, is the object we should have in view in enacting a law. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) spoke repeatedly of social reform. I have looked over all the speeches of the hon. gentleman on the question, and I could not help coming to the conclusion that all the reasons alleged this session by the hon. gentleman carry no more weight with them than they did previously. The hon. gentleman will allow me to ask him whether he agrees with his leader on this question? I do not know whether he is in accord with his leader, but I am rather disinclined to think that the hon. the leader of the Opposition is ready to endorse the opinion of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). At all events, granting these gentlemen agree, would the hon. member for Yarmouth be warranted in coming before this House with a plan of reform as important, as radical as the one he now proposes, without at the same time offering a practical means of putting that reform into operation; because, Sir, in my opinion, it would be extremely difficult to enforce such a reform. Is it the policy advocated by the hon. gentlemen opposite that is going to make up for the loss of revenue which the Government derive from that source? Or are we to look up to a reciprocity treaty with the United States, or to free trade as they have it in England, to find an adequate source of revenue as a substitute for the considerable amount of revenue derived from the duties on spirituous liquors? This question should not come before the House, unless accompanied with the indispensable means of providing a revenue to make up for the considerable loss that might arise, from the carrying out of that reform, which everybody, at any rate, would like to see enforced. What does the motion of the hon. member for Yarmouth propose? It reads as follows:—

That, in the opinion of this House, the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal, sacramental and mechanical purposes, should be prohibited by law.

It strikes me, as it must also strike the House, that the words used by the hon. gentleman, cover an immense ground. Keeping in view the few remarks I made in connection with the manufacture and composition of the various alcohols, it should be taken for granted, Sir, that they are necessary, to a large extent to arts and manufactures, and should be absolutely and entirely reserved for the same. With this understanding, the motion of the hon. member for Yarmouth is quite right and proper, so far as that provision in connection with the arts and manufactures is concerned. Let the trade spirits be exclusively applied to mechanical purposes; that is the construction I would put on the hon. gentleman's motion. I do not wish to suspect for one instant his sincerity. He is, no doubt, actuated by the best motives ; there is, however, one circumstance which should preclude him from presenting his motion now. He should not forget that it has not been determined yet whether Parliament had any power to legislate on this point. The question is still sub judice. I think it would have been more judicious on his part to wait till the courts have determined whether the Dominion Parliament is invested with the power of a liquor law, or whether that power belongs to the provincial legislatures. The hon. gentleman would do well to postpone his motion, till that point is settled by the courts. I think it is necessary to work out a reform, and to provide a remedy for the evil of intemperance, such a remedy, however, in my opinion, should consist in applying stringent regulations to the liquor traffic. They could do here like in France, where they encourage the necessary use of the light wines and beer, making them duty free, and levying, on the contrary, as heavy a tax as possible on the spirits which are essentially injurious to public health, to the family and to the society.

After Recess.

Mr. LACHAPELLE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, with your long parliamentary experience, I am sure it did not escape your notice at six o'clock, that I had somewhat hastened to bring to a conclusion the remarks I had to offer the House on the motion now before us. I intend now to resume the consideration of the same point. It follows from what I have said so far that prohibition is not the best step leading the way out of the difficulty which confronts us. I have shown that alcoholism is a disease which results from the indulgence in adulterated spirits in over-proof alcohol, manufactured for mechanical purposes, and the peculiar propriety of which is to reach the boiling point at a temperature somewhat higher than that of spirit of wine. The disease known as alcoholism is but the result of those artificial spirits, and was unknown when they did not yet exist. Complaints are heard to-day of the bad effects of the sophisticated spirits in common use. That also explains the fact that the prohibition movement dates back from the last quarter of a century. That agitation originated in the over-indulgence in the use of those liquors. And it is well known, Sir, how noxious those excesses prove to public health, especially over-indulgence in modern drinks. Now, Sir, are those effects sufficient to justify the temperance movement which is seen almost everywhere, and which is brought before Parliament through the action of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) ? That movement is an attempt at interfering with individual liberty. Is that logical ? No, Sir, and I can draw no other inference than this, and I invite the attention of the House to it. I desire to show that all the evils complained of are to be attributed to the use of adulterated spirits which alone are the cause of all the bad effects noticeable on public health, and which we are trying to remedy. Adulterated intoxicants being the cause, they ought to disappear. Such is the logical inference. But I do not see in that fact a reason why you should pass a measure which constitutes an attempt on individual liberty. Such was the position taken by mostly all the countries which have dealt with the question, and among others, France, which has just placed on her statute-book a legislation on the lines I have just described to the House, before recess. In France, people said : we must do away with commercial alcohol which is essentially noxious to the health. They levied a taxation on those spirits, to an alarming degree for the manufacturers, who turn out this product, but also in a way altogether beneficial to the population ; they then took off all taxation on the milder beverages, wine and beer, the use of which is encouraged as conducive to public health and as free from danger. Such is the course they followed to work out a most important reform. Such are the means they resorted to in order to check intemperance and inebriety ; for, it is the abuse which must be attacked, done away with, uprooted. Now, the legislation to which I have invited the attention of the House is the best remedy that can be adopted. Under that law, the object arrived at will be reached, and I think it could be also beneficially put into operation elsewhere. They ought to take the means of preventing the manufacture of adulterated spirits, the use of which offers so many dangers to public health ; and experience shows that those are the intoxicants which are most in use. But it is quite otherwise with spirits of wine which may be conducive to health. I may be told that it is very strange that a medical man should not feel bound to take a more decided attitude against an abuse which, according to everybody, is physically injurious. Let me be well understood, when I say that pure alcohol is not noxious to health. I shall go still further and say that a certain dose of alcohol is compatible with health, and even hygienic, and when you go beyond the prescribed limits, there begins the abuse and the bad effects resulting from it. Of course, it is impossible for me to determine the hygienic dose, as it may vary with each individual ; but I say that a dose of pure alcohol is quite compatible with health, and abuse begins only where you exceed the prescribed limits. Then the bad effects make themselves felt on the human organism in such a distressing manner as to draw the sympathy of well-meaning persons who resolve to make the study of inebriety their own work, in order to do away with the abuses. We all know that under the influence of outbreaks of intemperate drinking, a real disease appears, which is called alcoholism and is physically and morally injurious. Therefore, Sir, it is over-indulgence and not simply the abuse of alcohol which leads to bad results. I deem it my duty here to draw particularly the attention of the Government to the necessity of controlling the manufacture and sale of adulterated intoxicants. I shall go out of the trodden path and instead of laying the blame to the door of the liquor dealer, or of the saloon keeper, who are generally held responsible for the excess to which certain individuals are addicted, I shall say that he is not the main culprit. He merely exercises a trade sanctioned by the statute. But I would feel more disposed to arraign my own Government, to hold them responsible for what is going on, because they do not control the sale of alcoholic products which enter, for the most part, into the daily domestic consumption. I find it strange that the Government do not have a strict analysis made of all intoxicants, at the very time when they devote so much attention to the analysis of food. I hold the Dominion authorities responsible for that state of things, on account of their lack of supervision. All alcohols entering into the composition of the different drinks should be strictly analysed. Another method to bring about the social reform in question is that adopted in France. It consists in freeing the lighter wines, in order to help to propagate them. That method aims at substituting as much as possible, the use of lighter beverages to that of intoxicants injurious to public health. It is a well-known fact that in the wine-growing countries, you cannot find a single case of drunkenness; and when we have introduced in this House the French treaty, we aimed at substituting the lighter French wines to the consumption of alcohol. And to those who then criticised our course, as they do now, we replied that the diffusion of a taste for those light wines was an excellent means to decrease intemperance. There is not the least doubt that the admission of French wines into the country, at low prices, ought largely to contribute to diminish the natural appetite for strong drinks. I am, therefore, opposed to the principle embodied in the motion of the hon. member for Yarmouth, on the several grounds I have just mentioned. I may add that, without mentioning the attempt on individual liberty, there is no authority which prescribes such a stringent prohibition. Is the church, which ought to be our supreme guide in those matters, in favour of the principle? I think not. Can the hon. member find any text either in the Old or New Testament, to justify his motion? I think not. He cannot find a single text, a single phrase in the sacred writers, going to show the necessity of prohibition. On the contrary, I am inclined to think, from what I know of the sacred writers, that the principle of prohibition is unsound. And if I had nothing else but the miracle performed at Canaan of Galilee, I think it would be quite enough to show that prohibition does not meet with any favour with the sacred writers either of the Old or New Testament. There is a last statement to which I wish to invite the attention of the House: it is, that, not to mention the means suggested to attain the very end proposed by the hon. member for Yarmouth, not to mention the higher tax which would be placed upon adulterated spirits, nor the propagation of cheaper wines, nor the scrupulous analysis of the spirits which enter into the general consumption, an analysis which ought to result in excluding all artificial intoxicants noxious to public health, not to mention, I say, all these different means, I think I am warranted in saying that we have within our reach another means, it is the treatment of the dipsomaniacs, who experience an irresistible and unsatiated thirst for alcoholic drinks. I wish to impress upon the House the importance which this treatment should assume in our eyes, both as to its indisputable intrinsic value and as to its well established efficiency in many cases. I do not pretend to persuade the House into believing that in my opinion, that treatment is infallible. But I say that it is exceedingly beneficial and that it should not be slightly examined at a time when the question now before the House is taken into consideration. The evils we have to cure are so great so general, that the constituted authorities should study it; and we are within our right in asking the Government to exercise their solicitude and help us to fight and uproot that evil. It would be idle to enter here into the details of that treatment, but I may add that the Government of Canada, following the footsteps of the Washington Cabinet, ought to give their attention to the treatment in question which is one of the most powerful means of curing even those who are presumed incurable.

Mr. LACHAPELLE.

Mr. GUILLET. I took the opportunity, on the last occasion when this motion was brought before the House, of expressing the views which I have held for some time, and which I hold honestly and strongly, on this question. I believe there is room on the temperance platform for the advocacy of our different views on this important question. I do not think the spirit of intolerance prevails there, but that a liberal spirit prevails, and that the temperance men of this country desire that this question be discussed in all its bearings, in order that the greatest light may be thrown upon it, and the wisest possible conclusions arrived at.

As I expressed on a former occasion views that were in the direction of leaving this important matter to be dealt with by the local legislatures, I desire to refer again to a few of the arguments by which, I believe, that position is capable of being sustained. I have long thought that it more properly pertains to the duties and responsibilities of the local legislatures and governments to deal with this question. It seems to me that the local legislatures are expressly charged with the development of the manhood and of the mental and physical powers of the people. The local governments, which have to deal with the education of the people in science, in the mechanics, in the industrial arts, in literature and in fine arts, are the governments which should properly consider the bearings of a question like this upon the character, habits and morals of the people. These local governments, which have also to deal with the great interests of health, which are entrusted with the duty of enforcing the observance of the laws of health, which have to deal largely with all questions of charity and philanthropy, and are charged with the police protection of the people, should also possess within their spheres a question involving the great virtues of sobriety, industry, frugality and purity, as these bear upon and pertain to the great principles which those local governments have to deal with. Therefore, I say, if it lies in their power, it more particularly pertains to their duty, to promote a cause of this kind and to enforce laws of this kind. They have, in fact, the administration of all laws in their hands, the powers pertaining to the organization of the courts, the appointment of magistrates, of crown counsel, of inspectors of licenses—all the powers that go to the enforcement of a law like this. Therefore, it comes in their province to enforce a law of this kind, as it is in their province, in my opinion, to enact a law of this kind. It is also reasonable to state here, that it is in the natural progress of things that such a law should be the outcome of the development of increasing restrictions on the traffic, culminating in the power of local option, and finally embracing the power of entire prohibition in the whole province. It is a process of evolution, a natural process, which can only be based on a gradual growth from a small degree of prohibition to a large degree of prohibition. Then, we know very well, that, in some sections of the country, there is not sufficient preparedness for the enforcement of a law of this kind. We know, that in some sections the people have not been educated to that degree which will warrant the enactment of such a law with the assurance that it will be enforced. Now, it seems to me, that there are sections where a law of this kind would be speedily adopted, if the powers of the provinces enabled them to enact a prohibitory law. I can quite understand that in some of the provinces a prohibitory law might be enacted and enforced, but in some others there is not sufficient public sentiment, not a sufficient majority of the people behind it, to warrant such a law being enacted. In such provinces it is not likely that a local government would take its life into its own hands and enforce such a law, where there was not public sentiment behind it to support its rigid enforcement, and, without such public sentiment, the law would become practically a dead letter. Among writers upon parliamentary reform and government, it has long become an axiom of parliamentary government and practice, that it is unwise to enact and seek to enforce legislation upon the people until there is a proper sentiment behind it, until the people are properly educated to receive the law, until the parliament finds that, if such a law be enacted, there will be a proper moral sanction in the conscience of the people to enforce its observance, until there is adequate assurance that the people will give their assistance to carry it out. We know that public men in this Parliament, men of large experience in political affairs, men of judgment and experience in the practical enforcement of such a law, have declared that it requires a very strong and overwhelming public sentiment to enable a law of this kind to be enforced, and I propose to refer to statements of this character that have been made, in order that I may satisfy the House that I am not merely giving the opinion of one who has small experience, but the opinion of men competent to judge in matters of this kind. I refer to the speech which the Hon. Edward Blake made with reference to the enforcement of a law of this kind. Mr. Blake spoke as follows:—

I think no repressive legislation can be profitable or permanent unless there exists a widely-diffused and very strongly-felt and very earnest public opinion at its back. The tone and quality of this opinion are of as much or more consequence than its quantity. It is not from fear of the criminal law that the bulk of the community abstains from crime. The bulk would abstain if there were no criminal law; the conscience of the community would be its law. Laws generally derive their binding effect from this consideration. But for that, even though directed against a few only, they would be of little use. This view has very special application to legislation upon the subject of the general social customs of the people. It follows, then, that it is only this widely-diffused and strongly-felt public opinion which can be properly crystallized into law, and that premature attempts will be abortive failures. Thus conditions of opinion may exist at various epochs of progress under which, usefully, licenses may be required to sell, under which high license may replace low license, under which restricted license may replace freer license, under which local and partial prohibition may replace high and restricted license, and under which general prohibition may replace local and partial prohibition. But in deciding on the legislation to be at any particular time adopted, we must determine whether the country is at that time ripe for the legislation; whether it is reasonable to conclude that it will be enforced and maintained, else we hurt instead of helping the cause.

Then, speaking of the Canada Temperance Act, he said :

I am for or against the submission of the Act in new localities, according as there is or is not a fair prospect in the condition of local opinion that it will be reasonably efficacious. It is on this consideration that I myself would vote in case it were submitted in a county in which I had a vote. I am against the submission of the Act as a mere test of public opinion, by a vote in the nature of a plebiscite on prohibition, without a firm determination to work it thoroughly if passed.

I consider the Temperance Act itself is on its trial.

I have been anxiously watching its operation in that view, as also to use it as one test, whether there yet exists in Canada such a tone and quality of public opinion as would render further legislation efficacious and permanent. This I regard as a much better test than the mere vote at the polls. I cannot say I think the test as yet justifies the proposed legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I might quote Sir Leonard Tilley's own words, referred to by Hon. Edward Blake, in which he gives the reason why he was opposed to prohibitory legislation until there was a sufficient public sentiment behind it to secure its enforcement. This was spoken in 1883, when Sir Leonard Tilley declared that this country had not arrived at the point in relation to this question when prohibition could be properly enforced :

This is no new idea with me, for I appeal to my hon. friend opposite, whether, when I was occupying the position of Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, and a convention was held in Montreal to consider what steps should be taken by way of legislation in the Dominion Parliament for the suppression of intemperance, I did write a letter, which that hon. gentleman quoted on one or two occasions, expressing the hope which was my conviction in this matter, that if any law were passed by which a vote of the people should be taken, the measure should not be carried by a bare majority. I was willing that the vote should be three-fifths of the whole. That was a letter written when I was in a position to express my views without reference to political and party considerations of any kind, and that is my conviction to this day ; and, therefore, I urged my friends when moving in the Scott Act, only to move in localities in which the public sentiment would sufficiently sustain it. I did so in the interest of temperance. I can appeal to gentlemen present, who have known that when the Scott Act was carried by a majority and not enforced, that it was not in the interest of prohibition and temperance in many cases, and, therefore, the opinion that I then entertained thoroughly, and still entertain with reference to this proposition : That if you wish it to be beneficial to the cause of temperance, and to show that by shutting liquor out of a locality the effect is good, you will do it where the moral sentiment of the people is sufficient to enforce the law. That will convince the people, and they will say that it is a correct principle, and it would extend from one end of the Dominion to the other ; but if you carry it and put it into operation where the public sentiment is not with you, a reaction will follow, and the people will say : "It is a failure," and abandon the whole principle. This position I have maintained for thirty years and upwards since I introduced into the legislature of New Brunswick a Bill in favour of prohibition, which was endorsed by almost all the men, women and children in the province, and we thought from the petitions received—a carload almost was brought in—we had the public sentiment sufficiently strong in the province to carry it ; but many who signed the petitions the moment it came into force backed down and never lent the least assistance, moral or in any other way, to the measure. And, as "a burnt child dreads the fire," I have always felt since that it is most desirable in the attempt to get prohibition—which I believe will be carried some day in the Dominion of Canada throughout—to educate the people up to it, and to show that its results are favourable and beneficial to the morals and social conditions of the people. * * *

Take the county of Charlotte in my own province. I think that in some sections of that county to-day, there is as much liquor sold as before the Scott Act went into force, it is sold openly. In St. Andrew's there has never been any attempt to enforce it. The moral sentiment of the community is against it ; and, therefore, I am quite sure that it is not better for the cause of temperance—though we all feel that it was a triumph to carry the measure—that it was carried. As a matter of sentiment, I would like to see it carried everywhere ; but we have to look at the matter with a degree of common sense, and to see whether we can carry the principle to success.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have never expressed any doubt as to this Parliament having the power to pass a prohibitory law. But I pointed out on a former occasion, when I moved the amendment which I am now about to move, that it was most desirable that we should ascertain whether the local legislatures had or had not the power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors within their own boundaries. If they have that power, I am convinced that it would be in the interest of temperance, in the interest of prohibition that they should exercise that power, and so bring a prohibitory law into existence where there would be a sentiment to back it, and where the people would enforce it. For it would be to the interest of those who are instrumental in passing it to enforce it. The principle of self-preservation would induce them to do so, in order to justify themselves in passing the measure. And the very fact that the responsibility of enforcing it would be upon them would cause them not to pass such a law until the public sentiment of the province was ripe for it. In this way the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors could be prohibited. Of course they would have no power to prohibit the importation, but neither would the importation be prohibited by this Parliament for medicinal, mechanical and sacramental purposes. I believe that in this way prohibition could be more rapidly and surely obtained. Let me illustrate by referring to the case of the neighbouring republic. Is it not manifest that if the prohibition party there had been knocking at the doors of the federal parliament, instead of trying to pass a prohibitory law in the several states, there would have been no prohibition in those states where such a law is now in force? They would be compelled to wait until prohibition could be adopted for the whole union, either by constitutional amendments, if the power does not rest with the federal parliament, or by general law, if it is seized with that power. They have taken the wise course, and they now have prohibition in a number of the states, and, in two or three of them prohibition has been in force for years. I think that their experience ought to teach us that it is wiser to leave the provinces to deal with this matter. If the provinces are not ready, it is better that a prohibitory law should not be passed here, and if they are ready, all will pass it, and we shall have prohibition everywhere. When the decision of the Privy Council comes, we shall know to what extent the provinces have this power. I am not a constitutional authority, and I do not pretend to say what can be done; but I know that under the Scott Act this Parliament gave the power to counties and unions of counties to pass a prohibitory measure; and, if it is decided that the provinces have not the power already, I do not know any reason why we could not extend similar power to the provinces. In any case, it is wise that we should ascertain to what extent this power rests with the provinces, and then we can take action intelligently; and if we deem it advisable, can give them the power to enact a prohibitory law. I firmly believe that this is the quickest and least embarrassing way to obtain prohibition. Not only would the law be enforced, but in considering its adoption they would not be embarrassed in the local legislature by the loss of enormous revenues which must affect the consideration of it here to a great extent. The provinces do not need to consider how the Dominion Government shall make up the revenue which will be lost; they are not called upon to take the unpopular course of imposing new taxes to which the people are unaccustomed, which must be the case with the Dominion Parliament in the adoption of a prohibitory law. I think it would be wiser for the provinces, who would not be embarrassed with any such considerations, to have the power to deal with the question, and thus the change would take place gradually, and would not involve so serious a wrench upon the financial interests of the Dominion. There is another consideration to which I wish to refer, and that is that the questions which fall within the purview of this Parliament, and are discussed in the federal arena, are of such surpassing importance, and affect, necessarily, interests so great, such as the fiscal policy of the country, indeed, involving our international relations, and our international obligations and responsibilities, that they must necessarily overshadow any minor question of this kind when submitted to the verdict of the people at the polls. The people are sure to overlook such questions as this, to hold them in abeyance, when they are asked to decide upon the larger questions of national importance with which the federal Parliament has to deal. They will naturally give their chief attention to these larger national issues, and others, although important in themselves, will be thrust into the background, as our experience in the past abundantly proves. Therefore, I say that the local legislatures are the proper places for dealing with questions of this kind. There the question of prohibition would assume its due importance, would become the leading question, would force itself upon the attention of the electors at the poll when the local government submitted its policy for their approval. We know that when federal elections take place, the people naturally will discuss and give their chief attention to those great questions affecting their material interests, their material prosperity, and these questions will overshadow and thrust aside the question of prohibition. We have seen this to be the case often in the past, and it will continue so to be for many years to come. But in provincial issues the temperance question would be a leading question, it would receive proper consideration, the consideration to which it was entitled; and if the question of prohibition were dealt with in the provincial legislatures, it would prove successful far more rapidly than if it were dealt with in the federal Parliament, and certainly such a measure, when enacted, would be better enforced. I believe that the people, upon due consideration, will find that if they wait for this question to be taken up by the Dominion Parliament, and dealt with in the manner they desire, they will have to wait a long time, indeed. Now, with regard to the plebiscite, I have this to say: Several hon. gentlemen in this House have expressed their opinion upon this question; and I believe the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) stated he would not be willing to pass a prohibitory measure until, not only a majority of the people voting had pronounced in its favour, but until a majority of those entitled to vote had pronounced in its favour; in other words, he is of the opinion that there must be an overwhelming opinion in favour of it. The hon. gentleman is one of the leaders of Her Majesty's Opposition, and his opinion is entitled to consideration in considering the proposition of a plebiscite. We also know that the leader of the Opposition in this House has stated that if his party reached power, he would submit the question of prohibition to a plebiscite of the people of this Dominion, and that he would abide by the result. Now, let me ask that hon. gentleman, with his well-known views in favour of provincial autonomy, what he would do in case he found that a majority of the people in some one or more of the provinces, were opposed to prohibition, while a majority of the people in the other provinces were in favour of it? Would he not be prepared to say: Gentlemen, I could not think for a moment of enforcing a measure of that kind upon a hostile people, I have too much respect for provincial rights? We must wait until the growth of temperance sentiment has become more general throughout the Dominion, before I would attempt to enforce a measure of this kind upon an unwilling people in any one of the provinces. I can quite understand that the hon. gentleman would very properly and very consistently say that, and that he might act in that way. He said he would be guided by the result, and the result, it seems to me, would not warrant the enforcement of that measure upon any province which was largely hostile to it. That would be the sole result of a plebiscite, obtained, perhaps, at the expense of a couple hundred thousand dollars, that and nothing more. Therefore, I would warn the temperance people not to expect the Dominion Parliament to legislate very soon in the direction they desire. I do not think it would be well for the cause of temperance, or for the cause of prohibition, to force this measure immediately upon the country. It would be better to hesitate, to hesitate, perhaps, even a little too long, than to act precipitately, because the result of going too fast would be pretty sure to cause a serious reaction, and would do more harm than good, in the end, to the cause of temperance. Let us remember that:

Slowly moves the march of ages;
 Slowly grows the forest king,
 Slowly to perfection cometh
 Every grand and glorious thing.

Therefore, I think the cause of temperance will make more enduring progress by moving slowly, by moving surely, by entrenching itself firmly after each successive advance. I think that object can best be attained by relegating the question of prohibition to the provinces rather than by taking it up in this Parliament. These, Mr. Speaker, are my views, and I venture to place them before the House. I move in this matter entirely on my own responsibility, but with a desire to render any assistance in my power to procuring a settlement of this question. If this measure can be dealt with by the provinces at all, it can be dealt with there more effectually than it can be in this Parliament; and, when enacted by the provinces, it can be better enforced than it could be if enacted here. In consequence of this view, I beg to move, in amendment:

That all the words after "That" in the motion be struck out and the following inserted thereof:—"whereas the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council of Canada have not yet decided the appeals from the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada on the questions submitted to ascertain the powers of the provincial legislatures to enact laws prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; therefore, the further consideration of this question be deferred until these appeals shall have been decided."

Mr. CHRISTIE. It is not my intention to occupy the time of the House for more than a very few minutes. I am suffering from a cold and hoarseness, which make speaking somewhat difficult. But I cannot give a silent vote upon this question. I am fully convinced that it is a question of the utmost importance for the prosperity, the well-being and the happiness of the people of this Dominion. I think it is scarcely possible to over-estimate the amount of good that would result from the adoption of the motion in favour of immediate prohibition and its enforcement. It would prevent very great waste of life, of health, of strength, time and money; it would wipe out one of the great sources of demoralization in the country. We all know that the liquor traffic is fraught with sad and terrible evils, that it contributes very largely to poverty, misery, wretchedness, disease and crime, that many of those evils, much of that misery and crime, might and would be prevented by prohibition. I think all are agreed as to the evil, and I am almost convinced that all thorough reformers, all men who have been spending their time and money to promote the cause of temperance, are convinced that prohibition is the only remedy. The only question appears to be as to whether the country is ripe for it or not. We all know that many noble men and many noble women have been labouring for many years, striving to check this evil, doing what they could to disseminate temperance principles throughout the country, and they are all anxiously looking for prohibition. Petitions without number have been presented to this House in favour of it, perhaps more petitions in favour of it than for any other measure that has ever come before this House. Wherever the measure has been submitted to the popular vote in the provinces it has been carried by large and overwhelming majorities. In five of the provinces it has been voted upon, but it has not yet been submitted in the province of Quebec, and, I think, in British Columbia. In view of all these facts, it is clear that the time has come when this House should take some decided steps to meet the wishes of the people to secure prohibition. If the people want it, as I think they do, they should get it; but, be that as it may, I shall have pleasure in casting my vote in favour of prohibition.

Mr. FLINT. Before the question is put, I should like to make a few brief remarks by way of comment on the observations made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Guillet). And here I would call the attention of the House to the fact that the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman was not supported by the line of argument he took as leading up to it. Throughout the whole of the observations made by the hon. gentleman there was a tacit and practical admission that the claims made by the advocates of this resolution were sound; in other words, it was admitted that the liquor traffic should be prohibited by law and a prohibitory measure enacted in some way. That hon. gentleman seemed to indicate that this Parliament should voluntarily, by its own action, divest itself of the duty laid upon it by the constitution and hand that privilege or duty over to some other parliamentary body. Leading up to that end, he asks this House to delay further action until the decision of the Privy Council has been rendered. I contend that his argument is not supported by any facts laid before the House by the hon. gentleman or that can be adduced in support of that line of procedure. I stated in my opening observations on my resolution that there is no question as to the power of this Parliament in the premises, while there are questions going the whole length in opposition to the jurisdiction of the local parliament to enact absolute prohibition. The whole of the decisions which can be quoted all lead up to the point that jurisdiction of the local legislatures ends with regulation, with restriction within each province, and when it comes to the full extent indicated by this resolution their power ceases. There is no occasion whatever for any delay in reaching an opinion by this House. There is no question here of the enactment of a prohibitory law this session of Parliament, all that is asked is that this Parliament express its opinion favourable to the prohibition of the liquor traffic, leaving entirely action to a subsequent Parliament, if it is of the same opinion, to carry that decision into the form of legislation and to crystallize the opinion thus enunciated into law. There have been no arguments adduced for any further delay in reaching a conclusion on this important subject. Parliament has, at considerable expense, obtained the opinion of an able commission on this subject; many of the contentions of those commissioners have been read in the hearing of the House to-day, while the conclusion of the commission leads up to the conclusion enunciated by this resolution. I sincerely trust that friends of the principle of prohibition will not encourage further delay in reaching a decision by the House on the main proposition before us. If the House of Commons is of opinion that there is not a sufficient popular opinion in the country to support the enactment of a prohibitory law, then, of course, those holding that opinion might possibly be justified in antagonizing the resolution because we all agree there is no difference of opinion on that point, that a prohibitory law, like any other law on the statute-book, must be supported by popular and general approval, and the very fact that this Parliament has enunciated the proposition will go a long way towards strengthening that popular opinion. As has been said by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Christie), popular opinion, so far as it has been taken on this question has, not by a bare majority, but by enormous majorities, supported the principle of prohibition, and from our knowledge of human nature and of the people of the country, I consider that if a law of this kind was once enacted it would be thoroughly and faithfully enforced. I therefore trust that the friends of this resolution will vote down the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have listened to the hon. gentleman's remarks in reply, and also to the speech which he delivered in moving the resolution, and I must say that I do not agree that the law in respect to this question stands as the hon. gentleman has stated. The first case in respect to this subject was that of Russell vs. the Queen, upon the Canada Temperance Act. That case was decided in the Supreme Court here in favour of the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and that decision rested upon the jurisdiction of this House over the subjects of trade and commerce. That case was taken in appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which held that the jurisdiction rested upon the general residue of power that is vested in this Parliament. Let me for a moment call the attention of the House to the position taken by the Supreme Court here, and to the position of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council upon this same question. If the Supreme Court were right in the view which it took upon that occasion, then this case fell within the enumerated power, the exclusive power of the Dominion; because the subject of "trade and commerce" in its general sense is under the exclusive jurisdiction of this House. When that case went before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, they did not venture to rest their judgment upon that ground, and later in the Parsons case—an insurance case—in which the subject of trade and commerce was discussed, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council pointed out, that the words "trade and commerce" did not admit of that comprehensive construction which some were disposed to put upon these words, and which had been put upon them by the Supreme Court here in this very case. They pointed out that these same words were used in the Act of Union between England and Scotland, and that these words had there been construed, and that they had been given a more limited meaning than the meaning put upon them by the Supreme Court here. But the Judicial Committee said this : That looking at the arguments which had been presented to us, this case does not fall within the enumerated powers of the provinces, and it is not, in our opinion, within the enumerated powers of the Dominion. Now, as the residue of power is in the Dominion for all that portion of power which is not distributed in express terms, between the provincial legislature and the Dominion Legislature, it necessarily falls under the first portion of section 91 of the British North America Act, to the Parliament of Canada. It was upon that ground they rested their decision in this case. Then there was the case of the Queen vs. Hodge, dealing with the subject of licenses. I may say before that : This Parliament, upon the advice of the Premier, the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), assumed that the logical conclusion to be drawn from the case of Russell vs. the Queen, was, that while the province might have power to determine the amount that should be charged for a tavern or a shop license that as this House had jurisdiction over the subject of prohibition, this House had also jurisdiction over the subject of licenses. They concluded that that was the logical, and the proper legal inference to draw from the expressions which had been employed. That Act was contested. It went from this House to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The Judicial Committee held, that our legislation was ultra vires, and the opinion of the Council, as indicated during the argument of that case, would go to show that they, to some extent, resiled from the position taken in the case of the Queen vs. Russell. Well, that in a great measure left the matter at sea, and recently my hon. friend (Mr. Flint) said, that there are no judgments calling in question the power of this Parliament to deal absolutely with the whole question. Sir, I do not interpret the judgments which have been delivered by the courts in that way. This question of the power of the local legislatures, was referred to the court of appeals in the province of Ontario. That court considered the question, and it is pointed out in the judgment of the chief justice of the province of Ontario ; (Hon. Justice Hagarty), a judge of great experience, of great ability, and of great legal acumen ; that the interpretation which had sometimes been put upon the words "trade and commerce," was not warranted, and that police powers, and other powers, were possessed by the local legislature, that in his opinion gave jurisdiction ; and that so far as the granting of licenses was concerned, it was in the power of the local legislature to enact a measure of prohibition. Mr. Justice Burton, whose judgment is a very instructive one upon this subject, points out, that the fact that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council rested their judgment upon the unenu-merated power of Parliament, would go to show this : That if it could be shown that this subject fell within the enumerated powers, then that judgment in the Queen vs. Russell must fall to the ground, because there could be no jurisdiction under the unenumerated powers of the Dominion Parliament, if it could be shown that there was jurisdiction under the enumerated powers of the province. That was the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Burton, and he points out, that the case of the Queen vs. Russell was argued by Mr. Benjamin, a most able and distinguished lawyer, a gentleman who had practised at the bar of Louisiana for years before he had gone to England, but who had no knowledge whatever of the municipal institutions of the provinces of the Dominion, and therefore was not in that regard qualified to argue this question satisfactorily before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Then, the provincial lawyers who represented the province in that matter, were from the province of New Brunswick, where, prior to confederation the municipal institutions could be scarcely said to have an existence. And those large powers that were possessed by the municipal bodies in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec before confederation, were powers altogether more comprehensive and more extensive than those exercised in the province of New Brunswick, and which were never brought under the attention of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council at all. My hon. friend (Mr. Flint) says, that the jurisdiction of this legislature is not questioned. In my opinion the jurisdiction is necessarily questioned because the jurisdiction cannot be for the same purpose in both legislatures, except incidentally, that portion of the jurisdiction of the one which overlaps the other, where the power is granted to the Dominion for one purpose and to the local legislature for another and different purpose. Let me take a case as an instance. Take the case of the manufacture apart altogether from the sale. I would like to know what difference there is in principle, between the manufacture of a gallon of beer, and the manufacture or production of a yard of cotton, or any other article. The power of production, the application of industry and capital to production, is a matter of property, and the protection of that is a civil right. That surely is under the jurisdiction of the province. It would only be in a case where that property was delivered over for transportation from one portion of the Dominion to another, and entered, not into the local or provincial market, but into the general market, that it would come under the jurisdiction of this House at all. So that when you raise the question of jurisdiction in regard to the province, looking at the view expressed by Mr. Justice Burton, you incidentally raise the question of jurisdiction in regard to the Dominion. For, when one section of the constitution says certain enumerated powers shall vest exclusively in the Parliament of Canada, and the province shall have power exclusively to legislate on certain other enumerated matters, the word exclusively means exclusively. It means that the power alone can be exercised by the body to which that power is entrusted. Now, this case is pending before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Everybody, I suppose, expected that the decision would be given before this House met at all. But the Judicial Committee, perhaps in part on account of the judgments formerly delivered, with imperfect information and after defective argument, and from the internal difficulties associated with the question, have up to this time not delivered judgment. That judgment may be forthcoming any day, and it may assign importations and general traffic to this Dominion, and other matters relating to production or to the local traffic, to the provinces. It may divide the jurisdiction. That seems to be quite a possible thing, and that being so, I said last year to my hon. friend in this House, that so far as public opinion would sustain such a proposition. I was in favour of prohibition. But I have great objections to undertaking to deal with the subject when the question of jurisdiction on this subject is now before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the reasonable course to take is to have this debate adjourned. Before the end of this week or the beginning of next week, the question of jurisdiction may be decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and then my hon. friend will be in a position to say precisely what the power of this House is, and to call upon this House to deal with the subject. It does seem to me that my hon. friend is not proceeding in the right way. If I held the view he does, and were as confident as he is upon the question of jurisdiction, I would have asked this House to proceed by a Bill—to do some act that would amount to something, that would have some effect. That being so, I think it is important, as we shall be here for some time longer, that this House should have an opportunity of dealing with and voting on the subject after the question of jurisdiction is settled. I am quite certain, from what has been stated in the newspapers, that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council must within a very few days give their judgment on this question. That being so, if the matter were forced to a vote to-night, I would be unable to vote for the proposition of my hon. friend, but if the question of jurisdiction were settled, then I would be prepared to consider how far we ought to go with respect to the jurisdiction we have. I would, therefore, move that this debate be now adjourned.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Mr. Speaker. I was rising to make the same motion, and I will give you my reason. Dr. Lachapelle, a prominent physician of Montreal and a member of the American Public Health Association, has been charged by that association to prepare a work on this question, and a résumé of that work was published in the press of last Saturday. Dr. Lachapelle does not take the view of the hon. mover of this resolution. However, the American Public Health Association will meet in June next, and will discuss the question, and then we shall have the conclusions of men competent to deal with it, and the House will be in a better position to discuss the question more reasonably than we can at present. I may say that Dr. Lachapelle, in his work, takes the view that prohibition is not a good thing, but that temperance is a good thing. For these reasons I will support the motion to adjourn the debate; but I think it would be better to adjourn it to another session, when we shall have the views of that association.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. Speaker, in objecting to the motion of my hon. friend, I will only say that we have no assurance whatever that the decision of the Privy Council will be rendered during the session of this Parliament; and all experience of Parliament leads me to think that an adjournment of this debate will in all probability mean that we shall not reach a vote on the motion during this session. For these two reasons I object to the adjournment of the debate. The resolution simply asks the opinion of this Parliament upon the abstract question of the desirability of enacting such a law. There is no proposition before the House that the law should be enacted this session. It is the desire of those who favour prohibition that when this legislature is dissolved, it shall dissolve with a resolution of this kind placed upon the Journals, so that popular opinion upon the question shall be strengthened by the sanction of this House to the proposition. Therefore I, as the mover of the resolution, and I believe also the friends of the resolution here, will not consent either to the adjournment of the debate or to an amendment favouring delay.

House divided on motion (Mr. Mills, Bothwell) to adjourn debate :

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). The hon. member for South Leeds has not voted.

Mr. TAYLOR. The reason I did not vote is because the Chief Whip of the Opposition is not in his place, and he and I have a standing pair on all questions.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 25th February, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MONTREAL TURNPIKE TRUST.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House do on Friday next resolve itself into committee, to consider the following resolution :—

That it is expedient to authorize the Minister of Finance to make arrangements with the trustees of the Montreal Turnpike Trust for the redemption and cancellation of the bonds of the trust now held by the Government of Canada, and for replacing them with bonds issued under the Act 59 Victoria, chapter 65 of the statutes of the legislature of Quebec.

Motion agreed to.

STEAMSHIP SERVICE TO FRANCE AND BELGIUM.

Mr. IVES moved that the House do on Friday next resolve itself into committee, to consider the following resolution :—

That it is expedient to further amend the Act respecting Ocean Steamship Subsidies by providing that the Governor in Council may enter into a contract for a term not exceeding five years for the performance of a fortnightly steamship service between a port or ports in Canada and ports in France and Belgium, on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council deems expedient for a subsidy not exceeding $50,000 per annum.

Motion agreed to.

THE DEFENCE OF THE DOMINION.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House do on Friday next resolve itself into committee, to consider the following resolution :—

That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to raise by way of loan such sum or sums of money, not to exceed in the whole the sum of three million dollars, as may be required for the purpose of the defence of the Dominion, such loan to be raised under the provisions of that portion of chapter 29 of the Revised Statutes of Canada relating to public debt and the raising of loans authorized by Parliament, and the interest thereon not to exceed the rate of four per cent per annum.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). Mr. Speaker, in listening to the speeches delivered by some hon. gentlemen opposite in this debate, notably those of the members for Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple), North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), and south Huron (Mr. McMillan), an old and familiar story was heard. It is true, it has been supplemented this year and brought up to date ; but it was the same old story of blue-ruin, distress and suffering among the farmers that we have heard session after session in this House. One almost begins to wonder if the people of Canada, whom we have been so proud of pointing to in the past, not only as intelligent, but as industrious, and progressive, really exist in our country.

Sir, before proceeding with my remarks on the subject before us, I would like to draw the attention of the House to a statement made the other day by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), as follows :—

Now, the shipping employed in the coasting trade, in 1888, in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Quebec, amounted to 10,863,330 tons, which is 1,700,000 tons greater than the tonnage engaged in our ocean commerce, and 2,300,000 tons greater than what passed through the Suez Canal, and 5,730,000 tons greater than passed through the "Soo" Canal.

The hon. member for North Wellington, referring to that statement said :

My hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) referred to the amount of tonnage that passed the "Sault" Canal last year, as an evidence of prosperity. But if the hon. gentleman would analyse the statistics in that connection he would find that about 90 per cent is American tonnage, and that only 10 per cent comes to or from Canada.

If I understand the statement of the hon. member for Cape Breton aright, he was showing the amount of trade done in the four provinces named, and was comparing that with the amount of tonnage that passed through the Sault Canal. It made little or no difference whether it was Canadian or American tonnage.

There was also a statement made by the hon. member for South Huron the other day to the effect that the laxity of the Government in connection with the quarantine regulations had brought about the embargo on our cattle in England. Well, Sir, time after time it has been conclusively proven in this House that our quarantine regulations have been of a very strict character. The two cattle which were sent from Pilot Mound in Manitoba, in which evidences of disease were found, were 1,000 miles from the quarantine at Point Edward. But the hon. gentleman says there was laxity in the North-west quarantine regulations.

Well, that too has been denied, and it does appear to me that it has been shown most conclusively that all our quarantine regulations have been strictly enforced.

The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) made a reference the other day to our public debt, and I should like for a few moments, to deal with that question. Our net debt stood as follows :—

In 1867 our net debt was.....	$ 75,728,641
In 1874 "	108,324,965
In 1879 "	142,919,188

Now, the Reform Parliament opened 26th June, 1874, and was dissolved 17th August, 1878. During the seven years of the Conservative Government, the annual increase of the public debt amounted to $4,656,618, and during the five years of Reform Government the annual increase amounted to $6,933,045, and the debt in 1895 amounted to $253,074,927, or an increase of $110,084,739, from which, I think, may fairly be deducted $10,189,521 paid the Canadian Pacific Railway in exchange for 6,793,014 acres of railway lands. Now, although this may be a very good asset in the way of cash, still I think it should be deducted from the increase in the debt from 1879 to 1895. This would leave the amount of the increase $99,895,218, or a yearly increase during the sixteen years of Conservative administration since 1879, of $6,243,451. So that whether you compare it with the first period of Conservative rule or the last period of sixteen years, the increase was much in excess during the five years of Reform rule from 1874 to 1879. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us, however, that the debt was increased during the five years they held office because they had to carry out obligations left them by the Conservative party. True, they had to carry out some of these, but they were obligations which had been incurred by all parties and agreed to by the Act of Confederation.

Now, let me look for a moment at the debt. I admit that $253,000,000 is a considerable debt for the people of Canada, but a debt may be heavy and not oppressive. We want, in the first place, to see what it has been incurred for; we want to know if the advantages equal the cost. We have a right to know whether it has improved or injured our financial position, and I think we have equally as good a right to compare our debt with that of other countries and see whether it is excessive or not :

Our net debt increase since 1867....	$177,000,000
Provincial debts	31,000,000
Practical increase.....	$146,000,000

Now, how has this been incurred ?

The Intercolonial Railway has cost..	$45,300,000
The Prince Edward Island Railway has cost	635,000
The Canadian Pacific Railway has cost	62,653,000
Our canals	44,161,000
Total	$152,749,000

Now, on these items alone there have been expended :

On capital account..... $ 6,749,000

And in addition we have expended :

On Dominion lands	$3,668,000
Public buildings	2,163,000
Other buildings	7,023,000
North-west Territories	3,798,000
Total	$23,401,000

Large sums have annually been expended out of ordinary revenue during these years upon public buildings and works which are now of a very permanent character. Many of these may not be very paying investments in the shape of cash returns, but they are valuable contributors to the prosperity of the country, and in fact absolutely necessary, not only on political, but on commercial grounds. The Intercolonial was necessary for the pushing of our interprovincial trade. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said, the other day, that the Intercolonial had been carried too far. Instead of having a little over 700 miles of railway, we had now largely increased that mileage, and he claimed that it was never intended that such large sums of money should be spent on the Intercolonial. But it was necessary for our interprovincial trade that we should find a seaport independent of the United States. These were perhaps two of the principal reasons why it was absolutely necessary that the Intercolonial should be built. And had it not been built we would have probably suffered in this way, that instead of the Canadian people being able to ship in bond as they have been, that would have been stopped by the United States Government, because they have often threatened to do it. I scarcely think that any one will object to the large expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway, without which we could not have had confederation with Manitoba, North-west Territories and British Columbia. The lands, it is true, have not made the large return it was predicted they would, in the early days of building that railroad; still there is this to be taken into consideration, in connection with these lands, that there is to be a brighter day dawning when they will make a far better showing. The building of the Canadian Pacific Railway was absolutely as necessary for the interprovincial trade as was the Intercolonial. It was necessary on higher grounds, because we can create by its means a trans-continental trade. We are all proud of the enterprise displayed in the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and large as the amount may be which has been expended upon it, there are few in this House and out of it who would abolish the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Our canal system is something which the people of Canada have reason to be proud of. Their enlargement in every shape, the free construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, the improvement of the channel from the head of Lake Superior down to Montreal and its continuance from Montreal down the St. Lawrence to the ocean—all this has had the effect of placing larger vessels upon the route. It has reduced cost of transportation, and in this way not only helped the manufacturer, but the consumer and the farmer as well. It is often argued that our farmers' produce is taken but very little by the water routes; but every one who has paid any attention to the matter knows that the water routes, during the summer, have compelled the railways to reduce their rates. Why, it is within the recollection of many in this House when the cost of a bushel of wheat from any of our lake ports to Liverpool, was as much as we are getting for a bushel of wheat to-day. It is carried now at from 15 to 18 cents from any of our lake ports to Liverpool, including insurance. Will any one say that that has not helped the farmers, and that the improvement and enlargement of our waterways has not in every way assisted the farmer?

I want to look at the debt of Canada as compared with other countries. Our debt is a little over \$250,000,000, averaging about \$50 per head of the population. But when we take the Australian colonies, New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Western Australia, Queensland, Tasmania and New Zealand, we find that their average debt is \$187.61, to \$341.68. Our 3 per cent debentures are worth to-day 101½. In fact they rank next British consols. When we had a debt of about \$75,000,000, our 5 per cent bonds only sold at from 75 to 90 per cent. Now the financial position of the country is not to be reckoned by its indebtedness, by its willingness and its ability to pay. It is true that our debt is a large one; but we believe that it has been incurred for good purposes; we believe that it has improved our financial position; we believe that, compared with other provinces and other countries, our debt is not alarming; and that large as our debt may be to-day, we have behind it not only the willingness upon the part of the people of Canada but the ability to meet every cent of obligation which may be represented by that debt. The hon. gentleman from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) the other night stated that our taxation had immensely increased; that, instead of being \$24,455,382 as it was in 1878-79, it had increased to \$38,132,005, an increase of \$13,676,623. Now, I am prepared to admit that this increase is a fact; but the statement as presented by the hon. member for North Wellington is somewhat misleading. In 1878-79 we collected from customs, excise and bill stamps, \$18,476,613, and in 1894-95 we collected from customs and excise, \$25,446,199, or an increase of \$6,969,585. Of this increase about \$2,400,000 came excise duties on spirits, beer and tobacco. There are a number of items in the revenue increase in which goes to reduce the increase in expenditure, such as post office receipts, \$1,620,371, railways, \$1,728,540, and so on. I venture to say that no one in this House proposes to abolish the excise duties. But our friends opposite say that they will reduce the customs duties. The customs duties are about \$4 per head to-day. Gentlemen opposite say that, to meet the reductions in these customs duties which they intend to make, they propose to practice certain economies. The controllable expenditure in this country to-day is in the neighbourhood of \$10,000,000. Take the five years during which gentlemen opposite held office—and they were five years of great depression—and if those hon. gentlemen can point out where they economized in any single department, there may be some reason why we should take their word for it that they will meet proposed reductions in revenue by economy in expenditure. But until they can do that, they must be judged by their record while in office rather than by their words of to-day. I wish to look for a moment at the position our farmers occupy. It is quite true that we have had a period of commercial depression in Canada. But it is equally true that in every grain-growing country in the world there has been a depression; and, while Canada has suffered along with others, she has suffered less than almost any other country under similar circumstances. Let me quote some figures from the report of the Ontario Bureau of Industries—and Ontario is about the only province in which we can get reliable figures. The average area under crop in the eight years from 1882 to 1889 was 7,428,693 acres. In 1894 the area was 8,227,153, an increase of 798,460 acres, or 10·8 per cent. Now, if we look at the market value of the field crops, we find that the average for the eight years referred to was \$114,588,594. But in 1894 there had been an actual decrease in the market value of the field crops, so that that year it was only \$94,055,392, a falling off of \$20,533,202, or 17·90 per cent. The market value per acre during the eight years from 1882 to 1889 was \$15·43 per acre, and in 1894, \$11·44 per acre, a decrease of \$3·99, or 26 per cent. Now, with an increase of 10·8 per cent in acreage, we find there was a decrease of 17·90 in the value of the field crops. Unfortunately, this decrease has not been wholly caused by a decline in prices, as hon. gentlemen on the opposite side say, but has been due to actual decrease in yield, which is proven by the fact that the percentage of decrease in value per acre was much greater than the percentage of decrease in the aggregate value. Let us consider, for a moment, whether protection can do anything for the farmer. I admit that, in ordinary years, it is possible that protection may not be of very much service; but there are many years when it can be of very great advantage to us. There has scarcely been a year since 1879, when the National Policy came into force, when we have not been able, in one way or other, in some portion of the year or other, we have not been able to reap advantages from it. Now, let me take some figures in connection with the price of wheat, and see whether the National Policy has been of any service to the farmer or not. Let us take the month of October, 1895. I will quote prices for the 1st, 5th, 10th, 15th, 21st, 25th and 31st of that month. These figures, be it understood, are taken from the Toronto "Globe." On October 1st, No. 1 hard wheat in Toronto was 70 cents; No. 2, 67 cents. In Chicago, 63 cents; in New York, 67 cents; and in Liverpool, 5s. 2d. per cental, or 75 $\frac{1}{3}$ cents per bushel. Oats in Toronto were 28 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents; in Chicago, 18 $\frac{1}{3}$ cents. On the 5th October, No. 1 hard, in Toronto, was 70 cents; No. 2—that is the same wheat that is sold from the farmers' wagon—was 64 cents; in Chicago, 61 cents; in New York, 65 cents; in Liverpool, 5s. 3d., or 77 cents. Oats in Toronto were 28 cents, and in Chicago, 18 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents. On the 10th of October, No. 1 hard, in Toronto, was 70 cents, No. 2, 67 cents; in Chicago, 61 cents; in New York, 65 cents; and in Liverpool, 5s. 3d., or 77 cents. Oats in Toronto, 30 cents; in Chicago, 18 cents. On the 15th October, No. 1 hard wheat, in Toronto, was 70 cents, No. 2, 67 cents; in Chicago, 60 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents; in New York, 67 cents; in Liverpool, 5s. 3d., or 77 cents. Oats in Toronto, 28 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents; in Chicago, 18 cents. On the 21st of October, No. 1 hard wheat, in Toronto, was 70 cents, No. 2, 70 cents—a rather remarkable thing that the price from the farmers' wagon was actually the same as for No. 1 hard; in Chicago, 60 cents; New York, 66 cents; and Liverpool, 5s. 4d., or 79 cents. Oats, Toronto, 28 cents; Chicago, 18 cents. October 25th, Toronto, No. 1 hard, 70 cents, and No. 2 farmer's wagon, 72 cents; Chicago, 61 cents; New York, 67 cents; Liverpool, 5s. 5d., or 79 cents. Oats: Toronto, 28 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents; Chicago, 18 $\frac{1}{8}$ cents. October 21st, No. 1 hard, 71 cents; No. 2, farmer's wagon, 74 cents; Chicago, 60 cents; New York, 67 cents; Liverpool, 5s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., or 81 cents. Oats, 28 cents at Toronto, and 18 cents at Chicago. Now, this is one of the selling months in the year, and I think it is a fair month to take, October, 1895; but in case hon. gentlemen might object, I have in my hand a statement for a number of days in January, 1896; and because it shows that same state of affairs, and because it shows that the duty imposed upon wheat and oats is of great advantage to the Canadian farmer, I propose to read this statement for the month of January:

The relative prices in Canada are better than the market prices of any other country to-day. Now, then, the design of the National Policy, I take it, was not only to assist the farmer—

Mr. McSHANE. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? He says that the Canadian market is the best market in the world for Canadian wheat. Is it better than California?

Mr. SPROULE. It is the best all-round market for the farmers.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). Chicago and New York are good markets for wheat, and the price of wheat is a great deal higher in Canada to-day than in any of these places I have mentioned. I propose to show to you that one of the objects of the National Policy was the encouragement of our manufactures, and increasing the population of the towns and cities, to afford the farmers a home market. I admit it is difficult to get at the value of our home market, but there can be no question that at the time of confederation the trade between the provinces amounted to very little indeed; to-day we know that it has run up into millions of dollars. The National Policy has helped our fruit industry; that is growing day by day and year by year, and has become one of our most important industries. In fresh meats, poultry, &c., the present Administration have put forth efforts in order to develop the trade in those articles, for which I believe the people of Canada are grateful. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite, as I understand their speeches, not only in this House but in the country, say they now have a policy, they now have the policy of free trade such as they have it in England. Others claim that that is not sufficient, and that we must have, as soon as possible, reciprocity with the United States. Now, I desire to say that if we had free trade such as they have it in England, which hon. gentlemen opposite claim will do a great deal for Canada, you can never have reciprocity with the United States, because you will have nothing to offer the people of the United States in exchange for it. Do hon. gentlemen mean to say, after the efforts which have been put forth for the last thirty years, that there is any chance of our getting a reciprocity treaty with the United States? It is possible that you may get it if you give up everything they ask. I admit that Canada wants as many markets as possible, and she wants them free, if possible; but she does not want to have them free by paying too much for them. Now, in connection with this matter, I want to point out that not only the farmers but the people of Canada generally, when they have anything to sell, want to sell it to those who do not produce it. We have found that the British demand is almost illimitable, that they will not only take what we have to produce, but they will take the surplus of almost every other country. Let me read to you what Great Britain imported in 1894 :

Animals, living, for food	$ 44,237,455
Dressed meats	110,594,951
Butter	65,489,268
Margarine	14,818,075
Cheese	26,644,708
Lard	13,424,292
Milk, condensed	5,252,277
Poultry	2,340,246
Eggs	18,426,118
Fruits	12,459,594
	$313,686,934

Now, hon. gentlemen claim that we could scarcely exist without closer trade relations with the United States, but when we go into the English market we find that our principal competitor is the United States producing and exporting exactly upon the same lines as we do ; and it appears to me that it is in our interest rather to court a market that asks for our surplus, than to go into a market that produces a surplus of the same articles we do. Now, I have a few figures here which I think are very important, as showing that the United States market is of little value to us in connection with many of our articles of export. In 1894 Great Britain imported of butter, $65,489,268, or 2,327,474 cwts. ; of cheese, she imported $26,644,708, or 2,266,145 cwts. We sent to them, of butter, 20,887 cwts., and of cheese, 1,142,104 cwts. Now, of cattle, Great Britain imported 475,440 ; and of fresh beef, 2,104,104 cwts. Canada sent them 82,323 cattle, while the United States sent them 381,932 cattle, and 1,775,538 cwts. of fresh meats. Now, hon. gentlemen say that we want reciprocity with the United States, because we want to send our fat cattle there. I am prepared to admit this fact, that in the case of two countries like Canada and the United States, producing many articles alike, it is possible, at certain periods, that we could send them an article produced here, and that they produce, say, in the western states, and that we could sell it just as well in some portions of the eastern states as the western states producer could sell it. But I say that we need not court too much the markets of the United States for cattle, when we find that they send to our common market five cattle to our one. Now, there is another article I wish to refer to, and that is barley. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) the other night deplored the fact that we had lost our principal market for barley. It is true that we are not doing with the United States the trade in barley that we did previously to the passage of the McKinley Bill ; but if we examine closely our trade with that country in barley we shall find that it had already begun to diminish before the McKinley Bill was passed, that it had already diminished nearly one-half. Now, then, why had our exports in barley gone down before the passage of that Bill ? The consumers in the United States are to-day, and were then, using large quantities of Indian corn. I do not say that it is as good as barley, but it makes a splendid substitute. They have increased their area not in the eastern states, but in the western states, and although the quality of the barley in the early years was not as good as it is to-day, we find a great deal raised that will compare very favourably, indeed, with some of our Canadian barley. The brewers' to-day are able to manufacture cheaper than they were at that time, so that they are unwilling to pay very fancy prices for our bright barley. We have lost the trade because they use, as substitute, large quantities of corn, because their acreage of barley has immensely increased, because the quality has improved, and because the brewers' understand their business better than they did a few years ago. Now, what is the fact in connection with barley to-day ? The crop of 1895 was an exceptionally large one, and although quantities were shipped for brewing purposes, there is this fact staring us in the face, that very fine barley is sold in New York at from 35 to 47 cents per bushel. So the Canadian farmers who are still trying to exist by growing barley of the fine qualities, that a few years ago sold at fancy prices in the United States are doomed to disappointment, and the politician, I care not where he may hail from, who urges reciprocity because it may further our trade in barley with the United States is simply deluding the Canadian farmer. There is another matter to which I would like to refer for a moment, and it is in connection with our lumber trade. This is one of the most important industries in Canada and is one in which many of our people are largely interested. I want to show this fact, that even as regards lumber the United States is not our best market. I quote from the speech of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, delivered a few weeks ago in Toronto. His Honour said :

I regret to say that there has been no marked improvement in the past year in the condition of the lumber trade, the prosperity of which exerts so beneficial an influence on the general business of the province. While sales and prices in the British market have been fairly satisfactory, the market for foreign lumber in the United States has been in a depressed condition owing to the continuance there of business stagnation and financial disturbance.

Can there be any mistake about this language ? It is not my language, but is the language of the Reform Administration as placed in the Lieutenant-Governor's mouth a few weeks ago in Toronto, which language shows conclusively that the English market is far the best for our lumber and very much better than the market of the United States. There is one other point to which I desire to refer, and it is this. Hon. gentlemen proclaim in the country, and in this House as well, that protection means dear goods. I want to point out that the large portion of the hardware, machinery, glassware, leather, boots and shoes, stationery, drugs, dyes and chemicals are purchased in the United States, one of the most highly protected countries in the world, and it must be remembered that every article I have mentioned was formerly purchased in the British market. This shows most conclusively to my mind that as regards the article I have mentioned protection does not mean increased prices, and it must be remembered that these products of highly protected United States have to come into Canada and meet competition with free trade England. It appears to me that notwithstanding the depression we have had in Canada, notwithstanding some of the troubles which our farmers have had, we have been able to weather the storm a great deal better than our neighbours and the European countries. To-day we are within, as I understand it, easy distance of an appeal to the highest tribunal in this country, the people of Canada; and the Conservative party upon their trade policy need have no fear or hesitation whatever in appealing to the people with a clean, cut, well-defined policy, one that has been tried during the past 17 years, and which has done so much for us, when placed side by side and compared with free trade. The leader of the Opposition has said it is impossible that we can have free trade to-day, but that it may come in thirty-eight or forty years—he was definite on that point, and that is something which does not very often occur—but we have no hesitation, when these two policies are placed side by side, in leaving the issue to the free and independent electors of Canada.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that I cannot congratulate the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Smith, Ontario) on his references to men on this side of the House. He has rehashed some very old arguments, and repeated some very old assertions in support of the so-called National Policy. The hon. gentleman also has given to the House sheets of skilfully compiled statistics, so skilfully compiled as to give reason to believe that they were made to order and are being supplied freely to all speakers on the other side of the House. The hon. gentleman rang the praises of the Canadian Pacific Railway and predicted bright days for the North-west, and said that we would soon begin to realize from the sales of lands there. I believe that had the Canadian Pacific Railway followed the route adopted by the Liberal Government instead of traversing the most barren portion of the Territories, we would have realized immense returns from the sale of lands in the North-west. The hon. gentleman made a very unfair comparison of the debt of Canada with the debts of the Australian colonies. He was not fair enough to inform the House that those colonies have spent immense sums in the construction of railways. They have spent $450,000,000 in this way; the Government own 13,000 miles of railway, and this investment which adds enormously to the debt of the colony yields a dividend of 3½ per cent per annum. The hon. gentleman failed to tell the House that the Australian colonies own the telegraph lines and extensive irrigation works, and have erected and own such public buildings as court houses and school houses, which are built in Ontario by the municipalities. The hon. gentleman dwelt on the value of the home market, and almost immediately afterwards admitted the great need of enlarged markets. In beautiful language he advised us to cultivate the markets of England which are seeking our surplus products, rather than the markets in the United States, a country which is our chief competitor in the English market. He contended it would not benefit the people of Canada to enter the markets of the United States, but if it is not any benefit to us, if that market is not the market we would like to possess, how is it that in spite of our tariff laws millions in value of our products find their way into that market every year? How is it that the McKinley Bill, harsh as it was, and intended to absolutely exclude our products, failed in its object? Even in the face of that Bill, millions of dollars worth of Canadian farm products entered the United States, and were sold there in competition with the products of the American farmers.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith) spoke of our lumbering industry, and quoted from the speech of the Lieutenant-Governor at the opening of the Ontario legislature. He (Mr. Smith) told us, that the market for lumber was dull in the United States, and, immediately after, he gave us the reason, namely, the stagnation of trade that has prevailed in that country during the past year. Well, Sir, the condition of trade there is rapidly improving, and soon our lumbermen will find the market of the United States attain its normal condition, and become, as it has been for years past, the very best market we have in the world for the products of our forests. Although the speech of our hon. friend (Mr. Smith) was badly impregnated with the virus of protection, yet I believe, that the Premier of this country would have done better to have selected him as Minister of Agriculture than the learned doctor who now occupies that position. We have sixteen Ministers in this present Government, but not one of them is a farmer. The great agricultural class, for whom hon. gentlemen opposite say so much has been done, has not a single representative in the Cabinet. This Government have no faith whatever in the intelligence, the brains, the knowledge, and the fair dealing of the agricultural classes. They do not wish to trust one of them with a portfolio in that great Cabinet—great in number, if nothing else. I regret that the Minister of Agriculture is not in his place in the House. I am sorry that he is forced for his health's sake to submit to the "remedial acts" of his medical advisers across the sea. However, I hope that, before the end of the session, he will be here to develop to us his wonderful designs for the betterment of the agricultural classes.

Well, Sir, my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Smith) stands by his party and by their policy. That I cannot do, and I will give the reasons for my dissent, just as briefly as I can. In the first place, I am proud to belong to the Liberal party. I look upon it as the people's party, the distinguishing feature of which is now, and always has been, a well-founded and deeply-rooted trust of the people. I believe that the Liberal party has done much for the people of Canada. It was they who fought, year in and year out, the battle of responsible government; it was they who, in the past, fought against the Family Compact, which is to-day so closely imitated by hon. gentlemen opposite. It was they who fought against that combination, which was determined to rule this country, with or without the consent of the people. The Liberal party has always waged unceasing warfare against tyranny in any form. The Liberals, who have ruled the province of Ontario for the last twenty-four years, have placed on the statute-book of that province legislation defining the rights of labour and protecting labour against the tyranny of capital. It was they who passed laws defining the relations of landlord and tenant, and designed to protect the tenant from the extortion of the landlord. It was the Liberal party of Ontario who passed laws defining the relations of master and servant, and to protect the servant against wrong and injustice on the part of the employer. Sir, this party, of which I am a very humble member, has incessantly waged war against class legislation in every shape and form. It was the Liberals who overthrew a species of class legislation by their Rivers and Streams Act. Certain of our lumbermen in this country assumed rights which they were not willing to accord to others. Some years ago, some of our lumbermen in the province of Ontario claimed the exclusive control of the streams down which they floated their logs and timber. In the rear of my constituency, the timber limits happened at that time to be owned by a man who made this claim. There were settlers there who owned large quantities of pine, cedar, hemlock, ash, basswood, and other timbers, all marketable and all valuable. The man who owned the limits and controlled the streams, would not purchase a stick of this timber, and neither would he allow any one else to enter his limits to purchase it. I have myself seen vast quantities of valuable timber, logged up and burned out of the way. Thousands of dollars worth were lost to the settlers, thus bringing them, in the years of their early struggles, to the verge of deep distress. Well, Sir, at last a lumberman ventured up into that country and took out some logs, and promptly the courts were invoked, and an injunction issued to restrain him from using the streams. The Liberals, then in power in the province of Ontario, I am happy to say, placed on the statute-books a law called the Rivers and Streams Act, which declared the streams to be free and open to all, on payment of reasonable slide dues. This was a piece of legislation which aimed at class privilege, and so it was promptly disallowed by this Government. It was passed again, and again disallowed; passed again, and only allowed to become law when the highest court of the realm declared that the Liberals in the province of Ontario were right, and that henceforth these streams should remain free and open to all, and that the settlers were at liberty to dispose of their timber to whom they chose.

Sir, the Liberal party denies the right to grant to any man advantages in the matter of trade over his fellows. They wage war against trusts, monopolies and combines. These, Sir, are some of the reasons why I am proud to belong to the Liberal party. And I was never prouder to be enrolled as a member of that party than I was on the 20th June, 1893, when I saw gathered in the largest building in this city of Ottawa thousands of earnest men, come from the east and the west, from the prairies of the North-west, from the provinces by the sea, and from all parts of Ontario and Quebec; men selected by the rank and file of the great Liberal party to represent them in the largest convention that was ever held in the Dominion of Canada. Sir, when I saw these earnest men, come here to discuss the issues of the day, to discuss the best means of governing this great country of ours; then indeed my heart swelled with pride that I belonged to a party which could gather together an assemblage of men so representative and so creditable to their country.

I would ask my hon. friends opposite: When have they dared to call a convention of the rank and file of their party? Never once have they dared to issue the call; never once have the great Liberal-Conservative party been summoned to meet their leaders in a convention in any city in the land. The Government here are self-appointed dictators, and not the chosen leaders of their party. They name the leaders, they dictate the policy, and, after the manner of the old family compact, they simply command their followers throughout the country to obey. What are the results? The people think for themselves, and to-day we find that great Conservative party divided and split into factions, some following one leader, some following another, and many in open rebellion against all leaders. We see the Cabinet itself unable to hold together. Sir, contrast the condition of the Conservative party with that of the Liberal party to-day. United to a man, enthusiastically loyal to their leader, we stand undaunted before all the forces that the Conservatives are able to array against us.

Well, Sir, this convention assembled, and what for? Was it to adopt a platform ready-made for them? By no means. No leader of the Liberal party ever yet expected an unthinking, unreasoning following or obedience from his followers in the country. Liberals are members of their party, each one in his own right having his own position in it. This convention was called by the desire of our leader, who was chosen by the representatives of the party in this House, who at last yielded to the urgent, unanimous and enthusiastic demand of his colleagues, and accepted the leadership of the Liberals, with all its responsibilities. And, Sir, when I heard the ringing cheers, the tumultuous applause with which his name was greeted by that convention, I knew that he was hailed as the leader of the Liberals of Canada, from the Pacific to the Atlantic. He called that convention together to take counsel with them as to the best platform to be adopted by the Liberals of Canada. As usual, the convention themselves appointed a committee on resolutions, and in due course that committee reported to the convention ten resolutions altogether. These are to-day the planks composing the platform of the Liberal party. There are familiar features in every one of these planks. The Liberal party did not depart one jot or tittle from the principles we have been advocating for many years in this country. Sir, it was said at that convention that its members were grave and sober enough to be a conference of clergymen, or a convention of prohibitionists. They were grave men, met to discuss grave issues. It was an experience, Sir, never to be forgotten—the ringing cheers with which plank after plank of the platform was hailed by those grave men, who stood in their chairs and waved their hats and coats in the air and declared with shouts, their assent to each resolution as it was read to them.

Sir, what is the platform that was thus adopted? The last speaker tells us that he does not understand what the platform of the Liberal party is. I am sorry for him, because we have been endeavouring here, as clearly as possible, to inform him, and others, what our platform is. Some hon. gentlemen have already read the planks of that platform in this House, and I propose to do the same. We shall soon go to the country, and I do not want hon. gentlemen opposite to misrepresent our position. I do not think they will do it willingly. But, to remove any excuse, I will read the planks of that platform, one by one, with a few brief remarks on each:

We, the Liberal party of Canada, in convention assembled, declare:

1. FREER TRADE—REDUCED TAXATION.

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service:

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few;

It has checked immigration;

It has caused great loss of population;

It has impeded commerce;

It has discriminated against Great Britain.

In these and many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people;

That to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government:

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We believe that the results of the protective system have grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country, in the light of experience, is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

The issue between the two political parties on this question is now clearly defined.

The Government themselves admit the failure of their fiscal policy, and now profess their willingness to make some changes; but they say that such changes must be based only on the principle of protection.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

Sir, in this plank we have not declared for the abolition of all duties. We have not declared for absolute free trade—free trade as they have it in England, or anywhere else. So far as I am myself concerned, I would like very much, indeed, if we were in a position to go for absolute free trade. I believe in free trade. What is good enough for Great Britain, what has brought prosperity to that country, is good enough for me. But I am aware that hon. gentlemen opposite have so manacled this country, have so loaded us down with enormous liabilities, that it will be impossible for us, for many years to come, to get along without a tariff.

We propose, then, in this resolution, a tariff for revenue, and only for so much revenue as is actually required for the services of our country, honestly and economically administered. Under such a tariff, there will be protection. If there is any tax levied on imported goods at all, that, in the nature of things, must be a measure of protection. To a considerable extent there will be incidental protection. The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is a tariff for protection. This, if logically carried out, must be a tariff of exclusion. It must be meant to exclude the commodities upon which the taxes are levied. In regard to the article of sugar, for example, it means the absolute exclusion of all refined sugar, with the exception of a very small quantity indeed.

In this plank of our platform, we condemn the tariff policy of the Government, because it has developed monopolies. It has developed monopolies in sugar refining, in cotton manufacturing, in coal, in oil, and in many other lines. I would like, for a few moments, to take up the case of the manufacture of sugar. In 1894, speaking to a resolution moved by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), the hon. member for Halifax, whose company, I understand, is largely engaged in refining sugar, said in this House that he believed the Canadian refiners could refine sugar as cheaply as American refiners, at least, so near to it that the difference does not affect the calculation at all. But why is it that they want a little more protection? It is because the market of Canada is not so large.

Now, I interpret this to mean that if the market of Canada were secured to the sugar refiners, they would then give us sugar as cheap as it could be purchased in the United States. During that same session, I read to the House quotations for the months of January, February and March, 1894, of the prices of sugar in Montreal and in New York; and I showed that the difference in price between Montreal and New York was 28 cents per hundred pounds in favour of New York. Thus, on the 250,000,000 pounds of consumption of that year, the refiners of Canada were taking from the consumers here about $700,000 more than the refiners were receiving for a like quantity of sugar sold in

Mr. DAWSON.

New York. Therefore, they were not giving us sugar as cheaply as it was sold in the United States.

But I see no reason why we should be forced to purchase our sugar in the markets of New York. For my part, I would much prefer purchasing it in England for many reasons. In the first place, England being a large consumer of our products, it is but fair-play and right that we should trade with her as extensively as possible. Then, for selfish reasons, the providing of west-bound cargoes for the ships engaged in our carrying trade means a direct benefit to persons on this side shipping the produce of our farmers to the English market. Senator Drummond, speaking on this sugar question, declared:

As a manufacturer, I say that my preference is distinctly to be placed in the position of a manufacturer of cotton and have my raw material duty free. If that were so, I honestly believe that we could supply the trade and the country with sugar as cheaply as in England; but as a manufacturer, it is perhaps stepping out of my province to suggest.

Well, Sir, up to the 3rd of May last, the refiners had raw sugar duty free, and last session I showed the House by quotations taken from the London "Times" and the Montreal "Gazette" that sugar was sold in Montreal at an average advance on the price of London of 78 cents per hundred pounds, and that on the total consumption this meant a difference of $2,340,000 a year. Instead of giving us sugar as cheaply as it could be bought in England our refiners charged us $2,340,000 more for it.

I cannot see why our refiners are not able to refine sugar as cheaply as do the refiners in England. The raw material can be delivered at Halifax or Montreal at practically the same price as at the refineries in England. Of course, now that there is a duty of 50 cents per hundred pounds on the raw material, our refiners must add that to the price of the refined sugar, but they have no right to any more. If they add any more they are then taking from us as a bonus, under cover of the tariff which protects them, whatever difference there may be over and above the prices for which the sugar could be laid down here by the English refiners. If they live up to the promise implied in the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), and the speech from Senator Drummond, refined sugar could be sold here at an advance of 50 cents only on the price in England, 50 cents being the duty levied on the raw material.

Now, I shall give the House quotations, since the duty was placed on the raw material on the 3rd May last, showing the prices of granulated sugar in Liverpool and in Montreal:

Difference in price per 100 pounds in favour of Liverpool 1 08

The average for the 34 weeks was $3.09 per 100 pounds in Liverpool, against $4.17 in Montreal, a difference in favour of Liverpool of $1.08 per 100 pounds.

Now, Sir, up to the 3rd of May last, raw sugar was admitted into Canada free, and the duty on refined sugar was 64 cents per 100 pounds. On the 3rd of May the duty on raw sugar was fixed at 50 cents per 100 pounds, and the duty on refined sugar at $1.14 per 100 pounds. The difference between the duty on refined and the duty on raw being 64 cents per 100 pounds. This is the protection that is given under the tariff to the sugar refiners of this country. I shall endeavour to show that they avail themselves of the whole of this protection; that they do not divide it at all with the people of Canada, but simply put it all in their own pockets.

Before the duty was put on raw sugar, on the 3rd of May last, there was a large importation. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, the imports from the 1st January to the 3rd of May amounted to 154,000,000 pounds, admitted to this country free. One-third of this, at least, if not more, has been sold since that time at the advanced price. Altogether, if the consumption between the 3rd of May and the 31st of December last was as great as the average for the last three years, we consumed during that time some 200,000,000 pounds of sugar. This was sold to the people, as I have shown by the quotations taken from these papers, at an average advance on the Liverpool price of $1.08 per 100 pounds. This would amount, on the total of 200,000,000 pounds, to some $2,160,000. That is the amount of money that the refiners of Canada received for the sugar sold during these eight months more than the Liverpool refiner would have charged for a like quantity there.

During that time, however, the Canadian refiners were called upon to pay 50 cents per 100 pounds duty on a part of the sugar that entered into the consumption of the eight months. In reply to a question, as appears by "Hansard" of the 5th instant, I was informed by the Government, that during those eight months the refiners had paid $650,000 on raw sugar imported into the country. This amount must be taken from the excess charge of $2,160,000, leaving $1,510,000, which is the amount after providing for the duty for which our eight months' consumption of sugar was sold here in excess of the prices in Liverpool. At this rate our refineries are charging us for the sugar we consume in Canada some two and a quarter millions of dollars a year more than the same quantity could be purchased for in the Liverpool market, or a difference of 76 cents on every 100 pounds consumed.

Now, my quotations are up to 31st December last. I glanced over the quotations in the London "Times" and in the "Journal of Commerce" for January, and I find that the average price in Montreal during January was $4.62½, and during the same month in Liverpool, $3.25 per 100 pounds, a difference in favour of Liverpool for the month of January of $1.37 per 100 pounds. If we deduct from this the duty on raw sugar, 50 cents we find the net difference, after the payment of duty, was 87½ cents per 100 pounds.

I have said that the Canadian refiners took advantage of every cent of protection given. The difference between the duty on refined and the duty on raw sugar is the protection which the tariff gives them. But, in addition to that, they have the protection of the transportation charges. The protection which the tariff gives them is 64 cents per 100 pounds. The

And his reasons have been plainly manifest, and his reasons have been plainly advanced. I do not blame the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), as he had a perfect right to act as he has done in that regard. But I make this statement, which the facts have shown to be correct, that in every year during the last eight or nine years, there have been exported from the shores of the Georgian Bay to the United States, from 300,000,000 to 400,000,000 feet of saw-logs. I say this more, Sir, that there has been a direct and most violent attempt on the part of those exporting the saw-logs to suppress the truth of the returns. That has been amply shown during the past year, when two or three vessel-owners have been promptly fined by the Customs Department for making undervaluations of the quantity of logs they have exported. I ask, what does all this mean? The export from this country every year of 300,000,000 feet of saw-logs means that a large number of mills are working on the other side of the line, the owners of which, if deprived of those Canadian saw-logs, would be compelled to come to Canada and have the lumber manufactured here. I am going to read for the benefit of the House a short extract headed Bay City, to prove the truth of the statement I make of the quantity of logs exported. This statement is made by Mr. Thomas Pitts, the head of the firm of Pitts & Co., exporters of saw-logs:

Between 250,000,000 and 300,000,000 feet of logs are annually imported from Canada. An export duty would compel us to go to Canada to manufacture our lumber. Along this coast from Saginaw to Cheboygan it would turn 20,000 men out of employment that earn annually in the neighbourhood of $5,500,000.

That is a startling statement—that the Government of Canada, by their policy of permitting the export of logs from this country, are depriving 20,000 men of employment in Canada. By the National Policy, the Government have imposed high protective duties in order to foster certain industries in this country; and yet here it is pointed out by an American lumberman that the Government of Canada, by their suicidal policy—because it is a suicidal policy in this respect—are depriving this country of the employment, annually, of 20,000 men. The statement I have read amply proves that I have not over-stated the quantity of saw-logs exported; and if better proof were wanted, I could refer to the Customs returns, which show that from one port alone, some 150,000,000 feet were exported last year. Now, I have brought this matter before the House time and again. No hon. member has ever risen to defend the practice. The Government have promised consideration of the question time and again. I have presented indignant protests from the people of the Georgian Bay district. But the result has been the turning of a deaf ear to all our representations.

Mr. BENNETT.

I can tell the leader of the Opposition that he could carry every county on the Georgian Bay if he would announce that he was in favour of imposing an export duty on saw-logs. But I am sorry to say that among the hon. gentlemen behind him are to be found those who are the fiercest in denouncing an export duty. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has, throughout all these negotiations, acted in the most shameful manner, and I regret that he is not here to-night—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that word. The hon. member has acted in a manner that I would be ashamed of. He has acted in a manner that I think would not redound to the credit of any Canadian. I would not make any statements to-night relative to that hon. gentleman were it not that what I say I have stated in his presence on previous occasions. Two years ago, when the United States Government were offering to the people of Canada free lumber and the opportunity of having the most preferential privileges with respect to all articles in the wooden schedule, it was only by the action of the hon. member for North Norfolk, in connection with that very memorable letter which was written at the time, that those privileges were prevented. I admit, to-night, that the hon. member has never acknowledged in this House that he was the writer of that memorial. He has put upon myself the test of proving that he was the writer. At the time I expressed the opinion that the hon. gentleman was the writer. But I will do the hon. gentleman the credit to say that I heard him publicly announce in the recent campaign in North Ontario that he was not the writer of that memorial, but that it was an unwarranted use of his name, if his name was used in that connection. Well, Sir, I have only this to say, that, coming after two years, the denial seems rather late. But perhaps it is right and fair to accept his positive denial made on that occasion, and to express my regret that any injustice should have been done to him in attributing to him the authorship of that letter. If the hon. gentleman has only seen fit, at this late stage, two years after date, to announce that he was not the writer, I think he stood very much in his own light in failing to make the denial two years ago. Now, I have only this to say to the hon. Minister of Finance, that this matter of the suppression of the export duty should receive more serious consideration at the hands of the Administration than it has received in the past. I hold in my hand to-night a protest from the town of Penetanguishene, a town which is largely interested in the manufacture of lumber, also a memorial from the county council of the county of Simcoe, also a letter from a prominent saw-mill owner in one institute for the blind and one institute for the deaf and dumb; and the total cost of the maintenance of all these institutions is less than the amount which is extorted from the people of our province by this one monopoly, the sugar refiners.

There are hon. gentlemen in this House who went into every constituency in the province of Ontario and urged the people to hurl from power the Mowat Administration, because, as they alleged, a few eggs, a little jam, some pickles and some catsup were used per head in some of these public institutions more than they thought ought to have been consumed by one healthy man. This was one of the arguments urged against the Mowat Administration. Yet these same gentlemen stand up session after session, and back up and endorse a tariff which enables one industry to wring from the people of that province a larger sum than is paid to maintain the whole of its public institutions, including the jam, the eggs, the pickles and the catsup, which, they said, had been consumed into too large quantities.

We have a magnificent school system in the province of Ontario. Liberal grants of money are made to the poorer schools, so that education may be placed within the reach of all the children in the province, in every township and every county. Well, this subsidy amounts to rather more than $100,000 a year in excess of the sum spent on education, including the grants to public and separate schools, to our High schools and collegiate institutes, maintained so that higher education may be placed within the reach of all, including the cost of schools of practical science, teachers' institutes and mechanics' institutes, and the cost and maintenance of normal, model and art schools, and the inspection of them all—this whole sum amounts to about $100,000 less than this tribute we are forced to pay to this one combine, or industry, or monopoly, or whatever you may call it, of the sugar refiners of Canada.

Our contributions to this industry for eighteen months exceeds the whole cost of our parliament buildings in Toronto. I remember well, when the government talked of erecting the parliament buildings, that the people were urged to oppose them, on the ground that they were going to bring the province to the verge of ruin by expending such a large sum of money for that purpose. Yet the amount of tribute that is being paid to this one industry for eighteen months equals the whole cost of these parliament buildings.

Sir, the tribute which this industry exacts is more than the amount which was spent by the Ontario government for seven years in the construction and maintenance of colonization roads. During seven years, the government built 1,200 miles of new road through sparsely-settled portions of the country, opening up township after township for settlement; they repaired 2,700 miles of road, and they built and repaired 22,000 feet of bridges. I remember the sharp criticism of the items of the expenditure of the Crown Lands Department during the late campaign. There are some hon. gentlemen now in this House whom I heard denounce the government for their extravagant expenditure on colonization roads. But that expenditure for seven years does not equal the amount which these same men have compelled the people of the province of Ontario to pay as bonus to this one industry, the sugar monopoly.

Sir, let me call your attention to what the "Mail" said, in 1891, with reference to protection to the sugar refiners:

Protection is being run to the ground when it is allowed to extend to the sugar refineries the great advantages they now enjoy. It seems that it is possible to have too much of a good thing, and to work the goose-of-golden-egg-notoriety to death.

Well, I would like to see the "Mail-Empire" come out now in the interest of the people of Ontario, in the interest of the people of Canada, and advocate, with all the influence it possesses, the withdrawal from this combine of the advantages which they now enjoy and which they have abused.

Now, with reference to cotton, it is said that that article is as cheap here as it is anywhere else, if not cheaper. When it is sought to show that cotton manufactured in Canada is not as cheap as cotton produced in other countries, samples are shown, and it is at once said that the sample is not as good, and this simple assertion goes down with people whose eyes are blinded by their desire to maintain protection. But this we do know, that the combination that was called into existence in 1891 have been able to lay up enormous profits, according to their own confession. The Dominion Cotton Company was organized early in 1891 with a capital of $1,500,000; they purchased a number of mills, and went into business. From a statement issued by the company we learn that the profits for the first year amounted to 30 per cent on the whole capital, and for the second year 40 per cent. With such a showing it was impossible to go to the country and pretend that this was a struggling infant industry requiring protection, and so they devised a means of misleading the people as to the exact standing of their company. They concluded to double the stock, issuing shares amounting to $1,500,000 more, distributing them to holders of the original issue of stocks. They did not by any means propose to charge for the shares 100 cents on the dollar of their face value, but they took from the holders of the original stock 10 per cent of the face value and issued the new shares to them. In this way, while the capital appeared to be doubled, it was simply increased from $1,500,000 to $1,650,- 000, by the addition of $150,000, for which the second issue of stock was sold to the happy investors. The third year, fourth year and first half of the fifth year showed enormous profits. Altogether in four years and a half this company, according to their own confession, earned profits amounting to $1,982,551, or $332,551 more than the whole sum put into the industry; they paid off the old stock after four and a half years and had a surplus of over $300,000.

There may be, and I have no doubt there are, some industries which have difficulty in earning profits on their capital. Tariff restriction enhances the cost of the output of many manufacturers. The raw material of many of them is the finished product of other industries, and the tariff increases the cost of this raw material to them, and so many of them have to struggle as best they can to earn interest on the capital invested. It is my belief that the legislation of hon. gentlemen opposite, which was designed to hand over the markets of Canada to our manufacturers, has not worked well for them. The enormous profits which were earned at first induced over-production. The high prices paid for manufactured goods and the low prices paid for farm products played havoc with the farmers of our country and other great consuming classes. They cannot now purchase as freely as they could at one time, they cannot now purchase freely enough to absorb the manufacturers' output. I believe that a healthier fiscal system would be an untold benefit to all honest manufacturers in Canada. Finding foreign markets closed against their high-priced goods, the home market losing its purchasing power and all the time the output of manufacturers increasing, many of them have been compelled to combine for the purpose of regulating not only prices but the output. How successfully it has worked, I have shown by the facts I have given regarding two of the combines in this country. Other combines are the same in their results. Human nature is the same with all men, and while legislation gives manufacturers advantages and enables them to charge high prices, they will certainly avail themselves of the opportunity. I do not blame manufacturers for their extortion one half as much as I blame the people for permitting them the privilege which they enjoy and which they have abused. Sir, I believe that there is no more true statement in the first plank of our platform than that "it has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of the few."

To-day in every city in our land you will find men out of work, healthy, able, honest, sober and industrious men asking employment which they cannot obtain. Not only in our cities, but in our country places there are men who would be glad to do any kind of honest labour, but they find it impossible to get it. Why is this? It was said by hon. gentlemen opposite that we would never have any unemployed in this happy country when once the National Policy had sunk its roots deep in this Dominion. During eighteen years the National Policy has had an opportunity to sink its roots deep, but to-day there are more unemployed in Canada than at any period in our country's history.

I do not believe a reformation of the tariff would destroy our infant industries. It was said last session by the Minister of Railways and Canals that the adoption of the Liberal tariff policy meant that "the whole manufacturing class would be swept away at one blow," and "with the same blow the capital invested in manufacturing would be swept out of existence." I am afraid the Minister has no faith in Canadians. He has forgotten that from 1871 to 1881 under a revenue tariff, during the regime of the Liberal Administration, when times were said to be so hard, when the manufacturers had no special protection, the capital invested in our industries increased 103 per cent. From 1881 to 1891, with our magnificent National Policy in existence, with protection afforded to our manufacturers, the increase was only 107 per cent. Here is a picture of the condition of our manufacturing industries under a low tariff, as described by Sir Leonard Tilley in his budget speech in 1879, as will be found in "Hansard." Alluding to the budget speech which the hon. gentleman delivered in 1873, he said:

In 1873 I could point with satisfaction to the various manufacturing industries that were in operation throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion—remuneration to the men who had invested their capital in them and giving employment to tens of thousands.

This statement was made at a time when the lowest tariff ever known in Canada prevailed.

Sir, after eighteen years of protection, our exports of manufactured goods make a very pitiful showing. The Trade and Navigation Returns give for the year ending 30th June last, $7,768,875 as the value of the exports of manufactured goods. From this I think it is but fair to deduct household effects, effects of settlers fleeing from this tariff, the amount being $991,735; ice, $4,825; rags, $63,819, or altogether, $1,060,379, leaving a balance of $6,708,496 representing the total exports. This sum includes brick, extract of hemlock bark, charcoal, leather and wood manufactures which are in no sense or way benefited by protection, the total being $2,700,000. Deducting this sum from the amount of manufactures exported leaves $4,000,000 as the value of the exports of manufactures during last year, that is to say, of exports in any way benefited by protection. Contrast that with the export of industries which are in no sense protected. Of the products of our mines, we exported abroad $7,000,000 worth; of our fisheries, over $10,500,000 worth; of our forests, almost $24,000,000 worth; and from our farms, more than $50,000,000 worth. And add to these, the amount short returned from inland ports, three and one-third million dollars, and we find that our unprotected industries shipped out of Canada, $95,000,000 worth last year, against $4,000,000 worth of manufactured goods exported during the same period.

We are told it has been a most auspicious feature in this policy of the Government, the National Policy that we have in this country an institution unknown in any other country, namely, a free breakfast table. Well, Sir, in spite of what hon. gentlemen opposite contend, there are not a few articles which generally appear on our breakfast tables, and which are taxed. I will read you a few of them, and give you the tax which is actually paid by the people, before these commodities find a place on the breakfast table:

Baking powder and soda	$ 18,337
Yeast	10,183
Mustard	13,688
Spices	17,878
Rice	143,399
Tapioca and arrowroot	6,583
Currants	56,283
Figs	13,526
Prunes	27,082
Dates	7,688
Raisins	119,549
Tea (indirect importation)	6,132
Coffee	7,580
Molasses	68,606
Salt	5,872
Cocoa and chocolate	28,645
Dishes	151,225
Table cutlery	18,000
Macaroni and vermicelli.....	3,403
Rice and sago, flour and sago	3,675
Oranges, lemons and limes	91,840
Sugar, raw and refined, to 31st Dec., '95	710,343
Total	$1,529,517

Altogether, there is a tax upon our breakfast table of $1,529,517, paid into the treasury, and, in addition to that, there is $1,900,000 of the unearned profits extorted from us by the sugar refiners, making a total taxation on our breakfast table supplies, of over three and a half million dollars a year. Now, Sir, if we are content with a very simple breakfast indeed, and confine it to porridge, ham, potatoes, bread and milk, it would still not be able to escape taxation, because we would be obliged to pay duty on salt for our porridge, and mustard for our ham, and our dishes and cutlery are already taxed. Sir, there is no free breakfast table in Canada. We have a tax on soda and yeast, mustard and rice, tapioca and currants, figs and raisins, dates and prunes, cocoa and salt, cutlery and dishes, tea and coffee, molasses and sugar. But why should we complain? In the free list of imports, I find we can take into this country, sand and roots free of duty, sawdust and grass, free of duty, horse hair and ice, free of duty, leeches and crude bones, free of duty. Let us not complain. The hungry may be fed, we have a free breakfast table, for are not leeches and crude bones admitted free?

Sir, we have a tax on machinery and tools, on axes and saws, on scythes and hoes, on forks and spades, on nails and bolts, on glass and oil, on carpets and furniture, on sewing machines and stoves, on ropes and iron, on hardware and pumps. All these are taxed, but still we ought to be comforted, because rags are admitted free. Sir, we are taxed to death in this country, and when we die, our friends are taxed on the coffin to contain our bones. But if we flee from the oppression of this poor man's tariff, and happen to die abroad, we can be brought back into this country without any taxation on our friends, for skeletons are admitted duty free.

The National Policy has decreased the value of farm and other landed property.

So this plank No. 1 of the Liberal platform declares. The decrease in the value of farm lands has been admitted on all sides in this House. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) declared that he believed that the depression of the value of farm lands was not less than 25 per cent. I believe that there are hon. gentlemen in this House who know by their own knowledge and sad experience, that the depreciation in the value of farm lands in Canada is not less than 35 per cent. Why is it that there should be such a decrease in the value of agricultural lands? This country is, first of all, an agricultural country. The cost of living has been increased by the tariff, the cost of production of the crop has been increased by the tariff, the cost of the working expenses of the farm has been increased by the tariff, but the tariff has failed, and completely failed to increase the price at which the farmer's crop can be sold. But, Sir, the depreciation in value has not been confined to agricultural lands only. Our cities depend for their prosperity on the prosperity of the agricultural classes. When the agriculturists of Canada are not prosperous, our cities cannot be prosperous. Under the impetus of the promises made for the National Policy, our cities grew apace. The city of Toronto expanded over the adjoining country; new streets were opened up; large building operations were entered on in the fond belief that the requirements of the country would equal what Toronto so enlarged would be able to supply. Alas for Toronto and the people who invested their money during the boom period, these expectations were not realized, and so, last fall we found a newspaper with page after page, not less than thirty-two columns of advertisements of lands offered for sale in the city of Toronto for unpaid taxes. Not less than 1,248 parcels of property were offered under the auctioneer's hammer, for unpaid taxes. So much had the land depreciated that the arrears of taxation were allowed to roll up for two or three years, until the city was forced to sell the land to realize the taxation upon the lots.

Sir, this tariff has robbed us of our liberty. It is almost as bad as slavery. What is the difference between slavery and protection? Very slight, indeed. Slavery is a system under which I am deprived of my right to choose a market for my labour, under which I am robbed of my wages, under which my muscles and brains are used to benefit my owner, and under which my life is spent in toil to add to his wealth. Now, what is protection? It is a system under which I am fettered in the choice of a market for the products of my labour, under which I may not exchange the fruits of my labour where I choose, and under which I have got to exchange them by such channels as are provided for me by those who have enacted this iniquitous law, called protection. I am robbed of a portion of my wages to swell the extortionate profits of those who have combined to compel me to pay this tribute to them. Slavery and protection are designed by selfish men to benefit and to enrich the classes at the expense of the masses of the people.

Protection has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of the few. Sir, it is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that this is not so, that we have no people of great wealth in this Dominion, but that the wealth is distributed evenly among all the people of the country. I give in evidence against these hon. gentlemen, the words of the late Hon. Sir John Abbott, who, in speaking in the Senate, 1891, said in the debate on the salary of judges:

I remember when a man could live in this country for one-half the amount he could live on now; when the fortunes which judges in the attempt to maintain their social rank had to compete with, were not one-tenth nor one-hundredth part of what they are now. It is not so long ago when the sight of a millionaire would have attracted crowds in the streets. Now there is not a town in the country where you could not find men who are several times millionaires.

Where did these men get their millions? From the pockets of the people. Who are these millionaires? They are the sugar refiners, the cordage manufacturers, the cotton men, the tobacco manufacturers, the owners of distilleries, and the owners of other protected industries. These are the men who have become millionaires with whom the judges can no longer compete in the attempt to maintain their social position in the land. Under protection, these men have only to sit still, many of them, and wealth will flow in upon them without any effort on their part. Some of them to-day would outrival Solomon in all his glory, and yet they toil not, neither do they spin.

Sir, the Finance Minister declares that the very object of a protective tariff in its initial stages is to give a vantage ground. He says:

The object of a protective tariff in its initial stages is to give a vantage ground, and in giving it I frankly admit that in the initial stages the price will be raised to a certain degree. * * * I say that in the initial years of the National Policy with a protective principle in it that it will have the effect of enhancing the cost of goods, and that at the first the cost of goods will be very closely up to the measure of the protection which was given. If it does not have that effect, why should it ever be adopted at all, and what is the good of it?

These are the words of the present Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech of March, 1894. He says that at first the cost of goods will be very closely up to the measure of the protection that is given. By combination, to-day the manufacturers of our country see that the cost of our goods is kept up very near to the measure of the protection given to them. With this thought in his mind, the Finance Minister proceeded to revise the tariff. He made many changes, and then coolly assured the country that the changes would relieve the people of Canada of many burdens of taxation. This he called tariff reform, and this tariff reform was hailed with delight by many of his followers, who had become sick of the National Policy. But what did it amount to? Did it, in fact, as he said, relieve the people of Canada of many burdens of taxation? The Trade and Navigation Returns of last year tell a very different story. Let us take the average of taxation of three years up to the 30th June, 1894, so as not to single out any particular year. For those three years the dutiable goods entered for consumption amounted to $201,813,490, and on these we collected in duty $61,092,006, which is just about $30.27 on every $100 worth imported. Now, Sir, if the promise of hon. gentlemen opposite had been honestly kept, the succeeding year after the tariff was amended would naturally show a substantial reduction in the duties collected; but what are the facts? The dutiable goods entered for consumption amounted to $58,557,655, and the duty collected was $17,887,269, or just about $30.55 on every $100 worth imported—actually more than was charged and collected under the late tariff.

Now, Sir, why was it that the Government did not revise its tariff in the interests of the people? It was simply because there was a power behind the throne which they had to hearken to, and which would not permit them to revise the tariff in accordance with the demands expressed by the people of Canada, both in this House and in the press, from one end of the Dominion to the other, by Liberals and Conservatives alike. The power behind the throne is the Manufacturers' Association. These men control the Government of Canada; they are the masters of the Government of Canada. I quote from the report of J. J. Cassidy, secretary of the Manufacturers' Association, read at the annual meeting of the association held in Toronto on Wednesday, February 28th, 1895—that was after the so-called tariff revision. He reviewed the political events since last meeting; commended the efforts of the Premier "to open up new avenues of trade, particularly for our manufacturers"; approved of his Australian trip and the appointment of J. S. Larke as commissioner to that country, and of Hon. W. B. Ives's succession to the portfolio of Trade and Commerce. He continues:

It is gratifying to know that under the newly organized Government the interests of Canadian manufacturers will receive the best consideration.

* * With one of the best friends the manufacturers ever had in the Government as Premier, with Mr. Foster still in charge of the Finance Department, and with Mr. Ives as Minister of Trade and Commerce, manufacturers should experience a feeling of the utmost security and confidence.

In accordance with the usage of this association previous to your last meeting the tariff committee of the association, in the discharge of their duty, entered upon a close and careful examination of all matters brought before it by members of the association relating to the tariff. The situation at that time was critical. An excitement, amounting to a furor, had been worked up by the enemies of protection and some who had previously declared themselves staunch adherents of the National Policy weakened.

It was evident, however, that some changes in the tariff were imperative, and that if they were not inaugurated by the friends of protection the Government could not survive, and that the enemies of protection would come into power.

It was under these circumstances that the tariff committee entered upon their labours, the result of which was the embodiment of their views in a communication to the Finance Minister, which elicited from him a kindly letter, in which he alluded to it as a well-prepared brief, in which all the matters therein discussed had been done full justice.

Perhaps it might be going too far to even surmise the effect these recommendations of your tariff committee to the Minister, may have had in the final arrangement of the tariff; but it is but an act of justice to the committee to direct attention to the large number of changes that have been made in the tariff along the lines suggested in the recommendations and that in many instances the language used in both is substantially identical. This is particularly noticeable as regards the iron schedule, the duties upon textiles, the duties upon drugs, chemicals, alcoholic preparations, &c., as well as upon an extended list of miscellaneous articles, and large and most important additions to the list of non-dutiable articles.

It is also to be noticed that in many instances where the recommendations suggested that no changes be made in the duties upon articles therein enumerated no changes were made. * *

The association has just reason for congratulating itself upon the influence it possesses in assisting to mould public opinion in the matter of affording tariff protection to our manufacturing industries, and in shaping the laws of the country in conformity thereto.

Why, Sir, this Manufacturers' Association are boastful of their power. They believe, and I am not disposed to disagree with that belief, that they have this Government under their thumb—that, in fact, this Manufacturers' Association sent the Government here to enact such laws as they might dictate. The secretary adds:

The brief as prepared by the secretary was presented to the Minister, Hon. Mr. Foster, at Ottawa, on 26th February, 1894, the receipt of which was acknowledged by him as hereinbefore alluded to.

He winds up as follows, addressing the members of the association:

The fortress of protection does not totter to its fall, as its enemies declare, because you and such as you sustain it. There will be no collapse as these enemies predict. * * * * * In Sir Mackenzie Bowell we have a man at the head of our national affairs who is a sturdy and devoted adherent to our existing system, and who will hold his way steadily in the course he long since helped to mark out—

We on this side of the House are disposed to think that he will hold his course steadily in other directions as well, in spite of certain of his followers in the Cabinet and in this House.

—and, as an association and as individuals, no doubt your best and most earnest support will be given to his Government as long as the Government adhere to the principle of tariff protection to Canadian manufacturing industries.

Now, Sir, the Government must take warning. There is a covert threat in this promise. They will give the Government their unalterable allegiance and help just so long as they are willing to adhere to the principles of tariff protection to the industries which this association represents. Mr. R. W. Elliott, past president of the association, read a paper, in which the following paragraph appears:

In every electoral contest in which the principle of the National Policy is involved, every member of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association will fight for the right.

That is, the right of monopoly, the right to take unearned a portion of another man's wealth—rights worthy of the dark ages, when might was right, of the times of the old barons along the rivers of Germany, or of the chieftains in Scotland in ancient times, when it was considered right to take by force tribute from all passing traders.

We have, he said, in the past, and it is to be hoped we will in the future, devote any small surplus of our membership fees to spreading the truth by means of campaign literature and campaign speeches.

We have seen some samples of the campaign literature which the Manufacturers' Association spread during an election contest. They generally take the form of $2, $3 and $5 bills. This is the kind of literature they usually spread, and I have not a doubt but that they will, in the future, devote any small surplus from the fees of their association to the circulation of such literature.

Now, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association objects to the personnel of this House. They do not think that there are enough manufacturers here. Although the revision of the tariff was admittedly made on the lines suggested by them, even to the extent of adopting their language, so that there would not be even a verbal difference between the tariff as passed by this House and that proposed by the association, they are not satisfied. They find that there are not sufficient manufacturers in this House. Under date of 19th July, 1895, the "Canadian Manufacturer" complains bitterly, that there are not more manufacturers here. It says:

While the manufacturers were compelled to produce the sinews of war in the ever recurring fights to establish and maintain the policy, they were elbowed aside to make room for professional politicians, as has been repeatedly shown in these pages.

The sinews of war—here is a confession, an admission of what occurred—and which we only till then surmised—when the representatives of this association met the old chieftain in the famous red parlour and talked with him over the issues of the day, and decided on the amount of boodle that would be necessary to enable him to carry the different constituencies in the coming campaign. The "Manufacturer" winds up with this declaration:

Sir John and his party could never have attained to power without the active assistance of the manufacturers of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I have just a word or two more to say on this plank Number one, and then I am done with that plank:

It has checked immigration. It has caused great loss of population.

I admit this with a great deal of sadness, because there can be nothing more deplorable than loss of population in a country like Canada. Sir, when we speak of the exodus under the National Policy, during the ten years from 1881 to 1891, the retort is made, that there was an exodus under the Mackenzie Administration. Well, so there was, but, probably, that exodus did not exceed 32,000 souls a year. The utmost charge was, that 42,000 people left Canada every year during the Mackenzie Administration. The Mackenzie Government was roundly denounced for this exodus. The Opposition of that day declared that it must be stopped, that some desperate remedy must be resorted to to stop this frightful exodus of our young people. In Sir John Macdonald's celebrated resolution—his famous National Policy declaration—he said:

The National Policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of employment denied them at home.

Mr. DAWSON.

Sir, the people endorsed this policy. By 1881 it had got fairly under way, by 1881 it was pretty fairly planted in the country, and by 1891 we looked for the results, and I can well imagine the sickening sense of disappointment felt by hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as the deep regret felt by hon. gentlemen on this side, when they found the census revealing the fact that the prophecies of hon. gentlemen opposite of a great increase of population had dismally failed.

In figuring up the loss of population during those ten years, I will spare the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite as much as I can, and estimate the natural increase of population at 14 per cent, instead of 20 per cent, which, I believe, would be a fair estimate of the natural increase of a population so vigorous as ours. Well, estimating the natural increase in the ten years from 1881 to 1891 at 14 per cent, it amounted to 605,000. During these same ten years, there were brought into this country 886,000 immigrants, according to the reports of the Department of Agriculture. These immigrants would naturally have increased also, but, making no allowance for their natural increase, and simply adding the 886,000 to the natural increase of 605,000 in our own population, we should have had an increase of population, in these ten years, of at least 1,491,000. But, as a matter of fact, we found, by actual count, that our population had increased only 504,000, showing that 987,000 people had left Canada during these ten years, or well upon 100,000 souls per year, as against 42,000 per year, which was the most extreme estimate of the exodus during the Mackenzie regime. It is difficult, I admit, to determine accurately the natural increase of any country, but we know that the total increase for the ten years was only 504,000, and we know that the immigrants who came in numbered 886,000. So that, leaving out the natural increase, whatever it might be, and deducting simply the total increase in population of 504,000 from the total immigration of 886,000 in those ten years, and we find we have lost by the exodus 382,000 of that immigration, besides the natural increase, whatever it might be.

Sir Leonard Tilley, who ably advocated the National Policy, thought that it would specially benefit the maritime provinces, and in particular his own province of New Brunswick. How it must have wrung his heart, when the census returns showed that the whole increase in the population of New Brunswick was 63 souls between 1881 and 1891, under the National Policy, and this despite the fact that during that time railways had been constructed in all parts of the province and new country opened up, the country developed in many parts that were undeveloped before, and yet the whole increase was only 63 souls, against 5,639 between 1871 and 1881. Sir, there is one city in New Brunswick whose population increased between 1871 and 1881 and also between 1881 and 1891. Deducting the population of Moncton from the total population of the province, we find this to be the fact, that the increase, outside of Moncton, from 1871 to 1881 was 32,207, and that the decrease in the population of the province, outside of Moncton, from 1881 to 1891 was 3,703 souls. The National Policy drove out every immigrant that arrived seeking a home in New Brunswick, expatriated every soul of her natural increase, and drove with them 3,703 of a population besides. There is not one of our expatriated sons who does not yearn to return to this country, who would not hail with delight the day when a better fiscal system will enable him to return to Canada with the hope that he will be able to earn his daily bread here, so that he may join in that ever-memorable phrase of the late chieftain, who said: "A British subject I was born, and a British subject I will die."

During these fatal ten years we had done much to open up Canada. We developed the North-west by the construction of main and branch lines pretty well through all the North-west, and we should have an increase of population there by hundreds of thousands, aye, by millions, according to the prophecies of hon. gentlemen opposite. Yet the increase has amounted to a little less than the population in one of our largest cities in Ontario. Sir, in the older provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the maritime provinces, there are vast areas of waste lands awaiting settlement. We have spent vast sums on railway enterprises, opening up the newer portions, and we had every reason to expect a large increase in population in the older provinces. As a matter of fact, the increase from 1881 to 1891 was about 8 per cent. From 1860 to 1870, the Southern States were devastated by the most destructive war the world has ever seen, hundreds of thousands of her sons were killed in battle, millions of acres of fertile lands were laid waste and the country left in ruins, yet we find that, in spite of all that disaster, the increase of population during these ten years was 14 per cent against 8 per cent in our provinces of Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces. The effect of this tragedy called the National Policy was worse than that of the sword in the southern states. Though war-swept and famine stricken, they increased their population at a rate almost double that of these provinces of ours. Is it to be wondered at, then, that the Liberals denounce the policy that has brought our fair country to a pass such as this, when she fails to hold our own people here, but instead drives them forth together with those who come seeking a home amongst us in this new land.

Why do they persist in this policy? They say that it is to build up manufacturing industries. Sir, no one more earnestly desires to see the manufacturing industries of Canada prosperous than I do. The pluck, the energy, the perseverance necessary to establish and carry on one of our industries entitle those engaged in it to consideration; they deserve to have a fair and adequate profit. But is it wise to induce production beyond the power of the people to consume? It is said that the capacity of manufacturers has doubled; and yet our population in all Canada has increased only 12 per cent. Tariff restrictions seem to have had this effect—they have made it impossible for our manufacturers to produce at such prices as will enable them to command a market in foreign countries. The exports of our manufactured goods is about $4,000,000, as I have shown—about enough to supply 100,000 people; not more than enough to supply the number of people who are annually driven out of our country during this reign of terror, as I may call it, of the National Policy. In the name of the manufacturers as well as the farmers, I say: Stop the exodus. The home market is the best for the manufacturers as it is the best for the farmers. Why drive the people away and force our manufacturers to send their goods abroad to overcome the tariff barriers of other countries and seek a market among our very people who have been driven out by this policy?

The hon. member for Pictou says that we shall increase now in population, because our country has been more fully developed; railway enterprise has opened up our country and, therefore, we may look for a large increase in the population in the next ten years. But the country was more developed between 1881 and 1891 than between 1871 and 1881; and yet I find that the increase in population in that decade, in 1871-1881, was 18 per cent against only 12 per cent in the decade, 1881-1891. Sir, the mother country is alarmed at our failure to attract population here, at our failure to find homes for their sons seeking them in the new world. It wrings her heart to find her eldest daughter, Canada, turning away tens of thousands of her own children as well as tens of thousands from the mother country seeking homes amongst us, forcing them to take up residence under the Stars and Stripes and to spend their energy in building up a nation that is alien to ours. The St. James "Gazette," commenting on the results of the census, said:

While America is filled up and brimming over and increasing its population by millions, Canada, if not exactly stationary, is increasing very slowly indeed. It had been commonly supposed that with the great boom in the North-west, Canada should have shown an increase of at least two millions or three millions during the last decade, and would be well on its way to something like the population of a second-rate European state; but all such hopes have been dashed by the census. The increase of population spills over the border and fills up the Northern and Western States. The men who were born in Canada and should become citizens of the Empire grow and die under the Stars and Stripes. Whether we like it or not, Canada is not doing well, and has not been doing well for some time past.

And, Sir, it never can do well until we cease paralyzing the country's energies with the virus of protection. Under the Stars and Stripes nearly a million of our compatriots are living. They are men who hunger for the old home here in Canada; they love Canada with a greater love than that they have for their new home under the Stars and Stripes. What class of men go there? On one occasion the hon. member for Pictou declared that none went across the line except craven Grits. I know not what their politics were, but this I know, whether Grit or Tory, cravens they are not. Nobly have they held their own in the land of their adoption. You will find their names first in trade, at the head of vast corporations engaged in transportation, and taking the lead in directing great banking institutions and other financial undertakings in the land which is now their home.

A million of them have gone, including our immigrants, not infants or little children, but stalwart young men and young women, educated and equipped ready for the battle of life. I would like the Minister of Finance to figure out the money lost, through this exodus, to the people of Canada. Take the cost of educating our sons and daughters who are sent into the United States when adults grown. I think that he will find that at a very low estimate the cost of educating the people who have fled from Canada and taken up their abode in the United States well nigh equal in amount to our national debt.

Our population ought to have increased by leaps and bounds. Never in the history of Canada were such large expenditures made upon public enterprises as between 1881 and 1891. According to the Year-Book the Canadian people, through the Government and private corporations spent in railway construction alone over $400,000,000. Millions more were spent in canals and other public works. Building operations in the cities were the means of circulating tens of millions more. But in spite of all this we find that the exodus continued, and our people departed at the rate of a hundred thousand a year to help build up a foreign nation. And so we denounce the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, because it has checked immigration and caused a great loss of population.

We denounce that policy because it has impeded commerce, or rather it has failed to develop commerce with the nations of the world. Our imports for consumption last year amounted to $105,252,521. Outside of Great Britain and the United States, we buy very little from the nations of the world. From the United States we bought more than half of our imports, or a total of $54,634,521. From Great Britain and her colonies, we bought $33,808,642, or a total for these two of $88,443,163. From all the rest of the world outside we purchased $16,809,348. There are only four nations of the world that sold us over a million dollars worth of goods each:—Germany, from which we purchased $4,794,159; Spanish West Indies, $3,531,292; France, $2,585,174, and Japan, $1,567,558, or a total from these four of $12,478,183; leaving a balance of $4,331,165 to represent our total import trade with all the world outside of the countries named.

We sold, of the produce of Canada, $102,828,351. Britain and her colonies took $62,021,793. The United States took $35,603,773. All the countries on the earth besides took $5,202,785 of such goods as we had to sell. Now, of foreign nations, only one purchased from us over a million dollars' worth, and that is the Spanish West Indies, to whom we sold $1,407,400. Australasia sold us, altogether, $113,000 worth of goods, and we sold in Australasia $414,924, made up as follows:—Manufactured goods, $230,665; products of the forest, $94,840; products of the fisheries, $83,601; agricultural products, $5,804; animals and their products, $5. To secure this trifling trade with Australia we have subsidized a line of steamers to cost $122,000 a year.

Sir, we denounce this tariff because it discriminates against Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen opposite deny this, but the facts are against them. The Trade and Navigation Returns prove beyond all doubt that there is an actual discrimination against British trade. Loyal people were urged to support the National Policy because it would increase our trade with Great Britain. Here are the very words of Sir Leonard Tilley, when making his first National Policy Budget speech, in 1879:

Forming a part of that great country—a country that receives our natural products without any taxation, everything we have to send her—apart from our national feelings, I think this House will not object if, in the propositions before me, the duties touch more heavily the imports from foreign countries than from our fatherland.

Sir, it has had the very opposite effect. England takes free all the goods we choose to send her, the products of our fisheries, of our forests, of our mines, and of our farms—everything free of duty. Everything that is sent to the United States is heavily taxed, more heavily taxed during the last few years than formerly. This so-called patriotic policy, you might naturally expect, would produce a vast increase in the whole volume of our export and import trade with Great Britain. Now, as a matter of fact, I find that our trade with Great Britain, exports and imports, from 1873 to 1878, amounted to $560,000,000, an annual average, when the Liberals were in power, of $93,500,000. Our total trade, export and import, with the United States during the same period, was $490,000,000, in round numbers, an annual average of about 80 millions. Our trade with Great Britain exceeded our trade with the United States by $13,500,000 a year. Then came the National Policy, and what do we find? The last fourteen years, under the National Policy, our aggregate trade with Great Britain, exports and imports, has been 1,295 millions, an annual average of $92,500,000 a year, showing a shrinkage of one million a year. Our average aggregate trade for the last fourteen years was one million dollars a year less with Great Britain than it was during the five years of the Mackenzie regime. During the same fourteen years our trade with the United States was 1,290 millions, an average of $92,140,000, almost equal to that of Great Britain, and an increase of over 12 million dollars above what it was during the Mackenzie Administration. This anti-British, unpatriotic National Policy caused a shrinkage in our trade with Great Britain, where no barriers exist against free trade, and produced an increase of trade with the United States, in spite of their heavy protection barriers.

Sir, there is another striking proof of the anti-British character of this National Policy, and it will be found in the total imports for consumption. From 1873 to 1878, under Liberal rule and a low tariff, our trade with Great Britain amounted to $310,000,000, an average of $52,000,000 a year. During the same period our trade with the United States aggregated $299,000,000, or an average of about $50,000,000 a year. During the last fourteen years our trade with Great Britain has averaged $42,500,000, or $9,500,000 less than our average trade during the Mackenzie Administration. Our trade with the United States averages over 51 millions, or a million a year more than it averaged during the Mackenzie Administration.

Now, Sir, our imports from England benefit her. It is no special benefit to England to send her our goods; she has the whole world to draw upon, and it is not one jot to the profit of the people of England to sell her our goods. But she makes a profit on what she sells to us, and she has a right, therefore, to expect from a patriotic policy, that it will increase her export trade with us. Yet we find that, under this policy, exports from Great Britain have diminished to the extent of $9,500,000, and have increased from the United States, her great commercial rival. Now, let me quote further from Sir Leonard Tilley, when speaking in 1879:

In the imposition of the duties we are now about to ask the House to impose, it may be said we will receive from the imports from foreign countries a larger portion of the $2,000,000 we require than we will receive from the mother country. I believe such will be the effect.

But such was not the effect. The amount of duty levied on goods coming from Great Britain, that is, on the whole volume of our trade of last year was 22½ per cent; the duties levied on goods imported from the United States amounted to 12½ per cent, being a discrimination in the whole volume of our trade of 10 per cent. In the Trade and Navigation Returns we find that our imports from Great Britain, of dutiable goods entered for consumption, in the year ending 30th June last, amounted to $23,311,911, on which we collected in duties, $7,006,676.58. In the same year we imported from the United States, of dutiable goods, to the value of $25,795,538, on which we collected in duty $6,897,395.04. In other words, 30½ per cent was levied upon dutiable goods imported from Great Britain, and only 26¾ per cent were levied on the dutiable goods imported from the United States, a straight discrimination of 3¾ per cent, a heavier discrimination than we have had in any year before, and this occurred in the year after the hon. gentleman had revised the tariff.

Sir, this is not treating Great Britain fairly. We sold her, the produce of Canada, $57,913,564 worth, and purchased, of dutiable and non-dutiable goods, $31,131,737. Besides, to balance the account, we took from her, in cash, $26,771,827. Contrast this with our trade with the United States. We purchased there of dutiable and non-dutiable goods to the value of $54,634,521, and sold them of our produce to the value of $35,603,773, and paid them $19,030,748 in cash to balance the account.

Sir, the fact of this discrimination has been pointed out in this House, year after year, by hon. gentlemen on this side, but the Government have turned a deaf ear. They revised the tariff, and the discrimination was sharper than ever. The people in England long since saw and objected to the effect of the tariff policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, as is shown in a speech delivered on the floor of the House of Commons, on 27th April, 1888, when the then Minister of Finance, now the Secretary of State, said:

When we took up this question of fostering our native industries, many parties in England attacked me in reference to it and asked: What do you mean by turning your back upon the English free trade policy and taking up the United States protective policy?

And, Sir, it has been recognized by thinking men outside this House. Principal Grant, in an admirable paper, written by him in November, 1894, says:

We must get into the British or American system. At present we are copying the United States, and without intending it, discriminating against our best customers. Let us take the other tack now. The British system is right.

Sir, it has been recognized, as I said, by Liberals in this House, and they have sought to set it right. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), in April, 1892, moved this resolution:

Inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada into her ports free of duty, this House is of the opinion that the present scale of duties exacted on goods mainly imported from Great Britain, should be reduced.

This was a practical recognition of what was due to the motherland. Sir, I care nothing for the windy declarations of loyalty which are sometimes heard from our friends opposite. I believe in it when I see its fruits in practical works. When I see these hon. gentlemen discriminate against England and refuse to adopt such a resolution as was submitted by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), then I may be allowed to say that I am somewhat skeptical of the depth, quality and extent of their loyalty. This motion was voted down by hon. gentlemen opposite. But they proposed another resolution, a very unselfish one they thought it submitted by the hon. member for North Bruce, as follows:—

That if and when the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland admits Canadian products to the markets of the United Kingdom upon more favourable terms than it accords to the products of foreign countries, the Parliament of Canada will be prepared to accord corresponding advantages by a reduction in the duties it imposes upon British manufactured goods.

Every Conservative supported this resolution, and it was carried: and if my memory serves me, they rose and sang "God Save the Queen."

England admits all our goods free. We will not reduce the tariff unless she goes further, and taxes the bread of her workmen imported from other lands. When she not only admits our goods free, but gives them preferential treatment, then what? Admit her goods free? Not a bit of it. We will be prepared to yield and submit to reducing the duties on British goods so as to place them on a par with importations from the United States. Sir, I believe it would have been well for our trade and well for our relations with the motherland had the resolution of my hon. friend from Queen's been adopted, and reductions in the duties made so as to wipe out the reproach which rests upon the people of Canada, as seen in our Trade and Navigation Returns, that we undoubtedly discriminate in our tariff against importations from the mother country.

Sir, it has been lately the fashion for hon. gentlemen opposite to decry England. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, made use of most remarkable language. I desire to call the attention of the House to it once again, for we should never forget the words used. Speaking of England he said:

Driven from the civilized markets of the world, steadily and every year finding their output to those markets decreasing, they spend millions on their navy, and millions on their army, to force their wares, and their goods, and their merchandise into the uncivilized markets of the world.

This fashion so set by the hon. gentleman has been followed by his friends in the House and their press outside. It is no uncommon thing to see in Conservative newspapers a column filled with loyal praise of England, and to find her described as "Mistress of the sea," "Mother of Heroes," "Champion of Civil and Religious Liberty," "First of Nations," and side by side a column of gross and palpable falsehood about British trade. British workmen and British affairs, the column being headed, "Free Trade as they have it in England." I will give one statement as a sample of the whole. This assertion was made respecting Leeds: "The town of Leeds, England, has a population of 200,000, and not one workman in the town owns the house he lives in, and this in free trade England." The actual facts are these: Leeds has a population of 400,000. More than 2,000 workmen own their homes. The funds of workmen in their unions, friendly societies, co-operative stores and in savings banks, amount to $1,250,000. They have undertaken extensive business enterprises, and conduct them successfully on the co-operative plan. The Leeds Workingmen Co-operative Society own a small fleet on the canals and rivers of Yorkshire and Lancashire and engage profitably in the carrying trade. Allow me to add that this is in free trade England.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was discussing some of the reckless statements which appear, from time to time, in the Conservative press respecting British trade and the condition of the British workman. The condition of the British workman is nothing like so dark as is painted by the press of hon. gentlemen opposite. I would inform these hon. gentlemen that since Mr. Gladstone introduced the principle of eight hours as a day's labour on Government work, without any law whatever being passed, the system has been very generally adopted voluntarily in many of the largest and most important works in England and Scotland. I may inform hon. gentlemen that John Edward Ellis, M.P., managing director of extensive iron and coal mines in the Midlands of England, has voluntarily adopted the eight-hour system, and Col. Seeley, another M.P., who also manages iron works, employing 25,000 men, has followed his example. This shows that the condition of the unhappy labourer in free trade England is not so dark as some of the newspapers of hon. gentlemen opposite painted it just before the recent elections.

Why, Sir, our Canadian merchants who were in England last fall placing their orders for goods, found that they were unable to get their orders filled as rapidly as they desired. They found in almost every centre of industry in England factories working overtime, and some of them working day and night wherever practicable, and yet in spite of all this extra effort it was impossible for the manufacturers to overtake their orders.

What has free trade done for England? Mulhall declares that since the adoption of free trade, England has reduced her debt by $900,000,000; that her population has increased 42 per cent; that the wealth of her people has increased 124 per cent; that her trade has increased 472 per cent, and her shipping has increased 583 per cent. In speaking of this great increase in wealth which has much more than doubled since the adoption of free trade, Mulhall goes on to say:

The ordinary accumulation is £150,000,000 yearly, or about half a million daily. Does this wealth become congested among a small number of people? On the contrary the rich grow less rich and more numerous every year, and the poor become fewer in ratio of population.

One hundred and fifty millions pounds sterling, about $750,000,000 yearly of our money; well up to two and a half million dollars for each working day, is added to the wealth of England under free trade. England's trade with foreign nations, her export and import trade, has enormously increased under free trade. It was in 1893 almost equal to that of Germany and the United States together, and they have a population three times greater than that of England. The foreign trade of France and Russia, with a population four times greater than that of England, was thirty-four million dollars less. Italy and Spain, with ten millions more people, have together a trade less than one-sixth that of England.

England is to-day the creditor general of all the protected countries in the world. Without English money the protected industries of all the nations of the earth would suffer materially. Her reserve capital supports these industries, supplies them with money and enables them to survive in the countries adopting protection.

But, hon. gentlemen say, that within the last few years England is suffering more severely; that free trade is now getting in its work, and that England is rapidly falling into decay. Dire ruin and misery, they say, is spreading over the land, and her people are unemployed. Well, if that is so, we might naturally look for an increase of poverty and crime, and we would also expect to see her people fleeing from her shores. Let me inform these hon. gentlemen that during the last sixteen years, ending in 1895, the increase of the population of England almost equalled the total population of the Dominion of Canada. It increased from 34,622,930 in 1880 to 39,134,166 in 1895, an increase in the sixteen years of 4,511,236, or about 13 per cent.

We would expect that if the times were bad in England, that the increase in the number of paupers would exceed the percentage of increase in population at least. What are the facts? In the three years, 1880, 1881, 1882, the average number of all sorts of paupers, indoor and outdoor, in the United Kingdom was 1,001,944, while in the three years ending January, 1895, the number had fallen to 966,920, or an actual decrease of 4 per cent. Crime also decreased. In the three years 1880, 1881 and 1882, convictions in England, Scotland and Ireland averaged 15,808 per year, while in the three years ending January 1st, 1895, the average number of convictions had fallen to 12,899, a decrease of over 18 per cent. These statements are taken from the Statistical Abstract of the United Kingdom for the year 1895.

If trade is so bad in England we might expect the Bankruptcy Court to reveal the fact. But on the contrary, I find the following facts set forth in the Statistical Abstract: The number of adjudicated bankrupts and the number of resolutions registered for liquidation by arrangement and for composition with creditors altogether in England and Wales, during the years 1880, 1881 and 1882 was 29,066, while in the three years, 1892, 1893 and 1894 they had fallen to 14,352, or a decrease of over 50 per cent. The amount of liabilities involved during the same period fell from £52,976,044 to £23,458,124, a decrease in the amount of liabilities involved in these failures of 55 per cent. The assets in the three years 1880, 1881 and 1882 amounted to £15,085,324, and in the three years 1892, 1893 and 1894, they amounted to £8,298,228, a decrease in the assets of only 45 per cent. The number of bankrupts decreased 50 per cent, liabilities involved decreased 55 per cent, and the assets decreased 45 per cent; the proportion of the assets to the liabilities being larger in the three last years than in the first three years of the period under discussion.

This does not seem to me to prove that England is in the deplorable condition painted by hon. gentlemen opposite. But when we prove their libels respecting British trade to be false, they say: But what of agriculture, and they paint grim pictures of awful destitution among the agriculturists of England. I have no doubt that many of the English farmers are depressed. I think there is no question about it. The lower prices we obtain in the British market for agricultural products to-day, as compared with, say, twenty years ago, must have an effect upon the agriculturists of that country. But, Sir, if the English farmer cannot live on the price obtainable for his products in England, what is to become of the farmers of Canada who have to look to the English market in which to sell their goods. With our long winter, with our many disabilities, with the cost of the transportation of products to that great market in England, we have to compete with the English farmer, and if the British farmer is unable to live, how can the Canadian farmer live and contend with these disadvantages.

I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite will be able to show that the small farmers—those holding a comparatively speaking, small number of acres of land in England—are in a distressed condition. Where the farmers work their own land, with the help of their sons, they are not suffering in anything like the degree the large landholders are who conduct their operations by the employment of hired labour. The agricultural distress in England is caused by the use of hired labour and by high rents.

There is at present an agitation in England for protection, in the shape of duties on agricultural produce, and hon. gentlemen opposite seem disposed to back up that agitation. What would be the effect of protection, so-called, to the distressed agriculturists of England? It would simply increase the value of land and consequently increase the rent the owner of the land would exact from the tenant who works the soil. It is the landowners and not the farmers who are at the bottom of this agitation for the protection of agriculture in England. In proof of that, I will read to the House what was said by the Right Hon. Henry Chaplin, member of Parliament, on the 27th of February, 1891. He said:

One effect of such duties (duties on produce) was undoubtedly to very materially enhance the price of land, and thus to increase its value.

The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain is on record as saying:

The owners of property, the men who have privileges to maintain, would be glad to entrap you from the right path, by raising the cry of Fair Trade, under which they cover their demand "protected industry," and in connection with which they would tax the food of the people in order to raise the rent of the landlord.

That is the object of those who are at the back of the agitation for granting relief to the distressed agriculturists in England. The object is to raise the rent of the landlord.

Why do hon. gentlemen opposite decry the motherland? Why do they discriminate against her trade? Are they not loyal? Sir, I believe they are loyal. I believe, in spite of their abuse of England, in spite of their discrimination against her trade, that deep down in their hearts there is a sentiment of loyalty as fervent and as strong as that which swells the hearts of the Liberals of Canada. Should danger menace the Empire, and an enemy invade our land, I know that there is not a man on the other side of the House who would not take his place side by side with the Liberals, and manfully fight for the Empire, and manfully defend our homes. There is not one but would mingle his blood with that of the Liberals in stern defence of our country's flag and all that it implies. The flag, that emblem of our liberties which we on this side deem to be too sacred an emblem to be dragged in the mud of political strife.

2.—ENLARGED MARKETS—RECIPROCITY.

That, having regard to the prosperity of Canada and the United States as adjoining countries, with many mutual interests, it is desirable that there should be the most friendly relations and broad and liberal trade intercourse between them;

That the interests alike of the Dominion and of the Empire would be materially advanced by the establishing of such relations;

That the period of the old reciprocity treaty was one of marked prosperity to the British North American colonies;

That the pretext under which the Government appealed to the country in 1891 respecting negotiations for a treaty with the United States was misleading and dishonest and intended to deceive the electorate;

That no sincere effort has been made by them to obtain a treaty, but that, on the contrary, it is manifest that the present Government, controlled as they are by monopolies and combines, are not desirous of securing such a treaty;

That the first step towards obtaining the end in view, is to place a party in power who are sincerely desirous of promoting a treaty on terms honourable to both countries;

That a fair and liberal reciprocity treaty would develop the great natural resources of Canada, would enormously increase the trade and commerce between the two countries, would tend to encourage friendly relations between the two peoples, would remove many causes which have in the past provoked irritation and trouble to the governments of both countries, and would promote those kindly relations between the Empire and the republic which afford the best guarantee for peace and prosperity;

That the Liberal party is prepared to enter into negotiations with a view to obtaining such a treaty, including a well-considered list of manufactured articles, and we are satisfied that any treaty so arranged will receive the assent of Her Majesty's Government, without whose approval no treaty can be made.

Sir, the natural resources of Canada are very great, and all we lack to properly develop them are three things: Men, money, and markets. Under the National Policy, men have been driven out by tens of thousands. Money has been absorbed by a few, and I am sorry to say that some of those who have succeeded in absorbing much of the money of the people of Canada have seen fit to invest a portion, at least, of their surplus wealth in the United States, in preference to investing it in the development of our latent resources in Canada.

Markets are required. The Chinese policy of isolation, resulting in national stagnation, must be set aside. Our vast mineral wealth is useless to us for lack of men and money, and markets, to develop them.

Our natural wealth, until developed, is as useless to us as a bag of gold would be to a shipwrecked mariner on a desert island. These hon. gentleman say that we need not worry, because we have a vast home market, not perhaps for minerals, but at least for agricultural products. I will give them a few figures in regard to the home market. A home market for agricultural products? Let me tell hon. gentlemen that, according to census bulletin No. 18, which they can consult, 735,207 men are engaged in agriculture in Canada; 320,001 people altogether are engaged in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits. Sir, we had industries before the National Policy was thought of, but after eighteen years of it, let us see what success the census bulletins reveal. We have 320,001 operatives in our manufacturing industries. From this number, I shall have to ask permission to count off those whom the National Policy in no way benefits. Carpenters, coopers, joiners, boat-builders, and saw-mill men, number 67,000. Brick-makers, masons, painters and plasterers, number 26,000. Machinists and blacksmiths number 28,000. Milliners and dressmakers, shoemakers, harnessmakers, tailors and tanners number 70,000. Bakers, butchers, millers, butter and cheese makers, number 20,000. Bookbinders and printers number 9,000. These who are in no way indebted to the National Policy, directly or indirectly, number 220,000 of our industrial population, leaving 100,000 who are in some degree benefited by protection. These 100,000 include all who work in factories, refineries, breweries and distilleries, and some thousands who are put down in the tables as "others." We will suppose that not a soul worked in these industries before, and that the National Policy could claim the whole of them. The National Policy home market, then, would be limited to 100,000 people, and we have 735,000 farmers to supply them. We have the products of seven farms to supply one operative.

Sir, there are not 100,000 operatives to-day, directly or indirectly, benefited by protection. I will give you a list of the establishments that may be more or less benefited by protection, and the number of persons, male and female, employed in them. If there are others, let us have their names. They are as follows:—

Agricultural implements	3,856
Cotton operatives	6,053
Woollen operatives	4,241
Mill and factory operatives (textile)	3,876
Iron and steel workers	2,804
Machinists	9,572
Moulders	4,070
Tool and cutlery makers	964
Wire workers	283
Sugar refineries	1,700
Rope and cordage operatives	412
Oil well employees	344
Starch works employees	62
"Manufacturers and officials"	6,169

If hon. gentlemen can add to these, I wish they would; but take it at 100,000, and admit the absurd contention that not one of these could have received employment in this country but for the National Policy, and that is the utmost extent that can be claimed for the National Policy home market—100,000 for 735,000 farmers to supply.

Well, we would suppose from the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, from the speech of the hon. gentleman who last sat down. (Mr. Smith, Ontario), that they never advocated or desired reciprocity with the United States in any shape, manner, or form. Why, the last Parliament was prematurely dissolved and an election held to secure the people's endorsement of the Government's stand in favour of reciprocity. Clearly during the session of 1890, the Government had no idea of a general election before 1892. They refused in that year to revise the list of voters, and stated that it was not their intention to have general elections before the natural death of Parliament in the year 1892. Here are the words of the then Secretary of State (Hon. Mr. Chapleau):

But is there no other reason why that revision should not take place? We have not yet reached the end of this Parliament. According to law this Parliament will cease in the beginning of 1892. If in July, 1891, the census shows that the representation must be changed, it will become necessary to have new elections soon after the census, and those elections should take place at the beginning of 1892, by the natural death of this Parliament according to the constitution. There is no reason to doubt that a revision beginning in 1891 could be satisfactorily made, and would be ready for the eventuality of elections in 1892.

The lists were not revised, but the election was held on the 5th March, 1891. What reason was given for this change in the plan of the Government? What reason did they give for deciding to hold the elections a year before the date fixed by the constitution? Immediately after dissolution, the following announcement was published by authority in the Government press:

It will naturally be asked what are the reasons which have induced the Government to appeal to the country at the present time. It is understood that the Dominion Government have, through Her Majesty's Government, made certain proposals to the United States for negotiations looking to the extension of her commerce with that country. The proposals have been submitted to the President for his consideration and the Canadian Government is of the opinion that if the negotiations are to result in a treaty, which must be ratified by the Parliament of Canada, it is expedient that the Government should be able to deal with a Parliament fresh from the people rather than with a moribund House.

Sir, they were so red hot for reciprocity that they wanted a brand new Parliament elected at once, so that this golden opportunity would not be let slip. And during the campaign, at Toronto, Sir John Macdonald put himself on record as follows:—

The Government are appealing to the people to grant them authority to send a delegate to Washington to negotiate trade relations with the United States.

On the same day at the same meeting, Sir John Thompson said :

The Government would endeavour to obtain reciprocity with the United States along the line of the reciprocity treaty which prevailed from 1854 to 1856.

This further statement, dictated by the head of the Government, was published with regard to the alleged negotiations for reciprocity :

Moreover, these propositions were invited and suggested by the Washington authorities. Commissioners from Canada and Great Britain will start for Washington on 4th March, the date of the opening of the new Congress. The result of the Canadian elections will be known on the 6th March, the day the commissioners will reach Washington. In order that this commission may have no uncertain sound the Government has decided to appeal to the people and ask for judgment on these proposals to the Washington authorities.

On these lines, Sir, the elections were run, that is they were so run wherever reciprocity was found to be a winning card. Bills were published, calling meetings in the interests of the Government candidate in Carleton, N.B., headed :

Vote for Vince and Reciprocity.

If you want reciprocity, support the Government.

The Government have been approached by the Washington authorities ; they are in a position to get this boon for the farmers of Canada, and if you desire it you must support them. This was the language with which hon. gentlemen opposite, all through the country, approached the agricultural constituencies. Unfortunately, however, it turned out that the United States Government had not invited a conference, had made no overtures whatever to the Government here ; and Mr. Blaine found it necessary to write Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British Ambassador at Washington, under date of 1st April, 1891 :

I deem it important, since the matter has been for some weeks open to public remark, to have it settled that the conference was not initiated by me, but, on the contrary, that the private arrangement of which I spoke was but a modification of your proposal, and in no sense an original suggestion from the government of the United States.

Shortly after the elections, the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), then High Commissioner of Canada, who had visited Washington, wrote to Sir John Macdonald, after his return, as follows :—

I told Mr. Blaine that I wished at the outset to recognize the correctness of his statement contained in his letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote, which I had seen, in reference to the initiation of the negotiations regarding reciprocity and trade relations between the two countries.

Mr. DAWSON.

Well, our delegates went there. Sir John Thompson, Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) conferred with the Hon. Jas. G. Blaine respecting trade relations between Canada and the United States. Let me give you a quotation from a memo. prepared by Mr. Blaine and sent to the President of the United States, giving a summary of what occurred at that conference. He said :

At this conference the commissioners stated they were authorized by the Canadian Government to propose the renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854, with such modifications and extensions as the altered circumstances of both countries and their respective interests might seem to require. In answer to an inquiry the commissioners stated that the modifications or extensions contemplated in the schedule of articles should be confined to natural products and should not embrace manufactured articles.

The commissioners were informed that the government of the United States would not be prepared to renew the treaty of 1854, nor to agree upon any commercial reciprocity which should be confined to natural products alone.

Well, these delegates from the Dominion Government went to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity in natural products and failed. Now hon. gentlemen opposite assure us that a treaty would ruin us. The hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) declared that such a treaty would do our farmers no good because of the similarity of the products, and that the politician who advocated such a policy was deliberately deluding the public. I ask the hon. member for South Ontario what he has to say to these negotiators, the First Minister (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), who went to Washington to try and obtain a renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854? Reciprocity in barley, wheat, fish, lumber, cattle, butter, cheese and all other natural products. Does he say that these hon. gentlemen were deliberately deluding the agriculturists of Canada? If he makes that charge against them, I must leave him to their tender mercies.

The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) said, in this debate, that he feared a deluge of American farm products, if the duties were removed. Well, Sir, when the market in the United States for our barley was lost to us, that hon. gentleman sturdily advocated the cultivation of two-rowed barley for the English market. Some of our farmers did attempt to cultivate two-rowed barley, to their sorrow, loss and keen regret. These hon. gentlemen say that American products American farm truck, American hogs and cattle would displace ours in the Canadian market, in the event of a reciprocity treaty being made. These hon. gentlemen forget that the farmers of Canada beat all the world at the World's Fair in the very heart of the United States. In 1891 the Government thought that our farmers had nothing to fear. Having since then seen Canada's great exhibit at that World's Fair, I wonder that there is any member of this House who doubts the ability of the Canadian farmer to hold his own in competition with the farmers of any country in the world, and certainly with those of the United States. Let them open their markets to us, with their teeming millions in the great cities almost at our doors—in Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Washington—and let us see what share we shall have in competition for these markets with the farmers of the United States.

Hon. gentlemen opposite failed to get a treaty, and now they say the American market is not of much account, anyhow. Well, Sir, if the American market is of no account to the Canadian farmer, the tariff legislation of the United States cannot have affected our exports to it. Let us see. In 1890, the United States tariff was much lower than it was a couple of years later, after the adoption of the McKinley Bill. Let me read you a table, showing the effect upon our exports to the United States in a few leading articles of farm products, of the increased duties under the McKinley Bill :

COMPARISON OF EXPORT OF FARM PRODUCTS, 1890 AND 1893.

Name of Articles.	1890.	1893.
Horses	1,887,895	1,123,339
Cattle	104,623	11,032
Poultry	105,612	52,114
Eggs	1,793,104	324,355

Potatoes	308,915	259,176
Rye	113,320	3,302
	10,453,352	3,624,892

Of these twelve leading articles, our shipments fell from three to one. Our exports of cattle, poultry, malt and rye were practically wiped out. Our exports of eggs fell to one-sixth of what they had been. Of barley we exported only one bushel where formerly we exported seven. They simply raised the barriers against us, and immediately we lost two-thirds of our trade. But, in spite of these barriers against us, a large amount of our farm produce continued to find its way into that market. And that, I think, conclusively proves the value of that market to us ?

Gentlemen opposite tell us, that substitutes can be found for this market elsewhere, perhaps on the coast of Africa, perhaps in Java, perhaps in Iceland or in Terra del Fuego—anywhere except in the great cities of the country right at our door. I have said that the McKinley Bill was meant to be prohibitory. And, when I say that our exports to the United States, in many lines, under the McKinley Bill, largely exceeded our exports to all the world besides, it must surely prove to hon. gentlemen that that market is of some importance to us. Let me give you a list of articles of export, the produce of Canada, showing what amount of each was sent to the United States, and what to all other countries of the world besides :

Well, Sir, the McKinley tariff is no more. How soon it will be reimposed, no one knows. The Wilson Bill, even as amended, gives some relief, but the burden is still very great.

Now, for a moment let us examine the relative value of the United States and the Australian markets. In spite of tariff restrictions, we sold natural products to the United States last year to the value of $32,500,000, consisting of the following products: Of the mines, $6,271,397; of the fisheries, $3,025,171; of the forest, $12,482,969; of the farm, $7,423,171; altogether, of natural products sent into the United States, $32,502,707. Now, our exports of natural products to Australia were as follows:—Products of the mine, nothing; products of the fisheries, $83,610; products of the forest, $94,840; agricultural products, $5,804; animals and their products, $5; altogether, $184,259 worth of natural products found their way to the Australian market. Sir, I have no desire to belittle the Australian market. What we desire is an outlet for our natural products; but I think that a subsidy of $122,000 a year is rather too high a price to pay for a market consuming only $184,000 worth of our natural products. Why, Sir, we have to-day yards full of young beef cattle, but no market. We are barred out from the United States by their quarantine regulations. We have cheese and butter for sale by the million pounds. Of animals and their products, of all sorts, the Australian market took from us, last year, just $5 worth. Why, Sir, if next year our friends opposite are able to induce the Australians to purchase from us $10 worth of animals and their products, you will hear orators all over this country declaring that our trade with Australia in this line has increased 100 per cent. If they can induce the Australians to purchase from us $25 worth of animals or their products, we shall hear hon. gentlemen opposite proclaiming the startling fact that our trade with Australia in animals and their products has increased 500 per cent. And this would be a triumph for the National Policy, this would be the justification for the enormous sum which we pay to develop that market. Why, Sir, when the Australian delegates were here, they told us that they had millions of sheep, they had vast herds of cattle; that they could send ship-loads of mutton, countless tons of beef, an illimitable number of pounds of butter and cheese to our Canadian market. Now, let me say that my opinion is that the farmers of Canada do not object to Australian beef, or Australian mutton, or Australian butter, or Australian cheese, coming here in the natural course of trade, but what they object to is being compelled to pay a large subsidy to a steamship line as an inducement to these people to send these cheap products here. While being compelled, under the tariff, to pay exorbitant prices for the commodities which they use in their farming operations, handicapped, as they are, by high taxation for the benefit of combines, they object to being bled to pay this subsidy to a steamship line to induce Australians to dump in our market their cheaply-produced mutton and their bounty-fed butter and cheese. In spite of restrictions, the United States bought of us last year 180 times more of our natural products than Australia, and 1,280 times more of our farm products than we sold in Australia.

I believe, Sir, that an honest effort should be made by this Government to procure a treaty with the United States, and I believe if that effort were made, a treaty could be negotiated which would greatly extend our trade. The people of Canada desire to trade as freely as possible with the United States. We have been doing, and are doing, all that men can do to overcome the natural barriers that exist between these two countries. Why, Sir, our capitalists have built seven bridges across the rivers that flow between us—the Victoria, the Lachine, and the Canada Atlantic over the St. Lawrence; the Suspension, the Cantilever and the International over the Niagara; and the Canadian Pacific Railway over the Sault Ste. Marie. They propose to build five more bridges, one at Montreal, one near Brockville, one at Kingston, one at Niagara, and another at Windsor, all for the purpose of overcoming these natural barriers. They have bored a tunnel under the St. Clair River, and they propose to bore another to accommodate the traffic and passengers going to and fro between these two countries.

Why all these efforts, if we are not to trade with the United States? In years to come, people will marvel when they read of men spending millions of dollars to overcome the natural barriers to trade, and then spending their energies in advocating a war of tariffs whose sole possible object is to prevent trade.

Well, Sir, Canada is interested in many reciprocity treaties now. Unfortunately, many of the countries in whose trade she is interested, are so remote that the treaty is of very slight benefit to us. Let me give you a list of such treaties, containing the names of the countries with which Great Britain has reciprocal treaties of commerce, in which Canada is interested, with the date of the treaty, and the value of Canadian natural products exported to each country in the year 1894-95:

Sixteen purchase not a dollar's worth of our natural products. Sir, these countries are all thousands of miles away, too far to be of any benefit to us. New York city alone would absorb more of our farm products in a week than the whole of these countries absorbed last year. British statesmanship has been able to secure reciprocity treaties with Russia, Germany, France, Spain, Venezuela, with every one of the other twenty-nine countries I have read; but our statesmen sit here and weakly declare that it is beyond their ability to negotiate a treaty with our cousins in the United States. Let them give way to men who can, to men of courage and faith in Canada, men who will not hide affrighted behind their wretched tariff wall, fearing an inundation of cheap goods, men who believe that Canadians are qualified to try conclusions with any people outside of this Dominion, men who know that our Canadian people can hold their own in a fair field without favour with our American rivals.

There are other reciprocity treaties which have been negotiated by Great Britain, namely, treaties with Egypt, Ecuador, Greece, Italy, Mexico, Montenegro, Paraguay, Roumania, Salvador, Servia and Zanzibar. In these treaties we have no interest whatever. To those countries we sold of the products of the forest and fisheries and manufactures the value of $99,020, but not a dollar of farm products, last year. Sir, there are some timid souls who fear a trade treaty in any shape or form. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think such a treaty, in some unaccountable way would menace your liberties, and they are afraid to enter into reciprocal treaties with any country in the world. Such stick in the mud patriots are out of place in this age of progress. England is not afraid, that little tiny nation ventures into every sea, and it has negotiated 40 treaties with foreign nations alien in tongue and creed. Although they have those treaties no one in England deems for a moment that they are a menace to Britain, that there is any menace to her or her institutions lurking in those treaties.

"The incapables," as they call each other, who have so long usurped the place of statesmen on the treasury benches here, knowing their inability to negotiate a treaty with the United States, think to club that country into granting a treaty. They determined on "a reciprocity of tariffs" with our neighbours with the absurd belief that if they waged a tariff war with a nation of 65,000,000, that would tend to procure for this country eventually reciprocity of trade. To pursue this policy of endeavouring to force them into granting us a treaty is the only means that occurs to them of ensuring ultimately a trade treaty with the United States.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that it is necessary to maintain our high tariff in order that we shall have some vantage ground from which to negotiate a treaty. They forget that England, a free trade country, has been successful in negotiating 40 treaties, although she gives absolute free trade. It is anything for an excuse to continue protection.

There was one golden opportunity missed not long since by the Government of the day, the chance of a lifetime was allowed by them to slip by and be lost by their apathy, or perhaps by the incapacity of their Administration. The Wilson Bill passed the House of Representatives on 1st February, 1894, and it provided that mica, iron ore, bituminous coal and coke should be free. There was no help given to the advocates of the Wilson Bill, no encouragement to help the Bill on its way through the Senate. Nothing was done by our administrators; they sat idly here and allowed the bill to be amended in the Senate, as follows:—

A tax of 20 per cent was put on mica; a tax of 15 per cent was put on coke, and bituminous coal and iron ore were taxed 40 per cent per ton.

Sir, the Wilson Bill provided for a duty of 10 cents a bushel on potatoes and 25 per cent on barley. But as amended this Bill raised the duty on potatoes to 15 cents a bushel, and on barley to 30 per cent. The following were free under the Wilson Bill, as originally drafted, and as it passed the House of Representatives: Beef, mutton, pork, hams, bacon, lard, cheese, eggs, apples (green and dried). At present we have 3 cents a dozen duty on eggs, 1 cent a pound on lard, 4 cents a pound on cheese, and 20 per cent on the other articles I have named. Sir, if this Government had secured for us the American market for even these articles, I believe that an immense trade would have resulted. In the case of mica, $1 is taken out by the American tax collector from every $5 worth sent to the United States. We have a vast quantity of mica in different parts of this country seeking a market and finding none, or not a sufficient market in Canada; the natural market has been found in the United States, and it is forced now to cross that tariff barrier, and to pay for the privilege $1 out of every $5 worth sent.

Mr. DAWSON.

For iron ore the United States is our natural market. Even if we had all the smelting and iron works that were prophesied by hon. gentlemen opposite, we would not be able to consume one tithe of the ore we have ready to offer for sale in the province of Ontario alone. I can remember when the vast deposits of iron ore in the county which I have the honour to represent were being worked, giving employment to hundreds of men in and around the pits. Prospectors were tramping all over that county finding large deposits, with a view to their future development. We were just on the eve of a great mineral development there. Railways were projected, and other works in connection with this industry of mining undertaken, but then the Americans put on a duty of 75 cents a ton, and that simply wiped us out. The mines shut down, and have not since re-opened. In 1894 the Wilson Bill restored ore to the free list, and if our statesmen had only succeeded in keeping it there, what a development there would have been in the mining industries in Ontario. The Bill, as amended, puts 40 cents a ton on iron ore, and we have no certainty whatever that that duty will not be increased to 75 cents once more.

It was the object of Mr. Wilson to help the manufacturers in the eastern portion of the United States, and he put bituminous coal on the free list to enable them to import it from the province of Nova Scotia. There is an enormous consumption of coal on the eastern coast of the United States, and had Mr. Wilson succeeded in working his Bill through both Houses of Congress it would have resulted in an enormous increase of trade for the coal miners of Nova Scotia, and the output of the mines there would have increased four-fold. What effort was made by hon. gentlemen opposite to assist Mr. Wilson in this Bill; what offer did they make to the American government as an inducement to admit our coal free of duty into the United States? Sir, they sat here idle and allowed this opportunity to slip by. To-day 40 cents per ton is the tax on our coal going into the United States, and it may at any moment be increased to 75 cents. They made no effort in the matter.

They allowed Wilson's proposal of 10 cents a bushel on potatoes to be increased to 15 cents; only 5 cents of an increase, but this means a tax to be paid by the farmers of Canada of from $10 to $15 per acre on the crop which they grow, destined for the American market. Beef, mutton, pork, hams, bacon, lard, apples, all might have had free entry into the United States. It was so proposed by Mr. Wilson. What effort did this Government make to help him to get that Bill through the Senate? As a result of their inactivity, as a result of their apathy, there is to-day a tax of 20 per cent on these articles. If hon.

gentlemen opposite say that we can sell none of those commodities in the American market, my answer is: let these markets be open and let us try. There is no market in the world more particular about its food supply, and none more dainty as to quality than the market which we find in the great cities of the United States, where the farmers in the western part of Ontario have at their doors a population nearly equal to that of the cities of England.

Sir, I believe that the products raised upon our farms would admirably suit the American market. The flavours of our Canadian meats is so well known that they are recognized fully in the English market, and according to the observations of hon. gentlemen opposite—and I believe in this they assert the truth—to-day our hams and bacon are rapidly displacing the products of other countries in the British market. If they are of such exquisite flavour as to suit this market, they will also suit the American market, and I believe their quality will ensure a large demand and consumption there.

Eggs are taxed 3 cents a dozen going into the United States. We know what that means. We know that in 1890, when eggs were on the free list, we sent to the United States more than $1,750,000 worth. Cheese is now taxed 4 cents a pound. Hon. gentlemen opposite declare that we would have no market whatever in the United States for cheese. In that I differ, and differ profoundly, from these hon. gentlemen. The exhibit made at the World's Fair proved the superiority of the Canadian cheese, in flavour and in make, over any thing produced in the United States. The Americans are as fond of good cheese as are Englishmen, and the known quality of Canadian cheese would ensure a large consumption for it in their country if their markets were available to us.

Mr. Wilson desired to put these articles on the free list without any condition whatever. But the Government sat here quietly and planned a subsidy for an Australian line to enable us to send $5,809 worth of our farm products to that country; less than a small corner grocery would handle in a month. Sir, the Wilson Bill proposed to admit free of duty ploughs, harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horse rakes, cultivators and threshing machines. The new tariff as finally passed put these articles on the free list, but provides:

That all articles mentioned in this paragraph if imported from a country which places an import duty on like articles imported from the United States, shall be subject to the duties existing prior to the passage of this Act.

Thus the McKinley tariff on these articles was allowed to remain. Our manufacturers, given duty free their raw material, their iron and steel, would and could command a large share of this market. We have—con-troverting the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite—the evidence of such practical manufacturers as Mr. F. T. Frost, of Smith's Falls, and Mr. F. T. Lavoie, both manufacturers of agricultural implements, both anxious to try conclusions with the Americans in their own market. Our manufacturers are not cowards, nor are they all by any means corrupt. Many of them have pluck enough to pit their energy, their brains and their skill against the Americans. They want fair play, a fair field and no favour.

Sir, we believe that a liberal trade intercourse would promote these friendly relations between the Empire and the Republic which affords the best guarantee for peace. Now, Sir, it is my opinion that were it not for her colonies, England need never become involved in war. Her possessions in Africa adjoin those of France and Germany, and if she is ever involved in war with either of these nations, it will be on account of some dispute respecting these possessions. With Russia she need never have a dispute except with reference to questions affecting India. With the United States war would be absurd except in defence of her first-born colony, Canada. Lying side by side as we do, there are many opportunities for mischief-makers to stir up strife between these two countries—strife which might culminate in that most appalling of all disasters, a war between Great Britain and the United States. Sir, I believe it to be the most solemn duty of every man in Canada to do his utmost to remove every possible cause of friction or irritation between these two countries. It is his duty to cultivate the most friendly relations, and I believe that a war of tariffs is the last possible way of promoting peace between us. Sir, I firmly believe that a fair and liberal reciprocity arrangement between Canada and the United States would tend more than anything else to cement these friendly relations that it is our duty to encourage. Sir, I believe it to be the very essence of loyalty for us to advocate such a treaty, and it seems to me it ought not to require any very high degree of statesmanship to procure it. Sir, if we do our part, the day may not be so distant when the dream of men who know England to be something more than a mere nation of traders will be realized, and the great republic will stand side by side with Great Britain to advance the civilization of the world. A great statesman he will be who will bring about an alliance between these two great Anglo-Saxon nations—not a political union, for that is not desirable, but an alliance born of a treaty of peace. The Right Hon. A. J. Balfour spoke wisely, at Bristol, recently, when he said:

He felt that England and the United States should work together, each in its own sphere, to promote and extend the Anglo-Saxon ideas of liberty. If, he declared, Great Britain was in alliance with the United States, she could fulfil the duties Providence had entrusted to her, and need not fear a foreign foe or international divisions.

And what more natural than that they should be friends and allies, each working out her own destiny in her own way, but joining together as promoters of the peace of the world? English statesmen are not alone in desiring this alliance. Everywhere in the United States we can find earnest men who think the time has come to bury the hatchet and bring about a permanent treaty of peace between these countries. The wish of many an earnest American heart is expressed by one of their poets. They wish to see the flag of England and the stars and stripes—the Old Glory flag, so dear to all Americans—side by side for the progress of the nations and the liberty of mankind. These words of one of their poets find an echo in British hearts :

Where is the flag of England ?
It waves the throne above,
Where a woman reigns by the grace of God
And a people's boundless love ;
Of all the rulers earth now owns,
However the world may brag,
Not one so calm and so true is seen
As the woman, the mother, the gracious Queen
Enrobed by England's flag.

Where is the flag of England ?
It floats on every sea,
Borne by the hands of the bravest men
And waving o'er the free ;
It leads the way to the battlefield,
And the armies never lag,
For somehow or other they seem to know
England has conquered every foe,
Led on by that wondrous flag.

Where is the flag of England ?
Not yet where yet 'twill be,
Conjoined with "old glory" grand,
The emblem of the free ;
The Stars and Stripes, the Union Jack
These two shall be unfurled
For progress, liberty and right,
And England's fame, Columbia's might,
Shall help and bless the world.

3.—PURITY OF ADMINISTRATION—CONDEMN CORRUPTION.

That the convention deploras the gross corruption in the management and expenditure of public moneys which for years past has existed under the rule of the Conservative party, and the revelations of which by the different parliamentary committees of inquiry have brought disgrace upon the fair name of Canada.

The Government which profited politically by these expenditures of public moneys of which the people have been defrauded, and which, nevertheless, have never punished the guilty parties, must be held responsible for the wrongdoing. We arraign the Government for retaining in office a Minister of the Crown, proved to have accepted very large contributions of money for election purposes from the funds of a railway company, which, while paying the political contributions to him, a member of the Government, with one hand, was receiving Government subsidies with the other.

Mr. DAWSON.

The conduct of the Minister and the approval of his colleagues after the proof became known to them are calculated to degrade Canada in the estimation of the world and deserve the severe condemnation of the people.

Well, Sir, I would not torture the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite by any extended allusion to their delinquencies of the past, if it were not that they have promised to launch into a very large expenditure. The Order paper to-day contains a notice that the Minister of Finance will ask the House to sanction a vote of $3,000,000 for important works of defence. Well, Sir, I do not believe it would be safe to entrust this expenditure in their hands. Circumstances might be too strong for them. There are too many contractors in the country to whom they are under obligations of different kinds. These men know too much, and have the hon. gentlemen opposite in their power. I think it would be better for them to step down and out before they undertake this large expenditure. They dare not offend these contractors, who know so much of the inner workings of their party. These men must be kept quiet at all hazards. They might tell what they know, and bring disaster to the party from which it would never recover in the teeth of a general election. Sir, it is our duty to save hon. gentlemen from their friends, by relieving them of power and giving them a rest in the cool shades of opposition, so that they may free themselves from their taskmasters, the contractors of this country.

Sir, those of us who sat here through the session of 1891, inquiring into the Government expenditure on public works, know perfectly well the truth of the first paragraph in this plank No. 3 of the Liberal platform. We remember well the investigation into the Quebec Harbour works, when it was shown that Larkin, Connolly & Co. bagged a profit on those works of $953,975. It was proven that Robert H. McGreevy was given an interest in the profits of this concern, although he did not put a dollar into the capital. It was proven that he was given that interest simply for the purpose of securing the interest of his brother, then and now the member for Quebec West, and of securing, through him, the interest and influence of the then Minister of Public Works. Well, Sir, although he did not put a dollar into the capital of the firm, it was shown that Robert H. McGreevy drew, from the profits of that work, $137,800 as his share. It was proven that this firm contributed to the reptile fund of the party $170,447, and that this money was used in the elections of 1882, 1887 and 1891. Sir, the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) was treasurer of the party funds. Through him the money was paid out to the candidates and to their election agents to be spent by them in the interest of Government candidates in the Quebec district. The Conservative managers relied largely on the contributions of Larkin, Connolly & Co., of which firm Mr.

Murphy was a member. Mr. Valin, once a member of Parliament, gave this evidence before the Committee on Privileges and Elections :

I applied again to Mr. McGreevy and to Mr. Murphy. Mr. Murphy told me : " We have placed all that is necessary in Mr. McGreevy's hands and we have advised him to help you especially ; apply to him and you will get some." Then, having applied to Mr. McGreevy, he said to me, the elections in the county of Quebec are costing heavily. The Ministers are costing us very heavily and I have no more money to give you. Caron is always after me and I cannot satisfy him with money. We have Sir Hector at Three Rivers, and besides, other counties.

The official list of expenditure for party purposes in 1887 was published and showed that $112,700 was drawn out and paid on the written order of the hon. Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) and the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin. They had control of this fund, and they distributed it according to a plan carefully prepared before the elections began. It was clearly proven in the courts that Larkin, Connolly & Co. had paid $170,000 to purchase the favour of the Government and ensure the acceptance of their contract. The hon. Ministers claim that the Government ought not to be held accountable because they were not personally interested in the money, because they only took it to spend in the elections, and because they only received it from these contractors to spend in the interests of the party. Sir, this outrage against popular government is offered by these hon. gentlemen as an excuse for their conduct. How dull their moral perception must be when they consider this as an excuse for their course. They say : We did not spend it on ourselves, but on our friends to ensure their election. And they offer this as an excuse for their conduct. They used the money to tempt men, made poor by their bungling administration, to sell the birth-right our fathers died to win—the right to vote, the right of self-government.

Mr. B. B. Osler, in his address to the jury which convicted McGreevy and Connolly for conspiracy to defraud, said :

It is said that these items were paid out by this firm of contractors to Mr. Thomas McGreevy and others for the purpose of being expended in election expenses. Well, gentlemen, it will be for you to consider whether that circumstance does not aggravate instead of lessen the offence. If these moneys were paid out for the purpose of corrupting electors it is worse, not better, for the defendants. It is a very serious crime for you to consider. If a man by irregular practices obtains public money for his own pocket that is one thing, but if he obtains it for the purpose of influencing the minds of men in exercising their franchise, and that money comes from public contractors, one of the most serious offences against good government and the community that is possible is committed.

The presiding judge, in his charge to the jury, said :

It is no defence to say that this contract was let, or this influence was given, or the service was rendered in consideration of a money subscription being given by contractors to assist any government, any Minister, any member of Parliament in either corrupt or legitimate expenses.

Well, there are other little transactions of the Government which makes me doubtful whether they should be trusted with the expenditure of this $3,000,000, for which they are to ask next Friday. It is on record that they purchased in the city of St. John, a piece of property for the Intercolonial, in 1892. A year after the sale, the owner swore that its value was $93,401, and it was assessed by the city assessors at $66,000 ; but the Government paid $200,000 for the property. This job was denounced by one of their own followers, Senator Adams, then a member of the House, and a supporter of the Government. On 13th May, 1892, he said in this House :

You are to-night committing a public crime. You are trying to force an expenditure upon the people you cannot justify. There is no evidence to justify this legislature in passing $200,000 for the purchase of this property. No Grit, no Tory, high or low, from the richest to the poorest, could say that $200,000 was the actual price paid by common law, prudence or justice. It is simply a job. It stands unparalleled in the history of purchases. I am quite clear that this property had been purchased for three times its value, beyond all question.

In spite of that protest, $200,000 was paid.

Sir, the Government went into a little improvement on a small river in the province of Quebec, and built what is now known to fame as the Little Rapids lock. They estimated the cost of this work at $44,000. Well, they have paid in cash, up to date, of this work, the sum of $260,000, and there are claims pending amounting to $61,000. The contractor was Mr. W. J. Poupore. He got this contract without tenders, there is no traffic now upon the canal, the lock is not being used, the work is entirely useless, and Mr. Poupore is Government candidate in the county of Pontiac.

The Langevin block cost, in extras, as much as the whole original estimate.

The St. Charles branch of the Intercolonial was estimated to cost $136,000. Before the Government got through with it, they had spent on the work, $1,723,000, and there are claims against the Government amounting to $37,719 more. This railway is fourteen miles long, and runs out from Point Lévis.

The Galops channel in the St. Lawrence is another evidence of the incapacity of this Administration, if not of their corruption. There was a contract let for the improvement of this channel in 1879 by the Secretary of State, then Minister of Railways and Canals (Sir Charles Tupper). It was let to Mr. Denis O'Brien for $239,750, fourteen-foot navigation. O'Brien withdrew and Davis & Sons got the contract at an advance. They got it at $306,600. They assigned to Gilbert & Son, who were subsequently required to make it to 17-foot navigation. Their contract bound them to complete this work by 1881. It was reported to be complete in 1888, and was taken over by the department, and the departmental report states that the channel is open for navigation, 200 feet wide, 3,300 feet long, straight, and from 16½ to 17 foot navigation. In 1894, the Minister of Railways said it was not being used, that $446,500 had been spent upon it, and that there were claims against the department amounting to $130,000 more in connection with this work, besides the thousands of dollars spent in surveys, &c. And to-day the old south channel is still being preferred to this straight, deep, wide Galops channel, which has cost the country so dear.

The "St. Lawrence News," published at Iroquois, gave the following account, in its issue of September 15th, 1893, of the wreck of the barge "Huron," drawing 9 feet of water, in this channel:

Since 1879 the Government has been very busy pitching about three quarters of a million dollars into these very waters where this barge struck and what good has it done? A barge strikes, and fastens on a rock. Very fortunately it does not drift into deep water or what would have become of the crew? The next vessel to strike may be the "Empire State" or the "Merritt" with its living freight or pleasure-seeking excursionists. Would they find a convenient rock on which to become shelved until rescue, or would the creamy waves be dotted for a few minutes with the struggling mass of humanity and then hide them as secretly as they hide the iniquities that have cost the nation nearly a million.

Sir, the latest evidence of incapacity, if not corruption, that we have in the Department of Railways and Canals, is in connection with the construction of a public work, of which a few people in this country may have heard—the Curran Bridge, in the city of Montreal. It was decided to construct two bridges there, at Wellington Street, one for road traffic and another for the Grand Trunk Railway to cross the Lachine Canal. This work has resulted in the loss of some hundreds of thousands of dollars to the people. Parliament was told that the total cost would be $170,000, and that this was considered to be an excess estimate. Parliament was later told that an additional sum of $40,000 would be required for a 20-foot navigation. This raised the highest estimate made by hon. gentlemen opposite themselves to $210,000. The amount which they have actually paid to date is $394,000, and there are about $60,000 still unpaid. The superstructure of these works was built by contract at a contract price; the work on the substructure—the piers, &c.,—was done by days' labour, by men furnished by Mr. St. Louis; and in the investigation, it was shown that Mr. St. Louis said he gave $1,500 to the legal partner of the

Mr. DAWSON.

Hon. Mr. Ouimet, the Minister of Public Works, for the Vaudreuil election. These facts you will find at page 344 of the blue-book containing the evidence before the commission. After some $14,000 had been paid to St. Louis, Mr. Schreiber the chief engineer became suspicious that all was not right and on the 25th April, he wrote to the Minister as follows:—

Dear Mr. Haggart,—As I mentioned to you, I was not a little startled upon receiving from Mr. Parent the pay-rolls and accounts for the month of March in connection with the Wellington Street bridges, which summed up an enormous sum. * * * * * Mr. Parent explains that the excess of expenditure is due to the large amount of ice which had to be cut up and carried away; to the frozen condition of the excavation, to the breaking away of the cofferdam on two occasions, to the solid frozen condition of the crib and other obstructions which had to be removed, and, as I understand him to say, to political interference.

The Minister should have immediately ordered an investigation, and in the meantime, have stopped all payments to St. Louis. But he did not. On the 10th of May the chief engineer wrote again to the Minister urging that a commission of inquiry should be issued. On the 11th May, the day after this letter was written, $8,393 was paid to this man suspected of fraud. On the 17th of May a commission of inquiry was issued on the grounds that frauds had been committed. On the 27th May, ten days after the issue of that commission $66,000 was paid over, and on the 6th June, $39,000 more was paid, or a total of $105,000 paid to this man after a committee of investigation had been appointed by the Government to examine into these stupendous frauds. Sir, there is not a business man in all Canada who would be guilty of such utter mismanagement of his own affairs. The cause of the enormous amount which the pay-rolls and accounts for March totalled up is said by Mr. Parent to be the removal of ice and frozen earth and other obstructions, all of which was included in the original estimate of cost,—and, he adds, "political interference." This "political interference" has cost the country thus far $184,000 and, according to the judgment recently given will cost it some $60,000 more. Sir, we will leave the country to judge whether or not these losses are due to the incapacity of the Minister. The court of inquiry and the Committee of Public Accounts between them showed the following facts:—that the Government paid to contractor St. Louis:

- $4 a day for a foreman.
- $6 a day for a foreman for night or overtime.
- $8 a day for a foreman on Sunday.
- $12 a day for a foreman on Sunday overtime.
- $5 a day for team.
- $10 a day for team on Sunday.
- $2.50 a day for derrick.
- $3.75 a day for derrick for overtime.
- $7.50 a day for derrick for overtime on Sunday.

As an hon. gentleman remarked it must have been a very sensitive and religiously inclined derrick to require three days' pay for one day's work on Sunday :

St. Louis put on all the men he wished and got paid for them.

There were 2,000 men on the works at one time.

There were many idle.

No Government timekeeper.

No regular count.

No Government foreman.

No Government supervision.

No Government record of men or materials.

No Government classification of labour.

Unskilled labour was paid for as skilled labour.

There was no public tenders for timber.

Inferior timber was supplied.

Carters' delivery tickets for lumber are missing.

There were no checks as to quality of timber and lumber supplied.

Large quantities are missing.

New timber was burnt as firewood, carted away and stolen.

Government teams had to haul lumber that the contractor was to deliver.

$39,896 was paid for $6,000 worth of stone-cutting.

$16,715 was paid for $3,000 worth of stonecutting on another part of the work.

Stone was hauled by team 20 miles along the railway running from the quarry to the works.

The Government was warned all along of the frauds, but allowed them to continue, and paid the bills as they came in.

When the work was completed the Government issued a commission to investigate.

Pending the investigation the Government paid St. Louis a balance of $105,000 for wages on an account that the chief engineer discredited and would not certify to.

The commission unanimously reported incompetence, extravagance and fraud.

The people's money was lost.

No one has been held responsible.

It is said in this plank of our platform that the revelations made by the different parliamentary committees of inquiry "have brought disgrace upon the fair name of Canada." This is lamentably true. It is deplored by the English press. The "Graphic-Despatch" says :

The secret of Sir John Macdonald's electoral victories is out. On this side of the water surprise has often been expressed at the patience with which our Canadian cousins submitted to the Tory protectionist rule of that prince of political intriguers. There is now, alas, no difficulty in explaining that curious situation. Sir John's Government rested on a stupendous and all-prevailing system of bribery and corruption. Even Tammany Hall smells sweet and clean in comparison with the huge stink-pot of Sir John's Government.

Sir John Macdonald's Government also rested on gerrymandered constituencies and stuffed electoral lists. The London "Daily Chronicle" says :

It seems to be possible in the Dominion to secure the political support, not only of individuals, but of whole provinces by gifts of money. The locality is bribed as well as the member, and the consequent demoralization spreads through all ranks.

In a late election we find the Secretary of State holding up the map of a proposed railway and telling the electors that on his return to Ottawa he will see that that railway is extended to them. The hon. senior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) at Gabarus assured the electors that a break-water would be built and that the lobster season would be extended, thus in the midst of an election deliberately offering a bribe if they would support the Government candidate. The London "Times" says :

Here in the mother country there can be only—

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Now that the hon. gentleman has fully convinced the House that he is a good reader, I would ask your ruling whether the hon. gentleman would not be observing more closely the rules of the House, by making his speech, and whether it is quite in order to read a speech, even so long and entertaining a speech as this.

Mr. SPEAKER. My attention having been drawn to the matter, I must say that the hon. member would not be in order in reading his speech.

Mr. DAWSON. The hon. member is not reading his speech and has not been reading it. I refer the hon. gentleman for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to the notes of my speech now in the hands of the "Hansard" reporters if he desires to see them. The London "Times" says :

Here in the mother country there can be only one feeling, that of deep regret for the wrong done to the fair fame of the eldest of her daughter nations by the lax morality of her politicians.

I commend this sentence to the hon. member who interrupted me. I ask him to take it home, to sleep on it, and I hope it may improve his political morals. Sir, the day was when we thought our politicians pure ; but now we know that we can no longer look with pitying contempt upon the American politicians, but that ours have been guilty of acts such as could not be charged against Tammany Hall even in its palmiest days. The London "Echo" says :

No country can prosper where public departments are in league with fraudulent contractors, and where Ministers are open to offers.

St. James "Gazette" says :

The existence of an organized system of corruption among public officials in Canada has been conclusively proved, and like everything else on the American continent the bribery has been colossal.

London "Graphic" says :

It is no longer possible to doubt that corruption in its worst form is rampant in a large portion of the Canadian Civil Service.

This was after the revelations proving the facts in connection with Perley and his diamonds ; Arnoldi and his brass dogs, his yacht and tandem harness ; Talbot and his dry goods charged as Government supplies in departmental accounts. Let me read for the benefit of the hon. gentleman from Grey a quotation from the London "Telegraph," it will interest him, I have no doubt :

Enough, unfortunately, is already known in England to make it clear that only the most resolute and drastic purification can redeem public life in Canada from the taint of corruption, the like of which we have not seen in our country for hundreds of years.

Well, Sir, we have had some drastic purification. The trusted treasurer of the party funds was sent to jail for a year. He was relieved from imprisonment after two months, immediately afterwards was banquipped, and subsequently re-elected by the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite in his constituency, and sent here to represent them in this House. That is a very resolute and drastic purification. When that hon. gentleman returned here, he was received with acclaim, and was introduced to the House by no less a personage than the chief whip of the ministerialists.

Sir, in our own country the churches have deplored the condition in which the Government is sunk. Rev. W. J. Muckleston, rector of Perth, preached a sermon on this subject in June, 1893, in which he said :

The public scandals of two years ago revealed thieves and boodlers, and the fact that the electors failed to condemn them proved that the public conscience was dulled and that the political morality of Canada was away below that of the mother country.

The following resolution was adopted by the Presbytery of Montreal, in 1891 :

In view of the great public evils prevalent in our country the Presbytery sees great cause for alarm and humiliation before God, and resolves to express its abhorrence of the political corruption which has been revealed by recent investigations, and its dissatisfaction with the failure of Parliament to deal adequately with them in the punishment of the guilty, and therefore call upon the people to express their condemnation at the earliest opportunity at the polls.

Well, Sir, when they have this opportunity they will express their condemnation, and in the by-elections which have been held for the last three years, they have, time and again, expressed their condemnation.

Let me give the hon. member one more extract, this time from the Rev. Dr. Carman, General Superintendent of the Methodist Church, who is reported to have spoken as follows :—

Had we not better spike the doors of our Parliament buildings, shut and cease our vapourings about glorious country, constitutional governments, and Christian civilization? They have no such scenes in Caffraria or Mashonaland. Is not this an awful indictment: "Bribes in the shape of better terms to provinces; bribes both to provinces and single constituencies in the shape of grants for local works; tolls taken for the Government election fund on the illicit gains of contractors; the virtual sale of senatorships for money spent in elections, or in support of the party organ; the capture of societies and churches by doles of patronage distributed to them through their representatives in the Cabinet; the capture of the great distilleries and other powerful interests by special legislation in their favour; the capture of the press by largesse of 'pap', and, above all, the capture of the whole body of manufacturers by pledging to them the commercial policy of the country. Such have been the means by which government since confederation has, with little intermission, been carried on." And what count of it has not been proved with a terrible emphasis? Is a bottomless gulf any too deep or dark for such ruling and governing? It is likely the kind they have there, if they are not too poor for bribery. Is the lake of fire any too sharp a retribution for the men who corrupt our age, blast our freedom, blight prosperity, blacken a nation's name, and wither a nation's hope?

Sir, wherever the probe has been applied, since 1891, it has drawn forth corruption, and yet so dead is the conscience of hon. gentlemen opposite that they immediately whitewashed the culprits when proven guilty of these political crimes. Of one of them who was proven guilty, this statement was made, that if his skirts were not quite clean, they were clean enough to ensure his protection in this House.

Sir, I do not think it is safe to entrust hon. gentlemen opposite with the expenditure of vast sums of money. They have not proven themselves to be good trustees. They must be turned out, boodling must be stopped. Even if they have the will, they have lost the power to stop this reign of corruption. They must give way to men who are determined to put down wrong-doing and the waste of the people's money, men who believe that wrong-doing in public affairs is as indefensible as wrong-doing in private concerns.

4.—DEMANDS STRICTEST ECONOMY—DECREASED EXPENDITURE.

We cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt, and of the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion, and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the governments that have been continuously in power since 1878, and we demand the strictest economy in the administration of the government of the country.

Sir, in 1878, the net debt was $140,363,069.91; in 1881 it had risen to $155,395,780. Sir Leonard Tilley, in delivering his Budget speech in 1882, declared that it would be necessary still further to increase this debt to provide for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and certain public works. He said that $48,000,000 would be required for these purposes, and that the debt would then be $203,379,680. He promised distinctly that there would be thereafter no further increase of the public debt, but that instead, the debt would be rapidly decreased. He even gave us the particulars of that decrease, and stated that there would be a surplus in 1882 of $4,500,000; another in 1883 of $3,000,000 ; and a surplus of $1,000,000 a year for the next seven years, all of which would be applied to the reduction of our debt. He promised to provide a sinking fund amounting to $1,500,000 a year, and stated that by 1890 the surplus and the sinking fund would together reduce the net debt to $175,000,000. He went further, and declared that between 1882 and 1890, 75 million acres of our Crown lands in the North-west would be sold at an average price of $1 an acre, and that this sum of $75,000,000 would all be applied towards the reduction of our debt. Here are his words :

Then our debt would only be about $100,000,000 instead of $175,000,000, or less than $20 per head.

In 1890, the net debt was $237,500,000 or nearly $49 per head. It has long passed the $50 limit. Speaking during the same debate, the present Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) endorsed Sir Leonard Tilley's calculation. Let me recall to the House the very words he uttered :

When the great Canadian Pacific Railway is completed and every dollar of expenditure is provided for, including canal expenditure and everything else, the debt will only be $203,000,000, and the surpluses with the sinking funds up to 1890 will bring the debt down to $175,000,000.

He also said Sir Leonard Tilley's calculation to realize $75,000,000 by sale of lands in the North-west, was beyond question. Said he : " No hon. gentleman, I am sure, will venture to dispute it." Had any doubting Thomas dared to rise in the House and dispute the hon. gentleman, the finger of scorn would have been pointed at him, and he would have been charged with disloyalty to his country for having doubted their ability to dispose of 75 million acres of land during those eight years. Alas for the hon. gentleman's calculations. This mighty prophet declared that the net debt of Canada would be reduced down to 100 million dollars, after that great national work had been provided for. but, Sir, we find the debt was $237,500,000 in 1890. This sagacious statesman, this far-seeing man, this political prophet is the Aaron whom the despairing Israelites opposite hope will lead them out of the wilderness in which they have been wandering these five years without a leader. Why, Sir, they cannot get out of the wilderness. The elections will soon be on, and they cannot cross that Jordan. Every man of them will die in the wilderness, save two, Caleb and Joshua, of the old guard. These two will cross alive ; because, Sir, they have visited the promised land laid out before them in this platform of the Liberal party, and they have returned to their friends with a true report. But our friends opposite have not believed that report, and hence they must surely die.

politically, when these elections take place.

Instead of being reduced, our debt has gone on increasing, and on 30th June last it amounted to $253,074,927. This is an enormous sum. Hon. gentlemen, surely, cannot be alive to its magnitude, or they would not so merrily roll it up. Let me help them to realize it—and here let me say I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture is not present, because I have a little proposition to make to him. We coin no gold in Canada. If we were called upon to pay our national debt in coin, it must be paid off in silver. It would require 7,000 tons. If these were loaded on railway cars, there being 20 tons in each car, the train would be two miles and a half long.

Our foreign creditors, I do not think, would want our silver, at all events not in such vast quantities, they might prefer to take cattle or grain. So the hon. Minister might extend the scope of the Government farms and begin to raise cattle and grain to pay off the national indebtedness. Our creditors might prefer to take payment in cattle alone. He would require to raise 10,000,000 head at present prices. This is a large number. Sir, the Minister of Agriculture, with his limited knowledge of agriculture, may never have seen a herd so vast as this—neither have I. But I will, if possible, help him to realize how vast this herd would be. We will imagine that he has these cattle ready for market. I find it would require a field containing 5,000 acres to hold them, and they would be packed pretty closely then. We will suppose the Minister stationed at the gate of the field to let the cattle out, one by one, to water, and we will suppose that six seconds were occupied in each animal passing through. The Minister would require to remain there ten hours a day for five years before the last unhappy beast got out for a drink. Supposing he had them ready to march to market and had them arranged in procession, eight abreast. He would have a procession which would reach from Vancouver to Halifax, and for hundreds of miles beyond.

We will suppose, however, that our creditors prefer wheat, and will take it at 60 cents per bushel. When the Minister of Agriculture had produced enough wheat to pay our net debt, and had it loaded in cars, 20 tons in each, and the cars formed into a train—that train would reach from Vancouver to Halifax, and five or six hundred miles beyond.

The member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) dwelt vigorously on the increase of the national debt under the Mackenzie regime. It is quite true that the debt increased during these five years. The increase in 1874 was $8,476,502 ; in 1875, $7,683,413 ; 1876, $8,543,136 ; 1877, $8,683,794 ; 1878, $7,126,670, or, altogether, $40,513,608. Why this increase ? Every dollar was required to fulfil obligations entered into by the preceding Government, to which the honour of the country was pledged. They had to be carried out, and they were carried out wisely and well, and no scandal occurred in carrying out those obligations, no such scandals as characterized the construction of the dry dock at Quebec, the Curran Bridge at Montreal, and other public works throughout the Dominion. What were those engagements? I will give the House the words of Sir Leonard Tilley in 1873. He said :

We are entering upon new and increased engagements involving a very large sum of money. We are entering upon work—we have already done so—which will require a large increase of our debt. * * * * We have $10,000,000 to spend on the Intercolonial Railway. We have $30,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway and the canal system which has been accepted by the Government will involve an expenditure of $20,000,000. These are serious matters inasmuch as they add $60,000,000 to our existing debt.

They had already entered on the work in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the canal system which had been accepted, and it was in carrying out those works that the Mackenzie Government added to the national debt; but they spent upon them only forty millions and a half, instead of sixty millions, which Sir Leonard Tilley said those works would add to the national debt.

Hon. gentlemen opposite deplored the deficit that occurred during the Mackenzie Administration; they called that an era of deficits. The Secretary of State has expressed strong opinions on deficits generally. His opinion was uttered in 1878. Speaking in reply to the then Finance Minister, he said :

What does he (Sir Richard Cartwright) tell the House? He tells the House now that he does not propose to submit any measure by which this great calamity, this great disaster, this ruin to the credit of the country, shall be averted, although he shows that on the 10th of this month (February, 1878), he has a deficit of $617,610.

This may not have been a blue-ruin speech on the part of the hon. gentleman, but certainly it was red ruin—disaster, calamity and ruin to the credit of the country. The hon. gentleman thus described the deficit, which amounted to $617,610. We are aware that he possesses a very large vocabulary, but what has he to say of a deficit of $4,154,000, which the Public Accounts showed occurred last year? In that era of deficits, covering 1876, 1877 and 1878, we find that they aggregated $4,489,000, about equal to the single deficit which occurred last year. Let it be remembered, also, that those deficits under the Mackenzie Administration occurred under a low tariff, and were caused by loss of revenue, owing largely to the shrinkage in value of goods imported. The deficits under the present Government occur under high duties, under duties levied largely in the form of specific duties, a system which, it was said, would for ever remove any chance of future deficits. The customs receipts fell from $14,315,192 in 1873-74 to $12,900,000 in 1879, a decrease of $1,500,000. Why this falling off? We have heard much of the hard times during the Mackenzie Administration, and it was said that the volume of imports was largely diminished at that time. Nothing of the sort occurred. The volume of imports was not diminished. The people purchased and used, in 1878 and 1879, as many yards of cloth, as much hardware and cutlery, as much clothing and food, per head, as in 1873. The loss of revenue and consequent deficit is no evidence whatever of hard times prevailing during that period. It was owing to the great decrease in the value of the commodities being imported. In support of this, I will give as my evidence, the words of Sir Leonard Tilley, who, speaking in 1879, in support of the policy of specific duties, said :

It is established by comparative statements that the goods imported into the Dominion have decreased in value to the extent of from 33½ per cent to 40 per cent since 1873.

To leave no one in doubt as to the effect of this shrinkage in value on the revenue, he explains :

Twenty-five per cent in value will not now bring more than 15 per cent did in 1873.

And he gives as an example, the value of cloth. He says :

In 1873 100 yards of cloth at $1 a yard would produce $15 of revenue. The same cloth is worth 60 cents per yard now (1878), and it would require a tariff of 25 per cent to produce the same amount of revenue.

And he adds :

The volume of imports has not been diminished. The increase of our debt is out of all proportion to the increase of population. If our debt had increased only in the ratio of the increase of population, there would not be so much cause for alarm, but, Sir, from 1881 to 1891, our population increased 11.66 per cent, say 12 per cent, while our taxation, by customs, increased 27 per cent, our expenditure increased 42 per cent, and our debt increased 53 per cent. Sir, there was a large increase of controllable expenditure. The population from 1878 to 1895 increased, I believe, about 25 per cent—I think that is a fair statement of the increase of the population between 1878 and 1895. During this period the following increases in our expenditure occurred:—The expenditure in Civil Government increased 70 per cent; the expenditure on Public Works (departmental) increased 85 per cent; the expenditure on Mounted Police increased 90 per cent; the expenditure on Excise increased 100 per cent; the expenditure on Indians increased 140 per cent; the expenditure on Arts, Agriculture and Statistics increased 150 per cent; the expenditure on Militia and Defence increased 150 per cent; the expenditure on Superannuation increased 150 per cent; the expenditure on Quarantine increased 280 per cent; the expenditure on Fisheries increased 400 per cent; and the expenditure on the North-west Territories Government increased 1,500 per cent. Sir, the population increased, during this period, only 25 per cent. I will give the items, as follows, and hon. gentleman can figure out the percentages for themselves:—

Totals.....	17,774,089	30,009,638	12,235,549

These items totalled, in 1878, $17,774,089, and in 1895 they amounted to $30,009,638, an increase of $12,235,549, or over 60 per cent increase. The total expenditure on Consolidated Fund amounted to $23,503,158 in 1878, and to $38,132,005 in 1895, an increase of $14,628,847, or about 60 per cent increase in these eighteen years; while the population only increased 25 per cent.

I have said the Superannuation expenditure increased from $106,588 in 1878 to $265,385 in 1895. The Superannuation Act was passed in 1871 when Sir Francis Hincks was Minister of Finance in the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald. Its objects were to keep back a portion of the salaries of all civil servants, to form a fund out of which allowances would be made to members of the Civil Service who were disabled by ill-health or incapacitated by old age, and were placed on the retired list. This Act provided that 4 per cent of all salaries of $600, and over, should be kept back, and that 2½ per cent of all salaries under $600 should be retained. Had these percentages remained at that, with careful management and honest administration, the fund might have been self-sustaining; but, some few years later, when Sir Leonard Tilley was Finance Minister, the amount which the Civil Servants were required to pay was cut in half. Those receiving $600 salary, and over, paid 2 per cent of their salaries into the fund, and those receiving under $600 paid 1¼ per cent. But, Sir, while their contributions to the fund was cut in two, their claims upon that fund remained as they were before. Very soon after this change was made, the amount paid out to civil servants who had been retired and ceased to render any service whatever to the country, exceeded, largely, the amount which they paid in each and every year, and last year, the amount which was paid in by the civil servants was $63,274.88, but the amount of pensions paid out was $265,385.77. The people of this country paid the difference, amounting to $202,110.89. Sir, the following is a statement of the amounts which were paid into the fund each year since 1871, and the amount paid out in superannuation allowances during the same period:

Sir, during this period the expenditure was $4,036,349.60, and the amount paid in $1,302,368.96, a difference of $2,733,980.64, which represents the loss to the country in connection with this fund. During this period of twenty-five years, for every dollar paid in three dollars has been paid out, and the difference between the receipts and the expenditure is growing greater every year. For the last five years the difference is as one dollar paid in to four dollars paid out.

Sir, this fund is not fair to the Civil Service. If a civil servant continues in the service until death, his heirs receive nothing whatever for the amount of money he has paid in. If, however, he is superannuated, he then begins to draw from this fund whatever sum he may be entitled to under the statute. Sir, the Civil Service is not very arduous. He must be a very sick man indeed who cannot discharge the duties demanded of him, and he must be very old indeed when he is incapacitated by old age to discharge those duties. Sir, this fund is made an excuse by the Government for getting rid of civil servants whenever they choose. When a place is wanted for some chosen follower or friend, then the fund is charged with the superannuation of some member of the Civil Service to provide a place for him. Many of these civil servants have been superannuated when young in years and strong in health. They are living yet, and I hope they will long continue to live as happy beneficiaries of this fund. I have no desire to see their days shortened. But I regret very much that the country is deprived of the services of men so strong and healthy as those men must be to have lived so long after their superannuation.

I will mention a few sample cases showing the total amount paid in during the time of service and the total amount paid out to date :

	Paid in.	Drew out.
F. A. Himsworth	$ 315	$17,950
Lindsay Russell	832	18,598
J. B. Cherriman	1,120	19,359
G. W. Wicksteed	1,088	21,418
John Kidd	517	21,895
J. M. Passon	352	26,180
W. R. Mingaye	1,216	30,572
J. Lesslie	560	32,247
J. P. Rubidge	48	31,579

Altogether these nine members of the Civil Service, now retired, paid in $6,048 and have drawn out up to date, $219,798. They have drawn out 37 times more than the amount they paid into the fund while they were in the service.

Men in good health are superannuated against their will, against their earnest protestation that they are not suffering from ill-health and are not incapacitated by old age, simply to make room for political supporters. A case occurred not long since which illustrates the methods by which this is brought about. I refer to the retirement of Mr. Vankoughnet, who was superannuated in 1893 at the age of fifty six years and while in perfectly good health, and declaring himself to be sound in body and mind. The sole reason given by the Government for superannuating him was that his health was not good, that he had no longer the vigour of intellect once his, and that he was unfit to discharge the duties of his office; but it is known that their real reason for getting rid of him was to provide a position for Mr. Hayter Reed.

Let me read a letter which was received by Mr. Vankoughnet some time before his superannuation. It was the first intimation he received that it was the desire of the Government to dispense with his services, and to add his name to the superannuated list :

Department of Interior,
Ottawa, 28th June, 1893.

Dear Mr. Vankoughnet,—In watching closely the affairs of the Indian Department and the management of its branches for some time past, I have come to the conclusion that some radical changes are needed, and I have contemplated making such changes as will reduce the staff and consequently the expenses. Now, while thinking these matters over, I cannot help stating that I have for some time also noticed that your health is failing and that you have no longer the vigour of intellect which has characterized you in the past. I may say that hitherto, when the question of your superannuation was mooted, I took care to speak of you as you deserved, in as fair and friendly a light as I could, for that you have been a most zealous, faithful officer no one who knows you well can deny; but I am now forced to the conclusion I have come to after a very calm and full review of the whole circumstances as regards the Indian Department.

Your long services entitle you to full superannuation, and I know Council will willingly grant the same. In making this intimation, I desire to say that our relationship has been most cordial, and I reciprocate your kind offices to me since my occupancy of the position of Superintendent General. I really think that what I now write you is in your own interest, and that, especially from a health point of view your retirement from office will be beneficial to you. I must say that my convictions are firm in this matter, and not arrived at without mature consideration. In stating, therefore, in this friendly and private way that I am prepared to accept your request for superannuation, I am quite sure you will not disturb our cordial relations by refusing to act in accordance with my wishes—a course which would really be of no benefit to you. I also desire to say that I would like you to take the necessary steps in the matter with as little delay as possible, and whatever memoranda to Council are necessary I would be glad if you would have prepared at once. Again assuring you that this letter is not dictated with any hostile feeling or unfriendliness, and trusting that you will regard my request in a right spirit.

Believe me,

Dear Mr. Vankoughnet,

Yours faithfully,

T. MAYNE DALY.

The Minister puts it on the ground of economy, but he also notes that Mr. Vankoughnet's health is failing—that his intellect is not so vigorous as it used to be. Sir, the Minister was as frank in speaking of Mr. Vankoughnet as his colleagues afterwards were in discussing the Prime Minister. From a health point of view his retirement would be beneficial, and he hopes that he will not refuse to act in accordance with the suggestion he makes, that it will not help matters if he does, that they are bound to get rid of him, and he may as well be pleasant about it, is a free translation of the contents of this letter. The next day, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) received a letter from Mr. Vankoughnet, which proves that Mr. Vankoughnet's intellect was quite as vigorous as that of the Minister himself. Under date, Ottawa, 29th July, 1893, Mr. Vankoughnet wrote as follows:—

Dear Sir,—Yours of the 28th instant, received and contents fully considered.

In reply, I would say that as respects any measures which you may consider it advisable, in the interests of economy, to adopt, in the future management of this department, I shall be happy to assist you.

With regard to your statement that, for some time you have noticed that my health was failing, and that I had no longer the vigour of intellect which characterized me in the past, I have to state that I was never in the enjoyment of better health than I am now, and have been for the last nine months—since, in fact, I returned to my duties last autumn, after absence on sick leave; the latter having been only the second of such absences during the long term of thirty years' service.

The vigour of my intellect is amply proven by the immense volume of work which receives attention at my hands daily, as well as by the numerous reports on important matters made to you, also by the reports made by me for your signature to His Excellency the Governor General in Council; moreover the general management of the department both in the outside and inside service of it, of which I challenge fair criticism, shows that a vigorous intellect must be the possession of the one who is the presiding genius over it.

I am only in my fifty-sixth year as far as age is concerned, being four years short of the age for superannuation.

And as for service, I have had but thirty-two years and four months, being two years and eight months less than the term required by the Superannuation Act.

I could not, therefore, truthfully apply on the grounds of impaired physical or intellectual condition, age, or length of service for superannuation, even if I were otherwise disposed to make such application.

I must, therefore, respectfully decline to comply with your request to do so.

I reserve to myself the liberty of making such use of this correspondence as circumstances may seem to me to justify.

Yours sincerely,

L. VANKOUGHNET,

Deputy Supt. General of Indian Affairs.

Hon. T. Mayne Daly,

Supt. General of Indian Affairs.

Sir, there is a wonderful difference in men. Here was a man, fifty-six years of age, who had to go, on the ground that his age rendered him unable to manage one of the minor departments of the Government. And yet these same hon. gentlemen opposite afterwards send across the sea for the present Secretary of State and make him their leader in the House, a man far advanced in years, a man far beyond fifty-six years of age, which was Mr. Vankoughnet's age. Mr. Vankoughnet is too old to manage the affairs of one department, but the present Secretary of State in the estimation of our hon. friends is not too old to manage the affairs of this country. Mr. Vankoughnet declined to lie at the dictation of the General Superintendent of Indian Affairs, he refused to stultify himself by making a certificate which would be false, and by applying for superannuation on the ground mapped out for him. But, in spite of his refusal, he was duly superannuated. On 30th September, 1893, the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) wrote him, as follows:—

Dear Sir,—I have to inform you that to-day Council adopted the report of the Treasury Board, passed at its last sitting, and by which report I find you have been superannuated. By the same report and minute of Council, Mr. Hayter Reed, Indian Commissioner, has been appointed as your successor.

As I leave for Montreal early Monday A.M., I thought it only right you should get the information first through me.

I presume the duties of your office ceased to-day.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) T. MAYNE DALY.

Sir, the true reason for the superannuation of Mr. Vankoughnet is acknowledged by the Minister. It was this, that he should make place for Mr. Hayter Reed. Therefore, he was superannuated, and is now drawing $2,112 a year, doing nothing for it, but enjoying it in England, in perfect health and vigour of intellect.

There are a few other abuses of the superannuation system, and I will allude to one or two, with your kind permission. One was in connection with Mr. Dansereau, a leading Conservative of the city of Montreal. Mr. Dansereau desired the postmastership of Montreal, and Mr. Lamothe, who was postmaster at that time, was superannuated accordingly. This happened on 1st February, 1891, just on the eve of the general election. Well, Mr. Lamothe had friends whom it was desirable to keep quiet, so eight years were added to his term of service, and he was superannuated on a pension of $2,000 a year, and Mr. Dansereau was made postmaster at a salary of $4,000 a year. So that these two gentlemen receive out of the public chest no less a sum than $6,000 a year.

Mr. Robert Wallace was postmaster at Victoria, B.C. He strenuously resisted being superannuated. His health was all right and his intellect likewise, but, unfortunately for him, his place was wanted for Mr. Shakespeare, then a member of this House. To quiet Mr. Wallace, eight years were added to his length of service, and he was duly superannuated. After the eight years were added, he was only then entitled to draw $912 a year. This was considered too little to quiet Mr. Wallace, and so Parliament is asked every session to vote $240 more to his superannuation allowance, making it $1,150 a year which he receives, while Mr. Shakespeare is made postmaster at Victoria at a salary of $2,000 a year.

There are many similar cases, but I will only mention one more, the case of Mr. John Tilton, Deputy Minister of Fisheries, who was superannuated when only fifty-five years old, and who was also in the enjoyment of vigorous health and sound intellect. He was pensioned, I suppose, on the ground that he was sick, feeble, or incapacitated on account of old age, and this strong, healthy, vigorous man, in the prime of life, now receives $1,536 per year and does nothing in return.

These are some of the reasons why we condemn the superannuation system of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not intend to go into the details of every item of the expenditure of this Government. I have promised to be brief, and I intend to be brief. I have shown that the total expenditure of the Government has increased well upon $15,000,000 a year since 1878, and that the increase of our expenditure is over 60 per cent, against an increase in population, in these same eighteen years, of only 25 per cent. No one who cares to think at all, will say that this is safe or wise, and no one will believe that it is not possible to effect large savings in this expenditure. No one in the country will deny that this must be done. So much for plank No. 4 of our platform.

5.—FOR RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.—INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

That the convention regrets that by the action of Ministers and their supporters in Parliament, in one case in which serious charges were made against a Minister of the Crown, investigation was altogether refused, while in another case the charges preferred were altered and then referred to a commission appointed upon the advice of the Ministry, contrary to the well settled practice of Parliament and this convention affirms :

That it is the ancient and undoubted right of the House of Commons to inquire into all matters of public expenditure, and into all charges of misconduct in office against Ministers of the Crown, and the reference of such matters to royal commissions created upon the advice of the accused is at variance with the due responsibility of Ministers to the House of Commons, and tends to weaken the authority of the House over the Executive Government, and this convention affirms that the powers of the people's representatives in this regard should on all fitting occasions be upheld.

There can be no mistaking the meaning of this plank in our platform. No administration that intends to do right with the people's money, will fear to have their acts investigated in the full light of parliamentary inquiry. The House of Commons is more than a mere echo of the Ministers of the Crown. We are supposed to be in the enjoyment of responsible government here. The Ministers can be made, if hon. gentlemen opposite choose, responsible to this House for their conduct. We are the representatives of the people, their chosen trustees, and it is through us in this Parliament that the people of this country are governed and govern. It is our duty, then, to determine the policy of the Administration. But this committee of Parliament, this Government, sitting behind closed doors, frames a policy, and then demands that we support it without question. A policy once adopted, its administration is to be without question. No member of this House must dare to rise in his place and attack the administration or demand an investigation. If he does, the investigation is simply refused. The Government forget that they are not the dictators but the servants of the people, and accountable to them through their representatives here. They must give an account of their stewardship to the people, if it be demanded. To shirk an open investigation leaves on the mind an ugly suspicion concerning the person charged. The Ministers, I should imagine would court open and above-board inquiry into all their acts. If they are innocent, they should be glad to make the fact manifest to the people of Canada.

6.—THE LAND FOR THE SETTLER—NOT FOR THE SPECULATOR.

That in the opinion of this convention the sales of public lands of the Dominion should be to actual settlers only, and not to speculators, upon reasonable terms of settlement, and in such areas as can be reasonably occupied and cultivated by the settler.

Sir, I know something of what this country owes to the actual settler. I have lived for many years among them. I know all their struggles and their hardships, and I know the heroism they display in overcoming all the drawbacks, incident to the life of the pioneer. There is no finer province in the Dominion than Ontario; no state in the union can compare with it. And it was the early pioneers who made it what it is. Theirs were the lusty blows that transformed this wilderness into the smiling fertile farms that occupy our land. The wilderness areas of our great west now contain the bulk of our undeveloped natural resources. Immense wealth awaits there the advent of the settler. That land can only be made valuable by the labour of the pioneer. These men alone can lay broad and deep the foundations of our nations' greatness and wealth. The land grabber and the speculator are the natural enemies of the settler. Sir, it is a sin against him and against the nation to allow these land speculators in the North-west to stand between him and the land he wants. As matters stand to-day we find settlers taking up homesteads in the North-west where every alternate section is held either by a railway company or by the Hudson's Bay Company. And there are these settlers all alone awaiting the coming of neighbours who are able to purchase these alternate lots. In other townships the settler finds the whole of the lands owned by speculators called colonization societies. The few settlers who first go into these townships purchase their lands on reasonable terms. But after a few have gone in, the price of land is raised. This discourages further settlement, and so the pioneer finds himself toiling on alone, out in the prairie "splendidly isolated," surrounded with land which would make homes for many more, if only that land was made available to the actual settler, awaiting the coming of neighbours to help him by co-operation to build roads, support schools and maintain churches. Lonely, deprived of the society of his fellows, his children growing up without schools, he grows despondent; and many of our settlers in the North-west with its magnificent soil and splendid climate and with promise of great things to come, nevertheless, write home to friends in the old land so despondently as to discourage further immigration.

The land should be sold to the actual settler only and not to the speculator, and then settlement would be rapid and continuous. The colonization schemes of this Government in 1882 actually retarded the settlement of the North-west. Under the Order in Council of that year some 2,295 townships were sold on terms of credit to these colonization societies as they were called. But they were found to discourage settlement rather than to encourage it, and, to-day, the country is suffering from the results of that mistaken policy. In 1882 a motion declaring the land policy of the Liberals to be the land for the actual settler and not for the speculator was moved in this House and was defeated on a straight party vote. Again on the 7th of June, 1894, a similar motion was moved and again it was defeated by the Government majority. Sir, it would be wiser far to encourage dense and continuous settlement, and not to spread our population over vast areas where co-operation amongst the settlers is practically impossible. The practice of granting large blocks of land to railway companies that have built branch lines as feeders to the main line is not in the public interest. Let the people upon these lands, and they would settle the country gradually, and these feeders would speedily be constructed to carry the traffic created by the people who had gone in on the land. Sir, the railway companies, to realize on the lands, sell them out to those who apply first. Speculators buy them up and hold them for higher prices and in this way retard settlement. In the end the railway company suffers injury by keeping the people out of the country. In 1892 the Minister of the Interior declared that 44,000,000 acres were held by the railway companies.

Sir, the promise held out to us was that actual settlers would buy the public lands at a dollar an acre and that the receipts were to amount to $75,000,000 before 1890. After paying the cost of surveys and management $69,000,000 it was said, would remain to be applied to the reduction of the public debt. The Dominion lands cost, up to the 1st July, 1894, $5,288,995, and the receipts from land sales up to that time were $1,949,905. Instead of having a profit of $69,000,000, the management of our Dominion lands resulted in an actual loss to the treasury of $3,328,000.

The timber policy of the Government was madness itself. The policy which prevailed up to 1887 was simply scandalous and indefensible. Limits of the choicest timber were given away to those who were fortunate enough to enjoy the favour of the Government, at a nominal ground rent of $5 per square mile. It was shown by the returns that 850 square miles of timber had been allotted to seventeen members of this House, some of whom are still here. The scandal which followed the exposure of one of these deals resulted in driving J. C. Rykert from public life. Altogether some 1,600 miles of timber limits have been given away subject to a ground rent of something less than one cent per acre. In 1882, Hon. Edward Blake moved that the system of granting limits was liable to gross abuse and a system of public competition should be adopted. This resolution was defeated by the Government majority. Later, in 1891, the Liberals here again condemned the policy of the Government in this respect when the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) moved that these limits should be disposed of by public auction. This also was defeated. Sir, under the Ontario system of selling timber limits we find that in 1892 a bonus averaging $3,657.18 per square mile was received. That sale was of 633 square miles and on that the government received a bonus, a gratuity, one might call it, of $2,315,000 or $1,000,000 more than the cost of the Parliament buildings of Toronto. The same number of square miles sold under the Dominion plan would have brought $3,165. So the account would stand thus:—Dominion method, receipts, $3,165; provincial government method, $2,135,000, for the same area of land. Then again the Dominion timber lands were sold subject to dues of 75 cents per thousand feet, board measure. Provincial timber limits were sold subject to the dues, amounting to $1.25 per thousand feet board measure. Some of those limits have fallen back into the hands of the Government, because of the utter failure of the Government in attracting settlers to the North-west, and so providing a market for the timber which they had hoped to cut on those limits.

7.—OPPOSE THE DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT, FAVOUR THE PROVINCIAL FRANCHISE.

That the Franchise Act since its introduction has caused the Dominion treasury over a million of dollars, besides entailing a heavy expenditure to both political parties;

That each revision involves an additional expenditure of a further quarter of a million;

That this expenditure has prevented an annual revision, as originally intended, in the absence of which young voters entitled to the franchise have, in numerous instances, been prevented from exercising their natural rights;

That it has failed to secure uniformity, which was the principal reason assigned for its introduction;

That it has produced gross abuses by partisan revising barristers appointed by the Government of the day;

That its provisions are less liberal than those already existing in many provinces of the Dominion, and that, in the opinion of this convention, the Act should be repealed, and we should revert to the provincial franchise.

Sir, there are but few hon. gentlemen opposite who disagree with us in our hearty condemnation of this Franchise Act, if they would speak the secret of their souls. It is weary work to revise the lists under this Act, and it is costly work, as hon. gentlemen on both sides well know.

I know something of the revision of 1891. During an interesting tour through my constituency, we had with us, Mr. Shannon, who is now connected with the "Citizen," the Government organ in this city. He appeared at the court of revision in my county, representing the Conservatives there. He attended from day to day, and had a good opportunity of studying the working of the Act. The revision of that county was not satisfactory to him, the working of the Act he found to be complicated and expensive, and he was not satisfied that it resulted in lists that were at all accurate. On his return to Kingston, he relieved the bitterness of his heart by writing the following letter to his brother's paper, the Kingston "News":

Sir,—At the present time and for six months past the revising barristers have been engaged upon the correction of the voters' lists under the Dominion Electoral Franchise Act, and in every county in Canada many persons have been devoting time and labour to the same object, for the purpose of advancing the interests of the respective political parties. I believe the consensus of opinion among those who have had such experience of the actual operations of the Act will be that it is complicated, expensive and unsatisfactory.

There is reason in the contention that the bases of the franchise should be identified for every part of the Dominion, otherwise a representative might be sent to Parliament from Ontario by the votes of men, who in Quebec or Prince Edward Island would be disqualified were it not for this difficulty. Were Quebec possessed of a municipal system similar to ours, and were the qualifications demanded of voters in municipal elections the same in every province, it would undoubtedly be a measure of wisdom and economy to adopt for federal purposes the voters' lists prepared by the municipal authorities.

Many Conservatives fear the result which might flow from leaving their rights as electors to the tender mercy of the Grit assessor. They believe that their opponents are more bigoted and unscrupulous than themselves, that they carry party spirit into all the concerns of social and civil life, and that when appointed to public office they use their position to forward party ends. This belief may not be altogether without foundation; enough instances might probably be found to point a moral or adorn a tale. Yet there is a sense of fair-play in the breast of the average man which may be confidently addressed, and may be depended upon to prevent him from becoming incorrigibly dishonest. But every one who desires to see impartial justice practised by public servants will commence by himself taking his stand upon high principle when occupying public office, and will make it his own concern to treat friend and foe, Grit and Tory, alike, as sentiment must arise under which a partial and dishonest official will become rare. At all events it would be much easier to watch and prosecute the conscienceless assessors, and take the necessary proceedings for having their mistakes corrected by the county judge, than it is to operate the present Franchise Act.

The statute has, it is true, furnished an approximately uniform franchise, but it has failed to secure to other qualities not less important, namely, simplicity and cheapness. The amount of time, labour and expense demanded for the revision of the list can scarcely be estimated by those who have not been actively engaged in the work, and this cost is but poorly repaid by the uncertain, hurried and haphazard manner in which, at the final revision, the business of the court is despatched without being transacted.

If the obstacles to the adoption of the municipal voters' lists are found to be insuperable it will not in my opinion, be long before Parliament will supersede the present system by the introduction of universal suffrage with an easy and inexpensive system of registration.

R. W. SHANNON.

Sir, he thinks the Grit assessors are worse than the Tory assessors. They are bigoted, he says, and unscrupulous, carrying party spite into all the concerns of life, and yet he would trust these conscienceless assessors to make up the lists correctly rather than trust to the operation of this iniquitous franchise law.

Sir, the National Policy and the gerrymander, plus human devices, saved the Government from defeat in 1882. But the popular conscience was aroused against the gerrymander, and people began to question the wisdom of the National Policy, and in 1885 the Government began to fear defeat in the general elections which they knew must take place in 1887. So to be sure of victory, in spite of the will of the people, it occurred to them to prepare their own lists, to appoint officials of their own, so as to make these lists in such a way as to limit as much as possible the right to vote to their own political friends. This was the object of their Franchise Act of 1885. The elections are now held on lists sometimes two, sometimes three, years old. There are thousands of young men whose names do not appear upon the lists upon which the elections are held. They are deprived of the right to say what Government shall be in power, of the right to condemn, if they feel so disposed, the actions of the Government which is in power.

In the election of 1891 it is estimated that between 60,000 and 70,000 young men were disfranchised under that Act. The general elections which will now soon occur will be held on lists which were revised in 1894. Sir, it is in the highest degree important to hon. gentlemen opposite not to allow the young men of Canada to vote. I believe that if they enfranchised the young men of Canada, they would arise and hurl from power the men who have so long betrayed the interests of this country. The Liberals gave the most determined opposition to this Franchise Act in 1885, and throughout the longest session ever held in this building, they fought against that Act; and were it not for the stand they then took, great as are the iniquities now existing in that Act, still greater iniquities would be found in it. Sir, this expensive Act, this unworkable Act, resulting in defective lists, was put upon the statute-book of this country in direct defiance of the convictions of many hon. gentlemen opposite. I am sure that many of them have always been sincerely sorry that that statute ever found its way among the laws of our country.

Among these men, I believe the late Sir John Thompson was one, and we know that he earnestly desired its abolition, and a return, practically, to the franchise of the provinces. I will read what he said in June, 1894, when he introduced his Bill:

The question upon which so much difference has arisen in the past as to the basis of the franchise, shall be adjusted by adopting the franchise of the several provinces. * * * * * The number of differences which exist between the provincial franchises and the Dominion franchise as established by our own Act, are so few as not to be worth the contest and the expenses which are involved in keeping them up, and the adoption of a general system which will apply both to the local and Dominion legislatures, has recommendations as regards simplicity and facilities for economy, which cannot exist under a dual system such as we have been keeping up for the past few years.

Also, it is obviously one of the most desirable features in connection with any system of franchise, and to my mind an essential feature, that the system to be adopted will be such that it can be put into operation every year.

That was Sir John Thompson's view, but his Bill never passed. The hon. gentlemen who now form the present Administration, prefer the present law; they were opposed to the changes suggested by Sir John Thompson, and they are to-day in favour of the Franchise Act, knowing it to be in their interest.

8. AGAINST THE GERRYMANDER—COUNTY BOUNDARIES SHOULD BE PRESERVED.

That by the Gerrymander Acts, the electoral divisions for the return of members to the House of Commons have been so made as to prevent a fair expression of the opinion of the country at the general elections, and to secure to the party now in power a strength out of all proportion greater than the number of electors supporting them would warrant. To put an end to this abuse, to make the House of Commons a fair exponent of public opinion, and to preserve the historic continuity of counties, it is desirable that in the formation of electoral divisions, county boundaries should be preserved, and that in no case parts of different counties should be put in one electoral division.

Sir, the gerrymander occurred somewhat in this way: Under the British North America Act the province of Quebec is entitled to send sixty-five members to this House. The population of Quebec, when divided by sixty-five, gives the unit of representation, the number of persons entitled to send a representative here. The population of each province, divided by the unit gives the number of members that each province is entitled to send to this Parliament. When the census is taken, it will show that some provinces have grown in regard to population more than others, and thus arises the necessity of a redistribution of the seats. The proper method of doing this would be to adhere to the county boundaries, and when it is necessary to increase the representation of a province, to do it by sub-dividing some county, keeping within the county boundaries, and, at the same time, keeping as close as possible to the unit. The plan adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite, openly and above-board, is to arrange the constituencies so as to increase their chances at the polls. Take a strong Liberal county, surrounded by weak Conservative constituencies. The Liberal county may have a few townships with Conservative majorities, and the Conservative counties may have a few townships with Liberal majorities. The Conservative townships are detached from the Liberal county and distributed among, perhaps, several Conservative counties. The Liberal townships are detached from the Conservative counties, and added to the Liberal county. This is what is called "hiving the Grits," and by the deal the chances of the Government in several counties are increased. This has contributed enormously to the maintenance of the Government in office. The result has been to make some fearfully and wonderfully-shaped constituencies. The maps of some constituencies are utterly shapeless. As was said by some one, the map was so changed that it could be safely worshipped as it was unlike anything in heaven above or the earth beneath, or within the thought of man, except under the operation of this Gerrymander Act.

If we add up the votes cast for the Government candidates in the province of Ontario, allowing for the majorities in the constituencies at the general elections electing Government candidates by acclamation, and allowing where any triangular contest occurred the same Government majority as was obtained in the preceding election, we find very little difference in the voting strength of the two parties, even after the by-elections; yet so beautifully does the gerrymander work that the Government is able to count fifty-six followers as against thirty-six Opposition members from this province. To bring about this result, the Government carved up constituencies, regardless of county boundaries or community of interest.

In the redistribution of 1882 the Government departed radically from the principles laid down by their chieftain, Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1872. When the "Redistribution Act of 1872" was under consideration, Sir John A. Macdonald said:

With respect to the rural constituencies, the desire of the Government has been to preserve the representations for counties and subdivisions of counties as much as possible. It is considered objectionable to make representation a mere geographical term. It is desired as much as possible to keep the representation within the county so that each county that is a municipality of Ontario should be represented, and if it becomes large enough, divide it into ridings; that principle is carried out in the suggestions * * * but it is obvious that there is a great advantage in having counties elect men whom they know. Our municipal system gives an admirable opportunity to constituencies to select men for their deserts. We all know the process which happily goes on in western Ontario. A young man in the county commences his public life by being elected by the neighbours who know him to the township council. If he shows himself possessed of administrative ability he is made a reeve or deputy-reeve of his township. He becomes a member of the county council, and as his experience increases and his character and ability become known, he is selected by his people as their representative in Parliament. It is, I think, a grand system that the people of Canada should have the opportunity of choosing for political promotion the men in whom they have most confidence and of whose abilities they are fully assured. All that great advantage is lost by cutting off a portion of two separate counties and adding them together for electoral purposes only. Those portions so cut off have no common interest; they do not meet together and they have no common feeling, except that once in five years they go to the polls in their own township to vote for a man who may be known in one section and not in another. This tends toward the introduction and development of the American system of caucuses, by which wire-pullers take adventurers for their political ability only, and not for any personal respect for them. So that, as much as possible, from any point of view, it is advisable that counties should refuse men whom they do not know, and when the representation is increased, it should be by subdividing the counties into ridings.

I commend these views to hon. gentlemen opposite.

9.—THE SENATE DEFECTIVE—AMEND THE CONSTITUTION.

The present constitution of the Senate is inconsistent with the federal principle in our system of government, and is in other respects defective, as it makes the Senate independent of the people and uncontrolled by the public opinion of the country, and should be so amended as to bring it into harmony with the principles of popular government.

The experience of twenty-eight years has demonstrated that the Canadian Senate, under the present mode of appointment, is an utterly useless, though very expensive, part of our legislative machinery. It is an utter fiction to pretend that appointments to the Senate are made by the Crown. We all know that they are made by the party in power, and that, too often, the appointments are made as a reward for party services, and are given to candidates because they have been defeated in contesting some constituency for a seat in the Commons. We know that the vacancies in the Senate are filled by the party in power from among their party friends, and that, to-day, the Senate is no longer a representative body, and is little better than a political club, whose chief function is to undo the Grits. Sir, these men, rejected by the people when seeking a seat in the Commons, are sent to the so-called higher chamber, there to defeat, if they choose, the popular desire for reform. Well, Sir, these men, when they meet in the Senate, are supposed to revise hasty legislation, but, judged by their acts, one might imagine that they are appointed for the hasty revision of legislation. Every hon. gentleman knows that for weeks the lawyers in this House, on both sides, worked arduously to prepare the Criminal Code. It required weeks of careful study in this House to promote that Bill through its different stages, but it ran through the Senate in two or three days, and just as fast as they could read clause after clause, they were carried, and the Bill became law.

For myself, and speaking personally, I see so little use for a second chamber, that I would gladly go for its abolition. If it be a power for good, I wish its friends would inform the public when, and where, and how, that power is exercised. It possesses vast power for mischief, and little chance of rendering any equivalent for the money it costs. I believe, Sir, the time for the abolition of the Senate has arrived. But, if this chamber is to continue, I think it should be made elective; and then its members being dependent on the will of their constituents, would have greater regard to the responsibilities of their position.

10.—QUESTIONS OF PROHIBITION—A DOMINION PLEBISCITE.

That whereas public attention is at present much directed to the consideration of the admittedly great evils of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite.

Well, Sir, so far as I am concerned, I believe in prohibition. The first vote which I ever polled in my life was for prohibition, and I have not yet awoken to the belief that that vote was cast in a moment of weakness. When this question was brought up in this House, I voted in favour of prohibition. But I want prohibition that will prohibit. A prohibitory law which would fail would make matters infinitely worse than they have ever been, or ever can be, under a license law. A year or so ago, owing to the enterprise of the "Globe" newspaper, we were able to study the effects of prohibition in the different portions of the United States, where it was law. The one fact which was clearly brought out in that investigation was this: That a popular desire for this reform was necessary to its successful enforcement, and, where such desire was lacking, prohibition was found to be a miserable failure and the conditions were worse than they had been under a license system. The results demonstrated the wisdom of the Reform convention of 1893, in desiring to give every elector in the Dominion an opportunity to express his views upon the momentous question, before this Parliament resorted to prohibitory legislation. The temperance people of Canada are not cranks. They are practical men. They desire a full expression of public opinion upon this very important question. The true friends of temperance desire to have a fair majority of all the electors, before Parliament is called upon to enact prohibitory legislation. An opportunity to pronounce upon this question will be given to the people. The question can then be ventilated in all its aspects. Everything that can be urged against it may be urged, and everything that may be said in favour of prohibition may be urged in favour of it, and, if the verdict of the people is against prohibition, then, the prohibitionists of Canada must bide their time patiently, awaiting the day when a healthier public opinion will express itself in favour of this great reform. If the majority is for prohibition, and the people thus demand this reform, then, the expressed will of the people will, I believe, be faithfully carried out.

Mr. Speaker, I have one or two more concluding remarks, and, as I say, I will be as brief as possible. So much for the platform of the Liberal party. Now, Sir, a word or two respecting the platform of hon. gentlemen opposite. They have given up tariff reform in despair. They have got back again now to the old National Policy, as outlined in 1878. They say they do not believe that it is a tree having rotten branches which must be lopped off, according to the words of their late leader, Sir John Thompson. They say they believe it is a healthy, vigorous tree, and good enough for them. Well, here is their policy. Sir John Macdonald moved, on the 7th March, 1878, the following resolution, seconded by Mr. Pope:—

That this House is of opinion, that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home; will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed; will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market; will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually a reciprocity of trade.

Well, Sir, this policy has not benefited the agricultural interests of Canada. It has raised the cost of the production of agricultural produce; it has failed to maintain fair prices; it has resulted in depreciated land values, and an impoverished agricultural community; it has not retained our population; it has driven tens of thousands out of the country, until there is scarce a home in all Canada but mourns the loss of one or more of its sons. Thousands of honest toilers, grown gray in their warfare of life, are left at home on their farms, robbed of their stalwart sons and thrifty daughters, deprived of their helping hands, left alone to struggle on, patiently awaiting the summons to a world where tariffs are unknown.

The National Policy has destroyed many flourishing village industries all over the land. Under low tariff, villages sprung up all over Canada, in which there were many useful industries, giving employment to the youth of these villages. The young people found profitable employment within easy reach of their father's homes; but, to-day, they are driven out, forced to follow these industries, and, leaving the parental roof-tree in their happy village homes, are compelled to find employment as best they can in the large cities of the land, or leave the country in despair.

This policy has failed to coerce the United States into a reciprocity treaty. People are condemning it all over the country. In by-election after by-election the people have declared against it. Sir, according to the opinion of the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), this Government should resign, that is to say, if he has not changed his mind since 1877. Why, Sir, he thinks that the terms upon which this Government clings to office are too humiliating. In 1877 a few by-elections went against the Government of Mr. Mackenzie. The general elections were approaching, and, speaking of the situation, the Secretary of State, then in Opposition, took occasion to say:

I say, Sir, that I rejoice to know that however much hon. gentlemen may shrink from that ordeal, they must be more than blind not to see evidence on every side that they have lost the confidence of the people of this country.

Well, Sir, it is true that the Mackenzie Government lost the confidence of the people in a few of those constituencies, but they never for a moment lost confidence in each other. How is it to-day? Has not the Minister of Finance, who for a year was leader in this House, the Premier's trusted mouth-piece in the Commons, the second in command—has not he told us that the Premier is lacking in firmness and prudence, and is incapable of governing the country? Did he not tell us that this Government is neither strong nor efficient, and that the loyal and united efforts of himself and his six colleagues for a whole year had failed to make it so? Did he not tell us, and tell us truly, that the necessity for a strong Government was never greater than now? Did he not assure us that the Premier could not command the confidence of his colleagues? Did he not tell us that the Premier could not satisfy the Conservative party that its strongest elements were at its head? Did he not tell us a truth well known to us, a fact as apparent as the light of day—but one concerning which good taste and party loyalty should have kept him silent—namely, that the Premier could not impress the country that it had a Government which was united and had power to govern? And did not the Premier, speaking of his colleagues, tell us:

Mr. DAWSON.

Had not jealousy and a determination to destroy the usefulness of the head of the Government been firmly rooted in the breasts of those with whom I was associated, I flatter myself that we should have been successful in carrying on the affairs of this country.

Did he not solemnly assure us that he had not received their loyal support?

Sir, in my heart there is a great pity for the Secretary of State. He awakes to political life after a long and peaceful sleep in the sacred shades of the office of High Commissioner of Canada in London. Like Rip Van Winkle he awakes to find the world greatly changed—to find the party with the instinct of government hopelessly divided and the Cabinet in ruins. The sinking crew on the ship of state, frightened at the storm they themselves have raised, in their despair, as a last resort, wake him up and cry: "Save us, or we perish!" He cannot save them; he knows it now. The end of the world is coming. The party which the genius of Sir John Macdonald welded together it split into factions. He sees failure awaiting him on all sides. Sir, I think I can hear him exclaim, in the solitude of his chamber:

"The world is out of joint—oh, cursed spite
That ever I was born to set it right."

But let us return to the hon. gentleman's speech. He went on to say:

I do not intend, Sir, to appeal to them (the Government of Hon. Alex. Mackenzie) and to point out to them that when the Government of England, when the Government of Mr. Gladstone was situated as the hon. gentlemen opposite are situated to-day, when election after election taught them they had power, but not the concurrence of the public sentiment of the country. Sir, one would think he was a Grit speaking of the Government of to-day. Election after election has been teaching our hon. friends opposite that while they have power they lack the concurrence of the public sentiment of the country. Everything favour the candidate of a strong and efficient Government in a by-election. These elections are held one by one. The first one in a constituency having a good, safe Government majority. The argument is that the Government has a big majority in the House, and a change of representation would make no difference whatever; it would not change results to send a member of the Opposition here; and then the sinister suggestion is made that after all it is wise to be on the winning side, and that it would be better for the balance of the Parliamentary term to send a supporter of the Government than a member of the Opposition.

All these things tell in favour of the Government candidate, and I am sorry to say that human nature is so weak that men are at times carried away by such arguments. Then, Sir, the Government have the gang skilled in human devices, to use the expression of the hon.

Secretary of State, and well supplied out of the surplus fees of the Manufacturers' Association with nicely engraved campaign literature consisting of some bank's promise to pay $2, $5 or $10, as the case may be. And with this illustrated literature the gang proceeds to get in its fine work through the byways and the highways of the townships—the streets and alleys in the towns. To hold a riding with an increased majority should be very easy for our friends the enemy; but what has been their record in the recent by-elections? Since January 1st, 1893, nineteen constituencies have been contested. Two of these were Liberal constituencies. One of them, South Middlesex, which was vacated by the death of our esteemed friend Mr. Armstrong, returned our stalwart friend (Mr. Boston) with an increased majority. The other constituency was Verchères, vacated by the death of a friend whom we all regretted, the Hon. Félix Geoffrion. It returned our friend, the present able member for that county (Mr. Geoffrion), despite the appeals of the Minister of Public Works to the electors when they came to vote to forget their party, but to remember their God. Well, Mr. Speaker, they remembered both their party and their God, and voted for a Liberal. The other seventeen of the contested constituencies had been held by Conservatives. Of these the Conservatives succeeded in holding eight, and the Opposition gained nine. The aggregate Conservative majority against which the Liberals had to fight in these nine constituencies was 2,838, and the aggregate majority secured by the Liberals in them was 2,263. These nine constituencies are the following:—

L'Islet, where my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) put up such a fight as few men in this country besides him could equal; and against all odds—against the most bitter opposition and frantic efforts to defeat him as a punishment for the revelations of the political wrong-doing of hon. gentlemen opposite, made in this Parliament in 1891, he wrested that constituency from the Government.

Vaudreuil, in spite of St. Louis's money, in spite of the Minister of Public Works, in spite of the member for Provencher, in spite of the Solicitor General's appeal to the farmers to remember the great home market they had in the city of Montreal—to all these appeals Vaudreuil turned a deaf ear, and returned the present member (Mr. Harwood) by the handsome majority of 191.

Winnipeg, the gateway of the great Northwest, the centre of its life and energy, which in the election of 1891 had elected a supporter of the Government by a majority of 509, spurned the Government candidate in the by-election, and elected my hon. friend who now represents Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) with the handsome majority of 429.

Antigonish, which was vacated by the death of the late Premier, Sir John Thompson, resisted the pathetic appeals made to the electors to return a supporter of his to finish out the term which he unhappily did not survive to complete, and refused to endorse the conduct and administration of the Government, and returned to this House my hon. friend (Mr. McIsaac) with a handsome majority.

Cardwell was won by an opponent of the Government, the Government majority of 248 being changed to a majority of 226 against them.

Jacques Cartier, with a Conservative majority of 276, where the Conservatives had, according to the declaration of the late member, added to the list 700 more names than the Liberals, which should have rolled up a Government majority of nearly 1,000, went against the Government by a majority of 556.

Montreal Centre, where the Government had a majority of 1,214, they lost by a majority of 336. That constituency, the great centre of trade of the Dominion, with its vast commercial interests and its immense manufacturing concerns, went against the Government of the day, and declared, by electing my friend the present member (Mr. McShane), that they would have no more of the wrong-doing of this Government and no more incapacity in the administration of the affairs of the country.

Sir, West Huron proved the Government's dread of the by-election to be well founded. After long delay, the writs were issued and the constituency was lost to them by a majority of 190, and the war-horse from the west (Mr. Cameron) has come to this House to do valiant battle for truth and righteousness.

Charlevoix resisted the pleadings of both governments, provincial and federal, manfully proclaimed the principles of Liberalism, and returned an hon. gentleman (Mr. Angers) whose welcome by this House, I think, will long be remembered by him.

The hon. Secretary of State proceeded:

When this was the case I say that hon. gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) felt he owed it to himself and to the great party of which he was the leader, that he should not consent to hold office upon terms which he felt so humiliating.

What do hon. friends opposite intend to do now? Do they intend to imitate Mr. Gladstone? Not a bit. They will hold on to power as long as they can. Here we are in our sixth session, for the first time in our history, simply because the Government are afraid to face the electorate. For this reason they hang on to office one session longer than the constitution of our country contemplated. The hon. Secretary of State continued:

Sir, I have no hope that they will follow this example.

Neither have I.

I will not waste words or breath in order to take up the time of the House in making any hopeless appeals, but again congratulate the people that the day is drawing rapidly near when the independent public sentiment of this country will again have an opportunity of being heard—

Well, when the day does come there will be such a hurling from power of this Government as will teach them, once and for all, that it does not pay in the long run to mal-administer the affairs of the country :

—and that again there is a prospect of a brighter day dawning upon Canada than I regret to say has shone upon it for the last three years.

If we change the three years to eighteen years, this speech will fit the present occasion accurately. The Liberals will soon be returned to power. Then we shall have a return to brighter days and purer and wiser administration and a sounder fiscal system. The lessons of the by-elections are unmistakable, and it was just as well for the Government that they did not open Missisquoi, Pontiac and Soulanges, because, just so sure as they had elections in these constituencies, just so sure would then more men have been returned to vote against them. The elections cannot now be long delayed, and when they come we will find the farmers, the merchants, the labourers, the mechanics, the manufacturers and professional men, all joining together in pronouncing through the polls their condemnation of the present Government.

I would like, before I conclude to say a word more about the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper). That hon. gentleman was discussed by the Toronto "Mail" in 1891. On the 9th June, that paper contained the following editorial:—

After ostentatiously assuming the character of an impartial representative of the whole Canadian people, and their common ambassador to Washington, he proceeds to show his impartiality by the most violent and slanderous attacks on the party in Canada opposed to him, first, in an American, then in an English magazine. His article in the "Contemporary" impudently accusing Canadian Liberals to the British public of conspiracy to subvert British institutions and annex Canada to the United States, considering his position and the nature of his duties, may safely be said to be unique in the history of the public service. The appointment of such a man as the head of the state would be, not merely the inauguration of violence and corruption, unredeemed by any true wisdom or statesmanship,—it would be the signal for a disruption of the community and for a moral civil war.

Well, Sir, he is not head of the state, but if hon. gentlemen opposite have their way he may be soon, and I have no doubt that such an event would mean the inauguration of violence and corruption. Certainly the long black record which that hon. gentleman has left in the annals of his country teach us that his methods will be unredeemed by any true wisdom or statesmanship. But there will be no moral civil war. Sir, the people of Canada will not quarrel over him; he is a back number politically, and the people take but little interest in him.

Mr. DAWSON.

They look upon him as the costly High Commissioner, whose whole career as such is unmarked by any one act benefiting of Canada. But I think he somewhat dreaded the promised "moral civil war." He has never been accused of entertaining a low opinion of himself, he is not disposed to underrate his own importance on the earth, and so doubtless he thought the Liberal party had taken seriously his slanderous attacks on them in 1891, and he attempted to atone for his unjust attacks by what he said in Halifax the other day. To disarm them, he there said :

That the men of all political parties and all our public men, irrespective of politics, are loyal to the heart's core.

Sir, the Liberal party needs no such certificate. They have always treated with silent contempt that hon. gentleman's impudent accusations; but if it ease his remorse at having so vilified his fellow-countrymen to make so complete a recantation, I am very glad indeed for his sake that he made it.

There may possibly be remaining in this House a few who are not yet convinced that the Government is not entitled to the confidence of the Canadian people, and I shall therefore put on record a few reasons why the protectionist party is no longer entitled to the confidence of the electors of Canada.

1.—Because it has increased the net public debt from $140,362,069 in 1878 to $253,074,927 in 1895, an increase of $112,712,858, an average annual increase of $6,630,168.

2.—Because it has increased the expenditure, aside from capital expenditure, from $23,503,158 in 1878 to $38,132,095 in 1895, a difference of $14,628,847.

3.—Because in the face of falling revenue, hard times, and a deficit for 1893-94 of over $1,200,000, it appropriated in the session of 1894 over $4,000,000 for railway subsidies, the object of the grants in the majority of cases being to give aid to its candidates in the coming elections.

4.—Because it has squandered the public lands in the North-west by lavish and unnecessary grants to railway corporations, having granted in this way up to April last 44,242,298 acres, which is twice the quantity of land at present under cultivation in the Dominion.

5.—Because it has squandered public moneys in worthless investments made to serve the purposes of friends, such as the Tay Canal, which cost $476,128 and last year yielded revenue to the amount of $136.

6.—Because it has superannuated civil servants in the prime of life to make places for its own retainers, and has brought the superannuation service to that point when the receipts last year were $63,274, and the payments $265,385.

7.—Because it has copied the worst features of American political rascality in the infamous Gerrymander Act of 1882.

8.—Because by the "Franchise Act of 1885" it ceased to permit the provincial lists to be used for Dominion elections, and adopted an expensive partisan scheme for making Dominion lists, with power to perpetrate gross outrages; and has given the country but one revision on an average each three years, costing in each instance over $250,000, besides the vast expense in money and time the people are put to simply to secure the most cherished right of a British subject—the right to vote.

9.—Because it went to the country at the last general election under false pretenses, professing to be on the point of securing a reciprocity treaty with the United States, when no negotiations were in progress and no prospect of securing such a treaty existed.

10.—Because it has distributed 25,000 square miles of timber limits among its friends and supporters regardless of value and without consideration.

11.—Because it has utterly destroyed the independence of Parliament and secured the support of a slavish majority by gifts to members and their friends of timber limits, railway subsidies and other favours.

12.—Because it makes no attempt to secure purity of administration, but on the contrary is governing the country by the most shameless and corrupt methods.

13.—Because it is not an economical Government but is responsible for a system of extravagance and waste in every department.

14.—Because, when the country is staggering under a burden of debt and taxation, no effort is made to reduce the debt or diminish the expenditure.

15.—Because the tariff is not adjusted for the purpose of securing the revenue necessary for the economical administration of public affairs in the easiest way for the people, but on the contrary is made the weapon of rings and combines through the operation of which they exclude foreign goods and secure the power to charge exorbitant prices for their own wares.

16.—Because the promises made on behalf of the National Policy were foundationless and false. It has neither checked the exodus, nor given a home market for our farm products, nor increased the price of such products, nor secured prosperity for the country.

17.—Because the extravagance of the Government obliged the country to face a deficit of over $1,210,000 in 1893-94, followed by the largest deficit save one since confederation, namely, $4,153,875 for the year 1894-95.

18.—Because the buried secrets of peculations, frauds and maladministration in the various departments should be exposed to the light of day, and the accounts and records should be investigated by men who are not interested in concealing facts.

19.—Because Canada is nearly at a standstill and her people are disheartened. Her present rulers are incompetent, and their policy worse than a failure. We want new men, new methods, and the policy of the Liberals.

20.—Because parliamentary inquiry into grave charges made against members of the Government in the Caron case was refused, the character and allegations of said charges changed by the Government to suit its own purpose, and the emasculated indictment thus prepared referred to a commission chosen by itself before which acquittal was foreordained.

21.—Because their policy has led to the scheduling of Canadian cattle in Great Britain and the quarantining of Canadian cattle in the United States.

It would be well for Canada if the electors will consider carefully these reasons, and when the time comes, prove their love for their suffering country and mark their ballots against the protectionist candidates.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have often quoted certain passages from a celebrated letter by the Hon. Edward Blake to the electors of West Durham. Let me read a few other passages from the same letter :

The Canadian Conservative policy has failed to accomplish the predictions of its promoters.

Its real tendency has been, as foretold twelve years ago, towards disintegration and annexation, instead of consolidation and the maintenance of that British connection of which they claim to be the special guardians.

It has left us with a small population, a scanty immigration and a North-west empty still ; with enormous additions to our public debt and yearly charge, an extravagant system of expenditure, and an unjust and oppressive tariff ; with limited markets for our needs, whether to buy or to sell, and all the host of evils (greatly intensified by our special condition) thence arising ; with trade diverted from its natural into forced, and, therefore, less profitable channels, and with unfriendly relations and frowning tariff walls, ever more and more estranging us from the mighty English speaking nation to the south, our neighbours and relations, with whom we ought to be, as it was promised that it should be, living in generous amity and liberal intercourse.

Worse, far worse It has left us with lowered standards of public virtue and a death-like apathy in public opinion ; with racial, religious and provincial animosities rather inflamed than soothed ; with a subservient Parliament, an autocratic Executive, debauched constituencies and corrupted and corrupting classes ; with lessened self-reliance and increased dependence on the public chest and on legislative aids, and possessed with all by a boastful jingo spirit far enough removed from true manliness, loudly proclaiming unreal conditions and exaggerated sentiments, while actual facts and genuine opinions are suppressed.

It has left us with our hands tied, our future compromised, and in such a plight that, whether we stand or move, we must run some risks which else we might have either declined or encountered with greater promise of success.

Yet let us never despair of our country ! It is a goodly land ; endowed with great recuperative powers and vast resources as yet almost undeveloped ; inhabited by populations moral and religious, sober and industrious, virtuous and thrifty, capable and instructed—the descendants of a choice immigration, of men of mark and courage, energy and enterprise, in the breasts of whose children still should glow the sparks of those ancestral fires.

Sir, it is a goodly land, this country of ours. Vast are her resources. Noble are her sons. And, Sir, in my estimation, and, I believe, in the estimation of all his followers, the first of them all is our noble leader, the leader of the Opposition. A certain portion of the press in the province of Ontario supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, speak of our leader as "the French Mr. Laurier." Not contemptuously, I do not accuse them of that, for I do not believe there is a man in all Canada so dead to all that is noble as to feel less than admiration for a character so unsullied, a mind so broad, a heart so generous as that of the hon. leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. But why then speak of him as "the French Mr. Laurier." Do they intend this as a warning to the people of Ontario, and if so, against what ? Is there a man so ignorant of the past that he can doubt the loyalty of the French-Canadians, both Rouge and Bleu? Who doubted the loyalty of Sir George E. Cartier, Sir John A. Macdonald's friend and fellow-worker, co-leader with him of the Conservative party, practically joint Premier with him of the Dominion of Canada? Who doubted the loyalty of Dorion, or Taché, Lafontaine, Papineau, or our own beloved colleague in this House, the late Félix Geoffrion? French Canadians, without number, have their names written in the history of our country, whose every act and word proclaimed them loyal to the core.

Do they think we have forgotten the story of our country? Do we not know how nobly French Canadians stood by old England in the days of her danger and refused to join the colonies in their revolt? Had they done so, who will say what might have been? The fate of England, so far as this continent was concerned, was in their hands. Had they yielded then, the Stars and Stripes might to-day be waving from the gulf to the pole.

In 1812, when the young republic, in its youthful self-confidence, invaded our country, where were the French Canadians? At Chateauguay, many of them, standing shoulder to shoulder with the English to resist the invasion and retain aloft the good old Union Jack. And they did it, too. Later, when we were threatened with invasion, in 1866, the French Canadians stood ready to go out and resist the invader. Once more, in 1885, they sprang to arms and sternly fought to maintain intact this broad Dominion from sea to sea.

Never once have the French Canadians faltered in their duty as subjects of the Crown. Sir, the flag of our country is safe in French Canadian hands. They will keep it unsullied, unless, indeed, to dye it a deeper red, as oft before, with their hearts' warm blood shed in its defence.

Our leader has sat in this House for many years. He has travelled from one end of this country to the other, and never yet has any one dared to question his unswerving loyalty to his country and his Queen. I believe that under his wise rule, racial and religious animosities will speedily disappear, that men will learn to love and respect each other although they may bend the knee in reverent worship at different altars. Though different in race, all will join hand in hand in mutual trust and confidence to build up a united Canada, loyally determined to make her, in fact, as well as in name, the brightest gem in Britain's crown. True to Canada and loyal to the Empire, they have helped to build, we can well allow Frenchmen, while rejoicing in the institutions of this land of free men, to dwell in loving memory upon the glories of France. The German's great heart will swell when he thinks of the loved ones far away in the old home in the fatherland. He will tell his children gathered around his knees of the wars his fathers fought to make his country great. The Icelander, proud of his new home on the prairies of the west, surrounded by such comforts as his industry has won, will still yearn for the ice-clad hills his fathers loved so well. Albion's sons, proud of their country's greatness, oft thinking of the hills and dales, of the stately homes of old England, will strive to make Canada well worthy her proud relationship to that greatest and noblest of lands. Sir, my own countrymen's hearts will hunger for another sight of the dear old Emerald Isle, ever first in the affection of her absent sons; yet none more true than they to the land of their adoption, none more loyal to her best interests, none more anxious to see her worthy of her place in England's Empire. Scotchmen will fondly dream of the heather clad hills of the land of Wallace and of Bruce.

The hearts of our people will turn at times to their old homes, yet all will unite to make this country worthy of her place in the world-wide Empire to which they are proud to belong. Working together a united people, they may yet surely be permitted, each thinking of loved ones beyond the sea, to stand altogether and sing:

Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And never brought to mind,
We'll drink a cup o' kindness yet,
For the days of Auld Lang Syne.

Sir, under the rule of the hon. member for Quebec East, the moral law will be applied to our public life. Fair dealing between man and man will obtain. Cotton combines and sugar trusts will cease to oppress us; Curran Bridges and Tay Canals will become dark memories of other days; a united government, true and loyal to its chief, will rule. Sir, do what they may, this Parliament cannot live for ever. Soon the elections must be held, and when they are over, our beloved leader will take his place as leader of the Government of Canada. The day after the elections, I can imagine the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches, thinking, when too late, of their past misdeeds, of their mutual distrusts and jealousies, sitting around the Council board and mournfully singing:

Ship us somewhere east of Suez,
Where the best is like the worst,
Where there ain't no Ten Commandments,
Tay canals, combines or trusts.

Mr. STAIRS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—MR. DAVID McKEEN.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to inquire of the Government if Mr. David McKeen, late member for Cape Breton, has been called to the Senate?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will give the hon. gentleman the information to-morrow.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I inform the hon. gentleman that if such is the case, I will give him my opinion of it to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 26th February, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

LORD'S DAY OBSERVANCE ACT.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 74) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day. He said: I am sorry that circumstances prevented the earlier introduction of this Bill, and that its place upon the Order paper will not be as favourable as it would have been had I been able to attend in the early days of the session. I desire to say just a few words upon the provisions of this Bill, which are contained in four sections. The first provides that the issue and sale of Sunday newspapers shall be prohibited. The second provides for the closing of the Dominion canals from six o'clock on Sunday morning until ten o'clock on Sunday night. The third section makes provision for the reduction of railway travel as far as is possible at the present time. The regulations go to the extent of forbidding local freight traffic and local passenger traffic, but it does not interfere with through freight traffic or through passenger trains, but contains a provision that when the United States Government prohibits freight traffic on Sunday, then through freight trains from one point on the American border to another point on the American border shall not be permitted in Canada. The fourth section prohibits Sunday excursions by steamer or railway, or in part by steamer and part by railway. This is substantially the same Bill as that introduced last session. It is substantially the same Bill that met the approval of the late lamented Sir John Thompson, the session before last. He supported the first two clauses of the Bill, and it was due to the efficiency of his support that these clauses passed the House.

I am quite conscious, Mr. Speaker, that I am the subject of a good many jibes, some sneers, and no small amount of ridicule because of the position I have taken with regard to this Bill. I suppose the opponents of the Bill think it high time that my persistency in pressing it should cease, and that I should allow the matter to rest. But I am encouraged in the course I have taken in this regard by the success I finally met with in Parliament some years ago with a Bill providing for the punishment of seduction. At first, that Bill was scarcely treated with courtesy by the House. But it finally passed this House. And, after three attempts, it passed the Senate of Canada, and it is now the law of the Dominion. I say that the success I met with in that Bill encourages me to suppose that it is possible that the Bill I now present to the House, which is one of vastly more consequence, and one calculated to confer much greater advantages and blessings upon this country, may also finally become law. I observe that my friends the reporters and editors of the newspapers are sometimes somewhat facetious with regard to my hobby, my fad, as this Bill is termed. Well, Sir, I think the reporters of this country are interested in the matter of having one day out of seven for themselves. If they understood the position of their brethren of the press in the United States, I do not think they would desire to exchange circumstances with them. I believe the life of a newspaper man upon the press which issues Sunday editions is a life of slavery. I am told that the reporters upon the American daily papers which publish Sunday editions have a professional life of about seven years, on the average—at the end of seven years they are played out. I am told, Sir, that the proprietor of the New York "World," with all his energy and devotion to business, has paid the penalty of issuing a great Sunday journal, in addition to a daily paper for the rest of the week, with the loss of his eyesight, and that he now enjoys his success and his wealth in blindness. I believe that the success of this Bill with regard to Sunday newspapers is of vast importance to the reporters and editors of newspapers, and of vast importance to the public. The Sunday newspaper is itself a violation of God's law, and, being a violation of God's law, it is impossible but that it will sympathize with every other violation of that law, and that it will oppose every restriction upon violations of that law. That is found to be the case in the United States. No Sunday newspaper will advocate Sabbath observance, or will stand up for the observance of this day that honours God, and is a blessing to man. The Sunday newspaper is a curse which it is highly desirable, in the interests of Canada, as a whole, should not be allowed to obtain a foothold in this country.

This Bill, moreover, is intended to give to a class of labourers who are now helpless, the protection of the law in granting to them what should be considered a civil right, the right to one day's rest in seven. The labourers upon railways, for instance, are helpless. They must labour on the Sabbath or lose their situations, and unless the law steps in and affords protection to these men, and gives them the right to that rest from labour which God has given them, and which the law should give them, they are powerless. The question of Sunday observance has elicited a great deal of attention in the United States, and I am happy to say it is receiving the support of the most eminent of the Roman Catholic clergy and hierarchy in that country. Archbishop Ireland was one of the most prominent figures at the World's Sunday Rest Congress in Chicago. Cardinal Gibbons furnished a paper which was read at that congress. The influence of that church in the United States is thrown in favour of the cause of Sunday rest reform. This Bill does not propose to interfere with religious rights or religious opinions. It does not propose to say that men shall entertain any particular set of religious opinions, or attend any particular church, or even that they shall attend any church at all. Its object is to secure sanitary blessings, to secure to the labourer the civil right of rest. This Bill is not an innovation; there are many precedents for legislation of this kind. There are thirty statutes upon the British statute-book with reference to Sunday observance. There is scarcely a colony of the British Empire that has not legislated upon this matter, and every state in the American Union except one or two have statutes upon Sunday observance. This Bill which I ask leave to introduce to-day is one which I think should commend itself to the better sentiment of this country, and should commend itself to the sympathy and good wishes of all men who desire to see our institutions made stable and permanent, and to see that prosperity exist which is founded upon public virtue. I beg to move for leave to introduce this Bill, seconded by Mr. Christie.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before you proceed with questions to be put by members, I desire to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments in order to draw attention to a matter which I consider of importance to every member of this House. I refer to an article in the Montreal "Herald," of yesterday, which, with your permission, I will read :

Mr. CHARLTON.

(Special to the Herald.)

Halifax, N.S., Feb. 24.—The "Chronicle" tomorrow will publish the following open letter, which explains itself :—

To Richard C. Weldon, M.P. for Albert County, N.B., and Charles H. Cahan, ex-M.P., Halifax :

Gentlemen,—A considerable number of citizens have been informed by you during the last month that Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., the present Secretary of State, had been guilty of gross malversation of office on a former occasion, when a Cabinet Minister, whereby he dishonestly obtained $40,000, and that as a consequence of such conduct he has not been entrusted since by the Ottawa Government with any important financial transactions in London, notwithstanding that the creation of the office of High Commissioner was sought to be justified by the plea that he would be available in London to transact such business for the Government.

I, in common with any others, venture to think that, in view of the aspirations cherished by Sir Charles and the tremendous injury to Canada such a man could inflict if given larger control of public affairs, and especially if placed as he undoubtedly desires to be, in charge of one of the large spending departments, you will be but doing a public duty, however distasteful to yourselves it may be, if you give the public the authority for your statement, noted above, which has been made so freely and unequivocally and to so many persons.

Some citizens have asserted that an ex-Minister of Finance, Sir Leonard Tilley, has expressed his willingness to Dr. Weldon to substantiate the charge. Another staunch Conservative, the editor of the "Atlantic Weekly," recently declared editorially that "It would be a crime before high heaven" to make Sir Charles Tupper Premier of Canada, and it is understood that this strong statement was based, in part, on his belief that Sir Charles was guilty of the charge repeated on various occasions by you. Still another Conservative editor, whose name is withheld for the present, has repeatedly made similar statements.

Under all the circumstances, it is manifestly proper, not to say imperative, that the complete facts in connection with this statement should be declared as soon as possible, so that such a grave matter may be dealt with as the interests of the country demands.

Respectfully yours,

ROBERT M'CONNELL.

Halifax, N.S., Feb. 24.

I desire to say to the House, that I have addressed a letter to Sir Leonard Tilley, which had not reached him when this telegram was sent to me by him :

St. John, N.B., 26th February, 1896.

Sir Charles Tupper, Bart.,
Ottawa.

The use of my name in Mr. C. McConnell's letter is without the slightest warrant, as Dr. Weldon can confirm. No statement to Dr. Weldon, or any other person, in reference to the charge made against you, was ever made by me.

S. L. TILLEY.

I have just had the pleasure of receiving the following letter from the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) :—

Ottawa, 25th February, 1896.

My dear Sir Charles :

In reply to your esteemed favour of this day I beg to inclose a copy of a despatch which I have sent to the press.

(Copy.)

You are authorized to say that so far as I am concerned, Mr. McConnell has been imposed upon by false and slanderous statements.

I am,
Yours faithfully,
R. C. WELDON.

The following appears in the Montreal "Herald" of to-day :

Halifax, N.S., Feb. 25.—In reply to the "open letter" published yesterday, from Robert McConnell to Professor Weldon and C. H. Cahon, ex-M.P.P., the "Chronicle" to-morrow will publish the following :—

To the Editor of the "Morning Chronicle" :

Sir,—I wish distinctly to deny having made the statements attributed to me by Mr. Robert McConnell in a letter published in the "Morning Chronicle," of this date, referring to Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., and I challenge you to produce a single individual who ever heard me give utterance to the statements alleged by Mr. McConnell to have been made by me. I may also add that for many months prior to the publication of the article in the "Atlantic Weekly," referred to by Mr. McConnell, I had no communication either directly or indirectly with the editor of that journal or with any person connected therewith.

(Signed) CHARLES H. CAHAN.

Halifax, N.S., 25th February, 1896.

I have only to say, Mr. Speaker, that, holding the position I have the honour to hold in this House, I have felt it my duty to instruct my solicitors to proceed criminally against the publishers of this false and malicious libel.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of Public Works for the year ending 30th June, 1895. —(Mr. Ouimet.)

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

Mr. EDGAR. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you will allow me to repeat the question I asked the Secretary of State, across the House the other day, as to whether he has ascertained what was done by the Government in connection with the resolution passed by this House in 1894, on the subject of the settlement of disputes between Great Britain and the United States by peaceful arbitration.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As I promised the hon. member, I have made inquiry, and find that the resolution does not appear to have been transmitted to the Imperial Government.

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose it will be transmitted ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not aware that the House gave any authority or direction for its transmission. I believe that is usual.

CANADIAN COPYRIGHT.

Mr. EDGAR asked :

1. Has Her Majesty's Government yet denounced the Berne Copyright Convention on behalf of Canada, as requested ?

2. Has Her Majesty's Government yet given its assent to the issuing of the proclamation by the Canadian Government to bring into force the Canadian Copyright Act of 1889 ?

3. How much longer does the Canadian Government propose to withhold the proclaiming of the Act of 1889 ?

4. Does the Government propose to abandon to any, or to what extent the assertion of our rights to legislate on the subject of Canadian copyright ?

5. What is the practical result of the conference held since last session between the Colonial Office and a representative of the Canadian Government, in its bearing upon the following points, viz. :—

(a.) The Berne Convention.

(b.) The proclaiming of the Act of 1889.

(c.) The passage of any other copyright legislation by the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. DICKEY. 1. No. 2. No. 3. That will depend upon future events. 4. The Government does not propose to abandon to any extent the assertion of our rights to legislate on Canadian copyright. 5. A report of the conference will be brought down. It is too soon to say what the practical result will be.

ILLICIT STILL AT OKA.

Mr. O'BRIEN asked :

Whether an illicit still for the making of spirits was found by the inland revenue officers, on or about the 4th day of February, on the premises of the Trappist monks at Oka, and if so, was such still seized by them ?

Was any offer made by the monks to settle the case, and if so, what was that offer ? Has it been accepted, or have any, and what steps been taken with regard to it ?

Have any proceedings been taken for prosecuting the offenders if such there be, and if so, of what nature are those proceedings ?

What is the punishment for such an offence as is alleged to have been committed ?

Mr. PRIOR. A still was found on the premises referred to, and seized by the officers of inland revenue. A pecuniary penalty of $500 has been exacted, and the apparatus confiscated. In case of a corporate body, it would be difficult, in case of a prosecution, to determine where the punishment should most justly fall, and a pecuniary penalty seemed to be the only solution.

SUPERANNUATION OF LT.-COL. MACPHERSON.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

Has Lieut.-Col. J. P. Macpherson been superannuated? If so, what superannuation does he receive? What date was he retired, and why? Have any appointments been made to the clerical staff of the Public Works Department (inside service) since the retirement of Lieut.-Col. Macpherson?

Mr. OUIMET. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that Lieut.-Col. Macpherson has been superannuated, at $756 per annum. He was superannuated on 1st July, 1895, to promote efficiency and economy. Three third-class clerks have been appointed since, two of them at $400 and the other at $500. Two of the aforesaid third-class clerks have been in the department for some years as temporary clerks, one having been employed since 1887, and the other since 1882.

E. W. BENJAMIN, YARKER, ONT.

Mr. DAWSON asked :

What amount of money was paid to the Department of Inland Revenue by E. W. Benjamin, of Yarker, Ont., from August, 1875, as duties for stamping measures of his manufacture? What was the date of each payment? What was the amount, and name of person to whom paid?

Mr. PRIOR. The department has no means of furnishing the information asked for. No account is kept of individuals in respect of inspection of weights and measures, and the duplicate certificates transmitted to the department for the purpose of checking inspectors' returns, are destroyed after five years.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PICTON.

Mr. DAWSON asked :

1. What is the frontage on Main Street and depth in feet of the Barker site for the proposed public building at Picton? Is it a corner plot?
2. What is the frontage and depth in feet of the Carter site? Is it a corner plot, and on what streets?

Mr. OUIMET. 1. 170 feet on Main Street, by 120 feet deep. It is not a corner plot. 2. I have not the information in my possession.

PROPOSED BUILDING AT PICTON, ONT.

Mr. DAWSON asked :

Was an inspector or other officer or person sent by the Public Works Department, in 1893, to look over and measure the various suggested sites for the proposed public building at Picton? Did Mr. D. J. Barker, before arrival of said inspector, during his stay in Picton, or soon after his departure, offer to sell a site for the said building? What was the frontage, depth and location of site so offered, and price asked? Did the inspector look over said site? Did he recommend its purchase? Did he look over the Carter site? Did he recommend its purchase? Did he say there would be a commanding view of the whole harbour from a building on the Carter site? Who recommended the Government to abandon the Carter site in favour of the site it is proposed to purchase from Mr. D. J. Barker?

Mr. OUIMET. In answer to the hon. member, I beg to say, as follows:—1. An inspector was sent in 1892. 2. Mr. G. W. Barker informed the inspector, while at Picton, he was willing to sell a site for said building. 3. Frontage, 100 feet in depth, and 100 feet on Main Street. The price asked was $5,000. 4. Yes. 5. The inspector made no recommendation for the purchase of any lot, but stated it was the most central site offered, and that he was informed that three-fourths of the ratepayers were in favour of this site. 6. Yes. 7. No, he did not recommend the purchase of any lot. 8. No such statement is made in the report submitted by the officer after his visit in 1892. 9. The Barker site could have been purchased originally, had it not been on account of the price, $5,000, and the fact that there was an undischarged mortgage on the property. The quantity of ground required can now be obtained for $4,000, and the mortgage has been discharged.

GODERICH HARBOUR.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) asked :

1. Has any engineer of the Public Works Department made any reports to the said department as to the condition of the Goderich harbour and the piers and breakwater in connection therewith?
2. Who made such reports and when were they made?
3. What is the nature, extent and damage so done?
4. What is the estimated cost of repairing said breakwater?
5. Has the Government taken any steps to repair said breakwater? If not, why not?
6. Does the Government intend this year to repair said breakwater?

Mr. OUIMET. 1. Yes. 2. Mr. H. A. Gray, resident engineer in Toronto. They were made on 4th January, 1894; 17th March, 1894; and 28th September, 1894. 3. The north face of the breakwater is bulging out into the river at three or four different places, varying in length from 150 to 200 feet. The whole of the superstructure is in great need of repairs. The estimated cost of repairs is $53,000.

CONTRACT FOR MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN LA MALBAIE, ST. URBAIN AND ST. ALEXIS.

Mr. ANGERS (translation) asked :

Whether the contract for carrying the mail between the wharf and the village of Malbaie, has been renewed? If so, to whom has it been awarded? For what time? What is the amount? Were tenders called for?

Has the contract for mail service between St. Urbain and Ste Agnès been renewed ?

If so, to whom has it been awarded, for what time, at what price, and were tenders asked for ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) In reply to the question put by the hon. member, I may say : (1.) That the contract was renewed. (2.) The name of the contractor is Mr. George W. Bouliannes. (3.) The price is 50 cents per trip. (4.) There were no tenders asked for. As to the second part of the question, there is no postal service between Ste. Agnès and St. Urbain.

Mr. ANGERS. (Translation.) I did not ask whether there was a postal service between St. Urbain and Ste. Agnès, but it was the service between St. Urbain and St. Alexis I inquired about.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) I find that a clerical error has slipped into the latter part of the answer. I will get the information and give the hon. gentleman a supplementary answer.

ASSISTANT HARBOUR MASTER, ST. JOHNS, P.Q.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked :

1. Was an assistant harbour master appointed for the port of St. Johns, P.Q., last summer ? What are the causes which rendered the appointment necessary, and is the said assistant harbour-master still in that position ?

2. Are the Government aware that the harbour master at St. Johns, P.Q., has been an invalid for over two years, and that the duties are performed by another person, who does not act under the instructions of the Government ?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to inquire whether the present incumbent is still capable of doing the duties of the office ? And if not, do they intend to appoint a successor ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. Zotique Bonin was duly appointed deputy harbour master by Order in Council of the 13th June, 1895. The harbour master was unable to attend to his duties owing to ill-health. Mr. Zotique Bonin still holds the position of deputy harbour master. 2. The Department of Marine and Fisheries is aware of Mr. Pinsonneault's state of health, and that he requires assistance for the performance of the duties of harbour master. Mr. Bonin is still deputy harbour master, and as such officer, any work performed by him in his official capacity would be under the sanction of the department. 3. Inquiries will be made to ascertain whether the duties are being satisfactorily performed.

SEED-GRAIN FOR ALBERTA SETTLERS.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked :

1. Whether it is the intention of the Government to distribute seed-grain to the Alberta settlers whose crops were destroyed by prairie fires last fall, and who have not the means of purchasing seed-grain ?

2. Are the Government aware that, apart from those whose crops were so destroyed, many settlers in the districts afflicted had splendid crops, and have grain to sell ; and that all the seed-grain required to be distributed can be furnished to the Government by the said settlers ?

3. By purchasing the seed-grain elsewhere, would not the Government be open to the charge of discrediting the territory of Alberta, by causing it to be believed that the whole crop was destroyed, and that section of the country almost ruined, while in fact only a relatively small number of settlers suffered from the fires, and there are vast quantities of grain for sale in Alberta, in the very vicinity of the farms affected by the prairie fires ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I desire to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, for a moment, to this question, which I think hardly falls within the rules. But I may say for the information of the hon. gentleman, that the Government are well informed concerning the condition of the people of the Northwest, to whom this question refers, and also concerning the crops in that region, and that the subject is obtaining the attention of the Government.

PASPEBIAC AND THE HARBOUR OF REFUGE.

Mr. JONCAS moved for :

Copies of all petitions, letters, correspondence or documents of any nature whatsoever, asking the Government to construct wharfs or piers at Paspebiac, in the county of Bonaventure, with a view to making a harbour of refuge at that place.

He said : Before putting this motion into your hands, Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw your attention, the attention of the Government, and the attention of the House to certain facts in relation with it. In answer to a question put by me a few days ago, relative to this subject, the hon. the Minister of Public Works made the following answer :—

Two petitions have been received by the department, one in February, 1882, through Mr. Beauchésne, then member of Parliament, signed by Rev. Cyprien Larrivée, Messrs. Charles Robin & Co., Le Bouthillier Bros., the mayor and councillors of Paspebiac, and 184 others asking for the construction of a public wharf at Paspebiac.

Another petition was transmitted by one Mr. George Romeril, agent for Messrs. Charles Robin & Co., on the 1st of June, 1891, asking that necessary works be constructed at Paspebiac to make it a harbour of refuge. This petition was signed by Messrs. Le Bouthillier Bros., George Romeril, Rev. C. Larrivée and 118 others. Letters were subsequently received to the same effect from Mr. Romeril on the 8th of January, 28th November, and 26th December, 1894, and from Messrs. Robin, Colas & Co. on the 28th March, 1894.

In answer to another question on the same subject, the hon. the Minister of Public Works said :

My department has sent an engineer to Paspebiac, in the county of Bonaventure, with instructions to ascertain whether that harbour could or could not be used as a winter port. This engineer was sent at the request of the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sure there can be no objection from anybody to a public wharf being constructed at Paspébiac, nor to any ameliorations of a local nature being made to this harbour. Commercially speaking, Paspébiac is an important locality. Two of the most important fishing firms of Gaspésie have their main establishments at this place. Every year numerous cargoes are loaded and unloaded there, and Paspébiac certainly deserves that every facility should be given to its trade, and if the inhabitants of the locality had limited their demand to the local improvements they were asking for in the petition of 1882, I would have had nothing to say against it, and besides, I would have been most happy to work hand in hand with them to try and get for them ameliorations to which they are rightly and justly entitled. But, Mr. Speaker, they are to-day asking for what, in my humble opinion, is practically impossible. They are asking the Government of this country to spend unnecessarily a couple of millions of dollars to make at Paspébiac a harbour of refuge and a winter port. And who is particularly insisting on the accomplishment of what I may call this wild cat scheme? The directors of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, now the Atlantic and Lake Superior, and prominent amongst them Mr. C. N. Armstrong, who is celebrated throughout Canada for his impracticable plans and absurd theories.

In order that the Government may be in a position to deal wisely with the proposal submitted by these gentlemen, I desire to lay before them certain facts which they may not, perhaps, now bear in mind, and to put them on their guard against a project of this kind.

There are in our young country, so many useful improvements to be carried out, improvements which are urgently called for, and necessary, that we should look twice before committing ourselves to enterprises of worse than doubtful utility. Mr. J. W. Rider, the agent of the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company, who has recently visited that part of our province, goes into ecstasies over the scenery of the Baie des Chaleurs and over its climate in summer, and the fertility of the soil. He is quite right so far, and he merely repeats what I have stated publicly myself and written over and over again. But, Mr. Rider was wrong when he stopped short and did not push his inquiry a little further. He would not, perhaps, have so rapidly jumped to the conclusion that Paspébiac can be made a splendid seaport, to which vessels can resort at all seasons of the year. Now, I am prepared to show that he is mistaken and to give reasons why the Government should not undertake to make an artificial harbour at Paspébiac, a harbour involving a useless expenditure of at least two millions of dollars. The reasons are many, but I shall dwell on three leading reasons only:

1st. The uselessness of the expenditure as contemplated with the establishment in the Gulf of St. Lawrence of a port where the rapid transit steamers performing the service between Canada and Europe may touch and land or receive mails and passengers.

2nd. The difficulty, and in fact, practical impossibility of winter navigation in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

3rd. The flagrant injustice to the county of Gaspé of helping the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company—now the Atlantic and Lake Superior Company—to make Paspébiac its terminus. First, the uselessness of the expenditure. I am of the opinion of those who maintain that if we ever have between Canada and Europe vessels equal in speed to those now running between New York and Liverpool, they will eventually touch in summer at some port on the Gulf of St. Lawrence, for the convenience of passengers to or from Quebec to Montreal and other great western cities. In these days of progress, a saving of time and distance is a thing of the greatest possible importance. But if that be so, why should these vessels deviate from their route and make a useless run of 120 miles to a port far up the Baie des Chaleurs, when Gaspé Basin, the finest port in the Dominion of Canada lies in their course between the extremity of Anticosti and that of the Gaspé Peninsula? Why, above all, should the Government throw away two or three millions of dollars in order to make of Paspébiac an artificial harbour when Gaspé Basin, which is nearer at hand, affords undeniable and unquestioned natural advantages? I ask any man of sense to say if it would not be vastly better to spend those millions in helping to push on the Baie des Chaleurs Railway to deep water at some point on Gaspé Basin, and thus open up for settlement one of the finest counties in our province and furnish a population of some 30,000 people with easy and rapid means of communication.

Gaspé, as I have said, lies on the very course of the ocean steamers. It is the point from which they are signalled when they enter the St. Lawrence. Lying, as it does, 250 miles lower than Rimouski, this bay is open for navigation in the fall two months at least after the sailing of the last steamer from Montreal and Quebec. It is, moreover, the point in the province of Quebec nearest to Liverpool. This, the following figures will show. I challenge contradiction as to the accuracy of this statement:

	Miles.
Distance from Liverpool to Halifax	2,530
Distance from Liverpool to Quebec via Cape Race	2,850
Distance from Liverpool to Quebec via Gaspé	2,588
Distance from Liverpool to Gaspé.....	2,248

Comments would be useless, and if it is ever considered advisable that the ocean steamers should touch at one of the Gulf ports in our province in order to enable the mails and passengers to reach the west some hours sooner, the choice of Gaspé Basin is the only one open to the Government, in view of the natural advantages it affords. Why then should the Government, in the face of these facts which cannot be denied, and without any sound reason to justify it, waste the public money upon an artificial harbour at Paspébiac?

I have said it would involve an expenditure of two million dollars to make Paspébiac a port where vessels of large tonnage could touch and land their cargoes. I base my assertion on the following reasons:—

Paspébiac is a bay open to winds from the south, the south-west and west; there is nothing but a shoal or point of sand, affording it some slight protection from the east wind.

The steamers which are to do the rapid transit service between Canada and Europe will draw 28 to 30 feet of water. To enable them to land at Paspébiac and to shelter them from the strong winds and the heavy seas resulting therefrom, it will be necessary to construct in a depth of at least 35 feet of water, in the first place, a pier 1,500 to 1,800 feet in length, sufficiently solid to stand the action of the storms and of the ice hurried along, as it sometimes is, by currents of great rapidity.

At the end of the pier aforesaid it will be necessary to construct a shorter pier in the same depth of water, in order to protect the ships against winds from the south-west. Add to this the building of wharfs, required for the needs of traffic, and it will be admitted that I am not far astray when I assert that it will take an outlay of at least two millions of dollars to make Paspébiac what the directors of the railway company require. And this artificial harbour, if the blunder of constructing it was committed, would be most costly to maintain, for the small river which empties in to the bay, brings down a large quantity of sand, which, being arrested by the pier aforesaid, would accumulate within the port and necessitate almost constant dredging.

Is winter navigation in the Gulf of St. Lawrence possible? Suppose it to be, strictly speaking possible, is it practicable, and what benefit should we derive from it? These are two questions of importance which the Dominion Government should consider and solve before granting the request of those who want them to expend at Paspébiac an enormous amount of money for the creation of a port where ocean steamers of large tonnage may find shelter and accommodation at all seasons of the year.

In this age of light, invention and progress, any and everything seems to be possible, provided you only have money—even to change the course of the St. Lawrence and remove its outlet to New York, as was proposed by an American engineer only a few days ago. With powerful vessels, of special naval design, it is, perhaps, possible that a steamer might, if sufficiently solidly built, occasionally reach Paspébiac in mid-February, by taking plenty of time.

In 1874 a special committee appointed by the legislature of Quebec, and presided over by Mr. Bellingham, examined this question. I have before me the report of that committee, and I find that, while one-half of the witnesses called before it, declared that they considered the navigation of the river and gulf possible in winter, the other half considered that it was impossible. And yet these witnesses had been carefully selected among persons favourable to the scheme. Here is the statement of Mr. F. Gourdeau, then harbour master at Quebec, a man of great experience in the matter, and a man whose competence cannot be questioned:

It would be impossible to have a winter port near Quebec, for the simple reason that the river would be frozen in from the beginning of winter, and it would remain in that state sometimes for the whole winter, rendering an approach impossible for vessels.

2. The vast quantity of ice which covers the river and Gulf of St. Lawrence during the winter is an insurmountable obstacle to navigation, and even though these obstacles were overcome by using powerful steamers with skilled and energetic crew, the trade of the Dominion would not be in any way benefited, owing to the danger, delay and expense attending this navigation.

Moreover, what need is there for expert evidence, when we look at the facts already known. The "Northern Light," built specially by Mr. Sewell, and which was to solve the question of winter rapid and safe navigation in our province, has been an utter failure. She has been unable to perform the services between Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton. The Government have had constructed in Scotland an exceedingly strong steamer, the "Stanley," for the express purpose of transporting, with the utmost possible regularity, mails and passengers between the Island and the mainland. And what is the result? The complaints of the Islanders continue. In fine weather and when the strait is comparatively free of heavy ice, the "Stanley" does wonders, but how often is she compelled to remain for days in the offing and unable to make either coast of the strait? This being so, what can the ordinary steamer be expected to accomplish, when she must traverse immense fields of ice in order to get from the entrance of the gulf to Paspébiac, through the Baie des Chaleurs, which is often completely choked with ice driven in by the east wind and the gulf currents.

But, even though this winter navigation be admitted to be, strictly speaking, possible, I maintain that it is not practicable, but is simply like many of Mr. C. N. Armstrong's other projects. Utopian, and that the Government should not, when there are so many other important improvements to be carried out, waste the public money on impossible undertakings of the kind. As a matter of fact, the dangers involved in navigating the river and Gulf of St. Lawrence are greater than those presented in winter by the voyage from England to Portland, Halifax, or any other port on the Atlantic. These dangers are caused by the snow storms which prevail nearly unceasingly in those latitudes, the enormous quantity of ice forming there, the absence of buoys, harbours of refuge, and good anchorage grounds for vessels, when they are caught in sudden snow squalls. Steamers intended for this service should be more solidly constructed than for ordinary service, and the cost would thus be increased at least 25 per cent. A crew could not be found without paying double the wages paid on vessels crossing the Atlantic. Moreover, it would be impossible to find a cargo for the vessel, and, as to passengers, no man who was not tired of life would risk a trip on her. The insurance companies would take no risk on vessel or cargo, unless, perhaps, at such ruinous rates as would ruin all parties interested. The foregoing is sufficient to show the utter absurdity of the Armstrong scheme. But there is another reason which should induce the Government to refuse any aid to an enterprise such as this. By helping the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company to make Paspébiac its terminus the Government would commit an act of manifest injustice towards the county of Gaspé. When the company got its charter from the Quebec legislature in 1872, they bound themselves to build the road from Metapédia to Paspébiac, and reserved to themselves the right to extend it to deep water in Gaspé Basin. From 1872 to 1890, the work of construction went on very slowly; I need not say why. The history of the road is already sufficiently known. The eighty miles now in operation were constructed with the money of the taxpayers of Canada, and if the directors do not soon take steps to carry out the works, it will be the duty of the Government to intervene once more and compel the company to fulfil its obligations. In 1890 the position was such that the legislature threatened to deprive the company of its charter if they did not go on with the work. In 1891 the company appeared at Ottawa asking for a confirmation of the charter which the Quebec legislature was threatening to cancel. They succeeded in their wish, but they are bound to extend the railway to Gaspé. They also undertook to complete it as far as Paspébiac in 1893, and to Gaspé in 1895. In 1894 they changed their name to that of the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company, and by means of a further subterfuge secured a further delay. They are now bound to complete their road to Gaspé in 1897 only. In 1888, through the efforts of the directors, the subsidies granted for the section extending from Paspébiac to Gaspé were allowed to be applied to a section to the west of Paspébiac on the plea that this would enable them to put several miles of their road in operation at once and to place their debentures on the market. To-day the road is built only as far as New Richmond, twenty miles west of Paspébiac. The subsidies are exhausted, the company cannot dispose of its debentures, and they are applying for further favours, which, if granted, would enable them to shirk all their obligations by making Paspébiac their terminus. For years have the sturdy, industrious, energetic people of the county of Gaspé remained at a standstill for want of means of communication which would enable them to find markets in the great centres of the Dominion for the product of their labour; they are deprived of it through the fault of this company, which, having no consideration whatever for the public interest, have looked solely to their own, and have wasted the public moneys in a manner which I will not attempt to qualify. In the face of all this, the company is applying to the Government for fresh favours, and the Dominion authorities are asked to vote millions once more in order to make a winter port at Paspébiac, and to deprive the county of Gaspé of a railway which was promised to it and to which it is entitled. Instead of complying with this request it is rather the duty of the Government to intervene and compel the directors of the company to carry out all their obligations, and if they neglect or refuse to keep promises to which they are lawfully and solemnly pledged, let the authorities apply the law, which is made for great companies quite as much as for any individual member of the community. This scheme of making Paspébiac the terminus is not new. I have fought against it for several years already, and I intend to fight it so long as I am called upon to protect the interests of the county of Gaspé. In advising the Government of the Dominion not to encourage a scheme which would operate a flagrant wrong against the people of the county of Gaspé, I am simply doing my duty. That Paspébiac should be granted any local improvements to which its commercial importance entitles it, is a thing which I should be happy to see, but the rights of the county of Gaspé must not be sacrificed. Furthermore, in the present state of affairs, the Baie des Chaleurs Railway having been put under sequestration by the government of the province of Quebec for non-accomplishment of their obligations, I think the Government at Ottawa would be justified to take the necessary measures to make this road a branch of the Intercolonial. It was at first the intention of the Government to make of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway a branch of the Intercolonial, as you can see, Mr. Speaker, if you consult the "Hansard" of 1884. In 1884 Sir Charles Tupper, who was then, I think, Minister of Railways, in proposing a vote of $300,000 to build the first part of this railway from Metapedia eastward to wards Paspebiac, said :

We come to the conclusion that a feeder to the Intercolonial should be there, and we were prepared to ask the House to give an amount for its construction. We had, therefore, decided to build a branch of 20 miles rather than ask for a larger sum.

And in reply to Mr. Blake, he said again :

The hon. gentleman will see that the Intercolonial Railway, by constructing these 20 miles of railway, will be in a very much better position to operate the line than a company could be. Suppose the Government build these 20 miles, much of the expense connected with operating them and the cost of rolling stock would be saved.

And a good feeder of the Intercolonial this road would be. My predecessor in this House, the late Dr. Fortin, speaking on the same subject in 1884, expressed himself as follows :—

I hope it will not be considered out of place for me, if I say a few words in reference to the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. I thoroughly approve of the course the Government has adopted in this respect, as it appears to be the only way this important branch of the Intercolonial could be secured. It will be several years before this work can be brought to completion.

I may say here that if the Government had carried out their first intention, this road would now be built as far as Gaspé Basin. Mr. Fortin continued :

But the population of the two counties, interested in this important branch railway, will now not only live in hope, but will be sure that their aspirations after the long cherished idea of being put in communication by means of a railway with the other parts of Canada, and especially with the markets, will be realized. When this railway will have reached the important port of Gaspé, one of the finest and most secure harbours in the world, it will have traversed the greatest part of the counties of Bonaventure and Gaspé, containing over 5,000,000 (five millions) acres of land, of which a large part is of the best quality, with a population of 40,000 inhabitants—

It is now 50,000.

—which is fast increasing—witness the increase of the population of the county of Gaspé, from 15,557 inhabitants, that it was, in 1871, to 20,685 in 1881. That does not include the population of the Magdalen Islands, which is 4,316 inhabitants. I think it will be interesting to know what are the principal productions of that county in 1881.

Now, I will not read all these figures. Suffice it to say that the county of Gaspé and the county of Bonaventure are two of the finest counties in the province of Quebec. The land is fertile, a large percentage of it being better, as I have told you in this House, or at least as good, as any in the eastern townships. Now, I would call the attention of the Government and the House to the facts contained in the statement of Mr. McArthur, who was superintendent of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway during the eighteen months that it was in operation. Mr. McArthur has had every opportunity to know the resources of the county of Bonaventure. His statement relates only to that county, but the main features are true also as applied to the county of Gaspé. The following is Mr. McArthur's report :—

Metapedia, Que., 17th Feb., 1896.

L. Z. Joncas, Esq., M.P.,
Ottawa.

Sir,—I have the honour to give you my views as late superintendent of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, as to why the Government should take over the Baie des Chaleurs Railway and operate it as part of the Intercolonial Railway.

The counties of Bonaventure and Gaspé are, as you are aware, in the absence of railway communication, almost completely isolated from the outside world, for six months in the year, during the close of navigation, consequently there is very little opportunity or facility for doing business.

During the eighteen months the Baie des Chaleurs Railway was in active operation, the business people and public at large found it a great convenience although the line only was in operation to Caplin, some 80 miles, yet unfortunately on account of the line not being extended to Paspebiac it did not pay operating expenses and on account of arrears and other accounts due up to 5th October last, the line was closed to the public and has been closed since.

The company having the road in hand being utterly unable to extend the line to Paspebiac or pay the arrears that have accumulated, if the Government could see their way clear to take control of the railway without delay and extend it to Paspebiac I am satisfied it would not only pay ordinary expenses but would be a source of considerable revenue as well, and I base my opinion on the following grounds :—

The railway runs through a fine agricultural, fishing and lumbering district. At Paspebiac there are two large and old-established fisheries, Charles Robin, Colas & Co., and De Bouthillier Bros. The combined businesses of these firms amounts to over one million dollars per annum, and the amount of freight they pay, the boat running between Dalhousie and Gaspé twice a week, amounts to, I am told, over $20,000 each season, and they have told me their business would more than double inside of two years had they railway communication the year round, and as seven-eighths of their business is now done by water I am satisfied a large portion of it would be done by rail. There has been, during the last year, no less than six shingle and saw-mills erected along the railway, each of those mills would turn out at least forty carloads per week. There is also a large potato industry carried on between Metapedia and Caplin during the season, and this would extend all the way to Gaspé if they had a conveyance for doing their business.

There were shipped last year from the Baie 150,000 railway ties, which represent about 500 cars, besides over 5,000,000 feet of lumber ; of course all the lumber and nearly all the ties went by water, whereas if they had railway facilities half of it would go by rail. There is a timber limit on the Bonaventure River of 400 square miles which has never been touched, and, to repeat the words of four American gentlemen, who explored it last spring with the view of investing, is capable of supplying or turning out fifteen carloads of lumber per day for the next fifty years. There are some other very extensive limits along the line which if developed would be a great source of revenue to the railway. Then take from Paspébiac to Gaspé. The fishing and lumber, as well as the agricultural industry, could no doubt be doubled within one year.

The passenger traffic would also be extensive as the Baie des Chaleurs would become a great summer resort on account of its splendid salmon fishing and seaside resort.

There is not a doubt in my mind (and I have interviewed nearly every business man in both counties) but with very reasonable outlay the Baie des Chaleurs Railway would become an immense source of revenue to the Intercolonial, besides putting the people of these two counties on equal footing as regards commercial facilities with the other portions of the Dominion. Yes, these counties have been, in my mind, very much neglected heretofore, and I really think now is an opportune time for the Government to step in and grant them railway communication.

I have the honour to be, dear Sir,

Yours truly,

(Sd.) D. S. McARTHUR,

Supt., B. C. R.

Mr. McArthur has not spoken here of another industry which promises to be successful, if the information I have received is correct. I refer to the coal oil industry. We have operating in the Gaspé Basin a company which has spent there over $300,000 in sinking wells, and they have good reason to believe that these wells will give a sufficient quantity of oil to insure for them a good business. Now, Mr. Speaker, before ending my remarks, I might bring before the House the petitions which have been sent to the Quebec government and to this Government, giving the history of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway and the history of all the subventions it has received, and giving also the reasons why this Government should take hold of this road and make it a branch of the Intercolonial route, but I think I have given enough reasons without that. It is not at all my intention to blame the Government for the actual state of affairs. The Government is not at all to blame if this railway is now closed, if it is not operated, and if the company is not now in a position to continue the work of construction. On the contrary, the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure are grateful to the Government for what they have done in helping to build this railway. This Government has granted even more than the ordinary subsidies to this company. But under the circumstances, I think we are justified in asking the Government to go a step further, and to force this company either to fulfil their obligations, or to give up this road, which has been built entirely with the money of the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. JONCAS.

If there is no law at present empowering the Government to take hold of this road, I humbly submit that such a law should be put upon the statute-books. I hope, Sir, that the Government will take such measures as will enable them to do for the population of the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure what they have done for the population of other parts of the Dominion.

Mr. McALISTER. I was particularly interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) on the subject of making Paspébiac a winter port, as I have a thorough knowledge of the district, and the difficulties that present themselves in the way of accomplishing this object. I must say that I entirely agree with the objections raised by the hon. member for Gaspé on the ground that the bay, for the greater part of the winter season at least, is filled with ice, and snow storms and high winds prevail in the eastern portion of the bay. I think, perhaps, another difficulty might present itself in the winter season in the way of steamers coming in between the coast of Newfoundland and Cape Breton. I think that bay is always filled with ice in the winter season, and that it would be impossible for steamers to get between those places during at least three or four months in a year. Apart from this objection, it seems to me that the port of Paspébiac is not at all adapted for being made a safe winter port, nor yet for being a very good summer port. So far as safety is concerned, there is not a port along the coast of Quebec, or New Brunswick, or in fact I may say in any part of the continent of America, equal to the port of Dalhousie. While the ice makes there, perhaps, a little earlier in the fall of the year than it does at Paspébiac, and there may be a difference of a week or two in the spring of the year, yet the port of Dalhousie is open to navigation for at least eight months in the year. I have known sailing vessels to go out of that port as late as the first week in January; although that is not the rule, yet such has been the case on several occasions. The port of Dalhousie is protected from wind so that vessels can lie at the wharf in any weather. The wind does not strike any part of the harbour, and vessels cannot only safely enter the harbour under any wind or weather, but can lie there in safety as well. In addition to this, Dalhousie is about 100 miles nearer Liverpool than Rimouski, which in the summer season would make quite a difference in time in transmitting mails and passengers. They can land several hours earlier in Dalhousie than they can at Rimouski, and therefore considerable time would be saved in transmitting mails to Quebec, Montreal and other places west. Dalhousie is, perhaps, little known to hon. gentlemen here, with few exceptions, but those who are acquainted with it, know that my description of it is perfectly correct in every particular. The bay is free from reefs and shoals, and anything like a fog is never known there. The steamer "Admiral" which plys twice a week between Dalhousie and Gaspé, is seldom prevented from making her regular trips, except, perhaps, once or twice in the fall of the year. If a scheme of this kind should be undertaken by the Government, I think Dalhousie would be the most feasible port, and the best adapted of any place along the coast for becoming a winter port. With regard to the Baie des Chaleurs, I have listened with considerable interest to the statement read by my hon. friend from a report of Mr. McArthy, superintendent of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. I must say that so far as I know, the statement is correct in every particular. The railway runs through the finest agricultural, lumber and fishing regions, perhaps, in that province. But owing to the fact of the farmers being shut out from access to markets in the winter season, at least, there is very little inducement for them to go extensively into farming. They have to haul their produce by teams in the winter season from 20 to 50 miles to the nearest place where they can reach a railway, or get to a market of any description; therefore there is little inducement for them to go into farming operations very extensively. In the fall of the year when their produce is gathered, the cold sets in, and they have no access by water to Dalhousie, or to Campbellton, or to Bathurst, or to any other market place. Lumbering operations have been carried on considerably along that coast for several years. This road, I may say, skirts an unbroken forest of the best lumber, and in the winter season those who are engaged in cutting shingles, railway sleepers, and telegraph poles, which are the principal articles got out there at the present time, have to keep them on hand until the opening of navigation, and consequently small operators engaged in that business, cannot afford to carry it on profitably. If the Government were to take over this railway, I think it could be made an important feeder to the Intercolonial Railway. It cannot only be made useful to the inhabitants in those sections, but it could be made a paying road. At present I think it only extends down about 80 miles from Metapedia, and along the coast through which it runs it does not touch any port, and is not accessible by water from any direction; whereas if it was extended to Paspébiac, it would be accessible by water, and a great part of the lumber, and the fish now shipped by schooners in other directions, would find its way over that road. I think it would be well for the Government to take this matter into their favourable consideration, and take that road over as a branch of the Intercolonial Railway. I am satisfied it will be found within a very short time to be one of the best paying lines in connection with the Intercolonial Railway.

Motion agreed to.

BUTTER EXPORTS.

Mr. DAVIN. As the tariff has now come down, I will not take up the time of the House with this motion, and so I will drop it:

That the Government should at once take into consideration the propriety of giving a bonus on butter exported to the London markets, as is done by some of the Australian colonies, and also of raising the customs duty from 4 cents per pound to 6 cents, in order to enable the Northwest farmers to compete with the Australian exporters in the British Columbia markets.

Motion dropped.

BREAKWATERS AND PIERS IN PRINCE COUNTY, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY moved for:

Statement showing the amount expended by the Dominion Government on each of the following breakwaters, piers and wharfs in Prince County, P.E.I., from 1880 up to date:—

1. Malpeque breakwater.
2. Cape Traverse breakwater.
3. McGee's wharf, Egmont Bay.
4. Higgins wharf.
5. Brea breakwater.
6. West Point wharf.
7. Mimiuegash breakwater.
8. Tignish breakwater.

The work let by tender, the amount of each contract, the names of contractors, work done by day's work, names of parties in charge, and name of inspector in each case.

He said: The total amount in the Estimates for this year is $6,000 for repairs to breakwaters, piers and wharfs in Prince Edward Island, which number thirty altogether. Admitting that one-third of that sum goes to Prince county, it will only amount to about $2,000 with which to keep the public works in repair. The first public work to which I refer is Malpeque breakwater. I will pass that over, as I see a small sum for its repair in the Estimates as a special grant. Then I come to Cape Traverse breakwater. That cape is a very important point in the province, it being just opposite Cape Tormentine, across the Straits of Northumberland. Cape Tormentine is in New Brunswick, and Cape Traverse in the Island. The Canadian Government has built a very costly pier at Cape Tormentine, which I am able to say, having seen it two or three times, is a very substantial work. But it is only for the accommodation of a private individual in New Brunswick. He is the gentleman who got a special grant from the Dominion Government as a subsidy for a railway to Cape Tormentine; and that hon. gentleman also got a Government grant of about half a million to build a pier at the Cape, but I am sorry to say that this pier is only used by that private individual—I am now alluding to Senator Wood. Senator Wood has built lumber mills along the line of the railway, which is supposed to be his own, although it was subsidized by the Dominion Government, and he carries lumber to Cape Tormentine in the summer season, from which point vessels take it to distant ports, the pier affording accommodation for loading and unloading. But at the crossing between Capes Tormentine and Traverse, the distance between which is only nine miles, there is no accommodation on the Island side. I crossed there last spring and was detained a couple of hours for the tide, and even when flood tide came there were only three or four feet of water. It is true the Government has spent a few dollars there, but not sufficient to give the accommodation required. When we remember that the winter crossing should be between the two capes, the wonder is that the Government have not thought proper to expend a few thousand dollars there, or even a hundred thousand dollars to provide accommodation on the Island side. Justice is not done to the people of the Island when we remember that the Government has spent $1,000,000 in New Brunswick, between the subsidy granted to the Wood Railway, as I call it, and the breakwater at Cape Tormentine; and yet on the Island side where there should be direct communication, and the breakwater and every facility for navigation provided, nothing is done. I cannot see for the life of me how the Government can think they are doing what is right. A few years ago the Minister of Public Works told me he had sent an engineer to Cape Traverse, and he showed me a report, but I could not understand it, and I do not think the Minister understood it himself. At all events, the Minister of Public Works never acted on this report, and never gave a dollar for the work. Now, take McGee's wharf, Egmont Bay. I suppose the Government spent $500 there, although I am not sure that they spent even that much. At Higgins's wharf they spent a very small amount of money also, although the improvement was very much needed. These two wharfs are most important works, and are a great necessity for the people there. But the Government do not seem inclined to do anything for Prince Edward Island. I believe they expended $500 for the Brea breakwater, to supplement a similar subscription made by the people themselves. But how was that $500 expended? It was given away to some private individual, likely a friend of the Government, who gets $2.50 a day for superintendence, and when you come to look at the whole transaction the cost of superintending amounts to nearly as much as the money put into the work. That is not the only place in Prince county where the same mismanagement is allowed to go on. Now, with regard to the West Point wharf. I call it the West Point wharf, but there is no wharf there to-day. Some fifteen or twenty years ago, the provincial government built a wharf there, costing $6,000 or $7,000, and when the federal government took over the public works from the province they paid $5,000 for it; but since then they have allowed it to go to pieces. There are a few pieces of timber left, and I suppose a few loads of the ballast, but that is all; there is no wharf. Both myself and my hon. colleague (Mr. Yeo) have called the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this, but always without effect. The Government do not understand that the people of West Point are labouring under heavy disadvantages. They do not understand that the people of West Point pay their full share towards the revenue of the country, and that they are entitled to a fair share of the expenditure. The Minister seems to be quite deaf to the reasonable demands of the people of West Point, and he has not spent one dollar there. Now, Sir, it is true that the Government spend a few thousand dollars on the Miminegash breakwater. Miminegash is a harbour of refuge, and three or four thousand dollars more expended on improvements would make it a good and safe harbour. The repairs done by the Government there a year or two ago have effected a great deal of good, and if they could only see their way clear to spend $3,000 or $4,000 more, it would complete the work. Now, as regards Tignish breakwater. I have frequently drawn the attention of the Minister of Public Works to that. Some time ago he told the House that he knew the Tignish breakwater was liable to be carried away any day, but, he said, he had no money. Well, Sir, I do not take much stock in that, because I know that the hon. gentleman has plenty of money at his command. If he has no money, how could he advertise the other day for tenders to expend $37,500 on the Souris breakwater. I have no doubt that work is already going on, and it is quite right and proper that it should be undertaken now, for this is the proper time of the year, when the roads are good for hauling timber, when the people are good for hauling timber, when the people are not busy at other occupations, and when timber can be purchased 50 per cent cheaper than it can in the months of July and August. But why does not the Minister do the same thing for Tignish as he does for Souris? Tignish is in just as bad a condition as the Souris breakwater, but Souris is represented in this House by gentlemen who support the Government, and Tignish is represented here by two gentlemen who cannot see politically in the same light. That is just the difference. If there is $37,500 at hand to repair the Souris breakwater, I cannot for the life of me see why there is not $10,000 for the Tignish breakwater. But the reason is as I have stated. The people of Tignish must be punished for not sending members to this House to support the Government. Well, Sir, that is using that portion of the province wrongfully. Why does not the hon. gentleman take a special vote of $5,000 or $6,000 to repair the Tignish breakwater? Why does he not render justice to the people of Tignish, and at once call for tenders and let the contract? The Government are acting not in the interests of the country at large. They are silent when a demand is made on them to do this necessary work. They say: Oh, any usage is good enough for the Tignish people: we will compel them to send a member here to support us. But, Sir, I believe that these gentlemen on the Treasury benches will not be in a way to be supported as a Government in many more months to come. It is unjust and unfair that people who pay their money in taxes for the general welfare of the country should be deprived of the same rights as others, just because they will not send Government supporters of this House. I say, Sir, that if this kind of thing is to be continued, it would be better for Prince Edward Island to go back to where it was previous to 1873, and rely upon its own resources. The people of Prince Edward Island are not indebted to the Government of Canada, for we pay $200,000 or $300,000 a year more to the exchequer of Canada than we get from it. It is shameful when you come to think of it. We have been here sometimes as long as seven or eight days without having a mail from Prince Edward Island. In the old days, sixty years ago, we were in no worse a position in that respect than we are now. The Government will not build a tunnel; they will not get a steamer and try the experiment of crossing from Cape Traverse to Cape Tormentine. A few days before an election, the Government may promise to do something, but who is going to believe them? No one will, because they are not true to their promises. It is only an expedient on their part; when the people of Prince Edward Island ask them for bread, the Government offer them a good lump of stone. The Minister of Public Works tells me he has no money at his command. Will he say he has no money at his command for the Souris breakwater? The vote for that is simply in the Estimates. He is not sure yet that those Estimates are going to pass. If he has let a contract for $27,000, how is he going to pay it if he has no money? If he does not get the vote, what is he going to do? I contend that so far as that is concerned, the Minister of Public Works stands in a very unenviable position. He says he has no money at his command for the Tignish breakwater. Why, Sir, it is wonderful what has become of all the money of Canada. Is it all sunk in the Tay Canal, that Haggart's Ditch? Is it all sunk in the Curran Bridge, or in the harbour works at Quebec, or at Three Rivers, or in the Kaministiquia, or somewhere else? We do not know where it has gone to. I know that $300,000 or $400,000 has gone to build a bridge at Fredericton. When the people of Tignish want a vote of $4,000 or $5,000 to repair the breakwater there, to give accommodation to the fishermen, there is no money. Those fishermen are a class of people of more benefit to this country than the Cabinet Ministers themselves, because they are a hard-working people. I was looking over the Auditor General's Report the other day, and I could not find where a poor fisherman of Tignish had charged $300 or $400 for cab-hire. I could not find where those poor people had an opportunity of making a trip in a special car at the expense of the country. I could not find where they got a twelve or one o'clock lunch at the expense of the public. I could not find where there was $4,000 or $5,000 spent by those poor fishermen for newspapers. I could not find any of these things, but the Cabinet Ministers have all these things, although they get a very fine salary of $7,000 or $8,000 a year. Will the hon. Minister of Public Works tell me that this is proper treatment as between the Tignish fishermen and the Cabinet Ministers? I am not going to say what I said the other day with respect to the urgent necessity of repairing that breakwater. I have stated it so often that I am getting sick and tired of it. But let not the Minister of Public Works stand up here and give the people the excuse that he has no money at his command to repair that breakwater. If he has no money, what is he there for? He should make room for some one else who will show more of the spirit of justice and fair-play towards the people of Tignish, and who will administer the affairs of this country more satisfactorily to the people than he is doing. If the hon. Minister tells me that he is not going to have anything done to the Tignish breakwater because the people there are not Conservatives, then I will believe him, for he is actually doing that, and I suppose he will take the same position to the very end. But when he tells me that he has no money, that he cannot raise $4,000 or $5,000 to repair a work so important as the Tignish breakwater, I do not believe a word of it. It is impossible to reconcile myself to swallowing such a statement. If I were to believe that, how comes it that he can spend $37,500 on the Souris breakwater? He will, perhaps, tell me that is a work of great importance. I do not doubt it; I know that it is. I have seen the Souris breakwater; I presume my hon. friend never did. I am very glad to find that the people of Souris are going to be dealt with generously and equitably. But, Sir, I ask the same usage for the people of Tignish. I presume the Minister will say to me: You have no right to get it, you do not support the Government, or help them in any way. Well, Sir, I do not help them with a vote, but I watch them very closely, and in doing that I think I am serving the people of this country; but it is hard work. Now, I am not going to tell the Minister of Public Works, who is responsible for the present condition of that breakwater, what he ought to do. He ought to know himself that he is not doing right by the people of Tignish. He ought to come to his senses and repair that breakwater without delay. He ought to know that more than that should be done for the people of Tignish. A branch railway should be built to that port, which is an important place of shipping. We have six local schooners there carrying on a traffic with Miramichi, Shediac and Charlottetown and other ports. The warfage tolls of Tignish harbour are within a few dollars of being as much as the tolls collected on the Haggart Ditch, where the Government have spent three-quarters of a million dollars. There they had to spend three-quarters of a million dollars, but at Tignish they cannot afford to spend four or five thousand dollars. Why, if they even had used only the money which they have been collecting at that harbour, from year to year, to put in a few planks and save the breakwater and improve it, that would have been so much. But they are so grasping that, once they get hold of a few dollars collected at Tignish breakwater, it is hard for the people to get it back. If the hon. Minister does nothing, and, from present appearances, he is not likely to do anything, the people of Tignish will have to suffer, I suppose, until July next, when these gentlemen will be walked out of their easy chairs to make room for better and abler statesmen.

Mr. YEO. The attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) has been brought so often to the wants of public works in Prince county, that I am really surprised he has not given some little attention to our demands. With the exception of two works there, I think, nothing at all has been done. These works were necessary, and the money was properly expended, although, I think, it would have been more satisfactory if, instead of spending the money by day's work, a public contract had been given. However, I am very glad the money was expended and these works attended to, so far as they have been. Every hon. member knows that a very expensive breakwater has been constructed at Cape Tormentine, N.B., and that this breakwater is useless for the want of a similar work on the Prince Edward Island side. There is a pier at Cape Traverse, but it is sanded up, and the hon. Minister has allowed two years to pass without doing anything—without either dredging out and deepening the water at that pier, or taking steps to construct another. The people have petitioned time and again, engineers have been sent down and reports made; but, notwithstanding all this, nothing has been done. During the present winter, if a wharf or pier had been built at Cape Traverse, the winter boat could ply the whole winter between Cape Tormentine, N.B., and Cape Traverse, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY.

I am surprised the hon. Minister has not given this matter his serious consideration. Not only Prince county, but the whole island, is interested in this work, and it is a shame it has not been attended to. If the pier at Cape Traverse cannot be made available, people are anxious that a pier should be constructed at Carleton Point, some little distance from the terminus of the railway. A petition was sent to the Government, asking that a wharf be constructed at Gordon Point, north of Cape Traverse. And again, at Summerside, one of the most important harbours in the province, petitions have been sent, asking that breakwaters be erected on either side of that harbour, so as to narrow the channel and prevent ice accumulating. The construction of this work would very much help the trade of the Island, by enabling the winter boat to run to the port of Summerside. The lolly forms there in the winter, and it is almost impossible for a steamer to get there, but, if the breakwater were constructed, this difficulty would be done away with. I hope the hon. Minister will bring down an estimate for the building of these works. I might, in addition to the works which have been named by my hon. colleague, mention some others. There is a breakwater petitioned for at Fifteen Point, and another at Cape Egmont, very necessary works. I understand that an engineer has been visiting these places this winter to see whether he could make a favourable report for these breakwaters. I do not know whether this is intended to help along the elections. It is a common occurrence in the Island, to find that just on the eve of the elections, engineers are sent down to lead the people to believe that public works are to be undertaken. I hope this practice will not be resorted to in the coming election. I have, on former occasions, spoken of the necessity for the wharf at Higgins's shore to be dredged. It is useless as it is at present, and a very small amount spent in dredging would make it a very serviceable work. The hon. Minister promised, on other occasions, that he would do something towards constructing a pier at West Point. If I remember rightly, he said he would first complete the work at the Brae and then attend to the one at West Point. But I regret to say, that the Brae has not been completed, and nothing has been done at West Point. I do not know how the Government can justify their conduct in allowing these public works to become deteriorated as they have been. My hon. friend has alluded to Tignish breakwater. This is really an important work, which ought to be attended to without loss of time. It is a harbour in which the whole west end of Prince county is interested. A large business is done here; it is a great resort for boats and schooners; and, if this work be destroyed, a very serious loss will be entailed on the people. The people of Prince county think they are dealt very hardly with when they see the immense amounts squandered on public works elsewhere, which are of no use, and are told that there is no money to spend on the most important works in their county. I suppose another opportunity will be given for the discussion of these matters. but I hope, in the meantime, the hon. Minister of Public Works will think of his promise and bring down an estimate to go on with some of these public works.

Mr. OUIMET. I was very much gratified to hear the junior member for Prince county (Mr. Yeo) admit that we had done something for his county. The senior member (Mr. Perry) cannot see that we have done anything except for the very corrupt purpose of unduly influencing his electors, and he seems to dread that anything we may do there will have the effect of causing him to be left at home at the next general election. I think he is more in dread of what we are doing than of what we are not, and that the best news he could bring back to his constituency was, that we were squandering money everywhere else, and not spending anything in his county. He would be very sorry if we were to spend any in his county, because it would show the people that, although they are represented by the hon. gentleman, the Government is taking care that they obtain their due share in the expenditure of public money, and that no injustice is done them. I have in my hand a statement, showing that, during the time the hon. gentleman has mentioned, $64,000 were expended on those different piers mentioned by him in his motion, which after all are works of no general but only of local importance.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Have you at hand a memorandum showing what was expended in Bothwell?

Mr. OUIMET. The people there have such great advantage in being represented by the hon. gentleman that mere material considerations would affect them. I know a great many counties in which no large sums of public money are spent. I would cite my own, for instance.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You have the penitentiary there.

Mr. OUIMET. But that is for the shelter of good people coming from all other parts of the country. If it is a blessing, it is a blessing in disguise. I have been accused even of arranging to have the convicts vote.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did you get them on the list?

Mr. OUIMET. I am sure the hon. gentleman would be much surprised if they were not. But, seriously, Mr. Speaker, you will understand that we cannot spend the same amount of money upon every public work in the Dominion. And when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Perry) compares Tignish to Souris, he must know very well that he is not stating the case as it should be, as regards the two places. The Souris break-water is the protection for the very important public works that have been built there in order to protect the harbour, which is the most important in the whole of Prince Edward Island. These are very important works, and public money must be expended for their protection. Surely the hon. gentleman will not compare Souris in importance with Higgins's wharf, or Malpeque or Miminegash. I suppose in his own mind these latter places are much more important than Souris, because his friends are living there. But I think he should measure the importance of places in some other way than by what immediately concerns himself. The papers called for will be brought down. The House must have noticed a certain announcement that has been made by the hon. gentleman that perhaps the Department of the Public Work is undertaking work for which we shall not get the supplies this session. This is a very important announcement, and, though coming not from the biggest gun on the other side, I suppose it must be taken as the common report amongst the party of gentleman opposite, and that their plan is to obstruct or to drag the business along so as to prevent the supplies being passed. Well, if hon. gentlemen opposite have decided to prevent the supplies going through, as suggested by the hon. gentleman, the responsibility will rest upon them. At all events the contract has been given for the Souris break-water, and the work shall go on with what money was voted last year.

Mr. PERRY. Only $10,000 was voted last year.

Mr. OUIMET. I have no hesitation in saying that if I am not Minister of Public Works after next general election, the hon. gentleman will no doubt see that his friends shall meet the obligation which the department has contracted. But perhaps he would not be so fortunate if his friends come into power; for then he would have to keep his long tale of woe to himself, be satisfied with very little, and do what he could to explain to them that the Government he supports has done its best, and hold out hopes for better in the future. It is not fair for hon. members representing the Liberal counties to speak as the hon. gentleman has done, when I can assert positively that his county has been treated most fairly and has had its full share—

Mr. PERRY. No, no.

Mr. OUIMET—and much more than many counties that are much better represented, at least politically speaking from my point of view, than his county is. His tale of woe should end at last, for the people in his district must be very simple-minded if they take any stock in all the stories that he spends his session in circulating as regards the alleged injustice from which they are suffering.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think the hon. Minister of Public Works has dealt at all fairly with my hon. friend from Prince county (Mr. Perry). It may not be very pleasant for him to hear—

Mr. OUIMET. It was pleasant for a long while, but there should be an end some-time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It may not be very pleasant for the hon. Minister to hear my hon. friend representing the grievances of a very serious character which have existed for a long time without a remedy. My hon. friend from Prince is simply discharging his duty towards those who sent him here, when he brings before the hon. gentleman publicly session after session the fact that important public works are neglected to an extent which is seriously injurious to the public interest. The works to which the hon. gentleman has called special attention are works not of interprovincial character, it is true, but simply of a local character, still none the less of very great importance. Concerning one or two of them I can speak from personal knowledge. The hon. Minister must know that Tignish breakwater, to which my hon. friend has made special reference, is a very important work and one that to some extent justifies the name of a harbour of refuge. Nobody wishes to say a word against the great importance of the Souris breakwater, which makes a harbour of refuge for the fishing fleet. I do not say a word against the expenditure of money upon that breakwater, nor do I say that what has been spent has been unnecessarily spent. The Government are simply doing their duty in keeping that great public work in proper repair. It is the greatest public work of a marine character in Prince Edward Island. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not responsible for the construction of it. It was built under the direction of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie as Minister of Public Works, and it makes the greatest harbour of refuge in the maritime provinces. I myself have seen as many as 80 American and Nova Scotia schooners under the protection of that breakwater during a great storm. Many of those schooners could not have lived but for the protection of that breakwater. Every dollar spent upon that work is well spent. But that is apart from the question here. However necessary it may be to spend money upon Souris, it is also necessary that public works in other parts of the island should receive attention; and I think my hon. friend from Prince is strictly within his right in pressing for attention to these works. Take the case of Miminegash, where some little improvements were made about two years ago. I had the pleasure of visiting that place and spent part of the day upon the pier, and I can bear testimony to the fact that the improvements made have been of very great advantage. But they should be continued, because outside of the harbour there is a ridge of sand forming, and it is necessary to carry the jaws of the harbour a little further out than at present in order to give vessels an opportunity to get in and out. My hon. friend has called special attention to the local character of these works, or the character of these local works; and I want to call attention more especially to the Cape Traverse breakwater, which is a work of an interprovincial character. It is very unfair to speak of so much money having been spent in a county, and to say that the county has got its fair share because it got so much. A county may have works of an interprovincial character, the expenditure for which is not properly chargeable to that county at all. Take this very work, the Cape Traverse breakwater. There you are spending money to build a work not pertaining to the county of Prince alone, but to carry out the terms of union and to give communication between the mainland and Prince Edward Island. That is what the Cape Traverse breakwater was built for, and it was built in such a slipshod way, in such a small way, that it has never fulfilled the purpose it was intended for. It might just as well not have been built at all; it is absolutely no good the way it is now. If a proper breakwater was built, it would involve the expenditure of a large amount of money. This breakwater, as it is now, is of little practical importance, if any; and if the hon. gentleman intends to do that work properly, he has got to bring down a large sum, as he knows, in the Estimates, in order to do it. But I desire on this occasion to call the attention, perhaps not of himself—for it is not properly in his department—but of the gentlemen who sit alongside him, about the importance of that intercommunication, and to the fact that this winter it has been worse than for many winters back. The "Stanley" has been carrying the mails very, very, irregularly. I throw no blame upon the Government, and no blame upon the officers. They could not overcome the physical difficulties which exist on account of ice and the weather. But allowing that everything was done that ought to have been done with respect to the "Stanley," there still remains the alternative route by which in former days we were enabled to have our mails carried very nearly every day. For some inscrutable reason the service has been bungled this year, especially the mail service never was so badly performed as it has been during the past five or six weeks. The mails have been carried only once or twice a week.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman that he is wandering from the question.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, Mr. Speaker, I want to call your attention to the fact that in the motion reference is made explicitly to the Cape Traverse breakwater; a breakwater built for the sole purpose of enabling this communication to be carried on; and I was going to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that if the service is done as badly as it has been, it is in some measure, though not altogether, due to the want of an executive head there. The clashing between the Post Office Department and the Marine Department, and the absence of some responsible head who can direct the mails to be carried over by the Cape route, who can see that the Cape route is always in order to carry it out, is the one main cause of our difficulties down there. I myself had hoped that at this session we would have had an appropriation to test the feasibility of carrying the mails across there in a small but strong steam launch. I have never myself had the data on which to form a proper opinion as to whether the mails can be carried by steamer there in the winter. My impressions have been against it; but I have heard so many practical men say that at least it might be tested, that I have yielded my judgment to theirs unreservedly; and I think it is fair that that route should be tested, not by putting on the "Stanley" there, as some advocate, which I think would be a suicidal and a dangerous policy, but by building a strong and not very expensive steam launch, which could be used to test the question, first of all, whether the ice can be kept open during the winter months. A boat necessary for such a purpose need not be a very expensive one. An extremely strong steam launch would do for the purpose of making the test, and until the test is made, I do not think myself that the Government would be justified in expending an enormous sum of money to build a proper breakwater there. I think that such a launch as I have heard described, could be put there and could test the question, without the necessity of having an actual breakwater built first. I had hoped, therefore, that the Government would not let this season pass without hiring, if they could not purchase, such a boat, and putting her in the hands of an efficient man, a local man, who understands the tides and the currents, and who would take the responsibility of running her there during the winter. It may be necessary that a special launch would have to be built for the purpose, with a screw down very deep—I am not a sufficiently practical man to know that. But I have had it impressed upon me so often by the local men that the scheme of running a boat there in the winter is possible, that I think in justice to them, and in justice to the important public interests which are at stake, the Government should have the test made this winter; and I am the more confirmed in that belief when I see that the existing arrangements do not enable us to have a tolerable mail service in Prince Edward Island at all; and that I think is owing very largely to the cause which I have mentioned.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE AT LINKLETTER ROAD.

Mr. YEO moved for:

Copies of petitions, letters, telegrams and all other correspondence with the Postmaster General or his department respecting the establishment of a post office at Linkletter Road, Prince county, P.E.I.

He said: In making this motion I desire to say a few words to show why I want these papers brought down. During the last session of this House a petition was sent to the Postmaster General's Department asking for the establishment of a post office at Linkletter Road. The petition was sent to the post office inspector of Prince Edward Island for his report, and some time afterwards I met the Postmaster General here, and he told me that the inspector's report had been returned, and that he recommended the establishment of a post office. He said: I have ordered the post office to be established, the only thing that is wanted now to complete it is the name of the postmaster, and I have written to get one named. Of course after this statement of the Postmaster General, I considered that the post office was almost as good as established, having his word that he had arranged the matter. I may say also that the same evening I saw his deputy, and he told me that the Postmaster General had instructed him to open the office as soon as a postmaster was appointed. However, before leaving Ottawa, I thought it well perhaps to remind the Postmaster General of his promise; and I wrote him, and received a reply from him which, with your permission, I will read:

Ottawa, 17th July, 1895.

My dear Mr. Yeo:

I cannot understand how it is you have not yet received my letter. I wrote it the day after I had spoken to you, saying that I had given instructions to establish the post office that you asked for, and I have no doubt you have received it before this.

Yours truly,
ADOLPHE CARON.

Of course, after this I made up my mind that the thing was settled, and I told the people who lived in this locality that the post office had been granted, and would no doubt be established in a very short time. I may say that there can be no question as to the necessity of a post office there. These people have been put to very great inconvenience for a long time, for the want of this office. Well, time passed on. This letter was dated in July. I waited until the end of August, and hearing nothing about the post office, I took the liberty of writing the Postmaster General on the subject again, and I received a reply from him which I will also read :

Ottawa, 4th September, 1895.

My dear Sir :

With reference to your letter of 31st ultimo on the subject of an application for a new post office at Linkletter Road, township 17, in the county of Prince, I beg to say that I have given the subject of this application my attention, and that should the inquiries which require to be made prove satisfactory, I shall take the necessary steps in the matter.

Yours faithfully,

ADOLPHE CARON.

Of course, I was astonished at receiving this letter, because, as I have said, I thought the matter was settled, and there could be no doubt about the office being established. I had the verbal promise of the Minister, and also the written promise. In matters of very much more importance I would have no hesitation in taking the Minister's word, because we suppose a Minister of the Crown, by virtue of his high position, has every regard for his word, and, of course, I believed his promise in regard to a small matter such as this. I then wrote to the Postmaster General again and quoted to him the substance of the letter which he had written in July, and I received another reply, which I will also read. It is as follows :—

Ottawa, 3rd October, 1895.

My dear Mr. Yeo :

I have your letter of the 28th ult. upon the subject of the establishment of a post office at Linkletter Road, Township 17, county of Prince.

In reply I beg to say that a difficulty has arisen in the matter of the postmastership, which has occasioned some delay.

Yours faithfully,

ADOLPHE CARON.

I did not see that very much difficulty could occur about the appointment of a postmaster. I know that none of the people there are anxious to obtain the appointment, but more than one will take the post office for the convenience of neighbours and himself. From inquiries made, I have not heard of any one having been asked to take the post office. After receiving this letter, and finding delay in the appointment of the postmaster, I came to the conclusion that it involved only a delay until the promise of the Postmaster General would be carried out. Shortly after I came here, I asked a question in regard to this matter, and the reply I got was that, after inquiries made, the Postmaster General had decided that a post office was not needed at that place. I am very anxious to have the papers brought down, because I wish to know to whom the Postmaster General wrote in Prince Edward Island to name a postmaster, and to see whether any reasonable excuse can be given for not opening the post office promised. This is a matter which the House may think is not of very much importance, but it is of importance to the few people concerned. I have brought the case forward mainly for the purpose of showing it as a sample of how the public departments are conducted in Prince Edward Island. No doubt, it is in accordance with the wishes of some parties that this post office should not be established, although it would not do any injury to any one, and it is a small matter that this action should be taken to gratify a political friend, for that is the only reason I can guess as to why the post office has not been opened. I am very sorry the Postmaster General is not in his place, because, in my opinion, he must have been misinformed in regard to the facts of the case. I cannot for a moment conceive that, after making inquiries through his officers, and having received a favourable report, having, moreover, given his word that the office would be opened, and having written me that it would be opened, and having so instructed his deputy, he would have refused to open the office, except on a misconception of the facts.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have no objection whatever to the papers being brought down. I am sorry I was not in the House when the hon. gentleman made the remarks which fell from his lips in relation to the promise the hon. gentleman stated I made. I am quite certain of one thing, that whatever promise was made to the hon. gentleman, it was subject to the report of the inspector, for I could not carry out anything without having a report sent to me. However, I will look up the matter and see what the papers in the department indicate, and then I will be glad to bring them down.

Mr. PERRY. I think that is very unsatisfactory. The Postmaster General wrote over his own signature, on 17th July, to my colleague, that he had made all the necessary inquiries, and had ordered the post office to be opened. There is the letter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr. PERRY. It is as follows :—

Ottawa, 17th, 1895.

My dear Mr. Yeo :

I cannot understand how it is you have not yet received my letter. I wrote to-day after I spoke to you, saying I had given instructions to establish the post office you ask for.

It is signed "Adolphe Caron." Is there any qualification in that; can the Postmaster General wiggle out of it? It is signed in large letters, and I know the signature well. The hon. gentleman also wrote to Mr. Yeo some time in September, or, at all events, last fall, stating that he was making inquiry about the post office. The hon. gentleman does not appear to have had that information when he penned the previous letter. Would the hon. gentleman dare to order a post office to be opened if he did not know it was wanted? This letter flatly contradicts the other one. In January, he says: "I find now the post office is not wanted." His previous objection was, that he had not got a postmaster. There are no Tories there, otherwise everyone would have wanted the place. But I know the reason which influenced the Postmaster General. There is an individual living in Summerside who has been writing to the hon. gentleman in regard to the matter. He is the future candidate. He, no doubt, advised the Postmaster General to keep back the appointment, as it might be the means of getting him some votes, and at the same time the people would blame my colleague (Mr. Yeo). I stake my reputation, that, when these papers are brought down, if they ever are brought down, and I have my doubts about it, that I will be able to prove that the Postmaster General has been tampered with. He need not tell me that he is not aware that the post office is required. If he is not aware of that fact, he is not competent to hold the position he now occupies. It must be remembered that the hon. gentleman promised verbally and by letter over his own signature, that the post office would be opened. Was not that sufficient to lead us to conclude that his action was taken in good faith, and that the people actually wanted the post office? The hon. gentleman cannot contradict his letters, because we have them. We will find, when the papers are brought down, exactly how the matter stands.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I regret that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Perry) should attribute to me such base motives, as that I should have acted for the purpose of injuring his hon. confrere (Mr. Yeo). Moreover, I am sorry that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Perry) should lead, or try to lead, the House to believe that I have been tampered with, as he called it in a not very parliamentary style. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Perry) has explained better than I could, the whole reason why the post office has not been opened. I was requested by the hon. member to open the post office, and I wrote the letter which has been read to the House. In that letter, I stated that I had given instructions to have the post office opened; that is, as I have already stated, always subject to the report which I receive from the inspector's office. The hon. gentleman states, subsequently, that I was informed that a postmaster could not be found. Well, that would be an excellent reason why the post office should not be opened, as it is not supposed that an office should be opened if there is no postmaster to look after it. The hon. gentleman gives another very good reason; he says that subsequent inquiry has demonstrated that the necessity for the post office did not exist. Consequently, I wrote the letter to the hon. gentleman telling him that I could not open the post office.

Mr. PERRY. Will you open it now?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No. I am not going to open it now.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence, papers and documents relating to the sale or chartering of the steamer "Alert."—(Mr. Langelier.)

Return showing the number of vessels that passed through the Chambly Canal, in each of the years 1892, 1893, 1894 and 1895; the said return to show, separately, the number of vessels loaded with coal and those loaded with wood, as well as those bound upwards and those bound downwards.—(Mr. Langelier.)

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ONTARIO PEAT, FUEL AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BOYLE moved second reading of Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Ontario Peat Fuel and Railway Company.

Mr. EDGAR. I would ask the hon. gentleman to give an idea concerning the scope of the Bill, because the name implies a certain amount of novelty.

Mr. BOYLE. I have very little acquaintance with the Bill. The petition was sent to me, and I had not an opportunity of reading the Bill until this afternoon, but I think it is perfectly safe to send it to the committee, where it can be thoroughly discussed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

TORONTO, HAMILTON AND BUFFALO RAILWAY.

Mr. McKAY moved second reading of Bill (No. 70) respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.

Mr. EDGAR. This company was incorporated only last session. The Bill cannot be for an extension of the time, and it must be for some special object; perhaps the hon. gentleman would tell us.

Mr. McKAY. This Bill is to make the Bill of last year more practicable. There has been found some difficulty in making a settlement with the creditors, and it is necessary that a Bill of this kind should be passed this session to facilitate the settlement, and to make it more expeditious than under the Bill of last year.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 65) to incorporate the Manitoba and Nelson Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 71) to provide for the amalgamation of the Bay of Quinté Railway and Navigation Company and the Kingston, Napanee and Western Railway Company, under the name of the Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—(Mr. Northrup.)

RAILWAY RETURN FARE TICKETS.

Mr. McLENNAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 6) respecting the sale of railway return fare tickets. He said: It is not necessary for me to say very much about this Bill. It explains itself. Its object is to provide that where there are first-class and second-class tickets sold, the railways shall issue second-class return tickets at the same proportionate reduction at which they issue first-class return tickets. At many stations the railways issue first-class return tickets and refuse to issue second-class return tickets. I claim that this is discriminating against a class of people who perhaps can least afford to pay the high rate. For instance, a man going from Ottawa to Montreal is refused the privilege of a second-class return ticket, and has to pay single fare both going and returning; so that his journey in a second-class car costs him nearly as much as it costs a man to travel on a first-class return ticket in a first-class car. We all know that it is more expensive to construct a first-class car, and it has more comforts and better accommodation than are provided for the poor man in the second-class car. This Bill does not require the railways to furnish second-class return tickets, or even second-class single tickets, where second-class accommodation is not provided already. Some of the railways in the country issue second-class return tickets and some others do not. The Bill does not place any railway company under any extra expense or inconvenience, or ask them to furnish any accommodation which they do not provide at the present time. It only asks them to extend the same justice to the poorer classes which they are extending to the people who can best afford to pay. If their rates are not sufficient now to enable them to do that, let them increase their rates to the more wealthy classes. I think every man in this House will agree with me that this measure will be very satisfactory and in the interests of his constituents. As every member of the House understands the nature and object of the Bill as well as I can explain it, I do not think it is necessary for me to offer any further explanation of it. However, I trust that the hon. members of this House will take this matter into their consideration, and will be willing to deal properly with a class of people who can ill afford to pay a proportionally higher rate for the accommodation they receive in travelling than, in all fairness, should be exacted from them. There was a discussion in this House last year on the question of the granting of passes to members of Parliament, and some of the leading members of the House proposed as a remedy that the railway companies should be compelled to give passes to all members of Parliament and Senators. I think the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) made the suggestion, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as well as many other members of this House, endorsed it. Well, if those hon. gentlemen believe that it is not interfering with private rights to force the railway companies to give them passes, without charging anything at all for them, it will certainly not be interfering with private rights to extend to the poorer classes of people of this country the justice I propose in this Bill.

Mr. McKAY.

Mr. HAGGART. As the Bill proposes to interfere considerably with the railways, I think perhaps it had better be referred to the Railway Committee for their consideration. If a railway company adopt excursion rates, say from Ottawa to Montreal, and sell all excursion tickets as first-class tickets, I do not see any reason why they should be obliged at the same time to furnish second-class tickets and sell them at a correspondingly reduced rate. At present, I think it is an unnecessary obligation to impose upon the railway companies. However, the matter may be fully considered before the Railway Committee; and the different railway companies in the country will have notice of the Bill, and have an opportunity to advance reasons there, if there are any, against the passage of the Bill. I have no objection to the second reading of the Bill, provided it is afterwards referred to the Railway Committee.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). As I understand it, my hon. friend's Bill does not go that far. It only provides that, where the railway company sell first-class tickets and at the same time run a second-class car, they shall be bound to sell second-class tickets at a proportionate rate. I do not understand that they are bound to run a second-class car with first-class excursions or on any other occasion. I understand that it is only when they run second-class cars that they are to be obliged to sell second-class return tickets.

Mr. HAGGART. The Bill applies to excursion rates. The companies often have to have second-class cars attached to excursion trains, and the Bill might cause considerable inconvenience.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

THE INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. MULOCK moved second reading of Bill (No. 9) further to secure the independence of Parliament. He said: The object of this Bill, as the title states, is to better secure the independence of Parliament. There has been a constant endeavour in Canada as in other countries where constitutional government is aimed at, to free members of Parliament as much as possible from any influences that might warp their judgment or interfere with them in independently representing public opinion. We are all familiar with the struggles in Canada to perfect our system of representation, so that the will of the people should manifest itself on the floor of Parliament. The theory of our elective system is that certain views range the electorate into certain camps; and the preponderance of those views is supposed to find expression in Parliament as the result of the contests at the polls. If that theory is sound, I am sure that we ought to guard our system of representation in every way, so that the aim in view will not be defeated by anything that may arise after the election takes place. We have adopted from time to time stringent laws to protect the purity of elections. We have enacted that it shall be illegal to buy votes or to influence in any way improperly the minds of electors. We seek at all times to secure the independence of the electors, so that when casting their ballots they may do so uninfluenced except by their political views. We have imposed serious fines and penalties upon any who seek to interfere with the aim of this legislation by resorting to any methods forbidden by the law. If we have been careful and astute to prevent the corruption of individuals, much more should we guard the representation of the ridings after they have given their decision at the polls. It is a painful thing for a member of Parliament to be compelled to admit that the efforts of those who have been framing our laws have been defeated to a very considerable extent. If it is an offence against the spirit of our election laws to corrupt an individual elector, much more is it an offence, I submit, to seek in any way to affect the judgment of a member of the House by holding out to him inducements of personal gain. When a riding sends a man to Parliament, trusting him to represent it according to his best judgment, while he may not know in advance all the questions on which he is expected to express an opinion, and may not have a mandate from the people as to how he shall vote on particular questions, and while to that extent he may be free to exercise his best judgment as questions arise, still there are some questions which were under discussion at the time the election took place, on which each member pledges himself, and on which he is bound to redeem his pledge. But, Sir, whether on the floor of Parliament he violates a pledge by voting against his express promise to the electors, or whether when new issues arise after the election, his judgment is not free, and it becomes the judgment of others, in either case there has been a failure in the system of representation, because the electors have been compelled to speak by a voice which is not theirs. This is a two-fold wrong: it is not only a disfranchisement of the riding, but it makes the riding speak in a false voice, giving utterances to sentiments which are not the sentiments of the riding. Now, Sir, it is to me a painful thing to have witnessed, ever since I have been a member of Parliament, that which strikes at the very root of our system of representation. I have seen members—I do not know that any of these are at present in the House—but I have seen gentlemen occupying seats in this House, who, everybody knew, had the promises of positions of emolument made to them, who continued to sit long after these promises were made, long after they had ceased to be independent, and who were compelled to vote as mere echoes of the Government, or else forfeit those positions of emolument which they had supposed they had secured. Without naming any of these, I can remind hon. gentlemen of more than one such case in the lifetime of the present Parliament. I think I am within the facts when I say that one of these gentlemen sat at least for three sessions in this Parliament after he had secured the pledge of appointment to an office of emolument under the Crown, which pledge was only recently redeemed, when he vacated his seat and accepted the office. It was notorious that he had the office promised to him, and had therefore ceased to be an independent representative of the constituency which had elected him, and whose views he was bound to represent. But he remained here, hampered as effectually as if he had delivered a proxy of the riding into the hands of the Government, who continued to hold their grip upon the appointment that he was promised. There have been many such instances. I have been told by those who have gone through the records since the election of this Parliament in 1891, that no less than seventeen members elected by the people left their places in this Parliament to enter positions of emolument in the gift of the Crown. Not less than seventeen members chosen by the people were taken from their places in Parliament and put into positions of emolument. In many of these cases these gentlemen continued to sit here, pretending to represent their constituencies, after they had ceased to be free men, after they had ceased to be in the position of discharging their duty to their constituents, and which duty was the paramount obligation imposed upon them. And I am further told—and this is an additional painful statement for me to have to make—that there are, at this moment, sitting in this House, a large number of the supporters of the Administration who have understandings with the Government, who have had promises made to them by the Government, that in the near future they would not be called upon to go back to their constituents to render an account of their stewardship, but will be placed in situations of emolument in the gift of the Crown. The number in that position, I am told by a gentleman who has made a thorough examination, is not less than twenty-five. You remember, a few weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, that an hon. gentleman was taken directly out of this House and transferred for life to the Senate chamber. You remember the First Minister, a year ago, intimating that all the senatorships which were then vacant—I think eleven in number—had been promised. It is true, he did not say that they had been promised to members of this House, but they had been promised to some members, and some members walked out of this House into the Senate. And the very fact that an office in the Senate can be dangled before members of this House who, perhaps, prefer the secure life appointment in the other chamber to the precarious chances of retaining their hold in this chamber, has a grave influence upon those who would prefer that position. And, Sir, if the Government of the day can dangle public offices before their followers and induce a few, and perhaps an increasing number, to aspire to these positions instead of representing their constituents here, and exercising an unbiassed judgment and a wholesome influence upon the Administration of the day, they become mere parasites upon the Administration, and cease to voice the opinions of their constituents. Not only do they do that, Sir, but, moving about among their colleagues, they become, as it were, corrupting agencies amongst their own ranks. And so a small percentage of persons in that position are likely to impair the independence of the whole body. So it has become now, in my opinion, a crying abuse, and Parliament is cast down from its high position. And not only is the will of the people being interfered with, not only is Parliament being subordinated to the Administration, but there is even a worse evil growing out of this abuse. All through the country the electorate, noticing these things, are coming to the conclusion that the highest aim a man can have in seeking public life is, that he may, through Parliament, find his way into a comfortable position for life. If that becomes the highest aim of those who seek public life, then, public life becomes a means, not of advantage to the public, but of private gain. And thus we shall have coming into public life office-seekers, place-hunters, instead of those ready to make sacrifices for the love of their country, and ready to undertake the labours of public life for the good they can do in the interests of the people. So that, whether we view this evil with regard to its influence on the existing House, or with regard to its demoralizing influence upon public opinion, in either case, I submit, it is of such a pernicious character as to demand the earliest interference on the part of this Parliament. Viewing the situation, as I do, as one of great gravity, and desiring that Parliament should retain the respect of the people and should re-assert itself and become the mouth-piece of the people, the medium through which the will of the people shall find expression upon the statute-book, I feel that I am fully justified in inviting the attention of Parliament to the proposed remedy contained in my Bill. I would deem it an injustice, I admit, if it were made the law, that no member of Parliament, at any period of his life, should be eligible for a Government office, even after he has ceased to be a member. I admit, that men in public life make great sacrifices. And, in that view, one's feelings, to some extent, conflict with one's sense of duty. But, if the system has been so abused as to defeat the ends of those who have sought to establish firmly representative institutions in Canada, I think the duty before us is to terminate the abuse, even though it may involve some slight injustice to members of Parliament themselves. And, in that view, I have suggested in my Bill that no member of Parliament shall be eligible for any office of emolument in the gift of the Crown other than those positions that are made exceptions of under the Revised Statutes, in the Act respecting the independence of Parliament, until a certain period shall elapse, when it cannot be said he has received his appointment as a reward for any betrayal of trust. The House, of course, is aware, that, under the Independence of Parliament Act, members of Parliament may accept certain positions of emolument and still retain their seats, positions as members of the Government, for instance. My Bill, of course, does not interfere with that, but provides that, except in the cases provided in the statute, no member of Parliament shall be eligible for appointment to any position of emolument in the gift of the Crown during the lifetime of the Parliament of which he shall be a member, nor until twelve months after the dissolution of that House. If this rule were adopted, members would be safe-guarded from the influence of the Administration. The Government then could not be absolutely sure of being able to make good their pledges, because they could not redeem them until there had been a dissolution and a general election and a session of the new Parliament sustaining the Government, or, if they were defeated, until the new Government was appointed. Members of Parliament would be, to some extent, deterred from depending upon so uncertain a reward for a betrayal of trust. Now, whether I have made a proper suggestion or not, whether there is a better scheme for remedying this abuse or not, I do not pretend to say. But I do maintain that the present system is open to abuse, and has been flagrantly abused ; that it can be used, and, I submit, is being used, to defy the will of the people. And, under these circumstances, I submit to the House the Bill which is now before you for the second reading, and I trust that either this or some more effective measure will be adopted to render it impossible for governments to overreach the people and induce members to forget the duties devolving upon them when they accept positions in Parliament.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not at all disagree, Mr. Speaker, with the general line of argument of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). I quite agree with him in his statement of possible evils and in his general argument with regard to the independence of Parliament. I cannot, however, follow him in the view he takes of the personnel of this House. It has been my pleasure in the country, wherever I have spoken, and it is my pleasure here, to claim for the House of Commons of Canada, without regard to party, as high a standard of honour and as high a standard of public morality as exists in any similar body in the world, without any exception whatever. Therefore, I part company with the hon. gentleman in his estimate of the House of Commons, as it is constituted. The hon. gentleman entertains certain views with regard to the members who sit on this side of the House. I desire, so far as the members of this House are concerned, if it will have any influence with the hon. gentleman, utterly and absolutely to repudiate the charges which he has made with regard to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. They are charges made generally, they are charges made so as to affect every hon. gentleman sitting here, without specifying who or what. It seems to me it is most unfortunate that the hon. gentleman should think that his public duty required him to make these charges before the House and before the country. The hon. gentleman says the electors will think that the highest aim of members of Parliament is to get office. I tell the hon. gentleman that I do not believe anything of the kind. I believe the electors of this country have a high opinion of the men who represent them. I believe that the electors of this country are intelligent enough, that they have sufficient sense of public duty to choose with care the men who come here, and that the standard of the men they have chosen is, as I have said, as high as that of any representative assembly in the world. Now, the hon. gentleman was unfortunate in not citing to this House a precedent for the legislation he has introduced. They have representative institutions in the old country, they have them in the United States of America, they have them in the various colonies of Great Britain, and they have them in other countries in the world ; and yet the hon. gentleman has not cited an instance where it was necessary to place upon members of any representative body the stigma—because it is nothing else—which this Bill would place upon members of this House. It seems to me rather extraordinary that a precedent of that sort should not have occurred, if it was necessary in the working out of parliamentary institutions. Now, Sir, I say frankly that I think it would be most unfair to disqualify members of Parliament from holding public offices, as this Bill proposes to do. It is contrary to the practice in Canada. The hon. gentleman has given us the number—I dare say his figures may be correct—he has said there are seventeen members appointed since the general elections. That may be correct, I have not verified the numbers.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not say I had added them up myself, but that statement has been given to me.

Mr. DICKEY. I say that each of these appointments should be judged upon its own merits, and that simply because a man is a member of Parliament, it should not be said that his appointment to office was a mistake. Take, for instance, the question of judgeships. Is it to be supposed that any hon. gentleman of the legal profession who takes a seat in this House, is at once to be debarred from the opportunity of being appointed to the bench, and not only so, but that the country should be deprived of the benefit of his services upon the bench ? It is, I suppose, almost as important that the bench should be well filled as that the House of Commons should be well filled. And it would be a great mistake to withdraw from the Government the privilege of making selections for public office from the able lawyers whom the people of this country choose, from time to time, to represent them in Parliament. We know that the Hon. Edward Blake sat in this House some years ago. I have understood, I know not whether it is correct, that he was invited to take a seat upon the bench from this House. Now, I think every hon. gentleman will agree with me that a law which would prevent the elevation of a man of his supreme qualifications to the bench would be an injury to the country, and would be a measure which would require very grave reasons to justify it. It is, as I have said, the practice of both parties to appoint men from the House. Now, I do not wish to attack hon. gentlemen opposite upon their record. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in power, some four or five years, appointed, if I am correctly informed, about twenty members of Parliament to positions from the House. Does the hon. gentleman think that the Government led by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was lowering the tone of public morality in this country when they appointed these men to office ? I should not say so. Those appointments were agreed to by men of the highest standard of public morality, such as the Hon. Edward Blake, whom I have mentioned. Those appointments, some of them, were agreed to by the hon. leader of the Opposition, who, I suppose, represents a high tone of morality, and does, it gives me pleasure to admit. Therefore, the hon. gentleman should see that he is asking us to interfere with a practice which has been observed by both sides of politics, and surely he will admit that either side has the best interests of this country at heart. I have here a list of members of Parliament appointed to office by the Mackenzie Government during their regime, and, not counting senators, there are nineteen of them, as I make up the list, some of them very creditable appointments, and some of them serving the country well up to the present day. It is the practice in the various provinces of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman will remember much better than myself the case of the Hon. Mr. Fraser, in the province of Ontario. He was a man who had served his province so well, who had gained the respect of both sides of politics to such an extent, that both sides united in making, I believe, an office for his special benefit, called the Clerk of Forestry, with a salary of $3,000 or $3,500 a year. Both sides of politics united in appointing Mr. Fraser to that office as a reward for his public services. Now, does the hon. gentleman think it wise to adopt a measure that would interfere with a practice such as that? The 212 men who sit in this House are among the best men in the country; I say it would be a great mistake to withdraw those 212 men from eligibility to appointments to high offices in this country. There are men who come to this House with special qualifications, legal or otherwise. The Government of the country should have every scope to choose for public offices the very best men they can get, irrespective of the position they may previously have held. Now, Sir, I agree at once that that is a power that might be abused. There is not a power possessed by the Government that is not susceptible of abuse; but because the power is susceptible of abuse, it does not follow that this House should do a still greater wrong to the country, and should put an unmerited insult upon the House. The people must be allowed to pass in the ordinary way in constitutionally-governed countries, upon appointments to office, that is to say, according to the doctrine of responsibility. For these reasons, I do not think the House should adopt this Bill. It is a Bill, as I have said, totally without precedent in any legislative assembly, so far as I know. It is a Bill which I consider withdraws a large number of valuable men from the public service, it is a Bill which is not logical, and it is a Bill that, I think, throws an undeserved aspersion upon this House. If the hon. gentleman had desired to attain his end, he might have attained it very easily; he might have said that those gentlemen who have a promise of office shall not be eligible to sit in this House.

Mr. MULOCK. How can you do it?

Mr. DICKEY. It is done in the Election Act over and over again, where promises of anything like a gift, are called a matter of bribery. There is no practical difficulty in doing it, if it were necessary to touch the subject at all. The object of the hon. gentleman is one of very doubtful utility, and the method which he has chosen to compass it, is clumsy in its form, and is not such as this House should adopt, even if it adopted the object. For these reasons, I move that this Bill be not now read, but that it be read this day three months.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Justice has not in this case done himself justice. He has stated in justification of the course which I say has been pursued here what occurred during the regime of the late Alexander Mackenzie. I believe that hon. gentlemen opposite strongly condemned that action on the part of Mr. Mackenzie, that they were loud in their denunciations of his having appointed members of Parliament to office, that it was of the high crimes of his Administration. I therefore fail to see how they can reprobate and approbate just as happens to suit their purpose. The hon. gentleman says there is no precedent for discrimination of this kind. I reply by saying that in my judgment there is no precedent for abuses such as have been going on. The hon. gentleman says a simple process would be to remove from this House any hon. gentleman who has the promise of an office. It is impossible to establish the promise of an office—there may be an understanding or a wink, and an understanding between a member of the House and a member of the Government may not become a legal and binding promise, but we know it is a promise that will be made good when the right time comes; and hon. members of the Government will not stand up here and say that there are not members supporting the Administration with whom there are understandings at this moment that they will receive positions of emolument in the near future.

Mr. DICKEY. I have none, I can assure the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman may not have any in his department. The hon. gentleman, however, knows that before they go out of office they will confer positions of emolument on many members now sitting in this House and supporting the Government. He knows that, and the near future will make good what I am stating to-day, and everybody knows what I am saying is the case. No member of the Government will stand up and pledge his honour that what I am saying is not correct. The hon. gentleman alluded to the case of Mr. Fraser, a late member of the Ontario government, who was appointed to a government position. If the abuses were few in number and limited to extraordinary cases, such as the one to which he has alluded, no person would raise an exception. Public opinion would not in that case call for remedy. Mr. Fraser's case was a special one. He had been a member of the Ontario legislature for many years, for perhaps fifteen years; he had served the country as a member of the government for several years, and when, owing to ill-health, he broke down, he was placed in the position to which the hon. gentleman alluded. In his particular case I conceive it would have been a personal hardship had there been circumstances to prevent the government taking care of him in his need, and I am sure in such a case Parliament would willingly have made special exception, if necessary, by legislation if he had been prevented from accepting a position by which reasonable provision was made for him. That is wholly different from the Government itself, sitting on the Treasury benches, with all the patronage at their disposal, dangling offices before their followers as inducements for them to be faithful and subservient and not make trouble, and that such would be their reward. That is the state of affairs to-day. Whether the hon. gentleman thinks I am casting a stigma on any members of the House, the future will show whether I am telling the truth. I will guarantee that when this House is dissolved, before this Government goes out of office, as they will in a few months, they will insert in patents conferring appointments to office the names of twenty or thirty of their supporters in this House. It is idle to say to the House and to the country that these appointments will have their origin after the elections; everybody knows, and the people of the country know, that these appointments date from a period anterior to the present moment.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no doubt the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) means well; but if he carried out his boast and intention to the full extent which he appears to indicate in his motion, this law would be very much like the blue laws of Kentucky, more a disgrace than otherwise to the legislature that passed it. The hon. gentleman said he had no precedent for the abuses that were taking place in this House. He must either not be very observant, or read very little, or know very little as to what is going on around him, because if he went to the legislature in Toronto where his own political friends have been in power twenty-three or twenty-four years, he would find any number of precedents. That House, ever since Mr. Mowat took charge, has been conducted on the same principle, and to a much greater extent, as that which has been followed here. It would be interesting for any one to prepare a list of the members who occupied places in that House at different times during the last twenty years and find where they are to-day and by whom they were placed in their positions. Nearly every member of the legislature who has gone out has stepped into some lucrative employment, either in a government office or commission or some other employment under the government. If the principle is bad, it is bad there as here.

Mr. MULOCK. Certainly it is.

Mr. SPROULE. I never heard the hon. gentleman say a word against it.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not a member of that House.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman has never denied that this has been done.

Mr. MULOCK. I never denied it.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman has taken part in local elections, but he never uttered a word of complaint, although members have been taken out of the legislature during a session; one case occurred no later than between last session and the present one, when a member was taken out of the House and appointed to the position of registrar. One after another has been thus taken out and appointed to lucrative positions, but not one word has been heard against that practice by the hon. gentleman and his friends; but because the hon. gentleman's friends do not happen to be in power here, he is very virtuous and seeks to make the country believe that the majority are doing something that is very wrong. I am surprised at the course pursued by the hon. gentleman, because he is a lawyer. We sometimes say that every lawyer is a candidate for the bench, no matter whether he is a member of Parliament or not. The only reason for his anxiety in the present case is that he never expects his friends to get into power, at least during his lifetime; otherwise he would leave the door opened to secure a comfortable seat when he becomes tired of parliamentary life. The hon. gentleman says the principle is bad, but he thinks that there are exceptions which are justifiable, and he mentions the case of Hon. Mr. Fraser as one of them, he being a man who spent a large portion of his life in the service of his country, and at the end of his parliamentary term found himself without means of support. Is this not the case with many members of Parliament, men who have given the best of their lives to the service of the country, neglected their business and squandered their money, and yet possess accumulated knowledge which would be of great importance and value to the country; but if the hon. gentleman's Bill became law, that knowledge could not be used in the public interest, and the country would be denied the advantage of it. If the hon. gentleman can find one exception, I think he can find many among members who have served long in Parliament.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not cite the case, the Minister of Justice cited it.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman referred to Mr. Fraser having been a Minister of the Crown for a long time, and he thought in such a case an appointment was justifiable. Where is the difference between a member of the Crown and a member of Parliament, if they both do their duty equally well, give up their time and business in the interest of the country? I do not consider there is any difference in one case as compared with the other. I might mention a number of cases of members of the Ontario legislature being appointed to office. I have already mentioned one case. Then Dr. Widdifield was taken from the legislature, put in a cosy office in North York, which the hon. member (Mr. Mulock) represents. The hon. gentleman no doubt is quite willing to defend that case.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. He was not taken from the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Was he not a member of the legislature within a few months of the time he was put in office? He was promised that position, and only left Parliament to step into it.

Mr. MULOCK. That is not correct.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) is in a position to know, absolutely, I will accept his statement, but if he only imagines it to be correct, then, of course, he is in the same position as myself; he believes the rumour he heard.

Mr. MULOCK. That is not correct. I will tell you what did happen. If I remember the facts correctly, he had represented that seat in the House, he resigned that seat, another election took place, and his successor returned, and after some interval, he was appointed to this office.

Mr. SPROULE. He was appointed as sheriff before his successor was elected.

Mr. MULOCK. No, the riding elected his successor.

Mr. SPROULE. Notwithstanding that, Dr. Widdifield was to get the position. It was published in the papers all over this country, and no one pretended to deny it. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) can make people believe that now, for it was not denied at the time. However, that is only one of dozens of instances I might cite, if I had time to collect them. There are other instances in the Ontario legislature equally as glaring as this one. It is a notorious fact, that during the last session of the local legislature, instances were cited time after time in that House, and members pointed out as men who had the promise of office as soon as the parliamentary term would expire. And these men did not appear to think it worth while to keep it a secret. Why, they were laughing and talking about it themselves, and expecting the time when they would be shelled into some suitable office. Now, if the principle is good for one parliament, it is good for both. If it is justifiable under Sir Oliver Mowat, it is justifiable here. If it is a stigma upon the integrity and intelligence of the representatives in this House, it must be equally so on the representatives of the local legislature, because the rule, if it applies to one, must apply equally to the other. Now, I say that members of Parliament, from their long experience in this House, frequently make the most suitable men that the country can get for certain offices. They have gained a great deal of knowledge here, which they could not acquire in any other sphere. They have mature judgment and experience, and are better informed upon the details of government, and of the management of public affairs than are men in private life. Therefore, they become the more valuable to the state by virtue of the fact that they have had seats in this House for a length of time before assuming office. Then, again, Sir, if this Bill passed, it would be, as the hon. the Minister of Justice said, an acknowledgment to the world that members of Parliament were so corrupt, that Parliament had to pass a law to keep them out of office for a year or two after they left this House. Sir, that would apply to hon. gentlemen opposite as well as to members on this side of the House. I venture to say that very few hon. members in the party of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) would endorse the principle which he has laid down in this Bill. I do not think the leader of the Opposition would. I do not think that many of his friends would, and whatever has induced the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) to bring this Bill before the House, I cannot understand, except it may be for the purpose of trying to convince the world that he is disposed to be extra virtuous. Well, the hon. gentleman can afford to be so, because it is a Bill that is not likely to affect either him or his friends for a long time to come.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) never loses an opportunity, if at all possible, of instancing the Ontario legislature as a justification for something which he wants to support. Sir, the Bill which my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) introduces, whether it covers or does not cover the evil which is sought to be remedied, is a measure that may fairly be discussed. The evil, as I understand it, is not the appointment of a member of this House to office, because I agree with what has been said by the Minister of Justice, that the mere fact of a man being a member of the House of Commons should not be a bar to his appointment to some office of emolument. But what I do say is, that to hold an office dangling before a member of Parliament for one, two, or three sessions; to promise to give him, he expecting to receive it; I do say that the effect of that promise is to utterly destroy his independence. Why, Sir, we have a recent case within our own knowledge, in which the Government of this country promised to a member of this House the appointment of collector of customs. One session went past, and he was not appointed; another session passed, and the appointment was still not made, and to such an extent did that hon. member feel the unenviable position he occupied in the House that he resigned his seat, and the result is that my hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs) is sitting here to-day, opposing the Government, as a representative of that constituency. That, Sir, I take it, is an evil that should, if possible, be struck at by legislation. The hon. gentleman from Grey (Mr. Sproule) tells us that the members of this House are giving up their time and destroying their business by coming to Parliament. Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat remarkable the great number of people throughout the country who are willing to give up their time and to destroy their prospects for such a purpose. Why, there is my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) there. I venture to say that a yoke of oxen would not drag him out of Parliament.

Mr. SPROULE. Ditto.

Mr. LISTER. He is willing to destroy his business; he is willing to serve his country, and notwithstanding all these sacrifices, nothing would draw him out of Parliament, except the adverse vote of the electors. I take it that my hon. friend has failed in his argument, because he has not shown that any gentleman appointed by the local government of Ontario had been promised an appointment so as to affect his independence. But here, within the knowledge of almost every member of the House of Commons, we have not only one instance, but dozens of instances, where such a thing has occurred. We have sitting here to-day an hon. gentleman who has been promised a senatorship. They did not act fairly with him, because, when the bolters went out, the men who stayed in appointed somebody else instead of him. We have these facts before us, and that is the evil we complain of. Is there any instance during the time the Mackenzie Government were in power of that Government having held an office before a member as an inducement to get him to support the Government? Can there be cited any instance in which the Mackenzie Government promised a member an office for any considerable time before the appointment was actually made? I submit not, Sir. The evil, as I have said, is not the appointment of a member of Parliament, but the promise of appointment in order to affect his independence. It is hard to see how you are to get at the evil. My hon. friend who has introduced this Bill thinks that a member of Parliament should not be eligible to office for at least a year after the dissolution of Parliament. That, I agree with the hon. Minister of Justice, is not to be found amongst the legislative enactments of any country that I know of, and the reasons are very powerful why a member of Parliament should not be debarred from taking office. But if the ingenuity of my hon. friend could be exerted in the direction of getting at the case of a man who had been promised an office and had not been appointed, but who hung on to the Government in the expectation that their promise would be carried out, then he would be doing a real benefit to the people of this country. Because, I take it, no more disgraceful condition of affairs could be imagined than to see a man elected by the people of the country to come here as an independent member, and sit session after session voting for the Government after having been given to understand that the reward of his fealty would be his appointment to an office of emolument under the Crown. That is a disgraceful proceeding—one that could not be justified by any process of reasoning. My hon. friend attacks the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie. If the hon. gentleman was in Parliament then he must recall the fact that there was no charge that the appointments he refers to had been held up for the purpose of influencing the members, and no pretense that they had been held over after the promises had been made. The appointments were not carried out for a long time afterwards. The Government of Mr. Mackenzie was assailed violently and virulently day after day by hon. gentlemen opposite who were then sitting on this side of the House, for having made appointments from amongst their followers in the House; yet we find the hon. gentlemen who opposed that so violently then, the moment they get into power, increasing to a great extent the evil of which they then complained. In Opposition they were opposed to what they are doing now. In power, they think it is all right.

Mr. SPROULE. I never attacked Mr. Mackenzie for it, either in this House or out of this House. The hon. gentleman is only setting up that statement to knock it over.

Mr. LISTER. I did not speak of the hon. gentleman attacking; I said hon. gentlemen, not hon. gentleman. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when on this side of the House, attacked the Government of that day for appointing their followers to office. Now that they are in power, what was wrong then is right to-day. The evil aimed at by my hon. friend from York is a decided evil, and if it is possible to get at it all, this House should cure it.

Amendment (Mr. Dickey) agreed to, and motion, as amended, agreed to.

DETECTIVE CORPORATIONS AND MERCANTILE AGENCIES.

Mr. SPROULE moved second reading of Bill (No. 11) respecting detective corporations and mercantile agencies. He said: In moving that this Bill be read the second time, I would like to give some of the reasons which animate me in endeavouring to bring these associations under the control of the law. There are two classes of agencies in this country which do very extensive work, and which are almost all of them doing a great deal of injury to the people of this country, without the parties injured knowing whence the injury comes, and yet these associations are allowed to continue their work without being under the control of the law, or, comparatively speaking, without the law being able to reach them. These are detective corporations and mercantile agencies. It is a well-known fact that all through this country, in the large cities and towns, there are private detective agencies. Any number of gentlemen can associate themselves together, put an advertisement in the newspapers informing the public that they had constituted themselves private detective agencies, and then carry on a business that may destroy the reputation, either moral or financial, of respectable members of the community, and yet the people thus injured cannot tell who has done the injury. I need only give an instance or two to illustrate what I mean. A year ago last summer, an investigation was had into the municipal affairs of the city of Toronto, and a very respectable gentleman—I think his name was Wallace Nesbitt—was appointed as prosecutor in the case. Well, Sir, while carrying on that inquiry, this gentleman was shadowed everywhere he went by one of the Pinkerton detectives from Chicago. This detective followed him day and night, trying to spy out something which might be made the basis of a charge, and thus break down the credulity of this man who was doing most important and valuable work. This detective continued following Mr. Nesbitt round until, at last, his movements were noticed by some one, who remarked that he was to be found at untimely hours hovering about Mr. Nesbitt's house, and also following Mr. Nesbitt down the streets, into business places and out of them; and, after awhile, some person, who detected him in this work, got the man arrested. What was his reply when he was taken to the police court? He said that he was employed by parties who were trying to destroy the reputation of this public officer.

Mr. LISTER.

He, a foreigner, was brought over here, and employed deliberately to try and worm out some information, or spy out something in Mr. Nesbitt's private life on which he could base a prosecution, or give out to the world that Mr. Nesbitt was unworthy of the office he occupied. The man was stopped in his work; but what right had this man, a foreigner, to come into Canada and do this work without being under the control of the law, without being in any position where the party whom he was tracking almost as a blood hound could put hands on him and make him amenable for his conduct? I say it is a disgrace to the civilization of the nineteenth century that such things should be allowed to go on, and that the parties who do them should not be under the control of the law. Now, the Pinkerton detective agents from Chicago are travelling all over Canada. There is not a month in the year, I might say there is not a week in the year, in which there is not some one of these men travelled through Canada as a spy carrying on this nefarious work, and yet not amenable, comparatively speaking, to the laws of our country, because these people do their work in such a stealthy way that the parties injured do not know by what means they have been attacked. I might mention several instances, but I need only mention one, which I remember hearing of some years ago. A party who had been formerly a citizen of Canada, left his family here and went to the United States, where he accumulated considerable wealth, and where he died. An advertisement was put in some of the papers calling on the heirs of this man to come forward and claim his estate. It was ascertained by the Pinkerton detective agency that the heirs were located here in Canada, and they sent one of their officers over here to purchase the rights which these heirs had in this estate for a few hundred dollars. I believe that by his artful representations, this Pinkerton agent succeeded in purchasing the rights for something like $400, although the man who had died had left a fortune said to be worth over a half a million dollars. He represented that it was possible they were heirs, but that there was a strong probability they were not, and he got an assignment, perfectly regular, of their and interest in it, and then went across the line to benefit by it. It happened that these parties were brought back, and they were obliged to send men all through the country, to scour the country for the purpose of getting respectable men to bolster up their character, so that they might justify their conduct in a court of law. They succeeded sufficiently to escape the toils of the law; but although they escaped, I am credibly informed that they justly deserved punishment, and had they been compelled to carry on their operations under the control of some such law as I propose, they never could have acted as they did, and got out of the country scot free. Again, we have respectable associations in Canada that are doing detective work, and who would be well pleased to be under the control of the law. I need only mention one association, which I think most of the members of this House must have heard of. I refer to the firm of Mr. Grose, of Montreal, who has a detective agency there. I had a long conversation with Mr. Grose, and had a letter from him which I find I have forgotten to bring with me, but in this letter he speaks of this abuse to which I have alluded as one of the greatest evils that his firm have to contend with to-day. Parties who are irresponsible, who have no standing in the community, who are, perhaps, without moral character, or any of the obligations of manhood to the people of this country, carry on this work, representing themselves as respectable agencies. They destroy the moral character and reputation of others, they do untold injury, and yet they go unwhipped of justice. This Bill aims at bringing these men under control. In what way? In the first place, they must file a certificate declaring that they intend to become incorporated. They must file this certificate with the Secretary of State. Then they must enter into bonds with justified securities under oath, and then take out letters patent. They must enter into bonds of $10,000 each, with two good sureties as a guarantee for their conduct, so that there may be something to fall back upon in case they make themselves amenable to the law. There must be a justification of these securities. Power is then given to the association to employ agents to carry on their work, but every man who is employed by the association must carry with him a certificate showing that he belongs to it, and has the right to carry on the work of a private detective. Each employee has a certificate, and then there is a provision made that when any new members are taken into the firm, these members are to deposit each a bond with the Secretary of State, and provide the same sureties as in the first instance. This bond is to be renewed every five years, so that it may be a safe bond. This is required to meet the possibility of the sureties, from time to time, breaking down, and not being worth the amount which they are represented to be worth in the bonds. The duty of the members of the associations and the employees is, then, to discharge their work faithfully. They take oath to do it faithfully, and in this, too, they are under the control of the law. Then these associations, when incorporated, are liable, under the provisions of the Act, and their sureties are liable, on the bonds of the association, for damages to parties injured, where it is shown that the information given is incorrect and that the association has made itself liable to damages. In like manner, the other provisions of the Bill are for the purpose of getting them under the control of the law. That is with regard to detective corporations.

I now come to the other branch of my Bill, which has for its object, the controlling of mercantile agencies. In endeavouring to obtain a law which will control these mercantile agencies, I can only say that I have received very strong opposition for the purpose of defeating this Bill, from certain quarters; and I believe that if these quarters were as well informed of the object of the Bill and the abuses that take place under this system, as they ought to be, their opposition would not be so strong as it is. There is practically no control over these commercial agencies to-day, just as there is none over detective corporations, except under the common law, which scarcely touches them at all. We know how far the common law or the civil law of Quebec goes when you attempt to punish these individuals. We know that it is almost impossible to obtain a conviction, and, therefore, they may be fairly said not to be under the control of the law at all. If we consider for a moment the untold injury done by these mercantile agencies, we will be surprised that the abuse has been allowed to go on so long without any statute being passed to control them in any way. What is the position of these mercantile agencies? A man comes into the country who is a foreigner. He establishes an agency here. Take either of the agencies you like—the Dun-Wiman or the Bradstreet. They are both foreigners and have their agents in Canada. They appoint an agent in two or three business centres throughout the country. They pay little or no money to these agencies. They put little or no money into the enterprise, but put themselves in such a position that they can practically destroy, not only the moral reputation, but the financial standing of every member of the business community, without the parties injured knowing who it is that has done the injury. In any other line, would this be allowed? A man commences business with a small capital and limited experience, but with the honest intention to develop that business to the best of his ability, according to the needs of the locality. There may be another man in the same line of business who is an agent of one of these associations. These associations take their agents from every quarter. Whoever is willing to do the work for nothing is always acceptable. The one competing with the other, but the one who is an agent can give information to these associations with regard to the financial standing of the other, and ruin his financial standing, even though that information be altogether incorrect, and the one who is ruined does not know who is responsible for the injury. Some people may say that that is an exaggerated statement with regard to the operations of these firms. I say most distinctly, from my own knowledge, that the statement is correct, and I speak from a knowledge of twenty years of one of the agencies, and of half that time of both of them. I have repeatedly invited these agencies to have a permanent respectable agent employed in each town or village, and give him some small consideration, so that he may devote at least a portion of his time for the purpose of making inquiries regarding the financial standing of business men in the community. I have repeatedly asked them to do this, but my request has invariably been refused; and the only expense they incur in carrying on this business, practically speaking, until the last few years, is the expense in postage of sending out their schedules to any one they can get to give a reply. They generally have, if they can get them, two agents in each town or village; but if they cannot get the two, they will do with one, and they pay nothing. The work is done gratuitously, and when men are working for nothing, they are not likely to take the time they should in making inquiries to get correct information and do the work faithfully. Some may say that that is not the way this work is carried on. I think I can give such information as will satisfy them that I am right. I have a letter here from a gentleman who was engaged in this work for a great many years, a gentleman to whom I have reported for years myself, and one who, I believe, endeavoured to do justice to the mercantile community. When I wrote him for information with regard to how this work was carried on, he sent me the following letter:—

Your Bill, so far as it goes certainly is in the right direction, but I feel fully assured that a thorough investigation into the methods of the mercantile agencies would unfold a tale which I think might induce measures more far-reaching. I will state one fact which you can readily perceive is fraught with great injustice to many people doing business in Canada. One agency, at least, of which I was general manager many years, is now directed in almost its minutest details by a man sitting at his desk in New York—not in touch with conditions here, nor in sympathy with a manager or superintendent of any of the offices here, who may make a fair effort to report the circumstances of traders quoted in their books. I speak this from personal knowledge. During my term with them I made them say two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, remitted about two hundred and twelve thousand, the balance left them on their books to collect. This was done without more than a few hundred dollars investment made many years ago not one dollar having been put into the business by them within, say, twenty-five years past. Now I mention this as a prelude to the point I desire to direct your attention to. Every effort of recent years made by me to have a larger portion of the earnings spent in more thoroughly and carefully reporting the country was met by complaints of unnecessary expenses, &c., &c., thus rendering it impossible to give an approach to a report of traders in many parts of the country either safe to the bank or merchant getting the report or fair to party or firm reported upon. Travellers are sent out at long intervals, but chiefly to the larger cities and towns where subscriptions may be secured, beyond this there has not been, by Bradstreet's, one hundred dollars spent annually in Ontario to obtain information from paid correspondents, their chief expenditure being for postage stamps asking indiscriminately for information oftentimes without the least knowledge of the persons from whom they are making inquiry; the reply, however, if one comes, "fills the bill"—the report goes. I need not enlarge as to the frequent result of this. The usefulness of these institutions when properly managed or under proper supervision is not generally questioned, in trade or at least wholesale trade circles, but there is a limit which when reached is dangerous to all classes of trade, and that limit I think is being very closely shaved when they are run solely for the subscriptions that can be collected as small a proportion of the earnings as possible being given up to secure efficiency. There is a class of reports given out by agencies of which I never approved, and more frequently than otherwise while in management I refused to make, these are classed "call reports." The names do not appear in the reference books, but when asked for the reports is whispered into the ear of the subscriber and he only is supposed to learn the degree of wickedness reported. This class of report often extends to the affairs of private parties it will be clear to you that there is room for some restraint being put on this department of their business; these reports are not kept in books but are kept on file. There are numerous details of the workings of these agencies which I think would have a bearing on the minds in the House if understood, but with the limited time I have to get this letter to you by to-morrow, as I understand you wish, I cannot say much more.

Now, this letter is from a gentleman who managed one of these offices, and during the time he held this office he collected and sent to New York $212,000 in hard cash, although there was never invested in the enterprise here more than $300 or $400 at most. And yet the agent in New York, who has only escaped the toils of the law a short time ago, having been tried for alleged forgery, was perfectly satisfied to accept the information he received from irresponsible parties all over the country to whom these letters of inquiry were sent, no other effort to secure correct information being made, and no other expense being incurred than the writing and posting of these letters.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Have you any objection to giving the name?

Mr. SPROULE. None; the writer of this letter is Joseph Priestman.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Of what agency?

Mr. SPROULE. Of the Bradstreet agency. This man speaks from an experience of nearly twenty-five years, and he speaks with an authority that would be impossible except with one who had been engaged in the business. People often wonder that we have such a large number of firms breaking down who are represented by these agencies to be financially sound, and yet when these firms come to be wound up, we find that they have little or no assets. I have here a sheet showing the firms that have failed. It is headed as follows:—

The following list shows eight months of false ratings by Bradstreet's and Dun, Wiman's mercantile agencies. The ratings for the first four months ending March, 1878, are taken from both Bradstreet's and Dun, Wiman's books. The last four months ending April, 1879, are taken from Dun, Wiman's very latest revised book, dated January, 1879. This list represents 557 insolvents, rated in the aggregate to be worth $7,248,000 capital, and were kept thus falsely rated up to day of failure. Some of them had their ratings increased only a few weeks before they made an assignment. Instead of above insolvents being worth sufficient to pay their liabilities in full, and have a total capital of $7,248,000 as the agencies represented them very few of their estates have paid as high a dividend as 50 cents on the dollar, whilst a great many of them have not had sufficient assets to pay more than 5 or 10 cents on the dollar.

I merely mention this to show the unreliability of the information given. And I have given you the reason for its unreliability. The information given, in the nature of things, cannot be reliable, because those who are engaged in this work are doing it for nothing and they are not likely to spend much time in ferreting out the information they ought to have in order to do justice to the parties reported upon and to the mercantile community who depend upon the agency. Let me call attention to a case that came within my own knowledge. A certain gentleman is engaged in business and paying his ordinary accounts to the wholesale men. A friend of his interested in property that is intended to belong to this man's wife, makes an assignment of the property to him, he not paying out anything or investing in the property a single dollar. But it is reported to one of the agencies that this gentleman is engaging in another line of business, and is using his capital to buy property. His creditors come upon him and force him to pay. He is put into court. When he inquires why this is done, seeing that he has been paying his accounts as well as usual and has not heard any complaint, the answer is: You are speculating in property, and we cannot allow you to invest your money in any outside business while you owe money to the wholesale houses. Upon further inquiry, he learns that the information was furnished to the agency by an irresponsible representative who is a rival in business, and did not take the pains to ascertain the facts. The man might have been driven into insolvency as a result of this incorrect information, when, had correct information been given, his credit ought to have been much stronger on account of the property being made over to him. Then take the case of Carsley & Co., which passed through two courts. A gentleman in the city of Toronto, a commercial traveller, stated to one of the agents that the paper of Carsley & Co. had been refused renewal in the old country. I have here the pamphlet that was issued with regard to this case. It gives the history of this case, which shows the injury that these agencies may inflict upon the community. Here is a statement given by the judge, which I will read:

Now, what are the facts in this case, and will the principles of law and the precedents above cited apply? It appears, by the evidence of Joseph Priestman, manager of the company defendant in Canada residing in Toronto, that he had been informed in the beginning of May that the plaintiffs had asked or had obtained an extension of time. He wrote to the superintendent in Montreal, asking him to advise him of the currency, or whether he had any information to warrant or confirm this rumour, but received no answer. Nothing occurred during a month after, until the 16th June following, when Mr. Priestman communicated with the office in Montreal, informing the superintendent that information had been given by a creditor of Carsley in Toronto that a cable message had been received by an agent of a creditor of Carsley & Co. in London, stating that he had obtained, or asked for, an extension on liabilities of about £60,000 sterling, or $300,000. This information had been conveyed to Mr. Priestman by a reporter of the office in Toronto named Brown. The reporter Brown has been examined, and here is what he says: "A man by the name of Toshack, manufacturers' agent, representing an English house in Toronto, told him on the morning of 16th June that he had a cable saying that Carsley & Co. were asking for an extension of time on liabilities of £60,000 sterling. Brown immediately went to Priestman to acquaint him with the information, and the latter, on the same day, conveyed it to the office in Montreal, as aforesaid. At that time no information of any kind about the plaintiffs could be found in the office in Toronto. The alleged cable never was seen, either by Brown or Priestman, who had not even the thought, which would have occurred to the mind of any man of common prudence, viz., to call upon Toshack to exhibit his cable; upon the mere information of an outsider of their office, who may have been actuated by malice, for what we know, he transmits the report to the city, where the plaintiffs are keeping their place of business. It must have been hurried by telegraph, as the circular issued by the office in Montreal is of the same date. It has been circulated among 600 persons, many of whom were not subscribers, and the words "Call at Office," was received as a danger signal, says the manager of one of the banks in this city with which the plaintiffs are doing an extensive business. Many of the subscribers called at the office for information and there they were informed by the superintendent that it was stated that plaintiffs had asked for an extension of time in England for liabilities of about $300,000.

He goes on to give the history of this case further, and he says:

But in this present case there is more; the plaintiffs do not even guarantee the correctness of its information to the subscribers. It is so stated in plain terms in the contract; so that they may be at liberty to circulate any amount of false rumours, and still they would claim that this is a privileged communication. A trader who is not a subscriber, as is the case for the plaintiffs, might have been ruined by such false rumours, and because it would have pleased the subscribers to relieve the company in a private contract of the responsibility of its own acts, we are to be told that this is a privileged communication, and that such trader must submit to a contract to which he has been no party and suffer for it. This is not and never has been the law.

Then the judge goes on to ask, What is meant by calling at the office? He asks a banker with regard to the meaning of these words, who says that he would look upon them as a danger signal, which would be understood to mean something detrimental to the credit of the persons against whose name the words were placed. Now, that only shows the power these agencies have for doing evil, doing it without the knowledge of the party injured. I will read a letter that I have from a commercial traveller of many years' experience in business, and it is a fair sample of a number of letters that I have had upon the same subject:

There are but few who really know what a dangerous and unfair thing it is for a few men under the guise of protecting the wholesale dealers and the banks, for a certain sum per annum, to have both business and private characters of hundreds of thousands completely under their control. I regard it as the most dangerous system ever established in any civilized country. The retail man is completely under their control, and at their mercy. He cannot possibly find out what is said about him, as to either character or business status, consequently if the report about him is either untrue or incorrect he has no redress and simply goes under through misrepresentation.

Seventeen years experience as a commercial traveller has convinced me of the iniquity of these agencies. I know hundreds that have been ruined by them. Who through city and village gossip, &c., of local agents of those concerns completely damned the bright future of many a decent man, we ought to know.

In 1890 a private circular was issued from one of these offices in Victoria, B.C. The board of trade took it up and animadverted on it very strongly, and the result, I believe, was a withdrawal of the report that had been made. But still it is said to have done the commercial community in that province a good deal of harm, and they did not know what was the cause of the damage to some time after. Now, I have here a clipping that I have taken from a paper in reference to Nelson, B.C.:

The mercantile agencies, like Bradstreet's and Dun, Wiman & Co.'s, are useful when they give the correct ratings. We do not know who represents these rival concerns at Nelson, but we do know that the ratings given the business men of Nelson by the Dun, Wiman agency were either made by guess work or by some one who had a personal grudge against several of our leading business men.

I am told that almost every leading business man in that place was rated so low that they were scarcely worthy of credit, notwithstanding the fact that many of the firms were financially sound, and were doing a very good business, and as likely to pay their debts as men owning millions of capital. Then, I take the case of a firm in Montreal, Messrs. H. & N. E. Hamilton, concerning whom I will read an extract from a paper:

Messrs. Henry & N. E. Hamilton, dry goods merchants, Victoria Square, through their solicitors, Geoffrion, Dorion & Allan, have entered an action for $50,000 damages against the Bradstreet's Mercantile Agency.

It is claimed on behalf of the plaintiffs that they were rated by that agency in March last, as being worth from $75,000 to $100,000, their credit also being registered as good, and that at present they are entered in the books of the company as being without capital, and in "D" class, which implies a low credit.

Messrs. Hamilton say no change has taken place in their business in the meantime to justify the change in rating, and that it was due to malice; therefore, damages are claimed.

And they put the damages at $50,000. Now, it is contended, and I believe from the circumstances that there may be some truth in it, that certain mercantile firms are kept afloat by these agencies long beyond the time they are financially sound because they happen to subscribe to the agency whose books they are taking, and therefore they get a better rating than others who do not take them. It is a fact known to some that immediately after merchants have refused to take their books, their limit of credit goes down, and the next issue of the book or sheet that comes out shows them with a much lower rating than they had during the time they took these agency books. Then, I say it must be assumed that the reason is because they are not subscribers to that mercantile agency, for as soon as the agency ceases to benefit from the firm, they reduce their limit of credit, and thereby destroy their standing in the community. Then, again, I have a letter taken from a paper with reference to commercial men in Vancouver, towards whom the agency was very unfair and unjust. It represented them individually as being worth much less than they were in fact, and as having a standing or credit much lower than they were entitled to from the business they were doing, and from the way they paid their debts. The writer of the letter I refer to is a commercial traveller, and he says:

Sir,—You have kindly permitted the views of one "Commercial Traveller" to appear in your columns, on the subject of Dun, Wiman & Co.'s unjust report of Vancouver's financial position, please grant me the same privilege. What seems to trouble agencies of this description, is publicity, not truthfulness, as they have yet shown no disposition to retract their informants unfair criticism. Why? Suppose the report referred to an individual, instead of a city, and it was in substance as incorrect, regarding his monetary affairs, and secretly furnished to his creditors, or even those he was doing business with; well, what is the result? He has no means of ascertaining what is said about him, and consequently is not in a position to refute it. The fact is, all thoroughly posted business men throughout both Canada and the United States are a unit in declaring this system of direct espionage, carried out as it is to-day, an outrage on the mercantile community, and the sooner they are whipped into line the better, how can either a traveller, or even resident representative keep himself so free from the prejudices of local informants and decide truthfully, when refused the information from merchants or others themselves, as it is well known that very many object, and very properly, too, being catechised by some agent with very limited experience of either business men or manners. These agencies have frequently such individuals on their staff, and I affirm, without the slightest fear of contradiction, that the future of many a hard-working, honest tradesman, and merchant, has been blighted and oft-times ruined by the colouring given to his standing and character, from information of doubtful reliability, furnished through these sources. Vancouver city is all right, her merchants have had a slight struggle, just the same as in all newly created places, but they are both holding their own and gaining ground steadily, and the progress and push of the citizens of this terminal city is worthy of imitation anywhere on this civilized globe. Let me close by simply characterising Dun, Wiman & Co.'s confidential circular a species of blackmail, which very fortunately broke out in the right spot, was cured just in time, and will be a warning for the future. Thanking you, I remain, dear sir,

Faithfully yours,

ANOTHER COMMERCIAL TRAVELLER.

Vancouver, 9th June, 1890.

I have read these letters for the purpose of giving information from men of experience, from commercial travellers, and also from the commercial agent who has managed the Dun, Wiman Agency in Toronto for twenty-three or twenty-five years, and who has an intimate knowledge of the operations. I may say that, from time to time, that gentleman has addressed the managers living in New York, to whom he has sent $212,000 in the course of those years, and asked them to spend a little larger percentage of the earnings for the purpose of obtaining more responsible agents who would take the trouble of verifying, as far as possible, the information selected with respect to the standing of the financial community; but, in every instance, the answer came back, no. Accept the information you get, and this filled the bill whether it was from responsible or irresponsible parties, and no matter how unreliable and inaccurate it may be, and how much it may strike at the credit of any man in the community. What right has any mercantile agency, or any man, to go into any town or village, and of his own motion destroy a man's financial position and his prospects in life? He may be struggling with misfortune, but his chances may be good, and his financial outlook may be all right; but a single inaccurate report damns his future, and he does not know by whom this is done, although it is done by an irresponsible agency in New York, which is not responsible to the people of this country, whom it has injured. But there is another matter in connection with these agencies which is very objectionable: they claim that all the information they supply is privileged. If the information supplied proves to be inaccurate, they refuse to produce the original report. A great deal of the information is not entered into books, because, in the case of a lawsuit, they are afraid these books might have to be brought into court. But these agencies place a significant mark in their reports—it is a letter. What does it mean? The explanation given is, "Call at the office;" and, when a person calls there, a word is whispered in his ear, which destroys a merchant's chance of doing business with the man who has applied for information. But the report goes beyond that, because the fact that this letter is opposite the man's name is sufficient to destroy his business reputation and financial standing, and he cannot do business until he gets a better rating. Then, these agencies are objectionable for another reason: they are collecting firms. They advertise to collect accounts. When accounts are sent to them to collect, they notify the debtor that they hold an account of which they expect settlement forthwith. If the debtor does not settle, they follow that up by a threat, to the effect that his action must affect his credit in the agency, and he must be badly rated. That is a species of blackmail which forces a man either to go under or endeavour to settle the account. Why should any association be allowed to exercise this tyrannical power over the commercial community? This power extends all over, to merchants, bankers, wholesale dealers, retail dealers, professional men and others. Men are asked by these agencies for information regarding men who are living ten or twenty miles away, and of whom they know nothing. The person from whom the inquiry is made does not look into the matter, because he is not paid for doing so, and, therefore, he replies that he knows nothing of the party except by current rumour, and, perhaps, that is incorrect or deceptive. No one will deny the value of the agencies, that they are useful to the mercantile community and to the banks, and I am very much surprised to find that boards of trade, banking institutions and some of the loan companies object to the passage of this Bill. It does not, however, seek to do away with these agencies, but to place them under proper restraint and legal control, and make them responsible for inaccurate information which damages people financially or otherwise. It compels these agencies to make stronger efforts to secure correct information. One of the clauses of the Bill is in this direction. It provides that a schedule must be sent once a year to every man whose name appears on the agency books, asking him to fill it up and report with respect to his financial standing. It may be, that very many men will refuse to give this information ; but it does not compel the merchant, or any one else, to give a report. Many a man in business has nothing to hide, because his business is prosperous and his credit good, and he would be willing to give information with respect to his business and his financial standing, and he would much rather do this than have information supplied by some one who knows little about it, and whose information is most likely to be damaging. It may be said that some of these schedules will be incorrectly filled, and that a man is not likely to give a bad colouring to his own financial standing. The agencies, however, are not bound to accept this information as correct ; but, at least, in this way an opportunity is given to the party who is liable to be injured by the agency, to make an explanation of his financial affairs. When he has this opportunity afforded, and refuses to supply information, the agency is justified in obtaining the next best information and basing his rating on that. Then, the Bill seeks to compel these agencies to establish in every important town or village of the country a sub-agent, a man who is under their control, who is responsible for their acts, and who will endeavour to get the information as nearly correct as possible. I was told, in Toronto the other day that the agencies were doing this at the present time, but they never did it until this Bill was first introduced in the House by me a few years ago. When they saw that they were likely to be brought to book by Act of Parliament, then they tried to show that they were endeavouring to get correct information by establishing more agencies. In the large cities and towns throughout the country they have now these sub-agents, but in villages where there are a number of business men they have no agencies at all. They still depend on the old system of securing some one who will make a report for nothing. They get those persons to give them the information upon their own judgment, whether it may be biased by business jealousy or not, or whether it may be correct or not. A man in the same line of business is perhaps asked to report on his fellow-trader. I say that these men ought to be under control. This Bill does not seek to do away with the agencies, but it seeks to make these companies responsible for the operations of the business they carry on in this country. If they are foreigners, they must get a status here by the registration of these bonds, and the sureties upon these bonds are responsible for damages which may be incurred on account of incorrect or careless information given. This, Sir, is the scope of the Bill. It may be that some of its clauses will be held to be objectionable in some respects, but if so, I ask the House, when we go into Committee of the Whole, to assist me in making the measure as perfect as possible. I am not wedded to any single clause in the Bill. My sole and only aim is to bring these people under the control of the law, as I think they ought to be, and to prevent them in the future from carrying on business as carelessly as they have done in the past. If they are making large sums of money, then let them devote some of their profits for the purpose of getting correct information. Let them give the business community an opportunity of explaining their own financial position before they damn them for ever by publishing information furnished by some person who perhaps knows nothing about their business. I move, Mr. Speaker, that this Bill be read the second time.

Mr. LISTER. The Bill before the House is a very lengthy one, covering some eighteen clauses, and as the proposed legislation is of a somewhat novel character, and interesting to a very large section of people, I think it would be dangerous to allow the Bill to go into committee to-night, at all events. If my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is determined to press the legislation this session, then it would be better to refer it to, say, the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no objection to that at all.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My intention was to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. LISTER. Yes, the debate might be adjourned to-night in order to give hon. members an opportunity of considering the provisions of the Bill. A great deal can be said for and against the proposed legislation. There are no doubt many instances in which grave injustice has been done to business men throughout the country, but whether it would be wise to have the operations of these reporting associations or not, is a wide question about which a great deal could be said. As the Postmaster General states it to be his intention to move the adjournment of the debate, I shall say no more about the Bill to-night.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to second the motion of my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). In doing so I can endorse very much of what the hon. gentleman said. The Montreal case, to which he made reference, is a well known case to every man in commercial life and in the legal profession. There was a case similar to it, and prior to it, which did not go so far in the courts as that celebrated case. I refer to the case of Todd vs. Dun, Wiman. I happened to be the solicitor for the plaintiff, and the case was brought down for trial at the Whitby Assizes, and tried before Chief Justice Cameron, who held that the words "inquire at office" were slanderous, and so it went to a jury, and we succeeded in getting a verdict. That was a case of great hardship. Mr. Todd was a merchant in a village in the riding of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), and he met with a disaster in having his safe blown up. He had a rival in the grain business in the same village, who happened to be the local agent of one of the reporting agencies. We brought the action against him and Dun Wiman. Unfortunately the action should have been brought against him and Bradstreet, but the agency which first got the report gave the information to the other, and the court held that although Bradstreet was the first offender, yet inasmuch as Dun, Wiman got the information from Bradstreet, and reported it to their subscribers and others, Bradstreet was liable. At all events, that report had the effect of financially ruining Mr. Todd for the time being. A rich corporation such as the defendants was able to appeal against the judgment of the assize court, and the court appealed to, in opposition to the judgment of the learned chief justice, held that the pleadings were not sufficient—although that is a case in which judges disagreed—and it went off on that technicality. We were about to appeal further when we accepted a settlement from the company for a consideration, because we were no longer financially able to pursue it in the courts, we being poor and the company being rich. I do not approve of all the provisions of this Bill, nor do I think any lawyer in the House would approve of them all; but there is very much that is good in the Bill, and I think it should get to the committee stage and be perfected there. Probably the best committee to which to refer the Bill would be the Committee on Banking and Commerce as suggested by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), and I understand that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is willing the Bill should go there. I really think it is in the interests of the retail merchants and other business men of this country, that some legislation should be adopted to regulate these companies in regard to their business. When they put "inquire at office" or "call at office" opposite the name of a retail trader, they put a danger signal there on account of which no wholesale house would give that man any more credit, until they first made full investigations. In the Todd case. Eby, Blaine & Co., John Macdonald & Co., McMaster & Co., and all the leading wholesale men of Toronto were called to Whitby as witnesses when the case was tried. All held that these words, "inquiry at office," were a danger signal. Some held that they might mean that the man was hopelessly bankrupt, some that he was a bad character, some that he was, perhaps, given to too much sport and neglected his business; but all held that they constituted a danger signal, and would work injury to the man in trade, unless he was a man of considerable means. Without taking up the time of the House. I second the motion of the hon. member for East Grey, and trust that the Bill will receive the consideration of honourable members in the committee stage.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Bill now before the House should not, in my opinion, receive the sanction of the House. I do not think the hon. member for East Grey has given any reasons that will hold water why Parliament should pass such a Bill. Even if everything he has said against mercantile agencies were true, the Bill now before us is not worth the paper it is written on. It does not provide any remedy against the abuses which the hon. member claims now exist. But, for my part, I dissent entirely from the statements he has made. I know that in the opinion of every business man in this country, mercantile agencies are indispensable. Owing to our system of giving credit, it is impossible for any business man to get along without such reports as are furnished by Bradstreet's or Dun-Wiman.

Mr. SPROULE. The Bill does not seek to do away with them at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The value of these reports depends entirely upon their accuracy, and I contend that the reports of either Dun-Wiman or Bradstreet's are as accurate as it is possible to get them. It is impossible all the time to get perfectly accurate accounts of a man's standing. This Bill provides that the agencies are to send out schedules which every man in business is to fill up, stating what he is worth, and everything else that is required. A great many men will not fill out these schedules at all; but, suppose they do, you know how they will fill them out. Every man naturally wants to make himself out to be as wealthy and trustworthy as possible, and it is only natural that these schedules will be filled out in altogether too glowing colours.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Let the company verify that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then you come down to just what the company are doing now. How do they verify the reports now? They consult, not one man only, but the best men in every town and city.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL. They do not confine themselves to one man or to two men, but they consult the bankers, and the men of standing and character, generally, in the community, so that their reports may be corroborated before they are entered on their books. The aim of Bradstreet's or Dun, Wiman is always to report a man a little lower than he really is worth. They want to be on the safe side, so as not to mislead any one.

Mr. SPROULE. In their books a man is often rated a good deal higher than he is worth.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, it is impossible to get accurate statement in regard to every man's business. But the whole value of these reports depends on their accuracy. They are not worth anything unless they are as accurate as they can be made, and I believe, on the whole, they are. Look at the enormous work it is to get out these reports. Bradstreet's and Dun, Wiman issue four books every year, and in preparing each book they have to go to every man doing business in this broad Dominion and find out his standing, and verify it every three months.

Mr. SPROULE. No, only once a year.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In addition to that, they send out weekly reports, showing those who have failed, those who have gone out of business, those who have given chattel mortgages, those who have been sued, and against whom judgments have been recorded—valuable information which it is utterly impossible for the business community to get along without. Therefore, I say we should be very careful about hampering or restricting these agencies. I do not believe there is any more important work in the Dominion of Canada to-day, so far as the business community are concerned, than the reports of the mercantile agencies. My hon. friend says that they do not spend a hundred dollars in getting out these reports—that they do not cost them a cent. It does not matter to us whether they get them for nothing or pay a thousand dollars for them. But I can tell my hon. friend that they do not get them for nothing. I believe the rule is to furnish their books to the principal banks, free, in consideration of their getting information from the banks.

Mr. SPROULE. They do not give the books to the banks or to any others unless they pay for them.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. I have been their agent for a good many years, and I did not get the books.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You are a lawyer, and I do not suppose they give them to lawyers.

Mr. SPROULE. I am speaking of what I know, when I say they do not give their books for nothing.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not suppose they give them to lawyers or to doctors, either. But whether they give them for nothing or not, I know that the information contained in these books is most valuable to the commercial community. When a man starts in business, I want to know his character, and what he is worth. I apply to the mercantile agency for a report as to his standing, and if they have not a report, if it is a case of urgency, they wire for the information to their correspondent or responsible adviser in the town where the man does business, and they are thus able to furnish me, in a short time, with the information I desire.

Mr. SPROULE. They can still do that under this Bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I know that there is scarcely a city or town in the Dominion which has not representatives of both Bradstreet's and Dun, Wiman residing; and this is absolutely necessary in business, because changes are constantly going on, and business men require to know of them as soon as they are made. With regard to their power to ruin the moral or financial standing of any man, I do not think that enters into the question at all. These agencies are business firms, and their business is to furnish accurate and reliable reports of the standing and moral worth of every business man in the community. That is what we want; that is what we cannot get along without; and the more accurate and reliable they make their reports, the more we want them. For these reasons, I think the Bill proposes to interfere with a matter which we have no business to interfere with. I do not think any case has been made out of a man having been injured. Perhaps, sometimes, a man may be rated too low, but that cannot always be avoided. As to the rule of noting to "inquire at office," in regard to certain persons, I know that if you take up Bradstreet's or Dun, Wiman's book for the Dominion of Canada, you will find that that is done in only a very few instances. Now, there may be certain reasons for that. A man may be speculating on the quiet, he may be engaged in business that would render him unworthy of confidence.

Mr. SPROULE. What about Carsley's case, which I cited? He was good for $400,000 credit.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). I do not pretend to say that these men never make mistakes, but you must look at the thing as a whole, and I say that, as a whole, you would not find any bankers, merchants or business men asking for a law of this kind. Therefore, I think the Government should consider well before allowing it to become law. If it should become law, and I hope it will not, it should have first most serious and careful consideration. I do not consider that the hon. gentleman's Bill is worth anything at all. These associations send out their schedules, and they are filled out, and all that the hon. gentleman's Bill provides is, that, if any agent makes wilfully a false statement, he shall be subject to a fine. There is not a mercantile agent at all who would make a wilfully false statement, and, therefore, I do not think this Bill would be effective.

Mr. STAIRS. I agree very generally with what has been said by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister). This is a Bill of a very novel character, and I agree in his suggestion that it should be referred, possibly, to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. I agree very largely, also, in what has been said by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), in support of the Bill, although, singularly enough, I have arrived at a very different conclusion. I only rise for the purpose of suggesting that very great caution should be exercised in dealing with this matter. Though I agree with the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), I think it would be a pity for this House to pass a Bill of this nature; and I think so more because I agree with him than otherwise, for I foresee that it will not have a tendency to cure the evils of which he complains, but rather to intensify them. I may be mistaken, for I have not given very much consideration to the Bill, and, of course, am open to conviction, if the Bill goes to the proper committee; but I think it would be a great mistake for us to embody in an Act of Parliament any legislation that may have a tendency to give character and standing to a class of business of this kind which has many objectionable features, because I am afraid that the effect would be to induce people to place more dependence on these reports. My own idea of matters of this kind is that it is better to let the business men of Canada and these associations fight it out among themselves, and I do not believe it will be very many years before they will settle among themselves what it is best to do. If we should pass this Bill this session, we will be constantly afterwards amending it, so as to make it more reasonable and make the actions of these mercantile agencies less injurious to the business community, and I do not believe that we can by legislation cure the evils of which the hon. gentleman complains. Of course this is a question of opinion, and I am open to conviction; but we should be very careful before we pass any measure of this kind, in seeing that we do not attempt to do anything which we cannot succeed in accomplishing.

Mr. WALLACE. I am sure that the mercantile agencies will be delighted when they read the excellent certificate given them by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell). According to him, they are the most exemplary class of men in the community. He says that the mercantile agencies are indispensable to the business men of the community. Well, a similar statement was made by the promoter of the Bill. He did not seek to do away with these agencies, but simply to remove the evils which everybody who has examined into the question must admit have grown up under them. The hon. gentleman said that the information they gave was as correct as it was possible for them to give, and he said this in the face of a statement which he could not contradict, that in the last six or eight months, of 557 failures occurring in Canada, all these men who failed were represented as having combined capital of between seven and eight million dollars. And yet these 557 became bankrupt and paid far less than 50 cents on the dollar. If that be the most correct information possible to give, I for my part must say that greater inaccuracy could not be imagined. The very clause to which the hon. gentleman objects, that of providing security, will, I contend, be one of the best means for ensuring greater accuracy. Under the present system followed by these associations, each man's business record is given by somebody else. Now, who can tell a man's business affairs as well as the man himself, and he is given an opportunity under this Bill to state his own case. These associations are not compelled to accept that statement, but they can verify it or have it contradicted by other evidence; but in justice to the individual, the proposition is one which will commend itself to members of this House, that an opportunity should be given to him to make a statement for himself.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). They do that now.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, they do not. The hon. gentleman made another statement. He said that these agents visit every business man four times a year. They may, in some cases, but not in the town from which I come.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). They prepare four books every year.

Mr. WALLACE. And their books, year after year, are not changed. In the town where I live I guarantee that the four reports do not vary one letter in the line a year. They only go once per annum at the utmost, and sometimes once in two years, but most frequently only once a year. The hon. gentleman says that they visit every man at these particular periods. Nothing of the kind. They go to one man in our town, and he gives information to the best of his ability, and they go to no other. Their agent goes to but one man.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). And you say there are no changes?

Mr. WALLACE. There are changes made once a year, but not four times, as the hon. gentleman stated. Take the reports of that town year after year, and you will find no changes made except once a year, and sometimes perhaps not that even. I say further that every man should get an opportunity of stating his own case at any rate. The bankers give him that opportunity. You go for a line of credit to a bank, and you are asked to make a statement. You write down your record, your probable worth, the probable extent of your business, your investments of various kinds, and all these things. Who can give that information as well as the man himself? And he has a responsibility attaching to him when he makes that statement, which I consider is, at any rate, a valuable record and one that we should require. The hon. gentleman says that no one is asking for this Bill. How does he know that? We know that there is a good deal of terrorism exercised by these mercantile agencies; that business men who have lines of credit do not wish to jeopardize their positions by coming into open hostility with these concerns, which have the power of ruining them. They have ruined men, and where they cannot ruin they have the power to injure by lowering a man's credit. And so even where not ruinous, it may be undesirable to antagonize these mercantile agencies. It may be for that reason that there are not petitions, that there is not a demand that a Bill of this character should become law. But we know that there is the necessity for restraining these gentlemen; we know that there is a necessity where these institutions exist—and where properly conducted they supply information that is valuable for the business community—that they should have restrictions placed upon them, that they should be made responsible for what they do, and that a certain control of them should be exercised. And that is what is proposed by this Bill. It may be said that the clauses of this Bill are not best calculated to accomplish the end in view. But let the Bill pass its second reading and go before the Committee of Banking and Commerce, which is an experienced committee, where the clauses can be analysed and where a Bill will be produced that will accomplish the result desired in the best way, a Bill that it will be desirable to place on the statute-book of Canada.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The debate which has lasted for some time is a most interesting one and is an evidence of the importance of the legislation which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has introduced. I venture the opinion that it is a most important Bill that is now before us, and I hold that, even admitting, as I do admit, that there is a great deal of good in the measure as proposed, I am not prepared at the present moment to say that it is in such shape that it deserves to receive the approbation of Parliament. For this reason, and more especially as the Minister of Justice is not present, I would ask that the debate be adjourned. Before the second reading is agreed to and the principles of the Bill thereby affirmed, I think that the measure should be looked into very carefully, and that the opinion of the Minister of Justice should be heard. Under these circumstances I propose the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. WALLACE.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 27th February, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CATHOLIC SCHOOLS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Choquette) asked :

1. Whether the Government are aware that the late Sir John Thompson received the following letter :—

St. Albert, March 5, 1892.

To the Hon. Sir John Thompson, Minister of Justice.

Hon. and dear Sir,—Has the legislature of the North-west the right to impose on us, in our Catholic schools, Protestant inspectors? You would confer a great favour on us, dear sir, if you would kindly state to us, in confidence, what you think on this subject. The object is to destroy our separate and Catholic schools in the North-west, and finding it impossible to do away with them completely, at present, our legislators, the great majority of whom are Protestants, are determined at any price to prevent them from working. It is with that view that they now want to thrust upon us Protestant inspectors.

Accept, hon. and dear sir, the assurance of our cordial and devoted respect.

(Signed) VITAL, J., O.M.I.

Bp. of St. Albert.

ALBERT PASCAL, O.M.I.,

Vic. Ap. of Saskatchewan.

2. If so, what reply, if any, did the Government make to the said letter; or are the Government aware whether the late Sir John Thompson, then Minister of Justice, replied to the said letter, either in his own name or on behalf of the Government?

Mr. DICKEY. The Government has no knowledge of any such correspondence.

HARBOUR MASTER AT BRIDGE-WATER.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Forbes) asked:

Why was Joseph Wyman dismissed from the position of harbour master for the port of Bridgewater? What complaints (if any) were made against his efficiency as harbour master? Who made such complaints?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It was represented to the department by the member for the district that, owing to age and infirmity, Mr. Wyman, who did not reside near the place, was unable to perform the duties of harbour master, and Mr. William Oakes was appointed harbour master in his stead by Order in Council of 28th January last. Mr. Wyman is 78 years old.

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND MAINLAND.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked :

1. On what days has the SS. "Stanley" crossed from Prince Edward Island to the mainland since the 20th day of January last ?

2. How often have the mails been taken across at the Capes route since the 20th day of January ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. January 24 and 29 ; February 3, 5, 10, 12, 15 and 24. 2. January 25, 29, 30 and 31 ; and February 1, 4, 6, 9, 12, 13, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22 and 24. Seventeen times up to 24th February, from Tormentine to Prince Edward Island.

ALLAN McBEATH, APPRAISER.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked :

Has Allan McBeath, of St. John, N.B., appraiser, been superannuated ? If so, when, and why, and what allowance does he receive yearly ?

Who has been appointed to fill his late position ? When appointed, and at what salary ? Has a petition been received from a number of St. John merchants asking for Mr. McBeath's reinstatement ?

Mr. WOOD. Allan McBeath, appraiser at St. John, N.B., was superannuated on January 10th, 1896, on account of advanced age, on a retiring allowance of $528 per annum, to which he is entitled under the Act. He has been recalled, and he is now acting as appraiser. A petition has been received from a number of St. John merchants asking for Mr. McBeath's reinstatement.

JAMES KELLY AND JAMES H. HAMILTON.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked :

Has James Kelly, of St. John, N.B., been appointed to any and what position in the Civil Service ? If so, at what salary ? Is he now in the employ of the Government ? If so, in what position and at what salary ?

Is James H. Hamilton, of St. John, in the Government employ ? If so, in what capacity, at what salary, and since when ?

Have either James Kelly or James H. Hamilton passed the Civil Service examination, and if so, when ?

Mr. WOOD. James Kelly has been appointed a preventive officer of customs, at a salary of $1,000 per annum, and is now in the employ of the Government. Mr. Hamilton is not in the employ of the Government. No examination was necessary in the case of James Kelly.

MAIL CONTRACTS—CHRISTMAS ISLAND, &c.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked :

Under what arrangements or contracts are the mails carried between Christmas Island, Cape Breton and East Bay, and between Christmas Island and Grand Narrows ?

When were the contracts entered into, and with whom and what is payable for each service ?

Were tenders called for by public notice before contracts were entered into ? If so, when were the notices published ?

Who is the contractor for each service ? How long is the contract for, and what is paid to him respectively for each contract ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Carriage between Christmas Island and East Bay is performed under a temporary agreement. Carriage between Christmas Island, Grand Narrows, is performed under a regular contract. The agreement for the Christmas Island and East Bay mail service is dated March 1, 1895. With John McDonald, $4 per trip. The contract for the Christmas Island and Grand Narrows service is dated October 1, 1892. With James McDougall, $150 per annum. Tenders were not invited in either case. John McDonald is contractor for the former service, and James McDougall for the latter service. The agreement for the Christmas Island and East Bay mail service is to last during the Postmaster General's pleasure ; the contract for the Christmas Island and Grand Narrows is for four years. $624 per annum is paid for the former contract, and $150 per annum for the latter.

HARRIS PROPERTY, ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked :

What is the total sum to date paid for the purchase of the Harris property for the Intercolonial Railway in St. John, N.B. ? Has any, and what amount has been received from the sale of any buildings, bricks, iron or other moveable property on the land when purchased ? If not sold, what has become of the houses, bricks, iron, &c., on the property when purchased, and if sold, to whom ? What amount has been expended on such property since purchased ? What is the nature of the improvements, and how is the property now used ?

Mr. HAGGART. The total amount paid for the purchase of the Harris property, to date, is $200,000. The only thing sold off the property were the sashes out of the roof of the shed, as they were not required. They were sold by public auction, and were bought by H. A. Gould, of Sussex, for $52.28. Three of the houses are occupied as tenements, for which the Government receive rental. Part of the old brick and wooden buildings have been taken down, and the material used in other buildings, or stored away for future use. The expenditure on the property since purchased, is $3,025.23, and for building the crib-work to make it more convenient for approach to the property, there was expended $2,920.07. Three of the large car shops were refitted, and additional railway sidings were laid. These buildings and sidings are used for storing passenger cars, snow-ploughs, and other rolling stock.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WELDON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to read a sentence from the daily "Mail-Empire," of Wednesday, 26th inst.:

It has been no secret that owing to a long-standing quarrel, the personal relations of Dr. Weldon and Sir Charles Tupper have, since 1887, been somewhat strained, yet it was never supposed that this would lead him to seek to compass the destruction of a man who has for forty years served this country.

I wish to say, if there is a long-standing personal quarrel, I do not know it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am equally ignorant of it, Mr. Speaker.

SEED-GRAIN STANDARDS.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask my hon. friend, the Controller of Inland Revenue, whether a petition has come from Portage la Prairie, from the Patrons there, to His Excellency, respecting seed-grain standards, and whether it will be laid on the Table?

Mr. PRIOR. I may say to the hon. gentleman that such a petition has been received.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. STAIRS. Before I commence the brief remarks on the Budget which I intend to make this afternoon, I will make one promise, and that is that I will not take up so much of the time of the House as was taken by some hon. gentlemen who preceded me in this debate. I think, if I may say so, that it is very desirable, indeed, that hon. members on both sides should cultivate the practice of making short speeches and not long ones, if they wish their speeches to be attentively listened to in the House, and read with interest outside. Now, I want to say, besides, that I am making these few remarks this afternoon because I believe that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, in criticising any statement connected with any of the great industries of this country, wish, doubtless, to be accurate, and I feel sure that in cases in which they have been inadvertently inaccurate, they themselves would be the first persons who would desire to be corrected. In my remarks this afternoon, I intend to speak of what I know.

and, as in the course of the remarks that were made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and for Addington (Mr. Dawson), they referred to an industry of which I know a good deal about, and made some statements which, I am sorry to say, are not according to the facts, it is but fair to that great industry that the House should be put in possession of the facts. I will take up a remark that was first made respecting the sugar industry in this country, by the hon. member for North Wellington. He introduced his remarks on that subject by some very brief quotations from the Trade and Navigation Returns for the fiscal year 1894-95. He said:

Now, let us take the case of sugar. From the 3rd May, 1895, when the duty upon sugar was increased, to 30th June, 1895, the end of the fiscal year, we imported sugar entered for home consumption—according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, page 221—to the amount of 36,216,286 pounds, the value of which was $648,610. The duty collected was $181,081.78, or 28 per cent. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, page 280, we imported, of free sugar, from 1st July, 1894, to 3rd May, 1895, 309,302,296 pounds, value, $6,703,359.

And he goes on to make a charge against the refiners of this country that $1,855,815 in profits was made by the refiners of Canada. In making the statement I do I am speaking of what I know, and I assert most positively that this is not the case. I know it because I happen to be connected with a refinery and I have access to these statements of their business during that period, and also for many years past, and I can assure this House that no such profit was made. If the hon. gentleman's statement was true that that amount of money had been made by the refiners in that period, the company with which I am connected would have received, roughly speaking, about one-third of this sum. The refinery with which I am connected made nothing at all during that particular period, the fiscal year of 1894-95. That I shall show a little later in connection with my reply to something said by the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson).

Mr. WALLACE. For what is the stock of the company selling?

Mr. STAIRS. I will tell the hon. gentleman this, that the company with which I am connected, into which three refineries in the maritime provinces have been united, made a profit in round figures of 6 per cent on the value of the refineries, which every hon. gentleman will admit is not an unreasonable profit. As regards the preferential stock, I do not know exactly what the stock is quoted at. It has been sold as low as 50, and from that to 90, and perhaps on rare occasions at par, for the two different stocks, that is to say, that a man who pays 50 receives one $100 share of preferential stock and one $100 share of common stock, which the hon. gentleman will see is not exceedingly high.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman mean 6 per cent on the actual cost to the existing company?

Mr. STAIRS. To some of the company it is, and to some it is not. What I mean to say is 6 per cent on what the refineries cost in cash when built.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Originally?

Mr. STAIRS. Originally. The hon. gentleman will say that that is not excessive.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not saying whether it is excessive or not. I want to get the facts.

Mr. STAIRS. That is 6 per cent on the actual cost. It will be remembered by some hon. gentlemen that one of the refineries had to wind-up and be reorganized, and after its reorganization it was taken over at a lower figure than it cost. I have just been told—and I give this in reply to the question asked by the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) that $80 had been paid lately for $100 in preference stock and $100 in common stock. If hon. gentlemen will look at the prices during the period referred to by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), they will find that they show conclusively that refined sugar, taking everything into consideration, has been sold as cheaply in Canada as the same qualities have been sold anywhere, either in England or the United States; and if hon. gentlemen will take the difference between the prices of raw sugar and refined sugar in England and the United States, and compare those figures with similar figures in Canada, they will see that they show that the refineries in Canada are not taking any portion of the 64-100 of one cent referred to by the hon. gentleman. Then the hon. gentleman took up another phase of the question.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman has challenged the statement made by me with respect to the profits made by the refineries. I would ask him what answer he can give to the statement made by the refineries themselves as set out in the census. He will find at page 323, vol. III., book C, of the census that they admit over their own signatures that they made a profit of 21 per cent.

Mr. STAIRS. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I will come to that in a few minutes, and when I give my answer he will learn that the refineries did not make any such statement, and so the hon. gentleman's assertion is inaccurate. But I think it better to proceed with my remarks rather than answer the hon. gentleman at the present time. I was going on to say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) then took up another phase of the question, and he told the House that the refineries had, on May 3rd, 150,000,000 pounds of raw sugar on hand. I am sorry to tell the hon. gentleman that such statement is not absolutely correct, the figures are very largely exaggerated. I want to say in this connection that the Government could not have chosen any time for the imposition of a duty on raw sugar without benefit accruing to the refiners and to all holders of sugar in Canada; and I assert most emphatically that for the imposition of a duty on sugar the Government could not, in spite of what has been said by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), have chosen a better time, even if they had sought the very best time, because at that period the smallest stocks were held. I will give the reason why no better time could have been selected. Just at that time navigation was opening at Montreal. As will easily be understood, Montreal refiners during the winter season import very small quantities of raw sugar, because they have to pay extra railway freight on it. They allow the stocks, before the opening of navigation, to run down to the smallest possible limit they can risk, and the time the duty was imposed the Montreal refiners had small stocks, and had brought in practically no raw sugar at all. It is quite true that the refineries in Halifax had more raw sugar on hand than sometime, but not so much as they might have had, and not so much as they would have had. I am convinced, if I had not been of the opinion that no duty would be imposed, I have no objection to tell the House what took place at that time. In the early part of the winter, naturally enough, the refiners of Halifax thought that if the Government wanted any more revenue, they would take sugar as one of the articles upon which to impose additional taxation. If raw sugar had been very high at that time, it would not have been safe to import very much, but raw sugar just then was very low, and they felt justified in anticipating their wants during the next few months, and they imported a little more than they otherwise would have done. Sugar was low, lower than it ever has been, and if the duty went on it they would receive a certain amount of profit, and if the duty was not imposed, raw sugar was so low that they could not lose anything. I may say to the House that I was not so strongly of the opinion as were some of my co-directors at Halifax that an imposition of duty would take place, and very late in the spring, when it became a question as to whether the duties would be imposed or not, they asked my opinion, and I said I believed that a duty would not be imposed, and we cancelled some very large orders for raw sugar, which, had they been allowed to be executed, would have arrived in Canada before the duty was imposed. There is, therefore, nothing in this transaction which in any way reflects either upon the refineries or upon the Government. I may say, Mr. Speaker, in addition, that though the refinery at Halifax had a considerable quantity of raw sugar in hand at that time, yet they had not any larger quantity than they have had at some other times, nor larger quantities than they may have had since. There is another thing which has to be taken into consideration in this connection. The refiners did not by any means get the full benefit of the raw sugar which they had in hand when the duty was imposed, because, so doubtful were they as to whether that duty would be imposed or not, that during the few months preceding, all the refineries in Canada had sold very large quantities of refined sugar for delivery at later dates. The benefit accrued, not to the refiners when the duty was imposed, but to the dealers, and in a very considerable degree, to the consumers as well. As a matter of fact, it was not until some time after the duty had been imposed, that refined sugar really advanced in price correspondingly to the advance made necessary by the duty. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I would not be at all surprised if the imposition of that duty upon raw sugar was not a gain; but possibly a loss to some of the refiners. I feel certain that the most liberal calculation that could be made would not show that the refiners benefited to one-fifth of the amount that is claimed by the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) who made this statement. He estimated that the refiners had obtained an advantage of an entire half cent a pound on the 150,000,000 pounds of raw sugar which he said they had in hand at that time. Well, Sir, I do not believe that the refiners had one-fifth of that benefit. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, let us see how the figures really are. The hon. gentleman told us that the refiners made $1,855,813.77—I notice the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) figured it down to a very fine point in cents; much finer than I could estimate it—and that they also made $750,000, the advantage which he said accrued on the duty, making $2,605,813.77. He then adds the duty which was paid upon the sugar which came in between May and the close of the fiscal year, making in all $2,786,885.55, which he stated the people paid. From what I have said before the House will see that none at all of this was paid by the people, except the duty actually paid to the Government, and that instead of the $16.40 paid in protection, of which he stated $1 only went to the Dominion treasury, and $15.40 into the pockets of the refiners; if he had properly made the calculation he would have had to admit the refiners did not receive the $1. I would furthermore say, in reply to that hon. gentleman, that the $750,000 was not imposed as protection, and that the refiners did not get it. Even if they did get it I claim it would be quite legitimate. As an evidence that some at least of the refiners did not expect the change in duty, and that others of them were not very sure about it, I repeat that they sold refined sugar to a large extent before the duty was imposed; for delivery at later dates in the season of 1895. If they had got any part of the $750,000, it was quite justifiable. It was a class of profit which might be made when increased duties are imposed on any articles, and it would not more than counterbalance the risk that refiners run when duties are reduced. It must be remembered that refiners have to take the risk of duties being reduced as well as of duties being increased, and if they benefit occasionally in one way, they lose very often in the other. As I said before, I doubt if the refiners got a one-fifth part of the $750,000 mentioned by the hon. gentleman, and they did not get the $1,855,813.77 or any portion of it. The hon. gentleman did not prove his statement, nor could he prove it. But, I am in a position to make this declaration of my own knowledge. Having had access to the financial statements issued by the refinery, I say here that they did not make anything. I believe, Sir, that taking the question of quality into consideration, the people of Canada during the operation of the National Policy, have had their sugar at as cheap a price as the people of any country in the world. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) just asked me to explain about the statement given by the refiners in the census return.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Stairs) to say, that the people of Canada get their sugar as cheaply as any people in the world?

Mr. STAIRS. I believe they do. I would qualify that by saying: taking into consideration the quality of the sugar and the terms and conditions under which it is sold. Now, let us see what the census says. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said: that the Government's own statement (meaning the census returns) corroborated the statement which he had previously made, and to which I have already referred. He told us: the census returns of 1891 would show that there were eight refineries in Canada, that the total capital invested in them and employed in conducting the business was $5,922,400, and that the wages paid was $709,811. Now, the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) told us a few minutes ago, that taking the statement of the refiners themselves, they make a large profit. Well, when I go on a little further he will see that the refiners did not state any such thing. The hon. gentleman also said: That the raw material as shown by the census returns cost $15,023,500, making a total cost including wages of $15,733,311, and that the output as given by the companies, amounted to $17,127,100 worth, leaving a net balance of $1,393,789, or say 22 per cent interest on the investment of $5,952,400. The hon. gentleman then suggested that we should allow 5 per cent for wear and tear, which would leave a net profit of 17 per cent. I notice that the hon. gentleman then asked the Minister of Finance to point out where the money comes from.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help saying here, that the hon. member's figures are correctly quoted from the census, but I would like to ask him how he comes to discuss a question of this kind, which I must say—and I do not say it in any offensive sense at all—he does not know anything about.

Mr. McMULLEN. I took the statement from the census returns and I gave it as the authentic statement of the refiners themselves. The question that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Stairs) wants to answer, is, as to the statement of the refiners, and not my statement.

Mr. STAIRS. I admit that the statement so far as it goes, is true, but the hon. gentleman takes the statement to prove something that it does not pretend to prove. The statement never said, that the cost of refining sugar in Canada was the cost of the wages and the cost of the raw material only.

Mr. McMULLEN. It says so distinctly.

Mr. STAIRS. Does it. If the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) refers to the census returns he will find there certain columns giving the raw material, wages, output, &c. But, does the hon. member mean to say that the cost of making sugar is only the cost of wages, and the raw sugar.

Mr. McMULLEN. Certainly not, but there is 21 per cent interest on the entire investment, including the wages paid to those employed in refining.

Mr. STAIRS. If the hon. member cannot see it, I feel sure that a good many members on the other side will see where he is out before I get through. I do not, in any sense, blame the hon. member for not knowing the facts. It is not to be expected that in a technical matter he will know the facts; but I do think I am justified in saying that when he was not absolutely certain of his facts, he should not have taken them to prove the statements he made, when they did not prove them, and were never intended to prove them. Let me repeat. The hon. member calculates a profit of $1,393,789, or 22 per cent gross on the fixed capital employed, and he assumes that the only cost of refining sugar is the cost of wages and the cost of the raw sugar. He overlooks altogether the cost of char, of coal, of the barrels, of repairs, of insurance, of sundries, and commercial and selling expenses. Now, let me point out how the calculation should have been made. Excluding the interest on capital, the items which I have just mentioned amount, roughly speaking, to just four times the cost of the labour. No, I do not mean to say that, but three times the cost of the labour.

Mr. McMULLEN. You might as well say that as say what you are saying.

Mr. STAIRS. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell the House—he is quite welcome to do it if he likes—that you can refine sugar without char, without coal, without barrels to put it into, without repairs to the machinery, without insuring the refineries, and the stock, without paying brokers' commissions and other selling expenses, and the salaries of clerks and book-keepers? If he means to say that, he is free to do it; but I think most hon. members on his own side would admit that it is a very unreasonable position to take. I say these items amount, roughly speaking, to about three times the cost of the labour. Now, let us see how the calculation stands, and I freely confess that I am not making it mathematically exact, but I am giving a very fair approximation. The wages, as given by the census returns, amount to $709,711, the items which I have given would amount to three times that much, or $2,129,134; the cost of the raw material, as given in the census returns, is $15,023,500, making a total of $17,862,744, as the approximate cost of making the sugar, instead of $15,733,311, as given by the hon. gentleman. The output, as given by the census returns, is $17,127,100, leaving a loss on the year's business of $735,644, instead of a profit of over $1,300,000, as claimed by the hon. gentleman, or a loss of about 12½ per cent gross on the capital employed, as given in the census returns, instead of a profit of 22 per cent, as claimed by the hon. gentleman. This is based on the hon. gentleman's own figures, including these unavoidable expenses which I have mentioned, and without which the sugar cannot be refined. If these expenses, besides wages, are incurred in refining sugar, why not include them?

Now, I want briefly to refer to some remarks made on sugar by the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson). Some of his remarks I have already answered, and possibly I may repeat again what I have already stated; but I trust, as I shall not be long, that the House will bear with me for a few minutes. One of the remarks of the hon. member to which I want specially to refer is his charge that there is a monopoly in sugar refining in Canada to-day, and that the refiners of Canada have combined in one undertaking. I desire to deny that most emphatically. There is no monopoly in sugar refining in Canada to-day. The competition between the refineries in Canada to-day is more keen than it ever was before. It is more keen—and I am glad to be able to say it—than it was before the refineries in the maritime provinces were amalgamated into one company. The hon. member asked why we cannot refine sugar as cheaply in Canada as it is refined elsewhere. I think we can; I feel sure we can, if you make very slight allowances for differences in conditions and differences in products. The products we make in Canada are a little different from those made in England. He tells us that we have a right to add to the price the amount of revenue duty, and that sugar should be sold in Canada at Liverpool prices, with the duty added, and no more. He went very fully into quotations of the prices of granulated sugar in London, and the prices in Montreal, for a considerable period. I am not going to follow him all through those figures, but I am going to point out some circumstances that have to be taken into consideration when you make a comparison of this kind. In comparing sugar made in Canada with sugar made in England, you have to make allowance for the difference in the package. The package used in Canada is much more expensive than the package used in England. Our people, it seems, are very much more particular than people are in England as to the package in which the sugar is delivered. They want every pound of sugar sold in Canada, with very little exception, to be packed in new barrels that have never been used before. In England, they use very largely the old packages in which the raw sugar was received. Our people would not take sugar in those packages at all. Then, there is some difference in the quality of the sugar made. The Canadian granulated, especially, is better than the English granulated. There is also some difference in the terms, and in the cost of freightage. Then, there is another little item—not a very large one, but one that ought to be taken into consideration—that is, the loss in weight in the process of refining, and the corresponding loss of duty. The refiners pay 50 cents on every hundred pounds of sugar they get, no matter what its quality may be—on the low test as well as on the high test. The average test of the sugar imported into Canada is, of course, very far below 100. One hundred is about the test of granulated sugar. It will take a great deal more than 100 pounds of raw sugar of the average test imported into Canada to make 100 pounds of granulated; and some allowance—not very much, but still something—has to be made for that difference. Then, when you take the prices in the newspapers, the Montreal "Gazette," or other papers, I do not believe that you get the very lowest prices at which the articles are selling. Some allowance has to be made for that. To prove that, I may say that the retail price of granulated sugar is very often nearly, if not quite as low, as the prices at which the refiners are selling it. No doubt, the refiners sell sugar a good deal lower sometimes than the prices quoted in the papers. These are some of the things that have to be taken into account when making a comparison of this kind. They show that it is almost impossible, by comparisons of this kind, to prove anything about the profits that any industry is making in Canada.

Then, there is another fact connected with the refining of sugar which has to be taken into consideration, when you make a comparison. The English refiners use beet sugar almost altogether; the Canadian refiners use cane sugar with a very low proportion of beet sugar. You can always refine at a lower cost sugar made out of beet than out of cane, but you cannot get as good results, especially in the making of yellow sugar. You cannot put beet sugar very generally into the making of yellow sugar.

I feel confident that, if the protection on sugar were reduced in Canada, at some periods, not perhaps all periods, the refiners in Canada would not be able to work and would have to close down. The American refiners would, at some periods, take hold of this market, and the German refiners would also perhaps flood it with their very cheap beet sugar, and our refineries would be obliged to close down temporarily, men would be thrown out of work, and a very large amount of wages lost in Canada. The amount of wages given in the census, as paid by the sugar refiners, does not show anything like the real amount paid indirectly, as well as directly, in that industry. There is a very large amount paid for barrels, and a great many incidental expenses, a very large proportion of which is really paid out for labour, and which is not mentioned in the census.

I think I am entitled, when speaking on a question of this kind, to ask the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson), who spoke of monopolies and combines in this industry, what evidence he has to show that there is any monopoly or combine among the refiners of Canada at all? I say, most positively not. I am very much pleased to be able to say that the amalgamation of the refiners in the lower provinces has resulted in a much keener competition. The effect was, as was intended, that, instead of there being three weak refineries, some of which had never been profitable at all and had very slight working capital, and all of which were not in the most efficient state to work, these have been combined in one and strengthened and put in thoroughly good repair, and are in a better position than ever to compete with the larger refiners in Montreal.

It is not amiss, also, to point out, that there is nothing in the story which we have heard from time to time, for many years, that a very large amount of money has been made in sugar refining in the lower provinces.

I feel quite sure that I have said enough to show the members of this House and the people of the country, that the charges made against the sugar refining industry of Canada have no foundation in fact, that this industry is a benefit to the country, that it employs a large number of men, giving work to the railways and coal-miners and the makers of barrels, and that with these advantages the people are getting to-day a good sugar and, making allowance for the quality, as cheap sugar as any people in the world.

I do not intend to make any more general remarks, with one or two exceptions. When listening to the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson), there were one or two things he said which struck me as needing a little qualification. I was struck with some of the calculations of the average annual trade that he gave, and, as they are used so frequently in this House, on both sides, to prove either the advantages or disadvantages of the National Policy, I think that hon. members on both sides ought to take into consideration, when using these figures, comparing the trade we were doing with England in 1874-75 with the same trade in 1894-95, that they take in these comparisons only the money values and not the quantities. I am certain that the money values in our Trade and Navigation Returns give but a very poor idea of the amount of trade which we may be doing at different times. In the majority of articles, both in imports and exports, the prices are very much lower now than they were twenty years ago, and our imports and exports must have been increased to a much greater extent than the money values would seem to indicate. That is shown by the increased tonnage arriving in Canadian ports now as compared with twenty years ago. I am not going into the question in detail, but simply point this out as worthy of some attention.

I note something that the hon. gentleman said about the effect of reciprocity on the farmers. There seems to be a general opinion among hon. gentlemen opposite, that the farmers of Canada are not interested in the protective tariff and would be largely benefited by reciprocity with the United States. I am not going to lay down any cast-iron rule, either one way or the other, or make any definite statement, but I suggest the farmers of Canada ought to be very cautious indeed before entering into reciprocity with the United States in farm products. I do not say either one way or the other, but I say it is in their interest to consider very carefully indeed before they allow a reciprocity treaty to be negotiated. I believe they are more interested in the maintenance of a protective policy to-day in their products than any other class in Canada. I cannot see how our farmers could successfully conduct their operations, if the duties upon some of their principal products were wiped out with respect to the United States. Take everything connected with meat products. It goes without saying, that, if a majority of farmers in Canada cannot conduct their operations successfully unless they can raise stock; and, if we were to drop the duty on dressed beef, it is certain that our Canadian manufacturing towns, our large cities and centres, would be supplied very largely with American dressed beef. It was just coming in when the latest increase was made in the duty. I remember, just before that, hearing that Chicago dressed beef was coming into Halifax. That must have reduced the price of ours. After the duty was put on, the import of dressed beef into Halifax ceased.

Now, it is quite certain that unrestricted reciprocity, including the abolition of duties on manufactured goods, as well as those on farm products, would wipe out a very large number of the manufacturing industries of Canada. I was talking, only a few days ago, with a friend who has had a very large experience of manufacturers in the United States, and who in the last year or two has had some experience in Canada; and he gave me, unsolicited, his opinion, that, if we had not the duties to-day, American manufacturers would shut up nearly all the manufactures in Canada. In a late debate I pointed out another result that would follow the abolition of duties on manufactured articles. At that time the duty on agricultural implements was under consideration, and I showed that the result of removing the duties would be that, if our manufacturers did not have to go out of business, the larger and stronger industries would be moved to American centres, where they could manufacture to better advantage for the American market and at no less advantage for the Canadian market. The opinion I then expressed I have had very strongly confirmed since.

Underlying the remarks of hon. members on the other side of the House, there seems to be a belief that any reduction in the duties on manufactured goods coming into Canada would materially benefit the manufacturers of England. I am sure that is a mistaken idea. I feel quite confident that, if we dropped the duty on manufactured articles to-day, the benefit would go, not to the manufacturers of England, but to the manufacturers of the United States, more especially in the case of those articles which Canada is manufacturing generally. Take the staples, such as cotton, sugar, iron, steel and many others. To drop the duties on these articles would injure the Canadian manufacturers and would not benefit those of England. If hon. members will take the trouble to look at the importations, as given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, they will find an illustration of what I say. Take the case of pig iron. Here I may say that, if there is any country in the world that ought to be able to manufacture iron cheaply, it is England, and a few years ago we used to think that, so far as competition in this line is concerned, every other country was out of the running altogether. Take the imports of pig iron, upon which all manufactures of iron are based, and compare the prices of the iron imported from England and that imported from the United States, and you will find that, in the last year, the pig iron from the United States cost about $1 per ton less than that from England. Now, does not that show conclusively that, if you drop the duty upon pig iron to-day, the increased imports would be from the United States, and not from England? And I believe the same would apply to a large number of other articles.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The duty does not enable you to keep the American pig iron out. You imported it last year in spite of the duty.

Mr. STAIRS. We have not enough iron furnaces in Canada to supply the demand.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why, your production diminished 50 per cent last year.

Mr. STAIRS. Oh, no; I think not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Excuse me, I am confident that it did.

Mr. STAIRS. We need not bandy words about the fact; we can look up the returns. We have more power of production to-day than we had before. I noticed another fact in connection with the Trade and Navigation Returns which shows how impossible it is to institute a comparison between the imports from England and the imports from the United States. The Trade and Navigation Returns show that we imported from England, during the last year, $123,000 worth of hemp, and from the United States $497,000 worth. I presume that, in all calculations that have been made, the import of hemp from England was put in as English products and that from the United States as product of the United States. So in this single item England would appear at a disadvantage of very nearly $370,000, as compared with the United States. As a matter of fact, neither of these imports should be included in a calculation of this kind, because the hemp is not the product of either England or the United States, but comes through these countries in transit. So it is very difficult, indeed, either from the census returns or the Trade and Navigation Returns, to found a reliable argument upon statistics of this kind.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to take up the time of the House any longer. A great deal was said by the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson) that might be replied to; but I think the hon. gentleman said very little, even in the long speech that he made, that was new or that has not been already completely answered by hon. members in this House or on the public platform.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) says that the sugar question is a technical question. I believe it is; and I do not pretend to be capable of discussing it. But the hon. member did set up a defence for that particular industry, though I am not able to say whether that defence is complete. But I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is only in keeping with every other industry affected by the tariff. Each industry must set up a defence for the duties that have been adopted for its benefit. So each one is in the same position as a client with his solicitor before this court, each trying to show that the industry he represents is a benefit to the country, and that the tariff, so far as it affects that industry, must be maintained in the interest of the country. That is the real character of the whole system. If we had a sensible system, under which every one had the same rights and there were no special interests protected, there would be no such discussions to show that this or that particular industry was of such value to the country that special privileges must be conferred upon it. This being a technical question, as I have said, I leave the issue between the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) to those who are to follow me, for one must read the statement made by the hon. member for Halifax before he will be able to reply. But the hon. member for Halifax says that the farmers are more interested in the National Policy, and, as I understood him, are more benefited by it than any other class. One or two figures will suffice. The census shows that in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia we had 19,965 fewer farmers in 1891 than we had in 1881. It must be an admirable system in the interest of the farmers that leads to such a result as that. In the whole Dominion of Canada in those ten years, with a fertile country, with only one acre of every hundred of arable land in Canada under cultivation, we actually had 7,000 less farmers in 1891 than we had in 1880. How are you going to prove prosperity? Are you going to prove prosperity by simply making a statement? Are you going to prove prosperity by simply showing that one man in a particular place may have sold an article, at a given time, at a high price? Does that prove prosperity? How are you going to prove that any class in Canada are benefited by a tariff except by showing that all classes in Canada are benefited? But here we have a special class, and the class of all others in Canada most interested—because, being the larger, they are the most interested—and that is the condition of things with reference to it. Now, if the tariff was a good thing for the farmer, we would have more farmers in 1891 than we had ten years previously, would we not? The great boast of the manufacturers is this, that there are more men engaged in manufacturing now than there were formerly, and for that reason they set up the argument that protection must be a good thing. Now, apply that to the farmers who, in Canada, comprise at least 60 per cent of the whole population, and I have shown you the condition of the farmers. But I will come to that matter a little later. I only refer to it now to show that so far as the provinces by the sea are concerned, from which the hon. member and myself both come, we have, as I said, to speak accurately, 9,965 less farmers than we had ten years ago. A number of things have been said during the debate that I think are worthy of notice. For instance, the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney), who, I am glad to see in his place, lays down the proposition that protection is a good thing in practice. But before a man has made out his case, he must prove that protection is a good thing in principle as well as in practice. I will read his words :

I hold that protection is amply vindicated and justified by results when it brings about three things : first, if it keeps the home market for the industries of the country ; secondly, if it reduces the price of the article, or keeps the price down ; and thirdly, if it enables the manufacturer to go abroad in the open markets of the world, and compete openly there with the manufacturers of other countries.

That is to say, firstly, protection is a good thing if the manufacturers can get the home market ; secondly, if it keeps down the price just as it was, if it makes it lower then it would be better ; and thirdly, if the manufacturers can go abroad. Now, protection, he says, would enable them to keep down the price at the same figure as it was before. But as there are only, at most, about 12 per cent of the population of Canada engaged in manufacturing, what has he to say about the 88 per cent who are not so engaged ? Are they not to be considered at all ? When he says that if the manufacturers of Canada can keep the market at home, can keep the prices as they were, or perhaps lower, and in this way can sell their goods abroad, and compete in the open markets of the world, has he made out a good case for protection ? What of the toiling farmer ? What of the fisherman ? What of the lumberman ? What of the miner ? He does not care for them, if he has only 12 per cent of the population protected, and if, by that protection, they are increasing in wealth. Surely a condition of things would be the best for the country in which the whole 100 per cent were getting the greatest possible advantage in return for their labour. My hon. friend thinks he has made a good point in favour of protection when he shows that 12 per cent of the population can do these things. He must go further. He must show that there is an exclusion of foreign goods, because if an article is as cheap in this country as it was before when it came in under a cheaper rate of duty, then I submit that, so far as that particular article is concerned, there is no need for a duty, or anything else. I notice, for example, that the farmers are now getting a considerable amount of attention at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. In the previous four or five sessions of this Parliament, I have noticed that the discussion was chiefly directed to the interests of the manufacturer. But things are changed now, and it is attempted to be shown that protection is a good thing because it helps the farmer. For example, the hon. member for Halton says that certain articles were selling at a certain price at a given date, and he thinks he has established his case when he says that the article sells higher on that date in Canada than it does in the United States. His quotations were made for a few days previous to the time he spoke. Now, the hon. member is a very intelligent man, but if he thinks that he has proved his case by showing that on a particular day, at a particular point, an article is higher than it is at some other point on that day, I think he is in error :

In his speech on the Budget, Mr. Henderson, of Halton, begged the farmers to remember the blessings conferred on them by the National Policy tariff on pork. Let me point out that on that very day dressed hogs were selling in Detroit at $5.25 to $5.50, and in Chatham at $4.75 to $4.90. It continues : "In yesterday's "Empire" live hogs are quoted in Toronto at $3.75 to $4 ; in Buffalo, at $4.45 to $4.55 ; lambs, $3.50 to $4.25 in Toronto ; $4.45 to $4.65 in Buffalo. Sheep, $2.50 to $2.75 at Toronto ; $3.25 to $3.85 at Buffalo. Choice steers, $3.40 in Toronto ; $4.25 to $4.35 at Buffalo. Butchers' cattle, $2 to $2.25 in Toronto ; $3 to $3.70 in Buffalo. In the face of such figures, which can be found in the "Empire's" market reports almost daily, the Conservative members are paying intelligent farmers a poor compliment in asking them to bless the National Policy."

Does not the hon. gentleman see that the conditions of the trade make the prices, just as the wind changes its course to rush into a vacuum, so does trade ; and according as the reading of the barometer is high or low, so the price varies according to the demand at a particular point. Why, the hon. gentleman arrogates to his policy some of the attributes of Deity, if he thinks it can improve the price in one country only when the demands of our very existence call in various places for a supply that must be provided. I venture to say that there is no day in the year upon which the quotations made by the hon. gentleman could not be shown in a different light at those two points, and from these figures one person could prove that protection is a good thing, and another person could prove that free trade is a good thing. Now, that is not the way to arrive at a principle. If the hon. gentleman's argument is any good at all, he must show clearly that continuously the price in Canada, under the National Policy, has been greater than in the United States. But I will give him a further benefit. What if, during all the years in which protection has been in operation in Canada, the prevailing prices have altogether been in favour of Canada as against the United States? But, Mr. Speaker, does any man not understand this, that prices, so far as they are affected by the home market, must be fluctuating? There are 60 per cent of the people of Canada engaged in farming, and there are about 12 per cent engaged in manufacturing, and the hon. gentleman thinks that it is a good thing for the 60 per cent to be engaged in providing food for the 12 per cent, and that the 60 per cent have the best market in the world, because they have an opportunity of selling to the 12. Now, can anything be more ridiculous than that? How in the world are the 60 per cent to be made wealthy by selling only to the 12 per cent. That is what I would like to know. The home market is a good market, but you must regulate the home market in order to make protection effective, by finding how many mouths are to be filled, and then raising just the requisite quantity, and dividing it, as is done in some lines of business, among the various farmers, saying to each one: You need to raise so many hogs, and you need to raise so many bullocks, and you need to raise so many bushels of wheat, and you need to raise so many bushels of barley—just the production that is required to feed the 12 per cent; and you dole it out among them, and this makes the country prosperous. It will require more skill and more wisdom than the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) is able to bring to bear on this question to make them believe that any policy in the interests of the few is for the benefit of the many. The law of supply and demand does not recognize any such principle. It recognizes this fact, that every man has to labour the best he can, and that it is quite possible for a farmer to get not only the market nearest to him, but markets elsewhere, and then he need not calculate how much he shall raise this year, for it is only a question as to how much he can raise and how cheaply he can raise it, and it is according to the cheapness that he will have an advantage over his neighbour. The whole question is one of industry and skill, and not one as to nice calculation of how much is required, and therefore he will raise that and nothing more. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been talking about farming, and even the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) devoted some attention to that subject. I wish to place on record the ideas of men who are not politicians, but who formed themselves into a body in order to obtain relief from the effects of the National Policy. Between 300,000 and 400,000 farmers in Canada are combined as Patrons of Industry. I do not think they are all-wise, nor do I think they are lacking in intelligence, but rather that they possess as much intelligence as ordinary men in this country, but the very fact that this organization has been called into existence is the best proof that something is wrong in the tariff and the government of the country. I want to put what the Patrons say as against the contention put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the National Policy is in favour of the farmers, and I want the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), and all other hon. gentlemen who have been telling the farmers that the National Policy has been to their advantage, to settle the question with these men who have combined together for their best interests. I will refer first to what the Patrons say about farmers. They state:

Protectionists maintain to be sure that they benefit the farmer. And we have seen, they are not protecting him against Australian competition, then they coax by steamship bonuses to come here.

I shall never forget the look in the face of an hon. gentleman who sat next to me at a dinner given to the Australian delegates, when one of the speakers, quoting prices, said that he thought $60 or $70 could be obtained for a bullock in Canada, and an Australian remarked that such a bullock could be raised for $12 or $13, perhaps $10. The remark of an hon. gentleman whose devotion to the Conservative party is beyond question, was emphatic, it might be described as cursory in the highest sense. The farmers have caught on to the point, and they speak of it in this statement:

At present his only possible competitor in the Canadian market is the American farmer. Canadian protectionists say in effect that, although he has been protected up to the eyes for years, the American farmer does not possess the home market in which he can sell all he raises at remunerative prices, but is obliged to export vast quantities dirt cheap against which it is necessary to protect the Canadian farmer.

Here I may say, the question of exporting "dirt cheap" is a phrase that has no meaning in it, and that is a phrase used by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) about the United States market.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No, I never said that.

Mr. FRASER. The products of labour are exchanged by men because they want to satisfy their cravings for other things, and naturally these products are not sold dirt cheap; they are simply exchanged in the best markets, and with the most satisfactory results to the individual. They believe that the purchasing power which labour brings them in exchange will give them the greatest benefits with regard to results. Therefore the statement is correct. The Patrons further say:

It is admitted, in short, so far as regards protection to farmers in the United States, it is a failure. American protectionists, like McKinley, say, in turn, that notwithstanding the National Policy, which was to increase its price and furnish it with a home market, Canadian farm produce is so miserably low that the American farmer must be protected against it, or he will starve.

These are the ideas put forward, and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) gave a little colour to the idea presented as regards the effect of protection in the United States, by stating that if he lived in the United States he would be a Republican and have supported the McKinley Bill, but as he lived in Canada he could not do so because that measure was a bad thing for this country. That is the idea in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite—it is one of warfare, it is that if a man can cut and slash his neighbour, it is the better for the individual, and that nations, as individuals, should fly at each other's throats and seek to get the best of them, and that therefore tariff walls are advantageous. The Patrons pronounce protection as a fraud so far as the interests of the Canadian farmers are concerned. They say further :

They pronounce Canadian protection a fraud so far as the interests of the Canadian farmers are concerned. If there were two yellow wagon doctors at a fair vending the same lightening oil, and if each declared it to be a humbug in the hands of the other, we should have little difficulty in coming to the conclusion that both were quacks.

The Americans say : Keep out the low price products of Canada, and Canada says in return : Keep out the trash of the United States. This position must involve humbug, of course, because it cannot be true. Reference has been made to the cheese industry, and I desire to quote what the Patrons, many of whom are engaged in the business, say about it. They say :

The cheese industry has grown rapidly in Canada, and protectionists say gleefully, yes, cheese is protected 3 cents a pound. In the States it is protected 4 cents. Unprotectionists principles it must be dearer there than here, so that our duty is useless. Practical cheese men, like Mr. D. M. Macpherson, Patron M.P.P. for Glengarry, say with truth, that if our duty had never been imposed at all the industry would have thriven with no less vigour.

I admit that Mr. Macpherson, Patron member for Glengarry, may not be correct ; but I presume he has studied the subject, and as he is a practical man, he possesses more knowledge of the industry than professional men in this House. I presume any man who works a farm gets practical experience which is worth all the theories in the world, especially when protection is presented to the people as the best policy for the country. A farmer, for example, is a better authority on farming than is the hon. member for Kent and myself, who are both professional men ; and when these farmers unitedly issue such statements, not for the purpose of securing seats in Parliament and holding the reins of Government, but because they have studied the question in relation to their own business, surely their opinions are worth more than those held by professional members in this House. These opinions are not the opinions of members connected with the Liberal party, but of men connected with both the Liberal and Conservative parties, who have united against the National Policy for the purpose of securing tariff reform in Canada. I commend to hon. gentlemen opposite who live in farming constituencies what the Patrons say about the effects of the National Policy.

Mr. CAMERON. They are manufacturers.

Mr. FRASER. We have it now—farmers are manufacturers.

Mr. CAMERON. These are manufacturers of cheese.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman says farmers are manufacturers.

Mr. CAMERON. No. You are speaking of manufacturers.

Mr. FRASER. I am speaking about farmers, and the hon. gentleman has the majority of farmers in his county.

Mr. CAMERON. Cheese-makers are manufacturers.

Mr. FRASER. They depend on wheat, and everything else that they produce.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I beg to inform my hon. friend that we have cheese manufacturers in Inverness.

Mr. FRASER. I am aware of that, but I am talking about the farmers. The cheese matter is only one matter to which they refer.

Anyway, the protectionist cries, you must admit that the duty of 7½ cents per bushel on corn increases the price of corn. No doubt it does, and more's the pity. The cattle-raising and dairying industries, of so much importance to the country, require cheap feed above everything.

The farmer believes in two things. First, that protection increases the price of the article, and, secondly, being true Canadians, with the pluck of Britons in them, they are not afraid to compete with the United States or anywhere else. That is what they say, and they have arrived at that conclusion for two very good reasons. They know that the small home market never can give them sufficient impetus to go into business, and they feel that as Canada is a better country than the United States, and that as Ontario is much in advance of the states lying immediately south of the line, they are not afraid to meet the people of the United States in open competition. Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite have not already possessed themselves of this "Hand-book Introducing Facts and Figures in Support of the Patron Platform and Principles," if they send me their names I will be very glad to forward them this book, and to direct their careful attention to it. Although I am not a Patron myself, this book contains so much good political economy, that it will afford much useful and needed information to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). Do you endorse it all ?

Mr. FRASER. There is enough that is good in it, to make anything that I am not in accord with perfectly innocuous in the hands of an intelligent man. Now, Sir, coming directly to matters that I think ought to engage our attention in Canada. It is well for us, from time to time, to look at our national book-keeping. I have not compared one year with another, nor have I attempted to show that the country was better or worse off when Mr. Mackenzie was in power. That has been ably done by gentlemen who preceded me on this side of the House. But I shall, Sir, take a calm look at just exactly how we stand as a country during the last twenty-eight years.

Since the year 1868 we find that our imports have exceeded our exports by about $20,000,000 annually. Now, the very statement of that fact is a complete answer to the National Policy. The National Policy was designed to make our exports greater than our imports, but it has failed in that, and on the average our exports have been $20,000,000 a year less than our imports. What is the meaning of that ? Why, a child in political economy understands that $20,000,000 had to go out of Canada to pay some debt of some kind. We did not take it back in bullion, because during the last twenty years the total import of bullion into Canada is only $9,000,000 more than the export of bullion. Where has that $20,000,000 annually gone ? If protection is a good thing, it ought to enable us to send more out of the country than we bring in. That was the promise made for the National Policy at the time of its introduction. That promise has failed of its fulfilment, and to that extent the National Policy has failed.

Our gross debt in 1868—and I am merely looking at our books as a careful accountant would, not comparing one year with the other—our gross debt in 1868 was $96,896,066, and our net debt the same year was $75,728,641. At that we started on our race as a young nation in 1867. Now, in 1895, our gross debt has reached $318,480,000, and our net debt has leaped up to $253,740,000, an increase in our gross debt over 1868 of $221,583,954, and an increase in our net debt of $178,011,359. Now, let us take our revenue. In 1868, which is the first year for which figures are obtainable, our revenue was $13,687,928, and our expenditure was at the modest sum of $13,486,092. Compare this with our revenue last year. Our revenue last year was only $33,978,129, and our expenditure was $38,132,000, which means that the increase in our revenue since confederation up to last year was $20,290,201 each year. We see, therefore, that the increase in our expenditure last year over the first year of confederation was $24,645,918. Let us take the total trade and see how that stands. The total trade of Canada in 1868 was $131,027,533, and our total trade last year was $224,420,488, an increase of $103,392,952. But let it not be forgotten that since confederation Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, and every acre of land west of Ontario was brought into our Dominion. Therefore, our total trade—notwithstanding all the increase that we made in territory between 1867 and the present time—has only increased $3,500,000 a year, and when I refer to our total trade I mean of course our exports and imports combined. In 1867, our government cost us $3.87 per head of the population, but in 1895 our government cost us $7.87 per capita. Our population in 1871 was 3,485,761. Since that time Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, and all west of the great province of Ontario has been added, but notwithstanding this, at the last census our population was only 4,833,239. Therefore, we increased in population about 67.773 per annum. The increase of our population since confederation has been 39 per cent, but, on the other hand, the increase in our expenditure has been 182 per cent. Now, Sir, I am not going to say that that expenditure was all thrown away by any means, but I will say that if any prudent business man saw that his business had increased only 39 per cent, he would not think he was transacting business on a proper scale if his expenditure increased 182 per cent, while the power of paying the expenditure, namely, population, had only increased 39 per cent. It must never be forgotten, Sir, that a country is like a household. If the wage-earner, the head of the house, has only an increase of 39 per cent in his revenue to meet an increased expenditure of 182 per cent, nothing but bankruptcy stares him in the face. Now, if Canada has only increased 39 per cent in population, let me ask, Are we in a very good position when we have increased our expenditure by 182 per cent. One of two things must be shown. Either that the 39 per cent of the increase in our population are just that much richer than the population in 1867, and that much better able to pay the difference between the 39 per cent, which should be the increase of expenditure in a well-balanced country, and the 182 per cent, which is our real increase. That is not comparing one item with the other. Therefore I want to point out that while our debt per head of population is $50, in the United States the central, state, county, municipal and school debts all combined amount to $32 per head. If you add to that $50 our provincial, county, municipal and school debts, you will see at once the position Canada holds as compared with our neighbours to the south. Then it must not be forgotten, besides all this, that the very people who above all other pay this debt, the farmers of this country, have been decreasing in number during the last ten years. That is a statement which I submit is worthy of serious consideration by every man in Canada—for this reason. There is no charmed method by which a country can be run different from the way in which every man's business is run. There is no method by which this country can increase and prosper when our debt is increasing in greater ratio than our population. Therefore it is imperative that we should look the present condition of the country squarely in the face, to see whether or not any policy which produces these results is in the best interests of the people of Canada. I am not, Mr. Speaker, going to repeat what has been so admirably done by my predecessors; because I think the process of education has now gone on sufficiently to make our friends on the other side cease their cry that we have no policy. They needed the drastic lesson they have received, because they had been repeating that cry over and over again; and, like many men more honest in their views than they are, they came at last, simply from hearing their own voices so often, to think that there must be some truth in it. Here is a publication called "The People's Almanac" which I understand has been decreed by the Government to be the political bible of the Conservative party, and, from the number of tons of it I see distributed in Canada, I can understand that very well. Now, let us see what this "People's Almanac" has to say about the policy of the Liberal party. In the preface it is stated:

The year 1896 will see a general election to the House of Commons of Canada in which, for the fifth time, the contest will be between the protectionists and free traders.

Not between the protectionists and those who have no policy; not between the protectionists and the annexationists even; but between the protectionists and the free-traders. And when a man sits down to write in cold blood, and to be responsible for what he says, he will tell the truth, whether he wants to or not. That is all the answer I need to make to hon. gentlemen opposite who say that the Liberal party have no policy. This pamphlet tells the truth when it says that this fifth contest is to be exactly on the same lines as all the others—the lines between protection and free trade. What hon. gentlemen opposite mean by free trade I know not, and I care not. I only want to say that the policy of the Liberal party is the same now that it has been in four elections. That policy always has been a policy of taxation for revenue only, looking to the greatest possible amount that can be produced by an even distribution, without respect to classes or persons, and limited to the amount required to meet honest and economical government.

Now, in speaking of the population of Canada, I want to emphasize this—that there is no country in the world that I think equal to Canada in respect of giving the best opportunities to men from all countries to come here and make themselves wealthy and comfortable. I have seen the best of the United States; and while my particular feeling as a child of this soil may, perhaps, lead me to be somewhat emphatic in my statement, I want to say that I believe Canada to be the best country in this world in all that is required to build up a healthy, comfortable and prosperous people. I went to the North-west two years ago. I travelled through Manitoba. Then I went down on my homeward way through Dakota; and as between Manitoba and Dakota, to use an expression sometimes used among Americans, Dakota is not in it. Manitoba is much in advance of Dakota in every respect. But the sad fact which I met with there was that in the last decade the population of Dakota had increased by a greater number of souls than our whole population west of Lake Superior, including Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia. That is to say, in those ten years the population of Dakota increased more than the combined population of that whole magnificent country. We have been playing for some time with the office of Minister of the Interior. As each man has taken that position, we have heard the exclamation: "This is the man who is going to revolutionize matters in the North-west." I remember particularly, when the present occupant, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), assumed that office, what a flourish of trumpets there was. "A live man at last." I remember that the daily papers in the interest of the Government announced: "Mr. Daly assumed control of his office this day, and at once inaugurated a new and vigorous policy in regard to the North-west." The hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) had not much confidence in some of his predecessors, judging from certain statements he made that were neither very elegant nor very flattering. But this man was going to fill the North-west with a population of teeming millions. Well, let us look at the result of the operations of last year. The number of homesteaders who went into the North-west last year was 2,144, or 569 less than the year previous. The immigrants who arrived at Halifax, Quebec and Montreal numbered 22,363, a decrease of 2,290 as compared with the previous year. 17,231 declared their intention of becoming residents, against 18,923 in the year before. The total number who settled in Manitoba, the North-west and British Columbia, were only 4,901, as against 6,650 in 1894, or a decline of 1,749. That is the vigorous policy. That is the policy that was going to people that country—and a better country does not exist in the world. It has everything to commend it to people as a place of settlement; and yet there is a decline each year.

And yet the hon. member for Western Assiniboia, with that devotion that is begotten of the race to which he belongs, still clings to his idols, and calmly awaits further developments. There was a time when in the process of revolution he kicked. Now he is tranquil, and he thinks that the brightest and best place in the world is where a Grit is guillotined. That country can never prosper except by opening the gates and making it worth while for men to go in there from every country under the sun. That great North-west has been peopled so slowly. A number of reasons may be given; but one reason I believe to be the fact that the Government parcelled out among their retainers large tracts of land. Being a sort of radical myself, I want to say here and now that I do not believe any individual or corporation should own a single acre of land except what they are utilizing for legitimate purposes. I believe that the land belongs to the people; and when you make regulations of any kind that enables any man or body of men to hold more than they are prepared to utilize, in order that they may benefit by the rise in value consequent on the labour of others, you are committing a crime of which you will reap the reward some day. A block here and a block there, the Government have given to hungry retainers, who hold these lands and ask more for them than they are really worth. They can go on holding the lands because they got them for a song, and they need not pay interest on the investment because the investment was a mere trifle; and these are the lands that should be open to settlers and cultivated, but which remain instead idle in the hands of speculators. Of course there is plenty of land elsewhere; but any one who goes to that country must see that one of the prime conditions in settling such a country, where in some places there is very little water and where there is very little forest, is that the people must congregate together, so that any artificial lines inclosing large quantities reserved by some parties and preventing the people congregating together, and subjects them, if they try to do so, to being met by the bailiff or some official of some company who stops them from taking up the land which the Creator designed for them and no others. This policy has produced most lamentable results in the North-west. Where are the millions who should have been in that country ere this? Where is that country that was to be the pride not only of its own inhabitants but of all others? To-day I believe there are hundreds in that country, with wealthy soil about them in greater abundance than any place I ever saw, who would leave it to-morrow if they could. I have met such, unfortunately, and I told them: If you leave the country, you will be making the biggest mistake in your life. One of the evil effects of giving large tracts of land to people out there was this. It created the idea among the people of Canada that they need only go out there for a few years, take up a large tract of land, and make their fortunes. You can never people a country that way. You can only people it by throwing it open so that a man can obtain just enough land to cultivate, 200 or 300 acres. He will then feel that the country is going to be his home, that there he is going to settle and live and die, and that his first effort must be to raise enough to supply himself and his family, trusting to the years that come for the further increment that is going to increase his wealth. But we have held the country up as a golden Eldorado for speculators. We have inoculated people with the idea that they need only go out there, take up large tracts of land, make immense profits by selling them to others, and then return and become nabobs in their native country where they would enjoy more of the luxuries of life than they could out in the west.

Another factor is the tariff, which puts obstacles in the way of settlers getting the best returns out of what they have to send out of the country and getting in return at the cheapest rates what they require to bring into the country. The Government in place of grappling with the difficulty, through their Minister of Interior (Mr. Daly) as they promised, bring down the pitiable return showing that last year there were 1,794 less people who took up farms than in the previous year. Now, is there anything wrong with the country? I only met one man in the North-west who said there was. He was a minister, and I found that he had bought a tract of land, and when he was not getting any money out of it and nobody was going to hear him, he concluded that the land was bad.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Was he a Minister of the Crown?

Mr. FRASER. No, they have all the advantages without going there at all, and none of the disadvantages.

Mr. FOSTER. To what party did he belong?

Mr. FRASER. He was one of the worst kind of Tories I ever met in the whole North-west. Indeed he wanted to appear on the platform and attempt to answer us, and when we found out that he wanted to run down the country, we had not the time to listen to him. I say that the Government have been very remiss on this question. Though not a native of that country, I speak with some warmth on this question, because I felt the influence that country has on any one who goes there. I feel that if that great country to the west fails, Canada fails. Canada will fail to-day in all that her best admirers hope she may be, if our great west does not succeed. One of the things that struck me in this debate was the clamour that was made for the National Policy, so far as its effects upon the farmer are concerned. It also struck me that it was a wonderful thing that hon. gentlemen opposite did not think of this panacea for so long a time. Why were the down-trodden farmers permitted for so many years to work under a revenue tariff before this panacea was discovered. Hon. gentlemen opposite had the nation to the south of us as an example. Why did they not relieve the farmers between 1867 and 1874? The poor farmer was allowed to go on in the depths of financial degradation all these years, and there was not a man in the Conservative party whose bosom beat with compassion and who wanted to produce this panacea for all the farmers ill. How is it nobody ever thought of protection between 1867 and 1874? How was it that the fertile brain of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was not engaged in solving that problem during all these years? How was it that the scholastic Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) did not think out this problem and solve it in the best interests of Canada? He seemed to have slept securely all these years without ever thinking of his down-trodden country.

Mr. FOSTER. My heart bled with sympathy.

Mr. FRASER. His heart may have bled as the country is now bleeding, but that bleeding process did not bleed to any practical result. This poor country suffered under a revenue tariff between 1867 and 1874, and there was not a man in the Conservative party to raise his voice in favour of a change to protection. What was the reason? It was because they knew very well that the system then prevailing was the best system for the country. But when adverse fortune struck Canada as it struck many another country, when adverse fortune struck the Conservative party, then they said: Here is a method by which we will overturn our opponents, and we will introduce this panacea for all the ills under which we are now labouring.

Mr. DAVIN. I proposed protection in 1872 to Hon. George Brown.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You were a Liberal then.

Mr. DAVIN. Not at all.

Mr. FRASER. Why did not the hon. gentleman go to the willing ears of the Conservative party? Because, to hear them talk, you would think they were protectionists all their lives. His party affiliations were not with the Hon. George Brown, and it is a strange thing that he should propose this change to a man who was not in power. It is strange that this panacea was never then thought of. Now, we are passing through exactly a similar condition. Canada to-day is in as bad a position as it was when Mr. Mackenzie was in power. We had a striking illustration of that to-day, and I could not help looking at the Finance Minister, as his face turned all colours when the best banker in Canada—

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is out of order in referring to what took place in committee.

Mr. FRASER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say his silence, and a very suggestive silence, marked by an expression of countenance, is a matter which cannot be referred to because it happened in committee? If so, I withdraw my statement. I thought any changes in the exterior, or changes in the interior indicated by the exterior, were matters we might discuss. If I am out of order, I will withdraw my words. But, I submit, that the reason for all that, whoever said it, was that distinguished men here and elsewhere were hinting that the condition of trade in Canada was not good. And the highest authority in banking had to admit it elsewhere than in this House. I do not intend to berate hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not going to adopt the tactics they adopted against the great and good man who did his best to stem the tide of humbug that was inaugurated by hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not going to hold them altogether responsible for the condition of trade in Canada. I will hold them responsible only so far as their policy has injured the country. But I wish to call their attention to this fact, that during the years I have referred to, the policy they followed was to declare that the Government of the day was responsible, and to promise that, if they were given the reins of power, they would restore to Canada all the benefits that the people wanted. They claimed to have a sort of Prospero's wand by waving which over Canada they could call forth the wealth of soil, and mine, and forest, and sea, and make all Canada prosperous, contented and happy. They promised to bring back those who had left and to keep in Canada all who were here. All I have to say is this, naming no man, that the men who would address a people in their extremity—an extremity brought about by causes beyond the control of the Government—the men who would appeal to the woes of the people, at such a time, were charlatans. The tactics they followed were not the tactics of honourable men. I am not going to take advantage of any difficulty that exists in Canada and seek to convince the people that it is caused by the Government altogether. In large part, they are responsible, but I do not press even that point. All I say to the people of Canada is: Here are the gods you have been worshipping; have they helped you? Dumb idols they are. Break them in pieces and see to it that no such men can ever rule in Canada more. Was it fair, was it generous, was it honest, for these men to use the arguments they did with the people of Canada during these years? I am glad to observe that the medicine is taking effect upon the mind of the hon. gentleman opposite. I hope that is only the beginning of a state of mind and heart that will make him incapable of leading his party in the wrong direction, as he does now—this I say without wishing him any harm. Periodically, since the adoption of this policy, we have had schemes of different kinds presented to the people of Canada, one thing for one election and another thing for another election. For the last election the cry was reciprocity. This year I see that something entirely new has been brought out. We are now going to strengthen the British Empire by having preferential trade relations with Great Britain. Did the hon. gentleman ever make the calculation what our trade with Great Britain amounted to? The trade with Canada amounts to 3 per cent of the trade of Great Britain. I do not know that it is so much as that; certainly, it is not more. Are hon. gentlemen opposite to induce Great Britain to mould their trade policy with a view to this 3 per cent of their trade? I may be wrong as to the percentage, but I think the figure I have given—3 per cent—is about correct. At any rate, it cannot be very much more. So this is what is proposed—Great Britain is to make her trade relations having in view only 3 per cent of her trade. Great Britain will not do such a thing, and hon. gentlemen opposite know it. But they wish to make it appear that they are the only true friends of British connection, just as in 1891 they sought to make it appear they were the only loyal party in Canada. I am sorry the Secretary of State is not here, because I wish to read two statements made by that hon. gentleman, and to contrast them. The hon. gentleman, when he arrived in New York, was interviewed by the reporter of the New York "Herald." I quote from that interview:

Reporter—"Has the question of adopting protection in trade obtained any foothold in England?"

Sir Charles—"I do not think there is any sentiment there in favour of it. Neither the late Government nor the present, nor any section of the dominant party, would entertain it."

Think of that, and this is the hon. gentleman who is trying to make trade relations with Great Britain by which, for the sake of 3 per cent of her trade, she is going to upset her whole trade arrangements.

Reporter—"How about the Canadian people—are they not inclined toward it?"

Are they? Hear what the Secretary of State says:

Sir Charles—"No, the Canadian people are not in favour of protection."

That appeared in the New York "Herald." If the hon. gentleman says that that is not a correct report of what he said, I will, of course, accept his word. But that appeared in the New York "Herald" immediately after he landed on this side. But I will read some further words, in case it may be said that they should, in fairness, be quoted:

They have adopted the policy of incidental protection, the protection of manufactories and industries to which Canada is best adapted. So far as one may judge, the election of 1878 settled it that Canada was in favour of maintaining the present policy.

Yet he says the Canadian people are not in favour of protection. What, then, does he mean? Of course, he means to say that the Canadian people are not in favour of protection as a permanent policy, but that they adopted it for a purpose and for that purpose they maintain it. The New York "Herald" goes to England, and this will show the people of Great Britain what the hon. gentleman wishes them to think. In 1891, we were said to be disloyal. There is a book published in England, called Whitaker's Almanac, in which they give the notable events that occurred day by day. And this is what they say of 18th February, 1891:

Sir Charles Tupper, at Toronto, charged Canadian Liberals with treason, and conspiring to annex Canada to the United States.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER. "Hear, hear," says one of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me remind him that this very gentleman, the Secretary of State, in Ottawa a few days ago, declared that the whole people of Canada are loyal.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). There has been a considerable change.

Mr. FRASER. It may be that a considerable change has come over the hon. gentleman. No change has come over the people of Canada. They have always been loyal.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He will settle that when he gets into the Senate.

Mr. FRASER. If he does not settle it before then, judging by recent events, it will remain a long time unsettled. But in this case, as in former cases, the Government are simply humbugging the people, being ready to do anything to distract the attention of the people from the misdeeds of the Administration.

Mr. FOSTER. Appolinaris.

Mr. FRASER. Well, if the hon. Finance Minister will bring the appolinaris, I will be very glad to have it. Now, I was going to say that, so far as this policy is concerned, I believe it will be a failure, not only in England, but here. I believe the country has had enough experience to lead it to appreciate exactly where the party stands, and, as they did not produce this panacea for us previous to 1878, I leave it them, as I said, to settle that question. But I want to know, if protection, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, raises the price of what the farmers have to sell, and cheapens what they have to buy, how does it come about that the price of the article is increased that is produced in the greatest abundance, and decreased in the article that is produced in the smaller quantity? Now, how can that be? Hon. gentlemen in this House have said that protection increases the price of the article that the farmer has to sell, that is the idea. But, in the same breath, to the farmer they say that protection decreases the price of the article he has to buy; that is to say, that a home market, where 12 people are engaged in manufacturing, decreases the price of the article they produce, and the home market that has the 60 men employed in producing the article, increases the price of the article they produce. Now, every man can see how absurd that statement is. How in the world could it be? Reference was made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) to the census, and I want to dwell for a moment on what the census says about protection. I wish to read a statement from Mr. Johnson himself, and it will be remembered that there is not an industry in Canada where one man is doing anything to change one article into another, but what is put down:

The total amount of capital invested in manufacturing industries is $353,877,000; value of the products is $475,446,000; cost of raw material is $255,983,000; the cost of labour is $98,763,000; and the number of hands employed in all manufactories in Canada is 367,000.

Now, let us analyse that for a moment. Add the cost of the raw material to the cost of labour, and subtract the value of the product, and we find that the manufacturers made a yearly profit of $119,700,000, or 34.45ths per cent on the capital invested. These are not my figures. This is equal to a profit of $326 on each hand employed. Now, if you divide the number of hands employed into the wages given, what do we find? They simply give $277 each; that is to say, the manufacturer made out of each hand employed by him, man, woman and child, $326, while the wage-earner for his labour only got $272. Now, I know there must be deductions made from that. There must be deductions for wear and tear, and other things. But that is enough to show high profits, according to the statement made by Mr. Johnson himself. Now, what is the natural increment of wealth? About 3 per cent, that is all. Three per cent is the highest natural increment of all wealth in the world, and here we have over 33 per cent. Those statistics are Mr. Johnson's, and not mine. Now, Mr. Speaker, with the evidence before us of the failure, so far as the filling up of the North-west is concerned, with the evidence before us of the failure so far as every industry natural to Canada is concerned, we find that the natural results have been produced. Why, the very Government themselves are failing. The result of the National Policy on the interests of Canada is shown by the disorganized state of trade in Canada; and the effect of the National Policy is shown in the disorganized state of the Government of Canada. For the last twelve months we have actually had a resignation a month; in twelve months we have had twelve resignations. What does that indicate? It indicates that the malady of the Government is more chronic than that of trade in Canada, and chronic with a weakness that seems to be very natural to that Government, because these resignations cover quite a space of time. What is the remedy for all that? In the first place, the Government must be changed. I am afraid that repentance will not come to sinners who have erred so exceedingly. In the second place, we must lay our taxation in Canada upon the people of Canada so that each and every one in Canada, without favour to any man, shall pay his just share of the taxation. Of course, some day men will be surprised that we did not go further; men will be surprised that this generation did not break down every customs wall, did not close up every customs-house and let trade move as freely in this country as the wind and the air, and the sunshine. We have not arrived at that point, and I do not expect it just now. It will not arrive for some time, but that that is the right thing to do, I have no doubt in the world. You must levy your taxation so as to strike everybody. What is, after all, the contribution that men give in taxation, except so much given up from their wealth for the purpose of supporting a government? I read, not long ago, how a United States Senator put in very homely phrase the truth I am now stating, that taxation must be levied upon all, and that the revenue must be collected in the interest of the government, from the people, irrespective of any man in the country, and that any incidental protection that may result shall not be because of levying the taxes, but simply because of the fact that any taxation by customs duty must, of necessity, give an incidental protection to the man who is engaged in trade. Senator Vance said:

Protection's battle once begun,
Bequeathed by howling sire to son;
Only can be fought and won
By taxing every son-of-a-gun.

I believe, Sir, that Canada is in that position to-day. We are engaged in the struggle, and that struggle will be carried on until victory is won. However homely those words of Senator Vance may be, they clothe a truth that should guide any party in levying taxes upon the people of Canada. In our legislation we do not sufficiently consider the interest of those who have to toil for a living. I tell you, the Government does not sufficiently recognize the fact that the man who has to work is the sole foundation of all the wealth in Canada. I never pass by the humble shanty of the man who works in the woods, by the humble dwelling of the man who has to go out on the waves to gather from the ocean the wealth for wife and bairnies, without reflecting on the importance of the role they play in laying the foundations of this country's wealth. Surely, no man can see the fisherman go out upon the ocean without being reminded of these words of Burns :

Wae! may the boatie row
That gives the bairnies bread.

I never see a farmer who has to toil on a piece of land for a living, but I think how sadly we are astray in ignoring these men as the sole foundation of the wealth of Canada, while we are building up monopolies for the men who can look after themselves. Capital does not need Parliament to help it look after itself. Labour does not need it, but labour demands that it shall have the full fruition of its work, that and nothing more ; and that no effort of legislation shall prevent that full fruition. It does not come before us like a pauper to claim protection. All along our lines we have custom-houses, and every man is looked upon as a bad man that brings a dutiable article into Canada. He is treated as a man who is working against the best interests of the country, he is treated as a robber. The things that our farmers want cannot be brought in except by paying tribute. But labour presents itself on the frontier and walks boldly over our border, and no custom-house officer dare take any steps to prevent a busy brain and an active pair of hands from coming here and entering into competition with our own people. Under proper conditions, labour does not demand protection ; all it wants is that there should be a recognition of the great truth that labour, and labour alone, is wealth in this country, as in every other country. We have, therefore, been reversing the order of things all these years. I was struck with a remarkable statement I read a few days ago as indicating after all how little wealth there is in the world. All our legislation is in the direction of the protection of wealth, and, therefore, confirms the remark that we should protect wealth, and it would look after labour. Yes, it has looked after labour. But wealth looks after labour only when it is to its own advantage. Is wealth to be practically the trustee of labour in Canada ? One would suppose, hearing hon. gentlemen opposite speak, that our Government is constituted to act as trustees for the labour of Canada. In making these remarks, I am not saying a word against the great majority of manufacturers who are engaged in lawful occupations, but I am satisfied that the best class of manufacturers are opposed to duties, except in so far as they are necessary to raise the revenue, upon the lines indicated by the Liberal policy, and they want nothing more. Our leading manufacturers to-day are in favour of competition. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Putnam) wags his head ; if he does not hold this belief, he does dishonour to his country. The manufacturers of Canada, like the labourers of this Dominion, are as bright and as intelligent as those in the United States ; they do not need not be pap-fed, and they are not pap-fed to advantage, when they think they should enjoy a market without competition, and thereby without being called upon to use their best skill and ability. I could take hon. gentlemen to towns in Canada where there are manufacturers who have given their whole attention to business, and they advocate a tariff of from 17 to 20 per cent, and are prepared to meet any competition from outside.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). That is pretty good protection.

Mr. FRASER. Seventeen and a half per cent is very good protection, yet with the present tariff averaging 30 per cent, the hon. member for Inverness warned his friends not to take a brick out of the protection structure, and not reduce that tariff below 30 per cent. Perhaps, in view of events, the hon. gentleman may have been wiser than he thought, certainly he was wiser than he thought when he told the people that if the protection structure was interfered with it would fall on them. Thirty per cent protection is too much for any interest in Canada ; 17 per cent is very good, from 17 to 20. I should like to see the tariff less than 17 per cent, I should like to see trade so free that goods and products could be sent from one country to another without duty. For that purpose are our grand harbours, those harbours which indent the lower provinces. Were they simply provided for sightseers ? Did the Creator not design that ships should enter and leave those harbours. Such, no doubt, would be the opinion of the hon. member for Hants, if his party affiliations did not prevent him following the inclinations of his head and heart. What do we want with our ships, except to carry freight between our ports and the rest of the world ? Protection prevents such freedom, and the marvel is that men should still be prepared to stand by it.

Mr. ROOME. Do you favour free trade ?

Mr. FRASER. Personally, I am in favour of absolute free trade—I never go back on my principles—just as I am in favour of a hundred other advances in the future, but I am unable to obtain them at present, and men who, from party exigencies, are never prepared to look into the brighter future will never do very much to elevate Canada. I am in favour of a revenue tariff, because I believe it is the best thing now, because we are not sufficiently educated for free trade, and for a great many other reasons, and I will give the hon. gentleman a high authority. When the question came up under the new dispensation as to why polygamy was allowed under the old dispensation, why a man was allowed more than one wife, the answer was that this was allowed on account of the hardness of their hearts. The people of Canada are allowed protection on account of the hardness of their hearts, and with this authority I am willing to stand where I do. No country can advance as it should advance when the people are led to believe that greater restriction of trade is in the interest of the country. That is as clear to me as daylight. I believe that in the interests of Canada, a revenue tariff is the best policy. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that England is a poor, wretched country; Conservative papers are constantly striving to find out statements regarding failures in England, or poor crops. What have we in this country? In Canada we have the greatest agricultural, mineral and fishing resources in the world. We have every advantage of soil and climate, and yet last year, with all these advantages, we had a deficit of $4,000,000. How does the position stand in the tight little island, which is said to be going to ruin, that is paying millions a year to keep up an army and navy to force her wares on uncivilized peoples? The Chancellor of the Exchequer is able to announce this year, a surplus of nearly $30,000,000.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). How is the revenue raised?

Mr. MULOCK. Not by protection.

Mr. FRASER. I refer the hon. gentleman to Whittaker's Almanac, as I am not able to go into details, and, moreover, it would only be teaching one member, as all the rest in the House know the facts. I was going on to say that that country, which is said to be retrograding so rapidly, which is supposed to be going backward, is an example of what free trade can effect. Are we going to emulate them? The example of that country is the only example worth following, that country which has given to the world an object lesson, which takes the raw material of all nations in the world, and manufactures it and sends it back, and makes them pay the duty, plus the price. I suppose the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Roome) would, no doubt, be prepared to shed many tears, but he is a man who would not speak of England's glory.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). You have forgotten the United States.

Mr. FRASER. Now, when they find the facts are against them, it suits them to represent that England under free trade, has declined. They have made an alliance with the miserable protective system in force in the United States, and they can only excuse themselves by saying, that the policy pursued by the people to the south of us must dove-tail into their wretched policy. As has been well said by my respected leader, they adopted the miserable rag of protection from the United States, and they thought they would baptize it by singing "God Save the Queen" over it. The only way in which they can now dove-tail their policy into the policy of the United States, is by trying to show that England which has not adopted this nostrum, must be going to the bad.

Mr. McALISTER. What is the state of the farmer in England?

Mr. FRASER. I cannot bother about answering you as it is nearly six o'clock, and my time is about up. These hon. gentlemen opposite are now forced to proclaim that England must be going back, because if they admit that she is progressing, as undoubtedly England is, then they must admit that protection in Canada should be abolished, and that we should adopt the fiscal policy of the motherland. England is advancing and Canada is declining: therefore England must have a good policy and Canada must have a bad one. We believe, Sir, that that which has made England great can make Canada great. Our country possesses many natural conditions in common with England. Down by the sea where I come from, we are almost identically situated as they are in England. We have not the wealth of their soil, but we have minerals and fisheries, and magnificent harbours for shipping. We have the raw material—

Mr. MULOCK. And the men.

Mr. FRASER. Aye, and the men too, and the women, for we cannot have the men without the women. Sir, this National Policy has not been in the interests of the fishermen of my county nor of any other county in the maritime provinces. The fishermen has to buy everything he needs, but when the sea gives up her wealth to him, the National Policy takes it from him by compelling him to pay higher prices for the necessities of life. Sir, we have had an exhibition in this country, not only of the failure of the National Policy, but also of the failure of the Government. I wonder what are now the heart throbbings of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. Sir, a short time ago we had a message from President Cleveland hostile to the motherland, and I charge the responsibility for that message on hon. gentlemen opposite. When President Cleveland read the utterances of the late Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and found that England was spending millions on her army and navy to force her merchandise on uncivilized savages, President Cleveland saw his opportunity. "Now," said he, "is our chance for the English soldiers and sailors are engaged in forcing goods to these savages, and let us take advantage of that." He believed that was the time to strike the blow, for had he not his information on the authority of the Minister of Justice, an authority which ought to be respectable seeing that the hon. gentleman was a Minister of the Crown. But, Sir, President Cleveland calculated without his host. He woke up one morning to find that this free trade country had surrounded all of the United States with a great cordon of forces. He woke up to find that wherever ships could water and coal, the British ensign flew from their masts. He woke up to find that free trade England had money and men to protect her rights. President Cleveland found that without putting a cent of extra taxation on the people of his country, the English Chancellor of the Exchequer, could simply stop paying £30,000,000 a year to redeem the national debt, could convert that sum into a loan, and have £2,000,000,000 to fight the civilized world. All that was in a free trade country, and yet we are told by Conservative members in this House, and by the Conservative press of the country, that England is going to the bad. Oh, Sir, I wish we had a little of that kind of deterioration here. I wish we had in our exchequer a small portion of the English surplus, and then the Minister of Finance would not have had to meet Parliament so gloomingly as he did. I wish the Minister of Finance had adopted that policy which made England great. But, Sir, up to this time he has failed to do so and he will have no opportunity hereafter. It will be given to others to follow in the footsteps of that mother of nations, that mother of commerce, the only nation that is really worth imitating. It will be given to others in the government of this country, to follow the policy of that great nation whose fleets traverse every sea, and under whose flag commerce is carried from ocean to ocean, and from country to country. That is a good enough country for me. I commend to the study of hon. gentlemen opposite the greatness of Great Britain, ere they permit a member of the Government, or even the most ordinary member of their party, to hold her up for our pity, as a rotten, antiquated, and decaying country. Again, Sir, I say, that Great Britain is the only nation on earth whose example it is worth while for the people of Canada to follow.

After Recess.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up very much of the time of the House in discussing the questions which have been engaging the attention of this House for some days past. One gentleman remarked, in the course of his address, that this was what might be called a stock-taking time. It seems to me that is a very appropriate term to use, because this is, in my opinion, a time when we ought to look well after the affairs of the country, and see how they have been managed. The Government of this country are simply a committee of the House of Commons. They are responsible, first, to the House of Commons, and then to the country. Eighteen years ago, the people of this country dismissed those who were then conducting its affairs, and placed that responsibility upon the gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches. We have, therefore, had an experience of eighteen years of their administration, and it is well now to consider how they have managed public affairs during that time. You will remember that His Excellency the Governor General, in opening Parliament, congratulated the country upon the bountiful harvest that Providence had blessed it with during the past year. We all know that it has been a time of peace, that there have been no wars to distract our people; and, under these circumstances, you would naturally expect that the affairs of the country would be managed economically and well, and that, upon the meeting of the House, the Government would be able to show an excellent record for the last twelve months. But I am very sorry to say that the balance sheet they present to us is a very disappointing one; in fact, I think it could not be more so. It is one which every member of this House and every well-wisher of the Dominion of Canada should be almost ashamed of. What does that balance sheet show? It shows, in the first place, that notwithstanding the condition of the country, as I have described it, we have actually increased our indebtedness during the last year by nearly $8,000,000, so that it now stands at the enormous sum of over $253,000,000, making a debt charge of over $50 a head for every man, woman and child in this Dominion. This is a startling fact which ought to command the earnest and careful attention of the people of this country. We are now subject to an interest charge of about a quarter of a million dollars a year more than we had last year, or in any other year. At the same time, the trade of the Dominion has fallen off. In 1895 we exported from the Dominion of Canada, in round numbers, $113,638,000; the year before that we exported $117,525,000; so that last year we sold nearly $4,000,000 less than we did the year before. That makes a rather bad showing, if, as has been frequently asserted, Canada is the most prosperous country in the world, and contains the most contented and happy people to be found anywhere. We have, also, bought less during the past year. Last year our imports for consumption were, in round numbers, $105,000,000, while the year before they were $113,000,000, a decrease in our imports for consumption of nearly $8,000,000 in one year. So that, taking the balance sheet presented to us by the Minister of Finance, we find that our trade had fallen off, both in the exports and the imports, while the charges against the Dominion have, at the same time, largely increased.

Now, I want, for a moment, to call your attention to what I consider the alarming increase that has taken place in the public debt of this Dominion. We will go back to the time when the Liberal Government took charge of the affairs of this country. In 1873 our debt was, in round numbers, $99,848,000, and the interest upon that debt was $5,209,000 a year. After five years of the administration of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who left office in 1878, the debt stood at $140,000,000, and the interest charge was $6,797,000 a year. So that, during the five years he was in office, Mr. Mackenzie increased the debt $40,000,000, and the interest charge by $1,500,000. Now, this has been made considerable of. Hon. gentlemen have pointed to the fact that the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie increased the debt during his time more largely than it was increased by the gentlemen who now control the affairs of this country. But I want to call your attention to the fact that although the debt increased, he was not responsible for that increase. It was largely due to the fact that his predecessors had left a great many obligations which it was necessary for him to carry out. Sir Leonard Tilley, who was Finance Minister in 1873, in presenting his Budget speech to the House of Commons, stated :

We are further entering upon new and increased engagements, involving very large sums of money. We are entering, or have already entered, upon engagements which will require a large increase in our debt. We have $30,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway ; we have $10,000,000 to spend on the Intercolonial Railway, and the canal system that has been accepted by the Government will involve an expenditure of at least $20,000,000. These are serious matters, inasmuch as they add $60,000,000 to our existing debt.

Thus you will see, Mr. Speaker, that when the Mackenzie Government came into power these obligations had been created by his predecessors, which he was bound to carry out. And although the then Finance Minister estimated that the carrying out of these obligations would increase the public debt of this country by over $60,000,000, yet you will see that during the five years of the Mackenzie Administration the debt was only increased by about $40,000,000, and a large proportion of this work was done. So that while the debt was increased a certain amount during Mr. Mackenzie's time, yet that increase was due largely to these obligations which had been created by his predecessors. Now, on reading the speeches of the Finance Minister from 1873 to 1878, one cannot help but remark the extravagant promises that hon. gentlemen opposite made to the country at that time, and how little they have done towards carrying out those promises. As I have said, the debt is, in my opinion, exceedingly large to-day, and every effort ought to be made to stop any further piling up of this debt. The Finance Minister, in his Budget speech of March 27th, 1890, only six years ago, used this language :

I stated that last year that looking at the condition of the country and looking at the munificent contributions which had been given by this country for her public works, and at the splendid equipments which Canada had, by means of these contributions, gained for herself, it seems to me that we ought not, after the close of the year 1889, to increase the public debt ; that we ought not to increase the public expenditure for ordinary purposes, and that it was possible, by a prudent course, without stinting the public service in any way to carry on these services in a general way ; to meet the capital obligations which we have already assumed and to go to the year 1892 without adding to our net debt. After that, it seemed to me that we might well take into consideration whether we could not gradually decrease the amount of the debt which we had assumed and placed upon ourselves.

These were very fine words. This was, in my opinion, the course that should have been pursued ; it was a course that commended itself to this side of the House and to the majority of the people ; and we all hoped that the wise policy which the hon. gentleman had outlined in this speech would be followed. But I am sorry to say that these were but idle words, and that no steps were taken to carry out the promises then made, but that, on the contrary, year after year and month after month, the expenditure and the public debt of this country have been growing larger and larger, until now they have become a very heavy burden indeed upon the people. Why, since that language was used in 1890, we have added to the debt of this country over fifteen million dollars, and the interest charge has been increased very largely indeed as well. Now, Sir, one wonders how it is that this expenditure has gone up so high. One wonders where the money has gone. Year after year we are voting a large amount of money to carry on the affairs of this country, and it is astonishing how the expenditure rolls up. I believe that a very large amount is literally wasted. I believe that the expenditure is altogether too large, and before I am through I shall point out some ways in which I think it can be considerably reduced.

Before I leave that point I might call your attention also to the expenditure under two heads. For instance, I find that in 1877-78 the interest on our debt was $7,048,000 ; in 1894-95 that had grown to $10,496,000. The administration of justice in 1877-78 was only $564,000 ; last year it had grown to $755,000. Now, I ask you if there is any reason for this large increase in the expenditure under the head of administration of justice ? Then we may take civil government. I find that in 1877-78 the expenditure was, in round numbers, $823,000 ; last year it was $1,422,000. The fisheries in 1877-78 only cost the country $93,000 ; last year that had swelled to no less than $443,000.

Take the care of Indians. Now, we all know that there are not as many Indians in the country now as there were in 1877-78. We also know that there are better means of caring for them. We maintain in the North-west a large force of Mounted Police, very much larger than we did in 1877-78. I find that the care of the Indians in 1877-78 cost only $421,000; last year it had increased to $955,000. Or it had more than doubled in that short space of time. Despite the facts that the Indians are gradually decreasing, the expenditure has gone on increasing. Then we find under the head of legislation that in 1877-78 the expenditure was only $618,000; whereas last year it had grown to $941,000—a very large increase in that short time. On militia and defence, we find that in 1877-78 the expenditure was $618,000; last year that had grown to no less than $1,574,000. Now, Sir, I call your attention to this enormous increase under the head of militia expenditure, and yet the militia all over this Dominion was never in a more inefficient and disorganized condition than it is to-day. The money that has been spent in maintaining that service has been largely squandered and not applied to the purpose for which it was voted by Parliament. Then we take the head of superannuation, another outrageous expenditure, which has grown from $106,000 in 1877-78 to $265,000 in 1894-95. Then, the care of Dominion lands has grown from $87,000 in the former period to no less than $129,000 last year. Why should this expenditure be increased? Why, we know that we have not got anything like the Dominion lands to care for now that we had in 1877-78. Over 44,000,000 acres has been locked up in the North-west in colonization and railway companies over which we have no control, and a large amount has been sold and given away to settlers, and yet we find that the expenditure has grown from $87,000 to $129,000. I might go on and point out other ways in which this expenditure has largely increased, but time will not permit it, and I want just to sum up. The expenditure, which in 1877-78, was in round numbers $23,500,000, grew last year to over $38,000,000. The Finance Minister told us, a short time ago, that the public expenditure ought to remain stationary. In 1890 the hon. gentleman thought that the public expenditure would not increase but that thirty-five and a half million dollars would be sufficient for a number of years. You remember, Mr. Speaker, that in 1877 and 1878, the charges were made from every platform throughout the Dominion that the Administration of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was a corrupt and extravagant Administration. Sir Leonard Tilley stated, and the present Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) also stated on many platforms, that a Government that could not manage the affairs of this country with an expenditure of twenty-two and a half millions had better give way to others. But no sooner did they get into office than the fair promises they had made were forgotten, and year by year since then the expenditure has advanced by leaps and bounds, until last year it exceeded $38,000,000. And these hon. gentlemen are still going on in their mad career. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) in addressing the House a few days ago, told us that $40,000,000 was little enough with which to manage the affairs of this country. I have no doubt that if he has anything to do with the administration of affairs the expenditure will soon be forty millions, and that it will probably go to forty-five millions before many years are over. But I believe the reign of these gentlemen is drawing to a close and that more economical and business-like men will have charge of the affairs of Canada, and that the Government will be run, as it ought to be, on business principles, as a man would run his own private business. I have no doubt that if you, Mr. Speaker, were to run your extensive business in the way this Government in running the affairs of the country, before three months were over, you would be in the poor-house. And I tell you, Sir, that if the expenditure goes on increasing as it has done, very near the amount mentioned by the hon. member for Pictou, $40,000,000 will be required next year. And where are we going to stop? These hon. gentlemen seem to think they have nothing to do but spend the money. You would think that they picked the money up in the street or made it. They forget that every single dollar comes out of the pockets of the hard-working people of this country, and that they are only the trustees and are bound to exercise a wise supervision and great care in the expenditure of these revenues. When a business man finds that his expenditure is increasing year by year and that his business is being curtailed, that he is not selling as much as formerly, he at once says to the unworthy stewards who have charge of his affairs that they are not fit for their positions and must give way to better men. That is what the people should do.

Mr. MULOCK. That is what they are going to do.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is what they are going to do, I believe. Now I wish to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to another matter, one that was touched upon by my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser)—the progress of our North-west Territories. The hon. member for Guysboro' deplored the fact that we were not increasing in population as rapidly as we should and that immigration was not going into the North-west as it ought to do. Let me call your attention to a statement submitted to this House by the Secretary of State on 4th May, 1883. He was speaking of the expenditure in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was stated by the Government that the Canadian Pacific Railway would not cost the Canadian public one farthing, that every dollar that was spent in constructing that road would be recouped to the people by sales of land in the territory through which it passed. The hon. Secretary of State said :

Why, Sir, the close of the year—

That is the year before——after we had repaid them every dollar they were entitled to—

That is the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—

—with all that rapidity of construction, we actually owed $1,734,129 less than we did at the beginning of the year. The net debt of the Dominion—the net debt on the 30th of June, 1881, at the beginning of the contract, was $155,395,780.40 ; on the 30th June, 1882, it was $153,661,650.78, or, as I said before, a decrease of $1,734,129.62. So much for the ruin that was to overtake this country by the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has given me this memorandum :

Surplus consolidated revenue, 1879-80.	$ 4,132,743
Surplus consolidated revenue, 1880-81.	6,316,052
Proceeds of lands, 1880-81	1,744,456
Estimated surplus this year	6,000,000
Proceeds of lands this year	1,750,000
Estimated surplus next year	3,000,000
Estimated proceeds from lands	2,250,000
Estimated saving of interest after January, 1885, 1 per cent on $30,000,000 $300,000 per annum or equal to a reduction of debt of.....	7,500,000
If we have a surplus of about $1,000,000 a year from June, 1884 to 1891, say, seven years	7,000,000
Proceeds of lands, seven years at $2,000,000 would be	14,000,000

$53,693,251

That is the estimate of surplus from land sales in the North-west made by the hon. gentleman at that time. Now you will be surprised to know, Mr. Speaker, that our land transactions in the North-west have resulted in this—that we have expended in surveys and in preparing these lands for settlement, $6,488,904, and that we have only got back into the treasury, $4,275,526, so that we have a balance on the wrong side of $2,213,378. So that the rosy pictures the hon. gentleman presented to the House in 1883 of large sums that we were to receive from the North-west offsetting completely the cost to this country of building the Canadian Pacific Railway, faded away and we have to face the fact that we are over $2,000,000 more out of pocket because of our land transactions. Instead of receiving, as he states here, over two million dollars a year from land sales, and making a total of over fifty-three millions, we have now a deficit of over two million dollars. At that time he fortified himself with a certificate, with a report from a gentleman who ought to have known whereof he spoke, instead of making a mere prophecy. Sir, at that time he produced a letter from Mr. A. M. Burgess, which I will read :

Ottawa, 4th May, 1883.

Sir,—Having given the subject my best and fullest consideration, I estimate that the receipts of this department from the sales of agricultural and coal lands, timber dues, rents of grazing lands, and sales of mineral lands other than coal, with the royalties from the minerals, between the 1st day of January, 1883, and the 31st December, 1891, both days inclusive, will amount to not less than $58,000,000.

Did you ever hear such a statement as that presented to the House ? This is signed by A. M. Burgess, then and now Deputy Minister of the Interior, and was read by Sir Charles Tupper, and endorsed by him, as a true and fair estimate of what we would receive. He is so particular that he takes in the 1st day of January, and the 31st day of December, both days inclusive. So that all the statements they have made to the House have utterly failed in realization. Now, my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) pointed out to-day that the results of last year's operations in the North-west, instead of showing a large increase in the immigration to that section, instead of yielding a large sum of money from the sale of lands and other interests there, show that homestead entries in 1895 were 519 less than they were in 1894. In 1894 there were 2,683 homestead entries, and in 1895 only 2,114, showing a reduction of 519. The number of immigrants landing at Halifax, Quebec and Montreal has also fallen off very materially. In 1894 there were 25,653 and in 1895 only 23,363, showing a falling off of 2,290. Not only so, but the number of immigrants who declared their intention of settling in the country has also fallen off. In 1894 there were 18,923, and in 1895 there were only 17,231, showing a reduction of no less than 1,692 of those who declared their intention to settle in that country. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is fair to inquire what can be the reason that the tide of immigration has not set in towards that country ? I have been exceedingly anxious to find the cause why immigration has not been flowing in that direction, as of yore. Sir, I take up the report of the Minister of the Interior, that is sent broadcast over this vast Dominion as an authoritative document, one that is supposed to tell the truth in matters pertaining to the North-west, and what do I find ? Why, Sir, you cannot imagine what an astonishing reason I find given in the report of the Minister of the Interior. It is almost incredible to find such a reason given by a gentleman whose loyalty is unquestioned, and who is ambitious to appear as an upholder of the great North-west, who delights in praising the climate, the soil, the capabilities and the resources of that country ; and I may say, Sir, that in the pictures he has drawn to the House of the immense resources, the fertility, the boundless extent, and the great mineral wealth of that country, I do not think that he, in any sense, exaggerates ; I believe, and I am proud, as a humble citizen of this Dominion, to know, that in our great North-west we have boundless prairies which are rich in agricultural resources, and rich in mineral deposits, the rivers of which abound with some of the finest fish in the world, and everything augurs for that country a teeming population at an early day if its affairs are only rightly administered. But what do I find in the report of the Minister of the Interior? Sir, it is almost incredible to find such a statement, such a damning statement, a statement that will check the tide of immigration from every part of the world. Let me read it:

The reduction in the number of homestead entries as compared with the corresponding period last year, although greatly to be regretted, is easily accounted for by reference to the damaging effects upon the crops of 1894 of the excessive drought in the territories, particularly in Eastern Assiniboia.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if, of all places in the world you would expect to find such a statement as that in the report of the Minister of the Interior? Instead of ascribing the lack of immigration to the injurious fiscal policy, instead of accounting for it by the enormous charges that are made upon the people of the North-west by refusing them control over the railways, instead of ascribing it to their own maladministration of the affairs of that country, they state here that Providence itself has blighted and blasted the hopes of the people of that country. Sir, that statement ought never to have been found in this report. I do not believe it is true. It may be that in certain sections of that country the crops may have been injured by the drought, which we know has slightly affected some parts; but to publish that fact to the world, and to scatter it broadcast in a public document that will be found in all the libraries of the countries from which we may expect immigration, I say is a mistake that must have deplorable effects. I think that statement cannot receive too strong a condemnation from this House. I think if they had ascribed the lack of immigration to their own negligence, to their own lack of due care in managing the affairs of that country, they would have told the truth. Now, Sir, we have spent a very large amount of money for a good many years in inducing immigrants to go into that country. During the last ten years, we have spent, for that purpose, over three million dollars. We have bonused lines of steamers running to all parts of the world; we have a High Commissioner at a very large expense residing, until recently, in the city of London, England; we have a large staff of immigration agents in that country that are costing us a large amount of money yearly; and yet we find that the results are very meagre, and are yearly growing less. But I find there is some consolation in the report of the High Commissioner. He states:

Mr. CAMPBELL. *

I have only to assure you, in conclusion, that I take the keenest possible interest in promoting immigration to Canada.

How kind and considerate to assure Parliament that he takes the keenest possible interest in this work, for which he receives about $30,000 a year. The High Commissioner further says:

And I shall continue to do all I can in that direction.

Again, how kind and considerate. The High Commissioner continues:

But I have no hesitation in saying that I regard the filling up of the vacant lands in Manitoba and the North-west, as in other provinces, one of the most important matters, if not the most important, that can engage the attention of the Government of which you are a member. You know we have been handicapped considerably for some time past in consequence of the smallness of the fund available for immigration purposes.

The smallness of the fund, indeed, is the reason given why we have not got more immigrants. Further on, the High Commissioner says:

I do hope the Government will be able to secure a much larger sum for immigration, and that even a larger proportion than usual may be placed at my disposal,—

He wants to handle a little more money.

—for it is this country and on this continent that this expenditure is needed.

I think this country and this Parliament will hesitate for a good while before they place even as much money as they have placed hitherto in the hands of that hon. gentleman. For my part, I believe that every dollar of that expenditure is literally wasted. During the last ten years, over $3,000,000 have been expended, and what are the results? We were told in 1890 that the Government had brought in 886,000 people, but, when the people were counted by hon. gentlemen opposite, they could find only 500,000, all told. Where did the others go? We did not maintain our natural increase. The money spent on inducing immigration to this country has been placed in the wrong hands, and new men should be placed at the head of affairs, and new measures adopted to induce immigration. The Montreal "Herald" recently contained a statement, that in the city of Quebec over 4,000 people had waited on the Government, asking for bread or work. I venture to say, that in Montreal or Toronto there are thousands of people ready and anxious to work in order to earn a livelihood. A gentleman told me lately, that he had occasion to advertise for a book-keeper at a salary of $600 a year, and, although the advertisement appeared only in the evening papers of one day, he received 78 applications. Men are seeking work, and they cannot find it. Yet we are spending thousands of dollars yearly to bring other men here to compete with these men in their own market.

I am sorry that, in the financial statement presented to the House, the Finance Minister did not propose any remedy for preventing the increase of the debt which has been going on for the last few years. In 1891, Parliament was dissolved, and an intimation was given to the people that the Government were going to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States. I am free to say this, that I do not think any measures could be placed on the statute-book which would bring such prosperity to the people as would a reciprocity treaty with the United States. In the Senate of the United States, the other day, this subject came before the House Committee, as reported in the following despatch:—

Washington, Feb. 10.—The House Committee on Accounts has decided to recommend the passage of the resolution presented by Mr. Tawney (Rep., Minn.), authorizing the Committee on Ways and Means to investigate the reciprocity question. The inquiry will be conducted by a sub-committee headed by Mr. Tawney, which may employ an expert. The scope of the inquiry is outlined in the resolution, which recites that it is desirable to extend the export of surplus agricultural and manufactured products of the United States to foreign countries, and that in certain countries the importation of these products is restricted by discriminating duties, therefore, the Committee on Ways and Means is directed to report in what countries such restrictions are in force, the causes alleged therefor, their effect upon our foreign commerce as relating to the trade resulting from the commercial agreements with foreign countries entered into after October 30, 1890 (the Blaine reciprocity treaties).

Here is an intimation from the United States that they are, at least, contemplating the subject of reciprocity. I have no doubt that if this Government were anxious to have such a treaty, they could obtain one. What is the position of Canada to-day? It is simply this, that we are a country bordering on the United States for a distance of 3,000 miles. No less than nine states of the American union, with a population of about 27,000,000, adjoin the border line of this Dominion. As was stated by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) in his admirable speech, if you were to draw a straight line from the northern part of Minnesota to the northern part of Maine, the city of Toronto would lie 300 miles south of that line, and within eighteen hours' journey of that city you would find sixty-eight towns and villages, each one with a population of not less than 10,000. There is a population of 7,000,000 within eighteen hours of the city of Toronto. In my own county of Kent, the city of Chatham would lie 350 miles south of that line, and within eighteen hours' ride of that city there would be a population, in cities and towns alone, of nearly 8,000,000 people. Sir, if we had free commercial intercourse with this great population, you cannot imagine what enormous advantage it would be to Canada. We have had for a number of years a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and from what happened during that time, we can judge what would happen if that treaty were renewed. It is true that our reciprocity treaty with the States only embraced the natural and raw products of the two countries, for there were no manufactured goods included, but yet we find that the results of that treaty were so satisfactory to the people of Canada that every one deplored when it was abrogated. From 1846 to 1853, the average trade with the United States was $14,231,000 a year, but in 1855 the reciprocity treaty came into force, and during the eleven years of its existence from 1855 to 1866, the aggregate trade between the two countries rose from $14,231,000 per year to the enormous sum of $54,651,000. Here we are at the end of thirty years, after spending millions of dollars in increasing our facilities for trade between the great west and the east, after spending millions of dollars in deepening our canals, building our lines of railway, and constructing enormous bridges across the rivers and tunnels underneath to cheapen the cost of transportation and to facilitate trade and commerce between the two nations; here we are, after these thirty years have passed, after the population of the United States has grown largely, and after the population of Canada has increased to a considerable extent; here we are, I say, after all these years and under all these circumstances, and we find that to-day the trade of Canada with the United States is only $95,932,000. Sir, if the reciprocity treaty had continued until this date, the trade between Canada and the United States, instead of being $95,000,000, would have been by this time, I have no doubt, $150,000,000 or $200,000,000. What was the feeling of the people of Canada at the time the American Government gave notice of the abrogation of that treaty. Why, Sir, from one end of this Dominion to the other there was scarcely a man who did not regret that course was taken. And so strongly did the Government feel upon the question, that the Macdonald-Dorion Cabinet passed a minute of Council, which was signed by His Excellency the Governor General on the 19th February, 1864, and which reads as follows:—

It would be impossible to express in figures, with any approach to accuracy, the extent of which the facilities of commercial intercourse, created by the reciprocity treaty, have contributed to the wealth and prosperity of this province; and it would be difficult to exaggerate the importance which the people of Canada attach to the continued enjoyment of these facilities.

Nor is the subject entirely devoid of political significance.

Under the beneficent operations of the system of self-government which the latter policy of the mother country has accorded to Canada, in common with other colonies possessing representative institutions, combined with the advantages secured by the reciprocity treaty and of an unrestricted commerce with our nearest neighbours, in the natural productions of the two countries, all agitation for organic changes has ceased—all dissatisfaction with the existing political relations of the province has absolutely disappeared.

That, Sir, is the minute in Council which was adopted by the Government of the day, and which was endorsed by every well-wisher to Canada. I am sorry to say that this Government is apparently making no effort to bring about the desirable condition of things which would exist under a reciprocity treaty. In this connection, I might state that I have noticed that during the recent election in Cape Breton there was a good deal of discussion as to the course of the Government with respect to reciprocity in coal with the United States. I want to place on record the following letter which was written by the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald in reference to that question :

Les Rochers, St. Patrick, Rivière du Loup.

July 30, 1890.

My dear Sir,—In answer to your esteemed note of this day, I desire to say that I am fully assured that the Parliament of Canada will be ready to take off all customs duty on coal, ores and lumber imported from the United States whenever Congress makes those articles free of duty. The Canadian Government has already authorized Sir Julian Pauncefote to state to the American government that they will be prepared to take off the export duty on logs whenever Canadian lumber is admitted into the United States market at a reduced rate of $1.50 per thousand board measure. You are at liberty to show this to such members of Congress or the government as you please. It should not for obvious reasons be published in the press or quoted in Congress. In the United States Tariff Act provision might be made for making the above-mentioned articles free whenever they are and so soon as they are made free by the Canadian Parliament.

I remain, my dear sir, faithfully yours,

JOHN A. MACDONALD.

This was addressed to an American gentleman whose name is not given here. The House will see that at that time Sir John Macdonald was ready to remove the duty on coal, and he was also ready to remove the export duty on logs whenever the United States Government would reduce their duty to $1.50 per thousand feet.

Mr. MULLOCK. What is the date of that letter ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. 30th July, 1890. Now, I have stated that in my opinion no legislation we could adopt would be so beneficial to the people of Canada as the opening up of reciprocal trade with the United States. When we look at the trade we do with the different countries in the world, that is quite apparent. It has been stated by hon. gentlemen opposite with a good deal of pride that our trade with Great Britain is increasing. I rejoice to know that that is the case ; but it is quite apparent that our trade with the United States has been increasing in an equal degree. You must bear in mind that while everything we send to Great Britain is admitted free, everything we send to the American market has to meet a duty of 30, 40 or 50 per cent before it can get in, and all goods coming to Canada from the United States have also to pay a duty of 30 or 40 per cent. Of the goods we export from the Dominion every year, a large proportion go to the United States market. I may mention a few of the leading articles. For instance, we send to the United States no less than 954,000 tons of coal, while we send to Great Britain only 23,000 tons. Of sheep one year old, we send 105,000 heads to the United States and only 5,336 heads to Great Britain ; and on every one of the former we have to pay a duty of 75 cents, while the latter are admitted free. Of wool we send 5,449,000 pounds to the United States and pay a duty on it of 12 cents a pound, whereas we send only 10,200 pounds to Great Britain. Of barley we send 1,674,000 bushels to the United States, paying a duty of 30 per cent on it, against 30,000 bushels to Great Britain. Of beans we send 347,000 bushels to the United States, paying a duty of 30 per cent upon them, and not a solitary bushel to any other country. Of potatoes we send 773,000 bushels to the United States, and only 628 bushels all told to Great Britain. On all these articles we have to pay a duty to get into the United States market and no duty to get into the British market. We thus find that our natural and best market is across the line in the United States. Our total exports from Ontario are $30,186,000 worth, of which $18,000,000 worth went to the United States. Of the products of our mines, fisheries and forests, of our animals, our agricultural products and our manufactures, we send far the greater portion to the United States. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) to-day expressed his opinion that if the barriers on trade between Canada and the United States were removed, our manufactures would be simply wiped out, thousands of hands would be thrown out of employment, capital would be lost, and ruin, desolation and distress would prevail throughout the length and breadth of this country. Well, I have a higher opinion of the people of this Dominion. I think our manufacturers and our people generally are able to hold their own with those of any other country in the world. I do not think there is any other country where manufacturing can be done so cheaply and so well as in this Dominion. Our people sometimes forget that when we started housekeeping in 1867, and from that time down to 1874, we had a tariff of only 15 per cent in our favour ; and that from 1874 to 1879 it was only to 17½ per cent ; yet there has been no time in the history of Canada when greater progress has been made in manufacturing in Canada than was made in that time. In 1871, I find we were quite a manufacturing country. In that year we had invested in manufactures $77,964,000; the hands employed numbered 187,942; the raw material used was valued at $124,907,000; we paid in wages $40,852,000; and the value of our product was $221,617,000. By 1881 we could make a very fair comparison, though during the first half of that period the tariff was only 15 per cent, and during the latter half it was only 17½ per cent. Let us see how our manufacturing establishments increased in that decade. The capital invested had grown to $165,200,000; the hands employed had increased to 255,000; the raw materials had grown to $179,918,000; the wages paid had risen to $59,429,000; and the products of our factories were valued at $309,171,000. That shows a very healthy progress. During that decade our manufactures were on a sure and solid foundation. I know that in the western part of Ontario every single manufactory we have in existence to-day was started, developed and grew strong during the time we had a very low tariff in force; and our manufacturing establishments have never, I believe, grown as fast as they did during that period. I am a manufacturer myself, and I believe that if we could open up a reciprocity of trade with the United States, the great mass of the manufacturers of this Dominion would be largely benefited and would hold up both hands for it.

I know that, in my own city of Chatham, there is not one manufacturer who would not gladly hold up both hands in favour of a reciprocity treaty with the United States. Why? Because they are handicapped to-day by the taxes on their raw material. They have to pay duty on their coal, lumber, iron and steel, paints, oil and varnish—on all the raw materials that enter into their particular manufactures, the duties are so high that they are not able to compete on an even keel with the manufacturers of the United States, in many instances. This fact was recognized by the Government of this country when, in order to enable our manufacturers to compete in foreign markets, they allowed them a rebate of 99 per cent on the duties charged on American goods. The Government recognized that our manufacturers cannot compete in foreign markets because they are not placed on an even field with their competitors, and very wisely, in my opinion, gave them a drawback of 99 per cent. But it would be better if, instead of taxing them in the first place, they allowed their raw material to come in free.

During the time the National Policy has been in force, the evil results of this policy were shown in the very small increase in our population. From 1871 to 1881 our population increased much faster than it did under the National Policy. The population of Canada increased from 1871 to 1881 at the rate of about 18 per cent, while during the last decade it only increased about 12 per cent, showing that, for some cause or other, the results of our trade policy have not been beneficial. It is lamentable to think that this vast country of ours has only increased its population 500,000 during the last ten years. That shows clearly that something is wrong.

I do not wish to detain the House for any great length, but I merely want to show that, if we had, in order to get a reciprocity treaty, to embrace, as the Americans propose, a certain list of manufactured articles, as well as natural and raw products, I believe that would be of great benefit to the people of this country. It is well known that a few years ago the Americans were prepared to enter into such a treaty, provided we would consent to have included in it a list of manufactured articles. If we were to do that, our manufacturers would be on a level keel with those of the United States, and I do not believe that we have any reason to fear competition. There is no reason why our manufacturers should not be able to stand competition with those of the United States. Why, we have only one thing to-day in Canada which is enjoying free trade with the United States, and that is our railways. Our railways are the only things that enjoy comparatively free trade with the United States. Our Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway can load their cars at Chicago and draw them through Canada in bond to Buffalo and New York, without let or hindrance. What are the results? You find that our railways are competing, and competing successfully, with the American roads. They are increasing daily their traffic in every way, although to a certain extent they are handicapped, inasmuch as they have to pay a duty of 60 cents per ton on the coal they consume and duty on the iron and steel that enter into the construction of their rolling stock. Take our vessels. You know that they do not enjoy the same privilege as the railways. A Canadian vessel, for instance, cannot load a cargo at Chicago or Detroit and carry it to Buffalo. It is debarred from that coasting trade. It can carry a cargo from Chicago or Detroit to a Canadian port, and then it must discharge and get a clearance from there to an American port, but it is debarred from carrying from one American port to another. What is the consequence? You find that our Canadian vessels are gradually disappearing on our lakes. There is very little for them to do, and instead of building new vessels, as we did in the days of yore, our ship-yards are now idle and their hands have gone away. But once we have the restrictions on trade removed, if we once open up a reciprocity treaty with the United States, prosperity would bound back to the shores of Canada, and our vessels would be employed in carrying the enormous trade we once handled from the great west to the sea. Why, of the millions of tons of freight that came down the great lakes from the west to the east last year, it is a lamentable fact that only about 5 per cent was carried in Canadian vessels. But, if the obstructions to trade were removed, our marine men all over the Dominion would benefit, increased trade would flow to Canada, our ship-yards would again be started, and employment be given to thousands who have left our shores to seek their living in a foreign country. Not only that, but, when you look at the enormous trade we do with the United States, it shows clearly that, in spite of all the barriers we place in the way, our trade still seeks a market in the United States in preference to England. I cannot conceive of any measure that would confer anything like the advantages on this country which would flow from the opening up of this trade, and I am glad to know that it is a plank in the Liberal platform, that, as soon as we come into power, which I believe will be shortly, we will enter into negotiations in earnest with the United States. These negotiations will be opened up by men who are anxious to negotiate a treaty, and the result will be, that in a few months after the Liberal party are restored to power, we will have a reciprocity treaty with the United States that will not only embrace natural and raw products, but also a certain list of manufactured goods. Now, it has been said that we could not enter into a reciprocity treaty with the United States without discriminating against Great Britain. Well, in the first place, I think that the members of the Canadian House of Commons have one duty to perform, and one only, and that is to do what is best for our own country. We have to consider what will advance the prosperity of this Dominion, and if we take a wise course in that respect, we shall perform our duty, and we can let other representative bodies look after the interests committed to their care. I know that, so far as England is concerned, she is well able to take care of herself. Her statesmen are the equals of any statesmen in the world, and they are able and willing and anxious to promote the interests of the Empire as a whole. In the second place, even though we negotiate a treaty, before that treaty can become law, it must receive the sanction of the Imperial Government and be signed by Her Gracious Majesty the Queen. That itself, I should think, would be a sufficient guarantee that the interests of the Empire, as a whole, would be sufficiently safe-guarded. The fact that the Government and the Parliament of Great Britain would have to sanction the treaty before it became law, it seems to me, ought to allay any fear that the interests of the Empire would be jeopardized in any way. We find that treaties have been negotiated. Our sister province of Newfoundland, a few years ago, negotiated a treaty with the United States, known as the Blaine-Bond treaty. That treaty would have received the sanction of the Imperial Government, and would have been signed by Her Maesty but that Canada protested against it, and for that reason it was held over. But the fact that Newfoundland could negotiate a treaty that would be acceptable to the British Government and the British Parliament is sufficient to justify us in believing that if we were in earnest in our efforts to secure such a treaty, an arrangement could be made that would receive the sanction of the Imperial Government. There are a great many lines of goods that we import nearly altogether from the United States. If we entered into a reciprocity treaty that would embrace a certain line of manufactured goods, we could include only such things as we do not import from Great Britain at all. Take, for instance, agricultural implements. We import this class of goods almost wholly from the United States. Of wire nails we imported from the United States last year no less than $50,000 worth, while we imported from Great Britain only $1,461 worth. So I might name many articles of which we import almost none from England, while we import them largely from the United States. The list of articles in which reciprocity was agreed upon might be so arranged as not to interfere with our trade with England. I do not think there is any doubt whatever that if the Government were sincere in their efforts, they could obtain a treaty that would be greatly beneficial to the people of this Dominion. We have a great country here, a country with agricultural resources almost unlimited, a country whose progress ought to be very much greater than it is. It is lamentable to think what slow progress we have made in the last few years. In spite of all the efforts that have been made to increase the tide of immigration, we are not increasing the population in anything like the ratio we should. But, I believe a brighter day is coming. I anticipate great things for the future; I see in the near future, this young Canadian giant, conscious of his own strength, moving forward in the path of civilization with irresistible power. And, as he advances, I behold the plains of the North-west, the hills and valleys of the east, and the slopes that stretch to the Pacific, filled with an intelligent, religious, rejoicing people, one in sympathy, one in government, the inheritors and possessors of British institutions, the noblest and freest and brightest development of mankind.

Mr. EDWARDS. Before this debate closes—

Mr. MACLEAN (York). When?

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not know when—I desire to address a few words to the House. In the first place, I wish to refer to a few remarks made by hon. gentlemen on the other side. In the beginning of his speech, the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) said:

I am averse to the principle enunciated last year by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), that he was in favour of the total abolition of duties on pork, and on oats and other productions of the field and on other produce which farmers largely produce in which they are greatly interested.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have carefully read my speech delivered to the House last session, and what I shall now read is all that I can find bearing upon that question :

A second statement made by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, is that our farmers are protected. I deny that proposition most emphatically. They are not protected at all. They may have a small protection or a pretended protection, in the one article of pork, but even the protection on that is more a packer's protection than a farmer's protection.

Further on, I said :

I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to prove in any degree whatever that the farmers of this country are protected, except possibly to a very small extent, in the article of pork. Who are the producers of the wealth of this country ? They are, above all others, our farmers ! If any class should be protected, it is the farmers and the labourers ; but I defy any hon. gentleman to prove that either of these classes is protected in anything whatever, except as I have said.

Now, so far as the hon. member for East Simcoe is concerned, he did not correctly read my speech. The next question with which he dealt was the construction of the Trent Valley Canal. And he dealt with that canal versus the Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal. So far as the relative merits of these two canals are concerned, I do not think there is any similarity whatever. True, the Trent Valley Canal might be a work of very great importance to Canada, or, at least, to a portion of Canada ; but the construction of the Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal would not only be of paramount importance to the district through which it runs, but it would be of paramount importance to the whole Dominion of Canada. If there is one section of Canada more than another interested in the construction of that canal it is the city of Montreal, and also the city of Quebec. I am not going to dwell at any length on this question, but I will merely say that it is my belief that if that canal had been constructed thirty or forty years ago when it was a live question in this whole district, Canada would be worth many millions more to-day than she is ; and I believe that Montreal would be a much larger shipping port and New York relatively smaller. Sir, I earnestly desire that just as soon as the financial conditions of this country will permit, just as soon as the development of this country will warrant, that great work will be carried out. Great undertakings have been assumed by Canada in the last few years, and it might be premature now to ask, as some are asking, that that canal should be immediately built ; but just as soon as our condition will permit, I sincerely hope that that great work will be carried out. Now, Sir, in the discussion of this matter, the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) stated as follows :—

The construction of this canal would mean that barges after having delivered their cargoes of grain at Montreal could in turn be laden with Nova Scotia coal and hurried back to these different towns along the line of this canal. Again, in turn these barges passing through to the American side and discharging their cargoes of lumber or their cargoes of grain, could bring back hard coal, and necessarily the result of the double freight would be the lessening of rates each way.

As for that statement, Mr. Speaker, there is no question but that it is correct, and it illustrates what the Liberal party have always contended for, or what the free traders have always contended for, that in order that any country may achieve the best results, it must import as well as export. The hon. gentleman being a protectionist he can only apply this principle to the interior of the country. But I believe that the same principle extended the world over, would be beneficial wherever it was adopted. Now, the hon. gentleman next dealt with the export duty upon saw-logs, and again he made an onslaught on the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He stated that no member of this House had dared to defend the non-imposition of the export duty upon saw-logs except the hon. member for North Norfolk. Well, Sir, I may say that I and other members of this House have taken exactly the same ground as the hon. member for North Norfolk. The hon. member for Simcoe went on to say :

I ask what does all this mean ? The export from this country every year of 300,000,000 feet of saw-logs means that a large number of mills are working on the other side of the line, the owners of which, if deprived of those Canadian saw-logs, would be compelled to come to Canada and have the lumber manufactured here. I am going to read for the benefit of the House a short extract headed "Bay City," to prove the truth of the statement I made of the quantity of logs exported. This statement is made by Mr. Thos. Pitts, the head of the firm of Pitts & Co., exporters of saw-logs :

Between 260,000,000 and 300,000,000 feet of logs are annually imported from Canada. An export duty would compel us to go to Canada to manufacture our lumber. Along this coast from Saginaw to Cheboygan it would turn 20,000 men out of employment that earn annually in the neighbourhood of $5,500,000.

That is a startling statement—that the Government of Canada, by their policy of permitting the export of logs from this country, are depriving 20,000 men of employment in Canada. By the National Policy, the Government have imposed high protective duties in order to foster certain industries in this country ; and yet here it is pointed out by an American lumberman that the Government of Canada, by their suicidal policy—because it is a suicidal policy in this respect—are depriving this country of the employment, annually, of 20,000 men.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman not knowing very much about the question himself, read from this American importer; and I think you will agree with me that neither he nor the man from whom he quoted knew anything at all about the subject with which he was dealing. He says that the manufacture of 300,000,000 feet of logs into sawn lumber, would require the labour of 20,000 men, and an annual pay-sheet of $5,500,000. Mr. Speaker, it would take at the very outside 2,000 men to manufacture 3,000,000 feet of lumber, and the total expenditure for that labour would be $600,000. Their estimate is just ten times too large. I know, Mr. Speaker, that you will agree with me in making that statement. It simply does away with the contention of the hon. gentleman's whole speech, because it means that he will make any statement at all. Now, a great many not understanding this subject, suppose that the whole production of these logs is lost to Canada; whereas the truth of the matter is the cutting of the logs in the woods and bringing them to the mills, costs about three and one-half times as much as it does to manufacture them into sawn lumber. Furthermore, these logs are rafted in Canada, if they are not sawn in Canada, and that would mean at least 50 cents more per thousand, which would reduce by so much the figures I have already given. But these very saw-logs, after all, are manufactured by Canadians, although manufactured on American territory; and they are manufactured by Canadians driven out of this country by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. But under a rational system of government, under the policy that the Liberal party advocates, I believe that these logs would be manufactured in Canada, and manufactured by Canadians who are now working in the United States. The hon. gentleman represents a district of country upon Georgian Bay. He is a protectionist, and he considers the subject as regards the small district in which he lives, and not as regards the interests of the whole of Canada. The imposition of an export duty of $2 per thousand feet on 300,000,000 feet of lumber would mean to the treasury of Canada, $600,000 annually. The exportation of lumber to the United States is over 1,000,000,000 feet per annum. In the event of an export duty being placed on such logs, an import duty would be placed on lumber going from Canada to the United States, and this would mean a loss to the Canadian people of $2,000,000 annually. I never hear, in the course of speeches, delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite, such as the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), one word as to the preservation of our forests from the ravages of fire. That is a most important question to this House and to each of the provinces. There is another question of great interest, and that is the supply of timber in the United States and the supply of timber in Canada. There are many business men in this country, and no doubt many members of this House, who believe that the lumber of Canada is an absolute necessity to the United States. It is not the case. In so far as the United States is concerned, in my opinion it will not require one stick of timber from Canada for the next one hundred years.

Mr. SPROULE. American lumbermen do not say so.

Mr. EDWARDS. The supply is very large, indeed. There is the white pine of the north-western states, the yellow pine of the southern states, extending from Washington around the entire Atlantic coast to the mouth of the Mississippi River, and timber of various kinds in Mississippi, Kentucky, and Tennessee, a kind of pine that exists in very large quantities in the south-west, the red wood of California, and the Douglas pine of Washington and Oregon. The quantities are enormous, they are simply beyond calculation. In so far as white pine is concerned, it is quite true that the quantity in that single article is, in the United States, not so large as it is in Canada. What kind of lumber is it we export to the United States? It is our common lumber. The hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) stated a day or two ago that Great Britain was our best customer even for our lumber. That Great Britain is a very good customer for our pine lumber is quite true, and the best qualities are purchased for that market. But the exports to Great Britain were, in value, $2,000,000 less than to the United States last year, and the kind of lumber we exported to the United States was that which is the most difficult to sell, namely, our common lumber. If the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite should prevail, the result would be that our common lumber would have to bear an import duty, which it could not in the least degree bear, and this would be a serious detriment to the lumbermen of Canada and to Canada itself, because it is very well known that in so far as our exports are concerned, and also the production of wealth, the lumbermen stands next to the farmer. I have taken down the figures, in so far as exports are concerned for the past two years, and I find in 1894 we exported to England the value of $11,592,000, while we exported to the United States the value of $13,338,000. In 1895 we exported the value of $10,000,000 and $12,543,000 to the United States. I have already stated that it is of pre-eminent importance to the various provinces of this country that timber of all classes should be preserved against the ravages of fire. If hon. gentlemen speaking on the timber question in this House would devote themselves to the question of its preservation, they would be doing far more service than by bringing forward the subject of an export duty on logs, or anything of the kind. As regards an export duty on logs, I am opposed to it on principle, as well as opposed to it as a matter of policy. I hold that if gentlemen come here from the United States, or any other part of the world, and attend sales of timber limits in the various provinces, bid for them, purchase limits on certain conditions regulated by the provinces, comply with those regulations, it would be nothing less than theft on the part of the Government to step in and say, gentlemen, before you remove that property from this country, you must pay tribute to us. On principle, it is entirely wrong, and, as I have already explained, it would be a suicidal policy for this country to adopt.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. gentleman not think that the local governments should make regulations to have the timber manufactured in this country?

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. gentleman asks whether or not I think our provincial governments should make regulations to have the lumber manufactured in this country. So far as that is concerned, there is no Canadian who would be more heartily glad than I would be to see it all manufactured here, but I could not support any such principle. If we sought to carry that principle into effect, we would simply be declaring that the purchasers should not only saw, but should manufacture it into doors and sashes, &c. There is no consistency in such an argument.

Mr. SPROULE. It does not go that far, by any means.

Mr. EDWARDS. There is another question of export duty agitated in this country to which I desire to refer for a short time. I understand a very large deputation of gentlemen who are interested in Canadian pulp mills interviewed the Government, a few days ago, with the object of having an export duty placed upon pulp timber. So far as that is concerned, as a matter of principle and a question of policy, I would be adverse to any such imposition, and I most earnestly hope that the solicitations of the members of that deputation will not be entertained by the Government. What are the conditions of that trade, Sir? The various provinces have restrictions in so far as the cutting of spruce timber is concerned on the limits they own. In the province of Quebec, with which I am most intimate in this respect, spruce timber is not allowed to be cut on government limits of less dimension than eleven inches at the stump. Therefore, any timber cut for pulp wood is not cut upon the limits owned by the Government, but it is cut by the farmers and settlers on their own private lands. These farmers and settlers have never interviewed the Government nor never asked the Government for an export duty upon pulp wood, and they never will ask for it. And why, Sir? It is because they desire to sell their pulp wood in the free markets of the world for the highest price they can obtain. But the pulp-mill owners, protectionists, of course, would wish to say to the farmers and to the settlers: gentlemen, we will tax you for everything you buy, and for anything you have to sell in so far as we can we will tax you also. That spirit underlies the whole principle of protection. Sir, the interest of the farmers and the interest of the people of Canada is, that they shall have a free market to sell their pulp wood product, as well as all their other products, and a free market to buy in also.

Now, Sir, I shall deal briefly with a much larger hon. gentleman, namely, the Minister of Finance. He told us in his Budget speech that last year the balance of trade was in our favour, and he referred to that fact as "so much to the gain of the general of our business interests." Well, Sir, it is true that last year we did export more than we imported, but what was the reason? It was because the condition of the farmers of Canada to-day is so poor—and I am sorry to say it, but I must say it, because I know it is true—their condition is so bad that they had to sell everything they possibly could sell. And why was it that our imports were not larger? Sir, it was because our people were too poor to buy. The Minister of Finance, like a great many others, probably believes that when we export more than we import we are in a thriving condition. I deny that proposition entirely. I would be glad to see Canada in such a position that she would be able, each year, to buy more than she sells: and if she is making proper development within her own borders, and if the people are prospering as they should prosper, then they will each year be able to buy more than they sell. This balance of trade question is, I admit, a great difficulty to many, although I cannot see how it can be a difficulty to those who have studied the subject at all.

Mr. DICKEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. My hon. friend (Mr. Dickey) says "hear, hear," and he smiles. I know quite well that he does not think I know what I am talking about, but, Sir, perhaps I do. I contend that in dealing with the balance of trade, you have to consider the whole conditions surrounding a country, and in a new country like Canada—where, if we have not we should have large immigration, affording a greatly increased market for our products—we would be able to buy more than we sell if we were making the very best development. A great many people think that the rule in this respect applied to individuals should apply to nations, and that when a man sells more than he buys, he is in a prosperous condition. I admit that principle so far as individuals are concerned, but I deny that it applies to countries. For many years the United States had a balance of trade in its favour, but during that whole period the United States was not showing its best development. With a very large influx of population and with the great development that was going on during that time, the United States should have bought each year more than she sold. On the other hand, England for, I think, fifty years, has had each year a very large balance of trade against her; but where is there under the sun a country which is growing so fast in riches as is Great Britain? If the workmen of Canada were simply working for export, and if every hour of labour employed in Canada was devoted to the production of articles for export, then it would be true that we would be retrograding if we did not export more than we imported. But we are making internal development, and it is the application of the labour of the country that produces the riches of the country. I deny the statement that even to-day Canada is not becoming richer. Canada is becoming richer just in proportion as the people of Canada labour. Sir, the statement I make is this: that the labourers of Canada are not receiving a proper proportion of the results of their labour. It is going in a wrong direction, and it is going in a wrong direction because of the system of protection under which we live. Again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Finance Minister made the statement that we were just now emerging from a period of five years of hard times, of depression. Now, if I recollect aright, the Budget speeches of the hon. gentleman for the past five years, in each of them he described the condition of Canada in glowing terms, and the speeches of the hon. gentlemen behind him were in the same strain. Last year, for the first time, the hon. Finance Minister admitted that there was a little depression in Canada, and he says now that we are just emerging from a five year's period of depression. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am largely engaged in commerce myself. I know something about it, and I regret very much for Canada to have to say, that, in my opinion, we are only fairly well into it—the depression. We have not begun to emerge from the depression at all. I was in business from 1874 to 1878, and I make this statement, that the depression existing in Canada to-day is far greater than the depression that existed from 1874 to 1878. I make this further statement—though I know it will not be accepted by hon. members opposite, and it may not be accepted by a great many of the people of Canada—that in no period for many years did Canada make such great development as she made in the years of 1877 and 1878. A great deal of the prosperity that appeared to exist after 1879 was the result of our large borrowings and our large public expenditures. It was not due to the development of the lands and the other natural resources of Canada at all. Not only was that the case, but the expenditure of the savings that had been made by the people in 1877 and 1878, after that period, made it appear that it was a time of greater prosperity; whereas, I make the statement, and I think I can prove it, that in no period in the history of Canada was such a saving made by the people as was made in those years, I mean in 1877 and 1878. Later on the hon. Finance Minister made this statement:

The returns of the past six months of the current year show an increase of imports to the amount of $2,500,000 and an increase of exports of $500,000, making a betterment of trade of $3,000,000 in the six months.

The increase in imports was five times as great as the increase in exports, and a short time before he had made this statement that that was a bad state of things; yet he calls this a betterment of trade. Now, so far as being a learned professor or reading something on the subject is concerned, the Finance Minister, perhaps, knows, theoretically, something of commerce; but, practically, I am sorry to say, he is a perfect infant on the subject of trade and commerce; he knows nothing at all about it. Later on he expresses a willingness to be judged upon the record of his party for the past seventeen years, but not upon certain periods of that time. Well, Mr. Speaker, I consider the debate which is now closing, the best debate on the Budget that I ever heard in this House. The principles of protection versus those of free trade have been more and better discussed this year than I have ever heard them discussed in this House before. One man may say that he is a protectionist; another may say that he will not go the whole length of free trade, but that he is in favour of a revenue tariff. But there can be no intelligent discussion upon the subject at all unless it is a discussion of the question of protection versus free trade. The application of a revenue tariff is simply the application of the principles of free trade. Mr. Speaker, I have announced it in this House many and many a time, and I am not ashamed to say it here nor in any other place—in fact, I am proud to say it—that I am an out-and-out free trader; but I am willing for the present to accept the policy enunciated by the Liberal party, which is that of a revenue tariff. Now, the hon. Finance Minister said that he was willing to be judged by the whole period of the last seventeen years, but not by any portion of it. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in the discussion of this matter, have given us a very great deal of ancient history. Their minds always revert back to the period from 1874 to 1878, when the Liberal party were in power, and they discuss the conditions, as they consider they then existed, compared with the conditions as they consider they have existed since that time. They are very fond of ancient history, but they do not go back to the period prior to 1874. From the inception of confederation, up to 1874, Canada lived under a revenue tariff. After that period up to the date of the introduction of the National Policy, we still lived under the same condition, with a simple addition of 2½ per cent to the tariff in the last few years. It is true, for the first few years of that period—I refer to the period when Mr. Mackenzie was in power—a very great depression did exist in this country; but it is also true that at the same time a very great depression existed in the United States and in almost the entire world. Would any rational man expect that a country with a small population such as Canada would not, like all other countries, suffer under such conditions? Not only is that true, but the depression was far greater than it would otherwise have been in the United States and Canada in consequence of the American war. There is this one fact, and it will be so till the end of time: We shall be continually getting out of gear, so far as the proper employment of our people is concerned; and this applies, not only to Canada, but to all other countries in the world. If you could continually keep the number of traders exactly in proportion to the number of producers, no such thing as a depression would ever exist. It is because too many men leave their proper avocations and rush into business, that business is overdone, and labour is, to a great extent, neglected. We have too many traders, and, as a result, business calamities and commercial depression follow. These intervals of depression come about periodically. Now, in so far as the United States are concerned, as a result of the American war and the inflation that occurred after that war was over, the natural period of depression was put a long way further off than it would otherwise naturally have been; but when the depression did come, it was very severe and far reaching in its effects, and it had a very great effect on this country. The Liberal party came into power just after that depression had appeared, for it made its appearance in 1873. It appeared in a very marked manner in the United States in 1873, and it was, I admit, their misfortune to come into power at such a time. Then the improvement began in a very marked manner in the United States in 1878, and the results of that improvement we felt here, and everything that followed was claimed for the National Policy which began its operations in 1879. At that time what were the people of Canada promised? Hon. gentlemen opposite said: Return us to power; let us introduce the National Policy—although they did not know until after they came into power what their National Policy was to be; elect us, and we will bring about such a condition of things that the farmer, the lumberman, the manufacturer and the labourer, every one will be prosperous, and that prosperity will continue. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite are willing to be judged by the last period of seventeen years. Well, ask the farmers, ask the people of this country generally what the condition of things is to-day, and they will deny that we have had continuous prosperity since that time. They will deny that for many years past they have enjoyed any degree of prosperity, and they will all admit that to-day we are suffering from the most serious depression that has ever overtaken this country. When hon. gentlemen opposite pretend anything different, they simply insult the intelligence of the farmers of this country, who know very much better, and I am surprised that any farmer in this House will get up and defend the present condition of things and the policy of the present Government. That policy is one which robs the farmers of this country, which robs the producers of all the wealth of this country. It is nothing else but class legislation, and class legislation of a most iniquitous kind. There is one thing in this connection that I will admit. I will admit that after the inception of the so-called National Policy—I call it the irrational policy—there was a movement of population from the small towns to the greater. I admit that the small manufacturing towns grew less and the larger ones grew greater; but I contend that the result to-day is that while the large centres have grown greater, such as the cities of Montreal and Toronto, the whole country has been levelled down in order to build up these places. I hold further that those large cities are suffering more to-day than they have suffered perhaps at any time in their history; and I hold further that these cities cannot make any further great improvement until the country generally again begins to build up. I believe that the business men of Montreal, the manufacturers of Montreal, are beginning to realize this fact. Why, Mr. Speaker, because the policy of this Government is destroying the port of Montreal. The Government speak of their statesmanship in constructing canals. They talk as if they had built them themselves. Not at all, it is the farmers of this country who have built them; and by the Government's policy, the transport trade on these canals is lost to us and diverted to the United States ports. Their policy is destroying, in a commercial, in a manufacturing and in every sense, the great port of the city of Montreal; and until we have a rational policy which will enable the country to grow, which will allow us to import as well as export, the port of Montreal can make no further development. Now, the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) took to task the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) because he referred to the geographical and climatic conditions of this country, and the Minister exclaimed that our vigorous climate was very much in our favour, and that we had a country capable of growing good men and so forth. In so far as that is concerned, I accept his statement, but it was not a reply at all to the contention of my hon. friend from South Oxford. What the hon. member for South Oxford meant was that climatic influences were to some extent against us because of our lack of variety of climate. What he contended, and what any hon. gentleman will contend who gives any study to this question, is that if there is one country under the sun which is less suited for protection than another it is Canada, because of our climate, and because unfortunately of our lack of seaboard, and because of our great breadth and our narrow condition generally. Geographically there can be no doubt that things are to some extent against us. Geographically and climatically, the conditions of the United States are much more favourable than what they are in Canada. The United States have a compact country, a country with great breadth and great length, with seaboard all round it, and with all the climates and all the resources necessary to build up a great country. And of whom are we the competitors? We are the competitors of the people of the United States in the sale of our cattle, grain, butter, cheese and all our other agricultural products. True, the Americans have been living under the same iniquitous system for a number of years; but if there is one country under the sun better calculated to live under that iniquitous system, it is the United States. It is a combination of great countries the east trading with the west and the north with the south. If protection be a good thing for any country, then the people of the United States ought to apply it inside their own territory. They ought to run three or four lines through their own country and have a protective system—the north protected against the south and the east against the west. But the people of that country are bound to throw off that iniquitous system. They are beginning to understand the situation, and they are going to throw it off, and when they do so, England will have the greatest competitor she has ever had or ever will have. Now, what are our conditions? Our conditions are, as have been already described—we border on that great country for about four thousand miles. Is it reasonable, or is it not reasonable to say that it would be greatly in the interests of the people of Canada to be able to trade backwards and forwards across the line, instead of carrying all our products from west to east and from east to west, as we have to do to-day? There can be no kind of doubt that, in this respect, geographical conditions are against us. But, vigorous people that we are, give the producers of this country, the farmers, the lumbermen, the miners and the fishermen, fair-play, and, even with these conditions against us, we are not afraid to meet the people of the United States, or the people of any country, in the markets of the world. We, the producers of the natural resources of this country, desire to be able to buy exactly as we sell. Our products are sold in open competition with the products of all the countries of the world. We, the producers of the wealth of this country, desire to buy in the same way. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, in discussing this question, compare the farmers of England with the farmers of Canada. Now, Sir, so far as that is concerned, I will admit that agriculture in England is depressed. But I hold that it is only a temporary depression, and that it is only a question of the adjustment of rents. Will any hon. gentleman pretend that the land of Great Britain has lost its value? We compete against the farmers of England, it is true, but in that competition our farmers are handicapped to the extent of the freight to England from the Northwest and other parts of Canada. Is not the land of Great Britain, if it is equal in fertility, worth just as much more than our land, as the cost of transporting our products to their markets? There can be no kind of doubt about that. Talk of England being in a condition of decay. Why, Sir, it is perfect nonsense. We had an exemplification of her great power the other day, when many nations of the world appeared as if they were going to pounce upon old England at the same time. But she was able to stand up and say: You may have the men, but we have the money and the ships, and we are ready for you. There is no decay in England, but the very contrary. England stands higher among the nations of the world to-day than ever before. And is it possible that England can maintain that position with her agriculture going to pieces? Nothing of the kind—it is simply a question of adjustment of rents between landlord and tenant. But it is perfectly true that some of the farmers of England, if not all, are crying out for protection. And it is perfectly natural: the same condition of affairs prevails all over the world. Those who are interested in having protection are the ones who cry out for it. The manufacturers of England are not asking for protection, but the farmers are. In this country, the farmers are not asking for protection, but the manufacturers are. This only proves that it is not a question of principle at all, but a matter of policy for the individual himself. That is what protection amounts to, nothing more and nothing else.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of this subject, for a few sessions past, I have contended that the farmer of this country has no protection at all, except, possibly, on the one article of pork. I find that I have been making a mistake. I have looked into the subject, and I find that even in that particular the farmer has no protection. This country exports hog products far more largely than it imports them. I deny now, and I challenge any man in this House or out of it to show that the farmer of this country is protected in the slightest degree in anything that he produces. I may be told that he is protected in the matter of mess pork. He is not, and I will tell you why. The purchase of the hogs from the farmers of this country is not based upon the question of mess pork, but upon the quantity of hogs actually in the country; and the packer selects from the products what will make mess pork, and the rest he sells for bacon, hams, and so on, and the farmer gets no protection at all.

Mr. STEVENSON. Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. member for Peterborough laughs. But I ask him and other protectionists to study this question. Protection is a policy of infants. When I was a lad fourteen years old, I was a protectionist, and for years I would not wear anything that was not grown in Canada, and believed that if every Canadian would be a patriot and use only the products of Canada, and if we should then sell our surplus abroad we would become a very rich people. But before I was twenty years of age, and without ever hearing protection or free trade discussed, without reading one line upon the subject, I became an ultra free trader, and remain a free trader to this day.

Mr. ROOME. Would you be in favour, if your party came into power, of removing the duties upon farm products?

Mr. LISTER. Oh, you are asking that question of everybody. It does neither good nor harm.

Mr. EDWARDS. I have answered that question two or three times already. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) thought he was asking me a very clever question, when, a few years ago he put that query to me. The answer that I then gave is on record, and I ask the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Roome) to read it. I became a free trader by simply applying the principle of protection logically. On the principle of protection, each farmer should be his own shoemaker, his own tinsmith, blacksmith, and carpenter.

An hon. MEMBER. And his own doctor.

Mr. EDWARDS. And his own doctor, I suppose. But when I grew older, I came to the conclusion that it was far better for the farmer to farm and to exchange what he produced for the products of others. And the same is true of countries. If we had, in Canada, all the climates of the world, if we had in Canada all the varied products of the world, we might then put a Chinese wall around our country, allow nobody in and nobody out and trade only among ourselves. But conditions in Canada are the same as in other countries. We have resources that are natural to the country, and the best interests of the people of Canada lies in applying themselves to producing those articles which are natural to the country and exchanging them for the products for other parts of the world. Any other system is an artificial system, and prejudicial to the producers of the natural resources of the country. Sir, I am no enemy of the manufacturers. I desire that we shall have manufactures in this country, and I deny that under the system we propose to introduce the manufacturing interest will be very much lessened, if lessened at all. I believe that, under the rational system which the Liberal party will introduce, when returned to power, the development of our natural resources will be stimulated, our population will be increased and we shall have more manufacturing, because the manufacturers will have a larger population to manufacture for. Under protection it is quite impossible to sell in the markets of the world, and under the system of our present Government we can manufacture only for ourselves. It is owing to such conditions that we have not increased our population as fast as we should have done. As a result the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway—an enterprise which is national in its character and which has more or less difficulties of existence—an increase of population and general development is of great importance. The greatest question the people of Canada have to consider is, how are we going to fill up our great North-west, because, unless we fill up that country with a population, our progress will be very slow indeed. We have undertaken in the past heavy obligations, which are a charge upon the people of Canada, and, in order to lighten that charge, we must increase our population and develop our country. The great difficulty in the North-west at present is, that we have tried to cover too much country, our population is too sparse. In order to encourage immigration, in order to induce people to come to our shores from foreign countries, we must show them that we have a cheap country to live in, and that those who come here to engage in agriculture, or in the development of our natural resources, shall have fair-play, that they shall not be unjustly taxed, that they shall not be taxed for the advantage of a few manufacturers. Mr. Speaker, as a Canadian, who is proud of Canada, I desire her development, I desire that all impediments to her prosperity and greatness may be removed, and it is my sincere belief that the policy of the Liberal party will remove those impediments, and that our beloved country will attain to that degree of wealth and prosperity which we all hope for her.

Mr. McSHANE. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the night, I do not intend to make a long speech; I shall take another opportunity to say some things which I will not have time to say to-night. But, in the meantime, I desire to draw your attention to some events that occurred in the election that took place recently in the city of Montreal. Sir, although I was told by the Finance Minister that I was a man unworthy to sit in Parliament, yet, with all my unworthiness, the people of Montreal Centre have sent me here, and I desire to give you a little illustration of the tactics that were employed against me when I was a candidate for the high honour of a seat in the House of Commons of Canada. I was opposed by three or four monopolists. One was a very wealthy gentleman, and, although I do not think he was very fond of politics, I believe he was fond of the party in power. This gentleman worked night and day, with his son, and his clerks, and his manager. He told his employees for a month before the election, that, if they dare to vote for James McShane, they would not get any more work. Well, Sir, perhaps it would be just as well for these poor men if they did not get any more work, for, although that gentleman has made millions, he pays his men a miserable $1 or $1.10 a day to work in vats, and these poor men, after four or five years, become sick and contract rheumatism. But what does that gentleman care? The day of my election he had guards at his gates, and he told the men before they came out of his factory: "Cry out for Hingston, or you can't get out here." A great many of those men cried out for Hingston, but they voted for James McShane. Now, Sir, I will give you some reasons why one of these monopolists worked so hard against me, and that is because he has got rich by the favour of the present Government, and the poor people of this country have had to pay for it. Now, I want to give you an illustration of the way the tariff policy of this Government works in respect of the article of refined syrup, and I will give you a practical illustration of the protection enjoyed by our sugar refiners. In 1893, the duty on refined syrups was 1½ cents per gallon. This being a reasonable duty, we did considerable business in this article, which we purchased from the refiners in the United States. This, however, did not suit either the Government or the Canadian refiners, and in 1894 the duty was increased to 7 cents per gallon, which was simply an outrage, as the following actual importation by us will prove:—

Oct. 18.—500 barrels syrup (costing in New York) 21,221 galls. at 7¼c.....	$ 1,527 93
Freight to Montreal	$ 297 00
Wharfage and canal dues ..	10 25
Gauging	15 00
Marine insurance	11 25
Duty, 7 cents per gall., and 20 per cent on pkgs.	1,567 08
	1,900 58
	$3,428 51

Mr. McSHANE.

Notwithstanding this increased duty, we continued importing syrups, as we understood from our Finance Minister's speech, that he intended to reduce taxation, and we presumed that refined syrups would be one of the articles that would come under the heading of reduced taxation, and we patiently awaited the arrival of the Budget in 1895.

Imagine our dismay, when the Finance Minister brought down his Budget in 1895, and we read that the duty on this particular article had been increased to 10½ cents per gallon. This was the last straw, and we at once retired from the business of importing refined syrups, as we felt it would be quite useless to attempt any further business in an article costing 7¼ cents per gallon, on which we were asked to pay 10½ cents per gallon duty.

Now, there was another gentleman who worked very hard against me, and I will tell you why. This gentleman is a prominent Montreal merchant, and has a large number of steamships trading between Montreal and foreign ports. He has made a small fortune out of this National Policy, but still he is not satisfied. Once he was a strong Reformer, but, when he found out that he could make money out of the present Government, he changed his politics. This gentleman is in the rice business, and I will show how he is protected. The following figures, taken from the Government blue-book for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1895, are sufficient to prove that the duty on rice is simply outrageous:—

	Value.	Lbs.	Rate of Duty.	Duty Collected
	$		per lb.	$ cts.
Cleaned rice.....	98,849	5,876,856	1½ cts.	73,466 31
Rice, uncleaned, unhulled or paddy...	199,620	22,772,306	3-10 "	68,933 41

It will be noticed, from the above, that the Government collected more duty on 5,876,856 pounds of cleaned rice than what they did on 22,772,306 pounds of uncleaned. It will also be seen that the cleaned rice cost originally 1½ cents per pound, and had to pay a duty of 1¼ cents per pound, making the rice cost, duty paid, ¾ cents per pound. The uncleaned rice cost ¾ cents per pound, and the duty was 3-10th cent per pound, or less than ½ cent per pound. This would give a protection of equal to 1 cent per pound, and, on the quantity of uncleaned rice imported, would amount to $227,723.06. There is only one rice mill in the Dominion, and it is getting 3 cents per pound for rice which cost them as follows:—

First cost	$0 87½
Duty	0 30
Freight, say	0 25
	1 42

To this must be added the cost of cleaning, and as the same rice can be bought cleaned for $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound, the difference between the latter figure and \$1.42 is to be added to the cost..... 0 30

Actual cost 1 72

The rice-miller here says, however, that it costs more to clean rice here than it does in India or England. We don't believe there is any truth in this, as the cleaning is all done by machinery, and the process of doing so is very simple, and it is very doubtful if the mill employs twenty hands all the year around. But suppose, for the sake of argument, that we admit that the cleaning here does cost more and that we allow $\frac{3}{8}$ cent per pound to cover this extra labour, this would make the cleaned rice cost 2 cents, and still leave the mill a margin of 1 cent per pound, which, on their annual importation, would amount to \$227,723.06. It is no wonder that the gentleman spent money and worked very hard. He told his men that, if James McShane got into power, he could not make any more money out of rice, and that the factory would be destroyed. I have an interest in Montreal and will do something to promote the interest of my native city. No one pretends that rice can be grown in this country. It is an article of food which is consumed by the poorer classes principally, and for the Government to impose a duty of $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound in order that one mill may make \$227,723.06 per annum is simply legalized robbery. Of course, every one in the wholesale grocery trade is aware that the election subscription from this concern must be very large, but, if they subscribe half of the profits, there is still \$100,000 left for the mill. If the Government want revenue, why not impose the same duty on uncleaned as that on cleaned? rice, and they will be \$200,000 richer per annum. If they don't want revenue, make the duty on cleaned rice the same as on uncleaned, and the poor man will get his rice 1 cent per pound cheaper, which would mean a saving of \$200,000 to the consumer; and it would pay both the Government and the consumer if they were to pension off everybody connected with the rice-mill, in order to do away with this iniquity. The rice-mill has had a good time for the last ten years. It is about time that this state of affairs should end, and that the consumer should no longer be called upon to pay $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents on an article of food like rice, which can be bought outside of Canada for $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound. This is protection with a vengeance. I am very sorry the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) is not in the House because I have something to say to him in regard to the references made by him to the cheese trade in Montreal. However, I will be very brief on that point; I would have said more if the hon. gentleman had been in his seat. I desire to read the following letter:—

Butter and Cheese Association of the Montreal Board of Trade.

Office:—10 St. John Street and 39 St. Sacramento Street, Montreal 24th February, 1896.

Hon. Jas. McShane, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir:

By direction of the executive committee I am to thank you on behalf of the members of this association for your defence of the Montreal cheese trade in Parliament against the slanderous and untruthful statements of Mr. McLennan and others, and I now have pleasure in forwarding you memorandums prepared by prominent members of the trade, which may be of use to you in future discussions of this matter.

I am, dear sir,
Yours truly,

G. A. IRWIN,
Secretary.

Estimated make of cheese in Canada in 1895, up to 31st of July	1,075,000
Shipped up to 17th August	828,806
Remainder	248,194

There thus could not have been over 250,000 boxes June and July made cheese in all Canada in October, which proves the sheer foolishness of the statement that there were 600,000 boxes held by Montreal speculators alone.

It is well known that almost all, if not quite all, the cheese held in Montreal last fall were held by shippers and merchants regularly and legitimately in the business, proving that the Montreal cheese merchants were justified in assuming that Mr. McLennan had reference to them in stating in Parliament that so many cheese were held by Montreal speculators.

It is also well known that the bulk of the June and July cheese held in Montreal last fall were owned by English houses who bought them as June and July cheese, and had them held here because the facilities for doing so are better than in Great Britain.

Mr. McLennan's charges are not only untruthful, but show a shortsightedness not to be expected in a gentleman of his position, inasmuch that such statements, though false and unwarrantable, are apt to check the confidence and good-feeling that now exist in the trade generally, both in Canada and in Great Britain, to the lasting injury of the dairy trade of Canada. If the honourable gentleman were to set about to damage and injure the dairy interests of this country, no stronger words could do it than those which he uttered on the 20th inst. before this Parliament.

So far from any member of the Montreal butter and cheese trade having ever admitted that June and July cheese were shipped by them as September's, they, as a body, have challenged proof of such actions but no proof has ever been attempted, either in England or this country, showing that those who brought the charges knew they were entirely without foundation.

I am not going to read the letters that have appeared in the newspapers on the subject, because it would occupy too much time. Here is, however, a letter which I received to-day, and I will make it short:

Dear Mr. McShane :

Your letter of the 25th received, and I am indeed glad to hear from you and to know that you are taking such an interest in this matter. Between ourselves, it is doing you a good deal of good, both in a friendly and political way.

You have a very good case, indeed, to make against McLennan ; in the first place, McLennan said that the reason of small prices paid in the spring is largely due to the enormous quantity placed there late in the season. You can answer that the supply and demand always regulate the prices, and that the reason cheese went out low last spring was because there was too much of it and that the merchants suffered the loss in this instance and not the farmers and if it had been placed on the market earlier, the price would have been still lower.

Secondly, that it is a gross untruth and libel upon the trade in Canada that June and July cheese is stored with the view, to use his own words, of placing it on the English market in the fall and representing it as (September make) ; in this connection, he is branding those engaged in selling cheese to England as fraudulent dealers and thus trying to disturb or bring about a loss of that confidence which it has taken years of integrity and honesty to build up.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a man in this House who has paid more money to the farmers of this country than I have. I have bought from them their produce for years and years, and paid them millions of dollars in return, and no man in the city of Montreal knows the farmers better than I do. Hon. gentlemen opposite repeat the old, old story about the hard times in the period between 1874 and 1878. They tell us that Montreal has progressed since then, and they take credit for its progress, but do they expect that Montreal should not have made progress during these eighteen years. I can tell these hon. gentlemen on the other side, that never in the history of that city was it in such a depressed condition as it is to-day. Never was trade so dull, not for years was the shipping less than last year, and seldom have fewer men been employed on the wharfs than during last year and the year before. These gentlemen who support the Government tell us day after day, that the country is prospering, but they are afraid to get out of the positions they hold in order to give the people an opportunity to decide whether their policy has been successful or not. They hold on to the Treasury benches a year beyond their time, but the day of reckoning will come to them, and it is not far distant. Why, Mr. Speaker, the National Policy has been a ruinous policy. For the past six months more bankruptcies have occurred in Montreal than during any similar period for years past. There are more houses to let in the city to-day than ever before. I speak myself as a landlord, and I say that if the people cannot pay their rents it is not their fault, but the fault of the business being so bad. As the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) has said, the farmer has no protection. I commenced to ship cattle in 1874, and from that year up to 1888, I sent thousands of animals to England, and had fifteen or twenty steamers engaged in the business at the time. The farmer then got 5 or 6 cents a pound for his cattle, but to-day he gets only 3 cents, and sometimes less. In spite of that, we are told that the people of Canada are prosperous. Yes, there are a few blood-suckers and vampires prospering, whose object is to crush the masses of the people, but none others prosper. And the poor workingman is badly treated. I am here to speak for the people of Montreal, and I am here to defend the interests of Montreal, and were it not so late to-night I could give further evidence of the evil effects which the policy of the Government has wrought in that city. I shall again take occasion to speak of customs frauds, and of the manner in which our merchants have been treated for years and years. I have a seat in this House to-night because many honest Conservatives who have hitherto supported the Conservative policy are tired and ashamed of the party they belong to. They have voted for me, and they will vote for me again, because so long as I have the honour of a seat in Parliament, I shall faithfully do my duty. I want no office, and I want no place. I seek none. I shall be true to the interests of my constituents. Were it not that I am suffering from a severe cold, I would give further facts to show to the House how the merchants of Montreal have been treated by this Government for years. Young Mr. Tupper was good enough to refer to me as "Jimmy McShane" in the Windsor Hall in the city of Montreal. Well, he will find that I will protect the interests of the people of that city against any Government that does wrong. I wish to tell young Mr. Tupper that Jimmy McShane never lived on the people of this country and never will. Both he and the Minister of Finance will discover before I leave this Parliament that I am not exactly what they think. Some of the Government newspapers have slandered me ; they endeavoured to crush me, but the people have always supported me, and they know me better than either of these hon. gentlemen. I have some more truthful things to say about the Government, Mr. Speaker, but I will reserve them for another opportunity.

Mr. GRIEVE. Mr. Speaker, after the very able and exhaustive speeches from both sides on the question now before the House, it is not my intention to detain the House with any very lengthened arguments. And, in the remarks I wish to make, I shall confine myself almost exclusively to the question, speaking from a farmers standpoint. I have been astonished that since the commencement of this debate, only one farmer to your right, Sir, has seen fit to address the House with regard to the merits of the National Policy. We have had the question discussed by many leading professional gentlemen who occupy seats on the Government benches, but only one of the farmers supporting the Government has ventured to speak. It has been contended by hon. gentleman on this side of the House, and I am bound to say it has been contended with a great deal of force, that the existing tariff is a tariff in the interests of the large manufacturers who have formed themselves into rings, who have formed themselves into combinations, who have formed themselves into trusts, &c., with the one great object in view of making themselves rich at the expense of the farmers and the masses of the people of Canada. On the other hand, it is argued by our opponents that the tariff as it is framed at present is decidedly a farmers' tariff. Now, Mr. Speaker, I intend to show that if the tariff was framed with a view to the welfare of the farmers of Canada, it has been a lamentable failure and has fallen very far short of its aim. What has the National Policy done for the farmers of Canada? We know something of the lavish promises made for the National Policy prior to its introduction in 1879. We know that the National Policy, it was promised, would increase the value of farm lands and would increase the value of farm products. We were told that the National Policy was to provide a home market for the farmers. We were told that the National Policy was to keep our young men in our own country, secure for them steady employment, and give them a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. Let me ask, Sir, has a single one of those prophecies been fulfilled? Have farm lands increased in value? I know from my own knowledge that in my section of the country farm lands have largely depreciated in value during the last ten or fifteen years. I am within the judgment of every member of this House when I say that in that period farm property has depreciated at least from 25 to 40 per cent. Sir, I do not intend to confine myself to individual cases that could be shown throughout the different sections of the country, but I will show by figures which have been prepared by the Ontario Government that farm lands generally have very largely depreciated in value. We know, Sir, that in 1878, the Conservative party in Canada and the Conservative press as well, took the ground that the National Policy was to increase the value of farm lands. We know, Sir, that in 1878 not only many of the manufacturers, but many of the labouring men, and many of the farmers of this country, forsook their political allegiance, and their former political friends, and voted for the party that promised to increase the value of farm lands and the value of farm products. Now, Sir, how have these predictions been fulfilled? I take as a basis of calculation the reports of the Ontario Bureau of Industries for 1883 and 1894. These documents are official, being published by the legislature of Ontario. I find from them that the value of farm lands in the province of Ontario in 1883 was $655,000,000, and in 1894, $587,246,000, or a reduction of $67,754,000. But there are other things that must be considered in making the calculation. Between 1883 and 1894, 1,760,000 acres of land were cleared in Ontario. Hon. gentlemen may say that the value of this land would not add to the depreciation. We know that on an ordinary farm of 100 acres or 200 acres, a piece of bush of 20 or 25 acres does not depreciate the value of the farm, but rather enhances its value. But those 1,760,000 acres of land which were cleared in those ten years were lands in new districts. The ordinary cost of clearing land is $15 or $20 an acre. I will put it at the lowest price, $15, and you have a value of $29,400,000 that must be added to the amount of depreciation. In 1883 there were in Ontario, 213,000 farmers and in 1894, 243,000, an increase of 30,000. Hon. gentlemen may say that this shows the growing prosperity of the country. But it must not be forgotten that a large number of our farmers were young men who went into the new districts opened up by the provincial government. We know that during the last ten years many townships have been surveyed and opened for settlement in the Rainy River, Port Arthur, Bruce Mines, and other districts. The lands so taken up were formerly in the hands of the Government and assessed as Government lands previous to 1883; but after that time they passed into the hands of farmers and their value has to be added to the value of farm lands in the province in 1894. If we take all these three items together—the ultimate loss, the cleared lands and the value of the farms—we find that $97,154,000 is the amount of depreciation of farm property in the province of Ontario during those ten years. That is not all. There have been many permanent improvements made in those ten years. Farmers have been putting up buildings such as new houses and new barns, they have been removing stones and stumps, they have been doing much in the way of underdraining, open draining and so forth; and all these must be taken into account in calculating the depreciation in the value of farm lands. I think I am within the mark when I say that the depreciation in the value of farm lands in the province of Ontario in the ten years from 1883 to 1894, amounted to no less than $140,000,000 or $150,000,000. Now, Sir, did the Conservative party in 1878 promise that they would increase the value of farm lands? Did they promise that they would raise the prices of farm products? Sir John Macdonald himself, who was the leader of the Conservative party at that time, speaking at a large meeting in the city of Toronto, said:

If you desire this country to prosper; if you desire this country to rise out of the slough of despond in which it has sunk; if you desire to see manufactures rise; if you desire to see labour employed ; if you desire the emigration of our young men stopped ; if you desire to bring back those who have emigrated ; if you desire to see the value of land rise ; if you desire prosperity, you will support the National Policy.

Mr. Speaker, I say that not one of those prophecies have been fulfilled. I do not for a single moment say that this is entirely due to the working of the National Policy ; but I have every reason to believe that it is in a great measure due to the fact that the products of our farms have been shut out to a large degree from our best markets. While it is undoubtedly true that England is the principal, if not the only market for our wheat, cheese, beef, and light horses, and is a strong competitor with the United States for our surplus hay, sheep, hog products, oats, butter, apples, honey, and so forth, yet it is an admitted fact that the country to the south of us is the great market for our barley, lambs, heavy horses, poultry, eggs, pease, beans, potatoes and other roots, and many other products grown by the farmers of Canada. In order to prove that the statements I have just made are substantially correct, I think it only fair to the House that I should give the figures, as gleaned from the statistical Year-book of Canada for 1894. During that year we exported horses to England to the value of $400,507, and to the United States horses to the value of $480,525. It should be observed that the class of horses we are exporting to England are well-bred horses sent there for military purposes and for saddle and driving purposes, a class of horses which it is almost impossible for the great mass of the farmers of Canada to raise ; but the class of horses we have been shipping to the United States are heavy draught horses which are used on drays and for heavy working purposes, the class of horses that have been in the past and are at the present time easily raised by every farmer in the country. The values of other articles exported to England and the United States respectively in the same year, 1894, were as follows :—

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold that I have clearly demonstrated this fact to the House, that while England undoubtedly stands supreme as the great market for the world's produce, the United States is the principal market for a very large percentage of what is grown upon Canadian soil, and had Canadian shippers equal advantages in placing their products on the American market that they have on the English markets, I do not hesitate to say that our exports to the United States would, in a very few years, increase by 50 or 75 per cent. It is a wonder to me, when we consider the very high tariff existing between the two countries, that we are able to keep up the immense volume of trade that we do between this country and the United States. Will hon. gentlemen opposite pretend, with the facts before them, that there is any chance of our obtaining as good a market outside of Canada in any other country as we can in the United States for many of the articles I have enumerated, and which we have to sell? Are we likely to get as good a market elsewhere for our barley, horses, lambs, small fruits, eggs, poultry, hay, and the many other articles we have to sell, and for which there is, practically, an unlimited demand in the United States? Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers of Canada, through their different organizations, are crying out for relief? They have a right to get relief, and, Sir, in my opinion, there is only one way by which that relief can be obtained, and that is by a frank and free interchange of the products of the soil between the two countries, or, in other words, the right to sell in the best and most convenient market, and the right to buy in the same.

I must admit that I have been amused at the many speeches delivered on the Budget speech during the few years I have been in Parliament by gentlemen occupying seats to your right, while trying to make the people of this country believe that they were extremely anxious to enter into reciprocal trade relations with our neighbours, and yet have been advancing all sorts of ingenious arguments possible to show that such a treaty would be very bad, indeed, for the farmers of Canada. Have they not tried—and tried with what success, I will leave this House to decide—to prove that the farmers of Canada would be literally swamped by the free admission into our country of American hogs, beef, corn, and many other articles of American produce? In order to show that such statements are entirely erroneous and calculated to mislead the farmers of Canada, I shall take the same articles and quote from the Trade and Navigation Returns of the fiscal year ending June, 1895, to prove that no such danger may be feared. Produce, the world over, will inevitably find its way to the best market. I have in my hand a table of figures which I had prepared and which I thought I could, as has been done on former occasions by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and the Finance Minister, and others, hand in to the "Hansard" reporters without reading; but I understand that, according to what the leader of the House stated the other day, I shall be forced to read these figures from my place in the House. We imported in the year ending 30th June, 1895, as follows:—

	No.	Value.	Duty.
Horned cattle from G. B.	1	$ 100	$ 20 00
From U. S.	2,419	35,546	7,109 39

You will see by these figures that we imported quite a large number of cattle from the United States. This would, in a manner, bear out the arguments advanced by some hon. gentlemen opposite that the Americans would swamp our markets if we had a free interchange of agricultural products, but it might be interesting, perhaps, for these gentlemen to know where these animals were shipped to. They were distributed as follows:—

	No.	Value.	Duty.
Ontario	7	$ 220	$ 44 00
New Brunswick	32	264	52 80
British Columbia	115	1,825	365 00
North-west Ter.	2,266	33,337	6,667 59
Total	2,420	35,646	7,129 39

You will therefore see that of the 2,420 imported into Canada during that year, no less than 2,266 went into the North-west Territories.

	No.	Value.	Duty.
Horses from G. B.	1	$ 73	$ 14 60
St. Pierre	1	10	2 00
U. S.	1,484	46,221	9,244 70

These were imported by the several provinces, as follows:—

	No.	Value.	Duty.
Ontario	240	$12,208	$2,441 60
Quebec	82	4,601	800 20
Nova Scotia	20	1,095	219 50
New Brunswick	45	1,858	371 60
Manitoba	193	3,274	654 80
British Columbia	730	20,347	4,069 40
Prince Edward Island	2	95	19 00
North-west Ter.	174	3,426	685 20
Total	1,486	46,304	9,261 30

So that of the 1,486 horses imported into Canada during that year, no less than 730 went into the far distant province of British Columbia. I do not think that the farmers of the older provinces ever expect to work up a trade with the far-off province of British Columbia by shipping stock there. We do not think it possible to send horses and cattle nearly 3,000 miles by rail to that distant province, and if the people of British Columbia can buy their horses and cattle and what beef and flour and grain they require in a more convenient market, I am sure the farmers of the older provinces will not complain. Take the trade in sheep. We imported from the United States, 42,724 sheep, valued at $59,590, on which a duty was collected of $11,999. These went into the several provinces as follows:—

	No.	Value.	Duty.
Ontario	100	$ 213	$ 42 60
Quebec	2	2	0 40
New Brunswick	995	1,521	305 70
British Columbia	35,881	53,141	10,628 20
North-west Ter.	5,746	5,113	1,022 60
Total	42,724	59,990	11,999 50

There is one peculiar feature about the importation of sheep, and it is this, that the 5,746 sheep which went to the North-west Territories were valued only at $5,113, or about 85 cents to 90 cents each. I should like to know how that valuation was arrived at. It appears to me that this would be a proper case for the Controller of Customs to inquire into. But let me draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to this, that of all the sheep imported by Canada during that year, no less than 35,881 went into the distant province of British Columbia.

Take hogs next. Our imports were as follows:—

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have shown by the table of imports I have prepared, that the farmers of the old provinces of Canada have nothing to fear from reciprocity with the United States. But, while the farmers of the United States have imported somewhat largely of farm products into Canada, yet these importations have gone almost entirely, with the single exception of wheat, into the far-away province of British Columbia. I may say again, as I formerly said, that the farmers of the old provinces do not expect, and never expected, to be able to work up a large trade with the people of British Columbia in the way of sending farm produce there. It is nearly 3,000 miles away, the communication being almost entirely by rail, so that the extent to which we would be likely to ship farm products to British Columbia would not materially affect eastern farmers. I grant you, that in one article alone the products of our farms have increased. I refer to the article of cheese. Now, let me refer to some statements made the other day by my hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney). I am sorry he is not in his seat, because he was somewhat severe upon my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan), who tried to show, and I think he did show successfully, that the farmers of the older provinces, at any rate at the present time, were not as prosperous and in as good a condition as they were ten or fifteen years ago. This is what my hon. friend from Kent said, according to the "Hansard," in trying to refute the statement of the hon. member for Huron:

I will endeavour to show that the farmers derive more benefit from the National Policy than any other class of the population of Canada.

Mr. GRIEVE.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McINERNEY. I have made my statement, and if I fail in demonstrating the proposition laid down, it will be so much better for hon. gentlemen opposite. I state the proposition, and I will at the proper time undertake to prove it.

Now, how does he undertake to prove it? He undertook to prove it by showing what the production of the farmers of Canada was in 1891, compared with the year 1881. He said:

The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) said there was a falling off in everything produced by the farmers, that land values had decreased, that the products of the farmer had decreased, not only in value, but in volume, that all along the line, so far as the farmer was concerned, the National Policy had been a curse and a blight to him. Now, Sir, let us see how the declaration of the hon. gentleman accords with the figures given by this high and independent authority I now cite.

The authority the hon. member from Kent cited, was some American almanac or another. He goes on to say:

The amount of wheat raised in Canada in 1880 was 32 million bushels; in 1891 it had risen to over 60 million bushels.

Now, Sir, let me give my hon. friend, and let me give the House, the figures as they are gleaned from the census returns of 1891. In 1881 the total production of wheat in Canada was 32,350,269 bushels; he was not far astray there, he was only 350,269 bushels astray. But what say these same census returns which I have received from the Government statistician himself? They were verified on the Agricultural Committee this morning by Professor Saunders of the Experimental Farm, and he gave the total wheat production of Canada for the year 1890 as 42,144,779 bushels, not 60,000,000 bushels as the hon. member for Kent put it. The hon. gentleman was only something like 18 million bushels out in his calculation. But we find that the total wheat production in Canada increased during those ten years, not by 30 million bushels, as the hon. member for Kent tried to make this House believe, but the wheat production increased by 9,794,510 bushels. Sir, what more did the hon. gentleman say? He was interrupted then, as appears from the "Hansard":

Mr. MULOCK. What had the National Policy to do with that?

Mr. McINERNEY. I am not saying the National Policy had anything particularly to do with that, but I am answering the statement of the hon. member for Huron that the value of the products of the farmers of Canada had decreased under the National Policy. These figures show that the wheat product of Canada had increased from 1880 to 1891, had more than doubled in that period. Of barley, we raised 15 million bushels in 1880, and over 21½ million in 1891.

Or an increase, according to his own figures, of 6½ millions during the ten years. Now, let us see again how far the hon. gentleman was astray. In 1881, according to the census returns of Canada, we produced, not 15 million bushels, as the hon. gentleman put it, but we produced 16,844,868 bushels. In 1891, ten years later, we produced, according to the same high authority, 17,148,198 bushels, or, instead of an increase of six millions during the ten years, there was only a beggarly increase of 303,330. Now, let us follow him a little further. He says:

Of oats, we raised 70 million bushels in 1880, and 117,700,000 bushels in 1891. I have here figures, to about the same effect, of different other products grown in Canada, showing that from 1880 to 1891 the products of the farmers of Canada had materially increased. Sir, in face of these facts, I cannot understand how it is possible that a man engaged in agriculture, a man as intelligent as my hon. friend from Huron appears to be, and undoubtedly is, with such figures before him, can stand on a platform, or in an intelligent assembly like this, and make such declarations as he made to us this evening. Now, let us see how far the hon. gentleman was out in his figures with regard to the production of oats.

In 1881 we produced 70,493,131 bushels. The hon. gentleman was only half a million bushels astray in his calculation in regard to the production of 1881. In 1891, instead of 117,700,000 bushels, which the hon. gentleman said we produced, the census returns show that we produced only 82,515,413, or over 35,000,000 bushels short of the hon. gentleman's calculations; our increase during the ten years was 12,022,282. I have had these figures verified by Mr. Johnson, the Government statistician, and I place these before the House and the country to show that the position taken by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) was substantially correct, when he made the statement that the farmers of Canada, in 1891, taking volume of crops, prices of crops, number and value of cattle, value of horses into account, were much poorer than they were in 1881; and if we had the figures up to the present, they would show a much larger decrease in the value of farm products than even in the year 1891. I have another authority I wish to quote to show that the Liberals are not the only people in the country who assume that the position of the farmers is not so good today as it was fifteen years ago. I hold in my hand a book—it is not a Liberal campaign sheet, it is not facts and figures for Liberals, prepared by Liberals; but it is the hand-book of the Patrons of Industry. This hand-book has been referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Guysborough. It is not the production of Liberals, but of men who formerly belonged both to the Liberal and the Conservative parties, the production of men who found that the farmers were not receiving fair-play at the hands of the Government, men who knew that this was a Government that had done everything in its power to promote the interests of wealthy monopolists and manufacturers, and had done nothing for the farmers. These men organized, and they issued this pamphlet, and I must ask the indulgence of the House while I read a few short quotations from it. Treating of the tariff question, it says:

The farmer is deeply interested in the tariff. He was induced to vote for protection in 1878 by promises which it may be well to examine briefly in the light of ascertained results.

First, it was to augment the selling price of his wares. Mr. Haggart, now Minister of Railways, said in Parliament (Hansard, March 1, 1878):—"What they contended was that by a protective tariff they could so arrange matters that the produce raised by our agriculturists would be greatly increased in value." This was the burden of all the protectionist speeches and of resolutions introduced in the House. Prices were to be increased by keeping out cheap American produce, so Mr. Haggart contended in sunning home market within Canada. Cheap American produce, so Mr. Haggart contended in the same speech, was the basis of Canadian agriculture, and he gave examples which others on the same side multiplied. In saying this the protectionists, as any one can see, were blasting their own argument, for if a long trial of protection in the United States had left the American farmer without an all-consuming home market, so that instead of obtaining high prices at his own door he was obliged to export his oats, pork, wheat and corn for what he could get to revenue tariff countries like Canada, what sense was there in the Canadian farmer trying so worthless a remedy? We all know that the price of farm products has not increased since 1879. Canada, like the United States, is an exporting country, and the price of the staples is determined by the law of supply and demand abroad, which is so much beyond the jurisdiction of protectionist legislators as the phases of the moon.

This is the argument the Liberals have presented ever since the introduction of the National Policy. This was the argument of the Liberals in 1878, that our markets were regulated by the law of supply and demand. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have always maintained the opposite, but the other afternoon the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) enunciated what has formerly always been considered as good sound Liberal doctrine, that the markets of Canada were regulated by the law of supply and demand. Continuing the pamphlet said :

The reports of Mr. Glaffen, statistician of the Government Board of Trade in England, notably that issued in 1888 ("Recent Changes in the Prices of Exports and Imports") are interesting reading in this connection. Going back to the Crimean war, a halcyon period for the Canadian farmer, the average price of the wheat imported into the United Kingdom in 1854 and 1855 was 16½ shillings per 112 pounds of oats, nearly 10 shillings, wheat flour 23 shillings, hams 63 shillings, and so on. The price of wheat and flour has never been so high since. In the three years preceding the adoption of protection in Canada the price of wheat was as follows, per 112 pounds :—

	Shillings.

In 1880 the price rose and Canadian protectionists made themselves believe that it was their work, but in 1882 it fell to 10·67 shillings and has since gone lower. In the calendar year 1894, the declared value of the British imports of wheat (total imports 70,126,232 cwt., value £18,760,505) was under 5·4 shillings per cwt. The all-absorbing home market has also disappointed us. In 1878 we exported $32,000,000 of animals and farm produce raised within Canada, whereas in 1894 the exports were $52,000,000. So far from protection creating a secure home market for the farmer he is more dependent than ever upon the foreign market where competition is unrestrained.

It will be remembered that hon. gentlemen opposite in 1878 declared that the farmers of Canada were going to have the home markets for their products built up by the National Policy, hamlets were to grow into villages, villages into towns, towns into cities, and all would be large centres of manufacturing industry, and that the farmers would no longer be compelled to send their products abroad to find foreign markets, but they would be sold in this country. But in 1894 we had to export $20,000,000 worth more of farm products than in 1878, showing that we have not yet the home market that was promised. The pamphlet proceeds :

The answer of protectionists is that if cash prices are lower than they were the cost of factory goods has declined so that the farmer is better or no worse off than before, and they even suggest, some of them, that protection has brought about the decrease in the cost of factory goods. But this is quite another question from that under consideration just now, which is Mr. Haggart's promise that "the produce raised by our agriculturists would be greatly increased in value." The meaning intended to be conveyed by "greatly increased value" was that the cash price would be exalted, as plainly appears from the speeches made in Parliament, and from the famous cry, "I'm for a policy that has raised wheat to $1.49."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown by statistics that the farmers of the older provinces of Canada have nothing to fear in competition with the farmers of the United States. I have shown also that the farm products that are being shipped from the United States into Canada are nearly altogether imported into British Columbia and the North-west Territories. Hon. gentlemen opposite have to admit that the price of farm produce is to-day less than it was in 1878; but they comfort themselves with the idea, that if the price of farm produce is not so great now as it was then yet the volume of farm products that is raised on the farm to-day, is much greater than it was in 1878 or 1880. I have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a table taken from the census returns, which will show that the products of the older provinces of Canada, are not as great at present as they were fifteen years ago. This table which I have prepared from the census, refers to all the provinces, but as the hour is so late, I will only read the figures which refer to a few of the provinces. First, I will take the province of Prince Edward Island and the following is the result :—

So, Mr. Speaker, you will see that in the province of Prince Edward Island, while they have increased in some of the products of the farm, they have decreased in others. and the one would almost balance the other. Let me now take the products of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and first the province of Ontario:

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that in these products of the farm the only increase worthy of the name is in cheese, which increased in the ten years from 1881 to 1891 by over 28,000,000 pounds. Now, although I have the tables for the other provinces, I will only give the figures for the province of Quebec, from which you will see that there has been a decrease all along the line:

I will pass over the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, British Columbia and the Territories. With the exception of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, the same state of things can be shown—that the products of the farm, instead of increasing very largely in volume, as the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) said the other night, have practically decreased in volume. Now, Sir, I have here another short table showing the products of the older provinces—Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island; and I think I shall be able to show that these figures will bear out my contention that while the prices of farm products have very materially gone down, the volume of farm products has also diminished:

In the year 1880, two years after the defeat of the Mackenzie Government, before the National Policy could be said to have been fairly begun and before it could affect very much the prices realized by the farmers, we find that the prices were as follows:—

Now, we will take a period ten years after this, when the National Policy had been in operation twelve years, and when the prosperity which hon. gentlemen opposite are so fond of speaking of had loaded the farmers with all its benefits. These prices will show how much better their condition was than it had been before:

Mr. GRIEVE.

I will now take the year 1895, and show the prices upon which the farmers of the country are growing rich :

1895.	January.	February.	March.	April.	May.	June.	July.	August.	September.	October.	November.	December.	Average for 12 months.

You will see that in every product of the farm, there has been a great falling off in the price as well as, in many cases, a reduction in the quantity produced. Some of the hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this debate, notably my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), and my hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Smith), stated that the prices of farm products in Canada were very much better than in the United States, and upon that they have based an argument that reciprocity in natural products would not be to the advantage of the farmers in Canada. My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), in the course of his remarks a few nights ago, showed from statistics—statistics that were properly prepared from reliable sources—that the prices of farm products in the United States, taking a period of ten years into consideration, were very much in excess of the prices of similar products in Canada. My hon. friend from Halton and my hon. friend from South Ontario took a certain day's prices. It was easy for them to make out a case in that way. Of course days can be found when the prices of certain products in Canada are higher than in the United States. But let them take a period of years, say from 1882 to 1894, and make the comparison. Some of the hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House upon this question have made comparisons between the prices in the city of Toronto and the average prices throughout the whole United States. That is not a fair comparison. If you are going to take the prices for every part of the United States, why not compare them with the market reports for every point in Canada. Do the hon. gentlemen mean to tell me, Sir, that farmers in the western part of Manitoba or the Northwest Territories receive as much for their products as do the farmers who live within a few miles of the city of Toronto? I think I am within the mark when I say that wheat in Toronto will command, as a rule, 20 cents per bushel more than in Brandon or Portage la Prairie, or even in the city of Winnipeg. And oats are from 15 to 18 cents a bushel higher in Toronto than in any part of the west. Such a comparison as hon. gentlemen have made is calculated to mislead the House and mislead the country. If they wish to compare the prices in Toronto on a fair basis, let them compare them with the prices in Buffalo or New York and we will find no fault. Taking the city of Toronto and the city of New York for 1882, we find the prices were as follows for wheat:—

	Ontario.	U.S.
	Cents.	Cents.
1882	106	118·5
1883	107	112·6
1884	81·4	106·6
1885	80·6	86·2
1886	72·5	87
1887	78	89
1888	99·3	85·3
1889	88·1	89·7

Mr. GRIEVE.

	Ontario.	U.S.
	Cents.	Cents.
1890	91·3	83·2
1891	92·9	93·2
1892	67·8	102·6
1893	59·4	79·8
1894	55·5	67·2

There is what the farmers are protected against. Now, let me take oats for the same period:

	Ontario.	United States.
	Cents.	Cents.
1882	43	47·6
1883	38	50·6
1884	33 ¹ / ₁₀	30·9
1885	31 ⁵ / ₁₀	37·9
1886	32	34·3
1887	34 ⁶ / ₁₀	40·8
1888	40 ⁵ / ₁₀	43·4
1889	30 ¹ / ₁₀	39·3
1890	41 ¹ / ₁₀	32·9
1891	36 ⁵ / ₁₀	42·6
1892	30 ⁵ / ₁₀	40·7
1893	33 ² / ₁₀	39·0
1894	30 ⁵ / ₁₀	35·2

These figures are taken from the Ontario Bureau of Industry, which gives the price for all these years.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him what market he is quoting for wheat in the United States?

Mr. GRIEVE. New York and Buffalo.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now you compare Ontario with New York City, which is very unfair.

Mr. GRIEVE. I compare Toronto with Buffalo and New York.

Mr. HENDERSON. The statistics you are quoting are taken from the Ontario Bureau of Statistics, which states that 49·1 cents is the average price of wheat in the United States in 1894, but you quote 67 cents, which is the New York price. That is unfair, as compared with all the local markets to which farmers deliver in Ontario.

Mr. GRIEVE. I do not think the hon. gentleman can find any fault in comparing Toronto markets with Buffalo.

Mr. HENDERSON. But you are comparing Ontario with New York City.

Mr. GRIEVE. If my hon. friend wants to make a comparison between Ontario and the United States, why not take the Dominion of Canada as a whole as against the United States as a whole? He knows that there is no other part of the province of Ontario to-day where wheat commands as high price as it does in the city of Toronto, and he takes the point in Canada where wheat commands the highest market price, and compares it with the whole of the United States. He knows that even in our own North-west wheat does not command the same price that it does in my hon. friend's own town. Now, I wish to show the position the farmers occupied in Canada in 1881 as compared with 1880. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to go on the platform and tell the farmers of this country that they are rich, and are growing richer from year to year, but they cannot deny the statistics I will read them here :

Now, Sir, we have the total value of the articles I have enumerated here, and these are the principal articles, with the exception of cattle, sheep and hogs, that are produced upon the farm, and it is hard to find statistics in connection with them—in the year 1880, was $126,238,690, as against a valuation in 1890 of $106,605,566, or a difference in favour of 1880 of $19,633,124. That shows the value of the entire grain products of the farm, and others, such as butter, apples, and wool, that were raised during those two years, and it shows a difference of nearly $20,000,000, or, in other words, there has been a loss of 20 per cent. That, I think, should convince my hon. friends that the farmers of the country in 1890 were not as well off as they were in 1880; and I am satisfied that if we could find the figures of 1895 they would show a still greater reduction in value than do the figures of 1890. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have clearly demonstrated this fact that not only has the price of farm lands decreased in value, not only has the price of farm produce decreased in our market, but the output from some of the older provinces have very materially decreased. How, then, can hon. gentlemen get up and state in this House and to the country that the farmers are in a much better condition than they were in 1878, prior to the introduction of the National Policy? They know well that such is not the case, but they comfort themselves with the idea that the farmers are in a much better condition than the farmers of some other countries, and notably of the United States. I have obtained a few statistics from Prof. Robertson which opened my eyes in this respect. I had the idea that with our vast agricultural resources, with the finest agricultural soil, with provinces unequalled by any state in the union, New York, Ohio, or any other, none of which could raise as many bushels to the acre as we can in the province of Ontario. Referring to the census report of 1894, the number of cattle in Canada and the United States were as follows:—

	Cattle.	Sheep.	Swine.
Canada.....	4,060,662	2,513,977	1,702,785
United States.....	52,378,283	42,273,000	46,098,000
	Over 13 times as many as Canada.	Nearly 17 times as many as Canada.	Over 27 times as many as Canada.

What have been the exports of live cattle and other products from Canada to Great Britain? They have been as follows:—

	Cattle.	MEATS.
		Fresh Beef.	Salted Beef.	Preserved Beef.	Unenumerated.
		No.	cwt.	cwt.	cwt.
Canada.....	82,323		2,729	3,672	671
United States.....	381,932	1,775,538	235,120	205,485	34,315

This shows that the shipments of live cattle and beef to England during the year 1894 was fourteen times as great from the United States as from Canada. Then as to the shipments of live hogs and their products in 1894, the shipments were :

SWINE.

	Pork, Fresh.	Pork, Salted.	Hams and Bacon.
	Cwt.	Cwt.	Cwt.
Canada		7,702	305,019
United States...	4,339	150,186	3,636,473

Or over fifteen times as great as ours in Canada. This shows the falsity of the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, who have sought to make it appear that the farmers of the United States were not in as prosperous a condition as the farmers of Canada ; if we take the trade returns of the two countries and make a comparison it appears that the United States have more cattle horses, sheep and swine, and that their exports to Great Britain are very much in excess of those of Canada.

Let me ask, how are we to improve the condition of the farmers? My answer is that the only way you can improve the condition of the farmers of Canada is to give them better markets and better prices will follow, and if you cannot do that, give them the privilege of buying in the best market possible. We have lying along the side to the south a large and wealthy country, containing many populous cities. Would it not be advantageous to the Canadian farmers to be able to send their beef, eggs, barley, lambs, horses and a thousand and one other articles of farm produce into those large and wealthy cities. According to the census returns, we have within a short distance of the border line New York, with a population, in 1890, of nearly 2,000,000, Chicago with 1,250,000, Brooklyn, nearly 1,000,000, Boston, 500,000, Buffalo, 255,000, Detroit, 250,000, or seven cities with a population of over 5,000,000. Would it not be an advantage to Canadian farmers to be able to send their product to those cities with a united population greater than that of Canada? Reciprocity would be the very best thing the farmers could get. There is not a leading man in Canada who has not at some time advocated a reciprocity treaty with the United States. I might quote from speeches delivered by the present Secretary of State, the late Sir John Macdonald, Sir Leonard Tilley, and many others to show that they were willing and anxious to enter into a reciprocity treaty with that country, but I will not quote them as the hour is late. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the farmers do not pay increased prices for what they buy. Let me show whether the farmers do not pay taxes or not. The following articles are taxed in this way:—Wall paper, ungrounded, not including borders, 35 per cent ; all other papers hangings and borders, per roll of 8 yards and under and proportionately for greater lengths, 1½ cent per roll, and 25 per cent. Then there is the duty on coal oil of about 6 cents per gallon. No doubt some hon. members imagine that the farmer is still using tallow candles. Then there is the duty on Paris green, for the farmer is even taxed on the material with which to kill the potato bugs.

Coal, bituminous, 60 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds ; brick for building and paving brick, 20 per cent ad valorem ; drain tiles, not glazed, 20 per cent ad valorem ; cement, including Portland or Roman and hydraulic or water-lime, 40 cents per barrel ; including the duty on the barrel ; grindstones, not mounted and not less than 12 inches in diameter, $1.75 ad valorem ; slate pencils, 25 per cent ad valorem ; slates, slate mantels and other manufactures of slate, school writing slates, and roofing slates, 30 per cent ad valorem ; manufacture of leather and rubber, caps, hats and muffs, &c., 25 per cent ; upper leather, &c., 17½ per cent ; sole leather, tanned, but undressed, 10 per cent ; all manufactures of leather, 25 per cent ; belting of leather, &c., 20 per cent ; harness and saddlery, 30 per cent ; whips of all kinds, 35 per cent ; boots and shoes, 25 per cent ; Indian rubber boots and shoes, 30 per cent ; Indian rubber clothing, &c., 35 per cent ; nails and spikes, horse-shoe nails, &c., 30 per cent ; composition nails, 15 per cent ; wire nails, 1 cent per pound ; cut nails and spikes of iron or steel, ¾ cent per pound ; shoe tacks, 1 cent per thousand ; cut tacks, a half cent per thousand, and 1½ cents per pound ; screws, commonly called "wood screws," 8 cents per pound ; screws of iron, steel or brass, 30 per cent ; clothes wringers, 25 cents each and 20 per cent ; cutlery, 25 per cent ; picks, mattocks and grub hoes, axes and hatchets, 35 per cent ; axes of all kinds, scythes, hay knives, prong forks, rakes, hoes and other agricultural tools or implements, 35

Sir, I might go through the whole list and mention very many other articles. It is no wonder the farmers of this country are complaining bitterly of the high taxation that is imposed on them by the present Government. I remember reading a few years ago a piece of poetry that was composed by an old farmer in the western part of the province of Ontario. He had been attending many political meetings, and he had heard the party on the one side talking of the high taxation that existed, and he had heard the other party saying that the farmers and labouring men of the country did not have to pay any taxes. He went and got for himself a copy of the Canadian Customs Tariff, and after looking over it he composed the following :—

I was once a well-off farmer, now I'm worried and in debt ;

I've got poor a-payin' taxes, but I have to pay 'em yet ;

There's a tax on food and clothing, poor and scanty though they be,

But Sir Mackenzie Bowell says : ' Be thankful for ther' ain't no tax on tea ! '

There's a mortgage on the homestead, and the interest ain't all paid,

I've worked hard from early morning till the evening's dewy shade ;

Wife and me don't follow fashions an' I don't get on a spree,

Yet, I'm poor although they tell me that ther' ain't no tax on tea.

In my house there's no pianner, no rich carpets on the floor,

An' the tariff would'nt let me put a door-bell on the door,

An' my wife can't get a bonnet, that would be a luxuree.

But she says " we must be thankful for there ain't no tax on tea ;

I can't buy a bit o' cotton, but I have to pay a tax,

An' they levy on my wood-pile by a dooty on the axe,

An' the salt that's in my porridge is'nt now admitted free,

But the Lord be thankful for one thing that ther' ain't no tax on tea.

Once I tried to buy a picture, it was " lithographed," they said ;

Thirty-odd per cent o' dooty knocked that bargain in the head,

Had it been a great oil paintin,' worth ten thousand, then you see

'Twould been " a work of art," they said, and been admitted free.

When I'm working on the back lot, I would often like to know

Just how long 'twill be till sunset, or till dinner-horn will blow ;

So I thought a watch I'd purchase, but the man spoke up, says he,

Dooty's thirty-five on watches, but we get in diamonds free.

One and one-sevenths of a cent on sugar ; thirty-five per cent on boots

Does'nt help my wheat or barley, or increase the price o' roots ;

Diamonds will not cut my medder, though they may be nice to see,

An' my only crumbs o' comfort is ther' ain't no tax on tea.

Everything a farmer uses ; everything a farmer wears ;
 Hand-rake, cradle, scythe or pitchfork—each its load of dooty bears ;
 This is called "the poor man's tariff," for it keeps him poor, you see
 An' they tell him to be thankful that ther' ain't no tax on tea.

Once they told us that consumers didn't have the tax to pay ;
 That it made the things all cheaper, that it worked the other way ;
 An' I've thought the thing all over, an' I'm blessed if I can see
 If that's so, then, what's the reason that ther' ain't no tax on tea.

Wife and I are getting feeble, soon we'll both be goin' where Taxes do not worrit people ; tariffs do not enter there,
 But they'll foller our poor spirits right into eternitee
 By a tax on shrouds an' coffins to get even for the tea.

Well, Sir, if that old farmer had to compose that poetry now, he would have to make a considerable change in it, because I understand that there is now a tax on tea, and the treasury last year was enriched by over $10,000 from this tax on tea. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who have taken part in this Budget debate, have been telling us about all that this Government have been doing for the farmers. They tell us that they have established, not only a central experimental farm near Ottawa, but some four or five other branches of experimental farms, and they are continually telling the people that this has been done because they are anxious to improve the condition of the farmers. Sir, it is true that they have established experimental farms ; it is true that they have spent up to the present time nearly $400,000 of the people's money in establishing these farms. But let me ask you, Sir, what benefit do those farms confer on the great mass of the farmers of Canada to-day ? While experiments are being conducted there, are they such as are beneficial to the farmers of the country ? I have no fault to find with the gentlemen employed there. I believe the conductor of the experimental farm, Professor Saunders, is a first-class man for his position. I have no fault to find with him or with any of those associated with him. But I do find fault with the Government because, after having established these experimental farms at great cost to the people of Canada, they refuse to give the information gleaned there to the farmers of the country. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, if he were in his place, if he could tell me how many of those farm reports were circulated among the farmers of Canada during the last two years. Last year I brought this matter before the House, and I showed that not one report had been sent by the members of this House to their constituents. I showed that while the report on dairying was circulated to the farmers of the country in the spring of 1895, the information contained in that report had been gathered as far back as 1892. If that is the way the Government intend to conduct these experimental farms, if they intend to withhold the information that should be given to the people of this country, then I think they had better stop prating about the great benefit these experimental farms are to the farmers of the country, or else abolish them entirely. The chairman of the Agriculture Committee told us the other day that he could not get passed in the House the resolution which was passed in the committee a year ago to have a large number of those reports printed and circulated among the farmers of the country. He said the Minister of Finance had refused to pass that resolution unless the number were cut down very materially, and the chairman of the committee had to cut it down. What is the Agricultural Committee for but to look after the interests of the farmers. And when that committee makes the request, I say it is the duty of this House to see that these farm reports are printed in large numbers and circulated among the farmers.

Mr. Speaker, I will now refer for a few moments to some of the speeches that have been made in this debate. I am sorry that my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is not in his seat. That hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech on the Budget this session, comforted himself with this assurance. After depicting the prosperous condition of the farmers, he said there were some signs of the depression lifting. Sir, this is an old story with my hon. friend from East Grey. When I came into this House in 1891, I heard that hon. gentleman speak on the Budget. After criticising the position taken by the members of the Opposition, he admitted, then, that there was a certain amount of depression in Canada, though it was not nearly so great as the depression that existed in the United States ; but he comforted himself with the idea that there were some signs of the depression lifting. In 1892 he again spoke, and he again saw some signs of the depression lifting. Again, in 1893, he saw some signs of the depression lifting ; in 1894, and again in 1895, he saw the same signs of the depression lifting ; and, Sir, in the year of grace 1896, he again sees signs of the depression lifting. The hon. gentleman has, perhaps, a short memory. He claimed the other afternoon that the farmers of the country were in a fairly prosperous condition ; but, referring more particularly to the farmers of his own section of the country, he said : I know the farmers of my section of the country are not as prosperous as some others, because in the year before last, they had barely half a crop, and last year barely a third of a crop, and, in some cases, not a fourth of a crop. Well, I would like to ask that hon. gentleman what is the condition of the farmers of the good old county of Grey at the present moment. I have here the report from "Hansard" of a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman in this House in 1893, page 446. Speaking on a resolution of the member for Compton, in favour of free corn, the hon. gentleman pictured the condition of the farmers in the following language :—

But it is unfortunate that a very small percentage of our farmers are cattle feeders to-day. In the first place a large percentage of them have not the money to build suitable barns and stables in which to keep their cattle during the winter and feed them so to make them prime beef. In the second place they cannot afford to be out of their money the length of time involved if they raise cattle, not only through the summer would they have to wait, but through the fall and winter, some six months, and in the meantime feed their cattle a very large amount of what means money before they could get a return. I believe that every eighteen out of twenty farmers to-day are obliged to depend upon the sale of their coarse grains, and anything coming into competition with these coarse grains in our markets must be detrimental to the Canadian farmer.

If that was the condition of the farmers of Canada in 1893, if it was true that a large majority of them were unable to put up proper buildings and shelter to feed and take care of their stock; if it was true that a great majority of them had to depend on the sale of their coarse grains in order to keep their engagements at the end of the year; if it was true that they were not able to feed their cattle for the British market or the local market, because they could not afford to lie out of their money, what must be the condition of the farmers in the hon. gentleman's part of the country to-day, after two years' crops that have been almost entire failures? Sir, I leave him and the farmers in his part of the country to work out that question among themselves. But not only did the hon. gentleman say that the farmers were fairly prosperous, but he said that the workingmen were prosperous. He said the working people have lots of employment in the large cities and towns. The hon. gentleman thinks that because they are kept from actual want, they are happy; he thinks because they are able to get three meals a day, and be fairly well clothed, that they have no right to complain. I want to tell the hon. gentleman, if he does not know it, that the condition of the working classes in the country is worse to-day than it has ever been before in the history of Canada.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. No soup kitchens.

Mr. GRIEVE. Let him go to the city hall in the city of Ottawa on a morning after a snow storm, and he will see there hundreds of men looking for the work of cleaning it off the streets. Let him go to the offices of the Electric Railway Company, and he will see the same state of things there. Let him look at the men on the streets shovelling the snow, with one eye on their work and the other on the clouds, looking and praying for another snow storm in order that they may earn a dollar to procure for themselves and their families something to eat. And the worst of the condition of these men is that on every 30 cents or dollar that they earn they have to pay 25 or 30 cents in taxes. That is the state of things, not only in Ottawa, but in Montreal and Toronto, and in every other city in this Dominion. My hon. friend says there are no soup kitchens. I can tell him that if the Liberal party were in power to-day and such a state of things existed, you would see an agitation for soup kitchens raised by hon. gentlemen opposite in every town and city in order to make political capital, just as they did in 1878. There is more need of soup kitchens in Canada to-day than there ever has been before in the history of the country.

The hon. member for East Grey also made reference to our public debt. He says the people of Canada do not need to feel alarmed at our having a large public debt, because neither the people of this generation nor the people of the next generation either will have to pay it. That surely is a glorious doctrine to preach. What is the object of every man's labour, what are we struggling and striving for from morning to night? Is it not to try and save up something for those who are coming behind us? Let my hon. friend go back into his own part of the country and tell an audience of farmers there not to mind struggling to pay off the mortgages on their farms, that they need not be alarmed about that, that as long as they pay the interest, that is all they need care about. Why, he would be hissed from the platform. Does he not know that one great object of every farmer is to try and clear off the mortgage on his farm. Who wants to leave as a legacy to his family a farm with a heavy mortgage on it? That is what all the people are working and struggling for—to try and pay off their indebtedness, whether that indebtedness be in the shape of a mortgage or any other shape. And if it be true that the people of this country are trying to clear off their indebtedness, why should not the Government do the same? Let us look for a moment to what the English Government have been doing. During the past fifty or sixty years, they have reduced the public debt of England by over $900,000,000. Let us take a leaf out of the book of the people to the south of us and see what they have been doing in reducing their public debt. I have the figures here, but they have been given so often that I shall not trouble the House with them again.

But the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) says: Do not bother your head about our public debt; all you have to pay is the interest. Well, what does the interest on our national debt amount to? $10,466,204 per year. That has to be paid, he says. Well, if you go into the country before a farming audience and talk to them of millions of dollars, they do not understand you, but put it in thousands or better still in hundreds, and then they will begin to understand you. Why, this interest of ten and a half millions of dollars, which we have to pay yearly, means that every day we have to pay nearly $30,000. It means that every hour of the day we are called upon to pay over $1,200. Let me express this interest which we have to pay on our national debt in cattle. It would take 418,652 cows at $25 per head to pay one year's interest on our national debt. If a farmer undertook to tie those cows in his stables, and started on the 1st day of January, tying in two cows every minute, 120 every hour, or 1,200 every day of ten hours, it would take him nearly twelve months before the last poor animal got in out of the cold. He would have to work every hour of the day and every day of the week from Monday morning to Saturday night, and still have some cows left to tie up. He could not go to church on Sunday; but he would have to keep tying them up day in and day out, and it would take him twelve months before he got through. Put it in wheat at 60 cents a bushel and it would take 17½ millions bushels of wheat, or nearly the entire product of Ontario for one year, to pay one year's interest on our national debt. It would take Prince Edward Island just thirty years to produce sufficient wheat to pay the interest on that debt for one year. It would take the province of Quebec over eleven years to do the same thing. It would take New Brunswick, according to the census of 1891, nearly ninety years to pay one year's interest on our national debt. It would take Nova Scotia, according to the census returns over one hundred years to pay only one year's interest. Take the county of which I have the honour of being one of the representatives in this House. It is not one of the largest nor is it one of the smallest counties in the province, but it is one of the best grain growing counties we have in Ontario. Well, it would take the entire wheat product of that county at current prices for twenty-one years to pay one year's interest on our national debt. It would take all the wheat, and barley, oats, rye, beans, pease, potatoes, all the hay, all the wool and the butter and also the cheese that is produced in the county of Perth in three years, at present prices, to pay one year's interest on our national debt. Load that wheat in cars, put 500 bushels in each car, and it would take 35,000 cars to carry it at one time, or one continuous string reaching almost from the city of Stratford to the city of Ottawa to pay one year's interest on our national debt. Now, I think that I have shown that while the interest on our national debt is, in the eyes of the hon. member for East Grey, only a very small matter, yet it is not such a small matter after all.

I wish to pay my respects for a moment to my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) the practical farmer from Inverness. He spoke the other night of his practical experience as a farmer, but he gave me the idea that of being that kind of an agriculturist who farms the farmer. He argued that the reduction of duties would not reduce the price of the articles to the consumer. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is the old protectionist argument. In 1878 and 1879, when these high duties were imposed, we were told that they were not going to raise the prices to the Canadian consumer. Hon. gentlemen opposite would not admit that for a moment. They were going to make the coal and steel and iron producers of Pennsylvania pay their share of the taxes of Canada. They were going to make the manufacturers of cutlery in Sheffield and Birmingham pay their share of the taxes of Canada. They were going to make the sugar producers of the West Indies, the manufacturers of glass in Belgium, the cotton producers of the Southern States, the tin manufacturers of Germany, pay their share of our taxes. But after seventeen years' experience, the Minister of Finance himself has come before this House and said that the people of Canada actually pay this taxation themselves. I would simply quote his own words, and I wish his statement to be placed side by side with that of the hon. member for Inverness, who said that when the duty was reduced upon coal and other articles, it made no difference to the taxpayers of Canada, but simply meant so much additional profit to the dealers. The hon. Finance Minister said in his speech, page 1035:

In 1882 the Liberal-Conservative Government struck off entirely the duties upon tea, coffee and tin; and from that period until the present time there has thus been saved to the people on these articles alone the following amounts:—

On tea	$13,454,857
On coffee	677,231
On tin	1,486,347

Total $15,618,435

Every dollar of this amount has gone directly into the pockets of the great mass of the consumers in this country.

Further on he said:

In 1887 an agitation was raised, which became successful, for taking the duty off anthracite coal, which was supposed, and which did lie heavily upon the western provinces. The duty of 50 cents per ton was taken off, and from that time up to 1895, inclusive, the amount of $6,044,355 was remitted to the consumers of anthracite coal. In 1890, besides other reductions in the tariff, there was a reduction of 10 per cent on common window glass, and 15 per cent on molasses, and on these two articles alone, articles of common consumption, there has been saved $521,755 to the people of this country.

I commend the statement made by the Minister of Finance to my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron). After giving a list of articles on which reductions had been made the hon. Finance Minister goes on to say :

This list does not include all the articles on which reductions have been made, but it covers a large proportion of the more important articles and shows that there was an important and significant reduction. And hon. gentlemen must take into account this fact—that this reduction in tariff was made at a time when reduction of the tariff was accompanied with the greatest difficulties. It was made at a time when prices were lowering in the United States, in Belgium, and in every manufacturing country; not only when prices were lowering as quoted in the regular markets, but when hard times had made it necessary for manufacturers to sell, if they could get cash, even if they had to sell at cost, or less than cost. Many and many a case occurred in which manufactured goods were held as collateral by the banks, and the manufacturers were unable to meet their obligations, the banks sold the collateral security for whatever they could get, in order to turn it into cash. It was in this period of depression, this period of strong competition, this period of slaughter prices, that we undertook the revision of the tariff. Taking all these things into consideration, the remarkable cut that was made in the tariff on these articles, going to the very verge of the extreme, shows that a great advantage was afforded to consumers in the remission of taxation and the consequent cheapening.

This is exactly the argument the Liberal party have been using all these years. They have been saying that wherever a reduction of duty has been made it has been of benefit to the public. I think the statement of the Minister of Finance will bear out their position and convince the people that when the tariff was raised from 17½ per cent to 35 per cent, it meant that increased burdens of taxation were laid upon the people. Now, let me say one word more in conclusion—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear. Oh, oh.

Mr. GRIEVE. I hope the hon. gentlemen will allow me to proceed. I have two hours' figures here that I can give them if they wish. I think that after the speech made by the Minister of Finance it is not necessary to try to convince the people of this country that the vast mass of consumers bear the burden of taxation. Had the hon. Minister made that speech ten years ago, I believe the people, would ere this, have risen in their might and driven from power the party that has created such heavy burdens of taxation. There is only one question further that I wish to refer to in connection with the hon. Finance Minister's speech. This is what he says :

I read an article but a little time ago in the "Nineteenth Century Review," in which the general question which is agitating many thoughtful minds at the present day was raised and discussed, as to whether the Empire would be able to feed itself in the event of a war by Great Britain which would cut off its supplies from hostile nations. Feed itself! Why, Sir, if statesmanship is not able, practically to solve that question, statesmanship must find it impossible to solve any of the great questions which, from time to time, present themselves for solution. The Empire able to feed itself! Yes. That article said 100,000,000 bushels of wheat were necessary to England, other than what the colonies afforded her at the present time, in order to feed the people of the Empire there. One hundred millions bushels of wheat! Why, fifty thousand Canadian farmers, with 100 acres each, in wheat, and raising thirty bushels to the acre, would produce 150,000,000 of bushels of wheat for export to Great Britain. And, what is fifty thousand farmers cultivating five millions of acres, compared to the numbers of millions of acres of good wheat in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, which has not yet been scratched by the plough. Meats to the amount of one hundred and forty millions of pounds would have to be supplied by the colonies to make up for Great Britain's deficiency, supplied now from foreign countries. Why, cattle and horses, and pigs in illimitable quantity could be raised in this country. And as to butter and cheese, fifty thousand farmers owning fifty cows amounting to 2,500,000 cows, would supply butter and cheese enough to meet the demands of Great Britain for such supplies. And, with the vast lands of the North-west, that is not an estimate which cannot be reached, if means were taken by which it could be reached.

This is one of the brightest pictures I have ever known to be drawn in this House. It is worthy of a great artist. It should be framed and hung in the national art gallery. And there is another picture something of the same kind that should hang side by side with it. The older members of this House will remember the beautiful picture that was drawn some years ago by another great artist in this House when he told us that in 1891 the great provinces in the west would be raising 640 million bushels of wheat and that the sales of land would reduce the national debt by more than the amount of public expenditure upon the Canadian Pacific Railway. If these two pictures were hung in the national art gallery, they would show future generations of what stretches of imagination Ministers were capable of in the nineteenth century. How long does the hon. gentleman suppose it will take to fill up that country with these 50,000 farmers producing 150,000,000 bushels of wheat. I have in my possession a letter from a friend. It is dated from the capital city of the North-west. I may say, Sir, that this letter is not written by any disgruntled Grit or office seeker, but by a gentlemen who went to the North-west some years ago from the province of Ontario; a man who was the backbone of the Conservative party in his own township, who for many years represented his township in the county council and was spoken of time and again as the Conservative candidate in the riding for the local legislature:

Regina, February, 1896.

Mr. James Grieve, M.P.,

Dear Sir,—Permit me to thank you for blue-books sent last session. They have been of great importance in disseminating knowledge among the people. I would be so pleased if you could send me the "Hansard," it would be of great service in confounding the Davinites. You are aware that a Redistribution Bill is to be brought up to give the Territories another representative. I hope it won't pass, as we have enough of such men as are now members of Parliament in the west. I hope they will forever bid adieu to Parliament, as they are of no service to this part of Canada. I don't think the Territories will send a Conservative back the next time. I trust some change for the better will be made in the Government, and that soon. If not, the whole Territories will be abandoned, as no farmer can live here, freight rates are so high, machinery, the same monopolies in every branch of trade. Since I came here four years ago, six families have left for every one that came, and there are now more farms abandoned than occupied. Coal oil is 45 cents per gallon; wheat, 35 cents; oats, 12 cents; barley, the same, and so on. If there cannot be a reduction of duties that will break up the combines, I am certain this part cannot be settled with all its fertility. There don't seem to be any one to represent the settlers. They are dumped off here to shift for themselves. The only care the Government has is to look after their officials, of which there is a great abundance here, nearly every second man you meet is an official of some sort, or wearing the Queen's livery, while more than one-half the rigs you meet are filled with government gentry and their servants at the Government House. There is no person to occupy it half the time; its inmates are either to the Rockies or seeking pleasure at some other point. The Governor is not popular here. He had full control of the Territorial Fair; he would not allow any other body to have a say in the matter. It is claimed that the prize money is not yet paid, and a lot of other expenses the same. It is said that $600 of the money went for liquor and such like. He should be recalled at once, as he don't seem to meet the requirements of the people. The Minister of Interior is just as unpopular; he never does the country any good when he comes, either as a statesman, morally or socially; he only comes out here for a holiday and for a good time (he never comes but there is a frost in the country at the same time). It is reported on what I would call good authority that when he came here two years ago or over that he got into a heavenly or happy state of mind and danced with joy while under the influences of the Ambrosial cup of the gods. It was told of him that one Pocklington had a choice piece of music that nobody has ever heard. It wasn't a hymn or psalm either. It was said Pocklington declined to sing it, and thereupon the minister offered to raise Hayter Reed's salary two hundred dollars if he would cause Pocklington to sing. This was the time Vankoughnet's doom was sealed, so you see what sort of men we have to look after our interests. I have noticed that $150,000 is placed in the Estimates for immigration purposes. This is utter waste—better spend the amount in the North-west in making roads and finding employment for those that are here. Make the people contented and then every one will become an immigration agent. Let the Government do something to keep the people here. As it now is there is not one settler to every six sections, and that in a radius of twenty miles around the capital. And other ways you might go a hundred miles and not find a settler. I see we are to have dairying instructors sent out here. This would be the country for horses, sheep, cattle and dairying, if there were settlers; but they should come in summer, when people could go and hear them, and not now, just at the approach of an election. There is no use of them coming here to instruct the people to make butter and cheese for the C.P.R. That day is gone, as the freights would take it all. Last summer butter could not be sold at Regina at any price for at least two months. If the country could be settled, and butter and cheese factories established, unlimited amounts could be made, for our natural grasses here are equal to Ontario clover fields. But there is no use of talking unless the duties are taken off machinery, coal oil and what constitutes a man's living, and combines destroyed. In ten years there won't be a farmer here—all will have gone. Around Balgonie, twenty-five miles east of Regina, thirty-two families are leaving this spring for Kansas, and a number have already gone. In Township 20, Range 19 west of 2nd Meridian, north of Regina twenty miles, more than one hundred people have left. Several families of McFaydens, Campbells, McKaskells, Camerons, McLeods, McLeans, Moores—all have left, and not a solitary one in their place. The school-house is untenanted by a single child, and only two or three other homesteaders in the township. The same can be said of the whole country in a lesser degree. Those people were what is known as Crofters, brought out here at a great outlay to the country. Around Balgonie they were Germans, and industrious, but they could not stand high duties and monopolists. This is a lamentable state of affairs, as this is a fertile part of Canada and no barren waste. Horses, cattle, sheep, wheat, and dairy products could be raised here under what is possible circumstances. What we want is reasonable transportation rates, access to American markets, tariff for tariff purposes only. Don't force us to give a bonus on every manufactured article and get nothing in return only to pay enhanced prices for machinery.

Now, I commend that letter to the Minister of Finance. That, perhaps, will give him some idea of the difficulty of realizing his prediction about the thousands of farmers in that country raising 150 million bushels of wheat, and having other thousands of farmers raising all the butter and cheese that the people of England require. As I have said, that letter is written by a good old Conservative friend of mine. Now, Mr. Speaker, before closing, there is one other matter that I wish at this moment to refer to. It appears to me that it is very much to be regretted that the great Conservative party in Canada, or, perhaps, I might be more justified in saying a very small percentage of the great Conservative party in Canada, have seen fit to bring back into political life one whose whole political career has been anything but creditable to himself or to the party with whom he has been for the past forty years associated. The people of Canada will not soon forget the most violent attack he made only a few short years ago upon his political opponents when he did his utmost to brand the great Liberal party in Canada as being disloyal to the mother country, and as being most anxious to join our political fortunes with the great republic to the south of us. No baser calumny was ever uttered by any person claiming to be a Canadian statesman. Such a statement, Mr. Speaker, was in direct violation of every principle of truth and righteousness. Not only did he wilfully malign the Liberal party in Canada, but he made a most discreditable attack upon the management of one of the greatest corporations we have at the present time, or ever had, in Canada. I refer to his attack upon the Grand Trunk Railway, closely following the general election of 1891. Even before he left the shores of his native provinces, and immediately after landing upon English soil, he launched forth in one tirade of abuse against all and sundry connected with that great enterprise. And, Sir, if he failed in discrediting that great business enterprise before the English shareholders, it was certainly no fault of his. I think I am justified in saying that no other corporation, or I might go further in saying that the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada has done more to populate, to build up, and to enrich this country than all other corporations combined. Did he stop for one moment to think what effect his attack might have had upon the 20,000 workmen who are employed on that road? Did he think for a moment of the thousands of families whose bread and butter depended upon the financial success of that great enterprise? Does he not know that the Grand Trunk Railway pays out annually nearly $12,000,000 to its employees? No, Sir, Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner at the Court of St. James, thought of nothing else but his own selfish wishes and ideas. Why did he make such an attack upon the Grand Trunk Railway? It will be remembered that, shortly before the general elections in 1891, Sir Charles Tupper tried not only to get the Canadian Pacific Railway to help the Conservative party in those elections, but he attempted to enlist the support of the Grand Trunk Railway, as well. Mr. Seargeant stated on oath, when he was in the witness-box, being examined in connection with an election trial:

Sir Charles Tupper called upon me and I think that is generally pretty well known. That is public property, not all that passed, but only the reference to certain questions of coal duties, and so on. The Grand Trunk Railway company pays an enormous sum, close upon $1,000,000 per year in taxation on duties and they employ some 1,500 or 2,000 men. They have, therefore, a great interest in this prosperity of the Dominion, and an equal interest in the prosperity of our own shareholders. There is intervening between the shareholders and their dividend the heavy taxation and a protective policy. The abolition of the latter would give the shareholders a dividend that at present goes out of the country and some $700 per year would probably go into the pockets of the shareholders instead of being applied by the Conservative party, as it has been applied towards the construction, partly of lines competing with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. When I came into office on the first day of January, I had occasion to review the whole situation. I had been in Canada seventeen years. I came over from England in 1874, but I had never had anything to do whatever with questions of politics or voted in my life, certainly not in Canada. I had taken no interest whatever in the political situation, but when I came to assume the office of General Manager of the Grand Trunk Railway I found that it was necessary for me to consider the political situation, that is the opinions of the Conservative and Liberal party and to see how these opinions would react on the prosperity of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway. I came to the conclusion that the general policy which was advocated by the Reform party, that is the policy of doing away with as much taxation as possible and relieving the industries of the country from as much impost as it was practicable to do having regard to the fiscal requirements of the country was more in accord with my views, that it was more what the Grand Trunk Railway required than the policy of protection which was being pursued by the other side, and I, therefore, lent my sympathies, I say frankly, to the general policy which has been announced by the Reform party.

Now, Sir, because the Grand Trunk Railway took that stand in 1891 and refused to join with the great Conservative party, Sir Charles Tupper, both before he left Canada and after he went to England, made a most violent attack upon that great corporation. So violent was the language that he used, and so violent was the attack he made on the Grand Trunk Railway, that even some Conservative papers in Canada at that time took the High Commissioner to task. I will read from the Toronto "Mail" of 9th June, 1891:

His attack on the Grand Trunk Railway was as gratuitous an act of folly as ever insolence drunk with success committed. It was doubly insensate since he must have known that the Grand Trunk had the means of exposing his attempt to bribe its management. His subsequent performances, oratorical and literary—are on a piece with his attack upon the Grand Trunk. After ostentatiously assuming the character of an impartial representative of this whole Canadian people and their common ambassador to Washington, he proceeds to show his impartiality by the most violent and slanderous attacks on the party in Canada opposed to him, first, in an American, then in an English magazine. His article in the "Contemporary" impudently accusing Canadian Liberals to the British public of conspiracy to subvert British institutions and annex Canada to the United States, considering his position and the nature of his duties may safely be said to be unique in the history of the public service. The appointment of such a man as the head of the state would be not merely the inauguration of violence and corruption unredeemed by any true wisdom or statesmanship, it would be the signal for a disruption of the community and for a moral civil war.

That is not the language of a Liberal paper, but of a Conservative paper. I have another quotation I desire to read, from a paper supporting the platform of the Patrons of Industry, a newspaper that has given an undivided support both in federal and local politics to that organization. The Mitchell "Recorder," of January 10th, 1896, speaking of the elevation of Sir Charles Tupper, sen., to the Premiership, said :

It might save the Conservative party, but it would be calamitous to the country. Of all things on earth this country don't want a Tupper at the head of it. In profligate expenditure, in useless pomp and swagger, in exaggerated, rash, and reckless statement, and in self-appropriation and maintenance, there is not a family since the days of the old Family Compact that has cost Canada as much as the Tupper family. The record of Tupper has been one continuous record of arrogant pretension and profligate extravagance. He has lived in bumptious and lordly fashion in London on the substance of Canada as if he possessed it by right of inheritance. Last year he cost this country over $28,000. This country has seen and known enough of Tupper and all his connections. From the Tupper regime give us a rest.

I do not think it is necessary to add anything to these remarks by the Conservative and Patron press, for these organs speak louder than I could possibly do. Mr. Speaker, as the hour is growing so late, I will close by referring to some remarks made by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron). He speaks of the Liberal party being weighed in the balance and found wanting. He talks of the handwriting on the wall. Does he not know that the handwriting was seen on the wall a few months ago down in Antigonish? Does he not know that the same handwriting appeared a short time after in Verchères? Does he not know that it again appeared only a good deal plainer in Montreal Centre and in Jacques Cartier? Then it again appeared up in North Ontario where a majority of the votes cast was against the restrictive and coercive policy of the Government. Again in Cardwell it was very distinctly seen. Then in West Huron and Charlevoix; and last but not least when the Secretary of State went down with all the prestige of a coming Premier and only escaped defeat by means not creditable to himself or the party with whom he is associated. The Liberals do not fear the general elections. Let them come on within a few months or six months hence, they are prepared, they are anxiously waiting until the dissolution of the House shall take place; they are prepared to go before the country. The handwriting will again appear on the wall, and the writing will announce that the great Conservative party, which has controlled the destinies of this country for the last sixteen years, has been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 28th February, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE CANADIAN JOCKEY CLUB.

Mr. HAZEN moved :

That the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills have leave to sit this day during the time the House is in session.

He said: I may say in support of that motion that there is a Bill before the committee dealing with the Canadian Jockey Club, in the interest of which a large number of gentlemen are here from different parts of Canada, who are anxious to get away to-night, and the committee have unanimously recommended that motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE CHICAGO EXHIBITION.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish to say in reply to a question of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) with reference to the expenses incurred at the Chicago Exposition, that it is not proposed to bring down a return, as I find that it is all contained in the Auditor General's Report, as follows:—

1891-92....Page B-172.....	$ 5,009 14
1892-93....Pages B-125 to B-134	120,409 94
1893-94....Pages A-19 to A-22.	113,937 86

$241,270 57

This includes more than the orders require, and contains the full and detailed expenses up to 30th June, 1895; and the House will at once see, I think, that it would be very undesirable to spend considerable time in preparing these returns which could not be obtained in as full and exact a manner as they are contained here. I will send this to the hon. member for Winnipeg as an answer to his question.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of considerable difficulty to attempt to address this House on the question of the Budget after so much has been said about it, and well said, by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House ; still I think it is my duty to emphasize a few points, and perhaps to review in a more or less cursory manner the arguments which have already been laid before us.

The great question that we have to consider when we are asked to grant Supply, is, whether the Government of the day has a right to be entrusted with any Supply by this House. That depends entirely on whether they have the confidence of the House and the confidence of the country. It will be the object of my speech to show, first, that they do not deserve the confidence of the country ; second, that they have not got the confidence of the country ; and, third, that it is very doubtful whether they have got the confidence of this House, and for all these reasons we would not be justified in giving them Supply.

There is, Sir, another reason why we should not on this particular occasion grant supplies to the Government, even had they the confidence of those who now sit in the House. We must not forget that this is a moribund Parliament in the strictest sense of the word. It is usual to speak of a House in its fifth session as being a moribund Parliament, and it has occurred only once in the history of confederation that the House has reached its fifth session, until the present Parliament. But if the House in its fifth session is ordinarily and usually considered to be moribund, how much more is this House to be characterized by this name, when it is sitting beyond the allotted days of Parliament, beyond the three score years and ten when its life should become a burden to it ?

This sixth session is an excrescence on the constitution, and it was never contemplated, when confederation was formed, that this House should sit more than five times in the five years, for which the members thereof were elected, but it was left open to have a sixth session in case of an emergency, and the present session has been called for the purpose of meeting a special emergency. That emergency is due entirely to the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite, or rather I should say to their lack of definite policy, on the great question we have to settle before we leave Ottawa on this occasion. Before the last session of the House, action was taken by the Government in regard to the Manitoba school question, which would naturally involve legislation in the session of 1895. When that occasion came on, and the Government consulted their colleagues on the benches behind them, they found it was impossible to carry that legislation then, and by a special stretch of the constitution, only justified by a great emergency, they decided to call an extra session at a time when the first session of a newly elected Parliament should have been sitting.

Under these circumstances, I say that we are not only a moribund Parliament, but we are sitting here in a session called for one special purpose, and that one special purpose alone we should discharge, and go immediately to the country, that the Government may receive the verdict of the electors upon what they have done, and that the country may elect new members instead of ourselves to form a policy for the years next ensuing. It is possible within our constitutional power this year to vote Supply for the year beginning 1st July next. It is contrary, however, to all precedents that we should do so—contrary to English precedents and contrary to Canadian precedents—for not a single instance can be shown in England or here, when a dying House has, in an extra session, presumed to vote Supply, to lay the foundations of new policies in respect of public works, militia matters, and the like, in the dying moments of the House, when it should be quietly composing itself to meet the stern judge before whom it must come when dissolution arrives.

For all these reasons, I say that this session of Parliament, no matter how fully the Government possessed the support and confidence of their supporters in this House, even if it were open to us to believe that they possessed the confidence of the electors—we should not vote them any more Supply than is sufficient to carry on the business of the country until new elections have been held, and new members sit in our places, and a set of Estimates is presented to them by a Government fresh from the people.

Coming to another of the reasons why I think we should not grant Supply to this Government, it is that they do not possess the confidence of the country, even though they may have the confidence of the majority of the members. They have not got that confidence in respect of their policy, whether their financial policy, their school policy, their administrative policy, or as regards the minor duties of the Government. They have not the confidence of the people in regard to their personnel. The individuals composing this Government have not got the respect of the people, nor the respect of their own party throughout the country, nor the respect of all their followers in this House. I will speak of that later and more fully.

Another reason why the people have not confidence in this Government is their lack of capacity as legislators and administrators. The Government have not their confidence either, in respect of that particular quality which, above all others, should characterize men who presume to guard the destinies of this country—purity of administration.

Now, let me go over these points a little more fully in this order. As regards the financial policy, I say they are not supported by the people, and I claim, and the claim is so evidently supported by fact that it can hardly be disputed by anybody, that the National Policy as a means of securing popular support in Canada is played out.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. I hear on the other side a sarcastic cheer or two from hon. gentlemen who evidently think the National Policy is not played out. Whether this comes from hon. gentlemen who derive some benefit from the National Policy themselves, or from hon. gentlemen who do not know the feelings of the people, I am not aware; but it must come from either one of these two classes, because it is an undoubted fact that the name has ceased to charm, from one end of Canada to the other.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) and all the lesser lights who buzz around them on the platform, have been telling the farmer, for a year back or more, that he is prosperous, happy and contented. Sir, they may tell that to the Marines, but there is no use telling it to the farmers? If anybody knows what the farmer's position is, the farmer himself ought to know it, and, if you go from one end of this country to the other, and ask the farmers, whether the National Policy has made them rich, you will receive the answer in such a strong negative that I should hardly be considered in order, if I repeated it on the floor of this House. So, Sir, with the farmers, the National Policy has ceased to charm.

The Minister of Finance, a year ago, tried to make us believe—and I think he repeated his argument in the Budget speech this year, although I cannot remember everything he said in that valuable effort—he tried to make us believe that the increase of population between 1881 and 1891 showed a great increase in the farmer's home market. He told us there had been an increase of half a million souls in that time, a mighty small increase, but still an increase; and he claimed that this half million of people were an addition to the farmer's home market, and why did he claim it? He said: "Do you not see, Mr. Farmer, these 500,000 people are not your rivals, because the census shows that all the increase that has taken place in the population of Canada, in these ten years, is in the population of cities and towns? There are no more farmers than there were ten years ago; there are, rather, fewer farmers, and, therefore, you have fewer rivals to compete with, and you have 500,000 more mouths—as he called them—in the cities and towns to buy your produce and to pay for it."

Strangely enough, that argument did not seem to satisfy the farmers. When they realized the fact, vouched for by the Finance Minister, that the farming population of the country was decreasing, while the population of the cities and towns was increasing, they rather leaned to the belief that the policy of the Government was a policy unfriendly to the farmers. They said, that a policy which depleted the farms to fill the towns and cities with men who were not always earning a living, was not a policy good for the farming community. I believe they were right, Mr. Speaker, and I believe that that one argument of the Minister of Finance did more to show the farmers of Canada how utterly ignorant that hon. gentleman was of their interests, and how utterly unfit he was to frame a fiscal policy for this country, than anything that has ever been said from this side of the House.

Then, Sir, if the National Policy has not made the farmer rich, has it made anybody else rich? I doubt it. It has failed to start the new industries in the cities and towns that we were told it would start. It has led to a certain growth of industries already existing, where those industries were of such a nature that they could combine to take advantage of the high taxation. It has enabled the big fish in certain lines of manufacture—such as the Masseys among agricultural implement makers—to swallow the little fish, to create a monopoly within a monopoly, and to keep up prices by such means. But the National Policy has not visibly increased the total amount of production. It has not made the tall chimneys rise, nor has it caused the busy hum of industry to sound throughout Canada, as was promised it would do.

Now, in proof of these statements, I wish to refer to a few elections that have lately taken place. If the National Policy was popular with the farmers, the Government should have carried all the by-elections that have taken place within the last few months. Let Verchères answer, let Charlevoix answer, let Antigonish answer, let Cardwell answer; I say, let even North Ontario answer, whether the Government policy has swept the by-elections, where the farmers predominated? It is clear that in all those counties I have mentioned, except North Ontario, that policy has been repudiated, because open opponents of the Government have been actually returned in them; and, as regards North Ontario, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McGillivray) who represents that seat in the House, represents a minority of several hundreds of the people of that riding. He was opposed by a Liberal candidate, and by a Patron of Industry.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. A Conservative Patron.

Mr. CASEY. A Conservative Patron, says my hon. friend. I have always understood that, when a man became a Patron, he shed the old garment, and come out in a bright and shining new coat—I will not say of many colours.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. He took six hundred Conservative votes.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend says he took some Liberal votes?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. I said Conservative votes.

Mr. CASEY. It is quite true, he did that. And why did he take five or six hundred Conservative votes, and why did he take a certain number of Liberal votes? It is because he was directly opposed to the Government and their fiscal policy; it is because that Patron was running on the same policy as that of the Liberal party, the policy of a revenue tariff, as opposed to protection. For that reason he took Conservative votes, and for that reason he took some Liberal votes also, and for that reason the member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) represents only a pretty small minority of the people of the riding for which he sits. The six hundred Conservatives, who, he says, voted for the Patron candidate, in doing so voted diametrically against the Conservative Government, and against the gentleman who now holds the seat. I have, therefore, a right to count the Patron Conservative voters and the Liberal voters as opponents of the Government, and opponents of it because of its fiscal policy. I conclude that, if the Patron candidate had not been in the field, these gentlemen would have voted for the other candidate who represented their views on the financial question, and my hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) would have been at home, attending to other matters to-day.

I quote all of the counties I have named as proofs that the Government has lost the confidence of the farmers. But what about manufacturing constituencies? Well, Sir, is there a greater headquarters of the National Policy, and of manufacturing industries in Canada, than the city of Montreal? Is there a suburban district more directly interested in manufacturing than the district of Jacques Cartier? And what was the verdict of Montreal Centre, and what was the verdict of Jacques Cartier? It was against the Government and against it by overwhelming majorities. Not only that, but it was against the Government at a time when the Government's policy on the school question would naturally have commended itself to the majority of the electors in those districts, on the ground of their religious associations. When the Government had been making the strongest bid they possibly could for the support of the Catholic Church and Catholic electors, just at that crisis, the manufacturing centre of Montreal and the adjacent suburban county of Jacques Cartier returned opponents of the Government by immense majorities. What could have caused that result, but a revulsion against the fiscal policy of the Government?

It is clear, then, that the agricultural and the city constituencies, as far as heard from, have repudiated the National Policy, as it is called. Sir, I will ask another question. Why is it that the Government are afraid to have other elections for vacancies now existing in the House? Soulanges is vacant; Missisquoi is vacant; Pontiac is vacant. Two of these constituencies, Soulanges and Missisquoi, were vacated at exactly the same time as Northumberland, in which we have had an election, and at about the same time as Cape Breton, in which we have had an election. Why have the Government not ventured to face the electors in those constituencies? Because they dare not. Because they know that even with the assistance of their remedial policy in those Quebec counties, they have not the slightest chance of securing a supporter in either. The Government have shown by their action in postponing the elections in those counties, that they have not confidence in their own policy, that they have not confidence in the electors, that they have no confidence whatever in their prospects of success.

Now, in regard to the policy which we speak of as the National Policy, it is not, in the strict sense, what my friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is fond of speaking of as scientific protection. It is not a policy of carefully-contrived protection. I am not going to argue the question of protection just now. I am taking for granted, as most people in the country do, that protection is a bad thing. But even so, the National Policy is not a carefully-contrived system of protection. It is a system of jobbery; it is not protection. It is a system by which the combines who are going to make money by the imposition of certain taxes, dictate to the Minister of Finance what taxes are to be imposed. That was proven to the House last session by statements of the Manufacturers' Association, read by myself and by a number of others on the floor of this House. It was proven that the Association had given the Finance Minister a brief, a letter of instructions, and he acknowledged that it was a most valuable brief for him in the revision of the tariff in 1894, and that he had followed the instructions given to him in that brief, as a faithful attorney. He had done what his masters told him; and had not followed his own judgment.

I said then, and I say now, that the relation between the combines and the Government is the same relation that existed of old in the Roman Empire between the publicans and the central government. The publican or tax-collector paid a certain sum, annually, into the treasury for the right of taxing the people of distant provinces as much as he wished. He paid a certain sum to the treasury, and put the balance of the taxes into his pocket. That is just what the Canadian combines are doing to-day. They contribute to the election funds, and the Government, in return, do for them what they please with the tariff; and that tariff, instead of producing a revenue for the treasury, produces a revenue for the combines. I say the combines; I do not use the word manufacturers, because the scandal I refer to does not affect all the manufacturers of this country; it only affects, I believe, a very small proportion of them. To use a term that has become almost classical by repetition, the boodle that is in the National Policy is only for those industries which are able to combine to keep up prices. Other manufacturers do not make money by it. They are taxed by it, like the rest of the community. It is only the fortunate few combinesters, some of whom have seats in this House, Mr. Speaker, who are able to profit directly by this system of taxation. There are gentlemen sitting in this House who are concerned in the combines, who are prominent members of them. I would ask the member for Halifax if they have not confessed themselves to be members of these combines? The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), who spoke yesterday on the sugar question, has shown himself to be connected with the sugar combine. It would take too long to give a list of the members of this House who are connected with combines, but there are men in this House who have a pecuniary interest in voting taxes to be imposed, not for the benefit of the community—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member must not accuse members of this House of having a direct pecuniary interest in voting for particular measures.

Mr. CASEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, we will have to express the matter in a more parliamentary fashion. I say that there are gentlemen in this House interested in various combines, that these combines do derive the benefit of taxation imposed on the people, and that those taxes do not go into the treasury, but into the pockets of those combines, and, therefore, into the pockets of men who sit in this House.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order. Is that parliamentary, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is entirely out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; withdraw.

Mr. CASEY. What I say—I am not insinuating—

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has made a direct charge that members of this House are voting money into their own pockets.

Mr. CASEY. I have not said that these members are influenced in their votes by the well-known fact of their connection with these combines.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member must withdraw the statement he made in reference to members of this House—that they were voting money into their own pockets. Surely that is out of order.

Mr. CASEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw it in the parliamentary sense.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order. The hon. member must absolutely withdraw it.

Mr. CASEY. Speaking to the point of order, the precedent has been established, and established by the late Sir John A. Macdonald—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot speak to the point of order after the Speaker has ruled. I have ruled that the hon. member must withdraw that expression.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair. Withdraw.

Mr. CASEY. I ask you, Sir, with regard to the parliamentary rule—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member must withdraw the statement that hon. members of this House have voted money into their own pockets.

Mr. CASEY. I am not aware that I put it in that language.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is the way I understood the hon. member.

Mr. CASEY. If it be unparliamentary to make the statement in the words I used, and if they conveyed that impression to you, Mr. Speaker, then I will have to withdraw the statement, of course. But in regard to the last phrase I used, as to which I wish to speak to the point of order, I say that it was established by Sir John A. Macdonald himself, on a ruling in a question just like this, that the expression, "I withdraw the phrase in a parliamentary sense," is quite sufficient to cover the ground. When a member of this House has stated what he knows to be a fact, he is allowed to withdraw it in a parliamentary sense, without committing himself to a lie, by saying that the thing is not true. In that sense, I withdraw the statement.

Having referred to their financial policy, I wish to say something of the personnel of the Government. I have said that we have no confidence in the personnel of the Government, and that the country has no confidence in it. And I have the very best authority for stating that we should not have any confidence in the personnel of this Government, because one-half of the Government have said that they have no confidence in the other half, and the other half have returned the compliment. There are two halves of the Government, each of which has told the other that it has no confidence in them, and believes them to be unfit to sit in the Council Chamber. Therefore, they cannot grumble if the people of the country take them at their own valuation, and believe that what each side says of the other is true, and that both halves of the Government are entirely unworthy of our confidence, either as individuals or as politicians.

Now, I wish to quote briefly from the official explanation made in this House in the early part of the session, to prove that the two halves of this Government have no confidence in each other. I quote the statement made on behalf of the Ministers who bolted about the time this House met, on January 2nd. The hon. Minister of Finance, who was then not a Minister at all, said that he had a duty to perform before the House adjourned, and he conceived it should be performed at once, and he proceeded to say that he did not propose to enter into any discussion of the subject, but was going to make merely an official statement as to why he and his colleagues, who were acting with him, had left the Government. He went on to say that there had been no disagreement between the bolters and the Premier on any constitutional point, that their reasons for difference were purely personal, that they had not lost confidence in the policy of the party, and then he used these words :

Mr. DAVIN. Is not the hon. gentleman referring to a past debate ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I would point out to hon. members that in the discussion of the Budget, considerably greater license is given than upon ordinary occasions ; and this being an official statement made by a member of the Government, I would hardly like to rule that a reference to it is out of order.

Mr. CASEY. I yield to your ruling with greater pleasure still, this time, Mr. Speaker. This statement, I may say, is a pretty fair ground for alleging want of confidence in the Government, and it has been quoted again and again in the House in various other debates. Well, the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) then said :

Though with many misgivings, we agreed to enter the Government under Mr. Bowell in succession to Sir John Thompson, we have nevertheless unitedly and loyally striven to the best of our ability to make it strong and efficient, and it has been with growing regret that we have seen our efforts result in a measure of success less than that for which we had hoped and striven.

The hon. gentleman confessed that the Government had been a failure. He confessed that he had never believed in the First Minister under whom he took office, that his misgivings had been justified, and that for those reasons, purely personal, he withdrew. He then went on to say :

We are of the opinion that the Liberal-Conservative party ought to be represented by the strongest Government possible to be secured from its ranks, that the necessity therefor was never greater than under existing circumstances, and we believe that such a Government can be formed without delay. This we have repeatedly urged upon the Premier, with the result that we found ourselves face to face with Parliament, having a Government with its numbers incomplete and with no assurance that the present Premier could satisfactorily complete it. Under these circumstances, we thought it our duty to retire, and in this way to pave the way, if possible, for the formation of a Government whose Premier could command the confidence of all his colleagues, could satisfy the Liberal-Conservative party that its strongest elements were at its head, and impress the country that it had a Government which was united and had power to govern.

Those were the reasons which induced the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) to withdraw from the Government early in January. And now what do we find ? We find the Finance Minister back again, and he has brought his tail behind him. Like the sheep that belonged to little Bo Peep, he has come back and carried his tail behind him, for all his colleagues returned with him, except the one who made way for his father (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). We find him back again, faithful, above all things, to the salary of his office and the position which he desires to retain in this House. But how much better is he off with regard to the Government than he was before ? He hoped that the result of his withdrawal would be that they would have a Premier who could command the confidence of his colleagues and satisfy the Liberal-Conservative party that they had a strong Government ; but it is just the same Premier he has now that he had before ? We do not suppose that the Minister of Finance is so changeable in his views as to have a different opinion of the Premier now from what he held in January last. And we must take his own words that the Finance Minister knows he is now sitting as a member of a Government whose Premier cannot command the confidence of his colleagues, who cannot satisfy the Liberal-Conservative party that its strongest elements are at its head, and impress the country with the fact that the Government is united and has power to govern.

There is a denunciation of the Government by the second man in it, because the Minister of Finance is second only to the Premier. There is the statement that that Government has not the confidence of the country, and still more that it does not deserve the confidence of the country so long as Sir Mackenzie Bowell is at its head. That is a statement which the Minister of Finance has never withdrawn. What can the country think of a Government whose second in command speaks in this way of his leader and the colleagues who remained faithful to his leader ?

On the other hand, Sir Mackenzie Bowell had something to say for himself. He pointed out in another place, that the reasons given by the Minister of Finance for withdrawing were not reasons which could justify the members of the Government in retiring from the Cabinet, unless there was something in the character or reputation of its head which warranted their leaving, and refusing, in the future, to associate with him. He appealed to the country against the necessary inference from that, and he pointed out that he did not seek the position he holds, but far from that, and he pointed out that he did not seek them, but they sought him. He says if the Government failed to be a success, it was on account of the failure of his colleagues, and not from any lack of competency on his party. He said :

Had not jealousy and a determination to destroy the usefulness of the head of the Government been firmly rooted in the breasts of those with whom I was associated, I flatter myself that we should have been successful in carrying on the affairs of this country.

That is the Premier's opinion of his colleagues in reply to their opinion of him.

I was inclined at first to think that the Premier was altogether right in this matter, and his colleagues altogether wrong. I am inclined still to believe in the Premier to this extent, that he acted in an honourable and upright manner, and to the best of his lights, up to the time of that split in the Cabinet. But when he condescended to receive back these men who had betrayed him, who had watched for the exact moment when they could strike him down with the most fatal effect, in order to destroy him as leader of the party in the Government, I began to feel that there was some force in their statement, and that he was not quite so big a man as is required for the place. I am inclined to think he was not sufficiently strong in his determination to do what he thought was right, or he would never have sat again at the Council table with these men. Sir, I might enlarge upon that, but it has been quoted frequently before, and I only give enough of it to establish my point.

But it is not only that these hon. gentlemen accuse each other of incompetence, of treason to a chief, and political misdeeds of that kind. They have gone further. Men who sit at that Council board have accused each other on the floor of this House of conduct that would prevent them from being accepted anywhere in decent society. We have heard the Minister of Agriculture accuse the hon. gentleman who was lately Controller of Customs, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and we have heard the member for West York accuse the hon. Minister of Agriculture, of writing anonymous and slanderous letters about another colleague in the Government.

Mr. WALLACE. No one made a statement accusing me of writing those letters.

Mr. CASEY. I heard the Minister of Agriculture use words in this House which could have no other meaning than that he believed that the member for West York had got these letters up himself, and then tried to throw the blame upon him.

Mr. WALLACE. He would not dare to say that.

Mr. CASEY. He said he wished to God that the member for West York would be able to clear himself of that accusation. I heard him say also that he was going to institute criminal proceedings against the member for West York.

Mr. WALLACE. He did not say that.

Mr. CASEY. Well, proceeding—then : and that he had gone to consult the best criminal lawyer in Ontario on the subject, and had found him already engaged by my hon. friend from West York for his defence.

Now, Sir, unfortunately for the interest of truth in this matter the condition of the health of the hon. Minister of Agriculture has compelled him to leave the country for a time—I am afraid, at least for the rest of this session. And so we shall not have the opportunity we should have had of having this matter cleared up ; and we are left in grave doubt as to whether the Minister of Agriculture is right in thinking that the hon. member for West York was at the bottom of a conspiracy about these letters, or whether the member for West York is right in thinking the same of the Minister of Agriculture—and also what the Postmaster General must think of one or both of these hon. gentlemen. But the fact remains that these gentlemen have accused each other on the floor of the House of conduct that would rule them out of decent society, and that the matter has not been cleared up and does not now seem to be in process of being cleared up. Those accused would consult their own interest by taking the quickest means of bringing to light the truth about this matter.

Meantime, while such accusations are bandied about, what are we to think of the men who can talk thus about each other ? These accusations are not made by their opponents, but they are made by these gentlemen against each other. They cannot expect that the country will have any confidence in them as individuals, while such charges remain unanswered and not cleared up.

I have dealt with the fiscal policy of the Government and with its personnel. There are smaller instances of their administrative and other policies which I must refer to in order to show their incapacity for public office in a general way, to show that they have not acted as men of ordinary political sense would have acted in their positions. Take the case of the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company. Last year the Minister of Finance confessed that they had undertaken to guarantee the interest on bonds of this wildcat scheme to a very large amount. I would not trouble you with figures, even if I remembered them. But when the matter was called attention to in the House, they had to admit that it was wrong and to withdraw the promise of a guarantee that had been given. That was the act of an incapable government.

Then we had the Hudson Bay scheme. I am not going to discuss the merits of that road as a colonization road or as an outlet for Manitoba grain. But I wish to point out that this Government passed an Order in Council, involving a matter of $2,500,000, in favour of that road, and when the subject was ventilated on the floor of the House, they did not dare to carry out the terms they had made with the directors of the road. Either they knew that they were doing something wrong, something corrupt, when they passed the Order in Council, in which case they must be condemned for seeking to create a boodle fund, desisting only because they were afraid it would be found out. Or else the Order in Council was passed in good faith for the purpose of opening up the North-west and affording facilities for shipment, in which case they did what was wrong and cowardly in withdrawing from their position.

Then, to come down to the affairs of this session, we have the Order in Council which was passed recently to allow United States cattle to be exported from St. John, N.B. In the first place I do not see any justification for the issuing of this order. It is a confession, a confession which was also made openly across the floor of the House, that they had no hope of having the scheduling of our cattle by Great Britain withdrawn. It was a confession of the utter failure of the High Commissioner, who has now a seat in this House, to secure a removal of that discrimination against our cattle: a confession that all the time and words and money he had expended in that matter had resulted in nothing, and had been perfectly valueless to the people of this country. As to the confession of failure I quite agree with the Government. There was a failure. The High Commissioner had shown himself to be a perfect failure in connection with the matter. It was about time to recognize the fact, but not time to recognize it, I think, by making regulations for the exportation through Canada of United States cattle. The true way to recognize it was to dismiss the High Commissioner and send in his stead a man who had some weight and influence with the home government. But the Government chose this other way of doing it. They passed an Order in Council allowing the Canadian Pacific Railway to bring American cattle to St. John, N.B., to be exported by Canadian steamship lines. And here is the greatest proof they have shown yet of their sympathy with the Canadian farmer. First they subsidized a railway through American territory to reach St. John—I mean the Canadian Pacific Railway—then they subsidized Canadian lines of steamers to cross the Atlantic, and then they allow this railway and these steamers to carry United States cattle in competition with those exported by the Canadian farmer. I have no doubt they will go to the Canadian farmer and tell him that this is a convincing proof of their love for him.

Another subsidiary feature of their policy—part of the fiscal policy really—is the export bonus scheme. We have that in two shapes. We give a bonus to Canadian manufacturers who export certain lines of goods, farming implements especially, to other countries. We repay them when they export the goods, all the duties paid upon the raw material in the goods exported. We also give a bonus, or offer a bonus, for the manufacture of beet-root sugar. Now, Sir, what do both these schemes mean? They mean that the people of this country are taxed to supply cheap goods to the people of other countries. Taking the Masseys as the type of implement makers, we see that when they sell implements in Canada, they charge the full profit to the farmer on the goods, including the materials and the duties on these materials. But, when the Masseys send their goods to Australia, or to England, or anywhere else, they can sell them cheaper by the amount of the duty of the raw material. That is to say, the farmers of Canada not only have to pay a high price for the goods produced by the Masseys, but they have to pay the Masseys a bonus to enable them to sell cheap goods to the people of foreign countries. That is one of the smaller items of policy which have lost this Government the confidence of the people of Canada. All their fancy fads for farmers proceed on the same basis. Their butter-shop plan, their dead-meat-export plan—all these things are based on the idea that it pays to tax the people of this country for the purpose of selling things cheaply abroad.

Now, I must refer, naturally very briefly in this connection, to another line of policy which has lost them the confidence of the people. I refer to their method of handling the Manitoba school question. I do not intend to discuss the Bill before the House, of course; I have no right to do so; but I wish to refer to the way they have handled this question since it first came up. In the first instance, their conduct was marked by sluggishness and dilatoriness; in the second, by rash haste and inconsiderate action. When the Privy Council of England decided that it was the duty of the Canadian Cabinet to hear the appeal of the Manitoba minority in this matter, the first duty of that Cabinet should have been to hear the appeal. They should have inquired into the alleged grievance, they should have consulted with the Government of Manitoba, and amongst themselves, as to what were the least modifications in the existing law that would be required to remove that grievance. They should have gone into the whole matter carefully, with all obtainable evidence at their command. They should then have matured, after a due lapse of time, and after careful inquiry, a proposition which would have appeared, at least on the face of it, to offer a solution of the difficulty, and to remove the grievance of the minority, without overriding and destroying the legislation of the province. Had they done so, I am sure we should not have been sitting here to-day in special session to consider a Remedial Bill for Manitoba.

What did they do instead? They heard a lawyer on each side of the case, they took no evidence whatever as to the conditions of the old separate schools in Manitoba, as to the condition of the new public schools in Manitoba, and as to what might be necessary to produce a workable compromise between the two. After hearing arguments on each side, they adopted the whole plan of the plaintiff in the case, gave judgment in his favour, and passed an Order in Council directing Manitoba, in effect, to restore separate schools as they had been before 1890. They did not do this with their eyes shut. They had plenty of advice from the leader on this side of the House before that time, that their proper method to proceed was to inquire first and decide afterwards. He had recommended a commission of inquiry a long time before that, but, instead of listening to that advice, they rushed on, perhaps on the advice of the late Minister of Justice, on the advice, perhaps, of the Premier—I do not know on whose advice they rushed on to give judgment without any inquiry.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask you, and I ask the House, if they are not very sorry they did not adopt the advice from this side? If they had adopted a commission of inquiry last year, had gone to the country and had the elections, pending a report of that commission, with a promise to see fair-play in the matter after the elections, the elections would have now been over, a new House would have been sitting here, duly qualified to pass Estimates and do all other business. I do not know whether the Government would have been in power or not, but they would have had a vastly better chance of being in power, if they had held the elections last spring, than they are going to have after the elections that are coming on. But, having passed that Order in Council, they decided to hold a session. There, too, they showed a mistaken policy, they showed their incapacity for political management by going on with the session instead of having an election. Having held the session, they showed their incapacity, their absolute want of judgment, in not pressing the remedial legislation to an issue during that session. It would have met with far less opposition last spring and last summer than it is meeting with now.

Then, Sir, between last session and the opening of this one, they had plenty of time to negotiate and to inquire; they could have appointed a commission of inquiry, and then had full information on the subject to lay before the House, when we met to consider this Bill. But they had not sense enough to do that, Mr. Speaker, and when the House met, so far from having their legislation ready to present to us, and get it over, they were forced to adjourn for two weeks by an eruption amongst themselves; and, when they did get together again, they did not appear to be any more ready with a Remedial Bill than they had been six months before. Now, only on the 4th March, are we going to have the first consideration of the Bill which they have proposed; a Bill which, if they had kept their promises, they should have had ready for presentation at the opening of the session; which they should have presented at the opening of the session; which they should have had discussed to a finish, which they should have taken the sense of the House upon, before they dared to ask us to vote a single cent of Supply.

I say, Sir, that, until they have done that, until the principle of the Bill, at least, is debated in the House on the second reading, they have no right to ask us to believe that they have the confidence even of their own supporters. We know that they have not the confidence of a lot of them, for they have said so in the House, and we do not know how many more, who have said nothing, are thinking a great deal about it. Now, those are some of the reasons why I think we should not give this Government any money just now, why we should not have sufficient confidence in them to entrust them with it. But we are told that one great change has occurred in the Government since it was last reorganized, which of itself should restore the confidence of the people of the country. It has gained one great acquisition, the High Commissioner has taken his seat as a Minister of the Crown, retaining his High Commissionership, and retaining the old personality he had when he was in this House before, to a considerable extent—to what extent, I wish to point out at some length.

We are told that the return of this great man would restore the confidence of the people in the Government. We were told that it would do so, but, Mr. Speaker, I do not see that that result has materialized. Now, there is a generation of electors throughout the country, a generation of members in this House, who only know the High Commissioner by reputation. They know that he was a great man at one time. They know that he wielded great influence in Nova Scotia and in this House. They took it for granted that if they could only get him back all would be well. What has been the result?

He came out here at his own suggestion, he succeeded in worming himself into the Government of which he had been a servant, on the strength of his promise that he would do great things for them. He succeeded in getting elected in a Nova Scotia constituency by a majority about equal to the ordinary party majority in that county, and he came here as a member of the House. During the two weeks or so that have elapsed since he took his seat he has made two appearances before the House, other than merely to answer questions. The first was within ten minutes after his admission into the chamber, when he had to rise and try to defend himself. I think ineffectually, from the charge of slandering his opponents in the campaign. The other time was when he had to rise and deny the charge of having stolen $40,000 of public money. I do not think the Secretary of State and High Commissioner is to be congratulated upon the nature of his two appearances before the House and the effect they will have upon the people of the country.

He has retained, I say, a great deal of his old personality. He has always been, he is and always will be, the great I, the great capital I, the Ego, the essence of all the Egos. He has never ceased to blow his own trumpet since the time when his action in 1867, in dragging his province into confederation against her will, nearly succeeded in setting that province in a state of rebellion—from that time till now he has never ceased to sound his own trumpet, and force upon us the belief that there was one person at all events who had confidence in him. His return on this occasion was hailed as the return of a Master Mind. It was thought he would bring good luck to the Government, as he had done before; that he was a sort of Mascot, a lucky individual to have about, with whom in the ranks they could not fail. I am afraid hon. gentlemen opposite are beginning to find out that this hon. gentleman instead of being a Mascot is going to prove the Hoodoo of their party. They will find that instead of ringing the death knell of Liberalism, he has come out to hold funeral services over, and to pay last respects to the memory of a Conservative Government in Canada. They will find that this man who must be first or nowhere, who must bully his province into confederation, who must bully the Premier under whom he served as a member of the Civil Service to give him a seat in the Cabinet, who will bully his colleagues before long, if he has not done it already, will succeed in tolling the bell over them instead of over us on this side of the House.

The Minister of Finance and his colleagues objected to Sir Mackenzie Bowell as being old and feeble and played out. Well, Sir, I leave it to you and to the House if the saviour of the party who is sitting for the time being in the third place in the Cabinet, with the intention of taking the first place and the name of Premier as soon as the session is over—if the Secretary of State is not a much more played out man than the Premier under whom he temporarily serves—older in years, older in experience, no doubt, but I think more used up by his experience of politics than the comparatively young man for his years who is now Premier of the party.

I said a few minutes ago that the new generation thought the Secretary of State is something great because they did not know him, but they now find out that the man of whom they heard so much, when paraded before their eyes, is what is commonly called a back number, that the great I, the great Ego, instead of being the over-ruling providence of the party at the present time, has become the great "I was." The Secretary of State is the great "I was" of the Conservative party. What he was we need hardly discuss; what he is now, you can see for yourselves, and I do not think the sight will tend greatly to strengthen the Government in this House or in the country. Why, if he is not a man of the past, if he is not an out-of-date politician, has he not contributed something to the debate on this occasion?

He was Finance Minister, and the ruler of various other men who were Finance Ministers, at other times; he professed to have laid the basis of the wonderful progress in our iron manufactures, which perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite have not noticed, but which he told us would take place within the few past years. Why has he not contributed to the Budget debate? Why has he not told us how the great schemes of 1887 have succeeded? Why has he not told us why all the promises have not been fulfilled? It is because he was ashamed, in the face of those promises, to stand up before the House and confess to the failure which everybody has found out has attended those schemes, and the lack of fulfilment which everybody knows to have occurred. What is the use of a master-mind, a capital I, if he cannot get up and take part in a debate such as this? We are in the last day of this discussion. He told us in Nova Scotia that no man had a right to be considered a leader, or had a right to be in public life, who was not ready to discuss any public question at any moment beneath the glare of the electric light. The light is lit ; it will burn here I do not know to what hour to-morrow morning. I do not intend to occupy the floor all the rest of the afternoon and evening, and there will be an opportunity for the Master Mind to discuss the great issues of the day beneath the glare of the electric light. Let him rise and make his glaring statements, beneath this glare and we will see what a glaring failure he will make of it. I say so because we have here his promises when he was Minister of Finance in 1887, the proof of the failure of which is within everybody's knowledge.

I have made a few extracts from that speech, some in regard to the financial policy, and others in regard to different subjects, but I do not wish to frighten the House by the bulk of the papers I now hold in my hand, because I am not going to read them all. In 1887, Sir Charles Tupper made a statement at the beginning of his Budget speech which shows how history repeats itself. Hon. members will all remember that he came out to Canada just after the writs had been issued for the general elections in that year : that he stayed and took command of the forces, and went back to the old country after spending one session as Finance Minister. This is what he said about coming out to this country, and what followed : —

I was in communication, as I shall point out in a later period, with the Government in regard to a proposed treaty with Spain ; and having received a letter from the Finance Minister on that subject, as well as a communication from my right hon. friend who leads the Government (Sir John A. Macdonald) in regard to the proposed Imperial and Colonial Institute, I felt that it was desirable that we should have personal communication on both of these questions. Under those circumstances I cabled to my right hon. friend to say, that if he approved of it, I would take a run out to Canada so as to have an opportunity of discussing these two questions fully with him and his colleagues before proceeding any further. I received promptly his approval of my visiting Canada ; and when I landed in New York I learned for the first time that a general election was to take place in this country. I not only learned it for the first time, but I will say with all frankness to the House that I was surprised at that information. I had previously learned the result of the elections that had just been held in the province of Ontario ; and while down to that period I thought it not unlikely that there might be an appeal to the people this season, after those elections I felt it unlikely that any appeal would be made until after this session of Parliament. I mention that in order to show that this important question was receiving my attention. Well, unhappily for myself, I may say, I visited this country ; and after I arrived here my right hon. friend laid an embargo upon me, and I was obliged to leave all those enjoyments and pleasures which have been so much descanted upon in this House and elsewhere ; I was obliged to leave my comfortable residence in London and go into the campaign without that health or strength that I required for such a service.

There is a good deal of "I" about that too, Mr. Speaker, but the drift of it is that he had come out to consult the Government about another matter, and he "got cotched on the jury and could not get off," as the old darkie was when he went into town. I have said that history repeats itself. I shall read to the House now a telegram from Sir Charles Tupper to Sir Mackenzie Bowell, dated London, 14th November, 1895 :

Long interview Colonial Minister last night. Imperial Government will support fast Atlantic service, extent £75,000, vessels similar "Teutonic," but will require Canadian Government to invite new tenders. Agents General and self meet Colonial Minister Tuesday re cable. Have no doubt Government will support proposal and appoint commission at once to arrange details pending declaration policy Imperial Government. Will advise you result of meeting.

You notice, Mr. Speaker, the repetition of history. Sir Charles Tupper always had two matters to come out to consult the Government about. It was Spain and the Colonial Institute in 1887, and it was the fast line and the cable question in 1895. His telegram continues :

Shall I come out consult you about these two matters ? Think could render you material assistance. Do not make contents this message public until further advised.

He says "he thought he could render Sir Mackenzie Bowell material assistance." He came out here, and he rendered him material assistance ; very material assistance indeed, towards the end of Sir Mackenzie's political career ? In reply to that message, Sir Charles Tupper received, as on the former occasion, the approval of his chief, and the following telegram was sent to him, dated Ottawa, 2nd December, 1895 :

Re fast line, Come out to consult, get all information possible.

BOWELL.

And so faithful was the hon. Premier to the reputation of his High Commissioner, that when he was asked why Sir Charles Tupper had come out here, he said : "I telegraphed him to come out." But here is the proof that the suggestion to come out did not come from Sir Mackenzie Bowell, but from the High Commissioner himself, as was the case on a former occasion. We all know perfectly well, now, what Sir Charles Tupper had in view when he came to Canada, and we know in what way he was going to render that "material assistance" to his beloved chief.

Then, Sir, at the close of the extract which I have read from the speech of 1887, the present Secretary of State was very pathetic in pointing out that he had to resign his comforts in London in order to come out here. I want you to observe, Sir, that in 1887, immediately the election was over, immediately the session was over, immediately he got his iron and coal tariff fixed, and immediately he got his Canadian Pacific Railway arrangement through. Sir Charles Tupper was back to the old country to enjoy that comfortable residence in London, "and the enjoyments and pleasures which have been so often discarded on in this House." That is what he is after this time, too, Mr. Speaker. He is out here just for the occasion, to lend his powerful hand, as he believes he can do again, in refitting this broken-down and utterly discredited Government, as we infer it must be from the manner in which he talks about it. But he wants to get back soon to his comforts and pleasures in Queen Victoria Street, London. It remains to be seen whether that beautiful programme will be carried out.

History repeats itself again, Sir. Sir Charles Tupper, in that Budget speech, speaking on the expenditure of $10,000,000 for the purchase of lands from the Canadian Pacific Railway at $1.50 an acre, said :

I am glad to find that the statement meets with the approval of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I knew it would meet with their approval, because, when I am able to congratulate myself and the Government and the country on the fact that we have been enabled to make an investment of $10,000,000 in the purchase of lands at $1.50 an acre, which these gentlemen estimated a few years ago at $3, $4 and $5 an acre, the House will see that I am not only justified in striking off $10,000,000 from our debt, but also in congratulating the country on making a very excellent bargain.

Now, Sir, this is another case of history repeating itself. This is another thing that the High Commissioner has come out to do this time. He has come out to fix up another arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to buy back from them for hard cash the remaining lands which we gave them as part payment for the construction of the railway. This is the common talk of the country, and it is substantiated on good authority. I believe it will turn out to be one of the chief reasons for the present visit of Sir Charles Tupper. He made a great point in 1887 about reducing the debt by ten millions of dollars, because after giving that $10,000,000 in cash to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and increasing the debt by that much in order to do so, we received back in payment lands which we had presented to the company a few years before, and Sir Charles Tupper thinks that by that stroke of the pen $10,000,000 was actually wiped off our debt? Well, that is about the style of the High Commissioner's financing generally. He will no doubt try to help his friends of the Canadian Pacific Railway by a similar deal before he returns to the comforts, &c., of his London house.

Well, Sir, I wish to call attention to the fact that Sir Charles Tupper played the same old tune at that time, which has been played ever since, in regard to the depressed condition of trade in this country. It seems to be always the case that we are just recovering from a period of depression, which the glorious policy of the Government had enabled us to get through without feeling it much, for here is a statement made by Sir Charles Tupper nine years ago :

Then, Sir, I will refer for a single moment to another evidence which will probably be regarded by the House as more conclusive than all of those to which I have alluded—of the fact that we have passed the period of serious depression which Canada has suffered in recent years, and that the outlook for the future is all that we can possibly desire.

My hon. friend (Mr. Davies) looks up to me in a startled manner. I assure him that was a speech made nine years ago by Sir Charles Tupper, and that it is not culled from the Budget speech of this year. Nine years ago, also, we had finally passed from a period of depression, which the National Policy had prevented us from feeling, and then the outlook for the future was all that we could possibly desire !

I speak of it as a serious depression, and I notice that some hon. gentlemen opposite look almost incredulous, and why? Not because the same depressing causes and influences have not been in operation in Canada that have been in England, the United States and all other countries, but because here depression has been almost unfelt. Instead of suffering as the country suffered during the previous period of depression which has visited Canada, we have passed through a period of almost equal depression almost without knowing it, and why? Because, Sir, the changed policy of the country, the activity of our industries, the employment given to our own people, the keeping of the money in the country and distributing and expending it among our people, and the great expenditure in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway have enabled Canada to pass through what would probably have been as serious a depression as existed before, without scarcely knowing that such a thing as depression existed.

In that last paragraph, Sir, he has hit the nail on the head. The way in which we got through that period of depression without appearing to feel it as much as we otherwise would, was by borrowing money and expending it recklessly on the Canadian Pacific Railway, without regard to any prospect of profit from the expenditure, but merely for the purpose of putting money in circulation and keeping up the boom which was attributed to the National Policy.

Then, after some preliminaries, he began to refer to the iron trade. Amongst those preliminaries, were these :

I referred to the efforts we were making in connection with lines of steam communication, but I omitted on that occasion to refer to the fact that the sanction which was obtained from this House to establish a line of steam communication with France has, as you know, Sir, not been successful up to the present moment.

This is not this year's speech, Mr. Speaker, this is a speech of nine years ago. Nine years ago, the present Secretary of State felt it necessary to apologize that up to that moment steam communication with France had not been established. I think if you inquire of Echo, whether steam communication with France has been established yet, nine years later, Echo will give you a very peculiar reply. He goes on :

But I am glad to be able to say that the appropriation placed by Parliament at the service of the Government for that purpose is about to be utilized—

It was about to be utilized nine years ago. It has not been utilized yet.

—and that a strong French company are preparing to put on a line of steamers between France and Canada that I have no doubt will render that effort on our part as successful as the others.

Which others ?

There we have a sample of the hon. gentleman's predictions of nine years ago. We were to have steam communication with France, to be supplemented, subsequently, by a treaty of commerce with France. Well, we have the treaty with France, but we have not the steam communication, which is the only thing that will make that treaty of any use. The hon. gentleman's predictions in that regard are proven to be as fallacious as possible.

Referring to the iron question, he pointed out in general terms the importance of the iron industry to any country, and went on :

Now, Sir, if there is a country in the world to which the iron industry is important, it is Canada, and why ? Because we possess the coal and we possess the iron ore and we possess the fluxes ; and, therefore, it is necessary to develop the great iron industry within our borders, and yet down to the present moment we have left almost untouched, this enormous, this almost illimitable field for the extension of our National Policy.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, and down to the present moment this field is still almost untouched. After all that this gentleman proposed to do in his Budget speech of 1887, the iron industry of Canada is not any more developed to-day than it was nine years ago.

He goes on to speak in general terms of the national importance of that industry. He says :

The means of developing the iron industry of a country depend, first, upon the possession of the ore ; second, upon the possession of the coal or other fuel that is required to utilize it ; third, upon the possession of the fluxes, and fourth, upon the proximity of these articles to each other, and of the facilities for transporting the product from the points where it is manufactured to the great centres of the country, where it is to be used as an article of commerce. Now, Sir, Canada occupies in this regard a vantage ground over almost every country in the world.

I believe that is quite true so far ; but from that the hon. gentleman drew the peculiar deduction that because we had special advantages for manufacturing iron, therefore, we needed to use artificial means to develop the iron industry. Why, Sir, if any other country in the world had the facilities for manufacturing iron that we have in Canada—if they existed in free-trade England or in any other country where capital could be cheaply and effectively used—those resources would have been developed long ago. But in Canada, under the upas tree of the National Policy, progress has not been made. I continue the quotation :

England possesses coal and iron ore to an almost illimitable extent ; but the House will, perhaps, be surprised to learn that even England, with all its ore and all its coal, imports from Spain, a thousand miles away, more ore than is required to manufacture the entire production of steel in England.

He goes on to speak of the advantages possessed by the United States, and he claims that Canada's advantages are far greater. From all of which, I should certainly draw the conclusion, that the iron trade of Canada needed less meddling or coddling than that of any of these other countries.

I wish to quote one or two specific prophecies in regard to Canada, and then I will close this branch of the subject :

The time is not long since, when charcoal iron was one of the most important industries in Ontario and Quebec.

He confessed that the time was past when the manufacture of charcoal iron was an important industry in Canada :

I have no hesitation in saying that if the protection we have given to cotton and woollen and all other industries of Canada be applied to iron to-morrow, it will show what the past history of Canada has shown, that these charcoal iron industries will again be in full blast, and that in Ontario and Quebec they will become most essential and important industries to-morrow as they were in days gone by.

The fact being, Mr. Speaker, that in the days when the charcoal iron industry was important in Canada, we had not a protective tariff : and since the protective tariff came into force, this industry has died out.

Every person knows that charcoal iron is the most valuable product of iron ; every person knows the increase of value of charcoal iron ; every person knows that the great difficulty is the cost of producing it, but there is no country in the world that has such a field for the production of charcoal iron as the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. What have you, Sir, in these provinces ? You have the ore in illimitable quantity, you have a boundless field for the production of the ore, and you have, running along through the same tract of country, magnificent forests adapted to furnishing the charcoal. At present what are the people obliged to do ? Those who go into the wilderness to make a farm have to spend their valuable labour in cutting down this timber, and consuming it on the ground without receiving anything from it. Vivify, give protection to the iron industry, as you have given it to cotton, woollen, and everything else, and what will be the result ? It will be, that when a man goes into the forest to make a farm in Ontario or Quebec, the most valuable product under his hand will be that which he has to spend all his labour and capital now in wasting. You will have colonization extended in Ontario and Quebec as nothing else could extend it. The experiments recently made by some of the great lines of railway in the United States have shown, as the result of scientific analysis, that the mode of making the life of a rail infinitely greater than it is, is to have incorporated in the rail a large portion of charcoal iron, and under this recent discovery, there is a field for the development of charcoal iron, that will go far to make it one of the leading industries of Canada.

It is almost trifling with the House to ask if any of these promises have been redeemed. Are we making charcoal iron in central Ontario where the iron and wood are contiguous? Has that become an important industry in Quebec or elsewhere? We all know it has not. We all know he was trifling with us when predicting that which he knew would not occur. He went on to say :

There is at present, as you know, in Ontario, running through a large number of counties and townships, a most valuable deposit of iron ore. A railway has been built to central Ontario, over 100 miles long, to carry this ore to Weller's Bay, to be shipped across the lake to Charlotte, Oswego, and other points on the American side. Well, from Oswego, and Charlotte on the American side to the anthracite coal field, is only 150 miles, and I say that, under a policy which will give iron the protection we give to everything else in Canada, under the National Policy, you will have the ships that convey the ore to Oswego or to Charlotte, or to any of those places from Kingston, Cobourg and Weller's Bay, bringing back the anthracite coal, and you will have the establishment of blast furnaces at Cobourg, Kingston and Weller's Bay that will give the iron industry of Ontario the same position it occupied years ago.

Well, that ore is just as good as it used to be ; the anthracite coal is just as near as it used to be ; the lake is still open during the proper seasons of the year—and yet we do not see the smelting furnaces at Kingston, at Cobourg, at Weller's Bay, although nine years have elapsed since the great prophet, the great "I was," the great Master Mind, promised, as a dead certainty, that his higher tariff would procure the establishment of such industries. This is how his promises in the past have turned out, and we may judge from them what will be the future results of any promises he may make now.

He went on then to deal with the particular aspects of the iron trade, which he said, would be vivified and made to flourish like a green bay tree by his tariff. So far, however, it has not vivified to any extent. Then he said, going back to his dear Nova Scotia :

In the county of Pictou, iron, coal and limestone are found in the closest proximity ; within a radius of ten miles there is everything necessary to build up a great and successful industry ; and this mineral wealth is found on the seaboard so that the products of the industry can be cheaply transported by water to the head of Lake Superior if required. All descriptions of iron ore are found in this country, so that when we are told by persons engaged in the iron-founding industries that they require to import Scotch pig iron, the answer is that we possess within our own borders every variety of iron ore, so that any mixture desired can be made.

It seems he thought we had every variety of pig at home, that we had specular iron ore, and so on, giving technical descriptions.

What he said was true about the great advantage of Pictou county ; and if that county had not been cursed by the Tupperizing influence of the hon. gentleman, and the Fostering care of the Minister of Finance, it would now be a flourishing seat of the iron industry. The iron ships built in Nova Scotia would have taken the first place among the shipping of the world, which the Nova Scotian wooden ships used to take, were it not for the suicidal policy of this Government. Coming nearer home, the hon. gentleman then referred to the immediate neighbourhood of this city :

Magnetic iron ores are found more or less throughout the Laurentian range of mountains along the Ottawa River. At the Hull or Baldwin mines, west of the Gatineau River, the ore analyses 67 per cent. The quantity is estimated at 100,000,000 tons. The Haycock mine ore ranges from 64 to 68 per cent metal, Bristol mine 58 per cent iron, and so on.

Now, as a matter of fact, under the Mackenzie regime, the regime of a revenue tariff, these Gatineau iron ores were being worked. They were making Bessemer steel there, and they had a contract to supply car wheels to a company as far away as India. What are they doing now? What has become of the Haycock mine? The National Policy has Tupperized and Fostered it out of existence. I give you only these instances of the utterances of the false prophet in days gone by, and no doubt we shall hear more of the same kind from him, now that he has returned, and we shall know what to expect.

I want to call attention for a few moments to some of the hon. gentleman's utterances since his return to this mundane sphere from the "glaring electric light" of London. At North Sydney, Cape Breton, on 29th January, he made a speech in which he referred, among other things, to the Washington treaty, and he took a great deal of credit to himself for that treaty. He forgot to tell his hearers how anxious he was to get coal put on the free list in that treaty, as between the United States and Canada ; but he told them he was the only one to be thanked for the $5,500,000 award obtained with regard to our fisheries as a consequence of that treaty. He said :

Well, what happened? The arbitration was held in Halifax. The United States sent their ablest men as arbitrators. The witnesses were produced and the result was that this impartial and independent tribunal gave an award $5,500,000 as the cash value of the free use of the Canadian inshore fisheries over and above the value of those of the United States, $4,500,000 of which went to Canada and $1,000,000 to Newfoundland

To whom was it due that we obtained that grand result from the Halifax arbitration? Who was in power when that arbitration was conducted? Who prepared the case and presented it to the arbitrators? Whom have we really to thank for that first and only instance, in which Britain or Canada has triumphed over the United States before a court of arbitrators? We have to thank, in the first place, the Mackenzie Government, and its Minister of Marine for the time being, and then my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) who, with some assistance, got up our case for the Halifax arbitration and secured that magnificent award. I am willing to give the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) his share of the credit for the treaty if he will give our friends credit for the management of the case before the arbitration.

Then this retiring gentleman began to boast of how he was followed around by reporters from place to place in Cape Breton, as if he were a lump of sugar in fly time. He said:

The Opposition candidate and his speakers were not followed by a staff of able reporters, representing papers on both sides, as he was. Perhaps this was due to the modesty of these gentlemen.

However modest the Opposition speakers may have been, I am sure it was not the High Commissioner's modesty that attracted the reporters to him? At any rate, he said their speeches were not being put on record and handed down to posterity as his were. Well, Sir, I am helping a little to hand down his speech to posterity by putting part of it on the pages of "Hansard," but for which, I am afraid, posterity would not see much of it, notwithstanding that it has been published in a Conservative Halifax organ:

He had not invited these reporters, but they were following him everywhere and he was very glad to have them. The public men who would say one thing at one place and another thing at another, who had one story to suit one community and another story to tickle the ears of another section was unworthy the name of a public man.

Well, the hon. gentleman in that campaign stated that Mr. David McKeen had no promise of anything, that no promise of reward had been given him for making way for the High Commissioner in Cape Breton—not a word said about putting him in the Senate. But now, immediately the election is over, Mr. David McKeen is put in the Senate. Will the hon. Secretary of State or, if he cannot, will the High Commissioner explain the consistency of these two statements? Or, if he cannot explain, will he admit that he is unworthy the name of a public man?

He was glad to have every word he uttered taken down by these reporters and sent off—not on the wings of the wind, but by a much faster means—electricity—

Perhaps he will not be so glad, before he gets through hearing them quoted against him.

—and published all over the country so that the next morning the people of the entire country could know what he had said.

Then comes the passage about the electric light, which I have already read.

Now he told us still further:

Well, in 1878 he came down to Cape Breton, outlined the National Policy and told the people that the first plank in his platform was protection to coal. He was proud to stand face to face with the people to-day and ask them if he had not kept his word. If every promise he had made them and every hope he held out to them had not been fulfilled. The public man who holds out false hopes and displays false lights is unworthy of the confidence of the people and ought to be driven out of public life.

I wish I could conclude my remarks with that sentence, for I think it is, perhaps, the most emphatic condemnation of this Government that has ever been uttered. I will read it again, so as to fix it still more deeply upon your mind, Mr. Speaker, and the minds of hon. members:

The public man who holds out false hopes and displays false lights is unworthy of the confidence of the people and ought to be driven from public life.

Who has been more frequently convicted of showing false lights, of holding out false hopes before the people, than the hon. gentleman who made this speech, and who was brought here to take such a very high place in this House?

He tells us that he does not mind these accusations of unfulfilled promises; he does not mind accusations of corruption and political untruthfulness, and things of that kind. He says he has always been used to them, that the Grits are always saying such things about him. That statement reminds me of what was said by his distinguished colleague, the Minister of Railways, when accused of other matters in this House, who said that he did not pay the slightest attention to accusations of that kind—and they were accusations of a very personal nature, indeed—that he had been accustomed to them from his childhood upwards? That is the line of defence these hon. gentlemen take. They say that because they have always been accused of being dishonest, because they have always been accused of this or that personal wrong-doing, because they have always been accused of making false promises, no attention is to be paid to the accusation? But we cannot but be reminded of the old and true proverb that where there is a great deal of smoke there must be a little fire. That is all that I think it is necessary to quote from the Port Morien speech.

After the election in which he was so very moderately successful, they gave the hon. gentleman a banquet at Halifax. But before I come to that I must remind the House of one point in regard to one of the reasons of his success in Cape Breton that has been lost sight of. There was a grave scandal in that an employee of this Government, a man engaged for a special purpose, to do a certain work, put in a large part of his time canvassing for the High Commissioner in Cape Breton. I refer to Mr. A. W. Wright, who was appointed as a commissioner to inquire into the sweating alleged to be practised in certain cities of the Dominion. He was given ninety days to complete his investigation. That term was up on the 29th of January; but for ten days or more before the time his engagement was up, he was one of the most prominent speakers for the Secretary of State during the campaign in Cape Breton. While he was in receipt of public pay, he was taken away from the duty he was set to perform, and was sent down at public expense to canvass for a member of the Government in Cape Breton. Organizations of working men, trades and labour councils in different places, have called attention to this fact. And I have obtained the information by question across the floor of the House that up to the 29th of January, he was in the employ of this Government, and that during that time he was canvassing in Cape Breton. And, as a matter of fact, the job he was appointed to do is not done yet, for he has never made a report.

After the election was over, a banquet was tendered to the High Commissioner in Halifax, at which he delivered himself of certain "unwritten chapters of political history." He told us for how long, and how sadly, he had feared that he would be called upon to save the Conservative party, and leave the delights of residence among the aristocracy of London. And, referring to the election of 1891, he said :

I went there to aid my revered friend Sir John Macdonald to the utmost of my power, but I found that the struggle and the momentous issues that were at stake were wearing upon him and striking him down to an extent that I witnessed with the utmost dismay. After the election I went back to London and was sent by the Government of Canada to represent it at the great postal conference in Vienna. I am again in a position to give you evidence that the position of Prime Minister of Canada was not the object of my ambition. I hold in my hand a copy of a letter which I addressed to my son on the occasion of the death of Sir John A. Macdonald. It is in the hand of Mr. Just, a gentleman in my department, who was acting as my secretary in Vienna. I will hand it to Mr. Stairs to read it to you and then you can judge whether I was anxious to be Prime Minister of Canada.

The letter is dated, Vienna, 4th June, 1891. It begins :

My dear son,—I, as you know, have always felt the deepest personal attachment for our great leader, Sir John A. Macdonald, but I myself did not know how much I loved him until on my arrival here last Saturday, I learned that he was struck down by illness. The news was then reassuring, and I attended the dinner at the Hofburg Palace, with the Emperor and a King, at four o'clock,— Ah, Sir, he was, undoubtedly, in great society, dining with emperors and kings ?

—but refused the invitation of the Minister for the theatre that evening, and all invitations since.

It appears he drew the line at the theatre. He did not mind going to a plain, every-day dinner with an emperor and a king or two, but he drew the line at the theatre, while his leader was lying sick ?

It now seems that there is no hope; how mysterious are the ways of Providence.

Very mysterious, indeed.

Never, in his long and useful life have his invaluable services been so important to Canada and to the Empire, and God alone knows what the consequences to both may be.

But the good Sir John A. Macdonald is dead, and Canada and the Empire still stands.

I received your telegram saying that there was a disposition in certain quarters that Sir John Thompson should succeed him, with great satisfaction, and a strong sense of personal relief. You know I told you long ago, and repeated to you when last in Ottawa, that nothing could induce me to accept the position in case the Premiership became vacant.

I am glad to put the hon. High Commissioner on record as stating that nothing can, under any circumstances, induce him to accept the Premiership, should it become vacant. I hope his colleagues and his party will bear that in mind, and that, after this session is over, and when we are preparing to face the electors, they will not try to tempt this man, of high principles, this man of high associations, who dines familiarly with kings and emperors—that they will not try again to tempt him in vain to accept the Premiership of this country ?

I told you that Sir John looked up wearily from his papers and said to me : "I wish to God you were in my place;" and that I answered : "Thank God I am not."

He had better take care, Mr. Speaker, he is getting awfully near it now ?

He afterwards, well knowing my determination, said he thought Thompson, as matters now stood, was the only available man. Of course he had in view the charges that were made against Langevin, and still pending. Had it been otherwise, and I had been in Parliament, I would have given him my support, as you will know.

That is very nice reading for the hon. member spoken of.

When this terrible blow came, I naturally dreaded that my old colleagues, and the party for whom I had done so much, might unite in asking me to take the leadership, and I felt that in that case a serious responsibility would rest upon me.

A serious responsibility would rest upon him, knowing, of course, that he was the only man who could save the party, the Master Mind, and so on. He was quite correct in feeling that it would be a serious responsibility to accept.

Believing, as I do, that compliance would have involved a material shortening of the few years at the most remaining to me, you can imagine, my dear son, the relief with which I learned that I was absolved from any such responsibility, and able to assure your dear mother that all danger was past.

She must be very anxious now, Mr. Speaker?

Your course, my dear son, is to think only of your duty to Canada, and that is to give your hearty support to whatever can combine the members of the party in the greatest degree.

He seems to have been afraid that the "dear son" might not support a Cabinet which did not contain his "dear father."

I need not tell you how glad I will be if our mutual friend Thompson should be the man. His great ability, high legal attainments, forensic powers, and above all, his personal character, all render his choice one of which our party and country should be proud.

I believe every member of the House will agree with the High Commissioner in thinking that all these reasons did justify the choice of Sir John Thompson rather than the writer of this letter himself.

It was a strange coincidence that about one o'clock on Wednesday night, the 27th ult., I concluded my speech in response to a toast at a banquet given to myself by a large number of peers and members of the House of Commons, of both parties, by an eulogium upon Sir John A. Macdonald, when, by a slip of the tongue, I used the words "and now, at the close of his long and useful life," when I immediately corrected myself by expressing the hope that he would be spared many years to serve his country as he had done in the past.

It is to be sincerely hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of State and High Commissioner, or either of them, will make no such slips of the tongue in regard to the present Premier of the country. It seems to have a very fatal effect on Premiers.

While this prayer, for such it was, was enthusiastically cheered by the Lord Mayor, three ex-Secretaries of State for the Colonies, of both parties, and many members of the House of Commons, both Liberal and Conservatives, my dear friend appears to have been struck by the fatal shaft, and our prayer denied.

It was very sad, indeed, that even three ex-Secretaries of State for the Colonies, a number of peers and members of the House of Commons, and a High Commissioner, could not have averted the fatal effects of this first slip of the tongue. He should be very careful how he lets his tongue slip in the future. A friend of mine beside me suggests that the powers above are too well acquainted with him.

We can only bow with submission, knowing that the blow came from the One who doeth all things well. Let us all endeavour to work as untiringly and as unselfishly for the progress and prosperity of our country as Sir John has done, and so, come what may, we will be consoled as he has been, by the conviction that we have done our duty.

Really, Mr. Speaker, the tone of this letter is as surprising as it is touching!

It is a source of great satisfaction to me in this sad hour to feel that through good and evil report, I have stood at his side, and in sunshine and in storm have done all in my power to sustain and aid him in the great work to which he has, since first we met, devoted successfully all his great powers. He has left a bright example for us to follow, let us endeavour to imitate him as far as we can, and we will deserve well of our country.

Your loving father,

CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir, I did not know all that was in that letter, when I began to read it. There are some things in it that are touching, or that were meant to be touching, but I cannot refrain from seriously asking the House and the country, if that letter does not show signs of a peculiar—I would not say disease—but a peculiar eccentricity of mind? The man who wrote that letter was intensely fond of having it known that he had been dining with very distinguished people. He descends even so far as to ordinary members of the House of Commons in England, but he ascends to emperors and kings!

I ask if it is not a sign of that Megalomania which has become of late years a disease recognized by the medical profession. Megalomania has a short English name, it is called Big Head. It is described by the doctors as a sort of frenzied self-conceit. It is the same disease which was attributed by several distinguished physicians to the late lamented Louis Riel, and said by them to be the cause of his very eccentric conduct in the North-west. I leave it to hon. members to consider, whether a man so affected should be deprived of the last few years of his life, to which he so touchingly referred in the letter I have read, in which to rest in the bosom of his beloved family, and console himself for his toils in the past?

The war-horse has had his day. He has taken his share in the battle, and now if he does, in the words of Job, "paw in the valley and rejoice in his strength," he at least does not do it in public, for we do not see him pawing and rejoicing on the floor of this House. If he "sniffeth the battle from afar," he does it so very far away that we do not perceive he is taking any interest in it! I think he has earned the immortality sought after by Hindoo Buddhists, that state of Nirvana or quiet beatific contemplation in which Buddha himself ever sits, with immovable face, except when he yawns in disgust at the foolishness of those who bend in adoration before him. I think the job of Buddha would just suit the High Commissioner and Secretary of State. I fear his usefulness for other purposes in political life in Canada is gone.

There was another banquet in Halifax subsequent to the one to which I referred, at which Mr. Murray, the defeated candidate, made some criticisms on the conduct of the campaign. He answered Sir Charles Tupper's allegation that it was because of the latter's explanation of his policy that he had been elected for that county. He said :

Sir Charles Tupper had stated since his return that his election in Cape Breton was due to the fact that he "propounded a policy that the people could understand." The election returns in the districts where he propounded his policy in person should be evidence of its acceptance to the people. He spoke in Sydney, where he had an energetic organization. Sydney is the capital of the county, and he succeeded so well in having the electorate understand his policy that the Liberal majority was increased fifty votes. He spoke to a great gathering of workmen at Glace Bay under exceptional advantages ; the result was a strong Liberal gain among the class of voters whom he declared were especially indebted to him. He next spoke at Port Morien, a district which afforded the Tory party strong hopes of great gains, and the result was the Tory majority of 123 at the last election was reduced to 40. At a meeting at Port Morien Sir Charles Tupper evidently reached the conclusion that the "policy which the people could understand" required a little propping, and he induced the manager of the Dominion Coal Company to strengthen it by promising that a branch railway would be constructed into that village.

And so on. I merely quote these words to show that wherever the policy of the present Secretary of State was laid before the people, it seems to have been to the advantage of our people.

I am sure that will be the case throughout the country. I am satisfied to abide by the results when the people have the policy of the Government and the policy of the Liberal party laid before them. It is we and not they who have a definite policy, on all the subjects now before the people. It is we who have a definite policy in fiscal matters, the policy of a revenue tariff as opposed to the present policy of protection conducted on jobbing principles. In all other matters our policy is pretty well known to the House and the country by the presentation it has received in different speeches this session. I will read the headings of the different resolutions embodying that policy, which was confirmed at a convention of the Liberals here in 1893. The first plank is free trade and reduced taxation ; the second plank is enlarged markets and reciprocity ; the third plank in purity of administration ; the fourth plank is a demand for strictest economy and decreased expenditure.

On this point I want to call attention to one ominous feature which I have noticed in the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been complaining, the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) among others, that the Estimates before the House are not large enough, that $38,000,000 is not enough to spend. They appear to be leading up to a proposal to expend a great deal more money than that already proposed. We hear very vague estimates in regard to military matters, public works and railway subsidies. We do not know where the Supplementary Estimates and the resolutions will land us, if this Government seeks to bring them to completion. I protest against this, and I call attention to it as a very serious feature of this debate.

The fifth plank pleads for responsible government and the independence of Parliament ; the sixth, for land for the settler, not for the speculator ; the seventh opposes the Dominion Franchise Act ; the eighth attacks the gerrymander ; the ninth pronounces the Senate to be defective ; and the tenth, in regard to the question of prohibition, declares its decision should be left to the voice of the people themselves. When this definite policy, compared with the patchwork policy of the Government, comes before the people, I have not the slightest doubt of the result ; and, in common with others, I am anxious that we should get through the business we have come here to do, and pronounce on the one question that is properly before us, and go as soon as possible before our judges, the people.

Every sign on the Government benches seems to indicate hon. gentlemen opposite are afraid of that event ; every sign among us goes to show that we are anxious for it, and will be grateful when it comes. I hope the discussion which will commence on Tuesday of next week will be the last discussion we shall have to undertake during this session ; that immediately that question is disposed of one way or the other, we shall have the House dissolved and final judgment passed upon the Government, whom I have denounced, and I think properly denounced, as incapable, from their policy, their personnel, their mental capacity and administrative acts, to rule this country any longer.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Mr. Speaker, it was not my purpose to take up any of the time of the House upon this subject, and were it not for the references of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Casey) to the result of the late election in North Ontario and the issues then defined and then pronounced upon, I would not have troubled the House at all. If the hon. gentleman knows as little about the other matters of which he has spoken during the last two hours as he appears to know as to what the issues in North Ontario were, and what issues were decided, then he knows very little indeed. The election in North Ontario, he said, resulted unfavourably to the Government on the question of the National Policy and the fiscal policy of the Government. Why, Sir, he appears not to know that the greatest issues in that contest were the fiscal policy and the National Policy.

Mr. CASEY. That is just what I said.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman said that North Ontario did not pronounce in favour of the fiscal policy of the Government. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) said: Let North Ontario answer. Well, Sir, North Ontario did answer. That hon. gentleman told the House that I represented only a miserable minority of my constituency.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. And that seems to find echo in the voice of one of his friends on the other side of the House. Now, it was a three-cornered fight in North Ontario, and the candidates seeking the suffrages of the people were, a representative of the Patrons, myself, a strong supporter of the Government.

Mr. MARTIN. On the National Policy.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. On the National Policy and all their policy, save in one particular, and that is not pronounced upon yet by me. There was also as candidate a representative of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MARTIN. Did I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. McGillivray) to say that the Patron candidate was a very strong supporter of the National Policy?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. No, I said I was.

Mr. CASEY. We all knew that.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. You did not seem to know, judging from the way you spoke. The Liberal in that contest hardly saved his deposit; merely saved it. Then, what are hon. gentlemen opposite talking about? Did their policy commend itself to the people of North Ontario? One of the best known Liberals in the county, who had just got out of the warden's chair, who had just received the almost unanimous support of the county council, was the Liberal candidate, but he merely saved his deposit. By the way, before I go further, let me say that the Liberal candidate was also an office-holder under the Ontario government. The hon. member (Mr. Casey) complained that Mr. Wright was down in Cape Breton assisting the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) in his election. Sir, does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) not know that one of the leading officials of the Ontario government went from county to county in the late by-elections? I refer to Mr. Peter Ryan, of Toronto, than whom no more eloquent man is to be found in the whole ranks of the Liberal party. Although Mr. Ryan holds one of the best

offices in the city of Toronto, and is paid equally by Liberals and Conservatives, yet he thought it no impropriety to go up into Cardwell, and speak to his co-religionists there, in the interests of the candidate of hon. gentlemen opposite. I might quote, Sir, many prominent instances such as that. It was just as reprehensible for one of the friends of the Liberal party, holding office, and paid by the people of this country, to take part in the elections as it was reprehensible for Mr. Wright to take part, if either is reprehensible. Mr. Gillespie, the Liberal candidate in North Ontario was Division Court Clerk in one of the most important townships of North Ontario. He had everything in his favour, except his religion, and that seems to have told against him. It seems to have told against him, Sir, not in my favour, but in the favour of the Patron candidate. I did not poll the Liberal votes that went from Mr. Gillespie because he thought to worship as he pleased. I did not poll the Liberal votes of the townships of Brock, or Thorah, or Mara. They went to the Patron. Now, Sir, who was the Patron candidate? He was a Conservative. There were two Conservatives in that fight, two men who before had always been fighting together, two men who had met time and again at the Liberal-Conservative convention of the county. He was chosen as the standard bearer of the Patrons, and, therefore, the contest was unequal, so far as the Conservative candidate was concerned. Now, I gave my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) the information while he was speaking, that 600 Conservative votes went from me and went to the Patron candidate. Where were these 600 Conservative votes to be found? We have a riding almost 200 miles in length, and where were these votes to be found? Why, they were where the Patron candidate lived. There was nothing more natural than that. The candidate of the Government was not even a resident of the riding, but Mr. Brandon was not only a resident of the riding, but was a resident of the most pronounced Conservative township in the whole constituency. Mr. Brandon refused to say that he would vote want of confidence in the Government. He had been challenged, time and again, upon every platform to say whether he would vote confidence or non-confidence in the Government, but he kept silent. Consequently, a large Conservative vote of the district in which he lived, went for the Patron candidate. That vote going to him, can in no sense be considered as meaning want of confidence in the Government, because I am informed that even after his nomination he assured Conservatives that he was as good a Conservative as he had ever been, and when challenged by Conservatives supporting the Government, he refused to say that he would vote against the Government. When the hon. gentleman

(Mr. Casey) tells me that I represent a minority instead of a majority of my county I tell him that he is quite mistaken. I believe that I fell between 200 and 300 below getting half of the whole vote of that county. But many hon. gentlemen have sat on the opposite side of the House as the result of a three-cornered fight—I do not know how many of them at present, but in the past there have been a good many. Where there are three distinct parties, as there now appear to be, surely, Mr. Speaker, a majority of 780 over my nearest opponent is large enough in all conscience, not to say anything of a majority of more than 1,000 over the Liberal candidate. Now, Mr. Speaker, what were the issues of the contest in North Ontario, and what were the issues in the Cardwell election? The language the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) made reference to in regard to Cardwell was also misleading. First, with regard to Cardwell. I am one who believes that Cardwell would have been carried by the present representative of that riding, whether he ran as a Conservative candidate or as an independent candidate. I believe he is in this House quite independent of the support he got from the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). It is said that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs) belongs to the third party. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I believe, speaks of him as a follower, but wherein and how? The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is an opponent of the Government upon the trade policy, but throughout that contest—and I was in it—the supporters of Mr. Stubbs were equally supporters of the National Policy, as the supporters of Mr. Willoughby were. The dividing line there was remedial legislation, and in that three-cornered fight, the independent candidate succeeded. But now as to North Ontario. I was able to show the people of that county that the National Policy was in the interests of the farmers of Canada. I was able to show them that $1 would, at the present day, buy more of the goods required by the farmers than at any time in the history of this country. I was able to show them that everything used upon the farm, and required to be purchased by the farmer, was purchased for less money, by far, than when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. Mr. Speaker, I was able to point them to the United States, where they could buy horses in the state of Idaho at $2.50 a head, and then I was able to show that in the little township of Scugog, a sale had only just at that time taken place of eighteen horses, where the horses actually averaged $43 a head, old and young. I was able to point out to them, that the Liberal party, when in power, did not take taxes off anything, but put the taxes higher than they were before. I was able to show them that they had a free breakfast-table—that their tea was no longer subject to duty, and that whatever loss in the revenue of the country was occasioned thereby, was made up by judicious taxation of the luxuries used by the rich.

But it is not my purpose to talk to the House at length simply upon the issues in North Ontario. I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman—for he does not appear to know—that since this Parliament was elected there have been upwards of sixty by-elections; and what is the record of those elections? So far as I have been able to make it out hurriedly this afternoon, of those 60 odd by-elections the Liberal party have only succeeded in thirteen. Instead of citing Montreal Centre, Jacques Cartier and the other counties he named, why did not the hon. gentleman come down to a later date and speak of Northumberland, N.B., which has given this House the latest addition to its membership? Why did he not dwell upon the result in Cape Breton? Why did he not refer to the fact that the mover of the Address in this House this session, the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), had been sent here as the result of one of the recent by-elections? And so he might have gone on and told us of a number of other elections which have resulted favourable to the Government. But he refers to Montreal Centre, where local issues and local jealousies determined the result; and I might say the same of Jacques Cartier.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that the Government now in power is a Government socially, personally and mentally unfit to govern. I listened, as a new member, with some surprise to an old member like the hon. gentleman speaking of the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) as one having a big head. That may be parliamentary language, Mr. Speaker. I know not; but I do know that, if the hon. knight has not taken up much of the time of this House in talking upon the different subjects brought before it, that cannot be said of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) who has just taken his seat. He is troubled with big something else: he is a big talker. I do not think, Sir, that it is becoming in a member of this House to speak of the representative of this great country of ours in the capital of the Empire as the hon. gentleman spoke of the hon. baronet this afternoon. Is it a crime, Sir, in our representative to dine with emperors and kings? I should have thought the hon. gentleman would rather take pride in the fact that the representative of Canada in London was considered worthy to be invited to dine with kings and emperors. Then, the hon. gentleman says that, while the Secretary of State was willing to dine with the king, he refused to go to a theatre because of his feelings towards his leader. Well, there is all the difference in the world between the two.

It might have been because of his representative character, as representing the Canadian people in the great metropolis of the world, that he dined with the king, whereas going to a theatre would be simply for the satisfaction of personal enjoyment.

The hon. gentleman says that the Liberal party have a well-defined policy. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is so well defined that he took very good care not to tell us what it was. I challenge the hon. gentleman, I challenge his leader, I challenge every lieutenant his leader has, to tell us what their policy is. They have not told us in this debate yet, and now we are nearing the end of it.

Now, I wish to say that we, on this side of the House, do not speak of the leader of hon. gentlemen opposite as they speak of ours. Let them go into any county in the province of Ontario, and they will hear the name of the Liberal leader spoken of in kindness by Liberal-Conservatives and Liberals alike. We do not wish to treat him as hon. gentlemen opposite treat our leader.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Which is the leader?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman asks me, which is the leader. We have a Premier, who is our leader; but we have also the Secretary of State, who is our leader in this House. Now I hope the hon. gentleman understands.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Under which king do you serve?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. I am glad to know, Mr. Speaker, that I serve under both. But I was going to say, when I was interrupted, that Conservatives are pleased to join with Liberals in speaking well of the Liberal leader. I think, Sir, that it would be a pitiable thing if the politics of this country should ever descend so low that political opponents could not speak of men as they find them. We might say things of their leader, if we would; but, inasmuch as those things have been denied by him, we do not repeat them. Even when they are pronounced to be true by Liberal organs in the province of Quebec, we do not repeat them: we take his word that he did not speak of Orangemen as they say he did. We take his word, and let his papers eat the leek. And even though we think he made a mistake on one occasion in connection with the last Riel Rebellion in the North-west, we have forgiven him for that, too. We think it was only a mistake. We believe that, after all, he is a Canadian of whom we can be proud, and so we speak of him.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY.

Bill (No. 43) to incorporate the Queenston Heights Bridge Company.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

Bill (No. 44) relating to the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

Bill (No. 49) respecting the Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company.—(Sir John Carling.)

THE CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. POWELL moved that the order for second reading of Bill (No. 59) respecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company (Limited) be discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

Motion agreed to, order discharged, and Bill withdrawn.

Mr. POWELL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 75) respecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company (Limited).

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman, when introducing a Bill in this way, should at least explain the provisions of the Bill and the changes he proposes as compared with the one he has withdrawn.

Mr. POWELL. I thought the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) was in his place when the matter was discussed the other day. The Bill, as introduced, had some provisions that I certainly would not undertake to bring before the House, implying the continuation of the subsidy. The Bill in that form, to be introduced should have the assent of the Governor in Council. I undertook to have it amended in committee, but it was thought that this was the proper course; and I see that it is in accordance with precedent, as shown by a case which came before the House in 1885, and which is reported on page 428 of "Hansard" of that year. That Bill was withdrawn and a new one with the objectionable feature expunged, was introduced. The Bill I now introduce simply contemplates the extension of the time within which the company may construct the work, and does not imply the renewal of the subsidy.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 72) respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company.—(Mr. Lachapelle.)

REPORT.

Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for 1895 (Fisheries Branch).—(Mr. Costigan.)

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. As you were leaving the Chair at recess, Mr. Speaker, I was giving the leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition a certificate of character, or rather I was certifying to what that character was in the minds of the party of which I am a humble member in the province of Ontario. Let me just add that we like the hon. member because he looks so much like a former leader of ours. We loved Sir John Macdonald and we love the hon. gentleman. We love him so well that we shall use voice and vote to keep him where he is for a very long time to come—on your left rather than on your right.

But all this was merely by way of preface to my remarks when I came to speak on the address of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) at greater length. The hon. gentleman said that the policy of the Liberal party was well defined. But he did not venture to define that policy, nor, as I said before, has a single member of the Opposition, so far as I have heard them, defined what their policy is or stated upon what they were going to the country. Within the last few years they have spoken successively of commercial union, tariff reform, unrestricted reciprocity and free trade as they have it in England. So far as we have been able to learn what their policy is, it seems to be free trade as they have it in England. I need not take up the time of the House in dealing with that, because free trade as they have it in England is now being repudiated by the farming community of that country in large numbers. The hon. member for West Elgin said the National Policy was against the interests of the farmers of this country. But he was not able to say wherein or how. As I had occasion to say during the campaign, I say now, the farmers of England and Scotland are asking for exactly what the farmers of Canada have to-day. My recollection is that the leader of the Opposition, in reply to that statement, to that statement of mine on a previous occasion, said that if that were to come about it would be disastrous for the farmers of Canada. But that does not alter the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers there who were content with the free trade policy eighteen years ago are to-day asking for protection on their wheat, on their cattle and on their horses as we have it here to-day.

It is said that the National Policy puts us in antagonism to the people of the United States. Sir, no policy of the Canadian Government has ever had even the appearance of antagonism to the American people. We are not responsible for the tariff as it exists to-day, except that it was inaugurated for the purpose of protecting ourselves against the effects of the tariff they imposed, and only so far as was required for the purpose of protection. I believe that it is the wish of every Conservative in Canada to have the closest relationship possible with the people of the United States. We have done nothing, we have said nothing, to antagonize them in any sense. We look upon them almost as if they were our own people. We have a common language, a common destiny, and we have common traditions, and come of common stock. Yes, Mr. Speaker, and we have a common flag. When we cross over to that country it never occurs to my mind where the dividing line is. And if there is one thing our American neighbours are to be congratulated upon it is that when they separated from us a hundred years ago they kept the old flag. They added some stars and stripes thereto, it is true, but it is the old red, white and blue still; and by no act of any Canadian will the relations between these two peoples be disturbed.

It is also said that we are fostering combines by this trade policy of ours. I will not dwell upon that at length, but I would like to ask the hon. gentlemen where are the combines that are of such a disturbing character. Are we not getting everything to-day cheaper than we ever got it before? Talk about combines. Let them go to the other side of the line where everything is under a combine, sugar, whisky and oil and what not.

Now, taking up the question of the National Policy in general terms, rather than in a specific way, the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), said the other night that it was a miserable thing made up of patches, a thing that no one could understand and no one support with any degree of consistency. Now, let us look at what the members of the Opposition have said and done in these respects. The hon. leader of the Opposition has not always thought as he does to-day. There was a time when he was as strong a protectionist as there is in this House. Then he was younger. He had just received the first inspiration of politics at that time. He was commencing to make his mark in another legislature than this, and he spoke out in no uncertain way as to what was the proper policy for the French Canadian people. I believe he is correctly reported in the "Canadian Manufacturer" of 1894, and here is what that paper says of the early views of the leader of the Opposition upon the fiscal policy:

It is not, perhaps, so well known that the very first speech Mr. Laurier made in a legislative body contained a strong plea for protection. The speech is to be found in the English edition of "Wilfred Laurier on the Platform," published a few years ago. The Quebec legislature where he delivered it had nothing to do with such matters, but that did not prevent him from declaring that it was the duty of the French-Canadians to create national industries as a means of checking the exodus of population, and removing other ills. He wanted to see the abundant raw material which the province possesses, transmitted into factory goods by Quebec labour, and went so far as to endorse Papineau's advice that French-Canadians should buy nothing from Great Britain. Sir, is the gentleman who leads the Liberal party to-day, the same Wilfred Laurier mentioned here? He who cries out piteously in plaintive language against the enormity of Canadians putting a tax upon British goods? At that day he thought nothing should be purchased from Great Britain, but to-day he wants the barriers to be thrown down, and everything bought from Great Britain that we do not produce ourselves. We find that at that day his protection was of a contracted character, because he was then speaking for only French Canadians for his ideas so expressed only applied to French Canadians. But the National Policy which we advocate to-day is a wider and a larger policy than that, it is a policy for Canadians, irrespective of the province in which they dwell. Sir, these are the views the hon. gentleman formerly held, and I trust that there is no doubt but what his conversion has been honest and sincere. Now, what about other leaders of the Opposition? What of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). If I recollect aright, in the olden days he was just as strong a protectionist as I am myself. But he has forgotten the visions of that time, he has forgotten the spirit of his dreams in large measure, and yet he is to-day supporting the National Policy, in part. He is one of those, I am told, who would not have the tariff disturbed in so far as canned goods are concerned. Well, they talk about the National Policy not being such a thing as we can all support. I would ask our friends opposite to point to a single hon. gentleman on this side of the House who does not accept the whole policy, and support it as a whole. But are hon. gentlemen opposite all agreed in opposition to this policy of ours? Surely not. What does the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) think of it? What is his opinion as to the duty on coal oil? Should it be removed? The hon. gentleman is silent, and he may well be, because he knows that his tenure of a seat in Parliament would not be worth a day's purchase if he went back home and advocated that the duty on coal oil should be taken off.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Mr. Speaker, would it not be more to the point if he would answer my question by addressing himself to you, and tell us whether he has advocated that that duty should be taken off altogether. I know what I am talking about; and some other hon. gentlemen opposite will hear from me later on.

Mr. LISTER. You are not in a Foresters' lodge just now.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that he does not know what he is talking about when he talks about a Foresters' lodge, for there is no such thing in existence.

Mr. LISTER. I do not want to know, when they pay $6,000 a year to you.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Well, the hon. gentleman is getting personal; what I am saying must hurt him. But I am simply challenging him as a public man, and not going into his private affairs. It is none of his business where my salary comes from. Now, as far as that hon. gentleman is concerned, I will leave him alone.

Mr. LISTER. I think you had better.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Well, I don't think he has hurt me very much yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Now, let us come to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), whom I see in his seat. What does he think of having free corn, and free flour? How would that suit him? He will not tell me that I do not know what I am talking about. Then what of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor)? If he is not in his seat, he ought to be. I have the record of a resolution once proposed in this House, reading to this effect: "That it is expedient to place corn on the free list." The hon. member for North Essex was found with the wicked Tories voting "nay" on that motion; and so was the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Colter).

Mr. GRIEVE. Who placed that resolution upon the Order paper?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. I do not know the hon. member who is interrupting me. I have not been long enough in the House, nor do not know who put that resolution on the Order paper. All I know is how hon. members voted upon it. Now, during my late contest the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) visited North Ontario in the interest of the Liberal party. He came up there to talk against the National Policy. I met him on a certain platform one night, and asked him there and then, would he be in favour of the removal of the duty upon salt? and he was as dumb as an oyster, Mr. Speaker. Then what of the genial and popular member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson)? What does he think about the duties upon small fruits? What is the opinion of the hon. member for Wexford (Mr. Lowell) upon the same subject? Would they take the duty off small fruits? If those hon. gentlemen were obliged to give their opinions, they would say: No. Now, I come down to the address delivered the other evening by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards). The hon. member for Russell is in harmony, in a large measure, with the policy of the Government, as would appear from what he said the other night. He does not want the Government policy as to logs and lumber disturbed; nor, as I understand, does the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who supports the policy of the Government on that question. Mr. Speaker, there are some fourteen or fifteen members of the Opposition supporting one or other of the branches of this great national trade policy. How can they be agreed upon a policy when we see one after another of them rising in their seats and talking in favour of some one or other of the features of the policy of this Government? They can never hope to agree on a policy if they act when they come into power, if they ever do, as they have been acting in Opposition. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), of whom I would not say an unkind word, nor would any one who knows him, for to know him is to respect him. I find, according to "Hansard" of 1894, referred to this subject. The hon. gentleman was challenged by Hon. Mr. Montague in these words:

I ask the hon. gentlemen opposite whether they are prepared to cut off agricultural protection which the farmers enjoy at the present time.

Hon. gentlemen opposite were silent for the most part, but the hon. member for Russell sprang up and said:

I will answer for myself. I am prepared to vote for the removal of the deceit, snare and pretense that is offered to the farmers of this country.

Further down, the hon. gentleman is reported to have said:

I have never believed, nor do I believe now that it is a protection to the farmers.

Now, I do not wish to impute improper motives: but we can hardly expect men engaged in the business, followed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) to be very much in love with a policy that keeps out American oats, corn and pork. These men, until the National Policy came into force, could buy oats on the Chicago market at 12 cents per bushel and bring them into this country and feed them in our northern bush lands to the exclusion of the oats of the Canadian farmer. So it was with regard to American pork purchased in the Chicago market and used in the Canadian woods. No wonder those hon. gentlemen are opponents of the National Policy in some measure and to that extent. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) spoke to-day as if the Patron party were supporters and in sympathy with the Liberal party. If hon. gentlemen will read the columns of the "Globe," for the last three months, they will see how far they are supporters of that party. If I recollect rightly, the "Farmers' Sun" opposed the return of the hon. member for South Huron just as strongly as it opposed the candidature of Mr. Gillespie in North Ontario. I am not here to say one unkind word of the Patron party, I am not here to impute their motives. I know this, that they are as much supporters of the Government as they are of the Opposition, in so far as numbers are concerned, at least, in the counties in the midst of which I live. Another charge made repeatedly in this debate is, that the Conservative party is a corrupt party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear!

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Some very genial members of the Opposition say, "Hear, hear" to that sentiment, my confrère from one of the Ontarios being of the number. During the late contest in North Ontario, I had a number of those gentlemen in my riding, including the hon. member for Ad-dington (Mr. Dawson), but he did not give five-hour speeches there, he did not read his speeches there, but he spoke right out from his mouth without the use of manuscript what he thought: and there was also the hon. member for South Huron, and we were to have had the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), but some accident happened to him, and he could not get there, and another gentleman was sent in his place, and the hon. gentleman for West Ontario was also there. Inasmuch as I am one of his constituents, I do not like to speak too harshly of him.

Mr. EDGAR. Go ahead.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. From the beginning to the end of the contest, that hon. gentleman howled upon the corruption and against the corruption, so-called, of the Liberal-Conservative party, forgetful and unmindful of the history of his own party in the past. If there has been corruption in the Conservative party, in so far as I can remember, during the last quarter of a century, the punishment has been meted out to the party by a Liberal-Conservative Government. I need not go into names. Mr. Speaker, you and the members of Parliament here assembled have yourselves seen what has been done in this Parliament by a Conservative Government to erring Conservative members. But what did the Liberal party do? Have they been as careful, have they been guarding in an equal degree public interests? I need hardly remind the House of what they are doing in my own province. A few years ago the hon. member for Lincoln in the local House was unseated for corrupt practices, and, in the twinkling of an eye, the local legislature passed a whitewashing Act, which admitted of that gentleman coming right back into the legislature. The same thing was done in regard to Dr. Dowling, representing South Renfrew. Look at what was done in one of the Algoma elections. There was a returning officer so corrupt that he refused to accept the votes of honest electors by the score, and in that way the party succeeded in bringing about the return of the Liberal candidate, and, when these parties, thus deprived of their franchise, appealed to the courts, by bringing suit, then the Ontario Government came down with a measure that put an end to the suits, and they in consequence could not be proceeded with. These acts, I submit, are wrong in the extreme, yet we never hear any hon. gentleman opposite declaim against them. I need not take up the time of the House by referring to similar acts in the Quebec legislature, although I could do so.

Mr. LISTER. What about Muskoka and the frozen-whisky brigade? You might give us that.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. The frozen whisky only did harm to those who used it, but Apjohn did a wrong to innocent men who had a right to the franchise. That is the difference between the two. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been a whole month abusing the Conservative leaders in this House and in the other branch of the legislature. A while ago, they were manifesting sympathy towards the leader of the Government; to-day, they are acting in a manner deprecatory of his conduct. They say that prominent Liberal-Conservatives deserted the leader of the party, heartlessly and corruptly. They forget again the history of their party. They have only to go back a few years in order to see the Liberal party of this country drive from their ranks the Hon. Robert Baldwin by running a horse-jockey against him. The same party which to-day is declaring that the Conservatives are abusing their leader, deposed Alexander Mackenzie from their leadership in a most improper manner. And this very same party, by reason of the policy that they announced—perhaps they did it in all honesty, and in all parity of purpose—but which policy would have a most detrimental effect upon this country; they actually drove the Hon. Edward Blake out of Canada altogether, after they had practically if not actually deposed him from the leadership. It does not lie in the mouths of these men to say that Liberal-Conservatives are not true to their leadership. Sir, they have been true in the past, and they are true to-day—a little family quarrel is nothing at all. Let me draw your attention, Sir, to the fact that in the past the Liberal party have been a sectional party. Their policy in one province has been opposed to their policy in another province. For instance, it is not so long ago since Mr. Blake, then one of the leaders of the Liberal party, said: Let British Columbia go. That same party advocated a policy in the province of Ontario that would result, if carried out to perfection, in the annexation of this country to the United States. At the same time, the leaders of that party down by the sea advocated secession, and in the province of Quebec the religious and race cry was invoked. The difference between the Liberals and Conservatives is that we have always had a policy for the whole country, and the Liberals never had such a policy. In pursuance of our policy, the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, although the leader of the Liberal party, Hon.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY.

Alexander Mackenzie, said that all the resources of the British Empire could not build that road in ten years, yet this young country of ours built it in a little over half that time. In the same way, the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) declaimed in this House against the Trent Valley Canal and in strong terms he pronounced it to be a waste of public money. Sir, I am not in love with the Trent Valley Canal, simply because it runs through my constituency, but, let that canal be constructed, as it is now the purpose to construct it, let it unite the waters of the great lakes with the mighty St. Lawrence, and then what will the farmers of this country have? They will have their wheat transported from Port Arthur to Quebec for less money than it costs now to carry it by rail from Toronto to Montreal. That surely would be a boon to the farmers of this country. To use the language of the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) the other night, I believe that the Trent Valley Canal is one of the greatest public works that Canada has ever undertaken. But, it is all in line with the policy of the Conservative party. It is for the purpose of bringing the farmers of the North-west into sympathy with the farmers of Quebec and Ontario, and with the farmers of the maritime provinces. The same policy that enlarged our canals and built the Canadian Pacific Railway, is now advocating the building of the Trent Valley Canal. I sincerely trust, Sir, that whether the Liberals or the Conservatives be in power after the next general elections, that part of the Government policy at least will be carried to completion, as it is now proposed to carry it.

This afternoon, it was stated that the Conservatives were not a united party, and all through this debate the same thing has been asserted, time and again. Sir, we are a united party on the fiscal policy of the country. The Liberals are disunited altogether upon that. Then, Sir, take other matters of policy, whether it be the school question, remedial legislation, or any other policy, the Liberal party are hopelessly divided. These gentlemen opposite tell us that we from the province of Ontario cannot give an unbiased vote upon that question. Mr. Speaker, until I came to this national assembly, I never heard before in my life that the people of Ontario are not as liberal, in thought and in action as are the people of other provinces. Nowhere in the great province of Ontario can a word be heard to-day against a man being a leader in politics because of his religion. Sir, when, after Sir John Abbott's death, the Liberal-Conservative party were called upon to elect another leader, they with unbroken voice from the province of Ontario pointed with one acclaim and one accord to a man who differed from the great majority in religion; and so to-day you can go where you will throughout Ontario—and I believe

I represent in this House one of the most ultra-Protestant constituencies in that province—go where you will throughout the province of Ontario, and you hear no unkind word spoken of the hon. the leader of the Opposition because of his religion. I take this opportunity, here and now, to hurl back the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Conservative party are divided. Is remedial legislation distasteful to some? Why, we know it is to these hon. gentlemen on Opposition benches. How in the world can it be hoped that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), and the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), who is now joined with Major Mulvey—how is it to be hoped that they can agree upon a policy? Sir, we have Major Mulvey in the Manitoba legislature, saying that he would take up arms in order to prevent the policy of the Government of Canada going into force in his own province. Sir, if that party opposite contains the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), and Major Mulvey, how much more than that let me ask can any party be divided? I would advise hon. gentlemen opposite to look after their own household, and let ours alone on that point.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are adopting the rule: don't trouble us before our time.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. I hardly grasp the force of that remark. Mr. Speaker, what I wish to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to is this fact, that whatever difference there may be on this side of the House, if there be any, that is a question of conscience. I say that upon the general policy of the Government we are all united over here. Hon. gentlemen opposite are disunited. On that particular incident of government which brings about the question of remedial legislation, there may be differences of opinion here, as there certainly are over there. I wish, Sir, to repel the insinuation that there is any ultra-Protestant feeling in Ontario, that would not meet in fair argument, and by fair conduct, opponents of a religious school of thought different from ours. We do not want our French-Canadian fellow members of this House, whom we love and respect as much as we would if they came from Ontario—we do not want them to think there is any act of ours inspired by hatred to their religion or to the religion of any body of people.

I would not have spoken to-night but for the remarks of the hon. member for West Elgin. You see my remarks are disconnected, because I did not intend to speak. The hon. member for West Elgin said—and that is what prompted me to speak at all—that I represent a minority. That is what hurt my feelings. I do, however, in one sense represent a minority, Mr. Speaker, I believe it to be the duty of every man, once he is the choice of the people, to represent the majority and minority alike; and, in that sense, I do represent, I hope, in some small measure, at least, even the minority of my constituency.

One word more, Mr. Speaker, and I have done. I have taken exception to the language used by the hon. member for West Elgin, in speaking of one whom we young Conservatives have learned to respect and revere these forty years. I should have thought that the hon. member, and, indeed, every hon. member of the Opposition, would have gladly welcomed to this House once again the hon. baronet who represents Cape Breton. I cannot see why they should turn their batteries upon him, unless it be that they think he is going to work injury to them. I should have thought that a man who had been honoured by his Queen as that hon. gentleman has been honoured, a man who has been honoured by the people of his own province as he has been honoured for forty years, ought to be a man who would give character even to the House of Commons of Canada. We dislike very much to hear the language hurled across the floor of this House that was to-day hurled against that hon. gentleman, although he was not in his seat at the time. I hope that, whatever our differences may be, we can afford to speak of one another in kindly language, as we learn to know one another better; and let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we Conservatives, at least, whatever treatment may be meted out to us in that respect, will speak of the hon. leader of the Opposition and his lieutenants with the respect they deserve—because they in some considerable measure do deserve the respect of the people. I would be sorry indeed to think that the men of character were only to be found in the Liberal-Conservative party. I would be sorry to think that the men coming to this national assembly from away down by the sea, from Quebec and the maritime provinces, were not worthy of respect, alike with us from Ontario. I think it ought to be our pride to know that it is only men of character who get here at all, whether they come as Liberals, as Conservatives, or as Patrons. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me assure the hon. member for West Elgin, and others who asked me the question this afternoon, that we on this side of the House are quite contented with our leaders. We know that we have been led ably in the past. We know that for a quarter of a century old Sir John Macdonald safely piloted the ship of state through many a tempestuous political sea. We know that he did his work well. When he passed away, he was followed successively by two great men, who led the Conservative party in the same able manner. Both of these are now dead; and to-day we have at the head of the Government of this country a man whose political life is pure, and who has ably administered one of the greatest departments of Government. That

hon. gentleman has to-day the affection and support of the whole Liberal-Conservative party of this country; and, Sir, whether his leadership be long or short, we know not, but this we do know, that, if the time should come for him to step down and out of that place, we have one to succeed him, to whom we, as Liberal-Conservatives, can, in a political sense, all bend the knee and loyally support.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think I may fairly congratulate the hon. gentleman (Mr. McGillivray) upon one thing, at least—that, under circumstances somewhat depressing, with almost empty benches and no very enthusiastic audience, he has managed to bring to the discussion of this question a very considerable amount of energy and apparent enthusiasm. Perhaps, his disconnected remarks, as he terms them, might be pardoned, from the fact that the discussion upon this Budget has been somewhat exhaustive during the past four or five weeks; and, if the hon. gentleman has not said anything new, it may be that there was not very much new to be said. But, if he said nothing new, he has certainly delivered himself of one or two startling statements, to which, I think, I ought to call his attention. The hon. gentleman says that he was elected in North Ontario because he was able to tell the sturdy farmers of that constituency, that the Conservative Government had, in the first place, given them a free breakfast table. This catch phrase is sometimes used to trap the unwary; and, when I heard the hon. gentleman make the statement to-night, I wondered if he had paused for a moment to think what he was saying. A free breakfast table! If the hon. gentleman had taken up the tariff which was under his hand, he would have seen that, far from it making the breakfast table of the poor man free, from the time he sits down till he rises there is not a single article, with the exception of tea and coffee, that he can call free at all. While the hon. gentleman was speaking, I amused myself by running over a few of these articles.

An hon. MEMBER. The table-cloth.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You can take anything you like. Baking powder is taxed; rice is taxed about 74 per cent.

Mr. HAZEN. Not at breakfast.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman finds that very amusing; but I can show him plenty of families who use rice at breakfast. Oatmeal, flour, cornmeal, cocoa, earthenware and china of all kinds, table-cloths, napkins, table cutlery, of all kinds, fruits of all kinds, the different kinds of meat and fish—everything that is used on the table is taxed from 20 per cent up to 74 per cent.

An hon. MEMBER. Sugar.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, sugar also. I need not go through all the items. Now, will

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY.

the hon. gentleman tell me what single article there is on the breakfast table, outside of tea and coffee—and these only when they come from the country of production—that is free?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. I used the term in general.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman used the term in general, when, as a matter of fact, there is not a single thing on the table that is not taxed up to the hilt.

An hon. MEMBER. Cold water.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My hon. friend behind me calls my attention to the fact, that one of nature's bounties has so far escaped taxation—that is, water, whether boiled or cold. How long it may remain so, I do not know. But I ask the hon. gentleman, who obtained his seat in this House on false pretenses of that kind, for goodness' sake, to go back to his constituents and hand it back to them. Then the hon. gentleman, in drawing a very impassioned picture of the unity that exists between Canadians and Americans, said that they had everything in common. Why, he says that their flag is one in common with ours. True, he says, they have added a few stars and stripes to it, but that does not prevent the two being in common. Well, Mr. Speaker, I never knew there was anything in common between the two flags, except that both countries tax the cotton used in each pretty severely. Apart from common taxation, I do not see anything in common between the two flags. Then the hon. gentleman asked, in triumphant tones, where is the hon. gentleman who can point out a combine which has existed in Canada under the National Policy? Did the hon. gentleman ever hear of the nail combine? of the cordage combine? of the sugar combine?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman misunderstood what I said. I said a combine that bore hardly upon the people.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am quite willing to accept that. I am going over the combines, and before I resume my seat, if the hon. gentleman will favour me with his attention, I will convince him that these combines bear most heavily upon what is called the common people, and it is because they bear upon the people, and not upon the classes, that they are permitted to exist. If they bore hardly upon the classes and not the masses, the classes would remove them out of the way in a very short time.

Then the hon. gentleman capped the climax by telling us, in the sixth week of the debate, that he has not yet been able to discover any platform which the Liberal party has at all, except it may be free trade as they have it in England. I ask him, as a young member of the House whether he would not do better for himself and his constituency if he would be a little more guarded and prudent in his statements, because every one knows that the statement he has made is silly. Why, the Liberal party met in convention only three years ago, and laid down a policy consisting of some nine or ten planks, to which they agreed unanimously. That has since been published all through the country, and because some silly utterances were delivered here, before the hon. gentleman spoke, of a similar character as those to which I am now calling attention, some of my hon. friends behind me took the precaution of reading that platform from beginning to end, plank after plank.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. They have changed it since.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That platform has never been changed. There does not exist a power in this country that can change it, except the power that made it. The Liberal party, in convention assembled, determined upon that platform; and neither the leader of the party, whom we respect, nor any leading man in the party, has power to change or alter that platform one iota, except with the consent of those who made it. And I ask the hon. gentleman is it fair, is it just, that at a time when the Budget debate is in progress, and when we are trying, upon each side of the House, to find out what are the distinctive issues which divide the parties, so that we may discuss those distinctive issues, I ask is it fair to try and cloud the argument by telling the country that there are no issues at all. Now, I am not going to shirk the fact that the Liberal-Conservative party have a distinct, clear, and definite policy. I do not want to put up a man of straw and knock it down, but I am going to challenge the policy of that party, as its leaders have enunciated it, and the party have accepted it. I ask you to do us the same measure of justice. Our policy has been formulated in language so clear and distinct that it cannot be misinterpreted. That policy has never been altered. I ask you, if you differ from it, to point out in what respect it is wrong, but do not set up a policy to which the Liberal party never agreed, and, having successfully knocked that down, call upon your neighbours to admire you as an exceedingly clever fellow.

The hon. gentleman took some time in treating us to a lecture on the comparative unity which prevails in the Conservative party. In the light of recent events, I think we might have been spared that, but if it does him and those around him any good, we will let him enlarge upon that point with all the unction which the hon. gentleman possess, and will not notice it at all.

Let me draw attention, for a moment, to the policy of the two parties. The hon. gentleman followed a plan which has been adopted by older and more experienced politicians than he, of reading, from time to time, detached statements made by members of the Liberal party, five, ten, fifteen, and some twenty years ago. I do not know what he wanted to prove except that these men were not thoroughly consistent, throughout all these years, in the political policy they advocated. Well, I would not give very much for a man who, for twenty long years, amidst all the changing scenes of political life in Canada, was able to say, I have never wavered from the policy which I laid down when a boy. Wise men frequently change their opinions; it is a common saying that fools rarely do. If a man becomes convinced, after reaching years of maturity, that the opinions he held in his callow youth were not just and right, I would not give much for him if he had not the moral courage to announce his change of heart. Now, what is the Liberal policy? Summed up in a few words, it is to reduce the expenditure of the country to the lowest possible point consistent with an efficient service. You tell us that that cannot be done. Well, we have spent hour after hour on this side going into details and showing how it can be done. In reply to challenges which came from the other side, gentlemen on this side undertook the labour of pointing out the particular departments of the service in which money can be saved, and those are all upon record. We are ready to go to the country with that statement, on which we pledge ourselves, that very large and important reductions can be made in the expenditure of the country, without impairing the efficient administration of its affairs. But we say our policy, further, is to raise by customs taxes and excise duty all the money required to carry on governmental affairs, and we say that not a dollar of taxation shall be raised by the country directly, nor permitted to be raised indirectly, except it is for the Government's service. I can use the very words of our platform, namely, that the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service, as summing up what I have endeavoured to lay down the last moment or two. That is the Liberal policy. It provides for customs and excise duties sufficient to carry on the affairs of the country. It provides that all taxes collected shall go into the treasury, and it provides for a reduced expenditure by the Government.

What is the policy of the Government? If we can get down to a distinct issue between the two parties, we will have something tangible to present to the people and argue upon. I have such an abiding faith in the absolute justice of the policy of the Liberal party that I do not want to twist or turn it, or twist or turn the policy of my opponents. I am ready to discuss the two policies side by side in and out of this House. What is the policy of the Conservative party? It is to raise, in the first place, by customs and excise duties, as much money as is required to carry on the service of the country. But, over and beyond that and largely more important than that, to permit taxation to be levied by private persons for what they call the purposes of protection. Now, Sir, I am not going to ask my hon. friends' opposite to accept my statement for that. The policy of the Conservative party was formulated by the Finance Minister two or three years ago in carefully prepared language, language that could not be misunderstood. It has been re-affirmed from time to time, and it has never been challenged by any leading member of the Conservative party. It is embodied in the tariff which was then framed and which is to-day in existence, to the practical workings of which I shall call attention before I sit down, and that policy reads as follows. I am now quoting from the Finance Minister Budget speech of 1894 :

The arrangement of a tariff and the principle which is to be adopted has two aspects—it looks to the revenue which is required in a country, and it looks as well to the general trade and development of a country. I wish, at this early stage of my remarks upon this subject, to say that, so far as the revenue aspect is concerned, it is of infinitely less importance than the effect of the principle and the details of the tariff upon the trade and development of a country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen will see that the hon. Minister was not levying a tariff for the purpose of collecting taxes to carry on the affairs of the country—that, he says, is of infinitely less importance than the main object which he has in view. What is the main object which he has in view? The development of the trade of the country. How is he going to develop the trade of the country? By protecting it against inroads from outside. How is he going to protect it against inroads from outside? By taxing the foreign commodities and keeping them out. And so the primary object he has in view is the taxation of those commodities which the people require and the keeping of them out of the country. As a secondary and subsidiary object he proposes to raise money for the purpose of carrying on the Government of the country. Now the crucial point of difference, between the policy laid down by the Conservative party and the policy of the Liberals, is that the Liberals do not propose either to levy or to authorize other people to levy a single dollar of taxation for the purpose alone of developing any particular industry. They eliminate that principle entirely from their policy. They say: You are justified in levying taxation only for the purpose of raising sufficient revenue to carry on public affairs, and every dollar you levy or authorize to be levied beyond what is required to carry on the affairs of the country, is taken improperly and wrongfully from the pockets of the people. Now, I submit that that is, in a nutshell the difference between the two parties.

The Conservative policy has been in force sixteen or seventeen years. How has it worked out? Sir, I am not going to trouble this House with a vast mass of figures showing how the public debt has increased from 1878 until to-day. Everybody knows how our debt now stands—somewhere in the neighbourhood of $253,000,000. Hon. gentlemen will remember that, five or six years ago, a very distinguished and important member of the House called the serious attention of the House to the extraordinary and abnormal increase of our public debt, to the danger which threatened us if that debt continued to increase, and warned this House and this country against the danger that would follow if the process of increasing the public debt continued. I will venture to call your attention to a word or two that the Finance Minister said in his Budget speech in 1889. After telling us the liabilities that we had incurred and were then incurring, and showing what the debt of the country was, he went on :

So that, putting these two facts and these two sets of items together, my own opinion as a member of the Government; and it is an opinion in which I know I shall have all reasonable support from my colleagues in the Government in retaining and maintaining, is that, taking for granted that the condition of the country during the three years to come shall be equally prosperous with its condition to-day, should no extraordinary events arise to cause extraordinary expenses for the three years ending on the 30th June, 1892, we ought to meet our capital engagements, pay what we have to pay in the running expenses of the country, and add not one dollar to the net debt of the country. What I mean is this, if I have not made myself clear, that counting in the sinking fund investment, which is laid up as against gross debt, we ought in the next three years to meet all our capital engagements to the amount I have mentioned, and at the end of that time have no greater net debt than we shall have on the 1st July, 1889; and this is estimated on the basis of the tariff which we have to-day, without contemplating any increase in the tax rate. After 1892, with equal prosperity, with an increased population, and with consequently increased consumption and increased contributions to the revenue, on the same rate of tariff, I believe that, unless extraordinary events occur which call for extraordinary expenditure, this country ought to go on for a series of years without any increase of debt at all, providing for necessary capital expenditure and the services of the country out of the revenues which come in to make up the consolidated revenue of the country. That is my forecast, and one which I believe, if nothing intervenes of an unexpected character, will be fully carried out by the march of events.

And the next year he took occasion to recapitulate that statement in a few words. In the course of his Budget speech of 1890, he said :

I stated that last year that looking at the condition of the country, and looking at the munificent contributions which had been given by this country for her public works, and at the splendid equipment which Canada had by means of these contributions gained for herself, it seemed to me that we ought not, after the close of the year 1889, to increase the public debt, that we ought not to increase the public expenditure for ordinary purposes, and, that it was possible by a prudent course, without stinting the public service in any way, to carry on this service in a generous manner, to meet the capital obligations which we had already assumed, and to go to the year 1892 without adding to our net debt. After that it seemed to me that we might well take into consideration whether or not we could not gradually decrease the amount of the debt which we had assumed and placed upon ourselves.

So, the hon. gentleman, making provision for all the public works then in contemplation, calculated that for the next six or seven years not a dollar should be added to the public debt, and that after six or seven years we should begin to cut that debt down. Now, I wish to call the attention of the hon. Finance Minister to the facts as compared with his prediction and see where we stand. In the year 1889 the public debt was a little over $237,500,000. There was to be no increase but rather a reduction up to this year, according to the hon. gentleman's statement reaffirmed over and over again. As a matter of fact he has increased the public debt since then by nearly $16,000,000. This is in addition to enormous sums which he has taken from the public by increased taxation. This latter statement, of course, he will deny. But the main statement as to the increase of the debt is not denied and cannot be denied, for it is shown by the public accounts themselves.

And, instead of the expenditure during that time being reduced as the hon. gentleman promised, we find that since 1889 it has increased by several millions of dollars. So that while the expenditure was under 37 millions in that year, it was over 38 millions the last year.

Now, at this very time we have the ex-Minister of Justice, with these facts staring him in the face, standing up and declaring that he for one is not disposed to limit the debt where it stands to-day. He is ready to plunge Canada into large expenditures, and he thinks the time has come when the expenditure of this country, instead of being 36 or 37 or 38 millions, should go up and become 40 millions. The hon. gentleman is not in his place to-night, but I would like to ask him what portion of this community does he propose to wring the extra two and a half millions out of. I do not know how it may be elsewhere, but last night we heard the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) declare that never, in his long and varied commercial experience, had the times been as hard, or the depression as great, and the people as poor, as they are to-day in this part of the world. I think I can say without hesitation that that state of facts exists, and has existed, for several years in the maritime provinces; and I am told by those who come from the metropolitan cities of Toronto and Montreal that not for a decade have times been anything like as bad or as dark as they are to-day. But still, Sir, we find leading men in the Conservative party, who have violated their promises and their pledges to the people with regard to the public debt, who have increased it nearly 16 millions during the last seven or eight years, standing up here and declaring, and that on the eve of an election, that they propose to plunge this country into debt still further, and largely to increase the public expenditure besides.

Well, Sir, I was reading in the London "Times" the other day a little warning upon this matter of expenditure, which I will ask the House to allow me to read because it is very apropos, and shows when you once have run the expenditure up, the difficulty of getting it down. The financial critic in the "Times," of January 20th of this year, I think it is, writes:

Increase of expenditure is nearly always permanent with nations as with individuals. New indulgences speedily come to be regarded as necessities, and each instantly creates a little army of interested partisans ready to fight for it to the death. Every claim upon the exchequer successfully established in a year of plenty, practically has to be met in a year of impoverishment. The daughter of the horseleech is not so insatiable as local interests or industries that have once learned to look to the state to atone for lack of enterprise, initiative and adaptation to changing circumstances.

These are wise words, and I wish they could have some weight with hon. gentlemen who to-day propose largely to increase the expenditure of the country. Now, I think a mistake is made very frequently in attributing to the policy which prevails in any one country the trade depression or the good times which may from time to time exist. The policy does not necessarily make the good times, and does not necessarily cause depression, though it may accentuate and aggravate both. But a most singular ignorance appears to exist in this House, or is assumed at any rate, as to the existence of good or bad times in the mother country or in Canada.

We hear hon. gentlemen talk about the condition of affairs in England, and talk about the effects of the free trade policy there, and talk about the desire of the Liberal party to revert to that trade policy as their policy, and talk as if England to-day was on the downward grade, and as if depression marked every branch of her industries. Why, Mr. Speaker, I never knew more deplorable ignorance about anything than exists, or is expressed at least, in this House with regard to the effects of the trade system which England adopted many years ago. Hon. gentlemen state from time to time that England never dared to adopt free trade until she had built up her manufactures by a system of protection, and after she had built them up and made them strong, then, and not till then, did she introduce the principle of free trade. That talk is all nonsense. England had no such thing as manufactures, such as we now understand by that term, when she had her protective system. England had no such thing as a foreign trade, such as we understand it now, when she had the system of protection. There was nothing but stagnation in those days; and when people talk about protection and free trade, they must remember that free trade was not introduced in England in the year 1846, but was begun to be introduced as early as 1822. Now, let me read a statement to you from a valuable book which I hold in my hand as to the condition of matters in England some years ago, at the period to which I am referring. Mr. Bowley, who published a book called "England's Foreign Trade in the 19th Century," a book from which I had the honour to quote last year, and a book which took the prize at the Cambridge University among a large number of essays written on the same subject, says, on page 46:

It was not the theory of free trade, but the practical need that impelled the London and Edinburgh merchants to petition, in 1820, against every restrictive regulation of trade not essential to the revenue. A commission was appointed in response to these petitions, and they found that as regards revenue there were an infinite number of petty duties serving no purpose but to hinder trade, and laid down the fundamental principle that: "Commerce must be a source of reciprocal amity between nations, and an interchange of productions to promote the industry, the wealth and happiness of mankind," and, "if we should be compelled to continue any of the present restrictions.....it will be understood.....that it is a matter not of option, but of necessity, and not caused by any ideas on our part of promoting our own commercial interests by it."

This commission was appointed in 1820. The Corn Laws were not repealed till 1846; for though the case had been thus clearly stated, and the opinion of experts given, the confusion of the country after the war and the one-sided views that distress generates clouded the issue; different claims were raised by classes with conflicting interests, and amid the uproar the old-established monopolies only yielded their ground step by step.

Newmarch's description of our fiscal system in 1820 is as follows:—"At that time the system of prohibition, protection and fiscal confusion was at its height. It was said by competent authorities that the number of Acts of Parliament relating to the entry, export and custody of goods as matters of custom-house supervision, was not less than 1,500. All the special interests were in full possession of the vested rights to which they laid claim. There was the Corn Law of 1815; there were the differential duties in favour of the West India proprietors; the monopoly of the East India Company; the rigorous application of the navigation laws against competition on freights. There were heavy duties on raw materials of industry, and prohibitive or extravagant duties on foreign manufactures.

Mr. Speaker, that was the condition of matters as pictured by this writer and by Newmarch in 1820. Now, I will read one more paragraph, with your permission, as to the condition of matters at that time in Great Britain:

Let us now glance at the state of England at the end of the 18th century, bearing in mind that the changes from that to her present condition would have been impossible without foreign trade. There were practically no manufactures, in our present sense of the word, no ships to carry great increments of goods, no foreign demand for them, no admission to other countries; the products of machinery were known by our ancestors of three generations ago as little as to savage races now.

Now, I commend these statements of one of the best writers in Great Britain of the present day, to those gentlemen who assumed that before England adopted the principle of free trade she had thoroughly built up and established her manufactures. He goes on to say:

The population of Great Britain and Ireland was 16 millions in 1801; in 1892, it was 38 millions. Total imports and exports were 37 million pounds in 1791; in 1891, there were 744 million pounds. At the same time the average income per head has increased greatly. In fact, in the 18th century foreign trade was of so little importance to the majority of the inhabitants of England, that with one important exception the whole of it might have been destroyed without making any appreciable change in the habits or wealth of the people; the rich would have been deprived of some luxuries, the poor of very few, a small class of traders would have been affected, and an unimportant branch of revenue destroyed, but no other result would have followed.

So you will see that the introduction of machinery into Great Britain was co-incident with the introduction of free trade, and the combination of the new inventions and the machinery which was introduced, and the free trade which was also introduced and gave free play to the working of the system, enabled the trade of Great Britain to increase from 37 million pounds in the beginning of the century until it was, in 1891, 744 million pounds.

I may remark at the same time that a curious and very valuable diagram attached to this book by the learned writer shows that while this extraordinary increase has taken place in the total volume of the commerce and trade of that country, during the whole time from the beginning of the century till 1845, when free trade was fully established, the per capita increase was almost nil, and that it was only from 1845, when free trade in its entirety came in, the per capita trade of the country rose from about five or six pounds per head until in 1890 it exceeded 20 pounds per head of the population. I do not want to weary the House with any further extracts on these points, but I thought I might give them in justice to the argument which I advanced, and because they exhibit the precise facts which are at variance with what hon. gentlemen assume from time to time to be true.

How do we stand to-day, comparing Canada with England? While we have deficits, they are embarrassed with surpluses, and I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-day has upon his hands as the result of last year's operations a surplus of $30,000,000, or £6,000,000 sterling. While we have depression, they are enjoying an expansion of trade and a return to the good old times. I took the "Times" newspaper the other day, which reviewed the trade of the previous year, 1895, and I found in giving a summary of trade the newspaper said:

If the agricultural depression were removed there would be an all-round prosperity, but the home harvest having proved disastrous, and prices being generally complained of, centres depending upon agricultural support have not had the benefit others have already experienced. With encouraging railway and board of trade returns, together with the improved conditions shown by the absence of failures of any serious importance, and evidence of more careful trading, if the present political disturbances are removed a fair development of the revived prosperity already established is probable, as prices of all commodities are still at a low or reasonable prices, food products are cheap, and no fears are now entertained of any immediate fiscal changes in America or the East which will disturb the basis traders are now operating on.

In the same article it says:

A year ago the feeling was distinctly evident that the cycle of adverse years had given place to a more prosperous era, and the experience of 1895 has fully justified this, as in many trades the improvement then being felt has become more marked, and in some a return to the activity of the "good old times" has been recorded. The previous depression continued to some extent early in the year, but before midsummer this had given place to a marked revival in the leading industries, the metal, woollen, and cotton markets showing more rapid development than traders have of late been accustomed to.

While we have in that condition of matters a return to the good old times in Great Britain in all trades, mentioned one after the other, how is it in Canada? Well, Sir, I am not going to repeat what I have said before. We have heard the evidence of leading merchants and statements made by other parties in Canada, but one and all unite in this fact, that never before in the history of Canada was the outlook poorer or times harder than they are to-day.

The Minister of Finance tries to minimize the damaging evidence of the facts of increased debt and taxation which I have cited by quoting the average rate of customs duties and taxes for the five years when the Mackenzie Government was in power, and comparing them with the rate of taxation during the past year. That is a very favourite method adopted by the hon. gentleman. He takes a single year which suits his purpose, or a cycle of years. He has in this instance taken the lowest year for fifteen years, when there was a deficit of $4,000,000, and compared that with five years of the Mackenzie regime, and he declared that the rate of customs taxation is very little more than it was then. I submit that is a most unfair and unjust way to make a comparison. If the hon. gentleman wants to make a comparison, let him take ten years or the average of the past ten years, and ascertain what the average per capita of customs taxation has been in Canada, and he will find that instead of $3.42, it is $4.45, or $1 increase per capita customs taxation over that prevailing under Mr. Mackenzie's rule, and that on 5,000,000 of population means $5,000,000 a year, which tallies with the actual result. In 1895 we raised by customs taxation $17,800,000, but only $12,700,000 in 1878, which shows an increase during that period of about $5,000,000. That is a fact which I verify and prove by taking the average per capita for the past ten years, and the result shows that taxation for customs amounts to $4.45 per head. But I am not going to dwell on these figures.

The hon. gentleman referred to the shipping interest, and he drew a conclusion to this effect, that the amount of tonnage calling at our ports in Canada for the past years has gone on increasing from year to year. I thought if there was a branch of industry to which the hon. gentleman ought not to have called attention it was the ship-building and ship-owning industry. As a matter of fact, ship-building, which, years ago, was a most valuable industry, has to-day become practically extinct. I do not charge that the National Policy has been directly and solely responsible for this. There were other causes in operation which went to reduce and destroy the ship-building industry, but as a matter of fact, I say that the National Policy was a factor in the destruction of the industry, and an important factor, too. As a matter of fact, what do the figures show? In 1864 we built $6,000,000 worth of tonnage; in 1894 only $750,000. Between 1873 and 1878, our registered tonnage in the maritime provinces alone increased $5,000,000 in value. Between 1878 and 1894 the value decreased by $11,000,000. During the past twelve years, since 1884, the total tonnage of the maritime provinces has decreased nearly one-half, or, to speak accurately, by 400,000 tons. But, said Mr. Foster,—I am quoting his words:

We have come through the period of 1890-95 with increased shipping returns. The tonnage of vessels coming in and out of our ports, not including coasting vessels, has increased in that period by 640,000 tons.

The fact is true. The hon. gentleman has stated the fact correctly, but I should like to ask if that is a matter of unmixed congratulation on the part of Canada. It is not so when the facts come to be analyzed. The sea-going vessels, inward and outward, in 1878 showed 6,684,384 tons. In 1895 the tonnage was 10,976,829, but of this only 2,000,000 tons were Canadian; and of the 3,600,000 tons of freight Canadian bottoms carried a good deal less than one-fifth; accurately speaking, they carried 18 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent of the sea-borne freight and employed 112,000 men out of 430,000. So it comes down to this, that 80 per cent of the sea-borne Canadian freight is carried by foreigners and 20 per cent is carried by Canadian bottoms. In 1878 we carried 30 per cent, and that proportion is being reduced nearly every year. The total tonnage coming in and going out of our ports increased from 6,500,000 tons in 1878 to 11,000,000 in 1895, or an increase of over 4,000,000 tons, whilst our Canadian tonnage remained stationary, the increase being all in the foreign ships. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is not a matter upon which we can congratulate ourselves, but it is rather the reverse. The increased tonnage came to our ports and carried away increased quantities of freight, but all the profits have gone to foreign ships, and not to Canadian ships.

Sir, we object to the policy of the Government, which I have outlined, because, while it increases the taxes enormously, we say, that those taxes paid into the treasury bear but a small proportion to the taxes actually paid by the people. I made a careful estimate last year—and I verified it again this year—on the basis of population, of the actual taxes collected each year since 1878, and I say that the figures show that over \$100,000,000 more have been collected under the present National Policy system than would have been collected if Mr. Mackenzie's 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent tariff had been continued. My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) made an estimate, in which he made allowances for this, and allowances for that, and he said he estimated it under the mark, so as to leave no room for controversy at all, and I think he brought it down somewhere in the neighbourhood of \$75,000,000. I believe, Sir, he made allowances which it was unjust to make, and it is no use making unjust allowances, because you can be as unfair one way as the other. I say, taking it carefully and accurately, and just charging the actual taxation over and above what Mackenzie's tax would have yielded, and making allowances for the increase of population, this tariff of the present Government has taken \$100,000,000 more out of the people of this country than Mr. Mackenzie's tariff would have taken if it had continued in force. That is the amount which goes into the treasury alone. Now, Mr. Foster says that the collection of this tax for the treasury is, under the National Policy, of infinitely less importance than the question of developing the industries of the country. That means that the main object of the National Policy is so to arrange it that people are compelled to buy home-made goods and that the taxes paid into the treasury shall be a small proportion only of the taxes exacted from the people. Last year, I undertook to prove that statement by going into details, and showing the proportions of taxation that were collected for the treasury, on cottons, sugar, rice, iron, and a number of other articles. I do not propose to weary the House with similar calculations, but I will call attention to one fact, in order to emphasize my argument.

In 1895 we imported, in round figures, \$4,200,000 worth of cotton, and, with a duty of 28 per cent, we paid upon that, \$1,200,000. But, if we can accept the statements made by the cotton manufacturers and embodied in our census returns, about \$13,000,000 worth of cotton was manufactured in Canada, and, at the same rate of taxation, there was paid upon the cotton manufactured in this country, \$3,600,000. That is about the proportion which the National Policy exacts from the people, and relegates to the treasury and to the pockets of the favoured few; \$1,200,000 goes to the treasury, and \$3,600,000 is paid by the people, which never reaches the treasury at all, but goes into the pockets of the Canadian manufacturers. And just the same argument applies to sugar. I wish to call attention to a statement made in this House last night by a gentleman who is supposed to be an expert in this matter. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), who is largely interested, as he told us, in the sugar refineries of the maritime provinces, said (and I took his words down carefully) that he ventured to say that the Canadian people got their sugar as cheaply as any people in the world. That was a most extraordinary statement, coming from the hon. gentleman. I deny it. I say it is not correct. I myself this morning got some of the prices current of sugar in Liverpool, England, on February 7th last, only a few weeks ago. I find by these prices, that good yellow sugar—better sugar than what they call good yellow in Canada—cost 13s. 9d., less 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, which means \$2.91 per 100 pounds.

Mr. HAZEN. Is that what we call brown sugar in this country?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No; fair yellow sugar; a good yellow sugar.

Mr. HAZEN. That is not as high a grade as white sugar.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not being an expert, and for fear I should make a mistake, I applied to one of the largest grocers in Canada on this point, and he said that the sugar which I am now quoting the price of is a better sugar than the sugar which is called good yellow, and sold here. Now, what did the same kind of sugar sell for in Canada on the same day, namely, the 7th of this month? The same sugar which cost \$2.91 per 100 pounds in England, cost \$3.75 in Canada, a difference of 84 cents per 100 pounds; and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Stairs) tells me that the Canadian people get their sugar as cheaply as do the people of any other country in the world. If the fact was as the member for Halifax stated, there would be no need for a tariff to keep out the foreign sugar. If you can refine sugar and sell it as cheaply as they do in England, why do you keep a tariff on it of about two-thirds of a cent per pound? Although a smaller duty is put on raw sugar now, yet the duty on refined sugar has been raised, so as to leave the rate of protection just as it was before. You have $\frac{2}{3}$ of a cent per pound protection on sugar now, and almost up to that point do the sugar refiners of Canada charge the people extra for their sugar.

Mr. HAZEN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Is he making any allowance for the cost of bringing that sugar here from Great Britain, and is he making any allowance for the fact that the white granulated sugar here is put up in new packages which are more expensive than the packages in which yellow and brown sugar are put up?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman does not understand my argument. I do not make any allowance for the cost of bringing the sugar here. That is not necessary for the statement I am rebutting. The statement I wish to rebut is the statement made by my hon. friend for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) that the Canadian people get their sugar as cheaply as do the people in any country in the world. I say it is not true. I say that the English people get their sugar nearly a cent a pound cheaper than our people do.

Mr. HAZEN. The hon. gentleman's (Mr. Davies) statement would be more satisfactory if he would make a comparison between white sugars, and not between white sugar on the one hand, and yellow sugar on the other.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I quoted the prices of what I am told by my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) is refined yellow. The quotations I read were given me from the Montreal house this morning. I knew the hon. gentleman (Mr. Stairs) was wrong, because I had made inquiries last year, but I wanted to be fortified with the quotations of the current market prices within the last fortnight, and I gave the hon. gentleman (Mr. Stairs) the quotations of Gillespie & Co., of Liverpool, for February 7th, and the quotations of the Montreal market for the same day.

Mr. HAZEN. Has the hon. gentleman got there, the price of granulated sugar in Great Britain?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not see that any sugar is sold in England under the name of granulated.

Mr. HAZEN. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) tells me that there are tons and tons of it sold there as granulated sugar.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am dealing with the current prices given by Gillespie & Co., of Liverpool, and not with what the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Stairs) tells the hon. member (Mr. Hazen). This reads:

Brown or low grades, f.o.b., less $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per cwt., 11s. to 12s. Fair to good yellow, f.o.b., less $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per cwt., 12s. 3d. to 13s. 9d. Fine yellow to white, f.o.b., less $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per cwt., 14s. 6d. to 16s.

These embrace all the sugars which I am told the English people use. As I say, Mr. Speaker, we are charged $\frac{1}{2}$ a cent a pound on raw sugar and 14-100 cent per pound on refined sugar, under the revised tariff, so that we still retain the 64-100 of a cent per pound of protection to the refiner; that is nearly $\frac{2}{3}$ of a cent per pound. Now calculate what that comes to on the quantity consumed in Canada, namely, about 250,000,000 pounds a year, and you will see it means \$1,500,000 which the people of this country pay in taxes to the sugar refiners. If we were allowed to import the English sugar to-day free of duty, the consumers of sugar in this country would save about \$1,500,000 a year, which is the amount that is improperly transferred to the pockets of the sugar refiners.

Then, the hon. gentleman went on to say, in reply to a statement made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) as to the profits which it appeared on the face of the returns the sugar refiners made, that the hon. member for North Wellington was mistaken. "Why," said the hon. gentleman, "I tell the House that the refiners only pay 6 per cent upon the original investment." What has the original investment got to do with it? The people who own the refineries now did not make the original investment. The original investment has been lost; and the complaint we make against this National Policy is that the original investments, not only in sugar, but in cotton and other favoured industries, have been sunk, lost and destroyed. Sir, the question is not what they are paying on the original investment, but whether the hon. member for North Wellington was right when he said that they are paying 22 odd per cent upon their own investments. The hon. member for Halifax undertook to show that my hon. friend from North Wellington had omitted certain things from his estimate, such as charcoal, barrels, and so on. Well, Sir, I do not think he is right, though I am not going to discuss a technical point of that kind with him—because I think that if he examines the statement made by the hon. member for North Wellington he will find that these articles are all included in the raw materials.

Mr. STAIRS. They are not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Charcoal is as much a raw material as sugar, and so is the barrel. Now, I will show the hon. gentleman how he proved too much. He said: "Those articles were not taken into consideration by the member for Wellington, and if you take them into consideration, you will find that the refiners, instead of making 22 per cent, have lost 12 per cent." Is that true? Will the hon. gentleman venture to say that they have lost 12 per cent? Why, Sir, the thing is childish and ridiculous.

Mr. STAIRS. I quite admit that it is not correct. I say that by those census returns you cannot prove anything.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps the hon. gentleman is right, that you cannot prove anything from the census returns. But he undertook to show that my hon. friend from Wellington was wrong because he had omitted charcoal and barrels from the calculation, and he says: "If you include charcoal and barrels, I will prove that the refiners lost 12 per cent." The fact that they did not lose 12 per cent shows that the deduction should not have been made.

Mr. STAIRS. I did not say that at all. I said that the basis taken by the hon. member for Wellington would prove that the refiners had lost 12 per cent; but I did not say that they had lost 12 per cent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, the hon. gentleman did not say they had. What he said was that if those items were deducted from the statement of the hon. member for Wellington, as they ought to be, the result would be a loss of 12 per cent instead of a gain of 22 per cent, which, I say, proves that the hon. gentleman is wrong in his assumption.

Mr. STAIRS. No, it does not prove any such thing.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The result shows that they would lose 12 per cent if the deduction were made; but the fact is that they did not lose 12 per cent, and therefore the deduction should not have been made.

Now, let me say something in regard to another article akin to sugar, to show the gross and grievous injustice this tariff works. Take the article of rice. When the Finance Minister reformed his tariff a couple of years ago, he referred specially to rice. It had been pointed out time and again with what grievous injustice that tax bore upon people who used rice, and the Finance Minister said that on cleaned rice the rate would not exceed 30 per cent; and the House was induced to agree to the tariff he then proposed, upon that statement made by him. But what is the fact? I take up the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I find that in 1895 we entered for home consumption of cleaned rice 5,876,856 pounds, valued at \$98,849, on which we paid a duty of $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents a pound, amounting to \$73,466. Now, what rate of duty does this show that we paid on cleaned rice? Was it 30 per cent, as the hon. gentleman said it would be? No, Sir, but $74\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. But, Sir, why are we asked to pay that exorbitant rate of duty? If you turn to the next entry you will see why. There was imported of uncleaned rice, or paddy, 22,772,306 pounds, valued at \$199,620, on which we paid duty at the rate of 3-10ths cents a pound, or \$68,933. On that uncleaned rice the protected millers were enabled to tax the people of Canada about \$270,000. That is, to exact that much from the consumers to whom they sold by virtue of the tariff of $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents a pound, which kept out foreign cleaned rice, they made the people buy the rice they cleaned, and upon that they were enabled to charge them $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents a pound, less the 3-10ths cent a pound duty they paid themselves. They took from the people the \$270,000, less the \$68,000 which they paid on the uncleaned rice, leaving \$200,000 which the people of this country paid in tribute to the rice hullers. That may be a small matter, but it is one of the most iniquitous features of a very iniquitous tariff. It is based on the principle so often stated by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that for one dollar you pay into the treasury, you pay two dollars or more into the pockets of the protected manufacturers. What gentleman will pretend to defend that exaction, that iniquity?

Then, take the article which the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) is more particularly interested in. Take cordage, on which there is a customs tax of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound and 10 per cent, which is equal to $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound on rope. What is the effect of that? The effect is practically to exclude all foreign cordage from this country, and to enable cordage manufacturers to form a combine. The effect was to enable that combine to go and buy up the small factories in St. John and Quebec. They did buy them up for the purpose suppressing all home competition as far as they could, and after they had bought them up, they maintained their monopoly of the market, so that to-day there is not a man in Canada who dares to sell a pound of cordage except by the will and the permission of the hon. gentleman opposite, the president of the Consumers' Cordage Combine. I make the statement deliberately; there is no wholesale buyer who can purchase a pound of cordage except by the hon. gentleman's will or who can sell it except at prices which the hon. gentleman dictates. The tariff which the Finance Minister has framed effectually precludes any competition from abroad; and the hon. gentleman, acting in a combine with the Kingston Cordage Company, Alexander Main & Co., of Hamilton, and the Continental Twine Company of Toronto and Brantford, takes precious good care that not a man in Canada can buy a pound of cordage from them unless he signs a written agreement that he will only sell that cordage to the public at the price fixed in the list they give him.

Mr. HAZEN. What has become of the Patrons' Factory at Brantford?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think it makes rope at all.

Mr. HAZEN. I thought you spoke of twine.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I spoke of rope. Now, Mr. Speaker, as the fact was challenged by the hon. gentleman who preceded me that there are no combines in this country at all in consequence of the National Policy tariff, let me call his attention to this most iniquitous combine. Let me call his attention to this most iniquitous combine. I hold the documents in my hand here, headed Montreal, Kingston, Hamilton, Toronto and Brantford, and dated 1st January, 1896. They are marked "confidential." Here is the agreement :

COMBINE AGREEMENT.

Brantford.

We hereby agree to sustain the above and adhere to all the conditions therein named, waiving any and all right to premium in case of violation.

Premium on January purchases, payable on 31st July, etc., etc., etc.

Along with that there is the list of prices ; and for the ordinary commercial cordage that is used everywhere from our fishermen down to the woman who hangs up her clothes line, 9 cents per pound is the established price ; and all the man gets who sells it is his 3 per cent, and he dare not buy a pound outside of Canada or a pound inside of Canada except from this combine. This is a most iniquitous slavery to which they have reduced the people of Canada. By what means ? Simply because the Finance Minister has, by his policy, played into their hands, and enabled these combines to rob the people in this way. Why, when I tell you that these very gentlemen go down to Newfoundland and the Island of St. Pierre and sell to the fishermen there, under the noses of our fishermen, for 1½ and 1¾ cents a pound less than our fishermen can buy at, then I have shown you that the cup of their iniquity is full. Yet still we find men in this Parliament who have the courage to stand up in the face of damning pieces of evidences such as I have read, and shout for the party and support the National Policy. Have I proved to the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) the existence of combines in their most iniquitous forms ?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman has not proved what I asked. I asked where were the combines that bore hardly upon the people as the result of the National Policy ? Now, I would ask the hon. gentleman whether there is not a coal combine, although coal comes into this country free ? He cannot prove that the coal combine is the result of the National Policy ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Have I not shown the hon. gentleman that the National Policy, by means of this tax on foreign cordage, excludes foreign competition? Have I not show him that these cordage companies bought up the small factories, that they have thus become the only cordage companies in Canada, and that they have entered into an agreement by which you cannot buy a pound of rope except from them and at their prices. Does the hon. gentleman want more? Why there never was a case so proved up to hilt?

Mr. HAZEN. Are there not combines in free trade England?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If there are, they must exist under conditions which render them the least profitable. Free trade minimizes the possibility of a combine being successful. The very thing which justifies or causes the existence of a combine is the exclusion of foreign competition.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. What about coal? That is free, and look at the combine we have in coal.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not quite understand the hon. gentleman?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. I think that the most iniquitous combine we have in the coal combine. It keeps the price of coal up, and coal comes into the country free.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was not aware there was a combine of coal in Canada.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Yes, there is; it is a well known fact that in Ontario there is a coal combine, and that you can buy from nobody but it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is merely a combine among the local dealers.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. It is exactly the same thing, the coal men have a combine.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman proves to me that there are half a dozen combines like the one I mentioned, he only strengthens my argument. I live near a coal country where coal is mined, where within a hundred miles of me there are half a dozen companies mining coal, and I know no combine among them; but if there were such a combine, I suppose foreign coal would be brought in and destroy it.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. You could not buy any in Ontario except from the combines, and there is a grocers combine too.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I shall leave that for a moment, and call the attention of hon. gentlemen to another feature of the National Policy, which seems to me to deserve equal condemnation, and that is the kerosene oil duty. We on this side inveighed against that two years ago as being most iniquitous and unjust, and asked that the duty should be cut down. What did the Government do? They cut down the duty a cent and a sixth per gallon, or some tupenny ha'penny cutting like that, and what is the fact to-day? Last year we imported 6,454,666 gallons, valued at $414,427 on which we paid a duty of $387,279.80, or a little less than 100 per cent. But in the maritime provinces, I find that while Prince Edward Island paid 105 per cent,—Nova Scotia paid 115, and New Brunswick 125 per cent on the coal oil that they consumed. Can that be defended on any ground? The rich people in the cities use the electric light and gas, but the poor man has to use coal oil; and before he gets it, you levy a duty of from 100 to 125 per cent on it; and then you stand up here like little men and vote for its continuance every year. I say it is disgraceful. I shall not weary the House by going over any more items.

I have shown a feature of the National Policy that I very strongly object to, perhaps more than any other. That is the feature which enables favoured industries to tax, by virtue of the tariff, the people of this country and put the taxes into their own pockets. It enables them to levy two or three times as much taxes as are levied directly and go into the treasury for the purpose of the Government.

Then I complain that the National Policy is a disloyal policy, because it discriminates most strongly against Great Britain.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," whether by way of derision or approval I do not understand, but I will give him very shortly the figures, and he will tell me whether what I say is true or not. You, it is true do not single out any specific article and charge it greater duty from Great Britain than from the States, but you look at the whole field of your imports, take the classes of goods which mainly come from Great Britain, which have come and will come for many years from Great Britain, and you levy upon that class of goods a higher rate of taxation than upon other goods which come from the United States. You are not sinning through ignorance; you are sinning wilfully. Last year we imported from Great Britain about $31,000,000 worth of goods dutiable and free on which we paid $7,000,000 of duty, or about 22½ per cent. In the same time we imported from the United States about $54,500,000 worth of goods, dutiable and free, upon which we paid only $6,800,000 in duty, or about 12½ per cent, a discrimination against Great Britain of almost 10 per cent. Of course, it will be said, that a large portion of raw material comes from the United States duty free, and that this should be taken into account. The argument is good. But, eliminate the free goods altogether, and bring it down to a question of dutiable goods. We imported from England, of dutiable goods, about $23,300,000, upon which we paid about $7,000,000 duties, or 30 per cent; from the United States we imported $25,795,000 worth of goods, on which we paid in duties $6,897,000, or 26½ per cent. So that you discriminate directly against the classes of dutiable goods that are brought from Great Britain by 3½ per cent, quite enough to turn the trade away from one country to the other. And the figures show that this is largely what you have been doing. When my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) was making his argument, the other evening, the Finance Minister inquired, if the same discrepancy did not exist in 1878. He did not say it did, but he put it interrogatively. He wanted to insinuate that the same discrimination existed under the Mackenzie revenue tariff, and, therefore, he was not to blame for introducing this discrimination. I looked up that point, and I find that there is not a word of truth in the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman's question. I find that in 1878 we imported from Great Britain, in dutiable and free goods, $37,431,000, on which we paid in duty $6,445,000, or 17 per cent. From the United States we imported $48,628,000, on which we paid duties of $4,790,000, or 10 per cent. So that the discrimination upon the total imports, dutiable and free, existed in 1878, as it does to-day. But, when you eliminate the free goods—and I think hon. gentlemen opposite were right in contending that they should be eliminated—we find that the figures are as follows:—Of dutiable goods, we imported in 1878 from Great Britain $32,000,000 worth, on which we paid $6,400,000 of duty, or 20 per cent; from the United States we imported $23,400,000 worth on which we paid in duties $4,790,000, or 20 per cent. So that the same rate was levied upon dutiable goods from Great Britain as from the United States in 1878. But since that time you have deliberately, with your eyes open, knowing well the classes of goods we import from Great Britain, raised the rates against British goods, so that they are 3½ per cent on the whole higher than the rates on goods from the United States, enough to turn the current of trade from one to the other. And when the Liberal party openly invited your attention to this great discrimination, to this great wrong you were doing the motherland, and by a carefully framed resolution you asked to reduce the duties upon the classes of goods mainly imported from Great Britain, you gave a unanimous vote in the negative. But, notwithstanding that you refused to remove this discrimination, hon. gentlemen go out through the country and upon public platforms everywhere, and prate about their loyalty to the mother country and their desire to increase the trade between that country and Canada.

I have already said that the figures proved that the results which I said were sure to flow from such discrimination, have shown themselves. Take the last three years of the trade with Great Britain and compare them with the three years between 1873 and 1875, under a revenue tariff, and you will find these interesting results: In the period from 1873 to 1875, three years the duties on goods imported from Great Britain amounted to $24,147,000, being an average of 12½ per cent. On goods from the United States, consisting largely of corn, bread stuffs, coal and other articles on the free list we paid duties of $10,520,000, an average of 7 per cent. On goods from other countries the duties paid amounted to $7,130,000, or 24 per cent. But in the last period of three years, from 1893 to 1895, the duties on goods from Great Britain amounted to $24,751,000, an average rate of 22 per cent; on goods from the United States, $21,384,000, or 13 per cent, and on goods from other countries, $12,293,000, or 20 per cent. So that, whether you judge by the imports of a single year or by terms of years, it is proven conclusively, that your policy is a policy of gross cruelty and unjust discrimination against the motherland.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I sit down, I wish to call attention to some remarks which were made in this debate by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), with regard to the iron trade of this country. The hon. gentleman spoke in laudatory terms of the effect of the National Policy in developing the iron trade, and he tried to make this House believe that the free trade policy which was being carried out by Great Britain, was having the result of destroying the iron trade there, whereas the protective policy that we have adopted, was developing the Canadian iron trade. In order to prove this the hon. gentleman quoted at great length from the report made by the delegates from the masters and men of the British iron trade who were sent to the continent of Europe to examine into the condition of the iron trade there and to find out how it was that the continental iron trade was able successfully to compete with the British. After having given a number of quotations to show that the fact was, that the continental iron trade was competing successfully with the British, the hon. member for Pictou added to the quotation the following remarks of his own:—

That is a most extraordinary revolution in the iron and steel trade of Germany under a protective system, and it is under this policy of Germany that England is having so difficult a road to travel, and such a difficult experience. It is in connection with this that the price has dropped and dropped to such a figure that one reference in the "Times" goes to show that industries were running in England and selling their goods below cost.

Now, the conclusion which the hon. gentleman drew, and which he asked the House and all those who read his remarks to draw, is, that the delegates of the iron trade who visited the continental works, had reported that the reason why the continental works were able to compete successfully with the British works was, that the former were living under a system of protection. He said so in so many words, and I charge against that hon. gentleman, who I am sorry is not here to-night, because I have been waiting for this opportunity of speaking to him, that under his very hand, and in the very article from which he quoted, was conclusive and irrefutable evidence that the statement he made was not true. Sir, those delegates, after stating the fact that the continental iron works were enabled successfully to compete to-day with the English manufacturers, went on to point out the reason why this was so, and in commenting upon that report the "Times" says:

The point upon which the delegation appears to lay the greatest stress is the higher range of transportation charges in this country. This is described as "undoubtedly the greatest factor in favour of the foreign producer." Figures are given to prove that "Continental rates are generally at least one-half the rates charged for long distance traffic in this country." It is stated that the Belgians can send their iron 100 miles to Antwerp by rail and thence by sea to London for considerably less than is charged by rail from Staffordshire to London. British manufacturers also suffer from higher shipping freights. Not only have continental manufacturers cheaper transport from works to ports by railway, but they also have cheaper freights by steamer from the ports of Antwerp and Hamburg to outside markets; and even to our own colonies and India.

This article in the "Times," winds up as follows:—

While the report clearly shows that English manufacturers stand at a disadvantage in respect of railway and shipping charges, royalty rents, the payment of higher rates of wages, and less settled labour, it also appears to point to more enterprise and business tact on the part of continental industries. In Germany, for example, great care is taken to give the rank and file of the men a sound technical education, and young men of special promise are even sent to technical colleges for a two years' course of study, at the expense of their employers, so that the German manufacturers have the great advantage of employing a body of men who thoroughly understand the technique of their business. The delegation also suggests that there appears to be greater enterprise on the part of continental firms in organizing syndicates for the purpose of extending foreign business; and the syndicates established to regulate prices and production, are also believed to be helpful to continental manufacturers as against our own. Nevertheless, the report concludes that "if English manufacturers enjoyed the same railway rates and royalties as those paid on the continent, foreign competition could be defied in neutral markets." This final conclusion is in a sense encouraging, but it will not prevent Belgian and German firms from occupying British and colonial markets unless and until the railway companies and the steamship companies assist the British manufacturer to remove the obstacles that now hinder him from being on a level with his competitors of which at present there is no sign.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, the main reason to which these delegates attributed the ability of the continental works to compete with the English manufacturers, was that transportation charges on the continent were so much lower than the transportation charges in England. The other point to which they call attention is a point to which, apart from all party politics, I desire to call attention here, and that is the very great attention which is being paid on the continent of Europe to the technical education for men who are working in the iron trades. The same remark applies to other trades as well as the iron trade. It is said that England's monopoly of the principal markets of the world, is passing away. That may be, and I agree that the monopoly has ceased, but there is this to be said, that if her monopoly has passed away, she has at least a very proud and a very satisfactory pre-eminence to-day. I find that of the world's iron and steel supply, while she supplied 50 per cent fifty years ago, to-day she still supplies 45 per cent, and if she has not a monopoly she has, as I say, a very proud and satisfactory pre-eminence. The reason of it is not far to seek, and the reason is not discreditable to her, although it may be creditable to her rivals. The fact of the matter is that the Germans, the Belgians, and the other nations on the continent, have come to England and have studied British methods, and have graduated in British schools, and, as a consequence, they have acquired commercial aptitudes in all respects equal if not superior to those of their masters; and, having applied themselves to the study of the technique, as it were, of their trades, having given to their employees a better technical education than has been given in England during some years past, they have overtaken their English competitors. Sir, I would like that our Canadian manufacturers, instead of relying solely upon the increase of duties to enable them to compete with foreign manufacturers, take a leaf out of the book of their continental neighbours, and give to their employees and to the young men growing up in their establishment, a better technical education than they have heretofore. Let them learn to rely on their own pluck, and their own energy, and less upon governmental interference and governmental pap. Sir, upon this point I would like to repeat certain words which were used lately by Sir Henry Fowler, in a speech which he delivered at Wolverhampton:

In this respect (technical education) foreigners were ahead of England, and attached more importance to it. In foreign countries they made greater sacrifices for it, and did not grumble at the expense. In this country we want it very much on the lines of technical instruction for foremen and better class artisans. In a competition between two manufacturing countries, the country where the manufacturing population has the better technical education, was more favourably equipped and had a distinct advantage in the markets of the world.

Now, Sir, as we are situated, here we are a manufacturing country, in fierce competition with our neighbours to the south. If we want to succeed and beat them, we must also adopt a line of better technical education for our foremen, and better class artisans; and if we look to our own enterprise and our own energy, we will be much more likely to succeed than if we rely altogether upon government support and government patronage. Now, before I sit down, I want to call attention to the industry which the hon. gentleman from Pictou said had been so marvellously developed under the National Policy, that is the iron industry. From 1867 to 1879, that is a period of twelve years, pig iron was free in this country. There was a duty of 5 cents on bar and wrought iron, and coal was free. That was under the Mackenzie revenue tariff, to which we desire to return. What was the result of that? All kinds of manufactures into which iron entered, were encouraged, especially the manufacture of agricultural implements. I need not speak of that, because it has been done already by those better acquainted with the details than I am. But in 1879 we had the introduction of the thin end of the wedge of protection, so far as iron is concerned, with $2 on pig iron, 17½ per cent on bar iron, and so on in proportion. But in 1883 we, for the first time, gave a bounty of $1.50 on pig iron; and then, in 1887, came the drastic measure proposed by the present Secretary of State, when the pig iron duties were raised to $4 or $4.50 for the long ton, puddled bars, $9, bar and plate and hoop iron, $13, and so on in proportion. Now, the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) gave, this afternoon, what I intended to give if he had not done so, the promise made by Sir Charles Tupper at that time to induce Parliament to levy this heavy exaction upon the Canadian people. He promised that 20,000 men would be brought into the country, adding 100,000 to our population; and there was no reason, he said, why we should not steadily progress to the point of manufacturing all the iron we used, and this increase of 100,000 would be trebled and become 300,000. We would have furnaces in Carleton County, N.B., and all the way out to the Rocky Mountains and British Columbia. Iron was to be made in the country, and our manufacturers were to use our iron, and the development was to take place all along the line. What was the result of these additional duties? I say the result was, summarizing it, to double the price of nearly every piece of hardware, from a tenpenny nail up, and I have made close and accurate inquiries on this subject. Further, it almost wiped out the hardware importing business of the country. This was a very important trade before, and it received a shock from which it has not recovered to this day, by the imposition of the iron duties of that time. It also materially and prejudicially affected the shipping of the country. It increased to Canadian producers the prices of every article into the manufacture of which iron enters, to the extent of from 50 to 100 per cent, thus adding $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 to the taxation. Take up the Trade and Navigation Returns to-day, and hon. members will see that the amount of duty paid on iron and steel manufactures has varied from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000 per year, while the duties levied on the people altogether, directly and indirectly, come to $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, at the very least. It has not produced, I need scarcely say, either blast furnaces or an increased population. What was the result? The rolling mill men, constantly on the watch, as such men always are on the watch, to make what they can out of these wretched tariff exactions, got a clause put in the tariff allowing scrap iron to be imported at two dollars a ton. The result was, that they raked heaven and earth to buy scrap iron, and scrap iron was imported here from every part of the world, and we have the authority of the Finance Minister for the statement that the dealers were enabled to import it so cheaply that there was not a pound of Canadian pig iron manufactured into bar iron, but that it was all made up of scrap iron imported from abroad. In order to make assurances doubly sure, those men formed themselves into wire nail combines, tack combines, bar-iron combines, nail combines and other combines in every branch of the iron and steel trade. I acknowledge that these duties have by the tariff of 1894 been changed, and are now more equalized. What is the result? American iron has become so cheap that, even with comparatively lower duties, we cannot compete. In Montreal, Scotch iron is largely used, while American iron is coming in. In Toronto, American iron is almost exclusively used. The member from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) quoted from letters from Massey, Harris & Co., stating that they used some Canadian iron, but the quantity, I am assured, is very small. As a matter of fact, by far the largest proportion of iron used is iron manufactured in the United States, and Ontario manufacturers under this policy are handicapped to the tune of $5 on every long ton of iron they use, besides 60 cents per ton on every ton of coal. While this is going on and we are taking duties from the people amounting to from $2,000,000 to $2,500,000 on iron and steel, and bringing these iniquitous combines into existence to fleece the people and compel our people to go and buy iron abroad, what is the effect on the production of pig iron in this country? As a matter of fact, we produced very little more pig iron last year than fifteen years ago. I find, speaking in round numbers, that the whole quantity manufactured in Canada for the year 1884 was 28,000 tons; for 1885, 25,000 tons ; 1886, 27,000 tons ; 1887, 39,000 tons ; 1888, 22,000 tons ; 1889, 25,000 tons ; 1890, 26,000 tons ; 1891, 20,000 tons ; 1892, 30,000 ; 1893, 47,000 tons ; 1894, 62,500 tons, and last year, 1895, it dropped to 36,000 tons. Why did it drop ? It dropped because iron became so cheap in the United States, that notwithstanding the enormous protection given to it in Canada of a duty of $4 per ton, on pig iron, and the bounty of $2 per ton, aggregating a protection of $6 per ton, Ontario manufacturers are forced to go and buy iron in the United States, because they can buy it cheaper there. We imported last year 34,000 tons of pig iron from abroad, about the same quantity we manufactured in the country on an expenditure of $72,000 in the shape of bounties.

I will close my remarks by summing up shortly why I, for one, oppose this National Policy. I submit that protection has blighted our trade and commerce ; it has produced stagnation and commercial atrophy in the maritime provinces, at least ; it has caused an alarming exodus of our population ; it has helped to destroy our shipping interests ; it has depreciated our farming lands ; it has caused an unfair distribution of wealth ; it has encouraged extravagant expenditure, with all its attending evils ; it has prevented us enjoying the cheap goods of the world, while we have had to sell our surplus products in the cheap markets ; it unjustly levied unnecessary taxation for the development of special industries, without compensating the people taxed ; and it has discriminated against British trade.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Where has it depreciated land values ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It has depreciated land values in this very simple way, by driving people out of the country, and, as population decreases, the price of land invariably falls. It is a rule as certain as the rising of the sun.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Have our lands depreciated in proportion to the depreciation to the south of us ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That has nothing to do with it. The same system is in force there, and the same system has had the same results.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) How is it in England ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will tell the hon. gentleman in a few minutes. The hon. gentleman imagines that in England farming interests are depressed. That is the one industry in England that has not increased. Does the hon. gentleman know why ? Farming in England is in a depressed condition because of the heavy rents which farmers have to pay.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. They do not have to pay the rents they were obliged to pay fifteen years ago.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald) laughs. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has made himself acquainted with this branch of the subject, but I wish him to understand that within the last week I have made a rather extended study of this branch of this subject, and I have gone to Mulhall and examined the statistics, and I find that the rents to-day are larger than they were fifteen years ago. In England the amount paid for rent is as large as that paid for labour. There was a report brought down to the British Parliament only a few years ago, prepared by a commission, at the head of which was no less a personage than the Duke of Devonshire, and it shows the value of the produce, the cost of labour and the total expenditure. As regards twelve farms the rent is given relatively to the cost of labour, and I will ask the hon. gentleman's close attention to these figures : Farm No. 1 : cost of labour, £177 ; rent paid, £200. Farm No. 2 : cost of labour, £1,000 ; rent, rates and taxes, £1,098. No. 3 farm, cost of labour, £458, while the rent was £505. No. 4 farm, cost of labour, £243, while the rent was £475. No. 5 farm, cost of labour, £576, while the rent and the tithes together were £1,085. No. 6 farm, cost of labour, £480, and the rent, £555. No. 7 farm, cost of labour, £822, and the rent, rates and taxes, £942. No. 8 farm, cost of labour, £80, and the rent and tithes, £136. No. 9 farm, cost of labour, £20, and rent and taxes, £197. No. 10 farm, cost of labour, £718, and the rent and taxes, £880. No. 11 farm, cost of labour, £348, and the rent, £443. No. 12 farm, cost of labour, £360, and the rent and tithes, £1,203.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Is not the tax included in that rent ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In some of them the taxes are included, but I want to show the hon. gentleman that, from the evidence taken before that Devonshire commission on the twelve farms that were given, the rent and taxes exceeded largely, in many cases, and in all cases equalled the cost of the labour on the farm. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McGillivray) will see the impossibility of making farming pay, when I tell him that the rents—although they are not paid at the same rate to-day as they were fifteen years ago—are kept up at the same rate. They cannot get the same money paid in, but they never yet reduced the rents. The rents in England were fixed shortly after the wonderful increase in values, and the good times of 1870, and ever since, the struggle has been on the part of those who were interested in the land in England, to keep the rents up. It would not be human nature if they did not try to keep the rents up, and, in that respect, they are not more selfish than any other class of the community. They want to get the rents if they can ; but the people are unable to pay these rents, and why ?

It is because of the markets of the world which have been thrown open, and the competition which the English agriculturist has to meet, in the wheat from Argentine, and from India, and from Russia, and from the United States, and from Canada. And, hampered as he is with the enormous rent and taxes he has to pay, the farmer in England, of course, feels himself handicapped, and the agricultural industry is depressed for that reason.

But, does the hon. gentleman (Mr. McGillivray) imagine that the panacea which is offered in this House, from time to time, for the ills of the English agriculturist would do him any good? What good would it do the English farmer to tax foreign corn and let Canadian corn in free? If you tax Canadian corn, or all corn that comes to the country, what would be the effect? Why, the effect would be to enable the landlords to get the rents which to-day they cannot get. If the hon. gentleman doubts my word, I will give him the words of a man whom hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond of citing of late years:

"One effect of such duties," says the Right Hon. Henry Chaplin, "was undoubtedly to very materially enhance the price of the produce of the land, and thus to increase its value."

Its value being the rent the landlords get for it.

But a much more important man than Mr. Chaplin, says: The owners of property, those who are interested in the existing state of things, the men who have privileges to maintain, would be glad to entrap you from the right path, by raising the cry of fair trade under which they cover their demand: protected industry; and in connection with which they would tax the food of the people, in order to raise the rent of the landlord.

That was said by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, the present Colonial Secretary. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McGillivray) therefore will see that if agriculture is depressed in Great Britain, it is neither coincident with, nor in consequence of free trade prevailing in that country; but it is coincident with, and in consequence of, the extraordinary area of the world's surface which has been opened up to the production of cheap cereals, and to the fact that they are brought into England in competition with the English farmers' products, the English farmer being hampered at the same time with a rental far in excess of the entire value of much of the land in Canada.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Not as large as it was fifteen years ago.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I may tell the hon. gentleman that although the landlord is not able to collect as much rent as he did fifteen years ago, yet he retains the same rent roll.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. They practically remit a portion of the rent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They practically remit from year to year.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. And the lands have gone down in value there greater than here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Lands have gone down in value, but not so much as the hon. gentleman imagines.

Mr. POWELL. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him one question? Does not the report of that commission, of which the Duke of Devonshire was chairman, state that there has been a practical reduction of rents in England, ranging all the way from 15 to 50 per cent?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not mean to say that I have read the report with such accuracy as to enable me to deny what the hon. gentleman says. But I will give him Mulhall's Dictionary of Statistics, where the rental of Great Britain is given for 1893 as compared with 1873.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. The real rental or the nominal rental?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mulhall does not use the word "nominal." He gives it as "rental," and I have a right to assume he means the real rental. He shows that the rental is a little larger now than it was twenty years ago. I frankly admit from my own personal knowledge and reading, that many of the landlords have not been able to collect from the tenants the rents they charge. What then? Will taxing the food of the people enable them to do it? Probably it will. It will give a higher price for all the corn which the people of England have to consume. It will give the farmers there higher prices. It will enable the farmers to pay the rent, but it will not put a dollar into the farmers' pockets. It will increase the landlord's rent and that is about all it will do. Any man who studies the question, Mr. Speaker, will see that the enormous rentals which are exacted from the English tenants is one cause of the extraordinary depression which has existed in the agricultural industry in England, and now, Sir, I will close my remarks by thanking the gentlemen for their attention, and by repeating the words which the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain only a few days ago addressed to some colonial gentlemen who waited upon him. Speaking with reference to the colonies, he said:

Develop your resources, encourage your native industries. Trade will diversify as population increases. Rely on yourselves, and not on duties, and you may become then a great nation.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I did not intend to make any remarks on this Budget debate, but after listening to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) this afternoon, I thought I would be hardly doing my duty to myself, or to the county which I have the honour to represent, if I allowed this debate to pass without having something to say.

I do not believe in talking much; I do not believe in talking unless you have an object in doing so. I have an object in talking to-night, which is by no means to bore the House; but I would ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments. When I took my seat this evening, I was surprised to hear the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) make the remarks he did in reference to the free breakfast table. If there is anything Canada is proud of to-day it is her breakfast table, which is free to all intents and purposes, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman has said. What do we find upon that breakfast table? In the first place, we find flour. Flour is taxed, to be sure; but does not Canada make its own flour? I am from the maritime provinces, and I have had the temerity, not only in 1887, but in 1891, to stand upon the hustings and say: "Gentlemen, return me to Parliament, and I shall be willing to advocate a duty of $2.50 a barrel on flour, and still it will not increase the price of flour in Canada one jot or tittle." And what I said in Annapolis I say here. Talk to the people of Canada to-day about the price of flour. Why, when a barrel of flour gets below the price of $5, it is not worth talking about; it is hardly worth eating. Then, we have bacon and pork on the breakfast table. Will the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island stand up in this House and say that he will advocate a reduction of the duty on pork? Hon. gentlemen opposite say that tariff reduction was enunciated by the Liberals in convention in 1893, but they do not specify one single article on which they will reduce the duty. If the hon. member for Queen's will stand up in his place to-day and say that when the Liberals come into power he will advocate a reduction of the duty on pork, I will pause and allow him to say it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have no hesitation in telling the hon. gentleman that pork will have to be treated just the same as any other article in the general reduction of duties. I presume that a reduction will be made on that as on everything else.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). "I presume." The hon. gentleman will not say so. He gets on his feet to reply to me, and he says nothing when he does reply. What else have we on the breakfast table? We have tea. The National Policy has taken the duties off tea. It has also reduced the duties on sugar, and made it so free that the poorest people can now have sugar, whereas previously they had to be satisfied with Black Jack molasses. Then look at the other articles we have on the breakfast table. Take knives and forks. We produce our own iron, we have our own coal, we have the labour, and we have the money in Canada to produce them. Are these articles not essentially free? Take the table itself. We have the woods in the forests of Canada, and we have the men and the money to produce it. We do not have to go abroad to buy any of these things.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman answer me a question? Do the duties laid on flour and pork and the other articles used at the breakfast table enhance the prices of those articles?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). They preserve the market for these articles in Canada. You can to-day buy a barrel of flour in Canada at retail cheaper than you can in the city of Boston; I know that of my own certain knowledge. The same is true of sugar. The hon. gentleman has compared the price of sugar in Canada with the price of sugar in Great Britain. His comparison is not fair, because he does not compare the same grades of sugar at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did take the same grades.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). There is one grade of sugar in Great Britain and another grade in Canada; but if you take the same grade in both countries, I say that sugar is manufactured and sold as cheap in Canada as it is in England or any other country in the world. Sugar is a very sorry article for hon. gentlemen to select to prove their contention; because we can recollect that not many years ago it was a common thing for people to get only ten pounds of sugar for a dollar, whereas now in a country store you can buy as many as twenty-six pounds of sugar for a dollar. I am astonished at the hon. gentleman mentioning sugar as a ground for attacking the National Policy. If there is one thing I congratulate the Opposition on, it is this: that by means of the National Policy the Liberal Conservatives of Canada have made them good and loyal British subjects. Why, we do not hear any talk now of going to Washington for the sign by which to conquer. We do not have any excursions down to Boston to the boot and shoe trades union. We do not have any speeches made in New York. We do not have any people going in private cars down to Kentucky following Wiman, for the sign by which to conquer. No, the Opposition are looking to England now, and who has taught them to look to England? It has been the Liberal-Conservatives of Canada and the National Policy. The hon. leader of the Opposition smiles. He has talked a great deal in the United States and in Canada about sentiment. Perhaps he forgets some of the things he has said in regard to that. In 1888, on the 13th day of August, the hon. leader of the Opposition made a speech at Oakville, Ont., in which he said:

I read the prints of Ontario and I know that every day these people weep tears because they feel that if unrestricted reciprocity is adopted it must lead us into annexation. Well, I have only this to say. It is a great argument in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, because if it means anything at all it means that the change will be so advantageous to the people that they will want to go into the still closer union with the United States. Sir, it is very well to be sentimental but after all sentiment is not business.

That is what he said in Canada when talking to a Canadian audience; but when he is in Boston, talking in the Vendome Hotel, what does he say with reference to sentiment? This is an extract from his speech there in 1891, as reported in the "Globe," of November 27th, 1891, and surely he will not dispute that:

Mr. Blaine said referring to the reciprocity treaty of 1854: "He was free to admit that that treaty was not abrogated on commercial grounds, but in consequence of the feeling that had grown up that Canada had sympathized with the Southern States in their conflict." With this statement I, as a Canadian, can find no fault. The American people had then too just a cause to be incensed against Canada. I would not at this board accuse my own country, much as I could in anything believe it in the wrong, but I am relieved from any anxiety in that respect because what I say here I have again and again stated in my own country. I am a Liberal of Liberals. I was at that time too young to speak but old enough to feel, and since I came to man's estate, time and again on the floor of Parliament, on public platforms, I have declared that in my opinion the conduct of England, of Canada, towards the United States during the war was a disgrace to the civilization of England, of Canada. The American people could fight their own battles, they required no help, but when they were engaged in a supreme struggle for the life or death of this great nation, when they were fighting for a cause as great, as holy as ever engaged the devotion of men, when they had reason to expect the outspoken sympathy of those nearest to them, it was galling that southern privateers could be built, manned and equipped in England with the passive connivance of the British Government to destroy American commerce on the high sea. It was galling that rebel refugees could find shelter in Canada, and then with impunity and without provoking condemnation plot abominable crimes to help secession.

That was the hon. gentleman's idea with reference to sentiment when he was in the United States. Sentiment there counted for something. He praised the people of the United States; he commended them because they did not look to business but allowed their sentiment to abrogate the treaty which they had at that time with Canada. But in Canada, sentiment counts for nothing. Sentiment here is very good, but give him business first. He said:

And then with impunity and without provoking condemnation, plot abominable crimes to help secession.

Yes, the hon. gentleman is very fierce in condemning secession in the United States; but when he comes to Canada he is nothing loath to send for a man to assist him in forming a Government, who has been in the very hot bed of secession. When this late crisis which we have heard so much about took place, what did rumour say with reference to the hon. gentleman? Rumour said that he had telegraphed from Montreal to the Hon. Mr. Fielding to come and assist him in forming a Government. Well, the Hon. Mr. Fielding was steeped in secession in 1886. He plotted a most damnable crime of manhood and was assisted by his colleagues of that time, the Hon. Attorney General of Nova Scotia being one. They were steeped in secession and annexation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I call the hon. gentleman to order. He has no right to make the charge that Mr. Fielding was steeped in annexation. It is a foul slander.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am unable to rule that the hon. member for Annapolis is out of order in making reference to any person outside of Parliament.

Mr. HAZEN. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman referred to my hon. friend from Annapolis as being guilty of a foul slander. He ought to withdraw that expression.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that the hon. gentleman should withdraw that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly if you say so, I withdraw it in the parliamentary sense. I await to see whether the hon. member for Annapolis has the manliness to withdraw the statement he made charging Mr. Fielding with being an annexationist.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). If I said that Mr. Fielding was an annexationist I withdraw it, because I did not mean to say that; but I will not withdraw my statement that the Attorney General of Nova Scotia is an annexationist, because I can prove it by his own words. When the hon. leader of the Opposition was in the United States he was horrified at people plotting the abominable crime of secession; but when he is in Canada and wants to form a government, he does not hesitate to send for these people who, in 1886 and 1887, upon every stump in Nova Scotia, talked secession and talked of breaking up the union. That was the issue, and nothing else was the issue in the province of Nova Scotia. I have plenty of extracts to prove this, and I have no need to say it to the people there, because they understand it perfectly well. They know perfectly well that in 1886 that was the real issue—the breaking up of this union.

Mr. BOWERS. What of it?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). What of it? You, a Canadian, you say what of it—I am astonished that there should be a representative in this House to-day who would say "what of it?" when we talk of breaking up the union.

Mr. BOWERS. Cannot a Nova Scotian be as loyal as a Canadian?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). To be sure, we have hundreds of thousands of good loyal British subjects. The young men of Nova Scotia are rising in their might and putting their iron heel upon the reptile secession and the reptile annexation. If there is anything I have talked against since I came into politics, it has been this most abominable crime of secession. Look in the "Parliamentary Companion," and in 1887, I there told the people that I held the matter of annexation in supreme contempt, and I did. And even my friends in 1887 asked me not to go too far in that, as I might lose a few votes, because I held the annexation sentiment and the secession sentiment in contempt as reptile sentiments. I say that one of the most deplorable crimes ever perpetrated on the country was committed by these Liberals in Nova Scotia when, for the purpose of gaining a victory, they brought forward that question of repeal. But the leader of the Opposition has brought this secession right down to date, because if rumour be true—and if he rises in his seat and says it is not true, of course. I will accept his denial, as everybody will—but if rumour is true Mr. Fielding was telegraphed for to come into the Government which was to be formed by the hon. leader of the Opposition. And not only was it true that he was to come to that government, but he was to run for office in the county of Annapolis. I have it on good authority that the leader of the Opposition telegraphed to Mr. Fielding, and Mr. Fielding telegraphed to the clerk of the municipality of the county of Annapolis to the effect that he would accept the nomination in Annapolis county. I say that if there is one thing upon which I congratulate the Opposition, it is upon the fact that we are making them loyal British subjects. We hear nothing now talked about the United States.

Mr. BERGERON. What about Dominion day?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I was going to refer to that. This matter has been brought down not only by the hon. leader of the Opposition but also by the Nova Scotia government itself. The other day there was a motion brought up in the local house, lately prorogued in Nova Scotia,—and it was brought up of course by a Liberal-Conservative—that Dominion Day be given as a school holiday throughout Nova Scotia, and that motion was voted down. It was voted down in this provincial legislature led by the Hon. Mr. Fielding, who was to be the would-be colleague in the would-be government of the hon. leader of the Opposition.

We have heard a great deal of talk about the Liberal policy. We have heard it read by different hon. gentlemen in the Opposition—the policy that was launched upon this country in 1893 by the 2,000 delegates who had assembled here in Ottawa. Well, they have changed their policy a good deal since.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis).

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Davies) said that that is the policy of the Liberal party and that no power, not even the leader of the Opposition himself, can change it. His words were:

And there is no power under heaven to change it—not even the leader of the Opposition himself—to change that policy.

But the leader of the Opposition has evidently done his best to change that policy, for what has he been saying, not later than 1895? When you place his utterances of 1895 alongside his utterances of 1889, the contrast is extremely funny. In 1889, that is, before the Grit convention of 1893, Mr. Laurier, speaking in Toronto, on 30th September, said:

I have read history in this way that every reform has cost to the Reformers years of labour, and these years of labour I, for one,—

A great big "I."

—am prepared to give; and though the Democrats may be defeated in the States and though Canadians may grow faint-hearted in Canada, the Liberal party, so long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause of unrestricted reciprocity until that cause is successful. I will not expect to win in a day—

I do not think he will be disappointed there.

—but I am prepared to remain in the cool shades of opposition until the cause has triumphed.

That was his position in 1889. Well, they had this Grit convention in 1893, and, being bolstered up by patriotic gentlemen like Sir Oliver Mowat, and others, they have, to a considerable extent, changed their platform and they have made it extremely extensive and extremely general. But, notwithstanding that extremely extensive and extremely general platform, Mr. Laurier, in Montreal, on the 22nd January, 1895, said:

The Liberal party believe in free trade on broad lines, such as exist in Great Britain—

Nothing about the United States of America here.

—and their immediate object is a revenue tariff.

It is the revenue they are after.

A tariff to be derived from customs, but which will levy no duties except for the purposes of revenue. For means of government, for all economic principle, I go to the land of sound government and sound common sense—old England.

There is no talking of a trip in private cars to Kentucky, or Florida, or New York, or Boston. The National Policy and the Liberal-Conservatives have taught them better manners and better sense.

It is from that land that I take my theories, and upon that platform, exemplified as I have told you, the Liberal party of Canada will fight the next battle.

But everything is general: there is nothing specific with reference to it. The only time he ever approached anything like a specific statement was at Winnipeg, in 1894 :

When the Liberal party comes into power we shall examine very closely as to which is the best way to raise the amount necessary for carrying on the affairs of government.

They thoroughly understood, as every one of common sense must understand, that we must have money to carry on the Government. You cannot carry on any government without money, and that money must come from the people. The politician who teaches any doctrine different from that, is either a knave or a fool.

We shall, I say, examine the proper objects upon which to levy taxation. We shall make it as easy as possible upon things which are necessary, and, indeed, are the necessities of life for the people. We will also make taxation as light as possible upon all things which have to be used by the common people.

He takes good care not to go into details and tell the people what they are.

To get the money which will be lost if we take off some of the present taxation, and to make up the deficit which will arise, it will be necessary to get an addition from some other sources. This will be attempted to be done in this manner : In the first place there will be a difference made in the present tax imposed upon raw materials to be used for manufactured articles.

Then there is a great big full stop, and nothing more is said with reference to that. There is nothing specific, nothing by which the people can judge what their policy is, or whether the duties they will impose are likely to be less burdensome than those now in existence. There is nothing but a large platform of generalities.

Now, as I said, if there is one thing I congratulate the Opposition upon, it is their loyalty to England. We had some fine speeches when the resolution of my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) was before the House. Why, I cheered the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and so did other members on this side. It really did one's heart good to hear the expressions of loyalty at that time. But there has been a great change, and it would not be any wonder to me if Canada should say, in the words of Shakespeare—and I quote it with all deference to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who seems to have a copyright on Shakespeare, so far as this House is concerned :

Why should I think you can be mine and true,
Though you in swearing shake the throned Gods,
Who have been false to Fulvia.

They have been false to Fulvia. Not the Liberal party, not by any means the Liberal party, but many of the leaders of that party have been entirely false to Fulvia. They have been preaching annexation—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). A good many of them have. Their papers have been preaching annexation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I say, yes, and I will prove it in a moment. Their papers have been preaching annexation and have been saying that there is a large annexation sentiment in Canada. Take the papers of the United States from 1886 up to date, and I have gone to the trouble of getting extracts from a number of them, which I have here. They teem with assertions that there is a great annexation sentiment in Canada. They quote the speeches of public men, they read between the lines of speeches of public men of the Liberal party in Canada and assert distinctly and emphatically that there cannot but be a large and growing annexation sentiment in Canada. If there was ever a foul slander, this is one. I say, there is not a growing annexation or secession sentiment in Nova Scotia notwithstanding what the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) says. He may preach annexation ; he may preach secession.

Mr. BOWERS. I rise to point of order—

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I have never seen the reptile there.

Mr. BOWERS. I did not say there was a growing sentiment of annexation or secession in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). An incident took place in Nova Scotia, and I doubt very much that it has ever been heard of in this House. On 21st June, 1887,—that was during my first Parliament here—the Queen's jubilee was celebrated. It was a time when all loyal Canadians and all loyal British subjects did do their utmost to do honour to the glorious old woman—and I say that with the utmost respect—who rules over the destinies of this Empire. The government of Nova Scotia—at that time led by the Hon. Mr. Fielding, gave orders that no British flag should be hoisted on the provincial parliament buildings. That is the very same gentleman that the leader of the Opposition called upon to assist in forming his Government, when he thought His Excellency was going to call upon him to form a Government. It placed on its flag-staff on the Provincial Buildings in Halifax the colours of a defunct trading company.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the hon. gentleman reading from ?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I am asserting what I know to be a fact, and I know that there are gentlemen in this House to-night who will corroborate what I say. While on the same day the Halifax "Chronicle" ran up the Stars and Stripes—

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Is that a Tory paper ?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). We all know what the Halifax "Chronicle" is, it is the organ of the local government in Nova Scotia, and it ran up the Stars and Stripes upon the Queen's jubilee in 1887. Did you ever suppose that a Conservative paper would run up the Stars and Stripes? At the same time, a member of the "Chronicle" staff was a reporter for a leading Boston paper, and in his report to this Boston paper of the celebration of the Queen's jubilee, he explained this Halifax "Chronicle" incident as follows:—

The "Chronicle" has never advocated annexation, but it has very warmly espoused the cause of commercial union with the United States. This may be all that it intended to support, but the popular interpretation is that it intends to come out squarely for annexation.

And of the action of the local government, he says:

This was done by order of the local government, and is taken as an indication that the policy of the Government is Nova Scotia first, and that it will not be influenced by the sentiment of loyalty to the British Throne in shaping the future destiny of the province. There is no doubt that in this they give voice to the most enlightened sentiment of the people here.

Is that not precisely on the same lines as the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford at Oakville, made just about the same time? All he cares about is business. It is business first, sentiment afterwards. It was business first and sentiment afterwards with the "Chronicle," and the "Chronicle" ran up the Stars and Stripes. This was never denied. The paper has never denied this report. They all saw it, the "Chronicle" saw it. But, in addition, the "Chronicle" told its readers:

There is nothing dishonourable attaching to the charge that certain gentlemen are annexationists.

There is nothing dishonourable, says the "Chronicle." They can be annexationists, and still be honourable men. They can be traitors, and still be honourable men. And on the following day it merely postponed the use of:

Annexation as a remedy now when no constituency, or no considerable number of constituencies, could be got to support it.

It recognized the fact that there was a true and loyal sentiment in Nova Scotia, and in the rest of Canada. It recognized the fact that there was no constituency or no number of constituencies that could be got to support it, but at the same time the "Chronicle" declared:

Nobody can predict when a crisis in our history may create an enormous and irresistible sentiment in favour of seeking political union with the United States.

They were coquetting with the United States then. They were going down to Boston. The leader of the Opposition was going there, the member for South Oxford was going there, the Attorney General of Nova Scotia was there, and he made a howling speech in New York, which he never delivered. That seems very funny, but it is true. It is no use in going into that now, but I will reserve it for a future occasion. Now, the Halifax "Chronicle" of August 20th, 1888, referring to the Oakville speech of the hon. member for South Oxford, said:

These clear and sensible words are in striking contrast to the toadying utterances which meet one on all sides. They are honest, manly and healthy.

You see, Mr. Speaker, that sentiment was going all along the line. You see it originated at Oakville, you see it coming from the hon. leader of the Opposition, you see it coming from the hon. member for South Oxford. The Halifax "Chronicle" goes on to say:

They bid Canadians look those most important pending questions straight in the face. These matters are worthy of frank and full discussion. There is no need of beating about the bush. Our present political relations cannot always exist.

Just exactly what the hon. member for South Oxford said in his Oakville speech, and also said in his Boston speech. He said upon the floor of this House that he was prepared to stand by his Boston speech, and thus brought it down to date. The "Chronicle" goes on to say:

Why should our public men, whose business it is to grapple with all the vital questions, speak of them with bated breath? Are we such a cowardly lot of people that we do not want to know the truth and act accordingly? Besides, an attempt has been made in the Tory press—

Good for the Tory press, I say. They could not pay a better compliment to the Tory press than by saying that of them——to resist all who venture to express a candid opinion on these topics. The hour for open and fearless discussion has arrived, and Sir Richard has gallantly led the way.

The leader of the Opposition was at Oakville along with the hon. member for South Oxford, and the "Chronicle" and all the Liberals along the line got the cue, and pointed out the speech to their friends as leading directly to annexation. The Halifax "Chronicle" says so. I do not say so, because if I did, I would be only a Tory and be biassed. But those are the words of the Halifax "Chronicle," and are its interpretation of this Oakville speech by the hon. member for South Oxford, who was accompanied by the leader of the Opposition. Now, let us take the Acadian "Recorder," which is generally called the two-cent Annanias of Halifax. In commenting on the member for South Oxford's speech, it saw the "Chronicle," and went one better, for it deliberately told the public and the Yankees that retaliation would force Canada into annexation. No one need ask me whether it was a Liberal paper or not. This is what it says :

We are not so thin-skinned as to fear to express a candid view on the matter. We are told by the Tory press that the Americans will straightway hasten to apply the terrors of non-intercourse, should Canadians agree that retaliation would lead to annexation. But whether or no, the truth must be spoken, and we are of opinion that no surer method could be found to force Canada into the union than by putting on retaliation breaks. As things now stand, there is widespread dissatisfaction in this country, and many there are who would gladly vote for annexation.

A most foul slander, I repeat, a most foul slander, not only upon the province of Nova Scotia, but upon the whole Dominion of Canada. And still these Grit papers herald out these things to the United States, they are copied by the United States papers, and scattered over that country. Not only do we find them in the United States papers, but also in speeches of United States senators and public men, who are fairly bubbling over with the idea that Canada is anxious to come into the union. Then the "Recorder" goes on to say :

Should the retaliation millstone be tied about our necks in the meantime, the weight would soon carry us down into the currents of annexation.

Now, Sir, I think I have told you what I said I would. I told you I would read extracts to prove from the mouths of the Liberals themselves that they were in favour of annexation. I see by a paper this moment placed in my hands that this same Attorney General has been nominated in Annapolis county to oppose me at the next elections, the same gentleman who was in the Government that ordered the flag to be pulled down from a public building, and whose organ is the "Morning Chronicle," which paper ran up the Stars and Stripes in Nova Scotia.

Mr. FLINT. I rise to a point of order. The government of Nova Scotia never ordered the British flag to be run down from a public building. I deny it in toto, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to give the authority for his statement. He has no authority of any consequence whatever.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I have read my authority.

Mr. FLINT. The hon. gentleman never gave the authority.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). It was so reported by the reporter of the Halifax morning "Chronicle," it was sent to the Boston "Herald" and copied into different papers in Nova Scotia; it was never denied, but it was referred to by the morning "Chronicle," which added to it. I defy any hon. gentleman to controvert that statement. I will give the hon. gentleman the papers where he can ferret it out for himself. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) knows perfectly well that it is true, and that they gained a victory in 1886 upon one of the most despicable cries ever raised in any province.

Mr. FLINT. As regards the alleged order, I deny it in toto. It was denied in toto at the time, and the correspondent of the paper who wrote to Boston was a Conservative, and wrote for the Halifax "Herald."

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is not a point of order.

Mr. FLINT. It is a denial, and I give it here.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman may not have adduced evidence sufficient to satisfy the hon. gentleman. But as I understood it, the point of order was, that the hon. gentleman did not give the authority on which he founded his statement, nor state where he had found it. The hon. member for Annapolis has twice repeated his statement and given the evidence on which he founded it. No point of order has been established by the hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. FLINT. The point of order was that the hon. gentleman had twice made a statement and said it was not denied. I denied it, and I stated so, and I deny it now from my place here.

Mr. SPEAKER. As to the point of order in regard to the expression made use of by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), I question very much as to whether the hon. member for Yarmouth was not out of order in making his statement.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman twice stated that the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) could not deny it, and this was said in the hearing of everybody here.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman gave his evidence.

Mr. FLINT. He gave no authority.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I gave the authority. I state again that it is a matter of common repute. The hon. gentleman may rise to his feet and give it a bald denial, but I reassert it, and I am in as good a position to know what goes on in Nova Scotia as is the hon. gentleman. I have read extracts from the report which was actually made by the Halifax "Chronicle" reporter, sent to the Boston "Herald," copied in different papers throughout Canada, copied in papers in Nova Scotia, in the morning "Herald," and referred to in the "Chronicle" in the extracts I have read from that paper. The hon. gentleman although not having looked into these matters has yet taken on himself to contradict me, and to say this is not true. It is a matter of common repute in Nova Scotia; it is known there. I have spoken in tones of great indignation on the stump in Annapolis with respect to this abominable secession Nova Scotia government carrying out such transactions. Is it not this and the refusal of a Dominion holiday to the school children, on a par? Will the hon. gentleman deny it?

Mr. FLINT. Yes, I will deny it. The hon. gentleman has said that the legislature of Nova Scotia would not allow the school children a public holiday on Dominion Day. I deny it in toto; there is not a shadow of foundation for the statement.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). The hon. gentleman is quibbling, if that is a parliamentary term.

Mr. SPEAKER. No.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I take it back, because I thought myself it was going a little too far. The hon. gentleman is doing the same as I would do if I were to quibble.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). It is a sort of suppression of the truth—it is a suppression of the truth.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. It is not quite parliamentary to make use of an expression of that kind.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I will take it back at once because I desire to be parliamentary, but when I get talking on these matters as to loyalty and the way we have been used in Nova Scotia, I am very apt to drift into unparliamentary language. The hon. gentleman is not correct exactly. There was a motion made, I think by the hon. member for Pictou, in the local legislature to establish 1st of July as a Dominion holiday in Nova Scotia and establish it in the public schools. Is not that correct? That motion was voted down by every Liberal in the Nova Scotia legislature, and every Liberal-Conservative voted in favour of it.

An hon. MEMBER. Is that correct?

Mr. FLINT. If the hon. gentleman will permit me—

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I will give the explanation—I do not want the hon. gentleman to make my speech. I ask if this statement is not correct, for I know it is. The Liberals get out of it by saying that nothing can prevent the trustees from allowing the holiday. But if so, the teachers will have to make it up or lose their pay. That is the only way the Liberals can get out of it, but there is no doubt of the fact that they voted down the motion to observe Dominion Day in Nova Scotia. This is the very same Attorney General, the agent of the Queen, who is supposed to be one of the most loyal British subjects, who is supposed to put his iron heel down on the reptile of annexation and secession or anything having treason and secession in it. He was one of the first to vote for this motion, and he was one of the first to have a part in issuing this order that the flag be not raised on the provincial building in Halifax, but an old flag of some defunct company should be placed on the public building instead of our own British flag. This gentleman, according to the paper handed to me just now, has been nominated by the Liberals to oppose me, and when he comes here, and when they form that grand government they are going to form after the general elections, he will be asked to come into the fold in the same way as Mr. Snyder was.

Mr. BERGERON. If elected?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I think I will have something to say in regards to that. If he is elected, he will come here because he considers that all the rest of the Liberal members from Nova Scotia are political impossibilities. He has said so in regard to the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), the hon. member for Yarmouth, and the hon. member for King's, and he thinks the hon. member for Queen's is nowhere. He is in fact one of the greatest of the political impossibilities in the eyes of this Attorney General. If he comes here there is no doubt that the leader of the Opposition will welcome this secessionist and annexationist, and this Attorney General may perhaps be Minister of Justice.

Mr. LAURIER. Why not? Did not Sir John Abbott sign the annexation manifesto in 1849?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). If Sir John Abbott committed robbery why should you? This tu quoque argument is very good, but it will not answer principles. I am not here, however, to speak for Sir John Abbott. "Let the dead bury their dead; let us act in the living present." Hon. gentlemen opposite think that they may come to the Treasury benches, and I ask the leader of the Opposition if he is going to take such people into his Cabinet. If he is, the people of Canada want to understand it.

Mr. LAURIER. If I followed the Tory precedent I would.

Mr. MILL (Annapolis). Mr. Speaker, I shall say nothing more about those matters, nor do I intend to say very much further with reference to our policy. I was returned here in 1887 upon the National Policy. I fought the "Secesh" cry, I fought the repeal cry, I fought the annexation cry, and I was returned to Parliament upon the National Policy pure and simple, from a constituency in Nova Scotia that had direct dealings with the United States of America. The people of Annapolis, Nova Scotia, are not the blue ruin, down-trodden people that the Liberals think. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) went into the county of Annapolis, and endeavoured to make the people believe that they were going to ruin, and that their farms were depreciating in value. But, Sir, he did not know the people to whom he was talking. Go to the county of Annapolis, go through the province of Nova Scotia from one end of it to the other, and although you will not find very rich men, you will find men who are comfortable. You will find farmers there who are laying by from $200 to $2,000 a year off their farms. You will find some, of course, who are going behindhand. Will you not find such people in every department of life? You will find lawyers who are going behind hand simply because they have not the brains to go ahead. I say, Sir, that the average farmer in the county of Annapolis is one of the best provided men on the face of the globe. So are the farmers throughout the province of Nova Scotia, and so they are all through Canada. It is a libel upon Canada for hon. gentlemen opposite to speak of great poverty in Canada, and to speak of the poor people we have in Ottawa. The citizens of Ottawa do not know what poor people are. Go to the slums of English cities, and there you will see poverty in all its squalid degradation. I have been through the city of Ottawa from one end to the other, and I have failed to see soup kitchens or any crowds of men seeking labour. If the honest man wants to earn an honest dollar he can earn it any day in the week. He can earn it in Nova Scotia, he can earn it anywhere in Canada. It is a libel upon Canada to say that this country is going to ruin by reason of the National Policy. The late lamented Sir John Thompson was a man whom I loved beyond all other men, a man that I had the highest regard for. I was with him frequently practising at the bar; I was under him when he was on the bench. I was proud to be his colleague in this House, and a nobler man I never had the pleasure of knowing. Death has done a great deal against the Liberal-Conservative party. Death has taken away two great leaders. I revered Sir John Macdonald, but I did not know him so well as I knew Sir John Thompson. Death also removed Sir John Abbott, but death did not make the changes in the Liberal leadership. Did death make a change in the leadership of the party when Mr. Mackenzie, that respected old gentleman, was thrown overboard? He entered this House without knowing he was pitched overboard by his party until he saw his seat occupied by the man who succeeded him. It just occurs to me now, Sir, that when I first came here in 1887, for two or three years, the leadership of the Liberal party was in commission. We had a leader from the maritime provinces, we had a leader from Ontario, we had a leader from Quebec, and a leader from somewhere else. There was no head to the party whatever; it was all in commission. Then we had the Hon. Edward Blake. Death did not remove the Hon. Edward Blake. He was an able man—there is no doubt about that in the world—and the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) is an able man. I am proud to hear, Sir, the general expressions of respect that those who know personally that hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) entertain for him. But he is wrong with reference to his policy. He is wrong with reference to his associates, and he is all wrong with reference to what he has done in his political life. There is not the slightest doubt about that, and the people of Canada will tell him so soon. They have told him so before, and they will tell him so again. Let me quote to the House the words of the late Sir John Thompson, who, announcing his policy in Pictou, N.S., after becoming the leader of the Conservative party, used the following words:—

We propose a tariff reform that will reduce the tariff as low as possible compatible with producing the revenue absolutely necessary to carry on the public services of the country and which will give the preference to Canadian workmen over foreigners, whether mechanics and manufacturers or farmers.

Where duties are levied we will levy them on articles that can and ought to be produced in Canada, and we will lighten the duties on articles that we cannot manufacture or produce and are obliged to import.

The Government is pledged to raise only the revenue the country actually needs, and to raise it by those methods that will be least felt by the great consuming masses. That pledge has been carried out by the abolition of the duties on tea, coffee, sugar, &c. If the Cartwright tariff for these articles were still in force, the people of Canada would be paying between $8,000,000 and $10,000,000 a year more customs taxes than they are now paying under the National Policy. We have shown our sincerity by abolishing the taxes on many of the necessaries of life and we propose to continue to reduce the duties as we are able.

Step by step as the United States makes a reduction of duties on articles of Canadian produce, the Canadian Government will take a corresponding step in lowering the duty on American products—and this has been Canada's statutory offer for years. Consistent with the necessities of the revenue the Canadian Government will do everything in its power to make trade freer between the two countries, without sacrificing our commercial independence, the control of our own tariff, or the bonds of our attachment to the mother country.

It is our aim and determination to build up Canadian industries from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in preference to aiding in developing the interests of foreign countries; and to do our part in developing and consolidating the glorious Empire to which we belong.

That, Sir, is the true Canadian policy. There is no doubt that if Sir John Thompson were alive to-day he would still go further with his policy and advocate the fast line of steamers that this Government intends to establish between Canada and Great Britain, encouraged as they are by the liberality of the Conservative Government of Great Britain. It is to this policy, Sir, that I pin my faith. It is on the National Policy that I will appeal to my constituents, and I have no doubt at all that if I live I will be the candidate in Annapolis, N.S. What has this policy done for Canada? It is acknowledged by every one that Canada has progressed and prospered. I, in common with other of the young men of Canada, have faith in my country. Our young men who are springing up in Nova Scotia intend to blot out those old anti-confederation ideas that have been handed down from their forefathers. Our young men of Nova Scotia are coming out strong for Canada and strong for the Empire. This National Policy makes the interest of Canadians paramount to the interests of foreigners. As I have read from the words of our late lamented leader, it prevents Canada from being made a slaughter market for the surplus products of any other nation. It fully protects Canadian enterprise and industry, and it loyally refuses to consent to trade arrangements with foreign countries which in any way discriminate against Great Britain. It has been thrown in our teeth by the hon. member who last spoke, that this Government has a tariff against Great Britain, and is disloyal by reason of that tariff. I do not consider that we are disloyal for that reason. It would be extremely awkward, under existing circumstances, to make an exception of the articles that are produced in England. I think the mother country can get along very well if we do tax goods that come from there. She is not complaining of that.

It is a policy which gives confidence and stability to capital, ensures prosperity to our manufacturing industries, and enables our artisans to maintain a scale of wages far in excess of those which obtain in European countries. It retains our skilled artisans at home on wages that will enable them to live in comfort, and it has provided our farming population with a home market for many lines of agricultural products that cannot be exported. Our home market in Nova Scotia is a market which the farmers of that province know how to value. I do not wish it to be understood that, because I speak of Nova Scotia, I am by any means a provincialist. I am a little better acquainted with the province of Nova Scotia than with the province of Ontario; but I know perfectly well, that what obtains in the province of Nova Scotia, obtains to a larger extent in the province of Ontario and in the great North-west. This National Policy and the progressiveness of the Liberal-Conservative Government have kept Canada on the highway of national prosperity, while almost every other country has been suffering from severe commercial depressions. What has been the case in the United States. I have only to refer to the fact, which is within the knowledge of every gentleman within my hearing, that in that great country, with its 60,000,000 of population, they had a turn in their tariff not very long ago, and what was the result? Crash after crash went manufacturing throughout the country; crash after crash went the banks. Where only one bank failed in a population of 5,500,000 in Canada, one bank failed in every 250,000 people in the United States. And why was that? It was because of the instability that resulted from the changes in the tariff.

This National Policy has enhanced our credit, and that is one of the great arguments in its favour. For there is no market so susceptible as the money market. It will vary at the slightest indication of prosperity or retrogression in any country, and there has been no retrogression, so far as Canada is concerned, in the money markets of the world. It has been all progression, and Canada stands to-day in the money markets of the world higher than she has ever done before. That is an incontrovertible argument in favour of the great progress Canada has made, and in favour of the stability of the National Policy. This policy has encouraged and developed inter-provincial trade, and welded together this vast Dominion into a homogeneous whole. And just here it is recalled to my mind, that the hon. Attorney General of Nova Scotia has frequently said in the province of Nova Scotia, more particularly in the county of Annapolis, that there has been no inter-provincial trade between Nova Scotia and the upper provinces. He has gone to the people of Granville Ferry, many of whom were made wealthy by their ship-building industry, and he has said to them time and again: "Where has a prow of your vessels ever been pointed to Ontario or Quebec? We have no interprovincial trade." He has even gone so far as to say: "Bring an Ontario man down, and exhibit him at 10 cents a head and a fortune would be made, for people will rush to see him as a curiosity." But the Attorney General has changed his mind as to interprovincial trade. What has changed it? The same thing that has changed hon. gentlemen opposite from looking to the United States to find a sign with which to conquer, into loyal citizens who now look to good old England. The same thing has caused the Attorney General of Nova Scotia to see that we have built up a vast interprovincial trade throughout the whole Dominion of Canada, from one ocean to the other. This policy has already produced among Canadians a feeling of security, of national pride, of commercial and industrial independence, without which no people can ever attain to the acme of national prosperity. This policy has been sustained by the votes of three general elections; and by the votes of another general election the very same old policy will be again sustained. And, in response to these popular verdicts, what has been the result accruing from the National Policy? No less a sum than $200,000,000 has been invested in manufacturing industries in this country since the inauguration of the policy in 1879. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, time and again, during this session, as well as in previous sessions, have stood up in this House and have ridiculed the census returns by taking note of the little manufactories scattered throughout the towns and villages of our country. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, it is the little manufactories that I am proud of. It is the little manufactories that show the strength of the country. Their existence proves that capital and labour have been disseminated and scattered throughout the country, and not clustered or congested. Nothing imperils the security of capital or paralyzes industrial enterprise more surely or quickly than uncertainty as to the fiscal policy of the country. This has been exemplified in the United States. We do not want it exemplified here, and the people of Canada do not want it exemplified here, and they will speak in no uncertain tones at the coming election. Now, I will not trouble the House any longer. I do not speak very often in Parliament, and I do not propose to. I have no great desire to speak from here to the county of Annapolis. When I go back to the county of Annapolis, I can do my talking then.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not my intention, Sir, to detain the House more than a very few minutes in addressing myself to some of the observations that have been made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). I do not think the hon. gentleman need have made any apology by saying that he does not often address the House. That is perfectly true, and I think he has a very good excuse on the present occasion, because it is perfectly obvious that if Mr. Longley had not been nominated for the county of Annapolis, the hon. gentleman would not have troubled us this evening. I could not help contrasting the speech made by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray), in the earlier part of the day, with that made by the hon. gentleman just now. The two speeches remind me very much of the two brothers who travelled for the purpose of promoting the principles of temperance. The one was a total abstainer, and the other was an habitual drunkard. The total abstainer devoted himself to lecturing, and he apologized for his brother by saying that they taught the public by precept and by example. He undertook to tell them what the advantages of temperance were, and his brother was a good illustration of what were the evils. The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) to-day told us what excellent things hon. gentlemen on that side always said of the leader on this side (Mr. Laurier), and that on this side we, or some of us, at all events, had been saying unhandsome things of the leaders of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I may say, in answer to the hon. member for North Ontario that I would refer him to the speech just now delivered by the hon. member for Annapolis. The hon. gentleman devoted himself to charges of sedition, secession, corruption and all other imaginary forms of wickedness that could be attributed to Mr. Fielding.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I did not touch upon corruption; but if I had, I could have shown how the hon. leader of the Opposition offered to buy a province.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has got through his speech except the addendum which he has just now added. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman said

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. I was speaking of the leaders in the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman from Annapolis also spoke of the leaders in the House. He charged my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), he charged my hon. friend here (Mr. Laurier) with giving the cue to the annexationists and secessionists of the country, and the agitation went on all along the line, to use his expression, which he repeated over and over again. The hon. gentleman has not explained to us one fact in his speech of an hour and twenty minutes, and that is how it was that the people of Nova Scotia themselves, this loyal people, this devoted people to the cause of British connection, came to return Mr. Fielding and Mr. Longley and other gentlemen, with a majority to support them, to the legislature of Nova Scotia.

Mr. POWELL. And added a million dollars to the debt.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman say when that was added? The hon. gentleman gives a fact—if it be a fact—that transpired after they came into possession of the Government, as a reason why they came into possession. He says that the course taken after the people of Nova Scotia had made them members of the Administration was the reason why the people of Nova Scotia elected them as such.

Mr. POWELL. I understood the hon. gentleman to say the last election.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am pointing out the fact that these gentlemen were in power before the last election, and they carried the election. The good old county of Annapolis, the good loyal county, that county which is eminently loyal, which returns the hon. gentleman who made this violent and most vociferous loyalist speech this evening, is represented in the local legislature by Mr. Longley, a gentleman returned to that legislature by a larger majority than ever returned the hon. gentleman to this House. How does the hon. gentleman account for that fact?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). It is the franchise. They disfranchised the Dominion officials down there, and that is why they gained the election.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has explained to us how he became a member of this House. He is sent here by the officials of the Dominion, and if it were not for the officials of the Dominion, he would not be here at all.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Indirectly, that is true.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I must say that the hon. gentleman has not given us a very high opinion of the people of Nova Scotia by the speech which he has made here this evening. And I would be rather inclined to form my impression of those people from their having returned Mr. Fielding, Mr. Longley, and others, with a majority to support them, to the legislature at Halifax than from the observations which the hon. gentleman has addressed to the House this evening. I look rather to the example of the people of Nova Scotia in supporting that administration than to the precepts which the hon. gentleman has claimed here this evening with regard to these people. Otherwise, I would suppose that they were of rather suspicious character.

Now, the hon. gentleman has told us a good deal about the disloyalty of these people. He has told us that they pulled down the British flag, that they erected the Stars and Stripes, that they did a number of other heinous things which are certainly very wicked, and I would be willing to agree with the hon. gentleman if he had not drawn upon his imagination for his facts, that these were very serious offences on the part of the Government, yet the people of Nova Scotia has again and again entrusted the government of that country to these people, and placed in them the most implicit confidence.

Then the hon. gentleman told us about a terrible offence which the government of Nova Scotia has committed with regard to the schools there. Why, they ought to have made Dominion Day a holiday, and have given to the children the opportunity of shouting as loud as they please, of running as fast as they please, on that day, all over the country, but the Government of Nova Scotia, just out of perversity of disposition in consequence of the original sin that rests upon it, refused to make Dominion Day a holiday. Well, I know that there are a great many people in Ireland who do not march and sing and rejoice over the story of the battle of the Boyne. They have historical reasons for the course which they take. These reasons may be right or they may be wrong, but nevertheless, they are easily accounted for. Now, it does so happen that the people of Nova Scotia were brought into this Dominion against their will. They think that the course taken towards them was a very improper and a very unconstitutional one, and they are not going very readily to rejoice over what they look upon as their humiliation. A few years ago there were men in this country advocating the National Policy, and they were told that that National Policy would weaken British connection, and they were friends of the hon. gentleman from Annapolis. They were, like him, devoted to the National Policy, and what was their answer when that statement was made? They said it was so much the worse for British connection. Now, let us suppose for a moment that the people of the United Kingdom took it into their heads that they would be better rid of Canada. Let us suppose that they undertook to make a bargain with the United States to hand Canada over and annex it to that country, and that they would not be particular about consulting us. If they did they might consult a moribund Parliament, and I do not know that they would ever have a better opportunity than the present, for if there ever was a moribund Parliament anywhere, that Parliament exists here now. Let us suppose that the British Government and Parliament undertook to deal with us and decide our destiny without consulting us at all. What would be the feeling of this country with regard to the transaction—whether it would be a transaction in their interests or not? Would they not feel humiliated? Would they not think they should have had a voice in deciding what their fate would be? And the people of Nova Scotia said we elected a legislature under the constitution we had, but we did not elect a Parliament to transfer us to another body without our consent. That was the position of Nova Scotia, and if all the hon. gentleman said about that holiday were true, would it be an extraordinary thing under the circumstances?

Then the hon. gentleman became very violent with regard to the visit of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) to Boston. It was almost enough to make one hope that the hon. gentleman would not go to Boston again. It seems to have inoculated hon. gentlemen opposite with a sort of poison, and the disease it gives must be contagious. It broke out in the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) early in the session and the hon. member for Annapolis has been at fever heat with it. Is it very extraordinary that the leader of the Opposition should go to Boston? The increasing anger of hon. gentlemen about this incident reminds one of the story of the old lady who, reading the account in the book of Genesis of Joseph being sold into Egypt was much distressed. But when she read it a second time she said: I had a good deal of sympathy with him at first, but here he is sold into Egypt again, and he is a fool for putting himself in the power of his brothers a second time. Hon. gentlemen opposite grew warm on this subject last year but this year they virtually say to the leader of the Opposition: You have been guilty of an abominable crime, of a treasonable offence in going to Boston and speaking there, and you ought not to be tolerated as the leader of a party in this House. But later on the hon. member for Annapolis virtually said: You are a decent fellow yourself, but you are surrounded by a very bad lot. So the hon. gentleman has blown in all directions upon my hon. friend here to-night. Sir, Lord Elgin was in Boston and made a speech there. Sir John Young some years later, made a speech at, I think Augusta, in the state of Maine, and discussed the relation between England and the United States, and discussed the political destiny of Canada. I did not altogether like that speech, but if the hon. gentleman will turn to that speech he will see that this gentleman who was not a leader of one side or the other but the Governor General said things very objectionable from his super-loyal standpoint. The hon. gentleman said he was delighted to find that hon. gentlemen on this side were so loyal, and somehow he seemed to get it into his head that he had something to do with that loyalty. The hon. gentleman is labouring under a delusion. Mr. Canning speaks of a man who, hearing a noise in a theatre said: That is my thunder and my hail. So the hon. gentleman says that gentlemen on this side are loyal and that he is to be congratulated upon having made them so. Hon. gentlemen on this side have no need to go to a reformatory to be made loyal, they have always been loyal. If the hon. gentleman were on this side and had the experience of being in opposition, instead of being invigorated by the cool and bracing airs that blow in these shades he would be one of the most discontented men; he would be crying out blue ruin and wanting to establish soup kitchens. We know what these hon. gentlemen did when they had the opportunity before. The hon. gentleman said he was delighted to find we were loyal, but he took an extraordinary way of showing his pleasure. I think I have never heard him in a more irritable mood and violent mood; I have never known him to evince a stronger disposition to fight everybody. I could not tell what was the matter with the hon. member for Annapolis to rouse his indignation and provoke his intense excitement, until at last he announced that the Hon. Mr. Longley had been nominated as the Liberal candidate in Annapolis.

The hon. gentleman made a few remarks with regard to flour and pork. I shall not follow him in that discussion, because I do not know exactly where he was. He argued that the duty upon flour did not increase the price, and did not impose any additional burden upon the consumer. But, when he came to pork, he hesitated. He did not seem to be able to get over pork. He did not tell us whether the duty on pork increased the price to the consumer or not. But I wish to say a word or two with regard to some features of the tariff, and I shall occupy only a few minutes. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who have spoken on this subject have overlooked some patent facts. From 1860, when the high tariff was introduced in the United States—or rather counting from 1865, because one could hardly judge of prices before that time in consequence of the fluctuating value of the money that was in circulation—to 1878, there was a gradual fall in the price of lands in the United States. And on the Canadian side during the same time there was a gradual increase in the price of lands. I would like hon. gentlemen to bear that fact in mind, and it is a fact. In 1878 you changed the tariff in Canada, and immediately what was happening on the American side began to be manifest on this side. From that hour there has been a gradual diminution in the value of farm lands. To what is that attributable? Mainly to the National Policy. Now, the hon. gentleman refers to lands in England. Why, Sir, lands in England are in a different position. Agricultural lands in England, so far as they have diminished in value, have diminished because of the lowering of the prices of transporting the product of the lands of America, and India and Russia. Now, that is not our position. The diminution here has been in consequence of rendering the land less profitable by the cost of everything that the farmer consumes.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. By opening up the North-west Territories.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In part by the construction of more railways than are required, but largely for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, I could easily show that, but I do not wish to trespass upon the time of the House. I take one instance; I take a township containing 53,760 acres. That township had 300 inhabitants less in 1891 than it had in 1881. That township has diminished on the average by three per cent a year for the last twelve years, and for the ten years preceding, the land increased at least 3 per cent a year. Now, what does that mean? It means that lands being valued at $40 an acre, and I am taking the assessed value, there was a loss of $64,512 every year to the holders of those lands. Then I take again the 300 labourers. They represent labour worth $60,000 a year, which has been withdrawn from the cultivation of those lands. That represents to the little village in the township the loss of a market of $15,000 a year in clothing, $3,000 in boots and shoes, $7,000 in groceries. So you see there is over $144,000 loss in the township every year during the last ten years.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Has the hon. gentleman based his theory upon the idea that these 300 had left the country altogether; and if not, should not the country still be credited with those who have gone to the North-west and elsewhere?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman asks me a question. I can tell him that three-fourths of these men are in Michigan. Then there is more. Look at the losses. The village sustained a loss of $20,000 a year on the sale of products to those persons who have gone away. Take an ordinary township, and what is the result? You have a large number of carpenters, of painters and of other mechanics, who formerly were employed by farmers in making fences, in erecting buildings, in repairing buildings, and in doing work of that sort. You have the sale of the nails, and the lumber, and the paint, and what is required for those repairs, that has, in a great measure, ceased. You have nothing like the improvements going on, you have nothing like the amount of capital expended in repairs that you had fifteen years ago.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). What does Mr. Blue say about the increase in farm buildings?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No matter what Mr. Blue says. I am speaking of what has come under my personal observation, and I take a single instance in which I have made personal inquiries. Why, Sir, if I were to take the whole county, I would say that a county of 60,000 people sustains an additional tax of $180,000 a year compared with 1878; I would say that that $180,000 would be infinitely better employed by the persons who produced it, who earned it, if they were allowed to retain it in the production of wealth, than it can be in the hands of any administration. I am not going further to trespass upon the indulgence of the House. I take a single point, and bring it under your attention, and I ask every candid man on that side of the House whether the agricultural population are not sustaining serious damage in consequence of the policy that has been adopted.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into committee of Supply.

Resolution reported.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 76) to incorporate the British American Coal and Transportation Company.—(Mr. Hazen.)

THE CANADIAN JOCKEY CLUB.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 48) respecting the Canadian Jockey Club.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LISTER. This Bill has not been reprinted.

Mr. TISDALE. All the amendments are in it.

Mr. LISTER. The amendments proposed in committee are quite extensive, and, in my judgment, before the Bill is considered by the committee the Bill should be reprinted, so that all members may have an opportunity to consider well its provisions. What is proposed by the promoters of this measure is to incorporate a joint stock company, to be called the Canadian Jockey Club, and there is to be issued by that company stock to the amount mentioned by the Bill, and I understand that the large majority of that stock will be held by the gentlemen who are promoting this measure, but who are not acting in accord with the horse-breeders throughout the country. The effect of the Bill, if passed as it is now, will be to give to the stock the voting power, instead of to representatives of the clubs, while, if, perforce, it provide for taking in and affiliating clubs throughout the country, there is no provision that will prevent stockholders from having entire control of the management of the company. If it is in the interest of stock-breeding, then, all the clubs throughout the country should have a right to affiliate, and the gentlemen who promote the measure should have no more power on the board than every other club, which it is contended should have one representative each, no matter how much stock is held by the promoters, that the stock should not have the right to vote, but that every club should have one vote. In that way representation from all the clubs would be obtained, but in this way the joint stock company would obtain entire control of the club. It is true, the clubs would have representation on the board, but, so far as the Bill itself is concerned, would have no voice in the management of the central club. I say, therefore, that the principle of the Bill is wrong. It should not get its power as a joint stock company; its power should be that of a club, the object being to interest breeders in improving the breeding of horses, and every club should have a vote, regardless altogether of the question of stock, stock, in fact, being thrown on one side entirely. But, under this Bill, the stock is to govern, and the powers placed in the hands of the stockholders is simply enormous, not so great, to be sure, as they were under the Bill as originally presented, but still they are simply enormous. It will be within the power of this joint stock company to say that any horse that is found upon a non-affiliated track shall be debarred, and that it shall not have the right to run upon any affiliated track. The intention is that the rules of this jockey club shall be the same as those of New York and other states, and the result of the Bill will be that any horse declared ineligible by this company will be ineligible in New York state or in any of the other states acting with the company which it is now proposed to incorporate here. Regardless altogether as to whether the horse is properly debarred or not, regardless altogether whether the owner has done anything which ought to debar the horse, the mere fact of the horse having gone upon an unaffiliated track will be sufficient, if this company thinks proper to make that a rule, to debar that horse, and to prevent him going upon any track in Canada or the United States not affiliated with this jockey club. The result of that will be that this joint stock company can compel every track in Canada to affiliate with this track, and thus bring every track in Canada under the control of this company. That, Sir, I submit, is not good legislation. It is simply unprecedented. I do not believe that you can find any such legislation as is proposed here in any state or in any province of this Dominion. For the benefit of the committee I will take the liberty of reading a letter which I have received from a gentleman who is well qualified to express an opinion upon this question. He writes:

I have been following with much interest the various phases the Canadian Jockey Club Bill has taken, and I see with some alarm that it passed the Private Bills Committee yesterday; true, in somewhat a modified form, but still in such shape as to be a menace to horsemen generally; but more particularly to race-track owners the country over.

I have noticed in the papers, you are taking an interest in this very uncalled for piece of legislation, and that you appreciate clearly what a tremendous power is being given to the individuals who are asking for it; and consequently, I am calling your attention to a few points which strike me as vital, even though the Bill be passed in its modified form—if such its present shape can be termed.

The great cry of those at its back is, "in the interest of racing these sixty days' meetings must be put a stop to." I think I almost quote William Hendrie's words before the committee. With these ideas I am entirely in sympathy. Now, this I understand is to be done by an insertion of certain words in the Criminal Code of 1892, so that plank is pulled from the platform. But still they do not seem satisfied, and consequently it must be that more is desired. Now, to my mind, it is very wrong that any body of men, especially the governors of race tracks,—unless elected by the horsemen of the Dominion,—should control racing; and the clause in the Bill regarding affiliation is the one to which I wish particularly to call your attention, for as the section now reads, they have power to refuse a license to any track, whether it obey their mandates or not. This is distinctly wrong, since if they act in unison with the American Jockey Club, all horses racing on such a track would be disqualified everywhere. I think it should be framed in such a way, that any race track should have the privilege of coming into the association, and if they obey the rules, should remain members in good standing, and should have a representative on the board who would have a voice in all that was done; each member of the board to have one vote and not have it regulated by the amount of stock held. We do not live in an age when any close corporation,—however high may be the standing of each individual member,—may be trusted with such gigantic power as that demanded by these people.

I would like to call your attention to one point, but with apologies as it is an amendment suggested by yourself. I refer to the question of outlawing all horses on tracks not in affiliation with the Canadian Jockey Club. If an amendment in accordance with my suggestion could be inserted, there would be no necessity for this clause, for each track would be given its election of coming in or remaining out, and if they did not accept what must necessarily be reasonable rules, then in the interest of racing generally, they should be made to pay the penalty of outlawing.

I hope I do not trespass too much on your time and patience, but I take such a deep interest in this matter that I should like to let you know my ideas. If you think this letter might be used to any advantage you may use it as you think fit. These are my sentiments regarding what is for the best interests of the turf, and the breeding of thoroughbred horses in Canada.

This is from a gentleman who takes an interest in this matter, and one of the leading turf-men in the country who has seen this letter, has endorsed it as follows:—

I have read this letter and it embodies my ideas concerning the Bill exactly.

Mr. SPROULE. Name.

Mr. LISTER. It is of no consequence, I suppose.

Mr. SPROULE. You have read the letter, and you had better give the name.

Mr. LISTER. The letter was written by Mr. R. R. Pringle and the endorsement was by Mr. Joseph E. Seagram.

Mr. SPROULE. They are very good men, too.

Mr. LISTER. These are the men. I beg to move, Mr. Chairman:

That the committee rise and that the Bill be referred back to the Private Bills Committee for further consideration.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) is like the gentleman who wrote that letter. Both of them must have misunderstood this Bill. Mr. Seagram sent a long circular, and a very able one, I think, to every member of this House.

Mr. LISTER. I did not get it.

Mr. TISDALE. Well, he sent a circular to a great many members before this Bill came up. On account of that circular and for other reasons the Bill as first introduced was reprinted before it was submitted to the committee at all. Then, when it came before the committee, the Bill was changed and that is the reason why I mentioned that the amendments were so simple that it was not necessary, in my opinion, to have them reprinted. The principal change was this, and it was a very important one: As the Bill was introduced and taken before the committee, it enabled the Canadian Jockey Club to control all the clubs in the country whether they affiliated with it or not. It also asked for the prohibition of race meetings lasting more than a certain number of days. Now, the prohibition of race meetings was struck out at the suggestion of the Minister of Justice, who thought that if any such thing was to be dealt with it should be dealt with in the Criminal Code. The striking out of that clause was the first important change made in the Bill. The other changes were to strictly limit the Bill to these clubs who saw fit to affiliate, so as to make it entirely voluntary; and in regard to the important question that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) mentioned I will read the clause, showing that it does give representation to every club that affiliates. Subsection 2 of clause 4 says:

2. The club committee shall consist of twelve members of the club, and each duly incorporated racing or hunt club in Canada, being the owner or lessee of a race track affiliated with the club, shall be entitled to have at least one member on the club committee; and if it is necessary, owing to the increase or decrease of such clubs, to increase or reduce the number of the committee, such increase or decrease, as the case may be, may from time to time be effected by by-law of the club committee.

Mr. LISTER. It gives representation, but no vote.

Mr. TISDALE. Yes, it gives a vote.

Mr. LISTER. Who is to elect a member on the club committee?

Mr. TISDALE. His own club. Now, that provides distinctly that every club that affiliates shall have one member on the committee, and if the twelve gentlemen whose names are mentioned as the provisional club committee are not sufficient, then every club—and from remarks of gentlemen before the committee, I would be within the mark in saying there are at least one hundred of them in the Dominion—every club that joins shall have a member on the club committee. If there are fifty clubs affiliated, the club committee would have to be composed of fifty members. Let me say, that so far as Mr. Seagram is concerned, when I received the circular some ten days before the meeting of the committee, I asked him by all means to be present, because I agree with everything the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) has said in regard to Mr. Seagram's connection with racing. I agree with everything the hon. gentleman has said regarding Mr. Seagram. He wrote to me saying that it would not be possible for him to come here, but he hoped the Bill would be modified so as to meet his views. He took strong ground, and I think proper ground, against the compulsory clauses of the Bill providing that this Canadian Jockey Club should have control over any clubs that did not see fit to affiliate with it. I wrote to him this morning, informing him that his views had been sustained by the Private Bills Committee, and that the horsemen who were present, including the secretary of the association, at once conceded to the limitation clauses of the Bill to which he objected; and I explained, on their behalf, that the clauses regarding compulsory powers had been originally put into the Bill in order to elicit discussion from horsemen throughout the country. I have more regard for the views of the Horse Breeding Association than I have for those of the racing men, and they assented to this portion of the Bill in every particular. I do not know whether the other gentleman is an owner and breeder of horses or not, though I know him to be a high authority on racing matters. At any rate, ample notice of the Bill was given to everybody interested, not only by circular letter, but by publication for several days in the newspapers, as to when the Bill would come before the committee; and there was a very full representation, not only of the gentlemen whose names are here, but of the Horse Breeders' Association, which is a more extensive and important body than the Racing Association. Now, why should we have any delay? The very points made in that letter have been met in the Bill. There is a clause providing that every association that joins the club shall have a member on the board of directors. The whole scheme would be inoperative and of no benefit to the different racing associations if the Bill did not contain this provision. That is the very principle of the Bill. But it is limited, and I think properly limited, in its effect to those who see fit to join. Those who remain outside of the club are free. Therefore, I cannot see that any case has been made out for delay. What could be fairer? How could you form an association that would be workable otherwise than in the way proposed? First, the Bill compels nobody to join. In the next place, if any club does join, there is no danger of its being swamped. The stock of the club is only $10,000 in shares of $250 each, with a few hundred dollars paid in to comply with the law. The club was incorporated first by letters patent under the general Act. The gentlemen who compose it are representative men in Ontario and Quebec. The provisional directors are: William Hendrie, contractor, and James M. Lottridge, brewer, both of the city of Hamilton, in the province of Ontario; John Davis, customs official, and George M. Hendrie, contractor, both of the city of Windsor, in the said province; Andrew Smith, veterinary surgeon, Robert Davies, brewer, and George W. Beardmore, merchant, all of the city of Toronto, in said province of Ontario; Adam Beck, of the city of London in said province, merchant, and James P. Dawes, brewer, and James H. Wardlow, merchant, both of the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec. These are all representative men and men of high character, who have a great many thousand pounds invested in the breeding of the best class of horses. Not only do they assent to the Bill, and not only did Mr. Beck and Mr. Sinclair, the secretary of the Horse Breeders' Association, who came here to represent them, agree to the Bill, and through them the people who have hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in the breeding of horses. I am satisfied that all the objections raised by the two gentlemen mentioned have been met. The reports that went out through the papers were that the compulsory clauses were eliminated; but the details were not noticed by the reporters, especially the important detail I mention, giving each club a representative on the board of directors or the club committee. If only a few clubs join, this will not amount to much, but if many join, it will be very important to them. I think, therefore, no case has been made out for delaying this Bill. There was a full representation before the committee; all questions were asked there and answered by gentlemen who understood the matter; there was a full attendance of the Private Bills Committee; and the provisions of the Bill as it was adopted were agreeable all around.

Mr. EDGAR. As one of the members of the House who have not the advantage of belonging to the Private Bills Committee, it strikes me that the point which we are most interested in having explained is whether or not this association is a voluntary one—whether or not other racing associations are entirely free to join or affiliate with it. That occurs to me to be the point we want to understand. If they are entirely free to join or not to join, and there is nothing against public interest in the Bill, it becomes largely a domestic matter, and I do not see why we should interfere with it. But the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill has not explained to us exactly the clauses of the Bill which show that this is a voluntary association.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that there is a good deal of force in the objection raised by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister). If it is true that no association can join this incorporated club unless the latter is disposed to admit it, that would be a very serious objection. As there are a number of important amendments in the Bill, I think it ought to be reprinted before the House is asked to pass it. There are a great many members who are not on the Private Bills Committee and who know a very little about the nature of the Bill. The names of the two gentlemen who wrote that letter ought to be a sufficient guarantee, because they are thorough sportsmen who have owned some of the best horses in Canada, and are men of authority in sporting circles; so that when they take objection to the Bill, it seems to me that is sufficient ground for our considering it fairly before we allow the Bill to pass. I do not think that any harm will be done if the Bill is allowed to stand until it can be reprinted and every member will have an opportunity of going over it and seeing for himself whether it is on the proper lines or not.

Mr. TISDALE. If any one wishes to have the Bill reprinted, I will not resist that suggestion.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask not only that the Bill be reprinted, but that a reasonable delay be given, so that I, for instance, may communicate with the Racing Association in Winnipeg in regard to it. I understand, from what has fallen from previous speakers, that this Bill practically affects every race track in Canada, by means of the power this club are going to get with regard to ruling horses off the track, and so forth. I believe that associations of this kind should not run on the principle of joint stock companies. Surely it ought to be representative wholly. We ought not to incorporate private persons coming here and asking for privileges of this kind. Such privileges should only be given to a body made up entirely of representatives from the different racing tracks, and having no stock at all, because stock is not a thing that is necessary in a body of this kind. It is not a question of a man having a thousand or two thousand dollars invested in a jockey club, which ought to give him a say in its management; but it is a question of the representation of the different racing tracks, and I am entirely without any advice from the Racing Association of Winnipeg, which is an important body. I should like to have time to send them a copy of this Bill, when reprinted, and get their advice as to whether I should oppose or support it.

Mr. HAZEN. With regard to what has been said by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) and the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), I would like to say, having been present, as chairman, at the meeting of the Private Bills Committee which considered this measure, that the whole object and intention of the Bill is that its rules should only be binding on such clubs as voluntarily come in and affiliate with this club, and that in no sense is it binding upon any club or racing association that does not affiliate with it. The whole object which the gentlemen who came before the committee had in view, and I think a very commendable object, was this: They were gentlemen who had invested large sums in improving the breed of horses in this country, and in keeping up a high standard for the race courses of this country. It seems that about a year ago, a number of people came over from the southern states to Windsor, and there conducted a series of races during fifty or sixty days, which resulted in a great amount of gambling and evil. What the promoters of this Bill desire is to make horse-racing in Canada as respectable as it possibly can be made. As the Bill was first presented, it provided that the central association should be able to make rules that would control racing upon all tracks in Canada, whether they were tracks or associations affiliated with the club or not. That feature was eliminated in the Bill before the committee, and as it stands to-day, the association is a purely voluntary one. It is perfectly voluntary for any racing association to come in and affiliate with this club or not.

Mr. MARTIN. While apparently voluntary in name, this association, by the powers given it, is able indirectly to make its rules practically compulsory on all courses.

Mr. HAZEN. I do not think so. No power is given this club in this measure that is not now already possessed by any association in Canada. That is the way the committee were impressed with the matter, and, after full discussion, they determined not to adopt the amendment which had been moved. However, since this Bill has been before the Committee of the Whole to-day, it is clear to me that a little amendment has to be made in subsection G, section 5, in order to make that perfectly clear. However, as the mover of the Bill has consented that it should be reprinted, it is a waste of time to discuss the matter now.

Mr. CASEY. I quite agree in the suggestion that the Bill should be reprinted before we finally discuss it, but there are one or two points that might well be raised now so that the whole House may think of them before we come to a final discussion. In the first place, I have very grave doubts that we have any right to charter an association for the purpose of carrying on racing, or to give to any such body authority to make rules which shall govern racing throughout Canada, or on any particular tracks in Canada. It seems to me that the question of racing does not come within the list of subjects given to this Parliament by the British North America Act. It does not come under the head of trade and commerce, and it might more properly be classed under the head of civil rights or police regulation, which belong to the provinces. That would be a question for the Minister of Justice to consider very thoroughly before this Bill is again submitted to this House. But if we have the right to make any law on the subject, I am sure that our powers should not be exercised further than to charter certain persons as the Jockey Club of Canada, providing for the admission to the club of representatives of all racing associations duly organized and recognized in any part of Canada, and give the club power to make rules regarding such tracks alone as are affiliated with it.

I think that is as far as we ought to go. I do not believe that we should give them any power to keep a stud book for all Canadian-bred horses, as this Bill appears to do. There are other much more important associations than the Jockey Club, which are concerned in the breeding of horses, and to them, or a board selected from all of them, should be entrusted that work. The Jockey Club should not be authorized to disqualify horses which are run on other tracks than those controlled by the club. I need not go into the details of my objections to the Bill, since I object, in the first place, to the jurisdiction of the House in connection with it. I hope the Minister of Justice will study up the matter, and give us his matured opinion when we are next asked to pass the Bill. I think the Bill should be referred back to the Private Bills Committee before it comes up again in Committee of the Whole. The meeting of that committee was held on Friday last at an hour which prevented a great number of members attending.

Mr. EDGAR. There is one feature of this short discussion that, I think, will be very satisfactory and reassuring to the country, because it is perfectly clear there is a large number of gentlemen, on both sides, determined to oppose the passing of a coercion Bill on its second reading.

Mr. DICKEY. I promise the committee that I will look very carefully into the Bill before it comes up again. I do not think much of the question as to jurisdiction, because this Bill belongs to the whole of Canada, and I do not think any other legislature could possibly pass it. However, that is a matter for consideration. I think a good deal of consideration could profitably be given to the provisions of section 4. It seems to me that the mode in which affiliation is to take place is very indefinite, and the status of the affiliated clubs is also not very definite. I think the promoter of the Bill would do well to consider that, so that he would be prepared with some amendment when it comes before the committee again.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister says that this Bill must be within our power because it applies to the whole of Canada, and no other legislature can pass an Act which does so. That point seems to me very ill taken. There are certain classes of subjects in regard to which this House is not allowed to legislate at all, and upon which only the local legislatures can pass Acts. On such subjects, no local legislature could pass an Act affecting the whole of Canada, but neither could this House. I believe, as at present advised, subject to a much more matured opinion of the Minister of Justice than he seems to have now, that this House has not the right to legislate on this subject at all for the whole or any part of Canada. I may say that I am not at all opposed to the objects of the Bill, as I understood them originally from the promoters. I find that the principal point in the Bill in regard to which I spoke with Mr. Hendrie and other promoters, is not in the Bill as now before us. That was the prohibition of long-term racing at certain points. I believe such racing is not sport; it does not promote morality or anything else that is good, and I would be strongly opposed to it. I see that this provision is eliminated, and I believe it is proposed to reach that object by an amendment to the criminal law, in regard to which the Minister of Justice has no doubt been consulted. I do not know in what other way it could be got at by this Parliament. I believe that the whole subject of the regulation of racing, except so far as amendments to the criminal law are concerned, belongs to the legislatures of the different provinces; and I hope the Minister of Justice will look at it more critically than he evidently has done, before he gives another opinion on that point.

Mr. MCGREGOR. We have not had time to hear from those to whom we sent the amended Bill. Before the Bill is referred back—

Mr. TISDALE. It is not proposed to refer it back. The committee simply rises and reports progress, for the purpose of reprinting the Bill.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Another point to which I wish to call attention is, that this, being a close corporation, as it were, can decide exactly what tracks shall affiliate with it. There are a number of tracks in Canada upon which large amounts of money have been expended, and this association may decide not to allow any of these tracks to affiliate, except those acceptable to themselves. This may involve hardship and great loss to certain people. What we say is, that, where a track has been properly conducted, where the owner of the horse is an honest man, and the horse has no bar against him, the track should have the right to affiliate and the owner should have the right to run his horse on the affiliated track.

Otherwise, this association may exclude a track from affiliation, and, if a man runs his horse on that track, it will be barred from appearing on any track in affiliation with the association. I hope time will be given to send out the Bill to the different parties who are interested.

Committee rose and reported progress.

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. POWELL moved second reading of Bill (No. 75) respecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company (Limited). He said: I would ask that the Bill be allowed to stand.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion having been put, it would be better to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. HAZEN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Mr. INNES (for Mr. McMullen) asked:

1. How many Orders in Council were passed between the 4th and 17th January, 1896?
2. How many of the same involved increases of salaries or allowances?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The number of Orders in Council passed within the time stated was 235, of which 28 involved increases of salaries or allowances.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—PAYMENT OF DEPARTMENTAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. EDGAR asked:

Was the opinion of the Department of Justice taken before the passage of the Order in Council of 1st February, 1896, respecting the payment of departmental employees, an extract from which appears in the Auditor General's Report, page Q 217?

Mr. FOSTER. It does not appear that it was.

SOURIS BREAKWATER.

Mr. PERRY asked:

Is the contract for Souris Breakwater, Prince Edward Island, let? If so, who is the contractor? Was the lowest tender accepted? What is the amount of contract? Is the work commenced? When is it to be completed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In the absence of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Oimet), I beg to reply: The contract for the Souris Breakwater, P.E.I., is let, the contractors being Messrs. Heney & Smith, of Ottawa. The lowest regular tender was accepted. The amount of the contract is $27,950. Material has been purchased, and, after the opening of navigation, the work will be commenced and pushed forward vigorously. The work is to be completed by the 17th of February, 1897.

FEES AND COSTS, DISTRICTS OF MONTREAL AND QUEBEC.

Mr. MONET (for Mr. McShane) asked :

Statement of fees and costs paid during 1895 to law firms or individual lawyers by the Dominion Government in the districts of Montreal and Quebec, and all costs? What is the amount paid O'Connor & Hogg in 1895 for services rendered in the districts of Montreal and Quebec, or on any cases arising therefrom?

Mr. DICKEY. In answer to the last part of the question, I would say that the amount of the fees, costs and disbursements paid O'Connor & Hogg in 1895 for services rendered in the districts of Montreal and Quebec, or any cases arising therefrom, was $4,495.15. For a reply to the first part of the question, I beg to refer the hon. gentleman to the Auditor General's Report.

IMPORTS OF FLOUR AND WHEAT.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked :

1. How many barrels of flour have been imported into Canada for consumption since the 1st day of July, 1895, up to and including the 31st day of January, 1896?

2. Amount of duty paid on the same?

3. Quantity of wheat imported for consumption in Canada during the same period?

Mr. IVES. In the absence of the Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood), I beg to state that: 1st. The total number of barrels of flour imported into Canada for consumption between the 1st day of July, 1895, and the 31st December, 1895, was 26,913, upon which duty was paid to the amount of $20,185.01. 2nd. The total quantity of wheat imported into Canada for consumption during the same period was 76,647 bushels, upon which duty was paid to the amount of $11,947.06.

CENTRAL EXPERIMENTAL FARM—SALES OF HAY.

Mr. McMILLAN asked :

Was any hay sold from the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa within the last twelve months? If so, how much? Was it advertised and offers received before being sold? Was it the cut of 1894 or 1895? Who was the purchaser or purchasers? What was the price per ton and did the price paid include delivery at the station, or was delivery extra? To what address and railway station was it shipped?

Mr. FOSTER. Some hay was sold from the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa within the last twelve months, the quantity being 69 tons 1,600 pounds. It was not advertised, but inquiries were made by the farm foreman of the Central Farm to ascertain its value, before any prices were fixed on it, and it was offered at the prices estimated by him as its full value at the time.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Of the total, 61 tons 54 pounds were the cut of 1895, and 8 tons 1,546 pounds the cut of 1894. There was sold on the 31st October, 1895, to John Moss, 2¾ tons at $6 per ton, crop of 1895, not delivered; to James Hellem, 2 tons on the same date, at $6, not delivered; to C. Bailey, 1 and 1-10th tons on the same date, at $6, not delivered; to D. Porter, of Wiaraton, Ont., in December, 55 tons 450 pounds of hay of 1895, pressed and delivered to car on siding near farm, at $10 per ton; to the same purchaser, and on the same date, 8 tons 1,546 pounds of hay of the growth of 1894, at $8 per ton, also pressed and delivered to car on siding near farm. These latter quantities were forwarded to the address of D. Porter, Wiaraton.

POST OFFICE, VICTORIA, B.C.

Mr. EDGAR asked :

1. To whom and when was the contract first let for the construction of the post office at Victoria, B.C.? What was the amount of the contract price? Who were the contractor's sureties? To what value (if any) was work done by the first contractor?

2. Was the contract given to the present contractors, Messrs. Elford & Smith, after public competition by tender or otherwise, and was their tender the lowest? What was the amount of their contract? What are the names of all persons who are or have been sureties for Messrs. Elford & Smith on this work? How much has been paid to the said contractors? Have they made claim for any further sum? When should the building be completed, according to terms of contract? Has the building been completed according to contract?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1. To Mr. Fred. Toms, of Ottawa, on 21st November, 1894, for $195,765. The security given was an accepted cheque for $10,000 drawn on the Merchants' Bank, of Ottawa. No work was done by Mr. Toms. He died at Victoria before the work could be commenced. 2. Messrs. Elford & Smith were the next lowest tenderers after Mr. Toms, and they accepted to do the work at the price of the tender of Mr. Toms, whose tender was the lowest received after public advertisements. It was similar to that of Mr. Toms, namely, $195,765. The security given by Messrs. Elford & Smith for the fulfilment of their contract is a deposit receipt for $10,000 from the Bank of British Columbia, payable to the order of the hon. the Minister of Public Works. No personal securities were given. $48,530 has been paid to the said contractors. They have made no claim for any further sum. The building should be completed 1st May, 1897; the date has not yet come for completion.

DOMINION REFORMATORY.

Mr. CHARLTON (for Mr. Mulock) asked :

1. The Minister of Public Works having, on the 24th of February, 1896, stated that the Government had disbursed certain moneys, amounting in all to $6,211.92, on account of the Dominion Reformatory, what are the names of the persons to whom such moneys have been paid ?

2. What are the respective amounts paid such persons ?

3. On what accounts were such payments respectively made ?

VISIT OF SIR DONALD SMITH TO WINNIPEG.

Mr. McCARTHY asked :

1. Was Sir Donald Smith authorized on behalf of the Government to negotiate with the Premier or administration of the province of Manitoba with reference to or on the subject of the school law of that province ?

2. If yea, has Sir Donald Smith made any report with respect to such negotiation ?

3. Or did Sir Donald Smith voluntarily or otherwise undertake to act as mediator between the Government of Canada and the Government of Manitoba, or to negotiate with the said last mentioned government on the subject referred to in the first preceding question ?

4. If yea, has Sir Donald Smith made any report in respect of such mediation or negotiation ?

5. And what, in either of the supposed cases, was the substance of Sir Donald Smith's report ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to say, in reply to the hon. member, that the answer to the first portion of the question is, No. In response to the remainder of the question, I have to say, that the only communication that has taken place between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Donald Smith, was of a purely personal character, no report having been made.

FISHING LICENSES.

Mr. CHARLTON asked :

1. The number of fishing licenses granted by the Government within the district of which David Sharp, of Port Dover, Ont., is fishery overseer, for the years 1894 and 1895, stating the number for each year ?

2. The name of each licensee, the territory covered by each license and the amount received for each license in each of the years 1894 and 1895 ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the hon. member will be satisfied with an answer to the first part of the question, I will reply ; but, as the answer to the second part of the question will require a large amount of clerical work, I will ask him to put a notice on the paper.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will be satisfied with an answer to the first part of the question, and will put a notice on the paper for the balance of the information, if it can be obtained.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In 1894, there were 56 licenses granted for that district, and in 1895, 88.

CREAMERIES IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN moved :

That, in the opinion of this House, it would be expedient to apply $20,000 to aid in establishing creameries and cheese factories in the North-west Territories, and that this sum should be considered as an addition to the immigration grant.

He said : Last year, I moved a motion of which the present motion formed a part, but I have divided the motion this year, because I found that there are persons who were in favour of giving $20,000 to creameries in the North-west Territories, but opposed to a bonus on butter. The motion as to the bonus on butter I dropped, because it did not come up until after the tariff was brought down. But I find, from a discussion which took place here last year, and from the division which took place, that there seemed to be a strong feeling in favour of the motion that I had placed upon the paper. The Minister of Agriculture, in speaking to it, held out the hope, as I thought, that, when the finances of the country looked better, my proposition would be accepted by the Government. Those who opposed it, showed a complete misconception as to the position of the Territories and as to the claims that were made by these Territories, and as to what the Territories are entitled to. I could wish very much to be able to interest both sides of the House in this matter, and I am persuaded, that, if I could only get the leading men on both sides of the House to consider this proposition, they will agree with me. But, unfortunately, it is exceedingly difficult to get the House to pay attention to any question that is not strongly related to party battles, and, Mr. Speaker, I could wish that we made this chamber more a council for the advancement of the country, rather than a great party cockpit.

Mr. EDWARDS. You do your share.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I hope I do not contribute much to the cockpit character to the House, because that is a feature of this House that I should certainly like to see entirely abandoned. Now, the Minister of Agriculture said, last year, as a reason why the Government could not accept my motion:

Although the Government cannot pledge themselves at this time, with the finances as they are, to expend any such large sum as my hon. friend asks for, I have the authority of the Government to say to him that we are most sympathetic with regard to that industry in the Territories.

And the hon. member for York, I do not know whether he was supporting me or combatting the motion, but he seemed to be sympathetic, upbraided the Minister of Agriculture for not being ready to give me more than sympathy. Although I am glad to get that I could wish for something more satisfying. The member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) moved an amendment and spoke on it, and showed a complete misunderstanding of the claims of the Territories. When I ask here to-day for $20,000. I do not ask it as a favour from Parliament or as a grant, but 'ex debito justitia' it is a claim made by a province or any claim behind the subsidy that a province gets. And, Sir, the time will not be ill taken up, even supposing I do not get all I ask, if I can only get hon. members of this House to look at the exact position we occupy in the North-west as regards things that should be done there, because I say here, without fear of contradiction from either side of the House, that we are in the position to-day of being owed by the federal treasury over $1,200,000, and if the House will bear with me, I will show how that is. I found last year no objection from principle to my proposal set forward either by the Finance Minister or by the Minister of Agriculture. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), in opposing my motion, said:

I am not satisfied that the appropriation of $20,000 for which we are called upon to vote would receive proper application, so as to promote the best interests of the farming community. At all events, there is one sure thing, it is that we have already done a great deal in favour of the North-west.

The view that we have already in this Parliament done a great deal in favour of the North-west, is the view that I challenge right straight. I join issue with that position; I say it is untenable if it means this, that you have done more than you were entitled to do. I grant that the Government have done a great deal more than many hon. members would wish them to do, that the present Government have done far more for the North-west than many of their critics.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is a cockpit observation.

Mr. DAVIN. The spurs, I was going to say, of the hon. rooster for Bothwell, but I say the hon. member for Bothwell, on that occasion, were blunted. I am here to-day advocating a proposition that is of a protective character. I think we are making considerable progress in protection. I have been reading the Queen's speech in the Imperial Parliament, and I find Her Majesty has had a speech prepared for her by Lord Salisbury and by the man who used to be called the Apostle Paul of radicalism in England, Mr. Chamberlain, in which there is a strong protective measure adumbrated.

Mr. CASEY. He is not an apostle, but an apostate.

Mr. DAVIN. I said he was the Apostle Paul of radicalism, and if he has ceased to be a Radical, you may say he is an apostate to Radicalism, but probably the best way to consider him is that he was the Saul of Radicalism, and is now the Apostle Paul of Conservatism. There is a measure announced to check the importation of destitute aliens. That is going a long way from the position taken by Bright and Cobden, and is a thoroughly protective measure. Another measure indicated is for the betterment of agriculture in Ireland. This proposal of mine is a measure for the betterment of agriculture in the North-west Territories. I take it then, Mr. Speaker, that the only objection to my proposal is the money I ask, and in proceeding to remove that objection, I lay this down, that we owe the Territories at least, as I have said, $1,200,000. We kept from them last year $100,000, and we are determined to keep from them $100,000 in the forthcoming year. Until certain proposals lately made respecting irrigation are adopted, we cannot in any part of the North-west be sure of a grain crop every year. They are not sure of a crop in any country in the world, but by a wise adoption of the principles of irrigation that have proved successful in India, you may be sure of obtaining a crop every year in the North-west Territories. Besides, with the competition of the Argentine Republic and elsewhere, we cannot encourage the people anywhere to go into wheat raising exclusively. I think that we in this Parliament should be ready to do as much for the Territories as Russia has done for its provinces and it will interest my hon. friends of the Opposition if I add we ought to do as much or a little more than that apostle of free trade, the present Premier of Nova Scotia has done, and the Act which he passed in 1894 may show a reason why certain members on the Opposition side of the House may, when we come to vote, give me their votes on this matter. In 1894, what did the Minister of Agriculture in Russia, in despotic obscurantist Russia do? Wheat and all grains were very low, and he wisely determined to stimulate the different branches of agriculture, among them dairying, so as to convert the grain into more remunerative products. Dairy experts were employed from abroad from Denmark, from Germany, from Switzerland. Information on the dairy processes was published in the Russian language, and loans were raised to establish cheese and butter factories. Improvements were introduced respecting the carriage of dairy products by rail; in other words, they had in 1894 introduced the cold storage system that we have introduced, and what was of great importance, and I only wish we could do the same thing here, railway rates were reduced. Depots were established for the storage of butter and cheese, and a great impetus was given to the dairying industry. We are only following in the wake of European nations in what we have done, and we have not gone as far as Russia. Hon. gentlemen must bear in mind that in the North-west we have no provincial grant. A certain amount is given us every year, but we have no regular provincial subsidy. Our government, as I explained here on a previous occasion, is a kind of makeshift government, and so far as its resources go, it is, in my opinion, half-starved as to the money which it should have for doing the work of managing those Territories. But, Sir, not merely has Russia moved in this matter. Nova Scotia, whose Premier, Mr. W. S. Fielding, was one of the chairmen at the great Liberal convention of 1893, who was one of those who reported the tariff resolution, which has, you know, denounced protection; Mr. Fielding's government had an Act passed in 1894, in which there is the following clause:—

Any person, firm, or association, establishing and maintaining a creamery and cheese factory in Nova Scotia, shall be entitled to receive from the treasury, the following sums:—Two hundred dollars in the first year in which such creamery and cheese factory shall be in operation; one hundred dollars in the second year, and one hundred dollars in the third year.

This would amount to $400. The Act provides that these grants shall not be paid to any more than three factories in a county. There are seventeen counties in Nova Scotia, and, multiplying these by 400, you get $6,800, which this free trade Liberal Premier is ready to give for the carrying on of creameries, which, also, have the benefit of the lectures and the help which are given by the Dominion Government as well. There are thirty-eight members in the legislative assembly of Nova Scotia, and there are twenty-nine members in the legislative assembly of the North-west Territories. So, if we take that relation—although that is unfair to the North-west Territories—that would give you thirteen counties in the North-west Territories, to be multiplied by 400, which would amount to $5,200. If Mr. Fielding had the management of our affairs that is the sum he would give to the creameries in the North-west Territories. Well, Sir, that would be something. If we had, for instance, three creameries in Western Assiniboia, and three or four in Eastern Assiniboia, and three or four in Saskatchewan, and four, or five, or six in Alberta, getting this $400 each as help, which Mr. Fielding is ready to give to the creameries of Nova Scotia, it would be a great assistance to the creamery industry with us.

Mr. BORDEN. Mr. Fielding is giving it.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend, the member for King's (Mr. Borden) tells me that I am quite right in my inference, which I have taken from the Act, that Mr. Fielding is giving that sum of money. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Forbes) in discussing Mr. Fielding's action with me, said, But why should we take money from the federal treasury to give it to the North-west Territories? Now, Sir, that is the unfortunate position the people of the North-west are in, when we come to discuss their affairs in this House. Some hon. gentlemen cannot get it out of their heads that the North-west Territories are in the position of a province and have a subsidy; whereas we in this Parliament are governing the North-west Territories, and all that we have done is to give them a little assembly with twenty-nine members, having certain powers, and not full provincial powers. They have a little government up there that is simply a financial committee, without the power of making departments, and without the power of that responsible system, which is the British system, and which is the only possible way that representative government can be carried on successfully, economically, and properly. Our assembly in the North-west Territories is not in a position to do what the Nova Scotia Assembly can do. Sir, we have in the North-west Territories as intelligent a body of farmers as in any province in the Dominion of Canada. We have an assembly that, in my opinion, will compare in ability with any assembly of any province in the Dominion, and our little local government, or financial committee, whatever you like to call it, I venture to say, that taking its four members, they will compare well with any four men in any Ministry in any of the provinces. Why, then, treat us in the position of pupilage, as we are treated. Now, our people have established dairy associations for some years past, and they held a meeting on Tuesday, January 28th last, at Regina; and they appointed days for conventions, to which, I hope, the Acting Minister of Agriculture will be able to send either Professor Robertson, or some of his colleagues, to lecture to them. The leading paper of the Territories, the "Leader," commenting on that meeting, says:

It would have done Professor Robertson's heart good to have seen the earnestness which characterized the proceedings, and to have heard the practical expressions of those representative farmers who assembled in Regina on Tuesday, to take measures to propagate information regarding the industry about which the Professor is so eminent an authority.

The president, Mr. Hopkins, who is well known to me as a leading farmer and a leading dairyman, inculcated this sound doctrine in his speech :

Make a standard article of first quality, and it can create and maintain for itself a market.

And then the editor of the "Leader," commenting on all this, says :

It will pay the people to forward in every available way the dairy interests, and in no way can the Dominion Government at the present time spend money in the North-west, more judiciously, or to greater advantage than by assisting to develop that industry.

This is the way he concludes the article :

We would urge on the North-west representatives in Parliament, to strongly press the motion which Mr. Davin has now before the House in respect to that matter.

Now, Sir, I come to the question of money, which my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) asked me about. We ask $20,000. That could be given to the local assembly to spend for this purpose, or, if it was thought too large, a smaller sum might be given, say the amount that Mr. Fielding gives in Nova Scotia. At the present time, we vote the sums, practically, specifically, for the North-west Territories. That is to say, although we vote a lump sum, we still indicate what this money is for, and although not bound, mechanically, the assembly and the executive are bound in honour, and they are bound morally, to spend the money for the purposes for which it is voted, and if they did not, this Government could pull them up sharp by an Order in Council. The proposition that I lay down is this—and I call the attention, not only of the Minister of Finance, but of the Acting Minister of Agriculture to it, and I call the attention of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to it, because he is the member on the Opposition side of the House who watches, so to speak, North-west matters, and he is an ex-Minister of the Interior. I lay this proposition down : That the North-west Territories are entitled to be at least treated on the same financial footing as was Manitoba in 1870, when it had a population of only 17,000. I don't think that you can get over that proposition, and if you cannot get over that proposition, then you cannot get over the corollary proposition which I draw from it. If you upset that proposition I grant you that I am entirely upset ; but if you admit it, you are bound to do what I ask, and more than I ask to-day. Now, according to the census of the North-west Territories, as laid on the Table by the present Secretary of State, it will be seen that we have 91,000 people there—that in the four divisions of Eastern Assiniboia, Western Assiniboia, Saskatchewan and Alberta we have 73,506, and in the other parts of the Territories the balance. And surely these 91,000 people are entitled to all the rights and privileges which were granted to the 17,000 people in Manitoba in 1870. Now, that money was not given to Manitoba out of favour, or as a gratuity or a charity, but as a matter of right ; and if we are placed in the position the people of Manitoba were placed in at that time, what should we get ? The first item they got was $50,000 for government and legislature. Then they got 80 cents per head of their population, which on our population of 91,000 amounts to $72,800. Then they got 5 per cent on so many hundred thousand dollars, because they had no debt, which would amount to about $27.77 per head, which, as we have no debt, would give us $126,353. Then, inasmuch as Manitoba had not lands, but all their lands were in possession of the Dominion Government, they got, I think, $100,000 on that account ; we would be entitled to about $125,000. That probably is far too little ; but suppose you put it at that. These items would give us $349,000. Now, what amount is in the Estimates this year for the North-west ? On page 60 you will find that it is $242,000. Mind, these sums were given to Manitoba independently of the cost of Government House, of paying for a governor and paying the judges. Take $242,879 from $349,150, and you have $106,271. There is, therefore, that much less in the Estimates this year than we ought to have ; and if you go back, you will find that, according to the population we had, in 1883, in 1884, in 1885, in 1886, in 1887, in 1888, in 1889, in 1890, in 1891 and right on to the present, and putting us on the same basis as you put Manitoba in 1870, we have been entitled right along year after year to about $100,000 a year more than we have got. If I am establishing a just proposition there, is it not a fact that the milk that should have been given to these young territories has been, so to speak, skimmed—that they have been deprived year after year of the amount of money to which they have been entitled, and therefore deprived of the instrument of development which they would otherwise have had ? Yet they are told that we cannot pay so large a sum as $20,000 for dairies. Now, Sir, we are very imitative in Canada, whatever the reason is ; there is not a great deal of originality amongst us. Although I am not an unqualified admirer of what takes place in the United States ; yet they are a very progressive people, and if they do well and make successful experiments, I would just as lief take a leaf out of their book in such a case as anywhere else. In my childhood I was taught :

Seek for the truth where'er 'tis found,
 Amongst your friends, amongst your foes,
 On Christian or on heathen ground,—
 The plant's divine where'er it grows.

And I suppose it is as true of political as of dogmatic truth. What was done in the United States with regard to Dakota, Minnesota, Montana and Wyoming? They were organized into territories respectively in 1849, in 1861, in 1864 and in 1868. The area of Minnesota was 83,000 square miles, of Dakota, 149,000, of Montana, 146,000, and of Wyoming, 97,000; making an aggregate of 476,455 square miles. Their populations at the time of their organization into territories were: Minnesota, 6,000; Dakota, 4,837; Montana, 10,666; and Wyoming, 9,000; or an aggregate population of 30,032. The Canadian districts have areas as follows:—Assiniboia, 95,000 square miles; Alberta, 100,000; Saskatchewan, 114,000; and Arthabasca, which is not yet organized, 122,000 square miles. Now, take their populations separately. The population of Eastern Assiniboia is 23,317 white, and 379 half-breed. That is more than was the population of either Minnesota or Dakota, of Montana or Wyoming, when organized into a territory; it is twice the population of the most populous of them, Montana, which had only 10,000; and it is more than the combined populations of the three others—Minnesota, Dakota and Wyoming—when they were organized into territories. Western Assiniboia has a population of 10,608 white and 488 half-breed, making a total of over 11,000, which is more than the population of Montana when it was organized into a territory, and as much as the combined populations of Minnesota and Dakota when they were organized into territories. The population of Saskatchewan is 5,763 white and 4,168 half-breed, or a total of 9,931, which is nearly equal to the population of Montana when it was organized into a territory, and nearly equal to the combined populations of Minnesota and Dakota when they were organized into territories. Then take Alberta with a population of 26,115 whites and 2,578 half-breeds, or more than the population of Minnesota, Dakota, Montana and Wyoming, when they were at their several periods organized into territories. Now, I want to point out the way these territories were treated by the federal government at Washington when organized into territories. Take, first, Minnesota. It got a governor, judges, and executive officers who were appointed and whose salaries were paid by the federal government in Washington. Now, what we do for territories with millions of square miles of area and a population fully three times that of the four territories to which I have referred in the United States, when they were organized,—we do for that vast region what was done for each one of the four territories I have referred to when their populations respectively were only 6,000, 4,000, 10,000 and 9,000. With a population of only 6,000 Minnesota got a governor, chosen by the territory, judges, and executive officers, whose salaries were paid by the federal government. Then it got a legislature chosen by the people, federal appropriations for legislative expenses, public buildings, militia, or territorial troops, besides lands for schools and universities. We have got lands for schools, but none for universities; and in addition to the amount therefore I put in, when calculating a short time ago as to what should be given us, I should put down 150,000 acres of land, that being the amount which, I think, was given Manitoba.

Mr. MARTIN. It was never given but promised.

Mr. DAVIN. I presume that the promise of a high-minded Government is as good as given.

Mr. MARTIN. I would not give a cent for it.

Mr. DAVIN. But you belong to the spirit that denies. The United States territories got lands for schools and universities. How much? One-eighteenth of the area of the territory. Now, suppose we got one-eighteenth of the vast area of the North-west, or suppose each of the territories got one-eighteenth to deal with themselves; that would set them up, it would put them in a position to help to start housekeeping.

The American territories got land grants for each territory and future state for 1,800 miles of railway—we have got nothing of that sort. We cannot build a railway 50 feet long and give any land to bouns the project. Look at what the result has been to one state alone. Take Minnesota, she got lands for 1,800 miles of railways, and these railways were organized and controlled by the legislature—that is a very important thing. The fares are controlled, the running is controlled, and what is the result? Three per cent of the gross earnings go to the Minnesota treasury, and that amounted, ten years ago, to $600,000 per annum. In one thing we did better for the North-west Territories, but it was only obtained after a great deal of agitation on the part of some of us. I came down in 1884, as a delegate, and pressed that on Sir John Macdonald, who was then First Minister and Minister of the Interior. I pressed at the time two or three other things, and they were put into the Act, but at that time he did not give us representation. I remember him looking at me in the press gallery, and lifting up three fingers to show that he had given three of the things asked, when the Bill was brought down, but not tht fourth. The fourth we got in 1886.

Minnesota further got subsequent land appropriations, as they got in Manitoba,—swamp lands—for agricultural and internal improvements, amounting to one-third, including school and railway grants, of the area of Minnesota.

Now, we know what progress these territories made as such, and what progress they have made as states, and we know that our North-west Territories have many things in common with those states. And my reasoning is this, that if we had had the same means, if we had had the instruments of production and progress more largely in our own hands, we should have made more progress than we have up to this time. But the fact is that we have owing to causes into which it is not necessary to enter,—owing to harsh and narrow criticisms, want of faith, want of imagination as much as anything else.—we have only just got as much as would enable us to go on, and the means for progress and expansion have not been at our command. Now, I have been blamed because I condemned the North-west people lately in this House for not having gone more fully into hog raising. Well, I believe in the hog on the farm; I believe in poultry and sheep and cows; I believe that one of the great advantages of dairying is this, that by means of skimmed milk and buttermilk, you are enabled to fatten a large number of hogs. Not only that, but you are enabled to have better cattle and cattle in greater numbers if you carry on dairying to the extent I would wish to see it carried on. It is the opinion of men who are more skilled than I in these matters, it is the opinion of experts, and it is my own opinion from observation—for, after all, a man cannot have been brought in contact from fourteen to fifteen years with farmers, interested in all their affairs as I have been, without being able to give an opinion of some value—and my opinion as well as that of experts is that we might acquire a superior and a permanent reputation in the North-west as producers of butter. Let me give you one striking fact. The butter produced in the dairy at Moose Jaw, which is in the centre of my constituency, has a more solid body than any butter produced in any other part of the Dominion. Although we have dairies in every part of Canada, from Halifax to Esquimalt, yet Prof. Robertson tells us that the Moose Jaw dairy butter has the greatest body of any produced in the Dominion. The quality of butter is determined by two things. First, by the cow, for some cows will produce milk that is better for butter-making than others, and other cows will produce milk that is better for cheese-making. The grasses in some parts of the country are better for butter producing, while the grasses in other parts are better for cheese producing. There cannot be the least doubt, for instance, that Ontario stands pre-eminent, while Quebec stands high—let us say that Ontario and Quebec stand pre-eminent—as cheese-making countries. Why, we are the largest suppliers of cheese to the English market to-day. I do not see why the low position that Canada holds as an exporter to England of butter should not be improved by the North-west Territories, if proper and statesman-like action is taken. There is no reason why we should not take the same position in the export of butter that we take now in the export of cheese. The cold-storage policy that my hon. friends the Finance Minister and the Minister of the Interior spoke of last year is a good policy. The advantage of it for our people in the North-west would be great. At present, without cold storage, in Balgonie, and other places where there are not creameries, they must sell their butter for 10 cents a pound, which does not give the farmer a fair return for his investment. What I propose is that in places where they cannot afford to establish creameries, you should do for them what the free trader, Fielding, has done in Nova Scotia—you should say to them: If you establish creameries, we will give you so much money, say $200, if you like, or make it more if you like. But do something to help the people there, as Mr. Fielding has done in Nova Scotia. They need the help, of course: I should not be here asking for it if they did not need it. What is sometimes not understood is that in a new country, no matter how fertile, no matter of how great expanse, you will have a large immigration, that, in the early days, will require your fostering care. The Russians find it in their country, and Fielding has found it in Nova Scotia. I am perfectly confident that if we accede to the proposition that I have laid down here to-day, the results to the North-west will be of the greatest possible advantage.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I suppose my hon. friend scarcely expects to press this motion to a conclusion to-day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Surely he is not going to back down on this. It is the only thing left him.

Mr. FOSTER. Order. The latter part of the hon. gentleman's motion has reference to a department that is not to-day here represented. I am quite sure that the hon. Minister of the Interior, who has charge of immigration, would be glad to be present before the matter was disposed of. So far as the application of the resolution is concerned, it affects, to a certain extent, a kind of work that has been carried on by the Department of Agriculture. It attempts to make a specific appropriation for a particular branch of work which comes directly under that department. While I quite agree with my hon. friend in the general proposition that the Government of the Dominion should treat the North-west Territories, not as a province, but a part of the country directly under its own administration, so to speak, and, therefore, liberally, so far as the finances will allow, it is a little difficult, I think, in pursuing these general lines of administration, to make exceptions in the votes as to the different sections of the country where the money shall be expended. You take, for instance, this same vote for the establishment of creameries and the encouragement of making butter and cheese of a high and uniform grade. The vote has always been, and I suppose will remain, a general vote at the disposition of the department, and the department, from year to year, considers in what parts of the country there is the greatest need for the encouragement of these branches of work. It is not, and never has been the policy of the department to continue the work of encouraging the cheese and butter industries by these special means consecutively year after year. The object of this vote, and it has been used for that purpose, is to take a certain section of the country, and, by the application of the methods of the department, to give an impetus and an encouragement: to take, as it were, the initial step in a uniform and intelligent manner. It is expected that the farmers of one district, having learned and profited by the work of the department during a year or two, when it especially has these matters in charge, shall then go on with the added experience and with the encouragement already given and prosecute the industry themselves, quite independently of the Government. That has been done, and sections of the country, notably Prince Edward Island, show the excellent effects which that policy has produced. The expenditure out of this vote, in its initial years, was largely in the province of Prince Edward Island, and some other portions of the maritime provinces. That work has had its effect. The output of the cheese and by butter factories has been very largely increased, and the area over which these have worked has been continually extended. But better than that has been the demonstration that has been given of the fact that the making of butter and cheese on an improved basis, having quality and uniformity chiefly in sight, is a thing which pays the farmers themselves, that it is feasible, that it actually produces profit, that it opens to them avenues of work apart from other and congested lines, and promises steady remuneration. Once this is accomplished, the work of the department is done, and the department then moves its machinery, and gives similar encouragement for a year or two to some other section of the country, repeating there what has been done in the sections of the country already attacked, so to speak. I am led to believe, by the officers of the Agriculture Department, that during this year a large part of their endeavours will be directed towards the North-west Territories, with a view to the encouragement of the establishment of creameries, and also to making a uniform and high-class quality of butter and cheese in that part of the country. That is, so far as I am informed, the object of the Department of Agriculture, and its efforts will be particularly directed towards the North-west during the present season. I thought it proper just to make these remarks, and show my hon. friend that with the vote we have at present asked from Parliament it is the intention of the department not to neglect that large garden of Canada to which he has so ably directed the attention of the House this afternoon. Further than that, I do not feel prepared to speak at the present time. I would suggest, if the hon. gentleman would like to have the opinion of the Minister of the Interior, towards whose administration his resolution looks as affecting that branch of the Government, that might be well to adjourn the debate and take it up at a future time. However, I do not see how it is possible for my hon. friend to do other than that which he has so ably done this afternoon, that is, to direct the attention of the House and of the Government to the necessity which exists for the fullest possible recognition of the resources and capabilities of the great territories of the North-west, which mean so much to our Dominion, and from which I am sure such a large part of its prosperity is to be derived.

Mr. SPROULE. The work which the Dairy Commissioner has carried on for some time in Prince Edward Island, no doubt with a great deal of success, has reached that stage, we are told, when it can be practically abandoned for the future: and the general vote of $20,000 which was set apart for that purpose, will now be available, doubtless, for carrying on the same work in some other part of the country. Therefore, it seems to me that the Government could well afford to direct their attention towards the development of the butter trade in the North-west Territories, as it is the most helpless part of Canada in that line. Commencing, as they do, with a very scattered population, not strong in wealth nor in numbers, it is much more difficult, when expense is considered, to commence operations there than it is in a more thickly-settled part of Canada. Now, we have used that vote for developing dairy operations in Ontario: two or three factories have been put in operation, and part of the expense of beginning operations has been borne by the Government. After assistance has been given for a time, and where the population was so thick as it is in the older settled provinces, it is not difficult to carry on operations by the people after the Government had stopped work. We are told by the Dairy Commissioner that he is not likely to be needed in the future in Prince Edward Island, and the pronounced success which has attended his efforts there ought to be a strong inducement to commence similar operations in other parts of the country. As no part of the country can be more deserving of assistance than the North-west Territories, I think that the Dairy Commissioner might very well direct his efforts during the coming season to that part of the country. The Canadian Pacific Railway last year showed a commendable spirit, and proved that they were anxious to assist the enterprise as much as possible by offering to give assistance, in what direction I don't now exactly remember, but I think it was in the direction of assisting to provide cold storage, and, if necessary, refrigerator cars. There is no doubt that if the Government were to join with them in providing cold storage and refrigerator cars, then giving assistance to start butter factories, the trade could be carried on, and carried on very successfully, even with the assistance of the small sum that is at their disposal out of this $20,000. Then, as the hon. gentleman only asks for $20,000, it seems to me this vote is quite as available for this purpose as if there was a separate vote given for that special purpose. Now, what is the difficulty of starting these creameries? First, it is a scarcity of settlers; in the second place, it is the expense of starting. A few years ago, I believe, we proposed a scheme which was never carried out, that is, to assist in converting cheese factories into butter factories, provided they would continue their operations in the winter the same as in the summer. In other words, it was suggested to aid these associations wherever they proposed to convert a cheese factory into a butter factory, by giving them at least $300 to pay part of the expense of putting in creameries. Now, if that was done in the North-west Territories, no doubt in many localities they would take advantage of it. And in addition to the $300, the assistance given by the Canadian Pacific Railway would help them still further in establishing creameries, and I think it could be used just as well for the purpose the hon. gentleman indicates by his motion. I am quite sure that the people in the North-west would appreciate such assistance. I am quite sure also that the success which has attended the efforts of the Dairy Commissioner in Prince Edward Island warrants him carrying on the operations in the North-west Territories upon the same line; and if he did so, I have no doubt that the people out there would appreciate it very much, and the result would be as successful as it has been in the other portions of the country where he commenced to carry on operations by the small aid that was given him through this $20,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. While listening to this discussion, the idea has struck me that this Government has been spending a large sum of money every year under the impression that they were benefiting the farmers. They took up a scheme last year of purchasing butter and sending it to the old country, and I think instead of benefiting the farmers it has injured them. Last fall I visited a little creamery in Renfrew, a creamery that has been got up by a joint stock company, and I ascertained how much the plant of that creamery cost. I found that they could not obtain in Canada the most improved machinery, and they had to go to the other side to get it; and I ascertained that the plant of that creamery cost $6,000; but the duty was $1,200. Now, if the Government are so very anxious to favour the creamery business and the dairy business, why do they not give a rebate of duty upon the plant that is put into a creamery for a cheese factory, and also a rebate of duty upon the raw material that is used for the same purpose. I hold that if they want to confer a real benefit upon the farmers, they can do it in this way. This would be no fictitious benefit, and if they are really desirous of benefiting the farmer, I hold that one of the first steps to take is to give a rebate of duty, the same as they have done upon the raw material used by the manufacturers of agricultural implements and others, when the article manufactured is to be exported. Why should they not grant similar aid to this most important industry? We know at the present time that farming in Canada is very much depressed, and this would be a real benefit to every factory, not only to those to be established, but to those already in operation. I hope that the Government will take this into their serious consideration before spring opens up, and before they begin to establish factories in the North-west. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) spoke of a grant of $300. If they have to bring plant from the other side when they want to change a cheese factory into a creamery, this grant of $300 will be saved to each creamery or each cheese factory that is put into operation all over the country. Our separators are brought principally from the other side: they are not made on this side, and a great deal of the raw material that is used also comes from the other side; therefore, I think the Government could confer a real benefit upon the dairy industry by granting this rebate of duties.

Mr. SPROULE. Separators are being manufactured in Canada now.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the vote is taken, I wish to say, in reply to my hon. friend, that the last part of the question about immigration, to which the Minister of Finance has referred, could be dropped. That might be supposed, from a rhetorical point of view, to weaken my position, at least it so struck some hon. members, I meant it as an 'a fortiori' proposition. I meant it in this way: I say, that this, as an immigration vote, would be justifiable, and it would leave us still entitled to $100,000 extra, as a grant to the North-west Territories. But it could be dropped; I do not labour on that point, because the Minister of the Interior was not in his seat. I would be willing, and I have the authority of my seconder, to drop it from the motion. The Finance Minister, leading the House, did not grapple with my argument. My argument is this, that we are entitled to be treated on the same basis as Manitoba was treated in 1870. That is a proposition which should be dealt with—we are entitled to be treated in the same way as Manitoba was treated in 1870, with a population of 17,000. The fact is, we are not treated in that way. We were entitled to be treated in that way twelve or thirteen years ago; but, as a fact, I repeat, we have not been treated in that way. We were entitled to be treated, year after year, on the same basis as Manitoba was treated in 1870, and for that reason we are due $1,200,000. That is my proposition. Either that proposition is incapable of being blown to the winds as ludicrous and absurd, or it has to remain there, and, remaining there, then a paltry sum, such as $20,000, is not a sum to be treated as so much that might or might not be given us. If it is thought that persons on the spot would be able to deal better with the $20,000 than the central Government, then, give it to Mr. Haultain and Mr. Ross, or, rather, to the assembly as constituted now, but let it be indicated that this matter will be dealt with, and, if not, a grant of as much as Mr. Fielding gives to each creamery, $400, would be a material help. The farmers in Nova Scotia cannot require as much aid as farmers who come in as pioneers in certain parts of the Territories. Take the country around Balgonie; take the Germans who have come in there, who make the very best settlers, and who are founding a great population in that part of the Territory, these men need help much more, in my opinion, than any of the inhabitants of Nova Scotia. If we are entitled to $100,000 more than we receive, and I hope that amount will be put in the Supplementary Estimates, either this amount of $20,000 can be given out of that or supplementary to it, because, if you make the people contented and satisfied in the North-west, they will write letters home to their friends in Germany and elsewhere; and the result will be a great aid to immigration. The result will be that we will have greatly aided immigration. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) referred to a matter which all these propositions touch, and that is our sparse population. All these propositions of mine touch that point. We have about sixteen sections in each township to do the work of thirty-six. Half the townships are given away and cannot be settled on, and there are two sections of Hudson Bay and two sections of school lands, and so there are sixteen sections in every township to do the work of schools and what not for thirty-six. And here is a very important feature in that regard: One of the great enemies of the North-west Territories is the gopher. One of the greatest difficulties experienced in getting rid of the gopher is this, that there you have an odd section between every even-numbered section, a whole square mile given up, so to speak, to the free roaming of gophers. If a man kills or poisons them on his own land, there is this section uninhabited which is a big breeding ground for them. So we have a sparse settlement, and we need help. We do not scruple to say that we need help far more than the people in other parts of the Dominion, and we are entitled to more money, and, being entitled to more money and needing more help, the House should grant us the $20,000. I had expected on this motion much more support in debate than I have received.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. In view of the statement of the Minister, that the Minister of the Interior is absent, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ST. JOHN, N.B., AS A WINTER PORT.

Mr. HAZEN moved for :

Copy of the contract entered into between the Minister of Trade and Commerce on behalf of Her Majesty and the trustees for the bondholders of the Canada Shipping Company, for a steamship service between St. John, New Brunswick, and Liverpool, Great Britain.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to make the motion which, for several weeks, has been standing in my name upon the Order paper, I would ask that I might be granted the indulgence of the House while I bring to its attention a matter which is of very great national importance to the people of this country. For many years past, it is well known, that the question of the imports and exports of this country, during the winter season, through our own Canadian ports, has attracted the attention of our public men, irrespective of party, and irrespective of the part of the Dominion from which they may come. More especially, Sir,—though I do not wish to press this question from a sectional standpoint—more especially has the subject been one of serious consideration in the lower provinces, and particularly in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. As far back as the days of the confederation agitation, and the confederation elections in our province, it was a burning question. And, at the time of confederation, one of the arguments that was held out by the advocates of confederation, to enlist the sympathy of the people of the lower provinces in favour of that scheme was: that with confederation accomplished, and with shorter railway communication to the western provinces than existed at that time; then, an intercolonial railway was one of the terms of the union, all the freight going from and coming to Canada would flow out from, and into, the ports of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, instead of going to the ports of Boston and of Portland, Maine. Well, Mr. Speaker, confederation was accomplished, and the Intercolonial Railway was built. It is too late now, at this stage of our history, to discuss the reasons which led to the Intercolonial Railway being built along the north shores of the province of New Brunswick, and up the St. Lawrence, instead of taking the shorter route. The reasons were sufficient for the statesmen of that day. The idea of a military route had, no doubt, great weight at that time, and the long route of the Intercolonial Railway between the ports of the lower provinces and the western portions of this country was found to be such a disadvantage that it was impossible by means of that road, to divert to the lower province ports the Canadian trade that was going to the United States ports. Some years after the completion of the Intercolonial Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed, and after the main line was built, this Parliament voted a large subsidy for the construction of another branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from the south shore of the St. Lawrence, opposite the city of Montreal, across the state of Maine, down to the province of New Brunswick, terminating at the port of St. John. This route lessened the distance between Montreal and the port of St. John by about 300 miles. The people living in the constituency which I have the honour of representing in this House, then naturally expected that the trade of the west would flow into their port, and into other ports in the lower provinces. This trade, however, did not follow immediately upon the completion of that short line, and when the people of my constituency spoke to the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to members of the Government about the matter, they were told that their first duty would be to put their port in order, so that they would have proper facilities for handling that trade when it came to them. The citizens of St. John acted upon this advice, and they set to work to put their port in a position to accommodate the trade sought for. In the first place, they gave, as a free gift to the Canadian Pacific Railway, a branch line running for three or four miles from the Canadian Pacific Railway at Fairville to the deep water terminus at Carleton, on the western side of the harbour. They gave them this completed road, and they also gave the Canadian Pacific Railway valuable property in connection with the terminus in the city of St. John. Therefore, the Canadian Pacific Railway received, at that time, from the city of St. John, a right of way, a constructed railway, and also the grounds necessary for a deep-water terminus, which, in nearly every other city in this country has cost the company hundreds of thousands of dollars to obtain. All these were given to the Canadian Pacific Railway by the city of St. John, as absolutely free gifts.

Mr. HAZEN.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) On the Carleton side.

Mr. HAZEN. On the west side where the Canadian Pacific Railway ends, because it terminates on the west side of the city of St. John, at Fairville, and this branch line runs from Fairville, for three miles, around Carleton, and down to the deep-water terminus at Sand Point. The citizens of St. John also gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway a gift, or a bonus, of $40,000 for the construction of a grain elevator at their terminus, and they gave this without conditions of any sort, except, of course, that the elevator had to be built. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, the people of St. John built deep-water wharfs at the Canadian Pacific Railway terminus, where the elevator is. These wharfs were dredged at the face and sides to a depth of twenty-seven feet, so that at the lowest spring tides, any vessel drawing twenty-seven feet of water can lie there with perfect safety. The citizens of St. John built this at their own expense, and from first to last that city, in order to provide these terminal facilities has expended $300,000, without receiving one cent of assistance from the federal Government. That, Sir, is creditable to the enterprise and the energy of the people of my constituency, and I feel proud of the fact that I represent a city which has shown so much business energy in that respect. Well, these facilities were provided; our city had put its port in order, as advised to do by the railway authorities, and others, and still, for a year a more, no western trade came to our port. There were some reasons for that, Mr. Speaker. It is well known by everybody that if trade gets into certain channels, it is a difficult matter to divert its course. The trade of the Canadian west, unfortunately, was accustomed to seek an outlet in Boston and Portland, and it was impossible, in a day, or a year, to divert that trade to St. John, or to any port in the lower provinces. But, in this case, there were special reasons which made it all the more difficult. In the first place, I am sorry to say, there was a section of our own newspaper press, and of our own people, who did not hesitate, for years, to say that the idea of getting western business through a lower province port was a mere dream, that our city could never become—as the advocates of confederation claimed—the Liverpool of America, because they said that nature and geography were against us, and that the only natural winter ports of the Dominion were those of the United States. In the second place, there was another very powerful influence operating against us, and that was the influence of the Allan Line, and of the Dominion Line of steamers, the two greatest of the ocean carrying corporations connected with the Dominion of Canada. The Allan Line was interested in Portland. For years before confederation, the Allan Line steamers had received an enormous subsidy from the Parliament of Old Canada, a subsidy which at one time, I believe, amounted to fully half a million dollars annually. At that time, before railway communication existed between the western parts of Canada and the lower provinces, the terminus of the Allan Line was of necessity in Portland. It had built up interests there. It had capital invested at that point, and in season and out of season, the Allan Line Company and Dominion Line Company did not hesitate to say that the ports of the lower provinces were unfit for doing the winter business of Canada, and that it was absolutely necessary for them to send their steamers to Portland. However, Mr. Speaker, during last winter our opportunity came, and in the month of November last, gentlemen representing the Beaver Line of steamships—a line of steamers owned and controlled by Canadians, having agencies in every part of this country, and in every part of Europe as well—came down to the city of St. John and said that if they could get the sympathy and support of that city, and if the people and their representatives would support their claim for a fair and moderate subsidy, and make every effort to get it from the Dominion Government, then they would take their steamers which had been running in the winter to the port of Boston, and bring them to the port of St. John. They also guaranteed to use every possible effort to divert to the port of St. John the business which had been going to Boston and Portland. That proposition naturally commended itself to the citizens of St. John, and the result was that a delegation came from that city to Ottawa. My hon. colleague, who sits beside me (Mr. Chesley), the mayor of the city of St. John, myself, and other gentlemen who take an interest in public matters, were members of that deputation. We came to Ottawa and urged upon the Government the propriety of granting a subsidy of $25,000 to the Beaver Line, as an experimental service for this present winter. Hardly had we got to Ottawa, before we were met with the bitter opposition of the representatives of the Allan Line of steamers, and the representatives of the Dominion Line of steamers, and the representatives of the Grand Trunk Railway who also came here. But so strong a case were we able to make out, so well able were we to convince the Government that our city had gone to such great expense, that it was only right and fair that the Government should, in a moderate way, assist this enterprise, that, on the 20th November last, a contract was signed with the company controlling the Beaver Line of steamers. From that contract, which I now hold in my hand, I will read a few paragraphs to show the nature of the contract. The first paragraph provides :

The contractors owning and controlling in their capacity aforesaid the four steamships "Lake Superior," of the tonnage of 2,880 tons net, "Lake Winnipeg," of the tonnage of 2,106 tons net, "Lake Huron," of the tonnage of 2,576 tons net, and "Lake Ontario," of the tonnage of 2,741 tons net, the "Lake Superior," "Lake Winnipeg" and "Lake Ontario" being each guaranteed by the contractors capable of a speed of thirteen knots per hour, and the "Lake Huron" of twelve knots per hour, will place said steamships on a route between the port of Liverpool in Great Britain, and St. John in the province of New Brunswick, the first named, the "Lake Superior," to sail from Liverpool for St. John on the 23rd day of the present month of November, 1895, and on the return voyage to sail from St. John for Liverpool on the 11th day of December, 1895, regular sailings by one or other of the steamships named to follow from Liverpool and St. John fortnightly after the said 23rd day of November, and 11th day of December respectively, until ten complete round trips have been run from Liverpool to St. John and return, the last sailing from St. John to complete the said ten trips to be made on the 18th day of April, 1896.

It will be seen by hon. gentlemen, that the contract is for ten sailings, for which the subsidy was $25,000, or $2,500 for each round trip. The paragraph goes on :

Each of the said steamers while employed as aforesaid shall be run at an average speed of not less than eleven knots per hour, and the length of the voyage between the said ports shall not exceed nine days, extraordinary conditions of the weather excepted. It is understood and agreed that no calls are to be made by the said steamers at any intermediate or other port either on the westward or eastward voyages while employed under the terms and during the continuance of this contract.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the contract exclude them from having a terminus in the United States?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, the words are explicit. There are only two ports mentioned—Liverpool in Great Britain and St. John in New Brunswick.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not gather, from what the hon. gentleman read, that they were excluded from going to a terminus in the United States after leaving St. John.

Mr. HAZEN. The language is plain and clear. It says, from the port of Liverpool to the port of St. John, and "no calls are to be made by the said steamers at any intermediate or other port, either on the westward or eastward voyages, while employed under the terms, or during the continuance of this contract." Then, there are the usual provisions that these steamers shall have the necessary accommodation to carry the mails, when required to do so. I do not think it necessary to read any of the other clauses until we come to the seventh, which is a very important clause.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. HAZEN. When you left the Chair at Six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the contract that had been entered into on the 20th of November last between the Minister of Trade and Commerce, on behalf of the Queen, and the representatives of the Beaver Line; and I had read the first paragraph of that contract, which showed that the contract was for a service of ten trips between Liverpool, in Great Britain, and St. John, N.B. The seventh clause in the contract provides:

The Governor in Council may, if deemed expedient, fix from time to time the maximum rate for passengers or freight or any class or classes thereof, and in any such event the contractors shall carry on each steamer running under their contract, according to its capacity, both on outward and homeward voyages, all or any freight which may be offered at a rate not exceeding said maximum rate or rates. The freight rates on east-bound trips sailing from St. John, as hereinbefore provided, on through bills of lading to Liverpool from any place in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and Canadian points farther west, shall in no case be greater than from the same place to Liverpool via any United States route or port, and on west bound trips the rates from Liverpool to any place in Ontario, Quebec and Canadian points farther west, shall be as favourable as via any United States route or port to the same place.

Mr. HAZEN.

This provides that the charges by this line on freight from Liverpool to western ports, via St. John, shall be as low as they are by Portland or Boston, and that the same rates shall prevail on outward freight; that is, this line has to meet competition both ways. The clause goes on:

The contractors will carry on said steamships on each and every voyage from St. John, aforesaid, at least 400 cattle and horses or other live stock occupying a similar space upon the vessel, or at least 4,000 head of cattle or horses or their equivalent in other live stock, in the course of the time covered by the contract, provided that no prohibitive restrictions are during the continuance of this contract placed upon the importation into Great Britain of live Canadian cattle, and the balance of the full cargo shall in the case of each vessel consist of grain, cheese or other products, preference in all cases being given to the products of western Canada.

This clause was inserted because of the criticism, that, if this line were subsidized by the Government, it would be merely a competitor with the tramp vessels that come to St. John for the deal trade of the province of New Brunswick. So the provision was inserted, making it imperative on the company to carry 4,000 head of cattle or other live stock, and providing that the balance of the cargo should be made up of grain, cheese, or other products, preference being given to the products of western Canada, and that the cost of carrying these products from western Canada, via St. John, to Liverpool should be as low as the cost of carrying them to Liverpool via Portland or Boston. It is unnecessary to refer to the other sections, until we come to the eleventh section, which provides that the Government shall pay to the trustees of the company the sum of $25,000, or $2,500 a trip, to be paid, provided the contract is carried out in accordance with the provisions which I have read. That was the contract entered into on the 20th of November last. Every precaution was taken in that contract to secure the rights of the western shipper and the western producer, because it was felt, that, in order to justify the granting of that sum of money, it would be necessary to show Parliament that it was granted, not merely in the interest of the local port of St. John, but in the interest of the western shipper and farmer as well: and, by the figures which I shall give to the House in a few moments, I shall be able to show that that can be amply and fully justified. In pursuance of that contract, on the 13th day of December last, the steamer "Lake Superior," of the Beaver Line, sailed from the port of St. John with a full cargo of western products, and, I believe, was the pioneer ship in the inauguration of a new era in the trade of the Dominion of Canada, and, I trust, in the prosperity of the ports of the lower provinces, as well. Scarcely, however, had this contract been entered into, before the representatives of the Allan Line and the Dominion Line, to whom I referred this afternoon, began to decry the enterprise, and rushed into the public press to show that the subsidy was one absolutely unjustifiable, and that the Government of this country had no business whatever to grant such a subsidy. Not only did those representatives take that course, but some of the newspaper press, not understanding the question, also put forward the idea that the subsidy was not justified in the general interests of the country, but was simply a political deal, having in view the near approach of a general election. Going back to criticisms of the representatives of the Allan and Dominion Lines, I find in the Montreal "Witness" of Saturday 23rd November last, interviews with these gentlemen. The first one is with Mr. D. A. P. Watt, the representative of the Allan Line in that city. Mr. Watt said:

There is no trade requirement for a fortnightly line of steamers between Liverpool and St. John in winter any more than between Liverpool and Halifax, or between Liverpool and Louisbourg. The winter mail steamers are made to call at Halifax to land and receive the mails, but they bring to and take from Halifax very little cargo, and during the many years they have been running to that port they have failed to develop any local trade.

But Mr. Watt failed to tell the representative of the paper that one of the chief reasons why his company had failed to develop any local trade was because their interests were centred at Portland, and it was their desire to develop the local trade there rather than at the port at Halifax, where they simply touched for the purpose of landing or taking passengers or of landing and taking mails. Referring to the establishment of the line, he said:

Its establishment is unlikely to benefit anybody in the Dominion outside that city (St. John), where a certain amount of money will necessarily be spent for disbursements, and some wood merchants will get a low rate of freight for their export of deals.

In conclusion, he said:

Altogether it is manifest that this new service is a political rather than a commercial steamship line, and that the approaching elections has more to do with it than any trade requirement.

Mr. Torrance, of the Dominion Steamship Company, said to the reporter:

I think the subsidy to the Beaver Line is most unjust to the other lines as it is actually more than is paid to the Allan and Dominion mail steamers, which have so long and so well served the public interests.

How he can establish that proposition it is entirely impossible for me to tell:

These steamers have never been able to bring to or take from the lower provinces a tithe of their capacity, although the Government has taken care in the contract to provide that the lower province ports shall be served at very reasonable rates—and I think that the money which has been voted must largely go to the Canadian Pacific Railway which must charge for their longer haul considerably more than is charged either to New York, Boston or Portland. It looks to me as if it were largely political in view of the approaching elections.

This whole matter was well threshed out some few years ago at a conference in the residence of Sir John Abbott, when Mr. Seargeant, Sir William Van Horne, representatives from St. John and Halifax, and the managers of the Allan and Dominion Lines met to discuss the possibility of a service to a lower province port. After a full discussion it was agreed that it was impracticable owing to the longer railway haul and the consequent diminished earning of the steamers. The same conditions exist to-day. I can quite understand it would be very attractive to the country to have its own winter port for imports and exports, but I greatly fear as a steamship man that this is impracticable.

With regard to this latter part of Mr. Torrence's interview, I desire to say that I was present at that conference, to which he refers, at the residence of Sir John Abbott in Montreal. Sir John Thompson was there, my then colleague from the constituency. Mr. Skinner was present, and also the junior member for Halifax, besides Sir Wm. Van Horne and representatives of the Allan and other carrying companies of that city, and I say there was no such agreement reached or arrived at as that to which Mr. Torrence refers. The matter was there discussed in a general way, and no agreement was reached. But the representatives of the lower provinces who were there insisted that their ports were perfectly fit to do this business: they urged that it could be done in those ports if a reasonable subsidy was granted in order to get the enterprise initiated.

I have quoted these statements to show how entirely these gentlemen were misled. If they were looking at the question not from the point of view of their own particular interest but from the general standpoint of the country's interest, how entirely mistaken they were in the view they took, they must now recognize after the convincing proofs since shown that the business of the country can be done as well by the lower province ports as from Portland or Boston. During the last month I see by the papers, that a representative of the Allan Line has been in the city of St. John, inspecting the harbour there, and making soundings at the wharfs. If it is the intention of the Allan Line to bring their steamers to that port, despite what their representatives may have said of the port in the past, they will receive a hearty welcome, and we will do all we can to make their business there as easy and profitable as possible. To show what has been the result of giving that subsidy, I want to lay before the House some figures of the first five trips—the only ones concerning which I am able to get the figures now—of the boats of the Beaver Line showing the total amount of freight they have brought into Canada, the total amount they took out, and the time taken on each voyage.

These inward cargoes are not so large as I would like to see them. The vessels had capacities for considerably more freight than they brought inwards to the western points; but it must be remembered that it was late in the season when the project was started, and the Montreal and Toronto merchants and the merchants of other cities had made their contracts for the winter. But I am assured by the agent that if the steamers come to St. John's next winter, they will be able to fill up almost every vessel with inward cargo. In addition to that, I would like to state here that the last of these vessels which arrived at St. John brought a very much larger inward cargo than any of the previous vessels, and is now discharging her cargo in that port.

Now, with regard to the outward cargoes, I may say that every one of these vessels has had a full cargo during the present winter, and more freight is offered almost than the company can take care of. The following statement shows the business done:—

That, Mr. Speaker, is the record of the first five trips of the Beaver Line. But while the Beaver Line contract only calls for ten trips during the season, through their agencies in the west and through the co-operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway—which for its dealings with the Beaver Line deserves all possible praise, having met their wishes in every possible way—they have succeeded so well in securing business that they are not contented with keeping to the letter of their contract, but, I believe, have provided four extra sailings. So that there will be fourteen sailings of the Beaver Line during the season instead of ten. I understand that the two or three sailings since those the figures for which I have given, have been with full western cargo, including not only goods from the western ports of Canada, but also goods from Minneapolis,

Chicago and other points in the United States. But, to my mind, the most gratifying part of the Beaver Line service lies in the admirable manner in which they have handled the freight entrusted to them to carry from Great Britain to Montreal and other western points. I have here the figures, and I desire to give the House a comparison showing the time occupied in the delivery of cargo at Montreal by the Beaver Line via St. John, N.B., with the delivery by Allan and Dominion Lines via Portland, Maine. I am able to show that cargo for western points—taking Montreal as a centre—by the Beaver Line on the first five trips that have been made, was landed in Montreal in quicker time than freight leaving Liverpool for Montreal by the Allan and Dominion Lines by way of Portland, Maine:

TIME OCCUPIED IN THE DELIVERY OF CARGO AT MONTREAL, VIA THE BEAVER LINE, AND ST. JOHN, N. B.

Steamer.	Sailed from Liverpool.	Arrived at St. John.	Arrived at Montreal.	Time in Transit.
SS. "Lake Superior"	Nov. 23.	Dec. 2.	Dec. 6.	13 days.

SS. "Lake Winnipeg"	do 22.	Jan. 2.	Jan. 4.	13 do
SS. "Lake Superior"	Jan. 4.	do 15.	do 17.	13 do
SS. "Lake Ontario"	do 18.	do 28.	do 30.	12 do

Toronto goods were also delivered in 13 days on two occasions.

TIME OCCUPIED IN THE DELIVERY OF CARGO AT MONTREAL, VIA THE ALLAN AND DOMINION LINES, AND PORTLAND, ME.

Steamer.	Sailed from Liverpool.	Arrived at Portland.	Arrived at Montreal.	Time in Transit.
SS. "Vancouver"	Dec. 12.	Dec. 23.	Dec. 26.	14 days.
SS. "Numidian"	do 19.	do 30.	Jan. 1.	13 do
SS. "Labrador"	do 26.	Jan. 5.	do 7.	12 do
SS. "Laurentian"	Jan. 2.	do 12.	do 15.	13 do
SS. "Scotsman"	do 9.	do 21.	do 23.	14 do
SS. "Mongolian"	do 16.	do 28.	do 30.	14 do

So that freight from Liverpool via St. John to Montreal in these five sailings was never more than thirteen days, while freight from Liverpool via Portland to Montreal was, on three occasions out of six, fourteen days in transit; on two, thirteen days, and one, twelve days. And I think that if any fact was wanted to disprove the statement that our geographical position is such that we cannot do the winter port business for the Dominion, it is supplied by these figures, showing that with steamers certainly not superior, and sometimes not so good, the run from Liverpool to Montreal via St. John has been more quickly made than from Liverpool to Montreal via Portland.

Now, that is not all that I wish to bring to the attention of the House, nor is it all that this subsidy has accomplished. Having a regular series of sailings provided for, the Grand Trunk Railway warmly co-operated with the Beaver Line people, and the result was that other lines also sought St.

John for the purpose of carrying freight coming from the west to the old country.

For a number of years past there has been a line of steamers, the Furness Line, running from London to Halifax, and then to St. John, and on its outward voyage from St. John to Halifax, and then to London. That line of steamers, until the present winter, scarcely did any western business whatever, but, during the present winter, owing to the development of the western trade over the Canadian Pacific Railway, brought about by the activity of the agents of the Beaver Line in the west, diverting to St. John the trade which they had formerly taken to Boston, so much freight was brought over that line that the Furness Line people began to reap the benefit of it also. I have here a statement, showing the shipments of western goods from St. John to London by the Furness Line, during the winter season of 1895-96 :

This is the first time that a line of steamers has carried this large amount of products from western Canada, and, to some extent, from the Western States. I am in receipt of a letter from the agent of the Furness Line, a portion of which, I think, it might not do any harm to read to the House. It is written by Mr. Schofield, agent of the Furness Line at St. John :

We send herewith statements of the western shipments by the Furness Line hence to London, and the Donaldson Line hence to Glasgow during the present winter season. In addition to these shipments we have now on hand here about two hundred carloads of similar freight, which will be loaded by steamers of the two lines during this present week. Further engagements of cargo have also been made in the west for succeeding steamers, and the business will be continued steadily by both lines during the entire remainder of the season.

Further on in the letter, he says :

We are happy to be able to say that so far the steamers have all arrived here safely, and in good time, and the captains report no difficulty whatever in navigating the Bay of Fundy, notwithstanding the fact that several of them never visited this port before coming here this winter. The Canadian Pacific Railway also deserves credit for the expeditious manner in which they have handled the business, which, however, has already assumed proportions entirely beyond their present accommodations and facilities here, which clearly must be increased during the coming summer season. * * * * *

The small quantities of Canadian cattle obtainable for export has also been a disadvantage, which it is now expected, however, will be overcome by the proposed change in the Canadian regulations whereby United States cattle may be shipped from Canadian ports.

But, as a result of this development of the western business, another line of steamers came forward, as well, the Donaldson Line, which runs from Montreal to Glasgow in the summer, and hitherto in winter has been running from Baltimore to Glasgow. This line transferred their services from Baltimore to St. John, and, during the present year, has been running from St. John to Glasgow. I have here manifests showing the amount of western produce carried by that line during two trips—I have not got the others, I regret to say :

I know it must be uninteresting for the House to hear me read these lists of figures, but, at the same time, I think it most desirable that a statement of this business should be laid before Parliament, and that the attention of the country should be directed to the fact, that this business is now being done through our own ports that was formerly done from Boston and Portland. This business has already attracted a great deal of attention throughout Canada, and from the "Cattle Exporters' and Butchers' Advocate," published in the city of Montreal, I think, I find, in the issue of 26th January last, the following:—

OUR CANADIAN WINTER PORT.

The port of St. John, N.B., is rapidly coming to the front as a desirable and advantageous freight and passenger route. That the port is not behind its rivals on the other side of the line is evidenced by the following:—

"The 'Lake Ontario,' of the Beaver Line, left Liverpool on Saturday, January 18, at 4 p.m., arriving at St. John, Tuesday the 28th inst., at 6 a.m., the passengers left on the afternoon train reaching Montreal Wednesday morning. Twenty cars of freight were despatched the same evening and were delivered in Montreal Thursday at noon, thus goods were shipped from Liverpool via this route, and delivered at Montreal in the incredible short time of 12 days. The Beaver Line state they are confident that with more perfect arrangements, they can further reduce this record."

In the Montreal "Gazette" of 28th January, I find this paragraph:

The Beaver Liner "Lake Ontario," which left Liverpool at 4 p.m., January 18th, arrived here at 4 o'clock, this morning. Twenty carloads of freight were despatched to Montreal, this afternoon. The "Mongolian," of the Allan Line—

I ask the attention of the House to this:

—which left Liverpool two days ahead of the "Ontario," only reached Halifax yesterday, and will not get into Portland, Maine, till to-night, so that the "Ontario's" bulky freight for Upper Canadian cities will reach its destination in, at least, forty-eight hours quicker time than the "Mongolian's." This is one advantage that accrues to Canadian merchants and shippers who patronize St. John in preference to American ports.

Just think, Mr. Speaker, freight going by the Beaver Line to St. John, beating the freight carried by the heavily-subsidized mail steamers of the Allan Line fully forty-eight hours, and yet the Allan Line representative, Mr. Watt, objects to a subsidy to the Beaver Line as unjustifiable, claiming that no business could be built up by that line from maritime province ports.

I think that the figures I have read must have demonstrated to the House, as I think they will demonstrate also to this country, when the people are put in possession of the facts, that a most gratifying commencement has been made in the way of doing the business of Canada in the winter season through the ports of Canada itself. These statements show most clearly, and this winter's operations show most clearly how entirely misleading were the statements made that geography was against the lower province ports, and that the natural winter ports of Canada were in the United States. Portland and Boston, for this winter not only have there been shipped the products of Canada from the port of St. John, but also cattle, flour, and other products of the United States. The results of this winter's operations have set at rest the unfounded belief that the port of St. John is an unsafe port owing to the dangers consequent on navigating the Bay of Fundy, for vessels this winter have entered our port without a single casualty. There is a well-equipped and efficient corps of pilots, the dangerous points are well protected by fog-whistles and lights and the testimony of the captains of the Beaver Line is that in winter the port of St. John is an easier and safer port to make than is Portland, Maine. No record, as I once before pointed out to this House, can be found of a casualty occurring to a steamer sailing direct from Liverpool to St. John, or from St. John to Liverpool, and the wrecks which have given an evil reputation to the Bay of Fundy have occurred largely on the southern coast of Nova Scotia to ships coming from Halifax which, instead of standing well off to sea, hugged the shore of that province too closely, being anxious to make a quick run to St. John. This winter's operations have also shown that the bugbear of fog has nothing in it to cause alarm during the winter season, because these steamers have not been delayed one moment in coming in and going out of the harbour; and these operations have further shown that the great rise and fall of the tide is not an obstacle in loading vessels which cannot be overcome, and that for some classes of freight it is really an advantage rather than obstacle.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another aspect of this case which I wish to bring before the House on this occasion. It is a well-known fact that for a great many years past, a subsidy of $126,000 a year has been paid by this country to the Allan Line of steamers, part of it going through private arrangements to some boats of the Dominion Line, for carrying the mails via the St. Lawrence in summer, and Portland, Maine, in winter. I think this country has been obtaining very little value for that subsidy, for although we are paying that sum for the carriage of our mails, the Allan service has not been up to the times, the boats have not been able to compete with the fast boats sailing from New York, and fully two-thirds, I am within the mark, of the Canadian mails during the winter and summer both, have been carried, not by the boats subsidized for the purpose of carrying the mails, but carried by steamers sailing from the port of New York; and this winter's operations have shown that the Beaver Line steamers, which have carried some mails, have been able to carry the mails as satisfactorily and as quickly as have the Allan boats which have received the large subsidy of $126,000. The granting of that subsidy, to my mind, is not fair to the people of the country. I believe it has hurt the country more than a little, for the popular idea has prevailed abroad that this country during more than six months of the year is ice-bound, and the only way of getting out is through foreign ports, that our mails have to be carried through foreign ports, and that when we subsidize a line of steamers to carry our mails it is with Portland as the terminal point. I do not think it is fair to the people of the maritime provinces, to the labourers and others who benefit by having vessels come there, that a subsidy should be given to a line of steamers whose whole interest is to build up a foreign city and community. Early in the present session, I asked the following question:—

Is it the intention of the Government to discontinue the granting of subsidies to lines of steamers between Canada and Great Britain, touching or terminating at ports in foreign countries?

To that question, I received the following reply from the Minister of Trade and Commerce:—

There has been no change since the policy of the Government was disclosed in the debate which took place when the Fast Line Subsidy Act was before the House.

In order to find out what the reply really meant, I had to look up the "Hansard," and see what that declaration of policy was, and in the speech of the Finance Minister, which I find reported in "Hansard," 1889, page 1370, this was the declaration of policy:

Mr. HAZEN.

Another thing that has been determined by the Government is that this new steamship service shall be distinctly a Canadian service. Therefore we have granted subsidies to the Allan Line, and we are now paying a yearly subsidy of $126,000 to that line, their vessels having the privilege of going to an American port. This may have been necessary in the past; no doubt at first it was necessary. But I think it will strike the minds of hon. gentlemen that the time has come when, if we pay Canadian money to establish a route of this kind, the whole advantage of that route should come to Canadian ports and to our own country, and so the Government have laid it down as a policy that whatever line be established it should have the characteristic and shall be a completely Canadian line in that respect.

That was the policy of the Government of this country, a policy which would be universally approved by every one in this Dominion, as well as in this House, in 1889. But from that year down to the present winter, the old state of affairs has continued, a subsidy of $126,000 a year being paid to the Allan Line, which makes its winter terminus in Portland, Maine. There is no excuse for the continuation of that service now. As the matter stands, it has been demonstrated beyond a shadow of doubt that a lower province port is quite as capable of doing this business as is Portland, and I am pleased to have seen it stated in the press recently that the Government have determined that in the future they will not pay one dollar to a steamship company making its terminus at the port of a foreign country. If the subsidy of $25,000 given to the Beaver Line has done nothing else, it has accomplished a great deal in that it has made clear that our eastern ports are capable of doing our business, and demonstrating that there is no necessity of giving a subsidy for any further time to vessels that have their termini at foreign ports.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to approach this question from a sectional or from a local standpoint. While I cannot, as the representative of my constituency, shut my eyes to the fact that very great benefit has inured, not only to my constituents, but I believe to all classes in the province, as well, by the establishment of this line from our port, because it is to the advantage of our fishermen, our farmers, our miners, and all other classes that if their products are to be sent to the English market they should have the opportunity of sending them by a regular line, running from a port near at hand, yet I do not wish to view the question from a local standpoint, but rather from a Canadian, from a national standpoint, from the standpoints of a united Canada and of Canada for the Canadians. I think every part of Canada, every man who is a Canadian, and who believes in this Canadian Dominion, who desires to see it grow and flourish, must be glad that the time has come when it has been demonstrated that the business of Canada in winter does not end at Montreal, but that for the future it can be done from ports of the lower provinces. There are very great possibilities for this business. I have looked into the Trade and Navigation Returns to endeavour to ascertain the volume of Canadian business which goes in the winter season to ports of the United States. Owing to the fact that these returns are not as full and as complete as they should be, I have been unable to obtain full information, but such information as I have I will give to the House.

Our Trade and Navigation Returns, page 545, show that foreign goods passing in bond through the United States for Canadian importers, in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec only—there are no returns for the other provinces—amounted to $14,829,581 worth in 1895, and in the year 1894 (page 543, Trade and Navigation Returns), these imports for Ontario and Quebec alone passing through United States ports in bond amounted to $14,753,686. From the United States returns, which seem to be more complete, at page LXXIII, I find that in the year 1894, there was transhipped to Canada imports to the amount of $20,175,576. Going back again to our own Trade and Navigation Returns, we find that the value of goods exported via Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba, in bond through the United States during the year 1895, amounted to : domestic, $11,271,002 ; foreign, $224,484, or a total of $11,493,486. In 1894, these exports of ours passing through the United States in bond amounted to : domestic, $11,485,357 ; foreign, $989,407, or a total of $12,474,764. The United States report, at the page I mentioned above, says that there were received in the United States, for transshipment from Canada, exports to the value of $17,068,629. According to the United States returns, which are clearly incomplete, the Canadian business done through the ports of the United States in 1894, amounted in round numbers to forty million dollars' worth. I believe, taking one year with another, and considering the length of time the St. Lawrence is closed to navigation, that at least sixty or seventy million dollars' worth of Canadian business has passed through United States ports each year, and which business properly and naturally belongs to the ports of the lower provinces. Even supposing that only fifty millions dollars' worth of Canadian business was done through the United States—and I believe this figure to be far below the correct estimate—and supposing that even half of that can be diverted to St. John and Halifax, and other ports of the lower provinces, there would be ample business to keep us busy in the winter, not only at these ports, but at other ports as well. Sir, it is the duty of every patriotic Canadian to encourage by every means in his power the transaction of all business possible in Canada, and it is his duty to try and divert that trade from the avenues in which it has been running in the United States. The figures which I have given above only relate to our trade at the present time, but there is reason to believe that the trade between Canada and Great Britain will grow immeasurably greater in the future. As was pointed out by the Minister of Finance in his Budget speech, recent events have attracted the attention of the British people to Canada as it has never been attracted before. Great Britain now largely depends for her food supplies on Russia and the United States from the latter of which countries she each year imports $400,000,000 worth of food products. Recent events have shown that it is possible at any time that England may become embroiled with Russia or the United States, when, of course, her food supplies from these countries would be cut off. Public attention in England has been directed to the Dominion of Canada and the other colonies as a source of supply, and British statesmen feel that the mother country must look to friendly nations for assistance in this respect. We may fairly expect that with that sentiment prevailing in England, her trade with Canada will rapidly develop in the future. The bounteous harvest which we had in the Northwest last year, must naturally attract attention to that country, and tend year by year to increase its population, and as a consequence increase the volume of its products. That being the case, we have not only to consider our present trade, but the possibilities of our future trade as well, and in consequence of the great step forward made this winter in diverting that trade to the lower ports, we have every reason to hope that it will continue to grow. I appeal to the hon. members of this House, and to members of the Government, that every encouragement should be given to the development of Canadian trade through Canadian ports. Irrespective of politics and from a national standpoint, it is a question which commends itself to every one of us. I do not appeal to any sectional prejudices, but I appeal to all the people of this great country. I appeal to the cattle-producers of Ontario and the wheat-growers and wheat-dealers in the west, to consider the advantages which our maritime ports offer, and to endeavour to send their freight in our direction. I would also ask the merchants in Montreal and Toronto, the great importers of this country, patriotic Canadians as they are, to assist us in building up the lower provinces, and by so doing to help us in making Canada greater and richer. A large amount of merchandise which these gentlemen import is sold to the people of the lower provinces. They have their agents there every day going from hamlet to hamlet and from store to store, selling their goods to our people from samples. I appeal to them, not only from patriotic motives, but from the standpoint of their own self-interest, to encourage the growth of the maritime provinces. If the rate of freight is equal, as I have shown it to be, and if the facilities for handling their goods be as good in the lower province ports, as I believe they are, then I appeal to these merchants to give instructions that their goods imported from England shall in future be carried to the lower provinces, and not to ports in the United States. If they do this, it will give an enormous stimulus to Canadian trade. Speaking about the development of our trade with England, I wish to give two illustrations to the House. It is unnecessary for me to give hon. gentlemen the figures as to the immense increase in our cheese exports during the last few years. Taking the export of bacon from Canada to Great Britain, I find that in the year 1891 we exported 7,150,075 pounds, valued at $590,852, and in 1895 we exported to Great Britain Canadian bacon to the amount of 37,526,058 pounds, valued at $3,546,107. From the year 1891 to the year 1895, a period of four years, we increased six times the value of our exports in this one item alone. Still, Mr. Speaker, we only provide 8 per cent of the bacon that is used in the British market, and in this particular trade it will be seen that there is a splendid chance for extension and development. Sir, I must ask the pardon of the House for having trespassed so long upon its time. This, however, is a matter of national importance, and not merely a local question, and that being so, I thought it right to bring the question as strongly as I could before the House and the country. I sincerely hope that the energetic and active press of this country, irrespective of party politics, will do their very utmost, as they have been doing to a considerable extent this winter, to call the attention of the consumers, of the merchants and of the people of Canada generally, to the facilities which the lower province ports offer for transacting the business of this country, and to the importance of maintaining those ports. It is, I believe, the duty of the Government—no matter what Government be in power—to do what it can to turn trade in the direction of our own ports, and especially is it incumbent upon them to do so when they have before them the example of what the city of St. John has done by its enterprise. I sincerely trust, no matter what the fortune of war may be in the coming election, no matter what party may be in power, that it will be the pleasure of that party for some years yet to provide sufficient subsidies to insure the regular running of steamers from that port, and to do what they can liberally and ungrudgingly to assist that port, and by so doing to assist the general interests of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CHESLEY. Mr. Speaker my colleague, the hon. member who has just taken his seat, at the beginning of his address, called us back to the days of the confederation of these provinces. He mentioned the fact that the construction of the Intercolonial Railway was a part of that compact, and referred to the great expectations entertained by some of the public men of that day as to the results of confederation and the building of that railway for the purpose of uniting old Canada with the maritime provinces. That, Mr. Speaker, is somewhat ancient history, and I am not going to travel over the same ground this evening. But I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that for many years past the people of the city which I have the honour to represent in this House have looked forward to the time when, as the result of the confederation of these provinces and the building of the railways uniting them, the products of western Canada would pass through the port of St. John to the markets of Great Britain. When what is now known as the short line railway, from Montreal to St. John, was completed, our people felt that with an open harbour easy of access at all seasons of the year, there was no sufficient reason why St. John should not be the winter port of Canada. Holding this view very strongly, they at once determined, so far as it was within their power, to provide such accommodation for ocean going steamers and such facilities for handling the trade, as would be required. I remember very well that at that time public meetings were held in the city of St. John at which this whole question was discussed very fully. The board of trade, the press, and the common council of the city of St. John took up the matter also and discussed it very thoroughly. I also remember very well some of the adverse criticisms made by a portion of the press of the city at that time. That portion of the press held that it was unnatural for the port of St. John, owing to its geographical position, ever to expect to command the exports of Canadian goods and the imports of British goods to western Canada. However, a very large and intelligent number of the people of St. John held different views. They felt that upon the completion of the railway I have named, which had reduced the distance between Montreal, the commercial metropolis of Canada, and the city of St. John, to 480 miles, and with that port open at all seasons of the year, there was no reason that they could see why it should not be utilized for the shipment of the exports of Canada and the imports brought into the country by the merchants of the west. Having been myself a member of the city council of St. John for several years, I know how thoroughly and carefully the whole question was discussed and investigated by that body. They finally determined that whatever facilities were necessary for the accommodation of ocean-going steamers and for the handling of the export trade of Canada, they were prepared to provide. I remember the adverse criticism that was directed against the city council at that time for the expenditures they were making in order to carry out that determination. At the same time, we were strongly backed up by a portion of the press; and on the strength of the public opinion in our favour, we determined that suitable facilities should be provided. We found on investigation that although the Canadian Pacific Railway had connection with the city of St. John, it had no connection with the harbour, and we concluded that it was necessary that that railway should be extended to the deep-water terminus. With that object in view the city council purchased from the Government of Canada the Carlton Branch Railway, paying for it $40,000; and that piece of railway was handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for a long term of years at a nominal rent. This gave the Atlantic division of that railway connection with deep water at the harbour of St. John. At that terminus the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made certain improvements, among others building a wharf and erecting a warehouse. But the city council felt that the accommodation which the railway company provided was entirely inadequate to the trade which we expected to do through the port of St. John, and the council at once had plans and specifications made for the purpose of making the deep-water terminus suitable for these ocean-going vessels, and providing all the facilities that would be necessary for handling the expected trade. Very large and commodious wharfs having a depth of 27 feet of water at low tide were built at great expense, a large area of ground was set apart; on this an elevator with a capacity of 350,000 bushels, and with machinery enough to operate one of double that capacity was erected. All that would be required in the future would be additional buildings. The Canadian Pacific Railway tracks were laid upon these wharfs, warehouses were built, and a complete deep-water terminus made equal to anything of the same extent that we have at any sea port on the Atlantic coast. I think the whole cost, in round numbers, about $300,000. I make this statement to show the strong view of the situation held by our people, and their strong faith that the time would eventually come, which was predicted by our public men at the time of confederation, when the exports and imports of the country would, in the winter season at least, pass through our port. Our people had strong faith in the statements made by the public men of that day, but, Sir, for one or two years this trade did not come. We were told by the vested interests in other directions, that the Bay of Fundy was almost impossible of navigation, that trade would not offer at the port of St. John sufficient to warrant a steamship company attempting a service to that port. But, during last autumn, the manager of the Beaver Line came to the city of St. John himself to examine the conditions existing there for ocean-going vessels, and the facilities for handling inward and outward cargoes. He brought with him the oldest and most experienced men in their employ; and, after examining the whole situation and taking all matters into consideration, he concluded that we were fairly well equipped for the winter business. As a result of that examination, an offer was made by that company to give us a fortnightly service between St. John and Liverpool, if a subsidy of $25,000 could be obtained from the Government. I can only say that this proposition was placed before the Government by a delegation from that city, including the representatives of the city of St. John, and we pressed the matter upon the attention of the Government as strongly as we could. We made every effort, we used every argument possible to induce the Government to enter into a contract with this company upon the basis and terms I have named. I am glad to know that the Government did enter into a contract with the Beaver Line Steamship Company to give us a fast service of ten trips after the close of navigation of the St. Lawrence for the sum of $25,000. The first steamer reached the port of St. John early in December, and, although a very short time had elapsed between the signing of the contract and the arrival of the first vessel and there was some doubt as to whether the manager would be able to secure a full cargo, the first vessel left the port, on the 12th or 13th of December, with a full cargo from western Canada, consisting of cattle, horses, sheep, cheese and other agricultural products. As an evidence of the success which has attended this enterprise, I may be permitted to read an extract from the press of the city of St. John, which appeared in the St. John "Sun" in the month of January, about the time the second or third boat left the port:

Winter port matters are booming. American cattle are coming here for export, and it is not unlikely that the Beaver Line will make extra trips. The Allan Line seems to have an eye on St. John, as there is in the city at the present time a gentleman connected with that concern.

A "Sun" reporter met a large number of gentlemen at the Royal Hotel last night, who are helping to make this the Canadian winter route. From them he obtained the following information:—

Joseph Lunness of the firm of Rogers, Halligan & Lunness, of Toronto, who rank among the largest exporters of live stock in America, is here. He will ship 390 sheep by "Lake Ontario." They will be here by noon to-day. This will be the first shipment this firm have made by way of St. John. Mr. Lunness says he came down for the purpose of ascertaining what sort of a place St. John is for shipment of cattle. They handle large numbers of American cattle from Chicago, along with Canadian cattle. They have been shipping by way of Portland, Me., all along, but if they can do as well by using St. John they will give us a part of their trade. Mr. Lunness says his firm shipped 25,000 sheep and 3,000 cattle from Montreal last summer. The new regulation providing for the export of American cattle from St. John, he says, give this port a great advantage. This is the only Canadian port through which American cattle can be exported. Rogers, Halligan & Lunness are feeding 2,800 head of cattle at Walkerville, and 500 at Toronto.

Mr. Lunness will remain here until to-morrow afternoon.

W. H. Reid of Kingston, Ont., will send 36 head of cattle over in the "Lake Ontario." W. G. Elliott, of Montreal, will give her 50 cattle, 200 sheep and 60 horses.

Other live stock is on the way here for the "Ontario." Yesterday's accident will delay them somewhat, but they are all expected by noon to-day.

The "Ontario" is sure of a full cargo. In addition to the goods already mentioned as taken in by her she has received 20 carloads of provisions, 10 carloads of cheese and 10 carloads of apples.

Mr. Ludington, the live stock agent of the Allan Line, is at the Royal. Mr. Ludington is inspector and valuator for the insurance on all cattle shipped by their steamers. He says he had a few days to spare and came down here to see what the chances are for shipping cattle from this port. He wants to know what it costs to load a ship here. There has been some talk of Allan Line steamers coming here, but Mr. Ludington declined to tell the "Sun" man whether there was any truth in these stories or not. Mr. Ludington says he is going over to Sand Point to look at the facilities for handling cattle and general cargo.

Hatheway, the big Boston cattle man, will ship 240 head of American cattle to Glasgow by the "Concordia." This will be the first lot of American cattle sent from a Canadian port for years.

All the gentlemen above mentioned say St. John has scored a great point by securing the right to export American cattle.

Another paper gives this account :

The quantities of western goods arriving at Sand Point for shipment across the Atlantic are very large. There is said to be no less than 36,000 sacks of American flour here and on the way.

The "Lake Ontario" will sail for Liverpool this afternoon, having been detained as a result of an accident on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Her cargo is made up of 200 standards of deals, 16,000 bushels of grain, 700 or 800 boxes of meats, between 4,000 and 5,000 boxes of cheese, a lot of catmeal, canned goods, butter and apples. It amounts in all to about 3,000 tons. The live stock arrived yesterday afternoon and was all on board at midnight. There are in all 188 horses, 107 head of cattle and 900 sheep. To-day some more apples and a quantity of feed will be taken on board.

The western cattle men are satisfied with the way the live stock was handled at Carleton yesterday, and the Beaver Line people have no word of complaint to make as to yesterday's work.

I read these to show, that quite early in the history of the enterprise, it was already meeting with great success, as regards the quantities of goods being shipped. The results have been highly satisfactory, I think, to all concerned. I believe that the steamship people are thoroughly well satisfied with the work so far, and I know that our own people in the city of St. John are more than pleased. I believe that the people of the country at large will be glad to know that we have in Canada winter as well as summer ports, that we have in our country ports through which all our exports and imports can be shipped and received at all seasons of the year. I not only feel that our people are satisfied in that respect, but they ought to be further satisfied when they know that business can be done as cheaply and as expeditiously from Canadian ports as it can be done from ports in the United States. We must remember that a very short time ago, about the end of last January, an Order in Council was passed by the Government allowing American cattle to be shipped from the port of St. John. Some criticism was aroused at the time by the granting of that order. I hold that Order in Council in my hand, and I will read it to the House. For my part, I cannot understand why there should be any objection, or why it should be adversely criticised. It simply enables Canadian railways and Canadian steamship companies to handle a larger amount of freight than they could otherwise do. These cattle will be shipped in any case, and shipping them from St. John is an advantage to that port. This is the Order in Council I refer to :

At the Government House at Ottawa, Friday, the 24th day of January, 1896. Present: His Excellency the Governor General in Council. His Excellency, by and with the advice of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, is pleased to order that the regulations relating to quarantine and transit of United States cattle through Canada, shall be and the same are hereby amended in such way as to allow shipment of United States cattle from the port of St. John, New Brunswick, subject to the following conditions:—

1. That the regulations relating to the inspection and isolation of United States cattle passing through Canada in transit, from one United States port to another, be made applicable to cattle shipped from the port of St. John.

2. That such cattle not having pratique in Canada, but simply passing through in bond, be shipped as United States and not Canadian cattle.

JOHN J. MCGEE,

Clerk of the Privy Council.

The first shipment of these cattle, numbering, I think, some 240 head were shipped by the Dominion Line steamer "Concordia" to Glasgow. But that is not all, Mr. Speaker. The fact of that Order in Council being passed has increased the traffic on the western railways to the port of St. John, and I have every reason to believe that it has not only brought cattle to our ports for shipment, but also that large quantities of grain and flour have also found their way to the port of St. John, owing to the lowering of rates in consequence of the large quantities of goods being moved by the railways from the west to the seaboard. In addition to all this, we have the Furness line of steamers running from St. John and Halifax to London. These steamers have been running for some two or three years, if I recollect aright, but I think that up to this winter they had developed very little western trade. I believe that in consequence of subsidizing of the Beaver Line, and the bringing of western goods to the port of St. John, it has so increased the traffic, it has so advertised the facilities of the port of St. John for handling goods, that people who knew but little of the advantages we possessed have had their attention attracted to us, and large quantities of grain, flour, cheese, and other commodities, from the western states have also come through for shipment by these vessels, via the port of St. John. So large have been the quantities of goods coming to the port that the management of the Furness Line, which is the same as the Donaldson, gave us two or three, if not four additional boats to Glasgow, which boats also have been fully loaded with goods from the west. All this is an advantage to the farmer, to the shipper, and to the manufacturer. Having three lines of steamers, one running direct to Liverpool, one to London, and one to Glasgow, the western man is given the advantage of these three great markets. I might here say, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian Pacific Railway, over which nearly all these goods have passed during the past three months, has thrown into this business the energy that is characteristic of its management and has contributed in no small degree to the success of the whole enterprise. As an evidence of this, I will read a statement which appeared in the Montreal "Gazette" of February 4th last :

The Port of St. John, N.B., is rapidly coming to the front as a desirable and advantageous freight and passenger route. That the port is not behind its rivals on the other side of the line, is evidenced by the fact, that the "Lake Ontario," of the Beaver Line, left Liverpool on Saturday, January the 18th, at 4 p.m., arriving at St. John Tuesday, the 28th inst., at 6 a.m.; the passengers left on the afternoon train, reaching Montreal on Wednesday morning. Twenty cars of freight were despatched the same evening, and delivered in Montreal Thursday at noon; thus, goods shipped from Liverpool via this route were delivered in Montreal in the short time of twelve days.

I think that is a complete answer to the argument against the port that perhaps business would not be as expeditiously done as it might be from Portland or Boston. As a further evidence that the more freight you have to carry the cheaper it can be moved, and as a further evidence that the Canadian Pacific Railway are alive to the value of this trade and the interests of this country, I wish to read one or two despatches wired from the great centres of trade with reference to the rates of freight:

New York, February 5.—Commissioner George B. Blanchard, of the Joint Stock Traffic Association, said, to-day, of a report from Chicago, that western packers and forwarders had adopted a plan to break up the association by shipping over the Canadian Pacific Railway, and connecting lines, to St. John, N.B., where the consignments were taken on board steamers for European ports. I have no knowledge of the matter. If the information is correct, it means that shippers do not want to pay regular rates, and, therefore, ship by a line that will cut rates. The joint traffic lines will keep up rates, and depend on their facilities to obtain business.

On the same day there was wired from Chicago to the same paper the following :—

Chicago, February 5.—The Michigan Central sent a telegram to-day to Commissioner Blanchard, of the Joint Traffic Association, urging that all the western lines should be allowed to make a cut rate of 25 cents a hundred pounds on coarse grain to the seaboard, from St. Paul, which the Grand Trunk, in contraction with the Chicago-St. Paul lines, has been authorized to make since February 1st, to meet the Canadian Pacific's manipulation of rates, by which it is diverting great quantities of all grain, except wheat, from the North-west to Canadian ports for export to England. Within the last ten days it has carried over 1,000,000 bushels to St. John, which would otherwise have gone to New York. The agreement of that Joint Traffic Association allows the Grand Trunk Railway to fight its battles against the Canadian road in this manner, by making cut rates to Boston, but the American trunk lines to the seaboard are showing their dissatisfaction at not getting their share of the grain shipments.

The inference from all that is, that the effect of these large volumes of trade being offered over these roads, and almost all these shipments being made from the port of St. John, has enabled the railway and steamship companies to make a rate of freight which has attracted freights from western points to St. John. It not only proves that we can do the business there successfully, but it proves beyond doubt, that the larger the volume of trade which is handled by a railway, the cheaper it can be done; and that, while the Canadian Pacific Railway, by the Soo line, has a short route to the sea-board, it is very evident, from the despatches I have read, that they are taking advantage of that, and making a rate lower than that made by the Joint Traffic Association in Chicago for controlling of this western business. The result of the whole thing is, that the farmers of Canada get a cheap rate to the markets of the world for their produce, by sending it over the line of railway named and these lines of steamers from the port of St. John to Great Britain. As further evidence, let me read an extract that appeared in one of the St. John papers about that same date, with reference to this same matter :

Reference was made in this column yesterday to the large amount of American goods coming here for export. Inquiry reveals the fact that about 400 carloads have come here since December 19, or about 66 cars per week. These include 361 cars of flour, 20 of cheese, 5 of canned beef, 5 of grease and one or two others. The flour came from Minneapolis, the beef and grease from Chicago. While this is a great thing for St. John, it is not, as pointed out yesterday, so great a thing for the steamship companies. The farther west they go, the larger proportion must go to the railways and the keener the competition of ports like Baltimore. The nearer to the port of shipment the steamers can get their cargo, the better of course for them, and hence the importance to them, and likewise to this port, of securing more lower province and Quebec and Ontario goods. When the upper province goods that have come forward are added to the amount of United States products, the total shows a great volume of business.

I may say that, so large has this volume of business become, that the Beaver Line Steamship Company, that were to give us ten trips during the winter season, have already been obliged, in order to handle the large amount of goods they were able to secure going out, to put on two extra boats and make four additional trips to clean up the business before the opening of navigation through the St. Lawrence. So you see, Mr. Speaker, that, when trade gets running in a certain groove, and when great volumes of it are being moved along certain lines, the cheaper it can be handled and the greater it will grow. I think this fact must be entirely gratifying to all concerned. I further think that the success of this winter business in St. John, which was started to some extent as an experiment, perhaps, is a full and complete justification for the Government entering into a contract with this line of steamers; it is, furthermore, a full and complete evidence that the business can be done at St. John, that the business can be done through the port of St. John as well, as cheaply and as expeditiously, as it can through American ports. I think it further demonstrates the fact, that, as to speed, and as to time, which is a factor in handling these goods, is shown to be in our favour. Sir, I have another little article here from a newspaper on that point that I wish to read to the House:

The Beaver Line steamship "Lake Ontario" arrived at Patridge Island early yesterday morning and was docked about 9 o'clock. The steamer sailed from Liverpool at 1 o'clock on Saturday, 18th inst., and had moderate weather until Saturday last, when a heavy north-east gale sprung up which caused a heavy sea. Captain Campbell states that the wind blew a hurricane and was the worst he had experienced for years.

The "Ontario" brought out 107 passengers and 1,300 tons of general cargo. The steamer not only made a profitable trip, but quite a victorious one, as the passengers for the west embarked yesterday afternoon on the same train that carried those who arrived on the SS. "Mongolian" at Halifax on Monday. The latter steamer sailed from Liverpool two days ahead of the "Ontario," and her passengers for the west will not reach Montreal any quicker than those who sailed from Liverpool for this city. The "Ontario's" western freight is being rapidly shipped by the Canadian Pacific Railway and will arrive in Montreal before the "Mongolian" can reach Portland, Me., from which port the latter steamer will ship her freight for western ports.

The above clearly points out that the port of St. John is the winter port of Canada.

Then, Sir, there has been more or less comment in the press, made, I think, chiefly by parties having vested rights in other ports, to the damage of the port of St. John; I allude to misrepresentations and to statements that have been circulated through the press from time to time, concerning the navigation of the Bay of Fundy. We have been told, over and over again, that the Bay of Fundy was dangerous to navigators, that it was almost impossible for vessels of the class required for this ocean service, to be navigated with any degree of safety in the Bay of Fundy. That statement has been industriously circulated for years, circulated, I have no hesitation in saying, by parties who have vested interests and vested rights at other ports, and whose sole aim and object was simply so to misrepresent the Bay of Fundy and the harbour of St. John, and all in connection with it, that their own vested rights in other ports might be preserved, or not materially interfered with. But, Sir, this winter's operations have proved beyond a doubt that all these statements are unfounded. You have heard the statement made by my colleague who has just taken his seat, with reference to an interview with the managers of the Allan steamers, and the managers of the Dominion steamers, as reported in the Montreal "Witness." I think, Sir, these statements come with a very bad grace from a steamship company or companies that have for many years received large subsidies from the Government of this country for bringing the mails to the city of Halifax, throwing them on the wharf, taking the mail-bag off the wharf, going to a United States port, making an arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway to carry from that port all the western freight of Canada, and being paid with Canadian money for doing it, thus building up a United States port, a port in a country not friendly to us, a port in a country that won't trade with us, a port in a country that shows no disposition to trade with us. And yet, Sir, these vessels have been subsidized heavily, not by $25,000, but by $125,000 a year, and all we, as Canadians, have received from that large expenditure of money is simply found in the fact, that these vessels run to the city of Halifax in the winter season, throw the mail-bags on the wharf, and take up others, and away they go to Portland. All our Canadian goods have been shipped in the past over the Grand Trunk Railway to Portland, and you see the whole business of Portland in the winter season is simply dependent on this line of steamers, and on the business done over the Grand Trunk Railway. I say, it comes with bad grace from steamship companies that have been enjoying large subsidies of the public money of Canada, to stand up and tell us that no business is developing there, that no business would ever develop; that, when these boats had been running there, little or no trade could be had; that little or no trade developed, and that it was the fault of the merchants, who had never taken hold of this matter. They also point us to the city of Quebec, and tell us that Quebec has lost all its trade because the merchants did not take hold with energy. I believe firmly what the management of the Beaver Line stated to us at the outset. They said: We have our agents throughout the west and in Great Britain, and if we can get this subsidy, we can bring western business to your port: all we have to do is to be in a position to offer as low freight rates as any other route. They have kept their word, and have succeeded in carrying out what they promised, and, in fact, the volume of trade and the success of the whole enterprise have exceeded the expectations of its most sanguine friends. I hope we have heard the last of Canadian subsidies being paid to steamship lines having their termini at foreign ports, the result of which is to build up the trade of those ports. I hope further, that we will no longer be told by steamship companies that it is all the fault of the people of St. John that they have made no effort to develop trade, and that when the steamship companies have had connections made for a long time with Great Britain, they must keep up those connections and continue to carry their business to a foreign port. We are told, further, not perhaps directly, but indirectly, through the press, and through interviews with some steamship people, that on every occasion the Bay of Fundy has been held up to steamship owners and to the Government of this country as a great bugbear which stood in the way of successfully doing trade through the port of St. John, the result of this winter's business has thoroughly disabused the minds of the people of the maritime provinces at all events of that idea, and so great has been the success of this enterprise that I believe, and I know that it will be continued, that the farmers, the shippers, and people who have goods to sell in the markets of Great Britain realize that this venture during the past three months has proved that goods can be laid down in Great Britain just as cheaply through the ports of the maritime provinces by our steamship lines as through ports of the United States. Here is an extract from a letter written by the manager of one of the lines of steamships as regards the navigation of the Bay of Fundy. I know this gentleman very well, and he is a man who would not make a statement if he did not believe it to be entirely true, but would rather give the statement the benefit of any doubt that might exist—I allude to Mr. Schofield, manager of the Furness Line and Donaldson Line of steamers from St. John. He says that this is what his captains state in regard to the navigation of the Bay of Fundy:

All the vessels have arrived safely and in good time, and the captains report no difficulty whatever in navigating the Bay of Fundy, notwithstanding the fact that several had not visited this port before coming here this winter.

I think that statement, coming from the source it does, is an entire and complete answer to the assertion we have heard made so frequently through the press, and in interviews by parties interested in other directions, parties who were interested in remaining in the position they were, and who were not willing to consider any change that might be offered in regard to adopting the lower province ports with a view to trade being done through them. To-day I have information to show that there is no diminution, notwithstanding the fact that three months of the winter have passed, in the volume of goods shipped from the port, but rather an increase, and I will read statements appearing in one or two of our newspapers, as late as 25th February, to give the House an idea of the great quantity of goods still coming to our port for shipment:

The Beaver Line steamer "Lake Ontario," will take the largest shipment of live stock yet made from this city. Her cargo will consist of 107 head of cattle, 188 horses and 883 sheep. She will also take about 200 standards of deals, 15,000 bushels of grain, about 5,000 boxes of cheese, about 800 boxes of meat, besides a lot of general cargo. The steamer will sail for Liverpool this afternoon.

The Beaver Line boat "Lake Winnipeg," will sail for Liverpool about 1 p.m. to-day. Her cargo will be made up, among other things, of: 16,000 bushels of wheat, 10,000 maple blocks, 2,500 boxes of cheese, 500 packages butter, 75 cases pain killer, 5,000 sacks flour, 300 standards of deals, 385 head of cattle, 72 horses and 13 sheep. Of the 385 head of cattle, 317 are American, and a fine lot they are said to be. The lot furnished by one man averaged 1,500 each. The pain killer mentioned above is shipped by Davies & Laurence, of Montreal, and goes to Bombay.

The Canadian Pacific Railway advertise in the English papers a "personally conducted" excursion from Great Britain to Winnipeg by the Beaver Line "Lake Superior," leaving Liverpool on April 4th for this port. The party, which will likely number several hundred, will be in charge of J. J. Haslett, the Canadian Pacific Railway immigration agent.

This is true. Notwithstanding the large volume of business done this winter, large quantities of goods not only Canadian but also American, continue to arrive. When the arrangement is made for the coming winter, the service will be made weekly instead of fortnightly as at present. There is no reason in the world why one of these vessels cannot leave the port every week with just as full a cargo as she has once in two weeks. I believe that as a result of this winter's operations, we have demonstrated beyond a doubt, that the Canadian business can be done through the port of St. John in winter, as well as it can be done through United States ports. I believe that we shall require to pay subsidies to steamers coming to the port of St. John to carry away our exports or to bring in the freight which our merchants may import. The following table will show the details of the cargoes inward and outward carried by the Beaver Steamship Line, from December 4, 1895, to February 19, 1896:

SUMMARY STATEMENT of Cargoes carried by the "Beaver Steamship Line"—Ports of call, St. John, N.B., Canada, and Liverpool, England, from December 4, 1895, to February 19, 1896.

The House is now in possession of all the information we have in connection with the matter. I am glad to know the experiment has been a complete success, and that while there might have been misgivings at the outset, the people of St. John and everybody concerned, are now more than gratified at the result of the enterprise.

Mr. IVES. When the deputation from St. John waited upon the Government last fall, with the proposition that an experiment should be made of shipping Canadian products from the port of St. John, there were several matters which the Government had to consider, with a view of determining whether they could reasonably hope the project would be successful. To my mind, it seemed to be requisite that there should be a railway company disposed to favour the route via St. John, and disposed to take hold of the matter in earnest, so as to supply that port with the necessary freight to give these ships full cargoes. It also seemed to me to be necessary, that a transportation company, having fairly good ships, reasonably economic freight carriers, should be ready to go into the enterprise. In the next place, in order to make the experiment of any value at all as showing whether it might be continued successfully, it was necessary to fix as a condition, that the rate should be as low for both east bound and west bound freight, as that quoted from any American port. It was at once recognized by the Government, and by the gentlemen who waited upon the Government, that the experiment would be of no possible utility, except upon the condition that the freight rates should be as low as by any other possible route. We had also to provide, of course, in order to safeguard the public exchequer, that in case the experiment did not succeed, and full cargoes were not obtained, that the power should be retained by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to cancel the contract at any time during its course. It was also thought necessary, in order that the experiment should be of any advantage, to stipulate that the freight which these ships carried should be largely freight from Ontario, Quebec, and western points. It would be of no particular advantage to demonstrate, that a subsidized line of freight steamers could get loads of deals from New Brunswick, or cargoes of freight from any of the maritime provinces. That, of course, would not serve any interest of the Dominion at large. It was therefore stipulated that these vessels should be loaded with at least four-fifths of their cargo from western points, and we took power to cancel the contract if that, as well as the other conditions, were not complied with. To my mind, it seemed that if we made an experiment of this kind and it succeeded, it would demonstrate that St. John could be utilized as a winter port of the Dominion, under ordinary favourable circumstances. Well, Sir, we made that contract, because for the first time a steamship company and a railway company seemed prepared to take hold of the project, with a view of making it a success. I am sure it is gratifying to the members representing the city of St. John, and to the people of that city, as I know it is gratifying to the Government and gratifying I believe to the people of Canada at large; to find, that the experiment has proved so successful. It has been a pronounced success, and I have no reason to doubt from what I have heard, that the other leading Canadian lines of transportation will fall in with the policy of the present Government, and will in future seek their cargoes at maritime province ports. In answer to a petition from the Maritime Board of Trade of the maritime provinces, the Government have just laid down as its policy, that after the termination of existing contracts, no subsidy will be given to any line of steamers that touches at any other than a Canadian port on this side of the ocean. That is the settled policy of the Government, and we trust that that declared policy, coupled with the proof of what has been done by the city of St. John, will lead to, practically, a very large increase of business from Canadian ports during the winter season. There was only one thing that my friend (Mr. Hazen) the mover of this resolution said, with which I am disposed to quarrel. He seemed to express some lack of confidence as to which political party will have the granting of the subsidy next fall. I beg his pardon if I did not understand him, but it seems to me, that the patriotic course of the present Government in this matter, as well as in a thousand other matters, is likely to commend itself to the approval of the people of this country. We have no objection to bring down the contract and the other papers, and they will be laid on the Table at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Ives) the Minister, could not take his seat without reminding the people of Canada, that they owe this Government a special debt on account of the subsidy which has been recently granted; intending thereby, I suppose, to make the subsidy do good service at the approaching elections. The Government can hardly take very much credit for this subsidy, in view of the fact that it took so long a time to persuade them, that such a subsidy would be of any use. It was only at the last moment, and on the very eve of a general election—as is now clear from the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce—that the Government was induced to give this subsidy. Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested in the discussion that has taken place, and I must say that I think the hon. gentlemen who represent the city of St. John have a right to congratulate themselves, and to congratulate the city which they represent, upon the results which have followed the granting of this subsidy. But while these exercises, which have partaken more or less of a sort of jubilation, have been very interesting, I would have been more pleased had the hon. members who represent the city of Halifax been here to join in the programme. I noticed that my hon. friend the senior member for St. John (Mr. Hazen), with a fine irony and with great regard, perhaps, for the feelings of the hon. gentlemen who represent the city of Halifax, always referred to the shipments from St. John by this line as utilizing the ports of the maritime provinces; but I failed to gather from my hon. friend's speech or from the speech of the hon. junior member for St. John (Mr. Chesley), where the port of Halifax came in, or what port they meant to indicate other than the port of St. John. It occurred to me, Mr. Speaker, that the port of Halifax was not "in it." Now, as has been said by the two first speakers, we have had many promises, made both before and since confederation, as to what would happen as the result of the confederation of the old provinces. I remember very well when quite a young man hearing the speeches of the hon. gentleman who now leads this House, describing what Halifax would be in the near future, immediately after confederation—that it would be the Liverpool of Canada, the great entrepot of this Dominion. And still, nearly thirty years afterwards, it comes down to this, that Halifax is not "in it," but the business is being done by the sister city of St. John. Now, Sir, as a member coming from the province of Nova Scotia, I may say at once that I rejoice in the success which has attended this effort to build up the port of St. John, so far as it is a success. I am bound to say, however, that I was somewhat disappointed in the figures given by my hon. friend the senior member for St. John as to the number of tons of freight which these steamships brought from Liverpool in the first three trips out of the ten. If I remember rightly, I think the number of tons averaged something like 1,000, although each of the steamers has a capacity of four or five times that amount. It did seem to me that that was not as desirable a showing as we should expect. But my hon. friend the junior member has given us further light upon the subject. Before he got through he had proved almost too much, because he told us that during the concluding portion of the time for which these boats had been subsidized two or three additional steamers were found to be necessary to carry the large amount of freight which was offering; that one or two other lines of steamers were bidding for it, and that when the arrangements should be made for the coming season he had no doubt that a very much larger quantity of freight would be registered. Now, it seems to me that my hon. friend has thus proved conclusively to the House that no further subsidy will be needed. But, to refer again to the city of Halifax, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce told us when the Government were approached by the delegation from St. John, three or four things were necessary in order to carry out this scheme. First, he said it was necessary to have the co-operation of some great line of railway. That, it seems, was found in the Canadian Pacific Railway. Next, it was necessary to have the co-operation of the shippers who were willing to send their produce across or bring their goods from Great Britain. In the third place, it was necessary to have a provision in the contract by which the freight rate to be charged would be as low as the rate to and from any port in the United States. Well, Sir, it occurs to me that these provisions might be found with reference to the city of Halifax as well as with reference to the city of St. John. We have the railway, and the Government owns the railway that runs from Halifax. Consequently, if the Government were desirous of doing justice to the city of Halifax, there would be no difficulty in making arrangements with the railway that should co-operate in the project. And there is no difficulty in finding shippers who will ship their goods from this country, and if you subsidize a line of steamers and arrange with a line of railway to carry them, provided the rates of freight over those lines will be as low as the rates over other lines. Therefore, if the Government and the members who represent the city of Halifax were as zealous as the gentlemen who represent the city of St. John in looking after the interests of their own city, a similar arrangement might be made with Halifax to that which has been made with St. John. I think, Mr. Speaker, there is at present a freight line of steamers subsidized to run to the city of Halifax, known as the Furness Line. But I think the subsidy received by that line is only $25,000, and that for a whole year—not simply for ten trips throughout the year—and the condition is imposed on it to call not only at Halifax, but also at St. John; while in the arrangement made with the Beaver Line, I observe that the city of St. John is the only point at which these steamers are to touch. Now, both hon. gentlemen have referred to the Allan Line, and have called attention to the fact that the Allans received a very large subsidy while they do the principal part of their business through the ports of the United States. My hon. friends were perhaps not in politics at the time, and they do not remember the chapter in Canadian history when the Allans made some large subscriptions towards a certain fund in the interests of the party to which these hon. gentlemen belong; and we all remember, from the evidence that came out in the investigation shortly after the election of 1872, that Sir Hugh Allan had a distinct promise from the Premier of this country that he would be recouped for the money he had advanced. My hon. friend must not be annoyed at the Allans or at the Government, because the arrangement which was made so long ago as 1872 is being carried out, and until the Allans are recouped, my hon. friend need not hope to have the arrangements which is now being carried out, and which, I agree with them, is altogether wrong, changed. The hon. gentlemen have demonstrated, beyond question, that when any subsidy is given to any line of steamers to carry the mails from Canada to Europe, it ought to be a condition that those steamers should not touch at any other ports than the ports of Canada on this side. And I was glad to hear the statement of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that when the next contract is made for the carrying of mails from this country to England, the line of steamers contracted with shall not touch at any other than Canadian ports on this side. I do not intend to continue the discussion. I rose chiefly to call attention to the absence of the gentlemen who represent the interests of Halifax, and I note that it is not from ignorance of this subject coming up that they are absent, because I saw the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) in the House when my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Hazen) rose to make his motion this afternoon.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman seems to be quite true to his natural political instincts when he attempts to create rivalry and dissatisfaction between Halifax and St. John. That is the whole gist of the argument, if there be any argument. In what he has said. Instead of feeling pleased that a trade, started as an enterprise in St. John, had developed beyond the most sanguine expectations of its promoters, he rather blames the Government because the enterprise has been successful. I do not think the country will endorse his sentiments, or be inclined to attach as much importance, as he does to the support which is given to a steamship line. It is gratifying to know that, with the small subsidy given, we have secured a Canadian winter port through which we can satisfactorily ship the produce of Canada.

Mr. FORBES. That port has been there for a long number of years.

Mr. SPROULE. And it would be there for a much longer number of years before the hon. gentleman or his friends would have developed it if they followed their present policy. It ought to be a great pleasure to Canadians to know that we are not confined to Halifax as a winter port. We have, by the enterprise of the hon. gentleman who for the time being represents that section of the country, assisted by the Government, who are always ready to develop every enterprise that can be developed in the country, a winter port at St. John which meets all our requirements. We have been, hitherto, generally obliged to use Portland in the winter for the purpose of shipping our stock. But now we can ship from St. John. But the freight men of Ontario are not altogether satisfied, for this reason, that all the space, they claim, is taken up by Americans. The supply of American cattle is so great that the Americans have taken up the space to the disadvantage of the shippers from Ontario, who are practically shut out at present. But that can only go on for a limited period, because, according as more freight is offered and the demand for more steamers increases, of course there will be a greater number of steamers to do the trade. This winter the Ontario cattle men have been unable to take advantage of this port, and although the returns of freight given by the hon. gentleman from that district shows that a very large trade is being done from Ontario in different lines, it is only a question of time when a much larger trade will be done. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) spoke of the shipment of maple blocks by this line. I think those were nearly all produced in my part of the country. Why, we have immense quantities of valuable timber used for that purpose, and during the last eight or ten years, dozens of mills in my part of the country are getting these maple blocks and shipping them to England. They have heretofore carried on the trade in summer, because it is not advantageous to ship in the winter, but when they learn that they can ship as profitably in the winter as in the summer, no doubt that business will be materially developed and become very valuable. I am quite sure it will be a pleasure to all Canada to know that this port is turning out so satisfactory, that the trade offering is an encouragement to continue in the future, and also to know that no subsidy will be required to induce steamers to go to that port in the future. It is regrettable that the return cargoes are not as large as they might be, but still if the return cargo be sufficiently large to make the trade a paying one, no doubt the steamers will continue the business. If they can get full supply one way, and a partial cargo the other, that will be sufficient to enable them to go on doing business at this port.

Mr. FORBES. I had not intended to take any part in the discussion, but the remarks of the last speaker seemed to indicate that he is not correctly informed as to the facts relating to the Atlantic service, and I rise to put him right. I am surprised that the Government cannot announce its policy whereby it intends to satisfy the city of Halifax for being deprived of its pledged rights. From confederation down to today, at every general election held in that city, the people have been told by Cabinet Ministers and Conservative candidates that Halifax was to be the great winter port of Canada. Now, speaking for myself, I have no objection to St. John getting all it can of the foreign or provincial trade. I have no objection to this or any other Government developing the trade of that port, but when we are told that a steamboat line is subsidized very heavily by this Government to carry freight from western Canada to the old country from the port of St. John—subsidized at the rate of $25,000 a year, or $2,500 per trip—and that these steamers are almost exclusively utilized by American exporters, as stated by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, who declared that the space was taken up by American exporters to the exclusion of western Canadian exporters, and who complained of the contract this Government had made.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not complain of the nature of the contract, but that the Americans had taken advantage before the Canadian exporters, and had secured this space in advance. The Government had nothing to do with it.

Mr. FORBES. My hon. friend distinctly said that this line of steamers was under contract with the Government to carry passengers and cargo from the port of St. John, and he then, as representative of western exporters, said that the steamers did not give the Ontario exporters a chance because they had given exclusive rights to the American exporters.

Whether they can do that by virtue of the powers they have under the contract made with the Government, or whether they can do it because the American exporter gives a larger rate of freight, I do not know, and I do not care. All I know is, that Canadian citizens are paying large prices to enable these shipments to be carried through this port. Here we have to-night a declaration from a Conservative member of Parliament, that the steamboat lines are boycotting the Canadian exporters and refusing them privileges in the carrying of freight, while they grant those privileges to the American exporters. One cannot but come to the conclusion, that the Canadian people are paying to assist in carrying on the American export trade to the exclusion and injury of the Canadian exporter. Now, if, after three or four months of experiment of shipping from St. John, vast quantities of goods are lying in the warehouses, or in the stations, along the line, waiting for export because the steamers cannot carry them as fast as they are offered, surely that is conclusive evidence, either that the subsidy is too large, or unnecessary, the cargoes being sufficient to pay freight without a subsidy, or, on the other hand, that the Government contract is not sufficient for the requirements of the country, and that, instead of having a contract for ten trips, we should have twenty or, perhaps, forty trips a year. I hope that the export trade from that port, or any other, will continue to grow quite as rapidly as this trade has grown in the last four months, and that steamers will see that it is to their advantage to come to these ports to carry away western freight.

One thing more I would like to refer to. It has been said by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), that the Liberal party would never have done anything to develop the trade of St. John or any other maritime province port. My hon. friend is wrong there, quite wrong. If he will go over the history of the years when the Liberal party were in power, he will find that they took the only step that has ever been taken to make a maritime province port the winter port for Canada. During the regime of the Liberal party, they made the Allan Line come to Halifax and discharge their cargoes there. They did it to the great injury of the ports of Portland and Boston, those ports which the hon. gentleman and his friends have supported so long here, and which could have no better representatives here than the hon. members for Halifax, who, though sitting in this Parliament for so many years, have done nothing to benefit any maritime province port, while they have done all they could to assist the ports of Boston and Portland, having behind them the influence of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. members for Halifax have never put themselves on record in this House, or done anything else in Parliament to benefit any maritime province port. A few years ago, just previous to the by-elections in 1892, a mass meeting was called in Halifax to protest against the renewal of the Allan Line contract. I was present at that meeting, and remember it well. The hon. members for Halifax, the same gentlemen who now represent that city, had been unseated for corrupt practices, and were seeking re-election, and by the way, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that neither one of these gentlemen are in their seats to-day, although both are in Ottawa, and the junior was in the House when this debate began. At this great meeting, held in the Academy of Music, the hon. members were looked to for special speeches, and were expected to make wonderful statements as to the renewal of the Allan contract. The meeting was addressed by the hon. senior member at that time (Mr. Kenny). He moved a resolution, and spoke in most glowing terms of the great advantage to the western Canadian exporters of the port of Halifax and the great advantage to Nova Scotia of having these ante-confederation promises fulfilled, promises which had been made in 1867, repeated in 1871, in 1873, in 1878, in 1882, in 1887, and still again in 1892. He had great pleasure in informing the people of Halifax that at last they were to control the winter port of Canada. The resolution he moved approved the policy of the Government and denounced the efforts of the Allan Line to have their subsidy increased. He spoke in glowing terms of the establishment by the Government of the fast line, with a 22-knot service, and spoke of the great advantages that would accrue to the Dominion. The whole American continent was to receive its mails through Halifax by fast train connections with Montreal, Chicago and New York. No sooner had he resumed his seat, than the hon. junior member (Mr. Stairs) rose to move his resolution. He came to the most gratifying part of his remarks, when he presented a telegram from the Premier of the Dominion, to the effect that he was pleased to say the Government had refused to yield to the bluff of the Allan Line but had a contract for the mail service at the old rates, and he was proud to say, that, through the influence of himself and others, the old 13-knot Allan boats would land at the dock at Halifax. That, we thought, was the crowning speech of the evening, until it turned out to be a hoax. That bubble was pricked before the evening was over. It was shown that he was not speaking with authority, and that has been proven to be the fact. The contract was renewed, and the boats went to Portland, as before, and the same money was paid, $125,000 a year. That meeting in Halifax was got up for the purpose of deceiving the electors of the province of Nova Scotia. I have no hesitation in saying that the Government had never any intention of making Halifax a winter port, nor did they have any intention of making St. John the winter port of Canada until they were brought to do it by the force of commercial argument, by the fact that steamboat lines were uniting with commercial men in the maritime provinces to prove to the Government that freight could be sent through to these ports just as advantageously as through Portland or Boston. What I want to ask the Government is this: Where is the city of Halifax to get its 'quid pro quo'? Where is it to get its satisfaction for relinquishing its rights to the fulfilment of the promises made to it? It is whispered to me here, that Halifax is to get the fast Atlantic line, while St. John is to have the freight line. It may be, that the Government will be able to consummate that scheme, but I doubt it very much indeed. The hope will be held out to us, at any rate. What advantage is it going to be to us in Nova Scotia? I have the right to advocate one port, not as against another, but to claim that the promises made by the Government and their representatives, shall be fulfilled. I want to know, where does the advantage come in to the port of Halifax, as the hon. member for St. John said, to have these mails dumped on the dock, while the passengers are carried elsewhere? You cannot pass a law to compel the passengers to land at Halifax. You may pay $750,000 for getting these mails thrown upon the wharf at Halifax. Is that going to deceive the people, that justice is being done to that port?

Is that going to compensate those people for the loss of the freight which should be handled by the citizens of that port? Is that going to compensate them for the loss of the passenger traffic which the Government cannot control under the present conditions of the railways in the province? Sir, until the Government awakes to the fact that they cannot divide these subsidies among the several maritime ports of the Dominion for the purpose of making votes, for the purpose of gaining political influence, I say as soon as they arrive at the conclusion, then we will have this thing settled upon a commercial basis, free from politics. But if they are going to divide it up in this way, and parcel it out among several ports for the sole purpose of making political capital, I say that the principle on which they are working is one which deserves condemnation. Unless you are prepared to give railway facilities to the port of Halifax, similar to those which the port of St. John commands—and I am proud to say it does command—then the dropping of the fast Atlantic mails and passengers at the port at Halifax will be a mere farce; they will not stop there. It has been said in the press, and talked of by merchants and others, that the Government intend to sell out the Intercolonial Railway from Halifax to St. John, and to give it as a part of a bonus to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company if they will accept the contract for the fast Atlantic service. This may do very well, and it undoubtedly will prevent any western bound freight from being shipped from the port of Halifax. When this Government refused to extend the railway called Temiscouata branch into the city of Halifax, then they took away all chances, commercially, from the city of Halifax of ever being a winter port for that trade; there is no doubt about that. St. John as a Canadian port has secured a winter service, but I want to know whether it is going to please the members from Halifax to accept a fast Atlantic service under the terms and conditions indicated by the junior member from St. John. If we are to have this line from St. John made a success, it must be carried out upon a commercial basis; and I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the time is not far distant when exporters will see it to their advantage to ship from the port of St. John without the aid or assistance of a Dominion subsidy. To-day we have three lines of steamers sailing from the port of Halifax. They afford a great convenience to the small exporting towns of the province of Nova Scotia. It has been demonstrated it is to the interest of our exporters of fish and of farm produce in that province to ship them by rail or by schooners to the central port of Halifax, and thence by steamers to the great consuming ports of the world, either in Great Britain, the United States or the West Indies. This is a trade which will grow; it will grow to a much greater extent, and much more satisfactorily, under a changed tariff or fiscal condition in this country. I have great hopes that under a condition of change of affairs which will shortly come about, the return cargoes for these steamers will tend to lessen the freight of the outward cargo, and thus encourage export, so that it will be far greater than it is to-day. Until the Government look at this thing from a practical standpoint, until they look at it from any other point of view than that taken by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), I do not think they can make it a financial success, for the exporters of this country. I only hope that the trade of St. John will grow and prosper. Very little thanks I believe are due to the Government for what has been done. For many long years the port of St. John has been in the same or in a better condition than it is to-day. For many long years the port of Halifax has been in the same condition it is to-day; yet it has never occurred to those hon. gentlemen opposite and to such violent supporters as the hon. member for East Grey, that this thing might have been done before, that possibly a subsidy might have been tried before, and that if the trade of the port of St. John had increased in the proportion that hon. gentlemen say it has within the last three months, it would to-day have been one of the greatest exporting ports of the Dominion, or indeed of the western continent. I say, therefore, that very little thanks are due to the Government, very little thanks possibly are due to the members for St. John for foreseeing this thing at this late hour in their political life. True, they have been able, on the eve of an election, to bring such force to bear on the Government as to cause the Government to yield, and I heartily approve of their wisdom in taking the Government at the eleventh hour, and putting the nippers upon their throat. It is better late than never to do a good thing. But I do not think much credit is owing to the Government for deserting the maritime provinces in the way they have done since confederation. I think the people of the maritime provinces will look upon the matter in the same light; and I am glad to know that the matter has been discussed in Parliament and that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) has made the motion that is now before us.

Mr. BAIRD. It would appear, if the statements of the hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Forbes) are correct, that if the Government entered upon this scheme with a view of playing an election card on the eve of a general election, they must give the Government credit for having exercised almost unerring sagacity in playing a winning card. The thing apparently is about to succeed, and if the Government have a number of cards like this up their sleeve, the general elections will be about secure. Both the hon. gentlemen who have spoken of the port of Halifax, say the port of Halifax is not in it. They go on to recite that for years and years they were taunted with the prediction that Halifax was to become the Liverpool of America. Well, I think I can offer them a few words of consolation on that subject. For years and years the Conservatives of the province of New Brunswick were taunted with the same argument, that St. John was to become the Liverpool of America, and no greater joke could be played for the past ten or fifteen years than to repeat in an election campaign that it was predicted that St. John was to become the Liverpool of America. But the Liberal statesmen and the Liberal editors who dealt so freely with this subject in the past, are very silent at the present time. It would appear that St. John is about to become the Liverpool, or one of the Liverpools, of America, and these gentlemen now are forced to join in and to give their praise to the scheme that has been carried forward by the Government of the day. They certainly have taken hold of it with a strong hand, and have tried to turn the tide of traffic towards Canadian ports. To those gentlemen I would say, for fear that they might be laughed at, do not make fun of the prediction for Halifax may yet become the Liverpool of America. You must bear in mind that at the present time there are but few millions of bushels of grain raised in Canada for foreign export, but the time must soon come when hundreds of millions of bushels of grain must find their outlet somewhere on the Atlantic seaboard to foreign countries. It would appear that the wheat fields of the United States are being rapidly depleted. The hon. gentleman takes issue with that statement, but I think that those who have made a careful study of the question, say that the exports from the United States must gradually decrease until they completely dry up, while those of Canada are just beginning to expand. In a few years, if this tide of traffic is turned and kept turned towards Canadian ports, I think that St. John will have more than she will want to do, and Halifax will have more than she will want to do, as winter ports. I will give the port of St. John a second place to no other. I come from the province of New Brunswick, and it is natural that I should feel strongly in her favour. Her location is a wonderful one, furthest inland of all the Canadian ports that are open to the sea all the year round, she has a commanding position for that trade. All it required was to turn the tide of this traffic and it has quickly secured the prize, as has been demonstrated so clearly by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken from the city of St. John, and the result of that experiment needs no comment from me. I think I am right in saying that these hon. gentlemen have made out a clear case for the port of St. John: they have made out a clear justification for the Government of Canada in taking the step they have in granting this subsidy to encourage this trade, and a clearer justification for doing what should always be done, that is, withdrawing any subsidy to a line of steamers that goes to ports of the United States. This is all I wish to say on the subject, and we may be fully assured that the outlet for this traffic from Canada is going to be from Canadian ports and that St. John and her sister ports will be called the Liverpools of Canada.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. I am satisfied that the subsidy of $25,000 per year to the Beaver Line has created quite a "boom" not only in St. John, but throughout the maritime provinces, as all the hon. members seem to be interested in the question notwithstanding the jealousies of different sections. I desire to draw the attention of the House to some of the workings of this line from an Ontario standpoint. We in Ontario have shipped a large quantity of our produce by way of St. John. I know the Beaver Line, and I have shipped a great many thousands of cattle by that line, which I consider to be one of the best and safest carrying lines in the trade. But we all would like to have the advantage of those boats for the cattle trade; but now we are not in a position to get the benefit of them. The reason is that an Order in Council has been passed permitting American cattle to be shipped over this route and by this line. I know well many of the gentlemen to whom reference has been made. Recently I asked one of them how he liked shipping from St. John, and he replied, very well, but we are very much handicapped by the Americans. To illustrate, he said, I will show what freight I have to pay from Galt to St. John. I have to pay $82 per car for my cattle, whereas they have a special rate, run on express time, from Chicago to Montreal in 48 hours and have only to pay $54 per car, or $2 per head on an average car load in favour of American cattle being sent to that port as compared with Canadian cattle. The junior member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) alluded to British connection and the greater safety resulting from shipment by Canadian ports. We have been threatened with war with the United States. No doubt it would be safer in time of war to make shipments to the mother country by a Canadian route, but I do not see how we are going to get around the Yankees when the freight is carried through the State of Maine.

Mr. HAZEN. There are two routes through Canadian territories, one by the Intercolonial Railway and the other by Rivière du Loup.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. I am dealing with the route at present under discussion. This line goes through the State of Maine, and no doubt Canadian freight would be stopped in case of war. I think the subsidy of $25,000 is given not only for the benefit of the people of Ontario, but for the benefit of the maritime provinces and St. John City, but the greatest benefit as regards the cattle trade is derived by cattle shippers from Chicago to St. John. Canadian shippers were almost entirely shut out of the last vessel. The senior member for St. John (Mr. Chesley) stated that 317 American cattle were shipped on the "Lake Winnipeg," which sailed on the 27th February last, and that the vessel carried only a few other cattle. No doubt this is on account of the advantage possessed by shippers from Chicago to St. John, and those shippers are going to close St. John as a shipping port for Canadian cattle, and American cattle shippers will control it. What I would advise shippers to do is to go to Chicago and ship American cattle from there by way of St. John. The difference between shipping from Chicago to St. John and from Galt or London to St. John, is a saving of $2 per head in favour of the former route, which in itself would be a good profit. Any one who has been in the cattle business during the last few years and can secure a profit of $2 per head in this way will be willing to remain in the business the whole year round.

Mr. CHESLEY. No doubt 300 odd went by "Lake Winnipeg." I may say, however, for the information of the House that that was the sixth steamer of the subsidized line, and the other shipments had gone by vessels not subsidized.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. EDGAR. In the absence of the leader of the Opposition, who spoke to me about the matter, I desire to ask whether under the special order for the next few days' questions can be asked, which is the usual practice. I believe that it was understood by the House that this should be the order of business; Thursday's order of business as arranged is that the Government business should come next after questions put by members.

Mr. FOSTER. The arrangement made is very clearly seen in the resolution passed, and it was that this should be the order of the day, with the exception of Monday. On Monday the old order of the day remains and questions can be crowded in.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But always when a concession has been made there has never been any reluctance shown to answer questions.

Mr. FOSTER. And there will not be.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I recommend that the modification suggested be made. The Supplementary Estimates were promised me.

Mr. FOSTER. They are coming.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When?

Mr. FOSTER. As soon as we can get them ready.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRAYERS.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 58) The Remedial Act (Manitoba). He said: Mr. Speaker, in times past I have had occasion to propose to this House the consideration of measures of very great importance, but I confess that I have never risen to propose the second reading of a Bill under the same deep sense of responsibility that I feel on the present occasion. The question that is now submitted for the consideration of this House is one which, in my judgment, transcends in importance any measure that has ever been submitted to this House during its existence. I cannot do better than to draw the attention of the House, briefly, in the outset, to what has been accomplished by the great measure of confederation which to-day brings us face to face with the question under consideration.

In 1864 a measure was concerted between the governments of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and Nova Scotia for the legislative union of these maritime provinces. The Hon. Sir Leonard Tilley was at that time the Prime Minister of New Brunswick, the late Col. Grey was Premier of Prince Edward Island, and I had the honour to hold a similar position in regard to the province of Nova Scotia. I need not say to the members of this House, who all know, either personally or by long repute, Sir Leonard Tilley, that he was one of the fathers of confederation, and one of the public men who throughout his long career in Canada has been known and respected for his very high attainments and great patriotism. When we met as arranged, to hold a conference at Charlottetown for the purpose of taking up that question, a deputation came down from the province of Canada—then United Canada—and asked that they should be heard in reference to the still larger and wider project, of providing for the confederation of all the British North American colonies. I need hardly say that all gentlemen present in this House who have given attention to the history of Canada in those days, are well aware that the position of Canada was then anything but a happy one. All who have given attention to this subject know that questions of race and religion had formed prominent subjects of consideration between the great political parties, the Conservative and Liberal parties, of this country, and that during that period, so great had the conflict become, so closely balanced were the parties representing, as it were, Upper and Lower Canada, which, to a certain extent, were divided into hostile camps, that good government had become impossible. The commerce of the country was in a deplorable condition; the financial condition of Canada was anything but such as would afford gratification or satisfaction to any person interested in the welfare of the country; and the credit had sunk so low, that 6 per cent debentures were only saleable at a ruinous discount. Under this condition of things, a decision was arrived at between the leaders of the great parties of which Canada was then composed—the Liberal and Conservative parties—to unite in an effort to change the constitution of Canada, either by arranging a federal union of Upper and Lower Canada, or a confederation of all the provinces. That question was submitted to our consideration at Charlottetown. The additional fact presented itself, that as Canada stood, for six months in the year it was shut out from any communication to the ocean, except through a foreign country, while in the maritime provinces our trade naturally was forced into United States channels, because we had no means by rail of intercommunication, or of carrying on trade with the old province of Canada. We listened to the statements made by the late lamented Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, and by the late lamented Hon. George Brown, who were the leaders of the delegation that came to us on that occasion. And when they presented to us the position in which Canada stood, and when we considered the whole question, we felt that it was incumbent upon us to make an effort to see if the political position of all British North America might not be ameliorated and greatly enhanced by the adoption of the policy of union. Now, I do not intend to take more of your time than is necessary in reference to that matter, further than to say that, having arrived at that conclusion, we adjourned the question of a legislative union of the maritime provinces, and took up the wider and larger question of the confederation of British North America.

The result is known to all the members of this House. In October, 1864, a conference was called under the shadow of the Crown and with the hearty concurrence and approval of the Imperial authorities, and was held at the city of Quebec; and, after considerable discussion, in which several of the provinces were represented, the general principles of the union were arrived at. I am sorry to say that of those fathers of confederation, the only one that I see in this House, besides myself, is my old colleague and friend, Sir Hector Langevin; and he will bear me out in the statement that there was no feature of that conference which impressed itself more deeply upon those who wished to see the British North American provinces placed in an improved position—in a position that would guarantee their being able to hand down to their children and their children's children the British institutions they enjoyed;—there was no consideration that had greater significance or greater importance in the minds of all the delegates present on that occasion than that this measure afforded the means of removing that antagonism of race and religion which had been found to act so fatally in reference to the interests of Canada. I need not remind you that subsequently, at the Westminster Palace Hotel in London, in the year 1866, the governments of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick found themselves in a position to act under the parliamentary authority they had received, and that measures were there accomplished which enabled an Act to be passed through the Imperial Parliament changing the constitution of British North America, and uniting under one government the provinces of Canada, which were then separated and known as Upper and Lower Canada, and the provinces of Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, with powers under which not only the great territory of the North-west and the distant province of British Columbia, but also the Islands of Prince Edward and Newfoundland, might be brought into one confederation; so that there should be a consolidated government for the whole of British North America. That object was steadily pursued, and that object has been attained, except as regards the Island of Newfoundland, which, I still venture to hope, may at no distant day round off this confederation by becoming a part of the great whole of British North America. I need not detain the House to detail the wonderful change that ensued in every part of Canada. I need not detain the House while I point out that Canada rose rapidly to a status that had never before been occupied by any British colony or any outside portion of the British Empire. I need not remind you that, so far as government is concerned, Canada is practically independent. I need not remind you that, so far as measures relating to the internal life of Canada are concerned, we have practically the uncontrolled administration of our own affairs. I need not remind you that the status which Canada has attained has enabled her to be admitted as an integral portion of the great international conventions that are held throughout Europe—that at the international conference held in Paris in 1883 for the protection of submarine cables, Canada was as fully represented, and occupied a position in every respect equal to that of Belgium or Germany or any of the other great powers represented there. I need not remind the House that under this improved status, foreign affairs touching Canada are to a large extent placed under our own control—that arrangements have been made, with the hearty approval and assent of Her Majesty's Government, by which Canada practically negotiates her own treaties, with the advice and assistance and support of the great Empire of which we form a part. I need not remind the House of the wonderful material advancement and progress which Canada has made. I need not call attention to the fact that whereas, when this question of confederation was taken up, there was no railway connection even between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, to-day, from the eastern shores of Cape Breton on the Gulf of St. Lawrence away across to the Pacific Ocean, you may pass without leaving the car in which you have taken your passage. The development, the progress, the prosperity of this country has transcended anything that the most sanguine gentleman entertained in reference to what this great confederation would accomplish. The illimitable wilderness of the great North-west has been opened up by our transcontinental line of railway; and to-day, although some of our more sanguine expectations have not been realized, we are in a position to show that in this desert of yesterday more wheat was grown during the past year than in the whole of the United Kingdom. I give that as an evidence and indication of the position we have attained. Not only is that the case, but it was only a short time ago that the city of Ottawa witnessed one of the most striking events that has ever taken place in the history of any British colony, or in the history of any colony of any kind in the world. It was only the other day, as it were, that the wonderful scene was presented of the great colonies of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Canada being united in a conference and conclave here. Not only so, but that conference was attended by a distinguished representative of the Imperial Government, who took part in it, and who recognized it as one of the most important and transcendent events that had ever occurred in any part of the British Empire. I need not draw your attention to the fact that on that occasion you had the Imperial Government recognizing that Canada was a great highway—that under the wonderful progress and development she had made, she had become a great highway of intercommunication between England and the colonies of the Empire on the east and those on the west—between Hong Kong and Australia. In connection with those proceedings, we have had the gratification to find that the Imperial Government is at last thoroughly enlisted and pledged to the support of the means by which the intercommunication between the United Kingdom and those colonies shall be effected, in connection with the fast Atlantic service and the cable communication to be established via Canada with Australia. In fact, we are in a position to obtain at the hands of the Imperial Government substantial aid and assistance and co-operation in taking advantage of the great position we now occupy.

I spoke a few moments ago of the deplorable condition of the credit of Canada at the time this confederation was undertaken and accomplished. Instead of the 6 per cent bonds of Canada being away down, and sold at a ruinous discount, we have had the pleasure of finding, after all these great improvements, many of them of a very costly character, the credit of Canada so enhanced that our 3 per cent, when I left England, were standing at a premium of about 3 per cent. I give that as additional evidence. As I have referred to the distinguished nobleman who represented the Imperial Government at the Colonial Conference at Ottawa, I may be permitted to read a single sentence that fell from Lord Jersey on that occasion. He said :

It is with wonder that I think of what Canada has done to bring the northern and southern parts of this Empire together. She has linked the two great oceans, after an exhibition of courage, statesmanship and skill, which has never been surpassed in the history of the world.

And when I was sent to communicate with the government of the great republic to the south of us at Washington, Mr. Bayard, the eminent statesman who now represents the United States of America at the court of St. James, said to me : The confederation of Canada, and the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway have brought us face to face with a nation, and we may as well regard the question from that point of view. Instead of being isolated, separated, weak, even antagonistic provinces, they recognize the fact that we have become united, under one Government, in one great whole, and that we possess, in the northern portion of this continent of North America, a boundless field for advancement and progress ; and many of the most eminent statesmen of the United States have again and again drawn attention to the wonderful progress, wonderful development, and wonderful position which Canada has attained. I draw attention to that for the purpose of coming more particularly to the point now under consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And hon. gentlemen will see in a moment, if they will indulge me with the opportunity, the point to which I wish to call their attention. There would have been no confederation—I say it in the presence of my colleague who was at the Westminster Palace Hotel. I say it within the knowledge of Sir Leonard Tilley, who was one of the fathers of confederation, of the Hon. Peter Mitchell, who was at that conference, of the Hon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Wm. Macdougall, and the Hon. Sir Wm. Howland ; I say it within the knowledge of all these gentlemen, for six of us still, I am glad to know, remain—that but for the consent to the proposal of the Hon. Sir Alexander Galt, who represented especially the Protestants of the great province of Quebec on that occasion, but for the assent of that conference to the proposal of Sir Alexander Galt, that in the Confederation Act should be embodied a clause which would protect the rights of minorities, whether Catholic or Protestant, in this country, there would have been no confederation. And I draw attention to the fact that when you contrast our present position with that which Canada occupied on the occasion when Mr. Geo. Brown and Sir John A. Macdonald felt impelled, by the necessities of the case, by the condition of their country, to seek some change in its constitution which would relieve it from the terrible consequences of that war of religion and races that had been maintained in old Canada down to that time, it is significant that but for this clause protecting minorities, this measure of confederation would not have been accomplished, and no man could say how humiliating might not have been the position, either of Canada or any of the smaller provinces if that great work had not been accomplished. In the very valuable, although fragmentary, work of Mr. Pope, which I have in my hand—the history, so far as he could glean it from the documents left by the late Sir John A. Macdonald, of the establishment of confederation, I find the proposition made by Sir Alexander Galt on that occasion, made in the interests, not of Roman Catholics, but of the Protestants of Quebec, demanding that there should be embodied, as a 'sine qui non' to his agreeing, or to the Protestants of the province of Quebec agreeing to any confederation being accomplished—I find there the fact simile of the resolution which Sir Alexander Galt drafted with his own hand, and which was embodied in the Confederation Act. I say, therefore, it is important, it is significant that without this clause, without this guarantee for the rights of minorities being embodied in the new constitution, we should have been unable to obtain any confederation whatever. That is my reason for drawing attention to it at present. Now, I propose to read the terms of that provision whereby the protection of minorities, whether Catholic or Protestant, in any province of the Dominion, should be maintained. The third subsection of the 93rd section of the British North America Act of 1867 says :

Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union or is there after established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

Whether that applies to, or how far that bears upon the question under consideration in regard to Manitoba, it is not essential for me to inquire, because, in the Manitoba Act, which forms the law under which that province came into confederation, it was provided by the 22nd section :

In and for the province of Manitoba the said legislature—that is the provincial legislature—may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions.

I draw special attention to this, because it touches the fatal objection, as I understand it, that is entertained by many persons who have not had the opportunity, or who have not availed themselves of the opportunity, of ascertaining precisely the position in which this question stands, that if the Government of the Dominion, under any circumstances, interferes in the question of education with regard to the province of Manitoba it is coercing the province of Manitoba, and interfering with the autonomy of that province. It is the very reverse. As the Act itself provides, the Manitoba legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions :—

Nothing in such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools, which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

In case any such provincial law, as from time to time seems to the Governor General requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section, is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council, on any appeal under this section, is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

I think it would be impossible to find any terms in the English language that would more thoroughly establish the position that the exclusive right of the province of Quebec, or the province of Ontario, or the province of Manitoba to legislate in reference to education is confined to the case in which they have not taken away any of the rights enjoyed by any one of these provinces at the time they entered confederation ; that is to say, that if it can be shown that any right enjoyed by any province at the time it entered confederation has been infringed upon, if it be shown that the privileges that were enjoyed under that right, whether by Roman Catholics or Protestants, have been interfered with and removed, the moment that took place, under the Imperial Act of Confederation, under the law as it stands upon the statute-book, the right is transferred 'ipso facto' from the local legislature, because the local legislature hold that exclusive right, subject to the fact that they shall not invade the privileges of the minority, to the Parliament of the Dominion. And holding that under these circumstances, the moment it can be shown that the provincial legislature have invaded that right and have used the power entrusted to them contrary to the spirit of the Act of union, the Imperial Act of 1867, and to the law under which Manitoba came into the confederation—the moment it can be shown that the rights and privileges enjoyed have been infringed, that moment their power to legislate exclusively in regard to the question ceases and is transferred ipso facto to the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada. I would not say that I would hold that to be an incontrovertible position if I were not fortified in it by the highest authority in the British Empire, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The Dominion of Canada in its federal constitution has a great advantage in two respects over the federal constitution of the great republic to the south of us. There, as you know, the central power was built up by the sovereign states each consenting to give a part of the power it enjoyed, retaining for itself everything that was not specifically yielded. When we met in Quebec to frame a constitution for the Dominion of Canada, we had the advantage of many years of experience in the actual working of the constitution of the United States, and availing ourselves of that experience, we reversed their method and provided that the local legislatures of all the provinces should be restricted to the exercise of such powers as were specifically defined by the law as appertaining to them and that everything else should belong to the federal authority. Had that been the constitution of the United States of America that people would have been spared the sacrifice of a million lives and untold treasure in maintaining their union against the results of that defect in their constitution.

But there is another respect in which we have an advantage, and I hold that it is a very great and very significant advantage—and that is that while the United States have a supreme court by which questions of controversy in regard to the rights of the state governments and federal governments are to be settled, that court does not hold the position and does not offer the advantages of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in relation to Canada. That court is composed of men who are placed in their judicial position by the governments of the day, so that in that court you may have a great preponderance of gentlemen who have held prominent and important political positions in the country just previous to their going upon the bench. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe that the supreme court of the United States enjoys the confidence not only of the United States, but of the world to a very large extent, that it is regarded as a tribunal of the very highest, most important and most impartial character and that its judicial decisions have very great weight. But it cannot be forgotten that those who take part in controversies between the United States and any of the states of the union, those who have cases adjudicated upon involving questions of state against federal rights will too often be apt to believe that the strong party proclivities of the judges have something to do with the decision. Happily for us, that is not our position. Our ultimate court of appeal is a tribunal which is not only regarded throughout the civilized world as one of the most independent, most able and most impartial tribunals it is possible to find in any country in the world, but that it is a tribunal which stands apart from and beyond and above anything that touches political questions or considerations in Canada, and that therefore you can look to that tribunal with unqualified confidence that it will give a decision upon which any person and every person may rely.

Now, Sir, I will draw attention to some statements made by this august tribunal, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council upon the question before us. And I will only read a few brief extracts in regard to it, because I know that the whole judgment is before hon. members on both sides of the House :

(4). Does subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, apply to Manitoba ?

(6). Did the Acts of Manitoba relating to education, passed prior to the session of 1890, confer on or continue to the minority "a right or a privilege in relation to education" within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, or establish a system of separate or dissentient schools, within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867 ; if said section 93 be found applicable to Manitoba ; and if so, did the two Acts of 1890 complained of, or either of them, affect any right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council ?

There was the pith of the whole thing. As the constitution provides that it is only in cases where the rights enjoyed upon entering the union are infringed upon and interfered with that the duty is thrown upon the Dominion Government and the Dominion Parliament to take steps to protect these rights and restore these privileges, the whole issue turns upon the question just there asked. They say further :

The 3rd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act is identical with the 4th subsection of section 93 of the British North America Act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The 2nd and 3rd subsections respectively are the same, except that in the 2nd subsection of the Manitoba Act the words "of the legislature of the province or" are inserted before the words "any provincial authority," and that the 3rd subsection of the British North America Act commences with the words : "Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exist by law at the union or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province."

Their lordships say, as delivered by the Lord Chancellor :

In view of this comparison, it appears to their lordships impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act was intended to be a substitute for the 93rd section of the British North America Act. Obviously all that was intended to be identical has been repeated, and in so far as the provisions of the Manitoba Act differ from those of the earlier statute, they must be regarded as indicating the variations from those provisions intended to be introduced in the province of Manitoba.

They then come to the gist of the question :

In Upper Canada, a general system of undenominational education had been established, but with provision for separate schools to supply the wants of the Catholic inhabitants of that province. The 2nd subsection of section 93 of the British North America Act extended all the powers, privileges and duties which were then by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Roman Catholic inhabitants of that province to the dissentient schools of the Protestant and Roman Catholic inhabitants of Quebec. There can be no doubt that the views of the Roman Catholic inhabitants of Quebec and Ontario, with regard to education, were shared by the members of the same communion in the territory which afterwards became the province of Manitoba. They regarded it as essential that the education of their children should be in accordance with the teachings of their church, and consider that such an education could not be obtained in public schools designed for all the members of the community alike, whatever their creed, but could only be secured in schools conducted under the influence and guidance of the authorities of their church.

Then they continue :

Their lordships being of opinion that the enactment which governs the present case is the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act, it is unnecessary to refer at any length to the arguments derived from the provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act. But in so far as they throw light on the matter, they do not in their lordships' opinion weaken, but rather strengthen the views derived from the study of the later enactment.

It is admitted that the 3rd and 4th subsections of section 93 (the latter of which is, as has been observed, identical with subsection 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act) were not intended to have effect merely when a provincial legislature had exceeded the limit imposed on its powers by subsection 1, for subsection 3 gives an appeal to the Governor General, not only where a system of separate or dissentient schools existed in a province at the time of the union, but also where in any province such a system was thereafter established by the legislature of the province.

I think it will be impossible to find language clearer, or more unmistakable, to establish the position that their lordships have taken that the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba have been invaded by the legislation of that province; and as I have said before, the moment that conclusion is arrived at, the power given them under the Education Act exclusively to legislate on the subject of education, is removed, and is transferred to the power of the Dominion Parliament:

Their lordships are unable to concur in the view that there is any presumption which ought to influence the mind one way or the other. It must be remembered that the provincial legislature is not in all respect supreme within the province. Its legislative power is strictly limited. It can deal only with matters declared to be within its cognizance by the British North America Act, as varied by the Manitoba Act. In all other cases, legislative authority rests with the Dominion Parliament. In relation to the subjects specified in section 92 of the British North America Act, and not falling within those set forth in section 91, the exclusive power of the provincial legislature may be said to be absolute. But this is not so as regards education, which is separately dealt with, and has its own code, both in the British North America Act and in the Manitoba Act. * * * Acts amending the educational law in some respects were passed in subsequent years, but it is not necessary to refer to them, as in 1881 the Act of 1871 and these amending Acts were repealed. The Manitoba School Act, 1881, followed the same general lines as that of 1871. The number of the board of education was fixed at not more than 21, of whom 12 were to be Protestants and 9 Catholics. If a less number were appointed the same relative proportion was to be observed. The board, as before, was to resolve itself into two sections, Protestant and Catholic, each of which was to have the control of the schools of its section, and all the books to be used in the schools under its control were now to be selected by each section. There were to be, as before, a Protestant and a Catholic superintendent. It was provided that the establishment of a school district of one denomination should not prevent the establishment of a school district of the other denomination in the same place, and that a Protestant and Catholic district might include the same territory in whole or in part. The sum appropriated by the legislature for common school purposes was to be divided between the Protestant and Roman Catholic sections of the board in proportion to the number of children between the ages of 5 and 15 residing in the various Protestant and Roman Catholic school districts in the province where schools were in operation. With regard to local assessments for school purposes it was provided that the ratepayers of a school district should pay their respective assessments to the schools of their respective denominations, and in no case was a Protestant ratepayer to be obliged to pay for a Catholic school, or a Catholic ratepayer for a Protestant school. * * * What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Act of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statute fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctively Protestant in their character.

In view of this comparison, it does not seem possible to say that the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education, which existed prior to 1890, have not been affected. * * *

As a matter of fact, the objection of the Roman Catholics to such as alone receive state aid under the Act of 1890, is conscientious and deeply rooted. If this had not been so, if there had been a system of public education acceptable to Catholics and Protestants alike, the elaborate enactments which have been the subject of so much controversy and consideration would have been unnecessary. It is notorious that there were acute differences of opinion between Catholics and Protestants on the educational question prior to 1870. * * *

For the reasons which have been given, their lordships are of the opinion that the 2nd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act is the governing enactment, and that the appeal to the Governor General in Council was admissible by virtue of that enactment, on the grounds set forth in the memorials and petitions, inasmuch as the Acts of 1890 affected rights or privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education within the meaning of that subsection. The further question is submitted whether the Governor General in Council has power to make the declarations or remedial orders asked for in the memorials or petition, or has any other jurisdiction in the premises. Their lordships have decided that the Governor General in Council have jurisdiction, and that the appeal is well-founded, but the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities by whom it has been committed by the statute. It is not for this tribunal to intimate the precise steps to be taken. Their general character is sufficiently defined by the 3rd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act. * * *

All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions. Their lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the questions submitted should be answered in the manner indicated by the views which they have expressed.

Then the Queen's Order in Council follows, and I will read a clause of that:

The Lords of the Committee in obedience to Your Majesty's said general order of reference, have taken the said humble petition and appeal into consideration, and having heard counsel for the parties on both sides, their lordships do this day agree humbly to report to Your Majesty as their opinion that the said questions hereinbefore set forth ought to be answered as follows:—

(1). In answer to the first question:—That the appeal referred to in the said memorials and petitions, and asserted thereby, is such an appeal as is admissible under subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 33 Vict. (1870) c. 3, Canada.

(2). In answer to the second question :—That grounds are set forth in these petitions and memorials, such as may be the subject of appeal under the authority of the subsection of the Manitoba Act, immediately above referred to.

(5). In answer to the fifth question :—That the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction and the appeal is well founded, but that the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute ; that the general character of the steps to be taken is sufficiently defined by subsection 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 1870.

(6). In answer to the sixth question :—That the Acts of Manitoba relating to education passed prior to the session of 1890, did confer on the minority a right or privilege in relation to education within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, which alone applies that the two Acts of 1890 complained of did affect a right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council. * * *

Her Majesty having taken the said report into consideration, was pleased, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, to approve thereof, and to order as it is hereby ordered, that the recommendations and directions therein contained be punctually observed, obeyed and carried into effect in each and every particular. Whereof the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada for the time being, and all other persons to whom it may concern, are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

I think no argument is called for in the face of this emphatic judgment of the Privy Council, the highest tribunal in the great Empire to which we have the honour to belong, in order to show, if the claim on the part of the government of Manitoba to exclusively legislate on the question of legislation is raised, that, under the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, by the legislation passed by the province of Manitoba, they deliberately denuded themselves of the right to exercise exclusive jurisdiction on the question of education ; and no man, I hold, whether legal or layman, can read therein the emphatic statements made by the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council without arriving at the conclusion that the responsibility and the duty were transferred from the legislature and government of Manitoba and imposed on the central Government of the Dominion and on the Parliament of the Dominion to legislate in respect to this case.

But, Sir, it may be said, and I am rather surprised to hear a statement of that kind made : But the law says "may," it does not say "shall." Is there any hon. member within the sound of my voice who will say that, on a ground of that kind, you will turn your back on a helpless minority who are struggling for their privileges, of which they have been deprived by the local government, and will say : Yes, it is quite true that the lords of the Judicial Committee said we may do it, but they did not say we shall do it ; and we intend to leave you to suffer in the face of the decision of the highest judicial authority that can be given in the Empire ? A position of that kind would be unworthy of the government of any civilized country. I hope no body of gentlemen who are entrusted with the high position of administering the Government of Canada, will ever shelter themselves behind a subterfuge so plain and transparent as that, and avoid that duty and that responsibility which have been thrown upon them in regard to one of the most vital, one of the most important questions that can ever be presented.

Sir, I have already told you that this clause was insisted upon in the interest, not of Roman Catholics, but of Protestants. I have told you we would have had no confederation, the whole matter would have ended in hopeless failure, if we had refused to embody this protection for the Protestant minority in Quebec, as represented by Sir Alexander Galt. My colleagues who were there on that occasion, will bear me out in the statement, that so emphatic was Sir Alexander Galt on that question, that, until the conference would agree to adopt that policy, he was not prepared to take any hand or part, or assist in any way whatever in accomplishing confederation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say, moreover, that, not only was this done in the interest of Protestants, but the valuable, though brief, compendium of the circumstances connected with confederation which Mr. Pope has recently published, shows that it was carried unanimously, that the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and the province of Canada all voted yes in favour of this provision, which was for all time to come to protect the rights of the minority, whether Catholic or Protestant.

But I say that, independent of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council altogether, there is a higher law, and that is the great law, that you should do unto others as you wish them to do unto you. I believe that public sentiment of this country, when fully advised of the true position of this question, when considered in the light of history, in the light of evidence, that the overwhelming judgment of all classes and all creeds will be, that the Government of Canada would be unworthy of the position it occupies, that the Parliament of this Dominion would be unworthy of the position it occupies, if it turned deaf ears in a case made clear and established and declared in terms so unmistakable by the highest judicial tribunal in this Empire.

Mr. Speaker, one of the highest and most distinguished educationists in the Dominion of Canada, who himself is a Protestant and a Presbyterian, has given a clear and emphatic enunciation of his views on this question—I refer to Sir William Dawson. Sir William was many years a superintendent of education in the province of Nova Scotia, and from that post he has risen, step by step, and point by point, until he has attained one of the most exalted and respected positions among educationists throughout the world. The British Association did him the honour, did itself the honour, to elect him as its president, in consequence of his great educational attainments. I need not tell any one who knows anything of Sir William Dawson, that he is a man who is not only a Protestant, but a Presbyterian of the sternest sect, and yet Sir William has declared, unwilling as these men usually are to take part in a discussion of this kind, and has published, over his own signature, the most clear and emphatic declaration it is possible for a man to publish, as to the absolute necessity, in the interest of good government, and in the interest of justice and fair-play towards different religions and races, that, in taking the steps which the Dominion Government have most reluctantly taken, and have been impelled to take only by a sense of the duty that devolves upon them, they have the warm, the emphatic, approval of one of the most distinguished Protestant educationists to be found in the whole Dominion of Canada.

I may say here, that I have detained the House for some little time in regard to what has been accomplished by confederation. I have felt warranted in doing it because I was in a position to show that this confederation would not have been an established fact without embodying in the law that protection of the rights of the minority, both Catholic and Protestant, which it does embody, and, therefore, it was worth the expenditure of some little time of the House, in order that the attention of hon. members—especially as many of those taking part in those negotiations are not now remaining—should be drawn to this very important point.

In speaking of Sir William Dawson, I named him as a very eminent educationist, but I do not mean to say that our position rests only upon this high authority. I have had the satisfaction of meeting with and receiving communications from a large number of eminent divines, in the Church of England, in the Presbyterian Church, in the Wesleyan Methodist and Baptist churches, and I have been gratified to find, that those gentlemen, with scarcely an exception, were ready to endorse the action of the Government of Canada, to sustain the action of the Parliament of Canada, in giving redress to any minority, whether Catholic or Protestant, whose clear, unqualified and established rights had been infringed by the local government of any province.

But I say, Sir, apart from that altogether, apart from the responsibility that is imposed by the law—for I hold that the responsibility is imposed by the law in the clearest and most emphatic terms—apart from that altogether, I put the issue to the people of this wide Dominion. I ask them to look at what has been accomplished since the Act of Confederation was passed in 1867. We have been a happy family, Sir. I refer not to one political party nor to the other political party, but I do say: the people of this wide Dominion, whether Catholic or Protestant, whether French or English or Irish, whatever their race, whatever their religion; I say that the people of this wide Dominion have been a united, a happy and a prosperous people. By united action our people have raised Canada to a position of which every Canadian may be justly proud. If there be any man to be found in Canada who from any narrow, any selfish, any exclusive, any bigoted, or any fanatical sentiment would yield for a single moment to a disposition to advance his own race, religion or sect at the sacrifice of the interest and the conscience of others: if there be any such man, I ask him to look back at the deplorable condition into which Canada had sunk when she yielded to that sentiment, and when we had in this country a great party fomenting a war of races and a war of creeds. I ask such a one to look back upon Canada at that unhappy period, and I ask him to raise his eyes to the present proud position that our country occupies. I ask him to inquire from himself as to the reason for all this progress, all this prosperity, all this high position that we have obtained throughout the civilized world—for it is not extravagant to use that term in regard to Canada. I ask such an one if he is prepared to re-open a war of races, and a war of creeds, because he wishes to deny to a small and helpless Roman Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba the rights which the Imperial statute and the law under which Manitoba came into the union have guaranteed to them should be preserved. I care not who the man is: I care not which side of the House he sits on. I say that the Canadian who, with the history of the past to guide him, and with the history of the present before him, can for any such purpose be willing to lend his hand to promote and countenance in any way or shape a war of races and a war of religions, and a war of creeds, is an enemy of Canada. He may be acting from the highest and most conscientious principles. He may regard, as many do regard, that this is a question of separate schools, and that he is opposed to separate schools, and consequently he may wish to defeat this measure that is now proposed to the Parliament of Canada. But, Sir, no man who takes the trouble to examine this question can for a single moment consider that the question of separate schools is at issue at all. It is not a question of separate schools, it is a question of the constitution of the country. The progress and the prosperity and the future development of Canada depends upon that constitution being sacredly maintained, and that all the rights that are guaranteed under it, whether to the central or the provincial governments, shall be sacredly guarded. I do not intend to detain the House by discussing this self-evident point at any great length, but I put it to any intelligent man who recognizes the fact that within this wide Dominion you have got over 41 per cent of the population Roman Catholics; I put it to gentlemen who may hold—and I think some have without due consideration held—rather narrow views on the subject; I put it to them: whether for any object that was not of the most transcendent importance it would be right for this Government to refuse, or right for this Parliament to refuse, to grant redress in a case such as is presented on the present occasion, and to leave rankling in the minds of over 41 per cent of the entire population of the Dominion of Canada the sentiment that a Roman Catholic cannot, in the Parliament of this country, obtain the same just consideration that he would obtain if he were a Protestant. I thank you very much for the kind attention you have given to these very imperfect remarks. I may say that in forming this Bill the Government, while doing substantial justice to the rights of the minority, have been careful to encroach as little as possible upon the local government. No person can read this Bill without seeing on the very face of it that it is not proposed that the Government of Canada should take action under even this Bill, by the appointment of a board, the appointment of the superintendents, the guarantee that the schools shall be of the same high character as that of the other schools in Manitoba, for, before all that is done, this Bill provides, first, to invite the government of the province of Manitoba to take action; and it is only when they refuse, and when the unpleasant and disagreeable duty is forced by the Act of the Imperial Parliament upon the Dominion of Canada, that this Government proposes, in the least degree, to interfere with this matter. And, as I say, the coercion comes not from the Dominion Government. There is no coercion so far as the Dominion Government is concerned. There is not a line of coercion to be found in the Bill from beginning to end. There is a simple, a most easy and natural provision, to meet the interests of these people whose consciences deprive them from the opportunity of making use of such schools in Manitoba as they are now taxed to sustain. Under these circumstances, the Government have been compelled to adopt the policy which they have adopted. I need not say that they have adopted this policy in the face of great difficulty, because it is always an extremely unpleasant thing for any government to find itself in a position in which there is even a single member of their party that does not see eye to eye with them. In the face of even this difficulty, the Government have felt compelled, in justice to their own position, and in regard to their duty to the country as imposed by the Imperial Act, the Government have felt obliged to take the step they have taken. They have taken that step in the most moderate and temperate manner that was possible to be devised, and even down to the present hour they have been open to any suggestion by which the responsibility which is imposed upon them under the circumstances could be removed. They are still open to any suggestion, from any quarter, of any means which will remove the necessity of their being compelled to take action of this kind, and having done that, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying to you: that the Government would feel that it was unworthy the position it occupies; that the Government would feel that it did not deserve the confidence of that great Liberal-Conservative party who have enabled it to accomplish so much for Canada; that the Government would feel that it was unworthy the confidence of gentlemen on either side of this House if, on a question so momentous, so important, and so vital to the good government, progress and prosperity of Canada, they were not prepared to lay down office if necessary, or to refer to the great intelligent electorate of this country for a decision as to whether they had discharged their duty or not.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, if, in a debate of such moment, it were not out of place for me to make a personal reference to myself—a reference which, however, may perhaps be justified, not so much on account of the feelings which may not unnaturally be attributed to me, being of the race and of the creed of which I am, but still more in consideration of the great responsibility which has been placed on my shoulders by the too kind regard of the friends by whom I am surrounded here—I would say, that, in the course of my parliamentary career, during which it has been my duty on more than one occasion to take part in the discussion of those dangerous questions which too often have come before the Parliament of Canada, never did I rise, Sir, with a greater sense of security; never did I feel so strong in the consciousness of right, as I do now, at this anxious moment, when, in the name of the constitution, so outrageously misinterpreted by the Government, in the name of peace and harmony in this land, when, in the name of the minority which this Bill seeks or pretends to help, in the name of this young nation on which so many hopes are centred, I rise to ask this Parliament not to proceed any further with this Bill.

Sir, the position which I have taken from the first on this question, and which I have maintained all along up to this moment, and on which I more than ever firmly rely, is of such strength that it largely takes away the pain which no man of sensitiveness can well avoid when, impelled by a paramount sense of public duty, he has to take a course which he knows may not be fully shared in and believed in by all his friends. But, Sir, the argument seems to be overwhelming, that, if this Bill were to become law, while it would afford no protection whatever to the suffering minority in Manitoba, it would be a most violent wrench of the principles upon which our constitution is based. Sir, the hon. gentleman who has just moved the second reading of this Bill, who comes back to this House again, after an interval of several years, to take his place at the head of his party, and who, we are told, is to force this Bill on his unwilling party, has taken some credit to himself and to the Government of which he is a member, as being the champions of the minority. In so far as this contention is concerned, I have not the slightest desire to take one single particle from the encomiums to which the Government may be entitled; but the hon. gentleman has largely taken away from the praise which we would gladly have given to the Government, by the statement which he has made over and over again in his speech—reiterated, not once only, but, perhaps, ten times—which was, in fact, the burden of his whole speech, that the Government, in this instance, are not free agents, but are simply the creatures of necessity—the tools, the instruments, of the constitution, which, in this matter, leaves them no option, but compels them to bring forward the measure which they have now brought to the attention of the House. I do not intend at this moment to controvert that claim in any way, though I shall address myself to it further on. But I give every allowance to the claim of the hon. gentleman, that, in bringing forward this Bill, he is impelled by the desire of doing justice to the minority. Well, Sir, if such were the intention and the motive of the Government, I commend their intention, I commend their motive—would to heaven I could likewise commend their sound judgment and good sense! Sir, to do justice, and, of all things, to do justice to a minority, is always a great and noble thing; it is one of the noblest attributes of human nature. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman who has spoken for the Government knows, from his long parliamentary experience, that amongst men the standard of justice is not uniform, but is largely affected by differences of religion, differences of education, and a multitude of other circumstances. The hon. gentleman is aware—more than anybody else, perhaps, he ought to be aware—that, in a community with a free government, in a free country like this, upon any question involving different conceptions of what is right or wrong, different standards of what is just or unjust, it is the part of statesmanship not to force the views of any section, but to endeavour to bring them all to a uniform standard and a uniform conception of what is right.

The hon. gentleman has referred at length—and I do not blame him for that—to the history of this confederation. In that I followed him closely. There is a page of that history, however, of which he might have spoken, but of which he has not said a single word. He might have referred to the page of the history of confederation which tells us of the manner in which his native province of Nova Scotia was brought into the union. The hon. gentleman has not forgotten, surely—or, if he has, he is the only man in this country who has—that, when the idea of confederation—a great, a good, a noble idea—was brought to the attention of the people of Nova Scotia, it did not meet with ready acceptance; and for obvious, very obvious reasons. Sir, I am within the mark when I say, that, since the days of Athens of old, there never was, perhaps, a corner of the earth with so few acres and so few people, which in a given time produced such a galaxy of men of the very first class as the small province of Nova Scotia. The names in which she prides, Huntington, Uniacke, Johnson, Young, Howe—above all, Howe—are the names of men who were the peers of the most famous men of their generation—the names of men who, if they had moved and acted on a wider and better-known theatre, would to-day live, not only in the hearts of their own countrymen, as they now and will for ever live, but would also be household names throughout the civilized world. Sir, that is not all. In its isolation, its semi-independence, the province of Nova Scotia had attained to a remarkable degree of prosperity. Its merchants like the merchants of Venice, were princes. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that, when asked to join confederation, the people of Nova Scotia had some misgivings as to their course. What would have been the part of statesmanship upon that occasion? The part of statesmanship would have been to try and persuade them of the grandeur of the idea of a Canadian confederation—because they were a people eminently fitted to see the grandeur of such an idea. But, Sir, such was not the course taken. There was at the head of the government of Nova Scotia at that time a gentleman who to-day has been brought back from England to force this measure upon the people of Canada. Instead of applying himself to persuading his own fellow-countrymen of the grandeur of this Act of Confederation, he forced the project down the throats of the people of Nova Scotia by the brute force of a mechanical majority in a moribund Parliament. And Sir, the hon. gentleman must to-day bear the responsibility and the stigma that, for a whole generation, the great idea of confederation was to the people of Nova Scotia synonymous with oppression and coercion; but I am glad to say that to-day the people of Nova Scotia, especially the young generation, have become reconciled to the idea of confederation. The hon. gentleman, however, knows that the bitterness of the initial coercion has never been removed, and never will entirely disappear until it is buried in the grave of the last man of that generation, whose manhood was outraged by the arbitrary proceeding which trampled under foot the dignity and self-respect of a proud people. Sir, if the hon. gentleman, while he was tracing the history of confederation, had recalled that page, it might, perhaps, have struck him and those around him that coercive methods never yet led any people to good and wise action. But I would recall the history to the hon. gentleman, not only of his own province, but of the Dominion of Canada at large.

The hon. gentleman has told us that ever since confederation we have been a happy people. Well, if this were not so important a debate, I would say that if the people have been happy, the Cabinet Ministers, unfortunately, have not always been happy. But the subject is too important for pleasantries. I take issue with the hon. gentleman when he says that the people have always been happy. Is that the way the hon. gentleman has read the history of Canada since confederation? The people of Canada have been happy. Why, what has been the course of events ever since we have had confederation? Is it not a fact that, almost from the first moment of its existence until now, confederation has been torn, not once, not twice, but repeatedly, by agitations which more than once have shaken it to the very roots, and threatened its very existence? Why, the ink was scarcely dry upon the document which established confederation when the New Brunswick school question arose. From New Brunswick it spread to Quebec, and thence into Ontario, and for years, as every one knows, it embittered and impassioned public opinion of the Dominion to the exclusion almost of every other topic. Then, immediately after that, the attempt by this Government, of which the hon. gentleman was a member, to take away from the statute-book of Ontario the Act known as the Streams Bill, aroused the people of Ontario to a determination to maintain their legislative independence at all hazards. Then, a few years after, the repeated disallowance by the Government, of which the hon. gentleman was a member, of the railway legislation of Manitoba—that legislation by which Manitoba sought to get rid of the incubus of the monopoly in transportation which had been given the Canadian Pacific Railway—brought Manitoba to the very verge of rebellion. The day came when bloodshed was within measureable distance; and it was only when the Government decided to come down and yield, that strife was averted. Then arose the agitation consequent on the demand for the disallowance of the Jesuits' Estates law, which rekindled the religious passions and prejudices of former years, and excited them to a very dangerous pitch. Now, again, I am sorry to say, we can hear the roar coming upon us of another wave of agitation and civil commotion in this country. The demon of discord is in the land, blowing the wind of strife over all and in all directions, awakening slumbering passions, arousing old prejudices. You can follow the trace of its passage in our cities, towns and country villages, nay, in the backwoods settlements where the rude toil and the anxious days of the pioneer do not save him from its evil suggestions. Still the hon. gentleman seems to think lightly of this. He thought it would be misery if we had a civil and religious war. It would be misery, most certainly. But if religious war is to be brought in this country, by whose action will it be brought but by the action of this Government, which, although it had the methods of persuasion in its hands, has chosen to take the methods of coercion in order to redress a wrong.

Sir, there is one thing that is certain at this moment. The attention of the people from all parts of the country is upon this chamber, and whatever may be our opinion upon this question, whatever views we may hold as to the policy of the Government, there is one thing which cannot be denied. These frequent recurrences of agitations and commotion are a severe strain, and a very severe strain upon the tie which binds these provinces together; and the danger is all the more to be apprehended, if, searching further on for the causes which have brought about this commotion, you find that on every occasion there was only one cause, always the same, and that was the feature of our constitution which abridges the independence, the sovereignty of the provincial legislatures. In one form or the other, such was the cause of these agitations. In view of these salient facts, it may not be out of place at present to look further into the history of our own country; and by the dangers through which we have passed, learn, if possible, to avoid the danger with which we are threatened. I call attention to this fact, that when the idea of a union of our provinces was first mooted, the question was debated whether the bond of union should be legislative or federative. The very force of events made this a federative union. The fact that the provinces are scattered and divided by long distances, and by divisions of creed and race, made it imperative that there should be a division of legislative powers, a central legislature to be invested with that class of subjects which affects all the provinces, and local legislatures to be invested with those subjects which alone affect the different communities. This division of legislative powers is absolutely essential to the federal form of government. It seems also essential that all the legislatures should be absolutely free of each other, and free from supervision. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the differences which exist between our constitution, in this respect, and the American constitution. Sir, though I am prepared to say that, in many respects, the Canadian constitution is far superior to the American, it may be that in this respect it is not on a par with the American. Under the American system, all legislatures, whether the central legislature or the state legislatures, are free from the control of each other. There is, in a sense, the control of the Supreme Court, but this control is simply judicial. It is not allowed to review the discretion which is vested in any legislature. The only control it has is to keep within bounds the different legislatures, and prevent the encroachment of their respective powers. The weak point in the American constitution is just what has been stated by the hon. gentleman. The reserved powers are in the states, while with us the reserve powers are in this Parliament. But our constitution goes much further. It gives to the Dominion Government the control of and supervision over provincial legislatures. The hon. gentleman said this was a boon. I say, perhaps it was a very great mistake. Under our constitution, the Dominion Government has in its power to disallow, within a certain period, all Acts passed by the local legislatures. In matters of education the Government has still more extensive powers, because Parliament here can interfere and substitute laws for those of the provincial legislature in regard to education.

Now, Sir, before I go any further, it may not be out of place to ask what was the reason for these extraordinary powers being imported into our constitution. In so far as the power of disallowance is concerned, this can be traced very clearly to the power of disallowance which is possessed by the Imperial authorities over colonial legislatures. The Imperial Parliament has the power of disallowance, of supervision over the Acts of these colonial legislative bodies. This may be easily understood because colonies are dependencies. But the relations between the Dominion and the provinces are not the same. Between these there is no superiority and no inferiority; all are equal, with this exception that the Dominion Parliament is invested with larger powers, that is, powers of a more extended and more important character than the local legislature. Indeed, it must be accepted, and accepted as a truism, that under popular government the majority must rule. I do not mean to say, Sir, that the majority will always be right. No, Sir, the majority may err, the majority may prevaricate. But I am not prepared to say that the majority will always do wrong, will always prevaricate and will always wantonly and wickedly do injustice to the minority. It may be that the majority will prevaricate, it may be that the majority will do wrong to the minority. What is the remedy of the minority under these circumstances? The remedy of the minority under a free government is to agitate and endeavour to bring over the majority to their way of thinking. This is the rule under free government. But under our constitution the minority has also another power. It may not only agitate within the sphere of the province to convince the majority, but it may appeal to the executive of Canada, to the Parliament of Canada, to the people of Canada, and thus force the issue which was confined to their own province into the federal arena. Now, if in any province there is a contest of such bitterness that the minority will not rest satisfied with the arbitrament of the majority, that fact alone proves that the question at issue is one which deeply, very deeply, affects the people in that province. It is therefore manifest, it is obvious, that if, under these circumstances, the minority take an appeal to the executive of Canada, to the Parliament of Canada, the bitterness of the strife will be imported into the Dominion at large, and there rage not only with equal violence, but, perhaps, with increased fury. That, Sir, has been our experience within the last twenty-five, yes, almost thirty years. Recall the fierceness of the agitation over the New Brunswick school Act; think of the feeling aroused by the Jesuit estates question. In these cases the whole country was convulsed. In one, disallowance was demanded in the name of Roman Catholicism, while in the other disallowance was demanded in the name of Protestantism, and the old feuds which divided our ancestors threatened to invade our country, and here work the mischief which they had worked in other lands.

In view of these facts, what is the lesson to be deduced from this teaching of our history? The lesson we should deduce is that if it was a wise provision to establish this power in the constitution for the supervision of the local legislatures, perhaps it was not dictated by unmixed wisdom. For, Sir, experience has taught us that this remedy of interference with local legislation has never been applied and probably never can be applied without friction, disturbance and discontent; that you cannot apply that remedy without causing as much dissatisfaction as satisfaction. It must be evident that while you redress the grievance of the minority by such act of interference, you run grave risk of creating a grievance on the part of the majority. But the remedy of interference is found in the constitution; and, being there, it must be applied. But it must be applied in such a way as not to provoke irritation; it must be applied in such a way that even those who suffer by it shall continue to love the constitution, shall be ready to live for, and, if necessary, to die for it. Sir, the power is there, and, being there, the aid of the Dominion Government will be sought by the minority. What is the rule that ought to be followed? I shall be told by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), in fact, he has already told us, that the rule works mechanically, and that no judgment is to be exercised by this Parliament in such matters. Sir, that cannot be the rule. It cannot be that this remedy is to apply mechanically. This remedy must be granted or denied according as the circumstances of each case require. And that, Sir, is the very language of the statute that the hon. gentleman cited a few moments ago. The remedy is to be sought and applied as the circumstances of the case require. And it can be intelligently applied only after full and ample inquiry into the facts of the case, after all means of conciliation have been exhausted, and only as a last resort. These, in my judgment, are the principles which ought to guide us in this matter. And, assuming these principles to be true, I may now apply myself to a history of this case.

The hon. gentleman did not say much, in fact, did not say anything at all with regard to the history of this case or the circumstances which bring it before this Parliament for discussion on this occasion. Those circumstances are so well known, however, that I do not wholly blame him for not having referred to them. But there are some salient facts which it is well to bring again before the attention of the House. In 1870, the provincial legislature, shortly after the province of Manitoba was brought into the union, in the full exercise of the powers which had been conferred upon it by this Parliament, confirmed by the Imperial Parliament, established a system of separate schools. In 1890, the legislature, again in the full exercise of its powers, abolished those schools. Now, Sir, the minority, under such circumstances, could certainly not rest quiet, having a remedy against the legislation that has been passed. They came before this Government, they came before this Parliament, with petitions asking for redress of their grievance. The hon. gentleman has taken credit to himself for the fact that the Government acted in no other spirit than that of fairness and justice to the minority. Sir, if this Government had given the minority the same measure of justice it has given to other parties, the minority would have had redress of their grievance long ago.

An hon. MEMBER. How?

Mr. LAURIER. I will tell the hon. gentleman how. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, has not forgotten that, in 1890, the legislature of Manitoba passed four Acts which came up for review by the Minister of Justice and the Government of Canada the following year. One of these Acts was an Act abolishing the French language as an official language; one was an Act abolishing separate schools; one was an Act establishing a cattle quarantine, and the last was an Act dealing with public companies. Two of these Acts were disallowed, and two were allowed to go into operation. Which were the Acts which were disallowed? Were they the Acts abolishing the French language and separate schools? No; these were allowed to go into operation, and the Acts disallowed were the Acts to establish the cattle quarantine in Manitoba and to make certain provisions with regard to public companies in that province. The Cattle Quarantine Act was of such great consequence to the Government of Canada that they had to disallow it, and they disallowed it because they said there was another Act passed by this Parliament which we now know was never applied, this latter part being the cause of the scheduling of our cattle in England. The other Act was with regard to public companies, one of the provisions of which enacted that if any public lands came within the possession of public companies and rested there for ten years, at the end of ten years they should revert to the Crown. The Act was disallowed for this reason among others:

The provisions that land held by any company for a longer period than ten years from the date when such lands were acquired, shall be forfeited to and become vested in the Crown for the use of the province of Manitoba, except that any company now holding lands may hold them for five years from the date of the passing of that Act, would have the effect of confiscation in respect to all companies which, before the passing of the Act, acquired lands in Manitoba under competent legislation and by Dominion Land Patents, involves a breach of faith by causing a detrimental change in the terms on which the contracts with those companies were made.

Sir, it was confiscation. If I remember right, and I do remember right, one of the complaints of the minority in all their petitions was that they were subjected to confiscation by the Act of 1890. Sir, the power of disallowance has always been held by the Government opposite to be essential to the administration of this confederation. If they ever had a fair chance of putting into operation the doctrine which they have always preached, they had it, not when they disallowed the Cattle Quarantine Act, but when they did not disallow the Manitoba Schools Act.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Does he think that the Government should have disallowed that Manitoba Schools Act?

Mr. LAURIER. The answer to that question is very plain. The hon. gentleman asks me what was my view. Did the hon. gentleman, or anybody else on that side, ever take the view of the Liberal party on the question of disallowance? I am judging those hon. gentlemen out of their own mouths, and by their own doctrine; and I say to the hon. gentleman who has put me the question: If he thinks it was right and proper to disallow the Cattle Quarantine Act, would it not have been ten times better and more advantageous to the country to disallow this Manitoba Schools Act? But, Sir, in this matter the hon. gentlemen, as usual, apply their doctrine just as it suits them; when they think it is convenient to apply the doctrine, they do so; but when they find it is inconvenient, they do not apply it. Now, I refer to this case simply as an answer to the claim which was made a moment ago by the hon. gentleman that the Government in this matter acted simply as the friends of the minority. Then they referred the minority to the courts; they told the minority: Go to the courts and test the validity of the Act. And you remember the terms of the Order in Council. They stated specifically that if the courts confirmed the validity of the Act, then they might come before the Dominion Government, and the Dominion Government would take up their claim. Well, they went before the courts, and they were not successful. The court decided that the Act was valid, and within the power and purview of the Manitoba legislature. Then they came again with petitions, and what were those petitions? Those petitions affirmed three grievances in substance; first, they said that the Act of 1890 was an outrage upon their conscience in establishing a system of common schools; nay, more, that though it was nominally a system of common schools, yet in reality they were establishing Protestant schools. Then they alleged as another grievance that the Act was a violation of the compact which had been entered into by the population of the North-west Territories and the Government of Canada, which compact had been repeated several times afterwards by the legislature of Manitoba itself. Now, Sir, the Government, in my estimation, should have done just one thing above all others: when they received these petitions they should have investigated them, they should have ascertained the facts which were alleged by the minority of Manitoba in order to apply such remedy as the facts warranted. This was the first thing they should have done, but they did not do it. What did they do? They went again before the courts, and this time to ascertain whether they had power under the constitution to pass the remedial order which they were asked to pass in favour of the minority. The judgment of the court of last resort, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, was that the Government had the power to interfere, to pass the remedial order which was asked for, and that Parliament had the power to enforce it by legislation. Sir, what was then the duty of the Government? Again I say, it was their duty to investigate the complaints of the minority. But they failed to do that; they passed a drastic Order in Council which they sent to Manitoba, and now they ask us in the name of the minority to pass this Bill, though no investigation has ever taken place. They say in the name of the minority they are bound to pass it. Sir, I take issue with them, and in the name of the minority of Manitoba I say that their course to-day is unconstitutional, is weak, and dangerous. The hon. gentleman told us a moment ago that the Government is bound to act mechanically in this matter. Now, I ask Parliament this question: Are we, upon the complaint of the minority, unsupported by evidence, without having made any investigation—are we to be told that the laws of the majority are to be set aside? Sir, if you tell me this, then I say it was a mere mockery to give to the province of Manitoba the right to legislate upon this question. It is true, hon. gentlemen say that they stand upon the constitution. I take issue with them. I stand also upon the constitution, and I rest the case on the judgment of every Canadian, of all men who believe that above the constitution, nay, not above the constitution, but in it, incorporated in every word and syllable of it, there are to be found those laws of eternal truth and justice on which alone nations can be founded. Sir, we are told that the legislature of Manitoba has the right to legislate in matters of education. Is that denied? No, that is not denied. The legislature of Manitoba has the right to establish separate schools; this is not denied. The legislature of Manitoba has the right to abolish separate schools; this is not denied. Somebody says, No. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council says, Yes. The Judicial Committee has decided that the legislature had a right to pass that legislation; but the constitution also says that although the Manitoba legislature had the right to pass that Act, the minority has an appeal to this Government and to this Parliament. But if you tell me that this appeal is to be granted as a matter of course, without an inquiry, without any investigation whatever, I repeat what I said a moment ago, that this power of legislation on education was a most fatal gift to place in the hands of the province. It was not only a fatal gift, but it was a delusive right. It was a snare to entrap the legislature into humiliation, because, if they had not the right to pass legislation, if it was far beyond the power of the province, then the provincial government were entrapped into the belief that they possessed that power. But I say more: though the legislature of Manitoba had the right to pass that legislation, yet the minority of Manitoba has the right to come to this Parliament to ask redress for this grievance. That redress must be based on one condition—that the minority of Manitoba alleges and proves a wrong such as the hon. gentleman has described, a wrong which appeals to the heart and mind of every man, which is a violation of those sacred rights which God has implanted in the breast of every man, and which the Greek poet has called—

Heaven's law, unwritten and unchangeable.

I understand the position of the minority in the province of Manitoba, in their petitions, to be, that they have such a grievance to offer to the people of Canada. They say in their petitions, that their consciences are outraged, and, if their consciences are outraged and violated, it seems to me that this, in the opinion of every man, would be held to be one of those violations of Heaven's law, unwritten and unchangeable.

They say more. They say that they made a compact between themselves and the Government of Canada, that a compact was made between the Crown of England and themselves, and that this has been violated; and, if a compact to which the Crown was a party was violated, I hold, at all events for my part, that this ought to be held to be one of the violations of Heaven's law, unwritten and unchangeable.

These are the grievances which the minority of Manitoba have to urge upon this Parliament. How are we to know what the facts are, how to deal with them, except by investigation and by inquiry? Sir, we say this is the position that ought to be taken by everybody. This is the position I have taken myself. I know there are some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who controvert it, and I will deal with them immediately. I know what is their ground for saying there is no necessity for inquiry. Their ground is, that the case has been settled by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the decree leaves them no option to do anything but one thing, what they are doing to-day—direct interference. Such is their conclusion. If so, let us inquire into it for a moment. They tell us the facts have been settled by the decree of the Privy Council, and there cannot be any question now for the Government to investigate and determine. Are the facts better known to-day than they were four years ago, when the reference was made to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council? Have we more knowledge to-day?

An hon. MEMBER. We do not require it.

Mr. LAURIER. I will come to that by and by. Are the facts, I ask, better known to-day than they were four years ago? Have we any more knowledge to-day? The knowledge we have to-day is the knowledge we had four years ago, and no more. Let me recall the attention of the House once more to the reference which was made to the courts, first, to the Supreme Court, and then to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), a few moments ago, read some of the questions. There were six, but some of them may be dismissed. The first question was this:

1. Is the appeal referred to in the said memorials and petitions, and asserted thereby, such an appeal as is admissible by subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, or by subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 33 Vic. (1870, chap. 3, Canada.)

To this question the answer was, yes, that the appeal referred to in the said memorials and petitions is such an appeal as is admissible. The second question was as follows:

Are the grounds set forth in the petitions and memorials such as may be the subject of appeal under the authority of the subsections above referred to or either of them?

To this also the answer was in the affirmative. I pass questions 3 and 4, because they are not material, and I come to question 5, to which I ask the close attention of the House. It is as follows:—

5. Has His Excellency the Governor General in Council power to make the declarations or remedial orders which are asked for in the said memorials and petitions, assuming the material facts to be as stated therein, or has His Excellency the Governor General in Council any other jurisdiction in the premises?

Assuming the material facts to be as stated therein! Assuming the facts to be as stated therein! What was the answer to this question? The answer was in the affirmative, of course; that, assuming the material facts to be as stated in the petition, then this Government has the right to pass the remedial orders which are asked of them. I ask, were the Government, when they drafted this reference to the courts, of the same opinion as they are at the present time? Were they of the opinion, that the facts were well known and required no investigation? If they were of that opinion, why did they not say so in the reference sent to the courts? If they were of that opinion, that the facts required no investigation, then, I want to know why did they ask arbitrament on a false statement of facts, why were they thus guilty of deceit? If they were not of the same opinion, and could not state that the facts were well known, then, I ask, why do they tell us to-day that no investigation is required? A judgment has been rendered on a certain statement which, assumed the facts to be true, and an answer given in the affirmative. These hon. gentlemen tell us to-day, that the facts are well known and require no investigation; still, when they went before the courts which had to decide the question, they did not hold that position, but they held that the facts were very doubtful. I charge them with deceit on the one occasion or on the other occasion. I charge them with deceit, either four years ago or to-day ; they can choose between the option ; but there is deceit in some way, there has been deceit all along, and, because there has been subserviency to expediency all along, the question is as difficult of solution as it is at the present time.

But, even under the terms of the decree rendered by the judgment of the Privy Council, there was not that importance given to it which appears to attach to it to-day. It may seem invidious in a man of my creed and race that I should assail the basis of this Bill. I do so because I am of the creed and race of the minority. I do so because I believe that the minority have a strong case to present to the people of Canada, whenever they have a chance to do so, and I do not want their case to rest on falsehoods of any kind. Let the truth be presented, and I believe it will appeal to the heart and conscience of all men, no matter his creed and race, but I do not want the case to go on false facts presented by hon. gentlemen opposite. I spoke a moment ago in regard to the reference to the Privy Council and the question whether the Government had the right to pass these remedial orders. Shall we be told, that the Government here will place on the answer to this question a greater weight than was placed on it by the minority themselves ? Let me refer, Sir, to the argument of Mr. Ewart, the counsel of the minority before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Here it is :

Before closing I should like to say a word or two as to what we are seeking. As has already been remarked, we are not asking for any declaration as to the extent of the relief to be given by the Governor General. We merely ask that it should be held that he has jurisdiction to hear our prayer, and to grant us some relief if he thinks proper to do so.

If he thinks proper to do so ! The decision was that the Governor in Council had jurisdiction to make the remedial orders if he thought proper. But how was he to come to a conclusion, except by investigation of the facts ? And what was the construction put upon the judgment by the minority themselves when they came before the Privy Council of Canada ? Did Mr. Ewart, the counsel for the minority, say that the Government were bound to act immediately, without any more inquiry into the facts ? Why, Sir, the very first thing that Mr. Ewart proceeded to do was to put before the Privy Council of Canada, many facts which, in his opinion, should induce the Government of Canada, and the Parliament of Canada, to grant to the minority that relief which he was asking for. Mr. Ewart commenced by stating this, that he rested his case upon four or five facts, which, being proved, should be sufficient, in his judgment, to entitle the minority to the relief which they were seeking. The first is to be found at page 22 of the book. Mr. Ewart says :

My first argument is this : The people of Canada made a solemn agreement that in Manitoba the schools should be separate. There was a solemn agreement made between the Government of Canada and the people of Manitoba, and he asked that if that agreement had been made, and if it were proved to have been made, then it should bind the people of Canada in honour to maintain it against the people of Manitoba.

Mr. Ewart's second argument was a consequence of the first. He said :

The legislature of Manitoba was composed at the outset of a popular branch, and of a Senate, and a few years afterwards the Senate was abolished.

Well, Sir, second chambers, legislative councils, are not very popular nowadays, but if they have a value, and they should have that value ; it is that they ought to be a protection for minorities. The Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba, Mr. Ewart said, did not view in a favourable light the abolition of their Senate, but they were made to agree to it upon the representations made to them that their schools and their institutions should never be tampered with by the legislature of Manitoba. And, Sir, it seems to me that this is a strong and powerful argument in favour of the minority. If they could show that they were induced to make away with one of the bulwarks which was a protection to their rights, their liberties, and privileges, it seems to me it is a strong case, which should go in their favour in the judgment of all Canadians who love their country. Then, Mr. Ewart's third argument was : That the Liberal party in Manitoba, when coming into power in 1887, had made a compact with the minority that their schools would not be interfered with. The fourth argument was allied to the third argument, and was, that subsequently a similar agreement had also been made, and Mr. Ewart proceeded to say—and I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the House, to the language used by Mr. Ewart :

My first four arguments, then, are founded upon agreements and promises :—First, the compact made by the Dominion of Canada ; second, the promises made by the Protestants of Manitoba ; third, the promises made by the Liberal party in Manitoba ; and fourth, the promises made by the Greenway government. All these agreements and promises have been violated—those of the Greenway government ; those of the branch of the Liberal party in Manitoba (and I say it with a bowed head, for to that party I once belonged) ; those of the Protestants of Manitoba (and I feel the shame of it, for in that faith was I born and nurtured) ; and those, too, of the people of Canada. For this violation, however, the Liberal party of Canada, the Protestants of Canada, and the people of Canada have not yet made themselves responsible ; and to them I lift my eyes with confidence, that when the facts are known, then that which has been done will by them be repudiated, and all injustices remedied. With a full sense of my responsibility for the statement, I add that in my humble judgment Canada would not be a fit place for an honest man to live in, were its inhabitants to remain unaroused to indignant action by the relation of such shamefully perfidious action.

Sir, there was an appeal made here to the Liberals of Canada, to the Protestants of Canada, and to the people of Canada, and Mr. Ewart ventured the opinion, that as soon as these facts would be known, this injustice would be remedied. But, Sir, I am sorry to say, for the minority of Manitoba, that Mr. Ewart, having supported all these contentions with proof and affidavit, the hon. gentleman who represented the Manitoba government on that occasion, Mr. McCarthy, the member for Simcoe, having stated that he wanted to controvert that evidence, and wished some time to do it, Mr. Ewart, in my estimation, very imprudently, rather than undergo the delay—because he wanted that Remedial Bill last session—withdrew all his affidavits and his evidence. When Sir Mackenzie Bowell stated that they would allow Mr. McCarthy to produce affidavits in reply to those produced by Mr. Ewart, Mr. Ewart then said :

Allow me to say that that would throw the matter over so late that it would be impossible that anything could be done this year ; and rather than that should happen, I would withdraw the affidavits and rest the case upon the other material.

Well, Sir, the Liberals of Canada, the Protestants of Canada, the people of Canada, upon whom Mr. Ewart relied to come to the rescue of the minority upon these facts being known, were deprived of the very evidence upon which he rested his case for a favourable consideration of the claims of the minority of Manitoba.

Mr. DALY. These affidavits are all printed.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman says they are all printed.

Mr. DALY. Certainly.

Mr. LAURIER. Sir, this is the kind of law we have from this Government !

Mr. DALY. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that all these affidavits are printed. I make this statement in reply to his that the people are deprived of the knowledge of what these affidavits contain.

Mr. LAURIER. Sir, I reaffirm what I said a moment ago. That is the kind of law which is administered by one of the judges who pretended to adjudicate upon this case ! Here are affidavits which were brought in support of the contention of the minority, and when the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) who represented the majority of the people of Manitoba, stated that if these affidavits were to go in, according to all the rules of evidence, he should have an opportunity of contradicting them, then, rather than that he should have this opportunity of contradicting them, they were withdrawn, and though they were withdrawn, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) says that they are printed, and that they are in the hands of the public ! Sir, it is that evidence that has been withdrawn, it is that evidence which the other side never had the opportunity of contradicting, which we are now told is to go before the people of Canada, in order to secure redress for the minority ! This is why this question is so difficult of settlement. It is that we are going to pass a law to-day forcing a system of schools upon the majority of the people of Manitoba, upon facts which the people of Manitoba never had an opportunity of contradicting. That evidence may be true. For my part, I will be disposed to believe it, but I am not disposed to attach any importance to it unless the government of Manitoba have an opportunity of contradicting it. If they had an opportunity of contradicting that evidence, then, Sir, it would go for what it is worth, but if they have had no opportunity of contradicting it, then it is the most baseless of all claims to make in favour of the minority in Manitoba ; and for my part, speaking in the name of the race and the religion of the minority of Manitoba, I will not rest their claim upon such evidence as that. Then Mr. Ewart proceeded to argue the claim of his clients upon the merits of separate schools and public schools. Well, Sir, the moment he came to that he invited all the old controversies which have been raging in this country for twenty years, aye, for forty years and over. The minority have a right to present the strongest case they can make to have their own schools, that I admit. The minority have views which are not shared in by the majority. There has been a struggle of old upon that, and although the argument of Mr. Ewart is very strong upon that point, it could have been made much stronger if supported by evidence. If we had a committee of inquiry, then one of the minority could have come before it, and laid down the doctrine in which the Catholic people are instructed, and that would have been a great and a sound argument to have offered to the majority. Sir, there is precedent for that. In the motherland, at the time of the agitation for the restoration to the Roman Catholics of their civil rights, a committee of the House of Lords sat to investigate what the Roman Catholic doctrine was upon certain points. An eminent bishop of the Roman Catholic church, Bishop Doyle, was heard amongst others before that committee ; and it is a matter of history that the evidence of Bishop Doyle did more to remove the prejudices which existed at that time in England against the Roman Catholics than anything else. I am sorry that that wise precedent was not followed by the Government of Canada. I am sorry to say that they did not have any inquiry, where both parties—both the government of Manitoba and the Roman Catholics of Manitoba—might have been heard and where all parties would have had an opportunity of presenting their views. If that had been done, it is probable that the question would have reached nearer to a settlement than it has reached to-day, even when the Bill to restore the rights of the minority is before us.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend allow me one question, for the sake of clearness. According to his argument now, what he would investigate is not the allegation of a grievance as stated by the minority asking for the appeal, but the arguments advanced by a counsel as to why the Government should act.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have not had the power of making myself understood by the hon. gentleman. What I would investigate is precisely what is alleged in the petition of the Roman Catholic minority. Among the things that are alleged in this petition are these: first, that there was a compact made between the Roman Catholics of Manitoba and the Crown of England, as represented by the Government of Canada, whereby their schools were guaranteed to them; second, that the system of common schools is repugnant to their consciences; third, that the schools established in Manitoba, though nominally public schools, are in reality Protestant schools. These are the things to be investigated; these are the things on which the Roman Catholic minority have all along been resting their claim. What are we to conclude from all this? We are to conclude that the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba have a grievance and have a right of appeal to this Government. It is undoubted that the minority have a grievance, it is undoubted that they have the right of appeal, that this Government has jurisdiction to hear the appeal, and to pass remedial orders, and that this Parliament has the right to pass remedial legislation. But what I contend is that, before these remedial orders and this legislation can be passed, all the facts connected with the claims of the minority should be investigated, so as to give the Government and Parliament of Canada something to act upon. Until this is done, I say the Government cannot act in this matter without putting themselves in a false position. Sir, I know that this view which I take has been disputed in a good many quarters. For instance, a few days ago a report of a theological consultation was published in one of the ministerial organs in Quebec, the effect of which was that no Roman Catholic could vote in favour of an investigation into this matter. One of the reasons given for this was that an investigation would lead to nothing, because those who were in favour of it and who promoted it were not believers in it. Well, Sir, I happen to know to some extent the reverend gentleman who gave that consultation. He is a most eminent divine, and a young man, yet with great talents and a great future before him. But I am bound to say that when he gave that consultation, the reverend gentleman had not read the answer of the government of Manitoba to the Order in Council of this Government. Let me quote the language of this reverend gentleman. Referring to the bishops, he says:

They are of opinion, and quite properly, that it would be inconsiderate in so grave a matter to trust their hopes in a projected inquiry, which would unavoidably bring in new delays, and which, setting aside federal interference, to which its promoters are opposed, would fling back Catholics to the mercy of their persecutors.

I say that the reverend gentleman who gave that consultation evidently had not read the answer of the government of Manitoba, in which they positively admit the power of interference by this Government. Here is the answer given by the government of Manitoba to the amended Order in Council:

The remedy sought to be applied is fraught with great danger to the principle of provincial autonomy. An independent consideration of the subject, as well as the recognized constitutional practice in analogous cases, clearly indicates that it should only be made use of as a last resort and after the clearest possible case has been made out, it is obvious that so drastic proceeding as the coercion of a province in order to impose upon it a policy repugnant to the declared wishes of its people can only be justified by clear and unmistakable proof of flagrant wrong-doing on the part of the provincial authority.

Sir, here is a clear admission—as clear as language can make it—on the part of the government of Manitoba themselves that this Government has the power to interfere, and that this Parliament has the right to interfere by legislation; but, as they very properly say, this is a power which should be exercised only very sparingly and in cases of flagrant wrong-doing. But, Sir, this admission by the government of Manitoba is followed by an offer to remedy the grievances complained of. What is the inference to be drawn from that? The inference that there is an implied engagement on the part of the government of Manitoba that as soon as the grievances have been investigated, they are prepared themselves to give the minority the measure of relief to which they are entitled, the moment those wrongs to which I have alluded have been proved to their satisfaction. Now, Sir, I pass from this consideration, which is the main argument I have to advance, to another consideration. I know that there are eminent authorities who assert that the right of the minority rests on the sole fact that separate schools were abolished. Separate schools were established in 1870, and they were abolished in 1890. There are eminent authorities who hold that the moment these facts, which are notorious, are taken into consideration, the minority have the right to a restoration of their schools.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. I will not dispute that. I hear some one say "hear, hear." I am quite willing at this moment to take that view of the case. Let us suppose that the right of the minority rests alone on the fact that the separate schools which were granted them have been abolished. Sir, I want to know from those who pretend to be the friends of the minority—who pretend that we have power to discard everything else and stick close to that fact—why did not the minority in their petition press their case upon that fact alone? Why did they not say to the Government of Canada: We have nothing to allege but the simple fact that these schools have been abolished, and we claim that they have to be restored. But they did not rest their case there; they took the ground I have stated. They said: The people of Canada should restore our schools, because the schools now established are an outrage on our consciences; and we claim that the people of Canada should give us back our schools, because when we entered into confederation there was a compact with us, made by the Crown of England that we should have our schools forever. If the minority in Manitoba had rested their case on this simple fact, would it have been as strong a case, as it could be made by the allegation of those other facts? My hon. friend who interrupted me a moment ago knows that the case of the minority is not so popular that they could afford to neglect any argument or fact by which they could strengthen it. There are men in the party of hon. gentlemen opposite who are prepared to vote against the Government on this occasion, because they do not believe in separate schools. But they are British men, and have British blood in their veins; and I imagine that even those who do not believe in separate schools, if it were shown to them that a compact made with the Crown and by the Crown had been violated, would be prepared to review their judgment, and on this ground alone give the minority the satisfaction they are seeking. And therefore this is the reason why I say that, even as a matter of prudence, even if the rights existed otherwise, it would have been wise and statesmanlike to have this investigation into all the facts which are alleged in the petitions. There are men in this House who pretend to be friends of the minority, and who think they are going to carry out this question to a conclusion by high-handed proceedings. Sir, they are not the friends, but the worst enemies of the minority, if they think they can carry this question by any other method than the method of persuasion. But there is more than that. Even if we have the right to legislate at this moment, even if we have the fact that a wrong is established, have we the evidence before us that would warrant us in passing this legislation, and in formulating a remedy? The wrong exists, very true, but how is the remedy to be established? Here is a Bill passed in darkness, passed in ignorance. What evidence have we to-day here of the condition of things in Manitoba? What evidence have we of the different things we should know in order to legislate intelligently upon such a subject? What is before the House? A half-hearted and faint measure—a measure of compromise, and nothing else. This measure cannot be satisfactory to those who pretend so clamorously here that they are the friends of the minority. It is a measure of compromise to be administered by whom? Is it a measure of compromise which this Government itself can administer? No, it is a compromise which is to be administered by a hostile government. What benefit, do you think, will accrue to the minority on this question from this legislation?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, since this half-hearted measure has to be administered by a hostile government, would it not have been far more wise to have had a commission appointed? The government of Manitoba might have been represented on that commission, and there would have been the chance, then, that if a measure of compromise were agreed on, and there was nothing else to expect, at all events it would be administered by a friendly and not a hostile government. But there is more than that. The Government say to-day that they are bound to bring in this measure, because the Manitoba government have refused to come to any terms. I take complete issue with the Government on this point. The government of Manitoba never was approached in a proper spirit upon the point. It was approached with threatening hands. It was threatened with the strong arm of this Government unless it would do what it was ordered to do. But even after this outrageous proceeding, the Manitoba government made this reply, to which I call the attention of friends and foes—no, I shall not say foes, because I do not believe the minority have foes in this chamber—but I call attention to this reply:

It is a matter of regret that the invitation extended by the legislative assembly to make a proper inquiry into the facts of the case has not been accepted, but that, as above stated, the advisers of His Excellency have declared their policy without investigation. It is equally a matter of regret that Parliament is apparently about to be asked to legislate without investigation. It is with all deference submitted that such a course seems to be quite incapable of reasonable justification and must create the conviction that the educational interests of the people of the province of Manitoba are being dealt with in a hostile and peremptory way by a tribunal whose members have not approached the subject in a judicial spirit or taken the proceedings necessary to enable them to form a proper opinion upon the merits of the question.

The inquiry asked for by the reply of the legislature to the remedial order, should, in the opinion of the undersigned, be again earnestly invited, and in the event of the invitation being accepted, the scope of the inquiry should be sufficiently wide to embrace all available facts relating to the past or present school system.

This is the answer, and are we to be told that, in the face of this offer, we are to pass it by, to ignore it, to trample it under foot? Sir, I claim that, in the face of such an offer, the Parliament of Canada should not proceed any further. We would confer no benefit upon the minority by so doing, and would incur a great danger for the future of this confederation.

I arraign the policy of the Government upon every step they have taken in this question. They have been wrong from first to last. Why did they not approach the government of Manitoba in a friendly, instead of the hostile, spirit in which they approached it? When the last judgment was rendered by the Privy Council, why did this Government not go themselves to the people of Manitoba and say to them: Here is the decree of the sovereign tribunal of this land, here is the judgment which says that the Government of Canada, and the Parliament of Canada have a right to interfere in this matter. Do not compel us to take this extreme measure, but remedy this grievance yourselves. Had the Government done this, it is possible, nay, it is very probable, that the government of Manitoba, in the face of that decision of the Privy Council, would have accepted this friendly suggestion. Why did not this Government send an ambassador to Manitoba? Why did they not do at first what they did at the last hour? Why did they not do twelve months ago, what they did last week, when they sent my hon. friend from Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) to Winnipeg as an ambassador, and no better person could have been chosen. Nay, I was wrong? I forgot for the moment that we had yesterday a statement from the hon. gentleman who leads the House (Sir Charles Tupper) that the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) had not been sent as an ambassador by the Government here. They are not even entitled to that faint measure of praise which I was prepared to give them. They are not worthy of it, for we must accept the statement of the right hon. gentleman that my hon. friend from Montreal West simply went on his own accord. Finding that the Government were not prepared to do their duty, he went himself, as a messenger of peace, in order to restore the harmony and peace which was threatened by the action of the Government.

I admit that this is a most crucial question, but it is all the more crucial that it has been bungled from first to last by the Government. There are men in this House, who are against separate schools, but who would have no objection to the re-establishment of separate schools in Manitoba, provided they were re-established by the province of Manitoba itself. There are men in this House who are in favour of separate schools, but who think very strongly that it would not be advisable to interfere with the legislation of Manitoba at all until all means of conciliation had been exhausted. Sir, in face of this perilous position, I maintain to-day, and I submit it to the consideration of gentlemen on both sides, that the policy of the Opposition, affirmed since many years, reiterated upon more than one occasion, is the only policy which can satisfactorily deal with this question—the only policy which can remedy the grievance of the minority, while, at the same time, not violently assaulting the right of the majority and thereby, perhaps, creating a greater wrong. This was the policy, which, for my part, I adopted and developed the very first time the question came before this House, and upon this policy to-day I stand once more. Sir, I cannot forget at this moment that the policy which I have advocated and maintained all along has not been favourably received in all quarters. Not many weeks ago I was told from high quarters in the church to which I belong that unless I supported the school Bill, which was then being prepared by the Government, and which we have now before us, I would incur the hostility of a great and powerful body. Sir, this is too grave a phase of this question for me to pass it by in silence. I have only this to say: Even though I have threats held over me coming, as I am told, from high dignitaries in the church to which I belong, no word of bitterness shall ever pass my lips as against that church. I respect it and I love it. Sir, I am not of that school, which has been long dominant in France and other countries of continental Europe, which refuses ecclesiastics the right of a voice in public affairs? No; I am a Liberal of the English school. I believe in that school, which has all along claimed that it is the privilege of all subjects, whether high or low, whether rich or poor, whether ecclesiastics or laymen, to participate in the administration of public affairs, to discuss, to influence, to persuade, to convince,—but which has always denied even to the highest the right to dictate even to the lowest. I am here representing not Roman Catholics alone but Protestants as well, and I must give an account of my stewardship to all classes. Here am I.

a Roman Catholic of French extraction entrusted by the confidence of the men who sit around me with great and important duties under our constitutional system of government. I am here the acknowledged leader of a great party composed of Roman Catholics and Protestants as well, in which Protestants are in the majority, as Protestants must be in the majority in every part in Canada. Am I to be told, I, occupying such a position, that I am to be dictated the course I am to take in this House, by reasons that can appeal to the consciences of my fellow Catholic members, but which do not appeal as well to the consciences of my Protestant colleagues? No. So long as I have a seat in this House, so long as I occupy the position I do now, whenever it shall become my duty to take a stand upon any question whatever, that stand I will take not upon grounds of Roman Catholicism, not upon grounds of Protestantism, but upon grounds which can appeal to the consciences of all men, irrespective of their particular faith, upon grounds which can be occupied by all men who love justice, freedom and toleration.

So far as this Bill is concerned I have given you my views. I know, I acknowledge, that there is in this Government the power to interfere, there is in the Parliament the power to interfere; but that power should not be exercised until all the facts bearing upon the case have been investigated and all means of conciliation exhausted. Holding these opinions I move that the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

After Recess.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that members of this House will set aside party feeling for the time to rejoice that we have the pleasure of having again with us the present leader of the House, the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper). Though political lines divide us, we all recognize, I hope—at any rate the Conservative party in this House and throughout the Dominion recognize—the splendid services rendered to Canada prior to confederation and since then, by that hon. gentleman, and recalled to our minds so vividly this afternoon. For my part, I have always admired his splendid courage, which has brought the Conservative party and the country as well through many difficult crises. I recall one particularly, that during the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I remember with pride and pleasure the indomitable courage exhibited by the hon. Secretary of State during that trying period. He, like our other great leader, Sir John Macdonald, always had faith in our country and its possibilities.

Mr. LAURIER.

But, while I say that and while I have followed the hon. gentleman during many years in this House with very great pleasure, and though to-day I closely adhere to the doctrines of the Conservative party as I understand them—to the principle of protection and those other and large principles leading to the confederation of the Empire and closer connection with the motherland—I regret that on the question he has brought before the House to-day I am unable to follow him. The hon. gentleman called to mind the fact that Canada before confederation was divided on racial and religious lines and that at confederation those lines disappeared and the questions which had seriously divided the old provinces were left to be settled by the various provinces, and, as he very aptly said, we have been a happy family ever since. I regret that, by this Bill, which, I presume, was left to him as a legacy, a pledge to bring which before the House was made before he became a member of the House and a member of the Government, he should take such action as must divide the country on racial and religious lines. I believe that while these questions were kept in the domain to which they properly belong, that of the provinces, the provinces have always settled them fairly and satisfactorily, and each province has been satisfied and has done its part to upbuild the Dominion. That being so, I all the more regret that a Bill should be brought forward which will revive these racial and religious questions in the House of Commons and in the Dominion and plunge us again into those very difficulties which confederation was intended to overcome. Now, Sir, with reference to another matter alluded to by the hon. leader of the House, I have a few words to say. He referred to the people of bigoted and fanatical impulses, and he said the man who promoted a war of races or creeds, is an enemy to Canada. I quite coincide with that statement; I believe that those who promote these difficulties are enemies to Canada. But, while that is my belief, I repudiate the implication that those who are opposing this Bill, are open to be characterized by any such words. It is not upon us who may think proper to oppose this Bill that the charge can be thrown that we have done anything to promote racial or religious strife. If we oppose this Bill, as I shall oppose it at every stage, at the same time I repudiate the implication that I am responsible for bringing this question before the Parliament of Canada. Sir, this is a very serious matter. The leader of the Government has told us, this afternoon, that this is the most important question that has come up since confederation. I agree with him in that view, and I go this far in saying that before that question was ever brought up to be fought over in the Parliament of Canada, and to create disturbance of a kind which we all must deprecate and deplore, I say, that every effort should have been made to prevent it. This is a new form of legislation, it is something unknown heretofore. It is true, there is a provision for it on the statute-book, there is a reserved power; and the highest courts have declared that we have the power to enact some sort of legislation to remedy grievances, if grievances exist. But I say, that before we undertook to legislate in this way, every resort should have been exhausted, every effort should have been made, to avoid it. I cannot agree with the statement that every effort has been made to have the province of Manitoba settle this question themselves. I am fortified in that opinion by the documents that have been presented to the House, by the drastic order that was made last March, asking the province of Manitoba practically to re-enact a system of separate schools which previously existed, and which were found to be wholly unsuitable to the circumstances and conditions of the country, which were found to give a very inadequate education to the children, and which was productive of very poor results in every direction. So I say that, for my part, though I shall oppose this Bill, I shall not quietly rest under the implication, that, by opposing it, I am promoting racial or religious disturbance in the country. On the contrary, I say that the full responsibility of so doing will rest upon the Government who have proposed this legislation, who have thrust it upon the Conservative party; because the Conservative party, as I know it in the province of Ontario, have not been, at any time in my recollection, at any rate, in accord with the principles of this Bill. Now, what are the facts of the case? We have been told to-day that there is a legal obligation, that there is a constitutional order, as it were, and we were told by the hon. leader of the Government, that it is not a question of separate schools, but of the constitution. Well, Sir, when that matter was first brought before the House of Commons, by way of resolution declaring in favour of the creation of a court to investigate these matters, a resolution moved by the Hon. Mr. Blake and seconded, I think, by the present leader of the Opposition, there was no legal obligation contemplated then, nor is there to-day, for enforcing any legislation that may be enacted. Sir John A. Macdonald, who was then the leader of the Government, asked Mr. Blake about this point, when the latter brought in the resolution:

Of course my hon. friend in his resolution—
The resolution upon which the Act of Parliament was founded.

—has guarded against the suspicion that such a decision is binding upon the executive.

The reply was:

Such a decision is only for the information of the Government, the executive is not relieved from its responsibility. The answer of the tribunal will be simply for the information of the Government. The Government may dissent from that position.

And that is the position of affairs in this case. An opinion has been given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, but that opinion is not a decision binding upon us. In that decision the Privy Council declared the constitutional powers of the Government, but did not declare a policy at all. But, Mr. Speaker, because we have the power to legislate, does that imply that we are under an obligation to legislate? It then becomes, Sir, a political question. We have power to-day to legislate upon insolvency, but we are not doing so. We have power to-day to pass a prohibitory liquor law, but that does not make it compulsory on this Parliament to enact a prohibitory liquor law. And so, in this case, it is clear we have the power to enact some sort of legislation, though it is questionable whether we have the power to go as far as this Bill goes, and such was the indication of the Privy Council, not in the line of the Bill we have before us to-day, but some sort of legislation. But, for my part, I am not disposed to split hairs on that matter, because I am opposed to the principle of separate schools altogether. I do not believe they are good for any country, and experience has proved that. The province of Manitoba, in their wisdom, abolished the separate school system after nineteen years' experience, and, after five or six years' experience, have twice, I believe, reaffirmed their adherence to that system, and on the last occasion by a majority almost unanimous, because both political parties in the province are committed to the maintenance of the public school system. Therefore, I say, that the people of Manitoba, who have the greatest interest in this matter, whose whole legislation would be affected by this Bill, if passed, have, by an almost unanimous vote, decided that they are in favour of a public as against a separate school system. But we are told that the rights that were granted previous to the union have been infringed upon by provincial legislation. But, Mr. Speaker, the Privy Council, in the case of Barrett against the city of Winnipeg, decided that there was no infringement of rights previous to the union; that there were no rights existing, either by law or practice, that had been interfered with. They further declared, that the legislation of 1890 establishing a public school system was quite within the powers of the local legislature. They have reaffirmed that in their later decision, so that the fact stands to-day, that the local legislature of Manitoba, who, in their wisdom, have enacted a public school system, and abolished the separate school system, were acting quite within the powers which the Manitoba Act gave them. But we are told, that rights and privileges were affected, and that there was a grievance. But, Mr. Speaker, while there may have been a grievance, it does not follow that either a moral or a political wrong has been done. The legal grievance referred to in the Bill, consists in the abolition of a privilege heretofore granted, irrespective of whether that privilege was founded on justice or reason; and the privilege has been withdrawn. But a privilege was also given to the Protestants of Manitoba that they should have Protestant schools, because it said Protestant and Roman Catholics. That privilege has been withdrawn from the Protestants, so they have exactly, as I understand it, the same grounds for grievance as the Roman Catholics. But is it a grievance? Is it a grievance that the children of the Roman Catholic population have supplied to them now efficient schools in place of inefficient schools? Is it a grievance that there is a better system of education in the province of Manitoba for all the children of the province, both Protestant and Catholic, than there was before? Because where two schools were established before, and where the population was not sufficient to properly maintain those two schools, there is one efficient public school to-day. But we are told: But these are Protestant schools, and therefore you are doing an injustice to the Roman Catholics by compelling them to send their children there. To that I have to reply that we have the opinion of the Privy Council exactly to the contrary. The Privy Council, in their first judgment of Barrett vs. City of Winnipeg, said as follows:—

They cannot consent to the view which seems to be indicated by one of the members of the Supreme Court, that the public schools under the Act of 1890 are in reality Protestant schools. The legislature has declared in so many words: that the schools shall be entirely unsectarian, and that principle is carried out throughout the Act.

There is the evidence of the Privy Council after examination as to what the law was, that the schools are entirely unsectarian, and therefore there is no such thing as compelling the children of Roman Catholics to attend Protestant schools. In their late decision the Privy Council reaffirmed, in almost similar phraseology, their decision. They said:

It is true that religious exercises prescribed for the public schools are to be not distinctly Protestant, for they are to be non-sectarian, and a parent may withdraw his child from them.

So the schools now established, according to the statement of the Privy Council which examined into the question, are strictly non-sectarian.

Who are asking for the repeal of this Act? They are not, as I have shown, the people of Manitoba, because they are almost a unit in favour of its maintenance, and we have the best evidence to show not only that the Protestant population, but a large section of the Roman Catholic population are in favour of the public school system, because they know, as we know here that where a public school system is only in vogue there are more efficient schools and better progress is made by the pupils, a result which every parent desires. Who, then, are they who are asking for the repeal of the Public Schools Act of Manitoba? They are not, I affirm, the people of the province of Ontario. They are not the people of the great province and of the Territories to the west of Manitoba. I do not believe there is any province that would willingly desire to interfere in the affairs of Manitoba, because we had evidence in the province of Quebec during the last by-elections, when the strongest efforts were made to secure the support of the electorate on the plea that separate schools were to be re-established in Manitoba, that the Government failed to receive support on that ground, though, as I say, strong appeals were made to the people. So we may safely conclude that the people of the province of Quebec are not interested, as they should not be interested, in forcing separate schools on the province of Manitoba. Then, who are they who are forcing these schools on the province? We have evidence here, I am sorry to say, that the hierarchy are interested in doing so, and have interested themselves very much. I will refer to that matter more particularly later on. But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to this fact, that if they succeed in forcing a separate school system on the province of Manitoba against the wishes of the people of that province, they are not going to stop there. They will immediately demand that the same system be applied to the Territories as they are formed into provinces, and they will even make their demand without waiting for the formation of the Territories into provinces; and we have evidence before us to-day that the legislature of the North-west Territories, or rather the North-west Council, passed a school Act during the last session of the council, but through some means which we do not quite understand, although we know the fact, the signature of the Lieutenant-Governor was not given to the Act, and, therefore, it did not become law. I have not heard of any proper reason given why the Governor did not affix his signature to the document, which it was quite within the power of the North-west Council to enact, and therefore I say there has been a miscarriage of law in some respects, and we are told, and it has not been contradicted, that this course was taken because of the strong opposition of Archbishop Langevin to the measure, and in consequence of his protest. We do know that the same course was attempted with respect to legislation passed by the North-west Council some years ago. I have here a copy of the protest of Archbishop Langevin's predecessor, Archbishop Taché, sent to the Government against that law, and calling on the Government to disallow it; but Sir John Thompson, who was then Minister of Justice, refused to disallow it because the Council of the Territories, he said, had not exceeded the powers conferred on them by the Canadian Government, and as, therefore, the law was 'intra vires,' he had not the right to interfere. A strong feeling was aroused against him by Archbishop Taché, because he refused to disallow the Act. The same state of things prevails to-day, and this explains the fact that the Act passed by the North-west Council is not a law on the statute-books to-day. Not only will the hierarchy go to the North-west Territories, if this Bill is carried in this House, and have the same law to establish separate schools enacted there, but they will get power to go back to the legislatures which have declared that they do not want separate schools. They will go to British Columbia. Why not? If this law is right for Manitoba it must be right for British Columbia?

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. WALLACE. An hon. member says "no." I presume he thinks they would not want a separate school system there.

Mr. AMYOT. It is not in the constitution.

Mr. WALLACE. They will go and ask to have the constitution altered.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. Why not? If they have the right to force this school system on Manitoba, they will claim the right to force it on British Columbia, and on Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. We will then find ourselves in this position, that every year there will be interference with the educational legislation of the various provinces. I hold that we should approach this subject with the greatest care—or rather we should not approach it at all—because there will be difficulties, and no man can see where the difficulties will end. Hon. gentlemen say that the passage of this Act now will settle the question. The very Act of itself is evidence to the contrary. What does the last clause say? It reserves to the Dominion Government further power, and the power may be given as soon as it is shown that the powers conferred by this Bill are inadequate to the proper carrying out of the terms of the Act. We were told that the separate schools were granted to the province of Manitoba. First, because there was a treaty and by that treaty they were entitled to separate schools. Mr. Speaker, there was no treaty that gave them that right. There were four treaties, so-called, or bills of rights, made up there. Two of these were by a convention or a mass meeting of the people; there was one, at any rate, made by the provisional government of Louis Riel, and the fourth was said to be made, but I think the evidence is conclusive that the fourth, so-called treaty, or bill of rights, was a forgery. But, even if it were not a forgery, and even if these third and fourth treaties were in existence, the then Governor General of Canada, Sir John Young, refused to treat upon the basis of these, because they were the product of a rebellious government. He consented to treat upon the basis of the first and second, which were from a convention of citizens assembled in Winnipeg, and this convention sent these Bills of Rights down here, and had them brought before the people, and it was the second of these which was the basis upon which the Manitoba Act was founded. Therefore there is no treaty. In the second Bill of Rights, and in the first, and third, there is no mention of separate schools of any form. In the fourth one, this bogus one, which we claim, and which the evidence amply proves was a bogus one, there is mention of separate schools; but that was never considered by Sir John Young or by the Government of that time. Now, we are told, Mr. Speaker, that by the law they should have separate schools. But, Sir, the decision of the Privy Council, to which I have already alluded, does not bear out that proposition. The decision of the Privy Council does not make it compulsory in any way that there should be a separate school Act. Indeed, I should say the Privy Council does not give a decision at all, but simply expresses an opinion to the effect that: if the Parliament of Canada choose to enact such legislation within certain restricted limits, it has power to do so. I claim that this Parliament of Canada is as free as air to-day, not to enact a single line of legislation upon this matter. It becomes a political question, and for the future prosperity of this Dominion, for the future quietness of this Dominion, and its peace, I think that the Government should stay their hand even now, and decide to withdraw this Bill. I say that, because the Bill will provoke disaster, it will provoke quarrels, it will set province against province, and race against race, and religion against religion, and it will be of no benefit whatever to those whom it is intended or designed to serve. I say, Sir, that the Government in this matter have made a great mistake, and that it is not too late yet for them to retrace their steps. Mr. Speaker, there is not a line in the Public Schools Act of Manitoba that interferes with the liberty of either the parent or the child. It does not interfere in any way with the liberty of the people to educate their children in religious subjects as they may please. It does not interfere in any way with any of the privileges that it is proper they should enjoy. Therefore the conscientious convictions of Roman Catholics amount to this. They say: we want our children educated in the dogmas of our church in the public schools. But, Sir, I say, that we have no right to teach the dogmas of any church in the public schools of the country. If we acknowledge that right we must concede it to every religious denomination. We must give the same right to the Presbyterians, to the Methodists, to the Baptists, to the Mennonites, and to all the religious denominations in that country. Then we would find ourselves in this position. One school teaches what another school denies, in one school the dogmas of one church are taught, and in another school the dogmas of another church directly in opposition to it are taught. Sir, I say that they have no right to do that at the expense of the state. Each church should do that at its own expense. I say it is not the duty of the state to engage in such work, and I say that the state which undertakes to do it, is making a great mistake. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, what is the experience of all countries in this respect. We know that in almost every country where they have tried it, they are endeavouring to abolish, or have abolished it to-day. The separate school system—the ecclesiastical system it may perhaps be more properly called—has always been a failure in educating the people. It is not the object of these ecclesiastical schools to educate the people in the ordinary branches of education, but the object is, to inculcate the dogmas of their church; and the history of all countries proves, that they have always failed when they have undertaken to teach, not only the dogmas of their church but to give a general education. Why, Sir, look at our own country. We go to foreign countries, and we see the failure of such education there, but come down to our own country, and what do we find? I have here a copy of the Montreal "Gazette" having information bearing on the question, but before I refer to that, I will speak of the failure of such an educational system in other countries. They have tried the education of the people by the church in all countries, and it is not confined to the Roman Catholics, because the Church of England, and the Methodists, have all had more or less of the idea in their minds, that their school should be a church school. I repeat that it has been a failure, wherever that has been tried. In Belgium, which is almost exclusively a Roman Catholic country, they have made the schools non-sectarian. They have taken away the sectarian schools and established non-sectarian schools in their place. In Italy they have done the same thing, and they had great need for it, and I am told they find the most satisfactory results from the change, because Italy, which was the cradle of the arts, had degenerated until almost half of the people were illiterate. Now Italy has adopted the system of non-sectarian schools and the people are getting a good education. In Ireland the same result has been found. They have established a system of national schools there. In every province of Australia, the non-sectarian system of schools has been established. Then again, in the United States, our nearest neighbour, we know that the greatest efforts have been made by the archbishops, and bishops, and priests, and all the dignitaries of the church, to attempt to fasten upon the states of the union a sectarian system of education. But, I believe that in every state of the American union to-day, the non-sectarian is the system of schools established by law. Here in Canada, in the province of Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, in Prince Edward Island, and in British Columbia, we have non-sectarian schools and the people get along without separate schools. In the province of Ontario we have sectarian schools, but the fact is, that two-thirds of the Roman Catholic population are to-day being educated in the public schools. My hon. friend beside me says "No." Well, I make the statement, and I make it on good evidence, and I would ask that hon. gentleman to produce proof to the contrary. In the province of Ontario two-thirds of the Roman Catholic pupils are educated in the public schools, and there is no interference with their religious convictions there. They get the same fair-play as the Protestant pupils. I have the evidence of Roman Catholic people in the locality where I live that they are the strongest advocates of the public school system under which they were educated themselves, and they are good members of their church, too. In the province of Quebec we have a system of separate schools, or rather of religious schools, and I will read an extract from the report of the Superintendent of Education for that province, as published in the Montreal "Gazette." In his report for 1895, Mr. Boucher de la Bruère says:

The country schools are not as good as they might be. The children leave them without having received a sufficiently lasting impression to make them wish to increase their knowledge.

* * * To quote from one inspector's report, the slow increase in efficiency is due to the apathy of most of the members of the school board—too many of whom are unable to read—to the indifference of parents to the miserable salaries paid to teachers, which makes it difficult to obtain competent ones.....In one district, another inspector declares, where 166 schools were in operation, 38 teachers were without certificates, and 66 the year before.....Most of the teachers are entirely ignorant of the first principles of pedagogics, have no system in their work, and content themselves by making their pupils learn their books by rote.....The pupils recite their lessons fairly well, but without understanding their meaning.....As it is declared that the average salary to teachers is, in some districts, $108 for 10 months work, and as some must get considerably less than this, and as these small wages are not always promptly paid, it is not difficult to understand what is behind the teachers' indifference.....To put it briefly, the people, in too many cases, do not appreciate their duty to their children in the way of education. They are content to fit them to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for their more fortunate or better educated fellow-citizens.

In the face of that, I think it is not unfair to ask those priests who have interested themselves so much in the educational affairs of the province of Manitoba to pay a little attention to the educational affairs of the province of Quebec, where it is so badly needed. I have also a report in my hand upon the operation of the separate school system in this city of Ottawa. In response to a complaint which was made, the Hon. Geo. W. Ross, Minister of Education for the province of Ontario appointed three commissioners to visit the separate schools in this city, and gave them full powers to investigate and report. In that report, the first thing that attracts my attention is that the teachers, whose duty it is to teach loyalty to the children under their care, were themselves disloyal, disobeying the instructions of the Minister of Education, who had ample power conferred upon him, and who delegated ample power to these commissioners to make the inquiry they did. Here is a portion of their report :

On arriving at this school the next morning, Brother Director Mark informed them that "his higher superiors had given instructions that he was not to allow the commissioners to examine the classes." They next visited La Salle school. Here they were received by Brother Director Philadelphus, who said "he had orders not to allow the inquiry in this school."

The commissioners retired, and having doubts as to the extent of the resistance to be offered, they returned to La Salle school, and were informed by Brother Philadelphus, that "As soon as the commissioners entered a room, a brother in charge would leave his class. The pupils would be allowed to remain, and be at the disposal of the commissioners. Nothing would be said to them (pupils), to set them against the commissioners, the teacher would not answer any questions the commissioners might ask him. He (teacher) would give them no information regarding his class. In fact, the resistance to the inquiry meant everything short of using force." This view of the official instructions to the Brothers, was confirmed by Brother Director Mark, on whom your commissioners called a second time, and both gentlemen assured the commissioners that the same order had been issued to all the Brothers in the city.

These gentlemen found that they could not resist the commissioners, but would have to submit. Then the commissioners proceeded to examine the classes, and they say:

Thus, in a class of 51 boys of an average age of over 10 years, working in multiplication with a multiplier of three figures, not one had the correct answer to $7 \times 8 \times 2 - 3 \times 7 - 7$, written on the blackboard in this form. In a class of 31 boys, of an average age of 11, none had the right answer to $7 \times 8 \times 4 - 6 - 2 \times 9$. In the other classes only a few pupils got the correct result.

I might go on all through this book and show, perhaps not as bad a state of things as this, because it could not be worse, but a general want of progress in these schools.

For instance, in a class of fifteen pupils, seven failed to give a single correct answer; in a class of thirty-nine pupils, ten failed to give a single correct answer; in a class of twenty-four pupils, eleven failed to give a single correct answer; and so on. But I will not take up the time of the House in detailing these facts. I will simply say that all through this book is to be found evidence of the utter failure of the separate school system in the city of Ottawa. If that be the history of these schools here, we do not need to go to the province of Manitoba for evidence of the inefficiency of the separate schools there. We have the evidence furnished by the Manitoba government, by the inspectors there, by all those in authority, that the whole system of separate school education in Manitoba was utterly inefficient—that the pupils did not get that education which they might properly be expected to get, and therefore the system was changed and the separate schools were abolished.

Now, I said a moment ago that I thought those gentlemen, the members of the hierarchy in the province of Quebec and in other provinces who were interesting themselves so much, might well devote their energies to improving their own schools, instead of attempting to force upon Manitoba a system of separate schools, which is not wanted by the people of that province. The utterances of these gentlemen are, in my opinion, utterly uncalled for, and are subversive of the freedom of the people of Canada; and, if they are not so already, such utterances should be made contrary to the law. In every election that takes place an attempt is made by these gentlemen to interfere and force their views, illegally, as I contend, on the people of the country. I will just read to you a small portion of a letter written by Bishop Cameron, of Antigonish, during the recent election contest in the county of Cape Breton. In this letter he says :

And yet we meet the appalling spectacle of a multitude of men who are loud in their prayers of liberty and justice and religion arrayed against remedial legislation, the only available means under the constitution of redressing that wrong, and then doing all they can to perpetuate the monster evil, subversive of religion, justice and liberty, in order to attain their own selfish ends. In defiance of God, and to our shame among those hell-inspired hypocrites, Catholics are to be found.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I object personally to be put in that class even in such good company.

Mr. FOSTER. Your objections may not hold.

Mr. WALLACE. I think they will hold with the people of Canada. Now, we have another gentleman, Archbishop Langevin, who makes a statement as to the duty of Catholics, with which I have not so much to do, except to say that no archbishop has the right, under the laws of this country, to interfere with the free exercise of men's voting power. He has the right to exercise his franchise without interference from anybody, but the laws of this country prevent an employer from intimidating an employee and prevent one man interfering with another. And they apply exactly to this case. Archbishop Langevin says as follows :—

It has been said, falsely, that the Catholic hierarchy in this Dominion of ours, is to settle the school question. No, the Catholic hierarchy—you know it, and I can say it plainly—the Catholic hierarchy leave the Catholics in their religious convictions, and all those who do not follow the hierarchy are not Catholics. When the hierarchy has spoken there is no use for any Catholic to say the contrary, for if he does he is not longer a Catholic; such a man may carry the title, but I declare this as a bishop: I say to-night, and I say it with plain authority, a Catholic who does not follow the hierarchy on the school question is not more a Catholic, and who will be the one to entitle such a one to the name of Catholic?

Now, I contend that that is an intolerable species of intimidation. The Roman Catholic bishops have no right to intimidate any voter by any such penalties. We know that the members of the Roman Catholic church, like the members of every other church, desire to be in good standing with their church; and therefore when they are read out of that body, when they are deprived of those advantages which the church says it confers on members in good standing, because they do not choose to follow the dictates of that church upon any question, that is an intolerable interference with the liberty of the subject.

But we have still further an ultimatum from the Rev. M. M. Paquet, from Laval University, who writes to the press as follows:—

Rev. L. A. Paquet, of Laval University, in conformity to the desire of the episcopal authority of his diocese, Archbishop Bégin, and with his express approval wrote to "L'Événement" a two-column letter on February 18th, from which the following is taken:—

Is it not infinitely better, therefore, that, having the right and the occasion, the central power should raise up a rampart of religious justice and protection, that will resist all winds and all tempest? I may add that, given a party spirit which so profoundly divide our public men, it is not from a particular political group that we can look for the force of union necessary to rely under the same banner all Catholics. The hierarchy alone can hope to produce this union by calling upon our legislators, and especially upon those whose conscience it controls, to rise for a moment above the temporal interest which animate them to forget their political divisions and, taking the judgment of the Privy Council of England as their starting point to make it a solid basis of a truly remedial law. To the ecclesiastical power, then, belong the right to judge whether the interference should take place in the form of command or of counsel.

It evidently has taken the form of command in some cases:

And when the interference takes an imperative form, as in the case of the Manitoba schools, only one thing remains to be done by the faithful, and that is to obey.

An hon. MEMBER. That strikes you.

Mr. WALLACE. No, but I am afraid it does strike some in this House, because I remember hearing that the hon. member for

Mr. WALLACE.

Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) who went down to Cape Breton, was one of the loudest there in his desire to resent any attempt to interference.

Mr. DEVLIN. Were you there?

Mr. WALLACE. I was not, but I was told it by a member of Parliament who was there; and we are now told by the public press that the hon. gentleman is now in the position of Davy Crockett's coon who exclaimed:—"Don't shoot, Colonel, I will come down." And the hon. gentleman has come down. Mr. Paquet went on to say:

And when that interference takes the imperative form, as in the case of the Manitoba schools, only one thing remains to be done by the faithful, and that is to obey.

Now, I see that the functionaries of the Roman Catholic Church claim that it is the duty, not only of the electors but of members of Parliament, to obey them, and that is another interference or attempted interference with the rights and freedom of the Canadian people, which should not be tolerated, and will not be tolerated either.

Now, a good deal has been said about a commission to investigate this matter; and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was loudest in his demand for a commission. Why, what does he want a commission for? Is it to get at the facts? I am told he is the author of this Act of 1890, which we are called on to abolish, and surely he made a full investigation before framing that Act. If he did not, he should have, before he undertook to pass that law. We heard that he made an investigation and that he found the separate schools were very defective—not only defective but utterly useless—and should be abolished, and they were abolished accordingly; and I cannot see exactly why he should demand a commission or what good a commission could do him. I suppose his intention is to enlighten his fellow-members on this subject. But there is another way of proceeding. While I think a commission is utterly unnecessary, I believe that a convention or a meeting of the two governments, or of representatives of these two governments, would have smoothed away many of the difficulties which are now presented to us. But some say: But you are opposed to separate schools altogether. So I am. I do not think this Bill should have been brought into the House of Commons at all. I do not think that a separate school Bill should be passed anywhere. But, if the province of Manitoba, after passing a separate school Bill, choose to reverse their decision, that is a thing with which the other provinces have no right to interfere. The Confederation Act gives the various provinces power to establish separate schools if they so desire, and I presume it is not the business of any other province to interfere with them if they embody that desire in the shape of a statute. So that, if there are any grievances of any kind—which I cannot see, for my part—the people of the province of Manitoba are the people to remedy those grievances. But they have stated that they will not establish a system of separate schools in the country, because they have had experience of separate schools, and they have had an experience of a public school system, and they prefer the latter to the former.

I am sorry that the question has been brought before the House of Commons, and that it has become a bone of contention in every province of the Dominion. For this agitation is not confined to the province of Manitoba, but is going on in every province. At a time when the people of Canada should be, if possible, more united than ever; at a time when the old land is menaced and threatened by enemies who are jealous of her greatness, her power, and her pre-eminence among the nations, instead of bringing in here a proposal that must divide the people of Canada, we should carefully avoid all such questions and should join together, as we did in the resolutions passed the other day, and, presenting a united front, should be ready to assure the people of Great Britain, that we have sunk our minor differences, and are determined to do our duty as a portion of the great Empire in maintaining its supremacy both on sea and on land. In this view, it is all the more unfortunate that we have this Bill and this contentious subject thrust upon the people. I hope the Bill will not become law, for, if it does, it will only mark the commencement of litigation and serious disturbance throughout the Dominion. The matter does not end with the passage of this Bill, for the Bill itself provides for further legislation. And we know that the people of Manitoba will resist as strongly as they can, legally and constitutionally, the attempt to force upon them a system of education obnoxious to them. They will bring the Bill before the courts, testing its constitutionality and in every other constitutional way they will resist it. I shall, therefore, have pleasure in recording my vote against the Bill and in favour of the six months' hoist, as moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, I feel a good deal embarrassed in rising to discuss a question of such magnitude as this, particularly in view of the fact that I have not had very much experience in this House, or out of it, in dealing with questions so large, and because of the fact that there seem to be two lines of opposition by which the Government's position is opposed. I think it would be better, if I were to discuss this question from a point of view from which, I think, it has not yet received sufficient attention in this debate, and that is the drier, the merely legal aspect, of the question at issue. I may say, Sir, at the outset, that, in order to understand the Confederation Act and the Manitoba Act, on the subject of education, it is necessary to look at the circumstances under which those Acts were passed. Those circumstances have been brought vividly to the attention of the House this afternoon by the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), who himself took a large part in framing that constitution. But I do not think it can be too often said, I do not think the people of this country can have it too strongly or too frequently impressed upon them, that these educational sections of the British North America Act are Protestant in their origin and were designed to protect Protestants' rights, and that they were essential to the formation of the confederation, of which we are all so proud. It is almost useless for me to labour that point in this House; but, in order that there may be no mistake, I desire to refer to three of those persons who must know more than others of the beginning of our constitution. I refer, first, to Sir Alexander Galt, who said in 1864:

Now this applied to Lower Canada—
Speaking of the educational clauses.

—but it also applied and with equal force to Upper Canada and the other provinces; for in Lower Canada there was a Protestant minority, and in the other provinces a Catholic minority. The same privileges belong of right here,—

Speaking in Quebec.

—as belonged to the other of right elsewhere. There could be no greater injustice to a population than to compel them to have their children educated in a manner contrary to their own religious belief.

That is the opinion of a Protestant. I now call to testify the late Hon. George Brown, who certainly was no friend of separate schools. In the course of the confederation debates, Mr. Brown, speaking of these educational clauses, said:

I admit that from my point of view that is a blot on the scheme before the House. This is confessedly one of the concessions from our side that have to be made to secure this great measure of reform. But surely, I for one, have not the slightest hesitation of accepting it as a necessary condition of the scheme of union.

Then, Sir, we find the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat, in a speech delivered in the House of Assembly in Toronto in 1890, said—and, Sir, I think it is well that we who live now under the pressure of strong feeling outside, should hark back a little and see how the men who made this constitution viewed these provinces, and what our duties should be in the light which their opinions will throw upon it—

In what spirit was the new constitution framed? It was a compromise all round, and an essential part of that compromise—so essential that without it confederation could not have taken place—was the provision by which the separate schools of Ontario, and the Protestant dissentient schools of Quebec, were guaranteed by the Imperial enactment. But for these being guaranteed, we should have no Dominion Parliament with its present limited powers, we should have no provincial legislatures with their powers.

I think, Sir, that it is useful for us, no matter what view hon. gentlemen may take of this subject, it is useful in allaying prejudices, that the attention of the country should be directed to the historical origin of these troublesome provisions in the British North America Act. There is one point, however, I think nobody will dispute from a constitutional point of view, and that is, that the British North America Act and the Manitoba Act recognized the rights of a minority, as such. And I would respectfully say, that it seems to me that a great deal of the argument of the hon. gentleman who immediately preceded me, and a great deal of the argument of the hon. leader of the Opposition missed its point, from the fact that both these hon. gentlemen dealt with the ordinary case of a minority asserting its rights, and not with the case of a minority which was granted special privileges by the constitution under which we are working. Sir, we hear a great deal in the country and elsewhere about equal rights. So far as I am concerned, I will yield to no one in my insistence upon equal rights all round in this country, without respect to creed or class. There is no privilege granted to anybody in the British North America Act because of his religion. But, Sir, when you speak of the phrase "equal rights," as applied to minorities, you can only use it fairly in this sense, that a Protestant minority should have equal rights with a Catholic minority, and that Catholic minorities should have equal rights with Protestant minorities. You cannot use "equal rights" in the sense that a minority shall have equal rights with a majority, because the very charter to which you are appealing tells us that the minority 'per se' has certain specific rights, and in apportioning them out all you can say is that no creed is favoured, no minority holding any particular creed is favoured as against a minority holding a different creed. Now, Sir, there has been a good deal of controversy as to whether there was a bargain made when the province of Manitoba came into the union. I have heard a good deal about bills of rights, and as in the case of the last speaker, I have heard charges of forgery bandied with regard to bills of rights. I may say that I do not regard the question of bills of rights as of any prime importance. I concede that if every member of the Government which then existed in Canada had promised everybody in the province of Manitoba, personally, that a certain thing would be done by the Dominion Parliament, and that afterwards the Dominion Parliament had not fulfilled that promise, we cannot here to-day recognize those promises. The question for us is, what did the Parliament of Canada do when Manitoba came into the union?

Mr. DICKEY.

Now, as to whether there was a bargain made or not, all we can do is to look at the question from a common-sense standpoint, look at it from the standpoint of ordinary historical training. What do we find? We find that there was a special Act passed for Manitoba, providing for certain particular matters as to which Manitoba required special treatment, and one of those matters was the subject of education. Now, I ask any hon. gentleman why was Manitoba not left under the general clause with regard to education in the British North America Act, unless it was thought that there was some particular reason, arising from negotiations or otherwise, which led Parliament to deal specifically with that? I offer that suggestion for what it is worth. But, as a matter of fact, we find that the province of Manitoba took this constitution as it was offered to them by the Federal Parliament. It took it loyally, it passed an Educational Act, to bring those provisions into effect, and it lived under that Act for twenty years. Therefore, it seems to me that we can very well presume that there was some sort of an arrangement made at that time, although that may not be necessary for the contention. There is one more point to which I wish to direct attention. In the Manitoba Act an admitted difference between the Manitoba Act and the British North America Act is to be found, and that is that the future legislature of Manitoba is prevented from making laws "prejudicially affecting any right with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice before the union. These words "or practice" are new. Now, I need not go over the history of the construction of these words. We know that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the Barrett case, held in effect that those words "or practice" meant absolutely nothing; that whatever may have been the intention of Parliament in putting in those words, they were absolutely futile. There is no gentleman in this House, or out of it, there is no man who studies that question from a constitutional standpoint, but will be bound to admit that Parliament, when it put in those words "or practice," intended to preserve to the minority of that day all the rights that they were then possessed of with regard to schools. Sir, if the Parliament of Canada had properly expressed its meaning then, we would to-day have no Manitoba school question on our hands; because the Act of 1890 would have been ultra vires of the legislature, being in contravention of this first section. So, I say that I do not think this House can approach this question without feeling that it was owing to a mistake of this House itself that this question ever came here at all. That is of no constitutional weight, I admit; it may, perhaps, strike some minds as of no force whatever; but it certainly is, to my mind, an element in this case that at the very threshold we find these men have their rights taken from them because we failed to safeguard them as we intended, and as we thought, and as they thought, we did at that time. It seems to me that is a matter of some moment. Now, Sir, the hon. leader of the Opposition said something with regard to the alleged view of this Government that this section was a mechanical section: that we said: Prove a wrong, and immediately the section will act. Well, that hon. gentleman speaks of further investigation. I ask him, if a substantial wrong, such as he has spoken of with regard to Protestant schools is fairly proved, should there be any hesitation, then, in Parliament acting? Should not the operation of Parliament be mechanical with reference to the question of redressing a wrong? I think it should; and the real question at issue between the hon. gentleman and myself is not the mechanical action of this section, but the time when it shall act. Now, there has been a good deal said with reference to the obligation of Parliament to deal with this question now. I frankly admit that it is a very difficult subject to deal with off-hand; it is a very difficult subject particularly for an unpracticed speaker to make himself clear upon. But I desire to point out my view of the obligation of Parliament in this regard; and for a moment I wish to direct the attention of the House to the Manitoba Act, under which these proceedings are taken. It says an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council. Now, I suppose that no hon. gentleman will dispute that it is imperative on the Governor General in Council to hear that appeal. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) when arguing the case before the committee of the Privy Council, did dispute that; but I think, on reflection, that he will withdraw from that position. I think we must admit that it is imperative to hear the appeal. Then a decision is made, and then comes the question whether this House should act. Now, I have no doubt at all, as a lawyer, that this House has ample discretion to act or not to act. I have not the slightest doubt that this House is perfectly competent to reject this Bill, and to refuse absolutely to interfere at all in the affairs of Manitoba. I will go further than that, and I will say that there is no obligation whatever for this House to do anything at any time; that you could not by any conceivable means bind this House, or bind any future Parliament. Take, for instance, the question of the payment of our debt. There is no power in the world except war, and even that would not accomplish it, to oblige this Dominion to redeem one of its bonds. If this Parliament were so craven and dishonest as to repudiate its bonds, there is no power in the world to oblige the payment of those bonds; and yet will any hon. gentleman say that this Government is not bound to redeem its bonds? There is no power to oblige the country to keep its treaties except the arbitrament of war. We know the history of the United States, and its Indian treaties. We know that the United States for generations acted upon the principle that it was strong and the Indian population was weak, and there was nothing to oblige them to fulfil its treaty obligations to the Indians, and we know that the history of the United States as regards the treatment of the Indians has been a century of dishonour. We know moreover that the history of that question has proved that no country can violate its obligations with impunity, because every dollar the United States made by its Indian policy has been paid for in blood over and over again by some of its best citizens. The British Parliament itself is omnipotent. It is said it can do everything except make a man a woman; and yet where is there anybody in whose honour you can trust so absolutely as in that of the British Parliament? There is nobody to which you can look with more confidence to carry out its obligations, independent altogether of law, because there is no law binding the British Parliament itself. If this Parliament can pay its debts on bonds, shall it not equally pay its debts of honour, if this turns out to be a debt of honour? The British Parliament deals with many subject populations, and in all its dealings has always shown one tendency. However, I shall not follow that line further, although I had intended to do so.

The hon. gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Wallace) made what I think was a capital mistake in dealing with this question in that he said we had power to pass a prohibitory law, and need not do so, that we had power to pass an insolvency law, and need not do so. That is perfectly true. But the cases are not in the slightest degree parallel. No lawyer in this House will contend for one moment that the cases are in the slightest degree parallel. We have here the case of parties who claim to be aggrieved, who claim to suffer a wrong and come to us for justice. And are we to refuse justice because we do not exercise all the powers, every power this Parliament possesses? The cases are as I have said, not in the slightest degree parallel. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) argued before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that this Parliament in dealing with this legislation was exercising a power ad hoc, simply for this purpose. There is no doubt about this, that if this Parliament were exercising a power ad hoc, it would be obliged to exercise that power under the wording of the statutes. Nothing can be clearer than this, that if this legislation dealt with magistrates, courts of law, or any public functionary whatever subject to law that word "may" in section 3 would mean "shall," and we would be obliged to so interpret it. But I do not rest on so narrow a view as that.

We are asked now to refuse to exercise this legislation because we do not believe in separate schools. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) argued at great length against separate schools. So far as I am concerned his arguments are quite useless. I may say I was born, at all events I was educated and brought up and trained to believe that separate schools were not good for the country, and I still hold that opinion. I am dealing, however, with this question, not with respect to my opinion of such schools, but in reference to my sense of obligation under the constitution. What would be thought of a court that was given jurisdiction, for instance in divorce, if when a case came before the judge he should say: my religious convictions are against divorce, so I refuse altogether to hear your case. That is a parallel case, and you feel at once that that would be a refusal on the part of a public functionary to discharge a public duty.

I come now to the Manitoba Acts of 1871 and 1881, under which separate schools were established for all classes in the province of Manitoba. In 1890, as the House is very well aware, these rights and privileges were taken away by the Manitoba statute. I hold that this House has already taken a position upon this question. I hold that this House has already indicated the line of policy that should have been pursued with respect to this question. In 1890, Mr. Blake introduced his familiar resolution on this subject, in these words:

It is expedient to provide means whereby, on solemn occasions touching the exercise of the power of disallowance or of the appellate power as to educational legislation, important question of law or fact may be referred by the executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration, in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented and that a reasoned opinion may be obtained for the information of the executive.

That resolution was introduced by Mr. Blake with particular reference to this Manitoba school question, which was then looming on the horizon. He said:

Again, when you act on the appellate educational clause, as, for example, in the case of Manitoba, the very case which is now in a sense pending, as to whether recent legislation be within the limits of the rights of the provincial legislature, and whether any relief is due under the appellate clause to those who claim it, you have a legal question, or rather, in this case, a mixed question of law and of fact; which circumstance it was that induced me to insert the word "fact" in my motion, conscious as I was that it was only on the rarest occasions that any reference of that description would be necessary. Yet it seemed to me that, in this particular instance I was constrained to provide for an emergency which may arise.

There you have Mr. Blake introducing this resolution for the very purpose of dealing with this question through the instrumentality of the courts of law, and you have this House unanimously adopting this very resolution for the purpose of dealing with this Manitoba school question. In 1891, a Bill was introduced by the then Attorney General, the late Sir John Thompson, for this very purpose of carrying out the policy which emanated from the then leader of the Opposition—I am not sure whether Mr. Blake was leader at the time, but he occupied a very high position in the party—and referring this matter to the courts. That Bill passed this House with the unanimous consent of every hon. member. I therefore say that so far as this House could adopt a policy which would bind itself in the future, it did so by adopting that resolution and Bill without any division or without any criticisms but in every sense unambiguously empowering the Government of the day to use the power put in their hands by that Bill for the purpose of settling this very troublesome question. The Government of the day acted upon that suggestion. It has been said, and the leader of the Opposition touched it to-day very gingerly, and I do not think he came very well out of his reply to interruption from this side of the House, that this Government should have vetoed the Act of 1890. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has been most persistent in asserting that the Government was derelict in its duty in not vetoing the Act of 1890.

I have observed, Sir, in some quarters, a tendency to represent that this Government is dealing with this Manitoba school question in a different way from that in which Sir John Macdonald dealt with the New Brunswick school law, and I have observed a tendency to draw a comparison between Sir John Macdonald's action of that day and the action of the present Government—a comparison not to the credit of the present Government. Well, Sir, if this Government had acted upon the suggestion of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), faintly and feebly supported by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, and vetoed this Bill, it would have then been running counter to the action of Sir John Macdonald with regard to the New Brunswick school law. The New Brunswick school law came before this House, and the present Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan) pressed very strongly for some relief with regard to that Act, and he endeavoured to get it vetoed. There was actually a vote of this House, ordering the Government to veto that Act, but Sir John Macdonald refused to veto it for the very wise reason, that the educational sections of the British North America Act form a code by themselves, and that everything connected with education should be dealt with under that code in the 93rd section.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is mistaken, in saying there was any resolution of this House to carry the veto in the case of the New Brunswick School Act.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. Minister (Mr. Dickey) refers to the amendments, which were to the same effect.

Mr. DICKEY. I may be wrong, technically, but I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me, that Sir John Macdonald did not carry out the wish of the House of Commons in regard to that Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The resolution carried was the resolution of Mr. Colby, and in that resolution this House recommended the local legislature to so amend the law as to make it satisfactory to the people of the province.

Mr. DICKEY. Not at all. The resolution in favour of the veto, which I refer to, was with regard to a subsequent Act, in 1873.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. DICKEY. Well, Sir, this Government has pursued exactly the same course with regard to this Manitoba Act. It refused to veto this Act. Now, in the New Brunswick school case, there was no appeal to this Parliament, or to this Government, for the very obvious reason that the circumstances that would give an appeal did not exist in the province of New Brunswick. There were no rights acquired after the union, as to which any appeal could be made. They were in the same position in New Brunswick as if this Manitoba school law of 1890 had been passed in the year 1870, and they had no rights acquired after the union upon which to base an appeal. Therefore, the course of the Government with regard to this Manitoba Act has been exactly parallel to the course of Sir John Macdonald's Government with regard to the New Brunswick Act, and, I may say, also parallel to the course of the Government of Hon. Alexander Mackenzie with regard to the same New Brunswick school law.

Now, Sir, as I said, the Government referred this question to the courts for a decision. The Hon. Edward Blake enforced upon this House, with his magnificent diction, and wide wealth of illustration and knowledge, the propriety of withdrawing questions of this sort from political strife, and referring them to the courts. I know, so far as I am concerned myself, I have no hesitation in saying, that the opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council upon this question is of infinite value to me in dealing with it. I know perfectly well, that I have prejudices. I know perfectly well, that on questions of this kind, where prejudices are strong and deeply-seated upon both sides of the question, that nothing could have a better effect, nothing could have a more reassuring effect, and in no way can a man go safer than in taking the opinion of a body that is above prejudices, and above influences, and which decides the question according to the actual rights of the matter. And so, with regard to the Privy Council. When I hear hon.

gentlemen taking strong ground against the position of the Government, I feel that in that judgment of the Privy Council, whether it is binding or not, you have the greatest possible moral safeguard and moral support, in dealing with this vexed question. Sir, it is said, that that judgment is not binding upon us. It is certainly not binding upon us. Legally, we are not bound to accept the opinion of the Privy Council of England. There is no doubt about that at all. But, Sir, I ask, what has this solemn Assembly been doing during these years? What did this House mean by solemnly taking this question up, and placing it in the hands of the court, and saying to the court: Decide this according to the rights and justice of the case? Was it a solemn mockery? Did we intend, after all, to do what we liked? I put this case to hon. gentlemen. Suppose the Privy Council decided, that we had no jurisdiction to interfere, and suppose the Government had undertaken to interfere, in face of the judgment of the Privy Council, what then would be the opinion of this House? What is the difference, either the one way or the other? The Privy Council has given its judgment upon the question, and, while we may not be technically bound, and while we undoubtedly are not technically bound, I say, that this House would be stultifying itself, this House would be—I cannot find words strong enough to express the idea I have—but this House would be entirely stultifying itself, by taking any steps which would involve the assertion that the judgment of the Privy Council was not right. What is that judgment? I refer, Sir, to the two last sections. I candidly appeal to any hon. gentleman who wants to solve this question upon legal right and upon constitutional practice, irrespective of prejudices; I commend him to the careful reading of the last sections of that judgment, which say:

Their lordships have decided that the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction, and that the appeal is well founded, but the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute. It is not for this tribunal to intimate the precise steps to be taken. Their general character is sufficiently defined by the 3rd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act.

It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

I defy any candid man to read that, without arriving at the conclusion, that the Privy Council, while not dictating what course was to be pursued, unmistakably indicated that they thought it necessary to redress this grievance in some way or other. Everyone must come to the conclusion, in reading this, that in their view—whether it is binding or not is another question—in their view, this grievance should be remedied in such a method as would commend itself to this House. It is extremely to be deplored, that an hon. member of this House feels himself unable to follow the judgment of the Privy Council. This is not the last case of this kind that will arise.

There are other cognate questions that may arise. A written constitution has many disadvantages; but one of its advantages is that under it you are enabled to refer all disputes in regard to the powers of legislation to the courts, and obtain their decision upon them. The hon. leader of the Opposition has referred to several cases in which he thought this Parliament tried to trench upon the right of provincial parliaments. He only showed how dangerous it would be if this Parliament were left to judge of its own rights, and the local parliaments were left to judge of their rights. He only showed how necessary it is that we should look to the arbitrament of the courts in order to settle our powers. Now, I say that this House will take a most serious step—a far-reaching and dangerous step, in my judgment—if, after obtaining the judgment of the courts indicating clearly the course that should be followed, it deliberately rejects that judgment, and, in all future cases of this kind, renders an appeal to the courts absolutely impossible. If this House were to say to-night that, notwithstanding the judgment, we propose to act as we like, and throw aside all that has been there decided, what would be the result? The result would be that the next case of this kind that came up could never be referred to the courts, nor submitted to judicial decision; but it would simply have to come here to be fought out from first to last, as a mere political scramble, as to how it would affect votes one way or the other. That would be a condition of things very much to be deplored.

The hon. leader of the Opposition said that the Government had bungled this question from start to finish. Well, Sir, I have shown that the Government of the day had the unanimous authority of this House originally for referring this matter to the courts. Sir John Thompson, not once or twice, but a dozen times, in the Protestant province of Ontario, declared in the most unmistakable terms years ago that he proposed to settle this question according to the constitution and the decision of the courts. There never was any doubt whatever as to his position. There never has been, from the beginning of this matter to the present time, any hesitation whatever with regard to the position of the Government. It has been a policy of allowing the courts to settle these vexed questions, and carrying out such policy as the courts declare is required under the constitution. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), with his acute legal mind, long ago saw that. He pointed out to the House in 1893 that to accept a reference to the courts meant that we would be bound, finally, to accept whatever decision the court made. Now, Sir, there is one point upon which a good deal has been said, that is, that the remedial order should not have been made at the time it was made.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. DICKEY. That is a question of very considerable importance, and I see the hon. member for Bothwell refers to it. In order to properly judge that point, it is necessary that we should look back and see how matters stood when that remedial order was made. In 1893, I think it was, the argument on the appeal was begun before the Canadian Privy Council, and it was interrupted to enable the opinion of the courts to be taken as to the power of the Government to deal with the question. When the question came back in February, 1895, the Government were in this position: The argument was uncompleted. Mr. Ewart, who was arguing the case on behalf of the Manitoba minority had been cut off in the middle of his argument; and certainly it would have been an extraordinary proceeding if, after having adjourned the court in order to find out whether we had jurisdiction in the matter or not, we should not again meet after the question of jurisdiction was settled, and hear the argument of counsel. In July, 1894, this Government had approached the Manitoba government in regard to this matter; and I will read the last section of the Order in Council then adopted:

The committee beg to observe to Your Excellency that the statements which are contained in this memorial are matter of deep concern and solicitude in the interests of the Dominion at large, and that it is a matter of the utmost importance to the people of Canada that the laws which prevail in any portion of the Dominion should not be such as to occasion complaint of oppression or injustice to any class or portion of the people, but should be recognized as establishing perfect freedom and equality, especially in all matters relating to religion and religious belief and practice; and the committee, therefore, humbly advise that Your Excellency may join with them in expressing the most earnest hopes that the legislatures of Manitoba and the North-west Territories respectively, may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment the complaints which are set forth in this petition, and which are said to create dissatisfaction among Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well-founded complaint or grievance be ascertained to exist.

To that the Manitoba government made a reply, categorically refusing to recognize any grievance at all. In their reply, made in October, 1894, they say:

The questions which are raised by the report now under consideration have been the subject of most voluminous discussion in the legislature of Manitoba during the past four years. All of the statements made in the memorial addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, and many others, have been repeatedly made to and considered by the legislature. That body has advisedly enacted educational legislation which gives to every citizen equal rights and equal privileges, and makes no distinction respecting nationality and religion. After a harassing legal contest, the highest court in the British dominions has decided that the legislature, in enacting the law of 1890, was within its constitutional powers, and that the subject of education is one committed to the charge of the provincial legislature. Under these circumstances, the executive of the province see no reason for recommending the legislature to alter the principles of the legislation complained of. It has been made clear that there is no grievance, except it be a grievance that the legislature refuses to subsidize particular creeds out of the public funds, and the legislature can hardly be held to be responsible for the fact that their refusal to violate what seems to be a sound and just principle of government creates, in the words of the report, dissatisfaction amongst Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada.

So that this Government had approached the Manitoba government in a memorial which I think every hon. member must admit was most conciliatory in its terms; and that memorial had been met with this statement: We know all about this subject; it is an old story; it has been discussed over and over again; there is no grievance; and we will make no remedy. These facts, of course, were before the Government when this reference went on. Then the Government refused—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask a question of the hon. gentleman. He spoke about Mr. Ewart being incomplete in his argument. I would like to ask whether he maintains that the proceedings before the Privy Council ought to be judicial proceedings in form rather than a diplomatic?

Mr. DICKEY. Judicial, I should say.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is the appeal?

Mr. DICKEY. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It must be judicial in its form.

Mr. DICKEY. Oh, yes. Then, Sir, the Manitoba government refused to appear before the Privy Council to argue this case at all, which course certainly did not look at all towards conciliation. The Manitoba legislature met, after the judgment of the Privy Council was delivered in February. There was a speech delivered from the Throne, on which I cannot lay my hands just now, but every hon. gentleman knows that it referred to the judgment of the Privy Council, and reiterated the determination of the Manitoba legislature not to recede at all from the position it had taken. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman who represents Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) also spoke on this subject, and he emphatically repudiated the slightest chance of our obtaining any accommodation from the Manitoba legislature with regard to this question. The Manitoba legislature was then sitting. There was a chance of getting that question dealt with by that legislature then, and thus saving the loss of a whole year in getting it out of the way. It had been hanging before this House for three or four years; we had been taunted by the other side with keeping it here; we had been taunted with delay in dealing with it; motions had been made to censure the Government for the time they had shown in reaching a conclusion. Was it, therefore, unreasonable that the Privy Council of Canada should go on to hear the incomplete argument of Mr. Ewart and the argument of the Manitoba government, so as to enable the matter to be dealt with, if there was any disposition to deal with it amicably by the Manitoba legislature, which was then sitting. It seems to me that the action of the Privy Council at that moment, though it may seem to hon. gentlemen opposite now, under different motives, open to censure, was such as was reasonable and proper under the circumstances; and it seems to me that the course of events in Manitoba ever since has amply justified that action. The Manitoba legislature has shown no disposition whatever, so far as I am aware, to meet this subject in any other way than by standing upon what they considered their provincial rights. Last July, the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), speaking in this House, said:

For my part, I have no hope, not the slightest expectation of any arrangement being made with the province of Manitoba. I do not think, if we read the answer to the remedial order made by that legislature, not in haste, not in anger, but after due deliberation, that any sane man should hope that the same Government which brought down the answer to the remedial order, or the same legislature which, by a very large majority adopted it, will, in the next six months—and that is the limit given them to change their course—make any alteration in the conclusion at which they have arrived.

And he went on to repeat this in different passages throughout his speech. Now, the hon. leader of the Opposition referred to the terms of that order, and he spoke of it as a drastic order. It seems to me that that is a very strong expression. The hon. gentleman himself did not always hold that view. In the year 1895, he spoke rather slightly of the remedial order. He did not then seem to think it was drastic enough; he did not seem to think it was directory enough, and he said:

The Order in Council is termed a decision. I do not understand that term exactly. As I read it, and I have read it pretty carefully, it can hardly be called a decision. It is simply an invitation to the government of Manitoba to deal with the question and to leave them to apply a remedy to the evil which has been created by their own legislation.

So that it seems to me that I can appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober, and ask the hon. gentleman if he was not right in 1895.

Mr. EDGAR. What was the date the hon. gentleman was drunk.

Mr. DICKEY. Page 34 of the "Hansard."

Mr. LAURIER. The last one is the drunk-en one, the first one was sober.

Mr. DICKEY. I thoroughly agree with the hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, a good deal has been said with reference to the drastic nature of the remedial order, and I think that it is a matter of very considerable importance. I dispute entirely the proposition that there is anything whatever drastic about the remedial order except what is drastic in the judgment of every court. It is true it is clear; it is true it is definite; it is true it is decided; but that it is drastic, or offensive in any sense, I most certainly dispute. There is one thing overlooked with regard to the remedial order, and that is this, that while attention has been drawn to the three sections in which the rights are adjudged, which certainly are clear and definite, it is not always pointed out that there is recited in that order a part of the judgment of the Privy Council of England, which I have just read, declaring that it is not necessary at all to re-enact the Act or do anything more than modify it just sufficiently to practically replace the rights, and their finding, which is in that remedial order is clearly limited by the statement in the order that all they want is practically to redress their grievances, not necessarily repealing the law and not necessarily re-enacting the old law. So that it seems to me that the Manitoba government entirely misread the order which was sent to them, when they insisted that it meant re-enacting the old law or re-establishing the old system in toto. It is perfectly true that to take the A, B, C paragraphs, adjudicating the rights, there is some foundation for that contention; but that was qualified by what went before, which showed that all that was contemplated by this remedial order was a substantial righting of the grievances of the minority there, as adjudicated by the Privy Council of England. I wish also to draw attention to the last section of that order, which is as follows:—

The committee, without necessarily adopting this view.

That is the view that the legislation by this Parliament would be irrevocable:

Observe that section 22 of the Manitoba Act may admit of that construction.

Mr. DICKEY.

The committee, therefore, recommend that the provincial legislature be requested to consider whether its action upon the decision of Your Excellency in Council should be permitted to be such as, while refusing to redress a grievance which the highest court in the Empire has declared to exist, may compel Parliament to give the relief of which under the constitution the provincial legislature is the proper and primary source, thereby according to this view, permanently divesting itself in a very large measure of its authority and so establishing in the province an educational system, which no matter what changes may take place in the circumstances of the country or the views of the people, cannot be altered or repealed by any legislative body in Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman contend for that view?

Mr. DICKEY. No; distinctly, no. I point this out to show that this remedial order, this very much abused remedial order, is nothing more than a definite statement of the rights of the minority as the Privy Council of Canada saw them—

An hon. MEMBER. Privy Council of England.

Mr. DICKEY. And the Privy Council of England as well—and I will challenge any hon. gentleman, I do not care what is his legal ability or standing, to take the report of the proceedings before the Privy Council of Canada and draw any order definitely fixing these rights and giving Parliament jurisdiction to deal with this question that is one single word less drastic than the Order in Council we passed. There is absolutely nothing in that order except what is absolutely necessary to vest this Parliament with jurisdiction to deal with the question. So that I think that the criticism of that much abused order is entirely due to confining that criticism to two or three paragraphs in which the rights are defined.

Well, Sir, this Government is now inviting the House to read the Bill the second time. One would think to hear the speech of the leader of the Opposition that this Government was enamoured of this Bill. One would think that to hear the hon. gentleman that if there was one thing this Government loved it was to pass remedial Bills, Bills for the province of Manitoba. I can assure the hon. gentleman that it is for no love of the question that the Government is dealing with it. Every hon. member must know how invidious and difficult a question this is, and how absolutely absurd it is to suppose that the Government is grasping at jurisdiction in this matter. Nothing could be clearer to any man of common sense, to every citizen of the country, than that, whatever love we have of political power, the last thing that that sentiment would cause us to do would be to go outside and grasp at jurisdiction which, as the hon. gentleman has said involves the loss of the support in this House of a number of our strong friends. Certainly there can be no foundation for anything of that sort. Every hon. gentleman must feel that whether the Government is or is not mistaken as to the position, it is firmly convinced that public duty obliges it to submit this question to the House. There cannot possibly or conceivably be any political capital to be made out of questions so troublesome as this.

The hon. member from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) asked me if I thought this legislation would be irrevocable. I would not refer to that but for the fact that so high an authority as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) expressed positively to the Privy Council of Canada the opinion that this legislation of this House would be irrevocable. So far as I am concerned, I can find no foundation whatever for that doctrine. The statute says :

As far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section.

It is contended that because we may make laws therefore we can not repeal them. If so, then the local legislature cannot repeal its laws, for section 22 says that in and for the province of Manitoba, the provincial legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education. Therefore, if the phrase "make laws" does not give the power to repeal those laws, we have no power here to repeal them. But I have no sympathy with this view at all. This legislature can deal with no question ad hoc, this legislature can deal with no question except with the plenary powers of a body holding its high position. In this respect its powers are circumscribed as to the extent they are in any other case. But that there is anything to take away our implied sovereign right of repealing our own legislation I do not admit.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman deny that the local legislature has jurisdiction over this subject and over this Bill if it becomes law ?

Mr. DICKEY. I do not think the local legislature can amend or repeal the Act that we pass.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why not ?

Mr. DICKEY. I do not think the constitution would allow them to—if the hon. gentleman will excuse me for answering so shortly.

There is another point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House and it is this :—We have the statement of the Secretary of State to-day showing so admirably the very serious consequences which lie behind this question. What I wish to press upon the House is that if they refuse to interfere in this case, we practically wipe out this section from the statute-book. What are the facts here ? The hon. leader of the Opposition says that we should have a commission to investigate. To investigate what ? He has given us the question which he thinks should be investigated. The first was whether there was a compact, the second, whether the public schools are repugnant to Catholics and the third whether they are really Protestant schools. Let any hon. gentleman look this question fairly in the fact. What is the wrong done ? The wrong done is the repeal of certain legislative rights. These legislative rights inhere in the Act which was repealed. No practice can extend them, no indulgence in practice can mitigate them ; they are included in the Act which is repealed and you have to look to that Act and to that Act alone to find what those rights were. They are taken away by the Act of 1890. The hon. gentleman says that we must hold a commission to inquire whether the schools under the Act of 1890 are Protestant schools or not. I dissent entirely from that view. The question we have to look at is this :—Is the Act of 1890 on its face—not in its administration, which may be one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow, but on its face and in the powers it confers and in the rights it takes away—an infringement upon the rights of the minority under section 22 of the Manitoba Act ? There is nothing to investigate. The hon. member for Simcoe, when he argued the question before the Privy Council of Canada, said that he came there to discuss questions of law and history, but not to discuss questions of fact. I think he was perfectly right. The hon. gentleman also wishes us to investigate the question of whether public schools are repugnant to Catholics. Now, Sir, as I have already said, separate schools are not agreeable to me, but the question of whether public schools are repugnant to Catholics or not, is a question settled by the charter under which we live ; it is a question settled by the British North America Act for all time, as long as that Act shall last. We are not to inquire what were the motives that induced the Canadian Parliament of that day to ask the British Parliament to pass that Act. They have recognized as legal the rights of minorities with respect to schools. Suppose we inquire into the question whether those schools were repugnant to Catholics ; and suppose we had one set of Catholics coming and saying they had no objections to public schools ; and another set coming, as they certainly would, as every hon. gentleman in this House knows, and saying that public schools were repugnant to them ; what would be the position in this matter ? The position would be that we would have to give effect to that law, and that our investigation, or inquiry, would be simply a farce, gone through, possibly, for the sake of delaying this question a little longer, but to no practical end whatever. Therefore, I cannot see what there is to be gained by an investigation. Now, Sir, as I said before, if this power is ever to be exercised, it must be exercised now. It is not a question of inquiring whether you will interfere or not in this case. If some right of the Manitoba minority were taken away relating to administration, or to some detail of their law, then it would be a fair case for inquiry. But this House cannot shirk the question, there is no hon. gentleman in this House who can shirk the question. The question is now on a matter of principle as to whether you are ever to put this Act in force or not. You have a case where there is no dispute that every right has been swept away. Now, Sir, I wish to direct attention for a moment to the situation in the province of Quebec. In a country like this where we have mixed populations differently distributed in the various provinces, questions of this sort have to be dealt with in a very broad spirit. I say here that the Protestants of the province of Quebec are depending to-day, so far as the legal support of their schools is concerned, upon the very same power that the Catholics of Manitoba are now invoking to save their schools; and if we were to refuse to interfere with the province of Manitoba, we would certainly shut ourselves out for ever from interfering in the province of Quebec. Suppose the Catholics of the province of Quebec were to legislate on similar lines with reference to Protestant schools there, what would be the result?

Mr. MARTIN. Would not an Act of that kind be ultra vires?

Mr. DICKEY. I am coming to that, if the hon. gentleman will allow me. I am glad the hon. gentleman sees the force of the point I make. Suppose the Catholics were to legislate on similar lines, what would be the result? I have no doubt that the hon. member from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) would feel at once that a gross injustice had been done, and I would feel the same. But he and I must remember that religious convictions are things that we must take as we find them, and that we cannot improve them by legislation. If the Protestants of Quebec would consider it a gross injustice to be forced to contribute to Catholic schools, so the Catholics of Manitoba have a perfect right to express their disgust at a proposition that they shall contribute to schools that are against their conscience. That is not a personal question for us to settle; the question we have to consider is whether the conscientious repugnance to these schools is bona fide expressed or not. Now, in the province of Quebec, as I may explain to the hon. gentleman, all that is guaranteed by the British North America Act, subsection 3, to the Protestants, are the rights that were enjoyed by the Catholics in Ontario prior to the union. Now, those rights in Ontario prior to the union, and which are guaranteed absolutely to the province of Quebec, are a mere nothing. What are they? Merely a right for any five persons to form a school section, and when they do form a school section, they are exempt from general school taxation, and they get their share of the legislative grants.

Mr. EDGAR. Is the hon. gentleman speaking of Ontario or Quebec?

Mr. DICKEY. I am speaking of Ontario before the union, as showing the limit of the legal rights of the Protestants in Quebec that cannot be taken away from them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman speaks about Ontario standing in a different position from Quebec. That depends wholly upon whether that first subsection is applicable; but if you confine it to denominational schools, then they stand upon exactly the same footing.

Mr. DICKEY. Well, I cannot go into a definition of denominational schools with my hon. friend to-night; we may have a discussion of that some other time. But what I am now pointing out is that the rights ensured to the Protestants of Quebec under the British North America Act by the doctrine of ultra vires, are only those rights which existed in Ontario at the union. I think there is no dispute about that. Well, now, those rights were simply to form a school section, and to tax themselves, getting a share of the legislative grant, and being exempt from taxation for the schools of the majority.

Mr. MARTIN. Is that the full limit of separate schools?

Mr. DICKEY. They have no right to deal with school books. The Protestant schools of Quebec to-day could be forced by legislation to take any school books that the Catholic commissioners of Quebec chose to assign to them. The Catholic commissioners of the province of Quebec, if the legislature should so declare, could force upon Protestants, books that were most offensive to them, and could say that they should not enjoy school grants unless they used those books.

Mr. LANGELIER. That is an entire mistake.

Mr. DICKEY. Well, the hon. gentleman may show that it is a mistake. More than that, the Protestants of the province of Quebec have no right by law, or no right secured by the doctrine of ultra vires, to form a school board or to form any system of general organization for their schools. Article 1894, of the Quebec Code of 1883, gives the Council of Public Instruction certain powers. That council is divided into two bodies, one Roman Catholic and the other Protestant. Each section has power to fix the time of meeting, to make regulations respecting normal schools, regulations for organization, government and discipline of public schools, for the classification of schools and teachers, to select text books, etc., except in the case of books relating to religion or morals, which are otherwise selected; to make regulations for the boards of examiners, the cancellation of teachers' certificates, and the appointment of a central board of examiners. Now, Sir, all these ample powers, which are necessary in order to run an efficient school system, could to-morrow be swept away by the legislature of Quebec, and the only remedy that the Protestants of Quebec would have would be to come here by an appeal asking this House to interfere. So that we are to-day not deciding the question of the Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba, we are deciding the question of all minorities in the Dominion of Canada, Protestant as well as Catholic. The hon. member for North Simcoe has often referred to the smallness of the minority in Manitoba. It seems to me that if there could be one additional claim on the consideration of the House, it would be the fact that the Catholic minority in Manitoba is small and helpless. I think, Sir, hon. gentlemen would be very sorry if any doctrine were started, that, because the Protestants in the province of Quebec amounted to only one-seventh of the population, therefore, their rights may be disregarded. It will not do to figure upon questions of right or wrong according to majorities. The rights that are secured to the minority in Manitoba should be upheld, so far as the law confers them. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is perfectly consistent, he is perfectly logical, as one would expect to find a gentleman of his legal training. The hon. gentleman says: You should never use this power with respect to appeals under the educational section of the statutes. So that, of course, he is perfectly consistent. But I ask hon. gentlemen in this House who may some day come here appealing on behalf of a minority of another class, to consider that they are to-day assisting in laying down the principle that will guide this House for all time to come, in dealing with questions under the educational clauses either of the Manitoba or the British North America Act.

There is one argument which is used with a good deal of force, and that is the argument, that this is the coercion of Manitoba and infringement of provincial rights. Well, Sir, I have a great deal of sympathy with an argument of that kind. I believe that, if that position could be made good, this House would stay its hands at once, that, if we were infringing on any power of the local legislature, we should say, "hands off." But there can be no shadow of doubt about the legal position on this point—it is too absolutely clear to admit of argument. I do not know how it is represented in some parts of the country, but there cannot be the slightest doubt, from a legal standpoint, that, if we pass this Bill, assuming it to be within the limits of our jurisdiction, we have the absolute right to do so; what I mean is, that there is not a shadow of doubt of our right to replace all the rights the Roman Catholics had formerly. In case there should be any doubt, I will read the observations obiter of Lord Watson and Lord Macnaghten during the argument in the Manitoba school case before the Judicial Committee. Lord Watson said:

You start this part of your argument by saying that the legislature of Manitoba is to have exclusive legislative powers in the matter. But that is not in the Act. They are to have exclusive power except in so far as it is qualified by the provisions of the Act, and that leaves it open. We cannot assume that the legislature meant to give them the entire exclusive power, without the qualification of these provisions, and the only question really is to what extent is their exclusive right qualified, by the provisions of the section. You cannot take any benefit from the assumption that the legislature did give or meant to give them the whole power. They did not mean to give them the exclusive power.

Lord Macnaghten said:

They had the exclusive power till they overstepped the limits of the section. When they did that I do not see any limit to the remedy which the Dominion Parliament might apply, except the mischief which had to be remedied.

Then, reinforcing these dicta, is the solemn judgment of the court given on this point, where the Lord Chancellor says:

Before leaving this part of the case it may be well to notice the argument urged by the respondent that the construction which their lordships have put upon the 2nd and 3rd subsections of section 22 of the Manitoba Act is inconsistent with the power conferred upon the legislature of the province to "exclusively make laws in relation to education." The argument is fallacious. The power conferred is not absolute but limited. It is exercisable only subject and according to the following provisions. The subsections which follow, therefore, whatever be their true construction, define the conditions under which alone the provincial legislature may legislate in relation to education, and indicate the limitation imposed on, and the exceptions from, their power of exclusive legislation. Their right to legislate is not indeed, properly speaking, exclusive, for in the case specified in subsection 3 of the Parliament of Canada is authorized to legislate on the same subject. There is, therefore, no such inconsistency as was suggested.

So there is no doubt whatever that this is strictly within the limits of the powers of this Parliament. Sir, there are many cases in which this Parliament's legislation conflicts with the local legislatures. Take the question of insolvency. When we legislate on the question of insolvency, we can change the whole relation of debtor and creditor in the provinces; we can change the Registry Acts of the provinces and affect the register as regards priority of securities; we can change the whole operation of civil rights, so far as relates to debtor and creditor. Yet no one would say the Bill would be an infringement on the powers of the local legislatures. Take, for instance, a question on which it is often urged this Parliament has not properly exercised the right it possesses, that of declaring a work to be for the general advantage of Canada. The moment we do that, we withdraw that work from the jurisdiction of the local legislatures. And yet nobody would say there is an infringement of the local powers, because we simply go back to our charter, which has given us that power, and, therefore, there cannot be any infringement of the local powers. The fact of the matter is, that no argument of that kind can be based except on this assumption, that the British North America Act in this respect was a mistake, and that these sections about education should never have been passed, and that they should be repealed. It is too late now to argue questions of that kind. We are here to decide this question according to the law, as it now stands, and I am dealing with this simply on that assumption.

I may say, for myself, that I represent a county which is almost wholly Protestant, which is very strongly Protestant. It has been said, that we should go to the country and get a mandate from the people on this question. I do not at all agree with that theory. This question was started in the Parliament before this, in 1890. That Parliament took a stand with respect to this question, by passing Mr. Blake's resolution, authorizing a reference of this question to the courts. The very first session of this Parliament dealt with that question, by passing the Act of 1891, which was in the same direction. It is a question with which this Parliament has been familiar in every aspect. It has been brought up now by the decision of the Privy Council for judgment, and, in my opinion, this Parliament is right to at once deal with it and to take the responsibility of dealing with it. Surely, it will be very much to be regretted, if any constitutional doctrine should be found which would oblige this Parliament to throw that bone of contention amongst the constituencies of the Dominion. We all know it is difficult enough to discuss these questions here quietly and without raising any religious feeling, but, I think, no lover of his country, in this House or out of it, could view with anything except great alarm and regret, the possibility of running elections in which the chief issue would be one of Protestant against Catholic; and, really, this would be the case, if this question were before the people. I, for one, would do everything in my power to avoid coming to the conclusion, that any constitutional doctrine would take me so far as that. I recognize that, though a member for Cumberland and representing the Protestants there, I at the same time, recognize that I am a member for the whole Dominion, and I must discharge my obligations to the whole Dominion, as I see them; and I am here to say this, that, if the people of Cumberland gave me any mandate on a question like this, one which was contrary to my convictions, I would not obey that mandate, but I would act according to the best of my convictions, and allow them afterwards to pass judgment upon my action. That is the position I take now. I believe that when the people of this country as a whole understand this question thoroughly, and having had time to think over this matter quietly, and not in the heat of an election contest, I believe that there will not be nearly as much difficulty in settling it as has been the opinion in some quarters. I believe it is really a vote of want of confidence in the people of Canada to suppose that after having had time to calmly consider the question, they will not judge rightly—assuming the side for which I am arguing to be right, as I think I have to some extent made clear.

Now, Sir, in conclusion, I desire to say, that so far as I know, the Government, and certainly I myself, make no claim whatever to Catholic votes on account of our action in this matter. We claim the support of those Catholics who believe that our course is in accordance with the constitution and for the best interests of the country, and, Sir, we claim also, and with equal confidence, the votes and support of intelligent Protestants who think that our course is in the best interests of the country, and is the course that is demanded by the constitution. It would be a great misfortune that there should be any appeal whatever to Roman Catholic votes, or to Protestant votes as such, and so far as I am concerned, I entirely disclaim anything of that kind. I think that the people of this Dominion stand somewhat towards the minority in Manitoba as the Catholic majority in Quebec stand towards the Protestant minority in that province. The Protestants of this country have had in the province of Quebec a great object lesson of generous, frank and fair treatment towards the minority of their faith by the Catholic majority in Quebec. And, Sir, I do not think that the Protestants of this Dominion should be behindhand in a generous treatment of their fellow-countrymen, and I believe, Sir, that this Bill should be adopted. The details of the Bill are a matter of controversy. It was a Bill which was very difficult to draw, and a Bill as to which the Government will be glad to receive suggestions, if it goes into Committee of the Whole House. But, Sir, the question at this present moment is not a question of detail. The question now is a question of principle. The question now before the House is whether the educational sections of the Confederation Act are ever to be carried out, and upon that question I do sincerely hope that this House will speak in a way that will prevent such a controversy from being raised again.

PRAYERS.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for second reading of Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba) and the proposed motion (six months' hoist) of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with what was said yesterday by the leader of the House when, in moving the second reading of this Bill, he announced that he was introducing into this House a most momentous question. I believe, Sir, that this question is pregnant with results that may work for the weal or the woe of Canada; and I fear that it may perhaps endanger confederation itself, unless it is dealt with and discussed by this Parliament in a spirit of broad statesmanship and patriotic moderation. The leader of the House yesterday, in his speech, dealt very largely with historical questions; and, no doubt they were ably dealt with and were very interesting, only there was that one glaring omission from the history he gave of confederation, which was referred to by my leader. The leader of the House entirely forgot to tell us about his connection with the coercion of the province of Nova Scotia, which was a most important event in the history of confederation. I believe that as long as the hon. gentleman's name is remembered in connection with confederation, it will be remembered in connection with that incident. The hon. gentleman, too, when he began to touch the question of the Remedial Bill, told us a good many things which may have been entirely new to him, but which were not entirely new to most of the members of this House. I suppose that the absence of the hon. gentleman from the country, and his busy occupation with other important duties, prevented him from taking the same interest in that question, or at least, learning as much about the law relating to it as the members of this Parliament on both sides, as a rule, know. Therefore, I dare say, that a good deal of what he told us had more interest and more information for people who did not understand the question than for the members of this House. I have also the same complaint to make of the speech of the leader of the House that I have to make of the speech of the Minister of Justice, delivered later in the day. They both elaborately confuted many positions which we, on this side, have never held. I do not think it was very profitable. At any rate, after the speech of the leader of the Opposition, the Minister of Justice should not have assumed that it was necessary to argue a number of positions which were frankly admitted by the leader of the Opposition as being beyond dispute. Now, Sir, I would like, before making the few remarks I have to make on this question, to clear away a few matters which are not in dispute between the other side of the House and this side of the House, at any rate.

In the first place, the question of the federal jurisdiction of this Parliament to legislate upon the subject of education in Manitoba is not denied. Nobody ventures, I think, to deny that; and yet a great deal of the argument of the hon. gentlemen was directed against this man of straw, which they set up and valiantly knocked down.

Why, in the argument before the Canadian Privy Council, prior to the issuing of the remedial order in March last, the province of Manitoba, through its counsel, the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), expressly admitted the jurisdiction of this Parliament. The argument of the hon. member for Simcoe (see page 67, of the argument in the blue-book), puts that beyond question. Well, if the province of Manitoba admit it, if the council of Manitoba admit it, no one in this House or country would venture for a moment to deny it. It was only last week that the legislature of Manitoba, according to the reports in the newspapers, passed a memorial in which they most emphatically admit the jurisdiction of this Parliament to deal with the subject. That memorial says that "while the constitutional right of the Dominion Parliament to deal with the question is not denied"—and so on.

Then there is another matter, proof of which was elaborately made by both the Ministers of the Crown who spoke yesterday. They undertook to show the House that the Catholic minority of Manitoba had a grievance. Well, that is not disputed nor can it be disputed successfully, because the judgment of the Privy Council itself says that there is a grievance, and the counsel for the Manitoba government, in his argument before the Privy Council, made the distinct admission that there is a grievance. His words are very few, and I may as well read them to the House:

Hon. Mr. Curran—It may be necessary to hear why justice should not be done. But there is a grievance.

Mr. McCarthy—I am not going to say that there is not a grievance ; I am precluded from that by the judgment.

Now, that is a question which it was unnecessary to occupy the time of the House in proving. It is not the existence of the grievance we dispute, but the extent of the grievance which ought to be inquired into.

A great deal has been said by the Ministers to prove that the principle of provincial rights had nothing to do with this question. Well, we know perfectly well that this question of education does not stand on the same footing as the other questions with reference to which the provinces have exclusive right to legislate, and in connection with which what is called the question of provincial rights has been raised, from time to time, since confederation. But I say this : the question of provincial rights does arise in this way. It does not arise by denying the jurisdiction ; but a respect for provincial rights in general should teach us how to interpret and how to endeavour to exercise those powers which we undoubtedly have. In that sense alone, the question of provincial rights arises in this case, and that is a most important sense which should have very great influence upon this House. Now, this Government at least cannot dispute, it does not lie in the mouth of this Government to dispute, the fact that the question of education should be left to the provinces except as a last resort, because the present Government, or at least the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, on the 27th of July last, passed an Order in Council, which was sent up to Manitoba, in which they used these words :

In the interests of all concerned, it will not be disputed that, if possible, the subject of education should be exclusively dealt with by the local legislature. Upon every ground, in the opinion of the sub-committee, this course is to be preferred.

So to that extent provincial rights are to be considered. The Government have agreed with us, but why they are not doing it is another question. The position in which this Parliament finds itself to-day is this. We are in search of a remedy for that grievance of the minority. What is the best way to apply the remedy ? Why, it is through the province, as the Government themselves admit, in that passage I have just read from their Order in Council of the 27th of July, and also as they admit in this very Bill we are considering now. They admit by their Bill that the province of Manitoba is the proper machine for carrying out, not only the executive, but the legislative functions connected with the separate schools and religious education in that province. Section 1 of the Bill refers it to the Government to appoint a board of education in the first instance. Another section, section 7, I think, empowers the local government to appoint a superintendent. So much for the executive functions which they think properly should belong to the province. Then take section 74, the great section on which the whole machinery of this Bill depends, the section which provides money for the establishment of schools under this Bill. Why, that is frankly left to the legislative powers of the province of Manitoba. So I say that by their admissions under the Order in Council, and by the way they have drafted this Bill, the Government is estopped from denying our contention that the provincial legislature of Manitoba is the place of all others to deal with this question of education. Then, Sir, we must consider in connection with this subject, what is the best time to apply this remedy. Surely the people of this country, as a whole, when they see the unfortunate agitation and the bitterness that is being raised from one end of this country to the other, will say that this remedy is only to be applied as a last resort. The Manitoba legislature have frankly admitted that the jurisdiction is here, but they say and they contend that the power resting with us should only be exercised as a last resort and after the clearest possible case has been made of flagrant wrong-doing on the part of the provincial authorities.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we must consider what the details and particulars of that remedy shall be. The Government have admitted by this Bill and by their Order in Council of 27th July, 1895, that the remedy need not be the same as that prescribed by the remedial order of March last. They have let that slide, so to speak ; they only undertake to come under one corner of it. Therefore, apparently, according to their judgment, it is unnecessary for us to legislate according to the terms of the first remedial order. Well, then, what guide have we ? Have we the infallible wisdom of the Treasury benches alone ? Do the Ministers by intuition and instinct know exactly what this legislation should be ? They had one idea in March, 1895, when they passed the remedial order ; they have evidently another idea to-day when they bring forward this Bill. Which is right ? What has caused them to change their opinions ? Where has the new light come from ? They made no inquiry ; they refused to make any inquiry. Therefore, I contend, the House is absolutely at liberty, following the example of the Government, to exercise their own judgment as to the best form which that remedy should assume. But how can members of this House say what form the remedy should take without inquiry, without further information ? A few blue-books are brought down to us. But do they give us information ? Why, Mr. Speaker, the Government had all this information on the 21st March, 1895. They took one view of the position then ; but they take another to-day. So that, either they must have decided in the first place without exact information, or, they have acquired that information and have not communicated it to the House, which we cannot assume, as it would be most irregular and improper. We are driven to conclude that they have not got exact information, and, without it they are changing their minds from time to time, from day to day, from month to month. I know that some contend that the duty is thrown upon us as a Parliament to act. I am not going to discuss how far there is a binding, cast-iron obligation resting upon this Parliament. That there is a bounden and imperative duty before us is contended by some. But is there anything to show when we are to act; is there anything to show how we are to act? The law which prescribes the duty provides that these matters are left for us to settle. Therefore, I say, whether the duty is absolutely binding upon us or not, it is equally our duty to consider how we are to act and when we are to act. Do we know so much about this question of the Manitoba schools, do all of us know so much about the question that we have nothing further to learn about it? There may be a few members from Manitoba and the North-west, and a very few others, who have had any means of ascertaining the condition and position of the Manitoba schools. We have a good deal to do in this Parliament in attending to our own affairs, and never till this moment have we been called upon to legislate upon these questions; and naturally we are not informed regarding them. That is not discreditable to us. We cannot legislate intelligently upon that question without knowing much more than we do. You might as well ask a county council in Ontario to legislate about the lobster fisheries in Nova Scotia. I have no doubt that if the duty was cast upon them, and if they took proper measures to inquire into the case, and had all the facts concerning the lobster fisheries laid before them, they could and would legislate intelligently upon the subject. But I say that we are just as much at sea—or as far from the sea—as an Ontario county council would be in a case like that. Is this not an important enough question to be inquired into? Why, Sir, the Government, some years ago, thought it worth while to appoint a Royal Commission to investigate the question of Chinese cheap labour. Is that so important a question that before legislating upon it, or declining to legislate upon it, the Government had to send a special Royal Commission to the Pacific coast—of which commission the distinguished member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I think, was the secretary—and, in comparison, is not the question now before us sufficiently important to be inquired into before we are asked to legislate? Then there is a question which, I think, we happen to know something about, most of us a great deal more than we do about the Manitoba schools. We all know more or less about the evils of intemperance. And yet it was considered necessary to appoint a large commission and spend tens of thousands of dollars upon the investigation of that question for the information of Parliament. And this question that we know nothing about is not worth while to investigate, it appears. Now, Sir, I would not suggest an inquiry in order to shirk any parliamentary responsibility that is thrown upon us to deal with this question. It is not for the purpose of shirking responsibility that we suggest it, but it is for the purpose of being able to do our duty, to assume our responsibility in the proper way, that we ask for further inquiry. Now, the Minister of Justice suggested that there were no facts in dispute, there was really nothing in dispute in this matter, that it was all a question of interpretation of two statutes. There was the original school law, and there was the repeal of that, and by looking at those statutes, he said, anybody could tell what the grievance was, how much it was, and all about it. Well, now I venture absolutely and entirely to differ from the Minister of Justice. For instance, can he find out between the four corners of those two Acts, to his own satisfaction, whether those schools up there now are Protestant schools or not? Can he find out to his own satisfaction whether the schools that were not separate schools before 1890 were Protestant schools or not? Well, if the Minister of Justice is able to satisfy himself on those points, there are some people who know a great deal more about that question than either he or I do, or than any member of this House can possibly know, who do not agree with him. Let me give you an example. A memorial in 1892, signed by nearly all, or perhaps all, the Roman Catholic bishops and archbishops of Canada, contained this allegation:

Since the establishment of the province of Manitoba until 1890, the public schools of the province, as established by law, were either Protestant or Catholic schools.

Then they say:

Practically, and in spite of all assertions to the contrary, the result of the new system is purely and simply the legal suppression of all Catholic schools, and the maintenance of all Protestant schools, with all the rights and privileges they enjoyed previous to the school law of 1890.

This document is signed by all the Canadian bishops in 1892, and I quote from page 336 of the blue-book. Now, that may be very simple and clear until we hear the other side. The Minister of Justice, perhaps, knows better than the Bishop of Rupert's Land whether we could properly call these Protestant schools. But in 1895, the Bishop of Rupert's Land, in a letter published in this blue-book, dated at Winnipeg, refers in this way to these very schools which the Roman Catholic archbishops have been characterizing as Protestant schools :

The religious services are in no true sense Protestant. There never was in the Protestant schools under the old system, any instruction properly to be called Protestant. There was immeasurably less religious instruction than in the board schools of London, yet Cardinal Vaughan and the most of the Roman Catholic clergy supported the candidates favourable to such teaching in preference to those advocating the secularizing of these schools.

I quote this language from the Anglican Bishop of Rupert's Land, who lives in Winnipeg. Now, Sir, will the Minister of Justice tell me where he can find a judgment settling that disputed point, that direct contradiction between men of the highest possible standing, and with the best possible means of knowledge—will he tell me where he can find such a judgment in the four corners of either of these statutes? Can anybody doubt the absolute good faith of the gentlemen who make these two absolutely contradictory and vital statements, vital to the decision of this question by this House? Nobody can dispute their good faith. One or the other is mistaken, both cannot be right; therefore, this House ought to know which is right, before it is called upon to pass this legislation. Now, there is another very important question indeed at issue, to which I would like to draw the attention again of the Minister of Justice, and to ask him if he can show me a settlement of this point within these two Acts of Parliament. There is an executive report, from which the hon. gentleman quoted last night, signed by Thomas Greenway, and dated 20th October, 1894; it quotes the substance of a despatch that was sent up from this Government for the consideration of the Greenway government, and it says :

It is also stated that the Act of 1894 decrees the confiscation of all school property in all the districts which do not submit their schools to the new law, even although the school property may have been acquired by Catholics with their own money.

That is an official statement on behalf of the minority sent in to this Government and forwarded to the Manitoba government. What does Mr. Greenway say about that? Does he admit that to be the case? He does not. Here is his language :

In so far as the Act of 1894 is concerned, there is no ground for the statement attributed to the memorial, but it decrees the confiscation of school property in the districts which had not submitted their schools to the new law.

Now, Sir, there again is an absolute and positive contradiction in terms about a most essential and material element in the settlement of this school question. What does the Minister of Justice say about it?

Mr. EDGAR.

Which is right or which is wrong? He should have told the House. There is nothing in these Acts to which he refers us, that will give a decision of this question. Here again parties are making conflicting statements too important to be ignored. There are the memorialists on behalf of the Roman Catholic minority, on the one hand, who no doubt believe they are right and think that they have accurate information; but there is an absolute and positive contradiction by the Premier of Manitoba, on the other hand, who believes he is right, and has means of information. How are we unfortunate people down here to decide, without something more definite than a reference to a couple of Acts of Parliament, which is right and which is wrong? But we must know that, before we can conscientiously vote for the passage of this or any other Bill. Then, Sir, it will be remembered that in the argument before the Canadian Privy Council, previous to the issuing of the order of 21st March, 1894, the committee called before them a gentleman who made a statement before that committee. I think it was a sworn statement; at any rate it was accepted by the committee, and so far as I can make out, it was not withdrawn, or asked to be withdrawn. That was the statement of Mr. O'Donohue at Winnipeg. What does he say? He made some statements which are of vast importance, if true, and if not true they should be contradicted authoritatively and proved to be untrue. What does he say? He takes two points which are most material to the consideration of this question. He says, in the first place, at page 34 of the blue-book :

I am more convinced than ever (speaking of the Act of 1890, the repealing Act) that it is the best for the country and the Roman Catholics in particular, that they would be the greatest gainers, and would accept the School Act if the French clergy would allow them to do so.

Is not that a statement of vast importance, if true? Why should it not have been disproved if not true? I do not say it is true. Mr. O'Donohue goes on to say :

Another grievance many Catholics complain of is that our school property, instead of being held by the Catholic trustees, for the people, is held in fee simple by the Superintendent General, or head of the Oblat Fathers in France.

Is this not a statement that cannot be ignored? The members of the Privy Council, the Postmaster General, the ex-Minister of Justice and the Finance Minister were there, and I think the Finance Minister was there too, all listening to that statement. If they had a formal contradiction of it, why has it not been laid before Parliament, so that we may know as much as they do?

Then there are most extraordinary contradictions in connection with a very important matter indeed concerning these schools. The Minister of Justice touched very lightly last evening upon the question of contract between Canada and the Territory of Rupert's Land, that came in as Manitoba. The hon. gentleman said we might imply, we might presume, there was an understanding with them, because they lived for twenty years under the provisions of this statute of 1872. Well, Sir, that is a very poor thing to go on to show a contract and treaty between Canada and the district that came in under the Act of 1872 as a province. We are entitled to something more than that. Is that all the information there is to be had about this matter? Perhaps the Minister of Justice was wise in touching on it so gingerly, because he and this House know how contradictory the statements are on that point. The House will remember there were a great many bills of rights upon which on one or all of them it is said the legislation and treaty was based between Manitoba and Canada. There was one bill of rights called bill No. 4, and I should like the Minister of Justice to tell the House what he thinks of it. Has he evidence that it should have full weight or not? At all events, we know perfectly well that there is great dispute as to whether it was applicable at all to this question; and that is a very material point we should know about. In the argument, at page 48 of the blue-book, Mr. McCarthy, in reply, said:

Dealing with it in that way the question of fact must arise as to whether bill of rights No. 4 was ever brought here or not, and there being no trial of that question of fact, you will plainly see how difficult it would be to come to a conclusion with regard to it either one way or another. On that question all the official papers seem to be one way and the statement of the Rev. Father Ritchot in the other direction.

Well, Mr. McCarthy may be right or wrong. That is the statement made by him before the Ministers, and I believe that undoubtedly a state of confusion exists on that very important question. The parties are not dead. The hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) was himself an active party during the negotiations for the creation of the province of Manitoba. Father Ritchot is alive. He could be examined; Sir Donald Smith could be examined, and a dozen more witnesses could be examined, and documents could be examined, and then we would not be presuming something in regard to an Act of Parliament, but there would be actual evidence as to how much weight should be attached to the conditions respecting separate schools, and regarding bill of rights No. 4. None of the members of this House at the present time possess this knowledge, and yet we are asked to vote for the second and third reading of the Bill.

Another question of dispute on a very material point I may refer to: it is this. In his argument before the Privy Council, at page 23, Mr. Ewart introduced a very important statement of fact. He said:

My fourth argument is nearly allied to the third. It is based upon promises made by the Greenway government (after its accession to office) to His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, and to various other persons, in order to enable him to obtain for his Cabinet a representative of the Roman Catholics and to carry the general elections of 1888. In support of this I read the affidavits of the Rev. Vicar-General Allard and Mr. W. F. Alloway.

These affidavits were all afterwards withdrawn by Mr. Ewart. However, that is the state of affairs. We find at page 62, Mr. McCarthy said, when speaking in reply:

I am instructed to-day by the Attorney General, and that is all I propose to say about it,—that the alleged agreement between Mr. Greenway and the archbishop has been repeatedly denied. I am not denying it now, but it has been repeatedly denied, and I gather from the statement read yesterday that it had been denied.

Can anything be more solemn and important than the promise made by the then and present Prime Minister of Manitoba to the late Archbishop of St. Boniface, in the capacity of representative of the minority; and yet that fact is absolutely in dispute, and we are offered no evidence about it. Sir, if I had time I could find many other most important facts which are essentially necessary to inform this House before we are called upon to take this responsible action; facts which are absolutely in dispute, which are not admitted, and in relation to which no inquiry has been made. Still, Sir, in the absence of such information, we are asked to go on with the second reading of this Bill.

Now, I think I can show that some members of this Administration have had it in their mind that an inquiry was necessary. I do not see the Minister of Railways in his seat, but his colleagues who were there will probably remember this circumstance which occurred in the argument before them, prior to the remedial order. Mr. Ewart was about to conclude his argument when this conversation occurred:

Hon. Mr. Haggart—I suppose you intend to produce evidence to show how the Acts of 1890 interfered with the rights and privileges you had acquired?

This was addressed by one of the court, as those gentlemen of the Canadian Privy Council called themselves, when they were hearing the representative of the province of Manitoba, and the representative of the minority. This question was addressed by the Minister of Railways to the counsel representing the minority. What was Mr. Ewart's answer to that? How did Mr. Ewart get out of it? He simply said this:

That is established sufficiently by the judgment. That must be taken as conclusive upon that point. And the matter went no further. But, if we turn to the judgment, we find how easily Mr. Ewart was let off. Because these facts were not proved before the judgment was given; they were not stated in the case submitted for the judgment of the Privy Council, as facts at all. The material point on which this decision turned, assumed these to be true for the sake of the judgment; assumed them to be true for the sake of argument, assumed them to be true for the sake of the decision; and yet Mr. Ewart said: They are sufficiently established by the judgment. Now, Sir, the judgment was based upon this submission:

No. 5.—Has His Excellency the Governor General in Council power to make the declarations or remedial orders, which are asked for in the said memorials and petitions, assuming the material facts to be as stated therein.

If the Minister of Railways were in the House now, when this is pointed out to him, I am sure he would at once fall back upon the ground he very properly held there, namely, that evidence should be produced to show how the Acts of 1890 interfered with the rights and privileges acquired. The hon. gentleman is not in the House, but, perhaps, he may have changed his mind. At any rate, that was the view of the Minister of Railways at that time, as to the necessity of proving something even before the remedial order. There was another Minister then, who is not a Minister now, and I am glad to see him in his place. He seemed to have had the same notion in his mind then, whether he may have changed it since or not. He seemed to have the idea running through his mind, that they had to decide on the merits of this question, not on a formal matter, but on its merits. We find that, when Mr. McCarthy was making his argument, Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper said this:

The question that occurs to me, right or wrong, is this: That granting all you say as to our political responsibility, and as to our power to do one thing or another, does not the Act in its nature contemplate that we shall approach the question, not as a political or party body; not that we shall merely go through a form of inquiry on the appeal made to us, but that we shall, to the best of our ability, deal with the merits of the case, being responsible, to Parliament nevertheless, for our action on the merits.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is the merits of this case which we want to be able to deal with, as the Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) seemed to think then. He says they should not go through the form of an inquiry, but get at the merits. Well, we do not want to go through any form of inquiry, or to let any one else do it for us, unless it is for the purpose of submitting it in full to Parliament. Therefore, at that time, it is quite clear that the Minister of Railways and the then Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) had it distinctly in their minds that they were not to act on this solemn occasion without full inquiry into the merits of this case.

Mr. EDGAR.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You will admit, I suppose, that I did not get a very definite answer to that question.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not know. It was not the answer I looked at. I looked at what my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) said, and the frame of mind he was in when he stated that. I have not read the answer yet; but the answer of counsel in arguing a point is not always taken as evidence in a court of justice. It appears, also, that not very long ago it occurred to somebody—goodness knows who it was, for we cannot find out—that a little further inquiry into this matter would be desirable in the public interest. I suppose; and we have the hon. member for West Montreal (Sir Donald A. Smith) sent up by somebody on behalf of this Government, to make some inquiries—not for the benefit of the House, nor for the information of this House—but, I suppose, for the information of the Government. I complain about that a little. I think they should have taken us into their confidence, and that the very valuable inquiries which could be made, and, no doubt, were made by the member for West Montreal, should have been laid before the House, when we are called upon to pass this legislation. Was it voluntary, or was it requested, that the hon. member for Montreal (Sir Donald Smith) should go up there? Of course, we know he takes a profound interest in the present combination that sits upon the Treasury benches. We know that he is a sort of—if I might say it without offence—a sort of dry-nurse to that combination. He was there when they came into existence a few weeks ago—when the readjustment took place; and he is said to have been watching over them ever since, as carefully as if they were infant industries. When one of them squealed in the nursery, he would come up to Ottawa from Montreal; whenever he heard that one had called another a naughty name in the nursery, he would come down from Winnipeg to set matters right. It was generally understood on this side that he had a deputy or assistant dry-nurse for the Ministry in the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope), who also fusses around on the outside circle with a great interest in the whole combination. I was inquiring of a medical man what the particular duties of an assistant nurse in a case of that kind were, and I was told that his particular duties were to look after the pap bottle and see that it was properly administered.

Now, Sir, there is another party to this case: there is the province of Manitoba, which we cannot ignore. The Government are not ignoring it in their legislation. Now, what has the province of Manitoba said on the subject of the inquiry that we suggest should take place? Why, Sir, as long ago as the 19th of June, 1895, in reply to the communication that was sent to them forwarding the remedial order, the government of that province said in a very respectful way to this Government :

We believe that when the remedial order was made, there was not available then to Your Excellency in Council full and accurate information as to the workings of our former system of schools.

We also believe that there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of changes in the direction indicated in the order.

Being impressed with this view, we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late to make a full and deliberate investigation of the whole subject. Should such a course be adopted, we shall cheerfully assist in affording the most complete information available. An investigation of such a kind would furnish a substantial basis of fact upon which conclusions could be formed with a reasonable degree of certainty.

That was in June last. There is now, it appears, great urgency about this legislation. If the Government were impressed with its urgency when they passed the Order in Council in March, and if they are impressed with its urgency now, they must have felt its urgency last June; and did they do anything to meet this reasonable suggestion of the other high contracting party, the government of Manitoba? No, Sir; they absolutely ignored it. They have never proposed investigation. They did later on ask the government of Manitoba what they would suggest about legislation; but the demand made by the government of Manitoba for an investigation was never replied to. The Order in Council which was passed by this Government in reply to that of the Manitoba government, and which was sent to Manitoba shortly after the prorogation of last session of this Parliament, ignored the offer of an investigation altogether—discourteously ignored it, I think. However, did the government of Manitoba abandon that idea? No, Sir; they did not. On the 20th of December, 1895, they again addressed a respectful memorial to the Dominion Government, in which they said :

It is a matter of regret that the invitation extended by the legislative assembly to make a proper inquiry into the facts of the case has not been accepted, but that, as above stated, the advisers of His Excellency have declared their policy without investigation. It is equally a matter of regret that Parliament is apparently about to be asked to legislate without investigation. It is with all deference submitted that such a course seems to be quite incapable of reasonable justification, and must create the conviction that the educational interests of the people of the province of Manitoba are being dealt with in a hostile and peremptory way by a tribunal whose members have not approached the subject in a judicial spirit, or taken the proceedings necessary to enable them to form a proper opinion upon the merits of the question.

No wonder it strikes the government of Manitoba in that way. The first of these requests for investigation which I have read was from the legislature of Manitoba. The next, that of December last, was from the government of Manitoba. An election has been held since. A new legislature of Manitoba has assembled, and has again dealt with the question; and what did they say last week? They said:

Be it resolved,

That this House notes with cordial approval that the advisers of his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor did earnestly repeat to the advisers of His Excellency the invitation extended by this House to them to make full inquiry before asking Parliament to legislate and did also suggest that the scope of the inquiry should be sufficiently wide to embrace all available facts relating to the past or present school systems.

That it is sincerely regretted that these repeated and earnest invitations for an inquiry have been absolutely ignored by the advisers of His Excellency, who propose, without complete information, themselves to ask coercive legislation from Parliament, the great majority of whose members are necessarily without a full knowledge of the facts relative to the past and present school systems of Manitoba.

Sir, if ever there was a voice of a people, that is the voice of the people of Manitoba—a parliament elected since we have been sitting here, carrying that resolution by a vote of 31 to 7. And still the Government here will ignore that united voice of a great province. I think Parliament, at any rate, should not ignore it. Thank goodness, on this question we are not tied down to the views of the Government. This free Parliament of Canada can think for itself; and in the face of that request from an important, a rich and a growing province to this legislature, it would be worse than discourtesy—it would be criminal—for this Parliament to ignore it.

I say that alone is ample reason for our refusing to give this Bill a second reading just now. Then, what can the public think of the position the Government are putting that minority in—be the cause of that minority never so good—when they refuse an open and free inquiry into the grievance. What cause that deserves sympathy or assistance is afraid of any inquiry? Yet that is the position into which this Government is putting that unfortunate minority in the North-west. I say they do not deserve to be put in such a false position, and Parliament should not be a party to putting them in that false position before the eyes of the country, and of the world.

I believe I can show the House another very strong reason why the greatest caution and deliberation should be exercised in passing this law, and I think I will have the benefit of the assistance of the late Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) too in this argument, because I am going to quote from what he said himself, in his famous report on which the remedial order was based. The argument had been advanced before the Privy Council that it would be impossible, once remedial legislation was enacted here in pursuance of the remedial order, to change or revoke that legislation. It was argued that such legislation would then become irrevocable and unchangeable by any Parliament on this side of the Atlantic. What does the late Minister of Justice say about that in his report to the Council? He refers to it in order to let Mr. Greenway's government know that they had better look out, that they had better be pretty quick and pass legislation such as the remedial order required, or this Parliament would do it, and then it never could be changed, no matter how the circumstances of the country might change. This is what the hon. gentleman said:

In this connection it was urged by counsel on behalf of the province, that should Parliament legislate under these circumstances, its enactment would be absolute and irrevocable, so far as both Parliament and the provincial legislature are concerned. The committee, without necessarily adopting this view, observe that section 22 of the Manitoba Act may admit of that construction. The committee, therefore, recommend that the provincial legislature be requested to consider whether its action upon the decision of Your Excellency in Council should be permitted to be such as, while refusing to redress the grievance which the highest court of the Empire has declared to exist, may compel Parliament to give the relief of which, under the constitution, the provincial legislature is the proper and primary source, thereby, according to this view, permanently divesting itself in a very large measure of its authority, and so establishing in the province an educational system which, no matter what changes may take place in the circumstances of the country or the views of people, cannot be altered or repealed by any legislative body in Canada.

Now, the ex-Minister of Justice, while not necessarily adopting this view, says it is worthy of consideration, and submits it with the stamp, the quasi stamp at least, of his formal approval, to the legislature of Manitoba in order to force their legislation on. Why, unless the hon. Minister has utterly changed his mind, what is the position this question will be in if his law be right? If it be true that by the passing of this legislation we will absolutely and irrevocably fix a yoke upon the neck of the people of that province which no power, by any legislative authority in Canada, can remove, what sort of position will we place them in? Should not that reason alone—for the doubt, at any rate, has been created as to whether that is not the law by the ex-Minister of Justice himself—give us pause before we pass that absolute and irrevocable legislation. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), last evening, was frank enough to admit what we probably all knew before, that we had discretionary legislative powers in this House upon this question; and he argued that while that was the case—and the leader of the House had argued earlier in the day to the same effect—still, we were bound in honour to pay what we owe to the minority. Well, I will go so far as to agree with the Minister of Justice that we are bound in honour to do justice to the minority, and nobody, I hope, intends otherwise in this House; and I am sure that nobody in this House, if he did intend to do otherwise, would dare to say so. He would be ashamed to say so. Therefore, I too, say, we are bound, in honour, at least, to pay that debt due to the minority. And I say we, the Liberal party, are prepared to pay that debt in gold—not in hollow promises and not in worthless paper like this Bill. The hon. gentleman seemed to admit that, on the face of it, the remedial order of March last did look pretty drastic and somewhat offensive, but how did he get over that? He got over it in this ingenious way—by saying that although the operative part of the remedial order might seem to be drastic and offensive, still there was a recital in that order of the judgment of the Privy Council which would show that it was not so drastic as it seemed to be. So that we have an admission from the Government at last, that the operative part of the Order in Council has gone a good deal further than the judgment of the English Privy Council. The hon. gentleman must have meant that, if he meant anything. He said that in order to mitigate the harshness and offensiveness and drastic nature of the operative terms of the remedial order, we must read into it, and read with it the judgment of the Privy Council, which was so much more mild that it would dilute and weaken and soften, and possibly render palatable the otherwise disagreeable remedial order. Well, Sir, that is something to know. It is something to have that admission from the hon. Minister. But I am sorry to say that when he made that admission he did it without making a very good argument, because, on looking at the remedial order, I find that there is no recital in it at all. The recital is in the Minute of Council, in the sub-committee's report made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper).

Mr. DICKEY. That is quite correct. It was a slip. I meant to say that the recital was in the Minutes of Council.

Mr. EDGAR. Then there is no force in the argument. The hon. gentleman made the admission that—

Mr. DICKEY. They both went together, the Minute and the Order.

Mr. EDGAR. But one is a report, and the other is the solemn act of His Excellency in Council. Why, they are of different dates.

Mr. DICKEY. If the hon. gentleman will excuse me, they bear the same relation to each other that the reasoned judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council does to the formal order of that committee.

Mr. EDGAR. They may bear some theoretical relation, but I do not think you can read into the formal order of a court what a judge on the bench may have said. The record signed by the court, officially, is what the court means to say, and no recital or statement in any other judgment will vary the force of that decree. I place myself firmly and with confidence upon that legal position. But, after all, the important fact is that the Minister of Justice admitted that the remedial order is so much more rigorous in its terms than the judgment of the Privy Council that the latter was used to mitigate the former.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice last night appealed to us with a good deal of feeling not to make this question an issue at the general elections by refusing to pass this Bill. I would like to know who is pressing it forward, who is forcing this legislation on the country a few weeks before a general election, but the Ministers themselves? They are forcing this law upon an unwilling province, and one more unwilling and more determined than ever not to take the law as it is leaving the Ministers' hands to-day, after insult has been added to insult, by refusing so often the reasonable request of the province for an inquiry. In spite of all that has been done to induce them to refrain, the Ministers are forcing this upon the province and upon the people of Canada who do not want it. The hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury benches know a good deal better than I do, probably, the rebellion among the people of this country who have hitherto been supporters of this Government. And still they are forcing it upon the country on the eve of a general election. That is a policy of dictation and coercion, and policies of dictation and coercion have often produced in other countries, and in this country, too, in days gone by, rebellions and uprisings of the people, and bloodshed; it was never a policy of inquiry and conciliation and fair-play and equal justice to all that produced those results. Why cannot the Government yield, even at this late hour, and withdraw this issue from the general elections? I am sure that the whole House will assent at once if they will offer to put it off and make a full inquiry so that the matter may be removed from the political arena, as it ought to be.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that I have no right whatever to speak on behalf of the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba. But I remember very well that in my own province not so very long ago, when the liberties and the rights of the Roman Catholic minority there were threatened. I as a Protestant citizen did speak out on their behalf. And I think I can fairly claim to know a little of the opinions and feelings upon most questions of the Irish Roman Catholic minority in my own province of Ontario. I think I know enough of them, at least, to venture to say that their fathers have suffered a great deal too much coercion in Ireland for them to desire to coerce Manitoba, or any other province in Canada. I believe that they are too much attached to the principle of home rule to unite with any party in this country to crush out the home rule aspirations of a province in Canada, as they would, by passing this Bill. I believe they are altogether too intelligent a people not to trust that justice will be better and more speedily and more surely and permanently secured by a full and frank investigation of the grievances of their co-religionists in Manitoba than by this proposed method of action. And I know this, also, that they are too intelligent to allow a hollow cry—which we know is going to be raised in this election—of “the church in danger,” to distract their attention from the main issue, and cause any Liberal among them to support this incapable and discredited Government.

This Bill I believe to be a hollow compromise; I believe it is only a miserable makeshift that pleases neither party to the question. Hon. gentlemen on the other side know full well that it is not satisfactory to a large class of their followers. They think they will, perhaps, please another section of the Cabinet, or of their followers, but I think they will be mistaken, because I see on the Notice paper of this House a large number of amendments in the other direction, by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), who is intelligent enough to see that this Bill as it stands does not give efficient relief to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba, and does not meet the principles that he for one has been contending for. So I think the Ministers will see that it is an unacceptable and a mistaken compromise; and I sincerely hope before the vote is taken on the second reading, that the Ministers will make up their minds to withdraw that legislation from this House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat unfortunate last night, after the leader of the Opposition took his seat, in not catching your eye. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) rose in my stead, and spoke in my stead; but, Sir, I can say that that hon. gentleman did not make the speech which I wished to make yesterday, and which I shall try to make to-day. Since I have been in public life I have endeavoured to consider all questions such as the present one, independent of any consideration of race, of any consideration of nationality, of any consideration of province. I must say at the outset that I deplore that a question such as this should have come before the Parliament of Canada. I deplore it because, among some of the people of our country, it has created division and it has created irritation, which are never favourable to the political health of any country. But, Sir, I believe that at all hazards the constitution must be maintained, and it is from that point of view that I desire to consider this question. In my own native province, upon questions like the present one, and occasions now historic, I have had to face fierce fights, but there again, without considering whether these questions affected me prejudicially as a public man, not considering whether the sentiments of my people were enlisted in defence of the view which I had taken, I treated those questions as matters affecting not one nationality, not one province, but I considered them from the broad standpoint of the general interests of the Dominion. Now, Mr. Speaker, I look upon this question as a purely constitutional one. Although I know that religious views and ideas are involved in it more or less, I want to consider it in this Parliament, the national assembly of the Dominion, peopled by the representatives of so many different races—I say that on the floor of this Parliament, this question should be viewed from the constitutional standpoint, and in the light of the general interests of all our people. In the interest of the country, in the interest of the party which is concerned, it is better that it should be tried as a constitutional question, separated as much as possible from the irritating elements which unfortunately accompany it. Sir, as I view the question, it resolves itself into this: The highest tribunal in the Empire has declared that rights have been taken away from a minority; and that minority, under the laws which govern this country, the constitution under which this country began its career has appealed to the highest tribunal in the British Empire; and that tribunal, outside our strife, ignoring all questions of nationality or of province, viewing it as that tribunal does all great questions coming from every portion of the vast Empire to be submitted to its impartial judgment the judges of that high tribunal, the last tribunal to which a British subject can appeal, declared that rights had been taken away from the minority of Manitoba. Sir, I shall have occasion to refer later to the circumstances under which a clause for the protection of minorities, happens to be in the British North America Act; and under that clause I say it became the imperative duty of the Government, under the judgment rendered by the Privy Council, to hear the appeal of that minority, coming before them for redress. Now, this appeal having been heard, the Government of Canada proceeded to apply the remedy which the constitution afforded to the minority. Sir, hon. gentlemen on the other side have spoken of drastic measures being taken by this Government in relation to this matter; but I hope to be able to show before I resume my seat, that every thing that could be done by this Government to induce the Manitoba legislature to take into its own hands the application of that remedy, was done by this Government. I hope also before I resume my seat to be able to show by an analysis of the Orders in Council which were passed, that if to-day we have before this Parliament a debate the most important and the most momentous which has ever been heard within the walls of this House since confederation, it is because the legislature of Manitoba would not harken to the voice of those of her citizens, within her jurisdiction, who were asking her to remedy the evils from which they were suffering, and to restore to them the rights which the Privy Council of England had declared should not have been taken away from them. Sir, we proceeded so far that hon. gentlemen opposite and an important portion of the people of Canada reproached the Government for not using its power to settle before this day the Manitoba question, which, as I have already stated, was creating so much irritation, and is creating so much irritation at the present time. We were accused of delaying the solution of that question. We avoided everything that could interfere with the autonomy of the province, because I believe that the man who would knowingly touch the autonomy of any of the great provinces composing this confederation, would not feel a patriotic heart within his breast; and I would be the last to do so, and I would fight for delay, and would put up with any measure of tardiness, so as to be able to avoid the exercise of a jurisdiction which is given, under the British North America Act, to the Federal Government, but which is to be exercised only when every other means have failed. And I say that, if to-day that power is not exercised, it is because, after trying every means and attempting a solution by every possible method, we found it impossible to induce the province of Manitoba to accede to what I consider and what I believe can be easily established, is the right of the minority. But, Sir, we are told by the press in some instances, and by hon. gentlemen opposite on some occasions, that we should not disturb the peace and harmony of that province for the sake of a very small minority, a minority much smaller, of course, to-day than it was when the province became a part and parcel of confederation, small because other elements have been introduced into that province, and the majority disturbed. Instead of there being a French majority, as was the case at that period, other elements having been brought in subsequent to the first settlers, we find to-day the argument used, that it is a very small minority in that country for which to bring about the disturbance and trouble prevailing at the present moment. But I hold, that the smaller the minority, the greater is the duty of this Parliament, the natural protector of minorities, the power that stands independent between every province and every element composing the province, to stand forward and protect the minority.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Mr. Speaker, I venture to express the opinion, that, unless minorities can be convinced that the constitution which prevails in Canada will be applied fairly, and will protect them in their rights, confederation does not meet the necessities which it was intended to supply. I venture the opinion, that it is incomplete, and that it may wreck the institutions under which we live. Sir, speaking, as I do, as a French-Canadian, proud of my origin and proud of my native province, I say I would stand up in the old province of Quebec and fight, if any attempt were made to interfere with the rights of the Protestant minority of that province. I would do so, because with me it is not a question of what religion the minority belongs to, but it is with me a constitutional duty that we owe to those minorities, which, when they surrendered at confederation their own autonomy to form part of a larger union, relied on the good faith of that British North America Act, which was expounded to us so eloquently yesterday by one of the fathers of confederation, the Secretary of State, the leader of the Government in this House. If the minority in Quebec were interfered with, I would stand up with the same energy for the defence of their rights as I stand up to-day to protect the minority in the province of Manitoba.

Viewing this question upon its merits, I desire to express the opinion, that I agree altogether with the majority of the province of Quebec, who think we cannot make too many concessions to our friends who are a minority there, not speaking the language we speak, not going to the same church as we attend; but I consider that in the province of Quebec the different sections of the people are willing, in fact, it has been a rule which obtained long before the law included it in the Confederation Act, that we should concede to the minority the rights we enjoy ourselves. We have done it; and what is the result? The result is, that, to-day, this question which might, and does in other sections of the country, divide men belonging to different nationalities and churches, the Protestants and Catholics of Quebec view in the same light, and have come to the same conclusion upon it, that protection for the minority in Manitoba is a right which interests the Protestant minority of Quebec to the same extent as it interests the minority in the province of Manitoba.

Sir, when confederation was carried out, when the Protestants of the province of Quebec stated what they wanted in that old province, a certain number of counties to be set aside to be represented by the minority, what was the answer of the majority? The majority never discussed for one moment whether it was asking too much on the part of the Protestants to make that demand, but the only question discussed by those who took part in the framing of that important measure, was this: We do not wish to refuse anything to the Protestant minority, but we should like them to represent those constituencies without our appearing to be forced to make the concession by law; their rights will be respected, they are perfectly safe in our hands, but our only objection is, that it may appear we made this concession by the compulsion of law, instead of doing it willingly, as we are prepared to do. But, Sir, it was not only in relation to these constituencies that this concession was made. Long previous to confederation, the Protestant minority in Quebec, in so far as education is concerned, enjoyed all the rights and privileges which the Catholic minority, by law, enjoyed in the province of Ontario. Not only that, but outside of any constitutional enactment, and outside of any legislative act, when the Protestant minority came to us, and stated that they were desirous that there should be set aside in the common jails of the country special apartments for the women belonging to their own religion, the concession was granted without a moment's hesitation. So it was with the asylums, and so it was with many other privileges given the Protestant minority, which we were not by any means bound to grant by legislative enactment, but which we were prepared to give of our own volition, so as to obtain that priceless boon which we enjoy in the province of Quebec, namely, peace, harmony, and good-will among all the people. I have already stated, Sir, that long before the constitution decreed that the Protestant minority of Quebec should have their own schools and enjoy the same privileges that had been conferred by law on the Catholic minority of Ontario, our fellow-Protestant fellow-subjects in Quebec never had for a moment to dread the least intervention on the part of the Catholics. And, Sir, I am glad to say that not only in the province of Quebec, but in other provinces, there are men belonging to the Protestant Church who view the matter from the same standpoint as we do. I believe that liberal and generous expressions of opinion cannot be too widely circulated when they come from men known to belong to a different church from the one for which they speak, and I shall therefore read to the House a letter addressed by Mr. Carnegie, an ex-M.P.P. of Ontario, to Sir Mackenzie Bowell. Mr. Carnegie says:

Dear Sir Mackenzie Bowell:

While, as I fancy you are aware, I entertain very strong views in opposition to separate schools, disapproved and still disapprove of the then Government's failure to disallow the Jesuit Bill, joined heartily in the equal rights movement, until it was virtually strangled by its leader, and still approve of the principles which it was formed to maintain, and above all, endorse with all my heart, Meredith's position on the school question ; yet, after reading the report leading up to, and the order just passed by the Governor General in Council with reference to the Manitoba school question, I think you will be glad to learn that I heartily approve of your course in this matter. Indeed, I do not see how you or your colleagues could have done otherwise. To my mind, it is not so far as you are concerned, a question of separate schools or no separate schools, but one of obedience or non-obedience to the Confederation Act. If we do not like its terms and conditions, as I do not in this respect, let us appeal to the enactors of it for the amendment we desire ; but do not let us override and defy its provisions. Wishing you a long lease of life, &c.

Your old and sincere friend,
(Sd.) JOHN CARNEGIE.

There is another letter, Mr. Speaker, addressed to Sir Donald A. Smith by the Rev. Mr. Campbell, of Montreal, which I shall take the liberty of reading to the House :

General Assembly, Presbyterian Church in Canada.

Dear Sir Donald A. Smith :

Will you allow me as a citizen to thank you for the very interesting and important historical statement which you gave to the public last week, in response to the requisition presented to you. What you divulge as to the negotiations with the people of the Red River settlement, prior to their acceptance of the terms accompanying their entrance into confederation, to my mind, ought to have much weight in contributing to a solution of the present vexed problem affecting Manitoba. I hope that due regard will be had to the noble sentiment of the 15th Psalm, as to changing not though one sweareth to his own hurt. The good faith of our Sovereign, and of the sovereignty of the people of Canada, whom you represented in the transaction, must be respected even though it entails inconvenient consequences to do so. What you suggest, even as to the limitations of the pledges given, may help to an equitable settlement of the present difficulty. At all events, in view of your statement in this connection, I hope our Protestant friends throughout the Dominion will try and view the matter calmly and consider how it would affect them, had the destinies of a new province been different from what they have proved to be and been in the hands of a large Roman Catholic majority which proceeded to alter the status accorded to the Protestants equally with the Catholics in your negotiations in 1870. As a citizen of this province, I feel that we of the minority are handsomely treated in educational matters by the majority, and I could wish that my co-religionists in the provinces in which they predominate should not be outdone in generosity by their French-Canadian fellow-citizens.

Ever yours faithfully,

(Sd.) ROBERT CAMPBELL.

To the Hon. Sir Donald A. Smith, K.C.M.G., M.P.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH. That letter was written to me last year.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That letter, Mr. Speaker, was written just a year ago, as Sir Donald Smith informs me. Now, Sir, these are considerations which I venture to say should have the greatest possible weight with a Parliament such as ours. This country is divided into two parties, and will be, and I for one believe that the form of government which we have here is the best possible one. But, let us not forget that if, for the sake of party advantage, any political party should divide the people by any question which can be avoided, the result would be detrimental in the extreme to the future, to the greatness, and to the development of Canada. Sir, the idea which permeated the whole of the Confederation Act, as I understand it, was protection to the minority, and the intention of the statesmen who took part in the building of that legislative monument was to give to every class of the population the fullest possible enjoyment of religious liberty.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

At confederation that was evidently what was intended to be done in Manitoba, as we may see by the words of the late lamented great leader of the Conservative party, Sir John A. Macdonald. When applied to by a member of the legislative assembly of that province to express his opinion as to the laws relating to education in 1889, when the new education law abolishing separate schools was before the legislative assembly, Sir John Macdonald wrote the following letter, which explains itself :

You ask me for advice as to the course you should take upon the vexed question of separate schools in your province. There is, it seems to me, but one course open to you. By the Manitoba Act, the provisions of the British North America Act, section 93, respecting laws passed for the protection of minorities in educational matters, are made applicable to Manitoba, and cannot be changed, whereby the Imperial Act confirming the establishment of the new provinces, 34 and 35 Victoria, chapter 8, section 6, it is provided that it shall not be competent for the Parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the Manitoba Act in so far as it relates to the province of Manitoba. Obviously, therefore, the separate school system in Manitoba is beyond the reach of the legislature or of the Dominion Parliament.

Although I fear to take up too much of the time of the House, still, I think it is important, in the discussion of a question like the present, to place before Parliament and before the country the views entertained by the leading public men of Canada. Those who remember or who have read in the political history of this country of the troublesome times which existed in Canada previous to confederation, know that the people of the provinces were divided on religious questions ; and it seems to me that we should by every possible means avoid going back to the same questions, and possibly causing a return of those old troubles which we thought had disappeared. Among some of the most distinguished statesmen and political leaders in this country, who afterwards educated public opinion upon these questions, Sir Oliver Mowat and the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie fought fiercely against separate schools for a time ; but after the fight had been fought, and the benefits of the new system had been realized by experience, those men were the last who would advocate going back to the system which obtained previous to confederation. It is right, I think, to recall to the memory of hon. gentlemen what took place in the legislature of Quebec before the union. The Protestants of Lower Canada had by practice, although not by law, the full control of their schools, and of every question affecting the education of their children in that province; and, although, as history proves, they never had to complain of the manner in which they were treated by the Catholics, yet, when confederation was carried, and when it became necessary to prepare the Confederation Act, the Protestants insisted upon their rights and privileges being protected by a clause in the Confederation Act. At that time it seemed useless to insert such a clause, because they had always enjoyed, undisturbed, the same rights as the Catholic minority enjoyed in the province of Ontario. Still, they insisted on a clause being inserted, and it was in London that Sir Alexander Galt had inserted in the Confederation Act the very clause which to-day gives the minority in the province of Quebec the right of appeal to the Privy Council. I have heard it questioned during this debate whether the rights of the minority in the province of Quebec could be interfered with as the rights of the minority in the province of Manitoba are interfered with at present, or whether it was not ultra vires of the legislature of Quebec to pass a law that would change the status now enjoyed by the Protestant minority in that province. I cannot see that there can be a doubt on that point. I cannot see that there can be a doubt that to-morrow the legislature of Quebec could pass a law appointing Catholic inspectors, for instance, or imposing on the minority a selection of school books which they might not find acceptable. I am supposing a case; but I am quite sure that it is a case that can never happen in the province of Quebec. But what would be the remedy of the minority? Their remedy would be, under that clause of the Confederation Act, to come to the Governor in Council and ask the Governor in Council to hear their appeal; and it would be for the Governor in Council, after hearing that appeal, to pass whatever remedial order the Governor in Council should deem necessary. Now, Sir, however old the history may be, it is of advantage to turn back its pages and see how far they may throw light upon questions of this kind. Some hundred years ago, when the Quebec Act was under discussion in the British Parliament, there were then in that old British Parliament, from which we draw our parliamentary precedents, men whose descendants still live in Canada, who wished to crush the new subjects of His Majesty the King. But there were other men who, casting a prophetic eye upon the future of the British Empire, considering the question, not from the standpoint of might, but from the standpoint of right, replied to those who were trying to crush the new subjects of His Majesty: We may have the might, but we have not got the right; and the Quebec Act was passed. It was passed just a year before the war of 1812, and I do not think it can be denied by anybody that if it had not been for the loyalty of the French Canadians of that period, the Crown of England would not be able to boast to-day of having the Dominion of Canada as a portion of its great Empire. It was through the loyalty of the French people—those people who have shown their loyalty on every occasion—that Canada was preserved to the Crown of England. And, Sir, it seems to me that when, at this moment, men whose work I approve of and admire, are banded together to strengthen the union and tighten the bonds which connect the different component parts of the British Empire, those men who take an interest in Imperial federation, might, I think, look back to that period of history which I have cited and reason, as did the men of that day: if we have the might, we have not the right, and shall therefore make the concessions to which the minority are entitled. You have the power, but you have not the right, and that is a point which I consider should not be forgotten when we are discussing this matter.

Coming to another branch of the subject, I want to show how the school question stands, and I must here apologize to the House for having to read a document which is rather long, and which I was at considerable labour to compile, in order to make my review of the question as concise as possible, for I wish it to go in "Hansard." In discussing this question I desire to put concisely and clearly before the House the reasons why I believe the Government is right in the course which it has followed. I start, first, with the motion moved by Mr. Blake, and seconded by the hon. leader of the Opposition. At that period, in 1890, Mr. Blake, one of the most eminent men who has ever occupied a seat in Parliament, seeing the school question loom in the distance and believing, as a true patriot, that it should be removed from the political arena moved the motion to which I have referred. He felt that this question would create trouble, and prevent the country from developing peaceably and quietly as it should, and he wanted to remove it from the political arena and leave it to the impartial decision of the tribunal of justice. Sir, by that motion, he proposed to refer to the high tribunals important questions of law or fact in matters of education, in order to ascertain whether the power of disallowance could be exercised by the executive. And, as this House knows, his proposal was carried unanimously. Now, as I view it, the policy of the Government with regard to the Manitoba school question, has been directly in accord with the ideas which led to the unanimous acceptance of Mr. Blake's motion by the House of Commons. We have taken the matter from court to court, we have desired by all possible means to avoid its coming before Parliament; and in the last resort we had the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. And it was only after we obtained that decision that we acted, as I intend to show by the record which I propose to submit to the House:

Manitoba was created a province by the Act of Canada, commonly known as the "Manitoba Act, 1870," (33 Vic. ch. 3). This Act was confirmed by a statute of the United Kingdom (34 Vic., chap. 28). The Manitoba Act provided that after a date named the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, shall, except those parts thereof which are in terms made or by reasonable intendment, may be held to be specially applicable to, or only to affect one or more, but not the whole of the provinces now composing the Dominion, and except so far as the same may be varied by this Act, to be applicable to the province of Manitoba, in the same way and to the like extent as they apply to the several provinces of Canada, and as if the province of Manitoba had been one of the provinces originally united by this Act.

Provisions are made by the 93rd section of the British North America Act, 1867, and the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act, 1870, for an appeal to the Governor General in Council from Acts of the legislative assembly affecting the rights and privileges aforesaid.

Section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, provides that "in and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject in accordance to the following provisions:—

1. That they shall not affect any rights or privileges with respect to denominational schools.

2. The privileges and rights granted Catholics in Upper Canada are granted to Protestants in Lower Canada.

3. An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of any provincial authority affecting the rights of any Protestant or Catholic minority in any province, where a system of separate schools exists at the union, or is thereafter established.

4. The Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws where the provincial authorities fail to do so.

In 1871 the Manitoba legislature, at its first session, passed "An Act to establish a system of education in this province."

By this Act, a board of education was formed, composed of one-half Catholics and one-half Protestants; also one superintendent of Protestant schools and one of Catholic schools, who were joint secretaries of the board. The duties of this board were:—1. To make regulations for the general organization of common schools. 2. To select books to be used in the schools. 3. With sanction of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to alter and sub-divide any school district established by Act. The general board is divided into two sections, and among the duties of each section are the following:—Control and management of discipline in school. To make rules for examination, grading and licensing of teachers and for withdrawal of licenses on sufficient cause. It shall prescribe books as have reference to religion and morals. Section 13 of the Act divides money appropriated by legislature between Catholics and Protestants. The said statute is amended from time to time, but the system prevailed until 1890. The only substantial amendment was in 1875, when the board was increased to 21, 12 Protestants and 9 Catholics, and the moneys voted were to be divided in proportion to the number of children of school age in the respective Protestant and Catholic districts. The denominational distinction between the Catholics and Protestants, and the independent working of the two sections became more and more pronounced under the different statutes afterwards passed. Section 27 of the Act of 1875, c. 27, allows the establishment of schools of one denomination in the school districts of another denomination. The same principle is carried out and somewhat extended by sections 39, 40 and 41 of the Act of 1876, c. 1. In 1877, by c. 12, s. 10, it was enacted that in "no case a Protestant ratepayer shall be obliged to pay for the Catholic school, and a Catholic taxpayer for the Protestant school. It is manifest from all this that until the Act of 1890, the school system created by the legislature of Manitoba under the provisions of the constitutional Act, was entirely based and carried on on denominational principles as divided between Protestant and Catholic schools. In 1890 Manitoba passed certain Acts, viz.:— chapters 37 and 38 of 53 Vic., entitled respectively "An Act respecting the Department of Education," and "An Act respecting Public Schools," which affected very injuriously certain rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in that province in relation to education acquired by them under various prior statutes of Manitoba, as well as rights and privileges possessed by them before the creation of Manitoba as one of the provinces of Canada. The first of these Acts, c. 37, abolished the Board of Education and the office of Superintendent of Education and creates a Department of Education, which is to consist of the executive council or a committee thereof, and also an advisory board composed of seven members, four appointed by Department of Education, two by teachers of province, and one by the university council.

Among the duties of advisory board is power to examine and authorize text books, &c., to determine qualifications of teachers, to appoint examiners, to prescribe the form of religious exercises to be used in schools.

The Public Schools Act, c. 38, repeals all former statutes relating to education. It also enacts as follows:—

By sections 3 all matters concerning school district appointments, agreements, contracts, assessments and rate bills are made subject to provisions of this Act.

Section 4 continues in office school trustees holding office when Act comes in force.

By section 5 all public schools are free, and in rural municipalities children between the ages of 5 and 16, and in cities, towns and villages between the ages of 6 and 16 shall have right to attend school.

By section 6 it is enacted that religious exercises shall be conducted according to regulations of advisory board, religious exercises just before closing hour. Children may be exempted from attending such exercises.

Section 7, religious exercises in public schools are entirely at the option of the school trustees for the different districts.

Section 8, the public schools shall be entirely non-sectarian, and no religious exercises shall be allowed therein, except as above provided.

This Act provides for the formation, alteration and union in rural and urban municipalities, election of school trustees, and for levying a rate on taxable property for school purposes.

Subsection 3 of section 108 is as follows:—

Any school not conducted according to all the provisions of this or any other Act in force for the time being, all the regulations of the Department of Education, or the advisory board, shall not be deemed a public school within the meaning of the law, and shall not participate in the legislative grant.

By section 143 teachers are prohibited from using unauthorized text books.

By section 179, in cases where before the coming into force of this Act, Catholic school districts have been established as in the next preceding section mentioned (that is, covering the same territory as any Protestant district), such Catholic school district shall, upon the coming into force of this Act, cease to exist and all the assets of such Catholic school districts shall belong to, and all the liability be paid by the public school district.

Under the provision of the British North America Act and the Manitoba Act, the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba appealed to the Governor General in Council. In November, 1890, proceedings were taken to test the validity of the provincial statutes.

The form which the proceedings assumed was an application by Dr. Barrett (a Catholic ratepayer) to quash a by-law of the city of Winnipeg passed under the authority of the statutes. This application was on the 24th of November, 1890, dismissed by Mr. Justice Killam. An appeal was taken to the full court, and on the 2nd February, 1891, was dismissed, the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Bain holding that the legislation was valid. Judge Dubuc, however, dissented.

A further appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of Canada, and on October 28th, 1891, the court (comprising five judges) unanimously held the Acts to be ultra vires.

A further appeal was taken to the Privy Council on 30th July, 1892, and judgment was given, reversing the decision of the Supreme Court and holding that the legislation was valid. A petition from the members of the Roman Catholic Church in Manitoba, dated in August, 1890, was presented to the Dominion Government, asking:

That it may be declared that such provincial law does prejudicially affect the rights and privileges with regard to denominational schools which Roman Catholics had by law or practice in the province at the time of the union.

This petition, as is well known, was dealt with by the Order in Council of 4th April, 1891, which stated that:

An appeal had been asserted, and the case is now before the Supreme Court of Canada, where it will in all probability be heard in the course of next month. If the appeal should be successful, these Acts will be annulled by judicial decision, and the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba will receive protection and redress.

That is in the terms of the Order in Council itself. Again, there was a petition from the Roman Catholic Church in Manitoba, dated 27th September, 1892, received by the Government, also asking redress. That petition was signed by the Archbishop, of the Roman Catholic Church of Manitoba, which stated:

Your petitioner believes that the time has now come for Your Excellency to consider the petitions which have been presented by and on behalf of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba for redress, under subsections 2 and 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, as it has become necessary that the federal power should be resorted to for the protection of the Roman Catholic minority.

The petition of 1892 asked:

That it may be declared that to Your Excellency the Governor General in Council, it seems requisite that the provisions of the statutes in force in the province of Manitoba prior to the passage of the said Acts, should be re-enacted in so far, at least, as may be necessary to secure to the Roman Catholics in the said province the right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support these schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes.

The petition was referred by Council to a sub-committee, which sat on the 26th November, 1892. The report of the sub-committee was submitted to Council, and incorporated in an Order in Council of 29th December, 1892, which fixed the 21st January, 1893, as the date for hearing the appeal. Of course, the history of that appeal is well known. Argument upon this appeal was heard on the 21st January, 1893. Manitoba refused to be represented at this argument, and, by Order in Council of 23rd February, 1893, the preparation of a case was advised. By Order in Council of 22nd February, 1893, it was advised that copies of a draft case be transmitted to Manitoba. By Order in Council of 8th July, 1893, it is ordered that the amended copy of the case be submitted to Manitoba. By Order in Council, 31st July, 1893, the case was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. I would like to draw the attention of the House to this, as I consider, important feature, namely, that all these Orders in Council and proceedings that were being taken by the Federal Government, step by step, and stage by stage, were communicated, in every instance, to the Manitoba government. By Order in Council, 15th August, 1893, it is decided to notify the Attorney General and Mr. Ewart, that the case will be submitted on 3rd October next. There is no drastic character in these proceedings. Whatever information the Federal Government possessed, it considered itself bound to communicate to the provincial government of Manitoba. The Supreme Court of Canada, by a majority of members, decided against the claims of the petitioners. The Catholic bishops and archbishops of Canada sent in a joint petition in May, 1894, asking that the Act of Manitoba, 57, chap. 2, be disallowed. That is the last petition that came before us. This is a very important Order in Council to which I wish again to draw the attention of the House. By Order in Council, 26th July, 1894, the said petition was referred to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. It seems to me that the friendly intention, at least, of the Federal Government is shown by the fact, that the Order in Council and the petition itself of the bishops and archbishops and Catholics of the province of Quebec were referred to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, with the request that he lay the same before his advisers and legislators. A further petition, signed by the Catholics throughout the province of Quebec, was presented late in 1894, asking for the interference of the Federal Government. An appeal was taken to the Privy Council in England, under the title of Gerald Brophy et al., appellants, and the Attorney General of Manitoba, asking if the appeal of the Roman Catholic minority is such an appeal as is admissible by subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act of 1867, or by subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act of 1870. Are the grounds set forth in the petitions and memorials such as may be the subject of appeal under the authority of the subsections above referred to, or either of them? Does the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in the cases of Barrett vs. the City of Winnipeg, and Logan vs. the City of Winnipeg, disposed of or concluded, the application for redress based on the contention that the rights of the Roman Catholic majority which accrued to them after the union, under the statutes of the province, have been interfered with by the statutes of 1890 complained of in the said petitions and memorials? Does subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act of 1867 apply to Manitoba? Has His Excellency the Governor General in Council power to make the declarations or remedial orders which are asked for in the said memorials and petitions, assuming the material facts to be as stated therein, or has His Excellency the Governor General in Council any other jurisdiction in the premises? In this case the judgment delivered on 29th January, 1895, was favourable to the minority. On the 4th, 5th and 6th of March, the appeal of the minority was argued before the Privy Council of Canada. On the 29th March, 1895, a remedial order was passed by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, and transmitted to Manitoba. On the 19th June, 1895, the Manitoba legislature refused to give effect to the remedial order, suggesting that a commission be named to inquire into the subject. On the 8th July, 1895, the leader of the House laid down the policy of the Government as being that of waiting until the month of January next to pass remedial legislation. This policy was adopted by the House on 11th July, 1895, by a vote of 82 to 116; and, as is well known, this session of Parliament was called for the purpose of considering remedial legislation. Now, Sir, if I have inflicted the reading of this long document upon the House, for which I apologize again, I have done so because I felt it was right to lay before the House and the country an exact statement of the statutes regulating this question, together with the different Orders in Council and a history of the proceedings adopted by the Federal Government in their negotiations with the government of Manitoba. I have done this in order to dispel any impression that might still exist, in the minds of hon. gentlemen, that the Government of Canada meant to adopt drastic measures, which, in their nature, could have produced, on the part of the government of Manitoba a feeling of dissatisfaction, or that it meant to injure in any way the feelings of the majority of that province. That would have been a fatal mistake, Mr. Speaker, and I think the record will show, when it is examined, that the proceedings adopted by the Federal Government were such that any such impression, if it exists, must be dispelled. This question has been before the country for a very long time. It is impossible, in the face of the facts, to state that the Government of Canada have been hasty in the measures which they have adopted in relation to this very important question. It has been before the people of Canada one way or the other since 1890. I was under the impression that it was but fair that everything should be attempted to prevent the autonomy of the province of Manitoba being interfered with by the exercise of the federal authority of a jurisdiction which is undoubtedly committed to it by the British North America Act. My statement, I can guarantee, is absolutely correct, it having been taken from official records which have been consulted and copied in very many instances, as can easily be seen by the document itself, and which have enabled me to submit what I consider to be an absolutely reliable historical account of the legislation upon this question, and also the measures adopted by the Federal Government to deal with it in relation to the government of Manitoba. I will now take up another branch of the subject.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, before recess I stated that I desired to address myself to another branch of the subject. I wish to put upon record the utterances of some of those who took the most prominent part in building up this confederation, and my object in doing so is to show that at that period of the history of the country those men were striving to build up from provinces, separated from each other as they were, which constituted this northern half of the American continent, a confederation, vast in its extent, whose aspirations would be greater than could be the aspirations of the various colonies belonging to England, and enjoying absolute separate government I wish to put upon record the utterances of men whose names have remained in the history of Canada a legacy to those who have followed them, and whose example I hope will be followed by those who now strive, as they strove, to increase the prosperity and power of Canada. One name, and the first on the list, is that of Hon. Mr. Holton. Although a very much younger man than Mr. Holton, I had the honour and privilege of counting him among my friends, and although we sat on different sides of the House, I have on more than one occasion, as a young man entering Parliament, enjoyed the advantage of his advice, and I say among those who helped to build up confederation no name is worthier of being remembered than that of Hon. Mr. Holton. Mr. Holton, as will be found in the debates of confederation, said at that time :

My object in doing that was to show what were the opinions of these men as to the rights of minorities, and also upon the educational question which at that period, as we know, was a most disturbing element.

Mr. Holton said :

It may not be appropriate by the House generally, especially by the members from Upper Canada, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Galt) knows well the importance of it.

Speaking on the question of education, he said :

And that the English Protestants of Lower Canada desire to know what is to be done in this matter of education before the final voice of the people of this country is pronounced upon the question of confederations.

Hon. John S. Macdonald said :

I want to know what they are going to do for the Catholic minority of Upper Canada.

Sir George Cartier, then Mr. Cartier, said :

A measure which would have for its effect to give strong central, or local government, which would at once secure and guard the person, the property, and the civil and religious rights, belonging to the population of each section.

Mr. Haultain, one of the strongest champions of the Protestant views of the period, said :

I heard decided objections to this scheme from certain sections of the Protestant minority of Lower Canada. They say it will place them at the mercy of the French-Canadians. I am compelled to say that there is no part of the scheme that I feel more doubt about than the effect it will have upon the educational and political interests of the Protestants of Lower Canada. I heard it said that it would affect in a fair and just manner the educational interests of the Protestant minority, but on the other hand I have heard gentlemen qualified say, although there has not been open hostility to the educational interests there has been a certain amount of obstruction.

Mr. George E. Cartier, replying to Mr. Webb (of Richmond and Wolfe), said :

As a Catholic and as a member of the Canadian Government, I now reiterate that when the measure for the settlement of the local government comes before the House for discussion, it will be such as to satisfy the Protestant minority of Lower Canada.

Hon. Mr. Belleau said :

The hon. member for Wellington (Hon. Mr. Sanborn) laid great stress on the danger which might be incurred by the Protestant minority in the local legislature of Lower Canada. He fears that they may not be sufficiently protected by the Catholic majority in respect of their religion, their schools and possibly their property. I heard that remark with pain ; but I can tell him, the Protestant minority of Lower Canada have nothing to fear from the Catholic majority of that province ; their religion is guaranteed by treaty, and their schools and their rights which may be connected with them, are to be settled by legislation to take place hereafter, and when that legislation is laid before the House, those members who so greatly tremble now for the rights of the Protestant minority, will have an opportunity of protecting that minority, they may then urge their reasons and insist that the Protestant shall not be placed in a position of the slightest danger.

Then, at that period of time, those who foresaw that there might be a possibility of disturbance or trouble in the local legislatures, pointed out the remedy which has been adopted by the present Government, as being the remedy that would apply for the protection of the minority :

But even granting that the Protestants were wronged by the local legislature of Lower Canada, could they not avail themselves of the protection of the federal legislature. And would not the Federal Government exercise strict surveillance over the action of the local legislatures in these matters. This would be protected by the vigilance of the Federal Government, which will never permit the minority of our portion of the confederation to be oppressed by the majority.

Now, Sir, these quotations which I have made show that the idea which permeated the minds of the men who banded together for the purpose of building up confederation, was that the minorities must be protected in so far as their religious interests were concerned, and that, if these interests were not sufficiently protected by the local legislatures, then their remedy would be to appeal before the Federal Parliament. I take great pleasure in quoting from the speech of Sir Richard Cartwright upon confederation. Of course, I need not say that this speech is remarkable for its elegance of diction, and for the views set forth.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I say so, and I think when I have read it, the hon. gentleman will agree with me.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. We agree with you now.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Sir Richard Cartwright made the following reference to the protection of minorities :—

All I hope is that in adjusting our new constitution, local and general, we shall not allow our minds to be warped by antiquated notions of the dangers which threaten liberty. * * * While it is true, that here as elsewhere, there are always dangers enough to retard our progress, I think that every true reformer, every real friend of liberty will agree with me in saying, that if we must erect safeguards they should be rather for the security of the individual than of the mass, and that our chiefest care must be to train the majority to respect the rights of the minority, to prevent the claims of the few from being trampled under foot by the caprice or passion of the many.

I think that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) at that period in his useful career, was absolutely correct, and I take pleasure in quoting the views he expressed then, as a strong indication that the views entertained by those who believe that minorities must be protected at all hazards, are the proper views to be entertained. I quote now from the Hon. George Brown, the leader of the Reform party, who, in 1865 described the situation as it was then. I quote from the confederation debates, page 85 :

WHY UNION TOOK PLACE.

Here is a people composed of two distinct races, speaking different languages, with religious and social and municipal and educational institutions totally different. With sectional hostilities of such a character as to render government for many years well nigh impossible, and yet, Sir, here we sit patiently and temperately discussing how these great evils and hostilities can be justly and amicably swept away for ever. We are endeavouring to adjust harmoniously greater difficulties than have plunged other countries into all the horrors of civil war.

Hon. George Brown goes on to express his views as to the rights of minorities protected in perpetuity. After quoting the proposal concerning the rights and privileges which the Protestant or Catholic minority in both Canadas possessed as to their denominational schools at the time when the union would go into operation, Mr. Brown said :

I admit that from my point of view this is a blot upon the scheme before the House. It is confessedly one of concessions from our side that have to be made, to secure this great measure of reform.

But it is urged that though this arrangement might perhaps be vain as regards Upper Canada, it is not so as regards Lower Canada, for there were matters of which the British population have long complained, and some amendments to the existing School Act were required to secure them equal justice. Well, when this point was raised, gentlemen of all parties in Lower Canada at once expressed themselves prepared to treat it in a frank and conciliatory manner with a view to removing any injustice that might be shown to exist.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Mr. T. C. Wallbridge—That destroys the power of the local legislatures to legislate upon the subject.

Hon. Mr. Brown—I would like to know how much power the hon. gentleman has now to legislate upon it? Let him introduce a Bill to-day to annul the compact of 1863 and repeal all the sectarian school Acts of Upper Canada, and how many votes would he get for it?.....What has rendered prominent public men in one section utterly unpopular in the other in past years? Has it not been our views on trade and commerce? No, Sir; it was our views as to the applying of public money to local purposes—the chartering of ecclesiastical institutions, the granting of money for sectarian purposes, the interference with our school system, &c. A most happy day will it be for Canada when this Bill goes into effect and all these subjects of discord are swept from the discussion of our legislature. But, Mr. Speaker, I am further in favour of this scheme as a remedial measure, because it brings to an end the doubt that has so long hung over our position, and gives a stability to our future, in the eyes of the world, that could not otherwise have been attained.

There is a great deal in what the Hon. Mr. Brown said at that time which might be applied to the situation to-day. He admitted that the local legislatures could not annul the privilege. Mr. Brown and the assembly thus declared that a concession was made and a great principle established—that the rights of the minorities could not be interfered with by the local legislatures. In fact, a national guarantee was given. Now, Sir, I have quoted enough to show the nature of the compact—how it was approached and how it was understood and explained by those who were the fathers of confederation. What has been the position since 1867? Harmony, peace and concord. Shall we reopen an old sore? Shall we go back to chronic discord and religious strife? What I have quoted, I think, indicates that, after the troublesome times of religious strife, which had nearly ruined the prospects of Canada, a spirit of toleration and conciliation spread over Canada, and over those who had at heart the interests of the country, and they were ready to sink their differences and unite together to guarantee to the minority the rights they possessed, and they have enjoyed those rights ever since. To-day we ask that the same rights shall be granted to the minority in the province of Manitoba. Recently, in looking over some old books, it was a curious coincidence at this particular moment, that I opened an old book called a "Digest of the Synod Minutes of the Presbyterian Church of Canada," prepared by the Rev. Mr. Kemp, of the Free Church, of Montreal, in which I read the following passage, which appears in the introduction, and which I quote to show how remarkably well the Catholics and Protestants got on together in the province of Quebec in almost every period of its history :—

About the year 1790, the Presbyterians of Montreal of all denominations, both British and American, organized themselves into a church, and in the following years secured the services of the Rev. John Young. At this time they met in the Recollet Roman Catholic Church, but in the year following they erected the edifice which is now known as St. Gabriel Street Church, the oldest Protestant Church in the province. In their early minutes we find them, in acknowledgment of the kindness of the Recollet Fathers, presenting them with one box of candles and one hog-head of Spanish wine.

That indicates the state of feeling that existed in 1790, and I hope that we shall not go back on our history and show less toleration to-day.

Now, Sir, I would like to pass to another branch of the question, that is, the respective attitudes of the two great parties towards this question. When the late-lamented Sir John Thompson was leading the Government, and when he had the conduct of this vexed question, he announced in Ontario, in Quebec, in the House, and wherever he had occasion to speak, that the policy of the Government was to stand by the decision of the tribunals; and, Sir, that is the policy which has been faithfully adhered to by the present Government and by the party supporting that Government. It will be within the recollection of every hon. member, that, when the Barrett case was decided against the minority, the minority submitted, because they knew that the policy of the Government was not to import this question into the political arena, but to keep it out of that arena, and to have it decided by the tribunals, where, it was considered, all such matters should be discussed and determined.

Now, Sir, as I wish to avoid wearying the House by reading the declarations of Ministers on this subject, made in Parliament, I ask permission to put in these declarations, which are all taken from the official records. If that is permissible, it will save a great deal of the time of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. Follow the rule.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Then I shall read the declaration of the hon. First Minister (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) to the Senate. He said:

In reply to the hon. leader of the Opposition I am prepared to state the decision at which the Government has arrived on the Manitoba school question. I desire to state that the Government has had under consideration the reply of the Manitoba legislature to the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895, and after careful deliberation has arrived at the following conclusion:—

Though there may be a difference of opinion as to the exact meaning of the reply in question, the Government believes that it may be interpreted as holding out some hope of an amicable settlement of the Manitoba school question on the basis of possible action by the Manitoba government and legislature, and the Dominion Government is most unwilling to take any action which can be interpreted as forestalling or precluding such a desirable consummation.

The Government has also considered the difficulties to be met with in preparing and perfecting legislation on so important and intricate a question during the last hours of the session.

The Government has, therefore, decided not to ask Parliament to deal with remedial legislation during the present session. A communication will be sent immediately to the Manitoba government on the subject with a view to ascertaining whether that government is disposed to make a settlement of the question which will be reasonably satisfactory to the minority of that province, without making it necessary to call into requisition the powers of the Dominion Parliament.

A session of the present Parliament will be called together to meet not later than the first Thursday of January next. If at that time the Manitoba government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievance of the minority, the Dominion Government will be prepared, at the next session of Parliament, to be called as above stated, to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council and the remedial order of the 21st of March, 1895.

This is clear and sufficiently distinct, indicating the policy of the Government upon this very important and intricate question. It must be for Parliament and people of the Dominion to say whether they approve of this policy or not.

The declaration of Mr. Foster is identical in language and is to be found in the "Hansard" of 8th July, 1895.

Now, on the 11th July, 1895, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) spoke as follows regarding the resignation of the Ministry:—

I am glad that my hon. friend shows such skill in reading political weather predictions, if I may so denominate them. I have but very few remarks to make in reply to the question which has been put by my hon. friend on previous occasions, and repeated to-day. Some differences arose between members of the Cabinet with reference to the question of remedial legislation. The statement which I made the other day to the House gave the position of the Government on that matter. The differences in the Cabinet arose chiefly on two lines. Some of our colleagues were of the opinion that it was useless, and consequently unnecessary, to prolong negotiation or to enter into further negotiations with the Manitoba government with a view to the settlement by that government of the question—by that government themselves with the powers that they have. The other question of difference arose consequentially from that. They believed that remedial legislation should be introduced at once, starting from the premise that there was nothing to be hoped for from the action of the Manitoba government and legislature itself. I need not reiterate the position of the Government. That was shown in the statement I made the other day in this House. Both these positions were taken in that statement. The one that we would yet grant to Manitoba a certain amount of time, in the hope that negotiations would be entered into and an amicable settlement of this question arrived at. The other was, that in so intricate and important a question, the greatest deliberation was necessary in the perfecting of legislation in the matter, and that no remedial legislation should be introduced this session. These differences of opinion were canvassed by the different members of the Government. I regret to say that one of our colleagues, who has not a seat in this House, finds it impossible to accede to the view of the majority of the Government. He still holds very firmly and strongly to his view that remedial legislation should be undertaken and pressed to a conclusion at once; and as he finds it impossible to accede to the view of the majority in that respect, his resignation has not only been sent in but accepted, and he is now no longer a member of this Government, I regret to say. With reference to our two colleagues from the province of Quebec, who have seats in this House, I must say that they showed a disposition to canvass and discuss and look thoroughly into the grounds of difference between their own views and the views of the majority of their colleagues, as expressed in the statement I made the other day to this House, and in the end these differences proved to be rather a misunderstanding as to details than a real divergence of opinion as regards the principles that were involved. At the most it was simply a question of disagreement as to detail. As to the question of principle that remedial legislation was necessary and that it would be introduced by this Government at the next session of Parliament, to be called before the 3rd of January, in the event of the province of Manitoba not making a reasonable and satisfactory settlement of the question—with reference to that matter, I say it was a matter of divergence upon details and not upon principles. On the principle all were agreed, all members of the Cabinet stood side by side with my two hon. friends upon my left, and my hon. friends have been enabled—and wisely and patriotically, I believe, acted in that line—to see that it was a misunderstanding or a disagreement simply upon details, and they have been able to come to the conclusion that in the statement which was made on Monday last by me, the remedial legislation was actually and positively promised, and that there is no intention at all of going one single jot outside that statement, and that our intention is to carry out in perfect good faith the statement of the Government on Monday last. Having come to that conclusion, my two hon. friends, the Postmaster General and the Minister of Public Works, have believed it to be their duty which they owe to their party, to their country, and to the cause which they themselves have deeply at heart, to work in harmony with their former and present colleagues, and that we should stand together and carry out the policy of the Government in this way.

I wish to refer to the declarations made by other members of the Government, when addressing public meetings in the various parts of Canada. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper said at Sydney:

I am a Protestant and firmly cling to my faith, but I desire justice, fair play, and constitutional treatment for all. We must abide by our parliamentary compact, and I am ready to sacrifice my political career, if that be the price for doing that justice to the Catholic minority which I would fight to obtain for the Protestant minority under similar circumstances.

Mr. Haggart, at Smith's Falls, stated also:

The question may be settled, as I think it will be, by the people of Manitoba, but the possibilities are that it may have to be settled by the Dominion Government. We will settle it, as the hon. Finance Minister said it is our duty to do, and as the law and constitution require us to do.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Our policy with regard to the question has been fairly and squarely stated by the Finance Minister. The policy of the Government as to that has been stated by him in the House of Commons, and on this question there has been no discussion in the Cabinet.

And Mr. Foster, at Smith's Falls, said:

I tell you plainly that on the broad principle of it, I am in favour of public schools. I am not in favour so much of separate schools, but I stand here, not as a private citizen, but as a member of this Government and as a public man, not free to carry my personal likes or dislikes into the settlement of a question which is lodged in the very kernel of the constitution which I am sworn to settle according to my belief as to how the constitution meant it. That is my position; look at it fairly and squarely.

I am sorry, from the fact that the rules of the House require it, that I have had to read in extenso, these declarations, as I wish them to appear in "Hansard." This is the position of the Conservative party; this is the position which has been taken and consistently followed by the Government and which has resulted in the present session being called for the purpose of carrying out the promise made that this question should be settled. But I wish to ask hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, and I wish to ask the people of the country, whether the attitude of hon. gentlemen sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker, has been equally consistent and whether it has not at different periods and in different places varied very considerably. I quote now from "Hansard" of 1893, page 1882, where Mr. Laurier is reported as follows:—

The question after all is a simple one. In 1890 the legislature of Manitoba passed a law which the Roman Catholic minority deemed oppressive; that minority appealed to the Government against that law; this prayer has to be denied or has to be granted; this is the simple issue.

At page 1982 of the "Hansard" of 1893, Mr. Laurier says:

The question is a difficult one—I admit that it is surrounded with difficulties—because it is surrounded with passions, passions religious and national.

And again at page 2004 of the "Hansard" of 1893:

I blame the Government even now for not having done sooner—

Just fancy, Mr. Speaker, in 1893, the hon. gentleman found that we were not moving fast enough, and to-day he is proposing that we should put off for six months longer the settlement of this vexed and irritating question:

—I blame them for those long delays * * * after procrastination, after long delays, shifting of expedients, subterfuge, at last the Government will have to pronounce a decision.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I like to hear my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) applaud—ing "subterfuges" and "procrastinations." He also has changed his ground upon this question upon more than one occasion. Again Mr. Laurier is reported as having said, in 1894 :

The longer this question is kept before the public the worse it is for the good of Canada.

But now it is to be kept for six months more before the public "for the good of Canada."

It is a question to which there should be an immediate and speedy answer.

I am quoting the words of the hon. leader of the Opposition, although from the speech you heard from him a few days ago you would not imagine the same gentleman was speaking, seeing that he expresses such different views in such an absolutely positive manner as he did yesterday. Again I quote from Mr. Laurier's speech in the House of Commons, as given in the "Hansard" of 1895, page 4502 :

Something must be done and done at once—
Done at once, you will observe, Mr. Speaker.

—because this policy of delay, this policy of vacillation is not only paralyzing, but it is fast disintegrating national life ; I say because it is arraying creed against creed, race against race, something must be done and done at once.

Well, if in 1895 it was arraying creed against creed and race against race, is it wise to continue such a state of affairs ? The proposition of the Government is to adopt a measure which, according to my judgment is a fair measure and one that is acceptable to the minority.

An hon. MEMBER. Not at all.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not presume that my statement settles the question between us, but I venture the statement that this Bill is satisfactory to the minority. In Toronto, on 5th February, 1895, Mr. Laurier said, as reported by the "Globe :

The question is a legal one that is before the Government to answer to-day.

In those times it was always "to-day" with the hon. gentleman ; to-morrow would be too late. In 1895 the question had to be settled immediately, as it was arraying race against race and creed against creed. But now the hon. gentleman thinks that this arraying of race against race and creed against creed should continue for six months longer :

I do not desire at the present time to say anything to make their position more difficult than it is. It is a difficult question.

The hon. gentleman always displays a great deal of kindness when he finds the Government in a difficulty :

For my part, I must tell you frankly that I see in the question but a question of fact. I never saw any question of law or interpretation of the constitution. I think it was a question of fact and nothing else.

Again :

This is not a political question at the present time * * * To-day it is purely a judicial question.

Well, we took that view of the matter, that it is a purely judicial question, and for that reason we followed the course that was pointed out to us by the Hon. Edward Blake and the leader of the Opposition in transferring the question to the tribunals which should decide it. Mr. Laurier, speaking at Morrisburg, 8th October, 1895, the "Globe" report again—it will be seen that there is a great change in the hon. gentleman's views—said :

The first thing they must do is to investigate this question. Let the Government do this and appoint a commission and I will support them.

What has become of the commission ? It is no longer spoken of. The policy of the leader of the Opposition to-day is simply to turn the Bill out of the House—no investigation, nothing but simply give the Bill the six months' hoist. Mr. Laurier at Prescott, 9th October, 1895, "Globe" report, said :

He asked his fellow-countrymen to divest themselves for the moment of party and religious differences, and appealed to them if they did not think that the better way of dealing with this question was by such an investigation upon the result of which the Government could act.

Here again we see the change that has taken place. Then there was a possibility of a commission ; to-day there is no possibility of anything at all. The hon. gentleman will not even admit the principle of the Bill, but as the leader of the Opposition, moves the six months' hoist. Mr. Laurier in the House of Commons on the 19th of April, 1895, said, as reported in "Hansard," page 38 :

The Order in Council is termed a decision. I do not understand that term exactly. As I read it, and I read it pretty carefully, it cannot be called a decision, it is simply an invitation—

That is not very drastic—simply an invitation.

—to the government of Manitoba to deal with that question, and to leave them to apply the remedy to the evil which had been created by their own legislation—an invitation, I say, though I am sorry to say, couched in most unfortunate language.

Mr. Laurier in the House of Commons on 15th July, 1895, said :

We had an order passed by the Government commanding the province of Manitoba to restore the schools of the minority, commanding it to do so under the threat that if it failed to obey this Parliament would force schools upon them.

I do not see, Mr. Speaker, how the remedial order can be looked upon in the light of a threat. The remedial order is based, upon the judgment of the Privy Council, and the phraseology used in that order is the phraseology which is proper for an Order in Council based upon a judgment.

The course taken by the Government was to prepare a drastic Order in Council calling upon the Manitoba government to restore the separate schools, or failing it, they would do it by the supreme authority of Parliament. Could a more imprudent course ever be taken?

Now, again, on page 38 of the "Hansard," the hon. leader of the Opposition says:

If there is such an outrageous state of things prevailing in Manitoba, not a moment is to be lost in coming to the rescue of the oppressed minority.

That was in 1893. The hon. gentleman said then there was not a moment to be lost in coming to the rescue of the oppressed in Manitoba, if they were placed in such a position as that. But since then he has changed his views completely, as I have shown by these quotations. At Morrisburg again the hon. gentleman says, quoting from the "Globe" report:

Those facts are clear to you, and to all who believe in a system of separate schools.

Again, in the same place:

The question cannot be settled until there has been such an investigation. * * * *
If I were in power, and if I had the responsibility, I would try the sunny way, I would approach this man Greenway with the sunny way of patriotism.

These are very charming expressions, but I am afraid that when the hon. gentleman came to put the sunny way into practice he would find that it would not go very far. I think it would be necessary to use other means, although the one suggested by the leader of the Opposition may be much more agreeable. Now, Sir, I quote the "Cultivateur," a paper published by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte).

An hon. MEMBER. A fine paper, too.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I know the proprietor is a very fine writer. I will read some quotations from that paper giving the writer's views of the hon. gentleman's speech at Chicoutimi:

Mr. Laurier reiterated amidst indescribable enthusiasm his solemn engagement to re-establish the Catholic schools on his arrival in power.

That will take more than six months, to which date he wishes to hoist this Bill. If the hon. gentleman is going to keep the minority waiting for ever, I am sure he is not treating that minority as I think they are entitled to be treated. Now, here is what the hon. gentleman said at Sorel, in August, 1895, according to the "Globe" report:

He knew those Conservative papers well. They would be delighted, it would seem, if he said a word about separate schools.

From that quotation it would appear that the hon. gentleman never uttered a word

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

at all about the school question. Still, I have been quoting extensively the different views which he expressed at various times and at various places:

In Quebec those pious Conservative newspapers were Catholics; in Ontario they were Protestants. In Quebec the saintly "Minerve," Sir Adolphe Caron, Mr. Ouimet and the Ultramontanes, were listening to him with clubs in their hands, ready to down him if he said a single word about the school question, and in Ontario, Mr. Clarke Wallace, Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the Tory and Orange papers, were watching him with another club ready to strike him if he dared to say a word on the same question.

Well, between those two clubs the hon. gentleman has been obliged, evidently, to make many different statements upon this question which is now before Parliament. In August, 1895, the hon. gentleman said at Sorel, according to the "Globe" report:

Now, he had expressed his views on the school question on many occasions and in many parts of the Dominion. He had said over and over again, that it was a question of fact, and that the Federal Government had a right to interfere, but it had never yet interfered. It had shuffled---

You can see, Mr. Speaker, when he was speaking in Sorel, where he was not threatened by the club of Clarke Wallace, he again complains of delay. He says:

It had shuffled and dallied with the question all along.

Then Mr. Paraud's paper, the "L'Electeur," interprets Mr. Laurier's speech made in the House of Commons in April, 1895, as follows:--

Mr. Laurier has pronounced himself boldly for the re-establishment of separate schools in Manitoba.

"Boldly," the word is very appropriate, considering the motion that has been presented to the House. There is a great deal of boldness in kicking out a Bill which is intended to settle the separate school question. But at Sorel, the hon. leader of the Opposition pronounced himself boldly for the re-establishment of separate schools in Manitoba, and vigorously reproached the Government for not having interfered more promptly. But how can he, at Sorel, attack the Government for not interfering more promptly, when he wants now to prevent the Government from interfering for six months longer? I do not see how the hon. gentleman can reconcile these contradictory statements. The Winnipeg "Tribune" interpreted the speech of the leader of the Opposition made in the House of Commons on April 19, 1895, as follows:--

Mr. Laurier's declaration in Parliament on Monday is that if called upon to deal with the vexed question, he will stand upon the broad principle of provincial rights---

Another new idea.

—and decline to interfere with the province, beyond making a request for the fairest treatment of the minority under the circumstances. We are sure Mr. Laurier does not believe in separate schools.

I am beginning to believe it myself, Mr. Speaker, from the conduct the hon. gentleman has followed in relation to this question.

He is too advanced and liberal a thinker to endorse them.

So that from his liberality, and his being a great thinker, the minority would never have a chance of seeing this vexed question settled by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. Now, Sir, I have heard it stated as an excuse why separate schools in Manitoba were objected to by some people, and even by some hon. gentlemen in this House, that education in the province of Quebec is not equal to education in other portions of the Dominion. Well, Sir, I think I can speak upon that question, coming from the province of Quebec. I think it is possible to show beyond a doubt from the history of that province that the system of education which has turned out some of the most eminent men in church and state, must be equal to the education which is to be found in other portions of the Dominion. But I will take, on this point, a witness that cannot be questioned, I will take the evidence of the daily "Sun," of St. John, N.B., whose editor visited the Columbian Exposition held in Chicago. The gentleman who wrote that article, I have been able to ascertain, is a man well versed in educational matters, and well able to judge whereof he speaks. He quotes page 33 of the report of the provincial secretary on the Columbian Exhibition, and this is what he says :

In drawing, writing, models for teaching the blind, education of deaf mutes, and in fact generally all that tends to the advancement of a country and a people in an educational point of view, Quebec schools are in the front rank.

I am satisfied with that evidence, given by one who is foreign to our province, and I place it against the statements made by hon. gentlemen belonging to that province who attack the educational institutions which we possess there.

I have one more branch of the subject to treat, and I will treat it briefly.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I can sympathize with the hon. gentleman ; I am quite certain I have been too long already, but I promise not to do it again. The leader of the Opposition the other day in one of his most eloquent and brilliant strains, made a speech which was certainly very interesting, interesting from the fact that it treated of various questions, and spoke a little of the school question. But I want in the most friendly way to criticise some of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman on that occasion. The hon. gentleman commenced his speech by appealing to Canadians in the name of the constitution and of the minority, not to go beyond this with the Bill before the House. The constitution and the interests of the minority constitute the very reasons which have impelled the Government to bring down this legislation. So upon that ground it is quite impossible for us to agree. But the hon. gentleman said we were compelled to bring down the measure. The Secretary of State, he said, "was brought back to Canada to force the Bill down the throats of Canadians." Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman is so anxious to have a hit at the Secretary of State that he and his friends hit wildly in place and out of place. The leader of the Opposition knows well that long before the Secretary of State came from England the policy of the Government on the school question had been definitely settled ; and it was because the hon. gentleman viewed that question in accordance with the settled policy, as enunciated by the leader of the Government and by the then leader of this House, that he accepted a seat in the Government whose fixed policy was to bring remedial legislation before Parliament and to stake its existence as a government on the settlement of that question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman, as he and hon. gentlemen opposite have acted in all debates in which they have taken part, gave a painful description, which no doubt will be circulated abroad, of the strife, trouble and dissension which exist in Canada. I am not aware of all this strife, trouble and dissension. The little trouble which exists at the present moment in Manitoba is exactly what we are trying to settle and remove from the national life of Canada, and we wish to remove it from the national life of Canada because we desire to bring out to our vast prairies and to the great province of British Columbia the surplus population of the old country. By what means can you induce the surplus population to come and settle in a country when it is divided by religious and sectional strife and dissension ? Let me say to the hon. gentleman that as a Canadian I feel that to call special attention to trouble, dissension and strife as existing, is hurtful to the interests of this Dominion, and I deeply regret it. But if it does exist, it may be due to the fact that the hon. gentleman and his friends have been preaching it so long that outside people have begun to believe it exists in Canada.

"In 1870, by the power vested in it," the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) said, "the Manitoba legislature abolished separate schools." As I understand the Barrett case, and I speak after having studied it, and I believe I understand it, it was decided by the court that the legislature of Manitoba had the right to pass a law changing their system of schools. In the Brophy case it was decided by the Privy Council that rights had been taken away from the minority, and that this minority had the right under the constitution to call upon the Federal Government to restore those rights, to appeal to the Governor General in Council to apply a remedy as regards the removal of those rights. The hon. gentleman said "in 1890,"—and he made quite a point of these words, and hon. gentlemen opposite evidently thought that it was a strong point, for they applauded very much—"four Acts came before the Government; one, to abolish the French language; two, respecting the quarantine of cattle; three, with respect to joint stock companies; four, the School Act." and, he continued, "of all those Bills the only one that was not vetoed by the Government was the School Act."

Mr. LANGELIER. There were two.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, there were two, the other being that to abolish the French language. Does the hon. gentleman not see any distinction between a cattle quarantine Bill and a Bill affecting the rights of the minority of Manitoba? Mr. Blake framed a resolution for the purpose of removing from the political arena a question that he supposed and we supposed was going to prove an irritating one to the people of Canada, and this resolution was unanimously adopted by this House. Does not the hon. leader of the Opposition see a difference between that resolution and a cattle quarantine Bill? The reason why the School Bill was not vetoed was because, acting upon the resolution proposed by Mr. Blake and adopted by this House unanimously as regards this question, we appealed to the legal tribunals instead of vetoing the Bill, and I think we were right in doing so. The hon. gentleman made another point about evidence not having been submitted, and he referred to affidavits which were published in the blue-books, and which were withdrawn when the argument was made before the Privy Council. Well, Sir, Mr. Ewart did not rest his case upon these affidavits. He rested his case upon the facts, as explained in the petitions of the minority. He rested his case upon the judgment of the Privy Council, and the reason why these affidavits were put in the blue-book after being withdrawn is simply because we thought the record would not be complete without them. We thought it was due to Parliament that we should show Parliament all the proceedings which had taken place before the committee of the Canadian Privy Council, sitting as a judicial tribunal, and these affidavits were published so as to make the record absolutely complete. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) wishes to investigate, first, if schools had been promised the Catholic minority; second, if the existing schools are against the conscience of the minority, and, third, if they are Protestant schools. Well, Sir, as to separat schools being promised, he has the statements of Mgr. Taché and of Sir Donald Smith upon that point. As to the existing schools being against the conscience of the people, it seems to me that the investigation would not need to be very long. What stronger evidence can there be that the present Manitoba schools are Protestant than is to be found in the fact that when it was proposed to secularize these schools, every clergyman belonging to the Protestant Church protested against religious teaching being abandoned in them. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) also made the statement that Sir Donald Smith had been sent to Manitoba by this Government. Sir, I wish to meet that statement simply by denial. Sir Donald Smith himself has already denied it. As a member of the Government, I can say, as far as my own personal knowledge goes, and as well as the knowledge I have been able to get from my colleagues, none of us knew he was going on any particular mission to Manitoba. I do not even know now that he was on such a mission, although, from his close connection with Manitoba and the North-west, it would not be surprising to me if the hon. gentleman (Sir Donald Smith) had frequent interviews with Mr. Greenway and others up there. I can understand, Sir, the proposal for a commission to investigate made by the leader of the Opposition some time ago, I could understand the proposition from the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) to have a committee of the House to investigate, because those two propositions admit the principle of the Bill; but when a gentleman of the vast parliamentary experience of the leader of the Opposition moves the six months' hoist, he cannot deny that it is the strongest possible negative that could be given to any measure. I wish to say one word, Mr. Speaker, about what, according to my view, was a painful reference made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) to what he called a threat of the church, or of a member of the church. Sir, if the threat was not more definite than the explanation of it given by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), I am sure it was not a very serious threat. But, Sir, it is not usual for members of the Catholic clergy to threaten anybody. The hon. gentleman himself admits that clergymen, as citizens, have a right to hold the strongest possible views on political and public matters. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) admits that members of the clergy can carry out these views to the extent of voting for or against principles which are contrary to theirs. Well, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) goes that far, he must agree that members of the clergy have a right to tell a person or a party: If you entertain such views, I cannot endorse them, and I am prepared to vote against them. That is the right of the clergy, and, Mr. Speaker, why should it not be? Are not the clergy of Canada a national clergy? Are not the clergy of Canada composed of the sons of the men and women of Canada? Have not our clergy the same training as those who have not adopted as perfect a life as they have chosen to select? And, Sir, under their monastic gowns, do not their hearts beat as warmly for Canada as do the hearts of the laymen? May I be permitted, Sir, to mention an instance? My only brother, a Redemptorist, is labouring in St. Thomas, West India Islands, among the blacks, and in July last I received a letter from him, in which he told me that he had just completed a new home for his co-workers in that island, and he wrote to me: If it is not too much trouble or too much expense, would you send out to me a Canadian flag, because on our holidays and on the days when we rejoice, I should like to see the flag of Canada floating above the home of the Redemptorist Fathers here. And, Sir, I have a sister who is a nun in Durban, Natal, and when she writes home she is as anxious to know about how Canada is getting on as she is anxious to know about the interests of her own family. Of such are the clergy of Canada and the religious orders of Canada, composed. Sir, we are proud of our clergy. We are proud to follow them. Read the history of Canada from beginning to end. Point out to me a critical period in the history of our country during which the clergymen of Canada did not lead the people, loyal always because they were led by the clergy, loyal to the country and loyal to the Crown. In 1812, when our people were under the sorest temptation to give up their allegiance to England, because of the promises held out by the Americans, what course did the clergy of Canada take? Even in that period of 1837, when the sentiments of the French race were more moved than at any other period, when some of our own people were fighting for constitutional rights, but ignored the constitutional way in which those rights should have been vindicated, what course did the clergy of Canada take? Did not we then see the archbishops and the bishops publishing mandaments all through the country telling the people that their duty was to remain true to the Crown, and to respect the constituted authority. Why should we not follow such a lead? Sir, I do not wish to be misunderstood, and I am not insinuating that the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, attacked the clergy; but carried away in the discussion, the hon. the leader of the Opposition said that he had been attacked by the clergy. My contention, Sir, is that it is not the habit of our clergy to threaten. I know not what the threat to which the hon. gentleman refers was? If he referred to the letters which have been published in the newspapers, I do not see how that could be construed into a threat. I speak here in the presence of men from the province of Ontario, whom I have known when I was engaged in campaigns under the leadership of the great old leader of the Conservative party, Sir John A. Macdonald, and under the leadership of that other great man whose loss we deplore, Sir John Thompson. I know that my fellow-countrymen from Ontario are fair-minded men, and I have always been treated by them as a brother and a friend. I know that these gentlemen cannot be led to believe that the French-Canadian Catholics or the French-Canadian clergy are not true and loyal to the Crown of England and to the flag of Canada. I can speak for them, because I have had every possible opportunity of studying their past history and the history of their present movements, and I am unable to find an instance in which it can be stated that the clergy of Canada have been disloyal. I ask again, where did the threat come from? It was painful to me to hear the hon. gentleman make the remark he did.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me apologize for having kept the House so long. But before I sit down, I must mention a piece of badinage which was communicated to me to-day. It was said that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was complaining sadly of the hon. leader of the Opposition. In sadness and grief, he said: The leader of the Opposition has taken everything away from me; he has taken my motion away, and now he is taking from me my position as the leader of the strong Protestant element of Ontario.

Mr. GEOFFRION. Mr. Speaker, after the conclusion of the speech of the hon. member (Sir Adolphe Caron) who has just preceded me, I will endeavour to be cool, because I realize the importance of the question now before the House, and I do not want to stir the passions of anybody. I will try to reason with hon. members on this question. I have been listening to strong arguments from the opposite side in favour of equal justice to minorities. Appeals have been made to the constitution in support of those arguments. I am just as anxious as hon. gentlemen opposite are that justice should be rendered and that our constitution should be respected. But I most emphatically say that this Bill, which I have now before me, does not render justice, and I am most decidedly in favour of voting the six months' hoist, because the acceptance of such a Bill would be a delusion and a denial of justice. It has the label of a Remedial Act, but I do not see the remedy. If there were not so many weak points in the Bill, if it were possible to amend it, I would hesitate to pronounce at once against it, and to vote against it, in toto. But it cannot be amended. I do not know who is the father of the Bill. I do not know whether it has several fathers, or only one. I do not know whether they have so framed the Bill on purpose or by accident, but they could not have made it worse. It is evidently not by accident, but intentionally, framed so that it may be no remedy. It is of no use to repeat that at last justice shall be rendered to the minority of Manitoba. As this Bill, if passed, will, in my opinion, exhaust the remedial legislation which is to be introduced pursuant to the order adopted by the Government, it will leave the Catholics of Manitoba in a worse position than they would occupy if this Bill did not pass.

Mr. McALISTER. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he objects to the principle of the Bill?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LISTER. There is no principle about it.

Mr. GEOFFRION. Mr. Speaker, you cannot have schools without money, you cannot have teachers without money; and not only does this Bill, in clause 74, deny a part of the grant to the separate schools which might be established under it, but under the whole organization of the Bill, it is almost impossible even to levy on the ratepayers the money necessary to support the Catholic schools. The clause authorizing any Catholic to exercise his option in favour of public schools is most dangerous. At first sight, it appears to be fair; but if you establish separate schools, there is no coercion in obliging Catholics to support the schools of their own creed. To allow some Catholics the privilege of not joining the separate schools is to remove from the minds of the Catholics the possibility of supporting them. Mr. Speaker, I will give an instance to show how the support of these schools is taken away by the Bill itself. I have to go into these details, because, as I say, I believe the Bill is no Remedial Act at all. A Catholic may declare that he intends to join the public school. It is clear that parties contributing to the public schools will be taxed a smaller amount than those who are not assisted by any public grant, and who, being a minority, have to support their separate schools. A Catholic will have the option of declaring that he intends to contribute towards the public schools, and, at the same time, he is entitled to send his children to the Catholic schools at the rate of 50 cents a month. We also find in the law that loans may be made and debentures issued, to build schools; and it is not even provided in the Bill that when a debt has been incurred for that purpose, the Catholic who shall exercise his option to join the public school shall be bound to contribute to the debt. Therefore, as soon as a thousand dollars have been spent to build a school, if any number of Catholic ratepayers—who might sometimes be the majority—should wish to avoid contributing to that debt in a certain district, they would exercise their option of giving notice that they wish to join the public school. In such a case, where will be the ratepayers to pay the debentures for building the Catholic school, or to support it? And after all that is done, a Catholic ratepayer may still exercise his option of sending his children to the Catholic school by paying 50 cents a month. Therefore, if the separate schools are deprived of public grants and of the support of the ratepayers, how could they possibly exist or be established in the province of Manitoba? And if that be so, you will admit the principle, that separate schools ought to be established, and deny to a certain extent their existence. Not quite a year ago, I was called upon, in another place than here, to express my opinion upon remedial legislation in Manitoba. I was then a candidate in the county of Verchères, and the remedial order had been passed about a month before that. In fact, I believe the election was intentionally postponed on account of the remedial order, so as to make it a test in Verchères. My late lamented brother had died in July previous, and it was only in the following April that the Government found it necessary to replace him, and, by a peculiar coincidence, the remedial order had been passed about a month previous. I stated at Verchères before the electors, as I state here, that my feelings are in favour of remedial legislation. Both as regards creed and race, my sympathies are with the minority of Manitoba; and I stated at Verchères, as I do here, that I am ever ready to support or contribute in the best way I can to the passing of any legislation that will remedy the grievances of the minority in Manitoba. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) was present at the time. I stated, in his presence, that I had no confidence in the present Government, and that I could not believe in the famous remedial order, then shown to me. I told the hon. Minister that, if he were ready to show me a law, if he could show me a measure drafted which would do justice to the province of Manitoba, I would at once declare—not that I would support the Government, because that I never will—but that I would support the measure. Then the hon. Minister held up the remedial order, and said: This is the law. It is not yet enacted, he said, but the Government is pledged, the honour of the Crown is pledged, and whatever law is to be passed will be according to that remedial order.

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. McCarthy will show that to-morrow.

Mr. GEOFFRION. Well, you showed the remedial order, and the people did not believe you, but they believed me. They voted for the man who promised that he would be in favour of remedial legislation, and I am still in favour of it; but, when I examine this Bill and seek in it the provisions of the remedial order, I find that the most important part of the remedial order is omitted. I find that the right to a proportion of the grant to the public schools is removed from this measure, although that right is one of the privileges recognized by the Privy Council, and is one of the privileges which was embraced in the remedial order. Now, this promise was made and was not kept, and I am here to vote against a Bill which is not carrying out the promise made on both sides in that county. I do not care to take up too much of the time of the House upon the details of the Bill, but I will at once say that this Bill is framed in such a way that, in the hands of an unwilling government, or an unwilling party charged to apply that law, it will be of no avail. The presumption, of course, is, that a government which passes its own laws will execute such laws fairly; but, when the laws are by way of a judgment, when the law is a condemnation of the parties by a court of higher jurisdiction, to do the thing which they are averse to doing, the adverse presumption is, that, instead of executing the law in good faith, they will only do what they are bound to do, and nothing else. And that is where lies the danger of a Remedial Act of this nature. I have heard the term "drastic measure" used. I am not in favour of a drastic measure; but, if this Parliament is to pass a remedial law, let it be stringent, let it be positive—do not leave any door open by which the party charged with its execution may evade the law. There is, I know, danger in such legislation. I know how bitter the feelings in Manitoba would be, if a law such as I understand ought to be passed, were to be enacted by this Parliament; and that is why I would be in favour of negotiations, that is why I think that negotiations, conciliation, if possible, ought to be first tried.

I have heard it stated somewhere, that a distinguished member of the opposite party has expressed his regret that more attempts were not made to have this law repealed or modified by the legislature of Manitoba itself. The first clause at once leaves to the Lieutenant Governor in Council of Manitoba the right to constitute the Board of Education. I need not say that, as this is a kind of order, a kind of judgment, which has to be passed against the province of Manitoba, the Manitoba government may at once entrust the execution and administration of this law to parties so unwilling and hostile that actually nothing will be done. The powers of that Board of Education are considerable. They are to select the books, organize school districts, make by-laws for the administration of the funds from whatever source the money may come, and you see at once that an unwilling board may actually make a dead letter of this law. They select the books, but even in that respect this law is, on its face, an insult to the very Board of Education which is to be entrusted with its administration.

That board is not considered qualified to make the selection of its own books. It is ordered by this law to use either the public school books of Manitoba or the books of the Ontario separate schools. Why this distinction? Why not leave to the Board of Education of Manitoba the same discretion which is left to the Board of Education of Ontario, or to the Board of Education that deals with our separate schools in Quebec, or to Boards of Education generally, in the selection of their own books?

It is something unbearable for a province to say: You shall copy another province; you shall go for your law, you shall go for your books to another province. We are told that a Board of Education created under such circumstances will act with the intention of carrying out the law. Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is impossible to expect the same. I have mentioned clause 74; I need not go over that any more; it is so clear that this ought to be altogether replaced and the old draft of the law, as I understand it to be, reinstated. Now, the Catholic minority of Manitoba is entitled to separate schools—I may call them also public schools, for they are public schools for the purposes of that population—but why deprive them of the right of their proportion of the public funds? Why not support them, if it is not the intention once again to let them fall to the ground so that in a few years there will be separate schools. Because, under these provisions, the public schools will ultimately become so much superior to the separate schools that all, or at least a great majority of the people will use their option in favour of the public schools and the separate schools will be empty. Also, we see how expensive these separate schools may be. By section 23 we find that five heads of families can obtain the establishment of a separate school. They will have to tax themselves at least $20 a month, and they will be subject to another tax of 25 per cent more, or $5 a month more. Then, under section 24, a supplementary levy may be made, so that five people having children may find themselves obliged to pay $30 or $40 a month to support their schools. And this while the Protestants in the neighbourhood, who do not have a separate school will pay only 50 cents a month.

Mr. OUIMET. While the hon. gentleman is looking over his notes, I would like to ask, with reference to these so-called inferior schools, if he has read Mr. Ewart's letter that during last winter there were forty-four Protestant children attending these "inferior" schools, though they are kept by people who pay their taxes to the public schools and then out of their private funds support schools of such a superior character that Protestant parents send their children to them?

Mr. GEOFFRION. The hon. gentleman may rest assured that I did not claim that the schools now existing in Manitoba were inferior, especially those to which reference is made by Mr. Ewart. What I claim is that the schools that will have to be maintained under this Act will necessarily become inferior. But while I say that, I do not wish to be understood as saying that Catholic schools are inferior to Protestant schools. Far from it. It was from the other side of the House that I heard an hon. gentleman yesterday making unfavourable comparison of the separate schools with the public schools. All I can say is that if you judge of the tree by its fruit, it must not be forgotten that the leader of the Opposition was educated in a Catholic school, and the hon. member who attacked these schools was educated. I suppose, in Protestant schools. An answer may be made to the objection that the Catholic schools will be deserted by reason of the right of option which is given to Catholics to join the public school. It may be said that the hierarchy will prohibit Catholics from joining public schools and will thus force them to join separate schools. Well, why not make it the law? Why be obliged to look to another power to force them to send their children to the separate schools? There is another point. A large amount of property in Manitoba, as in other provinces—but probably more in Manitoba than elsewhere in the Dominion—is held by non-residents. And do you believe that non-residents not sending their children to school there, will not at once make their option in favour of the public school so that they may be taxed less? Do you not believe that Catholics, after all, are like other people, and like to keep their money? Where a man has to make his option, having in view the fact that his children must attend the school he supports, he may have conscientious scruples; but there will be no conscientious scruples where they have no children to send to the schools. Whence will come the support of the schools so far as the non-resident landowners are concerned, if you give them the opportunity of exemption from the support of the separate schools? Again, as I have already stated, the power is given to the school commissioners or school trustees to borrow money. Now, if you read the separate school law of Ontario or Quebec you will find that when a party makes his option and supports the separate schools, his land shall remain liable for payment of the debt contracted. That is to say, if the school section issues debentures, payable in twenty years, and a landowner who was a supporter of the separate schools when the debentures were issued, decides to abandon the separate schools and to support the other, his property, nevertheless, remains charged with the debentures. I have read this Bill with much care, and I find that all the parties who make option and join the separate schools are liable only for the assessment for the current year. So that if in a district having twenty separate school supporters, debentures are issued and a school built, ten or fifteen of the people may afterwards become supporters of the public schools and leave the debentures to be paid by the ten or five who remain. Still further, here are schools that are not subsidized and probably will not be subsidized by the government. By virtue of what right, then, do you oblige these schools to receive outsiders at a rate less than the supporters of these schools have to pay?

Section 112 is rather a strange provision, also. I may be wrong, but I am satisfied that such an appeal is exhausted and rendered impossible by the law we are asked to pass to-day. I contend that by legislating now in connection with the schools of Manitoba, we remove for ever the right to legislate hereafter for those schools. I claim that this appeal can exist only when there is a grievance, and when a new appeal is taken a grievance may be found to exist. But how can we find a grievance if this imperfect law is strictly applied and executed? There will be no grievance if there is no violation of the law; and consequently, if the government of Manitoba refused to make any grants of public money to these separate schools, or if they appointed a Board of Education which would make by-laws or regulations under which these schools would be hardly available, it would not be any grievance; it would not be a grievance as long as they executed the law; and therefore this saving clause, according to my view, is calculated rather to deceive than to protect anybody's rights. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to deal at any greater length with the details of the Bill. I am satisfied that we are not in a position to legislate at present in this direction. It has been said, and I find it everywhere repeated, that such legislation as is here proposed should be based on facts. We have to investigate the facts; and as I said, it may be imprudent on my part, but I cannot blame those who desire to investigate before passing this legislation. As far as I am concerned, I would be ready to vote for a remedial law, but perhaps in doing so I would be yielding to my prejudices. Mr. Speaker, we have heard much about a strife of creeds and races. I am opposed to anything that will stir up such a strife; but you cannot abolish the bonds of creed and race; I say more, it is not desirable that those bonds should be abolished. I claim that you can build up a strong nation with different races. What is Great Britain after all but a combination of various races? Can you suppress the Scotchman? You may call him an Englishman as much as you like, but he will always call himself a Scotchman. And so with the Irishman.

An hon. MEMBER. And the Frenchman.

Mr. GEOFFRION. You cannot suppress a Frenchman, either. As I say, it is well that these bonds should exist. You can no more suppress the bonds of race than you can suppress the bonds of family. And when I now claim justice for the Catholics of Manitoba, I say I may perhaps be yielding to a prejudice, but I cannot blame those who desire to investigate further before passing this legislation. Now, a good deal was said by the hon. Postmaster General about the six months' hoist. Sir, I think that is the only thing you can do with this Bill. As I said before, it cannot be amended; in order to amend it you will have to make a new Bill; and considering that this Parliament can last but a few weeks longer, the best thing we can do with the Bill is to give it the six months' hoist. Sir, having decided to vote against this Bill, I repeat that I shall do so, not because I am opposed to remedial legislation. On the contrary, I stated last year, that I had no confidence in the promises that were made on behalf of the Government by one of the Ministers; but I have a strong faith that our leader will be able to succeed where the Government are sure to fail. I have full confidence in my party, and not only in the leader of my party, but in his lieutenants. I am a full private in my party. Unfortunately, I am not a young member, but I am a new member. For the statements I now make I desire to be held alone responsible, speaking only for myself. I am stating my own personal views. It may be, as I have seen it stated in the "Mail and Empire," that we do not come to the same conclusion by the same route. Sir, I have no reproach to make to those who are opposed to this Remedial Bill, or opposed to any of its features. I am willing to believe that they are acting in good faith. I respect their opinion, and I claim for myself the same respect in opposing this Bill. I do so because I conscientiously believe that it is legislation that ought not to be adopted by this House. I believe it would be a source of injustice, and it would remove for ever from this Parliament the power of coming to the help of the people of my creed and race in Manitoba. I oppose this Bill precisely because I feel that if we were to pass it to-day, it would put an end to all possible chance of re-establishing separate schools in Manitoba. I am satisfied, moreover, that this Bill will create animosity, and will stir up ill-feeling among the people of Manitoba. I oppose it because I see that it is likely to do more harm than good. Though it may be accepted by interested parties, and though some of the people of Manitoba may accept it, although we have no proof of that, nevertheless I must vote according to my own opinion; and if some people in Manitoba are willing to accept it, for my own part, I am willing to accept it. Mr. Speaker, this discussion has already been too long, but I did not wish to give my vote upon such a question without explaining why I am in favour of the motion for the six months' hoist.

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) concluded his speech by saying that his leader would be able to succeed better than hon. gentlemen opposite. I should like to know why. I should like to know how. Is there any connection between the leader of the hon. member and the leader of the Manitoba government? Is the Greenway government led by the leader of the Opposition here, or is it vice versa? Are we to hold responsible for the acts of Mr. Greenway the leader of the Opposition in the Dominion? I should like to know if the leader of the Opposition has got a strong hold on Mr. Greenway, and if he does not use it so as to put an immediate stop to that infernal conduct where property and consciences are stolen. I denounce him to the whole of the confederation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. AMYOT. Hon. members may laugh. They will have to laugh a little more later on, but they will also have to feel ashamed for Mr. Greenway's party, which they think they could lead if they were in power. The hon. member for Verchères has said that we can be a strong nation with diverse races. That is true, and that is the desire of this Government. I say that in order that there may be a strong nation with diverse races sacrifices have to be made of sentiments, and those who make them are the Protestants who are at the head of the Government, supported by their friends, and those who feel they cannot sacrifice their sentiments even to render the strictest justice are led by one who, we would think, should understand better a cause of justice. It will be the pride of the Conservative party, under these circumstances, as it has been so often in the past, to know that those who are above prejudice, above passion, above the animosities of race and creed, are within the ranks of the Conservative party and are to-day bringing all the strength of their party to render justice to a minority. Yes, we are able to form a strong nation with diverse races. That is true. That is the way England does with her colonies all over the world. She gives most ample liberty to the new peoples enrolled under her flag. You may study the history of England, that great colonizing power, and you will find that it is not by tyranny, it is not by imposing false and bad laws, that she progresses. No. She tells the people of all her new colonies, as if they were speaking to allies: Keep your laws, your language, your customs, and be a happy people; work out your destiny with England for the honour of humanity and for the glory of the British flag. I hope those great loyalists, who are proud as we are to-day of the British flag and the institutions of Britain will be with us in recognizing that it is not by tyranny that she creates and gives happiness to a nation; but that these loyalists will grant justice to a minority. It is very easy to utter loyal sentiments for the British flag; but do not forget that Her Majesty the Queen has signed that law which has promised liberty and justice to the minority of Manitoba. If hon. gentlemen have any respect for that Crown and for the Queen, and feel that great loyalty of which they speak, they will join with us in doing justice to the minority. The hon. member for Verchères says: I am in favour of the constitution, and I am in favour of a remedial law; but in spite of the constitution, I will vote against the remedial law. Why? We have heard some members say the Bill is bad because it is too stringent, too exacting, it takes Manitoba by the throat and forces the law upon that province. The hon. gentleman has said that he promised his electors to vote for a remedial law, but the law is not satisfactory. I believe he has had experience enough in parliamentary usage and practice to know that when we are in favour of the principle of a Bill we vote for the second reading, and we introduce amendments in committee to remove any faults we may find in the Bill. That is the sound constitutional position which he should have taken, and his reasoning that he will vote against the Bill because it is incomplete is equivalent to saying to a man: You are very hungry, here is a meal for you; but as it will not be sufficient, you shall have nothing at all. I will not follow the hon. gentleman in all the details he has given as to the law, because the time has not arrived for the discussion of those points.

What is the object and purpose of the Bill? There were three things in the remedial order. First, "the right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes, which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid." Does not the Bill contain all that? Does it not contain provisions for the appointment of officers, for a Board of Education with all the powers necessary to build, maintain and equip the schools of the Roman Catholic minority. The second is the right "to share proportionately in any grant of public funds for the purposes of education." The hon. gentleman says you should impose on Manitoba the obligation of paying the amount necessary. Suppose we put in the law this clause: It shall be the duty of the government of Manitoba to grant a proportionate amount to Catholic schools; and if Manitoba, led by the friend of the leader of the Opposition, said no, what power would we have? Can we pass legislation to force Mr. Greenway or the Manitoba government? Can we legislate in their stead? What power have we? The only thing we can do is to pass a declaratory law, and the Bill contains that declaration. It says that it is decided that such is the right of the minority. Mr. Speaker, when the government of Manitoba will be led by men who are friends of the minorities as well as of the majorities; when the government of Manitoba will be led by friends of justice; then the Manitoba government will find in the law such declaration, and will give justice to the minority. But, Sir, so long as the Manitoba government will be led by friends of the Liberal party in this House, unless we go there with an army, unless we go there with force, unless we go there as a nation equipped for war in order to obtain that justice, which the constitution says is due, I do not see any human way of forcing Manitoba to give us justice. We might, perhaps, say in this Bill that a certain amount, yearly, should be given to the separate schools out of the lands which the Federal Government own in that province. Well, Sir, it will be easy to pass such a law later on. It might be, perhaps, possible to insert such a clause even in this Bill, but that I do not discuss now. But, Sir, is that a reason to oppose the Bill? It might be a reason to propose an amendment, but it is no reason to oppose this measure. Then, the third part of the remedial order says:

The right of exception of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.

In that connection, Sir, the Bill before the House is complete. What will be the position when this remedial law is passed? If Mr. Greenway or his officers seek to take school taxes from the Catholic minority, then this law will be enforced. The minority will say: We will not pay, then there will be an execution, and the courts will decide. And, Sir, where is the court in the British Empire which will decide that this remedial law is not based upon the constitution, and binding upon all British subjects. I say, Sir, that this Bill gives all that it is possible to give, based upon that remedial order, and the remedial order is based upon the judgment of the Privy Council. In fact this law is based upon the one prepared by Mr. Ewart, who represents, legally, the minority in Manitoba. He, himself, had prepared his project mainly upon the laws abolished by the statute of 1890. And now, Mr. Speaker, we hear these gentlemen of the Opposition saying that they are not satisfied with this Bill because it is not complete. Let us see, Sir, what the interested parties, those of the minority who are living in Winnipeg say with regard to this Bill. I will not take the words of a Conservative, because they would not be convincing to my hon. friends of the Opposition. I will take the words of the most prominent French-Canadian Liberal member of the Manitoba legislature. I will take the words of a man whom none of these gentlemen of the Opposition would dare accuse of being led by false motives. I will take the words of a man whom they are bound to respect, one who has held their flag high in the Dominion, and more especially in the province of Manitoba since he has been residing in that province. We will see what that gentleman says of the present Bill. I take the Manitoba morning "Free Press." of February 27 of this year, and I find in it the resume of the speech made in the legislature by Mr. Prendergast. This is what he says :

Mr. Prendergast viewed with regret the curtailment of the powers of this House by the Remedial Bill. He had taken it for granted for years that this Government would never do anything to relieve the minority; he also took it for granted that the Remedial Bill would be carried. The law, the constitutional law, must be complied with, as expounded by the highest courts in the realm. He reviewed the steps which had led up to the remedial order. The Blake resolution had been passed mainly to afford an easy solution of the educational question. He cited the opinion of Sir John Thompson that the decision of the Privy Council should be followed by action. Mr. Laurier also held that whenever the constitutionality of an Act was proposed to the court for its decision, that decision should be binding and final. Mr. Prendergast denied that the remedial order was in any sense a mandate or a command; it was simply a notice given by Order in Council. He, for one, would not be in favour of returning to the Act which existed before 1890. The responsibility for the remedial order rested with the honourable gentlemen opposite; the proceedings at Ottawa had not been high-handed. He said this as a Reformer, a follower of Mr. Wilfred Laurier; he was not a follower of Sir Mackenzie Bowell. The remedial order called for the supplementing of the Act of 1890 by a provincial Act which would remove the grievances of the minority. Speaking of the relations of Catholics to the hierarchy, he said they were at least as free as the supporters of the Government were in relation to the Government. Under the circumstances, he considered the Remedial Bill, though clumsy in some respects, to be satisfactory; and if he were a member of the House of Commons he would support it. He thought that the Catholic schools might get along if necessary, without the Government grant; if they were given by remedial legislation the right to tax themselves, and relieved from the incubus of taxation for other schools.

Sir, the two powers which Mr. Prendergast asks for are given by the Bill. First, there is the power for the minority to tax themselves, and second there is the exemption of the minority from paying taxation for these schools which their conscience prevents them sending their children to. The Bill gives all that, and Mr. Prendergast, speaking in the name of the minority of Manitoba, he a Liberal, led in federal politics by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), says that when these two powers are given by the Federal Government, the Catholics in Manitoba may be able to maintain their schools. It is under such circumstances that the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) and his friends say to the minority in Manitoba: We will refuse you a law that gives you power to tax yourselves, and that exempts you from paying taxes for the support of schools which your conscience does not allow you to use. That is the position taken by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Geoffrion), who has been elected to this House to support remedial legislation. Mr. Prendergast continues to say:

If he were in the Commons, he would insist upon the Catholic schools receiving a share of the money to the credit of the land grant. He believed that four years hence it would be seen that separate schools still existed, but under worse circumstances than before. He agreed with the amendment that it was the duty of this legislature to remedy the grievances; he regretted the necessity for the Federal Government to pass remedial legislation; but it was an act of justice, a duty thrown upon their shoulders.

These, Sir, are the words of Mr. Prendergast. But I hear some gentlemen say: Oh, they are such a small minority in Manitoba. Mr. Speaker, it is true that the Catholics are a small minority in Manitoba. But, Sir, the Conservative party of Manitoba, which, in Manitoba, as everywhere else, is the upholder of liberty, is not in a very small minority in that province. If you take the returns of the last election for the Manitoba legislature, you find that out of a total of 25,507 votes, giving thirty-two government supporters, the government supporters have received 11,178 votes, whereas the Conservative candidates received 10,719 votes, the Patrons 2,680 votes, and the Independents received 930 votes. But add to that, Mr. Speaker, the zig-zags of the map of the Manitoba constituencies as gerrymandered by Mr. Greenway; add to that the manipulation of the voters' lists; add to that the fact that some polls were placed at a distance of 100 miles from the homes of the voters, and you will see, Sir, that the Conservative party is not in a very small minority in the province of Manitoba. You will see, also, Sir, when party passion is over, when the present Bill will be the law of the land, when it will be understood and interpreted, when the sentiment of justice which exists in the heart of every Canadian is awakened, you will see then, Sir, that the Conservative party will be in power in Manitoba. Then the Conservative party will get back the majority in Manitoba, and you will have a friendly administration at the head of affairs there. Then this law will be the safety of the minority, will bring back peace to the Dominion, and will allow us to work harmoniously together for the development and the welfare of the country. That is what this law is likely to do; and when I hear a man of the intelligence and experience of the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), who was elected specially to support this law, saying that he refuses it because it is incomplete, I say, you refuse the only law, perhaps, that will ever be presented in favour of the minority; you want us to lose the only chance that will ever be given to the minority to obtain justice; and you shut the door upon the future peace, harmony and happiness of this country. That is what you do by refusing to accept this law. Mr. Speaker, it is rather extraordinary to see the diversity of opinion amongst those who are opposed to this measure. There is one reason why we should accept it as soon as possible, it is this: The minority have been suffering for five years, and they cannot go on much longer as they are now, having to sustain their schools for the education of their children besides paying for the common schools. I hold in my hand a printed circular signed by D. Guillet, O.M.I., parish priest of St. Mary's church, Winnipeg, appealing to the whole Dominion for assistance for private schools. I will not take up the time of the House by reading it; but I say that, as a matter of justice, we cannot delay any longer. We should immediately render that justice that has been asked so strenuously during the last five years. I will not follow the hon. member for Verchères in the discussion of the details of the Bill; it would be wasting my time, and the time of the House, to do so. But there is a point which I think it is important to elucidate. We have been told repeatedly on the hustings, in the press, and in this House, that we should have an inquiry. I ask myself, why have an inquiry? For which part of the law do we want an inquiry? I would like some of the hon. gentlemen of the left to tell us. Do we want an inquiry to know that a board of education is necessary, or that it has been abolished by the law of 1890? Do we want an inquiry to know that superintendents are necessary, that it is necessary to form school districts, to have trustees, school assessments, and so on? Which part of the law requires an inquiry? Do we not know that in 1871 a law was passed organizing separate schools? Do we not know that it was amended? Do we not know that it was codified in 1881? Do we not know that in 1890 it was abolished, and that we have to re-enact those provisions of the law permitting separate schools? We want an inquiry, says the leader of the Opposition, but we have had inquiries already; we have had law-suits in which all the parties were represented. The facts have been admitted. If you take the proceedings before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which are before this House, you will find that Lord Macnaghten, at page six, gives a résumé of the facts. He says:

It is agreed that there was no law or regulation or ordinance with respect to education in force at the time.

Further on, he says:

The practice which prevailed in Manitoba before the union is also a matter on which all parties are agreed.

Mr. AMYOT.

And he quotes the statements of Archbishop Taché, which he says have been accepted as accurate and complete. During the argument by the lawyers, we find, at page 14, that Sir Horace Davey, speaking for the city of Winnipeg, says:

The different churches and denominations, the Roman Catholic Church and the Episcopal Church of England and the Presbyterian Church, maintained their own schools where they had sufficient congregations for the purpose.

At page 22, Sir Horace Davey again says:

Then, my lords, it is said that the public schools are in competition with the denominational schools. Of course they are and intended to be.

At page 51 he again says:

Happily there is no dispute as to the facts, as to the state of affairs with reference to education, existing at the time of the union, and upon which the claim to possess certain rights and privileges is based.

Then, we have the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who was arguing before that tribunal; and I find this, at page 79:

Lord Watson—Was the school of 1891 in any sense a denominational school also?

Mr. McCarthy—It was a separate school—not only denominational but separate.

Lord Morris—That is a fortiori.

Mr. McCarthy—Yes, I say so.

Lord Morris—It was controlled by a Roman Catholic body, and the atmosphere and surroundings of the education were Roman Catholic.

Mr. McCarthy—Yes, it was a Roman Catholic separate school.

Lord Morris—You could not make it stronger than that.

Mr. McCarthy—No.

Again, I find at page 87:

Lord Watson—I think that you may assume, as I think all the judges below have assumed, that prior to 1870 it was the inseparable and universal practice in the district which is now called Manitoba, that each denomination provided and supported its own schools without any obligation to contribute anything towards the support of any other denominational schools.

Lord Shand—And not only is that so in the judges' opinions, but I think it is universally accepted. Both parties are now agreed about it, as I understand. I do not think there is any difference about it.

You see, Mr. Speaker, there was no difference between the parties before the courts as to the facts; they all agreed. They accepted the statements of Monseigneur Taché and of the different parties before the courts as being the truth. All the matters of fact have been admitted repeatedly before the courts, in both Canada and England. It was merely a question of law and jurisdiction, and when all the facts have been admitted, when they have all been stated in the newspapers, when they have been before the public for five years, we are told: Let us investigate. But did Manitoba in 1890, or 1891, or 1892, or 1893, or 1894, even think of asking an inquiry? Why should we have an inquiry? Is it to ascertain the circumstances under which the law was passed? We do not want any inquiry to learn that, because it is all a matter of history. We have only to look at the public documents, and we find all the circumstances related in them. I have no objection to substantiate what I say by a few quotations. I need not refer to the conditions of the entry of Manitoba into confederation, because that has been stated over and over again, but I shall refer to the words spoken by Mr. Davies, the Premier of Manitoba in 1876, when the consent of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba was sought for in order to abolish the legislative council. Mr. Davies then said:

It may be said that the council is a safeguard to the minority. He assured the minority that their rights would never be trampled upon in this province. There would always be sufficient English-speaking members in the House who would insist on giving their French fellow-subjects their rights, to protect them.

Now, I would ask any man of honour, be he ultra loyal to the British flag or not, whether those words spoken by an Englishman were only meant to betray, to deceive and to despoil. I shall quote the words of Mr. Luxton:

There were some questions of sentiment which lay close to the hearts of the French people, and he could assure them that the English-speaking members would not ruthlessly deal with these, if the French representatives were sufficiently patriotic to support the measure before the House. They would recognize their generosity and not forget it.

Mr. McKay said:

He was very much pleased to hear the generous and just remarks of the hon. Premier, the hon. Secretary, and also of the hon. member for Rockwood, who gave the minority in the House that confidence which the members of this House, and by their votes on this Bill would express, the security they felt in the hands of that majority.

These are the circumstances under which the Catholic minority of Manitoba gave up that safe-guard, the legislative council. Were these promises intended to deceive? I am sure that nobody would dare to make that accusation against the hon. gentlemen I have just quoted. Yet in 1888, what do we find? I shall leave a prominent member of the Liberal party at that time to state what occurred. In a speech delivered by Mr. Jas. Fisher, M.P.P., in the Manitoba legislature, may be found the following:—

I make the grave charge, that this school legislation was put upon the statute-book of this province in defiance of the most solemn pledges of the Liberal party.

And how is that substantiated? By the affidavits of parties who swore that the Hon. Mr. Greenway obtained power in Manitoba on promising to the minority the main-ance of their privileges. Mr. Greenway stated that he had talked the matter over with his friends and that he was quite willing to guarantee, under his government, the maintenance of the then existing condition of matters with regard first to separate Catholic schools; second, to the official use of the French language; and third, to the French electoral division. And the next day the same language was repeated elsewhere by Mr. Norquay. But what do we find? A few months afterwards, when the Catholics had given up their safe-guard, when they had elected a Liberal member, when they had given a majority to Mr. Greenway, we find that, in spite of the promise made by the Queen, by the British Government and by the Federal Government, in spite of the promises made by the Manitoba House of Assembly, in spite of the promises made by the Liberal members in the parish of St. François Xavier—in spite of the most solemn promises, we find them passing that law of 1890, which was then interpreted by a man called Joseph Martin, who, I think, is one of our colleagues in this House, in the following letter, addressed to Mr. C. J. Brown:—

Protestant Schools, Manitoba, Superintendent's Office,
Winnipeg, 10th April, 1890.

C. J. Brown, Esq., City Clerk,
Winnipeg.

Sir,—As there has been some discussion as to the relations between the school boards at present existing in the city of Winnipeg and the city council, and the effect of the change to be made in the law on the 1st of May in these relations, I beg to advise you as follows:—The two boards should make estimates and forward them to the council in the ordinary manner. They should each go on in their ordinary way until the 1st of May, on the 1st of May the Catholic School Board will cease to exist and, the Protestant School Board will become the Public School Board of the city. The members of the present Protestant School Board will continue in office as Public School Trustees for the remainder of their respective terms. After the 1st of May all moneys due to the Catholic School Board on the levy of 1890 will belong and be payable to the Public School Board.

The Act is being printed as rapidly as possible, and will shortly be distributed.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sd.) JOSEPH MARTIN,
Supt. of Education, per E.A.B.

Certified true copy,
C. J. BROWN,
City Clerk.

City Clerk's Office,
Winnipeg, January 20, 1896.

So that after power had been obtained through these promises, after the candidate in St. François Xavier had given his word, and after Mr. Greenway had given his word that the separate schools would not be disturbed, that the French language would be maintained, the first thing Mr. Greenway did was to take away the schools, and say to the Catholics: Now we will impose upon you schools directed by a Protestant school board, and you will have to pay for them, and you will receive no grant for your own schools. This is the greatest act of betrayal and deceit that was ever perpetrated to the dishonour of a nation; and I pity the party which says: If our chief were there, he would have influence enough over Mr. Greenway to obtain a better settlement. It is just as if some one were to say to you: Do not go into that forest with such a leader, because it is full of brigands who are his enemies; but if you will follow my leader, he is a friend of those bandits, and will protect you.

Those reasons I have given are supplementary reasons why the Act which we propose should receive the sanction of this House. I do not give them as the most important reasons. The real, the essential reason why we should pass this Bill is this: We are bound to pass it by the constitution. We are bound to comply with the decision of the highest tribunal of the Empire; and we must pass this Bill besides so as to restore peace and harmony. How does the hon. member for North York (Mr. McLean), who is a loyalist, hope that in case of difficulty with some other country, we, the forty-one hundredth of the population, would willingly fight alongside of him, if all the time he had been taking us by the throat and preventing us from educating our children as we please, depriving us of liberty of conscience and preventing the exercise of our free will in this country? How does he hope to form a strong confederation, if he goes on that way? I address him, because he is at the head of a newspaper. That newspaper has not the excuse of being an opponent of the Government. That newspaper pretends to be a friend of the Government and to be Conservative. And yet, when he sees his party trying to do justice, trying to restore harmony, he does his best, through his journal, to create public opinion against this act of justice, and then he turns to us and says: Well, you see, public opinion is against you. But he is a man of honour, of heart, of sound disposition of mind, and I hope that he will soon understand that he cannot go on long that way. We, of the province of Quebec, have been faithful to the party for over thirty years. Why? Because Sir John Macdonald and the great chiefs of the party have been faithful to us. Political sympathy must be mutual. If this involves a sacrifice of sentiment for the hon. gentleman, he must not ask us, for the sake of that sentiment, to sacrifice our conscience. For us this is not a sentiment; it is above that. For us this is a matter of conscience, which must come before party politics, before party interest, before everything; for God and conscience are inseparably related. Let him respect our conscience, and it will be easier to work politically with him, and he will continue to have good allies in the province of Quebec. As to the "Globe"—well, we know what party passion is, and we never expected anything good from that quarter.

It has been said that this Bill involves coercion. I do not know of any statute that does not involve coercion of some kind. You pass a law to say that, if a debtor does not pay you, you may seize his property: that is coercion. You pass a law to force your neighbour to build a fence between his property and yours: that is coercion. The municipal law is coercion from beginning to end. I defy any man to quote me a public statute that does not involve coercion. The laws of God are coercive and the laws of man are coercive also. But what is the coercion in this case? The constitution says that the minority shall have the right to separate schools. But the government of Manitoba refuses to recognize those rights and deprives the people of these separate schools. The constitution directs us to give them back. Well, we will give back the schools. There is no coercion in that. It is illegally coercive in the minority of Manitoba to force the people to send their children to schools which they cannot allow their children to attend, in accord with their consciences. That is the real coercion. We do not force Protestants to send their children to the schools, but we give to the Catholics the opportunity of having schools of their own in which to educate their children according to their own religion and their own conscience. There is no coercion in that. We say there is no coercion against the government of Manitoba. Why, what kind of men must they be? How must we approach these magnates who have in their control the goods and the consciences of the Catholics? Must we approach them kneeling, as petitioners approach the Grand Turk? Must we approach them with kid gloves? I suppose they are not wild beasts, that we must approach them with a gun. We have sent them repeated Orders in Council, among them that of the 26th July, 1894, the best diplomatic document that ever was penned. We have sent them prayer after prayer. But in vain. It is not because we do not approach them with white gloves, that they refuse: it is because they are determined not to grant what we ask. It is because they pretend that they have the right to deprive the Catholic minority of their schools. Mr. Speaker, I will not take more of your time, but I conclude by saying this: It will be a matter of never-failing pride for the Government, that, in spite of so many difficulties, they have taken the case of the minority in hand, and I hope that all lovers of their country, all lovers of fair-play will join in this measure of justice to the minority of Manitoba. And I hope that, when this discussion is over and the Bill is passed, it will be easy for us to go on working in harmony for the prosperity and development of our country.

Mr. LAVERGNE. Mr. Speaker, before giving my own views of this question, I wish to answer some of the remarks made by my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). The hon. gentleman has posed as a great defender of an oppressed minority. He said he was very much surprised to see men of the same religion and the same race as the minority rising in this House to oppose remedial legislation. I might say that I take somewhat the same view as to coercing a small and new province and removing from that province the right of making its own laws, especially laws which are within its power. I come here as a defender of the Manitoba minority, and I would be ready to accept a larger task—I would be ready to defend any minority, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant. My hon. friend, in support of his argument, has quoted the utterances of a member of the Manitoba legislature, and has said that we ought to be satisfied with this law, when a man like Mr. Prendergast, an eminent Liberal, has stated that he is satisfied with it. I believe that I can establish conclusively, that we are not very far from Mr. Prendergast's position. If my hon. friend has read the motion which was made in the legislature of Manitoba in amendment to the motion proposed by Mr. Sifton, he will see that what Mr. Prendergast wants is conciliation, and an amicable settlement, such as we desire ourselves. For the information of my hon. friend, I will read the motion made by Mr. Fisher, a Liberal, which was supported by Mr. Prendergast, and of which the last two clauses were as follows :

And, whereas, it would be in the highest degree unfortunate if, by means of the Parliament of Canada assuming to exercise its undoubted power in the premises, this province should lose, possibly for all time, its exclusive control over the educational legislation of the province, and there is now most imminent danger of this happening.

Therefore, this House is of the opinion that the present situation calls for prudent and conciliatory action in the hope that such result may, by wise counsels, be avoided, and to this end that the time is opportune for a calm and dispassionate review by the legislature of the matters at issue between the majority and minority, with a view to considering whether a reasonable settlement of the question may not be found which will avoid all excuse for federal interference.

Sir, that is exactly our policy. We want to arrive at an amicable settlement ; to use Mr. Fisher's words, we want a reasonable settlement of this question, and I believe that Mr. Prendergast is entirely in sympathy with us. Now, my hon. friend, in criticising the views expressed by my hon. friend from Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) in opposition to clause 74 of this Bill, admitted that probably the Manitoba minority would not be allowed to share in the grants of public money voted for education. But, said he, we cannot do any better, we would have to go there with an army in order to enforce our views. Then soon afterwards the hon. gentleman speaking of the gerrymander, and giving the figures of the majority of the Liberal party in Manitoba, said that in a few years the Conservatives will be in power there, and they will fix up this matter. Well, my hon. friend has forgotten one thing. Let me tell him for his information that the Conservatives of Manitoba are opposed to remedial legislation quite as strongly as the Liberals. They even say that they wish to go one better, and they stated on the public platform that they were afraid that Greenway would compromise the matter with the leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons. I think my hon. friend should not venture to make such statements until he knows all the facts. The hon. gentleman says he does not like the gerrymander. He says that Mr. Greenway would have no majority at all in the provincial legislature were it not for a gerrymander in that province. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman changing his views. If there has been a gerrymander there—a statement which I think requires investigation like many others—I would say that, unfortunately, they had followed the bad example given in this Parliament by the Conservative friends of the hon. member. Now, hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who have taken part in this debate, have told us that this is a very serious matter to deal with. I must say that I entirely agree with them. It is probably the most solemn occasion and the most important question that this House has ever confronted. I fully appreciate the responsibility which rests upon us at this time. Now, Sir, in order to put my views before you, it may be necessary to repeat some things which have been already said, and said, perhaps, better than I can say them. However, to lay the foundation of an argument which I intend to make, I must present a very brief review of the judicial history of this case. Before the admission into the union of the Territories which now form the province of Manitoba, there was no system of schools in those territories recognized by law. There was a system of voluntary schools, the Roman Catholic schools being supported by grants made by that church, and by the parents of the children attending these schools ; and the schools of other denominations being supported in the same way. In 1870 the province of Manitoba was admitted into confederation, and an Act was passed that same year by the Federal Parliament which received the sanction of the Imperial Parliament, which Act contained certain provisions in relation to schools. The compact which was made between the other provinces at the time of confederation, was, I believe, accepted by the province of Manitoba, and it was expected that this compact would cover a solemn engagement on the part of the majority of admitting and keeping separate schools without their supporters being obliged later on to pay for the support of other schools. This compact was embodied in one of the sections of the Manitoba Act, section 22, and subsection thereof. I may say at once that that clause seems to have been wiped out by the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I believe it was the intention of the parties to this compact that by this clause Roman Catholics would be entitled to their own schools without being obliged to support the schools of any other denomination. The legislation concerning education in the rest of the Dominion, was also embodied in the Manitoba Act. Section 2 of the Act reads as follows :—

On, from and after the said day on which the order of the Queen in Council shall take effect, as aforesaid, the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, shall, except those parts thereof which are in terms made, or by reasonable intendment, may be held to be specially applicable to, or only to affect one or more, but not the whole of the provinces now composing the Dominion, and except so far as the same may be varied by this Act, be applicable to the province of Manitoba, in the same way, and to the like extent as they apply to the several provinces of Canada, and as if the province of Manitoba had been one of the provinces originally united by the said Act.

By virtue of this clause, it was considered that the same disposition which existed in the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario would have existed, also, in the province of Manitoba. Other dispositions, which I will not read now, but to which I may have occasion to refer later on, were made to complete the system. This system worked satisfactorily for all the people until 1890. The population was very materially altered as to origin, creed and race, in that year. No doubt, at the time of the union of the province with the Dominion, it was considered that the French population would at least maintain its relative proportion. Later on, in 1890, they have become almost a small minority. These two Acts, which it is proposed to remedy, were passed, namely, an Act to establish a Department of Education and an Act called the Public School Act. This public school Act, no doubt, repealed the separate school system which had existed in the province. I wish to say that the tests which have been made since 1890 as regards the validity of this Act were of a very satisfactory nature to the province of Manitoba during five years. The first test was by means of a writ to quash the by-law making certain assessments and levying rates for the support of public schools. A Roman Catholic, Mr. Barrett, caused this writ to be issued. A few weeks afterwards it was decided by one of the judges of the province that the assessment was legal. It had been attacked under section 22, the first subsection of which reads :

Mr. LAVERGNE.

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have, by law or practice, in the province at the union.

It had been contended by Mr. Barrett that the law was not constitutional, that it was not within the power of the province of Manitoba. The first victory was for the province. An appeal was taken to the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba. Judgment was rendered there in February, 1891. Until then, the Federal Government, which it is now admitted has a right to interfere on certain occasions, had not done anything. The Manitoba people, evidently, were quite satisfied that they would carry the day. However, an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court. There the province was defeated. It was declared that the law was ultra vires of the powers of the legislature. The subject came next before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the highest tribunal in the Empire. There the judgment of the Supreme Court was reversed, giving a victory to the government of Manitoba. That judgment was rendered in July, 1892. At that time, nothing had been done by this Government in the way of interference. I may say, however, that more than a year before an appeal had been taken under the "Manitoba Act," section 22, subsection 2, and the provisions of the British North America Act were also invoked in that appeal. Before the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was given, the Privy Council of Canada decided to leave the matter in abeyance. It was considered that if the law were declared to be ultra vires, it would be the end of the matter. After the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was given, the appeal taken by the Roman Catholic minority, represented by the ecclesiastical authorities and leading citizens, was pressed and a decision was asked from the Government. Then it was decided to take other means of settling the question. It was resolved to take advantage of a certain statute allowing such questions to be referred to the Supreme Court, and a certain number of questions were referred for the opinion of that tribunal. On February 20th, 1894, the Supreme Court rendered a judgment. The Supreme Court declared that there was no appeal, and that Parliament had no right to interfere with that legislation of the province of Manitoba. Therefore, for four years, from the month of May, 1890, up to the month of February, 1894, the claims of the province of Manitoba had been supported by all the courts of the land. It had been maintained that they had the right to pass these laws, and that the Government or the Parliament of Canada had no right to interfere in any way whatever. The consequence of this was, that during these four years the system of public schools was very solidly established in that province. The consequence was that the people were very well satisfied with the system. The consequence was that the action of the legislature of Manitoba in 1890 was supported at the general elections of 1891. The consequence was, again, that that system of public schools having worked to the satisfaction of the great majority of the people of that province, in the year 1895 new general elections were held, and Mr. Greenway, who fought the battle mainly on that ground, was endorsed by the people, and came back to office with a larger majority than before. Now, Sir, I have said that the judgment of the Supreme Court was given on the 20th February, 1894. An appeal was taken from that judgment, and the case was argued before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and a judgment was rendered on the 29th January, 1895, which, I think, was sanctioned by Her Majesty about the 22nd of February. Then, Sir, until the 22nd of February, 1895, the law which had been in force in Manitoba, was the law approved by the tribunals of the province of Manitoba, was the law approved by the Supreme Court of Canada, was the law approved by the majority of the people, and, until that last judgment, it was the law which had been so far approved by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which had refused to interfere in the first case. It is no wonder that we find some resistance. It is no wonder that, after such encouragement by the tribunals and by the opinion of the people, which endorsed that policy of the government in two general elections—it is no wonder, I say, that the province of Manitoba hesitates to part with that legislation. Let me ask, Sir: How long after the decision of the Privy Council did the Government of Canada interfere? It was just one month after. And what means of conciliation were tried? What was done with the object of obtaining a settlement of that question, in order to preserve peace and harmony between the people who form this confederation, and who are of different religions, of different creeds, and of different races? I say, Sir, that the means taken by this Government to obtain a settlement was not only a drastic piece of legislation, but it has been almost an outrageous one. Have this Government ever shown that they were willing to interfere? I say not. What they have always shown was that they wished to have nothing to do with the matter, and that they wanted to wash their hands of it. I say that this Government have encouraged resistance on the part of Manitoba, and have encouraged the people of Manitoba in trying to keep that legislation. That school law has taken deep roots in Manitoba, and it has been appreciated by the majority of the people. It is considered as a very great injustice on the minority, and it is considered that it has been enacted in a spirit of domination and a spirit of selfishness. I say, Sir, that the circumstances which have followed this legislation, have justified, so far, the people of Manitoba in trying to maintain it. As to every detail of that Manitoba school law and as to its justice, I say that this Federal Government never had any policy. This Government never would express any opinion on it. Every time an appeal came before the Privy Council of Canada, they tried to put it off, or they left it in abeyance to have a decision in one case or another case, and they referred it from one court to another. They admit to-day, that they are very sorry that they have to deal with that law. Sir, I believe that there never was a desire on the part of the Government, that there should be a settlement of this question. I believe that the majority of the Cabinet were opposed to interference. We know what quarrelling there was amongst them, and we know what difficulty there was about their keeping their promise. We are sneered at in some quarters, when we speak of an investigation. Well, Sir, I believe that an investigation is the only mode of settling that question. There is no agreement as to the facts of the case. We have before us the words of the bishops, we have the words before us of eminent ecclesiastical authorities; we have before us the words of the lords of the Privy Council, but they do not agree upon the facts. I will point out one of these facts—I do not claim that it is very material for the issue that is before the House—in order to show how desirable investigation is, to arrive at a settlement, not by force, but by conviction. I for one am quite ready to take the word of his Grace Mgr. Taché when he says that the public schools established in 1890 are Protestant schools. However, Sir, that statement, I may say, at once, is not admitted by the lords of the Privy Council. I suppose the hon. members of this House have some respect for the opinions of those gentlemen, and I believe it is my duty to read what they state on that point. This is what their lordships have said:

They cannot assent to the view which seems to be indicated by one of the members of the Supreme Court, that public schools under the Act of 1890 are in reality Protestant schools. The legislature has declared in so many words that public schools shall be entirely unsectarian, and that principle is carried out throughout the Act.

Now, Sir, this is a fact of some importance. His Grace Mgr. Taché says that these schools are Protestant schools. The lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council say that they cannot agree to that. It is no wonder that we do not all agree as to the facts. I say I am quite ready to take the word of Mgr. Taché; but when it is contradicted by a Protestant bishop and by other Protestant ecclesiastical authorities, can I ask my Protestant friends to reject the opinion of their own clergymen, and say to them: "The one man you have to listen to and believe is not your own bishop or your own ecclesiastical authority, not the lords of the Privy Council, but Mgr. Taché." Sir, I believe this shows that we do not agree as to the facts, and that an investigation would go a great length to persuade and convince the people of what should be done—to convince them, I sincerely hope, that there are grievances to be remedied.

Now, Sir, as I stated some time ago, the first subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act has been almost wiped out by the first judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But I believe their lordships said that they did not know the circumstances of that case. They were not bound to know them, and they could only give to the words of the subsection their ordinary meaning. They could not extend their meaning to include the possible intention of the contracting parties, or of the legislators, and those words did not mean anything else than that the minority might be bound to support public schools, that did not prevent them having their own private schools. This is a point which I believe would be of great importance to inquire about, and would help in showing the justice of the claims of the minority.

Now, Sir, to what extent are we going to go to provide a remedy? What legislation are we asked to pass, and on what ground? It has been a fine question whether we should consider this matter from a judicial or a political point of view. It seems to be admitted, and I have no doubt that it is the right view, that this is for Parliament simply a political question—that we are not bound to interfere unless we find that it is just to do so; that we should not sit as a tribunal, because this is a political question. But I can go further. Whether it is a political or a judicial question, suppose we sit as judges, do we not require to be informed as to the facts? Even if we were judges, all the more should we require to be acquainted with all the facts.

Now, Sir, I would like to know what are the material differences in the working of the existing schools and the working of the schools which existed before the legislation of 1890. From the information which I can gather from documents, which I believe have come from a proper source, I find that this objectionable law has been accepted in thirty-seven Catholic school districts. I do not know what proportion that is of the whole. I do not claim this to be an argument against a remedial law, but I claim that it is an argument in favour of investigating this matter. How does that system work? If those schools are Protestant schools, if they are an outrage being imposed on the Catholic people, how is it that thirty-seven Catholic school districts have accepted them? My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amytot) has gone pretty far in his denunciations of Mr. Greenway. In fact, he has compared him to a bandit, and he has said that we are associating with bandits. He did not pay much of a compliment to his Conservative friends who are associating with us in Manitoba and in the other provinces. What information have we concerning the working of these schools? Officious people, good people, have distributed some pamphlets from which we gather some information, but we have information from some other sources also. It has been said that Mr. Greenway is very tyrannical to Roman Catholics. But what do I hear? I hear that in most of those districts where the public school system is in existence, the Roman Catholic religion is taught, the catechism is taught, and prayers are said after school hours. What more do I hear? An inspector of those schools went privately to one of the Ministers and told him: Why they are teaching the Roman Catholic religion in the schools. What was the answer of the Attorney General, who is the Minister of Education in the province of Manitoba? He asked this inspector whether that took place after the ordinary hours of the school, and the inspector replied that it did. Well, then, said the Minister, it is none of your business; we are not going to interfere; we are in favour of public schools, but we do not object to Catholic parents having their children instructed in the Catholic religion so long as that instruction does not interfere with our school system. I cite that as an example of tolerance, and I say that we should hesitate before removing from the legislature of Manitoba a power which has been declared intra vires of that province. I should dread the consequences. I should be afraid, that if we did not use all possible means of conciliation, retaliation might be used against the French Canadians who are in the minority. I am certainly in favour of remedial legislation; but where I differ is with regard to the methods to be adopted and the procedure to be adopted. I desire the removal of these grievances, but I desire also a proper investigation into the facts before we act. We have the admission of the Canadian Cabinet that these facts were not proved. They admit this in their reference to the Supreme Court. In the fifth question of that reference, they say:

Has His Excellency the Governor General in Council power to make the declaration or remedial orders which are asked for in the said memorials and petitions, assuming the material facts to be as stated therein, or has His Excellency the Governor General in Council any other jurisdiction in the premises?

"Assuming the material facts to be as stated therein." Who drafted that question? Was it not the Cabinet of Canada? Then what new evidence has since been brought in? None whatever. What do we know? What have we got to remedy? We know that one statute has been repealed and another passed, and that is about all we know. All the facts we can get do show that the system of public schools has been carried on in a spirit of conciliation and tolerance. Was any hope of conciliation held out by Manitoba? Why, three months after that remedial order was passed in March last, the Manitoba legislature was sitting, and what did they offer? I quote from the resolutions which were moved in the legislature of Manitoba by Mr. Sifton. I cannot lay my hands just now on the first statement in those resolutions, but it was in the exact terms of the one which was repeated a few days ago. I will simply read a very short extract from those resolutions:

We believe that when the remedial order was made, there was not then available to Your Excellency in Council full and accurate information as to the working of our separate schools. We also believe there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of the changes in that order. Being impressed with this view, we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late to make a full and complete investigation of the whole subject. Should such a course be adopted, we shall cheerfully assist in offering more complete information available. An investigation of such a kind would offer a substantial basis of facts upon which conclusions could be formed with a reasonable degree of certainty.

Now, on the hustings, and in the previous session, some offers were made, better offers were made perhaps. It was offered to supplement the law, it was offered to make such legislation as would cause these grievances to disappear. I shall not delay the House by looking for these quotations, but nobody will deny that it was distinctly offered to give a remedy. It was asked to show what was wanting, and they declared that they were ready for it. Now, is only the legislature of Manitoba ready for conciliation? What does His Grace Mgr. Langevin say? He is reported to have said, and the report has not been contradicted:

If I were to go into details, I would be misunderstood, but this I will say that once the people see what we really want, they will really be surprised to see how reasonable we are and will be amazed to see how reasonably and harmoniously the system will work, and will ask themselves why was this not got before? We never asked for the old law, and we have no intention of interfering with the present school system.

Taking these words contained in the resolutions presented by Mr. Sifton to the legislature of Manitoba, which were carried by a large majority, and taking the words of Mgr. Langevin, I say this is the proper time for conciliation and investigation. What was the plain duty of the Government after the judgment rendered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council? Or, take it a little later on, after the first session of the legislature of Manitoba, in June, when they suggested that an investigation should be made, what was the duty of the Government? Their duty was to accept this as the olive branch held out to them, and to come to a settlement after an investigation. Why, Sir, we know what human nature is. Had there been no other reason than self-pride, was it to be expected that Mr. Greenway, having the system of schools well settled in the province, being encouraged by the way the Federal Government dealt with the system, and the system having struck deep roots in the social life of the province, was it to be expected, I say, that he would get down on his knees immediately? And how long was he given after the judgment of the Privy Council had been sanctioned by Her Majesty? I believe it was less than one month. I believe that the judgment was sanctioned by Her Majesty on the 22nd February, and on the 21st March that remedial order was issued.

Now, Sir, I wish to say one word as to the finality of the law. It has been said, and I myself would say, is it not a very dangerous matter, in view of this question of finality to saddle that province, to saddle that minority with a law which will be ineffective? What opinions have we upon that question? We have the opinion of the very gentlemen who form the Government of the day. I quote from the remedial order:

The committee, without necessarily adopting this view, observe that section 22 of the Manitoba Act may admit of that construction. The committee, therefore, recommend that the provincial legislature be requested to consider whether its action upon the decision of Your Excellency in Council should be permitted to be such as, while refusing to redress a grievance which the highest court in the Empire has declared to exist, may compel Parliament to give the relief of which under the constitution the provincial legislature is the proper and primary source, thereby according to this view, permanently divesting itself in a very large measure of its authority and so establishing in the province an educational system, which no matter what changes may take place in the circumstances of the county or the views of the people, cannot be altered or repealed by any legislative body in Canada.

We may say that it is at least open to question. We have had here to-night the opinion of one of our own colleagues, which, I may fairly say, is a high legal opinion, the opinion of a recognized authority in law, and a man of great experience. Although not on the same side of the House as the gentlemen who expressed this opinion in the report of the Privy Council, he concurs in that opinion, and declares that the law will be final.

Now, it is said that we wish to delay the question. I join issue on that point. The question has been delayed by the Government for five years. And now, when we are coming to the end of a Parliament, and nearing the close of the last session of that Parliament, at a time when we have hardly sufficient time to examine that Bill properly it is proposed to saddle it upon the province with all its defects, with the result, according to high authorities on both sides of the House that it cannot be altered in future. Sir, I believe that if this Bill passes it will not be a settlement of the question, but only the beginning of the quarrel. It is a common saying among lawyers that a poor arrangement is better than a good law-suit. We believe that with the methods we on this side propose to employ, we shall reach, not a poor arrangement, but a good arrangement, and that we shall not avoid a good law-suit, but a bad law-suit.

Now, Sir, I say it would have been better to have disallowed that law. It was within the power of the Government to do so, and it would have been according to the methods and usages of the party then and now governing the country. I admit that, in principle, we on this side do not favour their views with regard to disallowing the Acts of provincial legislatures. But I say that rather than impose this legislation upon the province, it would have been better to disallow the provincial law. If this Bill can be made efficient, it will simply have the effect of re-enacting the old provincial law. If I am right in that contention, would it not have been far better simply to have disallowed the statute of 1890, and thus have given full force to the laws which existed before it was passed. We are going to do what is, in effect, the same thing—for if this proposed law can be made operative it will be about the same thing. Is this the remedial order? Is this the judgment of the Privy Council? I say, no. The judgment of the Privy Council did not go so far; even the remedial order did not go so far. The law, if it can be perfected, will go that far, if so, then why not have disallowed the school law in the first place, and thus have settled the question?

Now, Sir, we have heard many high-sounding phrases about loyalty and respect for our institutions, and so on. I do not think that the appeals made by my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) will convert his friends from East York (Mr. Maclean), and North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Now, the hon. Postmaster General has told us that we should not speak with disrespect of the system of education in the province of Quebec, and I admit that. But there is one point to which I wish to call the attention of the House, and this is another reason for investigation. Was there any justification for Mr. Greenway and the legislature of Manitoba, in interfering with the system of education which existed in that province prior to 1890? Now, we must remember that the people who migrated from the province of Quebec to settle in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, were accompanied by some of their ecclesiastics, and they must have carried their traditions and their usages into that country. Now, Sir, I am not afraid to say, and I think I shall be borne out in my statement by the public records, that, so far as our elementary schools are concerned in the province of Quebec, I believe they are defective, and we must remember that it was this system of elementary schools which the French-Canadians took with them into Manitoba. We must not be blind to the facts concerning some portions of our educational system in Quebec. I claim, with the Postmaster General, that, as far as concerns our classical colleges, our academies, our convents, our model schools, and I will even go so far as to say, the elementary schools in our villages, they are fairly satisfactory; but I must say that our elementary schools in the back concessions are nothing at all; they are nil. Now, if these schools have been carried into the province of Manitoba by the French-Canadians who went there, it is no wonder they have been found deficient, and it is no wonder that an attempt has been made to improve them. You may call it selfishness, you may call it a spirit of domination—and I am ready to admit that the legislature has created a grievance—but I do not impute such bad motives to the legislature. I see some patriotism in it. I believe that people must be educated, and that people who desire to prosper must be educated. I say that I am ready to believe, and do honestly believe, that, if these schools have been modeled after ours in the back concessions of the province of Quebec, they must have been pretty bad. Now, Sir, that is my first ground, I am opposed to this legislation now, because we want first to have an investigation into the facts. We want evidence to be put in by the majority, as well as by the minority. We want to deal fairly with the majority, as well as with the minority; we want to give equal justice. We want to be informed about all these matters, and then we will know the exact measure of justice which is required, then we will know the exact remedy which is necessary. More than that, Mr. Speaker, I say that, when we take from a provincial legislature powers which have been declared constitutional, we ought to be very sure of our ground, and, before removing those powers from the legislature, we ought to try and convince all parties concerned. We have, perhaps, convinced the Roman Catholics, we may be convinced ourselves, but we want to convince the Protestants, as well. We must remember that the Roman Catholics are in a minority in this country, and we are a still greater minority in the House of Commons. According to the last census, we form about 40 per cent of the population, but in this House the Roman Catholics form only about one-fourth of the deputation. Therefore, I say, that we are bound to convince the Protestant majority that the rights of the Roman Catholics have been invaded in Manitoba, and, when they are so convinced, when public opinion is convinced that there is a grievance to be removed, then it will be easy work, then the legislature of Manitoba will yield to our wishes. But, if they should not grant a remedy, if we were backed by public opinion, if we were backed by a great majority of the Protestants, we would have no difficulty in setting the wrong right. I take it for granted, that the Protestant majority are ready to give justice, I take it for granted that they are animated by a spirit of British fair-play, which nobody will deny; and I am convinced that, when it is proved to them that an injustice has been committed, they will at once be ready to remedy such injustice. Now, as I said a little while ago, why should Protestants take our word? We must remember that the Protestants, who hold very different views from our own, deny the facts which have been alleged by the Roman Catholic minority; the Manitoba legislature also denies these facts. Why should they take our word, unsupported by evidence? They have as much confidence in themselves as we have in ourselves. Then, I say that the only way to reach an amicable settlement, the only way to convince the whole people that something must be done, is to investigate the matter. When could that have been done? It could have been done since last June, after the suggestion was made by the Manitoba legislature. If an investigation had been entered upon then, it would now be closed. Sir, I ask myself sometimes, in reading this Bill, if it has not been devised simply with the object of getting rid of this whole matter. I cannot believe that hon. gentlemen opposite could be animated by any such motives; still I have heard it said by enemies of the Bill, but, at the same time, the friends of the Conservative Government: Give them the Act; it won't do them any good; the law is useless, and we can well support the government. Sir, I hope such motives will not weigh with an hon. gentleman, because it would be an infamy to saddle upon these people such a law simply because it will not do them any good. Now, I will pass to another point. Will it help the Catholic minority in Manitoba? I do not intend to deal with all clauses of the Bill. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) said that when the Bill was in committee was the proper time to make amendments to it. The Bill has been distributed, it had its first reading before we had seen it, but we have seen it since, and we have a right to question its efficiency, to examine its general lines and to show that the measure is not one that is acceptable. It is admitted that owing to the way the Bill is drafted, section 74 deprives the minority of its share in the educational grant. That grant, I observe from the last sessional papers of the province of Manitoba amounts to $130 for every school. In our province that would pay for two elementary schools.

Mr. LAVERGNE.

That grant is a very serious matter. It is admitted by the wording of the Bill that we cannot force the legislature to grant a share of the money for the support of the schools. I will read the clause to which I refer:

4. The right to share proportionately, in any grant made out of public funds for the purposes of education having been decided to be and being now one of the rights and privileges of the said Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in the province of Manitoba, any sum granted by the legislature of Manitoba and appropriated for the separate schools shall be placed to the credit of the Board of Education in accounts to be opened in the books of the Treasury Department and in the Audit Office.

It has been asserted that they have a right to it. But this right cannot be enforced. This is simply a trap to catch Roman Catholic support and Roman Catholic votes, to deceive simple people. This right should not be asserted if Parliament does not feel it can enforce it. The fact of it is that it is adding insult to injury. These words are there to deceive, and that is what they amount to. This is one of my greatest objections to the Bill, and is one of the most serious and urgent reasons for opposing it and for contending that this matter should be settled by means of conciliation. I believe we cannot force the legislature of Manitoba to vote this appropriation and to make this grant? Are we going to be satisfied with a bald statement of this kind without a law to enforce it? Not only as a French Canadian, not only as a Roman Catholic, but on broader grounds, as a Canadian, I shall always refuse to pass legislation which places not a Roman Catholic minority, not a French minority, but any minority whatever in an inferior position than that occupied by others, which places a minority, a class of people or a certain religious denomination in an unfair situation as compared with the balance of the population. It is humiliating, it is outrageous, I will never assent to that, and rather than do so I would be disposed to refuse any remedial legislation.

Another point is this, is the Bill efficient? I will not read it; I believe the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) has shown a great many deficiencies in it. Can it prove effectual, can it be operated? Take the clause cited by the hon. member for Verchères. He showed that the power rested in the hands of the local legislature, in the hands of the Manitoba government. What do they say? They protest against this measure. They may submit to the technical part of it, but without their good-will we cannot do anything whatever with the Act, if passed. I will not say much on this point, because it has been well dealt with by the hon. member for Verchères. I have many other reasons for objecting to this Bill, but at this late hour I do not wish to prolong the debate. Another reason is this: I distrust the hon. gentlemen who have charge of the measure and who are seeking to pass it through Parliament. They will tell us that perhaps we may improve the Bill in Committee. I feel convinced that hon. gentlemen opposite will not be here to execute it as a law. I fear that after hon. gentlemen opposite have gone before the people they will not be sent back to execute this law, and we are afraid to receive such a legacy and would sooner renounce any estate such as this. The first clause gives power to the local government of Manitoba to name the members of the council of public instruction. As the hon. member for Verchères has pointed out, they might make the law inefficient by appointing men who would not be willing to make use of it. There is a delay allowed of three months after the coming into force of the Act within which to make appointments to the board. This means that after this session is over there will be forty days to enforce the law. Three months afterwards a report will be made or the fact established in a regular way that the local government have not acted; then this Government will be entitled to appoint the members of the board. In six months from the present time we will probably have given an account of our good or bad deeds to the people to whom we have to account for our actions in Parliament. I affirm that the law can be set aside by the hon. gentlemen themselves. This Bill in fact is to bridge them over the elections,—it is a six months' hoist so far as the elections are concerned. Now, Sir, I distrust such a policy. I say that we have enough to satisfy us, that this law will never be enforced by these gentlemen, and will never be enforced by the legislature of Manitoba. A remedy like that we do not want. Sir, I will not detain the House any longer. I have stated my reasons, and I am not afraid in this matter to take this ground. I shall give my vote according to the dictates of my conscience, and I state my views before this House without any fear.

Mr. MASSON. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the night, I must apologize for wishing to take part in this debate, the importance of which is my only excuse. We have been told that we are now face to face with one of the greatest questions that the Parliament of Canada has ever had to deal with. And, considering the far-reaching effect, not only for the present, but for the future of Canada, that this enactment now before the House may have, I certainly agree with that statement. But, Sir, while agreeing with the statement that the question is momentous, and that it is fraught with serious consequences, it does not, in the least degree, lessen the duty of each member of this House to do the very best in his power to carry it out in the spirit and to the letter of the constitution. It is not a question to be treated as a party question. It is not an ordinary political question, as we have in times past looked upon the majority of questions that have come before the House, but it is purely and simply a constitutional question. It is as such that it comes as a legacy to the present Government. It does not come to them by any action of theirs, nor at their seeking, nor because it was any part of their policy, but, being an outgrowth of circumstances, it has come in a constitutional way to rest upon the shoulders of the present Government. It is, therefore, necessary, in debating this question, in order to base any argument upon the constitution, to trace, briefly, as I will endeavour to do, the history of the clause in the constitution under which we are now called upon to act. That matter has been gone over in a more able manner than it is possible for me to do, but still, I may be pardoned for attempting to rehearse some of the statements already made, in the hope of referring to some that I consider of importance, and which have not hitherto been dealt with. We have already been told that but for the recognition of separate schools as part of the constitution of Canada, there would have been no confederation. There is still another element to the back of that, and to see exactly why it depends on that question, we have to recall the very first steps taken towards confederation. At the two meetings of the fathers of confederation, in 1864, in the first preliminary statement made as to what should be, in the opinion of these gentlemen, left absolutely to the control of the provinces, one of the first subjects mentioned, and which these gentlemen agreed upon, was that of education. Now, it is to that early statement that I wish, for a moment, to call the attention of the House. The statement that the control of education should be left to the jurisdiction and management of the several provinces, was met with great feelings of distrust, not only in the province of Quebec, but in the province of Ontario. And, Sir, the distrust was not expressed by the minority in the province of Ontario, for the minority in that province then had much the same system of separate schools that they have to-day: the alteration made from that day to this being very slight, indeed. The feelings of distrust were evinced by the Protestants of Ontario, or of Upper Canada, then called, on behalf of their brethren in the province of Quebec, where they knew their brethren were weak. There was not a Protestant church in the province of Ontario that did not take that question up, and they brought what pressure and power they could to bear upon those in authority. Resolutions were passed, and conveyed to the leaders of the people of that day, and there was not a church paper published in the province of Ontario, either of the Presbyterian, the Methodist, or the English Church, but rung the changes upon the great danger in which the minority of Quebec would be, if the power of entirely controlling education was passed over to the great Catholic majority of Lower Canada. The agitation created by the Protestant churches of Ontario was taken up by the Protestants of Quebec, and petitions after petitions were circulated, and in due course, in the year 1865, they were presented to the Parliament of Upper and Lower Canada, at its very first session after these resolutions had been drafted. Now, what was the result of that agitation in the way of bringing forth petitions? Since the question was mentioned in the House yesterday, I have hurriedly looked over the records of the Parliament of 1865, and I find that between the date of the 6th of February and the 17th March, in that year, forty-nine petitions were presented to Parliament, praying for redress in that matter, and that the Protestant schools of Quebec should be made permanent, and at least equal to the separate schools of Upper Canada. The effect of this agitation and of these petitions may be pointed out. In the very commencement it was laid down that the provinces should have entire control of the education, but it was made clear that the existing laws as regards separate schools for the minority, should remain permanent.

That was agreed to in 1864, and following that, petitions came in asking that the separate schools of Lower Canada should be so improved as to be at least equal to those of Upper Canada. Those petitions resulted in the introduction into the Parliament of Canada of a Bill to change the Educational Act as regarded Lower Canada. That Bill failed to pass, receiving the six months' hoist, which is moved for the Bill before the House to-day. But it brought from the Hon. George E. Cartier a promise that such an amendment should be made to the school laws of Lower Canada as soon as the province had power to do it. So ended the efforts in 1865. That and that only was the result of the agitation at that time. But another Parliament is about to assemble. Again the church papers take the matter up. On a former occasion I referred to a number of passages from those papers. I will now only refer to a brief extract from one. In the "Presbyterian" we find these words:

Parliament will soon meet again to discuss the question of confederation. What has been done since last session was called? Has there been placed before the public the true aspect of our laws on common school education?

This paper, although largely subscribed for in the province of Upper Canada, was printed in the city of Montreal, and this expression refers undoubtedly to the schools of Lower Canada. The article goes on:

Two or three meetings, a number of circulars, a number of petitions, an application to Parliament, and then a total cessation of everything like effort.

This article urged further action, and further action was taken. In 1866 the Parliament met, and we have again a flood of petitions, resulting in the promise of Sir George E. Cartier being introduced into the resolutions and being placed, by way of proviso, in the Draft Act, providing that after the union the Protestant schools of Lower Canada should be made equal to the Roman Catholic schools of Upper Canada. But that promise, made by a member of the House whom we all respected, and so firmly engrafted into the resolutions, was not satisfactory to those who were still urging for something further in the way of protection of the rights of the minority in that province. It was said, and wisely said, that while they could trust the present representatives, the time would come when they would be no more, and other rulers might arise who knew nothing of the past struggles, and might act far differently. The result of pressure on those lines was the introduction of the subsection which is now the cause of all our trouble—the subsection providing that in case of provincial legislation prejudicially affecting the rights of a minority, which they either had at the time of the union or received afterwards by provincial legislation, it should be subject to appeal to the Federal Parliament. That was the result of two years of struggle upon that question; and I wish particularly to draw attention to the fact that that struggle was mainly, if not entirely, on behalf of the Protestant minority of Quebec. It is true that some petitions were presented to Parliament during those same years asking for an improvement in the Separate School Act of Upper Canada; but as that Act was at that time almost equal to what it is to-day, there was not very much effort made beyond presenting petitions. Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to the source from which the opposition to that subsection came. It was opposed by John Sandfield Macdonald, himself a Catholic representing an Upper Canada constituency; but he opposed it, not on any sectarian ground, but on the ground that such a provision would be an interference with the rights of the majority—taking the broad liberal ground that the majority should rule and the minority should submit. I mention this to show that the very questions raised to-day about the respective rights of the majority and minority were then discussed by the late John Sandfield Macdonald. The subsection was also opposed by Christopher Dunkin in a very able speech, in which, in prophetic language, he described exactly the scene we have witnessed during the last two years—that an application for the enforcement of the right of appeal would cause just such trouble as we are having here to-day. On these two grounds, and these two grounds only, was the subsection opposed. It was, therefore, thoroughly discussed on that line at that time. It was passed, however, and became part of the British North America Act. The same provision became, for the same reasons, part of the Manitoba Act. Let me mention also that, so far as I can find the only two or three little references made to that clause were made by Protestant members, and were in favour of it. We therefore have in our constitution, as stated by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) a different question from the ordinary question of provincial rights. It was not a question whether or not the province had the right; but it was a technical question under the constitution whether the province, having a right to do certain things, was still limited in that right, and whether, if the province passed that limit, it was subject to appeal. I am glad the hon. gentleman made that statement so emphatically as he did, because it is sufficient answer to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), who yesterday expatiated very loudly on the question of provincial rights, ignoring altogether the question arising under this subsection, ignoring this subsection to such an extent that he referred to the decision of the Privy Council in the Barrett case as declaring unmistakably that the province had complete jurisdiction.

Now, the Government are charged with having dealt weakly, imprudently and unsatisfactorily with this matter, if they did not do absolute wrong. With the exception perhaps of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) no one, in this debate, has charged the Government with direct wrong. I think the hon. leader of the Opposition came very close to it on several occasions, but, in that peculiar style of his, he could come close up to the line without touching it, and then withdraw from it. We are told that the Government have not dealt fairly with the minority. We are told by the leader of the Opposition that, if they had dealt as fairly with the minority in Manitoba as they have with other questions, the minority would have had their rights long ago. But in what step they did take they were wrong or dilatory, the leader of the Opposition failed to point out. The fact is, that no sooner was that Act passed than an application to veto it was presented. The Government did not veto it. Does the leader of the Opposition blame the Government? Does the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) blame the Government? Does the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who, perhaps, was the originator of nearly all this trouble, blame the Government? No, on the floor of this House, last session, he said the Government were right in not vetoing the Act. Why, then, should we be called on now to argue that the Government were right or wrong in that question? I think it is admitted by the House and country that the Government were right in not vetoing that Act. Why should they have to veto it? Almost immediately after it passed, those interested brought it before the courts. They claimed it was ultra vires; and in such cases the court was the proper tribunal to settle the question. The Barrett case passed through various stages until the judgment of the Privy Council declared that the Manitoba government had acted within its jurisdiction, and that consequently the Act was not a proper subject for veto. More especially was it not a proper case for veto, when the British North America Act and the Manitoba Act, in matters of education, are a code in themselves. The British North America Act provides a remedy for all grievances. Therefore, the proper course was, not to veto the Act, but to apply the remedy that the Act itself provided, and those interested immediately took steps to have an appeal. Now, how has the Government acted in each stage of this matter? The parties were granted an appeal, and the appeal was brought on. The province of Manitoba was notified of the appeal, but refused to attend. The argument began, and then certain legal questions being raised, the Government did what was right and proper, and what no gentleman on the other side can say was improper, because only two sessions before their leader, by a resolution known as the Blake Resolution, had provided for the reference of all such questions to the courts. These questions were propounded; and, in pursuance of the Act based on that Blake Resolution, they were referred to the courts, and in due process of time we had a decision. We have a decision that no hon. gentleman on the floor of this House or in the country would dare to take exception to. That decision declares that the right to appeal existed under the Manitoba Act, that the appeal was well founded, that the Manitoba minority has a grievance, and that it rests with this Government and with this House to remedy that grievance.

Now, we are told that the subsequent proceedings have not been taken in the proper spirit. I suppose it makes a good deal of difference whose ox is gored in this as well as in other cases. It makes a good deal of difference from what standpoint you look at it; but, trying to look at it in an unprejudiced light, I fail to see anything left undone which should have been done by the Government in the way of approaching Manitoba in a kindly spirit. From my standpoint, I think it did not rest with this Government to approach Manitoba at all. Manitoba was one of the parties interested, nay, the party mostly interested, and it was the duty of the government of Manitoba, when that judgment was pronounced declaring that there was a grievance, and pointing out the line upon which a remedy might be applied, to at once apply the remedy. They did not need to hesitate or wait for any request or interference from the federal authority. It was their duty to administer the law according to the constitution. And, having been told, if they did not know it before, what that constitution required, it was their duty to at once apply the remedy. But they did nothing. On the contrary, they declared, in spite of the Privy Council's decision, that they would stand by their Public School Act and would grant no remedy. Notice was then given for a continuation of the argument, and they did, on this occasion, attend. Now, certain delays were asked for, and we are told that the matter was hurried on, that the delays granted were insufficient. But it was not to inquire into matters of fact or into matters of conscience, or into matters of past compacts, or of subsequent bad faith that delay was required. It was to have time to prepare an argument, and that time was granted, and the argument was proceeded with and completed. We are told still, that there must be some inquiry, that there were some questions raised in that argument about matters of fact, that affidavits were produced, and that they were withdrawn.

If I were to take the words of the hon. leader of the Opposition as he gave them and put the ordinary interpretation upon them, I would understand him as representing that the counsel for the minority based his whole case upon these affidavits, and that when he withdrew these affidavits he withdrew his whole case. But can the hon. gentleman present such an argument in view of the whole case? The affidavits referred to matters entirely beyond those referred to in the judgment of the Privy Council and the remedial order. It was quite within the scope of the counsel's duty to urge independently of what appears upon the face of the Act that there was a breach of the contract. It was quite in the line of his duty to argue that and to produce evidence if he desired to establish it. But he had sufficient case upon the Act itself and what was admitted at that argument to argue for and obtain the relief that the remedial order granted. You will note, Sir, that the judgment of the Privy Council and the remedial order go no further than the interpretation of the rights under that subsection. To establish a compact would be to establish that the other subsection referring to the rights that could not be taken away that it would be ultra vires to interfere with, was defective, and as the Minister of Justice stated, there is a clause in that Manitoba statute in which the language differs from the corresponding clause in the British North America Act, and that the introduction of the word "practice" shows that it was the intention to preserve that practice. And that intention to preserve the practice was admitted on the floor of this House last session by a speaker who takes strong grounds against the Bill. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) stated on 17th July last that to make it quite clear that the minority should be protected in all the rights they had enjoyed in reference to denominational schools the word "practice" was put in as well as the word "law." The argument of the Minister of Justice was not as has been stated based upon a new interpretation of the word "practice." It was admitted last session by the opponents of this legislation that the word was introduced for the purpose stated by the hon. Minister. It is evident that there was a compact of some kind and that the intention of Parliament was to carry that compact out. But we have the interpretation of the other subsection in the Barrett case, and by that this Government has chosen to be bound. They have not attempted to go back of that or to base any of their remedy upon what was outside of that interpretation. Nothing whatever has been done that could for a moment be construed into carrying it beyond that interpretation. Therefore it is unnecessary, in discussing the Bill before the House, to say whether there was a compact beyond that or not. We are quite within the mark when we say that the remedies applied by this Act are such as are provided in the subsection under discussion and that it is not necessary to go beyond it.
