That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We believe that the results of the protective system have grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country, in the light of experience, is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

The issue between the two political parties on this question is now clearly defined.

The Government themselves admit the failure of their fiscal policy, and now profess their willingness to make some changes; but they say that such changes must be based only on the principle of protection.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

2.—ENLARGED MARKETS—RECIPROCITY.

That, having regard to the prosperity of Canada and the United States as adjoining countries, with many mutual interests, it is desirable that there should be the most friendly relations and broad and liberal trade intercourse between them;

That the interests alike of the Dominion and of the Empire would be materially advanced by the establishing of such relations;

That the period of the old reciprocity treaty was one of marked prosperity to the British North American colonies;

That the pretext under which the Government appealed to the country in 1891 respecting negotiations for a treaty with the United States was misleading and dishonest and intended to deceive the electorate;

That no sincere effort has been made by them to obtain a treaty, but that, on the contrary, it is manifest that the present Government, controlled as they are by monopolies and combines, are not desirous of securing such a treaty;

That the first step towards obtaining the end in view, is to place a party in power who are sincerely desirous of promoting a treaty on terms honourable to both countries ;

That a fair and liberal reciprocity treaty would develop the great natural resources of Canada, would enormously increase the trade and commerce between the two countries, would tend to encourage friendly relations between the two peoples, would remove many causes which have in the past provoked irritation and trouble to the governments of both countries, and would promote those kindly relations between the Empire and the Republic which afford the best guarantee for peace and prosperity ;

That the Liberal party is prepared to enter into negotiations with a view to obtaining such a treaty, including a well-considered list of manufactured articles, and we are satisfied that any treaty so arranged will receive the assent of Her Majesty's Government, without whose approval no treaty can be made.

3.—PURITY OF ADMINISTRATION—CONDEMN CORRUPTION.

That the convention deplores the gross corruption in the management and expenditure of public moneys which for years past has existed under the rule of the Conservative party, and the revelations of which by the different parliamentary committees of inquiry have brought disgrace upon the fair name of Canada.

The Government, which profited politically by these expenditures of public moneys of which the people have been defrauded, and which, nevertheless, have never punished the guilty parties, must be held responsible for the wrong-doing. We arraign the Government for retaining in office a Minister of the Crown proved to have accepted very large contributions of money for election purposes from the funds of a railway company, which, while paying the political contributions to him, a member of the Government, with one hand, was receiving Government subsidies with the other.

The conduct of the Minister and the approval of his colleagues after the proof became known to them are calculated to degrade Canada in the estimation of the world and deserve the severe condemnation of the people.

4.—DEMAND STRICTEST ECONOMY—DECREASED EXPENDITURE.

We cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt and of the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the governments that have been continuously in power since 1878, and we demand the strictest economy in the administration of the Government of the country.

5.—FOR RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT—INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

That the convention regrets that by the action of Ministers and their supporters in Parliament, in one case in which serious charges were made against a Minister of the Crown, investigation was altogether refused, while in another case the charges preferred were altered and then referred to a commission appointed upon the advice of the Ministry, contrary to the well-settled practice of Parliament ; and this convention affirms :

That it is the ancient and undoubted right of the House of Commons to inquire into all matters of public expenditure, and into all charges of misconduct in office against Ministers of the Crown, and the reference to royal commissions created upon the advice of the accused is at variance with due responsibility of Ministers to the House of Commons, and tends to weaken the authority of the House over the Executive Government, and this convention affirms that the powers of the people's representatives in this regard should on all fitting occasions be upheld.

Mr. BORDEN.

6.—THE LAND FOR THE SETTLER—NOT FOR THE SPECULATOR.

That in the opinion of this convention the sales of public lands of the Dominion should be to actual settlers only, and not to speculators, upon reasonable terms of settlement, and in such areas as can be reasonably occupied and cultivated by the settler.

7.—OPPOSE THE DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT—FAVOUR THE PROVINCIAL FRANCHISE.

That the Franchise Act since its introduction has caused the Dominion treasury over a million of dollars, besides entailing a heavy expenditure to both political parties ;

That each revision involves an additional expenditure of a further quarter of a million ;

That this expenditure has prevented an annual revision, as originally intended, in the absence of which young voters entitled to the franchise have, in numerous instances, been prevented from exercising their natural rights ;

That it has failed to secure uniformity, which was the principal reason assigned for its introduction ;

That it has produced gross abuses by partisan revising barrister appointed by the Government of the day.

That its provisions are less liberal than those already existing in many provinces of the Dominion, and that, in the opinion of this convention, the Act should be repealed, and we should revert to the provincial franchise.

8.—AGAINST THE GERRYMANDER—COUNTY BOUNDARIES SHOULD BE PRESERVED.

That by the Gerrymander Acts, the electoral divisions for the return of members to the House of Commons have been so made as to prevent a fair expression of the opinion of the country at the general elections, and to secure to the party now in power a strength out of all proportion greater than the number of electors supporting them would warrant. To put an end to this abuse, to make the House of Commons a fair exponent of public opinion, and to preserve the historic continuity of counties, it is desirable that, in the formation of electoral divisions, county boundaries should be preserved, and that in no case parts of different counties should be put in one electoral division.

9.—THE SENATE DEFECTIVE—AMEND THE CONSTITUTION.

The present constitution of the Senate is inconsistent with the federal principle in our system of government, and is in other respects defective, as it makes the Senate independent of the people and uncontrolled by the public opinion of the country, and should be so amended as to bring it into harmony with the principles of popular government.

10.—QUESTION OF PROHIBITION—A DOMINION PLEBISCITE.

That whereas public attention is at present much directed to the consideration of the admittedly great evils of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite.

Mr. Speaker, as our friends opposite are in the habit of continually taunting us that we have no policy, and as possibly some of them have never had an opportunity, as they never read good, sound literature, of hearing this policy, I think it is desirable that it should be embalmed in the proceedings of this House; so that when in future hon. gentlemen opposite are in doubt as to what the Liberal policy is, they can turn up the pages of "Hansard," which records of the policy of the Liberal party which I have had the honour to read.

Mr. FORBES moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 10th February, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FISHERY OVERSEER, RIVER THAMES DISTRICT.

Mr. YEO (for Mr. Campbell) asked :

Who is the fishery overseer for Lake St. Clair, Ontario? How many licenses were issued by him during the past year? How much was received for each license? What is the salary of the said overseer?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The fishery overseers are Joseph Boismier at Sandwich, and C. W. Raymond at Mitchell's Bay. In 1895 they countersigned and delivered sixty licenses for said lake, besides issuing eighty-seven angling permits. The fees received were as follows:—By Overseer Boismier, for thirty licenses $405, for nineteen angling permits at $5 each, $95; by Overseer Raymond, for thirty licenses $188.25, for sixty-eight angling permits at $5 each, $340, total, $528.25. The salary of Overseer Boismier is $200 per annum, and that of Overseer Raymond $150 per annum.

POST OFFICE, LINKLETTER ROAD, P.E.I.

Mr. YEO asked :

Has a post office been established at Linkletter Road, Prince County, Prince Edward Island, as promised by the Postmaster General in July last? If not, why not? If so, who is the postmaster?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A post office has not been established at Linkletter Road, P.E.I. The Postmaster General did not, upon making further inquiries, deem it advisable to establish the proposed office.

INTERCOLONIAL WORKSHOPS AT RIVIERE DU LOUP.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked :

1. Whether the superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway workshop at Rivière du Loup has been instructed not to take any more apprentices into the said shop?

2. If so, when was the order given, and why?

Mr. HAGGART. The foremen of the Intercolonial Railway workshops along the line, have not the power of taking on apprentices in the shops without instructions to do so from the mechanical superintendent, who obtains his authority from the general manager. It is the practice to limit the number of apprentices, and to employ others when vacancies occur. It is only in this manner that any instructions apply to Rivière du Loup shops.

BUSINESS FAILURES IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the large number of business failures, many for large amounts, which have recently occurred in Ontario and Quebec? Whether the Government propose to offer any remedy for the position of affairs indicated by these failures?

Mr. FOSTER. The attention of the Government has not been called to the large number of business failures, many for large amounts, which have recently occurred in Ontario and Quebec.

MAIL CARRIAGE TO ST. ROCH DE RICHELIEU.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

Who holds the contract for carrying the mail between the station on the South Shore Railway and the parish of St. Roch de Richelieu?

Were tenders asked for, and if so, who were the parties who tendered, and what was the sum named in each tender?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The service between St. Ours and the Montreal and Sorel Railway station, by which St. Roch post office is served, is in the hands of Thomas Duhamel, at the rate of $80 per annum. Tenders were not invited for the service, as a private arrangement was made with Mr. Duhamel.

BAIE DES CHALEURS RAILWAY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked :

1. Whether the Government are negotiating with the government of Quebec in relation to the purchase of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway ?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to purchase the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, in order to make it a section of the Intercolonial Railway ?

3. In the event of the Government purchasing the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, is it their intention to push on the construction as far as Gaspé Basin ?

Mr. HAGGART. 1. The Government are not negotiating for the purchase of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. 2. The matter has not been under consideration by the Government. 3. The answer to the previous question also answers this one.

POSTMASTER OF BATISCAN.

Mr. TARTE (Translation) asked :

What is the name of the postmaster of the parish of Batiscan, in the county of Champlain ?

When, and upon whose recommendation was he appointed ?

Are the Government aware that the said postmaster is also a lighthouse keeper ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I may say that the name of the postmaster of Batiscan is Ephrem Labyssonière. His appointment is from the 10th January, 1896. The post office has not yet been transferred to him. The Post Office Department is not informed that Mr. Ephrem Labyssonière is a lighthouse keeper ; but I have given instructions to get some information in that respect.

LIGHTHOUSE AT BATISCAN.

Mr. TARTE asked :

Whether the Government recently sent an agent to Batiscan, in the county of Champlain, in order to purchase a right of way to the lighthouse in that locality ? What is the name of the said agent, the sum agreed upon for the purchase of the right of way, and the name of the person or persons to whom the money is to be paid ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am not aware of any agent being sent to that place.

TERRITORIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Has the Government read the report of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories to the Honourable the Minister of the Interior, in the Department of the Interior, as follows :—

" TERRITORIAL EXHIBITION.

" The grant of $25,000 made by Parliament during the session of 1894 towards the holding of a territorial exhibition in the North-west promises to be fruitful of beneficial results. Up to the present time the small district fairs have established the ability of producers to compete with those of any country in the world so far as cattle, cereals and diversified farming are concerned. The success achieved at the World's Fair naturally enough stimulated all classes to improve upon the prevailing methods, the consequence being that throughout Alberta, Saskatchewan and Assiniboia a marked progress is already noticeable. In holding the proposed territorial exhibition, it was considered advisable that this initiatory object lesson of North-west products should take place at the capital, provided a suitable site could be procured. The town of Regina voted $10,000 towards erecting suitable buildings, while the town site trustees, representing the Canada and North-west Land Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Dominion Government, agreed to give a site whereon to erect the necessary structures ; the result being that a well-located and commodious plot of ground a little west of the Territorial assembly building, north of the railway track and immediately upon the main trail, comprising fifty acres, has been secured. I am glad to say the farmers and industrial producers generally throughout the North-west are already taking an active interest in the project, and the agricultural associations have already given assurance of substantial aid. Local committees are now in course of formation ; prize lists are being prepared, keeping in view the resources and distinctive capabilities of each district ; and it is confidently anticipated that the first territorial exhibition, marking a decade since the last spike was driven in a railway connecting the two oceans, will meet with universal support. Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Assiniboia, possessed as they are of certain distinct and well-defined advantages in cattle, horses, and small farm products, lumber and cereals, mixed farming, grain and cattle, will make such a showing as will convince even the most sceptical of the advancement already achieved, as well as of their future possibilities. Long distances have, to a great extent, prevented the intermingling of the people, and interchange of ideas, as well as of products. This, at all times, tends to create jealousies and to jeopardize that unity so much to be desired in new and sparsely-settled communities. A generous rivalry will stimulate the farmers, and, as the settlers are public-spirited and quite capable of accomplishing tenfold what has already been done, they only require encouragement and a recognition of their industry to bring about this much-to-be-desired result. Great satisfaction is expressed that His Excellency the Governor General has consented to open the proceedings, and many leading public men, both from Canada and the United States, have promised to be present."
Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

To the above Mr. Burgess refers as follows in his report to the Honourable the Minister :—

" With regard to the territorial exhibition to be held at Regina, and towards which Parliament at its last session granted the sum of $25,000, His Honour says, among other things :—

" The town of Regina voted $10,000 towards erecting public buildings, while the town site trustees, representing the Canada and North-west Land Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Dominion Government, agreed to give a site whereon to erect the necessary structures, the result being that a well-located and commodious plot of ground, comprising fifty acres, has been secured. I am glad to say the farmers and the industrial producers generally throughout the North-west are already taking an active interest in the project, and the agricultural associations have given assurance of substantial aid."

Has His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories placed a statement of accounts due for work done and goods supplied to the Territorial Exhibition ?

Does the Government intend to take steps to secure that the creditors of this exhibition, many of them poor men, shall be paid ?

Mr. FOSTER. His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories has been asked for a complete statement of the expenditures, liabilities and accounts with reference to the territorial exhibition. As soon as these are received, the Government will take the whole matter into consideration.

N. K. AND MICHAEL CONNOLLY.

Mr. LAURIER asked :

1. Have Messrs. N. K. and Michael Connolly paid their share of the judgment rendered against them in favour of the Crown in the Exchequer Court, on the 11th day of September, 1894 ?

2. Has process of execution been issued against them ? If so, when ?

3. Has execution taken place ? If not, for what reason ?

Mr. DICKEY. 1. No. 2. Writs of execution against the goods and lands of the defendants, N. K. and Michael Connolly were issued on 14th day of October, 1895, directed to the sheriff of the county of Frontenac in Ontario ; and the sheriffs of the district of Quebec and the district of Montreal, respectively, in the province of Quebec. These writs of execution were sent to the said sheriffs respectively, on the date of issue, 14th October, 1895. 3. Under the writ of execution against goods in the hands of the sheriff of Frontenac, a steam dredge was seized, and on several occasions was offered for sale by the sheriff, but no sale could be made for want of buyers. The last attempt made by the sheriff was on 31st January last, when, in consequence of there being no buyers, the sheriff returned the writ with his return, that he had seized goods of the defendants, N. K. and Michael Connolly, to the value of $35,000, which remained on hand for want of buyers. A writ of venditionis exponas is now being issued under which the sheriff will have to sell the dredge. The sheriff of Frontenac returned the fi. fa. lands, with his return, that the defendants N. K. and Michael Connolly had no lands in that county. The sheriff of the district of Montreal, under the writs of fi. fa. goods, seized in October, 1895, 50 shares of stock in the Richelieu Navigation Company, standing in the name of Michael Connolly, and 84 shares of same stock standing in the name of J. K. Connolly. The sheriff likewise seized certain lands in the district of Montreal owned by N. K. Connolly. On these seizures being made, oppositions were filed by the Connollys against them, and in consequence, the sheriff of the district of Montreal, on 19th November last, returned these writs to the Exchequer Court with the oppositions, to be dealt with there. The sheriff of the district of Quebec seized certain household furniture and effects of N. K. Connolly, and certain lands, and to these seizures the defendants, the Connollys, filed oppositions, and in consequence the said sheriff returned the writs, with the oppositions, into the Exchequer Court, to be dealt with there. After the writs were returned to the court the questions raised by the oppositions were brought before the judge of the Exchequer Court immediately after the Christmas vacation was over, and the judge made an order disposing of the questions raised by the oppositions, and these writs were again, on the 3rd February instant, returned to the sheriffs of the districts of Montreal and the district of Quebec, respectively, to be executed by them in due course of law.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

On the Order :

That, in the opinion of this House, the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal, sacramental and mechanical purposes, should be prohibited by law.

Mr. FLINT. Stand.

Mr. FOSTER. I must say that, looking at the state of the Order paper, henceforth these motions which are not ready to be gone on with, will have to be dropped, unless specially good reasons are given.

PAYMENTS TO MR. ISRAEL TARTE.

Mr. TARTE moved for :

Statement showing the amounts paid to Israel Tarte, by the several public departments, since 1st January, 1880 ; the dates of such payments, if any, and the object for which the same were made.

He said : I move this motion because of certain statements that have appeared in the public press. Among the many reports circulated about myself there is one to which I desire to give a full answer by moving this motion, the charge being to the effect that during the Riel agitation some of the Ministers gave printing work to me, and I received payment therefor. From 1877 to 1889 I never was owner of a press or printing establishment, and as a matter of fact, I never received from this Government a cent's worth of patronage. As the statement has been circulated broadly in the press of my former allies, I wish again to state publicly that I never received a cent from this Government. This is the place and the time for some of the Ministers, if they have any statement to make, to make it. I see in his seat the Postmaster General, with whom I was working as a political ally, and I am sure he will be the first man to be ready to declare that during the Riel agitation, far from receiving anything, I gave away a great deal of money.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the hon. gentleman will not object to the addition of two or three lines to the motion by way of amendment. I move to add after the words "Israel Tarte," "or to 'Le Canadien' or 'Le Cultivateur' newspaper."

Mr. TARTE. I have no objection whatever to those words being added as an amendment. I beg, however, to add that from 1877 to 1889 I never had a copper of interest either in "Le Canadien" or in "Le Cultivateur," and I make this statement and challenge any contradiction of it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that if the statement made by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) is a correct statement, there is no relevancy in the amendment, and it is scarcely in order. My hon. friend has moved for certain information. The leader of the House has proposed to amend his motion by adding a request for information in regard to certain newspapers. If the hon. gentleman were proprietor of those newspapers, then there might be some relevancy in the amendment; but when my hon. friend has declared that he is not proprietor, and no hon. gentleman opposite affirms the contrary, then it seems to me if the Minister wishes for any information of that sort to be brought down to the House, it should be brought down by a separate motion, and not by an amendment tacked on to the motion of the hon. member for L'Islet.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) must not have heard what the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), who moved the motion, stated. The hon. gentleman stated that he had no objection to the amendment. In the second place, the period he mentioned did not cover the period mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Whether the hon. gentleman objected or not can make no difference as to the question of the propriety of the amendment.

Mr. TARTE. I had no interest in it—you may move what you like.

Mr. SPEAKER. With regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), it seems to me that the point is not well taken. I understood from the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) that he disclaims having received any moneys from the Government as a newspaper proprietor since 1st January, 1880. Whether he was proprietor of those newspapers is a question that is not relevant.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My point is that an amendment must be relevant, it must be germane to the question. An amendment with respect to the salary of a judge would not be germane to the motion. This amendment is no more germane, unless it can be shown that the proprietor of the paper was the hon. member, who received the money. That is my contention—that having no interest in payments made to those newspapers so far as Mr. Tarte is concerned, the amendment is altogether foreign to the main motion.

Mr. MULOCK. Suppose it was the Toronto "Globe."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Or the London "Times."

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) state that he has no connection with those newspapers?

Mr. TARTE. I state on my word of honour that I had not a cent's worth of interest in those newspapers.

Mr. SPEAKER. During the period mentioned?

Mr. TARTE. From 1877 to 1889 I have not one cent of interest in it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion is for a statement showing the amount paid Israel Tarte by the several public departments since 1st January, 1880. Does the hon. gentleman say that he has had no connection with either newspaper during that period of time?

Mr. TARTE. Not one cent of interest. Since 1889 I have had an interest.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman says he has had any interest since 1889, which would be during a period since 1st January, 1880, because this motion covers the whole period from 1880 down to the present time, then the amendment is regular.

Mr. TARTE. I do not wish to deceive the House. What I have stated is that from 1877 to 1889 I had not a cent of interest in the papers. The reason why I moved the motion was that I was accused of having received money for printing in 1886. At that time I had not one cent of interest in "Le Canadien" or "Le Cultivateur." In 1889 I became owner of "Le Canadien," and since that time I have been responsible for it.

Mr. SPEAKER. Having heard the statement of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), I shall rule the amendment is in order, because it covers the whole period from 1880 down to the present session.

Mr. TARTE. Then I suppose we can amend the motion by saying from 1880 to 1889.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. TARTE. I have no objection to have the whole accounts brought down, because I have no interest in it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TARTE. I am just speaking to the point of order. I say I had no interest in it then. "Le Canadien" might have got patronage that I do not know anything about. I suppose "Le Canadien" did get something, but what I say is that I had not one cent of interest in it. If you want to have a statement of what I got when I was interested, make the motion read: "From 1889 to the present time," if you like. I say here, upon my honour, before Parliament, that I had not one cent of interest in it.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the motion mention the dates?

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion reads as follows:—

Statement showing the amounts paid to Israel Tarte by the several public departments since the 1st of January, 1889; the dates of such payments, if any, and the object for which the same were made.

The amendment moved by Mr. Foster reads as follows:—

That after the word "Tarte," the following words be inserted: "or to 'Le Cultivateur,' or 'Le Canadien.'"

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You will see, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment is still out of order. Supposing that there should have been paid sums, between 1880 and 1889, they will be altogether irrelevant, and that amendment would be confined to a period since 1889, and not to any period before.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to call my hon. friend's attention to this, which I think establishes a relevancy sufficient to make the amendment in order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) has stated that in 1889 he did have a substantive interest in "Le Canadien." Payments were made to that newspaper before the newspaper became his property, and if large sums were paid to it, it was largely built up by the payments that were made. The House has quite the right to make the amendment, and it is relevant.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am of the opinion that, on the statement made by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) himself, the amendment is in order.

Mr. TARTE. I have no objection to it.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY IN MOOSE JAW, N.W.T.

Mr. DAVIN moved:

That the Dominion Government should at once take steps to alienate, at any figures obtainable, whatever property it possesses, directly or indirectly, in Moose Jaw, North-west Territories, other than property used for public offices, and in such a manner, that the property alienated shall thereafter be liable to taxation.

He said: This motion, Mr. Speaker, has to some extent been already discussed in the House this session, because the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), when going over the motion list the other evening, dwelt on this motion.

Mr. MARTIN. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. There is no impropriety in that. The impropriety was on the part of the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) in discussing the motion the other evening.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has referred to what was said by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) in a previous debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not catch what the hon. member (Mr. Davin) said.

Mr. DAVIN. Really, Mr. Speaker, what I was saying was of no consequence.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. It was of no consequence any more than the interruption of the hon. member (Mr. Martin). The hon. member (Mr. Martin) has been guilty of a piece of hypercriticism.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, Mr. Speaker, the point of order is this: the hon. member (Mr. Davin) in moving his motion, said: that this question had already been discussed in the House by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies).

Mr. DAVIN. Well, what of it?

Mr. SPEAKER. Even supposing the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) had made such a statement, that would be a direct reference to a past debate only by way of illustration.

Mr. MARTIN. But he was going on to explain what the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) had said, and I proposed to stop him.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member (Mr. Davin) undertakes to refer directly to anything that took place in a previous debate, I shall certainly intervene.

Mr. DAVIN. I will submit the point of order for your decision now. A few evenings ago, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) took up the Order paper, and he made a sneering comment on the motion I now propose. Now, what I submit for your decision is this: whether when I move that motion now, it is not 'ad rem' that I should refer to the sneer in regard to that motion, which was then improperly made.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not see that there was any improper reference to a past debate. As I understand, the reference which the hon. member (Mr. Davin) has made to what fell from the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) was made by way of illustration.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) jumps a little too quickly, and a little too often. Now, Mr. Speaker, this motion which seemed to excite the scorn of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), will, I suppose, also excite the scorn of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), because I have failed to find in this House, during this, the last session of this Parliament, any proposal whatever from the Opposition that would show that interest in the North-west Territories, which I should expect from a great party at this period of its career. That kind of scoffing at whatever North-west members bring forward in the interest of the North-west Territories, has been a common thing in the past on the part of the Liberal party in this House, but it is a very imprudent thing for them to do, and especially at this hour. This is a matter which may seem a thing of very little consequence to an hon. member who knows nothing about the North-west and nothing about Moose Jaw. Such an one might suppose that I am asking the Government to do some thing unreasonable, whereas, the matter is of very great consequence indeed to Moose Jaw. Sir, the position is this: Moose Jaw is what is called a Government town site, and I may say that if there is any vicious principle in Government town sites, I am afraid that has to be laid at the door of my friends of the Opposition. Mr. Blake, when leader of the Opposition, denounced the Government of the day for allowing the public domain to get into the hands of speculators. Then, that little pamphlet, which I believe is at present the Bible of the Reform party—the report of the great convention that took place here in 1893—contains nine or ten resolutions which were passed on that occasion, and which seem so inspired and so full of wisdom that they have been quoted in full in this House by an hon. member, and one or two of them have been twice or thrice quoted by other hon. members. Mr. Charlton, in speaking there, on a motion that would never have been passed if the land in question in the North-west had been understood by the members of that convention, especially excepts town lots from his statement that the Government should allow the land in the North-west to be opened to the settler. Now, Sir, what happened in regard to Moose Jaw was this: A pooling arrangement was made between the Government, Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canada North-west Land Company, under which the lots were to be sold and the proceeds divided in the proportion, I believe, of one-fourth to the Canada North-west Land Company, one-fourth to the Canadian

Mr. DAVIN.

Pacific Railway Company, and one-half to the Government. The way that affects a town is this: All the property in the town site that is not alienated to private parties is untaxable. The town is progressing, private persons are spending money, property is increasing in value. The property of the Government, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the North-west Land Company is increasing in value, and yet all the time it remains untaxed. We say that is not just. It is not just under any circumstances, but in the case of Moose Jaw it is especially unjust, because in that town very little public money has been spent. In the case of a town where a large amount of public money were spent, even though there might be a large number of lots in the position of those in Moose Jaw, you could say to the people who complained: It is true, a large number of the lots in your town are untaxable, because they are held by the Government, but a considerable amount of Government money has been spent in your midst. But that is not the case in Moose Jaw. It is not only unjust, but it is useless from a public standpoint, because the Government are receiving no income, or, at least, none to speak of, out of this property. I moved last session for a return giving a statement of the receipts by the Government from the Moose Jaw town site, and here it is:

Dominion Government's proportion of $\frac{1}{2}$ \$ 41,339 90

The Dominion Government's proportion of that, for the time extending over twelve years, is only $41,339.90, which, divided by twelve, will give something over $3,000 a year received from the Moose Jaw town site. Well, Sir, $3,000 is a very small sum to a Government, but this state of things is a very large burden for a town to carry. What I contend is that the advantage the Government have received is so small, and I believe it is diminishing yearly—because that $3,000 is the average, the main portion of it having been received during the earlier years—that it would be in the public interest for them to take steps to alienate the land they now hold at any price they could receive for it—and I suppose they would receive a fair price. At any rate, suppose they would put up the lots at auction rates, they would get something, and they would place one of the principal towns of the North-west Territories in a better position to fight its municipal way. I do not apprehend that my hon. friend will have any objection, in principle, anyway, to offer to what I propose. He may have a technical objection, but I should think that would be the only objection that could be raised against this proposal. Now, I will revert to what I started out with. I said that there was, I thought, a very unjust and unfair desire on the part of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)—I am sorry he is not here—to cast discredit on my motion, as though I were asking something unreasonable. I am asking something which I hope this House and the Government will see in the light in which it is seen by the people of Moose Jaw, who feel the shoe pinch. It is a practical and a rational proposal. It does not ask the Government to give away the land.

Mr. MULOCK. At any price.

Mr. DAVIN. At any price that is obtainable.

Mr. MULOCK. That is a farthing. That is giving it away, is it not?

Mr. DAVIN. No, you would not be giving the lots away if you got a farthing. When I ask that they should be alienated at whatever price can be obtained, I mean that they should be put up at auction. They would fetch their market value at the time, whatever that might be. If their market value is a farthing, they might as well be alienated at a farthing.

Mr. FRASER. What taxes would you collect on them if they were sold at a farthing?

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend from Guyshoro' (Mr. Fraser) seems to show the same antagonism towards this motion as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). The old leaven is still working in them all—the leaven of carping criticism in regard to any proposal for the benefit of the North-west Territories. I had expected to get support from the hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side, and I now say that if the hon. leader of the Opposition will look into this and will come to it with the same fairness of mind that he generally brings to bear upon public questions I think that he will, instead of sneering at my motion, be inclined to agree with me.

Mr. DALY. The hon. member is certainly making a very laudable effort, on behalf of his constituents in Moose Jaw, to get the Government to alienate at any figure such interest as the Government owns in the Moose Jaw town site; and he is only seeking to have carried out what he has been, in the interests of the same constituents, making efforts to obtain by representations to myself and my predecessors. But the Government have not the full say in this matter. It appears that in October, 1883, an agreement was arrived at between the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canada North-western Company and the Dominion Government, by which they agreed to subdivide the lands which they severally owned at Moose Jaw, Regina, Virden and Qu'Appelle, into town lots, and create town sites, and the agreement which was then made provided, among other things, that the Government should bear an equal share of the cost of the administration of those lands. From that date to this sales have been made at Virden, Qu'Appelle, Regina and Moose Jaw, of a very large number of these lots, and a very considerable amount has been realized. The hon. gentleman has given the figures which pertain to Moose Jaw, the town site under discussion, and it is shown by them that the gross receipts were $108,755, of which the Government received $41,339, as its share, after deducting expenses. Of course the Dominion Government are holding their lands in trust for the people of Canada, and I think it is going too far to ask the Government to alienate this portion of the public domain in the town site of Moose Jaw at any figures obtainable at public auction, as the hon. gentleman desires. In order to carry out the idea of the citizens of Moose Jaw, the lands would have to be sold at public auction, without any upset price being placed upon them, and the people of Moose Jaw might buy them in at any figures they chose. It is a fundamental principle, so far as Government lands are concerned, and especially lands held in trust as these are, that they should not be sold without an upset price being fixed. If the hon. gentleman's motion were agreed to, we would have to act contrary to that principle in order that the citizens of these places might be relieved of some taxes. No such representations as have been made by the hon. gentleman on behalf of Moose Jaw, have been made by the people of Virden, Regina or Qu'Appelle. Until the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canada North-west Land Company consent to the disposal of the lands in the way the hon. gentleman asks, the Government could not possibly take any action in the matter. Representations have previously been made by the people of Moose Jaw with reference to the disposition of the Government's interest in these lands; and in June last the Liberal-Conservative Association of Moose Jaw sent a copy of certain resolutions that were passed by them in connection with this matter. Among other things they asked that the Government should transfer its interest in the Moose Jaw town site to the Moose Jaw council in trust for the town. The reply was that the Government had not the power to transfer the lands in the manner proposed, nor would the council have the power to hold the lands, were such a request entertained. It was next contended as unfair that the taxpayers of Moose Jaw should be required to pay taxation on lands held by the Government. The memorialists were informed in this case that the question of taxes on unsold lands within the town site had been settled some years ago through the joint trustees, who paid something like $4,000 to the town in full of the arrears, and agreed to pay one-quarter of future taxes, which had been done from year to year. As to the general question of taxing Government property, which was involved in the resolution, the memorialists were referred to the specific provisions of the British North America Act in that behalf. I may have omitted to say to the House the fact that these town sites of Regina, Virden, Qu'Appelle and Moose Jaw are held by trustees who may dispose of the land from time to time, as occasion requires, the receipts from which sales are funded, after which the trustees make a return, handing over one-half of the proceeds to the Department of the Interior and giving an account of their stewardship.

Mr. LAURIER. For whom are they trustees ?

Mr. DALY. For the Government, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canada North-west Land Company, who are the original proprietors of these several town sites. The trustees are, I think, Sir Donald Smith, R. B. Angus and the Minister of Finance. No action could be taken by the Government without the consent of the other proprietors.

Mr. MULOCK. Have the trustees sole discretion ?

Mr. DALY. Yes, as to the price, terms of sale and everything of that kind, as was outlined in the agreement of October, 1883.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the area ?

Mr. DALY. I am not in a position to say ; perhaps the hon. member for West Assiniboia might be able to say.

Mr. DAVIN. About a section.

Mr. DALY. That would be in four quarters. The Government would have one-half, the Canadian Pacific Railway one-quarter, and the North-west Land Company one-quarter.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the area of the town as a whole ?

Mr. DAVIN. Originally it was larger, just as Regina was larger, but afterwards it was contracted a little. Perhaps it is one and a half miles square.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. MULOCK. And a mile of this is reserved ?

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. DALY. The fundamental objection to the motion is that it asks the Government to sell whatever interest they may have in this town site for any figure that can be obtainable. There is a considerable asset to the public in this town site, and it would be contrary to the first principles of Government that we should dispose of the property in the manner indicated by the hon. gentleman. The Government cannot see their way to meet the hon. gentleman's wishes as expressed in this motion.

Mr. MARTIN. I should imagine that if the hon. gentleman were desirous of referring to carping objections and carping criticisms of motions made by representatives of the North-west Territories, he would be very much more justified if instead of attacking a few unfortunate members on this side, who simply ask some questions for information, he should make an attack upon my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) and the other members of the Government, who have had occasion to reply to the hon. gentleman, not only on this but on many other matters, which I do not know whether it would be parliamentary to characterize as buncombe. I do not know whether it would be parliamentary to say these are buncombe motions, but I would like to use the parliamentary term that would express that as my opinion of resolutions of this kind—resolutions that are made for the purpose of making for their mover a little cheap political capital, but so arranged that they shall not at all embarrass the Government. Of course, the Government know perfectly well that, after the hon. gentleman from West Assiniboia has made his speech, and has called upon them to do such things as these he asks of them, from time to time, all they have to do is request him to withdraw his motion, and he promptly withdraws it. There are exceptions, such as we saw a few days ago when, under the rules of the House, a motion could not be withdrawn, in which case the hon. gentleman shows his loyalty to the Government of which he is a supporter by just as promptly voting against his own motion. So often is this done that it has become well known as characteristic of the hon. gentleman's political methods. Though he is always bringing forward motions before the House and taking strong ground upon political matters in respect of which he thinks reform is necessary in the interests of the people of the North-west, he invariably votes exactly opposite to the way in which he has spoken.

Mr. DAVIN. Is that true ?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is true. I believe it cannot be found in any of the records of this House that the hon. gentleman has voted against the Government in connection with its tariff policy. Session after session we find the hon. gentleman bringing forward motions here with regard to the tariff on different items—agricultural implements, binder twine, and so on—and when the Budget debate comes on, we find him attacking the policy of the Government very strongly because of its effect on the North-west, but I have never yet—I may have overlooked a case, but I doubt that the hon. gentleman can point out a single one—known or read of a case of the hon. gentleman voting in opposition to this policy which he has arraigned so often before the bar of public opinion. I think the people of the North-west understand the object of these motions by the hon. gentleman. This motion, I think, is about as striking an example of the kind of thing to which I refer as we have ever had. Of course, if it is proposed for any particular constituency that the Government shall hand over to it a certain portion of the public property, or give to it a certain sum of public money, so far as that constituency is concerned there will be no particular objection. And, in case objection is made by members representing other constituencies to a proposition of that kind, the hon. gentleman finds that they have no sympathy at all with the North-west or with the constituency which he represents. I do not think, I do not believe, that the people of the North-west Territories thank the hon. gentleman for coming here and asking for alms on their behalf, as he has done on this occasion. I do not believe that there is any real desire amongst the people of the North-west to be treated differently from the people of any other part of Canada. The feeling that I find prevailing among the people there is that the Government's policy with regard to a great many matters involves unfair treatment of the people of the North-west, and that is what they object to.

Mr. DAVIN. Explain that, please.

Mr. MARTIN. What I say is that I do not believe the hon. gentleman's own constituents would support him in coming here and asking different treatment for them from that which every other constituency would be entitled to. And, of course, this is a proposition, as the hon. Minister of the Interior pointed out, which cannot be accepted—to hand over the public property as a gift to any particular constituency. However, I quite agree that the position of affairs in Moose Jaw, in Regina, in Qu'Appelle, and in Virden, is not a satisfactory one so far as these Government lands are concerned. It seems to me that the proper remedy would be for the Government to pay taxes upon these lands. The Government have gone into business as real estate speculators. In each of these towns they have appropriated a section or a half section of land of the public domain for a town site. I do not see any reason why, under these circumstances, the Government should not pay taxes like any one else; and I think that the Government's failure to do so involves a great hardship. But I think it is as great a hardship to the people of Regina, in which the hon. gentleman lives, as to the people in Moose Jaw. I cannot see the force of the hon. gentleman's suggestion that, because Regina has had the benefit of the expenditure of a considerable sum of public money, that this evil is not as great there as it is in Moose Jaw. It does not appear to me that the expenditure of public money in Regina changes the position of affairs one iota. The objection made by all these places is that the Government tie up a portion of the town site and refuse to pay taxes upon it, and that it is too great a burden upon the ratepayers of the town to have so large a portion of the town site exempt from taxes. It seems to me that there is a very great and very clear distinction between lands of this kind and the lands of the public domain, consisting of land that is not disposed of, and is held simply for public purposes, or land that is used in a place like Ottawa or Toronto, or any other of the cities, for actual public purposes, for the transaction of business. Under our system, whether it is right or wrong, lands and buildings used by the Government are exempt from taxation. But surely, Mr. Speaker, this is a very different thing. Surely if the Government go into the real estate business, as they have done in this case—and I do not propose at this moment to criticise the policy of the Government in taking that step, which may or may not have been a wise one on their part—they would be perfectly justified and there could be no objection to their course, from a public standpoint, or so far as other points of the Dominion are concerned, if they were to pay taxes like others in the same position. And if the taxes were paid, the citizens of Moose Jaw and the other places named would have nothing to complain of. But it is certainly a most absurd and ridiculous suggestion that is made by the hon. gentleman that because these lands do not realize any taxes for the municipality of Moose Jaw, therefore the Government should throw them away. The hon. gentleman is perfectly well aware of the fact that if the property owned by the Government in Moose Jaw were put up at auction, they would not bring anything at all. The hon. gentleman knows that. He knows the circumstances of Moose Jaw, he knows the circumstances of Regina, he knows the circumstances of the west generally, and he knows that at the present moment, if these particular properties were offered for sale, they would not pay the expenses of a sale. Now, under these circumstances, the Government could not be justified in parting with their property. If times were such that the Government could get a fair price for their property at a sale of this kind, there might be some reason in the suggestion. But at the present moment and under circumstances as they exist there to-day, it would simply mean, as has been suggested by some hon. members, that the Government should give away their public property. I do not hesitate for one moment to say—and I am perfectly willing to be judged by the people up there—that I dissent entirely from any such suggestion. I think it is a most unreasonable thing for the hon. gentleman to ask, and I do not believe that the people of Moose Jaw would justify him in making any such request on their behalf. It certainly is a great hardship to all these four places to be deprived of the taxes, and as long as the Government remain in this real estate business of holding and selling town lots in these four towns, it would be very difficult to support them in a proposition to pay their legitimate municipal taxes upon these town lots, just as any other real estate owner does in those towns.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was quite afflicted that the rules of this House would not allow him to characterize this motion of mine, and other motions, as "buncombe motions." He said what he cannot substantiate, and although, logically, I should not be called upon to prove a negative, I will prove a negative; and if I were to adopt the buncombe style of rhetoric of my hon. friend, I would say that I could ram, what is unmentionable in this House, down his throat.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not understand what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman will understand when I have done with him. He says that it is my invariable practice to move motions and then withdraw them.

Mr. TARTE. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. You hear the cuckoo note "hear, hear." I will deal with him in the same way.

Mr. MARTIN. I beg to say that I did not say that.

Mr. DAVIN. I have his words. Do you withdraw them, then?

Mr. MARTIN. What I said was that the hon. gentleman was very careful not to embarrass the Government by his motions, and that when the Government asked him to withdraw them, he either withdrew them or, if he could not do that under the rules of the House, he voted against them.

Mr. DAVIN. I will take that statement, and I say that there is not a tittle of foundation for it, and I will prove it from the records of "Hansard." The hon. gentleman said: "I would like to see him produce a single motion in regard to which he voted against the Government."

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. MARTIN. No, I did not say that. I said that I would like to have the hon. gentleman produce a single motion on which he voted against the Government's tariff policy.

Mr. DAVIN. Then what does the hon. gentleman mean? He was talking about my motion. He said he would like to find a single instance in which I voted against the tariff principles of the Government. Why, Mr. Speaker, suppose the case of a clergyman who had been preaching the gospel, the hon. gentleman might just as well try to blame him because he had not been able to bring forward a single instance in which he had preached a sermon against the divinity of our Lord—just as absurd. Mr. Speaker, if that was what he said—and we will look at the "Hansard" for it—it had no relevancy to the rest of his remarks. The statement that he, and some newspaper writers of about the same calibre, have made is that motions are brought forward by me and then withdrawn. I saw in one of the city papers here an article in which a clever young writer said that I had got a reputation for doing this. The reputation, Mr. Speaker, is in the mouths of Reform newspaper writers and politicians, who believe in that policy that I heard denounced in fitting terms only a short time ago, in the town hall here—they believe in the policy of calumny, and that there is something in the proverb, "Kill a man with lies." Now, Sir, I am going to give an instance to meet the charge of the hon. gentleman. Last session I brought forward a motion that I shall bring forward again here—"That in the opinion of this House it would be expedient to apply $20,000, &c., to establish creameries." We divided on it; the division will be found on page 4021 of "Hansard." All the ministerialists voted one way, and I find the name of Davin in very bad company, amongst the whole Liberal party, headed by the leader of the Opposition. I do not suppose the Opposition voted that way to help me, but merely in antagonism to the Government. I call the attention of the leader of the Opposition to this fact—because, after all, in dealing with the leader of the Opposition, one has this great advantage, that you are always dealing with a fair-minded man, you are always dealing, either in this House or out of it, with a perfect gentleman. Now, I have, I know, that the leader of the Opposition is interested in this matter; and I say that such remarks, coming from a man of some prominence, like the hon. member for Winnipeg, even supposing they had any foundation in fact, are calculated to do harm to the usefulness of members in this House; and I will tell you why. I lay down, as a parliamentarian, that it is the recognized practice in England, and here, and in every Parliament in the world, that if a member wishes to press certain views upon the country, and upon Parliament, he brings them forward in a motion, and has them discussed in order that he may see what is the opinion of the House, and of the country, and when he has ventilated the question, if he sees no chance of passing his motion, then, at the suggestion of the Government, he withdraws it. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I dared refer to what has taken place in this House this session, I could show that in the two cases where I brought forward motions prior to this, those two cases which were referred by the clever young journalist writing in the "Journal" here—and I do not think he meant any unfairness, I thought the writer was too clever, but it only indicated a mistaken attitude on his part—but I could show that in regard to the second important motion, at least, I carried my point. Why, what have we seen when Mr. Blake was a member of the House, one of the most powerful men in the country we have ever had in Parliament? He has risen and proposed a Bill, and when the leader of the House said it could not be taken into consideration this session, but that the Government would take it into consideration the next session, Mr. Blake did what every parliamentarian would do, he withdrew his Bill. We know that my hon. friend from Winnipeg has got a Bankruptcy Bill on the paper, but he knows well that no private member can carry such a Bill this session, he knows precious well that if the Government, by and by, says to him, this session, that it will be considered next year, but it cannot be considered this year, he will withdraw. The hon. gentleman is in the habit of suggesting that I am always making motions in this House and not being able to carry them, when the fact is that I have carried nearly everything I proposed. I have here "Hansard" for 1891, from which I can give the hon. gentleman proof of his utterly mistaken attitude—I will not put it stronger than that. I have no temptation to exaggerate the consequences of the absolute error made by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), but I will say this, that the hon. gentleman has been trying to give an utterly false view to the people outside, which is unworthy of him and his standing in this House and the country. In 1891 I had motions on the paper. I will take two cases from memory. Last year I submitted a motion to the House and had only four or five against me, and in 1891 there was a majority of only 14 against me.

Mr. MARTIN. That was not on the hon. gentleman's question at all.

Mr. DAVIN. It was in 1891.

Mr. MARTIN. The vote was not taken on the creamery matter and on the hon. gentleman's motion, but it was on the question whether the debate should be adjourned.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, you see the kind of applause I receive—I am afraid to use unparliamentary language, but you can imagine what I would say if I were allowed to be strictly accurate. The hon. member for Winnipeg has made a false parry or thrust, and I will point out what it is. I stated in regard to the creamery resolution that I voted with the Opposition last year, or rather that the Opposition voted with me, and that I was voting on the motion. My hon. friend thinks that because a vote was not taken as to whether my creamery motion should pass or not, I was not actually voting for my motion and against the Government. What is the fact? My action was far stronger than if I had voted with the Opposition and against the Government on a straight issue as to my motion; and, Mr. Speaker, I will tell you why. This motion, if carried, was capable—as the hon. member for Winnipeg says—of being construed as actually not a division on my motion, and therefore if I had not been very earnest about it, I would have voted with the Government. But as every hon. member knew at that time, voting for the postponement meant that the motion would never come up again, and consequently I would never have the chance of voting in its favour, and this was a stronger opposition on my part—and I appeal to the leader of the Opposition as a parliamentarian—than if I had voted on the motion. Take 1891—and I cannot at the moment give the references—these are the only two cases I remember, and I am prepared to go on any platform and prove a negative to the statement which some newspapers have brought forward, that I have been accustomed to introduce motions and to withdraw them, and such an assertion has not a leg to stand on in the records of "Hansard," and it is only due to the mendacity of scribblers.

Mr. MULLOCK. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. If you wish, you can apply it elsewhere, but I dare not do it. The hon. member for Winnipeg tells the House that Moose Jaw, in whose name I speak here and whose views I have expressed, is asking alms from the Government.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not say so. I said that the hon. gentleman was doing it for them, and I said I did not believe the people there would ask favours of that kind.

Mr. DAVIN. I say I am speaking for Moose Jaw, and I have the authority of Moose Jaw behind me. When the hon. gentleman says I am here asking for charity, asking for alms, and that he did not believe Moose Jaw would support me, all I can tell the hon. gentleman is, that I have the authority of the people there for my action, that I have their authority, and I have discussed the subject with their leading men. The hon. gentleman, however, does not see why any different treatment should be dealt to them from that which is dealt out to other districts, and that the people do not want any different treatment. If I carry this motion, the result will apply by and by to Regina and to other places.

Mr. MULLOCK. You in Regina have had enough money to pay.

Mr. DAVIN. If we had not the opposition of the hon. member for North York, no doubt we would be able to deal with them all. The hon. member for Winnipeg says he does not see why the Government should not pay taxes, and he declares that at the present time if the Government lands were sold we would get practically nothing for them. It so happens that these lots would fetch something at the present time. But look at the argument of the hon. gentleman. These lots, whether they are saleable or not at the figure, are valued at a certain rate, and you have to pay taxes there and in Regina at a certain rate. If the Government were obliged to pay taxes they would soon be glad to give them up. I have been paying taxes on town lots in different parts of the country, and I would be very glad to be able to give them up—or at all events, to be able to sell them at anything like a figure, for I do not like carrying them.

Mr. MULLOCK. You would sell them at the same terms as is proposed in regard to these lands.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, I would. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) criticised my motion as most unreasonable. He said he did not believe the people of Moose Jaw would sanction the proposed motion. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) understands the people of Moose Jaw better than I do, I am somewhat surprised, and at any rate I will give him an opportunity of voting on this question. In regard to the courage of an hon. member in this House, I want to say something. I am not conscious that my career in this House has shown a want of courage, and if there was a spark of generosity in the bosoms of hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches, who have seen the course I have pursued, they would know that during the whole time in 1890-91 I was fighting with my own Government, trying to get legislation carried—all of which I had carried in 1891—and that I did all this dead against my own interests. I knew Sir John Macdonald, few men in the House knew him better, and I knew well that he was a leader who resented the least appearance of opposition, on the part of any of his followers, though he could always veil his resentment beneath an urbanity which was all-fascinating. People will read in some so-called independent newspapers, and they will hear from certain critics like

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. Goldwin Smith that what we want in this country is some independent politician. Let the hon. member for Winnipeg or any of my critics occupy as I did such a position for four or five years in a House like this; with two cast-iron parties, and they will see where they are. Your own friends do not understand you, they look with defiance on you, and the Opposition does not know what to make of you, because they see you are voting or working against the Government for some reason, and yet you are not with them, and the consequence is that the cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite are painful to you, and you are isolated from your friends. And what will such a man get in the independent press? He will get no support whatever. And from the party press he can get none, because his own party papers cannot understand his course, and the opposition papers will not support him because they would be strengthening what might be an enemy in short time. My hon. friend (Mr. Mills) is not merely a politician. He is a literary man, and he knows well that I am speaking here by the book. He knows well that from 1887 to 1891, I played a part of independence in this House, such as has never been played here by any man related to one party or the other. However, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin); he and his friends think they are making a point by sneering at the course that an hon. member—I do not care whether he be Grit or Tory—may take, in making a motion and then withdrawing it at the suggestion of a member of the Government. Sir, what has the Opposition done up to the present time? Motion after motion has been proposed by them, but have they dared to divide the House? No. They have not dared to show the people how things stand, and what their numbers are. What do they do? They call out "lost on a division" so that it may go out that there has been a division, although as a matter of fact there has been no division whatever. That certainly seems to me to be something of a mockery—I must not say a "cowardly mockery," for I have learned that the expression is unparliamentary.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the Government could pay taxes, as the hon. member (Mr. Martin) suggests, could they not take steps to bring those representing the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the interests of the Canada North-west Land Company, together, and say: Let us do our best to get rid of the portion of the town-site in Moose Jaw that now belong to us. Suppose the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canada North-west Land Company agree to it—and they might easily be persuaded to agree to it—I do not suppose that the towns would be unreasonable. They might surely be persuaded to agree to it, because the Canada North-west Land Company pays taxes, and that is why the Minister of the Interior said, that arrangements had been made that a quarter of the taxes should be paid. That means, that the taxes covering the quarter owned by the Canada North-west Company have to be paid in consequence of the decision of the courts. The courts decided that the lands that passed into the hands of the Canada North-west Land Company had been alienated and were therefore liable to taxation, and so, a quarter of the land is taxable but there remains three-quarters untaxable. If the Government would submit to be taxed, as suggested by the member for Winnipeg, they could also take steps to call their partners in the town-site together and make a more equitable arrangement, whereby they would allow these townships to really go on unhampered and unharassed in their municipal course.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has appealed to me to support this motion. I can assure him—indeed it requires no assurance on my part—that it would always afford me pleasure to give support on the floor of this House to;—what shall I say? Well, to an independent member, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is, or at least supposes that he is; whenever he moves a motion which the Government have not been able to adopt. But, I would remind my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) that, if he wants us to approve of a motion moved by him, it is not sufficient simply to move it, but he should give us some information as to the reasons which should impel the House to the course which he suggests. Let the hon. gentleman read the motion which he has laid before the House. It is as follows:—

That the Government should at once take steps to alienate, at any figures obtainable, whatever property it possesses, directly or indirectly, in Moose Jaw, North-west Territories, other than property used for public offices, and in such a manner, that the property alienated shall thereafter be liable to taxation.

Well, there are many facts here which are brought to the attention of the House for the first time; facts of which they have had no information up to the present moment, and of which even now they have very scant knowledge. First of all, here is the assertion: that the Government possesses property in Moose Jaw. I may say I give as much attention as perhaps any man to the business of the House and to the affairs of Government generally; but I was not aware up to this moment that the Government were possessed of any land in Moose Jaw, and I believe that there are many members who are also unaware of the fact. It turns out that the Government are not exactly owners of lands in Moose Jaw, but simply, that there is a trust for the benefit of the Government, of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and of the North-west Land Company which are the owners of some land in that place. I am quite ready to agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), that probably this monopoly—for I cannot see that it is anything else but a monopoly—is in all probability very injurious to the people of Moose Jaw. Why it was created I cannot conceive. But, I can very well conceive that any such monopolies—and there are too many of these land monopolies in the North-west—are a great obstacle to the development of Moose Jaw or any growing city. There might be good reason for alienating that land, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) must understand, that though I have no particular confidence in the Government, yet after all, it is very difficult for any members, even for those who have no confidence in the administration of the Government as a rule—it is very difficult for any member to come to a decision, to assert upon a motion of this kind—whether there has been no papers laid on the Table of the House—that there is a case made out that the lands held there by the Government should be alienated. This is the first objection to which I call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin). His motion says:

That the Dominion Government should at once take steps to alienate, at any figures obtainable,—

Well, the hon. gentleman must agree that this is a very strange proposal. If he had said that the lands should be sold at an upset price, or at some regular figure, his proposition would have been more fit for discussion. But, to tell us that we should vote upon this bare motion, that the lands should be sold at any price obtainable, which might be even a single farthing, is a proposition which very few business men would be prepared to endorse. If the hon. gentleman would bring his motion at a later day when the papers have been laid on the Table of the House and when we have some information upon it, for my part I can tell him that I would be very readily disposed to favour it, because as a rule I am much opposed to land monopolies of any kind, whether in the North-west or anywhere else. But at the present time, I am sorry to say that it seems to me, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has not made out a case upon which he could appeal for support to the Opposition, or to any others in the House for that matter. There is a good deal of force in the proposition of my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin); that all such lands held by the Government in trust, not only for those but for other parties, should be subject to taxation. I quite see the force of the motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin). Probably the monopoly which exists is a great obstacle to the development of Moose Jaw. But, at the present time, he has not given us such information as would enable us to give him that support which probably he thinks himself entitled to. If at a later period he brings the matter up, when we are in possession of the necessary information, I can say for my part, that I will give him all the support in my power.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I would not refer to this matter, were it not that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) alluded to me as one of the persons on this side of the House opposing his views. I do not oppose his appeal for relief, and I am prepared to consider it, even if there are obstacles in the way that are insurmountable. The discussion involves a very simple business proposition, although the hon. gentleman has made it the occasion for ranging far and wide touching his political history, and creed, and consistency, and inconsistency, and so on. It appears that he asks the Government to sell at any price that may be procurable, and which means a nominal price if it means anything, whatever property the Government may own in the town of Moose Jaw, other than property used for public offices. The Government give a complete answer to the motion when they say they have no property. They say that they alienated their property in 1883, twelve years ago. They did what the hon. gentleman wants them to do—alienated all the property which they owned of the character referred to in this motion, joining with the two other owners investing their property in trustees. So that there is now no property to which this motion would apply, even if it were adopted. I would have thought that the explanation offered by the Government would have invited the attention of the hon. gentleman to this point—whether it was wise for the Government to have entered into an arrangement of the kind, placing under the absolute control of three trustees the discretion as to when and how they should at any time break up this monopoly. It is true, this arrangement has not occasioned the whole difficulty, because I believe the Government have only put into the pool their share of the whole estate—one-fourth, I believe.

Mr. DALY. I can give the hon. gentleman the information he asks for. The Government have section 32, township 16, range 26, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, section 33 of the same township and range. The North-west Land Company have half, I presume, of the Canadian Pacific Railway section. So that there are two sections, or 1,280 acres in the town site.

Mr. MULOCK. I asked the hon. gentleman what proportion of the whole area of the town embraced the lands covered by this trust. The statement he has made harmonizes with the statement furnished to me by the hon. member for West Assinibola, when he stated that he thought the property held in trust would represent about half the town area.

Mr. DAWIN. Originally, all the property was held in trust, but about half of it has been alienated.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. MULOCK. I can well understand a great block of land such as has been referred to, in the heart of a town, stopping the progress of the town, and I do sympathize with the property-owners of Moose Jaw, under the circumstances. But the very evil complained of here exists throughout the whole of the North-west and Manitoba, in a greater or less degree, in respect not only of property in towns, but of property in townships. At the time of the creation of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, the Government assented to a condition exempting the company's great estate from taxation, and this is just one outbreak of the dissatisfaction with that feature. But I would put this question to my hon. friend: Assuming that that trust did not exist, and that the Government were in a position to comply with his request to sell all this property for whatever it would bring, a nominal price, what would be the effect of such a transaction upon the value of property generally in that town? It seems to me that if you slaughtered or gave away a very large amount of property in this town, you would discredit the values of property owned by private individuals there, and thus do serious injury to the property-owners themselves. So that I am afraid, even if it were possible to comply with the hon. gentleman's request, that it would not be to the advantage of the inhabitants of Moose Jaw. I sympathize with them in their difficulties, but those difficulties are not of to-day's creation. They are the creation of ten or twelve years ago, and the only possible relief that is now within the reach of the town is the taxation of a portion of the property. The Government may be willing to have their one-fourth of this estate taxed, but I presume the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will not be willing. How are you going to get over the exemption of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? I am afraid the people of Moose Jaw must now realize that they have got themselves into this unfortunate position because of the exemption clauses in the grants of land to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the initiation of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract.

Mr. FRASER. I would not have taken part in this debate except for the few remarks made by the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin). I know it is a method of his, when he has a motion which he knows is not going to carry, to lay a wrong foundation by trying to show that the Opposition are opposed to it, in order that he may utilize that as much as possible and put it opposite to the fact that the Government will not accede to his motion. Now, there is no carping criticism in this case at all—no attempt at it. I am sure the hon. gentleman must have known the facts as brought out by the hon. Minister of the Interior before he made his motion. If so, the motion is senseless—there is no point to it at all. If he had all the facts before him, there was no need of his offering the motion. So that it would appear that the motion had another purpose altogether than that of gaining the point to which it would seem to be directed. This seems to break the force of the motion. I might as well say that this motion was made in the interests of a land company out there, who wished to get the land in question at a nominal price. I would not say that, but it would be as regular and fair as to say that the Opposition were indulging in carping criticism because we wanted to get at the facts. I think the hon. gentleman might move in a better and larger sphere than this. Nothing can come of this motion. He knows it now, and he ought to have known it before he made it, because he had been in communication with the Minister of the Interior. But there is a monopoly overshadowing the whole of the North-west; and if he would move—and he would find me supporting him—that the Government should take over all the land there held by parties who are not utilizing it for the benefit of the settlers, and thus repossess themselves of the whole territory at fair and reasonable prices, in order that it might become peopled, that would be a motion worthy of the great statesmanlike qualities of my hon. friend from Assiniboia. It would be something broad. It would not be confined to this one town, but it would be so extensive and broad a movement as would make a name for the hon. gentleman. He would have something to which he could apply himself more worthily than defending his reputation against the somewhat caustic remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad you suggested that, because I proposed that in 1885.

Mr. FRASER. Why does not the hon. gentleman continue? He says that he has succeeded in everything that he has put his hand to, but he evidently dropped this 1885 matter, for he never succeeded in that.

Mr. DAVIN. I was not in the House then. I proposed it in the "Leader."

Mr. FRASER. He proposed it in the "Leader," but when he came here, and was a leader of a party himself, he would not propose it. It is one thing to propose it in a newspaper and another thing to stand up in Parliament and propose it. If that be the right thing, why, when he is here, all powerful, succeeding in every matter that he takes up and brings before Parliament—why does he not move in this direction? Here is a noble purpose, here is a method by which he will immortalize in the North-west, not only himself, but his family after him. I believe that the whole system of men taking up and keeping land for speculative purposes is not only against the best interests of the country but against every higher law that men should acknowledge. Therefore, even now, if the hon. gentleman will undertake this noble work, though he may, like Wilberforce, be many years in bringing about a change, I am sure, as he has never failed, he cannot fail in this. He will at least have this advantage, he will have something which will attract men's sympathies. He will have something, not relating only to towns, in which, according to the information given by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), it is impossible for the Government to accede to his request, but he will have something affecting the country from one end to the other. I sympathize very much with the hon. gentleman in the recapitulation he has given us of the trials of an independent man. They are indeed such as to commend him to the sympathy of every one. And sitting here for the last five years, I could not help admiring how very fairly he has kept his independent position before this House. I trust that many of us will learn what it is to be an independent man and will follow the noble example he has set before us. But I rise simply to ask him that, with his great force and eloquence, he should move in this direction. And if no other person in this House should come to his assistance, I shall support his great skill and eloquence by my avoirdupois, and we will gather round us a party that will relieve the North-west from that incubus which, I believe, more than any thing else, is preventing its settlement. It is a great country. Free it from the shackles that bind it—principally the one I have mentioned by which a man can hold a thousand, ten thousand or a hundred thousand acres of land—and open it to the poor from all lands and allow them to go in there and settle free of restrictions. We will not then have to spend an afternoon in this House discussing a quarter of a section, which three parties have taken up in a town, which would sell for scarcely anything, while millions of acres are lying in the hands of capitalists who will not sell them at such prices as men willing to settle are able to pay.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has informed us that he belongs, not to this but to the other side of the House. But he also has informed us that he is a very independent man and has been for several years engaged in a fierce contest with those whom he was sent here to support. The hon. gentleman says that on these occasions he has generally been found voting with us, but that, as we are always in the wrong, he does not care to be allied with us. The hon. gentleman's position is very much like that of Hosea Bigelow:

His mind is too fair to lose its balance
And to say which party has most sense;
There may be men of greater talents—
They can sit steadier on the fence.

I am inclined to think that the hon. gentleman is not very steady on the fence. I believe the hon. gentleman is on the fence, but he is not the less for that reason a party man. He would be, if he were on the other side of the line, a mugwump; but the mug is always pointing in the direction of the Government. The hon. member has told us how much he has been persecuted, what trials he has endured, how he has had to endure the criticism of journalists that call themselves independent—the adverse criticisms of journals that support the Opposition, and the failure on the part of Government newspapers to come in any way to his relief. He is, indeed, Sir, in this regard, a very singular man, for the hon. gentleman assures us that his own friends look upon him with deaf ears.

Mr. DAVIN. No; I rise to order. The hon. gentleman's own ears evidently were not very acute. What I said was with "défiance." The hon. gentleman does not understand French.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I perfectly understood the hon. gentleman; and if the hon. gentleman had assured us that his friends had looked upon him with blind eyes, why perhaps he might not have been further away from the possibilities than in assuring us that they looked upon him with deaf ears. But the slip was not an extraordinary one under the circumstances, considering the isolated position in which the hon. gentleman stood, without a friend—in that condition of splendid isolation which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) has declared that Great Britain herself occupied. And it was right and proper for us that so distinguished a supporter of the mother country should, like the mother country, stand in so distinguished a position. I will venture to say that we must look to the biography of Abelard and Heloise to find anything which can picture the misfortune which the hon. gentleman is suffering from. Now, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman, in this motion which he has submitted to the House, has asked us to take a certain line of action in respect to matters on which he and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) are not agreed; because if the facts are as represented by the Minister of the Interior, there will be no object in supporting the motion of the hon. gentleman, and besides that, I do not know whether this House could, if the facts are as the hon. Minister represents them, interfere properly with the private rights of parties secured by a contract to which the Government and Parliament of this country were parties.

Motion negatived on division.

CHARLES CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Copies of all reports to Council and Orders in Council respecting the release of Charles Chamberlain from confinement at Stony Mountain Penitentiary, in Manitoba, on a conviction for perjury in connection with the last Dominion election in the city of Winnipeg.

He said: Charles Chamberlain, as the motion states, shortly after the Dominion election in the city of Winnipeg which took place in November, 1893, was convicted of perjury under these circumstances: Mr. Chamberlain came to Winnipeg from Toronto two or three days before the election took place, and on election day, he appeared at a polling booth in that city, and asked for a ballot in the name of, I think, Matthew Leggatt, a well-known citizen of the city of Hamilton. The deputy returning officer, at the instance of the scrutineer who was acting for me at that poll, administered to Mr. Chamberlain the oath that he was this man. He took the oath and was immediately arrested, and afterwards committed for trial; and, his trial coming on at the next assizes, he was found guilty and was sentenced by Judge Bain to serve three years in the penitentiary. I think a question was reserved under the Criminal Act procedure, and that was argued the following term of the full court, and decided against the contention of Chamberlain's counsel, and he then went to the penitentiary. He was pardoned shortly before two years of his sentence had elapsed; and, in response to a question put by an hon. member this session, the Government have stated that the reason he was pardoned was for valuable services rendered. Now, Mr. Speaker, we were warned at the time of the election to which I referred that a determined effort would be made by the Government supporters to commit a large number of frauds of this kind; that they had taken particular pains to organize a personating gang whom we must be ready to look for at the different polling places of the city; and also that generally they had decided, as a party measure, to gain the election, if possible, by frauds of this kind. As an illustration of that I may say that at one of the polling divisions the deputy returning officer opened the poll about half an hour before the proper time and proceeded, in the absence of the scrutineer who represented me, to fill up the ballot boxes with ballots in the names of persons who had not appeared there at all; so that when my scrutineer arrived at that poll, he found that a large number of persons were marked on the list as having already voted, although the scrutineer himself got there some ten or fifteen minutes before the time at which the poll ought to have opened. This deputy returning officer also was arrested, and, at the same assizes, he was tried and found guilty of this offence against the election laws, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $500. Having been fully warned as to the intentions of the Government with regard to this election contest, we, on our part, were fully prepared to meet this onslaught upon us. Chamberlain, I believe, in spite of his statement to the contrary, had not registered more than one vote at the election. When he was arrested he stated that he had already polled sixteen votes in the names of different persons at the several polling places. The Liberal party determined that these two persons should be made an example of, and, at considerable expense to themselves, they pressed the prosecution. They were hampered in every way by the returning officer, who took pains to send in all the papers at once, so that we had very great difficulty indeed in getting the proper evidence before the police magistrate in order to get these two persons committed; for it was necessary to prove the election, the appointment of the deputy returning officer and other matters, which could only be proved by papers in the hands of the returning officer. In spite of all these difficulties, placed in our way by the Government's friends and supporters, we did, at very considerable expense to ourselves, obtain the conviction of Charles Chamberlain, who was sentenced to three years' imprisonment, and of Jacob Holman, the deputy returning officer, who was fined $500. It was, therefore, Mr. Speaker, with a great deal of surprise that the people of Winnipeg learned that the Minister of Justice had advised the commutation of Charles Chamberlain's term of imprisonment, shortening it by a year. I may say that it transpired during the investigation which took place with regard to Chamberlain, that he was sent up specially as an expert from Toronto by friends of the Government there for the express purpose of attempting to personate a large number of voters in that election. It appeared from letters that were found upon him that the person more particularly connected with sending him up to Winnipeg was Mr. John Small, a former member of this House and supporter of the Government, who is now, I believe, collector of customs, or the holder of some other office in the city of Toronto. It appeared from these letters that Mr. Small and other friends of the Government resident in Toronto, learning that the Government were in dire straits in this election, and were liable to be defeated, deliberately employed Charles Chamberlain to go to Winnipeg for the express purpose of registering a large number of votes against me in that election by means of personation. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what valuable services Charles Chamberlain has performed for the Government, except it was in undertaking this very arduous task of going to Winnipeg for the purpose of influencing that election in the way he did. At any rate, it does seem to me that the Government have taken a great deal of responsibility in deliberately using their power of commutation of sentences, in favour of a party friend of theirs such as Chamberlain was, sent to Winnipeg by party friends of theirs.

one of them an official of the Government, for the express purpose of committing this deliberate outrage and this deliberate fraud. It does seem to me that the Government should have been careful, under these circumstances, not to have shortened this term of imprisonment which, to my mind, was not at all too long, because I cannot imagine any offence more serious than that of deliberately attempting to obtain a judgment from the people, not by means of the bona fide votes of the people, but by means of stuffing the ballot boxes, as the deputy returning officer did, and by personating as Charles Chamberlain attempted to do. For these reasons I am anxious to have the report of the judge, any correspondence that may have taken place, and all Orders in Council and other documents in connection with this case. I would be very glad indeed to learn what these valuable services were. It seems to me the Government were not fair in answering the questions in that brief way. They should have gone further and told the House what the valuable services were for which Mr. Chamberlain was released. Of course I know that in the penitentiaries there are rules and regulations under which convicts are allowed to shorten their terms by good conduct; of course, this would operate without any action on the part of the Minister of Justice, or on the part of the Governor General in Council. What the further valuable services were which entitled this man to be released from the just punishment of his very serious crime, I am most anxious to learn. Sir, I must condemn the Government, and I must express the disappointment of those citizens at Winnipeg who, at their own expense, obtained the condemnation of these two men before the magistrate; I must express their disappointment that the term of imprisonment should have been shortened in favour of one of the Government's own heelers, who allowed himself to be used as a tool by men in the city of Toronto and in the city of Winnipeg, supporting the hon. gentlemen opposite, who had determined by hook or by crook, by fair means or by foul means, to obtain in the city of Winnipeg a verdict in favour of the Government, when they knew that that city, if left to itself, and to the free working of the election law, was prepared to give the verdict which it did give, a very strong disapproval of the conduct of the Government.

Mr. MULOCK. If my hon. friend has no objection, I would like to make the following amendment:—

Also copies of all letters, petitions, or other communications to the Government, or any member, or department, or to His Excellency, and of all letters by or on behalf of any member of the Government, or any department, in reference to the commutation of the said Chamberlain's term of imprisonment.

I hope there will be no unnecessary delay in laying these papers on the Table. There has been a good deal of interference with the course of justice within the last few years, and I think it is about time that the House should take some decided stand upon the matter. These remarks have no reference, of course, to the present Minister of Justice, for I am sure he would be one of the last to interfere in the slightest degree with the proper course of justice. But when we recollect within the last two or three years, what appeared to the public, to me at least, to have been some unjustifiable interferences with the course of justice, we cannot too soon, I think, as a House, place ourselves upon record. Only last Saturday I was informed—rightly or wrongly I do not know; I state this for the Government's information, they may perhaps deny it—only last Saturday I was informed that not long ago a case of smuggling occurred in which a member of this House was arrested and put in jail. The officer was over-astute, the Government had not intended that they should capture such big fish, and when it was discovered that the prisoner was a member of this House, he was set at large.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. To what year does the hon. gentleman refer?

Mr. MULOCK. My informant did not give me that information. He is a man who supports the Administration, a man in a very high position; and if the late Minister of Justice wishes to get his name, I will try and get permission to give it to him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I never heard of the case.

Mr. MULOCK. I never heard of it before, either. I will try and get permission of my informant to give his name to my hon. friend. It may not be true, and it may be true. However, I hinge no argument upon that statement, for I am not going to say that it is the case. But we have cases on record now that are beyond question open to public criticism. We have the commutation of the sentence of Connolly and McGreevy, and not one member of the Government has ever defended that act, public opinion has overwhelmingly condemned it. The commutation of the sentence of that unfortunate man Shortis was nothing less than a public scandal. The Minister of Finance shakes his head. The responsibility did not devolve upon His Excellency. We are told that the late Minister of Justice recommended that the law should take its course, and that when the report went to Council—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot discuss those questions on this motion.

Mr. MULOCK. There is an impression that the inaction of the Government in that case was a public scandal. Now we have the case of Chamberlain, that my hon. friend has referred to, and when early this session I put a question upon the paper. I got an answer from the Minister of Justice that Chamberlain had been discharged because he rendered certain services to the country, that he had given some public service. What these services are, we have no official information. The general rumour is that there was some alteration in a public building, the residence of the warden of the penitentiary, that there was about to be a contract let to make this change, and that Chamberlain, being an expert builder, was able to do the work, in fact gave a hint how it could be done at considerable saving to the country, and that for his services in this way, he was discharged. Now, that is public rumour. It may be true, and it may not be true. The Minister of Justice stated, I think, that the discharge was because of services of a pecuniary character, saving money to the country. But if that was the reason, it will be a very difficult thing to justify discharging prisoners on any such grounds. When I was in the North-west a few years ago I learned of a case there—the Minister of Justice will tell me if it is true—where an unfortunate woman was fined the sum of $10, with the option of going to jail for a certain length of time, for having written a few words inside a newspaper. She was obliged to submit to the law, nobody came to her relief. I do not remember whether she was put in jail or paid the fine. But here Connolly and McGreevy were liberated after spending a month or so in jail, although they had committed one of the most serious of crimes against the treasury of the country, and against the liberties of the people. It is true that Chamberlain was convicted by a jury in Manitoba, it is true that his offence savoured of politics, public opinion condemning him, a jury found him guilty, and the judge sentenced him to three years in jail. Can there be a much greater crime against the liberties of the people than that a man shall be able to defy the will of the people. When B. L. Fellows was convicted of what amounted to ballot stuffing, which resulted in placing bogus votes on the roll, and was sentenced to eighteen months in jail, did anybody at that time ask that his sentence should be shortened? If I remember history aright, he served every day of the term in the common jail as a common felon, and the result was that his life was blighted and his public usefulness was gone. But hon. gentlemen opposite discharged, after two months' service, the hon. member for West Quebec (Mr. McGreevy), and he now sits in this House. Is it not shocking that public opinion should be so demoralized and that there should be such maladministration of justice as this? I feel that among the many crimes and offences for which this Government is responsible that action which tampers with the administration of justice is the most unpardonable. You invite lawlessness by giving support to the belief that prison doors are not strong enough to hold within the walls of a prison a convict who may have a hold upon the Administration, political or other influence. That view is permeating the public mind. I heard the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) on a certain occasion indicate that but for respect for the law—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. I am in order. I have not said when or where. The hon. member for Beauharnois on a certain occasion stated that but for the respect that his constituents had of the majesty of the law, and but for the assurance given to them—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MULOCK—that the law would be administered, they would have taken the law into their own hands. The country will see that the time has arrived, is in fact long since passed when these interferences should cease. I have before on the floor of the House expressed my view in strong language, and I await any further comments until after full explanations touching this matter are before the House, and I hope they will be before the House at a sufficiently early date to enable us to say whether or not this case further illustrates improper interference with the administration of justice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the House on consideration will agree with me that it is a deplorable occurrence for a member of this Parliament to rush to such hasty conclusions in the absence of full information. If the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) was disturbed in regard to the administration of justice and so anxious that the stream of justice should run pure, I do not think he would so strongly seek in advance of accurate information, to convince this House and the country that there has been maladministration or any tampering with justice. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) admitted that at this stage he was labouring under absolute ignorance as to the cause of the release of Mr. Chamberlain. He stated that the only reason given was that it was for services rendered, and he construed these services as having been rendered in the electoral contest in Winnipeg. I am dealing with what the hon. gentleman stated, and he does not correct me—that his assumption was that the services were in connection with an electoral contest, outside of which he knew nothing. It is true the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) added that he had heard that those services were services in connection with improvements to the building of the penitentiary. I must assume absolute and entire responsibility for action in this case, for I was Minister of Justice at the time of his release.

Mr. LAURIER. The statement was made by the Minister of Justice that Chamberlain had been released for services rendered.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for Winnipeg added that they were services rendered in connection with an electoral contest. For that statement there was no foundation.

Mr. MARTIN. What I said, and the impression I intended to convey was that this man had undoubtedly rendered political services to the Government, and there was that kind of reason for liberating him. I did not wish to convey the idea that the Minister of Justice in answering the question referred to that kind of service; but I want to point out that this was a case in which the Government should not have interfered, because this man was a Government supporter and had been engaged on that kind of work by the hon. gentleman's party friends on the occasion to which I referred.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. However that may be, I assume absolute responsibility for the case of Chamberlain. I consulted none of my colleagues in the Government; I was not bound to consult any one of them. It was one of the cases under the Governor General's instructions where His Excellency is instructed to consult a member of his Government, usually, as the practice is, the Minister of Justice. The reason why, under the instructions, that member of the Cabinet is not expressly referred to is obvious—he may not be available at the moment he is required. But as in the case of the Home Secretary in England, these cases, which are not capital cases, are dealt with by the Minister of Justice of the day, and he is responsible in every sense to Parliament for the advice upon which His Excellency acted. In this particular case I did not even do what I might have done, casually consult with my colleagues. I acted on my own official and individual responsibility. I believe when the papers are brought down, all fair-minded men in this Parliament and in the country, so far as they have looked into the matter, will say that what I did was right and would have been done by any hon. gentleman in my place. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) must remember that there were several petitions; two, I think, at least, from the city of Winnipeg, numerous signed regardless of party; asking for the release of this convict, long anterior to his release. Mr. Isaac Campbell, for instance, is well known to the hon. gentleman. He was his chairman, if I recollect aright.

Mr. MARTIN. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. At any rate he was chairman of the convention which received the leader of the Opposition, and he is a man of high standing, and an opponent of the Government. Mr.

Campbell thought this was a case where the clemency of the Crown might properly be shown, and I mention his name because I recollect it very well, as appearing along with the names of others on the opposite side of politics not so well known to me. In Sir John Thompson's time this petition was received, but the Minister of Justice did not think that the time had arrived when the case of Chamberlain could properly be considered, and he made no recommendation. In my time another petition, most influentially signed whether you take the names of Conservatives or Liberals in the city of Winnipeg, was laid before me, and in dealing with it I was considerably bothered. The House will see when the papers come down that though the judge took what might be considered a severe view—it was considered a very severe view by a great many people in Winnipeg—nevertheless under the law of the land it was impossible to say that it was an improper sentence. A person looking at the facts after the trial, and making allowances that perhaps the judge would not altogether entertain, might come to a different conclusion. However, that was no reason to recommend clemency. So, with great regret—I confess it, because from what I had observed, and even from the evidence in the case that I saw, I could consider how this man had perhaps been more sinned against than sinning. I am not going to travel into gossip. I know nothing of it as to who were behind this man, or how it was that he came to do what he did; but nevertheless, he was a man who at this particular time had not been taking very good care of himself. At any rate, he came within the clutches of the law. He was convicted, and he was sentenced to serve three years in the penitentiary at Stony Mountain. Now then, before he was released he had served two years, and if I remember aright, it entitled himself by good conduct from the day of his entry into the penitentiary to the day of his discharge, to something like a remission of four months on the sentence of three years.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the abatement?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The exact number of days I have forgotten, but I think without one bad mark, it would make four months in the two years. I think four months could be earned where there is no misconduct. The exact number of days I have forgotten, but the papers will show.

Mr. MULOCK. May I correct you?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, if you want to.

Mr. MULOCK. I have the answer of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) here. The sentence began on the 14th March, 1894, and he was discharged on the 21st December, 1895.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It made a year less, but at all events, the papers will show everything more correctly. In substance my memory is correct for I took a great deal of pains in dealing with the case. No action was taken on either of these petitions, representative and influential as I considered them; and with all the circumstances that I would like to consider favourably, I did not feel warranted in acting favourably upon them, and my advice, which was submitted to His Excellency, will be seen on the record. No action, therefore, was taken and this man stood to serve his full term. Now then, I think it is unnecessary for me to assure the House, that the only reason upon which I was induced to act, and the only consultation I had in connection with that action, was an official one which arose, I think, five months after I had recommended that this convict should not be released. The inspector of penitentiaries on his annual tour went to Stony Mountain, and there he had to deal with a subject that had been before the department. There had been built, some time ago, a very large house for the warden; a large stone building, three or four stories high, and the present warden had been unable to live in it, because, being large and so high, it was impossible to heat the house without burning an enormous amount of fuel which the warden said was more than he could afford. Consequently he was unable to live in the building, although it was within the prison grounds and most convenient for his work. Among the duties the inspector had to perform was to see what could be done in connection with this building, and calling upon the trade instructor, he asked for an estimate for taking off the story that was not required so far as space was concerned, and in that way making it possible to have the building properly heated. The trade instructor made his examination and reported that it would cost some $3,500 to do this. That was considered an expense, more than the department felt warranted in assuming. There was no appropriation for it at any rate, and it seemed to make any remedy for the case hopeless. The convict Chamberlain, who was a master builder, I believe, approached the inspector, or at any rate was able to tell him, that he believed that if he was given the assistance from the penitentiary which he required, he could do the whole thing for the sum of $25; he would remove this story, and put the country to no further expense than $25. I was consulted by the inspector and asked if I would permit the attempt to be made. I saw nothing to lose by it in any way. The building was there, a white elephant upon our hands, and practically useless for the purpose we required it. If this story could be removed it seemed to me to be a most desirable thing. Instructions were given to allow this attempt to be made, and the story was removed, leaving a compact building.

By taking advantage of the prison labour the work was completed for something like $15 odd. The suggestion at once occurred to me, and I followed it up as the papers will show, as to how it could happen, if we had a properly qualified trade instructor on the penitentiary staff, that a job which he could not handle without so large a sum of money as $3,500, could be done for the sum of $25; or as it turned out, for the sum of $15, using, of course, the prison labour. It turned out that as a trade instructor, we had not, of course, a man with the qualifications in connection with building that Chamberlain possessed, and that this trade instructor, like the trade instructors in other penitentiaries, while very expert in certain trades, was not an expert builder. Now, the inspector made his recommendation in Chamberlain's case on the ground of this service being rendered to the department, and I challenge the contradiction of any man who takes the trouble to look into the administration of prisons either in this country or in England, to point out an instance in which circumstances of that character are not taken into consideration. And so, acting upon the traditional practices in these cases, and upon the inspector's report which will speak for itself. I undertook to advise executive clemency. The papers will show in the main the facts which I have mentioned. I can give my assurance that no other considerations entered into the handling of the case. That, of course, fortifies my position against the unfair insinuations thrown out by the hon. member for North York, in view of my action on petitions that preceded this case by a good many months, if my memory serves me. You, Mr. Speaker, have stopped the debate on subjects that do not relate to the matter in hand. But I think the hon. member for North York would be more wise if, instead of doing what he has done in the case of Connolly and McGreevy—interjecting extravagant language into a debate where the subject does not properly come up—he would found some motion on the case, and test the sense of this House after a regular discussion upon the information which was moved for by that hon. gentleman, was laid before this House, and has never yet been discussed by him.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, it has.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Once, certainly, and not at all to the hon. gentleman's credit. On a totally different subject, he ventured to say something about it, and the late Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson, administered to him a most severe rebuke for his conduct.

Mr. MULOCK. That is your opinion, but nobody else's.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. With this statement, I am content to leave the subject at this stage. What was done in that case, and in every other, was done in every similar case that had come before every Minister of Justice in Canada from 1867 down to that date; and the discussion stopped at the statement of Sir John Thompson, which no hon. gentleman has ever challenged or could successfully challenge. However, I have taken the pains to make good that statement, and I have the record to show that what was done in Sir John Thompson's time in connection with the case of Connolly and McGreevy was done in the time of Blake, Macdonald, Laflamme, and is done in England in every case of this kind.

Mr. MULOCK. There never was such a case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. When the hon. gentleman says there never was such a case, it only shows the reckless spirit that has taken possession of him.

Mr. MULOCK. Name one. I challenge you to name a case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Dozens of cases, when the hon. gentleman has the manliness to bring the subject up at a time when it can be fully discussed.

Mr. MULOCK. You cannot name one.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the discussion on the case of Shortis, the hon. gentleman had to make the most extravagant statements, although, with the practical consent of both sides of the House, that case is waiting until the full information regarding it is laid on the Table, when I am quite certain the Government will have no difficulty in showing that their action in that matter was perfectly justifiable. I have only to say this, Mr. Speaker, and I claim the right to say it as a member of Parliament. It is a deplorable thing that cases involving the exercise of the prerogative of clemency should come before Parliament at all. I quite agree that it is a desperate thing, in connection with the government of this country, if there are cases which require to be reviewed by this Parliament. I quite admit that; but I want the House to understand, and the Opposition to understand, the grave responsibility that seems to me to underlie their position when they do challenge a case in which the prerogative is exercised. I speak by the book. I do not know what the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) wants to say. He has several times interrupted me in an inaudible way. If he wants to say anything to me, I will sit down while he says it.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I have a similar case to that mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), and I cannot get any report about it. I have several times asked for the papers, but they do not come down.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You will see, Mr. Speaker, how absurd some of these interruptions are. They have nothing whatever to do with this case. I was speaking concerning the practice in England, and the delicacy of bringing these cases before the House. I recognize the responsibility of the executive in these cases, and the responsibility of the individual upon whom rests the responsibility of dealing with them. But there is also a great responsibility upon the House of Commons, and upon hon. gentlemen who feel warranted in bringing these cases up. Unless they are strong cases, in which absolute scandals are perpetrated, which should instantly wreck the Government concerned or the man concerned, there is a weakening of the administration of justice that will have its effect in the country all over. That is the practice in England, and that is the opinion of Parliament there. So that I say that the hon. member for North York, if he is sincere in these matters, should speak with less emphasis at the stage at which he has undertaken to speak to the House. When the papers come down, if they bear out the view he has taken, no language could be too strong to apply to the action of the persons concerned.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. member for Picton (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) said there had been, on two different occasions, petitions presented to him asking for the release of this man, Charles Chamberlain, and he dwelt very strongly on the fact that these petitions were signed by Liberals as well as Conservatives. I understood him later, however, to say that he had refused to act upon the petitions, and that he did not in any way rest his case, in justifying the action he had taken, upon the petitions. If that were the case, then I can hardly see what object the hon. gentleman had in alluding to the petitions at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see my object was to meet the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), that despite all the difficulty connected with obtaining this conviction, the general impression of the community was that the man had been properly convicted and was averse to any exercise of clemency, and I was endeavouring to meet that point when I said that the desire to show mercy was not altogether confined to one political party.

Mr. MARTIN. It becomes necessary then to refer to the question of these petitions, and I may say, in the first place, that I attach myself very little importance to a petition in a case of this kind, knowing as I do, how easy it is to obtain signatures of people to petitions of this nature. But in addition to that, in this particular case, I am aware of the circumstances under which the signatures of people in Winnipeg were obtained. The persons who went round with the petitions utterly repudiated any desire to alleviate the condition of Charles Chamberlain. They admitted that he had been justly sentenced, and that there was no excuse at all for any application to get him out of penitentiary on account of any merits he had in himself, but they represented that he had a wife and a large family who were in destitute circumstances, and that it was very hard upon them that he should remain so long in penitentiary. It was upon that plea that people were induced to sign these petitions. So that I do not think these petitions represent in any way the views of the people of Winnipeg with regard to the period of time for which Chamberlain was sentenced, or with regard to the merits of the case at all. They simply show that these persons who signed the petitions were influenced by the strong appeal that was made to them, not on behalf of Chamberlain, but on behalf of his unfortunate wife and family. So that, Mr. Speaker, I think that, for every reason, we can dismiss from our consideration these petitions. The hon. gentleman rather deprecated any discussion of this matter in the absence of the papers. At the same time, he himself fully discussed the question, going very fully into the reasons which had induced him, as Minister of Justice, to recommend the shortening of the period of incarceration of this man by a whole year. I was very anxious to learn the full particulars of the reasons which had induced the Government to pardon this man, and what the valuable services were to which the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) had alluded, in replying to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). We have now, in the explanation of the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), the reason of the Government, or his reason—because the hon. gentleman appears to prefer to take the full responsibility himself for releasing this convict. I must say that I can see no justification whatever for it. As I understand the hon. gentleman, he claims that there was a saving to the country of $3,500 less $15, through the ability or knowledge which Mr. Chamberlain possessed as a builder. Even if that were correct, I would certainly dispute the validity of any such excuse for recommending the discharge of a convict. If it be right that a convict should be discharged because he has saved, through the exercise of some skill peculiar to himself, the sum of $3,500 to the Government, then, on the same reason, would it not be just as right that the Government should release the convict upon payment of that sum? Surely if it is a question of money, if it is a question of value received, then it would be very much better—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And two years' punishment.

Mr. MARTIN. Let us keep the two things separate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, I shall discuss in a moment the question of whether the sentence was too long or short. I did not understand the hon. gentleman to say that he had granted the release upon the ground that the judge had erred on the side of severity, and should only have given two years. The hon. gentleman perhaps did indirectly allude to that, but it was not put forward in reply to the hon. member for North York by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) as the reason. The reason given is that this man saved the Government $3,500. If that be a valid reason, why the Government can do very much better than that with regard to their convicts. I am satisfied that, in many instances, the Minister of Justice will find that convicts are prepared to pay even greater sums than $3,500 for the purpose of purchasing a shortening of sentence. But when you come to examine the hon. gentleman's contention that this man had saved the Government $3,500, you find that there is nothing in it. We find that he did not save the Government anything at all. But he was able to show that the Government trade inspector, who had been entrusted by the Government with the task of fixing this building was utterly incompetent to do his work. If the trade instructor had been a competent builder, who understood how to fix this building in the way the Government required, and if he had made a proper estimate showing the cost would be $3,500, so that we could assume that if the Government called for tenders to do this work, the price for doing it would be to them $3,500, and if Mr. Chamberlain were the only man in the world who was able to do the requisite work for $15 instead of $3,500, there might be something in the hon. gentleman's contention that he had released the prisoner because the prisoner had saved the Government the sum of $3,500. But that is not so; the Government have not made $3,500 out of this exercise of clemency. It is very clear from his explanation that any ordinary builder who was competent would have been able to do this work for just as small a sum as Chamberlain was able to do it for, namely $15. That being the case, the hon. gentleman's excuse fails entirely. It fails in the first place as being wrong in principle. There is no justification whatever for releasing a convict who was justly punished because that convict is able to save the Government money. But, even if that were a sound principle, even if the Government were justified in using the power of clemency, which they have under the law, for the purpose of saving money, the principle does not apply in this case, as no money was saved to the Government; but, as the hon. gentleman was forced to admit, the circumstances demonstrated that his department had referred the matter to a man who was utterly incompetent to undertake the work, a man who, though, as he says, skilful in some branches of trade and able to instruct in some trades, so far as building was concerned, was quite incompetent and unable to undertake the task. Then the hon. gentleman intimated, although he did not attempt in any way to give it as a reason for this commutation, that public opinion in Winnipeg generally favoured the view that Justice Bain had given an exceedingly severe sentence to this man in sending him to the penitentiary for three years for this offence. I might be inclined to grant that if a man, in the heat of an election, being worked upon by others, committed personation and perjury, and if there were no other circumstances to make his guilt greater, it might be considered a long sentence to send him to the penitentiary for three years. But we must remember that these were not the circumstances in the case of Charles Chamberlain. The hon. gentleman suggested that Chamberlain was more sinned against than sinning. I do not know in what particular. The facts are that this man came all the way from Toronto, fifteen hundred miles away, for the purpose of committing this crime. That was proven before the jury and the judge. The judge might well have thought such an offence, if committed, as I have suggested, by an ardent supporter of the Government in the heat of an election and without due thought of the consequences, might be fairly punished by a year or eighteen months imprisonment. But in the case of a man like Chamberlain, who was furnished in the city of Toronto by the hon. Minister's friends there, including Mr. Small, a high official in their employ and a former member of this House, with a list of 120 or 150 names of persons dead and absent, and was sent, his expenses being paid, all the way from Toronto to Winnipeg, for the express purpose and with the express intention of personating these people or as many of them as he could—in such a case I deny emphatically the hon. gentleman's suggestion that public opinion in Winnipeg thought it was too severe a sentence. I state, and I believe that both Liberals and Conservatives—that is fair-minded Conservatives—felt that the jury in the first place in finding this man guilty, and Judge Bain afterwards in giving him the sentence of three years had done a great deal to prevent in the future such disreputable attacks upon the election laws of this country. I am satisfied that public opinion generally approved the action of the grand jury in the first place, of the petty jury in the second place, and of Judge Bain in the third place. I may say that on previous occasions in Winnipeg there have been attempts to punish men for election offences, and that, in some instances, where all the circumstances were such as I have alluded to, the offence being committed in the heat of an election and without premeditation, the grand jury have thrown out the bill;—improperly to my mind, but I mention the case as showing the state of public opinion. But in this case the circumstances were entirely different. The man had hired himself deliberately to go fifteen hundred miles for the express purpose of committing this crime. The grand jury had no difficulty in finding a true bill, and no difficulty was experienced in getting a conviction by the jury; and, as I have said before, I am satisfied the judge was quite reasonable in giving this man the sentence of three years.

Under all the circumstances, what are we to think? The hon. ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) grows very indignant at criticism from this side of the House with regard to the exercise of the power of clemency by the Government; and he refers to the practice in England, and speaks of the delicacy with which this matter is treated in the Imperial Parliament. But, when we find that a deliberate attempt is made, not alone with regard to this matter but by the action of the deputy returning officer to which I referred in my opening remarks—when a deliberate attempt is made by one side in a conflict to use unfair means in violation of the election laws for the purpose of electing to this House a supporter of gentlemen opposite, when a man guilty of the offence is prosecuted at considerable expense to private individuals and is duly convicted and sent to the penitentiary and when we find him let out on the flimsy excuse which the hon. ex-Minister has brought forward here, what are we to think, Mr. Speaker? Are we not justified in coming to the conclusion, which I do not hesitate to say I have come to, that Chamberlain was let out not because he had saved the Government $3,500, but because influence was brought to bear by those who were more guilty than he was and because of the fact, which has been intimated and which I believe, that Chamberlain was in a position to implicate men whose influence the Government was bound to respect in these notorious transactions. Mr. Speaker, I know that is a very strong charge to make.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is unparliamentary, and it is untrue.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think it is unparliamentary.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Untrue, certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. It is a matter of opinion whether it is untrue or not. The best we can do in a case of this kind is to form our judgment on the facts. I refrained, in my opening remarks, from making any charge against the Government whatever. I expressed my anxiety to know what was the real reason for his release. The reason given by the hon. ex-Minister is that he saved the Government $3,500, but I think, upon an examination of the circumstances, which he depends upon to justify that statement, he will find that no saving whatever was effected to the Government. Then I come to a conclusion on that fact, and while it may be untrue, possibly it is untrue, all we can do, in a case of this kind, is to form our opinion upon the facts before us, and the facts before me to-day and the facts before this Parliament, I claim, justify the opinion that the excuse given by the Government is too flimsy for reasonable men to accept. The other circumstance that is evident in the case, is that the man committed this offence at the instance of the hon. gentleman's friends. It was stated, I may say, that amongst those who had sent Chamberlain to Winnipeg from Toronto to do this work, was a colleague of the hon. gentleman at that time. I do not know whether that is so or not, but that has been stated in the newspapers. It has been stated in the newspapers that Chamberlain was in a position to implicate that colleague in this most nefarious transaction. Now, I do not know whether that is so or not, but I say that there must be some reason for this gross abuse of the pardoning power, there must be some reason for the release of this man, for cutting down the reasonable sentence of three years to a sentence of two years, while the ex-Minister of Justice has no more reasonable excuse than to say that he was able to expose the incompetency of the trade instructor in the penitentiary at Manitoba, because that is all it amounts to. No doubt if the hon. gentleman had gone into Winnipeg and got any builder and taken him out to the penitentiary, he would have been able, with the assistance of the convicts, to do that work for just the small sum that Mr. Chamberlain did it for, namely, the sum of $15. Therefore, the excuse is so transparent that we must, as reasonable men, look beyond it and form our opinion upon the surrounding circumstances. Mr. Speaker, the whole matter is most disgraceful. It is not suggested that there are any further facts in the papers which are to come down which will throw any further light upon the hon. gentleman's conduct. He accepts full responsibility for it, he did it on his own behalf, he did it for the reasons he has alleged to-day. Then, I say, when we remember what has been said in the newspapers, when we remember that upon this man, when he was arrested, was found a letter in the well-known handwriting of Mr. John Small, a former member of this House, introducing this man Chamberlain, under an alias of John Ayre, to Mr. A. W. Ross, now representing Lisgar in this House, that another document was found upon him which stated that Mr. Ross was to be found either at his office at a certain number on Main Street, or at the Leland Hotel, in Winnipeg; and when we find that it has been charged in the newspapers that a colleague of the hon. gentleman interested himself in this matter, then I say the excuse upon which the man was liberated, being perfectly frivolous, being entirely flimsy, people generally, I think, will come to the conclusion I have come to, namely, that in this case, when the ex-Minister of Justice used the pardoning power, he did not use it because it was right, but because it was expedient and in the interest of his political party.

Mr. LISTER. Without imputing any impropriety at all to the ex-Minister of Justice, I think it was unfortunate that that gentleman should have advised His Excellency to extend to this man Chamberlain the executive clemency. I have no hesitation in saying, Mr. Speaker, that the case was eminently one where executive clemency should not have been extended, where no pardon should have been given by His Excellency. What are the facts? An election is going on in the city of Winnipeg, a man belonging to Toronto is sent to Winnipeg with a letter in his possession from a gentleman who formerly was a member of this House, at present collector of customs in the city of Toronto, a supporter of the hon. gentlemen who are now governing this country. That letter was addressed to a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, A. W. Ross, of Winnipeg. It was introducing this man Chamberlain, under an assumed name, to Mr. Ross. There can be no question that the object of that man's visit to Winnipeg was to personate and to commit perjury. The evidence, to my mind, is conclusive on that point, for, found upon his person, was a list of names that he was to personate; upon his person was a letter from a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, directed to an hon. member of this House. Sir, there can be no doubt whatever, in drawing an inference from these facts, that the object of that man's visit was to personate voters, and to commit perjury. We find him in Winnipeg, a thousand miles away from where he lived, while an election is going on, and he is caught red-handed. He is arrested, he is tried for this grievous offence, he is convicted by a jury of his countrymen, not only of perjury of the grossest kind, committed over and over again, but of personation. The judge, in the exercise of that judgment which the law confers upon him, sentenced him to the very short term, in my view, of three years.

Mr. MUILOCK. He did not deliver sentence for some days.

Mr. LISTER. At any rate, I have no hesitation in saying that the sentence pronounced upon this man was a mild one, indeed, in view of the crime of which he was convicted. Who is this man Chamberlain? We do not know. We do know, at all events, the men who were associated with him. We do know the man who sent him to Winnipeg, and we do know the man to whom he was advised to go. The judge, in his discretion, sentenced him to three years imprisonment for the crime, and there is no man in this country, I believe, who is seized with all the facts, who would be inclined to find any fault with the decision of the learned judge. It was supposed that this man Chamberlain had powerful friends. It was supposed, from the first, that a great effort would be made by these friends to secure his release. Sir, I think it is unfortunate for the Government, it is unfortunate for the ex-Minister of Justice, his party being in power, his party being served by this man in his nefarious business, the party who were to gain by what he did—I say it was unfortunate, to put it in the mildest way, that the Minister of Justice should have interfered at all. Whether improper influences were brought to bear or not, I know not. I do not impute impropriety to the ex-Minister of Justice, but what I do say is, that under all the circumstances, in view of the fact that the man convicted was supporting the Government, that what he was doing was for the benefit of the Government candidate, it is unfortunate that this action should have been taken, because it causes a feeling to pervade the public mind that all is not right, and the Government interference gives strength to that feeling.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to say a word. The hon. gentleman is proceeding very fairly on the lines of the present discussion. Of course, as he must understand, I felt that embarrassment to which he now refers. I think it an unfortunate circumstance; I know that the man belongs to the party to which I belong. But I claim that, while that is unpleasant, if a case were made out, it would not be fair, it would be unfair, in my opinion, to take any other course on that ground; that is to say, I should not show my partiality by being severe on a criminal because he happened to be a Conservative. It is natural enough that suspicion should be aroused; nevertheless I felt bound to ignore it.

Mr. LISTER. I quite appreciate what the hon. gentleman has said, that because this man was a Conservative that was no reason why his case should not be fairly considered by the executive. I agree with that entirely. But I say this was a case where executive influence should not have been exercised, because the evidence itself and everything connected with the case show that the sentence inflicted by the judge was a moderate sentence indeed. In exercising executive clemency certain things must be considered. There are two classes of crimes. There is the class known as unpremeditated crime, when action is taken on sudden impulse and in a burst of passion, when there is no intent. There is another class of crime known as deliberate crime, which includes forgery, perjury and personation. These are all crimes of deliberation, not committed suddenly but after thought and mature deliberation. Such crimes as these should always be punished severely. The man who knocks another down suddenly in a brawl and kills him should not be considered a murderer, but the man who pursues him as a sleuth hound and kills him should suffer the extreme penalty of the law because that act was premeditated. In the same way a man who deliberately makes up his mind to commit perjury and carries that out, doing it not once, but dozens of times, who has deliberately thought over the act is not entitled to consideration at the hands of the executive. But there is worse than that. There is the man who commits the double crime, not only of perjury, but of personation, which is a dangerous crime in itself, a crime which this legislature and all legislatures in modern days have tried and are trying to put down by the strongest legislation. This man deliberately committed that double crime. It cannot be said that he was forced to do it, that it was done suddenly in the heat of an election campaign in which he had taken active interest, because he had travelled over a thousand miles to do it. He goes to Winnipeg. He not only personates voters in the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite, but he commits perjury in order that those votes may be recorded. What excuse can be made for such a man? What reason can be advanced for the interference of the executive in a case such as that, and the judge, after his conviction, sentenced him to only three years' imprisonment. Two years of the time passed, and he was released. The hon. gentleman knows what influences were brought to bear. While I would not attempt to say that the hon. gentleman would receive improper influences, yet it is reasonably clear that others have been influenced for some reason, and have urged upon the ex-Minister of Justice the release of this man, and the extension of a pardon to him. From the fact that the crime was one for which no excuse can be made, that sentence, under all the circumstances, was a light one, and the hon. gentleman mistook his duty as Minister of Justice when he advised that the sentence should be shortened and the man should be pardoned. This action was in effect flying in the face of public opinion. What was done had the effect of making people believe that these grave crimes are light in their nature and are not to be severely punished. If there is one crime more dangerous to the community at large than another it is the crime of perjury. No man's life is safe, no man's property is safe, so long as the perjurer is about.

Mr. LISTER.

It is a crime difficult to bring home and difficult on which to secure a conviction, and when a fair conviction had taken place it was the duty of the court to sentence the prisoner severely in order that the community at large may be protected and he be made an example of through the country at large. In a case of that kind the ex-Minister of Justice, under those circumstances, should never have interfered, let the influences be what they might to get this man pardoned, and he should never have yielded, because the crime was a great crime against the country at large. The man who would commit the crime of perjury as this man did, should never be at large, he should have been sentenced not to three years, but to thirty years. On one day he took a false oath thirty or forty times in order to advance the election of one of the candidates. Such a man is a danger and a menace to the community. I repeat that the sentence inflicted by the judge was under all the circumstances, a light sentence indeed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has referred to influences brought to bear. I hope he will allow me to state that the only argument made with me, or representation, if it can be called such, was the second petition supported by counsel, when they presented the case in the usual way in my office. That I did not entertain. Between that time and my action no representation took place, and no influence was brought to bear on me until the circumstances were officially reported and action was taken for which I take full responsibility.

Mr. MULOCK. When the counsel went before you.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The counsel appeared before me very soon after my taking office as Minister of Justice, about a year ago, the papers will show the date. That was the first time I heard about the case, and the next time was on the Inspector's report after his annual inspection.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Speaker, it is usual in such cases for the Minister of Justice to correspond with the presiding judge, and to get his opinion as to whether executive clemency should be extended to the convict, or not. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has not stated—at least I have not understood him to say whether that course was pursued or not, and what the report of the learned judge was.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The report of the learned judge was not in favour of commutation. Perhaps I am going a little too far, and it is only a matter of a day or two before the papers are on the Table of the House, but I may say, the usual course is to refer these petitions to the judge. That course was followed, and one of my reasons for not acting, was the report of the judge not supporting the petition for clemency.

Mr. LISTER. Well, I have some little experience in criminal prosecutions, and I have no hesitation in saying that the report of the trial judge should receive the greatest consideration at the hands of the Minister of Justice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LISTER. The learned judge has seen the accused, he has seen the witnesses, he is familiar with all the facts, he is thoroughly unbiased, he has no motive to wrong the man, and, if the prisoner is guilty he has no reason to recommend his reprieve except in so far as he thinks may be just and right. I repeat that in these cases the opinion of the learned judge is always of the greatest possible consequence to the Minister of Justice in determining whether clemency should be extended or not. And, it is more amazing to me than ever, that this pardon should have been granted, in view of the fact that the trial judge reported adversely to the petition. It does not appear—it is seldom, however—that the opinion of the Crown counsel was asked as to the propriety of extending executive clemency, or not. At all events, we have the fact here, that in this most nefarious transaction, that in the case of this crime without one single redeeming circumstance, a pardon was granted to a convict in the face of the fact that the trial judge reported against the pardon.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is hardly fair, because on that petition and judge's report no action was taken, in consequence among other things, of the judge's report.

Mr. LISTER. Action was taken ultimately, but not on the first petition.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. It is a regrettable fact that my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) did not adhere to the decision to which he first came, and determine that that should be final and conclusive. It does not appear that on the second occasion the judge's opinion was asked.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No; it is never done in a matter of that kind.

Mr. LISTER. His opinion was not asked again; no further communication took place with the judge, and all that was before the Minister of Justice was the adverse report of the judge, and on the second occasion, the petition, and the counsel I suppose who defended the prisoner.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And the long term of imprisonment served.

Mr. LISTER. Under the circumstances the judge ought to have been the judge of that. I repeat that all the facts surrounding this case show that it is a case that the executive should never have interfered with at all. There are certain well known rules guiding the Minister of Justice in such cases as this, but in this case there is not one single feature that these rules could be applied to. There is not one ground which should invite the intervention of the executive in this man's case. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) says that petitions were sent in. As the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) stated, you can get men to sign petitions for almost anything. Rather than say no, most men will put their names to a petition no matter what it is asked for, if it does not cost them anything, and especially if they think they are going to release somebody. So far as petitions are concerned, therefore, no particular importance should be attached to them. But my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) says, that in addition to the petitions this convict saved the country $3,500.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I hope the hon. gentleman will allow me again to correct him. I am sure he would not desire to willingly misrepresent my position. I did not ask the House to consider my grounds stronger on account of the petition. I was endeavouring to meet the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) as to the public impression, and when I found names on the petition of leading men of all political parties, including that of one particular man, a gentleman of high standing but a great opponent of the Government. I argue from that, not that it was a reason to release the prisoner, but it was a reason that that sentence was not considered a mild one, at least. I was then speaking on another branch of the case. I did not justify my action because of the petition.

Mr. LISTER. My hon. friend says that although certain petitions were presented to him, yet he would not allow them to weigh with him if he thought the circumstances did not warrant it. I repeat that the nature of the crime was such that the hon. gentleman should have disregarded all petitions. It was a crime without one redeeming feature, a crime deliberately committed, a crime that ought to receive a severe sentence, and under all circumstances the sentence was a mild one. I think my hon. friend is unfortunate in invoking as an excuse, the work that this convict did; because the point is well taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), that any carpenter in the city of Winnipeg or in that part of the country could have done what the prisoner did. If the hon. gentleman lays it down as a principle: that because a convict saves a considerable sum of money to the country, that is to be a reason for his release, then I think he will lay down a very unsafe and unfortunate rule.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The rule is, and it has been acted upon time and time again, that special service in conjunction with good conduct entitles a convict to special consideration. The services vary. For instance, services in defending the lives of the officers, or in saving property, and I think it is hard to draw the line between these special services. In this case the ingenuity of the man did save a great deal of money to the country. I do not think that any person in Winnipeg, as suggested by the hon. member, would be able to perform the work as this man did, at such a small cost. At all events the officers of the prison were unable to find one.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has pointed out that the officer was thoroughly incompetent.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all.

Mr. MARTIN. You said so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all. I have been misunderstood. I am quite sure the "Hansard" will bear me out if it is referred to. I did not reflect upon the trade instructor. I said, that I myself supposed at the outset, that the Trade Instructor ought to have understood that kind of thing, but on inquiry I found it was no reflection upon the trade instructor, because, in our various penitentiaries in Canada we have not a superfluity of these officers, and we take one man instead of many. An instructor may be extremely good in his particular line, good in making boots and shoes and in certain industries, but he may know nothing of house-joining and work of that character. As a matter of fact, this work was a matter for an expert in house-joining, and it was an exercise, as I believe, of extraordinary ability on the part of this convict.

Mr. MARTIN. Does not what the hon. gentleman say show that he was a house-joiner?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I endeavoured to guard against that. I have not reflected on the trade instructor, because I made special inquiry and found that due care had been used at the outset to ascertain his qualifications, and his conduct shows that even on those special qualifications he was still a good man.

Mr. LISTER. I know perfectly well that service in some instances is a ground for releasing convicts. As my hon. friend says, where a convict saves the life of an official of the penitentiary, or saves the premises from burning, or performs any meritorious service of that kind, there is no doubt that the executive consider these things, and give the convict the benefit of them, for manifest reasons—to encourage others, and to maintain discipline in the prison. But I think my hon. friend is going a great length indeed when he says that some carpenter work performed by a convict, which probably an ordinary builder or carpenter might have done quite as well, entitles a prisoner to be pardoned. I think that would be carrying the doctrine to a dangerous extent. I feel that it was unfortunate, under all the circumstances, that this man should have been released at all, because it leaves an impression upon the public mind that through his friends, he had a political pull. If the opponents of my hon. friend had been in power, and this man had been released by them, of course, no charge of that kind could have been made. But it is unfortunate that, having been guilty of this crime, he should have been released by the party in power for whom he was doing the work. The public are naturally suspicious, and, without their being anything at all in the charge that improper influences were brought to bear, or that any improper considerations entered into the mind of the Minister of Justice, the public are prone to think that, because this man was backed up by influential friends. Such influences were brought to bear, and that as a consequence he did not suffer the punishment which, if he had been a stranger, and friendless, he would have been allowed to suffer. I think it unfortunate that in this sort of cases the law is not allowed to take its course. I have always thought it was particularly unfortunate that the executive should have interfered in the case of McGreevey and Connolly. They were men who had been convicted of conspiring to defraud the country, and of defrauding it, of many thousands of dollars; and, though men occupying high position, men of great influence and power, a jury of their countrymen convicted them, and a judge imposed upon them a sentence which I consider was mild. Yet, after these men had been in prison only three or four months, it was found that their health was so bad that the executive released them. I have always thought that if ever there was a case—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is going too far in discussing that case. He may refer to it by way of illustration, but to discuss the merits of the case is another matter.

Mr. LISTER. I do not propose to discuss the merits of that case further than to say, in illustration of the case under consideration, that I think it is unfortunate where crimes are of a semi-political character that the executive should interfere with the decision of the judge who pronounced the sentence. I can only repeat that the judge who tried the prisoner is the best judge of what is the proper sentence under all circumstances, and so long as that sentence is within reason it should not be interfered with, unless the circumstances are very exceptional, and unless it appears particularly clear that the judge has pronounced a sentence far in excess of the crime which has been committed. I can only re-echo the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), that under all the circumstances it was most unfortunate that the executive should have interfered at all with the sentence imposed upon this man Chamberlain.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, the more this case is discussed, the worse it looks. I think, Sir, that the crime of perjury, of which that man Chamberlain was found guilty, was committed under circumstances which called for the severest penalty of the law. It was not simply an ordinary case of perjury, involving some rights of property, perhaps. It was a case of perjury against society. It was in support of a crime against society, which every man on either side of this House must resent. We come here every year and pass laws in the interests of the people against such crimes—high crimes, they are, against the people. Was three years an unreasonable sentence for that crime? I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if that was the limit of the possible sentence. The Minister of Justice knows perfectly well that the sentence under the law might have been for fourteen years to the penitentiary, the maximum sentence for the crime of perjury, and this was the most flagrant kind of perjury. The judge might have imposed that sentence, within the letter of the law, and almost within the spirit of it, in this case. The Minister of Justice sits as a high court of appeal, to review the sentence imposed by the judge; and, with the report of the judge in his hands against the commutation of the sentence, the hon. gentleman, because the prisoner has helped to save, as he thinks, a few paltry thousand dollars, decides that two years is sufficient punishment for that high crime. The crime, Sir, was of a most serious character, and the excuse given for the commutation will not, I think, be accepted by the public for one moment as a justification for the release, especially when it is against the report of the judge who tried the case, and when the law provides that fourteen years might be the maximum punishment.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Am I to understand that the hon. gentleman thinks that the judge erred in the discharge of his duty by giving this man only three years, when the law provided for a much heavier punishment—four times as great? I think it is unfair to attack the judge.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think I wanted to condemn the judge. But I was, as well as I could, condemning the Minister of Justice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Both together.

Mr. EDGAR. I was pointing out to the Minister of Justice that, if he did not know it before, he will know now, that the judge could have sentenced this man to fourteen years, but instead inflicted a very light sentence on him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Too light, you think.

Mr. EDGAR. Well, he inflicted a lenient sentence. It might have been much greater, but the Minister of Justice, who has no political feeling in the matter, of course, ignored the report of the judge, who knew all about the case, and struck a year off the sentence. Does the Minister of Justice defend his course on the ground that this man was a skilled artisan? And if he had been a bungling artisan, would he never have been released? The release evidently was the reward of his skill or education. If a doctor is put in a penitentiary and is allowed to prescribe for a fellow-prisoner and saves his life, how many years would the Minister of Justice take off his sentence? If a lawyer were in a penitentiary and gave legal advice to the Government—if a very skillful lawyer like the ex-Minister of Justice were in the penitentiary and advised the Government on an important case and saved for the Government one, ten or twenty thousand dollars by his advice, how many years would be taken off his sentence? Or better still, if a rich convict says: I can give you $25,000 for election or any other purposes,—how many years would the hon. gentleman take off his term? That is what it amounts to and the country will not attach the slightest weight to that excuse. In this case, most unfortunately for the ex-Minister of Justice, it was a political crime which had been committed by this notorious political agent, at the bidding of an organized backing in Toronto. He was sent off by them to carry out his system of plugging and telegraphing and personation, fifteen hundred miles away, in the interests of the Government of which the ex-Minister of Justice was then a member. And it was most unfortunate for the hon. gentleman that he cannot find a better excuse than he has given to-night. The hon. gentleman knew perfectly well all about the nature of the crime committed, and that should have made him most careful not to unfairly remit the sentence of a criminal who had got into the penitentiary by trying to serve the political party of which the hon. gentleman is a member, and of the very Government of which he was a member.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES CENSUS.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Return of the census of the North-west Territories recently taken by the Mounted Police, showing the number of male and female inhabitants in each division and showing boundaries of divisions.

He said, I understand that the number of persons found in the North-west Territories, under the Mounted Police census which was taken last year, was somewhere in the neighbourhood of 73,000. Now it is suggested in the Speech from the Throne that the Government intend to give to the North-west Territories an additional member. It is somewhat difficult to conceive on what principle the Government propose to take that course. The unit obtained by dividing the population of Quebec by sixty-five, which is the course laid down in the British North America Act, is, I understand something over 22,000 for each constituency. The North-west Territories already have four members, so that it would be necessary for them to have a population of 90,000, to entitle them to their present representation, and to entitle them to a further increase of one, making five in all, they should have a population in there of something over 113,000. Now, I do not desire in any way to oppose the suggestion of the Government that an additional member be given to the North-west Territories. I suppose there is a good deal in the fact that the Territories are very large in extent, and, therefore, although sparsely populated, there may be a justification for increasing the number of members. But I desire particularly to call the attention of Parliament to the fact that since the census of 1891, the population of Manitoba has increased about 40,000, so that if the Territories are entitled to an increase in their representation of one—although they are still some eight or nine thousand short of the population required for their present representation—then Manitoba, whose present representation is based entirely upon its population, is entitled, according to the census of 1891, to seven members, which they will get in the next House. The representation of Manitoba has been figured out and based upon the unit obtained in the manner I have described. Now, the Government has admitted that Manitoba has at present a population of 190,000. As a matter of fact, the local government claim that its present population is 200,000, but for the purpose of obtaining subsidies—a matter of dollars and cents—the hon. Finance Minister has fully admitted that the actual population is 190,000 people, because he is now paying to that province the sum of 80 cents a head for that number. Therefore, I suggest to the Government that it would be eminently fair that they should give to Manitoba at least two more representatives at the general elections, because they are clearly, so far as population is concerned, entitled to nine members. While the Territories are not entitled to an additional member, yet the Government intend to give them that additional member. I do not for one moment oppose the suggestion of the Government. It might perhaps be pointed out that there might be some difficulty, under the British North America Act, in giving this increased representation to Manitoba, but I think that the Government will have to strain the British North America Act and the amending Acts with regard to this question of the representation of the Territories very much indeed to justify them in the course they intend to take. It would be just as easy, as constitutional and as legal to pass an Act giving Manitoba what it is fairly entitled to, namely, two additional representatives, as it will be for the Government to get over the provisions of the constitution which prevent its giving to the Territories any more than their proper representation according to population.

Mr. DALY. I understand the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) to be that he does not object to the increased representation being given to the North-west Territories, but he thinks that in view of the fact that the population of Manitoba has increased in larger proportion than that of the North-west Territories, and of the fact that the province, under the unit of population, would be entitled to nine members instead of seven, the Government should take steps to give Manitoba that increased representation. Well, the hon. gentleman is aware, that even if the Government desired to do so they could not meet his wishes which, no doubt, would be the wishes of the people of Manitoba. The representation of Manitoba is fixed under the British North America Act as is the representation of the other provinces, but the representation in this House of the North-west Territories is entirely in the hands of this House under the British North America Act of 1886. We can deal with the representation of the North-west Territories ourselves, but so far as the representation of Manitoba is concerned, unless we have an amendment to the British North America Act made by the Imperial Parliament, we are not in a position to change that representation. The hon. gentleman may rest assured that when the redistribution took place in 1891, I, along with the other representatives of Manitoba at that time, did our best to get the full representation Manitoba was entitled to under the census of 1891. My recollection is that the unit of population fixed by the representation of Quebec was 22,400. Our population was 162,000, and seven representatives, being an increase of two, was all we were entitled to, and it would be impossible to-day, even if the Government could see their way to do it—if, on account of the population and as a matter of justice they thought they had a right to increase the representation of Manitoba in this House—for them to do so. No person would be gladder to see increased representation here than I would. There is no objection to the hon. gentleman's motion; the papers will be brought down. And, I presume that if a Bill is introduced, as foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne, the House will have an opportunity of discussing whether or not it will grant the increased representation to the North-west Territories. Those hon. gentlemen who were in the House in 1886 when the Bill was passed that gave representation to the Territories, will recollect that the right hon. leader of the House of that date stated that, as a matter of fact, the population of the Territories at that time did not entitle them to the representation proposed—that is taking the unit of population in the older provinces. But my recollection of the debate is that there were great interests that entitled the Territories to special representation here.

Mr. MULOCK. And great area.

Mr. DALY. A vast area and large interests, which entitled them to representation even greater than that given to the other provinces. A reading too of the debate will show whether I am right or not; but I think that was the reason stated by Sir John Macdonald for giving the North-west Territories four representatives. The Territories have largely increased in population since that time; their railway development has been very large; their interests have greatly increased; and I think the Government will be able to give good reasons for asking this House to give the North-west Territories another representative in Parliament.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am rather surprised at the speech the hon. gentleman has made, but the reasons he assigns for the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which he refers to are the most plausible, perhaps the only reasons why such a paragraph should be there at all. The hon. gentleman will look in vain for such a declaration of principle as that he has stated. I recollect very well the circumstances under which the North-west Territories were given representation in this House, and I wish to call the attention of the House especially to the subject. When it was proposed to give representation to the province of Manitoba and the province of British Columbia, they were given representation on account of their territory beyond what they were actually entitled to on the ground of population. But it was expressly provided at the time that the number of representatives should not be increased until the population warranted that increase, that the principle of representation by population from that time forward was to apply to these provinces precisely as it did to other provinces. When the first Bill was introduced in 1871, in consequence of the position of which Manitoba occupied, it will be remembered by the few who remain in this House from the membership of that time, the Manitoba Act was adopted by this Parliament. I made very strong objection to that, because, in my opinion, this House could not establish under the constitution as it then stood a federal relation between itself and any new province which had its constitution given by this Parliament instead of by an Act of the Imperial Parliament. That subject was taken into consideration by Sir John Macdonald, who was Minister of Justice at the time. A report was made to the Government, and Sir John came down to Parliament declaring that for the purpose of removing any doubt in the matter Imperial sanction would be sought. When the proposition came before Parliament it came in the form of a resolution declaring that Imperial legislation was necessary. Mr. Dorion, who had a seat in this House at the time, Mr. Blake and others insisted that the very words that were intended to be embodied in the Imperial Act amending the British North America Act should be submitted to this House and should be passed by this House as a portion of the address to the Imperial Parliament. That principle was agreed to at that time. In 1886, when it was proposed to give representation to the North-west Territories, Sir John Macdonald proceeded too with a resolution precisely as he had proposed to do in the first instance. The hon. gentleman will see from the report of the debates that I pressed upon the attention of the House the propriety of following the procedure of 1871, and that the address passed by this House asking the Imperial Parliament to empower us to admit representation from the Territories should be embodied in the address sent from this House to the Imperial Parliament. That was not done. The hon. gentleman will find that Sir John Macdonald, then, as leader of the House, read a very brief Bill, which he said was prepared by the law clerk, but was not embodied in the address. And hon. gentlemen who will look at that Bill will see that it is not the Bill which became law by Act of the Imperial Parliament, that, in fact, very important changes were made in and additions made to that Bill. If the interpretation which the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) now puts upon that statute is a correct interpretation, there would be nothing to prevent any government supported by a narrow majority in this House carrying through here a Bill giving to the North-west Territories 50 or 60 representatives wholly regardless of the principle that representation was to be based upon the population. In fact, the representation of the other provinces might be swamped by the excessive representation given by the Government, for political considerations, to the North-west Territories. Before a construction of that sort can be adopted before such a meaning can be attached to that statute, it is very important that this House should look with care to see if it admits of no other construction, for it would be a most preposterous thing for the other provinces to be bound by the rule of representation by population with a view to securing to the people in every part of the Dominion a fair proportion of representation in this House, if it were in the power of the Government to select any territory or province and, at their own discretion, give to that province or territory, representation wholly regardless of the population that such a province or territory might have. Now, that is the proposition for which the hon. gentleman contends. I deny that such a proposition ought to receive the support of this House, if it were in the power of this House to act upon that rule. It is not compelled to give the Territories more representation than the population of the Territories would entitle them to. If the hon. gentleman were to adopt any other rule, it would be indeed a very unsafe thing for Parliament, because it would put it in the power of any government hard pressed to swamp representation from every other portion of the Dominion by the excess of representation given to the Territories. Sir, I do not think that is by any means the only construction which that statute will admit, and I am inclined to think that the only safe thing for Parliament to do, having given to the Territories representation beyond what they were entitled to by population in the first instance, as this House gave to Manitoba and British Columbia, is to refuse any further increase in the representation of those Territories until such increase is warranted by the increased population that may be found there. I have no objection to the motion being adopted; but I have risen at this moment, not to enter into an exhaustive discussion of the subject, but to warn the Minister that if the course which he has intimated, should be taken by the Government, it will be resisted, so far as I am concerned, and I believe that it will be reprobated in every part of the country, because it will absolutely destroy that security which every section possesses by having regard to the principle of representation by population.

Motion agreed to.

TAY CANAL.

Mr. MULOCK moved for :

Statement in detail of the several properties taken possession or expropriated by the Crown for the purposes of the Tay Canal, the names of all the owners or persons claiming any right, title or franchise in respect of the same, the amounts claimed, the amounts paid to such owners or other persons, the names of any persons claiming damages in respect of any property or franchise injuriously affected by the construction, working or otherwise of the said canal; such statement to give details of the specific property, works, and other assets of the Tay Navigation Company taken by the Government for the purpose of the said Tay Canal, estimates of the value of the same, and statements of amounts, if any, paid therefor, and the names of the parties to whom such amounts were allowed or paid. Also, copies of all Orders in Council, documents and other papers showing under what authority the said property and works were taken and used, and particularly whether the same were taken and used under the provisions of the Upper Canada Act incorporating the company, 1st William IV., chapter 11, s. 40-42, and copies of the said sections.

He said. I may inform the House and the Minister of Railways and Canals what the object of this motion is, so that the return need not be more comprehensive than desired. I would say that I am informed that the Tay Navigation Company issued debentures upon its undertaking many years ago, which debentures are outstanding liabilities yet against that company, and that the present Tay Canal Company has been constructed over somewhat the same property, and has become successors to the franchise and properties of the old Tay Navigation Company. It is on that assumption I make the motion. It happens that some of these debentures became the property of the old province of Canada in trust for the University of Toronto, and are outstanding and unpaid, and it is for the purpose of investigating the claim in connection with that matter, that I make this motion. The university has been moving in the matter and they have to obtain permission from the Ontario government to institute proceedings against, either the Dominion of Canada or the province of Ontario, with regard to this and other claims, and it is for the purpose of obtaining information in connection with that application and movement, that I make this motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE SUPERANNUATION FUND.

Sir JAMES GRANT moved for :

Return of—1. The names of all officers in the service of the Government of Canada on the 30th June, 1895, contributing to the Superannuation Fund, as established prior to the passing of "The Civil Service Superannuation Amendment Act, 1893."

2. The names of all officers in the said service who contributed to such fund and who prior to the said 30th June, 1895, ceased to be officers in such service, but who did not receive a retiring allowance or a gratuity under the Superannuation Act.

3. The date of appointment of each such officer.

4. The salary of each such officer at the time of appointment.

5. The number of years' service of each such officer.

6. The gross amount contributed by each such officer to the Superannuation Fund up to the 30th June, 1895, or up to the date when he ceased to be an officer in the said service, as the case may be.

He said: The chief object in bringing this subject before the House is to have it carefully considered. These officers form a very influential body in this city, and many of them think that their rights are not properly protected. When the facts are fully presented that class in this community will see that the Government have every intention to guard their interest in the affairs of this country.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House

Bill (No. 56) respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Lachapelle.)

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. MULOCK moved that Bill (No. 7) further to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, be placed again on the Order paper for further consideration of the Committee of the Whole.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Lost.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not suppose that any hon. gentleman would have objected to this motion, and therefore assumed that it was not necessary for me to add anything in recommendation of it. I presume that most of the members know to what the motion refers; but as there may be some members in the House to-day who were not present when this Bill was in Committee of the Whole on the former occasion, and where it was defeated, for their information I would say that it is the Bill having reference to the matter of railway passes to members. I submit the motion and trust it will receive the further consideration of this House.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 57) respecting assignment and attachment of salaries of public employees.

THE REMEDIAL BILL (MANITOBA).

Mr. DICKEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 58) intituled The Remedial Act of Manitoba.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid any explanation I can give to-day, with the members of the House of Commons not in possession of the Bill, will be very inadequate, and will really not furnish hon. members with any very definite information as to the details of the Bill. The only thing I can say to the House in asking leave to introduce the Bill is to refer to the general lines on which it is drawn. I may say that in drafting it the lines of the old legislation in Manitoba have been followed as closely as possible, in order that while restoring those rights which it was thought desirable should be restored, we should not transgress the lines of the jurisdiction of this Parliament. It has been a matter of very grave difficulty, I need scarcely say, to frame the Bill. The general scheme, I may say, is this: It was found impossible to restore to the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba those rights which it was thought they were entitled to under the constitution without establishing a system of separate schools. In order to make that workable, a Board of Education is to be established in the province for separate schools, composed of the same number of members as the Catholic section of the old Board of Education. This board will have power with respect to organizing and carrying on the schools. The standard of education to be taught in these schools and the standard of the teachers who are qualified to hold licenses will be not identically the same as in the Public School Act of Manitoba, but of as high a standard. The persons who contribute to those schools, the separate schools, are prima facie to be all Catholics in Manitoba. But the Roman Catholic who prefers that his children shall attend the public schools, and decides that he will contribute to the public schools, has the right to make that choice by giving certain notices, which will be found in the Bill, and he becomes quoad a Protestant, a contributor to the public schools and not to the separate schools. The inspection is to be of a double kind. What I may call the every-day inspection of the schools for the practical working is to be carried on by inspectors to be appointed by the Board of Education, the body to which I have referred. There is a further inspection to be made by inspectors to be appointed or to be authorized in that behalf by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council in the province of Manitoba. These inspectors of the local government will inspect the schools simply for the purpose of certifying to the efficiency of the teaching in them. It was thought desirable that an entirely independent inspection should be had for the purpose of testing efficiency, but, as I have said, the practical, every-day inspection is to be made by what we may call domestic inspectors, appointed by the Board of Education. It is not necessary for me, I think, to go into any further details. The Bill provides for certain powers as to trustees and as to ratepayers and other matters that are essential to the working of any school system, and which are necessarily in the nature of details that cannot be discussed at the present time. One very troublesome question dealt with by the Bill is the question of school books. That, I may say, gave a great deal of difficulty, but it was finally settled on this basis, that the Board of Education should be able to choose the school books, their choice, however, being limited to this, they should only select school books that have been the choice of the public schools of Manitoba, or the books in the public separate schools of the province of Ontario. That gives a fair range of choice, and it will secure, I think, what will be readily admitted to be a very high standard of books. These are the general lines of the Bill. I do not intend particularly to discuss either the details or the principle of the Bill to-day, because this can be more fittingly done on another occasion. I do not think I need say more to put the House in possession of the lines on which the Bill has been drawn.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell the House about the financial aspect of the measure.

Mr. DICKEY. The financial aspect of the measure, is this: The Catholics who become adherents to this school system, or rather who do not dissent from this school system, are allowed to tax themselves for separate schools in the district, and they are exempted from taxation for the public schools of the province of Manitoba. The municipality is enjoined by the Bill to collect the whole municipal taxes over the whole of the property in the municipality, and distribute it for the support of schools in the municipality; by property, in that sense, I mean Roman Catholic property subject to be taxed for the support of separate schools. The subject of a legislative grant was one of very grave difficulty, and the constitutionality of the provisions relating to that will, I have no doubt, be the subject of discussion in the House. But, so far as the Bill is concerned, the attempt that was made by the Government was this. There were two aspects of the question. The sharing of the legislative grant was one of the rights adjudged particularly to the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba in the Privy Council decisions in England and Canada. That, therefore, was one of the rights to which they were particularly entitled. On the other hand, it was felt that for this Parliament to attempt to interfere directly with supply granted by the province of Manitoba would lead to enormous practical difficulty, besides being of a very highly offensive character, if I may use that term—to the local authorities. The Government did not feel that this House had any constitutional authority to deal practically with the question of the legislative grant, and, so far as the difficulty was considered possible of solution, it is solved in the Bill which I propose to introduce, by adjudicating that the right to share in the legislative grant be one of the rights and privileges of the Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba, taking it for granted—as I think later discussion will show, we have a right to do—that the province of Manitoba itself, will after the system is established, supply that fund to the separate schools. That, of course, will be a matter of discussion later on. I do not know that I can say anything further just now as to the financial aspect of the case.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to ask my hon. friend, if he can tell me at this moment, by whom is the Board of Education for the separate schools to be appointed?

Mr. DICKEY. It is to be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province of Manitoba, and after three months default in making any appointment, the Governor General in Council here is clothed with power to fill vacancies and to complete the board.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) I desire to know from the hon. Minister if this Bill has received the approbation of the religious authorities?

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) The hon. member may inquire for himself.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I would like to know from the hon. Minister of Justice, or, at least, from the French Ministers, if the Bill is translated in French?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) It is not yet translated.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dickey), if he is prepared at this moment—this is, of course, a very important measure—to fix a day for the second reading?

Mr. DICKEY. I am not at this moment prepared, but I have no doubt that the leaders of the two sides of this House can agree at a later date.

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest that some time would be needed for the study of this Bill before the second reading.

Mr. DICKEY. Quite so. I would point out to the hon. gentleman that the Bill is not yet printed in French.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask, whether it is the intention of the Government to communicate a copy of this Bill to the government of Manitoba, before the second reading; and whether, they will be invited to express any opinion upon this subject?

Mr. DICKEY. I think there would be no objection at all to that course being followed, although I do not know that it would be necessary. If it is considered more courteous it shall certainly be done.

Mr. HAZEN. I wish to ask the Minister of Justice, how many clauses does the Bill contain ?

Mr. DICKEY. There are 112 clauses.

Mr. MARTIN. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say it is printed in English, and will be distributed to-day ?

Mr. DICKEY. No, but I think very shortly. Probably to-morrow or the day after.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

EXPORT OF AMERICAN CATTLE FROM ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to refer to a statement in one of the newspapers, I think, of Saturday last, as to a declaration which I made in the House on Friday of last week, with reference to the Order in Council which has been passed in connection with the shipment of American cattle from the port of St. John. The newspaper to which I refer questioned the accuracy of my statement, which was : That when I was asked for the information on Friday the 24th day of January, I could not give it because the Order in Council had not been signed by His Excellency, and I was, therefore, not in a position to communicate it to the House. I wish to state now in the hearing of the House, that the charge made by that newspaper, that I had made a misstatement to the House, was absolutely untrue. I gave the correct information to the House. The Order in Council was not signed by the Governor General when I made this statement to the House, and I deem it justice to myself that I should take the opportunity of making this statement now.

RETURNS.

Mr. CASEY. I again wish to ask the leader of the House, when the return, in answer to my motion regarding the appointment of the High Commissioner, and instructions as to his duties, &c., shall be laid before the House ? When I called the Minister's attention to the matter the other day, he said, the papers would be brought down in a day or two. That was several days ago, and they are not down yet.

Mr. FOSTER. I did say that to the hon. gentleman, and I made inquiries and asked that the report should be hastened. I shall let my hon. friend know before the evening in what state the matter is.

Mr. CASEY. There cannot be a great deal of it.

Mr. FOSTER. There is not a great deal of it.

THE CAPE BRETON ELECTION.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, a day or two ago I called the attention of the

Mr. DICKEY.

House to a statement which was reported in the papers as having been made by the hon. member for Cape Breton—I am not quite sure whether I should designate him as the leader of the House or not. The speech was delivered by him, I think, in the town of Amherst, or in some place in the maritime provinces, and it contained a statement to the effect, that in the contest between himself and Mr. Murray in the county of Cape Breton, the sum of $25,000 had been sent down to buy the seat from under him. Mr. Speaker, from personal knowledge which I myself possess, I gave that statement at the time an unqualified contradiction. Since that, I see by the morning paper, that the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) is reported to have repeated the statement at the reception tendered him yesterday, at the Ottawa railway station. He is reported as having used the following words :—

Money was unquestionably used to secure his (Sir Charles Tupper's) defeat. He spoke of what he knew when he said that $25,000 were sent down to buy the seat from under him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I beg to tell the House and to tell the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) that he has been entirely misinformed. The statement made by him is ludicrously inaccurate and absurd. It is without any foundation whatever. I am in a position to know—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). How much was it ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If hon. gentlemen are curious they will hear me out, and perhaps they will accept the offer I propose to make to them. I am in a position to know that attempts were made, on the part of those who believed that it was in the public interest to defeat the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) ; attempts were made to assist Mr. Murray to pay those legitimate expenses which everybody knows have to be made in an election of that kind. I thought myself that the expenses would range somewhere from $1,000 to $1,500. I make no scruple in saying, that I attempted myself to assist Mr. Murray in that regard. I tell the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) that his statement that $25,000, or the one-tenth part of it, was sent, is absurd and is untrue ; and to my knowledge, a sum ludicrously insufficient to pay even the travelling expenses of Mr. Murray and his associates, was sent to Cape Breton. Now, Sir, if the hon. gentleman accepts my statement, I hope he will withdraw the statement he has made here. But if he does not accept my statement, and thinks that I am not fully in possession of the facts, then I ask him to apply for a committee of this House to make an investigation in regard to the moneys which were spent in Cape Breton, which were sent there to assist Mr. Murray, and the moneys which were sent to assist the right hon. gentleman himself. We on our side will offer every facility, Sir, for the appointment of that committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman intend to conclude with a motion?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I shall, Mr. Speaker, if you think it necessary. We on our side will offer every facility to the hon. gentleman to obtain that committee, and every facility to the committee to procure the information. And when that committee is appointed, I have no doubt the country will be delighted to see what sums of money were contributed, and every true Liberal will be delighted to learn that not a dollar was contributed on our side which could be used for any improper or corrupt purpose. If the hon. gentleman is able to say as much for his side, it will do much to elevate the public life of Canada in the minds of all right-thinking men. To put myself in order, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am quite willing, Mr. Speaker, to accept the assurance which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has given, that to the best of his knowledge and belief my impression that the amount of money which was sent down to the county of Cape Breton by the Opposition exceeded $25,000. I am quite willing to accept the assurance of the hon. gentleman that to the best of his knowledge and belief that sum is largely over-stated. In speaking of a thing of this kind, a person can only speak from the best judgment he is able to offer, and I will give the hon. gentleman the grounds for the statement I made, or, at all events, a certain portion of the grounds. In the first place, the candidate, Mr. Murray, who was, I believe, the representative of the government of Nova Scotia in the legislative council, and who resigned his seat in order to contest this election, stated over his own signature in his election address, that he was very unwilling to contest this election, but that it was a great emergency. He stated, as I believe, on arriving in the county—it was so reported—at a meeting which he addressed, that the Liberal party had determined to make this the fight of their life. I think that is a tolerably good ground for supposing that Mr. Murray was not to be left unaided in fighting this battle.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I am able to remind hon. gentlemen that the records of the courts will prove that individual members on the other side of the House admitted that they had expended in a single election $20,000. When I am able to say that, I think I have given the House the proof that these gentlemen consider an expenditure of a very large sum of money not misapplied in a very important contest. Now, Sir, when I state that Mr. Murray declared that the Liberal party had determined to make this the fight of their life, that this was a vital emergency, that it was a question of life and death, practically, to the Opposition, that they should prevent my election in the county of Cape Breton, the hon. gentleman will, I think, agree with me that I had pretty good grounds for supposing that Mr. Murray was not going to undertake to contest an election which would cover the party with anything but triumph if they could not very materially reduce the majority which my predecessor had had in the county. An election, therefore, was promoted; and, from the county of Ottawa away down to the shores of Cape Breton, gentlemen occupying prominent positions in this House and out of it went to the aid and support of Mr. Murray. After they had canvassed the county for several days, after every portion of the county had been visited by some one of their agents, the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, who had taken a prominent part in the contest, suddenly left the county, went to the city of Halifax, and immediately returned. On the Saturday night preceding the election—which was too late a period to admit of parties being able to affect the election, which was on Tuesday, by any other means than the use of money, he was followed by half a dozen emissaries from the county of Halifax; and when I was informed by persons in whose credibility I have the utmost confidence, that $20 was freely offered, not for a vote, but to any elector who would stay at home, and that gentlemen occupying positions of considerable influence were offered $100 for their vote and influence, I came to the conclusion—and I think, from the history of the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite in the past, as attested to before the courts of the country, that I was warranted in that conclusion—that human devices were not to be wanting in the endeavour to prevent my obtaining a seat in Cape Breton. I can only say at this moment that parties of the highest respectability and intelligence, and with the best means of knowing, assured me that the very smallest sum they could estimate as being sent into the county was $25,000; and I believe that $25,000 to have been sent into the county of Cape Breton by the Opposition in Canada, broadcast all over this country, just as firmly as the hon. gentleman opposite believes that it was not sent. Now, I would like to ask that hon. gentleman whether he or I have been in the best position to form an opinion upon this question. I would like to ask whether he, sitting in the Parliament of Ottawa, or I, having gone through the county in this contest, having met those gentlemen, having witnessed their untiring and desperate efforts, and with the knowledge that nothing but a large sum of money could enable them successfully to contest my seat for the county of Cape Breton, have the best grounds for judging of the fact—whether I have not as good grounds for my opinion, which I restate with the firmest belief that it is well based, and with all the light I could get, as the hon. gentleman has for entertaining a contrary opinion. I do not think it is necessary to say more. I am quite certain my colleague, the senior member for the county of Cape Breton, will be able to give the hon. gentleman further information in regard to this matter if he wants it.

Mr. CASEY. What about the proposal for a committee?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I spent about ten days in the county of Cape Breton, and I have to say that in every section of the county I visited, I had the best possible evidences of the fact that our opponents made a free use of money. I did not go into a district where I did not see strong evidences of the use of money. I know of a district that was visited by an hon. gentleman of the legislative council at Halifax, who went round offering to the people to build a bridge across the river, the building of which, I am sure, would cost a hundred thousand dollars. I was informed on very good authority that $100 was offered to a man to remain neutral, and I was informed on several occasions that at different places $10 and $20 had been offered—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Names, names.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If I did give the names, hon. gentlemen opposite would have difficulty in finding him. We had all those evidences; we had more, we had proof of the statement made by a gentleman, a former member of this House, the Hon. Mr. Jones, of Halifax, that the Liberal party should spend $100,000 at least to accomplish the defeat of Sir Charles Tupper. There is proof of that statement being made, and of similar statements being made by other people throughout the province. We are aware that one man was telegraphed to in a particular town of Nova Scotia and asked for a contribution of $100. He was asked for permission to draw on him for $100, but he replied: I have done that kind of thing too often already, but if you elect George Murray, on election day you can draw on me for $100. As I said before, we have the best possible evidence that not only was $20,000 or $25,000 spent, but a great deal more was spent. The Attorney General for Nova Scotia went back to Halifax after his first visit, and we are informed that after he got there, $3,000 was made up by the Liberal party in that city. We have the best possible evidence, I believe, that money went to Cape Breton to be used for the purpose of bribing the electors to vote against Sir Charles Tupper. I am glad, however, that not many were bribed. We know that many voters remained at home because they were of the opinion it was not necessary they should take the trouble to go to the polls. They counted on so very large a majority for Sir Charles Tupper that they did not think it necessary to put themselves to any inconvenience to vote for him. And I know of some people who were unwilling to go to the poll and vote against Sir Charles Tupper, but whom the Opposition expected to vote against him, and whom they afterwards paid to remain at home.

Mr. FORBES. Give the names.

Mr. McDOUGALL. We know that money was sent down from Ottawa, and that money was subscribed by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How much? We will give the figures, if you will give us the committee.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If my hon. friend should get the investigation he suggests, no doubt a great many of his followers down at Cape Breton will be glad to be paid travelling expenses up here. If they cannot get anything else out of the election at Cape Breton, they would like to get that.

Mr. FRASER. As one who took a small part in the election at Cape Breton, I cannot allow the remarks that have been made to pass without simply making the statement that, so far as I am concerned—and I know all about the inner working of the election—the sum mentioned by the hon. member for Queen's P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) is largely in excess of the total amount used in the election at Cape Breton. What is the train of reasoning by which the junior member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) arrives at the fact that money was spent? First, that there was a great emergency; second, that there was a battle for life; third, that Attorney General Longley went to Halifax and came back; and, lastly, that there were gentlemen down there from Ottawa and every other place in the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, there were just three members of Parliament and the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, who took part in that election, besides a few who came down on the day of the election to be present at the polling. It is by this train of reasoning that the hon. gentleman arrives at the conclusion that $25,000 were spent in that election. Verily, this is reasoning according to the best authority. There was no money spent by the Opposition; and if the suggestion of my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) be accepted, I will guarantee that, even if a commission be sent from here, every witness named by the Government will be brought before that commissior, and subjected to the fullest investigation. The fact is that this statement was circulated by the friends of the Government in order that the shekels of the junior member (Sir Charles Tupper) might be all the more freely called into requisition.

tion. That is the method they used. They set up this story of the Liberals spending so much money in order that they might bleed the hon. gentleman; and I have no doubt that the amount which was thus taken from the hon. gentleman's pocket forms the basis of his opinion as to the amount expended in that election. It is well that this matter has been brought up. Let us have an investigation and the fullest investigation. Mr. Murray did say that this was an emergency, and every man in Cape Breton thought it was an emergency. We were taunted with going down there to run the election. Well, we had a perfect right to go there. It was an emergency; every opening of a constituency is, and this was particularly an emergency, occurring as it did, at this late date of Parliament. And therefore we did what we thought was right in opposing Sir Charles Tupper in that county. But as to spending money, there was none spent by the Liberal party. There was not $2,000 sent into that county altogether by the Liberal party. I make that statement here, and the Government may take any method they like to make an investigation, and I will prove my statement. Surely we can fight out elections without making statements which are not based upon facts, and I submit that the train of reasoning by which the hon. junior member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) arrived at the conclusion he did, without any data on which to form an opinion, is one that cannot appeal to the fair judgment of the people. Now, Sir, I deprecate that kind of thing on either side. I am not going to say that a single dollar was spent by Sir Charles Tupper at that election. I am not going to say that, after we have been defeated, and I would not say it, even if we had won, unless I had the evidence. It is easy to bandy about charges of that kind; but, so far as the Liberal party is concerned, they fought out that election, as they always have fought, and always will fight, for what they conceive, rightly or wrongly, to be true principles, principles worth fighting for, and without the aid of money. The senior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) says that in every section there was a free use of money. No doubt there was, but the question was by whom. He, I have no doubt, is the best judge of that, but as to $100 being offered to men, I submit that this is not the method of proving it. We have a law under which every man of that kind can be brought immediately to book. I would suggest to the hon. senior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) that he should place in his solicitor's hands the names of all these delinquents, for he can thereby, if his statement is well founded, add much to the coffers of the party giving the information. One word more. It is said that Mr. Jones stated that he would spend $100,000 to defeat Sir Charles Tupper.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to correct the hon. gentleman. I did not say that Mr. Jones said he would spend $100,000, but that it was reported to me that he had said that the party ought to spend $100,000.

Mr. FRASER. That is better still. I have not seen Mr. Jones, and if the hon. gentleman says that he has the statement from Mr. Jones, very well. But if he says only that somebody told him that Mr. Jones made such a statement, I submit that, in Mr. Jones's absence, that is not the way to talk. The hon. gentleman knows right well that, if Mr. Jones were here, he would not dare to make such a statement; and I think it exceedingly small to quote such remarks because they have been reported by somebody else. I would ask the hon. member if Mr. Jones made that statement to him?

Mr. McDOUGALL. He did not.

Mr. FRASER. You were simply told it?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I was told it on good authority.

Mr. FRASER. Were you present when that statement was made?

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FRASER. I have a right to ask the hon. gentleman his authority.

An hon. MEMBER. Through the Chair.

Mr. FRASER. I beg pardon, Mr. Speaker, in my hurry I omitted to ask through you. I would like to ask if the hon. gentleman was present when Mr. Jones made that statement?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I have already told the hon. gentleman I was not present. The statement was not made to me or in my presence, but I was informed on good authority that the statement was made.

Mr. FRASER. Now we have the ground upon which the statement is based. The hon. gentleman says that he was informed that Mr. Jones had made the statement. But we have not the name of his authority. I ask him, in all fairness, is that a fair or right method to deal with men who are not present to answer for themselves? I venture to say that Mr. Jones never made the statement. I myself have heard on very reliable authority that certain statements were made both by the hon. senior member and the hon. junior member for Cape Breton. But I would be ashamed to retail these statements and hold the hon. gentlemen responsible for them. Such methods of controversy must lead to even greater demoralization, if possible, than we have now. Let us carry on our political warfare in better fashion. We of the Liberal party found ourselves in that election confronted with great difficulties in the campaign, and we met those difficulties as best we could, and we opposed them without the assistance of such as those to which reference has been made. We had not such means, and if we had had them, we could not, and would not, have used them in the county. It is said that this was a fight for life or death of the Opposition. It was by no means a fight for life or death on the part of the Opposition. The holding of a county even by so distinguished—and I will admit at once the rightfulness of using that adjective in this connection—so distinguished a man as Sir Charles Tupper, is not a death-blow to the Opposition. The return of any number of equally able men would not be a death-blow to the Opposition. The Government has simply marked time in a county that has been Conservative since 1867, except once when an opponent of hon. gentlemen opposite got in. If such a result as this is a death-knell to the Opposition, what would their success be? Having taken part in this contest, and knowing the facts, I desire to say, and to make the statement emphatic, that the figures given by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) are even above the mark. There is a method by which the truth can be arrived at, and if the Government will exert its power in that matter, they will be supported by every man on this side. Every man who took part in the election can be brought to show that there is no truth in the statement that such a sum as has been named was spent on behalf of the Liberals, while it can be shown that the sum named by the hon. member for Queen's is actually above the mark.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRASER. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask for my own information, and to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to explain. I recollect reading the reports of a number of speeches by the hon. gentlemen in Opposition, and one particularly from the hon. gentleman in which he formulated some peculiar ideas of ethics. He is reported to have exhorted his hearers somewhat in this form: There is money going; it is in the county; there is plenty of it. Take all you can get. If they offer you $5, take it; if they offer you $10, take it; if they offer you $20, take it; take all you can get but vote for our candidate.

Mr. FRASER. I made no such statement. But I will tell you the statement I did make. I said: It is said we have money, but we have not. If our opponents resort to that sort of business, all I had to say was that let the electors take it, but, in any case, let him vote as his conscience directed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER. And I repeat that statement here. I make that statement publicly in this House, as I made it there. Does the hon. gentleman object to that style of ethics?

Mr. FOSTER. That is bad political morals.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Very bad.

Mr. FRASER. I am surprised the hon. gentleman thinks so. I would much rather somebody else had asked the question whose moral susceptibilities are not so exceedingly fine as those of the hon. gentleman. The hon. senior member for Cape Breton mentioned promises. I have but little to say upon that subject. He said that there was a promise of a bridge on the part of the Liberals. The people must be very ignorant if they thought it possible that a bridge costing $100,000 would be built, when the whole amount at the disposal of the county for bridges, if I remember well, is $8,000. No such offer could have been made because the Government has not money enough to build a bridge like that. I do know that promises were made—promises of breakwaters, and so on. Why, if I liked to trouble the House, I could show the hon. gentleman a letter to a person in Gabarus to the effect that politics were not in it, that this was a question of a breakwater and extending the time for catching lobsters—and this statement made over the writer's own signature. But I refrain from going into these promises further than to say that they were used—used everywhere. Let us come to an understanding that, except upon evidence, which evidence can be procured if we send for it, no such statements will be made as have been made here this afternoon. If the evidence is gone into it will certainly be shown that we had not a cent except for legitimate purposes and no more than has already been stated.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, there may be doubts, as to what assertions were made by my good friend Mr. Jones, but there can be no doubt as to what assertions have been made and repeated here by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper). Now, Sir, it was a very old habit of a certain old associate of the hon. gentleman, whom I knew well, when he had done any particularly naughty thing to turn round and charge the Opposition with having done the self-same thing. It was his invariable practice. If he spent $10,000 or $20,000 or $50,000 in corrupt practices, the first thing he did was to charge the Opposition with having spent that identical sum, and I have a strong impression, I will not say suspicion, that the hon. gentleman has done precisely the same thing as his old acquaintance. The hon. gentleman refers to the records of the courts. In the province from which he comes, some gentleman had the happy fashion of not getting into the courts. The hon. member for Cape Breton, when charged with corrupt practices, threw up the sponge, not daring to face the courts. Had there been an investigation, it is not $20,000 that would have been deemed a high price for a seat in certain portions of the Dominion. For himself the hon. gentleman had easier means, probably. I can recollect the time when the hon. gentleman expended two or three millions in making comfortable seats for himself and certain relatives of his. I can remember when, if I am not mistaken, he told this House that he was going to shorten the route of the Inter-colonial Railroad by five and forty miles for every passenger from east to the west, and for every pound of freight from east to west, and when we came to test the correctness of the hon. gentleman's promises, according to the late Sir John A. Macdonald, if my memory serves me, the five and forty miles had shrunk into four. Sir, it was not a question of life or death to the Liberal party whether the hon. gentleman came back to this Parliament or not, but it was a question of life or death for the hon. gentleman whether he was elected in Cape Breton; and, under these circumstances, we can guess that it would not be a trifle like $25,000 that would stand in his way. I would not have been surprised if he had thought that $640,000 or $640,000,000 would be too little, or—to be more exact, $58,300,000—I think that is about what the hon. gentleman considers himself worth to the country. Now, my hon. friend has made a straightforward challenge to the hon. gentleman. My hon. friend says here that the Liberal party have been grossly slandered by a statement made by the hon. gentleman. If he believes one word of the statement, let him accept my hon. friend's challenge, and let us have a committee of investigation. There is, Sir, but one course for an honourable man to take, on information such as has been given here, either to retract the slander, or, if he has proof, to prove it. We challenge him to do it, we defy him to give any decent, tolerable, credible evidence of the statement which he has not been ashamed to make in two public places in Canada. That Mr. Longley left the county and went to Halifax, and came back there, appears to be the only substantial evidence the hon. gentleman has that $25,000 was spent. He may be perfectly aware that $20 were paid men to stay at home; he may be perfectly aware that $100 were paid men to vote; but it was not for the Liberal candidate they were asked to vote, or paid to stay at home. Sir, let us apply the rule that I have laid down. Remember the course of these hon. gentlemen in times past; remember that whenever they have done things of which they ought to have repented and been ashamed, they straightway turned round and charged their opponents with doing the same. Now, if the hon. gentleman has one particle of evidence worth presenting—I do not say to a court of law, because he would never dare submit it to a court of law—but before a committee of this House, on which a majority would be his own friends, a majority chosen by himself, and only the minority chosen from among my hon. friends; let him come forward and do that, or let him stand convicted by my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) of having made assertions in which there was not one particle of truth. Sir, I had hoped better of the hon. gentleman. He comes back to us now under—what shall I say? Certainly under episcopal auspices; and, considering who is his political god-father, I had hoped better things of the hon. gentleman. Sir, let him go back to the gentle and pious prelate to whom he is indebted for his seat, and not to the electors of Cape Breton in the proper sense of the term, and I am sure that worthy man will tell him that he never would have encouraged him, whatever else he might do for him, in bringing slanderous witness against his opponents; and I trust he will repent it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not challenge the right of the hon. gentleman who raised this question to do so, or the mode in which he has done so. He brought it forward in a very gentlemanly manner, and he was quite within his rights.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot speak the second time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I only desire to speak with the assent of the House; I do not wish to violate the rules.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, in justification of my repeating here the statement which he says I made before, that I have this ground for doing it. I made the statement which he has challenged, that $25,000 had been sent down into the county of Cape Breton to endeavour to buy the seat from under me. I made the statement three times in the presence of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, who did not challenge its accuracy, and the Attorney General of Nova Scotia was the man who engineered the contest against me.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) May I ask the hon. gentleman a question right here? I am informed, not directly by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, but by a friend of his, that he solicited the privilege of answering the hon. gentleman, and that privilege was denied him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no hesitation in telling the hon. gentleman that he has been entirely misinformed. Had the Attorney General of Nova Scotia asked the privilege of addressing the electors at any one of the three meetings where he listened to the very statement that has been challenged, I should have obtained a hearing for him at once for that purpose. This is the first intimation that I have had of anything of the kind. I deliberately made the statement in the presence of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, who engineered the campaign on the part of my opponents, and its accuracy was not challenged by him.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Did he speak at all?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now, Mr. Speaker, having made this statement in his presence, it having gone unchallenged by him, and his not having asked an opportunity of controverting it, I ask whether I was not warranted in coming to the conclusion I did? Not only that, but I state that when he came back from Halifax he was followed by half a dozen young gentlemen who went into the county with him.

Mr. MULLOCK. What has that to do with it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It meant this, it meant that, having canvassed the county and having come to the conclusion that money would buy the seat, Mr. Longley went down to the city of Halifax and was accompanied back on Saturday, the election taking place on Tuesday following, by half a dozen persons to be sent over the county, as I believe they were sent, to distribute money.

Mr. DEVLIN. It is hardly possible for me to retain my seat since the Secretary of State has mentioned the fact that I went down into Cape Breton, when he said that a gentleman from the county of Ottawa had taken part in that contest. I did. I did so with much pleasure. I did so out of a sense of public duty, believing that the interests of our country required that the Secretary of State should not take his seat here to-day. I will take up the last word mentioned by the Secretary of State, when he said that Mr. Longley had an opportunity of answering the charge in regard to the $25,000. It is within my personal knowledge that the Hon. Mr. Longley sent a telegram to the Secretary of State, challenging the Secretary of State to meet Mr. Longley at a public meeting in the town of North Sydney, on Saturday night, that is a few nights previous to the election, if I mistake not, and the answer from the Secretary of State was to the effect that he, Mr. Longley, could not do so, but that he might send a member of the local legislature to that meeting. More than that, I know that Mr. Longley approached Mr. McKeen on the day of the Liberal convention, and requested that he might have an opportunity of attending the Conservative meetings called by the Secretary of State, and that Mr. McKeen then told him that no such arrangement could be made. I think it is proper that this explanation should be made now. With regard to the statement that some $25,000 were sent down from Ottawa to that constituency, all I can say is this: I took a considerable part in the fight—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. McDOUGALL. At French Bay?

Mr. DEVLIN. I will attend to you in a moment. I am here to defend anything I have done in that contest, whether at French Bay or elsewhere. I was only too anxious to meet that hon. gentleman who has interrupted me now, but he had not the courage to meet me on the platform, face to face. He is here to-day, and I am glad to meet him, and I am not afraid to discuss with him any question that came up in that contest. I was going to say with regard to this $25,000 that it is all a mystery to me. Personally, I know not that one dollar was expended in the campaign. I went down at my own expense; I came back at my own expense, and I received not a dollar during the campaign, after the campaign, or to this day, having borne my own expenses. I know, as a matter of fact, that the Liberal party had no funds in that campaign.

An hon. MEMBER. Or a special car.

Mr. DEVLIN. No, they had not a special car. But I do know of a special train that was put on the day of the convention which chose the Secretary of State as the ministerial candidate in the county of Cape Breton. The train should have started at eight o'clock in the morning from Glace Bay, but it did not start. It passed at ten in the morning. The train had a very large number on board, hundreds of them being supplied with free tickets.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. gentleman is misleading the House. The railway is not a Dominion railway, but it is a railway belonging to the coal company.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am not misleading the House because I never said it was a Government railway. If the hon. gentleman would open his eyes and ears perhaps he would understand what is being said. It was the Dominion Coal Company's Railway, a company directed by whom? By the hon. gentleman, who thought he could hand over the county in his hat. Since the hon. gentleman is up, I will attend to him immediately. He spoke of promises made on behalf of the Liberal party, and among others that a bridge was to be constructed. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he ever heard the promise of a railway made. Was not the promise of a railway made by a very prominent gentleman in his own ranks? That was the current rumour. With respect to the question put by the Minister of Finance, that speakers on our side told the people: take all the money that is going, it is a good time for it, now is the moment—I will answer him by saying that I never heard that charge made. But I know this, that I heard that an hon. member belonging to the party opposite told some people to take all the money that was going. That statement I make, and that statement I make with a thorough knowledge, namely, that now is the time for them to take the money. We know perfectly well how the campaign was conducted. The senior member for Cape Breton, as I am informed, stated—and this was one part of his plan of the campaign—that I slandered the clergy. He made that statement, I believe, down in Cape Breton. I am here to defend myself in respect to that charge, made in that county, and I should like any man here to make good that statement. I say that if the hon. gentleman made that statement—and I believe he did—he made one that was incorrect in every respect. I never slandered the clergy. We know the influences that were brought to bear in this election, we know the pressure used in the county. We know, as a matter of fact, that the influence of the clergy was largely exercised in behalf of the Secretary of State, and all I said was that certainly I was a Roman Catholic, I had studied my catechism, and had read it twenty years ago, but having doubt on a certain matter I had reviewed it the day before, and I did not find the name of the Secretary of State in the catechism. That was all the slandering of the clergy I did, and, in fact, I do not see that it was any slander at all. It is true I went a little further, and said that it was exceedingly strange that at almost every election in Cape Breton there was very great danger to our holy faith. I made that statement, I admit; but I did not slander the clergy. I am sorry the hon. Postmaster General is not in his seat. He has an organ in Ottawa, "Le Canada," and a very precious organ it is, and in last night's issue it says:

M. Devlin est tellement trompeur en cette affaire, et sa fourberie a été si apparente aux yeux de Mgr Cameron, à Cap-Breton, que ce digne prélat s'est décidé à écrire une lettre pastorale pour mettre les catholiques de son diocèse en garde contre "des hypocrites soudoyés par l'enfer."

This statement means that I was the reason why Mgr. Cameron wrote a pastoral letter to the electorate of Cape Breton. Bear in mind, I did not say that he wrote a pastoral letter; it is the organ of the Postmaster General that states that His Grace Bishop Cameron wrote a pastoral letter to the electorate of Cape Breton, warning them against my tactics. Now, His Grace, if I understand the matter correctly, did not write a pastoral letter; but here is the organ of the Postmaster General telling His Grace that he did. I wish to contradict this item at once; I wish to say that every line of this is unfounded, inaccurate and entirely in keeping with Tory tactics in this country. I did not slander the clergy, but they were slandered by some hon. gentlemen opposite, by the ex-Controller of Customs a couple of years ago. The Bishop of Nicolet was slandered. The Postmaster General was silent. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) was silent, being afraid to say a word, as he is every time when any question, national or religious, is brought up. The hon. gentleman had not the courage to deny that slander; he might lose a few votes in the county, he thought. But on every occasion, I stood up and defended the bishops and the clergy, and I have testimonials from them that I have done my duty, and when the hon. gentleman says that I have slandered the clergy he makes a statement which is without foundation.

Mr. WALLACE. In regard to the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin), I may say that I never slandered the Bishop of Nicolet, but that I quoted a statement which he had made. I quoted from his own document, and when occasion requires I will quote again.

Mr. DEVLIN. Yes, but the hon. gentleman's conception of slander is different from mine. That is all the difference.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad my conception is not the same as that of the hon. member for Ottawa County. I repeat that when occasion demands I will again quote statements made by the Bishop of Nicolet and make any comments justified by the contents of the document itself.

Mr. DEVLIN. I will be ready to answer you.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just returned to this House with such a flourish of trumpets on his own part and on that of a few of his friends, has taken up his old habits of dealing with facts, exactly at the point where he left them off on the last occasion that he left us. He has been absent many years, but every once in a while he has returned, when the health of the party seemed to need medical aid, but his habit in dealing with matters of fact appears to have sustained no change in the meantime.

In regard to the matter we are discussing, he has put himself completely in the wrong, and the senior member for the same county (Mr. McDougall) has proven that he was in the wrong in the statements he made. The Secretary of State and High Commissioner—for I suppose we must address him by his double title in this House—has made the statement that he knows of his own knowledge that $25,000 was sent into Cape Breton and spent by the Liberals there. Mark you, not that it was raised in Cape Breton, but that it was made up and sent there from outside for the purpose of killing the hon. gentleman. He appears to be carried away with such an impression of his own importance in the eyes of the Liberals that he thinks we made a desperate effort to defeat him and raised all the money the Liberals possess, but it was not so.

In the words of a strong Conservative, a member of this House, to me—I should not have said a member of the House, because I am not at liberty to mention his name—but a strong Conservative, said to me: "The Government will pay out their last dollar in Cape Breton, for it is a matter of life or death to them to elect Sir Charles Tupper there." Members of the party have themselves stated by the mouths of Ministers that Sir Charles Tupper is the only man they possess who is capable of leading a Government, that he is the only possible saviour of the Conservative party, and that they imported him for that purpose. Of course it was vital to them to get him elected, but as for us, our experience of his presence in this House has not been such as to lead us to fear him in the way in which he seems to think we do. We are inclined to think he will play the part of a "hoodoo" to the Conservative party, than of their saviour, and we are well content that he should return here and exercise his magic arts for the revivification of the party.

Sir, the Minister of Finance and his six associates, amongst others the son of his Secretary of State, have done all they could to ruin the Conservative party in Canada, to ruin the Conservative Government in Canada, and to ruin the old true-hearted worthy leader of the Conservative party in this country. They did not succeed, but we on this side of the House, have great hope, that the new importation will be successful, and that he will accomplish the ruin of the party, and of the Government to which he belongs. We had not the desperate interest that the Conservative party had, to spend money in order to alter the result of this election. We knew this was a Conservative county, we knew that even a gentleman on the back benches, like the senior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) or like Mr. McKeen who has resigned, was able to get elected by seven or eight hundred majority at the general election. We knew that in 1887, that constituency had been carried by the Conservative party by, I think, twelve or fifteen hundred majority.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No.

Mr. CASEY. We knew that in 1878 it had been carried by about 2,000 majority.

Mr. McDUGALL. Oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIES. You are all wrong.

Mr. CASEY. Well, I am not sure of the figures in 1878, but the others are correct.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). You are wrong in both.

Mr. CASEY. I may be out a hundred or so, but I am not so far out as the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) was in one of his statements, which I will refer to later on. We knew that this was an overwhelmingly Conservative county. We knew that the Secretary of State went down there with the prestige of being the only saviour of his party. We know that almost as a matter of course he ought to be elected, but without money, and with nothing but reason and argument to back us, we found before that campaign was over, that there were very strong prospects indeed, that the only great one would be defeated in that specially Conservative county—and it was then that the talk arose about money being sent from here, and then that the pretense was made, that $25,000 was sent to Cape Breton.

Now, when the Secretary of State is made, on the floor of Parliament, to face the mis-statements he has made on the public platform, what does he say in support of his position? He does not pretend that he had that personal knowledge in regard to the matter which my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) had, but he does pretend that, because he was in the county, he knew more about what the Liberals spent than does my hon. friend from Queen's. Mr. Speaker, it is absurd, and it is insulting to the House, for the Secretary of State to talk that way. He knew all about what he spent himself, but how could he know as much about what was spent by the Liberal party as does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies), who himself has told us that he did his best to collect some funds and send them down?

My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) makes his manly and straightforward statement across the floor of the House, but what does the Secretary of State do? Does he accept it? No, Sir, it is not in his line to accept a straightforward manly statement. He will not accept that statement as being correct, and he will neither withdraw his charges, nor will he take up the challenge of my friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) to have a committee to investigate the whole question. So long as the Secretary of State does not accept that challenge, he stands convicted by his own attitude, of having said what he knows he cannot prove. I am not prepared to say, that the Secretary of State has said what he knows to be false, because I do not suppose he knew anything about it, but he has stated what he knew he could not prove, or he would have accepted the challenge.

The result of this first little skirmish which has arisen since his return to this House, is to establish that he is still in the habit of making statements that he cannot prove, and statements which he himself probably knows to be very dubious. Sir, it is very hard to criticise these statements in parliamentary language; but there is one phrase sacred to his special use by long precedent in this Parliament; a phrase which occurs time after time on the pages of "Hansard;" a phrase which exactly describes the situation, and that is: that the statement of the hon. the Secretary of State is nothing but a flagrant Tupperism. "A flagrant Tupperism," Sir, is the phrase sacred to his special use. He is, like the Minister of Finance, credited with the origin, although in a different way, of a remarkable phrase, and he is entitled to all the credit for it.

The reason which the Secretary of State gave for this statement of his was that he thought his opponents were anxious to win, and he thought they would use all human devices. But it remained for him to use devices that were super-human. Why, if he thought that county was so strongly in his favour, did he secure the assistance of those powers which are above the human? Why did he secure heavenly assistance in his campaign—for it is not pretended for a moment that the bishop did not interfere in that election? The bishop himself has not denied that he interfered in the campaign. Bishop Cameron has made a very guarded and peculiarly worded denial of the statement, that he sent around a circular containing the oft-mentioned phrase, "hell-inspired hypocrites." He denies that he sent any such circular or pastoral to the priests of Cape Breton. He says the published statement is a garbled extract from a private letter, marked as "private," which he sent to a friend. But he does not deny the fact, which is asserted by several parties who know the fact, that he sent a similar letter to that, to all the priests in the county of Cape Breton—no doubt marked "private," and not intended for publication, but meant for the personal information and guidance of the priests to whom it was sent.

It is not denied for a moment, that the prelate's influence had a great deal to do with the result of the election, and the Secretary of State has not disclaimed that assistance, and has not disclaimed the sentiments expressed in this private letter of his lordship the bishop. Therefore, the Secretary of State will have to take the responsibility of being elected here on the supposition, that all those differing, in any degree, from the Government, on the question of remedial legislation, are "hell-inspired hypocrites." If the hon. gentleman likes that position he can accept it, and if not, he can declare that he is quite out of sympathy with the bishop's statement in that respect, and so clear his own skirts. It remains to be seen if he has the pluck to do so.

Now, Sir, when I said a few minutes ago, that the senior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) had disproved the assertion of the junior member (Sir Charles Tupper), in regard to the offering of large bribes to the people to stay at home, I referred to the statement of the senior member. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) said: That lots of their people—the Conservative voters in Cape Breton—stayed at home, because they expected the majority to be so large, that they did not think it was worth their while to go out to vote. And yet, although the election was so slack, and all the Tories there were so sure of the result that they would not take the trouble to go to the poll, the hon. Secretary of State says that we were offering one man $20 to stay at home and another man $100 to go and vote for us! It is a flagrant untruth on the face of it, on the statement of the senior member for Cape Breton himself. Then, he tells us that he knew about Mr. Jones' promise. My hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) has dealt fully with that. But I must say that if it were correct that Mr. Jones offered to subscribe $100, it would be the only $100 that they have told us of yet out of the whole $25,000; so that they are within $24,900 of proving their statement, which is about as close as they generally come to it.

Then, Sir, the hon. Secretary of State, in his second speech, which he was allowed to make by consent of the House, repeated the story about Mr. Longley bringing back what he called "emissaries" from Halifax. I suppose he credits Mr. Longley with having done what he would have done under the same circumstances—with having used emissaries in the opprobrious political sense, for the purpose of buying votes. My hon. friend from Guysboro' disposed of that. He told the House that Mr. Longley went down to Halifax and made arrangements for a number of young men—legal men, I believe, they were—to go to Cape Breton and act as scrutineers in the election. That is what the emissaries from Halifax were doing—trying to see that the law was enforced at the polls; and the Secretary of State's imputation of corruption to them was perfectly gratuitous on his part. I hope, after due consideration, that the hon. gentleman will see what is due to him in the matter of accepting the committee of inquiry which is proposed. If he does not accept it, I hope my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) will consider the propriety of forcing him to declare himself more clearly on the subject at a later date.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be only fair, before this debate closes, that reference should be made to a letter published in the press of Halifax, signed by the Attorney General, Mr. Longley, the day after the entertainment given to the hon. Secretary of State. The hon. gentleman had then made the statement which has occasioned the discussion this afternoon. On the following morning the letter to which I allude appeared, I believe, in the Government organ in Halifax, the "Herald." I have sent to the reading room for the paper, but have been unable to obtain it, as it appears to be out. The Hon. Mr. Longley referred to the suspicions which were cast upon him in consequence of the observations of the hon. Secretary of State, which compelled him to publish this letter. He stated very strongly that he knew of no money having been collected or expended in the Cape Breton county election, that his visit to Halifax was connected entirely with private affairs, that neither directly nor indirectly was he connected with or aware of any money being used on the part of the Opposition during that campaign. Now, I think it is very much to be regretted that this discussion should have arisen to-day, or that the necessity for it should have arisen, because as every hon. gentleman is aware, what is to-day made the basis of a charge against the Opposition, may on another day be made the basis of a charge against the hon. gentlemen opposite, or against any individual member of this House. These charges are very easy to make and difficult to refute—in fact, impossible to refute; and they are as unfair as anything can possibly be. The names are not given of the parties from whom the information has been obtained or to whom the alleged expenditure has been made, and the public are allowed to believe that a large amount of corruption existed which evidently did not exist, at any rate so far as the Liberal party was concerned. Now, Sir, I am in a position to know, so far as the members of the Opposition in this House are concerned, that no contributions were solicited, and none were made, for the assistance of our friends in that district, who were labouring for the defeat of the hon. Secretary of State. It was perfectly proper, as I believe the hon. gentleman will admit, that the Liberal party should oppose his election; and had they been able to defeat him, we all know that the result would have been considered, from one end of the country to the other, as an exceedingly important feature in the history of the Conservative party as well as in the history of the Liberal party. I am not revealing any secret when I state that it was scarcely expected on this side of the House that the hon. gentleman would be defeated. We realized the fact that he had selected the strongest Conservative constituency in his native province. We realized the fact that he was a gentleman of enormous prestige and with an extraordinary political history, and one whose name stood high in the province of Nova Scotia, at any rate, among the leaders of the Conservative party. We also felt that he carried with him the prestige of being a member of the Government, and the expectation, not at all concealed by those who were advocating his cause in the county, that in a very few weeks he would be Premier of the Dominion of Canada. We realized the fact that the gentleman who had resigned his seat, in order to facilitate the re-entry of the hon. Secretary of State into public life, was the manager of the greatest corporation existing in that county. We realized that the whole weight and influence of that corporation and the prestige and influence of the Dominion Government together, with an unlimited supply of means, if they were required, were at the disposal of the hon. gentleman. Consequently, we scarcely expected—I have not met one Liberal member of this House who expected—that the hon. gentleman would be defeated. The most we hoped was that it would be possible to keep the majority down, so that the Conservatives would not be in a position to boast of any very great triumph; and in that particular we have succeeded. In that particular our hon. friends who, at a great sacrifice of means and time and personal comfort, fought that contest at this season of the year, deserve a great deal of credit. They bearded the lion in his den, so to speak, and fought, as the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) has said, without any of the means which were at the disposal of their opponents. I think it is in exceedingly bad taste, after the noble struggle which our friends made, without the improper expenditure of any money, that charges of illegitimate expenditure of large sums of money should be flung broadcast against the Liberal party, without a careful statement of the grounds on which those charges are based. Now we realize the great importance to the country that such charges should not be made without being supported by ample proof. And I think that the indignant denials made here to-day and the lack of proof offered must convince the people that the battle was fought on a square and manly basis, so far as the Liberals are concerned, and that the Liberals who took part in that contest deserve the greatest credit from their fellow-Liberals through the country, when it is borne in mind that they succeeded in keeping down the majority of so distinguished a man as the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), and also reducing, taking the percentage of the total vote cast into consideration, the majority of the hon. gentleman, as compared with that of his predecessor. This debate will teach all that unless we have the proof under our hands, it is unfair and unmanly to make charges of this kind to besmirch the great Liberal party.

Mr. MULOCK. The debate has taken a somewhat wide range, and I shall not follow the examples of the other speakers, but try and bring myself to the consideration of the simple issue now before the House. It is an issue involving, first of all, the status of the Liberal party in connection with the recent election in Cape Breton; but more important still, it involves the honour of the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper). This House is not a competent tribunal to try this question. The hon. Secretary of State is reported to have said on public platforms, since his election, that the Liberal party had fought him by the expenditure of no less a sum than $25,000. The statement read by my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). I shall read again for the information of the hon. Secretary of State. This statement appeared in the "Citizen" of this morning, one of the Government organs, in the report of a speech made by the hon. gentleman yesterday in public. According to this report, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) said:

Men were sent from Nova Scotia and money was unstintedly used to secure his defeat. He spoke of what he knew when he said that $25,000 were sent down to buy the seat from under him.

Now, I believe in men standing up firmly for their principles. I myself am firm in my political convictions, but I deny the right of any man, on whatever side of politics he may be, to wilfully misrepresent the conduct of another, and it is to be deplored that any public man should so far forget his high duty to the country—and the higher his position the higher his duty—as to mislead the public mind. Far be it from me to say how the truth of these statements, these contradictions, should be determined. This is not the tribunal to decide whether the Secretary of State has told the truth or not. He has certainly made a grave charge. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) has made a very serious and emphatic statement in reply. These two statements are irreconcilable. Now, let us come fairly and squarely to the proposition of the hon. member for Queen's; and if his proposition does not commend itself as a fair one in order to discover the truth, let the hon. gentleman himself suggest some better tribunal, and I am sure my hon. friend will acquiesce in the suggestion. I do not wish myself, at any time, to commit myself to the defence of anything political, either on my side or on any other side, unless I can do so, conscientiously believing in the justice of the decision at which I have arrived. I have read the statement of the hon. Secretary of State in the public press, and I submit to the hon. Secretary of State, if he has read the public press too—I would submit to him, for his serious consideration, whether he does not owe it to himself to accept the challenge of my hon. friend or propose a better solution, or admit that he is absolutely in error and withdraw his statement. The hon. gentleman is, in a sense, a young member. If this were a rash statement made by a man inexperienced on the public platform, whose tongue might run away with him at times, then we could make allowance, and not hold him so strictly to his words as we can an old parliamentarian, who has so often been described as "the Cumberland war-horse." The hon. Secretary of State must know that in times past, when he was in public life here, it was often charged in the public press that his statements lacked, in many cases, the weight and accuracy that they should have. It was told generally of him that he was less careful than he should be with regard to his statements, but it was hoped—and I trust it will be established by inquiry—that under the influences and the associations which he met in the high position he has lately filled, he had, at all events, learned the importance of guarding himself in his public utterances. And I trust that if this inquiry is granted, the hon. gentleman will be able to justify the expectations of his best friends in that respect. He is, we understand, an embryo Premier. Will it do to have it said that his re-entry into public life to fill the highest position in the gift of the people of Canada, was marked by a departure from what is strictly true? Sir, he cannot, I submit, accept this high office, he cannot take Her Majesty's commission, until he displaces the cloud which rests upon him to-day. And, Mr. Speaker, let him either admit that he is the old Sir Charles or that he has reformed. Let us determine now which it is. That is the issue. His old record the country does not want. The country does not want a Premier whose statements to the public cannot be accepted as accurate, whether the inaccuracy arises from carelessness of language or wilful misstatement. In either case the public is misled. And I submit that before the hon. gentleman can claim a good title to the position of Premier, he will have to establish the correctness of his statement or withdraw it. I now ask the hon. Secretary of State here, in the presence of this House and of the country, in view of his past, in view of his expectations, whether he proposes to have a judicial inquiry, at which witnesses can be examined and the facts inquired into. I pause for a reply.

Mr. FERGUSON. Go into court yourself.

Mr. MULOCK. I ask the hon. gentleman does he propose to accept this issue or to leave the matter where it is. His silence is proof that he dare not subject this charge to an inquiry. I do not wish to draw any inference, but, Mr. Speaker, how can we avoid it? A fair proposition has been made. There is a conflict of statement—

Mr. IVES. Possibly he might like to have the proposition made by some one higher in the councils of the party.

Mr. MULOCK. Than the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies)?

Mr. IVES. Than the cross-examiner.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member from Prince Edward Island is duly accredited to make a proposition, I trust.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) At all events he has made it on his responsibility as a member of this House.

Mr. IVES. I was not referring to the hon. member from Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MULOCK. At all events, I am referring to the proposition made by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island. The Secretary of State will compel the public to draw certain conclusions, if he does not adopt this mode of vindicating his honour, or some other mode as good or better. There can be but one conclusion drawn if he now, having got all the advantage, outside, of his statement, now when he is confronted with his fellow-members in this tribunal, from which he cannot escape, does not either absolutely withdraw his statements or accept the challenge. But, perhaps it is not fair to press the hon. gentleman to a decision now. I would suggest to him that if he is not prepared to give an answer, let him think the matter over and give an answer to the country and to the House tomorrow, what course he intends to pursue in regard to this matter. At all events, the challenge has been made, and the cloud will rest upon his honour unless he adopts the course offered for his vindication, or a better one. If he does not, I fear that the public will regard this as a most inauspicious re-entry on the part of the hon. gentleman, into Canadian public life.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sure it is very much to be regretted that the hon. Secretary of State persists in sitting still under the repeated challenge for a committee to investigate this whole important subject. The hon. Minister made a statement very boldly. He stated as of his own knowledge that $25,000 had been spent in Cape Breton to defeat him. He has come to this House and has been introduced, and he has been openly and fairly challenged to verify his statements, and he has been unable to do so. He has partly withdrawn his statement, and partly apologized for it, but he has not made a full retraction. He should do one or the other, either come out plainly and say that he is sorry that, in the excitement of the moment, and elated by his victory—which victory, possibly, he was scared he would not be able to achieve—he had made a statement which he could not substantiate. If he would say he regretted that statement, I am quite sure that the House would accept that, and that we would not have to press for a committee. But, if he is not prepared to withdraw his statement, then I think that both he and the Government should at once accept the offer and the challenge made by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), consent to the appointment of a committee and have this whole question investigated. Why, Sir, I am sorry to think that the recent addition to the Cabinet appears to be no better than those who were in it before he came here. Ever since this session commenced, we have had statements and counter-statements, challenges and counter-challenges by one member of the Cabinet to another; we have had bolters; we have had the Premier virtually compelled to say that he was surrounded by a lot of traitors, by men unworthy of the position they occupy, men who were ready to cut his throat, politically; we have had the charges of writing anonymous letters injurious to the reputation of a Cabinet Minister made by one Minister against another, and flatly denied; we have had a row between the ex-Controller of Customs and another member of the Cabinet upon another point, and a repetition of matters that certainly, to say the least, were not creditable to the party in power. And with these matters the time of the House has been occupied. We have now been five or six weeks in session, and it is only to-day that we have the remedial Bill to consider which this session was specially called, and which should have been ready as soon as the House opened. The Auditor General's Report has not yet been brought down. The time of Parliament has been frittered away, and hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for it. Now the Secretary of State has been introduced, and he has made statements that are not creditable to any hon. gentleman. I had the pleasure of listening to that hon. gentleman years ago, when he was a member of this House. I remember very well when he introduced the Bill to construct the Oxford and New Glasgow Railway. That Bill was introduced with a flow of eloquence that would have been worthy of the most gigantic scheme. He pointed out that the road would be forty-five miles shorter than the existing route, and represented that it would be the means of putting the Intercolonial on its feet, and opening up for it an era of progress and prosperity. We know what the result has been—as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said, it saved about four and a half miles, but the grades are heavier.

Mr. IVES. I rise to a point of order. I would like to know if the hon. gentleman's remarks have anything to do with the resolution before the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a question of order, and I will explain to the hon. gentleman. There is a question of accuracy of statement—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am speaking to the point of order. The question is as to the accuracy of statements by the hon. member for Cape Breton and my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is giving an illustration of it, a remarkable illustration.

Mr. IVES. The adjournment of the House was moved for a specific purpose—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was just proceeding to say that I presume the hon. Minister is now convinced he was wrong—

Mr. IVES. Order, order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was just going to explain that the hon. Secretary of State has heralded with bursts of eloquence a great many schemes that he has presented to this House, and we would be glad if he would show the House and the country that in any single case his prophecies have been fulfilled. With regard to the expenditure of money in Cape Breton, I think it has been clearly shown that a very limited amount was contributed for the Liberal candidate. No doubt the friends of the hon. Secretary of State knew that he was, or ought to be, in the position to spend a considerable sum of money in Cape Breton. It seems to me that those who told him about voters being offered $100 and so on, were, to use a vulgar expression, trying to pull his leg. Looking over the expenditure for the office of the High Commissioner in London for the last six or seven years, they must have seen that the hon. gentleman had drawn something like $25,000 a year; and when he came back to Canada they no doubt thought he ought to be able creditably to meet all the demands for election funds, and that if any man who should be prepared to fork out the fives and tens, he was that man. No doubt they expected that he would be willing to dole out a certain percentage of his accumulations. I know very well that the hon. Secretary of State regretted that he was called upon to make a great financial sacrifice in taking the position he now holds. I noticed in the first speech he made on his way to Cape Breton that he stated he was making a sacrifice of $14,000 a year, that in order to serve his country he was throwing away $14,000 a year. He appeared to make that statement with a considerable amount of regret, he regretted that at his advanced age he should be called upon to make such a sacrifice. But I presume that he entertains strong hope that possibly he may be restored to his old office, and be allowed to draw the salary of that particularly comfortable position possibly for the rest of his life. Now, in order to show that there is a vestige of honour, a vestige of honesty left in hon. gentlemen opposite, politically, I would advise the hon. Secretary of State to get up and frankly admit that he was misled, that he was deceived, that he was thoroughly fooled, and if he would do so, we would be willing to accept his explanation and drop the whole question. If he is not willing to do that, if he still believes that he can prove his statement to be true, why, then, let us have a committee, let us get at the facts. We are not doing anything in this House anyhow, and an investigation could take place in two weeks. It would be time well spent. I am sure if the Secretary of State can prove that the Liberal party made such an unjustifiable effort to defeat him as to spend $25,000 in Cape Breton, it will be time better spent in the interest of the Tory party, than any time we can possibly spend otherwise. It will afford a very strong argument for the Secretary of State to use in the approaching contest. For my part I do not believe that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and our friends in the country, believe that the defeat of the Secretary of State would be worth $25,000. I would look upon it as money squandered, I would not contribute the thousandth part of that sum for the purpose. I must say that I am glad to see the Secretary of State back here. We hail his return, because we know very well, judging from his past record, that we will have some fun. I know that we will have a good deal of sport in this House, such as we had when he was here before. We used to listen to his eloquent tongue, and we used to regard with great suspicion the statements that he made before the House. I am very much afraid that now, also, owing to the statement he made with regard to this $25,000, we will have to measure very carefully every other statement that he makes, just the same as we did in the past. We cannot accept them without a considerable allowance of salt. Now, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the Secretary of State, that he should get up at once and manfully say: I am sorry, I regret that in the excitement of the moment I made that statement, and I now withdraw the whole thing. I acknowledge that I was humbugged, and I withdraw the whole of it. But if he is not willing to do that, then, let us have a committee, let us search the charge to the bottom. Either the one thing or the other we are entitled to. Surely, the Secretary of State will consent to a committee. Let us go to work and summon every man who is supposed to have contributed a dollar, who is supposed to have expended a dollar, and put them under oath, and investigate the whole thing. But I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite will consent to a committee. Committees have been very unfortunate experiments for hon. gentlemen opposite in past years. We had a committee on the Curran bridge, and there was an exposure which has stuck to them, and will stick to them for a quarter of a century. We had the Graving Dock Committee, and we proved that $964,000 of the people's money had been stolen. We have had many other committees of investigation in this House, and every committee we have had has proven conclusively that the skirts of hon. gentlemen opposite were far from being clean. I expect that, if we had this committee, and had an opportunity to subpoena before it the friends and supporters of the Secretary of State, as well as gentlemen on this side of the House, it would be proved that we contributed ten cents to every hundred dollars they contributed. No doubt, there was a considerable amount of money spent by the Secretary of State and his followers. But I should like to have this committee, and let us have an investigation, and let us try and purge the skirts of those men who have been charged with spending such a large amount of money in Cape Breton in order to defeat the Secretary of State. I think he would be surprised to find how little, after all, was contributed for that purpose. I fancy he thinks that we were so anxious to defeat him that we contributed enormous sums of money, that every man on this side of the House almost pauperized himself to try and defeat him. But it is all a delusion. There was no extra effort made, there was no anxious desire to defeat the Secretary of State at all. He is just as well here as he would be outside. Why, when we had the election in 1891, he came back to this country, travelled through it on fast trains, and heralded the statement that the Government had received an invitation to send a delegation to Washington, after the 4th March, to enter into negotiations for the purpose of making a reciprocity treaty. He said to the people of this country: Now is the time, if you want a reciprocity treaty, now is the time to elect men to support the Government, and, after the 4th March, a delegation will go to Washington, and a treaty will certainly be negotiated. Well, Sir, after the election, when the hon. gentleman went to Washington, what was the first thing he did there? He virtually got down on his knees before Mr. Blaine and acknowledged to Mr. Blaine: All you stated, with regard to the initiation of the negotiations and the interview that is now taking place, was true, and what I stated in Canada was virtually untrue. He wrote to Sir John A. Macdonald that he embraced the earliest opportunity to tell Mr. Blaine that all the statements that he himself had made, and other Canadian Ministers, in regard to that question, were virtually unfounded, and that Mr. Blaine's statement was true. Well, the Secretary of State withdrew that very important statement, and I think now he might as well get up and withdraw this. On that occasion, at Montreal, at Toronto, and all through this country where he addressed the electors on the question of a reciprocity treaty, he told them what he was going to do for them, he told them the reciprocity treaty was going to be secured, and then when he went back to Washington he retracted the whole thing. He had to do so, because Mr. Blaine would not even have given him an audience if he had not retracted at once. Now, it is a grand thing to observe that where men are great sinners, they are good repenters. The hon. gentleman has evidently been a great sinner in the way of making statements that had no truth for a foundation, and he proved himself to be a great repentor when he went to Washington. I think he ought to repent now also and get up and say, I am sorry I made that statement with regard to that $25,000, I am sincerely sorry that I acted so foolishly. I am quite sure that he regrets now that he has given the Opposition an opportunity to make these extended criticisms over that foolish and imprudent statement. He might have been contented to wear his newly-won laurels that he has done so much to earn in Cape Breton, without turning round and blackening the Reform party by charging them with having expended $25,000 to beat him. It is to be hoped that he will get up manfully and call for a committee, and I think in 48 hours that committee will prove to his entire satisfaction that there is no foundation whatever for that statement.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I ask the House to be allowed to offer an explanation in regard to the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin).

Mr. DEVLIN. I have no objection, provided I have the right to answer the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think if hon. members enter into a discussion of that kind there will be no end to the discussion. If the hon. member for Cape Breton has any personal explanation to make, the House, no doubt, will bear with him while he makes it; but if his statement is in regard to anything that has fallen from any hon. member, it would not be in order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I consider it personal. The hon. gentleman charged me with having made a statement that he had slandered the clergy of Cape Breton, and he said I had no authority for making that statement. I do not remember an occasion on which I made such a statement; but I know I had reason to make it, whether I made it or not. I am going to read to the House the report of the Montreal "Star" and Toronto "Globe" in support of my statement.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEVLIN. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection, provided I have the right to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER. We are not in committee of the whole House, but, as I have already stated, if the hon. member for Cape Breton wishes to make a personal explanation, no doubt the House will indulge him to that extent.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The only explanation I can make, in the absence of being permitted to read the report of the papers to which I have referred, is that I had information from the clergy of Cape Breton, and from several of them, that they were insulted on nomination day at Sydney.

Mr. DEVLIN. If that is all the explanation, it was not worth making.

Mr. EDGAR. The charge which has been made by the Secretary of State against the Liberal party, which has been complained of here by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to-day, is in all respects a very serious charge indeed. It is a very serious charge in itself to make, and it is much more serious when made by the Secretary of State. The hon. gentleman's past draws attention to anything that he says of a public nature in this country, and perhaps on the other side of the water. The hon. gentleman's present position makes any allegation by him very important, and we all know that the future position which the hon. gentleman has come here to take possession of makes it still more important that we should pay attention to all his statements. Very likely we will see when the English papers arrive that the statement made more than once by the Secretary of State, that $25,000 have been corruptly used by the Opposition in Cape Breton to defeat the hon. gentleman, has been telegraphed over to England and added to the triumph of this great statesman. And remember, Mr. Speaker, what the effect of that statement is: It is that $25,000 have been spent in the election for corrupt purposes, against the law of the land, in defiance of the legislation of the country. Is that a legitimate charge to make? The Secretary of State knows perfectly well that in the present position of this Parliament it would be impossible to file an election petition and have the case tried before a general election takes place. Perhaps that will be the excuse of the hon. gentleman; but when he makes this statement, as he has done publicly, when he repeats that statement to-day, as he has done in this House, it is his duty as a public man to demand and insist upon an investigation of that charge. He cannot get it tried before the courts, we know, at this stage of Parliament; and I would have supposed that he would have been the first either to deny it, to withdraw it, or to say I will prove it and ask for a committee of this House. But he has not denied it, he has not withdrawn it, but he has tried to justify it by a lot of loose allegations which do not amount to anything; not only does he not ask for a committee, but when he is challenged to appoint a committee, with a majority of his friends on it, to try the question promptly and vigorously, and investigate his own expenditures at the same time, too, he does not accept the offer and challenge. He lets it go by the board, and lets the slander remain on record without contradiction and without proving it. Why should he not withdraw it, if he is not ready to prove it, when the leader of the maritime Liberals has said that from his own knowledge there was not one-tenth of the sum mentioned expended, when the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), who was through the whole campaign, and has said he knows all about it, has given his word as a member of this House that not $2,000 were expended, and when another hon. gentleman who was down in the county added his testimony to the same effect, that there was practically no expenditure? What did the hon. gentleman say? He stated that when Mr. Longley went into Halifax the day before the election he came back with half a dozen young fellows. Do they not have scrutineers at the polls there? Were there not more than half a dozen polling places in Cape Breton county? I should like to know how many friends of the Secretary of State were brought from Halifax and other parts? I understand that the county was overrun with them, and not only with them but with officials like Mr. A. W. Wright, who is in the pay of the Government here and is investigating the sweating system, and who went down to sweat the money in Cape Breton. We do not know how many local officials of the Government were assisting, but we know Mr. Wright was. The whole position occupied by the Secretary of State to-day, when he is making his triumphant reappearance in this House, is not one that is creditable to a public man occupying the position that he holds. It reflects no credit on any hon. gentleman to make a charge and withdraw from proving it. Why, Mr. Speaker, I have made charges in this House myself, but I never shirked a committee of inquiry. I made a charge against the hon. gentleman who is sitting on the left of the Secretary of State and demanded an inquiry, but the Government emasculated the charges and referred them to a Royal Commission, which they appointed themselves, and even then I will tell you what appeared—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. You did not appear.

Mr. EDGAR. I did not appear, but the commission examined some witnesses whose names I sent, and even out of the mouths of those witnesses, I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, what did appear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. You did not.

Mr. EDGAR. I will tell you what did appear. It was proved that in twenty-two counties in Quebec—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is going outside of the subject before the House.

Mr. EDGAR. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, the point I am about to make. The Secretary of State has accused the Liberal party of squandering money at elections, and I want to tell him the record of his own party in particular cases. In that particular inquiry—but perhaps the Postmaster General does not like to hear anything more about it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not object at all.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman is not worse in this particular than the hon. gentlemen around him. It was proved that twenty-two constituencies in Quebec had a fund which was used, amounting to $112,000, obtained nearly altogether from public contractors, and under circumstances which I need not go into, but which the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) knows. That, Sir, was an average of $5,000 for each of these constituencies, out of the corruption fund for that election, over and above everything that was contributed from other sources. I have no doubt we only lifted up a corner of the veil, but if we could see the fund established for the whole Dominion, it would have amounted to over $1,000,000 at the same rate. Why, Sir, for the constituency of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), who then occupied the position of Minister of Public Works, there were over $13,000 drawn out of that fund, and each vote that he polled cost him over $20. Yet, Sir, the hon. Secretary of State stands up here and throws accusations against the Liberal party in connection with the Cape Breton election. Why, committee after committee of this House have developed the truth of charges we have made in respect to the corruption of hon. gentlemen opposite. There was the case of bridge selling by the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane), in which he sold out all the bridge positions, and the lighthouse positions in his county, to members of his party.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member (Mr. Edgar) is exceeding the bounds of parliamentary propriety in discussing these matters in detail. He is quite at liberty to refer to these statements in general, but when he goes into detail I think he is out of order.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I was merely following on the line of the Secretary of State.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) made only one reference to the fact that some gentlemen, on the opposite side of the House, had expended as much as $20,000 in an election.

Mr. EDGAR. Well, Mr. Speaker, I elaborated a little, the same subject, in answer to the Secretary of State. If at any other time when it will be more in order, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) wishes to go into that subject, we will be quite prepared to meet him. I repeat my regrets, that the Secretary of State—the leader of the House, I suppose he is, and the leader of the Government as I suppose we shall see him in a short time—should set such an unfortunate example to members of this House, as to refuse to withdraw or to apologize for a statement of his, which has been proven to be incorrect.

Mr. McISAAC. Mr. Speaker, I was one of the members of this House who took part in the recent election in Cape Breton, and I desire to say a few words. In the first place, I wish to say that I am in a much better position to speak on behalf of the Liberal party, and the Liberal campaign in that county, than is the Secretary of State, or any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House. I have travelled over a great portion of that county during the election.

Mr. EDGAR.

I have attended the committee rooms of the Liberal party in several localities, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to appoint a committee, and to subpoena me as a witness and to put me on oath. I will tell them what the Liberal party did in that campaign, so far as my personal observation went, and I will show that they have done nothing that honest men need be ashamed of. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) talks about the promise of some person to build a bridge in that county. Let me refer him—and the matter is particularly pertinent now—to promises which were made in another section of the county, where a prominent Tory in Gabarus, wrote a letter to a prominent Dominion official in North Sydney, requesting that official to send the hon. gentleman himself into a district, and to promise in a certain district, a breakwater, and to promise in other districts an extension of the season for lobster catching, but, at the same time to be very non-committal lest there might be "some after claps." "and the devil with the future," to use his exact words in the letter. It was even suggested in that letter that Dr. McKay, M.P.E., should approach a reverend gentleman in that district, and "get him to come out of the cold," for these were the words used in the letter. These were some of the promises made by hon. gentlemen opposite. They talk about the promise of a bridge. Why, those who were in the county of Cape Breton heard many Conservative promises with regard to a certain railway that was to be built in a certain portion of the county. It has been a by-word among the electors, both Tory and Liberals in the neighbourhood of Sydney Mines, where the people were interested in a proposed railroad, and where the Secretary of State in referring to it is reported to have said that the road would start from French River, although there was no such district in the county at all, and that it was to go around the Island of Boularderie to Sydney Mines. That is to say, if the proposed road were built in that way, it would be built on the high seas or on the Bras d'Or Lake. That is one of the extravagant promises which I am told was made by the Secretary of State on that occasion. I do not know very much, and I do not profess to know about the methods of our opponents in that election. I cannot say how much money they expended. Perhaps they expended $25,000; perhaps more, and perhaps less. I have no evidence, and, therefore, I shall make no observation upon it, further than to say what I do know, and that is, that an hon. member of this House, a supporter of the Government, wrote a letter to an elector in North Sydney in the county of Cape Breton, and wrote it not three weeks ago, in which letter he stated, among other things: Sir Charles is going down to the county now to fight the election, here is a chance for certain people to make money; the old man has lots of money, and there is an opportunity for certain parties. That letter was sent by a member supporting the Administration to-day and now sitting in this House.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Name ?

Mr. McISAAC. Do you want names ?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Yes.

Mr. McISAAC. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McDonald) is the man who wrote that letter, and the gentleman to whom it was addressed is Mr. Tobin, barrister, of North Sydney.

Sir, that is positive evidence. That is evidence of a substantial kind. Perhaps the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. McDonald) was not telling the truth, but I am not responsible for that. Here is one thing absolutely certain, and no gentleman on the other side of the House can make his assertion as clear as I have made this one. This statement came from a supporter of the Government, and let them explain it. Let them say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDonald) did not know what he was talking about, or let them say that he was not telling the truth. I do not know whether he was telling the truth or not, but I do know, that he ought to be in a better position to know what funds were at the disposal of the Conservative party in the Cape Breton campaign, than is the Secretary of State to know what funds the Liberal party had at their disposal in that election. I repudiate with scorn the allegation made by the Secretary of State, that he knows the Liberal party had at their disposal $25,000, in the County of Cape Breton. If he does know it, let him accept the challenge to appoint a committee, let him subpoena me as a witness, or Mr. Devlin, or Mr. Fraser, or any one else who took part in the election in that county, and let him make good his word. A man who in this House or out of it makes an assertion of that kind, without the slightest scintilla of evidence to back it up, is not worthy of the position which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) occupies in this House, and in this country. It is a base slander upon the Liberal party, and upon the campaign we fought in that county. We fought an open and manly fight in Cape Breton. We submitted to the people the principles of our party. We discussed the issues which separate the two parties. We had no money to buy votes. We had no other means except appeals to the intellects of the independent electors of the county, and we have the proud satisfaction to-day of knowing, that notwithstanding the tremendous odds which were used against us, some 3,000 stalwart electors of the county of Cape Breton, came up like men on the 4th day of February, and voted for the principles of the Liberal party. Sir, that is nothing to be ashamed of. The allegation has also been made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House and the Secretary of State, that there were huge frauds in connection with the electoral lists of that county. There is just as little foundation for that statement as for the statement with regard to the $25,000. Let that be investigated also, and it will be found that the Liberal-Conservatives placed about a thousand names on the lists, and that the Liberals placed only about 600 names. It will be found that the majority of names were placed on the list in favour of our opponents. The fact is, as I gathered in the county, that no objection was heard against the list on one side more than on the other. It appeared that nearly every person who was entitled to have his name put on the lists, on either side, had it put on. The fact is, as I am informed, that all the names in the applications of both parties were put on the list, and there is no substantial complaint that any number of names do not appear on the lists which should be there. So that all these charges are flimsy and cannot be substantiated. If they can be, this is the time and place to substantiate them. Let the hon. gentleman accept the challenge of the hon. member for Queen's, and appoint a committee, and there prove his charges if he can, and for ever confound us. We were told that the election of the hon. Secretary of State was to sound the death-knell of the Liberal party in that county and elsewhere. We were told that the money spent there was lost, and that we lost the county and our character. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that if they are able to prove that, this is their golden opportunity. If they want to take away our character, and prove to the world that we expended corruptly $25,000, or even $1,000, let them accept the challenge and appoint the committee; and then, if they can make out their case, they will have the opportunity to do so. Sir, they cannot do it, and they know they cannot do it. They will not accept the committee, because they have not the witnesses to substantiate their charges, and henceforth we will regard them as cowards and slanderers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is certainly out of order in accusing hon. members of this House of being cowards and slanderers. The hon. member must withdraw that.

Mr. McISAAC. I take back the words cowards and slanderers, if they are not parliamentary. But I say that if these hon. gentlemen do not accept the challenge and prove the charges, which they have made outside of this House we will hereafter brand them as not being able to make good those charges, and will hurl back in their teeth in this House and out of it the accusations that they were challenged in this House to make good, and that they did not dare even attempt to do so.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). I may say that I have no recollection of writing any letter to Mr. Tobin, barrister, of North Sydney, in the words the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) states. I have known Mr. Tobin to be one of the staunchest Liberals in the county for a number of years, and all his people to be the same. I have been on very intimate terms with him. I have written half a dozen letters to him, and have received answers from him, and I may have said something jocular to him in regard to the election; but I never did so seriously, because I knew him to be one of the staunchest Liberals in the county. I do not know what I may have said to him in a jocular way; but as for saying that the right hon. Secretary of State went down to the county with lots of money, I never said anything of the kind in any letter I wrote to Mr. Tobin—a gentleman whom I have known for the last twelve or fifteen years as one of the most pronounced supporters of the Liberal party in the county, and who has been doing business for me as agent at North Sydney for more than a year.

Mr. McISAAC. In fairness to the hon. gentleman I ought to say that the words he wrote were not the words used by me, but very much stronger words. Therefore, in consideration for him, I did not repeat them.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Motion (Mr. Davies, P. E. L.) to adjourn, negatived.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to remind the Finance Minister that so far as I know the Committee on Public Accounts has not been called this week. It would be as well that it should be called in order that papers may be moved for. I also want to know if the second part of the Auditor General's Report is ready yet.

Mr. FOSTER. No. That is the reason the committee has not been called. I know that my hon. friends would not be able to work on that committee without the Auditor's Report, but I received a note from the Auditor to-day stating that it is not quite ready yet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When may we expect it?

Mr. FOSTER. I think to-morrow.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply."

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, in rising to take a hand in this Budget debate, I think we should cast our minds back to the promises made at the time the National Policy was first imposed upon the country—in 1878 or 1879. At that time it was said the country was in a very depressed condition. We have been told time and again that the farmers to-day are better off than they were at the time the Government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was in power. Now, I have been a farmer in Canada for the last fifty-two years, and I only wish that the farmers of this country to-day enjoyed the prosperity that we did prior to and up to 1878 or 1879. I only wish we had now the markets we had at that time. Although the Finance Minister tells us that both our home and foreign markets have been increased under the National Policy, the fact is that under the National Policy our markets have been very much circumscribed. Owing to the action of this Government in several directions, we have lost the hold we formerly had on one of the best markets for one of the greatest agricultural industries in Canada. For the scheduling of our cattle in the British market I hold this Government to be greatly to blame. They withdrew the strict quarantine that existed in the North-west for a number of years, and allowed settlers to bring in cattle upon an inspection only. In proof of that, let me say that when I asked the question in this House whether that quarantine had been strictly enforced, the Finance Minister replied that it had been—that an Order in Council had been passed strictly enforcing it; and when, on a Monday, the leader of the Opposition asked when that order was passed, the answer came that it had only been passed the Saturday before. So that I hold that our Government are to blame for our cattle being scheduled in the British market, because they did not stand strictly to the agreement that had been entered into with the Government of Great Britain with respect to cattle coming into the Dominion of Canada. Let me tell the hon. gentleman again, that our sheep have been scheduled in the old country. It is only a year ago when the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston) rose in this House and drew the attention of the Government to the condition of a large number of sheep that were coming in through Canada for transshipment to the old country. He drew attention to the fact that they were suffering from a certain disease. On that occasion I asked the Government to appoint an inspector well versed in the diseases of sheep, and I predicted that unless they did, in a very short time our sheep would be scheduled in the British market. Through the carelessness and negligence of the Government to appoint a competent and thorough inspector, my prediction was verified, and our sheep were scheduled in that market.

What other promises did they make? The Government promised that a market would be opened, at our own doors, for all we produced. Not only our butter and eggs, but our cheese, cattle and wheat and all our other produce would find a ready market at home. That promise was made by the late Sir John Macdonald. Has that been fulfilled? The hon. Finance Minister tells us that our market at home for agricultural products has increased in that time, and also the foreign markets. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that it would be very strange indeed if, in a young country like Canada, with such a small population as we then had, our market had not increased to a certain extent at home; but the increase in our home consumption has not kept pace with the increased production, and yet our agricultural industry has increased but very slightly. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) showed us that the land was getting into the hands of fewer people in Great Britain. Let me point to a young country like Canada, and, according to the census returns, there were seven thousand fewer farmers in this country in 1891 than there were in 1881, even with all the land that has been taken up. That shows conclusively that Canada has not been in the healthy condition in which an agricultural and a young country ought to be, even if we had commercial depression. We certainly ought to have a larger number of farmers now, in 1891, than we had ten years previously. Such, however, is not the case, which shows that our agricultural industry is not thriving.

We were told that all our industries were in a languishing condition in 1877-78, and that the Conservative Government were going to adopt a policy which would not only stimulate agriculture, but promote all our other industries. Well, Mr. Speaker, the agricultural industry has never been in a more languishing condition than now. Through the mistaken policy of the Government, we have lost some of our products in the best market we ever had, namely, the American market. The Government added to our tariff in 1890 the goods which they had withdrawn from that tariff under pressure. We had promised to reciprocate, in our tariff legislation, whenever the United States should remove the duty from a large number of articles enumerated in our tariff statute of 1879. Whenever the United States took off the duty, or a part of the duty, from those articles, we agreed, under that statute, to do likewise. Well, Mr. Speaker, they took the duty off a large list of articles in 1883, and yet our Government did not reciprocate until 1888: and then, when they did so, they acted under pressure from the British Government, because the British Minister at Washington sent a despatch to the Colonial Office in London, and that office communicated with the Government of Canada, asking why those duties had not been removed from our tariff, although the promise to do so was embodied in the Canadian tariff statute of 1879. We were told at first that those duties would not be removed, but by and by they were, and in 1890 they were again imposed. When the McKinley Bill was under discussion in the House of Representatives, Mr. McKinley himself said that while it was not in reality a retaliatory measure, yet they should not forget the action of the Canadian Government in returning to the tariff schedule those articles which had been removed from it in 1888. I hold, therefore, that it was due to this conduct of our Government that we lost the American market for our barley and eggs, two of the most profitable articles that can be raised on the farm. We used to send 9,000,000 bushels of barley per year across the line before the McKinley Bill was imposed, and $1,800,000 to $2,000,000 worth of eggs. Now we have lost a market worth six millions to the farmers of this Dominion in eggs and barley alone, through this absurd policy of the Government. Feeling no doubt that they were to blame for the loss of this market, the Government promised to open to us a superior market in the old country than we formerly had in the United States. We can all remember when something like 50,000 bushels of seed barley were brought from the old country and distributed amongst our farmers at a certain price in order that we might be able to raise two-rowed barley with which to supply the English market. But if the Government had been acquainted with the trade of the country, and the result of sending two-rowed barley to the British markets, they would have seen their mistake. I stated at the time it would not be a success, because I tried the experiment twice. It turned out a complete failure, and many of our farmers, who went in for this two-rowed barley, lost large sums. The Government also promised to give us in the old country a better market for our eggs than we had in the United States, but that trade has fallen off to such an extent that our farmers have lost all hope in it. I hold, therefore, that under the action of the Government our markets have been very much curtailed.

Then there were other promises. Sir Leonard Tilley told us, in 1878, that if he had had control when the Mackenzie Government was in power, he would not have required so much money, by at least two millions. Well, the amount spent by the Mackenzie Administration was $23,500,000, so that if there was any truth in the statement of Sir Leonard Tilley, the Government which succeeded the Mackenzie Administration should have reduced our annual expenditure to something like $21,500,000. Has that promise ever been fulfilled? Has the Government of the day, since they took office in 1879, ever reduced the expenditure?

The Finance Minister has told us that his Government has reduced taxation. But where they reduced the taxation upon the one hand to the amount of one dollar they increased it on the other hand to double that amount, and made it bear all the more heavily on the farmers. We have been told a great deal about the duty taken off coal and of the amounts saved to the people of this country, something like forty-six dollars in a given number of years. But when the Finance Minister told us about relieving the people of the burdens of taxation, he neglected to tell us that they had put an extra duty upon cotton clothing. In 1880 the duty on that article was 30 per cent, and in 1890 it was 35 per cent. The hon. gentleman did not make a calculation to show what amount of increased taxation was paid by the people on account of that article. The duty on printed cottons in 1880 was 28 per cent, and in 1889 it was 32½ per cent. The hon. gentleman told us of the amount taken off on account of the iron duties, but here we have some articles of prime importance to the farmers and workmen of the country the duty on which has been increased. On earthenware and stoneware, in 1880 the duty was 30 per cent, while in 1889 it was increased to 35 per cent. The hon. Finance Minister neglected to make any calculation of the amount taken from the pockets of the people on this account, not only that which went into the treasury, but the very large sum that went into the pockets of the combinesters. We believe that the statements made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) two years ago were true. That hon. gentleman stated that there was not an industry of any importance that was not under the control of some trust or combine, and that all these trusts and combines were taking large sums out of the pockets of the people. I believe that is the case to-day. I saw a statement just before this House met with respect to the cotton factories to the effect that the representatives of the manufacturing industries had met and that the result was a rise of 15 per cent in the prices of cotton goods. They put the price as high as they could while still keeping out the foreign goods. I saw a statement also with regard to the nail manufacturers. Those manufacturers met, but not alone; an expert from the United States sat with them, and it was said that an arrangement had been reached under which the nail manufacturers of Canada were to enjoy the Canadian market while those of the United States were to have the control of those of that country. Shortly after I saw the notice of that meeting there was a considerable increase in the price of nails. Then we come to the case of agricultural implements. I make now the statement which was contradicted when I made it before, that in 1878 there was a tariff clause providing that agricultural implements brought in by agricultural societies or for the encouragement of agriculture in Canada were admitted free. We could get free all the agricultural implements we needed. In 1880 a duty of 25 per cent was put upon implements; but that was not sufficient, and it was afterwards raised to 35 per cent. When the hon. Minister of Finance gave his figures to show how much taxation had been taken off, he did not make a calculation to show the burden imposed upon the farmers of this country through the increase in the duty on agricultural implements. The duties on iron, I believe, benefited only some of the manufacturers. The manufacturers were able to carry on their business successfully before the National Policy. I think I shall be able to show that before I resume my seat. The hon. Minister did not give us a calculation to show the additional burden placed upon the farmers through these tariff changes. Though the manufacturers of wagons and buggies and goods of that description had a great advantage through the duty, they were given a further advantage by being allowed to import other goods, such as spokes, felloes, &c., of their raw material free. This was quietly put through by Order in Council for the benefit of a few individuals and was not put through this House, while the duty upon manufactured goods, which the farmers had to pay, was kept up. I have stated that the manufacturers of this country were willing and able to manufacture under the tariff in force in 1878. If my memory serves me aright, a committee investigated this matter in 1878, and received a number of reports from manufacturers, and this is what some of them had to say. The first I may mention was a founder with a capital of $180,000:

No profit on fixed capital last year, owing to bad debts and keen competition; the measure of protection they had enjoyed has unduly stimulated the industry, and the business was overdone.

Here was a manufacturer who said even before the National Policy that they had too much protection and the effect was to unduly stimulate the industry. That, I believe, has been the effect of the National Policy. A hosiery manufacturer established in the west was the next. He reports:

Too much home competition and business overdone; profits last year, 6 per cent.

Another hosiery establishment:

Trade fairly good; profits on capital last year, 8 per cent.

An extensive sewing-machine maker:

Not running full time; satisfied last year with the interest on investment.

Agricultural implement maker in the west, making reapers, harvesters, and various machines :

Exported largely to Great Britain, Australia and South Africa ; export trade rapidly increasing.

Here is a statement by an agricultural implement manufacturer before the National Policy was adopted that the export trade in agricultural implements was largely increasing. But we find that up to the present time, the amount has not been so large, because only $270,000 of agricultural implements went to the Australian colonies last year, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, although we heard two years ago that one order for $300,000 had been given. Here is the report of another establishment, that of James Noxon :

The profits of this company last year, after making ample provision for bad and doubtful debts, were 28 per cent on paid-up capital stock. Our usual profits were over 20 per cent. * * * There was never a more absurd cry than that manufacturers are languishing for want of protection, while the fact is, the manufacturing industries, not including lumber, are to-day more prosperous than any other of the great industries of the country, with the possible exception of agriculture. It may safely be said, generally, that the manufacturers of Canada are more prosperous than are the manufacturers of any country in the world at the present time.

There, Sir, is an important statement from a prominent manufacturer in the west, one who, I believe, told the truth. And I believe that if it had not been for the National Policy, our manufacturing industries would have stood upon a sounder basis than they do to-day. I find that Mr. T. G. Hiscott, lumberman, miller and builder, was interviewed by the reporter of the "Mail :

Our interests are very wide, and extended to many lines of business. We are interested in wood-working, flour-milling, wool-manufacturing, real estate, lumber, &c. An extended market, such as we should gain by commercial union, would benefit every line. I could manufacture to better purposes for 60,000,000 of people than I could for 5,000,000.

That is the opinion of one of the largest manufacturers of the province of Ontario. Let us now take the opinion of a carriage manufacturer :

The iron duties have greatly increased the price of iron, and, consequently, have reduced our profits, there being no corresponding increase in the retail price of the manufactured article. Some of our manufacturers here are not doing well under the protective tariff ; in fact, some of them have failed. Our market is too small and overstocked. We could produce a great deal more than we do without much extra expense or trouble, if we get larger sales for our goods. I think I can face any competition ; I do not know why I should not. If I am not as good a business man as my competitors, why should the public suffer for my benefit ?

Let me now give you the views held by members of the Farmers' Institute, at a meeting held in 1888 :

That in the opinion of this meeting, unrestricted trade between the Dominion of Canada and the United States would be advantageous to both countries, and we desire that the same may be entered into.

There is the opinion both of farmers and manufacturers with respect to the National Policy. Let me say that I am perfectly convinced that if this National Policy had never been imposed upon the farmers of Canada, they would have been in a far more prosperous condition than they are to-day. A great deal is said with respect to our agricultural implement manufacturers, and others, to the effect that they would all be completely wiped out if the National Policy were abolished, or if the tariff were reduced. Let me say that it would be impossible to wipe it out at one fell swoop. It would be an injustice to most of the manufacturers themselves who have a large stock on hand. They must be allowed time. But let me say that we have manufacturers in Canada to-day who are quite ready to compete with any country in the world, providing they can get their raw material free, and can have the opportunity of sending their goods into other countries. It would be very strange if it were otherwise. We find that last year there were $663,000 worth of agricultural implements manufactured in Canada and exported. Now if, under the present tariff, those manufacturers are able to export such a large quantity of agricultural implements, would they not be able to export a still larger number if they could get their raw material free, and the duty thrown off coal, and a more extended market ? There is no doubt about it. Let me read the statement of a prominent agricultural implement manufacturer, Mr. Frank Frost, of Smith's Falls :

Mr. Frank T. Frost, of Smith's Falls, the manufacturer, arraigned the National Policy and pronounced it a flat failure. He said that there were just as many manufacturers using pig-iron in Canada in 1878 as there were to-day. They were then a great deal more prosperous than they were to-day, and the wages of moulders and mechanics generally were better. There was more work then than there was now for workmen in this town, Brockville or Smith's Falls. The country had never seen as good times under the National Policy as before, except during the first two or three years after its adoption. There was no foundry in Canada to-day using pig-iron but was paying $4 a ton duty. Prior to 1878 there was no duty on pig-iron. Besides the duty of $4 a ton the miner receives a bonus of $2 a ton, making his protection $6 a ton. This was not sufficient to enable the iron-producers to produce all that the country needed, so that three-quarters of the iron had to be imported from the United States. With the lower duty on the finished product the Canadian manufacturers were not able to hold their own, and the workmen had to bear the brunt. There was not a greater fallacy than the idea that the National Policy had given the workmen work. When the duty prescribed by the tariff on a certain article had to be met, if there was any squeezing down of the price to meet competition, that squeezing would be upon the workingman. The workmen never had to stand that squeezing under the old tariff of 15½ to 17½ per cent. The Liberal party had never been opposed to the manufacturing industries. It was a well-known fact that there was not an iron manufacturing industry in Canada that was not in existence prior to 1878. At the exhibitions held throughout the country in September it would be found that the men who were exhibiting their goods were the men who had been exhibiting for the last twenty or twenty-five years. There never was a policy so well vindicated in the last sixteen years of the National Policy as the old revenue tariff policy of Mr. Mackenzie. The Liberals had been accused of being opposed to manufacturers. He had no hesitation in saying, as a manufacturer, that this was deliberately untrue. What they were opposed to was the injustice that had been done by the imposition of duties by which monopolists had been drawing money from the people which they had not earned. In five villages of the county of Lanark there was not a factory now that was in operation five years ago. It was simply a case of allowing the combines in Montreal and Toronto to gather in all these small factories and close them up. Mr. Frost repeated, that the National Policy had been a flat failure.

That is the opinion of a gentleman who manufactures implements upon a large scale, and who employs from 120 to 150 men in his factory throughout the year. He is perfectly prepared to compete with other manufacturers throughout the world, provided the duty is thrown off the materials that he requires to use, and that he can get free coal.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). What was the date of that letter ?

Mr. McMILLAN. It is not a letter, it is a speech that was delivered in Brockville. Here is a statement showing that some of our most extensive manufacturers believe they would be better off provided they could get their goods free from the United States, and were able to send their manufactures into that market. I find a statement in a paper, from the Massey-Harris Company, which I will read :

MASSEY-HARRIS COMPANY.

A despatch was received yesterday from Niagara Falls, N.Y., stating that final arrangements had been made with the Massey-Harris Company of Toronto to locate the United States branch of their agricultural implement factory there, and that building operations would be begun in the spring. Inquiries were made last night, and the officials would not give a denial to the despatch. It was learned, however, that the company had bought a large property adjoining the Michigan Central Railway, and that large orders for the best Canadian hardwood lumber had been placed during last fall with the largest manufacturers of hardwood lumber in Canada for delivery on the American frontier this year.

Let me tell the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule) that here is the very result that he was anticipating. Here we find that one of the most important manufacturing companies in this country believe that it would be to their benefit to have freer trade relations with the United States. Letters were read in the House the other night showing that there is a firm in the lower provinces that is going to move a large part of their works from Canada into the United States.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, here is the statement: I have read it. If the Government had accepted the tariff offer of the United States to allow a certain number of implements to go into the United States free, on condition that their goods could come into Canada free, the Massey-Harris Manufacturing Company would have remained in Canada, because it will cost them so much more to move their works and make a fresh start. If there had been free trade in agricultural implements between the two countries, all they would have had to pay, extra, in Canada would have been a little freight, and it would have been a long time before the amount they would have to pay in freight would equal the amount of money that it will take them to move their works and set them up on the other side of the line. The Massey-Harris Company is one of the very largest agricultural implement manufacturers we have in Canada. Let me say, Sir, that Mr. Massey made the statement before the Combines Committee that the duties imposed on iron and steel had caused the firm of which he was the representative, to pay $30,000 extra in taxes during one year. I would ask, where did these $30,000 of extra taxation come from? There was no rebate of duties at that time and very little exportation of agricultural implements—the whole amount came out of the pockets of the farmers. I sent a letter to one of Massey's agents, and received a reply stating that it would be impossible for the Massey Company to fill all their orders without an increase of 10 per cent, and then they would almost sell the machines without profit, and they would be obliged to increase the price of their implements to a considerable extent. That shows conclusively that the removal of some duties and the imposition of others was a feat of which the hon. Finance Minister had no reason to boast. It does not require a feat of legerdemain to take off $1,000 in duties and impose $2,000, but I consider it a dishonest act in any statesman to state that a large amount had been saved to the people in taxation, while he did not state anything with respect to the extra amount of taxation he had imposed on the people in order to recoup himself for the taxation removed. A great many of our manufactures in Canada are today in a languishing condition, they are not healthy and prosperous. Take the large woollen mill at Markham. I find that notice has been given of a reduction in wages to commence February 1st, to the extent of 25 per cent on wages over $1 per day, and 10 per cent on wages under $1. This will mean an average reduction of 17½ per cent all around. Whenever manufacturers find themselves in a tight place and squeezing has to be done, it is always in the direction of lowering the wages of the workingmen. Over the civilized world wherever there is a protective country, the wages of the artisans are cut down almost to the lowest notch. There was a time, when the working-people were not so well educated as they are to-day, that they believed a protective system protected workingmen. In this connection let me read an extract from a newspaper :

The Speight Wagon Company have received an offer from the Chatham Wagon Company to take over the finished or unfinished stock, so that the Speight Company can close down. The company find that with the present competition they are not capable of going on, and they are thinking of removing.

However, I believe a number of friends of the company have taken measures so as to render it unnecessary for the company to remove. There is not the least doubt that both the workingmen and the farmers have suffered grievously through the National Policy.

Some people declare that the farmers of this country are protected. Here is a despatch that was sent by the British ambassador at Washington to Lord Kimberley, with respect to the position in the United States, and I hold that the statements there made will hold good as regards Canada. He says :

The other agricultural products are nominally protected, but as they could not be delivered from elsewhere as cheaply as they can be made at home, the United States farmer cannot be said to enjoy protection, but rather the contrary, as the cost of such manufactured goods as he has to buy is increased by their being protected, thus diminishing the purchasing power of his produce. Owing to the geographical situation of Canada, some agricultural products have been imported thence even under the McKinley tariff, and more would doubtless arrive if allowed to enter free, but prices would not be materially affected owing to their being fixed not here but in Europe.

Whenever the Finance Minister or any member on the Government side of the House claims that protection benefits farmers in the United States, they forget that the market for their surplus products is in Europe, and that the prices are fixed in Great Britain. To a certain extent, perhaps, it would be a great benefit to Canadian farmers if we got our produce into the United States market free. There is another short statement, as follows :—

Protective duties exist, but as agricultural profits depend on the sale abroad of surplus produce, these duties do not serve their purpose.

That is what we have pointed out time and again, that duties on agricultural produce do not protect Canadian farmers, but on account of the tariff the farmer has to pay an increased price for every article he purchases, and on that account the purchasing power of his produce is very much decreased. We have been told that goods are as cheap in Canada to-day as they ever were. We have been told by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) that prosperity in the United States dated from the adoption of protection, that under a protective tariff the United States had achieved its present greatness. Let me read some statements of the committee which revised the tariff in 1884, as follows :—

The history of American industry shows that during no other period has there been a more healthy and rapid development of our manufacturing industry than during the fifteen years of low tariff from 1846 to 1861, nor a more healthy or harmonious growth of agricultural and all the other great industries of the country.

That is an admission made by men who were well qualified to judge—the most prosperous period in the United States was the time it had the lowest tariff. The statement continues :

No chapter in our political experience carries with it a more sanitary lesson than this, and none could appeal more strongly to law makers to establish a just and rational system of public revenues, neither exhausting agriculture by constant blood-letting nor keeping manufactures alternating between chills and fever by artificial pampering. In this direction alone lies stability, concord of sections of great industries.

Here is a statement which applies to Canada equally with the United States. I believe in the adjoining republic there is a very strong feeling growing up with respect to the high tariff, and notwithstanding the fact that there was a little reduction made during the last revision ; but no doubt they are on the road to reduce their tariff. The late Senator Beck said :

In adjusting taxation on imports with a view only to obtain revenue or for revenue only, we never thought of discriminating against American industries, or of depriving them of the incidental benefits of the protection a proper revenue tariff would afford.

We have evidence that during a revenue tariff in Canada, when there was an incidental protection of from 15 to 17½ per cent, our manufacturers and farmers were more prosperous than they are to-day. Secretary Carlisle said :

If we were called upon now for the first time to declare a principle or inaugurate a policy upon this subject, I should not hesitate to announce my adherence to that creed which commands the largest liberty in trade. That doctrine which opens the channels of commerce in all parts of the world and invites the producer and consumer to meet on equal terms in a free market for the exchange of their commodities, for I sincerely believe that all commercial restrictions are in the end injurious to the interests of the people.

I believe every right-thinking man in the world who wishes well of his country is beginning to feel that these restrictions are detrimental to the true interests of the people. Secretary Sherman said :

The measure of protection should extend only so far as to create competition, and not to create home monopoly.

Now, Sir, protection in Canada has created monopoly. We have a monopoly in our cotton manufacture, a monopoly in our iron industry, and we have, we may say, a monopoly in the manufacture of agricultural implements. We have a monopoly in the sugar refining industry, and in almost every great industry in this country. The late President Garfield said :

Duties should be so high that our manufacturers can fairly compete with the foreign product, but not so high as to enable them to drive out the foreign article, enjoy the monopoly of the trade, and regulate the prices as they please.

Senator Sherman, discussing the tariff commission bill in 1883, said :

The measure of protection should extend only so far as to create competition, and not to create home monopoly.

That, Sir, is what is done in Canada to-day. The manufacturers regulate the prices as they please, and not only that, but they are regulating the tariff as they like. The monopolies had their tariff committee appointed, and after deliberating for several days, they prepared their brief and submitted it to the Minister of Finance. He accepted it, and as they themselves boasted afterwards, they revised the tariff to suit the manufacturers of Canada. That state of things should be put an end to at once. If the manufacturers are allowed to regulate the tariff, let them have seats in this House. Indeed, at least one hon. member of this House who has a large woollen mill in Almonte, sat on that manufacturer's committee, and revised the tariff to suit himself.

Now, Sir, agricultural implements there were imported into Canada to the value of $292,222, which paid a duty of $70,156, and we exported agricultural implements to the value of $633,718, or nearly $400,000 worth more than we imported. But, there is more than that. You are aware, Sir, that the manufacturers interviewed the Minister of Finance, according to their own statements, time and time again. They were not satisfied with the revision of the tariff, but they wanted no duty upon the raw material that entered into the production of their goods, and so, on the entreaty of the manufacturers to the Finance Minister, an Order in Council was passed giving them a rebate of 99 per cent of all the duty of the raw material entering into their manufactured goods, which are exported out of the country. Is it not a great injustice to the Canadian farmer, that implements can be manufactured in this country, and sold in Great Britain, Argentina, and in Australia, less the cost of duty when they leave the shores of Canada, than the prices they are sold at to the farmers of this country. The farmers of Canada have a right to complain. They have been discriminated against by this Government which has never done anything to assist them, but which has imposed taxation upon taxation on their shoulders. Since the National Policy was imposed, and after it was imposed, this Government have done everything in their power to increase the burdens of the farmers. Now, Sir, in what condition do we find the farmers of Canada at the present day? We find them in a very depressed condition, indeed, and we find them in not at all the same healthy condition that they enjoyed when the National Policy was first inaugurated. The Government tell us that the farmers are well off, but I, as a practical farmer, am in a position to contradict that statement. This present winter, farm after farm is being mortgaged, and since I have commenced to examine the statement of the mortgages to companies in the province of Ontario, I never knew of as many farms held for sale as there are during this present winter. There are many farmers not able to meet their engagements, and their farms will have to be sacrificed. Let me give to the House a statement as to how the farmers of Ontario stood in 1882 compared with 1894 with respect to their income from their farms and the value of their field crops. This statement is given in the report of the Bureau of Industries for the province of Ontario. In making the calculation, I think it is better to give the size of the farm at 100 acres, as it is much more easily understood than if the farm is divided into fractions. In 1882, there were 19,622,000 acres of land, giving 196,225 farms of 100 acres each; there was $155,000,000 worth of farm produce, giving to each farmer with 100 acres, $789. That was a fair remuneration for the farmer, but it was nothing extra, and he could not make money very rapidly out of it. Some may say, that after this, the farmer has his stock of cattle; but when we take his produce at its full value and calculate what it is worth, you cannot take that produce again and feed it to the stock. You can only make the one calculation of it, so that all the farmer would have after the agricultural produce would be what little he could make of his pasture. From 1882 to 1889, there were 207,815 farms of 100 acres each, and the average value of the crops during these years was $114,533,000, or $551 to each farmer. When we come down to 1893 we find that there was 219,407 farms of 100 acres each in the province of Ontario, and the total value of field crops was $101,886,000, giving to each farmer a sum of $464. When I made this statement to the House last year, I said then that from my experience in going over the province of Ontario, that when we got the returns of 1894, they would be very much reduced as compared with 1893. And, Sir, I am very sorry indeed to find that my prediction has proven only too true. In 1894, there were 220,327 farms of 100 acres each, and the value of all field crops was $94,055,000, or $426 for each farm. This shows that the return to each farmer in 1894 was $363, less than it was in 1882. And it must be remembered that out of the $426 for each farmer in 1894, he must feed a team and provide seed. However, Mr. Speaker, that does not show the sad condition of the farmers to the full extent. In 1887 the amount of mortgages in Ontario with loan and investment companies was $79,494,963, and that has steadily increased up to the year 1894, when it amounted to $115,692,809. This is an annual increase of $5,171,000 of mortgage indebtedness in the province of Ontario held by the loan and investment companies. But that does not at all represent the total amount of the mortgages held against the farmers of that province. I am perfectly convinced that in the locality in which I live, for every mortgage held by the loan and investment companies, there are two held by private individuals; but of these we have no means of judging the extent at the present time, as we cannot go to the registry office in the county and get a statement there. But there is another mortgage which is the last resort of the farmer when his circumstances become very straitened indeed, that is, the chattel mortgage; and in the province of Ontario there has been a very large increase indeed in the chattel mortgage indebtedness. In fact, in some parts of the country to such an extent do chattel mortgages exist, that it is very difficult to know when to buy stock from a farmer and when not to do so, because it is mostly on stock and implements that chattel mortgages are held. The following figures will show the extent to which chattel mortgages have increased in one year:

	No.	Amount.
On December 31, 1894.....	21,759	$11,220,000
do do 1893.....	19,722	9,333,000
Increase.....	2,037	$ 1,887,000

This increase in a single year in the chattel mortgages in the province of Ontario shows to an alarming extent how the farmers are going back, though I am convinced that a great many of them are both economical and industrious. This state of things is due to the very low prices they have been getting for their produce, combined with the higher prices they have to pay for almost every article they purchase in the market. Now, Sir, the condition of the farmer, when we compare it with that of the manufacturer in this country, is not a very enviable one. We find the value of farm lands in Ontario in 1882 was $632,342,000, and in 1894 $587,246,000, a reduction in twelve years of $45,000,000. Besides, during that time we had 2,073,000 acres more cleared, which should be added to the reduction. At $20 an acre, which is a low estimate indeed for clearing and fencing land in the province of Ontario, this would bring the reduction in the value of land alone up to $86,575,693 in those twelve years, leaving out of consideration the improvements in draining, in removing rocks and stones from the fields, in digging ditches, etc., which would amount to a very large sum of money. As I stated before, of the 220,327 farmers in Ontario each has an income of $426 a year. Out of this he has to pay taxes, keep a team and furnish seed. Put his taxes at $20, the keep of a team at $40, and seed at $40, and there is only $326 left to himself. But very few farmers with 100 acres can do without the assistance of a hired man during the summer. Allow $125 for that, and what is left to the farmer? The small sum of $201, without taking into account blacksmiths' bills and wear and tear of machinery. So that the condition of the farmer is not one to be envied. Now, let us compare this with the condition of the manufacturers. We find that the manufacturers had invested in Canada in 1881, $353,837,000, on which the amount of profit, without deducting raw material, was $219,463,000. The amount of profit per hand employed was $596. The average wages paid to each hand was $272. So that the net profit to the manufacturer, after deducting the wages, was $324 on each hand he employed, while the farmer's income for his whole year's labour, for himself and his family, is only $201. If this condition of things should continue for a length of time, I know not what is to become of a great many of our farmers. In a great many cases their farms have gone out of their hands. We have more tenant farmers in Canada to-day than we ever had since Canada was settled, although the National Policy is not the sole reason for this. It is partly due to the restriction upon our market in the United States, which was one of the best markets we had for our produce, and partly due to the large amounts of money we have to pay for all we have to purchase. We have been told time and again that low as the prices are for our grain, they would be lower still if we were not protected against the wheat and oats that would otherwise come in from the United States. I have a statement here for the thirteen years down to the year 1894, showing the prices of wheat and oats in the markets of the province of Ontario, as taken from the report of the Bureau of Industries of 1894, page 107, and the prices of wheat and oats in the markets of the United States, as taken from the "World" Almanac, page 167. The average prices of wheat per bushel in the two countries in those years were as follows:—

	Ontario. Cents.	U.S. Cents.
1883	107	112·6
1884	81·4	106·6
1885	80·6	86·2
1886	72·5	87
1887	78	89
1888	99·3	85·3
1889	88·1	89·7
1890	91·3	83·2
1891	92·9	93·2
1892	67·8	102·6
1893	59·4	79·8
1894	55·5	67·2

Or during the thirteen years, wheat averaged 85 6-10 cents in Ontario, and 92 3-10 in United States. That is what the farmer of the Dominion is protected against—against a market where wheat is generally higher priced than it is in ours. Now, take oats for the same period :

	Ontario. Cents.	United States. Cents.
1882	43	47·6
1883	38	50·6
1884	33 ¹ / ₁₀	30·9
1885	31 ¹ / ₁₀	37·9
1886	32	34·3
1887	34 ⁹ / ₁₀	40·8
1888	40 ¹ / ₂	43·4
1889	30 ¹ / ₂	39·3
1891	36 ¹ / ₂	42·6
1894	30 ¹ / ₁₀	35·2

In other words, during those thirteen years, oats averaged 34 9-10 cents in Ontario and 39 6-10 in United States. These figures are taken from the Ontario Bureau of Industry of 1894, which gives the prices of all those years. These prices given for Ontario are a favourable showing for the Dominion, because grain in the province of Ontario brings more than the average of the price which would be got all over the Dominion. When we take into account, this last year or two, the large quantities of grain raised in Manitoba and the North-west and sold at much smaller prices than in Ontario, it will be seen that if we had the figures for the whole of Canada, they would show a lower average during those years than is shown by the statement I have given. I hope the Finance Minister will give his attention to this and see that his boast that he has been protecting the farmers of Canada against the farmers of the United States has no foundation in fact, but that, on the contrary, the United States market is one of the best markets we could get. I shall prove this still further when I show the large amount of farm produce that went to the United States before the McKinley Bill and since that Bill was enacted.

Compare the markets of Toronto and Buffalo in 1895. Canada red wheat sold for 63½ cents at Toronto, and red wheat sold at Buffalo for 67 cents. Canadian white wheat sold at Toronto for 63½ cents; and white wheat at Buffalo sold for 67 cents. Barley sold from 27½ to 41 cents in Toronto, and in Chicago from 40 cents to 48 cents. Cattle were selling in Montreal from 2¾ cents to 3¾ cents, and in Chicago from $3.60 to $4.50 per 100 pounds. This shows clearly what a benefit it would be to Canadian farmers to have access to the American market. Hogs, on the 4th October, 1895, were quoted in Toronto at $4.50, and in Chicago at $4.55 to $4.60. Sheep were quoted in Toronto at $1 to $3, and in Buffalo at $1.50 to $3.75. Here is another statement which goes to show that we have not received as good prices for our grains in Canada, compared with the prices running with the United States, since the introduction of the National Policy, as we did before. Take oats in 1877, oats were selling in Toronto at 43 cents, and in Chicago at 31¼. In 1881 oats were selling in Toronto at 39¼ cents, and in Chicago at 37·83 cents. When we consider that oats are only 32 pounds to the bushel in Chicago and 34 in Toronto, oats were as high in 1881 in Chicago as they were in Toronto, just two years after the National Policy was imposed, whereas they were at least 3 cents lower in Chicago than in Toronto two years before the National Policy was imposed.

Large amounts of corn, between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 bushels came into Canada for consumption in 1877, while in 1881 we only imported 1,500,000 bushels. Take rye during the same period—I have taken my statements from the evidence taken by Mr. Orton's committee, appointed to inquire into the condition of agriculture. In 1877 rye was selling at 77 cents in Toronto and 62½ cents in Chicago, or 7¾ cents higher in Toronto than in Chicago. In 1881 rye was selling at 89 cents in Toronto and 91¼ cents in Chicago, or 2¾ cents higher in Chicago, two years after the National Policy was imposed. Take barley, in 1877 it was selling in Toronto at 73¾ cents while in Chicago it only brought 58 4-10 cents. In 1881 barley in Toronto sold at 91 cents, while in Chicago it was selling at 81 cents to $1.09, or 16 cents higher in Chicago than in Toronto. Now, I have another statement which goes to show our commerce in a large number of articles. My figures are taken from a statement that was compiled three years after the National Policy had been in operation, and it takes in all wheat, oats, barley, hay, straw, wool, dressed hogs, and eggs. The following is the table :

	1874.	1875.	1876.	1877.	1878.
Fall wheat.	$ 1 00	$ 1 10	$ 1 11	$ 1 25	$ 0 92	$ 1 07
Oats.....	0 43	0 39	0 40	0 35	0 32	0 38
Barley.....	0 97	0 92	0 86	0 65	1 00	0 88
Hay.....	23 00	20 00	14 00	18 25	13 50	17 97
Straw.....	16 00	14 00	11 00	15 00	12 00	13 75
Wool.....	0 30	0 24	0 27

Hogs.....	8 50	8 00	6 50	5 25	5 50	6 75
Eggs.....	0 24	0 21	0 22	0 20	0 15	20 2-5c

Making a total average of,$41 28

This was taken on the 20th October of each year. Now, let us take the three years after the adoption of the National Policy :

	20th October.			Average.
	1879.	1880.	1881.
Wheat.....	$ 1 34	$ 1 35	$ 1 36	$ 1 25
Oats.....	0 36	0 34	0 43	0 38
Barley.....	0 72	0 73	0 96	0 80
Hay.....	11 00	11 50	16 00	12 75
Straw.....	7 00	8 50	12 00	9 00
Wool.....	0 20	0 27	0 24	0 23
Dressed hogs.....	6 00	7 00	8 50	7 16
Eggs.....	0 18	0 20	0 25	0 21

Making an average total of,$31 79½

These figures show that there was a shortage of $9.49 in the receipts of the farmers for these articles for the last three years, as compared with the five years preceding. And yet these figures do not bring us to the period when agricultural produce was so very low. It is easy to show that 1881 was one of the best years in respect of prices of farm produce for a considerable period. Take the figures on 20th June, and see whether they show the same result as those for the month of October :

	June 20th.					Average.
	1874.	1875.	1876.	1877.	1878.
Wheat	$ 1 32	$ 1 01	$ 1 14	$ 1 60	$ 1 01	$ 1 21
Oats.....	0 53	0 49	0 34	0 56	0 32	0 45 4-5
Barley.....	0 70	0 60	0 57	0 70	0 55	0 62 2-5

The farmers' receipts from these articles, according to the average of the last three years, was $22.02½, as against $31.28 3-5 for the five years when the Government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie held the reins of power, a falling off for these latter years, of $9.26. These figures show conclusively that we had, as a rule, better markets before the National Policy was adopted than we have had since. There is another statement I wish to make in answer to a statement of the Finance Minister. He said :

Experimental farms have been placed in different parts of the country ; and the information which has thus been disseminated by example and by the distribution of the results on those farms to the farming population in the different provinces has introduced better methods of feeding, and has turned the attention of the farmers to more remunerative classes of products than they had formerly devoted their attention to.

Now, I have here a statement showing what it cost the farmers of Ontario, upon an average, during the years 1893 and 1894, to grow an acre of barley, and an acre of oats, and an acre of peas, and also showing what it costs to produce an acre of each of these three grains upon the Experimental Farm at Ottawa. I am not going to take the experimental plots on the farm, I am going to take field plots, which I consider afford a better guide of what is being done upon the farms. I have taken these figures from the Bureau of Industries, giving the value of an acre of wheat, and I have also taken the cost of production from the Bureau of Industries. Then I take the cost of production upon the experimental farm from a statement that is given there, and I take the value of the average produce of oats, barley and peas per acre. Now, I find that in the province of Ontario, in 1893, the value of an acre of fall wheat was $11.50, the cost of production was $19, showing that there was $7.50 of a loss in the cost of production over the value of the crop. In spring wheat the value of an acre was $6.97, the cost of production was $15, so that there was a loss of $8.03 per acre to the farmer. In barley, the value of an acre was $8.41, the cost of production, $14, showing a loss of $5.59. In oats, the value of an acre was $10.04, cost of production, $14, showing a loss of $3.96 to the farmer. In peas, the value of an acre was $10.36, cost of production, $15, loss on each acre, $4.64. In 1894—I will not go over the figures giving the cost of production—the loss upon a field of wheat was $7.35 per acre ; upon spring wheat, $6.88 per acre, upon barley, $4.86 per acre ; upon oats, $4.77 per acre, and upon peas, $5.43 per acre. Now one would think that the Experimental Farm must necessarily be of great benefit to the farmers of this country when those who work it are in possession of all the agricultural knowledge that can be gathered from books and other sources, of all the chemical science that can be brought to bear upon agriculture. I may also add that they have spent large sums for manure on that farm. We have been told that they spent something like $1,500 a year, for four or five years, in placing manure upon that farm, more than they made. We find there were 46 acres of oats, and the average yield was 25 bushels and 20 pounds per acre, which, at 31 cents per bushel, would give $8.39. The cost of production will be found in the report of the Agricultural Farm. It shows that there were seven and three-quarters acres of green feed, that cost $17.97 per acre to produce, and I hold that putting an acre of grain into the barn and thrashing it, will cost as much. Therefore, the loss was $9.63 upon the Experimental Farm, as against $7.35 by the general farmer in the province of Ontario. Now, there were only five and a half acres of peas, yielding 22 bushels and 38 pounds per acre, just one field of peas. Estimating the value at 53.6 cents per bushel, which was the average price in Ontario, that would give us $12.12. The cost of production being the same, $17.97, there is a loss upon each acre of peas of $5.85. There were eight and one-half acre of barley, yielding 25 bushels and 13 pounds on an average per acre, which, at 40½ cents per bushel, gives $10.21 per acre. Estimating the cost at $17.97, there was a loss of $7.76. Now, Sir, the case of the general farmer in Ontario, with the average as given in the Bureau of Industries, is not a fair comparison to make with a farm such as the Experimental Farm at Ottawa, because the latter has all possible advantages, first-class agriculture, first-class implements, and a large amount of manure. Let me say that this estimate does not include manure; I have only taken the grain, and on a field of oats there were put 18 tons of manure, which, according to the prices they have hitherto paid for manure upon the farm, would give us something like $4.50 per acre for the manure, besides the labour of putting it on the land. But I have allowed the manure to go against the straw. Now, how much is the loss upon this 46 acres of oats, eight and a half acres of barley, and five and a half acres of peas? Sir, you will be astonished when I tell you that these 46 acres of oats, according to their own statement, they have grown at a loss of $442.98. The eight and a half acres of barley have been grown at a loss of $65.96; and the five and a half acres of peas have been grown at a loss of $32.17, or an entire loss over the cost of production of $541. Now, this farm does not show what in reality can be done. There are many farms where oats and barley are raised, and raised at a profit. A farmer to-day that can produce the greatest amount of grain with the smallest amount of labour, and keep his farm in the best condition, the farmer that can produce the greatest amount upon the smallest quantity of land at the lowest cost of production, is the farmer that is the most successful. I hold that if this farm at Ottawa is to be of any benefit to the farmers of Canada, it is not by such teaching as is afforded by these results. I have gone carefully over the report of that farm, and I must say that there is a great lack of information as to what is done with the large amount of money that is spent upon it. Now, what do we find in respect to dairying in the report of the Experimental Farm? We find that some changes have been made in the cows composing the herd, from time to time. In all 37 cows have been kept. Then the report goes on to say that the total quantity of milk obtained was 59,896 pounds. If all the milk from a 40-acre plot had been manufactured into butter, it would have yielded 3,651 pounds. Let us estimate the value of the butter at 16 cents per pound. Thirty-one cows were milked from 7th July to the fall. Why, Sir, it only gives $13 per cow for that period; and if we take the other six months and estimate another $13 per cow, we would only get $26. I hold that these are insufficient returns for the amount spent on the experimental farm. Plenty of farmers are doing far better than these results indicate; yet the Finance Minister will tell the House that the experimental farm has been teaching our farmers improved methods of agriculture, and how to raise crops that will pay better, and also improved methods of feeding. If these returns show the results derived from improved systems of farming, they confer very little benefit on the farmer. In going over the report of the Central Experimental Farm I have been astonished to find that we do not get a full report of everything that takes place on the farm. There is no statement of the revenue derived. This would be advantageous to the farmer, especially if it gave a detailed statement for every field, the value of the labour expended on it, the amount spent for seed, and so on. Of course, we are all aware that experimental plots never pay. They are conducted for experimental purposes only, and with new varieties of seeds. I observe that thirteen varieties of oats have been taken out of thirty-six varieties. Certainly, the best varieties would be taken, and there should have been a full statement of the results given. We are constantly told that the central farm is for the benefit of the farmer. I have visited three of the experimental farms in the North-west, and I was very well pleased with them, the amount of money spent there being very much less in proportion than here. I have gone over the farm here many times, and I consider we have a right to criticise it, because it is the central experimental farm, and examples of good farming are supposed to be found there. It is supposed to set an example to our agriculturists, but, in my opinion, it is doing nothing of the kind. In the important matter of dairying it is not setting an example to the ordinary farmer in Ontario, because it is not affording much better results than the ordinary farmer obtains. We are well aware that very many of the best farmers are producing from $35 to $40 per cow, and some even as much as $50, when proper care is taken, and proper feeding adopted. Of what benefit is an experimental farm unless it is leading the farmers, showing them improvements in systems whereby they can secure an increased yield of products. This farm is not doing it at the present time.

I will again refer to some remarks made by the Finance Minister. He said :

But, Sir, if the home market for agricultural products has increased in that time, so also has the foreign market, as shown by the exports of the country. Agriculture and animal products, taken together, were exported to the amount of, in 1890, $37,000,000, and in 1895, to the amount of $50,000,000, an increase in this period of $13,000,000, or of 35 per cent. Let me exemplify by the exports in certain articles, the increase in the agricultural exports of this country, comparing the year 1890 with the year 1895.

I expected to see butter as the first article on the list, but that article is entirely absent. The report does not show what benefit our farmers have derived from the large amount of money spent on creameries for the purpose of making butter by the most improved methods and sending it to the British market. The hon. gentleman shows the increase in cheese. While other provinces may have been benefited by the system which the Government has established of sending the dairy commissioner and some of his assistants to cheese factories in the provinces of Quebec and Prince Edward Island. I hold that Ontario has not been benefited by anything the commissioner of dairying has done. It would have been better for Ontario if we had never bought a single pound of cheese and put it on the British market. If the hon. gentleman doubts my statement, let him take his own report for 1892-93 and examine closely into the sales. Hon. members will remember the splurge made a year ago, when the Government were going to procure large quantities of creamery butter and send it to the old country in order to establish there a high standard for Canadian butter. We have had no reports of the sales. The only statements we have received was from the commissioner of dairying when he came before the Committee on Agriculture last session, when he told us that he had realized 63 shillings per hundred weight, or 13½ cents per pound. We have been told across the floor by the present Minister of Agriculture that there were two sales, one at 16 6-10 cents, and the other 16 4-10 cents per pound. But we have never yet got a correct report of the condition of the butter and the quantity of butter that realized high prices. There was something very peculiar about the sales. A large quantity of the butter was kept in Montreal and sold there, according to the statement made here, at 21½ cents, and 22 cents. Why should we send butter across to the British market to realize 16 cents per pound when we could have realized 22 cents in Montreal? I am as thoroughly convinced as I am of my own existence that butter going to the old country has not benefited Canada. I have here a statement which gives an account of 271 packages sent to the old country. It is as follows :—

Forty-five, good texture, high-coloured, turnipy, too old ; 211, old, well made, fresh ; 6, variable ; 18, old, high-coloured ; 18, high-coloured, very salty and rany ; 18, old and turnipy ; 6, high-coloured and clean-flavoured ; 11, clean-flavoured and fair ; 34, high-coloured and bad ; 62, good, some old, high-coloured and too salty ; 18, good, some old, high-coloured and salty, and 14, fair, high-coloured, and too old.

That is the class of butter that was sent to the British market to raise the character of our Canadian product, and I am convinced that the very best dairymen in Canada, will not be able, during the next five years, to overcome the injury that has been inflicted upon the creamery butter trade of the Dominion by such butter being sent to England last year. We have creameries in Canada that are, I believe, a credit to the country. I will prove to the House that we have in the province of Ontario, private establishments that will do more for the credit of our Canadian creamery butter upon the British market, than can be done by any action on the part of this Government. Here is a statement respecting a visit to the model creamery, the Black Creek cheese and butter factory, belonging to the Hon. Thos. Ballantyne :

Up to this season all the output was disposed of in Toronto and Stratford, but the output being largely increased this season, a number of shipments have been made to England, with a view to testing the markets there. During Hon. Thomas Ballantyne's visit to England last summer, he thoroughly investigated the butter trade, and found that the shipments of Canadian butter made by the Dominion Government last winter had not only been a financial loss to the Government, but had injured the reputation of the Canadian product.

There is a confirmation of my statement from one of the most experienced dairymen in the province of Ontario, a gentleman who has done more in the interests of dairying in Ontario than any other man I know of, and I have known him for the last thirty years. The report continues :

The butter was bought haphazard in Canada and was made up of rolls, prints and tubs, high-coloured, low-coloured, heavily-salted and light-salted, fresh and strong, and all dumped on the English markets irrespective of the requirements of each. In Manchester, for instance, where the market demands a pale, light-salted butter, put up in packages of 56 pounds (the half of an English hundredweight), he found, among a great variety of other butter, some of his own make, which had been sold to a Toronto firm and who, in turn, had turned it over to the Dominion Government. These tubs were high-coloured and well salted, such as the Toronto trade demands, and, not to speak of the injury done them by being held so long a time, were quite unsuitable for the Manchester markets. The dealers said the people there called the oblong prints "soap bars," and were too suggestive of that article to meet with favour. In London he also found the 56-pound package to be the popular size, but a shade more colour was demanded than at Manchester.

Acting on the information he then gleaned several shipments have been made this winter to Manchester and London, and with the most satisfactory results. The butter is packed in square spruce 56-lb. packages, which are well steamed and soaked with salt brine before being used, and afterwards lined with parchment paper. For Manchester no colouring is used and only half the quantity of salt that goes into the butter for the Canadian trade. For London about half as much colour as for the Canadian trade and the same amount of salt as for Manchester.

Shipments have been made weekly since 1st December, and the goods have always arrived in prime condition. The prices realized have ranged from 102 shillings to 112 shillings for 112 pounds, only one small lot bringing the lowest price, the average being 109 shillings, which is almost 24 cents, Canadian money. One hundred and twelve shillings a hundred (112 pounds) is exactly a shilling a pound, which, at present rate of exchange, is a fraction over 24½ cents. After allowing for freight, commission, handling, &c., the butter which brought 112 shillings should make the price here a fraction over 22 cents, or 3 cents a pound more than could be realized in Toronto, where the prevailing price for best creamery tubs has been 19 cents. So that it will be seen that for this season, at least, England is the better market for high-class, properly-made and packed butter. Whether it can be counted on in other seasons, when there is no drought in New Zealand to reduce the supply from that quarter, remains to be seen. But the Messrs. Ballantyne are determined to give it a fair trial, and, by establishing a high reputation for their goods, secure for their patrons their best possible prices. The factory charges only 3½ cents for making the butter, so that from the last shipment to Manchester the patrons will realize nearly 19 cents per pound, or 3½ cents more than if the butter had been sold in Toronto.

The advantages of the creamery system over the private dairy are many. In the first place, a larger quantity of butter fat is obtained by the separator from a given quantity of milk of the same average quality than can be got by the most careful manipulation in the ordinary farm dairy. The average amount of butter fat in milk is 4 per cent, and the creamery gets from every pound of butter fat 1 1-5th pounds of butter, the fraction being moisture. The largest quantity got by the farm dairy is 4 pounds. So that, from every 100 pounds of average quality of milk, the creamery extracts four-fifths of a pound more butter than can be got by the hand process—a saving which amounts to almost one-quarter, a very important consideration. Then, the price which creamery butter commands over the dairy article, is very considerable, and these two factors, together with the saving of labour to the farmers' wives and daughters in the making of the butter, and time and trouble in the marketing of it, constitute the winter creamery one of the greatest boons that could be conferred on the farming community. That this is fully appreciated by the farmers in the vicinity of the Black Creek Creamery is made manifest by the very general manner in which it is patronized. The farmers' wives and daughters have been relieved of a large amount of drudgery, which renders to them life on the farm more comfortable and satisfying—and anything which contributes to this end is certainly a public advantage.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a report of what can be done in a well conducted creamery by a skilled individual. This is a report which will do more to raise the credit of our butter in the British market, and to increase winter dairying, than has even been done by the Dairy Commissioner of the Dominion of Canada. We have been told that our dairy commissioner has had factories running on the most approved principles, and if so, why did he not take some of their product, and put it in proper condition on the markets in Great Britain. Why did he not ship his consignments once a week, or once every two weeks? He has done nothing of the kind. The only benefit we have derived in that relation from all the money we have expended, is on account of the travelling dairies, that have gone through the country and have educated the farmers to a certain extent in the system of manufacturing butter. So much for the experimental farm and dairying. Now, Sir, we have been told by the Government that the farmers are in a more prosperous condition in Canada than in many other countries. It occurred to me last fall, that if I were to examine my accounts for a number of years, it would be interesting to find what amount of taxes I have paid on certain properties I have held since 1882, and also, what I was obliged to pay for some necessities of life which I purchased for my own use. In 1882 I paid on a piece of property $93.12 of taxes. That year I was selling wheat at $1.25 per bushel, so that I paid my taxes with 47½ bushels of wheat. But when I come to 1895 the taxes on that same piece of property was $93.90, only 78 cents more; but in that year I only get 62 cents a bushel for my wheat; so that instead of paying my taxes with 74½ bushels, it took 151½ bushels of wheat to pay my taxes. And yet we are told that the farmer is prosperous. In 1882 I bought a pair of boots for which I paid $5. Wheat was $1.25 per bushel, so that four bushels of wheat paid for my boots. In 1895 I also bought a pair of boots for $5, but wheat was only 62 cents a bushel, so that it took eight bushels and eight pounds of wheat to pay for those boots, whereas four bushels paid for a pair of boots of the same price in 1882. I bought a suit of clothes in 1882 for $24. With wheat at $1.25 per bushel, it took 19 bushels and 12 pounds to pay for that suit of clothes. In 1895 I got a suit of clothes for which, it is true, I only paid $20; but wheat was only 62 cents a bushel; so that instead of 19 bushels and 12 pounds of wheat for it, I had to give 32½ bushels of wheat for my suit of clothes. This statement shows the large amount of produce it takes to get the ordinary necessaries of life for the farmer. That suit of clothes, which I bought for $20, would certainly have been got for $16 but for the National Policy. Now, I stated that I believed I would be able to show that the United States was one of our best markets for agricultural produce, provided our Government had not locked the gate and lost the key to that market. If a fair attempt were made to get reciprocity with the United States, I have no doubt we could get a reciprocity that would be beneficial to Canada. Now, let us see the amount of agricultural products we sent to the United States, as compared with the amount we send to Great Britain. In 1889 we sent to Great Britain $3,678,055 worth, and to the United States $9,125,770 worth, or nearly three times as much, although there was a duty of something like 20 per cent on produce going into the United States. In 1890 we sent to Great Britain $3,661,000 worth, and to the United States $7,519,000 worth, showing that but for the tariff wall that exists between Canada and the United States, that country would be the best market for our agricultural products. In 1891 we sent to Great Britain $5,000,000 worth, whereas the United States took $7,000,000 worth. We all remember that it was in the fall of 1891 that the McKinley tariff took effect, which accounts to a considerable extent for the increase in the exports to Great Britain and the reduction in those to the United States. But when we come to the year 1892, the year after the McKinley tariff was imposed, we find that $15,000,000 worth of agricultural products went to Great Britain and only $4,573,000 worth to the United States. If that much produce could go to that country over a high tariff wall, with 30 cents a bushel upon our barley and 30 per cent upon our cattle and horses, how much more would go there if the duty were removed? In 1894 we sent to Great Britain $12,431,000 worth, and to the United States only $2,784,000 worth. It is astonishing that with such a high tariff wall against them any of our agricultural products should go to the United States. Now, what do these exports amount to in percentages? In 1889 while Great Britain took 27 per cent, the United States took 68 per cent; in 1890, while Great Britain took 30 per cent, the United States took 63 per cent; in 1891, while Great Britain took 38 per cent, the United States took 53 per cent; showing conclusively that the United States is by all odds the best market for our produce. With all the many large cities right along the line of the great lakes and along the Canadian frontier in the state of New York, and in the New England States, they furnish the most convenient market the people of Canada could have. We have been told that there is no market equal to the home market; but there are a number of cities in the New England States and in the state of New York, having a combined population equal to the whole population of the Dominion of Canada, and these would furnish a market for our produce if we had reciprocity, and were allowed to enter those markets. Now, Sir, our total exports in 1873, 1883 and 1893 to Great Britain and the United States respectively were as follows:—

	To Great Britain.	To the U.S.
In 1873.....	$31,431,030	$40,554,000
In 1883.....	33,672,000	40,000,000
In 1893.....	58,409,000	37,605,000

I hold that our Government were in a great measure to blame for the high tariff that has been raised in the United States against Canada, because I believe that if they had been in earnest in their professed desire to obtain a reciprocity treaty in 1891, when they appealed to the country under false pretenses, stating that it was at the instance of the United States Government that they were going to Washington to discuss reciprocity, and that they did not want to go with a moribund Parliament at their back, but a Parliament fresh from the people, and therefore dissolved the House—if they had been in earnest at that time, I have not the least doubt that they could have got a fair treaty. When they went to Washington, it is no wonder that they were not warmly received, because of the false statement they had made all over Canada, that it was at the instance of the Government of the United States that the meeting was to take place. But Secretary Blaine, when asked by Congressman Baker whether it was at the instance of the United States, stated distinctly that it was not; and when the hon. gentleman who took his seat to-day (Sir Charles Tupper) went to Washington, he had to admit, before any discussion took place, that the Government here had published false statements all over Canada—that it was not the United States Government who had asked that reciprocity should be discussed, but that it was owing to pressure having been brought to bear on the United States Government by the British Minister at Washington, and on the British Minister by the Government of Canada. We know that when they went to Washington they had a very long journey, but a very short stay. The delegates from Canada were asked how far they were prepared to go, and they replied that they would only enter into reciprocity in natural products. They must have known before they went to Washington that reciprocity would not be entertained if confined to natural products alone. Secretary Blaine, in his letter to Congressman Baker, said positively that the United States would not enter into a reciprocity treaty on the line of the treaty of 1854. But Secretary Blaine and Mr. Foster, of the United States—not the Finance Minister of Canada—were perfectly prepared to discuss reciprocity with the Canadian commissioners, if the latter had submitted a list of manufactured goods along with natural products. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) told us that if he were going to inaugurate a tariff policy in any country for the purpose of drawing immigration, and which, therefore, ought to be in favour of the poor man, he would introduce just such a policy as we have in Canada at present. He argued that the Canadian tariff was in favour of the poor man, and not of the rich man. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is yet fresh in the memory of every gentleman in this House that two delegates were sent out to Canada from the old country, Messrs. Davey and McQueen, to inquire into the condition of the lower provinces as a field for immigration. After they had made investigations and very full inquiries, did they come to the conclusion that the present tariff laws of Canada were such as to make it a desirable field for immigration? Certainly they did not, and I consider their opinion worth that of any ten individuals on either side of this House, who take a party view. What is the reason that the report of Messrs. Davey and McQueen was for a long time hidden from the light? How is it that when it came out to this country, it was immediately sent back to England? The reason was because their report—that of gentlemen who had full experience with respect to tariffs in other countries, and of the effect which a protective system had on the people, specially the farmers—revealed a condition of things which the Government were interested in concealing from the people. What was the report of these gentlemen? Mr. McQueen gave his impression as follows:—

I must now give the conclusions I have formed, from an emigration point of view, of the capabilities and resources of the maritime provinces. Any one reading my report will have some idea of what they are. I may here say, my co-delegate and I held exactly the same views, and came to the same conclusions regarding the state of the country. As many former delegates to Canada and the maritime provinces have given such glowing, and, I think, rather misleading and overdrawn reports of the country, it places me in a delicate and unenviable position to be compelled to do the reverse. I cannot say anything derogatory of the resources and capabilities of the provinces; they are great, and capable of great development, particularly the mineral. But facts prove that agriculture or farming has, for a number of years, but more clearly since the McKinley Bill came into operation, been on the down grade and in a very depressed state. Nearly all the young people are leaving the old folks on their farms and going to the States. Land, consequently, is badly farmed, and getting run down, houses and buildings in many instances falling out of repair. Any number of farms can be purchased at very low figures, often at less than the houses and buildings on them cost. A large number of farms are heavily mortgaged. The output of coal is increasing very slowly, and the iron industry is not developing as it ought to do. The census returns issued some months ago showed that the increase of population in the maritime provinces during the last ten years was very small, not at all commensurate with the natural increase of population and the number of emigrants coming into the provinces. The questions naturally arise: What is the cause of this depression? And can I recommend farmers, labourers, or artisans to emigrate to the maritime provinces? In answer to the first question, from my own observation and from all I could hear and learn, it is from the want of better trade relations with the United States, the natural market for the surplus produce. Some may say: You have nothing to do with the question—it is out of your province and touches on politics; but I hold it so closely associated with our mission and the object of our report, that we are bound to bring it forward. In answer to the second question, as to recommending emigrants to go to the maritime provinces, until there is unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, so that farmers would have a better market and be able to command higher prices for their produce, I must decidedly say "No." In coming to this conclusion, I may say I went to the provinces unbiassed and unprejudiced, and have endeavoured to give an honest and just report.

(Sgd.) JOHN McQUEEN.

Oakwood, Selkirk, Scotland, 18th Jan., 1892.

The same gentleman sent a letter to the North British Agriculturist, published in Scotland, in answer to correspondence in that paper, and in that letter he said:

I believe that the policy pursued by the Government of the Dominion of Canada will bring the people of Canada into annexation.

Such is the opinion of a gentleman who came to this country, unbiassed and unprejudiced, for the purpose of examining into its conditions as a field for immigration and settlement. I draw the attention of the hon. member for Westmoreland to this opinion and ask him to state whether that opinion bears out his contention that the policy of this Government is in the interests of the workingman? No, Mr. Speaker, it is not even in the interests of the manufacturers. As I have already said, the manufacturers would be better off to-day if it were not for the National Policy. Now, we have been told that England is going in for protection. We have heard of such an inclination being indulged in by Lord Salisbury. Let me read a statement that Lord Salisbury made in London on November 23rd, 1895:

London, 23rd November, 1895.—(Special United Press Cable Letter.)—The cool contempt with which Prime Minister Salisbury, when speaking last Tuesday at the meeting of the National Union of Conservatives, treated the proposals of the protectionists relative to the imposition of a tariff on wheat, oats, barley and hops, has keenly disappointed the agriculturists, who trusted that the accession of the Tories to office would imply some modicum of protection. His explicit declaration that a tariff for protection in any possible form was impossible has not deterred the agricultural interests from making fresh appeals. Yesterday a deputation from the National Association of Hop-growers waited on Lord Salisbury and protested that, unless a tariff was placed on foreign-grown hops, the English hop industry would soon cease to exist. Again the Prime Minister was compelled to speak plainly. He asked the deputation to look closely into the problem of protection. If protection should be granted to the hop-growers, he asked, what would be the feeling of the wheat-growers? They would be envious. Taking as highly practical the demands for a protective tariff, what, if they were granted, would be the feeling of the consumer, at finding the price of bread raised? The Government, he added, had no intention of placing a tariff on any article of general commerce.

There is the statement of the Prime Minister of England. Now, we have been told, time and again, that the farmers of Britain are protectionists to-day and are calling out for protection. We are told that in the report of the Royal Agricultural Commission which has been laid before the British House of Commons they appeal for protection. I have gone over the whole of that report, and I do not find that it bears out this contention :

Oxford, Gloucester, Wilts and Berkshire.—Grass farmers said : We like the importation of cheap corn ; it is the only thing that saved us last year. Dairy and grazing farmers said : The duty on foreign corn would rather injure than assist them. The commissioner said : The farmers in the district that I visited are in favour of some sort of protection.

Salisbury and Wiltshire.—Some asked for a tax on wheat ; others want wheat free, but a duty on flour.

Suffolk.—A slight duty on imported flour and manufactured articles.

Lincolnshire.—Put a duty on all manufactured goods and agricultural produce.

Somerset and Warwick.—The majority of farmers indicate a tax upon manufactured goods, flour and barley ; wheat free.

Lincoln and Essex.—In favour of taxing foreign meat.

Northumberland and Lancashire.—Chairman of Liverpool Farmers' Club favours a duty on imported flour and manufactured articles. Many farmers advocate fair trade. Put a duty on imported manufactured goods as long as exports to foreign countries are taxed. A number of farmers are opposed to putting a duty on manufactured articles as a whole, but put a duty on barley. Other farmers are opposed to protection in any form. Mr. Foster, of Ruth, says : I pass over protection as something too childish to trouble you with. As long as other nations send their produce here, it shows it is the best market for them, as well as for us.

Dorsetshire.—The question of protection was referred to at three meetings, but only for the purpose of repudiating it. It might be considered to put a small tax on flour. This would give work for millers and others and cheaper bran and offal.

Hampshire and Kent.—Many persons in favour of some sort of protection. Let wheat be free, but put a duty on flour. Some farmers advocate a bounty on wheat.

Kent.—A wide-spread feeling in favour of protection. Many farmers maintain that a return to protection is impossible. One said a tax on horses and cattle, but duty on grain would be injurious.

Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, Wigton and Ayr.—Farmers say nothing about protection, but complain of foreign wheat being sold as the best Scotch.

Roxburgh, Berwick, Selkirk, Peebles, Lindlithgow, Haddington, Banff, Nairn, and Elgin.—Farmers complained of imports being duty free. Some say a duty should be put upon all foreign produce. The number who advocated this were few. They had no expectation that protection would be adopted. Many want the duty removed from foreign import tariffs, and suggest that a retailer of foreign meat should take out a license, and that foreign meat should be sold as such.

Perth, Fife, Forfar and Aberdeen.—Complain of potatoes sent to the United States having to pay a duty, while American produce comes in free. Some suggest that foreign goods directly competing with the farmers' produce should pay an import duty ; that this would raise the price, but it would benefit the farmer only for a short time. At the end of his lease the rent would be raised, and only the landlord would be benefited in the end. The question of adjusting rent to the price of produce lies at the bottom of the agricultural question. Many favour the labelling of foreign meat and the licensing of those who sell it.

Now, Sir, that is a fair statement of the feeling, according to the evidence that has been taken by the committee that was sent out to investigate the condition of agriculture, for I believe that the full report is not in, but that it is only the evidence that has been placed before the British public. We have heard a great deal about Great Britain and about the straitened circumstances in which she is. We are told that she is being driven out of the markets of the world. Why, Sir, I think it was a year ago that the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) made the statement that Great Britain was being driven from the markets of the civilized nations of the earth, and that her trade was being confined to the barbarous countries upon whose people she was able to force her goods by strength of arms. I have here the return of the exports and imports between Great Britain and foreign countries and British possessions, from 1879 to 1893. I begin with the case of France, in which there is the greatest falling off in British export trade :

In 1879, the total foreign exports were £248,783,000; in 1893 they were £277,188,000, or an increase of £20,354,000. Now, consider the large shrinkage in the value of goods that took place from 1879 to 1893. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) said it amounted to 30 per cent. Consider what that means, in view of the enormous increase in the volume of goods that Britain has sent to other countries, and the enormous increase in her imports, and then consider that during that period, over five millions were added to her population. Farmers in England to-day are no more protectionists, as a class, than they are in this country. They know their position too well. The same argument was used during the agitation for the repeal of the Corn Laws, when they knew well that the only system that could give them redress was one regulating the rents of the country according to the price of produce. Now, we are told that Britain was in a prosperous condition under a protective tariff, which afterwards enabled her to adopt free trade. Let me give you a few examples to show how prosperous she was during the period from 1825 to 1896:

Seven London bankers and sixty-seven country banks stopped payment. The number of bankruptcies in 1826 was nearly 2,600. People mistrusting paper money ran for gold, and the bullion in the Bank of England was reduced to £1,300,000. As somebody said, the country was within twenty-four hours of barter. Immense numbers of working men were thrown out of employment, and the distress was universal.

Now, let me take another statement for 1842:

But what I supplicate for, on the part of the starving people is that they, and not you, shall be the judge of when corn is wanted. By what right do you pretend to gauge the appetites and admeasure the wants of millions of people? Are you prepared to deal even-handed justice to the people? If not, your law will not stand—nay, your house itself, if based upon injustice, will not stand.

1842—While the three great measures introduced by government—the modified corn law, the income tax, and the tariff reform—were in the process of receiving the sanction of the legislature, the condition of the country had undergone no improvement. The distress was deep and universal. From the agricultural as well as from the manufacturing districts, from all the great centres of trade—Manchester, Birmingham, Glasgow and Leeds—there came forth one great cry of agony. Merchants and manufacturers in great numbers succumbed to the pressure, and were driven into bankruptcy. Hundreds of thousands of industrious men were thrown out of employment, and subsisted either by private charity or out of the Poor's Rates, which had swollen into oppressive dimensions.

Sir, I read this as an answer to a statement made by the present Minister of Agriculture last year to show that it was necessary that the people of that country should adopt protection. I could read page after page to show the great amount of distress that existed in Britain under protection. Since the abolition of her corn laws, no such distress has even passed over Great Britain. Labourers were then getting five, six and seven shillings a week under the protective system, having to support their families on these wages when food and clothing were very much higher than they are to-day. Three years ago when I visited the old country, labourers were getting from 15 to 18 shillings a week. England never suffered under a free trade system as she did during the time she was under a protective system. England has made advances under free trade such as no country, except perhaps the United States, has ever made. Mr. Speaker, I have spoken a long time, I beg leave to thank you for your indulgence, and I will now resume my seat.

Mr. McINERNEY. Nothing affords me greater pleasure than to listen to the broad Doric accents of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan); and considering, as I have been led to understand, the early opportunities that hon. gentleman enjoyed, he appears to me to be a wonderful speaker, indeed. But, Sir, the most mellifluous accents and the most nicely worded phrases begin to pall upon one's ear at 11 o'clock at night, and we have been listening to them for nearly three hours. I wish to add that with many of the statements of the hon. gentleman, I have not much fault to find; but there are some of his statements so obviously fallacious, that I must enter my protest and my dissent to them, before I go any further. The hon. gentleman has said that there was no time in the history of the United States of America when that country was more prosperous than during the time when they had the lowest tariff. Now, Sir, I think that a man must have read American history in vain who can coolly and deliberately make such a statement as that. Every one of us who has read the history of the United States, and who is acquainted with recent events in that country, must certainly come to a conclusion opposite to that at which the hon. gentleman has arrived. We all remember that when the reform tariff party headed by President Cleveland, gained a recent victory in that country, what a panic seized upon the industries of the United States. Banks failed, business houses collapsed, industries of every character underwent a terrible depression. Coxey's army, representing the highest possible type of depression, marched almost across the continent to Washington. At no time in the history of the United States had that country come to such a deplorable financial pass as during the time when the party pledged to the reform of the tariff, held power for the last time in Washington. Why, Sir, the United States had been rapidly paying off their national debt under protection, but we find now that, under the reform tariff policy of President Cleveland and the Democratic party, the gold surplus in the vaults of the United States treasury has almost entirely disappeared. Only the other day Mr. Carlisle, the Secretary of State, had to make a bond issue of two hundred million dollars in order to bring back to the treasury the gold that had been taken from it during the depression. I claim therefore that the hon. gentleman is obviously wrong when he states to the House that at no time in the history of the United States was that country so prosperous as during the time when the tariff was lowest. Again, the hon. gentleman has stated what appears to me to be obviously wrong, that the farmers of this country derive no benefit at all from the National Policy, and that they are the only class in the country who derive no benefit at all from it. I am prepared to show that there is no class of the population of this country that has derived greater benefits from the protective tariff than the farmers of Canada, which I will endeavour to show later on from the few notes I have prepared on that subject. Does my hon. friend from Huron think it fair, in discussing a question of this nature, to compare farm prices in 1878 and previously, with farm prices in 1896? When he shows, as he easily can, that the prices of farm products have in that period fallen to a certain extent, does he think that that points a moral, or that it makes a conclusion in favour of his argument? I rather think not. My hon. friend, with his knowledge of farming, knowing the large amount of agricultural implements and the low price at which they can be bought, with the cheapness of labour, with the large farming areas that have been lately brought under cultivation, and which have access to the markets of the world—my hon. friend should know that it is no argument whatever for him to say that because the value of the farm products are less to-day than they were 20 years ago, therefore the farmer is not in a prosperous condition. I will endeavour to show that the farmers derive more benefit from the National Policy than any other class of the population of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McINERNEY. I have made my statement, and if I fail in demonstrating the proposition laid down, it will be so much better for hon. gentlemen opposite. I state the proposition, and I will at the proper time undertake to prove it. I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that the Budget debate offers an occasion for the discussion of the financial standing of the country, that it is rather a stock-taking time, in which we look at the means we have on hand and judge so far as we are able of the result of the plunge we may take into the future. But the hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches have during this debate entered into a discussion of nearly every subject under the sun. They have talked about the divisions that have taken place in the Government ranks. One hon. gentleman even dropped into poetry on that occasion, and with him the wish was father to the thought when he said that when the brains were out—meaning that the hon. gentlemen who had left the Cabinet were the brains—he thought the Government would die. The hon. gentleman was quoting, I think, from a very wonderful production by the greatest poet of any age. But he should have finished the quotation. The hon. gentleman was quoting from the great play of Macbeth, and like Macbeth, the hon. gentleman's wish was father to the thought, that when the brains were out the man would die. The hon. gentleman should have continued further in the wonderful scene in which Macbeth sees Duncan rise before him, and with a stricken conscience, being the cause of his death, he says :

The times have been that when the brains were out.

The man would die, and there an end,
But now they rise again—
And push us from our stools.

The hon. gentleman will find that the reconstructed Government, like the ghost of Duncan, will trouble him in his dreams, and push him from the fancifully erected throne that he has established for himself. I wish during the remarks I intend to offer to the House to direct my attention to the different subjects which I think legitimately come within the four corners of this discussion. For what I have to offer I do not claim any particular originality. The statements I have to put before the House have often been placed on "Hansard" and delivered in this Chamber, but like many an old story, I think it is well that such well known truths should be dinned into the ears of the people, and now particularly, when the two great parties in this country are going to ask a verdict from the electors of Canada. But I intend proceeding on the main lines of the financial state of the country, to institute a comparison between the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite and the regime of the Government which I have the honour to support; and in doing that I wish to call the attention of the House to the public debt, to the interest paid on the public debt, to the public credit, the annual expenditures, to the several deficits we have had and to the trade returns for the different years since 1873. I wish to institute a comparison between the periods from 1873 to 1878, and from 1878 to 1896, and I think I shall conclusively show to every unbiassed mind, to every fair-minded man in this country, as I shall show to every fair-minded man who reads what I say, that by the record, and by their fruits we should judge them, the party of hon. gentlemen opposite stands condemned before the bar of public judgment, and the party of my friends stand before the bar of public judgment deserving of the verdict of the people of Canada. We have heard very much about the public debt, and I admit that for a population only amounting to about five millions we have a large debt; but not a debt larger than the resources of this country, than the hopes in the great future of this country justify. But how has that debt been incurred? To hear hon. gentlemen speak, one would imagine that all that debt was incurred by the Conservative party. That is very far from the truth, and still in every schoolhouse in the country where hon. gentlemen opposite get an opportunity of addressing the people they constantly ring the changes upon the immense debt of the country and upon the fact that the Conservatives have incurred this tremendous debt in Canada. The debt down to June 30, 1895, amounted to $253,074,927. That debt was made up in the following way. The provincial debts we assumed in 1867 amounted to $77,500,000. In 1870 we took in Manitoba, in 1871 British Columbia, in 1873 Prince Edward Island, and with the readjustments made during those several years we assumed the debts of the provinces amounting to $20,452,340. In 1884, 1885 and 1886 there were further adjustments, adding $11,477,808 to the debt. So that the total public debt arising from the provincial debts which we had assumed at Confederation and the readjustments that took place subsequently amounted to $109,430,148, leaving otherwise incurred a debt of $143,644,779. Of that we incurred for the purchase of the North-west Territories $6,043,294, for the Intercolonial Railway about $50,000,000, for the Canadian Pacific Railway $63,000,000, for our canals and river improvements $42,000,000, or a total of $161,043,294, exceeding the amount as given before by about $18,000,000, paid out of the accumulated surpluses of the different years when the Conservative party have been in power. I wish to compare the increase of the debt. The debt increase from 1890 to 1895 was $15,544,880, and to hear hon. gentlemen opposite speak one would suppose that no improvements had been carried out of any nature that was for the benefit of the people. Of that sum there was expended, as follows: On canals, $11,319,378; Intercolonial Railway and connecting roads, $4,919,781; for the Canadian Pacific Railway, $754,142, or in all, $16,993,301. In railway subsidies we paid during the five years $5,867,748. And, Sir, I claim that the improvement to the country, in affording cheaper and quicker transportation both for freight and passenger traffic, amply justified the increase in the debt during that time.

But, let me come to a comparison between the years while hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, and the years while this Government have been in power; comparison with regard to the increase of the national debt. I wish to compare the years from 1878 to 1896 with the years from 1873 to 1878. On the 1st of July, 1873, the net debt of Canada was $99,848,461, but on the 1st of July, 1878, that debt had increased to the then enormous figure of $140,362,069, or an increase during the years from 1873 to 1878, of $40,513,608, being a yearly increase during that period of $8,102,721. Now, what are the facts with regard to this matter, between the years 1878 and 1896. In these eighteen years the increase of the national debt has been $112,712,858, or, during the eighteen years, an annual increase of $6,261,825, as compared with a yearly increase during the Liberal regime of $8,702,121. In the last six years, from 1890 to 1895, we have added to the debt, an increase of $15,544,880, or an annual increase of only $2,590,814, as compared with an annual increase of over $8,702,121, between the years 1873 and 1878. Sir, having finished with the debt, and having, as I think, conclusively shown that on the record, as far as our debt is brought before the public, the Conservative party stands in a much better position than the Liberal party of this country; having proved that, I wish to proceed to the next subject I have to deal with, namely, the interest on that debt.

In 1887-88 the interest paid on the public debt per annum was $8,891,288, and the average interest from that time down to the year 1895 was $8,784,542. The per capita interest paid in 1887-88 was $1.90, while the per capita interest paid in 1894-95, was $1.83, or a reduction of 7 cents per capita between the years 1887 and 1895. The per capita interest paid in 1873 was $1.31, and in 1878 it was $1.58, or an increase between 1873 and 1878 of 27 cents per head of the population. Therefore, whilst from 1887 to 1895 the per capita payment of interest decreased 7 cents per head, the increase per capita during the years of the Liberal regime from 1873 to 1878 was 27 cents. The rate of interest in 1878 was 3.68 per cent, but the rate of interest in 1890 was only 2.89 per cent.

Having left that branch of the subject, I come to speak of the credit of the country, and, after all, the debt of a country cannot be large, when it can, as this country has done at a recent date, put a loan upon the market at such a wonderfully fine figure. The credit of Canada stands pre-eminently fine in the markets of the world. In 1894, the present Finance Minister put a loan of £2,500,000 sterling upon the London market, and that loan was taken up at 3 1-6 per cent, and very much more than the amount of the loan was subscribed by the capitalists of Great Britain. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side say: We admit that it is true, but the price of money has fallen in late years throughout the world, and it is not due to the Conservative party that the credit of Canada is higher now than it was some years ago, but it is rather due to the cheapness of money at present. That argument finds its answer in this statement, that almost immediately after our Finance Minister had placed that loan of £2,500,000 upon the London market, the United States, with a population of over sixty millions of people, and with all the resources which hon. gentlemen in opposition are never tired of advertising—the United States put a loan of sixty millions upon the market, and, Sir, what did they get for it? That United States loan was taken up at 3½ per cent, while ours went at 3 1-6 per cent.

Let us compare the loans that have been put upon the market during the Liberal regime in this country, with the loans that have been put upon the market by the Conservative Government, and I will do that in order to establish a fair comparison between the credit of the country during the years from 1873 to 1878, and the credit of the country during the years from 1878 to 1896. In 1878, Sir Richard Cartwright, then Finance Minister, floated a loan in London at 4¾ per cent, and, in 1894, Mr. Foster, the present Finance Minister, floated a loan at 3 1-6 per cent.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Would you allow me to ask you a question. How were these bonds of the United States to be paid?

Mr. McINERNEY. It is true that the United States bonds that were issued at that time were on the face of them to be paid in silver.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Hear, hear.

Mr. McINERNEY. I thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) would laugh, but the hon. gentleman has laughed too soon. Sir, the hon. gentleman should not forget this, that while upon the face of it the bond was payable in silver, President Cleveland and Mr. John Sherman, at that time the greatest financial authority in the United States, and the leader of the Republican party in opposition to the President, both these gentlemen made statements—President Cleveland under his own hand—that these bonds would be redeemed in gold. It was, therefore, known to financial men throughout the world that the United States would redeem these bonds in gold, and it makes little or no difference, consequently, whether, upon the face of them, they stated they were to be paid in silver, because, if the credit and the standing of the United States in the financial markets of the world were to be maintained, the bonds would have to be redeemed in gold, as was stated by President Cleveland and by John Sherman, the leaders of the two great parties in that country. I think, therefore, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) cannot take much comfort out of the interruption that he made.

Now, Sir, in 1879, Canada 4 per cents were worth from 89 to 91 per cent, and in 1895, Canada 4 per cents were worth from 110 to 112, or an increase of 21 per cent in the values of these bonds. Similar bonds of the United States increased, during the same period, 13 per cent; similar bonds of the colony of Victoria increased, during the same time, only 10 per cent; and similar bonds of New South Wales increased, during the same time, only 13 per cent, as against an increase of 21 per cent in the 4 per cent bonds of the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, having shown, as I think, conclusively, that the credit of this country has not only been maintained, but considerably advanced by the Conservative Government under the present Minister of Finance, I propose to take up the annual expenditure. We are told by the Finance Minister, from what he knows and estimates, that the expenditure to the end of June, 1896, will amount to $37,000,000, and the estimated revenue to $37,000,000. So that we shall have no deficit for the present year. In 1878 we had an expenditure of about $24,000,000, so that there has been an increase in the annual expenditure since 1878 of $13,000,000 a year. That has arisen fairly, I think, from increased interest and sinking fund, $4,600,000; increased subsidies paid to provinces, $830,000; additional amounts spent on railways, canals and post offices, $4,000,000; an amount spent on the Experimental Farm, which did not exist in 1878; an additional amount spent on the Administration of Justice of $205,000; the government of the North-west Territories, for which there was no expenditure in 1878, $258,000; additional fishery bounty and protection, $280,000; the inspection of food, $19,000; the inspection of steamboats, $12,000; Indian management, $450,000 additional; penitentiaries, $138,000; superannuation, $156,000; militia and defence, $480,000; and mounted police, $166,000; or, taken altogether, $11,594,000. Add to that an increased expenditure for improved lighthouse service, geological surveys, immigration, Dominion lands, Dominion police and legislation, and you will find that you have made up the total amount of $12,000,000 of increase in the annual expenditure from 1878. Now, Sir, let us compare the increase in the expenditure from 1873 to 1878 with the increase from 1878 to 1896. The Liberals, when they came into power in 1873, found the expenditure $19,174,000. When they left office in 1878, they left the expenditure at $24,488,000, or an increase in the five years of over $5,000,000, or an increase of over $1,000,000 a year. Let us compare that with the Conservative record from 1878 to 1896, and what do we find? The Conservatives, when they came into power in 1878, found the expenditure at $24,488,000. In 1896 it had increased to $37,000,000, or an increase in those eighteen years of $12,512,000, or two-thirds of a million dollars a year, as compared with an increase of over $1,000,000 a year during the time the Liberal party were in power. Now, I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite a question which they have been asked before, but which they have never yet answered. They were asked the same question the other evening by the hon. member for Pictou, the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper); they were asked it last year by the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart); I asked it two years ago in a speech which I made on the Budget: and from that time to this it has never been answered, either in this House or in the country. The question is: upon what particular items would the hon. gentlemen, if they got into power to-morrow, economize and reduce the expenditure of the country? Before they talk of economy, which is at all times a very popular cry in the country, and which may be a misleading and unfair cry, let them state to the House and to the country, if they wish to get an honest verdict from an intelligent people in their favour, on what particular items of expenditure they intend to economize when they do get into power. Will they economize by reducing the fishery bounties paid to the hardy fishermen on the coast, as part of the award which was got at Halifax?

Mr. FORBES. By a Liberal Government.

Mr. McINERNEY. I care not by what Government it was obtained. It was not obtained by a Liberal Government. My hon. friend is wrong there again. It was obtained by a Conservative Government on Conservative plans.

Mr. FORBES. No.

Mr. McINERNEY. My hon. friend is perfectly ignorant of the matter if he says it was obtained under a Liberal Government. The gentleman who was defeated in Northumberland the other day always took the credit of having obtained that award. He said he prepared the plans for it.

Mr. FORBES. Does the hon. gentleman know the year in which it was obtained?

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not know exactly the year. Will the hon. gentleman tell us?

Mr. FORBES. Yes, by the Liberal Government which was in power in 1878.

Mr. McINERNEY. In 1878?

Mr. FORBES. In 1877.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman had better stick to one figure or the other. He first said 1876, then 1878, and now he says 1877. The hon. gentleman reminds me—or rather he does not remind me—of a witness I once knew who, when he came on the stand, was bound to stick to what he said in the first place. He was asked the height of a horse, and he answered that it was seventeen feet high. On cross-examination he said the horse was seventeen hands high. "But you said seventeen feet," the cross-examiner told him. "Did I say seventeen feet?" he asked. "Yes." "Well," he said, "if I said seventeen feet, by George, I will stick to it." If the hon. gentleman said 1876, he should stick to it, and not say 1878, and then go back to 1877. The hon. gentleman perhaps thinks that he knows more about this than any other gentleman in this House, but that does not count. We may form an estimate of what the hon. gentleman knows from what knowledge he shows, not from what he thinks he possesses. If hon. gentlemen opposite get into power, would they reduce the militia expenditure? The hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford have both committed themselves in favour of largely increased militia expenditure for the present year, so that in that item they cannot very well effect a decrease. Will they decrease the amount expended for the postal facilities of the country? They ought to know, and they do know, that the country is increasing in population and improving in intelligence.

Mr. McSHANE. Not increasing in population.

Mr. McINERNEY. There my hon. friend is wrong again. If the hon. gentleman would read the census returns, he would find that the population of the country very largely increased during the last decade.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, decreased.

Mr. McINERNEY. Well, I cannot account for the wonderful lack of knowledge and information evinced by these hon. gentlemen. They will hardly undertake to reduce the amount granted as railway subsidies to the different railway enterprises in the country. They will hardly undertake to reduce the grants for public works, immigration, lighthouses or the expenditure on the Experimental Farm. Let me again call the hon. gentlemen's attention to their record in regard to expenditure. A few years ago a number of Liberal Premiers from the different provinces of Canada met at Quebec under the leadership of Mr. Honoré Mercier, and there committed themselves to a resolution, each and every one of them, which was subsequently subscribed to by the hon. leader of the Opposition. That resolution would have taken out of the exchequer of this country every year $1,721,476. Mr. Peters, the Premier of Prince Edward Island, who has laid a direct tax on every acre of land in that province, has boldly stated that of that increased amount he would obtain from Prince Edward Island over $70,000 a year. Now, I would refer to what was said all through the West on that wonderful mission undertaken by the hon. leader of the Opposition and some other gentlemen who accompanied him. I should like to refer to what these gentlemen said at different places along their line of travel as to the way they intended to reduce the expenditure. At Medicine Hat, Mr. Laurier said:

I am not a Puritan or a saint, but simply a man, and I do not hesitate to say to you, that in the west you need public works.

Mr. Gibson at Medicine Hat, said :

In the North-west the requirements are many. Your constituency has not got all it should have. You need a bridge.

At Vancouver, on 13th September, 1894, that hon. gentleman said :

He would say that the Liberal party was just as much in favour of legitimate public works as the Conservatives were. Any one sailing from Vancouver to Victoria could see where public money might be spent in improving the approach to the Terminal City's magnificent harbour.

Mr. Laurier, in his speech at Vancouver, said :

I agree with my friend Mr. Gibson, that perhaps there is something to do for this city yet. Perhaps it would be well to encourage and assist the energy of the people, and that the harbour of Vancouver might be improved with some public money. I can only reiterate what has been said by Mr. Gibson ; That, when we have a Liberal Administration at Ottawa, it will be the duty, it will be the pleasure of that Administration, to favour any public work that is for the credit and benefit of the Canadian people, and it would certainly be for the benefit of Vancouver, and for the whole of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not suppose he is to do it for any other purpose. I do not wish to asperse his character by saying that it would be done for any other purpose —and that the harbour of this fair city should be made as accessible as it is possible to make it.

Mr. Laurier at New Westminster said :

Great works are required up on the Fraser River.

Mr. Laurier, at Winnipeg, on 6th September, 1894, ("Globe" report) said :

Mr. Laurier, in reply to a question from Mr. James, a prominent Patron of Industry, stated that, because of the insufficiency of information, in his possession, he had formed no opinion as to the feasibility of the Hudson Bay route, but he would favour the voting of considerable money in favour of a thorough investigation.

I have read these extracts from the different speeches pronounced in the west by the leader of the Opposition and his lieutenants to show—and, I think, they conclusively show—that whatever doctrines they may announce in this House, when they go abroad among the electorate, they certainly announce that when they get into power the people generally may look out for a golden shower from the treasury.

Leaving that branch of the subject, I wish for a few moments to discuss the deficits under the different regimes of the two parties. From 1873 to 1878 there were four deficits. While the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, it was only the first year, 1874-75, that they ever had a surplus at all. And I wish here to call the attention of the House to the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) the other evening. In speaking of the deficits, the hon. gentleman said that those that occurred during his regime resulted from the responsibilities that were laid upon the shoulders of the Liberal party by the Conservative party which had previously been in power. Now, it is passing strange that the facts do not carry out any such contention, because if the responsibilities that were laid upon him by his predecessors were the cause of all the deficits that he had, how comes it that, in the very first year after he came into power, he had a surplus and that every subsequent year he had a deficit ? How is it that the responsibilities laid upon him by his predecessors resulted in giving him a surplus the first year he came into power, and that his own blundering—if I may use the term—resulted in giving him deficits in the succeeding years ? I have here a record of the deficits during the different terms when the different parties were in power and the surpluses in the different years they held office. I will first take up the years when the Liberal party were in power :

GRIT YEARS.

	Surpluses.	Deficits.
1874-75.....	$935,644
1875-76.....		$1,900,785
1876-77.....		1,460,027
1877-78.....		1,127,146

So that during these four years there was to the debit of the Liberal party a balance of $3,551,314. I leave out of account the year 1878-79, for which perhaps both parties are somewhat responsible. I come now to the years under the Conservative regime. In those years, the account stands as follows :—

CONSERVATIVE YEARS.

	Surpluses.	Deficits
1879-80.....		$1,543,227
1880-81.....	$4,132,743
1881-82.....	6,316,351
1882-83.....	7,064,192
1884-85.....	754,255
1885-86.....		2,240,058
1886-87.....		5,834,571
1887-88.....	97,313
1888-89.....		810,031
1889-90.....	1,865,035
1890-91.....	3,885,893
1891-92.....	2,235,742
1892-93.....	155,977
1893-94.....		1,210,332

And I do not take from that, as the hon. Finance Minister did, the amount that went into the sinking fund of over two million dollars last year. So that there is a total of deficits during the Conservative regime of $15,692,094 against a total of surpluses of $26,507,501, or a surplus to the credit of the Conservative party, from 1878 to 1895 inclusive, of $10,815,407.

I may say that the deficits in 1894-95 accompanied decreased taxation. The remission of duties on sugar alone, according to the statement of the Finance Minister, and as the Public Accounts clearly show, amounted last year to $5,475,000. The duties on glass and anthracite coal and sugar since 1890, which were remitted, would have amounted in that time to over $25,000,000, or sufficient to have wiped out all the accumulated deficits and left a very large surplus in the treasury. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the revision of 1894 took nothing at all from the revenue of the country. but, as has been clearly shown, over $1,500,000 at that very time was taken out of the treasury of the country yearly by the large reduction that was made all along the line. The deficits under the Liberal regime, on the contrary, accompanied increased taxation.

In the different branches of the subject I have taken I have endeavoured to show that there is much to be said to the credit of the Conservative party and much against the administration of the Liberal party on those very subjects. I come now to a test which, I think, is absolutely correct as to the condition of the people of this country financially during those several years. I allude to the savings of the people. From 1874 to 1878, the savings of the people, as shown by the savings bank returns, decreased $353,057, or over 4½ per cent. From 1890 to 1895 the savings increased $45,000,000, or over 22 per cent. I think that is a gratifying statement and a conclusive proof that from 1890 to 1895, the people of this country have, from their different avocations amassed a large sum of money and put it to their credit in the banks far beyond what they did from 1874 to 1878.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman excuse me if I ask a question. Do I understand him to say that from 1890 to 1895, the deposits in the savings banks showed an increase of $45,000,000 ?

Mr. McINERNEY. Yes ; total savings in banks.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman sure of that ?

Mr. McINERNEY. These are the figures that I have, and they show an increase of 22 per cent. The next thing I turn my attention to is the failures that occurred from 1874 to 1878, and from 1890 to 1895. Now, in 1874, the failures, that occurred in Canada, according to Dun, Wiman & Co., represented a total of $7,796,000. In 1878 the failures amounted to $23,908,000 or an increase in that time of 310 per cent. In 1890 the failures amounted to $18,000,000, in 1894 they were $17,600,000, and in 1895 they had fallen to $15,800,000, a decrease of 11 per cent. So that, while the failures among the business men of Canada from 1874 to 1878 had increased 310 per cent, from 1890 to 1895 they decreased by 11 per cent. I have here a general comparison of these two periods which, if it would not weary the House, I would like to read :

Mr. McINERNEY.

Exports fell.....	$18,000,000
Imports fell.....	18,000,000
Duty collected decreased.....	1,400,000
Per cent of duty rose, 4 p.c.
Debt increased.....	40,000,000
Net interest on public debt increased	1,500,000

1889-94.
Exports rose.....	$28,000,000
Imports rose.....	28,000,000
Duty collected decreased.....	4,500,000
Per cent of duty fell, 4½ p.c.
Debt increased.....	10,000,000
Net interest on public debt increased	100,000

I think that that is a statement that should be of some interest to the people of this country, if they would only take the trouble to study it. Now I come to the customs duties levied in these two periods. In 1888-89, the customs duties levied amounted to $5 per head, while in 1893-94, they were $3.82 per head. The percentage of imports dutiable and free in 1888-89 was 21.65 per cent, and in 1893-94, 17.13 per cent. The duties collected in 1889 amounted to $23,726,784, while in 1894 they had fallen to $19,119,000. Now, Sir, there is another subject to which I would like to call the attention of the House—the banking returns during these periods. The following are the figures for the Cartwright period, as it is called :—

	1874.	1878.
Note circulation.....	$ 27,904,000	$ 20,475,000
Total deposit.....	77,113,000	70,856,000
Discount to people.....	131,680,000	113,485,000
Assets	187,921,000	175,450,000

When the circulation and discounts decline, denoting shrinkage of commerce ; when the deposits fall off, showing loss of resources, and the bank assets diminish, no further comment is required to prove the embargo which the country's policy at that period placed against prosperity.

If we take the same facts for the past five years, the substantial success of the present policy is illustrated.

THE LAST FIVE YEARS.

Note circulation.....	$ 32,207,000	$ 33,811,000
Total deposits.....	134,650,000	174,776,000
Discounts to people....	140,958,000	205,623,000
Assets	253,789,000	302,696,000

So that the banking returns of the country during these periods teach a very important lesson. Now, with regard to the trade of the country, perhaps the best barometer of that trade is the freight traffic.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would the hon. gentleman excuse me. Before he passes to that, I would like to find out whether I understood him aright as to a matter he touched upon previously. Either I misunderstood him or I have misread the public accounts, and I wish to understand the matter.

Mr. McINERNEY. You refer to the figures to which you called my attention before. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that, when I read it, it seemed to be a large figure. But I took it from an authentic source.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman said that the increased deposits in the savings banks was $45,000,000.

Mr. McINERNEY. Yes ; total savings.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman will consult public accounts he will see that there is not $45,000,000 since 1867.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman may state that and—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman will take up the public accounts he will see that the total figure for last year is $3,400,000.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman may be correct, but I—

Mr. FOSTER. What my hon. friend means, no doubt, is the total in the savings banks of the country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) All the banks ?

Mr. McINERNEY. I said all the savings of the people in the different banks. I know I have taken the statement from an authentic source. It may be that I am wrong. I do not vouch for the exact correctness of all these figures. But I say that until the hon. gentleman quotes me something that shows I am wrong I will stick to the figures I have given.

I was proceeding, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the freight carriage. I was going to say that railway corporations do not carry freight for fun, and the extent of traffic is a pretty good indication of the extent of internal trade. In 1875, the first year of which we have a record the railways carried 5,670,836 tons of freight. In 1878 that had increased to 7,883,472 tons. In 1893 the figures had rolled up to the enormous quantity of almost 23,000,000 tons carried by the railways of Canada. Now, I wish to refer to the foreign trade. In 1878 our foreign trade was $173,000,000, and in 1894 it had increased to $241,000,000 :

FREIGHT CARRIED BY RAILWAYS.

	Tons.
1878	7,883,472
1893	22,003,599

BANK DISCOUNTS.

1878	$119,682,659
1893	199,773,000

TONNAGE SEAGOING AND INLAND VESSELS (EXCLUSIVE OF COASTING).

	Tons.
1878	12,054,890
1893	18,539,534

COASTING TRADE.

1893	24,569,123

Now, look at the growth of the postal business of the country. In 1873 there were 53,500,000 letters carried, and in 1893 there were 137,000,000 carried. The National Policy has, therefore, proved a most effective destroyer of the hopes of our Liberal friends. I now come to the total trade of the country during the two periods. In 1874 it amounted to $217,000,000. In 1878 it fell to $173,000,000, or a decrease of $44,000,000. In 1895 our total trade had gone up to the large sum of $240,000,000, or an increase during the Conservative regime of $87,000,000 as against a decrease of $44,000,000 during the regime of our hon. friends opposite. I will now give you a tabulated statement showing the difference in our total trade between the five years of our Liberal friends, and the last five years under protection :

LIBERAL FIVE YEARS.

1875.....	200,957,262
1876.....	174,166,781
1877.....	175,203,355
1878.....	172,405,454

LAST FIVE YEARS, UNDER PROTECTION.

1890.....	$218,608,490
1891.....	218,384,934
1892.....	241,369,443
1893.....	247,638,620
1894.....	241,000,000

In 1894 Canada shipped to Great Britain from the port of Montreal alone 87,604 cattle and 130,663 sheep, against 15,963 cattle and 31,841 sheep in 1878. Cheese shipments increased from 38,054,294 pounds to 133,946,365 pounds ; the value of hog meats exported rose from $998,409 to $2,052,471 ; the value of apple exports to Great Britain increased from $168,000 to $2,247,482. Now I come to the export of agricultural products from the country. The exports of cheese, bacon, hams, apples, wheat and flour, horses, sheep and cattle, amounted, in 1890, to $22,071,000 in value, and in 1895, to $36,387,000. In pork, the imports decreased from 1889 to 1893. Sir, there is no greater lesson of the beneficial effects of the National Policy as regards the farmer than is to be found in the Trade Returns regarding the exports and imports of pork in the different periods. In 1889 we imported into Canada the enormous amount of 27,000,000 pounds of pork ; in 1893 that had fallen to 4,000,000 pounds ; and in 1895 to less than 4,000,000 pounds. Well, Sir, while our exports of pork only amounted to 4,000,000 pounds in 1893, it had grown to over 20,000,000 pounds. That shows conclusively that putting a duty on American pork brought into Canada, resulted in shutting out 23,000,000 pounds of American pork that formerly came in. The Canadian farmers have more than raised the difference between the two figures, because the exports of pork, after providing for the wants of the country, so far as they could, rose from 4,000,000 pounds in 1889 to over 20,000,000 pounds in 1893. I may say, in addition, that the exports of cattle in 1878 amounted to $1,500,000 in value, and in 1895 the cattle exported amounted to the enormous sum of $7,120,000. Now, I have here a statement which I think my hon. friends opposite will not say is taken from a very friendly source, it is taken from a pamphlet published by the Department of Agriculture in the United States, called "The World's Markets for American Products," and shows the agricultural production in Canada for the years indicated. The pamphlet was issued at Washington by the Government printing office, in 1895, and from that pamphlet I take the figures I am now about to read to the House. The figures refer to the agricultural products of Canada for the different years indicated. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) said there was a falling off in everything produced by the farmers, that land values had decreased, that the products of the farmer had decreased, not only in value, but in volume, that all along the line, so far as the farmer was concerned, the National Policy had been a curse and a blight to him. Now, Sir, let us see how the declaration of the hon. gentleman accords with the figures given by this high and independent authority I now cite. The amount of wheat raised in Canada in 1880 was 32 million bushels; in 1891 it had risen to over 60 million bushels.

Mr. MULOCK. What had the National Policy to do with that ?

Mr. McINERNEY. I am not saying the National Policy had anything particularly to do with that, but I am answering the statement of the hon. member for Huron that the value of the products of the farmers of Canada had decreased under the National Policy. These figures show that the wheat product of Canada had increased from 1880 to 1891, had more than doubled in that period. Of barley, we raised 15 million bushels in 1880, and over 21½ millions in 1891. Of oats, we raised 70 million bushels in 1880, and 117,700,000 bushels in 1891. I have here figures, to about the same effect, of different other products grown in Canada, showing that from 1880 to 1891 the products of the farmers of Canada had materially increased. Sir, in face of these facts, I cannot understand how it is possible that a man engaged in agriculture, a man as intelligent as my hon. friend from Huron appears to be, and undoubtedly is, with such figures before him, can stand on a platform, or in an intelligent assembly like this, and make such declarations as he made to us this evening. Now, Sir, from that book I also take a statement with regard to the ratio of cattle owned by the farmers of Canada, as compared with those in the United States of America. It must be admitted that the United States is a rich country, it has had a great start ahead of us, it has had protection for a much longer time, and has an immense population. In view of these facts it will be something wonderful to find that the farmers of Canada, per head, possess almost as many cattle and horses as the farmers of the United States, the great market of which hon. gentlemen opposite are continually boasting, and to which they ask us, from time to time, to turn our eyes. Why, Sir, Canada is one of the few countries, as regards the ratio of live stock to population, that do not present a strikingly unfavourable contrast to the United States of America. The following table shows the number of farm animals to every one thousand inhabitants in the United States, on June 1st, 1890, and in Canada, on April 6th, 1891 :—

Mr. McINERNEY.

Animals.	Canada.	U.S.
Horses	298	239
Milch cows.....	378	264
Other neat cattle.....	462	557
Sheep	520	574
Swine	352	917

I also find that the number of farm animals in the Dominion of Canada, according to the census of 1891, were : Horses, 1,441,037; working oxen, 127,987; milch cows, 1,829,375; other neat cattle, 2,103,300; sheep, 3,513,977; swine, 1,702,785. These figures, taken from this authoritative source, show that there has been an increase in the number of swine of 495,166 in the past decade; in the number of horses, 381,679; in the number of milch cows, 233,575; and in other neat cattle, 396,912. Yet, Sir, there are hon. gentlemen engaged in the farming industry in Canada, men who have seats in this House, who will stand up, and, in the face of these figures, which clearly show the prosperity of Canada, will declaim against the National Policy, and say that it is responsible for the falling off in values and in volume of the farm products of Canada. Now, there is another thing to which I wish to draw the attention of the House, and that is with regard to the coal trade. During the fifteen years that protection has been in operation in Canada, the sales of Nova Scotia coal aggregated 21,973,399 tons, which was over five million tons more than the total sales of the whole previous ninety-five years. These figures are taken from the report of the Nova Scotia Department of Mines for 1894, at page 62. During the much vaunted period of reciprocity with the United States, which hon. gentlemen opposite are always asking us to advert to, Nova Scotia coal sales increased, it is true, from 217,416 to 558,528 tons, an increase of 341,112 tons for the whole thirteen years of the reciprocity period; while in one year after the adoption of protection that increase jumped from 688,000 tons to 954,000 tons, and has steadily increased until now 2,000,000 tons a year are raised in that country. So that whatever may be said of reciprocity, this can truly be said of protection, it has enhanced to a very large extent the volume of coal taken out of the coal mines of Nova Scotia.

There are other subjects to which I intended to advert this evening, but it is getting very late. I intended to call attention to the argument made by hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to the census. Hon. gentlemen say: you may find figures to tell you the trade of the country has increased in this line and in that line, but we tell you that the census returns of 1891 prove conclusively that the population of Canada did not increase in a ratio as it should have increased in that time. Well, I think a fitting answer to any such argument is an answer taken from the mouths of those very hon. gentlemen themselves. Those hon. gentlemen in 1881 claimed that the census then taken was not a fair census, that it was a census which added a number of people to the population of Canada for which we should not have credit, but if we proceed on the basis of the census of 1881 we have added a much larger number of people than Canada was entitled to, and it cannot fairly be taken by them now as the basis of comparison with the census of 1891, which hon. gentlemen did not attack with respect to the population having been improperly increased.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We did.

Mr. McINERNEY. With respect to the population?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly. If the hon. gentlemen will look at the statements made by the hon. member for Queen's, he will see it was attacked on very serious grounds indeed.

Mr. McINERNEY. Hon. gentlemen, no doubt, did in one or two localities raise the question. I have understood, however, ever since I came here and from my reading before I came here, that the principal point of attack by hon. gentlemen on the census has been the industries reported, and not the population of the country. I never knew before that hon. gentlemen had attacked the census of 1891 with respect to the population. But if the hon. gentleman says it has been done, I am prepared to take his word for it. Whatever may be said of any attack on the census of 1891, I have the words of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as to what he said about the census of 1881. The hon. gentleman said:

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to this. During the taking of the preceding census, we, from this side, called attention to the manifestly fraudulent intention with which it was taken. The result of that census has been that we have paid $500,000 for a document as to which we only know this, that it does not contain one single statement that can be relied upon; that in the very first statement, the most important of all, the statement of the number of people who are now in the Dominion of Canada, that census had been deliberately and fraudulently falsified, and falsified for a purpose.

The hon. gentleman further stated:

But, whatever may have been the object, whatever may have been the purpose, the fact remains that we have a census that cost us $500,000, if not more, and of that census no man who takes the trouble to analyse it, to scrutinize its tables, can affirm with certainty any proposition except that in the most important part of all, it exaggerates by thousands of people the number of persons supposed to be resident in Canada.

Not only did my hon. friend say that, but an hon. gentleman who stood high in this House as an authority on that question, and in fact on every subject, Mr. Blake, made similar statements. He said, alluding to the census of 1881:

In some cases they have counted every person who belonged to a house, even though that person had been for a very long time resident in foreign parts, unless the head of the household would say he was quite sure the person was not coming back. In other instances, men who had been absent eight, fifteen or twenty years, have, as I am informed by persons in the locality who were familiar with the circumstances, been counted.

Again, Mr. Blake said:

It is entirely uncertain, then, under the circumstances, what our population numbers. Nobody can tell by this mode of taking the census the actual number of our Canadian population.

There were other opinions expressed by hon. gentlemen high in authority on the Liberal side of the House which I might quote to bear out that criticism of the census of 1881 uttered by hon. gentlemen opposite. But I turn from that criticism, which I think is on a par with the criticism of the census of 1891, to the statement of the number of industrial establishments in Canada and their increase from 1881 to 1891, according to the census. I find as follows:—

INDUSTRIAL INCREASE ACCORDING TO CENSUS
1881 AND 1891.

—	1881.		1891.
	No.	$	No.	$
Number of establishments..	49,923		75,768
Capital invested		165,302,623		353,836,817
Number of employees.....	254,935		367,865
Wages paid.....		59,429,002		99,762,441
Cost of raw material.....		179,918,593		255,983,219
Value of products.....		309,676,068		475,455,705

That would be a sufficient answer to any hon. gentleman who asks the question, have the industrial establishments of Canada increased during the decade from 1881 to 1891?

Mr. McDONALD (Huron). Do you believe the correctness of those figures?

Mr. McINERNEY. I believe they are reasonably correct. I do not state that they are specifically correct, and correct in each and every instance; but I say the census of 1891 was taken on a more proper basis than that in 1881, and in that I agree with hon. gentlemen opposite. But I claim that there is no higher authority to which we can go than an authority which has been prepared and paid for out of the earnings of the people of Canada and the work carried on under the directions of public officers.

I wish to say a word or two about the fisheries. I come from a county in which the fishing interest is one of the most important. My county has an extensive line of coast, and it is very important that not only the attention of the Department of Fisheries, but the attention of the whole Government should be turned to that very important branch of industry; and before I advert to any figures I wish to say this, that so far as the fishermen are concerned, as well as the farmers, they should lift up both hands in praise of the National Policy of Canada. The fisherman's rope, hooks, lines and everything that enters into consumption in his trade is free of duty. So the fisherman is well treated by the protective tariff as we have it at the present time. The fisheries of British North America are among the most extensive and important fisheries in the world. They produce a value yearly of over $30,000,000 and they engage a population of about 110,000 people. In 1893, the total reported value of the production of the deep sea fisheries of the Dominion of Canada was $17,945,637, and of that quantity $2,737,024 worth were fresh water fish. To that must be added the value, estimated at $2,000,000, of the fish taken by Indians mainly in the rivers of British Columbia making a total of nearly $23,000,000, from the fisheries for that year.

There is one other statement that I wish to make, and that is with regard to the wealth of the people of Canada. Gentlemen in opposition say, that this is a poor country, that the people here are poor, that in comparison with other countries they are ground down by taxes, and that they are in a deplorable state. Well, Sir, the records, and statisticians of authority do not bear hon. gentlemen out in making such statements. I refer to one of the most eminent statisticians, Michael G. Mulhall, and he computes that the wealth of Canada is nearly $5,000,000,000. He computes that the value of lands in Canada amounts to $1,500,000,000, that houses and furniture amount to $955,000,000, that railway and shipping amount to $785,000,000, that cattle amount to $400,000,000, and sundries to $1,350,000,000. That is an average of $980 to each inhabitant as compared with an average, says Mr. Mulhall, of $1,050 for each inhabitant of the United States. Not a bad showing, Mr. Speaker, for Canada, after all these years of protection, and after all these years of desolation that hon. gentlemen in opposition have so often referred to. Now, Sir, I have been asked several times during the course of my remarks, as to whether I give all the credit, of the great increase in each line I have indicated, entirely to the National Policy. Sir, there are conditions in the country, that are independent I suppose of any policy; but I claim that the National Policy is to be credited with a very large amount of the increase of the products of Canada, of the increase in the industrial establishments of Canada, and of the increase of the prosperity of Canada from 1878 to 1896. Sir, I shall now for a few moments touch upon the relative merits of protection and free trade. I cannot do better than to refer, on this subject, to the authority of one of the greatest political economists of the age. I refer to John Stuart Mill. He says:

In the case of a young nation, protective duties were defensible on principles of political economy, when they were imposed "in hopes of naturalizing a foreign industry in itself perfectly suitable to the circumstances of the country."

Again, he says:

The whole question of the applicability in a particular nation of free trade or protection, must be studied out in accordance with the facts of the case.

So that, as I have stated before in this House, the question of free trade and protection is not an academic question. It is a question that must be taken into consideration with the situation surrounding you, when you apply it to the circumstances of any country. In addition to the opinion of Mr. Mill, I have other opinions of a later date; opinions which ought to have considerable weight in this country. I have an opinion given by John Charlton, at present a member of this House representing North Norfolk, and a member of this House when this opinion was delivered. He is a gentleman who stands high in the councils of the Liberal party of Canada, a man who ever since he delivered that speech, and before it, was a member of the Liberal party. I have his opinion as to what protection is and as to what may be derived from it. Says Mr. Charlton in a speech delivered in 1875:

It may be safely assumed that no nation has attained to greatness in commerce or manufactures without having, in the course of its history, imposed exactions and restrictions, notably the case of Great Britain. When industries are adapted to the land, it is the duty of the government to protect them.

And again:

I believe the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by protection, and that the manufacturer, being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were three thousand miles away. With a home market established by protection to manufacturers, the farmer can benefit his soil by a rotation of crops.

I wonder what the hon. gentleman from Huron (Mr. McMillan) would say to that, since he has given us his opinion, that protection has injured and ruined the farmer of Canada. Mr. Charlton went on to say :

They had heard a great deal said about protection vs. free trade, but that was not the issue at the present time. The issue was as to the relative degrees of protection it would be proper to afford our industries. We have now what some considered an efficient protection, and what others claimed to insufficient.

I have here under my hand, the opinion expressed by another gentleman, high in the councils of the Liberal party. Mr. Paterson, the member for Brant, speaking in 1878, said :

I hold that the position is impregnable : that there is a duty other than the collection of revenue devolving on a Minister of Finance. Let us look for a moment at the article of boots and shoes. Within my own recollection almost all these goods were imported from the United States and I remember that, when the tariff was raised to 10 per cent, a great stimulus was given to that branch of our industry, which now finds employment for tens of thousands of persons. I am not one of those who believe in erecting a wall so high that you cannot trade with any other country, but I must admit I am in favour of a defensive policy. I cannot view with complacency what we see in this country.

And, Sir, what he, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) could not see with complacency, was the policy that had been adopted and kept up by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Now, Sir, in addition to that, I might quote the opinion given, in his green and verdant days as he said himself, by the hon. the leader of the Opposition ; but I will let that pass, as it is so long ago that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) does not want to be held responsible now for his utterances then. But, if I remember aright, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) said : that in order to establish an industry in Canada and keep it here, he was willing to go so far as to put on a prohibitory tariff. To-day the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) takes different ground. He looks forward to free trade ; he is an out and out free trader. At that time, Sir, when he was expressing the sentiment of his heart, when the sentiments of his heart were coming fresh from his heart, when perhaps he had not any political ambition to gratify ; at that time, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) was a protectionist pure and simple. Now, Sir, I rise from the opinion that I have just read to the House, to the opinion of one of the greatest men that ever lived upon this continent : the opinion of Daniel Webster. It has been said that Daniel Webster made one very strong free trade speech, and the Democratic tariff tinkers in the United States, are very fond of reverting to that speech which they say was delivered in 1843. But, in 1846, Daniel Webster, spoke as follows in the United States Senate :—

The interest of every labouring community requires diversity of occupations, pursuits, and objects of industry. The more that diversity is multiplied or extended the better. To diversify employment is to increase employment and to enhance wages. And, Sir, take this great truth, place it on the title-page of every book of political economy intended for the use of the government, put it in every farmer's almanac, let it be the heading of the column in every mechanic's magazine, proclaim it everywhere, and make it a proverb—that, where there is work for the hands of men, there will be work for their teeth.

Where there is employment, there will be bread. It is a great blessing to the poor to have cheap food, but greater than that, prior to that, and of still higher value, is the blessing of being able to buy food by honest and respectable employment. Employment feeds, and clothes, and instructs. Employment gives health, sobriety and morals. Constant employment and well-paid labour produce, in a country like ours, general prosperity, content and cheerfulness. Thus happy have we seen the country. Thus happy may we long continue to see it.

There, Sir, is an utterance in favour of protection from the greatest man, I think, this continent has ever produced. Now, Sir, I go from that speech to a speech delivered, it is true, by one of the greatest of protectionists, but also one of the greatest Americans ever born. I refer to Henry Clay's speech in the United States Senate in 1832. It is a long time ago, but economic principles are true for ever. He says :

When gentlemen have succeeded in their design of an immediate or gradual destruction of the American system, what is their substitute ? Free trade ! The call for free trade is as unavailing as the cry of a spoiled child in its nurse's arms, for the moon, or the stars that glitter in the firmament of heaven. It never has existed. It never will exist. Trade implies at least two parties. To be free, it should be fair, equal and reciprocal. But if we throw our ports wide open to the admission of foreign productions, free of all duty, what ports of any foreign nation shall we find open to the free admission of our surplus produce ? We may break down all barriers to free trade on our part, but the work will not be complete until foreign powers shall have removed theirs. There would be freedom on one side, and restrictions, prohibitions, and exclusions on the other. The bolts and the bars and the chains of all other nations will remain undisturbed.

In that speech there is a very remarkable quotation made from a speech delivered shortly before by Lord Goderich in the British Parliament. Lord Goderich had alluded to the violation of the Treaty of Methuen, and went on to say :

It was idle for us to endeavour to persuade other nations to join with us in adopting the principles of what was called "free trade." Other nations knew, as well as the noble lord opposite, and those who acted with him, what we meant by "free trade" was nothing more nor less than, by means of the great advantages we enjoyed, to get a monopoly of all their markets for our manufactures, and to prevent them, one and all, from ever becoming manufacturing nations. When the system of reciprocity and free trade had been proposed to a French ambassador, his remark was, that the plan was excellent in theory, but, to make it fair in practice, it would be necessary to defer the attempt to put it in to execution for half a century, until France should be on the same footing with Great Britain, in marine, in manufactures, in capital, and the many other peculiar advantages which it now enjoyed.

Sir, I could point to numbers of authorities from eminent men, to prove that for a young country protection is a much better policy than free trade. But, Sir, before I sit down, I wish to try and illustrate the argument I have been making in favour of protection as against free trade by one or two examples. I hold that protection is amply vindicated and justified by results when it brings about three things: if it keeps the home market for the industry of the country, if it reduces the price of the article or keeps the price down, and if it enables the manufacturer to go abroad on the open markets of the world and compete openly there with the manufacturers of other countries, then I say protection stands fully justified and vindicated. We had a discussion some time ago with regard to the duty on agricultural implements; and this evening the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), before taking his seat, endeavoured to show that the duty on agricultural implements was against the interests of the farmers of Canada. But we find, with regard to agricultural implements, that the tariff has brought about these three things of which I have spoken: it has reduced the price of the article, it has maintained the home market for the manufacturer, and it has permitted the manufacturer in Canada to go into open competition with the manufacturers of other countries in the open markets of the world. How is that proved? The latter part of the proposition is proved conclusively by the Trade and Navigation Returns, which show that in 1895 the manufacturers of agricultural implements in Canada exported $663,718 worth to the open markets of the world. But the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), touching upon that, said, Wasn't it a crime to allow the manufacturer of agricultural implements in Canada to receive a drawback for the implements he sent to meet with competitors in Argentina and other countries? The hon. gentleman, if his facts had been correct might have been all correct; but what will he say in regard to the fact that we sent last year to the open market of Great Britain $300,000 worth, while we sent to Argentina only $40,000 worth, or less than one seventh the amount sent to Great Britain.

Mr. McINERNEY.

and to Australia $136,000 worth? Now, the question was asked the other day, and it was asked again to-day by the hon. member for South Huron: if protection conserves the home market, reduces the price and allows the country manufacturer to go into competition abroad, particularly if it reduces the price, why do you keep up the duty? It seems to me very easy to answer that question. Just reverse it and ask: if the reduction of price is obtained by protection, what benefit would be obtained by taking the duty off? I cannot see that you would receive any.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We ought to have kept it on sugar, then.

Mr. McINERNEY. The same thing does not follow at all. This is not a sugar-growing country; but in this country we can manufacture agricultural implements just as well as they can in any other country. There are things on which it is not right to keep protection, and sugar is one of these. But if the requirements of the revenue demand a duty on sugar, I would say put a duty on sugar. Now, Sir, I must ask the House to pardon me for the very long time I have taken in making the remarks I have been allowed to make in the very incomplete way in which I have made them. I have endeavoured, in as concise a manner as possible, to place before the House the figures in which lie a fair comparison between the years 1873-78 and the years 1878-96; and I draw from these figures in every line the one conclusion, that from 1878 to 1896 the country has advanced in prosperity, whereas from 1873 to 1878 the very opposite was the case. Now, if we are to have a fair contest in the next appeal to the people, I think it will be on such a question as this that that contest will be carried on. But hon. gentlemen opposite will from time to time try to destroy the peace and harmony of this country on various other cries. Until they get into office, there will be no peace in this country. As a poet in the Atlanta "Constitution" has lately said:

There'll be peace in all this country
From the mountains to the sea,
And the rivers will go singing
Jest as merry as kin be;
And the mule will pull the plow-stock,
And the crows will all be killed,
And the mortgage will be lifted
When the offices are filled.

But not till then. But, Sir, for such a dishonourable peace, purchased at so dear a price as the filling of the public offices by our friends opposite, I think the intelligent people of this country, if rightly called upon, will not be willing to give their consent.

Mr. McDONALD (Huron). Instead of entering upon a regular speech to-night, I shall confine myself to referring briefly to some of the arguments brought forward by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. McInerney). He said, among other things, that the productions of the country were much in excess now of what they were in 1878. No doubt they are. We have acquired half a continent since then in the North-west, and have to-day no less than 192,000 people now in Manitoba, the bulk of whom have gone into that province since that year. These people produced last year no less than 30,000,000 bushels of wheat and 30,000,000 bushels of barley, peas and other cereals, all of which is an increase on what we raised in 1878. But I cannot, for the life of me, see what connection there is between that increased production and the National Policy. I do not see what the National Policy has had to do with this production of wheat and other cereals in Manitoba. Out in that province the people believe it is due to their skill and labour and to the blessing of divine Providence in giving them favourable weather; but evidently, according to the gospel of hon. gentlemen opposite, anything good which takes place in the country must be attributed to the influence of the National Policy, though ordinary mortals fail to see the connection between the two. I certainly fail to see what the National Policy has to do with our production of cereals, either in the North-west or elsewhere.

Again we are told that in the United States the disturbance caused by the passage of the Wilson Bill was the source of every evil which has since afflicted that country. I am really sorry that the hon. gentleman who preceded me and who advanced this theory, did not investigate the question a little deeper. Why, Mr. Speaker, he even went so far as to attribute the march of Coxey's Army from west to east to the disturbance caused by a slight reduction of the American tariff. If 30 per cent duty has added to the prosperity of this country to the extent hon. gentlemen opposite say it has, how comes it that a 42 per cent protective duty on the other side has been the cause of Coxey's Army marching from west to east? The whole thing appears so absurd that I am occasionally lost in wonder that men sufficiently intelligent to be representatives of the people should take up the time of this House stating such absurdities which no intelligent man can believe.

We are also told that the cheese industry of Canada has been benefited largely by the National Policy. Now, this industry began long before the National Policy was in existence; and if any hon. gentleman can explain to my satisfaction in what way, directly or indirectly, the National Policy has stimulated the cheese industry, he will certainly be gifted with no ordinary persuasive powers. As was stated by an hon. gentleman who preceded me, this cheese industry was stimulated by the Hon. Oliver Mowat, who established a Central Farm to teach the people how to manufacture cheese and sent out a large number of experts to give instructions in that branch of industry, long before the Experimental Farm at Ottawa was ever thought of. And I remember well how I used to contend against Tory abuse on the public platform when they attacked Sir Oliver Mowat for this policy. The fact is that our farmers have found it more profitable of late years to go into the dairy business than in times past, and they have found that by raising cows and manufacturing the milk into cheese and marketing the same in the old country, they could make more money than by raising cereals. It was their own common sense which told them that it would be better that they should change their mode of farming, and instead of raising grain, go into the dairy business; and the National Policy has had nothing to do with it at all. If the National Policy stimulated the cheese industry, why has it not stimulated the butter industry? In 1878 we exported from Canada 14,000,000 pounds of butter. Butter has now a higher protective duty, and yet last year we exported less than 7,000,000 pounds. It must indeed be a very one-sided policy which will stimulate the cheese industry and utterly fail to stimulate the butter interest. Now, in the United States, instead of their having a 3-cent protective duty on cheese, they have a 4-cent duty; and yet in 1878 they exported 16,000,000 pounds of cheese, while in 1894 they exported less than 8,000,000 pounds. Is not the working of this protective policy something fearfully and wonderfully strange? You cross an imaginary line over to a country which stimulates the cheese industry to such an enormous extent and the exportation falls off. And on this side, where the protection is less, the reverse is the case. How can this be explained by these gentlemen who make it a point to urge that the National Policy is good for everything? Their whole argument appears to me so absurd, that I sometimes have hardly the patience to discuss it.

We are again told that the deposits in the savings banks are an indication of the prosperity of the people. Now, Mr. Speaker, you know, as a business man, that that is not the case at all. You know that when we are prosperous, we undertake business enterprises throughout the length and breadth of the country and keep our money in circulation ourselves instead of depositing it in the savings banks. And that is the very argument which was used by hon. gentlemen opposite a few years ago when they sneered and laughed at the very idea that large deposits in the savings banks were an indication of prosperity.

Now, my hon. friend drew a comparison between the expenditure of the Mackenzie Government and the expenditure under this precious Government, which has been in power for the last seventeen years. The hon. gentleman misquoted many of the figures and I propose to set him right. One of the planks of our policy is economy. We believe that the Conservative party has been thoroughly extravagant and so we inserted this plank in our platform :

We can but view with alarm the large increase of public debt and of the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the governments that have been continuously in power since 1878, and we demand the strictest economy in the administration of the government of the country.

Now, if the statement made by the hon. member who spoke last is true, that plank in the Liberal party's platform is not true. But I am going to show that it is true and that the figures he has used and the comparisons he has made were not fair ones. Let us make a few comparisons before I come to the figures to which the hon. gentleman made reference. Let us take the interest on the debt in 1878 and 1895. But before I go into that I will move the adjournment of the debate, if the hon. leader of the House will permit.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend must go on with his speech for a reasonable length of time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was distinctly agreed with the leader of the Opposition that—

Mr. FOSTER. I beg my hon. friend's pardon ; it was not distinctly agreed that we should adjourn—

An hon. MEMBER. Mr. Laurier said so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is the understanding.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was only on that understanding that the hon. gentleman went on.

Mr. FOSTER. We should go on until one o'clock, at least.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I—

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I have moved the adjournment of the debate, and it is in the hands of the leader of the House. I do not think the leader of the House will make anything by insisting upon a longer sitting.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friends must be a little fair. What we proposed was to have three days each week for the Budget debate until it was disposed of. Hon. gentlemen took the whole of this afternoon, that is from the time we met until six o'clock, when the House rose. It is of the greatest moment that we should get on with the business and it is certainly not unreasonable that we should sit here until one o'clock. We must make up our minds to sit later.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must point out to the hon. gentleman that the business of the House from three to six was not delayed by us, but by a scandalous misstatement of the Secretary of State. The hon. gentleman had the option to withdraw it or to grant a committee, and so had the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). But they did neither. They are responsible for the delay from three to six. I do not wish to have any unnecessary wrangle with the hon. gentleman for it is good neither for him nor for us. We were distinctly informed that it was understood—and that is the reason why we went on—that the House was to adjourn, and that that was the agreement that had been come to between the hon. gentleman and the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. FOSTER. There was no distinct agreement. The leader of the Opposition wished to adjourn at half past twelve, and I said that the hon. gentleman who was speaking ought to go on and make his speech. But the leader of the Opposition demurred to that. I was not at all determined that the hon. gentleman should make his whole speech, but I wanted to go until two o'clock. Still, I was willing that we should adjourn at one o'clock, and I think that is not unreasonable.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is nothing in the world to be gained by remaining until one o'clock. My hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) cannot possibly finish his speech by that time. I have had the pleasure of looking through his notes, and I know very well he cannot get through. To go on will simply mean a lot of repetition when he resumes his speech. We have to meet in committee tomorrow, as the hon. gentleman knows, at half past ten or eleven o'clock. Now, I have been here from three o'clock until now—half past twelve—that, I think, is an honest day's work.

Mr. FOSTER. So have I.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Quite so. And I think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman's health is too valuable to be trifled with. I should loath to see the hon. gentleman used up ; it would add to the length of the session. There can be no possible use in sitting later. Look at the House now. I doubt if there are twenty men in it. There may be, but that is as many as there are. It is really unreasonable to ask my hon. friend from Huron, who is not disposed to waste time, to go on now when he must repeat on resuming what he will say to-night.

Mr. FOSTER. I would be sorry to have the hon. gentleman repeat himself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He will have to do it, because of the nature of his argument.

Mr. FOSTER. It is certainly not unreasonable that, on Government days, we should ask the House to sit later than twelve o'clock. We have been in the habit often of sitting here very much later than that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But never made any progress by it. The leader of this side, before he left here, informed us distinctly that he had an understanding with the hon. leader of the House that the debate should go on, and that the House should adjourn at half past twelve.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry for that. I would not like to have even the appearance of a misunderstanding between the hon. gentleman and myself, but he is mistaken if he understood me to say that the House should adjourn at half past twelve. It certainly was a mistake, and I am sorry that he so interpreted what I said, and informed his side of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He most decidedly made that statement to us; and I think that, under the circumstances, the hon. gentleman would do well to adjourn. It will not in the slightest degree add to the length of the debate now, and it will give him the opportunity to get home at reasonable time. There is no use in keeping us for the purpose of hearing what, as I have said, must be repeated when the debate is resumed.

Mr. FOSTER. I feel that there is some force in this, that the leader of the Opposition went away believing that the House was to adjourn at half past twelve o'clock. But hon. gentlemen inform me that he had that understanding.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). He informed me before he left that that was the agreement between himself and the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. That was a misunderstanding. He pressed for that and I pressed for the other, and we did not reach a conclusion. But I would be sorry to have the House or hon. gentlemen on that side think for a moment that I would go back on an agreement made with the hon. gentleman. I would not do that; it would not be honest or fair. Rather than give an impression of that kind I am willing to let the House adjourn half an hour earlier than I would have pressed for, but on that account and on that account alone. But I must tell my hon. friends that we must make up our minds to sit later and get through with the business, or else make up our minds to draw the Budget debate toward a conclusion. I had some conversation with the leader of the Opposition on that matter and came to a partial conclusion as to when this debate should be closed. And I would ask hon. gentlemen to take that into account in order that we may get through this Budget debate as soon as possible—certainly I should think not later than Tuesday of next week.

We shall have Thursday and Friday and the following Tuesday, and I think we should try to draw it to a conclusion on Tuesday night. That is the line of my conversation with the leader of the Opposition, and, that being the view held the more it inclines me to give way on this occasion and to allow the debate to adjourn.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it would be very inadvisable that the hon. gentleman should agree to a motion for the adjournment of any understanding that,—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not understand the hon. gentleman says there is any understanding.

Mr. MULOCK. No; but he suggests that he agrees to this motion now in view of the hint that this debate must be brought to a close on such and such a day.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion is on the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of that. But the hon. leader accompanied that with the remark that he agreed to the motion in view of the conversation he had had with the leader of the Opposition, and threw out a hint as to the early termination of the debate—next Tuesday if possible. Now, I for one object to the motion to adjourn if the Opposition is to be bound by any hint of the kind. I say we should be perfectly free to discuss when this shall terminate, without regard to shortening the debate to-night.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.35 a.m. (Wednesday.)

ROYAL CANADIAN INFANTRY.

Mr. O'BRIEN asked :

When and by whom was Sir Charles Tupper, as High Commissioner for Canada, directed to place a Regiment of Royal Canadian Infantry at the service of the Imperial Government, to be maintained by Canada, as stated in an article in the February number of the "Canadian Magazine" intitled : "The Navy Question and the Colonies, by Sir Charles Tupper, Bart." ?

Mr. DICKEY. Sir Charles Tupper as High Commissioner for Canada was instructed to place a portion of the Regiment of Royal Canadian Infantry at the service of the Imperial Government for garrison duty. As the instructions were conveyed by an informal telegram of the then Minister of Militia, the exact date cannot be accurately fixed at present.

CREAMERY BUTTER—THE ENGLISH MARKET.

Mr. McMILLAN asked :

How many pounds of creamery butter purchased by the Government in the winter of 1895 for shipment to the English market were actually shipped to that market ?

What was the net price per pound at Montreal realized for the whole shipment, after deducting expenses from the time of leaving Montreal ?

What was the highest price per cwt. realized in England, and how much brought that price ? What was the lowest price per cwt. realized in England, and what quantity was sold at that price ? What quantity was sold in Montreal as not suitable for the English market ? How much did it realize, and what was the average price per pound of sales in Montreal ? Has the collection of the proceeds of all such sales been finally made ? If any, how much remains unpaid ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. 57,748 lbs. of creamery butter were shipped to Great Britain under the Government advance of 20 cents per lb. The average net price realized in Montreal for the whole shipment, after deducting all expenses from Montreal outwards, was 14.38 cents per lb. The highest price realized in Great Britain was 90 shillings per cwt., for 12 packages from the Government dairy station at Lennoxville, Que. The lowest price realized in Great Britain was 63 shillings per cwt., for 6 packages. 14,683 lbs. of butter was the quantity sold in Montreal as being in unsuitable packages for export to Great Britain. It was sold in Montreal at an average price of 21.34 cents per lb. After deducting the freight charges and selling commission in Montreal, it realized an average net price of 19.87 cents per lb. The proceeds of all sales have been paid and deposited to the credit of the Receiver General.

SHIPMENT OF AMERICAN CATTLE FROM CANADIAN PORTS.

Mr. CASEY asked :

1. Is the Honourable Minister of Agriculture aware that a copy of an Order in Council concerning the shipping of United States cattle from a Canadian port was published in some of the morning newspapers of Friday, 24th January ?

2. Has the Honourable Minister since heard that the said Order in Council was given to the press by the Premier, and when did he hear it ?

3. Has he since heard that said Order in Council was communicated to and approved and signed by His Excellency before it was given to the press, and when did he hear it ?

4. Are the statements referred to in the last two questions correct ?

5. If so, how did it happen that he knew nothing whatever about such dealing with an Order in Council specially concerning his own department ?

6. Does he still think the course he took then was the correct one under the circumstances, in not producing the Order in the House when asked for ?

7. Does he still feel that the resentment of the honourable gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) because the Order was given to the press, is joined in most heartily by himself ?

8. Is he still astounded, and pained, and humiliated, that the said Order in Council was not given to this House before it was given to the press ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I answered that question in my statement made to the House yesterday.

COST OF COLD STORAGE.

Mr. BAIN asked :

What was the expenditure by the Government for cold storage on ocean steamers for the shipment of butter to the English market during the season of 1895 ; giving each month's expenditure separately, and if by different steamship lines, their names and the amounts paid to each ? The quantity of butter in pounds shipped each month, and by each steamship line separately ? The amount paid to the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railways, respectively, for cold storage car service in each month, and the quantity of butter, in pounds, carried by each to Montreal or other port of shipment ?

Has the cold storage been used in either ocean or railway mail service to any appreciable extent for transport of cheese, or for any other purpose ? If so, for what, to what extent, and with what results ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Ten ocean steamships were fitted up with cold storage compartments, six on the steamers on the New Dominion SS. Line from Montreal to Avonmouth, and four on the Allan Lines. The expenditure for fitting up the ten steamships was $6,732.03. The amounts paid to the New Dominion SS. Company for cold storage service, and the quantities of butter and cheese carried were :

	Amount Paid.	Butter. Lbs.	Cheese. Lbs.
July	$ 436 84	362,742
August	1,249 85	535,933	124,700
September	730 16	835,733
October	691 02	824,238	26,284
November	436 68	439,570	122,270
	$3,544 55	2,998,216	273,254

The Allan SS. Company have not yet rendered their account, and nothing has been paid to them. The amounts paid to the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway for cold storage car service each month were :

	Grand Trunk.	Canadian Pacific.
June	$	$ 17 62
July	323 21	387 92
August	513 99	480 91
September	222 07	396 43
October	380 71	47 07
	$1,439 98	$1,329 95

The quantity of butter carried by the railways does not appear on their accounts. It can be ascertained if required. Cold storage service on ocean steamships was used for four shipments of cheese to Great Britain. The shippers and receivers expressed the opinion that the cheese arrived in better condition than by ordinary storage on board steamships.

HOSPITAL DUES.

Mr. McSHANE asked :

1. Has the Government from time to time received memorials from the Montreal shipping interests and board of trade, praying for the abolition of the tonnage tax known as hospital dues ?

2. Is the Government aware that the imposition of this tax in the ports of Quebec and the maritime provinces has led to a retaliatory tax being levied on Canadian tonnage trading with ports in the United States ; that under the laws of the United States now in force, their retaliatory tax will cease to be levied so soon as Canada ceases to levy her tax ; but that a Bill is at present before Congress repealing this standing offer of reciprocal freedom from taxation, thereby making their tax a permanent one ?

3. Under the circumstances, and in view of the fact that this tax is peculiar to Canada, and that sick seamen are cared for in all other countries without the imposition of a tax, will the Government consider the advisability, by legislation or otherwise, of freeing the St. Lawrence route from the taxation at present levied on its shipping in the form of hospital dues ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. Yes ; such memorials have been received from time to time. 2. The Government has no evidence to show that the imposition of sick mariners' dues has led to a retaliatory tax being levied on Canadian tonnage trading with ports in the United States. The Government is, however, aware that the President of the United States has power, by proclamation, to suspend the collection of so much of the duty imposed on foreign vessels as shall exceed the amount collected on American vessels by a foreign country. The Government is not aware that there is a Bill before Congress making the tonnage tax a permanent one. 3. The tax is not peculiar to Canada, as marine hospitals are maintained in the United States out of tonnage dues. There is no tax imposed for care of sick seamen in Great Britain, and such seamen are not cared for by Government. The Government does not consider it advisable to free the shipping of the St. Lawrence from payment of sick mariners' dues, as the tax is only sufficient for the care of sick seamen, and should it be abolished such seamen would be a charge on the ships to which they belong, or become objects of public charity.

COMMISSIONER ON THE SWEATING SYSTEM.

Mr. CASEY asked :

1. Has the Government appointed a commissioner or commissioners to investigate the sweating system ? If so, at whose request, and whom, and on what date ?

2. What instructions were given to the commissioner or commissioners as to places where they were to conduct inquiries ; and parties from whom they were to get information ?

3. What time was given for the investigation ?

4. What progress has been made with the investigation, and what places visited ; and have the employed as well as the employers, been asked to give information ?

5. Was A. W. Wright a commissioner for the above purpose ? Is he so still ? If not, when did he resign ?

6. Did he leave Ottawa lately with the alleged purpose of visiting Halifax to collect information? Was he directed by the Government to go there?

7. Did he take part in the late election in Cape Breton county, Nova Scotia?

8. Is he the A. W. Wright who spoke on behalf of Sir Charles Tupper at Boularderie and other places during said election?

9. When will the commissioner or commissioners report?

Mr. FOSTER. Acting upon a suggestion contained in a resolution of the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress, at its meeting in London, Ont., in September, 1895, Alexander W. Wright, of Niagara, Ont., was appointed such commissioner on October 29th, 1895. He was instructed "to inquire whether, and if so, to what extent, the sweating system is practised in the various industrial centres of the Dominion; and also, so far as may be necessary, to procure information respecting the kindred question of wages, and any other matters affecting the employment and conditions of life and labour among the industrial classes." Ninety days was allowed for the investigation. The commissioner's report has not yet been received. Mr. Wright is not now commissioner. The time allowed him expired on the 29th January. No special instructions were given him by the Government as to the points at which he was to make his inquiry. It was to be a general inquiry. He is the A. W. Wright who spoke on behalf of Sir Charles Tupper at Boularderie, if any A. W. Wright spoke there during the election; but at that time his period of commissionership had expired, and he was not under pay. The report is expected in a week or so.

Mr. CASEY. Was it after January 29th that he spoke there?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose so.

Mr. CASEY. I doubt it.

COUNTY OF RICHELIEU VOTERS' LIST.

Mr. CARROLL (for Mr. Bruneau) asked:

What has been the total cost of the last revision of the voters' list for the county of Richelieu?

Mr. FOSTER. For the last revision of the voters' list for the county of Richelieu there was paid to the reviser, Mr. Justice Gill, according to the Auditor General's Report of 1895, page J-26, $736.02; add the total cost of printing—see Queen's Printer's statement, $210.33; making a total cost of $946.35.

REVISION OF VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. LEGRIS asked:

1. What has been the total cost of the electoral lists for the Dominion of Canada, made in 1894-95?

2. Does the said amount comprise the value of the printing done at the Government printing office?

3. What is the total sum paid to E. M. Chapedelaine, Esq., revising officer for the electoral district of Maskinongé, in connection with the preparation of the last lists for that county?

Mr. FOSTER. The total amount of allowances to revising officers (see Auditor General's Report for 1895, page J-28) was $168,150.36; the cost of appeals from revisers' decision (page J-28) was $175.03. Adding these together you get the total amount of $168,325.39. The cost of printing given by the Queen's Printer was $67,071.58; making a total cost of $235,396.97. The total cost includes the value of printing in the bureau. The total sum paid to Mr. Chapedelaine, revising officer for the electoral district of Maskinongé in connection with the preparation of the last list for that county was $672.75, as will be seen by the Auditor General's Report of 1895, page J-25.

LEANDRE HOUDE.

Mr. LEGRIS (translation) asked:

1. What position is held by Léandre Houde, of the parish of St. Maurice, in connection with certain works which the Government have had done, or are actually carrying on, on the upper St. Maurice? 2. What is his salary? 3. How much has he been paid by the Government since 1891?

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) The position held by Mr. Léandre Houde is that of overseer for the Government works, between the Grandes Piles and LaTuque. He receives as salary $2 per day's work. Since 1891, he has been paid the sum of $1,458.48.

QUEBEC NORTH SHORE RAILWAY.

Mr. RIDER (for Mr. Devlin) asked:

Does the Act of 1894, authorizing the Governor General in Council to pay on demand the principal sum of the Quebec North Shore Railway subsidy of 1884, amounting in all to $2,394,000, make the Dominion liable for that amount?

Mr. FOSTER. The Act of 1894 made the Government liable for the payment of interest upon a certain amount as a capitalized railway subsidy. The Act of 1894 provides that the Quebec Government may ask for the payment of the capitalized amount. That Act is simply permissive. When the Dominion Government, on the request of the Quebec Government, agrees to the payment of the capital amount instead of the payment of the subsidy, as the Act of 1884 provides, it will then become a liability as capital, and will have to be paid.

GOVERNMENT SHIPMENTS OF BUTTER.

Mr. McMILLAN asked:

At what date was the last sale in England of creamery butter shipped by the Government in 1895, and what was the quantity?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Four hundred and thirty-three boxes of creamery butter, containing 24,248 pounds were shipped from Montreal on December 23rd, 1895. They were sold in Manchester on January 18th, 1896. The proceeds have been deposited to the credit of the Receiver General.

FISH ISLAND, P. E. I., LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. YEO asked :

Has a lighthouse keeper been appointed at Fish Island, P.E.I., in place of the late Angus McLellan? If so, who, and when was the appointment made? If not, who has charge of the lighthouse?

Mr. COSTIGAN. A lighthouse keeper has not been permanently appointed at Fish Island. D. R. McLellan, son of the late keeper, is at present in charge of the light.

MADUXNEKEAG, N.B., FISHWAY.

Mr. COLTER asked :

What was the cost of the fishway at the mouth of the Maduxnekeag, in the county of Carleton, New Brunswick? Have any repairs been made? If so, what has been the cost of such repairs?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The cost of the fishway was $190.57. No repairs have been made, but the fishery officer was authorized to expend a sum not exceeding $150, in the construction of a pier to protect the fishway from ice.

UNITED STATES ALIEN LABOUR LAW.

Mr. CASEY asked :

Did the Government, or any of the departments, carry on or authorize any negotiations with the authorities of the state of New York, or other parties, in regard to a reciprocal relaxation of the Alien Labour law, on one side, and the fishery laws, on the other, in the Thousand Islands or elsewhere on the St. Lawrence? If so when, and who was appointed to negotiate, and what was the result of negotiations?

Mr. COSTIGAN. During the past year, representations were made to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries through Mr. W. H. Thompson, secretary of the St. Lawrence Angling Association, of Alexandria Bay, United States, and the Hon. Senator Mullin, of Watertown, N.Y. The object was to make the Thousand Islands an international summer resort, to be limited on the United States side between Cape Vincent and Ogdensburg; and on the Canadian side between Kingston and Prescott, and the proposition with a view to promoting the above suggestion was the suspension of the enforcement of the United States Alien Labour Act, with regard to Canadians within the United States limits above described, for a compensating or equivalent concession within Canadian limits above described, as to United States citizens, of freedom from the fee charged on angling permits. Assurances were given by the Hon. Senator Mullin on behalf of the United States, and arrangements were made for a meeting at Alexandria Bay between the appointees of the state of New York and the Canadian representative Dr. Wakeham, who is also one of the joint commission appointed by Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States, for the consideration of the much larger and more comprehensive question of international regulations in contiguous waters, and in waters commonly resorted to by the fishermen of both countries. A meeting took place at Alexandria Bay, 16th August, 1895, between Dr. Wakeham and the commissioners appointed by the Senate of the state of New York, together with Senator Mullin, and several members of the St. Lawrence Angling Association. Subsequently, 19th August, the members of the Senate committee came to Ottawa, where, in the absence of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, they were received by the Hon. Sir Adolphe Caron, Hon. J. F. Wood, Dr. Bergin, M.P., Dr. Wakeham, and the deputy Minister, being introduced by Mr. Geo. Taylor, M.P. The question of fishing rights as distinct from the inauguration of an international park, formed the subject of discussion, the question of a park not coming within the jurisdiction of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and a set of mutual regulations submitted conditional upon such modification, restraint, or interpretation of the United States Alien Labour Act, being arranged and guaranteed authoritatively, as would admit British subjects, acting as guides or boatmen plying their calling and seeking engagements in the United States waters and along the shore and among the islands within the points specified above, as freely and as securely as the same may be done by United States boatmen in the corresponding Canadian waters. The respective representatives are at present corresponding regarding the date of an early meeting to discuss the question of whatever legislation is requisite to effect such arrangements.

FISH WARDEN—BIDEFORD, P.E.I.

Mr. YEO asked :

Has a fish warden been appointed at Bideford, Prince County, Prince Edward Island, in place of George Sharp, deceased? If so, who, and when was the appointment made?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No, but a special fishery guardian has been employed as occasion required.

FISHING WITH POUND-NETS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Whether any persons or corporations are allowed to fish with pound-nets in any British Columbia waters except under the Order in Council of the 20th March, 1894? If so, who are those persons or corporations, and under what authority are they so allowed to fish, and for what reason is such authority given?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No permission has been granted by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to fish pound-nets in the waters of British Columbia except under Order in Council of 20th March, 1894.

BRIDGE AT NEPEAN POINT.

Mr. RIDER (for Mr. Devlin) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to extend some suitable measure of aid during the present session towards the building of a combined highway and railway bridge at or near Nepean Point, in the city of Ottawa, and joining the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. FOSTER. The matter has been brought to the attention of the Government and is now under consideration.

POSTMASTER AT GRANDE-GREVE, COUNTY OF GASPE.

Mr. GUAY (translation) (for Mr. Choquette) asked :

Whether the postmaster at Grande-Grève, in the county of Gaspé, has resigned? If so, why, and who is his successor?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) In reply to the question put by the hon. member, I may say that the postmaster, at Grande-Grève, has not resigned.

POSTAL DELIVERY SYSTEM.

Mr. BOWERS asked :

How many towns and cities in the Dominion have the postal delivery system? The names of such towns and cities?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Twelve, namely: Halifax, Hamilton, Kingston, London, Montreal, Ottawa, Quebec, St. John, Toronto, Vancouver, Victoria and Winnipeg.

REMEDIAL BILL—MANITOBA.

Mr. CASEY asked :

Was a draft, or synopsis, or other indication of the contents of the Remedial Bill shown to any one not a member of the Cabinet before the introduction of that Bill in the House? If so, to whom?

Mr. DICKEY. No draft, synopsis or other indication of the contents of the Remedial Bill were shown to any one not a member of the Cabinet, except confidential officers of the Justice Department, after the Bill was submitted to Council for consideration and before the introduction of that Bill into the House. In drafting the Bill for submission to Council a number of persons were consulted as to details.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of James Robinson, Esq., for the electoral district of Northumberland, N.B.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

James Robinson, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Northumberland, N.B., introduced by Mr. Costigan and Mr. Foster.

CAPE BRETON ELECTION.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I regret, Mr. Speaker, to be obliged to move the adjournment of the House to-day, but I do so in order to be able to make a statement which I deem of very great importance arising out of certain allegations made yesterday. The House will remember that yesterday certain addresses were made with regard to the election in Cape Breton, challenging the accuracy of certain statements which had been made by the Secretary of State in reply to the statements I made yesterday.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is out of order in moving the adjournment of the House for the purpose of referring to a past debate—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not make this motion for the purpose of referring to a past debate. My intention is to call attention to an inaccurate statement made in the debate yesterday, and I think I am—

Mr. SPEAKER. That would clearly be referring to a past debate. It is to refer to statements made in the debate of yesterday that the hon. member proposes to move the adjournment of the House to-day. That would certainly, from my point of view, be a direct reference to a previous debate, which, under the rules of this House, cannot be made.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then I shall not refer to the debate of yesterday. I shall refer to a statement made by Sir Charles Tupper, Secretary of State, on his arrival in Ottawa, when he was presented with an address by the Conservative Association in Ottawa, to the effect that his election had been won notwithstanding money subscribed by the Liberal party and sent into the county. At the same time he stated that the Attorney General of Nova Scotia had gone to Cape Breton, and after taking charge of the contest there on behalf of the Liberal party, finding himself unable to win the county for his party by argument, had gone to the city of Halifax to obtain money to corruptly buy the county. Now these statements, if made by an ordinary person might be allowed to pass unchallenged, but we cannot forget that the Secretary of State, has for many years, occupied a very distinguished position in London, and that from the very fact of his occupying that position so long, statements made by him affecting the honour and integrity of public men in Canada are likely to be accorded more weight in Great Britain than they would be if made by a person not so distinguished.

Mr. DICKEY. I would ask the hon. gentleman on what authority he bases that statement?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I base that statement on the authority of Sir Charles Tupper himself.

Mr. DICKEY. When was the statement made by Sir Charles Tupper?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is not necessary for me to say when the hon. gentleman made the statement; but he made it in my presence.

Mr. DICKEY. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is debating a ruling you have made, Mr. Speaker, and is discussing what took place in this House in a past debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. I was not aware whether the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) was referring to a statement made by Sir Charles Tupper on his arrival, or to a statement made upon his taking his seat here yesterday. If the hon. member is now referring to what took place in the debate yesterday, he is clearly out of order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have informed you, Mr. Speaker, that I would drop that matter and would call the attention of the House to a statement made by Sir Charles Tupper in Ottawa, before he took his seat in this House—

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Which you heard?

Mr. DICKEY. Then I challenge the hon. gentleman to produce any proof of his assertion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You can do that afterwards. What I am going to do now is to put on record in this House a statement handed in to the press and signed by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia in which he declares the inaccuracy of the statement made by the Secretary of State. That statement reads as follows:—

Sir Charles Tupper, I am informed, on the night of the election in Cape Breton, said that the Liberal party had raised large sums of money, not less than $25,000, to corrupt the electors of Cape Breton. I heard him repeat this statement at Antigonish the next day, and again at the banquet on Thursday night. This statement, I am in a position to say, is absolutely untrue. No such sum was raised or spent, indeed, any large sum whatever.

An hon. MEMBER. How much?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

The Liberals are not able to contribute such sums, and having been actively engaged in the election from beginning to end, I say most positively that this statement of Sir Charles Tupper is without foundation, and made without a shadow of proof.

He also publicly stated, so I am informed, that I went to Halifax during the campaign to get more money, and came back with a large sum. On this point I am able to speak with personal knowledge. The statement is an unmitigated falsehood, uttered without responsible authority, and I regret to be compelled to say, made wilfully and recklessly. I did not go to Halifax to get money for the campaign. I did not discuss the subject of money for Cape Breton with any person during my absence; I did not ask or receive one dollar for that purpose, nor did I take or spend one dollar except for my personal expenses.

Sir Charles Tupper claims to be a statesman, and has occupied many distinguished positions here and in England. It is certainly not creditable that he should fill his speeches with false and ridiculous assertions of this kind, which would scarcely be worthy of the lowest type of ward politician.

(Signed) J. W. LONGLEY.

Now, the hon. gentleman asks me how much money was spent. Yesterday we proposed that a committee of this House should be appointed to investigate how much money was spent on both sides. I told him, having a pretty good knowledge of what was spent by the Liberal party, that I could state it was not over $2,000 including everything—personal expenses and all. And I asked the hon. gentlemen yesterday if they were prepared to give a committee of the House to examine into the expenditure of both parties on that occasion. If hon. gentlemen are ready to do that, we are ready to facilitate the inquiry by every means in our power. If they are not so prepared, I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the false and vile charges which have been made against the Liberal party and against such a distinguished man as the Attorney General of Nova Scotia shall be withdrawn in this House. And if hon. gentlemen will accept neither alternative, then I give them notice that, at an early day, I, myself, will move in the matter in the most formal way, demanding in the only way in which a member of Parliament can demand it, that such a committee shall be appointed and that the fullest inquiry shall be made into the expenditures of the candidates on both sides and by their friends in that contest. I tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that the Liberal party is not prepared to submit, and will not submit, to foul charges of this kind. We do not propose to carry elections by means of bribery and corruption.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hon. gentlemen may smile. They have the best opportunity to prove the falsity of my statement if they accept my challenge. Let us know what Sir Charles Tupper and his friends spent, and what Mr. Murray and his friends spent, and then the public will be able to judge which side have been guilty of corruption and wrong-doing in that election. Sir, the statement made with reference to the expenditure of that money, and the proof offered, that the Attorney General of Nova Scotia went to Halifax to get it, and come back with half a dozen young men in his train to spend it—the statement is false from beginning to end. That statement has been characterized by Mr. Longley in the strongest language he could possibly use, as without a shadow of foundation; and I ask you, in face of that denial, whether it is fair or right for a man occupying the distinguished position that the Secretary of State does in this country, and has occupied in London, to persist in statements which, Sir, are not only untrue in themselves, but are a libel upon the great Liberal party of Canada.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman to-day has again pledged his personal honour as to the amount of money spent in the election in Cape Breton. I do not know what means of knowledge the hon. gentleman has; I only know that if, in a legal trial, a witness were rash enough to pledge his oath to a thing that he could not possibly know, he could be found guilty of perjury. The hon. gentleman has pledged his honour, whatever that may be worth, to a thing—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am inclined to think the hon. gentleman's expression was an imputation, which is not parliamentary.

Mr. DICKEY. If so, I withdraw it at once. The hon. gentleman has pledged his personal honour to the truth of a statement as to which he cannot possibly know whether it is correct or not. The hon. gentleman has ventured to assure this House positively, upon his honour, about a thing as to which he possibly could have no knowledge.

Mr. MULOCK. He is willing to submit it to a test.

Mr. DICKEY. Exactly, the hon. gentleman is willing to submit the question to a test. That is a fair proposition, but I say that any hon. gentleman who gets up here and makes a statement the truth of which he cannot know, and pledges to it his personal honour, is very little in order when he speaks of reckless statements made by other gentlemen. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman seems to intimate, as the Attorney General of Nova Scotia seems to intimate, that the Liberal party never spends money in elections, or that the moneyed men of the Liberal party take so little interest in the principles of that party, that they will not subscribe money freely to elections. The hon. gentleman himself could not succeed in raising enough to pay even the travelling expenses of the gentlemen who went down to take part in the contest in Cape Breton. Now, the hon. member asked for a committee of the House. A committee of the House, for what purpose? To investigate the truth of a statement, made outside the House, by a gentleman who was not then a member of the House. I ask whether any hon. gentleman can cite a precedent for that.

Mr. CASEY. Repeatedly, in the House.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman must not refer to a past debate. The hon. member for Queen's submitted to a ruling of Mr. Speaker, and, therefore, did not refer to a past debate. We must take that for granted. The hon. gentleman wants a committee of the House. He knows perfectly well, no man in this House knows better, that this House voluntarily divested itself years ago of the function of inquiring into the illegal expenditure of money in elections.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. member for Bothwell is perfectly correct. We have the power, and we deliberately laid down that function and handed it over to the courts, and the hon. gentleman wants us to take it up. For what purpose? The hon. gentleman knows that the Liberal party in Cape Breton can inquire into the expenditure made by Sir Charles Tupper by filing an election petition, because Sir Charles Tupper was elected. He knows that we cannot file a petition against Mr. Murray, because Mr. Murray was defeated. Therefore, we cannot institute an inquiry into a charge of personal bribery, we cannot make an inquiry legally. The hon. gentleman proposes to shirk the inquiry, which the courts offer him, into the expenditure of money by the Secretary of State, and asks for a committee of this House, a procedure which was abandoned long ago, as I have said, and a procedure which, in the instance of the Secretary of State, would be directly usurping the functions of the courts. So far as the Government is concerned, and so far as I am concerned, I would certainly not consent, upon this occasion, to resume that authority which we laid down years ago. The hon. gentleman cannot escape this option, that the courts are open to him to prove anything he likes with regard to the Secretary of State. He can have his inquiry, not before a committee of the House, but before a judge, and he can bring evidence there; whereas the Conservative party is not in that position. I do not know what was spent in the Cape Breton election. I would consider myself a most reckless man if, without any knowledge whatever, I pledged my word that $25,000 were spent there, or any amount was spent there. I do not believe that that is the proper way to conduct business matters in this House. Statements that are made in this House upon personal honour, had better be founded upon personal knowledge, and therefore I make no statement upon the matter whatever. Sir, so far as the expenditure of the Secretary of State is concerned, the courts are open to the hon. gentlemen opposite, or to anybody else who desires to make an inquiry; but so far as the Government is concerned, they would not be willing to violate the well established rule that the courts are the proper authority to inquire into such matters.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We have a new rule of parliamentary law laid down by the Minister of Justice. He tells us that because we have a right to inquire through a judicial proceeding into corrupt practices at an election for the purpose of unseating a candidate, or for the purpose of disqualifying a candidate, this House has no right whatever to exercise the general powers with which it is invested to inquire into a charge of this kind.

Mr. DICKEY. I did not deny it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says practically that we have surrendered the right. Now, I deny that altogether. We have practically surrendered the right for a specific purpose, but we retain that power to be exercised for every other purpose, on every other occasion, when the exercise of that power is appropriate. Why, if the hon. gentleman's rule were correct, and an alien were returned to this House, and a petition were not filed against him to unseat him, this House could have no power to protect itself against a disqualified party from continuing to sit here as a member. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten all the inquiries that took place with reference to Mr. Parnell, and with reference to other parties? Is this House not qualified to protect itself against parties who are unworthy to hold seats in this House, by an inquiry in this House, unless such an inquiry is made within thirty days after the return of a particular candidate? Why, Sir, we have no such rule. My hon. friend has challenged hon. gentlemen opposite to appoint a committee to inquire into certain charges made against the Liberal party, laid against members in this House by the Secretary of State. These charges were made in the constituency. They were repeated in this city at the city hall, and they were made and repeated for the purpose of damaging hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. We say those charges are without any foundation. Those charges are not proved, and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has challenged the Government who wish to profit by those charges, has challenged the Secretary of State who made those charges to call for a committee or accept a committee appointed by this House for the purpose of investigating them. The Minister of Justice has said that if we wish to unseat Sir Charles Tupper for corrupt practices there is a proper mode of proceeding. No one is proposing to take action against the Secretary of State for that purpose. It is not in our power. That is a power which belongs to the electors of the constituency to exercise. But do hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to say that the whole of the rest of this Dominion is absolutely helpless to protect itself simply because some members of the constituency will not take the initiative. I deny altogether such a proposition. Parliament is not in that helpless condition, and is competent to protect itself, and the proper way of protecting itself against unfounded charges and maintaining the character and reputation of members here, is by an inquiry conducted by the House itself, and by no other party. The hon. gentleman has said that members of the Opposition have been liberal subscribers to a fund of $25,000 for the purpose of corrupting and debauching the constituency. If that charge were true, the truth would be a disgrace to members on this side of the House. If an hon. gentleman were to bring against an hon. member on the other side of the House the charge that he was a felon or a burglar, does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that an inquiry could not take place because there was not any election petition filed. The moment a charge is made against the character and standing of a member as to whether he is fit to be a member of the House, that is a proper subject for inquiry, and the charge made by the Secretary of State, if true, would discredit the men against whom it was made, and they have a perfect right to ask this House to name a committee to vindicate themselves and clear themselves from the aspersions cast on them. There is no rule of law or rule of Parliament more clearly settled and established than the rule that if a discreditable charge is made against a member of the House, it is his right as a member to ask for a committee to vindicate himself. The Secretary of State has made such charges. The hon. gentleman has refused to withdraw those charges, to recede from his position, or to establish the charges. What was done in England when similar charges were made against an hon. member in the House, and the hon. member refused to ask for a committee? Why, a committee was appointed. The hon. gentleman was asked to appear before it, and when he refused, the committee found the charges were unfounded, and that the accused was not guilty of the accusations brought against him. Sir, I do not know any case where an hon. member has a better right to ask for a committee than in the case now before the House. The hon. member for Queen's stated that he knew no such sum of money was sent down to Cape Breton. If the hon. gentleman were the medium through which moneys were sent for election purposes, would he not know it?

Mr. FOSTER. Is he such a medium ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is the contribution to elections of thousands of dollars such an ordinary transaction, one of such an every-day occurrence that a man can speak with no confidence on the subject ?

Mr. DICKEY. How could the hon. member for Queen's know what took place in Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, and other centres ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman did not pretend to say what took place at Halifax.

Mr. DICKEY. He did. That was the point.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let the hon. gentleman grant a committee. The Secretary of State thought there was something in the charge or he would not have made it. The Secretary of State made the charge for a purpose, and that purpose was to asperse the men against whom the charge was directed. The hon. gentleman says, you must lie under the charge, and shall not have an opportunity of vindicating and clearing away the aspersions cast upon members on this side of the House. I deny that proposition, and I say that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) is within his rights in asking that a committee be granted.

Mr. WELDON. The question which was brought before the House by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) yesterday has assumed an importance to-day, largely through the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that it does not deserve. How the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., could reconcile his action to himself, how he could think it compatible with the dignity of this House to make a charge against the Secretary of State on no other ground than that which he himself stated, is certainly not easy to understand. The most he could possibly say in that matter was that he did not know that the Liberals of Cape Breton expended large sums of money corruptly ; but he went further, and said that he knew that the Liberals did not spend large sums. No man could state and prove that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was referring to the statement that sums were sent down.

Mr. WELDON. From where ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) From here—from the upper provinces.

Mr. WELDON. "Hansard" will decide between us, but in my recollection no such statement was made. The hon. gentleman did not confine himself to sums sent from Ottawa.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) From the upper provinces.

Mr. WELDON. Even if the hon. gentleman spoke of sums sent from Ottawa, he could not possibly know that other sums were not sent from here or elsewhere. The hon. member for Bothwell raised this question to an importance which it did not deserve. He laid down a constitutional rule which does not conform to the established practice of this House. The old law and the authorities may be as he has stated, but there is no hon. member of this House belonging to the legal profession who is not aware that an important part of constitution law is the usages and conventions of the constitution. In that memorable case from my own province regarding the election in Queen's, N.B., in 1887, which came up in this House for exhaustive consideration and discussion, the decision given confirmed the practice of earlier days, and has governed the practice since. It has established the practice, which we are certainly competent to make, that when time is open to file a petition, aggrieved parties cannot come to this House and ask it to inquire into charges of electoral corruption. And this is so because the courts of justice are open to the parties, seeing that Parliament, in 1874, threw on the courts a duty which it formerly did discharge by committees of this House. Then there was another reason why it was not necessary to invoke and revive a latent power in the House, because, two years ago, Parliament passed a law for the prevention of corrupt practices, placing it within the power of a small number of men, by putting up a small sum of money, to send a commissioner down into the county and have the charge tried. He can do whichever he likes. He can take the Act of 1894 or the Act of 1874, and he can search out whatever he wants to know. I would not have spoken, Mr. Speaker, were it not that I wish to declare against this false doctrine which the hon. member is trying to put upon the records of the House.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I certainly was very much surprised indeed, that the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), who have just spoken, had not expressed, before they sat down, regret that the Secretary of State made such an assertion as he made in the city hall in Ottawa, the other day.

Mr. WELDON. If the hon. gentleman will allow me for one moment. I say, I do express regret, and I think it was an unfortunate statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDGAR. I am very glad to hear that. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to sit down and let the Minister of Justice have an opportunity of getting up and expressing the same opinion as the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). The Minister of Justice does not do it.

Mr. DICKEY. Yes; if the statement is incorrect it was a most unfortunate statement.

Mr. EDGAR. I am afraid I can hardly congratulate the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) upon his candour. An apology of that kind is very much like the unfortunate innuendo which he made in reference to my friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), and which he had to withdraw a few minutes ago, at the direction of you, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Justice spoke of my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) making a statement here upon his honour which he did not know the truth of. That statement he had to withdraw. Now, I will read the statement which was made by the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) at the City Hall on Monday last, and as reported in the daily "Citizen," he said:

Men were sent from Nova Scotia, and money was unstintedly used to secure his defeat. He spoke of what he knew, when he said that $25,000 were sent down to buy the seat from under him.

Did the Secretary of State not speak on his honour, or had he no honour to pledge to his statement? Is that the distinction to be drawn? He says he spoke of what he knew, and he must surely have been stating upon his honour as a man that he knew it. And, Sir, when he is confronted with that statement in the House, it appears from his own lips that he knows nothing at all about it. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), and the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), contend that the creation of an election court, takes away from the jurisdiction of this House, the right to try an election petition. Very well, without going into an argument on that point I would like to ask the Minister of Justice, if, supposing an hon. member outside of the House made a slanderous statement and was confronted with it in this House, would he have no opportunity of asking the right to prove it, when it related to a great political party and to public transactions in an election? Would such an hon. gentleman not have an opportunity to ask the House for a committee to vindicate his statement, and his honour in making it? When attention was drawn to the statement made by the Secretary of State, he should have been the first man in the House to ask for a committee to prove his statement, or else, he should withdraw it. Not only did he not ask for a committee, but we on this side proposed a committee, asked him to take a committee, urged it upon him, entreated him to have a committee to prove the truth of the words which he must have pledged his honour to. And what does the honour of the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) come to, if he will not avail of that opportunity to vindicate it. The less said by the Minister of Justice about pledging the honour of hon. members in this House to statements, the better. So far as that is concerned, do not we all know that the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has special reasons for knowing about this election. He is the leader of the Liberal party in the maritime provinces, and no doubt he has general control over elections there. He has had communications with all the leading men of these provinces. Before he made his statement here to-day he had an opportunity of communicating with the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, who took an active part in the Cape Breton campaign, and he knows from the Attorney General of Nova Scotia that money was not spent there. He has had an opportunity of communicating with the member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), who took an active part all through that contest, and he knows from him that money was not spent there. He has had an opportunity of communicating with the member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin), who took an active part in that campaign, and he has ascertained from him that no money was spent there. He has had an opportunity of communicating with the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), and in fact with all the Liberal speakers who took an active part in that election, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) has ascertained from them, what he states to be a fact, that money was not expended in that election to the extent of $2,000. Now, Sir, in the face of that, the Secretary of State has not seen fit to withdraw his words; but I am glad at any rate, that one member on the other side of the House has got up in his place, and told the House that he was ashamed of the statement made by the Secretary of State.

Mr. EDGAR.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Edgar), being a lawyer, ought to know that this House has no power to grant a committee to investigate the expenditures of Mr. Murray. This House may have the right to grant a committee to inquire into the standing of the members of the House; but in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of other legal gentlemen in this House—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear. "Other legal gentlemen" is good.

Mr. TAYLOR. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but before I sit down the laugh will be on the other side. I will make a proposition, a proposition that this House can deal with, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to accept it. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has put words into the mouth of the Secretary of State, which the Secretary of State never uttered. The hon. member for Bothwell has charged the Secretary of State with having said that the Liberal members of this House contributed to that fund to the extent of $25,000. The hon. the Secretary of State never referred to the subscription of a member of this House. The only one who did refer to the Liberal members in this House having subscribed, is the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), who said he knew about the fund, and he knew how much was made up here among them, and it did not exceed $1,500 all told.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not say any such thing.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is your statement in "Hansard" of yesterday.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is wrong. I never spoke of $1,500 being subscribed here. I never said any such thing. I never intimated that it was $1,500, or the half of $1,500.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, I make the statement, and the statement made by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Edgar) proves, that the Secretary of State has never preferred a charge against an hon. gentleman on that side of the House of having contributed one cent towards the expenditure in the Cape Breton election. There is, therefore, nothing for the Secretary of State to withdraw. He has not charged anything against any member in this House, and why should he offer to accept a committee to investigate something which he never stated. But, the Secretary of State did say that $25,000 was sent down by the Liberal party from all over the country, and that it was expended in Cape Breton. The hon. gentleman may ask for a committee of inquiry into the standing of an hon. member of this House; but I am authorized, on behalf of nine hon. gentlemen besides myself, to make a proposition to the hon. gentleman. Let us leave the matter to three judges. We on this side will select one, hon. gentlemen opposite will select one, and these two will select a third, and let them inquire as to which party contributed and expended the larger amount of money. We on this side of the House will pay the expense of the inquiry if it be proved that our side have expended the larger sum of money; and if, on the contrary, it is found that hon. gentlemen opposite have contributed and expended the larger sum, they shall pay the expense. So that the country will be put to no cost for the inquiry. Or, take the proposition submitted by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) a few moments ago.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the hon. gentleman authority from any judge to say that he will accept such an appointment? And will the hon. gentleman undertake to get a statute passed in this House giving these judges power to take evidence under oath?

Mr. TAYLOR. I have this to say. We will have two judges as arbitrators, and they will select a third to act as referee, and make the inquiry.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Under oath?

Mr. TAYLOR. Then this House has no right to grant power to any committee to take evidence under oath. But this whole matter is a piece of bluff on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, just to affect the country. Let them accept the proposition I make, which is something reasonable and something that is common-sense, instead of giving us a piece of bluff to go to the country, charging the Secretary of State with having made statements which he never made. He never said that an hon. member of this House had contributed a cent to that election; but the hon. member for Queen's did say that hon. gentlemen opposite had contributed to the extent of about $1,500.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is inaccurate again. I did not make that statement.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order. All this is discussing a previous debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. It seemed to me at the outset that the whole discussion had reference, although no direct reference was made, to the debate of yesterday; but I was bound to accept the statement of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) that he was referring to a statement made in the city hall in Ottawa.

Mr. MULOCK. Yesterday I made a few remarks touching this matter.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to order. This is a direct reference to a previous debate.

Mr. MULOCK. I have not referred to a previous debate. I said that yesterday I spoke on the subject. Now, I am going to speak to the proposition of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), that this matter should be referred to a tribunal of three persons. For one, I will assent to that proposition if those three persons are to be properly empowered to make the inquiry. It is essential that they shall be clothed with the power of examining witnesses under oath, sending for persons and papers, and thoroughly ascertaining whether the Secretary of State was correct in the charge he made or not. Any tribunal that can exhaustively deal with the subject ought to be accepted.

Mr. TAYLOR. At the expense of the Conservative and Reform parties of the country.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes; and I for one—I do not know whether this will commend itself to my hon. friends on this side of the House—am content to let the hon. gentleman name the three judges, provided they are members of this House. Then we can create them a committee, and clothe them with power, under the Act of 1894, to take evidence under oath.

Mr. TAYLOR. We have no judges in this House.

Mr. MULOCK. We have 214 members of this House, and I am willing that the three judges to test this question should be chosen by the hon. gentleman, and chose from his own side. It is the evidence we want.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend makes a proposition to have three political judges taken from this House, and leave me to select them. I make the proposition that we shall take three judges from the bench and make them referees. If I selected three members of this House, taking two from this side and one from that side, the chances are that there would be a majority report and a minority report; and then our friends on the other side would say that it was a whitewash. Let us have three judges.

Mr. MULOCK. My hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), a few minutes ago, read from a Conservative journal the words said to have been uttered by Sir Charles Tupper. Now, I desire to bring the debate back to where it ought to be. The question is whether Sir Charles Tupper, a coming Premier of Canada, has, on his re-entry into public life, made a statement of a reckless character, which is untrue in fact, or which he ought to have had some evidence about before he made it. I have in my hand the file of the Toronto "Daily Mail and Empire," which purports to give a verbatim account of Sir Charles Tupper's speech at Ottawa on February 10th, on the occasion in question. He he is reported to have stated:

I speak of that which I know when I say that $25,000 were sent down by the Liberal party into the county to buy the seat from under my feet. (Cheers.) The Liberals are, unfortunately, in this position, that they staked their all on the desperate throw of a ruined gamester, and they have lost. They have not only lost the seat, but they have lost their money and their character, too.

That is the statement to which we take exception. I entirely concur in the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Justice, that no one should make a positive statement on matters that he cannot have absolute knowledge about, and that observation is expressly applicable to the unqualified assertion of the Secretary of State. I am not at all afraid of the honour of the Liberal party. I do not think the country will attach much importance to the utterances of the Secretary of State casting any discredit on the Liberal party under these circumstances. But, Sir, I am concerned for the honour of our public men; I am concerned for the honour of a Minister of the Crown; I am concerned for the honour of a man who aspires to be Premier of Canada; and I say here that that gentleman cannot expect ever to fill a position of honour until he comes like a man before the country, and either withdraws that statement or attempts, before a proper tribunal, to make it good. It is disreputable that public men can trifle with the truth, and still occupy places of public trust. What is demoralizing Canada and public opinion to-day? Truth in high places is trifled with. Virtue is deposed, and hon. gentlemen are usurping the honour that is due to virtue; and here we are expected to condone an offence like this in the presence of the country, and allow the Secretary of State not only to retain his position, but to secure higher honours if possible. That is the issue. It is not a question as to whether his assertion has any weight with the country or not. I acknowledge that we should be charitable towards those who make assertions even more positive than the facts warranted; but when the matter has been brought to his attention on a former occasion, and is still before the country, there is only one course for an honourable man to adopt, I submit, and that is, to make good his statement or withdraw it, or show that he had reasonable and probable cause for making it. I can understand a man making a misstatement and not intentionally telling an untruth. If the hon. gentleman was misled, then he can be acquitted of intentional misstatement, as he lacked the intention to mislead. If he had good and probable cause for making the assertion, I would, for one, relieve him of moral responsibility. But he cannot remain in his present position, allowing, by his silence, the charge to be reasserted and affirmed. He is too unmanly to have an investigation and make an effort to prove his charge. He stands to-day arraigned before the bar of the public of having made a statement which he cannot know to be true, and which he dare not try and prove to be true, and yet which he is unwilling to withdraw. Mr. Speaker, I submit that that is not the action of a gentleman. I submit that no man is animated by proper gentlemanly instincts who will intentionally trifle with what is true. We may have our strong views, but no gentleman is warranted in trifling with the truth.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is going too far in the expressions he is making use of. The expressions which he is applying to a member of Parliament are certainly very strong.

Mr. MULOCK. I apologize, Sir, for having used these expressions. I have said all I need say with regard to that; but, speaking in the abstract, all hon. gentlemen will agree with me that we are entitled to expect from every member of this House that he will, in discussing public matters, have a proper respect for the facts. It is quite possible for us to be mistaken, but there is a duty cast upon us which we should not shirk. It is our duty to respect the truth; and those who will not respect the truth, the country will not respect.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. member has given us a historical picture—truth trifled with, virtue deposed, and the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) weeping deciduous tears over the pair. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Mulock) and the hon. gentleman who introduced this subject to-day (Mr. Davies) have made, in my opinion, a very great mistake. First, they have made the mistake, as hon. members of this House, of trifling with the time of this House; and, in the next place, they have made a mistake, as members of the great Liberal party, because by wantonly and foolishly, and without adequate motive, as I shall show, attacking the hon. baronet, the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), they have shown that they are greatly afraid of that hon. gentleman. They have shown that they are determined, with or without adequate motive, to attack him; and in taking that course, they are certain to rally round that hon. gentleman the Conservative party of Canada. Now, what is the question before the House? The question introduced by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the speech with which he introduced it, were on a par and germane to each other, because that speech was in the hon. gentleman's platform style. It was violent, and we know that when he speaks from the platform, he speaks in the King Cambyses vein. But when my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) spoke, he tried to raise the question to a higher plane. He discussed it from a high constitutional standpoint, and as long as you forgot what the real question before the House was, you listened to the hon. member for Bothwell with interest and respect, because he was laying down perfectly just principles. But the proposition that should have been behind, but was not behind, that constitutional speech of the hon. member for Bothwell, is that the hon. Secretary of State had accused members of this House of contributing to the funds of the election contest in Cape Breton. That is the proposition which should have been behind the speech of my hon. friend from Bothwell. If the hon. baronet, the Secretary of State had accused any member of this House of contributing to an election fund in Cape Breton, the argument of my hon. friend from Bothwell would have been perfectly to the point, but the hon. Secretary of State did not do anything of the kind. All he did say at the city hall, as my hon. friend from Ontario has just pointed out, was that $25,000 had been spent to buy the seat from under him. He did not say that it had been spent or contributed by any member of this House, and in order to bring the matter within the purview of this House, and to justify taking up a moment of this House in discussing it, it was essential to show that the hon. baronet had charged members of this House with having subscribed to this fund; neither in the city hall, where I heard him, nor elsewhere, did the hon. baronet say a word to that effect. Therefore, in vain was expended all this righteous indignation on the part of the hon. member for Queen's and all the learned lore of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and all the nondescript eloquence of my hon. friend from York (Mr. Mulock)—all his great indignation about truth trifled with—the delicate truth for the honour of which he is so zealous, and then virtue deposed for whose restoration and crowning the hon. gentleman insists. The hon. gentleman appeared so earnest as he posed like a dignified embodiment of all that is virtuous in humanity, weeping over dethroned justice and trifling with truth. Why, Sir, it is a touching picture, but it has its ludicrous side. It is a picture that may well try our patience, when we consider that the very moment you go beneath the surface, you find no logical basis for the discussion we have had. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has been guilty, from the point of view of parliamentary conduct, of a grave misdemeanour in bringing forward to-day this subject. He has taken up the time of this House without any justification whatever. What is to happen, if this House is to become the receptacle for the wild and windy rhetoric of the platform? What is to happen if we are to review every utterance sent forth from the hustings? Suppose that every time the hon. member for South Oxford declares that the Tory party is made up of all sorts of corruptionists and boodlers, we take these assertions seriously and ask the House to give us a committee to investigate into their truth or falsity, why, we should have no time for legislation, we should have no time for the questions that are dear to hon. members, and our private day would disappear completely. My hon. friend from Queen's, who introduced this question, unfortunately for his party and unfortunately for his own reputation as a parliamentarian in this House—he knows that this is private members' day—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You are taking up the time of this House.

Mr. DAVIN. When an hon. member so demeans himself, as the hon. member for Queen's has done, by exhibiting a complete departure from the position that should be taken by a gentleman of his standing in the House, when we have propositions placed before us and demands made which are an insult, in my opinion, to parliamentary traditions, we must refute these propositions and demands, but the responsibility for any expenditure of time thus taken up lies at the door of my hon. friend. If the hon. member had brought this forward on a Government day, he would be carrying out the tactics which are now almost avowed. But here to-day my hon. friend (Mr. Flint) has a motion on the paper in which a large number of members of this House are interested and in which a large number of men in the North-west are interested, a motion about the liquor traffic, which stands first on the Order paper. And what prevents that being brought forward? What has prevented our making any progress here to-day? Tactics on the part of, literally, the same gentlemen who last year practically burked the motion of my hon. friend.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. DAVIN. Somebody says "No." Only to-day I was looking at the division list on that motion, and I found that some twenty-four leading Conservatives, including the leader of the House, stood by my hon. friend, and ten leading Liberals headed by the leader of the Opposition, and including my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and, I think, my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) against.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the discussion is becoming irrelevant.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I think not.

An hon. MEMBER. Take it back.

Mr. DAVIN. No; I bow, of course, to your decision, Mr. Speaker. But if you would permit me I will show that I am pointing out—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DAVIN. I am told by my hon. friend here (Mr. McCarthy), who is an older parliamentarian, that I must not argue the question of order. Therefore, I will merely say that I certainly greatly regret that a very important question that we are all deeply interested in has not been reached to-day, and the reason is a discussion which, so far as it has been taken part in by the hon. gentlemen opposite, is a wanton waste of the time of this House. Neither my hon. friend from Queen's, who brought this matter up, nor my hon. friend from York (Mr. Mulock) has given any ground for their action in provoking and prolonging this debate. I wish to point out clearly that the Secretary of State, neither at the city hall nor anywhere else made a charge against any member of this House. That being so, we are in no position to investigate anything that he said about the Cape Breton election. There is no principle upon which we could undertake such an investigation except one which would lead us to inquire into every statement made in regard to their political opponents by gentlemen sitting in the House, even during an election or immediately after an election. The hon. Secretary of State, when speaking at the city hall had just come from a fierce contest in which he had won a great victory. He had been received with unbounded enthusiasm—

Mr. DAVIN.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, unbounded enthusiasm. The procession of carriages extended, to my certain knowledge, from the station right to the Parliament Buildings here.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, the procession of carriages extended from the club to the Canadian Pacific Railway station, and at every corner it passed the utmost interest was shown and there was great cheering for the hon. member. When we got to the city hall, it was almost impossible for anybody to get inside. Why, Sir, what is more natural than that enthusiasm should attend the reception of a gentleman who has just come from a great victory? Why, I have had a few victories in my life over the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I know how a man feels who has won a great victory. And we must not weigh in the nice scales of the apothecary all that is said under these circumstances. I grant you that if anything had been said against a member of this House, it must be taken up. I agree with the hon. member for Bothwell that this House is the guardian of its own honour, and we are in a position to bring the offender to the bar of this House and make him answer for the breach of privilege. But no case whatever has been made out for the proposal either of the hon. member for Queen's or for the proposal of my hon. friend from York. And I will say that I could not agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) who suggested that three judges should sit on this case. I could not agree with a proposal to go to the least trouble to inquire into the question at all, because, though $25,000 is a larger sum than $10,000 and $10,000 larger than $5,000, the whole discussion that has taken place here to-day or at any other time, has been an attempt to make a mountain out of a molehill, and to use the time and opportunities of this House, not for the purpose of furthering the business of the country, but for the purpose of throwing dust in the eyes of the public outside and of making electioneering capital.

Mr. FRASER. Nothing, I am sure, could bring out better the varied talents of the wandering bard of Assiniboia, the hon. member who has just taken his seat, than the remarks he has just made. Again and again, Mr. Speaker, he returned to the question of how the time of the House was being spent. And so careful was he of the time of the House that he actually wandered so far that it was necessary for you, Mr. Speaker, to call him to order—so frugal was he of the time, so careful lest any moment of precious time of the people of this country should be unnecessarily taken up. And then, methinks, when he speaks of not weighing words used after a victory in the nice scales of the apothecary, I suggest that no scales are large enough—or it may be small enough—to weigh his own statements. Then he wandered off into this immense procession. Why, even the hon. junior member for Cape Breton, or any other member of this House, can hardly plume himself upon his reputation for exaggeration after the hon. gentleman's statement concerning the procession stretching from the station to the Parliament Buildings.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And up to the top of the tower.

Mr. FRASER. I do not know about that, but I do know that in olden times men were sent to the tower for saying less than the hon. member for West Assiniboia has said. The hon. gentleman was very anxious that the discussion of the motion standing in the name of the hon. gentleman for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), should go on. I admit that that was a good argument, particularly as coming from one who can so well claim a position on this question and whose whole life is an example of that. Now, what is the state of the case? The statement is made that $25,000 was spent by the Liberal party in a certain election. If there is good ground for making that statement it ought to be investigated as a matter of public policy. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), whom I do not now see in his seat, and the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), spoke about going into the courts. But the case could not be reached before the general election comes off. It would be a nice thing to be called upon to put up $1,000 for a case that would not be heard. The hon. member for Albert said that according to the Bill of last year, a certain number could go into the courts on paying $500. Why will his own friends not accept that? They made the statement that this large expenditure was made. Surely, in the interest of good government and purity of elections they should take the necessary steps to inquire into this expenditure by the Liberals of $25,000. Let them do it, and we will facilitate the investigation in every way. If the process is put in operation, and if it is shown that one-tenth of the amount was expended, I will guarantee that the whole of their costs will be paid by hon. members on this side of the House. If that is not a fair proposition—

Mr. McALISTER. If a tenth is proved, you mean?

Mr. FRASER. If it is proved that a tenth was expended, I think that is a fair proposition. Now, I want to reiterate what was said by an hon. member, that this information can be easily obtained, and if there ever was an occasion on which Parliament should grant a committee of inquiry, when you take into consideration the standing of the gentleman who made the statement, I think this is the time. How else are we going to get the information?

An hon. MEMBER. How much did you expend?

Mr. FRASER. I will give the hon. gentleman the figures, I have got them here, every cent I expended.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Let us have them.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman for Inverness had better not ask the question, or he will receive the same reply he did yesterday, one not entirely to his satisfaction—I mean the reply he received from the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac). I say that what money was expended, was legitimately expended, and they know it. I only want to repeat what I said before, namely, that this is brought up by the opposite side, the statement which was made by them, and attempted to be sustained in this House, just because they knew very well, or somebody knows, that when the statement was first started it had the effect of freely bleeding, and now they turn round and, finding that the money passed into the hands of middlemen, and that the bleeding process was much more effective than they expected, they want to make it appear that there must have been an equal sum spent on the other side, or else the result would have been different. Now, why will not the Government accept our challenge? I think the Minister of Justice admitted that it could be done. He did not for a moment contend that Parliament had given up all its authority in this respect. Now, let it be done, and that will end the matter. If that had been understood yesterday, there would have been no discussion to-day. Let us get at the facts. Surely no one ought to fear the facts, and when the facts are got at, there will be no further discussion in this House on this point. For one, I am ready to bear the results of the fullest investigation when that is made.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I think it is very unfortunate that a statement has been made that $25,000 have been expended in the Cape Breton election, and I think it would be more unfortunate still if that large amount of money has really been expended. It appears to me that our hon. friends opposite show a great deal of virtuous indignation at the expenditure of such a large amount of money. We are not in a position to say exactly what amount of money has been expended by either party, but we are in a position to say, on the authority of a gentleman whose truthfulness will not be doubted by hon. gentlemen opposite, that a considerable amount of money has been subscribed to that election. That hon. gentleman says:

I am in a position to know that attempts were made, on the part of those who believed that it was in the public interest to defeat the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper), attempts were made to assist Mr. Murray to pay these legitimate expenses.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member is reading directly from a debate.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I am reading from a statement made by an hon. gentleman in regard to this question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yesterday.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I did not say yesterday.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In a former debate in this House.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I am reading from a statement made by an hon. gentleman whom I am sure every hon. member of the Opposition will credit.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member is quoting from the "Hansard," of course, he is out of order. If he is quoting from a statement made by the Secretary of State outside this House, he is in order.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I am not quoting from a statement made by the Secretary of State, but I am quoting from a statement made by an hon. gentleman, possibly in this House. If it is out of order, I will desist, for I would be the very last person to quote anything that would be out of order. I only regret exceedingly that hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be afraid of hearing an acknowledgment made by an hon. gentleman on that side, one of themselves. But the fact is clear. It is well known to the public that the Liberal party contributed a considerable amount towards the election expenses of Mr. Murray in Cape Breton. The hon. member for Guysboro' says that it was not more than one-tenth of the amount stated by the Secretary of State outside this House.

Mr. FRASER. I said it was less.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Well, if it was wrong to spend $25,000, it was also wrong to spend $2,500. I think it is a great pity that a discussion on this question should be pressed on the House by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. FRASER. I said no such thing as that $2,500 was expended. I said that the sum mentioned by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) was much less than the amount mentioned, namely, one-tenth of the $25,000 said by the junior member for Cape Breton to have been spent.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Then a large amount of money has been subscribed, but it was not expended?

Mr. FRASER. I did not say so.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I do not think the hon. gentleman is improving his own position to any extent.

Motion (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) to adjourn, negatived.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness).

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. FLINT moved :

That, in the opinion of this House, the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal, sacramental and mechanical purposes, should be prohibited by law.

He said : The resolution before the House is an old friend of hon. members, and I trust that before the discussion concludes, the points at issue that are raised by this resolution, will be fully and thoroughly considered. Last session a similar resolution was brought forward, but the discussion was unfortunately cut somewhat short by an amendment which was proposed. That amendment was one that I think I am not out of place in characterizing as one of delay. It asked the House to suspend judgment upon the main principle of the prohibition of the liquor traffic, until something else should be done in another place. I am confronted by more than one difficulty in discussing this subject, and perhaps the principal one, from a parliamentary standpoint, is that arising from the character of the resolution passed last year. That resolution was :

Whereas there is now before the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council the appeal against the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors ; the further consideration of this question be deferred until this appeal shall have been decided and the report of the Judicial Committee thereon received.

I did not at that time attack, as I might have attacked, the amendment, and the reason for doing so was this : the session was approaching its conclusion, the debate would have been necessarily somewhat lengthy, and it would have been quite in accordance with parliamentary precedents that the debate should have been adjourned. In that event, the question could not possibly come to a vote during that session. Consequently, those of us interested in dividing the House on the question at issue, preferred that the vote should be taken that evening to continuing the discussion on a side issue. Unfortunately the amendment was adopted. I think it might not have been adopted if a full and fair discussion had been had on its terms. We are now in the position that the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has not been rendered. Why this decision has not been rendered, no one at the present time seems to know. It appears that the time which has elapsed since the date of the argument has been unusually long, and the motives which have influenced the noble lords in refraining from publishing their decision is unknown to the public ; at any rate, we are without a decision upon the points involved in that appeal. But I contend, and I think every one in Parliament will admit, that the fact of the non-publication of the decision at which the noble lords have arrived is no reason for inaction on the part of this House. It will not be proper to lay down the rule or to submit to the rule for one instant, that we are to lay aside our own duties, that we cease our responsibilities in consequence of the action or inaction of the Judicial Committee or a court or any other body whatever. I think this Parliament has the right and duty to approach and decide this question on its merits, and upon the opinion this Parliament may form as to its duty in the premises. I call the attention of the House to another matter in connection with the amendment adopted last session. It will be noticed that the question referred to the decision of the Supreme Court and of the Judicial Committee, was not one as to the powers of this Parliament. The resolution itself admits as much. It speaks of the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, while the resolution before the House is one which presupposes and assumes the power of this Parliament to prohibit without any reference whatever to the power and jurisdiction of the provincial legislature. It can easily be seen that had discussion taken place on that point during last session the argument must have been entirely in favour of the main resolution, because, admitting there were questions, as it must be admitted there are questions of great importance and intricacy regarding the jurisdiction of the local legislatures in enacting prohibition or the most stringent legislative restriction on the sale and traffic in intoxicating liquors, none of these questions could prevent Parliament dealing with prohibition in the fullest sense of the word. In fact, I defy hon. gentlemen, whatever views they may take of this question as to its propriety, practicality or constitutionality, to point out in the decisions of the courts, in the constitution of the country or the argument of any jurist any doubt as to the power of this Parliament to pass a prohibitory liquor law. We have the dictum of some of the ablest judges in Ontario and of the Supreme Court of Canada, that the power to prohibit lies solely with the Parliament of Canada, and all the questions which have been agitated in the courts since the commencement of the discussion of this question and cognate questions—as the cases of Russell vs. Queen, Fredericton vs. Queen, Hodge vs. Queen, and Huson vs. South Norwich, and the present case now in appeal before the Judicial Committee—all these cases have been argued and all these matters have been discussed in relation to the powers of the local legislatures to deal with this question. In one of these cases it was held that an Act passed by the Parliament of Canada dealing with licenses was 'ultra vires' of the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada and came within the jurisdiction of the local legislatures under the British North America Act. That this Parliament has the sole power and jurisdiction to enact a prohibitory law is quite apparent from the Act constituting the confederation. Mr. Justice Taschereau, in the case of Fredericton vs. the Queen laid down this dictum:

And it may well be, notwithstanding what was said in this court, in the case of Fredericton vs. the Queen, that, if Parliament has the power to prohibit the liquor traffic in the whole Dominion, it is not at all under the words "regulation of trade and commerce," of section 91 of the British North America Act, that it gets it.

The jurisdiction of this Parliament, then, arises under the general statement as to the powers of this Parliament. The powers of this Parliament are settled by section 91, as follows:—

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for the great certainty but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next herein enumerated.

One of these subjects is the regulation of trade and commerce. It is not solely, then, that the power of this Parliament is defined under "the regulation of trade and commerce," and obtains jurisdiction in regard to that traffic in intoxicating liquors, but it is in view of the fact that the Federal Parliament absorbs within itself not merely the power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, but because it possesses all the sovereign powers of the Dominion not exclusively assigned to the legislatures of the various provinces. When exclusive jurisdiction is given to the provinces it is defined in section 92, and this Parliament absorbs within itself all the remaining and undefined powers of sovereignty; and consequently, while prohibition is not in terms stated in the British North America Act, it is included in the powers to make laws for the peace, order and good government of the Dominion, and in connection with that for the regulation of trade and commerce. Consequently, I think we are justified, without going into any elaborate argument—and it would be unfair to this House to occupy its time with a constitutional argument, even if we had the material at hand to make it—upon that point. We will leave the matter as assumed for the basis of this argument, that the powers of Parliament are complete and unquestioned as to its jurisdiction to legislate in favour of the prohibition of the liquor traffic. Assuming this to be a fundamental principle, the question then arises: Is it advisable that Parliament should exercise that power? Have circumstances been proven to exist which might induce this Parliament to exercise the power committed to it, for the peace, order, and good government of the Dominion? That strong claims can be made and have been made upon Parliament to so exercise that power, is undisputed. Almost ever since the organization of the Government after confederation, this Parliament has been appealed to by large classes of the most intelligent and patriotic citizens, to so legislate. They have pointed out from time to time, in petitions, in memorials, in the reports of public bodies, in the statements of jurists, the terrible evils of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. They have shown the demoralization which that traffic has occasioned, they have shown its bad results in almost every phase of our social and domestic life, and, from time to time, Parliament has been so moved by those appeals and by those representations, that it has taken steps to verify them by official action. The history of this question is one of considerable interest, and if time allowed, it would be valuable to run over the various attempts that have been made here to concentrate the attention of Parliament upon it, and to induce a favourable verdict in this House on the representations of those who have favoured the establishment of a prohibitory liquor law. The first elaborate attempt to induce Parliament to act was made in 1873. In that year petitions numerous signed from all portions of the Dominion, petitions from church courts and ecclesiastical bodies representing large numbers of people, and of great importance, flooded Parliament, covered the Table of the House, and induced Parliament to appoint a committee to deal with this whole question. A committee of the Senate was appointed as well as a committee of the Commons. The Senate committee took the matter into its consideration on two or three occasions and made reports to that body, which have been frequently referred to in prohibition discussions here. These reports were certainly as strong in their character as any that have ever been made to that body. They denounced in the strongest possible terms the liquor traffic, as represented to them by the various persons whom they examined upon the subject, and they appealed to Parliament, as the result of their investigations, to pass a law to prohibit the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors. In order to give merely a sample of the language used I will quote from one of the reports made to the Senate in the year 1873;

Your committee are fully convinced that the traffic in intoxicating liquors, in addition to the evils already mentioned, is detrimental to all the true interests of the Dominion, mercilessly slaying every year hundreds of her most promising citizens, plunging thousands into misery and want, converting her intelligent and industrious sons, who should be her glory and her strength, into feeble inebriates, her burden and her shame, wasting millions of her wealth in the consumption of an article whose use not only imparts no strength, but induces and leads to insanity, suicide and murder, thus diverting into a hurtful channel the capital that should be employed in developing her resources, establishing her manufactures and expanding her commerce—in short, it is a cancer in the body politic, which, if not speedily eradicated, will mar the bright prospects and blight the patriotic hopes of this noble Dominion.

The committee added:

And concurring in the opinion of the legislative assembly of Ontario, as expressed in their petition, that a prohibitory liquor law such as prayed for by the petitioners would be most beneficial in its results to the Dominion, would respectfully recommend that the prayer of the petitioners be favourably entertained.

During the same session of Parliament, the matter was brought before this House, and, after a very animated discussion, in which almost every phase of the question was laid before, the committee to which the matter was referred, in a very able and interesting report, concluded their observations as follows:—

In view of these facts, the committee would most respectfully submit to your honourable House the importance of speedily removing the evils complained of, by the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law; that is, a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors except for medicinal, manufacturing and mechanical purposes, to be regulated by proper safeguards and checks.

That was the opinion of Parliament, or, at any rate, of a committee of Parliament, as far back as 1873. The result of the agitation of that period subsequently impressed itself upon Parliament, and resulted in the Canada Temperance Act. In 1875, this question was brought up and the motion of the Hon. Mr. Schultz, who asked the House to accept this proposition:

That, in the opinion of this House, a prohibitory liquor law is the only effectual remedy for the evils of intemperance, and it is the duty of the Government to submit such a measure at the earliest moment practicable.

Now, it will be seen here, that the Hon. Mr. Schultz went a step further than I do, in the proposition now before the House. Candidly I do not think it would be fair to the Government of the day to throw upon them the sole burden of bringing in a prohibitory resolution. At any rate, I do not think it would be proper, for one who is in general opposition to the policy of the Government on trade and other questions, to attempt to make a question of this kind one of partisan policy. It has been my endeavour, since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, to keep this question as far as possible from assuming a partisan character; because I think it is eminently desirable, in the interest of good government, which this legislation aims at, that it should be sustained and supported by a union of all the various political elements of the country, in order that it may be made successful. And I am convinced that no greater injury could be done to the cause of prohibition than to make it a weapon of party attack or party defence. So strongly entrenched in financial strength are the practical opponents of prohibition, so difficult is it to destroy the traffic, that it will require the combined influence of all the elements of every political party that are opposed to this traffic, to uproot it and to render it innocuous for the future. Parliament at that day took the same view, and passed a resolution with that feature eliminated, defeating a resolution the object of which was that the Government should exact prohibition as a party measure. One excellent result of the agitation and discussion at that time was the adoption of the Canada Temperance Act; and here I may be permitted to say that that Act was a great advance, so far as the whole Dominion was concerned, upon anything that had preceded it. It was, in fact, a prohibitory measure made applicable in such communities as felt themselves strong enough to support it. It enunciated the power and jurisdiction of Parliament to enact a prohibitory law; but it conceded so much to public opinion in various localities as to ask the aid and assistance of the localities in enforcing the measure, if it suited their local ideas. The Act was attacked, of course, as it naturally would be, in the courts, and was sustained upon the ground that it was within the jurisdiction and power of the Dominion Parliament, being a prohibitory measure, while it did not necessarily attack the exclusive jurisdiction of the local legislatures over the various matter assigned to them, in consequence of its being made a question of local option. The Canada Temperance Act, however, has not been an unqualified success in practice; and I think this Parliament is somewhat to blame for that fact. The law as originally enacted was perhaps as perfect in its terms as any law that has ever been passed by this Parliament. But we are all aware that in the administration of a law which is quasi criminal, difficulties are always encountered, as difficulties were encountered in the administration of this law. But, unfortunately, either in one branch of Parliament or the other, there was not that disposition to amend the law, as difficulties were found to exist, that has been manifested by Parliament in reference to many other subjects of legislation; and the Canada Temperance Act, and I say it sincerely and distinctly, has been very much injured in its operation by the unwillingness of Parliament to accede to such amendments as have been from time to time requested by those interested in carrying out the law.

Consequently, while the failures in the administration of that Act in various localities are indicated to us, I think all those failures can be seen to fall under one of two heads: either in the locality the temperance sentiment has not been sufficiently strong to enforce the Act as it stands, or Parliament has been remiss in its duty in amending the Act in such a way as to make it more workable. However, in many localities the law has worked very well. It has worked to advantage, and has been and is still held in high popular estimation. Not long ago, in the constituency represented by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), an attempt was made to repeal the Canada Temperance Act. I am not aware of the difficulties which arose in that district, and consequently cannot speak with confidence as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness, from an outside standpoint, of those who asked for its repeal. But, with all its faults and all the difficulties of administering it, it appears from the returns made that a very substantial majority of those who voted, still thought the Act very beneficial in the interests of the temperance cause, and in the promotion of order and good government as affected by the restriction of the sale of intoxicating liquors. They felt that the Act was working very satisfactorily, and by a substantial majority they declined to repeal it. But in many portions of the Dominion the Act was repealed, and Parliament was again appealed to, to strengthen by direct legislation the hands of those who thought the liquor traffic an evil and only an evil. The question was brought up here by my hon. friend the Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) in 1884, in a resolution similar in terms to that at present before you. It contained a preamble in which were strongly set forth the evils of the liquor traffic, and the great injury it was to all the interests of the state, and for these reasons asked that this legislation should declare that the most effectual legislative remedy would lie in the enactment and enforcement of a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. My hon. friend on that occasion addressed the House in a speech which I have read frequently with interest and profit, and the power of which I think has lost nothing by time. I think every argument he stated there is as strong and as sound to-day as it was then; and I would commend the study of that speech to any hon. member who has not had the opportunity of perusing it. The resolution, however, was not accepted by the House; but it was amended by the addition of a proviso that this House is prepared, so soon as public opinion will sufficiently sustain stringent measures, to promote such legislation, so far as the same is within the competency of the Parliament of Canada. This resolution was adopted by a substantial majority. In 1888 the matter was again brought up, but the resolution did not reach a vote. In 1889 the matter was brought forward again by Mr. Jamieson, now a judge. On that occasion, unfortunately an amendment proposed by the present Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood) was tacked upon the resolution, and the resolution was not adopted, but was replaced by a resolution favourable to prohibition when the public opinion of the country was ripe for its reception and enforcement. The exact terms of the amendment of the hon. gentleman I shall read :

That in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes, when the public sentiment of the country is ripe for the reception and enforcement of such a measure of prohibition.

Consequently the House is in the position of having twice accepted substantially the principle of prohibition, subject to the proviso that public opinion should be strong enough to sustain its enforcement. In 1891 an amendment to a similar resolution was adopted, which resulted in the appointment of a royal commission, whose report I shall briefly refer to before I take my seat. In 1894 I had the honour of presenting a resolution similar to that now before you, but unfortunately it did not reach a vote. We have the House committed, at any rate, thus far on numerous occasions. It was admitted that the liquor traffic was a great evil, that it was the duty of this Parliament to deal with that evil, that it was in the power of Parliament to suppress that evil, that it was desirable that Parliament should act in that regard, but that public opinion was not sufficiently strong to support such a law, should such a law be enacted. Now, this proposition is one which appears very plausible and one which substantially is a correct proposition, but I contend it is one which, from the very nature of the case, can never be actually demonstrated. It will be useless for any number of hon. gentlemen to stand up in this House and express their confidence that such a public opinion does exist. It would be useless for any large number of those to whom the country looks for advice and suggestion, to whom the country looks with confidence in their various capacities, as jurists, legislators, legal advisers, or as men of eminence in any walk or profession, to declare that, in their opinion, such a public sentiment does exist, because after all that would simply be the opinion, better founded or more poorly founded, of a larger or smaller body of men. What we are to take, in settling a matter of this kind, is our knowledge, not only of the general trend of public sentiment, but of the character and the disposition of the people of the Dominion at large to obey and submit to the legislation of the country. Is this question asked in relation to other matters of legislation that come before us? I have used the argument before, and I use it again with confidence, because I have never seen it met—the argument used by our hon. friends on the other side of the House, when they defend the National Policy on the ground that it was demanded by public sentiment. Great numbers of our most intelligent men denied that statement. They asserted, on the contrary, that public sentiment did not demand the enactment of this protective policy. In fact, so confident was a great political party that public sentiment did not demand it, that they staked their political existence upon their opinion; and as the result of the election did not carry out their belief, the policy of protection was wrought into a legislative enactment. There was no appearance of any public sentiment demanding a protective policy. That policy was brought forward by the public men who favoured it, upon the assumption that it would be so manifestly beneficial in its effects, that its enactment would continually sustain them in power. If there was one evidence in favour of the National Policy, previous to its being brought forward as a legislative measure, we have a thousand evidences of public opinion in favour of a prohibitory liquor policy. I think the signs throughout the country pointing to the fact that the people generally favour a prohibitory liquor law, are stronger than those in favour of any other legislation ever brought forward. We have before us every session important subjects for legislation, and no one ever raises the question as to whether public opinion will uphold these measures, if made statutory. And no one raises the point, with regard to these matters, that if Parliament should enact the law desired, the country will oppose its being carried out. No one will venture to say that if we placed upon the statute-book a well adjusted law prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors, that law would not be as effectually supported as any other of a quasi criminal character ever enacted by the Canadian Parliament. There are other reasons for taking this view. Suppose there would be in any locality a strong opposition to the idea of such legislation. We know that the law would have on its side, not only the general weight of public favour, but in almost every locality it would have able and enthusiastic popular advocacy. The argument that public opinion is not strong enough to enable such a law to be carried out is not well founded. The law-abiding character of our people is sufficient guarantee that such a law would be effectively and successfully administered. We have furthermore positive evidence, which we have not always had in connection with public questions, that popular opinion is largely favourable to a measure of this kind. In the first place, there is the evidence given to us by the popular action which impressed itself upon the various local legislatures throughout the Dominion and compelled them to pass enactments looking to a vote of the people. Unless there was a strong public opinion pressing upon the various local legislatures they would not have taken the trouble and borne the expense involved in taking these plebiscites. The various local legislatures to which I shall allude, asked the people their opinion at the polls on this question removed from conflicting and personal questions as to the feasibility of a prohibitory law, and the results show that a strong degree of popular favour is behind that proposed law. In previous debates the numbers have been alluded to, but I think it would be proper to refer to them again in order to press upon the House the favour with which it has been received. In 1892 Manitoba declared in favour of a prohibitory law by a majority of 11,592. In the same year the province of Prince Edward Island declared by a majority of 7,226 in the same direction. The province of Ontario, by a popular majority—leaving out of account about 10,000 votes of women who, under the Dominion Franchise Act are not qualified to vote—of 71,527 declared that it also was in favour of the enactment of a prohibitory law. The province of Nova Scotia gave a large majority of 31,400 of the voters in that intelligent province in favour of prohibition. In New Brunswick a plebiscite was not taken; but so strongly was the legislature of that province convinced of the popular wish in that direction that, by a unanimous vote, it declared the sentiments of the members as representing their constituents in favour of the prohibitory liquor law. The only large province not included in this category is the province of Quebec. As to the exact state of public opinion there, we are not prepared, of course, to speak with confidence. But I think that no student of the social and political conditions in the province of Quebec can arise from the study of those conditions without being strongly convinced that a prohibitory liquor law would be received in that province with a great deal of favour. The people of Quebec, so far as my acquaintance with them goes, and from my acquaintance with their representatives here, are strongly in favour of the principle of temperance, many of them showing themselves warmly in favour of it so far as personal practice is concerned. I think that the taking of a plebiscite in the province of Quebec would result in a majority in favour of prohibition. At any rate we have fair reason from analogy for believing that they would not be behind their fellow-citizens in other provinces in favouring a measure so well calculated to contribute to the peace and prosperity of the whole province.

Now, Sir, viewing the matter as one covering a great deal of ground it would be manifestly impossible within reasonable limits to debate before this House all the grounds upon which a prohibitory law is urged. The evils of intemperance are admitted; they require no discussion or illustration here. In fact many who are not convinced that a prohibitory liquor law could be effectually operated and many who would, perhaps, dissent from the principle of prohibition on constitutional or other grounds, agree that intemperance is one of the great evils of the country, one that it is desirable by all reasonable and fair means to diminish. The social evils of intemperance are also admitted. The pauperism, disease and crime due to intemperance, the immense loss caused to the people of the municipalities throughout the country through the traffic in intoxicating liquors have been dwelt upon at too great length to require repetition here. The House placed it within the power of the Government to appoint a commission to ascertain, as far as possible, the extent of these evils and suggest some possible remedy. The result of that commission it will take a long time for the public to thoroughly consider and study. I believe, and I think, many strong temperance advocates believe, that the commission undertook a task covering too much ground, and that had it undertaken less it might have accomplished more. However, at great expense to the country the commission has accumulated, for the information of the people, an enormous mass of statistical and other matter. I must say that the sources of information that have been tapped by the various members in their advocacy or opposition to prohibitory legislation and have been made use of by these commissioners, are very numerous and very valuable. We have the result in a bulky volume which very few of us, possibly, have had time since its publication, to study at all thoroughly. I trust that the time is not distant when some careful analysis of this very bulky report may be prepared by some competent person. It covers too much ground to be studied as a whole in detail. It is not arranged so well as it might have been arranged for careful study. I think, however, on the whole, from a very cursory examination of it, that the commissioners have placed within our reach almost all the information which it is desirable to have at hand for the careful study of this question in all its bearings. Unfortunately, however, the commissioners have not been united with their recommendations. The portion of the report made by the dissenting commissioner is much more in line with the method and spirit of previous reports, and with the view of the House, than the report signed by the majority of the commission. In the absence of opportunity for careful collating the opinions of the majority of the commission, I desire to call the attention of the House to some of the more salient features of the report of the minority. And here I desire to pay a tribute to the patience and skill with which the Reverend Dr. McLeod has marshalled the facts brought before him in support of the proposition which I now desire to lay before the House. So complete are they that I shall offer no apology for quoting at some length from the observations he has made.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 56) respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Lachapelle.)

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—CAPE BRETON ELECTION.

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like, for the purpose of personal explanation, to refer to some words used by me in debate this afternoon, that you ruled were out of order. I think I should do more than withdraw the words. They were used in the heat of debate, and without intending any imputation whatever against the personal honour of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). As I say, I think I should do more than withdraw them, and that I should express my sincere regret to this House and to the member for Queen's for having used them. I do not wish, however, either the member for Queen's, or the House, to understand that I modify in the slightest degree, or wish to withdraw in any respect, the arguments I used, or the view I took of the particular statement he made. But I think there is quite enough acerbity already in the debates of the House this session, and certainly I do not wish to be the means of introducing any more.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD, DRUGS, &c. (HONEY.)

Mr. SPROULE moved third reading of Bill (No. 10) further to amend the Act respecting the Adulteration of Food, Drugs, and Agricultural Fertilizers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did this pass through committee of the House?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am sorry to say I was not present. Did the Minister of Justice give it a character?

Mr. FOSTER. We put it in very good shape.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is our last opportunity. I am strongly with the hon. gentleman, I may say, in desiring to punish the adulteration of food as severely as he can possibly wish, especially if the adulteration is of a character which would injure the health of the consumers of the food. I will go with him, or with the Minister of Justice, in making it a felony without benefit of clergy, I may say. Are there any penalties attached?

Mr. SPROULE. There are two classes of penalties, $5 the lowest, and $30 the highest, in one class; and $5 the lowest and $50 the highest in the other class.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is too little punishment of an offence against the health of Her Majesty's lieges.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this Bill is with reference to feeding sugar to bees. I do not suppose that the hon. gentleman would undertake to maintain that this is a Bill in respect to the adulteration of food which affects the health of the people of all.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The object, I understand, is simply to prevent a fraud being practised upon the purchaser; it is to punish the vendor or proprietors of bees for offering for sale an article purporting to be honey which is really not such. It seems to me that if the Bill had provided that an article of this sort might be put upon the market, but being marked and showing what its character was, the hon. gentleman would have gone as far as we ought to go. It seems to me that it is going a long way to say that an article which is harmless as an article of food, and which is used as an article of food, when sold under another name, should subject the party under all circumstances to penal consequences. I think it is right and proper to inflict a penalty where an article is put upon the market which purports to be what it is not, and by which the purchaser is induced to pay more than he otherwise would have paid, or induced to purchase when otherwise he would not have purchased. I think if we had compelled the party to indicate what the real character of the article was, we would have gone as far as we should go. For instance, if a party represents a horse to be a sound animal when it is not such, the law makes provision for punishing the party; but if a man relies upon his own judgment, there is no such protection afforded. I am inclined to think that without doing any substantial good in the form in which the Bill is now, you will subject the party, under certain circumstances, to severe penalty. You can regulate, and sometimes regulate with success, where you cannot prohibit with success at all.

Mr. McMULLEN. I understand that the Minister of Finance made a very important amendment to this Bill, and it has not been reprinted. Would the Minister state what was the amendment that he did make? I know he made a suggestion with regard to an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. The amendment I suggested was embodied in the Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But we have only got the Bill before us as originally introduced.

Mr. SPROULE. It was distributed as reprinted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It did not reach me.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION.

Mr. McMULLEN rose to move second reading of Bill (No. 19) to abolish the superannuation system as applied to the Civil Service of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER. I want to point out that this is almost an exact transcript of the Bill I ruled out of order last year. This Bill, however, has a different title. Last year it was "to amend the Superannuation Act"; this year the Bill is intitled "An Act to Abolish the Superannuation System as applied to the Civil Service of Canada." If the hon. gentleman proposes only to repeal the Superannuation Act, then it will not be out of order; but the Bill contains a provision that involves a charge on the public revenue, and such a Bill can only be introduced on the authority of the Crown by resolution.

Mr. McMULLEN. I eliminated the clause that affected the revenue of the country. This is not exactly a reprint of the Bill of last year. The clause to which you, Mr. Speaker, took exception last year has been altered, so that it now rests with the Governor in Council to say whether they will allow interests on the sum deducted from the civil salaries of the civil servants or not.

Mr. SPEAKER. I find that in this Bill the second clause reads:

2. Any person now in the permanent Civil Service of Canada and having contributed to the superannuation fund, shall be entitled to elect whether he shall retain his right to superannuation under the provisions of the said Act or abandon the same and accept in lieu thereof the provisions of this Act; but such choice shall be made by each civil servant now a contributor to the superannuation fund within twelve months after the passing of this Act.

Then the Bill goes on to say at clause 3:

Any person now in the Civil Service of Canada, or any person so appointed after the passing of this Act, shall, upon his retiring from the public service, or, if he dies when in the service, his legal representatives shall upon his death be entitled to the repayment of the whole amount of the deductions from his salary under the provisions of the said Act.

That would be clearly imposing a charge on the public revenue, which is not provided for under the Superannuation Act as it stands at present. It is here provided that any person in the Civil Service shall upon his retirement from the public service or upon his death when in the service, his legal representative should be entitled to the whole sums deducted from his salary under the provisions of this Bill. As I understand the Superannuation Act as it is at present, if a member of the Civil Service dies in the service his legal representatives are not entitled to anything. So it seems to me that this clause clearly imposes a charge on the public revenue.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I submit that this Bill simply regulates the moneys that belong to parties which moneys are in the hands of the Government. Take, for instance, clause 3. It provides:

Any person now in the Civil Service of Canada, or any person so appointed after the passing of this Act, shall, upon his retiring from the public service, or, if he dies when in the service, his legal representatives shall upon his death be entitled to the repayment of the whole amount of the deductions from his salary under the provisions of the said Act.

These are moneys held in trust, not moneys that belong to the Crown; they are not moneys which are the property of the Crown but they are the property of these individuals, and my hon. friend proposes by this Bill simply to determine in what direction these moneys which are held by the Crown in trust for certain persons shall be disposed of, which I think is a very different matter from imposing a charge upon the public revenue. If the moneys were the property of the Crown, then any charge made upon them would be a charge on the revenue of the Crown; but moneys held in trust by the Crown for individuals are not moneys over which bring the Bill within the rule to which you, Mr. Speaker, have referred. The same observation will apply to section 2. In both cases my hon. friend by his Bill is undertaking to deal with a residue of the salaries which the parties have earned, and which residue is still in the possession of the Government. That residue or salary is, I think, open to any hon. member to deal with or submit a measure regarding it. It stands in a wholly different position from that of any charge on the public revenue.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not at all coincide with the proposition laid down by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). In my opinion when these moneys are paid into the Receiver General they become part of the moneys of the Crown just as much as any other moneys paid into the Receiver General, and they can only be paid out under the provisions of the Act as it now stands on the statute-book to such persons as are retired from the Civil Service under the Superannuation Act. But this Bill proposes that these moneys shall be paid to any servant upon his retiring from the public service, and there shall be paid the whole amount of the deductions from his salary—which has been paid into the Receiver General. It also provides—and this is something not contemplated under the present Superannuation Act—that the moneys paid by the civil servants into the public revenue shall be repaid to his legal representatives. I am clearly of the opinion that if this Bill proposes to go further than to repeal the Superannuation Act it is out of order,—at all events those provisions to which I have referred.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But those provisions could be struck out.

Mr. SPEAKER. No doubt.

Mr. FOSTER. They should be struck out before the Bill is proceeded with.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no objection to bring the Bill within the power of this Parliament, for, of course, I have no desire to legislate beyond the powers of the House. This is the second year I have introduced the Bill for the purpose of remedying an evil, which is a growing one, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will proceed to point out my objections to the present Superannuation Act, and the objectionable clauses in my Bill can be eliminated when we go into committee on it. There are some provisions that are certainly within the competency of any private member to move, and with these I have a right to deal.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not seem to me to be practicable for the House to assent to the procedure proposed. If we did so, there would be practically no bar to an hon. member introducing any Bill. An hon. member could introduce a Bill, with the design that he would strike out the clauses which affect the revenue if objection were taken. The hon. gentleman could make the plea: well, I am quite willing to forego those clauses when we come to committee. In this way he could proceed with his Bill. It seems to me that regular and orderly proceeding will be entirely disobeyed if an hon. gentleman is allowed to introduce a Bill of which objectionable clauses form a generic part, and proceed and afterwards state that he will be willing to throw those clauses to the wind when the Bill goes into committee. I should like to have your ruling on this point, and it seems to me that such a proceeding would cause great disarrangement of business.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes; still I do not think it is out of order to introduce a Bill because it contains objectionable clauses, provided it contains clauses that are within the scope of a private member. If this Bill proposes simply to abolish the present Superannuation Act and makes no further provision, it will be in order, and the hon. gentleman might proceed with the second reading. If he proposes to go beyond that, the Bill will not be in order. I point out that the first clause makes this provision:

1. Notwithstanding anything therein or in any other Act contained, so much of the "Civil Service Superannuation Act" chapter eighteen of the Revised Statutes, as provides for the granting of a superannuation allowance or of a gratuity, shall not apply to any person now in the Civil Service of Canada, or appointed after the passing of this Act to a permanent position in any branch of the public service of Canada.

If the hon. gentleman had stopped there, the clause would have been perfectly in order, but he goes beyond that and says:

And except as hereinafter provided by this Act.

So that it seems to me unless the latter part of this clause is struck out, the whole Bill is out of order.

Mr. McMULLEN. If I cannot have all the provisions of the Bill, I am quite willing to accept that portion of it which it is within the power of an humble member of this House to introduce. I am ready to accept such of the provisions of the Bill as the House will allow me, and I shall proceed to point out why I consider it prudent that this Bill should pass. Since it has been my privilege to occupy a seat in this House, I have given considerable attention to the question of superannuation. I have shown that from the inception of this Act down to the present time, it has entailed a very great loss upon the country. For the first few years, after the adoption of the Act, the contributions of the civil servants made up for more than the amount given to those who were superannuated. But, three years after the Act had been in existence, it was amended by Sir Leonard Tilley, and 50 per cent of the sums deducted from the salary of civil servants, was struck off, so that afterwards the contributors paid only one-half what they paid for the first three years. From that time up to the present, the superannuation system has become an ever-increasing drain upon the resources of this country. Had the Act remained as it was when first passed, and had it been honestly and economically administered, there would be now in the Dominion treasury, a considerable sum to the credit of the superannuation fund. But, unfortunately, hon. gentlemen opposite found it to be a very convenient means of removing from office, civil servants who were in many cases in the prime of life, not because they were inefficient, not because they were in bad health and unable to perform the duties, but simply because the Government wanted their position for relatives or friends. We know that the Superannuation Act has been used for political purposes, and as a result of this, we have on the superannuation list to-day, 540 retired civil servants, who are drawing $265,000 a year. The contributions to the superannuation fund amount to from $63,- 000 to $65,000 a year, so that the country is actually losing about $200,000 a year by the operation of this Act.

Now, Sir, I have no feeling of hostility whatever to the civil servants of this country. I do not for a moment say but that we have, in a great many cases, in fact, in the majority of cases, a very efficient civil service staff, but I do say that I believe that many of those men who are now walking our streets in perfect health, and thoroughly capable of performing the duties assigned to them when they were in the service, are so relieved, not because they were in bad health, but because the Government wanted to put others in their places. Not only has the Superannuation Act been abused in that respect, but it has been abused in other ways. There is a provision in the Act that the Government can grant a gratuity to any civil servant on retiring from office. I have gone carefully over the Return laid on the Table of the House recently, in order to find out to what extent the money of the people of this country had been given away under the operation of this clause 91 of the Act. Since 1880, the Government have granted in gratuities, the sum of $48,636.31. A civil servant who had put in a few years in the service, and who possibly was discovered to be incompetent, got a gratuity on retiring. That civil servant was probably placed in office by some member of Parliament, or by some member of the Cabinet in the hope that he might be able to work out a living in some department, but, being found totally and absolutely incapable of discharging the duties, the Government not only paid the salary they agreed to pay him, but they also gave him a gratuity when he left. On the 1st of January, 1895, we had 539 superannuated officers, and of that number, the present Government, since last election, superannuated no less than 244. In five years they superannuated 244 officials, and of that number, thirty-two have died, leaving 212 at present on the superannuation list who have been superannuated by the Government since last elections. Since the Conservative Government took office, in 1879, they superannuated 494 clerks out of the 539, so that there is to-day only 45 on the list who were superannuated by all previous Governments. Forty-eight clerks per year have, on an average, been superannuated by the Conservative Government since 1891.

Now, there is another feature of the Superannuation Act that I wish to draw the attention of the House to. Under the provisions of the Act, where any person is possessed of technical knowledge, the Government has power to add to his years of service. I can easily conceive a case where a man engaged to perform some very important duty, might possibly be possessed of certain technical knowledge, and during the time he was acquiring it, of course he was growing in years. Such an one would not be able to serve the number of years that would entitle him to draw the maximum superannuation of thirty-five fiftieths of his salary, and, under these circumstances, the Government is empowered to add a certain number of years to his service. Sir, I find that this provision of the Act has been grossly abused. I hold in my hand a list of the names of those who have had years added to their term of service. Those persons whose names I shall read to the House have yearly drawn sums in excess of what the Act provides for, and they are enabled to do this on account of a term of years being added to their service, presumably because they were possessed of some particular technical knowledge.

All these names I have mentioned are the names of parties who were superannuated by hon. gentlemen opposite and had years added to their term. These people have drawn $92,844 of the public money, to one cent of which they were not entitled. I should like the Finance Minister to tell me on what principle Mr. Lamothe, the postmaster of Montreal, who had a salary of $4,000 a year and had enjoyed his office for sixteen and a half years, was given an addition to his term of service of eight and a half years. What particular technical knowledge had he that entitled him to this addition? None whatever. The only reason there was for making this addition to his salary was this: Mr. Dansereau, the very prominent and bosom friend of Mr. Chapleau, who is now Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec, wanted to get the position of postmaster of Montreal. The incumbent was, I presume, in perfect health and vigour and did not want to retire; but no doubt the inducement was held out to him that an addition would be made to his term of service. The Government added eight and a half years to his term, and in this way increased his annual grant $880. This gave him 25-50 of his salary as his retiring allowance, namely, $2,000 as long as he lives. Mr. Dansereau now has the office at $4,000 a year. That rule will apply to every one of the cases I have cited with scarcely an exception. In almost every case, years have been added, as an inducement to these men to quietly and peaceably retire, in order that their positions might be given to particular friends of the Government or members of Parliament. The result of this prostitution of the Superannuation Act has been that the country has lost hundreds of thousands of dollars. We have lost $2,500,000 altogether. But over and above what we would have been called to pay strictly according to the Act, if no additions had been made to the superannuations, we have lost hundreds of thousands of dollars by these additions to terms of service. Last year I asked for a return of the operations of this Act, from its inception down to the present. The hon. Minister of Finance loaded down that return by an amendment which he proposed himself. That amendment was proposed no doubt, for the purpose of preventing that return coming down last year. At least it could not be got down in time last session, and this year it has been laid on the Table. No doubt it has cost considerable trouble to produce this return; and it is well, now that we have it, that we should make use of it by ascertaining how far the system of superannuation has been abused. Had it not been abused, the system would not be in the unfortunate position in which it is. As the case stands, our people have been called upon to contribute, out of their hard-earned means, a large sum for the retirement of a considerable number of superannuated officers which they would not have had to contribute, if the Act had not been abused in the way I have been pointing out, with the results I have indicated.

I shall give some cases of those who have been superannuated under the Act, to show that the statement I presented to the House last year was about correct.

I may say, with regard to Charles Thibault, that he was superannuated in violation of the terms of the Superannuation Act, because he only served nine years, and no man is entitled to a superannuation allowance unless he has served ten years. The Government did not even add the year to his time of service to make his superannuation legal. For the satisfaction of the hon. Finance Minister, I am glad to say that I have reached the end of the first part of my speech and am quite willing to adjourn and give the balance at another time. But before doing so, I want to draw to the hon. Minister's attention this fact, that every one of those names are the names of parties who have been superannuated by hon. gentlemen opposite. The present Government, since 1880, are responsible for every name on the list, with the exception of forty-eight who were superannuated, not by the Mackenzie Government, but by the Administration which preceded Mr. Mackenzie's. Only two in the whole list were retired by the Mackenzie Government, so that hon. gentlemen opposite stand responsible for all the rest. I have presented these cases to the House in order to show that the Act has been positively abused. It has been used in a way to make openings for men, who no doubt were pressing their services on hon. gentlemen opposite, and for whom there was no possibility of providing comfortable situations with lucrative salaries except by creating vacancies through this abuse of the Superannuation Act.

Mr. FOSTER. I see that my hon. friend's vitality is somewhat diminished, and perhaps it would be well to move the adjournment of the debate. It is my desire to have the hon. gentleman in the best trim for his work.

Mr. DEVLIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of the Interior for the year 1895 laid on the Table.—(Mr. Daly.)

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We were promised the balance of the Auditor General's Report to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. All I can do is to bring down the report as soon as the Auditor General has completed it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The law declares that on the 31st of January and not later we are to have the Auditor General's Report. The Auditor General or the hon. gentleman is breaking the law.

Mr. FOSTER. It must be the Auditor General.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is an accomplice before the fact. He did not give the Auditor General the means to do his work.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 13th February, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MONTREAL HARBOUR.

Mr. McSHANE asked :

1. Has not the Government, in the interests of shipping, expended very large sums of money on harbours and harbour works of one kind and another in ports and places all over the Dominion ?

2. At the port of Quebec do not the Government outlays, in principal and interest, amount to about $5,000,000, in respect of the Princess Louise Basin, and to about $1,000,000 in respect of the Lévis Graving Dock ?

3. Is it not true, as regard the port of Montreal, that no Government money has been expended on the harbour proper, all responsibility for construction and maintenance in connection therewith having been laid on the Board of Harbour Commissioners without financial aid from the Government or Parliament ?

4. Is it not true that the appropriation made by Government to reimburse the Montreal Harbour Board for their expenditures prior to 1860, in connection with the twenty feet channel through Lake St. Peter, proved insufficient by the sum of $295,471.10, and that in connection with the Nearer Channel improvements, the Government exacted from the Harbour Board interest on expenditure during the construction of the works, which levies amounted in the aggregate to the sum of $794,027.95, so that in effect the Government is at present in pocket of harbour moneys to the extent of over a million dollars ?

5. Is it the intention of the Government to place in the Supplementary Estimates a sum sufficient to reimburse the Montreal Harbour Board for this outlay of theirs in connection with the Lake St. Peter channel ?

6. Is it the intention of the Government to place the Montreal Harbour on the same financial footing as other harbours are placed throughout the Dominion ?

Mr. OUIMET. The answer to the first question is "Yes." The answer to the second question is as follows:—No direct Government outlays were made in connection with the harbour works at Quebec, but loans of sums authorized by Parliament were made from time to time to the Quebec

Harbour Commissioners, amounting to $3,975,000. As regards the Lévis Graving Dock, it is Government property, and the total cost was $910,000. The answer to the third question is "Yes." In answer to the fourth question: The question itself is a pretty fair statement of the contention of the Montreal Harbour Board. When the settlement took place in 1888, this was not recognized in the settlement, and has been a standing claim since. As to the fifth and sixth questions: They will be answered later on when the Supplementary Estimates are brought down.

WHITEHEAD CANAL, GUYSBORO', N.S.

Mr. FRASER asked :

1. Does the Government propose finishing the Whitehead Canal, in the county of Guysboro', for which fifteen hundred dollars have been spent already during the present year? Will an amount sufficient for that purpose be included in the Supplementary Estimates?

2. Have the Government sent an engineer during the past year to make surveys at St. Francis Harbour, in the county of Guysboro'? If so, what was his name? Has he given in his report? What amount will be required to complete the proposed work? Will a sum sufficient to complete the work be included in the Supplementary Estimates?

Mr. OUMET. The answer to the first question cannot be given now. It will be given later on when the Supplementary Estimates are before the House. As to the second question the answer is: Instructions were sent to Mr. Milledge, and survey made by Mr. Bernascone, one of his assistants. The chief engineer submitted, on the 16th January last, a report in which he states that a sum of $1,300 will be required to do the necessary work, which consists in deepening the channel and protecting the base of the bank with crib-work. The Supplementary Estimates will answer the latter part of the question.

SOREL ILLICIT WHISKY CASE.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

Whether Frédéric Lahaise, of Sorel, was recently charged before Magistrate Charles Dorion, with unlawfully manufacturing whisky? If so, did his trial take place, and what was the verdict? Were other complaints entered against other persons in Sorel, in relation to the same offence, and as accomplices of the said Lahaise? If so, what has been the result?

Mr. PRIOR. Frédéric Lahaise was convicted of running a still in a cellar below the Brunswick Hotel, Sorel. He was fined $100 and sentenced to one month in jail, and a further month, if the fine is not paid. Copy of judgment and evidence has been written for in order to know what justification exists for further prosecutions.

LONDON CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. FORBES asked :

1. Have any charges of dereliction of duty or other nature been made to, or received by, the department during the years 1895 or 1896 against any official or officials of the London Custom-house?

2. If any, what was the nature of such charges?

3. Against whom made?

4. By whom made or from whom received?

5. By whom investigated?

6. Were such charges proved or disproved?

7. What was the decision of the department regarding such charges?

Mr. WOOD. I beg to say, in answer to the question, that no such charges have been made.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day, I would again call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact, that we are now in the seventh week of the session, and the Public Accounts Committee has not held one single meeting, except for the purpose of organization. It may be correct enough to say that the Auditor General's Report is not down in full; but there is quite enough down to enable papers to be moved for; and I think it is not treating that important committee properly not to summon it before this time. While on my feet, I may as well point out to the Minister of Finance that it is very desirable that some member of the Government should be present at the meetings of important committees like the Banking and Commerce Committee. I did not see one there to-day. Questions arise there on which the committee ought to be instructed as to what the policy of the Government is. Although I cannot allude to it further, we had such a question up to-day, and we had no luminary on the Government side to guide or advise us. We were left to our own discretion entirely. I do not think that should be.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad my hon. friend thinks that Ministers are necessary for advice on that important committee. He is quite right, I have no doubt, and some Minister is generally in attendance. I myself was very busy this morning, and was unable to be present. However, that matter will not be lost sight of. With reference to the Public Accounts Committee, it is organized, and the chairman will, I suppose, take immediate steps to summon a meeting. I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that a part of the Auditor General's Report will be sufficient in order to commence work on the Public Accounts Committee. I hope he will be of the same opinion when we come to the Committee of Supply.

IMPORTS FROM AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) I gave notice to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) that I would like to put a question to him, and as it is a matter of importance, I would like to get an answer as soon as possible:

What are the various kinds of articles imported into British Columbia from Australia and New Zealand since the 1st of July, 1895? What are the names, quantities and values of the various articles imported?

The hon. gentleman may be able to give me the information now.

Mr. IVES. I am not able to give the information at the moment; but I gave orders this morning to have it prepared, because the hon. gentleman spoke to me last night, and I think by the first of the week I shall be able to give him the information.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. CASEY. I beg again to call the attention of the leader of the House to his promise of a very early return to the order of the House for correspondence with the High Commissioner at London, who is also now Secretary of State, in regard to his leaving London and coming to Canada on the last occasion, his leave of absence, and so on. It is a very small return: it cannot comprise more than two or three documents. I also wish to inquire about a return of the correspondence with the High Commissioner in regard to his duties and his appointment, which has not already been laid before the House. I reminded the hon. gentleman once before of those returns, and he promised to have them at a very early date.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to inform my hon. friend that I am writing a note now in reference to them.

Mr. CASEY. And when does the hon. gentleman expect to get them?

Mr. FOSTER. As soon as I can.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue the debate on the Budget, I feel that there is a difficult task before me. However, I will endeavour to use my strength carefully, so that I may be able to continue the discussion for some time. In listening to the debate for the past two weeks, I have arrived at the conclusion that the hon. members who support the Government are in doubt as to what the Liberal policy in regard to the trade question is. They have said that we have no consistent policy. They say sometimes that we are in favour of continental free trade, and at other times that we are in favour of free trade as we find it in England. It is evident that in reference to this question a great deal of ignorance prevails that should not prevail, since our policy has been so definitely stated. In 1893 one of the largest and most influential conventions that ever met in Canada met in the city of Ottawa for the purpose of considering the condition of this country and formulating a policy which, in the opinion of the delegates, would be in the interests of Canada. After sitting and meditating no less than two or three days on this question, the convention formulated a policy. That policy was put in plain English, and has been placed before the people of this country. So that there need not be any difficulty or doubt as to what the real policy of the Liberal party is. I object, Mr. Speaker, to the party in opposition to us formulating a policy for the Liberal party. They are at liberty, so far as I am concerned, to formulate a policy of their own, and to put their own construction upon it. But I, as a humble member of the Liberal party, object very strenuously to their formulating a policy for us, and putting their own construction upon it. We believe, from the policy which they have adopted for many years, and from their preconceived Tory ideas, that they are not exactly in a position to lay down the broad policy that will exactly suit the present circumstances of this country; and I am of opinion that the sooner the Liberal party are in power, the better it will be for the general interests of the country. In this day, as in all other days, Liberal views are broader and sounder on trade and other national questions than the views entertained by the Liberal-Conservative party. Therefore, you might expect that our policy would be broader and more in the interests of Canada than any policy our opponents have adopted. Now, in order that there may be no mistake on this matter, I want to place on record the first plank of the Liberal policy, and then I will show you that it is based upon truth:

We, the Liberal party of Canada, in convention assembled, declare:—

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service;

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few;

It has checked immigration;

It has caused great loss of population;

It has impeded commerce;

It has discriminated against Great Britain.

In these and many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people;

That to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government ;

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We believe that the results of the protective system have grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country, in the light of experience, is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

The issue between the two political parties on this question is now clearly defined.

The Government themselves admit the failure of their fiscal policy, and now profess their willingness to make some changes ; but they say that such changes must be based only on the principle of protection.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

Now, that plank of the Liberal policy is very plain, definite and distinct from the policy enunciated by the Liberal-Conservative party, and, therefore, there is a line of demarcation between the two, clear and distinct. We accept the issue, and propose to demand the support of the people on the ground of our policy. The Liberal party condemn the principle of protection, as you will see, Mr. Speaker, from what I have read, as an unsound principle, unjust to the great majority of the people.

Having discussed the evils of protection in various ways during the last number of years, and having shown from actual facts and conditions that this policy is unsound in principle, unjust in practice, and deleterious to the best interests of this country, I will, instead of going into the various arguments which I formerly used, give you the conclusions at which I have arrived after a complete investigation into the whole question. This is one of the conclusions at which I have arrived, and I shall give it in the language of one of the ablest statesmen of the century :

That protection is a legal robbery, and not a whit more respectable or justifiable because the state is the culprit.

I think when we look over the records of this country, when we see the operations of the protective principle during the last seventeen years, we must, if we put aside our political bias and reason out the question as candid, intelligent men, come to the conclusion to endorse this statement.

My second conclusion is as follows :—

Protection is a promise given by the Government to dear production to shield it against the competition of cheap productions.

My third conclusion is this :

Protection is a power given to dear production to exact from the consumer a price which he would not otherwise pay.

My fourth conclusion is as follows :—

Protection shields the products of labour from competition on equal terms, and puts the labour itself upon the free list.

It is evident to everybody that however much you can protect the products of labour there has been no demand in this country for the protection of labour itself. While marts are full of men perhaps crying at the pores for labour, we are inviting men from other parts of the world to come in and compete in the labour market with our own people, and this we are doing, as part of our policy at the very time we are preventing the products of labour in outside countries from coming in to compete with the products of labour in this country. We are giving protection to the manufacturer and withholding it from the workingman.

Another conclusion at which I have arrived is that protection protects only from 10 to 20 per cent of the people, and the balance are compelled to sell their products and labour in the competitive markets of the world, and while they are compelled to do that, they are compelled to buy the products which they need for their own use in the dear protected markets at home.

Another conclusion at which I have arrived is this :

Protection renders millions of money non-productive which is now being used in the process of distribution.

Let me illustrate this. Suppose one man undertook to distribute all the coal oil which came from abroad. The value last year was $437,000 and the duty $430,000. You see he would require nearly $900,000 to purchase the product which he was distributing. Then he would require some working capital. Now, if there were no duty, all he would require would be $437,000 to pay for the oil and the other $430,000, which now goes in duty, would be let loose for employment in other industries of the country. That $430,000, which under our protective system, must be thus used in the distribution of coal oil, might be used for the purpose of building up manufacturing industries in the various centres and giving employment to a large number of men. Now, under our policy of protection, there is no more work done with the $900,000 capital, than there would be with the $437,000 capital without protection, because in the one case it requires just as many men to distribute the 6,000,000 gallons of oil as in the other. So that you see there is a large waste of capital. If you multiply that by all the businesses in the country, you will find that there are hundreds of millions of money now wrapped up in the distribution of products required by the people, which could be set free and invested in other sources, giving employment to a large number of hands and stimulating our industries.

Another conclusion at which I have arrived is this :

Protection prevents people from investing their capital in the way they consider most profitable to themselves, and, therefore, it is an interference in the opinion of most able writers, with the most sacred rights of the citizens of any country.

Again, protection is the parent of combines, trusts, guilds and monopolies. So much so in Canada, that both parties combined some years ago to pass an Act to prevent, if possible, those combines, guilds and monopolies from fleecing the people. If this protective system has such an effect, we should at least modify it to suit the necessities and wants of the country and establish a system by which that protection would be withdrawn when necessary in order to prevent combines among manufacturing industries.

Another conclusion at which I have arrived, after investigation, is this :

Protection enables manufacturers, by the means of combines, to unload a glutted market by selling what they unload in the competitive markets of the world, it may at a loss or a lesser profit than they obtain in the protected home market, and then they recoup themselves by selling at heavier prices to the people who consume the goods manufactured at home, and who give them protection.

This was the position which the cotton combines took two or three years ago. You will remember, Sir, that the Canadian market became glutted with cotton goods. And the manufacturers of cottons sent to Japan and China no less than a quarter of a million dollars worth of cotton, thus unloading the Canadian market ; and, having accomplished that, they charged 15 per cent more for Canadian cottons sold to Canadian people, thus making the Canadian people pay not only a reasonable profit on what they used, but enough to recoup the manufactures for the loss sustained in the foreign market. Those who support the Liberal-Conservative party most strongly were enabled to fleece people in this fashion.

Another conclusion at which I arrive is :

Protection compels the farmer to furnish the banquet for the protected manufacturing class ; and, when the banquet is ready, the farmer is allowed to wait upon the table, and all that he receives for his work is the smell of the viands.

This is the only dividend that I can find, after full investigation, to be actually received by the farmers. It is a poor dividend for the money which they contribute to help make rich the manufacturers engaged in protected industries in Canada. There is another conclusion at which I arrive :

Protection centralizes the capital of the country, it draws a capital away from the rural districts and centralizes it in the manufacturing districts.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

In the United States the nine north-eastern states own 25 per cent of the value of the entire United States ; and it is estimated that 25,000 individuals in the United States actually own one-half the value of the entire country. There is thus the tendency to build up a privileged ruling class at the expense of the toiling masses. There is another conclusion at which I arrive—that Protection is always introduced to raise revenue during depression and hard times, because it is found that the popular mind under these conditions can be made to believe a lie and a fraud which, in more prosperous times, it could not be brought to believe.

Another conclusion is that the manufacturers, feeling the power and influence that the Government have given them, take the Government by the throat, just as the manufacturers of this country took the Government by the throat, and present to them the alternative of political death or continued protection. In reality we may say that the country reaches a condition in which the manufacturers acquire such tremendous influence and power that they control the government. This is exemplified in the history of this country. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that last year the manufacturers' association had a large meeting in the city of Toronto and congratulated the members upon the power and influence they had with the Government. They went so far as to say in the report of the secretary that the words that were employed by the association to describe what they wanted were the very words employed by the Finance Minister to carry out their wishes. More. They went so far as to congratulate themselves upon their success and prosperity as manufacturers, under the benign influence, as they called it, of the National Policy. Need you wonder that, having the Government, as they believe, by the throat they demand the continuance of the protective policy which fills their pockets at the expense of the people ?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to another conclusion :

Protection tends to decrease the price of farm lands, as it prevents the farmer from making the most of his product by compelling him to sell in the competitive markets of the world, and buy in the protected market of Canada.

I have gone to the trouble of working out a calculation based upon official documents to prove the truth of one paragraph in this item of the Liberal policy. The figures I shall give show very distinctly the effect of this policy on the farm lands of the province of Ontario. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the promoters of the National Policy promised that that policy would increase the price of real estate by increasing the prosperity of the farmers. The greater the prosperity of the farmers, they said, the greater the demand for farms, and consequently the higher the price for them. Many of the farmers of the country believed these promises, I am sorry to say, and, in 1878, they forsook their former allegiance and supported the Liberal-Conservative party in the election, returning that party to power, to the sorrow and regret of the country to-day. It may be said that the value of farm lands in England and in other countries diminished, and, therefore, the National Policy is not responsible for the depreciation of farm values in Canada. There may be a good deal of force in that contention. That is, virtually the same argument that we used in 1878. But it was denied then by our opponents, who maintained that they could increase the value of the land by introducing this policy. The leaders of the Liberal-Conservative party promised that the home market would be so increased that the demand would raise the prices, and, the products being increased in value, the land behind the products would also be increased in value. Let me point out how their prophecies signally failed. Many isolated instances might be given of lands selling since the inauguration of the National Policy at a much lower price than before that time. But, instead of confining myself to isolated sales, I shall base my calculations upon the total figures in official documents, which will bring forcibly before the House the fact of the reduction in value of farm properties under the National Policy. I take as a basis of calculation, the reports of the Bureau of Industries for 1883 and 1894. These are official documents published by the legislature of Ontario. I find that the value of farm lands in 1883 was, in round numbers, $655,000,000. In 1894 the value of farm lands was $587,246,000. This was a reduction from 1883 to 1894 of $67,754,000. But there are other things that must be considered in making the calculation. Between 1883 and 1894 land to the extent of 1,760,000 acres was cleared in Ontario. At the ordinary price for clearing land of $20 per acre, and you have a total of $35,200,000, that should have been added to the value of lands in 1883. Again, in 1883, there were 213,000 farmers in Ontario, and in 1894 there were 243,000, an increase of 30,000 farmers. It may be said that this increase shows the growing prosperity of the country. You know, Mr. Speaker, that a number of our farmers went into the Rainy River settlement, the Port Arthur district and Bruce Mines and Algoma. In that way they have taken up Government lands which were in the hands of the Government, previous to 1883, but they passed since that time into the hands of those farmers, and should be added to the value of the lands given in 1883. Now, if we take all these three items together, we find that $132,954,000 indicates the amount of the depreciation of farm property in the province of Ontario during those ten years.

Now, if the National Policy had any power whatever to do what they promised it would do, we should not have this state of matters to-day. In addition to this, I could reasonably add several other items of much importance. There has been permanent improvement made upon farms during the last eleven years, by the removal of stone, in many cases, by the clearing up of swamp lands, by building better fences, by under-draining and open draining, which has added millions more, so that in reality you may say that the real depreciation in the value of the lands, has been at least $150,000,000, or about 25 per cent of the whole value of lands in 1883. As I said before, we are told to-day that the National Policy is in no way responsible for this. If not, I am sure the Government and their supporters owe an apology to this country. They know very well that they placed this prospect before the country in 1877-78, and impressed upon the farmers that it would increase their land values. Now, they may deny that, because they said it seventeen years since, and they may think that I cannot put my finger upon any speech made by their friends which will bring back to them the remembrance of the promises they made. I am going to quote from a speech delivered by the late Sir John A. Macdonald, the great leader of the Conservative party, a speech delivered in the amphitheatre of St. James Street, Toronto, in 1878. The hon. gentleman then spoke as follows:—

If you desire this country to prosper ; if you desire this country to rise out of the slough of despond in which it has sunk ; if you desire to see manufactures rise ; if you desire to see labour employed ; if you desire the emigration of our young men stopped ; if you desire to bring back those who have emigrated ; if you desire to see the value of land rise ; if you desire prosperity, you will support the National Policy.

Now, here is a series of promises that were made by the leader of the party, by the father of the National Policy, who went before the people of this country, in many places, and announced such a doctrine as contained in these few sentences I have quoted from his speech. We were told that not only the land would rise in value, but that the price of the products of the farmer would be increased. The home market was dwelt much upon. The farmers were led to believe that when they had the home market, when those smoke stacks would be so numerous in the different towns and villages throughout the country—which I have not, as yet, seen—they could sell their eggs, their butter, their cheese, and a hundred and one other articles, near at home, and realize a higher price for them than they could realize in any foreign market, and therefore, the higher prices coming to the farmer would be a compensation, to a large extent, for what he would pay in taxes to support the manufacturing industries of the country. The present Minister of Railways and Canals made a speech in this chamber in 1878, as reported in "Hansard," page 706. He said :

The farmers would benefit from the adoption of a protective system, owing to the increase in the price of commodities they have to sell that this policy would certainly bring about.

Now, here is a promise made by one of the Ministers that the products of the farm would be increased in value under the National Policy, and I have also quoted you the promise made by the father of the National Policy that the price of lands would rise, and that our people would be kept at home, about which I intend to speak further on. Now, were those prices kept up? That is a reasonable question to put. Let me give you a few figures. They are official, because they are taken from the statistical record of 1894. They compare the price of several articles in 1883 and in 1895, as exported from the city of Montreal :

Horses.....	$125 45	$108 25
Sheep.....	4 50	3 57
Potatoes.....	0 43 per bush	0 36 per bush
Barley.....	0 71 do	0 44 do
Oats.....	0 45 do	0 38 do
Oatmeal.....	4 19 per brl.	3 52 per brl.
Bacon.....	0 11 7 per lb.	0 10 5 per lb.
Butter.....	0 21 do	0 19 1/2 do
Cheese.....	0 11 1/2 do	0 10 do
Wheat.....	1 02 per bush	0 66 per bush
Eggs.....	0 16 3/4 per doz.	0 13 3/4 per doz.
Hams.....	0 12 per lb.	0 10 1/2 per lb.

Now, if a farmer sold one of each denomination of these articles I have mentioned, he would realize, by the export price of 1895, $19.67 1-10 less than he would for the same articles in 1883. So you see that the promise made by the Minister of Railways and Canals was made without any knowledge, or if he had knowledge, then he made it without due consideration as to the effect the National Policy might have. A farmer with an ordinary crop of the value, say, of $700, under the latter prices, would realize $100 less than he would in 1883, eleven years before, although the National Policy has been extolled from time to time as largely increasing the prices to the farmer. But we are now told that the Government cannot increase the prices. I have heard an hon. gentlemen opposite discussing this question upon a public platform, when he said it was really absurd for any person to suppose that the Government could increase the prices, that the prices were fixed largely by the demand in the markets in which we sold, and as those markets were foreign markets, beyond our control, neither he nor the Government could by any possibility increase those prices. That was the position taken by the Liberal party in 1878, and every one of them who was old enough to take any part in the contest at that time, will remember, if he was in public life then, that the leaders of the Conservative party told the farmers directly that the Government had power, by act of Parliament, to increase the prosperity of the people. Sir Charles Tupper, speaking on this question in this House in 1878, as reported in "Hansard," page 451, said :

The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) ought to know, that, if governments are good for anything, they are good to increase the prosperity of the country by Acts of Parliament.

If that be so, the present Government has committed a great crime by permitting the present depression to come over the country and to continue so long, casting its dark shade over the Dominion. But it is well known that the country has been struggling for years under financial depression. Indeed no later than last session the Minister of Railways in an eloquent speech delivered in this House, stated that the country was in a splendid condition, that its financial condition was first-class, that the people were prosperous from one ocean to the other, that not a murmur was heard from any class in regard to depression. And one method the hon. gentleman took to show how prosperous the people were was to state the amount of money they had deposited in the savings banks and other banks of Canada. The hon. gentleman said that the people had put their money in the banks—and the hon. gentleman enumerated the number of millions that the people had deposited; and then he boldly challenged any hon. member to deny the soundness of the position he had taken. The hon. member for St. John, speaking in this House, made the same statement, that the deposits in the banks of Canada afforded an indication of prosperity. I always thought it was the contrary. I think the Conservatives in 1878 thought it was the contrary. The leaders of the Conservative party in those days spoke exactly opposite to what the leaders of that party are speaking now. They were in the habit of going on public platforms and saying something like this: When you find the people placing money in the banks and realizing only 3 and 4 per cent, it indicates that the sources of investment are being dried up, that the manufacturing industries are languishing, that building operations are not going forward, because if those industries are prospering, then the money was drawn out of the banks and placed in those different investments. That was the argument used generally by the Conservatives in 1878. In that year the hon. member for South Lanark spoke on the question. He was then called John G. Haggart; he is now the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. Here is what he said, when speaking in this House that year, as reported in "Hansard" at page 703 :

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) had alluded to the large amount of money in the banks as proof that the country was now prosperous. But, on the contrary, that was always evidence of depression in commerce and in manufactures. When commerce was active and manufactures were prospering, the people did not deposit their moneys in the banks, but invested them in manufacturing and other industries. Consequently, the argument of the hon. gentleman was true in a sense opposite to what he intended.

This was the contention made in 1878 by one of the Ministers of the Crown to-day, but last year that hon. gentleman made a statement entirely the opposite. How is it possible to keep these men in line and make them consistent in their arguments? It is well known by every person who has given this subject consideration that when there are large deposits in the banks at 3 per cent, that fact is an indication that outside investments have dried up, and the people have put their money in the banks because they have no use for it outside. It is impossible to keep hon. gentlemen opposite along the line of consistent argument: political exigencies interfere and make them act in a ridiculous manner in the eyes of the country, arguing one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow.

There is another charge made by the Liberal party against the policy of the Liberal-Conservatives. As the House will remember when I read from the speech delivered by Sir John Macdonald in 1878, he said that those who would support the National Policy and were prepared to put it in operation would prevent the people going to a foreign land to find employment which their own country denied them, and that if they wish to prevent that and bring back those already gone, they should certainly support the National Policy which would secure both these results. It is well to investigate and see if this promise made by the Government has been carried out. Sir Charles Tupper, speaking in this House and making reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway as a great immigration agent, said, as reported in "Hansard" of 1877, page 150, as follows:—

We, therefore, took up the Canadian Pacific Railway as a means by which we could extend and continue a policy having for its object the prosecution of a public work which has been found to be successful in our country, and by means of which $100,000,000 of foreign capital would be drawn into the country and hundreds of thousands of immigrants annually brought into the country, which would develop our trade.

Of course, that is a Tupperism, and we must discount it to a large extent. Hundreds of millions of capital have not come in, and every one will acknowledge that hundreds of thousands of immigrants yearly have not arrived. It was a great stretch of imagination on the part of the hon. gentleman, for which, indeed, he has a reputation. A few of the cities have increased in population, but those cities have increased at the expense of the towns and villages in the rural sections of the country. Let us examine the population that came into this country, and what have we? One of the annual reports of the Minister of Agriculture gives the following statement as to the number of immigrants who came in between 1881 and 1891, and expressed their intention of remaining in Canada and making Canada their home. That number, as given in the report, is 886,000. We spent during those ten years no less than $3,000,000 on immigration, and, therefore, we would naturally expect a large number of immigrants to come in. Now, I would just ask: when we get 886,000 people into this grand country of ours, which presents to immigrants so many features of prosperity, why do they not stop here? We have a beautiful climate, a magnificent soil, and any quantity of it, open to settlement. Consequently, when 886,000 persons left their homes and came to Canada with the intention of remaining here, it would be reasonable to expect that the free lands and the fertile farms which we were able to give them would cause them to remain with us, unless, indeed, there was some other element operating to the contrary. In addition to this immigration, we must add the natural increase of population, which we would expect. We had in the year 1881, according to the census, a population of 4,325,000 in round numbers. The natural increase for the decade, based on the United States returns, would be 14 per cent, or 605,500 souls. If you add the immigration and natural increase together, you should have 1,491,500 people more in 1891 than in 1881. Did our population increase that amount? If not, why not? Well, let us see. In 1891 census commissioners were appointed who could in some cases almost see double. They went through this country counting every man, woman and child, once at least, and sometimes twice, but after their reports were put in the hands of the Government and counted up, it was found that in Canada we had only 4,833,000 inhabitants all told. Now, if the immigrants and the natural increase that we should have had were added to the population of 1881, the population in 1891 would have been 5,816,000. But sad to say, we were 983,500 short of that. I would ask any hon. gentleman who follows me in this debate—and I think I know who is to follow me—and I would bring to his mind this fact, and I hope he will seek to give an explanation how it has occurred. How is it, that the census commissioners could only find in all Canada 4,833,000 people in 1891, a number which was 983,000 less than there should have been if we add the immigration and the natural increase to the population of 1881. There must have been an average exodus of 98,350 each year, and why should there be? Remember, that this alarming exodus occurred under a policy which Sir John Macdonald said would keep our people at home and bring back a large number of those who were said to have gone away under the Liberal regime. What does the National Policy platform say with regard to that matter? I will read a paragraph from it:

That such a policy would retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home.

Now, Sir, in view of the complete and absolute failure of the National Policy to keep the people at home, what reason have we to support the National Policy at this late year of the century. What reason have we to suppose that its pledges have been fulfilled, and that our people are kept at home. Not only did the National Policy promise what I have quoted, but Sir Charles Tupper, while discussing this question, also made some remarks in regard to the effect of the National Policy in keeping the people at home. Speaking of the National Policy resolution in 1878, as recorded in "Hansard," p. 470, Sir Charles Tupper is reported as follows:—

This policy—

That is, the Liberal policy—

This policy which the Government has pursued has had the effect of depopulating this country. It has sent away the most skilled and intelligent labour, and the finest sons of Canada, to a foreign country, to find employment there which their own country denied them.

Now, Sir, is it not fair for me to argue that if the Liberal policy had sent away a large number to the United States to find a home there, if that was the result of the revenue tariff of 1874-79, how are we to criticise the results of the National Policy which has sent away two-and-a-half times more people out of Canada than left us under the policy of the Liberal party. If, on the other hand, it is argued now by Government supporters that the National Policy is not responsible for sending our people away, how did the leaders of the National Policy scheme in 1878 argue that the policy of the Liberal party was the cause of sending so many away. If the argument in one case is good, certainly the argument in the other case is good.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to another point. If under the National Policy our country only increased in population 11.66 per cent, would it not be well to return to the revenue tariff policy of the Liberal party, under which our population increased 18 per cent. Why, the argument used by Sir Charles Tupper in 1878, proves that the National Policy has been a great failure to keep our people at home or to bring back those who have gone away. The statement was made by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878, as reported in "Hansard," p. 859, as follows:—

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Let any man visit any of the manufactories of the United States, and there he will find the Canadian artisan toiling and doing well, and, therefore, not coming back; when, if Canada had a judicious system of taxation, they would be toiling and doing well in this country.

Hon. gentlemen will remark how Sir John Macdonald used the word "judicious." Well, Sir, this judicious system of taxation was established, and it has continued for the last seventeen years, and we find to-day that a larger number is leaving the country than under what Sir John Macdonald termed the injudicious system of taxation adopted by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. The Conservatives at that time charged that the policy of the Liberal party was depopulating the country. Now, let us compare the population during the two decades, and we will find by that means which policy was the better calculated to keep our people at home.

From 1871 to 1881 Nova Scotia increased her population 52,772, or 13.161 per cent. That was under the so-called injudicious taxation of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, or the greater portion of that period was under his Government. Now, under this judicious system of the National Policy, which Sir John Macdonald spoke about, Nova Scotia increased from 1881 to 1891 by 9,951 souls, or only 2¼ per cent. New Brunswick increased from 1871 to 1881 by 35,639 persons, or 12.48 per cent; but between 1881 and 1891, under this "judicious" system of taxation, New Brunswick increased only 61 souls, or 2-10ths of 1 per cent. Prince Edward Island increased in the decade, during the larger portion of which the country was under a revenue tariff by 14,870 souls, or 17.9 per cent. Prince Edward Island increased, under the National Policy, only 197, or 0.18 per cent. Quebec increased in the decade from 1871 to 1881, 167,511, or 14.05 per cent. Under the National Policy, Quebec increased 129,559, or only 9.53 per cent. Ontario, the banner province of the Dominion, a province which increased 306,070 under the regime of a revenue tariff, or 18.88 per cent, increased under this benign system of judicious taxation, as the manufacturers would call it, 186,067, or only 9.65 per cent, a little more than one-half the increase which took place in the preceding decade. The whole increase in these provinces from 1871 to 1881, was 638,214, or 17.31 per cent, as compared with an increase of 504,601, or 11.66 per cent under this blessed National Policy. The hon. gentleman who is going to succeed me, be he who he may, can point out how the National Policy has failed to realize the promises made by the leaders of the party, made by the father of the National Policy resolution, and made by themselves throughout the whole of the last decade, that the census of 1891, when made, would show their predictions and expectations to be thoroughly and completely fulfilled. Can you give me the reason for that failure? Now, Mr. Speaker, according to the highest estimate made, the exodus during Mr. Mackenzie's time, is put down at 42,000, whereas, the exodus under the National Policy is over 96,000, showing that the National Policy had not much to do with the exodus, and that the revenue tariff existing in Mr. Mackenzie's time had not much to do with it. But the hon. gentlemen opposite claimed that it was the revenue tariff of Mr. Mackenzie that was driving the people away, and promised that the National Policy would bring them back. Therefore, they are responsible for that promise; and in view of the fact that the people of this country accepted their promise and had confidence in it, now that that promise has failed, the people will withdraw that confidence from them; and there will be a change of parties sitting on the respective sides of this House. Those 98,000 people not only went away from the country, during these eleven years, but they took away with them no less than $10,000,000 worth of household effects, reducing the value of this country in that one particular to that extent. There is no record of other articles which those people took away with them, but we are easily within the limit if we say that over $20,000,000 of the property of this country was picked up in the various households where they were living, and carried across the line to add to the wealth of the United States.

The present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) when he was a private member sitting on the back benches, was particularly anxious that the Government should adopt a vigorous immigration policy. He was continually urging, on behalf of Manitoba and the North-west, that the Government should spend more money and bring in a policy to populate that country. Since that time he has become Minister of the Interior, and we have been expecting him to inaugurate such a policy. Has he done so? He has not inaugurated a single policy in regard to immigration into the North-west. The result is that for some years past, the number of people going into that country has not been as large as it was previously. I hope there are not as many leaving as there were in the last decade. Now, I am sorry to see such statements as have lately appeared in the English journals in regard to Canada. I am a Canadian, and I love Canada. I think she is the best country that the sun of heaven shines upon. I believe the energy and push and industry and capacity of the Canadian people are equal, if not superior, to those of any other people in the world. I believe, also, that if this country had been governed by a reasonable policy, adapted to the circumstances of the Canadian people, and calculated to increase the prosperity of every class, instead of by a policy of class legislation such as we have to-day, this country would have made far greater progress in every way than it has under the policy in vogue during the last seventeen years. I was particularly sorry to see the following article in regard to Canada in one of the leading London journals:—

While America is filling up, and brimming over, and increasing its population by millions, Canada, if not exactly stationary, is increasing very slowly indeed. The men who were born in Canada and should become citizens of the Empire, grow and die under the Stars and Stripes. Whether we like it or not, Canada is not doing well, and has not been doing well for some time past.

I suppose that meant the last seventeen years; but it is not so stated, and I will not impute motives to the writer of the article. At that rate of progress, I would like to know when the rosy expectations of the Finance Minister will be realized. Speaking on the Budget the other day, he boasted of a large increase in the population of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Referring to an article which he had read in the "Nineteenth Century," in reference to the ability of the British Empire to feed itself in case of a war which would cut off the supply of food to Great Britain from hostile nations, the hon. gentleman exultantly exclaimed with pride—and I hope he will listen to his words as I repeat them:

The Empire feed itself! Yes. That article said that 100,000,000 bushels of wheat were necessary to England, other than what the colonies afforded her at the present time, in order to feed the people of the Empire there. One hundred millions of bushels of wheat! Why, fifty thousand Canadian farmers, with 100 acres each, in wheat, and raising thirty bushels to the acre, would produce 150,000,000 bushels of wheat for export to Great Britain. And, what is fifty thousand farmers cultivating five millions of acres compared to the number of millions of acres of good wheat land in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, which has not yet been scratched by the plough?

Now, that was a very pretty picture, but I tell the Finance Minister that if he lives to be as old as Methusaleh, at the rate at which the population of that country has increased during the last seventeen years, he will not realize the expectation he held out that Manitoba and the North-west would feed Great Britain with wheat; 50,000 farmers! not half the number in that country now. For seventeen years, they have been endeavouring to get people in there, and there is not half the number he expected to raise wheat, even at thirty bushels to the acre. But then he was going to place there 50,000 more farmers for the purpose of raising cows, butter, cheese and milk for the soldiers of Great Britain. He said:

And, as to butter and cheese, fifty thousand farmers, owning fifty cows each, amounting to 2,500,000 cows, would supply butter and cheese enough to meet the demands of Great Britain for such supplies. And with the vast lands of the North-west, that is not an estimate which cannot be reached, if means are taken by which it could be reached.

I hope that England may not become engaged in war until the Finance Minister is ready with his butter, eggs, flour and cheese to feed her soldiers. It would be interesting and profitable if the Finance Minister had given us an idea of what those means were which he was going to employ. If he had any means, would it not have been judicious to announce them to this Parliament, and more particularly to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), who has so thoroughly and effectually failed to get people in there. He said: "If the proper means were used"—now, a great statesman like the Finance Minister should take the opportunity of explaining what means he would employ in order to accomplish the end he had in view. And now that they are reorganizing and fixing up the Cabinet, would it not be well to dismiss the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) and appoint the Finance Minister in his stead, so as to give that hon. gentleman the opportunity of bringing into operation those means by which he was going to fill up that country, so that we might have there 50,000 farmers raising wheat, 50,000 farmers raising cows, and 50,000 more raising beef, mutton and pork for the people of Great Britain. Each of the 50,000 farmers would have to raise 24,000 pounds of meat, to supply England with all the meats she requires in one year? Each cow of the 2,500,000 would have to produce 116 pounds of butter and 102 pounds of cheese per cow, to feed the people of England in one year? As soon as the hon. gentleman gets those 150,000 farmers into the North-west, we will give him all the credit due him for the extra benefit he has conferred upon this country. But if peace on earth and good-will towards men is to continue until the results which the hon. Finance Minister predicts will be accomplished, I think we are at present entering upon the dawn of the millenium.

From this I turn to another plank in the policy of the Liberal party. I wish to impress upon hon. gentlemen opposite that this is our policy and that they need not put themselves to the trouble of endeavouring to foist on us continental union, commercial union, free trade as it is in England, and the hundred and one things they impute to us—all they need do is to read up the policy of the Liberal party, as formulated by the great convention of 1893. This is the second plank in that platform:

That, having regard to the prosperity of Canada and the United States as adjoining countries, with many mutual interests, it is desirable that there should be the most friendly relations and broad and liberal trade intercourse between them;

That the interests alike of the Dominion and of the Empire would be materially advanced by the establishing of such relations;

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

That the period of the old reciprocity treaty was one of marked prosperity to the British North American colonies;

That the pretext under which the Government appealed to the country in 1891 respecting negotiations for a treaty with the United States was misleading and dishonest and intended to deceive the electorate;

That no sincere effort has been made by them to obtain a treaty, but that, on the contrary, it is manifest that the present Government, controlled as they are by monopolies and combines, are not desirous of securing such a treaty;

That the first step towards obtaining the end in view, is to place a party in power who are sincerely desirous of promoting a treaty on terms honourable to both countries;

That a fair and liberal reciprocity treaty would develop the great natural resources of Canada, would enormously increase the trade and commerce between the two countries, would tend to encourage friendly relations between the two peoples, would remove many causes which have in the past provoked irritation and trouble to the governments of both countries, and would promote those kindly relations between the Empire and the republic which afford the best guarantee for peace and prosperity;

That the Liberal party is prepared to enter into negotiations with a view to obtaining such a treaty, including a well-considered list of manufactured articles, and we are satisfied that any treaty so arranged will receive the assent of Her Majesty's Government, without whose approval no treaty can be made.

That sets out, in a very concise and complete manner, the policy of the Liberal party on the reciprocity question. We are bordering upon a country with which it is of great importance that we should be on the most friendly terms. We are bordering upon a country which produces many articles that we require for the consumption of our own people, and we produce on this side many other articles which are required for the wants of the people on that side. And if we can establish a reciprocity treaty, based upon sound and equitable principles, which would result to the advantage of both countries, that would be a benefit in many ways, and therefore, on the whole, it would be advantageous to the commerce and industries of this country. At present, under the action of two hostile camps, we are dealing very largely with that country. We are frequently told that it is not the proper market for Canadian products, and that if we had free trade or modified freedom of trade, no great advantage would result to us. The interest, I believe, of the Dominion and of the Empire would be mutually advanced by having larger trade relations with our neighbours to the south. They would be benefited by our cultivating, not only commercial but social and friendly relations. This is of absolute necessity to us, lying as we do along the border of such a large and powerful state. Our trade and commerce with the United States, previous to the old reciprocity treaty, was very largely hampered by the tariffs of the two countries. In 1848 there was a good deal of dissatisfaction in Canada. Many good citizens thought that we would be better off if annexed to the United States, and therefore there was a feeling prevailing in favour of annexation, in those years, as some of the older members in this House will recollect. In fact, so far did that feeling in favour of annexation go, that 136 of the leading men of Montreal, among whom was the late Sir Alex. T. Galt, signed a manifesto which was to be presented to the English Government, asking for a peaceful dissolution from that country and annexation to the United States. But shortly after that, there was an agitation set on foot for reciprocity with the United States, and after a few years of negotiations, a treaty of reciprocity was consummated in 1854. That treaty remained in force for twelve years. And during the successful operation of that convention, all the feeling in favour of annexation passed away, owing largely to the prosperity which the treaty brought to this country. As you know, Mr. Speaker, people who are prosperous think very little of the form of government under which they live. Make us prosperous and we will be satisfied under almost any government, so long, of course, as we have civil and religious liberty. Hon. gentlemen opposite argue that reciprocity, by making closer our social and trade relations with the United States, would wean us from our allegiance to the Empire. I hold that it would have a contrary effect, as it had in the days of the reciprocity treaty. When we look at the trade that was done in those twelve years, we cannot but see how advantageous a treaty along similar lines would be to this country now. Our aggregate trade with the United States from 1846 to 1853, inclusive, amounted to $113,846,000, an average of $14,231,000 a year. Now, see how, with leaps and bounds, that trade increases under reciprocity. From 1855 to 1866, inclusive, our aggregate trade with the United States was $655,447,000, an average annually of $54,651,000 as against $14,231,000 a year for the seven years previous. These figures prove beyond a doubt that a reciprocity treaty would be beneficial to us if it could be got on fair and equitable terms. In fact, so strongly impressed was the Government of the day, the Macdonald-Dorion Government, with the importance of this treaty that, when the United States gave notice of the cessation of that treaty at the expiration of the time, a Council meeting was held in this city and the Council adopted a minute which received the sanction of the Governor General on the 19th February, 1864. That minute of Council was sent to England urging England to use her influence and good offices to secure the continuance of that treaty. Permit me to read that minute to the House:

It would be impossible to express in figures, with any approach to accuracy, the extent to which the facilities of commercial intercourse, created by the reciprocity treaty, have contributed to the wealth and prosperity of this province; and it would be difficult to exaggerate the importance which the people of Canada attach to the continued enjoyment of these facilities.

Now note this, Mr. Speaker:

Nor is the subject entirely devoid of political significance.

Under the beneficent operations of the system of self-government which the latter policy of the mother country has accorded to Canada, in common with other colonies possessing representative institutions, combined with the advantages secured by the reciprocity treaty and of an unrestricted commerce with our nearest neighbours, in the natural productions of the two countries, all agitation for organic changes has ceased—all dissatisfaction with the existing political relations of the province has absolutely disappeared.

Now, Sir, had that reciprocity treaty a tendency toward annexation or to cause a breach between us and the Empire? On the contrary, it reconciled us to our own political institutions—political institutions which, in my opinion, are better than those the United States can offer. All we wanted was reciprocity so as to make our trade more prosperous, to bring more money into the pockets of the hard-working masses of Canada and to increase the price of lands which had been depreciated in value. And when this source of prosperity was open to this country, all agitation for organic changes ceased and we became far more loyal to the motherland than we were before. And I am of opinion that, if we had a reciprocity treaty with the United States to-morrow and the country became more prosperous through its operations, if our farmers were raised out of the slough of despond, every heart in this country would beat still stronger with love and devotion to the British flag.

But, Sir, it will be answered that we cannot obtain a treaty similar to the one we formerly had.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). My hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says "hear, hear." I am not sure that we can obtain such a treaty. I fear that the Government has allowed the opportunity to pass. But if the Government had been honest when, in 1891, they declared to the country that they were going to Washington for the purpose of negotiating a treaty, not on their own motion but by invitation from the government of the United States, if they had then done their duty in the interests of the country, we should have had such a reciprocity treaty as would have greatly extended the trade relations between the two countries and greatly increased the prosperity of the Dominion. That opportunity has passed. But I believe that, even yet, there is a possibility, that the Liberal party if returned to power will have an advantageous treaty negotiated. The United States are not willing to give us more than they receive. But if we go there with the purpose of doing what is right, ready to make concessions in return for concessions made upon their side, I am satisfied that, if the Liberal party is returned to power, we shall have a reciprocity treaty upon the statute-books within three years that will redound greatly to the advantage of this country. But when the three commissioners went to Washington in 1891, they did not go there with the intention of making a treaty. They were told repeatedly that no treaty could be negotiated with the United States on the same lines as the treaty of 1854, but that the United States were willing to include natural products if also a well selected line of manufactured articles was included. But the commissioners, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Sir John Thompson and Hon. G. E. Foster, went there not ready to include one single solitary item of manufactured articles. In order to put that right I will read the minute of the negotiations, which I think it is well this House should consider, and which I think should be on record. I have here a document called: "A message from the President of the United States in response to a Senate resolution of February 24th, 1892, relative to negotiations for reciprocal trade with Canada." The Senate passed the following resolution:—

Resolved, that the President be requested, if, in his opinion, not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate of the proceedings recently had with the representatives of the Dominion of Canada and of the British Government, as to arrangements for reciprocal trade between Canada and the United States.

In answer to that, Secretary Blaine, who was the commissioner who conferred with the three commissioners from Canada, sent the following to the President so that he might lay it before the Senate. It is dated at Washington, April 15th, 1892, and addressed to the President of the United States.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of 24th February, 1892, requesting the President, if, in his opinion, not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate of the proceedings recently had with representatives of the Dominion of Canada and the British Government, as to arrangements for reciprocal trade between Canada and the United States, has the honour to submit the following report:—

In the month of October, 1890, Hon. Robert Bond, Colonial Secretary of Newfoundland, visited Washington for the purpose of conferring with the Government of the United States respecting the commercial relations between Newfoundland and the United States. He was presented to me by the British Minister in this city, Sir Julian Pauncefote, and, after various conferences, continuing through the months of October and November, a draft of a reciprocity convention between the United States and Newfoundland was framed and forwarded to London for the action of the British Government.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

This fact having come to the attention of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, a strong protest was forwarded by it to the British Government against the ratification of the action of the Colonial Minister of Newfoundland, and this was followed, in December, 1890, by a proposition initiated and made to me by the British Minister in Washington, for the opening of formal negotiations in this city for a treaty embracing commercial reciprocity with Canada, the fisheries and other unsettled questions with the Dominion Government. I declined to open formal negotiations, but stated that I would be willing to have a full and private conference with the British Minister and one or more agents of Canada, and consider with them every subject connected with the relations of the two countries upon which a mutual interest could be founded, with a view to formal negotiations, should the proposed conference indicate a probability of agreement on any of the subjects discussed. This basis was accepted by the British Minister and the Dominion Government, but, for various reasons of convenience to the members of the proposed conference, it did not take place until 10th February, when the British Minister presented to me, at the Department of State, Sir John Thompson, Minister of Justice, Hon. George E. Foster, Minister of Finance, and Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, Minister of Customs, as commissioners on the part of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, to participate with him in the conference.

Now this brings me down to the conference:

At the first conference, on 10th February, the commissioners stated that they were authorized by the Canadian Government to propose the renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 (which was terminated in 1866 by the action of the Congress of the United States), with such modifications and extensions as the altered circumstances of both countries and their respective interests might seem to require.

In answer to an inquiry, the commissioners stated that the modifications or extensions contemplated in the schedules of articles should be confined to natural products, and should not embrace manufactured articles.

The commissioners were informed that the Government of the United States would not be prepared to renew the treaty of 1854, nor to agree upon any commercial reciprocity which should be confined to natural products alone; and that, in view of the great development of industrial interests of the United States, and of the changed conditions of the commercial relations of the two countries since the treaty of 1854 was negotiated, it was regarded of essential importance that a list of manufactured goods should be included in the schedules of articles for free or favoured exchange in any reciprocity arrangement which might be made.

The commissioners then inquired if the Government of the United States would expect to have preferential treatment extended to the list of manufactured goods of the United States on their introduction into Canada by virtue of a reciprocity treaty, or whether it would regard the Canadian Government as at liberty to extend the same favours to the manufactured goods of other countries not parties to the treaty, on their introduction into Canada.

The reply given to them was, that it was the desire of the Government of the United States to make a reciprocity convention which would be exclusive in its application to the United States and Canada, and that other countries which are not parties to it, should not enjoy gratuitously the favours which the two neighbouring countries might reciprocally concede to each other for valuable considerations and at a large sacrifice of their respective revenues.

Upon receiving this reply, the Canadian commissioners asked that the further consideration of the subject be adjourned till another conference, to enable them to consult as to the course which they would adopt in view of the foregoing declaration.

In the conference of the 11th, the Canadian commissioners stated that they had given careful consideration to the suggestion that manufactured goods should be included in the schedules of articles for exchange in a reciprocity convention, and to the desire expressed by the Government of the United States, that such American goods on their introduction into Canada should be accorded preferential treatment over similar goods from other countries; and they announced, with an expression of regret, that they did not consider it possible to meet the expectations of the Government of the United States in these respects. In the first place, they encountered a serious obstacle in the matter of revenue. If any considerable list of manufactured goods of the United States should be admitted free into Canada, it would entail a material loss to the Dominion treasury, and, if the same favours were likewise extended to the merchandise of other countries, the loss of revenue would be much greater. They felt that they would not be able to recoup these losses by other methods of taxation. In the second place, it seemed to be impossible for the Canadian Government, in view of its present political relations and obligations, to extend to American goods preferential treatment over those of other countries. As Canada was a part of the British Empire, they did not consider it competent for the Dominion Government to enter into any commercial arrangement with the United States, from the benefits of which Great Britain and its colonies should be excluded.

The announcement of these conclusions of the Canadian commissioners was accepted as a bar to further negotiations on this subject.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask you, and this House, in view of the negotiations that were going on and described in that minute, did the Government of this country show the least desire to say to the Government at Washington, let us consider a list of manufactured articles? There are about 100 articles we import from the United States, very few of which we import from the old country, and therefore a large list of manufactured articles could be embodied in a treaty, without discriminating against Great Britain to the extent of one dollar. But, Sir, they did not want to give to the United States, in compensation for what they were to receive in return, any better position in the Canadian market than they were going to give to other countries. Do you suppose that any country, with the intelligence of the United States, would enter into negotiations to carry out a treaty based upon such a principle as that? What advantage were they to get in the Canadian market for their goods, if other countries, without compensation, were to get equal advantages in the Canadian market? Then our commissioners made excuse that the revenue of the country would not stand it. Sir, the revenue could be very easily raised in this country if the people were prosperous. Give them plenty of work, give them more trade and commerce with other countries, give them greater freedom to trade with each other, whereby they may make more money upon which a revenue can be raised in a hundred and one ways to meet all the necessary expenditure for carrying on the Government. Now, Sir, I want to say to you that in 1874, when the Hon. George Brown went to Washington to negotiate a treaty, not only natural products were included as being part of the treaty, but there were over 100 manufactured articles included in that treaty. I do not suppose that among those 100 articles, there were five articles that we imported from Great Britain at all. That basis of treaty in 1874 was accepted by this Government, and it was accepted by the English Government, and had the Congress of the United States accepted it, it would have been made a treaty between this country and that country, and over 100 manufactured articles would have been included in it. Why did not the three commissioners who went to Washington succeed? Why did they not say, let us go over these matters, let us see what articles can be introduced into each country with profit with each other, and if we find that there would be great discrimination against Great Britain, then it may be justifiable to refuse to enter into a treaty. But we see there was no desire on the part of the commissioners to enter into negotiations with a view to arriving at a satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. SPROULE. Why did not George Brown succeed, when he offered so much both in regard to manufactures as well as natural products?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). We might not have been able to have succeeded in negotiating a treaty, but there was nothing to prevent an effort being made to secure one, and the minutes of the conference show that the representatives of the United States were willing to enter a number of articles on the list. At all events a draft treaty might have been framed so that it might have been submitted to the Senate of the United States, as was done before. But the commissioners who went down to the United States did not think so. Mr. Blaine announced that he was willing to enter into a discussion of a draft treaty, but so soon as it was announced by our commissioners that no articles were to be included other than natural products, that ended the matter, as it had been announced from time to time, that the Americans would never give a treaty based on the same lines as that of the treaty of 1854.

I want to point out some of the advantages that would arise to this country under an equitable reciprocity treaty with the United States. We have peculiarly close relations with the adjacent republic. We have bordering on this country, east, west and south no less than nine states, containing a population of 26,500,000. If a line could be drawn from the north part of Minnesota to the north part of Maine, Toronto would fall 300 miles south of that line; so hon. members can see the advantage which Toronto would possess as a distributing centre if we secured the markets of the United States. Our people would be able to reach any city in those states within a few hours, and would be able to market Canadian produce in the large cities. So when we speak of a home market, where is there a better home market than could be found among those 26,500,000 of people who can be reached from Toronto within 18 hours? Speaking of home market within those nine states, there are 68 cities, not one of which has a less population than 10,000, making 6,500,000 people centred in those cities within 18 hours railway travel from Toronto. And the farmers north, east and west of Toronto could market their products within a few additional hours. But here I shall be met with the assertion, that those cities and those localities themselves, produce more agricultural and other products than they need, and, therefore, those cities and states would not afford a market available to our agricultural produce. Is it so? Why did we spend so many millions to open avenues of communication with the United States? It is well known that we have spent millions on railways, on building bridges across rivers between the two countries, in digging tunnels in order to break down the trade barriers between Canada and the United States. Yet, now we are told that all the results which have been accomplished by the investment of millions of Canadian capital must be minimized by tariff policies arrayed against each other.

Let me now take up another point,—and I am glad the Controller of Inland Revenue is in his seat as representing that part of the country to which I am about to refer. If British Columbia should ever see a day of prosperity—and I hope she will—she will see prosperity under free trade or reciprocity with the United States, for nearly all the products of her gold and silver mines and coal mines go to the United States. The large proportion of timber taken from the sides of the mountains and carried down through her water-stretches, goes to the United States. It is only through the development of those great natural resources that British Columbia can ever take that position among the provinces of the Dominion which we wish her to hold. So a reciprocity treaty with the United States, based on equitable conditions, would be a bonanza in giving her facilities to get her products into the market to the south of her. Let me give a few figures to impress this on the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. British Columbia trades with eighteen countries. Of the products of the mines sent to all countries to the value of $4,660,000, she sends to the United States no less than $4,567,859, only $100,000 of products of her mines going to any other country. Does this fact not prove beyond a doubt to hon. gentlemen opposite that if the tariff walls were broken down between those two countries, she would be facilitated in sending her products to those markets? Do not hon. gentlemen know that out of $650,000 worth of coal mined on Vancouver Island and sent to foreign countries all but the value of 20,000 tons goes to the United States? When 75 cents a ton is paid thereon as duty it represents about half a million dollars. This might be utilized in improving the properties, and instead of being taken out of the capital of the operators, would be retained to increase the number of hands, to develop trade and increase the prosperity of the province.

Mr. PRIOR. How much does the hon. gentleman say was the duty per ton on coal going into the United States?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). 75 cents. I am talking about the American duty, because it is that you have to overcome. Now, that province sent of the products of our fisheries, to all countries, $3,254,500 worth, and of that only $93,800 was sent to the United States. England is a large consuming centre for British Columbia fish, but still a proportion is sent to the United States, and more would be sent to that country if there were freedom of trade. The fish of British Columbia, in the cold waters of the north, are much superior in quality to the fish caught in the warmer waters further south; and therefore if it were allowed freedom of entry into the American market, the British Columbia fish would command the highest price. British Columbia exports, of the products of her magnificent forests—and I was proud to see them when I was out there—to the value of $500,000. Some of that lumber was sent as far as Africa, India and Japan, and to the United States she exported $144,057 worth of lumber. You will find, Mr. Speaker, that the lumbering industry has been vivified and stimulated by the free trade in lumber which was allowed by the United States a year or two ago. The lumber dealers with whom I had communication when I was in that country, all bore testimony to that. Of animals and their products, British Columbia sends to all countries $454,618 worth, and to the United States she sends $252,057 worth, so that actually one-half of the exports of animals and their products from British Columbia is sent to the United States.

a country which we are frequently told has more of these products than she needs. Over that high protective barrier, British Columbia is forced to send one-half her total exports of animals and their products. The returns published by the Government show that the minerals of British Columbia find their way into the American market, and that a large proportion of the agricultural products also go there, and, Sir, if a reciprocity treaty on an equitable basis was negotiated with the United States, British Columbia would flourish and be prosperous to the extent that she has never experienced during her existence. Her population would increase. There would be a boom in the mineral interests of British Columbia and Vancouver Island, and in her mountains and her forests. Surely, all must see that reciprocity with the United States would be of vast advantage to that province. I believe that a majority of the British Columbia people are to-day either in favour of free trade or much free trade with the United States.

Let us now, Mr. Speaker, see how reciprocity would benefit Manitoba. If the Finance Minister wishes to accomplish his great idea of having 150,000 farmers in our western country within a reasonable time, he will commence by advocating greater freedom of trade between Manitoba and the United States. Manitoba products would then find a market in the United States, notwithstanding that the United States produces a large surplus of the various articles which are produced in that province. Manitoba and the North-west Territories have large fields of very good coal, whereas, immediately to the south, there is a large section of the United States which has no coal at all. The state of Montana is rich in minerals of almost every kind, but it has no coal, and so, if a reciprocity treaty were established between the two countries, the coal industry would be greatly developed in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Manitoba sends nearly all her fish into the American market, and if she were permitted to send this fish free of duty, you would find our fish every morning on the breakfast tables of Minneapolis, St. Paul and Chicago, and the fishermen of Manitoba would derive a larger profit from their industry than they do at the present day. Then, again, take the No. 1 hard wheat of Manitoba. That wheat is much superior to the No. 1 hard of Dakota, Minnesota or Iowa. If it had free entry into the United States market, in competition with the hard wheat of those states, it would command the better price, and it would be sold to the great milling industries of St. Paul and Minneapolis at a higher price than any wheat which they can get in their own country. Again, take the cattle raised on the ranches of the North-west and Manitoba. They are far superior for beef, to the cattle raised in Texas, the Indian Territory, and other warmer climates to the south. Our cattle would be used for home consumption in the western states; the beef would command a higher price because of its superior flavour, and the cattle of the southern and western states would have to find sale in some other market. In this way the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories would be largely benefited. In addition to that, the people inhabiting our North-west would have freedom of purchase in the United States market, and that would increase their returns each year. Therefore, when we take the profits derived from exports, and the money saved by importing, it would confer a boon on the farmers of the North-west, which would be a great blessing to them. They would accomplish the end the Minister of Finance has in view much quicker than they could accomplish it by any other means that he could employ.

Would reciprocity benefit Ontario? Let us see. It is frequently said upon public platforms that the United States is no market for the products of Ontario. I hope the hon. gentleman who will reply to me will note this, and answer it if he can. I think I have heard him state in this House that it is an impossibility to get a market in the United States for the products of Ontario, because the United States exports more natural products than they have use for, and that therefore if we had reciprocity, it would be just the same thing as sending coals to Newcastle. Is that statement correct? I do not think it is. The statistics prove that notwithstanding the high tariff barrier between the two countries, we trade with the United States to an extraordinary degree. Let me give a few figures to endorse the statement I have made. The province of Ontario does business with thirty-nine countries. Of the products of the mines, she exports to all countries $916,654 worth, and to the United States she exports of that amount $908,504 worth. Therefore, Sir, nearly the entire exports of the minerals of Ontario go to the United States. Of the fisheries of Ontario, we export to all countries $454,552 worth, and of that we export to the United States $454,244 worth. Of the products of the forests, Ontario exports to all countries $9,929,683 worth, of which she exports to the United States $9,861,890 worth. Of animals and their products Ontario exports to all countries $7,391,449 worth, of which $2,524,511 worth goes to the United States. Of the products of agriculture we send to all countries $8,101,863 worth, of which we send to the United States $2,694,638 worth. Of manufactures we send to all countries $3,381,156 worth, of which we send to the United States $141,255 worth. The total exports of Ontario to all countries are $30,186,271, of which $18,588,764 goes to the United States. Is it not strange, Mr. Speaker, that we send to the United States nearly two-thirds of all the manufactured articles exported from Ontario, notwithstanding the high tariff wall which at present exists between the two countries? Does not that indicate with great force that if we had free trade with the United States, that export would increase largely? And if the United States should send manufactured articles into this country under a treaty, there would at the same time be an immense market in the United States for the manufactured goods of Canada. It may be said that the United States have sufficient manufactured articles for themselves, and that we would be sending coals to Newcastle in sending manufactured articles to them. But when we send an article that is in demand, and an article of the best quality, and can sell it there in the face of a tariff of 20, 30 or 40 per cent, we need not fear but that under free trade these articles would be purchased at the highest market price. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, seeing that we now send our minerals over a high tariff wall, that under free trade, our iron industries in Ontario would receive a great impetus and be stimulated into greater activity than they enjoy to-day? Do you not believe that our vast copper mines to the north of Lake Superior would be more completely developed, and that we would have the sound of industry there, instead of complete silence, as at present? We have better and richer copper ores in Canada than they have in the United States, and yet we find that they take copper ore from the south side of Lake Superior, carry it 1,000 miles on the railways, and have it smelted at Pittsburg. Could we not smelt it just as easily in our own country, where the fuel is found, if we had the advantage of its going into the United States free of duty? But let me show that reciprocity treaty, based upon honourable and equitable principles, would be of great advantage to the eastern provinces. New Brunswick, one of those eastern provinces, trades with 17 countries. Of the products of the mines she exports to all countries $54,586 worth, of which nearly the whole, or $53,523 worth goes to the markets of the United States. Of the products of the fisheries she exports to all countries $620,613 worth, of which $484,670 worth goes to the United States. Of the products of the forest she sends to all countries $4,933,000 worth, of which $2,011,248 worth goes to the United States. Of animals and their products $112,000 worth are sent to all countries, of which $77,643 worth goes to the United States. Of agricultural products the total export is $183,036 worth, of which $135,142 worth goes to the United States. Out of the manufactured articles of New Brunswick, she sends a total of $306,872 worth to all countries, of which $181,933 worth goes to the United States. Out of a total export to all countries of $6,216,000,

by New Brunswick, $2,950,142 is sent to the United States. It will be seen from these figures that nearly 50 per cent of the whole export trade of New Brunswick is with the United States, which fact testifies that it would be of great value to that province to have freer trade with that country, which is already her chief market. Let us take another province, the province of Nova Scotia, and see the advantages of reciprocity to her. Nova Scotia exports to 28 countries. She exports of the product of the mine to all countries $701,135 worth, of which $370,000 worth goes to the United States. Of the fisheries she exports $5,165,000 worth, of which $1,572,000 worth goes to the United States. Of the products of the forest she exports $2,035,000 worth, of which $491,120 worth goes to the United States. Of animals and their products she exports to all countries $440,000 worth, of which $36,000 worth only goes to the United States. Of agricultural products she exports $1,110,000 worth, of which $89,183 worth goes to the United States. Of the products of her manufacturing industries she exports $981,000 worth, of which $251,948 worth goes to the United States. The total exports of Nova Scotia to all countries amount to $10,433,000, of which she sends to the United States $2,810,000. It will be seen from these figures what a large proportion of the export trade of Nova Scotia is done with the United States, and if there were greater freedom of trade her prosperity would hardly know any bounds. When such a large trade under the present high tariff restrictions can be carried on, how much would it be possible to enlarge that trade and stimulate the prosperity of the people if those tariff restrictions were removed? But, Sir, there is one more of the eastern provinces to which I wish to refer—the little province of Prince Edward Island, a province which I believe would be benefited more by reciprocity in trade than probably any other province of the Dominion; because a large proportion of the articles which she raises for export have to go to the United States to find a market at all. Of her fisheries she exports $437,305 worth to all countries, of which she sends $290,000 worth to the United States market—a market which we are told has at present fish enough of its own; but, as I said before, with regard to British Columbia, the fish caught in the waters further north are better fish, and are selected in the southern markets in preference to their own, and are sold at a higher price, or our people would not be able to send them there at all. Of animals and their products Prince Edward Island sends to all countries—the 14 with which she deals—$320,000 worth, of which she sends to the United States $115,950 worth. Of agricultural products she sends to all countries $251,000 worth, of which she sends to the United States $68,750 worth. Of manufactures she sends to all countries $22,508 worth, and of that amount she sends $2,189 worth to the United States. Of the total exports of $1,037,947 worth from Prince Edward Island, she sends to the United States $476,554 worth, or nearly 50 per cent. Now, there is a particular hardship on that province. Last year she exported 378,000 bushels of potatoes, for which she is unable to find a market either in the province itself or in Nova Scotia, and those potatoes have to climb over a barrier of 15 cents a bushel before they can get into the market of the United States, in which they are sold. Out of the total exports of the Dominion of 1,370,000 bushels of potatoes, the maritime provinces exported 1,030,000, and 777,708 bushels of that went into the United States in spite of a tariff of 15 cents per bushel. Do you not really suppose that if there was free trade in those articles, that would be a blessing to the eastern provinces—a blessing which they cannot enjoy under the iniquitous system of protection. It would bring about a condition of prosperity which would far more than counterbalance any loss of revenue.

I believe that if there was reciprocity in coal, it would be a great advantage to the people of Nova Scotia. These people have an immense market in the eastern states. If there was reciprocity between the maritime provinces, particularly Nova Scotia, and the eastern states, it would give a stimulus to the coal industry which nothing else could give. It would give a stimulus also to the iron industry of these eastern provinces better than anything else could give. You can see plainly that when you have fuel and iron lying in the same neighbourhood as well as the limestone which is used as flux in the making of iron, you have every facility to produce the iron as cheaply as it can be in any other part of the world. If you had freedom of trade, so that you could ship your iron and coal to other markets, you would develop those industries to an extent far beyond any development that can be hoped for in the restricted markets of Canada. These are so restricted that they have a deleterious effect upon the production and development of the iron industry. Nova Scotia has railways running almost among mountains of iron, plenty of ships floating almost in the very neighbourhood, by which to ship her iron products to other countries, and realize larger profits than she can obtain under any restrictive policy. Therefore, it is wholly to her interests to have reciprocity with the United States.

Now, I shall pass on to another question. I come to another plank in the policy of the great Liberal party—a party in which I take the greatest pride; a party that has a history in this country which no other party has; a party that placed in the constitution of this country more fundamental principles than any other party; a party that is the father of responsible government; a party that is the father of free schools in Canada; a party that secularized the clergy reserves in 1855 and put all churches of this country upon an equal basis, and distributed the proceeds of those clergy reserves among the municipalities of the country; a party that has brought about representation by population, whereby every province of the country receives the justice it is entitled to; a party that was the means of bringing the provinces of the Dominion into confederation; a party of economy and purity in office and out of office; a party which in a few months will come into power. Let me read the third plank in the policy of the Liberal party:

That the convention deplores the gross corruption in the management and expenditure of public moneys which for years past has existed under the rule of the Conservative party, and the revelations of which by the different parliamentary committees of inquiry have brought disgrace upon the fair name of Canada.

The Government, which profited politically by these expenditures of public moneys of which the people have been defrauded, and which, nevertheless, have never punished the guilty parties, must be held responsible for the wrong-doing. We arraign the Government for retaining in office a Minister of the Crown proved to have accepted very large contributions of money for election purposes from the funds of a railway company, which, while paying the political contributions to him, a member of the Government, with one hand, was receiving Government subsidies with the other.

The conduct of the Minister and the approval of his colleagues after the proof became known to them are calculated to degrade Canada in the estimation of the world and deserve the severe condemnation of the people.

I must make good this charge against the present Government. You will remember, Sir, that in 1891 the Quebec Harbour Works were undertaken by the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. Robert H. McGreevy was given a large interest in the contract, although he had not one dollar invested, directly or indirectly, in the concern. Why was he given this interest? Because he was thought to have influence upon his brother, the hon. member for Quebec West, and his brother had a strong influence upon the Minister of Public Works of that day (Sir Hector Langevin). He was an intimate friend of the Minister of Public Works, lived in the same house, and it was almost said, slept in the same bed, so intimate and cordial were the relations between the two. Now, Larkin, Connolly & Co. obtained contracts from this Government. They received from 1878 to 1891, $3,138,334 for the works constructed by them—works planned by the very best engineers in the country, and estimated not to cost a dollar more than two millions. This left a balance, beyond a reasonable profit for the works, of $1,138,334. This was an enormous profit; but when we consider the sequel, we find that the profits of Larkin, Connolly & Co. were not so large as they appeared. This firm was compelled to contribute into the bribery and corruption fund no less than $170,447, as established by the investigation before the Public Accounts Committee in 1891. Robert McGreevy, although he had no money in the concern whatever, and although he ran no risk whatever, received $187,000 for his influence as go-between—the company on one hand and his brother on the other, his brother having great influence with the Minister of Public Works, from whom this company might receive great benefit at the expense of the people of the country. Thomas McGreevy acknowledged that he received large sums of money as the treasurer of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec; but when pressed for the names of the parties from whom he received the money, he refused to answer in order to prevent exposure. Then to escape the punishment Parliament would certainly have inflicted upon him, he skipped the country. This was equivalent to acknowledgment that there was something wrong with the gift of these large sums. Evidence established that he had given $25,000 to subsidize the newspaper organ of his friend the then Minister of Public Works. It was in this corrupt way that these extraordinary profits of Larkin, Connolly & Co. were spent, and thus the country was robbed of nearly three-quarters of a million of money that should never have been paid out, and would never have been paid out but that the company was expected to contribute largely to the boodle fund of the Conservative party. So strong was the evidence against the leaders in this case that Sir Hector Langevin, still a member of this House, had to resign his position as Minister of Public Works, and take, as it were, a back bench in this House because of his connection with this affair. Two of the men engaged in these transactions had to skip the country, and both, I think, feared to come back lest the clutches of the law should fasten upon them for their notorious robbery of the people of the country. Two of them were sent for a short time to prison. And let it be said to the discredit of the Government, that they released these two men from behind the bars and left to pine away in the cells hundreds of people more honest, more upright, people of cleaner and more respectable character than these men. There is another charge we bring against the Government, and it is in connection with the beautiful building on the south side of Wellington street in this city, a building which is the admiration of every stranger and the pride of every citizen, but a building that cost twice as much as it would have cost if it had been built according to honest principles. If Mr. Charlebois, the contractor, had been paid according to his contract, he would have been entitled to only $355,000; but in order to put larger sums of money into his pocket, an agreement was made between him and the Government containing a clause that is not to be found, I venture to say, in any other agreement, private or public, that ever was made in Canada. I heard the chief engineer state on his oath that it was the first agreement containing such a clause that he had ever seen in the department. Let me read that clause:

The contractors will agree to bind themselves to buy the right of way from the contractor, Charlebois.

That was to enable the chief contractor to exact from those who took sub-contracts—one to build the stairs, another to put in the elevators, another to put in the furnaces, another to furnish the iron cross beams, and so on—25 per cent upon their actual tenders. So when they put in an honest tender for the value of the work they had to add 25 per cent so as to recoup themselves for what they were compelled, under that clause of the contract, to pay this chief contractor what he was not fairly entitled to. And so \$350,000 was taken from the people more than was necessary for the construction of the building. Nor is that all, I wish it were. Let me give you a few items of extravagance besides the two I have already mentioned. There was the Tay Canal. That work was estimated to cost \$132,600, and that was all the work was worth. The canal is only $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles long, passing through a level country, so that no deep cuts were necessary, and having only one lock upon it as it empties into the Rideau Canal. But the work actually cost \$476,000, nearly \$300,000 in excess of the estimates made by the Government engineer. Now, one of two things must be true, either these Government engineers were not worthy of the positions they held, or the Government must have expended corruptly that \$300,000 upon a work which the engineers said would cost only \$132,600. Then, again, there is the Little Rapids Canal. The engineers' estimate of the cost of this work was \$44,000. But as a matter of fact about \$300,000 was spent upon it, or about \$250,000 more than the estimate—actually five times as much spent as the amount of the original estimate. And not a solitary cent of revenue after spending these large sums of money. Need we wonder that the people of this country are heavily burdened with taxation, when they have to pay the cost of such blundering extravagance and corruption? Then, there is the Galops Channel. The estimated cost of that work was \$300,000, and before it was finished the Government had to pay for the work about \$900,000.

000. Were the engineers to blame? If they were, I do not see why the Government should retain them in their positions. If they were not to blame, what is the explanation of these figures. No explanation satisfactory to the people has ever been given of these extraordinary expenditures over the estimates made by the Government engineers. Take the case of another work—the St. Charles Branch Railway. When the Government entered upon that work it was estimated to cost $136,000. The railway is fourteen miles long. The actual cost was $1,723,000, or an average of $123,000 per mile. The Government says that the construction cost only $822,000, but that the land damages and expenses involved an increased cost of about $900,000. I fear that fraud, mismanagement and corruption all combined to make up this extraordinary expenditure of the people's money. The people have no redress but to pay the money and defeat this corrupt Government in a few months. I now come to speak of the two bridges which were built in the city of Montreal, across the Lachine Canal. One was for the Grand Trunk Railway, and the other for passenger traffic. The Government, it must be admitted, were compelled to build those bridges at an unfavourable time of the year, which entailed a considerably larger expense than if built later in the season, and that must be borne in mind, if we would be fair. They had to build them at a period of the year when a good deal of work had to be done that would not have had to be done at a more seasonable time of the year. I am willing to give the Government the advantage of every palliating circumstance, and to place this matter as fairly as I can before the people of this country. Sir, I have carefully gone over the evidence taken by the Public Accounts Committee, and I have also carefully examined the evidence taken before the Royal Commission which the Government itself appointed to investigate the frauds perpetrated on it. I wish to place before you some facts that I have gleaned from a careful examination of the evidence. The estimated cost of the bridge, as made by the engineers, was $175,000, that is, the final cost. The estimate was even less at the beginning, but I understand that the Government deepened the canal and ordered a more expensive construction. The final cost of those bridges was $394,000, which is the amount of money the Government have already had to pay, but there are still some $50,000 or $60,000 in dispute between the Government and the contractors. Now, these are some of the facts which I find in the evidence taken by the Royal Commission, and I give them in order to refresh the memory of the members of the Government, and also to refresh the memory of the people of this country, with the condition in which those bridges were completed, and the carelessness that characterized the officials who looked after their construction. I find that $4 were paid for foremen, and $6 a day for foremen for night-work, or overtime. $5 a day were paid for a team, and $10 for a team on Sunday. $2.50 were paid for a derrick, and $3.50 for a derrick overtime. Now, Mr. Speaker, is it not truly astonishing that so large a sum of money should be paid for the use of a derrick for overtime? How can that be explained upon any principle of justice or right? Then it appears that this derrick had great objections to working on Sunday, and had to be persuaded by doubling its wages, for I find that for Sunday work the derrick cost $7.50. Now, these are not my statements, they are gathered from the evidence placed before this country by the Government, and taken by the Royal Commission appointed by themselves. Then I find that $8 a day were paid for foremen on Sunday, and $12 a day for foremen working overtime on Sunday. Mr. St. Louis, the contractor for the labour, and, I understand, an intimate friend and relative of the Minister of Public Works, put so many men on the works that there were hardly standing room for them; and I am informed that many of them had to leave, and were employed to do private work for the contractors. There was no room on the canal for them to work, but the Government paid them all the same, and the contractors received the profit and put it into their pockets. There were 2,000 men on the works at one time. Of course, many of them were idle and not able to work, because there was no room for them. Again, I find there was no Government time-keeper. What excuse can the Government make for such gross negligence, on a work of that kind, when such large sums of public money were at stake? They knew they had to pay out money on the pay-list submitted by the contractors, and they neglected to appoint a time-keeper of their own, in whom they might have confidence, to certify that the pay-lists were proper, and that the work was actually done before the men were paid. The Government had no supervision over the work, there was no Government officer there to oversee it, and the result was that the whole thing was left in the hands of these rascals who were in possession at the time. They took advantage of their opportunity to defraud the Government, because the Government was evidently neglectful in looking after that public work. Then, there was no Government record of the materials used.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). When you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was giving to the House and to the country some of the facts which I had gleaned from the evidence given before the Royal Commission

In connection with the bridges built by the Government in the city of Montreal, and from the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee in relation to the same bridges. I will now proceed to give a few more of those facts, showing what I may justly term the corrupt expenditure of the Government in connection with those bridges. Sir, there was no classification of labour. Mr. St. Louis charged for skilled labour where he was not entitled to be paid for it, and this increased the charges against the Government to a very large extent. There were no public tenders for timber, and therefore the timber supplied by those parties was charged to the Government at a cost much in excess of its real value. Had the Government taken the precaution to ask for public tenders for the supply of timber for these bridges, they would have saved thousands of dollars, but instead of doing that, they allowed the contractor to supply the timber, and to make his own price to the Government, which they had to pay. Then again, there was no one appointed by the Government to look after the kind of timber that was supplied, and the result was that an inferior class of timber and lumber was provided for the construction of those bridges; consequently the Government had not only to pay an exceedingly high price, but they had to pay that price for an inferior quality of material. Again, unskilled labour and skilled labour were not defined by the Government, and consequently the contractor for labour was able to charge the Government, in many cases, for skilled labour when unskilled labour was what he actually supplied, and the Government was compelled to pay the price of skilled labour when unskilled labour was provided. There was no check as to the quality of the timber and lumber supplied, and, therefore, as I say, a large proportion of this timber and lumber was of a very inferior quality. Then, Sir, one million feet of lumber was actually stolen from the grounds, of which no account was given for which the Government had to pay. New lumber was taken and cut up, and used for firewood, and for this lumber thus used for firewood, the Government had to pay large sums of money. Government teams were used to haul lumber for some distance which the contractor had already been paid to haul himself; thus the Government had to pay for the teams in the first place, and then they had to pay the contractor for the use of those teams in the second place. I find that $39,896 were paid by the Government for work which was proved in evidence to be worth only $6,000. For stone-cutting, which should have cost $3,000, according to the evidence the Government had to pay no less than $16,715. Stone was hauled by teams 20 miles along the side of a railway from the quarry to the bridge, and this was done in order to enable the contractor to make large profits upon the men and teams which he supplied. If the Government had looked into those matters, they could have easily seen that these parties were defrauding them on the right hand and on the left. But they neglected their duties towards the public they were serving. The result was that these fraudulent transactions were going on every day in the city of Montreal by which large sums of money were being extracted from the pockets of the Canadian people. Sir, there was no excuse for the Government, because they were warned that great extravagance was going on there, that there were too many men on the works, so many that there was not room for them all to be employed. Further, it was intimated that there was irregularity whereby the Government was being defrauded, and notwithstanding that notification and information which came to them through their own engineer, no step was taken for the purpose of preventing the Government being defrauded any further. The Government paid large sums to the contractor, although they were warned of the conduct of the contractor; and, therefore, you can plainly see, Mr. Speaker, and the supporters of the Government can plainly see, and I am sure the people at large will plainly see, that a large proportion of this money taken out of the pockets of the people was paid through negligence on the part of the parties who should have overseen the work. Pending the investigation that was instituted by the Government itself, pending that investigation which was to take place before a Royal Commission, the Government paid the contractor, St. Louis, $105,000, on an account that the chief engineer discredited, and which he refused to certify. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, was that an act which should be regarded as in the interest of the country, to pay a large sum of money on an account which their own engineer discredited? It appears to me not only to be an extravagant, but a corrupt act on the part of the Government. After the Royal Commission finished their work, they drafted a report and submitted that report to the Government, and at the close of that document, they reported incompetence, extravagance and fraud. That extravagance was as much on the part of the Government as on the part of the contractor, that incompetence I attribute to those who should look after the public works of Canada and are paid to do so. The Minister of Railways and Canals, although attending here during the session, and making that an excuse for not supervising the work, was only a few hours' distance by railway from Montreal, and, moreover, he had the chief engineer of the Government, whose duty it was to see that this work was properly constructed, and everything carried out with efficiency and economy. The people have lost the money, and they are determined in a few weeks to hold the Government responsible for an expenditure in this way, of over $230,000.

Mr. Speaker, before taking up the next head of my speech, I want to refer to a little error I made this afternoon while speaking. I do not wish to make errors. In speaking of the duty which the United States charge on coal, I said it was 75 cents per ton, overlooking the fact that in 1894, under the Wilson Bill, the duty was brought down to 40 cents. In speaking of fish, I regarded fish as dutiable, but I find that fresh fish goes in free. Hon. members will see that though I made these paltry errors, they do not affect my argument, and that a reduction in duty would largely benefit parties exporting products to the United States.

Now I come to another plank in the policy of the Liberal party, and it is a very important one, because it bears largely on the expenditure of money in the discharge of public business. It is as follows:—

We cannot but view with alarm the large increase in the public debt and controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion, and consequent undue taxation of the people under the Government that has been continuously in power since 1873, and we demand the strictest economy in the administration of the Government of this country.

The hon. gentleman who spoke the night before last, the hon. member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) sought to prove by an array of figures that the Liberal Government was much more extravagant in the expenditure of money than was the Government at present in power. But I think I will satisfy you, Mr. Speaker, and even the hon. gentleman himself, if he is present, that he was altogether in error, and although he did not intend to be in error, still he was so by using the figures which he used. In looking over the expenditures of 1878 and 1895 under special heads, everybody will observe that the Conservative Government has been more extravagant in regard to expenditures. The interest on the debt was only $7,000,000 in 1878, and in 1895 it increased to $10,466,000, or 48 per cent increase. The expenditure under civil government in 1878 was $823,370. That amount rose to $1,422,000 in 1895, or an increase of 72½ per cent. Under the head of legislation, the cost in 1878 was $618,035, but it rose last year to $941,570, or an increase of 52 per cent. Under the head of militia, the expenditure in 1878 was $618,126, and this year it reached the enormous sum of $1,574,000, or an increase of 154 per cent. There is no hon. gentleman present, whether he belongs to the militia or not, who will undertake to state that the militia is in a better condition to-day than it was in 1878, for, as I have already stated, the Militia Department has neglected its duty to a very large extent, and allowed the militia to become very inefficient, indeed. I am stating these facts, not from personal knowledge of the state of the militia, but from the knowledge of the most eminent men in the militia, and therefore this tremendous additional expense was, in my opinion, unjustifiable, judged from the fruits of that expenditure. Then the expenditure for Mounted Police in 1878 was $325,000. Under that head to-day the expenditure is $646,000, or an increase of 92 per cent. Then, under the head of Indians, we had an expenditure, in 1878, under the regime of Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, of $421,000, and to-day the expenditure is $955,000, or an increase of 126 per cent. Under the head of superannuations, the expenditure during the last year of Mr. Mackenzie's Government, was $106,000, now it is $265,000, or 149 per cent increase. This increase has been going on while the whole population has only increased about 18 per cent, and the average increase of all these increases will very nearly reach 100 per cent. We maintain, as the Liberal party, that these comparisons show too large an expenditure, they indicate an expenditure under these departmental heads that is extravagant, and the Liberal party, when it comes into power, which they will do in a few weeks, will seek to reduce the expenditures, and bring them to a proper standard compatible with the interests and well-being of Canada.

I will draw another comparison. During the first year of confederation, the annual expenditure on consolidated fund was $13,456,000; in 1874, when the Liberal-Conservatives left power, it was $23,316,316. That is an increase in those six years of $9,830,000, or an annual increase of $1,640,000. Now, take the expenditure during the last time they were in power. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, they came into power again in 1878. They began with an expenditure of $23,503,000, and in 1895, seventeen years thereafter, they ended with an expenditure of $38,132,000, or an additional expenditure of $14,629,000, making an average yearly increase of $860,000, or 62 per cent. In the first period of six years, there was an increase of 73 per cent, and in the second period of the Conservative regime, there was an increase of 62 per cent; and mark you, Mr. Speaker, while these enormous percentages were piling up in the expenditure, our population in that period only increased 18 per cent. We will take the other side of the shield, and we will see what the Reformers did during the years they were in power. When the Reformers took office in 1874, the annual expenditure was $23,316,000, and when they went out in 1878, the expenditure was $23,503,000, or a total increase during the five years they were in power, of only $187,000, or an annual increase of $37,400, or four-fiftieths of 1 per cent. Now, Sir, during that time, the population of this country increased 9 per cent. During the Conservative period of government, the expenditure increased three and a half times the increase of population, and under the Liberal regime the population increased by 100 times the expenditure. You see by these comparisons which of the two parties were the most economical in the discharge of their duties. There is another method, Sir, by which we can test the economy of governments, and perhaps it is the best method after all. That is to compare the controllable expenditure of the different governments. The controllable expenditure in 1868 amounted to $3,630,000, and in 1874 it had increased to $8,324,000. In 1878, after the five years that Mr. Mackenzie was in power, he had reduced the controllable expenditure from $8,324,000 to $6,542,000. Now let us see what the Conservatives did during the last seventeen years. They went in, as Mackenzie went out, with a controllable expenditure of $6,542,000; but to-day it has increased to $17,500,000. That is nearly 300 per cent of an increase in the controllable expenditure, and this way of comparison tests the economy of government probably better than any other way it can be tested, by the contrast of figures. Therefore, in seventeen years, the Conservatives have increased the controllable expenditure by $11,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to draw your attention for a few moments to the charge that was made the other night against the Liberal Government. That charge was, that they increased the debt in larger proportion than the Liberal-Conservatives did. I shall give you the figures which will properly and fairly place this matter before the House, and the country, and let them be the judges as to whether the Mackenzie Government was responsible for a greater increase of the debt, than was the Conservative Government. The debt in 1868 was $75,000,000, and we need not go beyond that date, because we all know how that debt came about. In 1874 the debt had risen to $108,000,000, an increase under the Conservatives of about $33,000,000. The Conservative Government, Mr. Speaker, as you know very well, committed themselves to large undertakings previous to going out of power, and which undertakings had to be assumed by the Liberal Government, on taking office. In fact, the Conservatives had already entered upon some of those undertakings, and the Liberal party had to provide the funds for carrying them on. This is what Sir Leonard Tilley said in his Budget speech of 1873, shortly before his party went out of power, and it will show to you what was in prospect for the Liberals at that time. I read from Sir Leonard Tilley's speech:

We are entering upon new and increased engagements, involving a very large sum of money. We are entering upon work—we have already done so—which will require a large increase of our debt. We have $10,000,000 on the Intercolonial Railway; we have $30,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the canal system which has been accepted by the Government, will involve an expenditure of $20,000,000. These are serious matters, inasmuch as they add $60,000,000 to our existing debt.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

That was the statement made by Sir Leonard Tilley in the last Budget speech he delivered before the Liberals came into power. When the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie took the reins of government, he had to accept these responsibilities thrown upon him, and for the sake of the good faith of the country he had to carry out the promises made by his predecessors. During the Liberal regime, much money was spent upon these works, and as a matter of fact, in 1872 and in 1873, no less than $8,000,000 of this expenditure was voted by the Conservative Government, but they made no provisions to meet it, leaving to the Mackenzie Government the responsibility of providing for the appropriations passed by them. During Mr. Mackenzie's regime, he spent on canals, $16,232,000, more than has been spent since he went out of power. He spent on the Canadian Pacific Railway, $11,362,000. The work was undertaken by the previous Government, and, in fact, both sides of the House were pledged to carrying it out. On the Intercolonial Railway, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie spent $10,103,000. The total of these three works, to which Sir Leonard Tilley, the then Finance Minister referred in his Budget of 1873, was $37,697,000, or within a very little of the entire addition which the Liberal Government made to the debt. And now, these hon. gentlemen who put those burdens upon the Liberal Government of that day, turn around in these late years and say that Mackenzie was responsible for it all. It is plain to be seen by the remarks which I have quoted from Sir Leonard Tilley, that Mr. Mackenzie, in this expenditure, was only carrying out the engagements which were entered into by the previous Government, and out of which it was impossible for him to extricate himself. I do not doubt but that these works were necessary. Every one will admit that. But it is not necessary, nor is it fair, nor is it just, to make the Mackenzie Government responsible for all this large expenditure. Since the present Government came into power last, they have increased the debt by no less than $113,000,000, and when they are explaining this enormous increase of debt away, they do it in this way. They say: We required so much for such a public work, and so much for such another public work, and so much for such another public work, and there is value to the country for every dollar. That is all very well, but when we come down to deal with the details of the matter it is a very different story. Then we begin to find out about the Curran bridge on which $200,000 of the money of the people was worse than thrown away, and we begin to find out about the building of the Quebec graving dock, where $750,000 of the people's money was thrown away. We do not complain that these public works were not necessary, but we do complain that the Government was derelict in its duty, and squandered money on these works. They expended far more than was necessary on these works. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that much of this $113,000,000 was needed for public works, but much of it has been extravagantly expended, as I have shown you, and much has been added to our public debt by the corruption and maladministration of this Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, another question to which I wish to direct the attention of the House and the country. The Liberal Government was termed the Government of deficits. Our hon. friends on the other side of the House are getting a little mild now on that question. Deficit after deficit has been rolled up by themselves, so that now they do not feel so free to make charges of derision against the Liberal Government in regard to their deficits. Now, I want to bring these deficits clearly before the members of this House; and if I am astray, I hope the hon. gentleman who is to follow me, and who is generally keen in debate, who reasons out his points very fairly and well, will take note of the figures I intend to present to the House; and if he finds that they are not correct, no person in the House will be more thankful than I to have their incorrectness pointed out. In 1875-76, with a taxation of $18,611,000, and with a total income of $22,588,000, the Liberal Government had a deficit of $1,901,000. In 1876-77, with a taxation of $17,698,000, and with a total income of $22,059,000, the Liberal Government had a deficit of $1,460,000. In 1877-78, with a taxation of $17,842,000, and with a total income of $22,375,000, the Liberal party had a deficit of $1,128,000. Or, with a total taxation, during the three years of deficits, of $54,154,000, and with a total income of $67,022,000, the Liberal party had a total deficit of $4,489,000. Now, this is the point that I want to bring forcibly before the House, that with an average taxation of $18,051,000 during those three years, and with an average income of $22,341,000, they had an average deficit of $1,496,000. Now let us look at the Conservative deficits; and I would just say here that before you can make anything out of a deficit as being in favour of or against a government, you must take into consideration the amount of money they had at their disposal to spend to carry on the affairs of the country. That is an important point. If the taxation of the country is low, then there is greater chance for a deficit to occur. If the taxation of the country is high, and a deficit follow that high taxation, it is evidence of extravagance or corruption on the part of the Government. In 1879, the first year of the Liberal-Conservative Government, with a taxation of $18,477,000 and a total income of $22,518,000, they had a deficit of $1,938,000. In 1879-80, the taxation was $18,480,000, the income $23,308,000, and the deficit $1,543,000. Now, notice, Mr. Speaker, that in 1884-85, with a taxation of $25,385,

000, and an annual income of $32,797,000, they had a deficit of $2,240,000. In 1885-86, they had another deficit. In that year they taxed the people to the extent of $25,227,000 by increased duties, and, with an income of $33,177,000, they had a deficit of $5,835,000. In 1887-88, with an increased taxation of $28,178,000 and a total income of $35,908,000, they had a deficit of $810,000. In 1893-94, with a taxation of $27,579,000, and with a total income of $36,375,000, they had a deficit of $1,210,000. In the last deficit year, 1894-95, with a taxation of $25,446,000, and with an income of $33,978,000, they had a deficit of $4,154,000. Or, with a total taxation during those seven years of $168,772,000 and with a total income of $218,061,000, there was no less a deficit than $17,730,000 under the present Government. Or, with an average of $24,110,000 of taxes every year, and with an average income of $31,151,000, their average deficit was $2,533,000, as compared with the average annual deficit of the Liberal Government of $1,496,000; or they had $1,037,000 more of an annual average deficit, with $6,059,000 more of taxation, and with an annual income of $8,810,000 more than the Liberal Administration. In the face of these facts, with such a large taxation on the people, and with an income from other sources that ran up to so large a sum, how can hon. gentlemen opposite claim that they are justified in having greater deficits than the party that taxed the people $6,059,000 less? Yet the average deficits of the present Government is $1,937,000 more than the average deficits of the Liberal party. If, then, the Liberal Government, the Mackenzie Administration, had taxed the people during the three years of their deficits as this Government have taxed the people during their seven years of deficits, the Liberal Government, instead of having a deficit, would have had a surplus of $12,697,000. Or if the income of the Liberal Government, during the three years of deficits, had been equal to that of the Conservative Government during its seven years of deficits, instead of having a deficit, the Liberal Government would have had a surplus of $21,942,000. Now, I challenge anybody to show wherein this comparison is in error. It is the only true and proper comparison that can be made between the deficits, when you take into consideration the taxation and income. Sir Charles Tupper gave his opinion of the deficits in 1878, as recorded in "Hansard," page 449. He spoke as follows:—

What does he (Sir Richard Cartwright) tell this House? He tells the House now that he does not propose to submit any measure by which this great calamity, this great disaster, this ruin to the credit of the country, shall be averted, although he says that on the 10th of this month (February, 1878), he has a deficit of $617,610.

If the deficit in 1878 could be described as a calamity, a disaster and ruin to the credit of the country. I would like to have that hon. gentleman's opinion of the deficit of $4,154,000 which this Government has. I am sure that the hon. baronet could find no words in his vocabulary—and he has a very large one, full of very strong words—to express his horror at the deficits of his own party, when he had to use such words as “calamity, disaster and ruin to the credit of the country.” in order to express his opinion of the deficit of $617,000 in 1878. I have only touched upon aggregates, and have no time to go into detail to show how the moneys were spent to purchase influence and corrupt the people.

I now intend to take up another plank of the policy of the Liberal party. And surely it will not be said, after I have done, that hon. gentlemen opposite do not know the policy of the Liberal party. I hope that from this time henceforth and for ever that they will know what is the policy of the Liberal party.

An hon. MEMBER. What is it ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There is one gentleman who does not know it yet. This is the next plank to which I am going to draw the attention of the House. This may be the last time when I shall speak on the Budget, I may be left at home at the coming election, and I want to leave behind me the record of the Liberal party, so that when I meet these gentlemen on the public platform I may refer them to my speech, and then go on in the even tenor of my way.

That the convention regrets that by the action of Ministers and their supporters in Parliament, in one case in which serious charges were made against a Minister of the Crown, investigation was altogether refused, while in another case the charges preferred were altered and then referred to a commission appointed upon the advice of the Ministry, contrary to the well-settled practice of Parliament ; and this convention affirms :

That it is the ancient and undoubted right of the House of Commons to inquire into all matters of public expenditure, and into all charges of misconduct in office against Ministers of the Crown, and the reference to royal commissions created upon the advice of the accused is at variance with due responsibility of Ministers to the House of Commons and tends to weaken the authority of the House over the Executive Government, and this convention affirms that the powers of the people's representatives in this regard should on all fitting occasions be upheld.

That contains a proposition which should be adhered to. It is the undoubted right of Parliament both to make and hear charges and take evidence with regard to them. But in 1892 that was denied to an hon. member of this House, who, in his place in this House, took upon himself the responsibility of formulating direct charges against a Minister of the Crown, and asked this House to appoint a committee, so that those charges might be investigated and the honour of Parliament vindicated. The hon. Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) was charged by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) with having received from the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company a large sum of money for political purposes. The charges which he had formulated, he stated in the House he was prepared to prove, if given a committee. But those charges were changed and put in another shape which could not be accepted by the hon. member for West Ontario, and then the Government appointed a commission of their own to take evidence upon those cut and carved charges instead of upon the charge originally made upon the responsibility of a member of this House. The Postmaster General admitted that he had received some money from the Hon. J. S. Ross, who was president of the construction company that built the road, and who had a very large interest in the road itself. That road was receiving subsidies from this Parliament from time to time, amounting in the long run to about a million dollars ; and while they were begging at the door of Parliament for subsidies, one of the Ministers of this Government, who had been approached by this company to use his influence in getting subsidies, was receiving a portion of those Government grants. That money was received by him and put into the boodle fund for the purpose of carrying the elections in Lower Canada. The hon. gentleman admitted this himself before the royal commission. He was asked :

Q. You say you got these different sums, amounting in all to $25,000, from the Hon. Mr. Ross ?—A. I did.

Q. Personally ?—A. Personally.

Q. In what form ?—A. In bank bills.

Q. And you took them in that form to Mr. McGreevy ?—A. I drove from his office to Mr. McGreevy's. The amount never left my hands until it was deposited in the hands of Mr. McGreevy.

You must bear in mind that Mr. McGreevy was the treasurer of the Conservative Government election fund, and this $25,000 was taken out of the subsidies granted to that railway and then carried by the hon. Postmaster General to Mr. McGreevy as treasurer of the fund, and placed in his hands for distribution during election time, to buy up the voters of Quebec. The hon. Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) boasted upon the floor of this House, in my own hearing, a few years ago, that if he had the opportunity he would do it again. He said he was bound to assist his friends, and that he was perfectly justified in taking this money, notwithstanding that it was part of the money given by the Government to that railway company. He said :

I take the full responsibility for my actions and for assisting my friends, because it was necessary to assist them under the peculiar conditions existing in the district of Quebec, which I was looking after. I am prepared to stand or fall by what I have done, considering that I have helped my friends to the extent that I considered legitimate. I say, under the circumstances, what I did on that occasion I would do again to-morrow, in order to help my friends.

This hon. gentleman appeared to be more anxious to help his friends than to help the country who paid him his salary. The idea of a Minister of the Crown standing up in this House after having, by his own admission, received such large sums from a company that was in receipt of subsidies from this country, and saying that he had taken this money to assist his friends in the elections of the time. It appears to me it requires more moral courage—or immoral courage—than any other man in the House could show. Now, although the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) refused to go before the commission on the ground that the Postmaster General was not to be tried upon the charges preferred by him—for that reason the hon. gentleman was perfectly justified in refraining from appearing before that commission—still, he gave the names of witnesses he would have called before the committee that he wished to have appointed. And, though the evidence taken was partial in its nature on many points, still it brought home that the Postmaster General had received large sums of money as testified to by himself. So strong was that evidence that the following resolution was moved in this House on the 22nd March, 1893, in amendment to a motion to go into Supply :

That Mr. Speaker do not leave the Chair, but that it be declared that, in the opinion of this House, the evidence taken by the royal commission appointed last session to inquire into certain charges made against the Hon. Sir A. P. Caron, K.C.M.G., M.P., which was reported to the Government on the 24th November last, and is now laid before us, established facts which should have prevented the subsequent appointment of Sir A. P. Caron to be an adviser of the Crown, and also renders it highly improper that he should continue to hold such office.

Of course that resolution was voted down. But I wish to show that even among those on the Postmaster General's own side of the House, there were men, capable and honest men, men who had the practice of a lifetime in hearing evidence and weighing testimony and reaching proper conclusions, who were so strongly influenced by the evidence taken before that commission that they voted for the resolution. One of these was the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), a man of eminent ability. And I believe he had nothing against this hon. gentleman at all, but, upon weighing all the evidence, he was forced to support that resolution condemnatory of the Postmaster General. Another was the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), whom we all regard as a man of great ability, himself a professor of law and well accustomed to the sifting of evidence. After going through the evidence taken before that royal commission he was forced to the conclusion that the Postmaster General was guilty of the charges laid at his door, and he manfully rose on the floor of this House in the face of the opposition of the vast majority of his political friends and voted for the condemnation of the Postmaster General. Here are two men whose ability and capacity are well known. We know their fairness also. I believe the hon. member for Albert wishes to be fair in these matters, and it must have taken a good deal of moral courage to rise and vote against the large majority of his own party. He would not have done so but that conviction was forced upon him by the evidence. There was others who voted for the condemnation of that transaction.

Now, I might refer to other charges, but I do not wish to take up the time of the House. If I did wish to take up your time, and if I had the strength, I could stand here from now till morning making charges against the Government and substantiating them by as strong evidence as that which convinced the hon. member for Albert when he voted to condemn the Postmaster General. It is clear that the ancient and undoubted right of Parliament was denied by the majority of this chamber in the case to which I have referred, in order to save their friends from public exposure and condemnation.

Now, I know, Mr. Speaker, that you are a very patient man, and therefore I shall impose a little further upon your patience and that of the House. We have another plank in the Liberal platform to which I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen. It deals with the land policy of the Government :

That, in the opinion of this convention, the sales of public lands of the Dominion should be to actual settlers only, and not to speculators, upon reasonable terms of settlement, and in such areas as can be reasonably occupied and cultivated by the settler.

I suppose all will approve of that plank. No doubt you will understand what it means, because the party had great experience—I must speak to the party through you, Mr. Speaker—in this land business. Only a few years ago they gave away so much land to their political friends that had they continued at the same rate, we should have had very little left by this time. Let me give you an insight into what they did. They have already given away to railways and colonization and ranch companies no less than 44,250,000 acres in Manitoba and the North-west. Over 27,000,000 of this have passed out of the hands of the Government altogether. I do not say that there is none of this land which should have been given away, but I do say that a large acreage has been given away to wildcat schemes, that the land has passed into the hands of speculators, and these speculators hold that land for a rise, and thus prevent the actual settlers from going in and occupying those lands. You will remember very well, Mr. Speaker, that some years ago land regulations were adopted in reference to Manitoba dividing the lands into certain belts. For the first five miles—I think it was—on either side of the track the land was to be sold at $4 an acre, in the next belt at $3, in the next at $2, and outside at $1 per acre. Now, there were hundreds of thousands of acres of the outside belt sold for one dollar an acre, in the best parts and the most available sections of Manitoba, for settlement. Take that section through which the South-western Railway runs. It runs through a belt of the most fertile land that can be found in the province of Manitoba, it runs through a belt in which lands were sold by the Government to speculators for one dollar an acre, and the result is that a large section of that country is now held by speculators who are waiting to receive large prices for it, while the actual settlers who would go in there and take up that land for homesteads, are now prevented from doing so because the land is locked up, and they have to pass further to the west. In this way that section of the country is retarded in progress and prosperity, on account of so much of its area lying idle.

By the deterrent influence of the Liberal party in this House, and by the exposures we made of the system of giving large timber limits to the friends of the Administration, the Government has largely refrained from selling timber limits on the same conditions as they did a few years ago. Let it be said to their credit that they took the advice of the Liberal party for once in the interest of the country. Now, let me give you a few examples to show how our public domain was dissipated into the hands of personal friends of the Government. Many will remember Mr. Charles Rykert, formerly a member of this House; Charles Rykert, of scrap book fame, will be well remembered by the older members as a man who got upon the right side of the Government, by some means, and obtained from them a timber limit in the Cypress Hills for which he paid $250. He held that timber limit for a short time, took in a partner with him, and sold it for $200,000. There was $200,000 worth of the timber limits of this country dissipated from the public use, and put into the hands of private individuals, who got rich out of them. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman who will follow me, can he justify the acts of the Government in allowing lands to pass from under their hands into the hands of private parties who make large sums for themselves, thus robbing the young men of this country of the public domain? Then, again, there was an island called Hunter's Island, lying in the disputed territory. A few years ago this Government sold that island to a company for $7,500. That company kept the land for a short time and sold it to a Chicago syndicate for $650,000. Nearly three-quarters of a million of money was about to be realized by the company who received it from the present Government for $7,500. Did that land go into the hands of the syndicate? No, it did not, because the hon. gentleman whom the late Sir John A. Macdonald used to call "the little tyrant," stepped forward, little as he was, and got the courts to issue an injunction to prevent a transfer of the lands from the company who sold it to the Chicago syndicate, until it was decided in whose territory it lay, and were it not for the steps taken by Sir Oliver Mowat, so far as this Government is concerned, at least, that land would have passed into the hands of a foreign syndicate. Now, let me refer to the large area of timber limits that were given to the St. Catharines Milling Company. Limits that were worth almost a million dollars were given away for the paltry sum of $5 per square mile yearly, and whatever stumpage dues were to be paid, which were a bagatelle. Millions of feet of lumber were cut and floated down to the river's mouth, and then again "the little tyrant" came forward in the interest of this Canada of ours, and had an injunction issued to prevent the company from moving the logs until it was decided to whom the timber belonged. And did the Federal Government take the side of the province, or did it take the side of the St. Catharines Milling Company? Sir, they went so far as to appeal the case to the Privy Council of England, and the Federal Government footed every dollar of the expense on behalf of the said milling company against the province. But "the little tyrant," as usual, came out on top, and won the case, and restored that property to the province of Ontario, thus preventing those lands from being dissipated into the hands of private parties, and keeping them for the use of settlers. Sir, I now come to another case. You will remember it, Sir, because you were on the floor of this House when this case was discussed, and you will know whether I am correct in my figures. Mr. Robillard, now the senior member for the city of Ottawa in this House, made application to the Government, a few years ago, for a timber limit. He obtained that limit by paying the paltry sum of $5 for every square mile annually, and by also paying the paltry sum of 75 cents or $1 for every thousand feet of board measure that was taken off the land. That hon. gentleman had two parties who were acting with him, one of whom was Mr. Riopelle, and the other man's name I forget. That limit, which was purchased for $315—for that is every cent that went into the exchequer of this country for that limit—was sold by that company of three men, within a few months, for $50,000. There was $50,000 worth of timber taken out of the hands of the young men of this country and placed in the hands of three individuals, who manipulated the Government in the first place, and who sold the land afterwards at that enormous profit. Mr. Speaker, I know this much personally about the matter. I was sitting one day at the dinner table, and a stranger was sitting before me, at the time this question was under discussion in this House. He said to me: "Did Mr. Robillard state in the House that he reaped no advantage from that transaction?" I said he did. "Well," he said, "I cannot understand it, for I am one of the company, my name is Riopelle, and Robillard made $15,000 out of it, which he put into his pocket." Mr. Robillard was not a member of the House at the time, but he afterwards became a member. But was that all this land was worth? Not at all. That land was kept by the company for two years, and after a large portion of the timber had been taken off, it was sold for $60,000 to another company. The third company worked it for two years longer, and then sold the limit for $100,000. Sir, the Government were cognizant of these facts, they knew that these timber limits were passing into the hands of private parties who were making enormous profits out of them. Sir, all this was going on, notwithstanding the influence that the Liberal party sought to exert against it, and notwithstanding the exposures made year after year of the enormous dissipation of the timber limits of our country. No less than 112 Orders in Council were passed assigning these limits to friends of the Government. Now, an Order in Council does not mean a license to cut, but an Order in Council gave them the first chance of accepting the limit, if the limit was of any value. Many of them gave up the limits because they found there was not much timber upon them. But the intention of the Government was all the same to part with the public property for the advantage of their friends. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope that if the Liberal party gets into power we will establish a system of dealing with the public lands of Canada that will be more in the interest of the people, and less in the interest of speculators, boodlers and others. Now I come to speak of another plank in the policy of the Liberal party. I want to draw the attention of the House and the country to one of the most iniquitous Acts ever perpetrated on a free people—I have reference to the Franchise Act, which was placed on the statute-book in 1884, an Act against which the Liberal party protested in order to prevent themselves being politically destroyed by this measure, which would enable revising officers to place on the lists men whose names had no right to be there. Let me read this plank so that hon. gentlemen opposite will not forget it. It is as follows:—

That the Franchise Act since its introduction has cost the Dominion Treasury over a million of dollars, besides entailing a heavy expenditure to both political parties;

That each revision involves an additional expenditure of a further quarter of a million;

That this expenditure has prevented an annual revision, as originally intended, in the absence of which young voters entitled to the franchise have, in numerous instances, been prevented from exercising their natural rights;

That it has failed to secure uniformity, which was the principal reason assigned for its introduction;

That it has produced gross abuses by partisan revising barristers appointed by the Government of the day.

That its provisions are less liberal than those already existing in many provinces of the Dominion, and that in the opinion of this convention the Act should be repealed, and we should revert to the provincial franchise.

I am sure the hon. gentleman who will follow me is as much opposed to this Act as I am. I believe he is of the opinion, if he dare only state it in this House, that the Act has been a complete failure, that it has involved both parties in heavy expense, loss of time, and a great deal of irritation, as well as involving the Government in an expenditure of nearly a million dollars. Every time the lists are revised, the work costs a quarter of a million. The election of 1891 was thrust upon the country on a list three years old, on the list of 1888, which contained thousands of names of persons who had no right to vote in 1891, while at the same time, thousands of young men who had come of age during the preceding period had no opportunity of voting. So there was great injustice done to the young men of the country on the one hand, and to the parties whose names were retained, on the other. The Act was not necessary. There were no petitions presented to this House for a change. The lists were previously better prepared than was possible under this Act, because every one who is at all acquainted with municipal matters knows that the local lists were prepared by parties who are outside of politics. They are prepared by trustee boards, and in towns they are prepared by independent parties for the purpose of voting on by-laws, and these men were interested in having them perfect on that ground, and councillors had an interest in these lists being perfect. For these reasons, these provincial and local lists are better adapted for the election of members of Parliament than any list that can be got up by a revising officer. In view of these facts, upon which I do not intend to dwell at length, I desire to point out that if the Liberal party comes into power, and that is as sure as there is an electric light over my head, within a few months—so hon. gentlemen opposite had better prepare for the inevitable—this Franchise Act will be repealed, to the advantage of the Liberal party and to the advantage of the Conservative party, for there is not a single revision of the list when a candidate or his friends are not called upon to pay $200 or $300 out of their pockets. That was the result of this iniquitous, unfair and unjust Act. If we fall back on the provincial lists it will be to the advantage of every party concerned. As the people in the province of Quebec are opposed to manhood suffrage, that is no reason why it should be withheld from the province of Ontario, where, in fact, we have manhood suffrage at elections for the local legislature. There is no reason why one province should be held back because another is not inclined to advance. What matters it as regards elections for members of the Federal Parliament on what qualification they are elected? A certain number of members are sent here from each province, and that can be efficiently done by using the franchise of the provinces. If one province is not as far advanced as another, that is no reason why we in the west who believe that young men of twenty-one years under our educational system are perfectly qualified to discharge the onerous and important duties of the franchise, should not have a wider franchise. These young men contribute largely to the revenues of the country through articles which they buy and on which duties are levied, and there is no reason whatever why they should not have a voice in the election of members to this House. Again, if they possessed the right of the franchise, they would take a deeper interest in the public affairs than if excluded by this Act called the Franchise Act of the Federal Government. In view of these facts I would convey to the members on the Government side of the House the pleasing information that in three or four months the Act will be repealed and candidates will be relieved from the extraordinary expense now incurred in revising the lists.

There is another plank in the policy of the Liberal party which I wish to impress on hon. gentlemen opposite, and I wish to press it very strongly lest hon. gentlemen should forget it in repeating the charges that we are commercial unionists or annexationists or free traders, as they are in England, or something else. Listen, learn and weigh :

That by the gerrymander Acts, the electoral divisions for the return of members of the House of Commons have been so made as to prevent a fair expression of the opinion of the country at the general elections, and to secure to the party now in power a strength out of all proportion greater than the number of electors supporting them would warrant. To put an end to this abuse, to make the House of Commons a fair exponent of public opinion, and to preserve the historic continuity of counties, it is desirable that in the formation of electoral divisions, county boundaries should be preserved, and that in no case parts of different counties should be put in one electoral division.

I suppose you are aware, Mr. Speaker, that this is the policy of the Liberal party, for when the redistribution took place a few years ago, I myself presented to this House a plan by which all the redistribution of

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Ontario could be made without interfering with any county boundary. County boundaries were effaced and the territories cut and carved to suit the needs of the party in power, so that, as the hon. gentleman properly stated that, looking over the map, it appeared as if the electoral districts had been laid out by chain lightning. What has the Gerrymander Act done for the Liberals? We are represented in this House by a minority. Why are our numbers so small? It is by the operation of the Gerrymander Act, and I will show that conclusively, and in such a manner that no hon. gentleman can answer the argument. How can I do it? The returns of the elections of 1891, corrected by the returns of the by-elections, show that 186,000 Conservatives polled their votes in the province of Ontario, as against 182,000 Liberals, a difference of only 4,000 in that vast number. One would suppose, according to those figures, that out of the 92 members from Ontario, the Liberals should have 45 and a fraction of a member, if that were possible, and the Conservatives, 46 and a fraction. That would be the division. Should not the Liberals have the same power of recording their votes with the same results following, as have the Conservatives? Was that the case? Look at the facts. After that election, the Conservatives returned to this House 59 members on 186,000 votes, and the Liberals with 182,000 votes returned only 33 members. Was that fair or just? In other words, it required only 3,150 votes to send a Conservative to this House, and it required 9,950 Liberal votes to send a Liberal member to the House. In the face of that, is it not conclusively demonstrated that the gerrymander, by which a large number of Liberal voters were hived together, deprived them of their power to return a fair proportion of the members? In this way, a large number of the supporters of the Government here, are in the House by Act of Parliament, and not by the will of the people.

I now come to speak of the Senate, and this is the plank of the Liberal party upon that question :

The present constitution of the Senate is inconsistent with the federal principle in our system of government, and is, in other respects, defective, as it makes the Senate independent of the people, and uncontrolled by the public opinion of the country, and should be so amended as to bring it into harmony with the principles of popular government.

If I had my will—and now I speak for myself—if I had my will the Senate would be abolished altogether. I believe that the House of Commons of Canada has sufficient broadness of mind, and sufficient penetration and capacity, to examine every feature of every law which comes before it, so that the review of another House is not necessary. It is a fact, that a large number of these emigentlemen who occupy the Red Chamber, have passed the age at which they are capable of thoroughly investigating these questions. A large number of them are, like myself, getting well up in years. They have lost the energy of their youth, and they no longer possess that penetration and capacity which they formerly enjoyed. As they get up in years, between the sixties and the seventies, and between the seventies and the eighties, and more particularly between the eighties and the nineties, they have not that energy necessary to criticise and to review the legislation which passes through the hands of younger men. I have every respect for these gentlemen—just as much as I have for myself—but I am looking at the Senate from a Canadian standpoint, and I believe it to be the interest of all parties to abolish that institution, and to have only one Chamber. You know very well, Sir, that the province of Ontario, the banner province of the Dominion, never had an Upper House, and they have conducted their affairs better—I think I can use that word advisedly—than has any other province. If the province of Ontario can do that in connection with their affairs, I think the Federal Government can do it in connection with its affairs. It appears that when the Senate was first instituted, it was established at the instance of the smaller provinces, which supposed that in any case coming up affecting their interest, a majority of the House of Commons might in a party spirit, take advantage of them. The Upper Chamber was, therefore, instituted in order to refer to it any such question. If the smaller provinces are willing to abolish the Senate then we should be all willing, and if they are not willing, then we can continue the Senate and make it representative in its character. This could be done by placing the appointments with the local legislatures, as is done in the United States; or, the senators could be elected by the people from certain districts, as was the case before the present system came into vogue. The Senate has ceased to be a body which can review questions from both political aspects. You know, Mr. Speaker, that every appointment, or nearly every appointment, to the Senate during the last 17 years, has been made from the ranks of the Conservative party, until at the present day, there are only 10 or 12 Liberals in that House. How is it possible that the two political sides of a question can be properly presented. Suppose an important measure passes this House after a discussion from both sides, how can it receive a thorough discussion from both sides in the Senate, when there is actually only one side there. Therefore, the present constitution of the Senate should be so changed as to allow the people to send to it, either a supporter or an opponent of the Government. Suppose the Liberal party came into power tomorrow, and passed in this House a measure opposed to the views of the Conservatives, the Senate would throw it out; and consequently, a branch of Parliament which did not represent anybody on earth, or in the heavens above, or in the waters beneath, would have the power of vetoing such a Bill, although it was the will of the people that it should become law. These arguments are plain, and they will appeal to the honest convictions of any man who can look upon the question from a non-political standpoint. I am, therefore, in favour of the abolition of the Senate, or failing that, I am in favour of the reorganization of the Senate upon a proper basis, making it somewhat responsible to the people of this country, and decreasing the number.

There is still another plank in the Liberal platform which reads thus:

That, whereas public attention is at present much directed to the consideration of the admittedly great evils of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite.

I do not think it is necessary for me to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that personally I am a prohibitionist. Personally I would like to see a good prohibition measure placed upon the statute-books of the country, and unless we get a good one, I do not want one at all. I want a good prohibition measure with sufficient machinery to carry its provisions into effect, for I believe that without that efficient machinery and without reliable officers to enforce it, the condition would be worse than if there was no such law at all. I believe, Sir, that a thorough prohibition law passed through this House would be endorsed largely by the sentiments of the people. As I said, I believe that officers should be appointed to enforce it, and I do not believe that this work should be left to private individuals in various centres of the country. I believe, Sir, that this is one of the most important questions which can engage the attention of the people of this generation. When we know that the traffic in intoxicating liquors wages war against the very best feelings, against the very highest hopes, and against everything that is sacred in the human breast; and when we know that hundreds of thousands of people are annually incarcerated behind the bars of prison cells, because strong drink has stimulated them to commit crimes they would not commit were it not for drink; when we know all this, we see the importance of effectually stopping the liquor traffic. There are hundreds and thousands of people throughout this country crying to the Parliament of Canada to put upon the statute-book a law that will stem the tide of intemperance which so malignantly intensifies the sufferings of the people of this country. But, Sir, I would not like prohibition to be carried by a party vote. I believe it should not be carried by a party vote. If it were, then it would become a political question per se, and at every election both parties would be at each other's throats in regard to the maintenance or the repeal of the prohibitory law, so that in a few years, by a snatch vote, it might be repealed, and the system of intemperance would then be wider and stronger than ever. The end we have in view would not be accomplished nearly so quickly as it will be if we move forward and try to have the law carried by the united vote of both parties. I think that is all I need to say on that question. You know my views upon it, and you know the policy of the Liberal party. That party do not bind themselves to pass a law without first consulting the people as to whether it should be passed. If they come into power, a plebiscite will be submitted, so that the people can vote yea or nay on the question, and if the majority of the people of this country want prohibition, the Liberal party are pledged by their platform to give prohibition and to enact a law that will be properly enforced.

Now, Sir, that ends the planks of the Liberal party's policy. Mr. Speaker, you will clearly see, after my speaking to you for nearly five hours, that the issue between us is cleanly cut on those planks, and the line of demarcation is distinctly drawn. The party of hon. gentlemen opposite have accepted the protective system, as they have carried it out for seventeen years, while we on this side have accepted a revenue tariff, with duties so based on the various articles as to press as lightly as possible upon the consumers of the country, and as heavy as need be on those who are able to pay.

Many sections of this country have already condemned the Government and their policy as strongly as I have this afternoon. Nealy all the by-elections have pronounced against them and against their policy. They had an election a few weeks ago in Montreal Centre, a riding which at last general election returned a member here by 1,200 majority. That majority was reversed, and now we have from that riding a Liberal supporting the policy which I have outlined this afternoon, with a majority of 300, testifying plainly that the Government have lost control in Montreal, and have lost the confidence of the electorate of that city. Then, the riding of Antigonish last year went back on the Government, and showed that it was not in accord with their policy. Although so eminent a statesman as the late Sir John Thompson represented that riding in this House, and although one might suppose that for the sake of his memory as leader of the Government, and as a man of great power and capacity, the electors of that riding would have stood by the policy of which he had been the exponent, my hon. friend Mr. McIsaac went in there a comparatively young man, without a dollar in his pocket, and defeated the Conservative candidate, and he is here to-day a supporter of the policy of the Liberal party. The county of Verchères, that good old Reform county, which sent here such a noble man as the late Hon. Mr. Geoffrion, who was at one time a member of the Liberal Government, and stood nobly by the principles of the Liberal party for so many years, sent back here his brother to sustain and support the Liberal party in their demands for what is right and just in the interests of the country. Then Cardwell, which has been a Conservative riding for many years, also had an election. The Government sent their ablest men to speak in the school houses and in the small town halls throughout that county, and sent a large sum of money there for the purpose of gaining support of the electors for the policy of the Conservative party, but notwithstanding all the efforts they put forth, a candidate was returned here who is in the main a supporter of the Liberal policy on the trade question, and on many other questions; and I have no doubt that after he has been here a year and hears the arguments on both sides, he will strip himself clean of every shred of the Conservative policy, and come over here as a Liberal. Then, West Huron has been redeemed. The present Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, the late Minister of Militia, went to that riding, and by a snatch vote, obtained a majority. He made promises there in my own hearing which brought to him many votes. This is one of the promises which he made at the town of Clinton, on the same platform where I was present to oppose him. He said:

Gentlemen, farmers, I am here to announce this fact. To-day, three hon. members of the Administration at Ottawa have left for Washington to negotiate a treaty; and two things that are going to be put upon the free list are binder-twine and agricultural implements.

That was a statement made by an accredited agent of the Government, running in that riding, and many farmers supported him, believing that the Government honestly intended to negotiate a treaty, and had gone down to Washington to do so. But, Sir, that riding had been redeemed, and now it is represented here by a staunch old war horse in politics who has fought the Conservative party for many years, and who is here standing by his guns and ready to give them the same fight that he has given them for many years past. Again, we have the county of Charlevoix, which in the last general election returned a supporter of the Government; and I do not think he thought a great deal of the Government, though he voted for them. He was a noble man, though not one of strong convictions. But when he died and the by-election was brought on, a supporter of the Liberal party, I am glad to say, was returned to this House, and he is here to-day. Then Jacques Cartier has also gone back on the policy of the Government, and has sent here a supporter of the Liberal programme which I have spread out before you to-day, and which I hope you will never forget. I might also refer to North Ontario. Now, in North Ontario a member has been sent here to support the Government in some things and in other things I understand he is not going to support them. There were seven Ministers of the Crown sent from here into that riding, and the hon. gentleman opposite me (Mr. Costigan) was one of them. It was said that he went round the concessions from door to door asking his people to vote against Mr. Gillespie. However, I am not in a position to prove that and only give it as hearsay. I do not wish to make any charge against any man, but I simply give what I hear as having heard it. Six other Ministers went into that riding and put forth every effort to defeat Mr. Gillespie. It is not very often that you find Ministers of the Crown coming down to address meetings of ten or a dozen people; yet so small were some of these meetings, that the Minister sat down in a chair, crossed his legs, and conversed with his audience. Many an audience of that kind greeted some of the Ministers in North Ontario. Against a total vote polled for the two candidates opposed by the Government, of 2,400, these hon. Ministers succeeded in obtaining a vote of 2,100 in support of their candidate, so that there really was 300 of a majority against the Government. They must perceive that they have lost the support of the people, and they should be prepared to throw up the sponge, and go back to the people and ask for a new verdict. If they do, they will not be returned in their present numbers, but the Liberal party will be returned and form a Government to carry out the principles contained in the planks of the Liberal policy.

Mr. CRAIG. I am sure the House will be very glad to know that I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman through all the various matters he has discussed. We may congratulate him on having at least good staying powers; and if that is the result of prohibition principles, I think it is a very good argument in favour of prohibition. I am sure the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) must feel like resigning his position and allowing the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) to become the financial critic of the Opposition. However, I will leave these gentlemen to settle that between themselves. I was a little surprised to hear the hon. gentleman refer to the election in Cardwell, but he carefully omitted telling us that the Liberal candidate there lost his deposit. I think that is something on which he might reflect with profit to himself and on which the whole party may reflect with profit to themselves, and perhaps learn something about their policy. I might also refer them to North Ontario, where, although the Liberal candidate did not lose his deposit, he came within 40 of doing so. So that I think the hon. gentleman and the Opposition need not take much comfort in those two elections.

The hon. gentleman gave us a long speech about four and a half hours in length, and I am very glad that not many members take as long as that to address the House. If they did, I am afraid the speaking would have to be confined to very few. But the hon. member took up a great part of his time, not in discussing the Budget, but in a criticism of all the mistakes he could rake up against the present Government. He referred, I notice, to the gerrymander. Well, I would just advise him to discuss that question with the hon. Premier of Ontario. And I think he might possibly find that while this Government have perhaps done a little in this way, they could learn a good many lessons from the Ontario government. Now, I do not claim that this Government, any more than any other government, is perfect. I do not claim that we have a Government composed of angels who can never make mistakes or of men who know everything, who can see into the future and prevent any mistakes that might occur; but I do claim that the Government administers the affairs of this House as well as we might reasonably expect human beings to administer them. Generally I may say that the affairs of this country are conducted ably and economically, but we claim besides that our policy is the best policy for the country. In the remarks I shall make to-night I intend to advocate that policy, and to show that it is one adapted to a country such as Canada. If I chose to retaliate, I might refer the hon. member to that celebrated letter of Mr. Mackenzie, in which he said that while he was Premier of this country he had to keep the Department of Public Works in his own hands and, to use his own words, he had to sleep on his arms to guard the treasury against the attacks of his own friends.

I intend to discuss the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party. The Opposition do not care to discuss that policy, but they want in every way to divert the attention of the country from it by talking about all other matters and all the scandals they can rake up. In the short time that I shall address this House, for I do not intend to be very long, I want to make a plain statement of facts which may perhaps escape the people as they listen to members of the Opposition. Sometimes these hon. gentlemen talk about free trade, and when they are discussing the subject of free trade, I ask myself, what about the revenue of the country? They forget to tell the people that we must have a revenue, that the people must be taxed one way or other, if not by customs and excise, then by direct taxation. I do not believe there are any members on either side in favour of direct taxation. Now, what is this money collected for? I notice that in the year ending the 30th June, 1895, the amount collected from customs was $17,640,000, and excise, $7,800,000. Sometimes the people imagine that all the money expended last year, about $38,000,000 was collected from the people by customs and excise, and principally by customs; and when speakers of the Opposition go to the country they make the people believe,—I do not say intentionally—but by their speeches they do make them believe that all this expenditure of $36,000,000 or $38,000,000 is taken out of the people by taxes of some sort. This is not the case. In the year ending 30th June, 1895, while the amount expended was $38,000,000, a great part of that was not what could be called properly expense and was not taken out of the people of the country. A great part of that, amounting to $8,500,000, was received from railways, canals, post offices, and public works and other ways, and was not a tax on the people of the country at all. I found that the amount required to be collected last year, in order that we might come out square, was $29,600,000. I mention this fact because a great many people think that the total amount of expenditure is collected from them by customs. And that is the reason they are sometimes led to believe that the taxes are very high and that they are oppressed by them. I repeat that we must have a revenue, and I think that we all agree that the best way and the easiest way to collect that revenue is by customs and excise.

Now, the second statement that I have to make is that the tariff should be as little burdensome as possible. I think we will all agree on that subject also. I heard the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat make a statement very much the same. I wish to show that the tariff imposed by this Government is a tariff of that kind, that it is so arranged as to be as little burdensome upon the people of this country as possible. If we analyse this tariff we shall find that the rich pay the greater portion of the taxes. I hold that this is as it should be. I find that the necessaries of life are, most of them, on the free list, while others are very lightly taxed. Among the articles on the free list which were taxed under the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite, I find, for instance, tea and coffee. These are articles of daily consumption in every home. It has been said sometimes that the workingmen and farmers are oppressed by the taxation imposed by this tariff. If they are oppressed I am sure they do not know it. It takes many speakers on the other side going through the country to induce even some of the farmers and workingmen to believe that they are oppressively taxed. If they were left to themselves, they would never find it out. We find that the articles used by the great consuming masses are as cheap here as anywhere else. We find that clothing in this country is very cheap; it is simply astonishing at what low prices clothing can be bought. If we compare the prices of to-day with those of some years ago, we find that the National Policy, instead of making clothing dear, has had the very opposite effect. There are large establishments in this country turning out ready-made clothing and selling it at very low prices. And ready-made clothing is made in a vastly different styles from that of a few years ago, and as now made it is good enough for any man to wear. I am satisfied that if any farmer or workingman were asked if he considered that clothing were too dear he would say that he considered it almost too cheap. He might say the same of boots and shoes. Under the National Policy the boot and shoe business has advanced with very rapid strides. Some years ago we were a good deal behind the people on the other side of the line in our styles and methods of manufacture, but to-day goods of Canadian manufacture can be bought just as good in every respect as those of the United States, and just as cheap. I think that no one will complain to-day of the price of boots and shoes in this country: I think I have shown that whoever the tariff may oppress, and I hold it does not oppress any one, certainly the farmers and workingmen have no reason to complain on this account. I have already said that I think it perfectly right that the rich should pay the greater part of the taxes. Those who wish to wear clothing made in England, those who wish to wear American boots, I think should pay the duty on those goods. I think no one will object to that. But the farmers and workingmen, unless they were told it by those who seek to prejudice them against the Government are not likely to feel that they are oppressed by the tariff.

Then the tariff should be arranged so as to encourage the manufacture of goods that can be profitably made in this country. That is what we call protection, and I am glad to say that the Liberal Conservative party does take its stand on moderate protection. We are not in favour of high protection. I know that we are charged with being a high protectionist party, with building a Chinese wall around this country. That is very far from being the case. But we do believe in moderate protection, in the principle that I have laid down that the tariff should be so arranged as to encourage the manufacture of goods that can be profitably made in this country. And as a means to this, we believe that raw materials should be, as far as possible, free. That policy, as a matter of fact, we carry out. Making raw materials free has tended very largely to encourage manufacturing in this country. I might point to the manufacture of woollens, and to the manufacture of cottons, which has grown to such large proportions mainly through protection upon the finished goods and the admission of the raw materials free. There is one respect in which I believe the tariff could be advantageously amended. There is machinery necessary to the manufacture of woollen goods, boots and shoes and leather, which is not made in this country, and which never will be made in this country, at least not for the next twenty-five or fifty years. I think machinery of this kind, which if allowed to come in free would tend to cheapen many articles of clothing, ought to be admitted free. That would be the means of encouraging the manufacture in this country of goods that can profitably be produced here; and I hope the Government will take the matter into consideration. Looking over some debates of many years ago, I find that Sir Charles Tupper, in 1876, criticizing the Mackenzie Government, said:

I do not think there was much protection in taxing machinery that, for the purpose of fostering industries, we had allowed to come into our country free.

I think that this is a matter it would be well for the Government to consider. But we ought not only to have raw materials free and machinery that cannot be manufactured in this country free, but we ought to have a moderate protection on goods that can profitably be made here. And I wish to emphasize again that we wish moderate protection and to disabuse the minds of the people of this country of the idea that we advocate high protection.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Rice, for instance.

Mr. CRAIG. Sir, there may be one or two cases of what might be called high protection. But I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to prove that, generally speaking, the tariff is a high protection tariff. In many cases, I believe, the tariff is too low. It is charged that the Finance Minister, in revising the tariff, made a great many changes and then put the articles back to their former duties. I am able to deny that. I know that the protection on many articles was reduced at that time, and that to-day the protection is not what it ought to be, and I shall be very glad personally, though I do not expect it to have the protection on some of these articles increased again.

Now, Sir, I wish to advance an argument in favour of protection which I believe will have some force with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I intend to quote a speech—delivered a long time ago, it is true, in 1876—by an hon. gentleman who is still a member of this House. I refer to the hon. member from South Brant (Mr. Paterson). The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) made a speech in 1876 discussing the financial depression. At that time the financial depression of the country was so great, while hon. members on the other side of the House were in power, that a committee was moved to inquire into the subject to see if they could find out the causes of this depression. Now, in order to be fair, I do not wish to say that the depression was caused entirely by the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I do say, as was said by some of their own supporters at that time, that they did not take any means to remove that depression; that when the causes of that depression were pointed out to them by members of the Opposition, and by members of their own party, they refused to take any steps to remove those causes. I intend to read an extract from a speech delivered on February 17, 1876, by the hon. member for Brant, which showed that at that time he was in favour of moderate protection, although the Government which he supported, and the Finance Minister of that Government, were entirely opposed to protection in any case. This is what he says:

It is well known that we pay a cash bonus to the inhabitants of other countries to come to Canada and settle in our midst. It is a fact that some of those who have been thus induced to emigrate to Canada, have been compelled, from want of employment to which they have been accustomed, to go to the United States. I believe by a defensive tariff—

He said he was not a protectionist, he did not believe in protection, but he said at that time that he was in favour of a defensive tariff, which I hold is just what we advocate to-day.

—I believe by a defensive tariff you would not have to pay to bring those men here. Adopt it, and you will find the steam-whistle of our factories will be a call for them to come.

The other year, the Finance Minister, in revising the tariff, gave some encouragement to our industry which it never had before. The result was that a thousand men, who were engaged in that industry in Germany, were literally transported by the change in the tariff to Canada, and set to work here. The cost of the article was not increased one iota, and Canada got all the benefit. The middlemen suffered a diminution of profits; but for them nobody seems to care much, the producer and consumer receiving all the sympathy. It is inevitable that a like result would flow to other manufacturers under the same policy.

Sir, I do not think that any stronger argument can be used than is used in these words, that a moderate protection is a benefit to a country situated as we are. Now, there is another subject about which I will say a word, and that is drawbacks of duty on manufactures exported. I find that members on the other side of the House make great objection to this. They make it a criticism against the Government, they attack the Government because they allow a drawback of duty on articles that have entered into manufactures exported to other countries. Well, Sir, all I can say is this: I consider that it is a policy which is beneficial, not only to the manufacturers themselves, not only to the workmen who are employed, and who would otherwise not find employment at all, but I hold it is beneficial to the farmers themselves, for whom a larger market for their produce is created by the workmen who are engaged in these manufactures. The argument is used especially in regard to reaping machines which are exported, and it is said that they are sold cheaper in foreign markets than they are to our own farmers. It is said the drawback of duty is allowed on those which are exported to foreign countries, and that on those sold to our own farmers, no drawback is allowed. Well, Sir, I think in doing this the Government are encouraging manufacturers to make these machines for export which otherwise would not be made in this country at all, but which would be made in the United States; and I ask whether it is not better that drawbacks should be allowed so that the machines might be made here, and employment given to our workingmen, and a larger market created for the produce of our farmers, than that they should be made in the United States. I have a few figures here which I shall read, showing the increase in Canadian industries from 1881 to 1891:

Capital invested.....	$165,300,000	$353,800,000
No. of employees.....	255,000	368,000
Wages paid.....	$ 59,400,000	$ 99,762,000
Cost of raw materials....	180,000,000	256,000,000
Value of products.....	309,676,000	475,455,000

INCREASES.

Capital	$188,500,000
Employees	113,000
Wages	$ 40,330,000
Raw materials.....	76,000,000
Product	165,769,000

Sir, I think a statement like that alone is sufficient to justify the National Policy in this country. I think an increase of wages of over $40,000,000 is enough to show the workingmen of this country that the National Policy is for their benefit, and I shall add as well, that it is enough to show the farmers of this country that an increase in wages of $40,000,000, which was almost entirely spent on farm produce, is proof that the National Policy has benefited the farmer as well. Now, I am going to give one or two more quotations from the debates of 1876, and I shall quote now from another member of this House, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton): At that time he adduced a very strong argument in favour of protection, although he was connected with a party that was not in favour of protection, and he closed his speech by saying that he was still going to maintain his confidence in the Government. But I have not the least doubt that in what he said he expressed his real sentiments. On February 29, 1876, the hon. member for North Norfolk, speaking of the United States, said:

It has been charged that protection has prevented the extension of foreign commerce in that country. That may be true; but it is estimated that the domestic commerce of the United States last year reached the enormous proportions of 200,000,000 tons, valued at $10,000,000,000. What is the foreign commerce of that country compared with the vast domestic trade that goes on increasing without the fluctuations or risks of foreign trade? Look at the progress of the cotton trade in that country. Previous to the import duties on foreign cottons, in 1824, British manufactures crushed out all efforts to establish factories in the republic; but the imposition of 25 per cent duty on foreign cottons had the effect in a few years, not only of building up manufactories, but led to the production of an article better in quality and lower in price than the Americans received from British manufactories before their own industries were established. In 1860 the United States were exporters of cottons, exporting nearly 10 per cent of the whole amount manufactured. The same way with the iron trade.

I think this is a subject in which we are vitally interested. We find in some parts of this country a great deal of criticism on the iron duty. Now, the hon. member went on to say:

All attempts to establish iron industries were crushed out by foreign competition, and high prices were maintained at intervals—higher, on the average, than the percentage necessary to produce them in the United States at a profit. But, when a protective duty was imposed, iron manufactories were established, and in a short time the price of iron was brought down several dollars per ton, and it is now sold cheaper than the British iron ever was offered for on that market.

Sir, I hope that we shall see the same result in this country, I believe we shall see the same result in this country. I believe that while it is admitted that the duties on iron are comparatively high at the present time, we shall see the same results flowing from the duties on this article as were mentioned by the hon. member for North Norfolk. I believe that we shall see iron reduced in price by competition among manufacturers in this country. I am sure that hon. members were all pleased to see that an iron smelting furnace was established in Hamilton lately. That is a testimony to the National Policy. I feel satisfied that if it were not for the National Policy, and that the Liberal-Conservative party is in power that furnace would never have been established. I have another quotation to read to the House. Mr. Devlin, at that time member for Montreal, speaking on the same day in 1876, said:

Look at our position to-day: look into the great metropolitan city of the Dominion and see the condition of her artisans, labourers and others, who have, many of them now to depend on the soup-kitchens and the charity of the citizens of Montreal to save them from starvation.

I wish the House to remember that this gentleman was a Liberal, he was not speaking against the Government as an enemy, because he was a friend of the Government, but he was pointing out the condition of the country caused by their policy, and he was asking them to introduce something to relieve their distress and to alter their policy, but he asked in vain. He proceeded to say :

Similar distress exists in other cities of the Dominion, and what is the cause? Surely, there must be something wrong in the Government, when, with all our natural advantages, and with the wonderful products of our soil, thousands of workmen are in a state of destitution. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to entertain free-trade opinions and give expression to them in this House, but they will have very little weight with men who have wives and children who are starving, and are told to wait and suffer a little more until the policy of the Finance Minister has been more fully developed.

Sir, I do not think we need ask any stronger criticism of the hon. gentlemen who were in power at that time; I do not think we need ask any stronger criticism of their policy at the present day, because they have not altered it at all. To-day, they claim that if they came into power they would adopt and follow the same policy, and I am a little afraid they would produce results such as are stated in the quotations I have read. But while the tariff should encourage manufactures in this country, I believe it should be arranged to encourage agriculture. It is sometimes said to the farmers that the manufacturers get all the benefit of the National Policy, it is sometimes said to the farmers that we are the enemies of the farmers, that we are building up bloated manufacturers, men who are rolling in wealth, while the farmers are struggling, toiling and making nothing and paying a heavy toll for the benefit of the manufacturers. I hold that this is very far from the truth. I believe that our tariff is arranged so as to encourage agriculture. The Liberal-Conservative party are the true friends of the farmers of this country, and the farmers of the country know it.

What protection have the farmers? I have prepared a list of some of the articles on which the farmers are protected, which I will read to the House. It is as follows :

DUTIES ON ANIMALS AND AGRICULTURAL AND ANIMAL PRODUCTS.

Animals, living, n.e.s.	20 per cent.
Live hogs.	1½c. per lb.
Salt beef, in barrel.	2c. per lb.
Fresh meats, n.e.s.	30c. per lb.
Hog products.	2c. per lb.
Canned meats.	25 per cent.
Fresh mutton and lamb.	35 per cent.
Lard and cottolene.	2c. per lb.
Tallow.	20 per cent.
Butter.	4c. per lb.
Cheese.	3c. per lb.
Condensed milk.	3c. per lb.

Apples.	40c. per brl.

Hay.	$2 per ton.
Fresh vegetables.	25 per cent.
Barley.	30 per cent.
Corn.	7½c. per bush.
Cornmeal.	40c. per brl.
Oats.	10c. per bush.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Can the hon. gentleman tell us why corn should be taxed 7½ cents and oats 10 cents, corn being a dearer article?

Mr. CRAIG. I will not discuss that point at present.

Oatmeal.	20 per cent.
Wheat.	15c. per bush.
Wheat flour.	75c. per brl.
Fresh tomatoes.	20c. per bush. & 10 per cent.
Canned corn.	1½c. per lb.

Apples, dried or evaporated.	25 per cent.
Grapes.	2c. per lb.
Peaches.	1c. per lb.
Honey.	3c. per lb.

I have made out this list to show the members of this House who have not looked into the question and the farmers that if any men are protected the farmers are, that protection is not arranged for the manufacturers alone, but is arranged just as well and more fully for the farmers. I wish to refer for a moment, as I said the Liberal-Conservative party are the true friends of the farmers, to what they are doing for the farmers to-day. I will not spend much time on this point, but I will mention the experimental farm. While the experimental farm is the subject of criticism by some members of the Opposition, I believe the farmers know and appreciate the experimental farm. I think they appreciate the work done on that farm. I believe the work done there is of great value to farmers, and that its value is increasing every year. There is no doubt that farming to-day is not what it used to be. It has become scientific. Farming was formerly considered a very simple matter. Fields had to be ploughed, seeds sown, and the crops reaped. To-day all that has changed. Mixed farming is to be done in this country. The opening up of the great wheat fields of Manitoba have entirely changed farming in the older provinces, and I hold that the work done at the experimental farm and the experiments carried out result in great benefit to the agricultural class. I am sure we all appreciate, and I am satisfied the farmers appreciate very highly the labours of the dairy commissioner. I do not know any man to-day who is doing more for the farmers of this country than is Professor Robertson. I consider the money spent in paying his salary and expenses is among the moneys most profitably expended in this country, and further, that the money spent on the experimental farm and in connection with the Department of Agriculture is the best expended public money. I realize that the farmers are the foundation of all our success: we must have successful farmers in order to have a successful country. I need not refer to what has been done in the article of cheese: that is known to all of us, as is also what is being done at the present time in butter. We lead the world in cheese, due in a great measure to the efforts of the Government and of Professor Robertson, but in butter we have not reached as high a standard as that which we will attain. We are endeavouring to attain that standard, and I believe with the encouragement of this Government, we will be able to place our butter in the same position as that which our cheese has attained. I think our farmers are beginning to learn that in order to hold the British market they must send nothing there but the very highest grade. That is a lesson which needs to be impressed on them constantly, that nothing but the best must be sent there, and if the best is sent there we will get our full share of the market. I will now read a few figures showing our exports of agricultural products, and how they have increased from 1890 to 1895, not a very long period, and yet the increase is marvellous:

is doing for them. When we find that in five years the import of meats decreased 26,575,000 pounds, I think that argument is quite sufficient to convince the farmers that the Government which protects them, is the Government they should support. It is my belief, Sir, that the tariff should be arranged with reference to the different sections of the Dominion, or in other words, that it should be a Canadian tariff. Sometimes people in the western part of the Dominion criticise the duties on coal and iron; while at the same time, people living in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, criticise the duties on wheat and flour. I would remind these people, that in a country like this there must be a compromise; and that while it may be possible that the people of Ontario would prefer not to have a duty on coal, yet the people of the lower provinces would prefer not to have a duty on flour. But the duty on coal benefits the maritime provinces, and the duty on flour benefits the farmers in the west. We have thus a reciprocity among ourselves, and by this tariff an interprovincial trade is built up which would not otherwise exist. Now, if there were no duty on flour what would be the result? The result would be that all the flour going to the lower provinces would come from the United States, and our farmers would lose that large market for their wheat, and our millers would lose that large market for their flour. I lay it down as a proposition, which I think will be accepted by the country: that the tariff should be arranged with reference to the different sections of the Dominion, and that it should not, and cannot, be arranged entirely to suit any one part of the Dominion.

I wish to say further, Sir, that the farmers, the manufacturers, and the workmen of this country are all partners. The Opposition in this House frequently endeavour to convince the farmers, that the manufacturers are their enemies, that the two classes are in opposing camps, that the manufacturers are trying to see how much they can get out of the farmers, and that the farmers are trying to see how much they can reduce the profits of the manufacturers. I hold that this picture is entirely a false one. I believe that the interests of the farmers, the manufacturers, and the workmen of this country, are identical. I hold, Sir, that the home market is the best market for all; manufacturers, workingmen and farmers alike. And, if we seriously consider the question for a moment, I believe we need no arguments to convince any reasonable man of the truth of my proposition. We all admit that the more the farmers are worth in this country, the greater the home market is for the manufacturers, and as a consequence, the more employment there is for the workingmen. I have heard it argued by an hon. member in this House, that we ought all be farmers. Let me ask him this question: If such were the case where

I wish to show the decrease in the imports of meat for home consumption, during the same five years, namely, from 1890 to 1895. The following are the figures:—

IMPORTS OF MEATS FOR CONSUMPTION.

	1890.	1895.
	Lbs.	Lbs.

Total in pounds.....	32,850,000	6,275,000

In addition to this I find that in 1890 we imported 135,000 barrels of flour, and in 1895 we imported only 47,890 barrels.

Now, Sir, a study of these figures will show the farmers what the National Policy would we sell our products? It would all have to be exported, and we could not send it to the United States because of their high duties. It is true that sometimes gentlemen opposite tell us that we should have reciprocity, but they have never yet told us how to get it. They say that if they were in power they would obtain reciprocity, but what guarantee have we of that? We have none whatever, Sir. We have to take things as they are, and if we were all farmers in Canada, we would have to sell all that we produce outside of the Canadian market. Whatever farming may be to-day, it would certainly be an unprofitable business under such circumstances, for I hold that the home market is our best market. As was well said by the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in that speech of his to which I called attention a few moments ago: The home market is not fluctuating, is not changeable, is right at our doors, and affords a market for articles which would otherwise have to be sent a long way for sale. I go further and say: The more prosperous the farmer, the more prosperous is the manufacturer and the workingman; and I might reverse that and say: The more prosperous is the manufacturer and the workingman, the more prosperous is the farmer. Why, Sir, farmers know very well that in buying a farm, the farm near a good manufacturing centre is more valuable than the one more remote. I can point to a town not two hundred miles from Ottawa, which on Saturday is crowded with farmers disposing of their produce; and these farmers will admit that it is one of the best markets they can find. If that town were not there, do you mean to tell me that the land within a few miles of it would be worth as much as it is to-day? Do you mean to tell me that the farmers there would be as prosperous as they are to-day? I might remark incidentally in passing that while we hear a great deal about the farmers in Canada not being prosperous, I can re-echo the words of the Premier of Ontario. Although I do not agree with him in everything, I do agree with him when he said: That the farmers of Ontario—he spoke of that province because it is the province with which he is immediately connected—that the farmers of Ontario were as well off and as comfortable as any farmers on the face of the earth. I believe that statement to be true as regards the farmers of Ontario, and I believe it is equally true of the farmers of the other provinces. It is all very well for members of the Liberal party to try and make the farmers believe that they are not prosperous, and to try and make them believe that if they had some other conditions they might be prosperous; but, Sir, I believe, that while there are farmers who are not prosperous, yet as a whole they are just as prosperous as men in any other walk of life, and they are just as prosperous as are the farmers in any other part of the world. Sir, the farmers know that farms near a good manufacturing centre are valuable, just because they are near the home market. That is a proposition which cannot be disputed. It is a proposition which all farmers will admit, and all farmers know that if anything was said to the contrary it would be devoid of common sense.

Mr. CRAIG.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a great argument in favour of the National Policy being a benefit to the farmers, because I hold that these towns would not be manufacturing centres were it not for the National Policy. A great many manufactures in this country have received protection from the Liberal-Conservative party—it is the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party to protect them—and if that protection were removed, these manufactures would become bankrupt, or would be compelled to remove from Canada and go elsewhere. A very amusing incident occurred not long ago in Ontario. The leader of the Opposition was making a tour in the western part of the province, and he came to a certain manufacturing town, which all hon. members have heard of, the town of Berlin. The Liberal candidate there announced that he was a protectionist, and stated, that he knew and admitted that protection had done a great deal in fostering the industries of that town. He was wise in saying that, and he was truthful as well. However, I was a little surprised, that notwithstanding this candidate was a protectionist, and avowed his principles so plainly, the leader of the Opposition was quite ready to receive him into his arms, and to take him as one of his free trade party. Sir, I cannot understand how such a gentleman could join the Liberal party which is entirely opposed to protection, unless, indeed, he hopes at some future day, he might possibly convert the leader of the Opposition to his own view. Now, Sir, I have already quoted from a speech delivered by the hon. member for North Norfolk in 1876, and I have another very short quotation from the same speech, which expresses the opinions I hold better than I could do it myself. Speaking at that time, and I have no doubt speaking his honest opinions—and this is a point to which I call the attention especially of those members of the Opposition who argue that protection is not good for the agricultural interests of this country—he went on to say this:

But, although it may be conceded that protection is to the advantage of manufacturers, unless it can be shown that it is also an advantage to the other classes of the community and the nation at large, all arguments in favour of protection fall to the ground.

Sir, I agree with him in that; I am willing to stand or fall on that sentiment. I would not advocate protection if it was good only for one class of the community. He goes on to say:

It must be shown that the agriculturists are to be benefited by protection before it is incumbent on the Government to adopt a protective policy. * * * I believe that the interests of the nation at large would be forwarded by judicious protection; I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be forwarded by protection, and that the manufacturer, being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were 3,000 miles away. With a home market of this kind established by protection to manufacturers, the agriculturist can benefit his soil by producing a rotation of crops.

Nothing could be plainer than that, and I call the particular attention of the farmers of this country to it. I am satisfied that the hon. member at that time was stating his honest opinions, and I am satisfied that he was stating correct opinions—opinions which I believe would be admitted to be correct by all who are not prejudiced by their attachment to their party. Now, Sir, what is the policy of the Opposition? Their policy, we are told, is reciprocity. They blame this Government for not endeavouring to get reciprocity. They say that when the Government stated that they were endeavouring to get reciprocity, they were only pretending to get it. Well, Sir, I claim that the Government were perfectly honest in their endeavours to get reciprocity; but I claim this as well, that the Government were not willing to get reciprocity unless they could get it on terms that would be fair and equitable to this country. I admire them for that stand. Sir, I am satisfied that the country would not back up any Government in obtaining a reciprocity which was not equally favourable to this country as to the United States, and when the Government found that it was impossible to obtain a reciprocity which was fair to this country, and which would be as beneficial to this country as it was to the United States, then, Sir, they abandoned the attempt. I might remind the members of the Opposition, if I wished to do it, of what was said by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie when he was in power, and when he was asked what attempt he was going to make to obtain reciprocity. He said he was going to make no attempt. He said that he had done all he could, and that if the United States wanted reciprocity, they could ask for it. I might remind them of the statement of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), at that time Finance Minister of the Mackenzie Government, who, when asked the same question, said they were going to make no further attempt; but he went on to say—and I admire him for the stand he took at that time—“We have men and we have ships, and we should carry the war into the enemy's country; we should carry our trade into other channels.” What he suggested should be done, this Government have done. They did not cease their efforts to extend our trade because the negotiations for reciprocity failed. If those negotiations had been successful, then the British markets would not have been worked up as they have been by the present Government. Those markets, which, after all, are the best markets for most of the farm products of this country, would not have been developed as they have been by the present Government. But, Sir, we stand ready to-day to make any fair reciprocity treaty with the United States. I have always been in favour of that. I am in favour of it to-day, and I believe the Government are favourable to it. But if we are to have reciprocity, it must be a fair reciprocity between the two countries.

Another policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is free trade. Whatever they mean by that I do not know. They sometimes say free trade as they have it in England. The leader of the Opposition, when he went to Manitoba, said he was in favour of free trade as they have it in England. I am afraid, Sir, that if we had in Canada free trade as they have it in England, the farmers of this country would find very soon that a great mistake had been made. Then, Sir, they talk about a tariff for revenue only, without any element of protection. Well, Sir, I would ask them this question: Do they mean to remove all protection, or do they not? They sometimes say they do; and then, when we pin them down to that statement, they say they do not. But I think we may gather, from the statements of the financial leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for South Oxford, that he at any rate is opposed to all protection. At any rate, he is opposed to all protection on farm products. I have been surprised to hear other members of the Opposition who speak for the farmers say that the protection the farmers receive is no good to them at all. I am afraid that they will find that the farmers of this country do not agree with them in that. It is sometimes argued that this protection to the farmer does not increase the prices of farm products in this country. Sir, I am satisfied not to argue that question myself, but to leave it to the farmers themselves. I would ask the members of the Opposition this question: Do they intend to remove all protection from the farmers of this country, or do they not? If they do, let them say so plainly, so that the farmers may know when these gentlemen get into power all the duties levied on farm products will be swept away, and there will be entire free trade as far as this country is concerned, whatever the United States may do in the matter. I wish our hon. friends would take that position, because I know what answer would come from the farmers of this country. I know that whatever these hon. gentleman may say, the farmers of this country are in favour of a moderate protection. We find that some farmers even who advocate doing away with protection on manufactured goods, do not wish to have the protection which they receive wiped out. Then, Sir, do the Opposition intend to remove all the protection on manufactures? Do they intend to remove the duty on coal? Sometimes they say one thing on that point, and sometimes another. Do they intend to remove the duty on iron? If they do, let them say so plainly. But when we ask them to give a plain answer to these questions, not to this party, but to the country—for the country has a right to know—they equivocate and say, when we get into power we will tell you all these things. Sir, I am afraid the country will want to know what their policy is before it allows them to get into power. The country is not willing to take them on trust, but it wants them to say definitely what they are going to do in these matters. It will want them to say whether they do or do not intend to remove protection from farm products or from manufactures, which includes protection to the workingmen of this country, or from coal, or from iron. What is their policy? Have they any definite policy? In studying up this matter, in reading their speeches, I find that in Montreal they have one policy for the manufacturers and workingmen. What is that policy? They say they will lower the duties, but that this will be done so gradually that it will be almost imperceptible, and that the workingmen and manufacturers will not perceive it at all. That is their policy when they go to Montreal, but when they go to the farmers in Ontario and Manitoba they advocate free trade. There they say we will remove the duties on manufactures. They do not say anything about the duties on farm products. They keep quiet about them but they are quite willing to sacrifice the manufacturers. These hon. gentlemen do not give the people of this country credit for much common sense or intelligence. If they think that by making one statement in Montreal and a different one in Winnipeg, they can hoodwink the people they will find themselves very much mistaken. Our people are a reading people, they read both sides of the question; and when they read and consider, they will prefer to have a party in power which has some definite policy rather than one whose policy is all things to all men. Sir, the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party is a definite policy. It is not a changing policy, it does not change from Cape Breton to Manitoba. It is the same in Halifax as in Winnipeg, in Montreal as in Toronto, it is the same in all parts of the country. What is the policy of this country? It is moderate protection to the men who pay the expenses of the country. We do not believe in opening this country freely to foreigners, who pay nothing towards our public works and the expenses of governing the country, and who spend all their profits in another country. We do not believe in letting all the profits go to men who pay nothing towards our expenses, but in giving these profits to men who are building up this country, who are paying for our public works, who are building up our cities and who are cultivating our fields. The policy of the Conservative party is to protect our farmers and our manufacturers and the workingmen. We know no class, we have no class legislation, we are sometimes accused of such legislation, but I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to prove that charge. On the contrary, I have shown—I do not know that I have shown to the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite—but to the satisfaction of all fair-minded men that our policy is for the advantage of all classes in this country, that we are all bound up together in this country, that the prosperity of Manitoba is the prosperity of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that the prosperity of Ontario is the prosperity of Quebec, that the prosperity of our farmers is the prosperity of our manufacturers and workingmen, and that the prosperity of our manufacturers is the prosperity of our farmers. What Canada wants is a Canadian policy—a policy for Canada and not a policy for the United States—not a policy to encourage the manufacturers and farmers of the United States, but a policy to encourage the people of this country; and the way to have such a policy is to sustain the Conservative party. Under that party Canada is becoming a self-reliant country. The return of this party to power at the next election will, I confidently anticipate, give proper confidence to capital and employment to workingmen. Sir, there is nothing more required than stability in this country, and I hold it is most unfortunate that while the people of this country have endorsed in every election, since 1878, the policy of the Conservative party, the Opposition still keep endeavouring to overthrow that policy which has benefited the country so much, and still keep trying to make the people believe that if they were in power they would have some great policy which would give the people greater prosperity. They do not tell what that policy is because they do not know. I guarantee that you could not find a dozen of them who have the same policy. I have confidence in the country, and I confidently anticipate that when the issues are fairly placed before the people, and when the people see, as they will see, when the question is placed before them, that the Conservative party is the one which would lead this country on to still greater prosperity, they will cast their votes for this party which has done so much for this country.

Mr. SEMPLE. I agree with my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) when he says that agriculture is the foundation for the best interests of the country. I agree with him also when he says that if the farmers are prosperous, the manufacturers and merchants are prosperous also, but when he said that when the manufacturers are prosperous the farmers are likewise in that condition, I beg to differ from him. It is true that a certain class of manufacturers in our towns and villages are a necessity for the farmers who do business with them, and when farming is prosperous, they always reap the advantage. I must say that during the debate on the Budget I was more surprised than at any time during a similar previous debate. When the hon. Minister of Finance was delivering his Budget speech, very little attention was paid to him and there was an absence of cheering which must have had a very chilling effect on the hon. gentleman. No doubt when he was not in a position to proclaim, amidst a storm of applause, as on some other occasions, that there was a large surplus, but had to declare that there was a deficit, was no doubt the cause of the silence on the other side. At all events the deficit in 1894 was $1,210,332, and last year $4,153,875. We do not blame the Finance Minister on that account, because deficits are caused by not levying sufficient taxes, and it is not a very good time to levy taxes when the people are in a condition the reverse of prosperous. Now, the hon. gentlemen opposite have charged different members of the Opposition with having contradicted themselves by making speeches in 1876 which are at variance with those made to-day. But I must say that the speeches made at the introduction of the National Policy in 1878 were very plausible. I remember one of the apostles of that policy speaking to an assemblage of farmers and asking them whether it would not be better for them to pay a little more for what they bought, if they got more for what they had to sell. That seemed a very reasonable proposition, but the farmers to-day have the sad experience of having more to pay for what they must buy and receiving less for what they have to sell. At all events, I notice that the Finance Minister has announced that there will be a further increase in the estimates amounting to $1,316,548 and that there will be besides other supplementary estimates, so that we hardly know what amount of money may be asked for during the coming year. The Minister of Finance, no doubt, will resort to the old practice of going to Great Britain and borrowing more money, and we shall have all the more interest to pay annually.

Mr. Speaker, figures are not a very interesting portion of a speech, but I shall be obliged to quote a few figures in order to impress one or two points upon the House. Only by the use of figures can we understand the state of affairs in this country. We find that the increase in the public debt in 1894 was $4,501,989, and in 1895 it was $6,891,897, a total increase in the two years of $11,393,886. The total debt of the Dominion in 1895 was $318,048,754, and the net debt, after allowing for doubtful assets, was $253,074,937. The interest on the public debt was $10,446,294. Now, the census returns of 1891 show an average of 5.2 persons in each family. From the census returns and comparisons it is estimated at present that the population is 5,083,424. So that there is resting on each family a net debt of more than $250. But in studying the subject as presented in the Public Accounts it is found that there are charged to capital account the following items:—

Canals	$44,161,311
Canadian Pacific Railway.....	62,653,745
Intercolonial Railway	45,294,029
Other public works	7,023,755
Dominion lands.....	3,668,903
Public buildings, Ottawa.....	2,163,544
North-west Territories.....	3,798,656
Subsidies to railways granted exclusively of the C.P.R. (of which $11,710,382 is paid).....	15,116,058

For this purpose of railway subsidies a further sum of $4,659,160 was granted in the session of 1894. Now, let us consider the annual expenditure. In 1867-68 it was $13,486,092; in 1873-74 it was $23,316,316; in 1877-78 it was $23,503,158; in 1878-79 the expenditure was $24,455,381; in 1893-94 it was $37,585,025; in 1894-95 it was $38,132,005. Now, Sir, in view of the facts it is evident that the country needs an economical Government that will study the best interests of the people which the present Government have proved themselves incapable to do. They have squandered the public resources, they have shown themselves ready to spend money upon public works, such as bridges, post offices, canals and railways, if by so doing they are likely to gain votes and keep themselves in power. And, from the remarks of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), it is quite evident that the old policy will be followed unless they are checked in their mad career by the electors at the polls. I will quote the language of the hon. member for Pictou when addressing this House. Referring to a remark of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), he said:

That is the language of the member for South Oxford, but it is significant to observe that from the beginning to the end of the speech, this statesman was not able to tell this House or the people of Canada just about the sum that Canada could be properly governed for, just the amount of money which he, for instance, would undertake to do the job himself, just what the growing necessities and the development of this young country demands, and that, after all, is a very important consideration. I think I can ferret out and can put my hand upon some of the reasons why the hon. gentleman has not done that. I am firmly of the opinion, and I believe the majority of the business men of this country are of the opinion, that it is simply child's play to pretend that in a country like Canada, in a country with Canada's ambition, with Canada's plans, aye, with Canada's preparations for the future, it is within the possibility of human knowledge or human genius, to govern this country successfully for one dollar a year less. As a representative of one of the constituencies of this country, I take the responsibility of saying that whether my party or the other party be successful at the next election, I have not the slightest doubt that the expenditure of this country will increase instead of diminishing; and I will go further and say that, provided wisdom presides over the system of management and expenditure, I hope, and devoutly hope, that the expenditure will increase instead of diminishing. This country as it grows, this country as it successfully develops, certainly this country as it accumulates a larger population, will and must require a larger amount than $40,000,000 a year for its government. We might as well look the thing in the face, we might as well realize, too, the strength of our position. The people of this country are in no wise discouraged by the growth of expenditure by the Government, as long as they get something for the money.

So the farmers who wish the country well, and who wish not to be loaded with heavier burdens of taxation need not be surprised to hear the statement of the hon. member for Pictou that if he and those associated with him are left in control of public affairs, the public expenditure will be greater than it has been. But we might expect that, while the public debt was increasing so rapidly there would be a great increase in the business of the country. On consulting the Trade and Navigation Returns, I find that the total exports and imports of Canada in 1873 amounted to $217,104,516. In 1895 the total was $218,891,314, an increase in 22 years of only $1,586,793. It is true that in the year following 1873 the trade decreased about a million dollars, and in 1893 we had the largest import and export trade ever known in this country, amounting to about $240,000,000 in round numbers. So that taking 20 years, from 1873 to 1893, the utmost that can be said is that the trade of the country increased by barely $23,000,000. And this notwithstanding about $3,000,000 was spent in promoting immigration and also immense sums spread broadcast over the country in building railways, canals and public works. The trade of Canada is mostly with Great Britain and the United States and to that I wish to make reference. Now, let us consider some details of the amount of goods entered for consumption. In 1895 the amount entered from Great Britain was $31,131,737, and from the United States, $54,624,521. There were $23,502,784 more paid to the United States than to Great Britain. In considering where the goods the produce of Canada were exported during 1895, I find that exports to Great Britain amounted to $61,856,990; to the United States, $41,297,676. $20,559,314 more in cash was received from Great Britain than from the United States. In the interchange of goods with Great Britain, Canada received $30,752,253 more in cash from the produce sold than the amount paid for the goods bought. In the interchange with the United States Canada paid $13,336,840 more to the United States for goods bought than was received for goods sold. Is it not therefore ludicrous to talk so much about loyalty and yet do so little to give the British people a practical illustration that we mean what we say? Actions speak louder than words, and doubtless the British people form a due estimate of all such loyal protestations. During a session of this House, it will be remembered that the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) moved this resolution:

Inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada into her ports free of duty, this House is of opinion that the present scale of duties exacted on goods mainly imported from Great Britain, should be reduced.

This received the support of every Liberal member in this House, and every Conservative voted against it. But opinion has changed somewhat in this respect, even among Conservatives. I shall now read an extract from a Conservative paper, whose editor has been a life-long Conservative, and has no leanings towards the Liberal party. He says:

Our present tariff on goods imported from Great Britain runs anywhere from 25 to 45 per cent and upwards. With this duty reduced to an average of 15 or even 10 per cent, we would raise more revenue than we do now, because our importations would be larger. With such a reduction, too, the cost of a bill of goods for which a farmer or mechanic now pays $25, would be cut down to $20 or $15. The expense of living in this country would be very much lessened, and the exports of Canadian butter, cheese, meat and flour to Great Britain in payment for the goods bought from that country would be enormously increased. Under such a system our farmers would prosper amazingly. The cost of their table cutlery, hardware, woollens, cottons, and sugars would be lessened, and the demand for their farm products taken in exchange for these articles very greatly enlarged. And, with increasing prosperity, for the farmers would come greater prosperity for us all. But, more important even than this, the extended commercial relations between the Dominion and the mother country would add the link of material interest to the bond of sympathy and sentiment now binding them together.

Another extract from the same paper says:

Tax British goods to the very highest point and sing "God Save the Queen," is the queer policy of the men who have at one time boasted of their loyalty to the British Empire.

These extracts are taken from the "Orange Sentinel," a paper which, it is a well known fact that the editor has no sympathy with the Liberal party. Now, in 1894, when the Finance Minister, delivered his Budget speech, considerable alterations were proposed in the tariff. Their consideration, however, was delayed for a time, and the manufacturers came from all parts of the Dominion to this House asking for changes in their interest. The Manufacturers' Association, at Toronto, considered the subject fully, and at a meeting they instructed their secretary to ask that certain changes be made in the duties; and in many cases where an ad valorem duty was charged, it was changed to specific. So ready and agreeable did they find the Government that it was said by their secretary that the Finance Minister accepted their brief and gave them great thanks for their pains, accepting their suggestions almost in the very words in which they were written. This fact shows conclusively that this Government frames its tariff policy chiefly in the interests of the manufacturers. Now, we wish to see all classes prosperous, but there are many manufacturers who are not prosperous, and who receive no benefit from the National Policy. Take, for instance, these small industries found in most of the towns and villages of Canada, such as grist mills, oatmeal mills, saw-mills, those of the blacksmiths, carpenters, wagon-makers, carriage makers, bakers, tailors, dress-makers, &c. All this class of manufacturers receive no benefit whatever from the National Policy. It is when the farmer prospers and enjoys good times that these small manufacturers are able to sell what they produce, and the farmers are able to buy from them. Let me read a few more figures from the census, showing the condition of the manufacturers. Doubtless these figures have been quoted before, but I wish to make a different application of them. The census of 1891 shows that the manufacturers are truly a favoured class. In that year there were 75,768 manufacturing establishments: capital invested, $353,836,817; number of employees, 367,865; wages paid, $99,762,441; cost of raw material, $255,983,219; wages paid and cost of raw material together, $355,745,660; value of finished products, $475,455,705; profit after paying labour and raw material, $119,710,045. The profits were 33 per cent annually for ten years, and to each employee, $270, or 89 cents a day. These large profits are drawn from the consumers of Canada. The manufacturers cannot make money through the National Policy except drawing it from the consumers of this country. The farmers know this, and I will read their opinion, as well as the opinion of others who are not themselves farmers, but who are able to judge. At the annual meeting of the Dominion Grange, 1892, Master Workman Goffatt said:

Nearly every important interest in the country is enjoying the benefit of helpful legislation, whilst the farmer is handicapped and discriminated against by railway monopolies and by an unjust system of taxation.

During the session of 1893, representatives of the Patrons of Industry waited upon the Government to urge consideration of grievances set forth in a petition presented to the House, signed by 27,000 Patrons of Industry, which commenced as follows:—

“That the agricultural interests of the country are not in as prosperous condition as we would desire; that tariff legislation for the purpose of assisting the manufacturing interests of the country has been taken advantage of by such manufacturing interests so as to unduly enhance the prices of many such articles as are indispensably necessary to farmers in carrying on their business.”

The Central Farmers' Institute, at its annual meeting in Toronto, on 9th February, 1893, adopted a series of resolutions, including the following:—

“That, whereas the farmers of Canada, during the last thirteen years, have largely supported a protective policy for the purpose of establishing and building up the manufacturing interests of this country; and whereas such manufacturing industries as are suitable for the country have received such assistance for a period long enough to enable them now to withstand fair and open competition; and whereas the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, at its annual meeting, held in Toronto, 7th February, declares and re-affirms its determination to support and perpetuate the high-tariff policy; be it therefore resolved, that this meeting hereby declares and affirms that to continue and perpetuate such a high-tariff would be detrimental to the vital interests of the agricultural community.”

Again, the industrial brotherhood of Canada on 1st of October, 1892, passed the following resolution:—

Resolved, That the fiscal policy of our country is a farce in so far as it purposes to benefit the masses; that it increases the cost of living, decreases the purchasing power of the wage labourers of all classes, is eating the vitals out of the Dominion, scattering the members of every family, so that the fathers and mothers are forced to see their sons and daughters leave home—leave home and kindred—that a few may roll in superabundance; that every lawful means be used to rectify the wrongs created and maintained by the present system.

Again, the Council of the Board of Trade of Winnipeg passed the following resolution:—

That the customs duties on goods coming into Canada should be reduced to the lowest point, consistent with a revenue tariff;

That all specific rates of duty be abolished, and that all duties be levied on an ad valorem basis;

That the Government be empowered, upon evidence given of the existence of a combine to maintain or increase prices, to lower or abolish by Order in Council the import duty on articles affected by such combine;

The council maintains that the increased importations at lower rates of duty than now prevail would tend rather to increase than diminish the revenue derived by the Dominion; many of the duties now in force are absolutely prohibitive and, therefore no revenue now accrues to the Government.

The council submits that manufacturers of many lines of staple goods in Canada have formed combines, and based their prices, not on the cost of manufacture plus a fair profit, but on the value which similar goods from abroad cost laid down in Canada duty paid. This being the case, the consumer pays an excessive price for his goods, and the Government does not secure a revenue; the manufacturer being the only gainer.

Rev. Principal Grant of Queen's University said, in 1893:

The right principle is free trade, modified only by revenue requirements or national conditions. We, however, have fostered protection until it has become a virus in the blood. It must be purged away.

In a series of political papers written in November, 1893, Principal Grant wrote as follows:—

A low tariff means increased imports as well as steady and normal trade, and in all probability there would be no deficit. * * There are certain lines of manufactures for which Canada is fitted and these would be benefited. We have given all others plenty of time to get on their feet, and those that are still unable to stand had better stand from under.

So although the hon. member for East Durham has been speaking for the farmers, it is evident that when they assemble and deliberate in their own representative bodies, which include the most intelligent farmers, they arrive at altogether different conclusions from those stated by the hon. gentleman. When the National Policy was brought into force in 1878 it was specially intended to benefit manufacturers. However, knowing very well that farmers constitute nearly one-half of the population, in the Year-Book the estimate is 45 per cent of the population, it was felt that they could not be disregarded, and therefore it was resolved to make a pretense of giving them protection, which was only a pretense, and done no perceptible good. We hear a great deal about the home market. It is true there is a limited Canadian market to be found in every village, town and city. But the buyers are only buying like middlemen, their object being to ship to the old country and make a profit after paying freight and expenses. In addition to supplying the home market during 1894, there were exported as follows:—

	Value.
Horses	$ 1,261,942
Cattle	7,112,101
Sheep	1,624,589
Butter	697,476
Cheese	14,253,002
Eggs	807,990
Wool	1,049,450
Meats	319,702
Apples	1,821,463
Barley	720,718
Beans	425,283
Oats	320,458
Bacon	3,546,107
Peas	1,622,919
Wheat	5,359,109
Hay	1,539,691
Clover seed	767,806
Vegetables	118,449
Potatoes	527,379
Oatmeal	276,310
Wheat flour.....	839,112
Poultry	45,848
Grass seed.....	55,253

These are exports to Great Britain. This trade can in no case be viewed as a result of the National Policy, but it represents produce of farms sold in the markets of the world where it had to meet competition from every country that sells in that market. I listened to the figures given by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Craig) in regard to the amount realized from products sold in Great Britain and in the Canadian home market. I find as follows:

EXPORTS—AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Cheese	$ 9,372,212	$14,253,002
Bacon	607,495	3,546,107
Hams	23,584	260,602
Apples (dry)	250,320
do (green)	997,922	2,071,783
Wheat and flour	910,244	6,298,221
Horses	1,936,073	1,312,676
Sheep	1,274,347	1,624,587
Cattle	6,949,417	7,120,823
Total	$22,071,294	$36,387,801

Taking these items, they total in this way: $22,071,294 exported in 1890; $36,387,801 worth exported in 1895. The reason I consider that the Americans sometimes have taken advantage of the Canadian market is this: on the goods that come from the United States there is a lower rate of freight than on the same articles transferred from one portion of the Dominion to the other. That is the reason why the Americans can bring their wheat and flour and bacon into this country. But I do not think the imports of produce from the United States has hurt the country any. In 1890 bacon to the amount of $607,495 and hams to the amount of $23,558 were exported to Great Britain, while in 1895 there was bacon to the amount of $3,546,107, and hams to the amount of $260,602 exported to Great Britain. Therefore, there were $3,175,630 more received for bacon and hams in 1895 than in 1890. The reason of that increase is that in the year 1895 it was more profitable for the farmers to raise pork. I know very well from experience that if there was a suitable price Canada could export annually $10,000,000 worth of bacon and ham: and it is because the price has been low that there has not been a larger export from this country.

Mr. SPROULE. It would improve the price to take the duty off.

Mr. SEMPLE. Well, I do not think it would hurt it any. If the duty was off, and prices higher in the United States than in Canada, there is no danger of the duty doing any harm.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not the case now.

Mr. SEMPLE. I will quote for your instruction the prices which I have taken from the papers to-day. The "Mail-Empire" gives the following market prices:

Cattle, in Toronto, $2 to $3.25 per 100 pounds; hogs, $3.75 to $4 per 100 pounds; lambs, $4 to $4.25. In Buffalo: Hogs, $4.50 to $4.55 per 100 pounds; butchers' cattle, $2.65 to $3.50; lambs, $4.75 to $5. In Chicago: Beef steers, $3.20 to $4.65 per 100 pounds; hogs, $4.05 to $4.22½ per 100 pounds; lambs, as high as $4.65 per 100 pounds. In New York, lambs, $5.50 to $5.60; hogs, $4.50 to $4.80.

As was mentioned by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), who went into figures very thoroughly, in Ontario for the last thirteen years the average price of wheat was 85.6 cents, and in the United States the average price was 92.3. The average price of oats in Ontario during the same period was 34.9, and in the United States 39.8. Oats and wheat were about 5 cents a bushel more in the United States than in Ontario. I have remarked for a number of years, in regard to pork, that when the price was high in 1894, it was much higher in Buffalo than in any part of Canada. I remember reading in the papers that when the McKinley tariff was in force, and there was a duty of $1.50 on each hog sent to the United States there were often eight and ten cars going over the Suspension Bridge to the United States daily, and the shipper was making a handsome profit. I have seen in that year when the prices were constantly fluctuating, that probably you would get 50 cents or $1 per 100 pounds more one week than you would get another. The scale of prices was constantly going up and down, and I myself honestly believe that at the present time there is more injury done to the farmers by the combine among the pork packers than there would be if American pork came into this country free of duty.

Mr. SPROULE. Let me give the hon. gentleman the market prices. As quoted in the Toronto "Globe," on the 6th of this month, mess pork in Toronto was \$13.50; in Montreal, \$15, and in Chicago, \$10.30. Wheat in Toronto was 85 cents; in Duluth, 61 $\frac{3}{4}$, and in Detroit, 75 cents. Oats in Toronto were 28 cents, and Detroit, 19 $\frac{3}{4}$.

Mr. SEMPLE. I have given the figures for February 12th, a later date than is mentioned by the hon. gentleman, and he can verify them both in the "Globe" and in the "Mail."

Mr. SPROULE. Here is the "Globe" if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Semple) wants it.

Mr. SEMPLE. You can verify the figures. I have given, and I guarantee that they are correct.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no question about that, because I have the paper right here, and you can get the exact prices if you believe what the "Globe" says about them.

Mr. SEMPLE. The farmers sell live hogs and not pork. It is the pork packers who produce the barrel pork, and when supplies are large they reduce the price of live hogs in order to make large profit to themselves, much to the loss and injury of the farmers and do them more injury than if the United States were selling pork free in this country. On account of this combination, the papers can tell a week in advance when the price of live hogs will go up and when it will go down. If there is a large quantity in the market the price is lower, and if there is a small quantity the price advances. It is this fluctuation in price that makes the production of pork so unsatisfactory to the farmer.

Now, Sir, it has been said by some hon. gentlemen opposite that the experimental farm has been a wonderful benefit to the Canadian farmers. In my opinion it is more benefit to the professors and the men working there, than it is to the farmers of the country. According to the Year-Book, the cost of that farm of 500 acres was $62,956, and the cost of buildings to June 30th, 1895, was $167,313. Last year the amount spent for the maintenance of the farm and dairying was $104,700, while the receipts from all sources amounted to only $5,027, made up as follows:—Agassiz Farm, $408.68; Brandon, $600.99; Indian Head, $1,231.66; Nappin, $599.13; Ottawa, $2,186.56. The following were the sources of revenue at the Experimental Farm, Ottawa: Berries, $161.65; cattle, $204; pigs, $718.19; eggs, $242.49; milk and cream, $273.44; butter, $209.53; vegetables and small fruits, $265.18; rent, $60; poultry, $36.49; small trees, $5.75; grains, $1.20; total, $2,267.82. If there is one thing profitable on the farm it is the raising of poultry. There is not very much cost in the management; not very much ground is occupied, and a great deal of money is received out of that important industry. In 1888, when there was no duty there was no less a sum than $2,119,000 received in Canada from the sale of eggs alone. There was more money received from eggs that year than from wheat and oats; and in the last year that eggs were on the free list, 1889, no less a sum than $2,156,725 was received for the egg product alone. So that I consider that a very important part of the operation of the Experimental Farm, is in experimenting on the different breeds of fowls, and instructing the farmers what are the best breeds to raise and how best to take care of them. There is one thing, however, that I do not approve of. I have observed that two or three acres of land at least is devoted to the cultivation of berries. It is all very well to have a small portion of land devoted to testing the different varieties, but so much as has been done in that line is not necessary when the revenue is so small, amounting only to eighty dollars after paying for picking, and besides it seriously interferes with market gardeners in the vicinity. Potatoes do not appear to have received very much consideration, although I notice that an address has been delivered on that subject before what is called the Central Experimental Farm Club. Here is a report of it in a paper:

The Central Experimental Farm Club listened to a most interesting and instructive talk by W. T. McCoun, one evening this week. The subject was "Potatoes." The cultivation of potatoes as a farm product, if properly carried on, he claimed, has been proved to give as good profit as any class of farming. He said an acre of potatoes will yield an average of 200 bushels, and would cost the farmer $34.11, including rent, cultivation, spraying, digging and marketing, and when sold at the rate of 30 cents per bushel, leaves a margin of $25.89 of clear profit.

I would agree with him if that price could only be obtained; it would be a fair remunerative price, at which potatoes would be a profitable crop; but I know that at the present time some of the best potatoes that can be found in the world can be bought for about nine cents a bushel at the railway station. If you calculate how much 200 bushels would bring at that rate, you would find that a farmer who had raised an acre of potatoes, would be $14 out of pocket by the transaction, allowing $34 for the cost of the land, the marketing, the spraying and other attention. It is well known that when the farmers really need something the Government is found wanting. It is not too much to say that it was partly owing to the carelessness of the Government in not having a proper inspection of American cattle coming into and through Canada, that an embargo was put on Canadian cattle going to England, entailing a loss of from $5 to $10 on every head of cattle sold in that market in 1894. Last year the loss was not so great, as cattle were allowed to be shipped from American ports during the months of March, April and May; so that so large a number were not placed on the British market at one time. This advantage, I believe, has been brought about through the intervention of the railway companies, and has proved to be a great advantage to the farmers. Now, I think it is needless to expect that the embargo will be removed in Great Britain, and it is clearly the duty of this Government to facilitate as much as possible the shipment of cattle by way of the United States, which can be done at any season of the year, whenever they are exported to Great Britain. This was done last year, when the farmers received a much larger price than they did in the previous year. When the embargo was put on, it was known that our cattle were mostly shipped from Montreal. They had to be shipped commencing about the 24th May, when a large number of cattle arrived in the British market at one time, which caused a stagnation in the trade, and resulted in great loss to the farmers. Many who had expected to make good sales lost their all. Now, Sir, what is most objected to by the farmers is that they have to stand competition in the markets of the world, while at the same time they have to pay about one-third of the value of nearly every article they buy to the protected manufacturers. That is what the farmers complain of, and what they consider is not fair. The only true way to check combines, trusts, rings and monopolies is to take off the duty. Without the duty it is very hard for them to exist. The Minister of Finance gave his experience of them during a trip he took to Manitoba. He showed that combines existed there to an alarming extent in lumber and other materials used for buildings. I will quote his own words. He said:

With reference to woods, logs and round, unmanufactured timber, not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act; firewood, handlebolts, railroad ties, ship timber and ship-planking not specially provided for in this Act, and other woods as mentioned in the schedule, are free. This is a special concession, and I hope will prove a useful one in Manitoba and the North-west. There was not one feature of our examination into the condition of things in that part of the country, which impressed itself so forcibly on my mind as the combine which existed for the distribution and sale of lumber. Every town was parcelled out. One or two men were selected, to whom was given the monopoly of selling in each place. The prices were fixed, and if they sold a fraction of a cent under the fixed prices, their privilege was taken away and given to somebody else. That monopoly bore heavily on the people in that country, where lumber is so essentially necessary in the making of barns and houses, and I came to the conclusion that if possible help would be given by putting lumber upon the free list, and that has been done.

So, in regard to another branch of manufactures, stoves, I am credibly informed that at a meeting of the manufacturers, they fixed the prices at which stoves were to be sold, and the prices fixed cannot be departed from under a penalty upon the manufacturer who has transgressed the understood law of the association. There is nothing that would benefit the farmers in this country more than reciprocity with the United States, or freer trade, and it cannot be got except through the Liberal party, hence every farmer should wish them success at the general election not far distant. Every farmer who has studied the question, knows that to be a fact. There are many things which he can hardly sell anywhere else. Notwithstanding the duties that have been imposed for a number of years on lambs, almost the only market for them is the United States. In 1891, the Government dissolved the House on the ground that a proposition had come from Washington in favour of reciprocity, and the Government wished to be able to enter into negotiations with the strong support of a new Parliament at its back. When our farmers read this in the "Empire," they were exceedingly rejoiced at the prospect. Sir John Macdonald knew at the time that there was nothing which would suit the farmers so well, and after the House was dissolved he made a faint effort to procure a treaty. Members of his Cabinet went to Washington but they achieved nothing. It is evident that the United States will not negotiate a treaty confined to natural products alone, but only one which will include a certain number of manufactured articles also.

We know that when the late Hon. George Brown went to Washington for the purpose of negotiating a treaty, an arrangement was entered into which covered natural products and a certain number of manufactured articles. This was satisfactory to the British Government, it was satisfactory to the Colonial Secretary of State at the time. It passed the Congress of the United States, but was defeated in the Senate. However, we know that the Senate has since changed, and while they would not favour a treaty at that time they might favour it now, if fair terms were offered. But we know that as long as this Government is in office, nothing of the kind can be done, because our manufacturers hold the Government under their entire control. And if the Government desires to put a number of manufactured articles on the free list, they dare not do so. They are under the control of manufacturers who no doubt will say to the Government you must not do this, because there will be a large number of manufactured articles coming in from the United States, we will not have so much profit, and therefore it is against our interests that any treaty should take place. We hear hon. gentlemen opposite say continually we do not want to do away with some monopoly, because if we do, a much greater monopoly will take its place. It is well known that the Government is partly responsible for the McKinley tariff being brought in force. When that Bill was before Congress, this Parliament met. The hon. Finance Minister delivered his Budget speech, and increased the duties. He put duties on fruit trees, small fruits, and increased the duties on beef and pork, and added 25 cents per barrel on flour. So that there was a lever in the hands of members of Congress who wanted to have the McKinley tariff pass. This Government most effectively helped the McKinley Bill, and the result is well known. The last year before the McKinley tariff went into force we received in cash from the United States no less a sum than $6,400,000 for barley, over $2,000,000 for horses, and $2,156,725 for eggs, so that although there was a small amount gained by the farmers by our shutting out a certain amount of American pork, that was more than offset by what they lost, they made ten cents, when they certainly lost a dollar.

There is another question which has engaged the attention of this country to a very large extent, and that is trade with Australia. That trade will be absolutely in manufactured articles, which will be very little consolation to the farmers for the large amount of money that is paid in subsidies. I will just read an article on this subject. There had been a discussion in North Ontario during the time of the election, on this subject, and the Government candidate declared he did not believe any imports of Australian meats and other cheap supplies were coming to this country from

Mr. SEMPLE.

Australia. The article thus describes the reply :

His answer soon came, however, for cans of Australian mutton were produced at meetings a day or two later, and with them a letter from a large Montreal firm, offering to fill any number of orders with many similar supplies. The hon. Minister of Finance came on then and explained it all away by telling the farmers that the $125,000 a year extra tax all went to bonus ships to take freight to Australia, and not to bring anything back ! This nice distinction between tweedledum and tweedledee was declared to be quite satisfactory to some Tory farmers present ! Of course, if it just happened that these ships were willing to carry return freights very cheap, in consequence of the big bonus, or free of charge for ballast, what had that to do with the question, anyway ?

At that time we showed, from the Trade and Navigation Returns of 1894 that large quantities of such supplies had been imported for home consumption in Canada. Since that time the Government returns for 1895 have been published and here are the facts of the imports from Australasia for home consumption during the last fiscal year :

	Lbs.	Value.
Butter	40,291	$ 6,458
Lard	2,146	187
Beef, salted.....	4,612	202
Canned meats.....	121,536	10,319
Extract of meat.....		265
Mutton, fresh.....	16,052	576
Poultry, &c.....		96
	184,637	$18,103

The duties imposed and collected, it will be seen, amounted to over 25 per cent of the entire value of the imports. The National Policy works both ways in this case : the people are taxed $125,000 a year for a bonus to open up a traffic, and then the importers and consumers are taxed over 25 per cent in order to prevent competition with home products. It will be seen that the fresh mutton thus imported was valued at but little over 3 cents per pound after all freight and other expenses had been paid of landing it on Canadian shores ; the butter about 16 cents ; the lard, 8½ cents ; the salted beef, a little over 4 cents ; and the canned meat, cans included, but little over 8 cents. All the after expenses was added by the import duties imposed. Would any other country tax its farmers some hundreds of thousands of dollars to help cheapen transportation for competition in its own markets ?

Hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken about the trade of Great Britain and of the attempts to introduce protection into that country. It would be very surprising if every member of the British House of Commons held the same opinion regarding tariffs. There are some there as in Canada who would like to be made rich by Act of Parliament, or get anything that is going wrong with their business made right by Parliament. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the farmers in Great Britain would profit through protection when it is known that Great Britain annually imports 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, or its equivalent, to supply the manufacturers and artisans, it is not to be surprised that the farmers there would like protection. But I would like to ask how the farmers of this country would like it if a tax was put upon their horses, their wheat, their oats, hay, apples and every other article exported to Great Britain. No doubt protection would be a help to the farmers of Great Britain and it would be a help to the treasury of Great Britain. But the statesmen there look to the interest of the great masses, and Lord Salisbury, in making his speech clearly indicated that he had no faith in protection. And Sir William Harcourt in an address he delivered the other day, said :

He was glad the Ministry had not thought of introducing protection into the country or of tampering with the currency.

So although there may be a few in Great Britain who favour protection, as we might expect there would be, they are not numerous enough to receive any great consideration, still less have they any prospect of forming a government. And, Sir, it would be a dark day for Canada if a duty were levied on the goods we send to Great Britain as duties are levied on those we send to the United States. But hon. gentlemen on the other side, by their eloquent speeches in favour of protection, are doing what they can to educate the British minds to believe that protection is something to be desired. People in Great Britain read Canadian papers just as people in Canada read British papers, and there is no doubt that some of the brilliant speeches delivered in this House in favour of protection will be used in the House of Commons in Great Britain for the purpose of having it introduced there. Preferential trade with Great Britain would no doubt be a benefit to farmers in Canada, but to believe it will be carried out is only a delusion. I would like to read a few extracts from the report of the colonial conference to show the opinion that is held by certain eminent men upon this subject. The book from which I quote is "The Report of the Hon. Earl of Jersey, G.C.M.G., on the Colonial Conference at Ottawa with the proceedings of the conference" :

As has been remarked above with reference to an earlier stage of the discussion, there was no general anticipation that, under present conditions, Great Britain would consent to put a tax upon foreign produce, in order to favour colonial produce. The trade of Great Britain was acknowledged to be increasing. It was, indeed, alleged that this increase is due solely to the colonial trade ; but Mr. Ferrest corrected the statement by pointing out that the foreign trade of England has increased proportionately with the colonial trade. Mr. Fitzgerald observed :—" We know that in the matter of wheat England would never give us any advantage, for the simple reason that by doing so she must increase the cost of the food of her people." * * * Mr. Lee-Smith argued, that on no account whatever " must we do anything in this room which will in the slightest possible manner hamper Great Britain in her trade relations with the world at large. Great Britain is a free trade country ; it must necessarily continue to be a free trade country, if it is going to preserve that pre-eminent position which it already holds and which I hope it will always hold in the commercial affairs of the world." * * * It is an obvious consideration that the proposals would involve a fundamental change in the financial policy of Great Britain. A remission of duties in certain cases is, of course, easily effected in colonies which possess a heavy customs tariff, as, for instance, when 25 per cent is the ordinary charge ; and it is proposed to reduce this in certain cases to 20 per cent. But in Great Britain the institution of a differential tariff would involve the special creation of a customs tariff against all foreign powers in respect of the articles, whatever they might be, which would have to be favoured on importation from the colonies. The proposal, in short, means in the colonies the remission of existing taxation, but in Great Britain the creation of a new taxation : not a mere variation in the existing machinery, but the introduction of a new system.

But, though this change of policy in Great Britain may be neither necessary nor practicable, under present conditions, it may be said that the general feeling of the conference was that the question will assume a different shape as the population and commerce of the countries increase. * * * At present the consummation seems far off. I quoted certain figures which showed that the North American colonies contribute only 2.7 per cent of the trade of Great Britain : Australasia, 7.5 per cent, and South Africa, 2.2 per cent. Our imports from foreign countries in 1893 amounted to £313,000,000, or 77 per cent, whilst from the British possessions the amount was £92,000,000, or 23 per cent. We find a market for two-thirds of our exports of British produce in foreign countries and for one-third in British possessions ; i.e., £146,000,000 to £72,000,000. British possessions in these figures include India. The imports from and exports to Australasia, in round figures, stand at £30,000,000 and £15,000,000, respectively.

This expression of opinion by the delegates who were here shows that there is no likelihood of Great Britain changing her fiscal policy. Sir, there is no sentiment in trade and commerce. Although the Americans adopted the McKinley Bill which was prohibitive on the British manufacturers in many instances, they did not discriminate against that country. And it seems to me that from the way Canada has put up a high tariff in the endeavour to get all she can out of the mother country and to bonus the manufacturers, she cannot expect to get any special privileges in the markets of Great Britain. There will have to be a great change in the feelings of the British Parliament before anything of that kind occurs. Imperial federation has been talked about for years, but a celebrated statesman in Great Britain said it could be regarded only as a dream. The colonies are so far separated from each other that, in many cases, trade cannot be carried on profitably between them. It is to the country south of us, when common sense prevails, that we shall look to have our trade extended, and if we can get freer trade relations with that country, it will be of more benefit to the farmers of this country than anything else that could be done for them.

As Mr. Haycock, the leader of the Patron movement, said, the Wilson Bill did more for the farmers of Canada than all the tinkering with the tariff in 1894; and I believe it. It may be said that on account of the war bluster that recently occurred in the United States, it would be difficult to negotiate a trade treaty, but that was no doubt a political move, and these things very soon pass away. The best element in the United States deprecated the war talk, and considered that a war between that country and Great Britain would be an immeasurable evil to humanity. Governor Morton, of New York State, said :

Any disturbance of the existing friendly relations between the United States and Great Britain cannot fail to have a serious effect. Because of the possible baleful consequences of such disturbances, I feel myself justified in making this reference to the larger affairs of the nation in which we feel such a peculiar and vital interest.

I cannot believe that the relations between our country and Great Britain will be ruptured or seriously impaired by the misunderstanding now existing between that country and Venezuela concerning the proper location of the boundary line of their possessions in South America. Arbitration affords a simple, humane and honourable method of determining national disputes; and it is scarcely conceivable at this period of the world's history that any great nation is willing to take the responsibility of the needless sacrifice of human life and the wanton destruction of property which would be the inevitable result of an armed conflict.

Mr. Bayard, American Ambassador to England, and who was Secretary of State in Mr. Cleveland's first Administration, said in a recent speech :

He expressed pleasure in being admitted into the personal sympathy of the English people, when he recognized the community of sentiment existing between his country and theirs, he felt that crossing the Atlantic was merely a change of faces, not a change of hearts.

Their language and feeling did not need to be translated. They meant one and the same thing. What ought to be easier than to maintain friendship in such a transparent truth? Yet some persons might possibly contend that aspirations of honest men here and there were different. He did not believe it.

If there was a difference, it was artificial. No form of words or exchange of sentiments was necessary. Only let human hearts speak to human hearts, and it would be found that all differences could be arranged.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, it is my opinion that it is certainly an unnecessary expense to the country for the Government to call Parliament together at the present time. They should have followed the example of Sir John A. Macdonald, who, when he contemplated introducing a reciprocity measure, said he did not wish it to be passed by a moribund Parliament, but by a Parliament fresh from the people. I cannot understand how this Government can justify their conduct in calling this House together at this season of the year, and causing such a large expense to the country. What they intend to do this session might have been done last session, but they put it off last session in order that they might hold on to power a little longer. Now, I will read an extract from a Conservative paper called the Toronto "Star." It is an independent Conservative paper, the writer is a free lance, and he expresses his opinion freely. For that reason he is able to give an unbiased opinion better than some others who are against the Government, or who are out and out supporters of the Government. He says :

The seventh Parliament of Canada has been an extraordinary one.

During its existence four Premiers have been at the head of the Government, and before it closes we are likely to have a fifth. It is now in its sixth session, and it was stated in the House of Commons that it is the only parliament under the British constitution that has held that many sessions.

The constitution, precedents and everything else connected with parliamentary government have been strained to the utmost limit.

The disorganized Government, with its fourth Premier, who has barely escaped political assassination at the hands of his colleagues, at the end of the sixth session, which never should have been called, are preparing to do the most extraordinary thing in the history of this extraordinary Parliament.

At the last general elections Sir John Macdonald was Premier. The main, if not the only point at issue was the trade policy. The Conservative party was united and triumphant; the leader of the Government was a dictator, wise and experienced, as well as the idol of his party.

Since then Sir John Macdonald and two of his successors have been buried. Times have changed; the electorate has largely changed; according to the by-elections the desires of the people have changed; the policy of the Government has changed; the fiscal policy is no longer the main issue; remedial legislation overshadows everything else.

Yet the electors have not been consulted either in a general election or a convention of the supporters of the Government.

Yet this dying Parliament, which should have been dead months ago, having been long estranged from the people, with a Premier who is politically dying, and would have been officially dead weeks ago, if his Cabinet could have killed him off, is about to coerce one of the seven provinces of the Dominion, though the electors of that province have almost unanimously refused even to consider, let alone accept, the coercive Bill.

Such legislation as is proposed is not of the ordinary, but of the most extraordinary sort. It is not the class of legislation for which parliaments ordinarily meet, and, if this seventh Parliament had just come from the electors, the majority thoroughly instructed to make such a law as is proposed, it might well pause and consider whether, for once, the people had not been wrong.

A dying Parliament has no business to consider extraordinary legislation, no matter whether it is good or bad. Beaconsfield declared such conduct to be politically immoral, and refused to legislate on a very much less important matter without first consulting the people.

The seventh Parliament of Canada is pursuing the opposite course. It is holding an extra session around its own death-bed, with a deliberate intention of violating the wishes of the electors that it dare not face.

Its conduct is not only indecent and dishonest, but it is tyrannical, scandalous, and strikes at the very root of constitutional government.

This is not responsible government. Since Sir John A. Macdonald died, the Government has been degenerating, until it no longer has even the semblance of pretending to care for the people or to follow constitutional usage.

Unhindered by any fear, except the rebellion of his mercenary Ministers, the Premier of Canada, who is not the choice of the electors, but the accident of a funeral, is a dictator holding the life, property and liberties of the Canadian people as completely in his hand as if he had the powers of the Czar of Russia.

Though Canadians are being treated as if they were serfs, when an opportunity occurs, they will show the present Government, if it persists in its course, that the people of this country are too well educated and too long accustomed to the rights of British subjects to tolerate any such tyranny.

Now, Mr. Speaker, an hon. gentleman, speaking last evening, asked what the Liberal party would do if they came into power. No one can charge against the Mackenzie Government that scandals occurred in the Public Works Department. One would have thought that the investigation into the McGreevy affair in 1891 would have proved a lesson to the Government, and that similar transactions would not again have occurred. But it had no effect on hon. gentlemen opposite, for only a year ago when the Curran bridge was constructed the grossest corruption prevailed, and the bridges cost over twice the amount of the original estimate. It is evident that this Government is followed by a lot of boodlers who occupy what they consider to be a rich field, and who do their utmost to continue the present state of things.

In conclusion I desire to read an extract from a speech delivered by a celebrated politician in Nova Scotia, for I know of nothing that better describes the present situation. He said :

If he consulted his own interests or his own inclination he should decline the honour ; but this is a trying moment in the history of Canada, and not the time for patriotic men to think of their own interests, a time for sacrifice and a time for duty. "We have now in power," he said, "a Government which has held office for nearly eighteen years, a Government which has been convicted of every form of corruption and peculation in the public service. This Government had dragged down the fair name of Canada until it has become a reproach in the eyes of the world. It has used public funds to maintain itself in power, and received moneys from contractors to debauch the manhood of the country. It has lost its leaders, and within the past year it has degenerated into a weak and helpless concern. A few weeks ago half the members of the Government resigned, and gave the reason that the Premier was incapable. The Premier responded by declaring the bolters were guilty of the blackest treachery, and yet the bolters are now serving under this incapable Premier, and the Premier is sitting at the Council table with a nest of traitors. So hopeless and despised had the Government become that the country began to pronounce against it from all quarters, when suddenly Sir Charles Tupper appeared upon the scene, and has assumed the reins of government. Without wishing to be offensive, I can only say Sir Charles Tupper has exerted an evil influence in politics from the moment he appeared 40 years ago. His aim in life has been purely selfish, and his means have always been corrupt. His return to active public life is hailed with joy by boodling contractors and unscrupulous ward politicians ; right-minded men regard his appearance with dismay. The best elements of both parties feel that his capacity for mischief is unlimited, and unless checked will drag down the country and cover it with dishonour. The only hope under these circumstances is an appeal to the honest manhood of the country. You have called upon me to be the standard-bearer in this county. Gladly would I shrink from the task. Any member of the Commons would be glad to leave his seat to obtain the office which I have so long held. But if duty calls, self must be disregarded. I give up all and accept the call. I ask those who believe in honest government to make sacrifices. I hope the spirit which animates this county will burn in every part of Nova Scotia and Canada as well until we shall be able in a few months to record a splendid victory over corruption and favouritism, and secure an honest, capable and progressive Government under the leadership of Mr. Wilfrid Laurier. Let every man do his part, and soon we shall see the downfall of Tupperism and all it represents.

These are the remarks of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia in a speech recently delivered, and exactly describes the present political situation.

Mr. SPROULE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 14th February, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. LARIVIERE presented the second report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates, as follows :—

The Committee recommend that Mr. J. A. Bernard be appointed on the staff of translators of the Official Report of the Debates to replace Mr. O. Boisvert, whose delicate state of health incapacitates him from discharging his official duties, and that for this session the sum of $1,000, which Mr. Boisvert would have been entitled to receive had he been able to continue to perform his share of the work, be divided equally between the above-mentioned parties.

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT COMPANY.

Mr. McINERNEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 59) respecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Company (Limited).

Mr. LAURIER. Explain.

Mr. McINERNEY. This Bill is merely to enable the company to complete, maintain and operate the works authorized under the Act of 1882. It continues the company's franchises which it obtained under that Act and the amending Acts. It also provides that unless the work is completed within five years after the passing of this Act, the company, so far as the work to be done in the future is concerned, shall lose all rights in connection with it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 60) respecting the Thousand Islands Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 61) to incorporate the Toronto Hamilton and Niagara Falls Railway Company.—(Mr. Bennett.)

Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Ontario Peat Fuel and Railway Company.—(Mr. Boyle.)

Bill (No. 63) to amend the Act incorporating the International Radial Railway Company.—(Mr. McKay.)

Bill (No. 64) to incorporate the Imperial Life Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

Bill (No. 65) to incorporate the Manitoba and Nelson Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis, Alberta.)

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. COATSWORTH moved :

That the Public Accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1895, and the Report of the Auditor General for the same year in part, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

THE REMEDIAL BILL—MANITOBA.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would call the attention of the hon. Finance Minister to the fact that the Remedial Bill, which appears to have been printed in English, has not yet been distributed to the members of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a matter, which, of course, the House has by its officers under its own control entirely. As soon as the Bill is introduced, the clerk and officers of the House take it under their control, and the leader of the Government has no more power in the matter than the other members. I understand, however, it is being expedited.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. SPROULE. In resuming the debate upon this motion, I take occasion on this, the closing session of the present Parliament, to review somewhat the management of the country in the last sixteen or seventeen years during which the Conservative party have been in power, and to compare their management with that of the previous five years during which the Reform party were in power. At the outset, I may say that I congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) for his very clear, concise and businesslike statement with regard to the affairs of the country during the time he has been in the position he so creditably fills. I am sure that it must be satisfactory to the people to know that the cloud of depression which has hung not only over our country, but over the whole continent of North America, as well as many European countries during the past few years, is showing signs of rising and there are evidences of returning prosperity. No doubt many would regard the data given as insufficient to satisfy them that there are evidences of returning prosperity in the country to-day. But I am quite sure that if the question be examined from every standpoint—whether from the standpoint of the industrial pursuits of the people or the financial condition or development of the country, or otherwise, there is no fair-minded man who will not come to the conclusion that we are making fair progress. I must, at the outset, acknowledge with regret that, in my part of the country at least, we are passing through a period of depression,—a period of depression, however, which was not the result of the management or mismanagement of the Government but the result of two very bad crops in succession. Our last crop was almost a total failure in our part of the country, but I am glad to know that this failure was confined to a comparatively local area and portion of the province of Ontario, and that in other sections the bad harvests, from which we have suffered during the past two years, have not been experienced. I regret exceedingly that the nature of the past season has been such that in our part of the country at least the crop on which we depend for the maintenance of our stock was almost a total failure. Not one farmer, perhaps, out of twenty had as much as a ton of hay this last season in my part of the country, and the grain and other crops were only about one-quarter to one-third of what they should be. Remembering this and remembering that the previous season we had not more than half a crop, we can understand that the farmers in that part of the country feel somewhat the depression of the times; but we are glad to know that in other portions of the Dominion a different condition of things exists, and that by the improved means of communication and transport, which have been furnished through the policy and administration of the present Government, every section of Canada is able to-day to obtain food and other supplies it requires from other sections. This we could not have done sixteen years ago. Thanks to the administration of the Government, we are enjoying a happy condition of things which enables one portion of the country to supply another. Where want is felt in any one section, a supply is available from another, by means of the rapid communication and transport which enables the products of the country to be distributed according to the wants of the different sections. But what has been the progress of the country in those lines that make up the industrial, financial and commercial development of the country? In the first place, the great requirement of any country is employment for the people. If the people are not employed, their condition must be a very unfavourable one; if they are employed and receive a fair return for their labour, then the condition of the country is not so bad. I apprehend, I need scarcely ask the question, are the people employed to-day or are they not? For, if we take the public papers in any part of Canada and examine them, we must come to the conclusion fairly, I think, that the people are employed, for the simple reason that we have no great outcry from the large towns and cities in our country, even in this winter season, the season above all others, when, if the people are not employed the pinch of want is most keenly felt and the strongest demands are made upon the charitable public. There is no great evidence to-day in any part of Canada that any considerable number of our people are out of employment, or in a condition of want, calling for the distribution of charitable gifts to support them. But if we recall the past, we know that from 1875 to 1878, that was not the condition. In every large town and city in the Dominion, especially in 1876, 1877 and 1878 the demand upon the charity and hospitality of the people was so great that the country was not able to supply as much as was needed. Then, if we travel through the country and enter the homes of the people in any part of the Dominion, do we find indications of want or poverty, of the lack of the comforts or necessaries of life? If we regard the people as to their appearance, as to their dress, we cannot but see that they are very much above want, and that they are able from their earnings to supply themselves with at least the ordinary necessaries and comforts, and, in many cases, with many of the luxuries of life as well. Then, so far as my knowledge has enabled me to judge, the people have enough to keep them from poverty, hunger or starvation. Go into the homes of the people, among the farming community especially, and you can get a good meal, if you reach there at meal time, and you can see evidences of comfort and in many instances, evidences of prosperity. Then, if we consider the number of young men and young women attending our colleges, high schools, collegiate institutes and other educational institutions where they receive the benefits of a liberal education, we find unmistakable evidences of the prosperity of the country, for, over and above what is required to keep them from the pinching of want, they are enabled to lay by sufficient to give themselves that higher education which fits them for the duties of life, for the responsibilities of statesmanship or for their places in the professions, in commerce, in mechanical or industrial life, or any other. If we look at the country from these standpoints, we must fairly confess that it is not in as bad a condition as some would have us suppose. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Richard Cartwright), in dealing with this question, drew a very unpleasant picture of the condition of the country. I listened to his speech with a good deal of interest and curiosity, because it was the speech of a gentleman who, for a long time, had controlled the financial affairs of the Dominion. I endeavoured to gather from his remarks his estimate of the condition of the country to-day compared with what it was during the time he was Finance Minister. Like many other members, I am sure, I listened to him with great interest, expecting to hear something new, fresh and enlightening, something which would enable us to understand better the principles of political economy which ought to obtain in this country. But I confess that I was disappointed. When the speech was finished I found that we had had what might fairly be called the sixteenth annual edition of the same speech in two volumes, the first not very large, but the second an exhaustive one. It was revised by the original author and embellished with the addition of strong adjectives and bitter invective. Its contents and summary included comments upon political economy, the exodus of the people, the population of the country growing less, shrinkage in values, reduction in wages, want of employment, high taxation, unbearable burdens of debt. The hon. gentleman divided the people into two classes, legalized robbers and paupers, Millionaire manufacturers on one hand, and mendicants, mere hewers of wood and drawers of water, on the other. The Government was represented as stupid, ignorant, extravagant and corrupt. The people were said to be deceived, deluded, corrupted and demoralized. If one formed his opinion of the condition of the country from the speech, he could not but come to the conclusion that the country was in a deplorable condition. The hon. gentleman said :

Every single solitary promise which was made by the hon. gentlemen opposite, or rather by their predecessors, to the people of Canada in 1878, has been utterly and signally falsified.

I need not deal at length with that statement now. I need only remind the hon. gentleman that the promises which were made in 1878 or 1879, when the party now in power took control of the affairs of the country, were that a new tariff would be introduced, designed to protect the interests of the Canadian people, intended to raise a revenue for the country, and intended to give employment to the people and improve their condition. I was struck with one statement made by the hon. gentleman to the effect that the management of the country under the Conservative party was largely instrumental in depopulating the country. And, as illustrating what was happening in this country, he quoted the case of Ireland as a country above all others affording an example of the condition of things in Canada. He said that owing to the protective tariff in Ireland that country had been depopulated and impoverished, that its best men had left it, and that it was much in the position of Canada to-day. Now, for fear the hon. gentleman might think that I misrepresented him, I will read his own words. After reading the historian Lecky's account of Ireland, he proceeded :

Sir, ten times greater curse to Ireland, ten times greater source of evil to Ireland, than even Cromwell's sword or Strongbow's either, was that vile system of protection which, for the sake of propitiating a small number of English manufacturers, stamped out ruthlessly and crushed every attempt which the people of Ireland made to raise themselves in the scale of nations and humanity. Protection was the curse of Ireland as it is to-day the curse of Canada.

And therefore, protection was the cause of depopulating Ireland. In looking over the history of Ireland I was struck with the fact that Ireland increased in population up to the time that free trade was introduced in England. The greatest population Ireland has ever maintained was 8,295,067, and that was in 1845, about the time free trade was introduced in England. Ireland's greatest development was made up to that time, and it was during the protective period that woollens, cottons and flax products were most largely manufactured in the country. In 1841 the English Ministers introduced free trade measures as the best remedy for the existing evils afflicting the English people at the time. The corn duties were repealed in 1846, and the navigation laws in 1847. And what was the result ?

Mr. SPROULE.

Trace the history of Ireland from that time down to the present, and we find that to-day, instead of having 8,295,000 of a population, she has only 4,584,434 souls, and that appears to be all she is able to support, giving them the comforts of life. Now, I say what inference must be drawn from this ? While I do not hold that the introduction of free trade was the sole and only cause for the depopulation of Ireland, I do hold that it was the most important cause, that it was the principal one, and above all others the cause which reduced Ireland to the condition she is in to-day. When the destruction of her flax industries was brought about, when the destruction of her cotton and woollen industries were brought about, the people who had been engaged in those manufactures, had to go to other countries to find employment, while the remaining few were compelled to live by agriculture, and the country was not able to support the large number that she was able to support before that time. Then I say that if the hon. gentleman intended, in that argument, to prove that our country was being cursed by the same influences which depopulated Ireland, he is most unfortunate, taking that as an example, and drawing the deductions which he did at the time. Now, Sir, in examining into the condition of the country, there are several ways by which we may test it, namely, the wealth of the country as represented by the deposits in the banks, life insurance, the commerce of the country, its development by railways and canals, the debt of the country, the actual taxation of the people in comparison with other countries, the cost of living, the development of trade and industry, and the growth of manufactures. Let me give a few of the results which I find in our official records. I will take first the wealth of the country as represented by deposits in our banks, and will compare the period during which the present party have controlled the destinies of Canada, with the preceding period during which time the Reform party were in power. I think it is only fair to take the whole time, because then it cannot be said that you have selected a period where the argument might be most in your favour. Take first the deposits in the chartered banks of the country. In 1874, when the Reform party came into power, there were $63,453,682 deposited in the banks ; when they left power in 1878, there were $16,013,756 ; or in other words, during that period there was an average yearly increase of $604,018. Then I take the deposits in the chartered banks. In 1878 they amounted to $66,013,756 ; in 1895 they had reached the sum of $182,688,227 ; or in other words, the average yearly increase had been $6,863,204 for every year of those seventeen years ; while in the previous period it had only been $640,000. Sir, does that not indicate increased prosperity ? It surely does, so far as the savings of the people are concerned. Then I take the deposits in the post office and other Government banks of the country, and I find that during the four years from 1874 to 1878, the average yearly increase was only $26,728. I take the following years, from 1878 to 1895, and I find that whereas the deposits in the banks in 1878 were only $14,128,185, in 1895 they were $57,578,981, or an average yearly increase of $2,555,928 as against $26,000 in the preceding five years. This showing covers the whole period, and it cannot be said to be unfair. Now, if you can take a period in the history of a country when a people lay by two millions dollars a year, against another period when they can only lay by only $26,000 a year, you can easily understand which period is the most prosperous in the history of the country. Then I will take fire insurance. The amount of risks in 1874 was $306,844,219; in 1878 the risks were $409,889,701; or a yearly average increase during that period of $25,763,870. Then I take the following period of fifteen years, and I find an average yearly increase of $26,635,469, as against $25,000,000 in the previous period. Then I take life insurance, and I think if there is one line more than another which indicates that the people are able to lay by a portion of their earnings, it is the business of life insurance, because it is only those who have money to spare who are able to insure their lives. In 1874 I find the amount of life insurance was $85,716,323; in 1878 it had been reduced to $84,751,937, or an average yearly decrease during those five years of $241,097. Then I take the succeeding seventeen years, and what is the result? In 1878, as I have just said, the life insurance amounted to $84,751,937, but in 1895, it was $308,161,436, or an average yearly increase of $13,963,033; while in the previous five years there was a yearly decrease of $241,000. Now, surely that must be an evidence of the increasing wealth of the country. I will now take the value of the exports of the country as indicating what the people are able to send away and for which they get money in return. Between 1874 and 1878 the exports were $354,963,602, or an average yearly export during the five years of $70,992,720. Now, I take the period from 1879 to 1895, and I find that the total amount of exports reached the enormous sum of $1,466,895,092, or an average during those seventeen years of $86,287,946. During all those years the increase was going on rapidly. I take next the freight carried in the country. It will be understood by every one who is within the sound of my voice, that the freight carried by the railroads and the transportation companies of our country, is an evidence of the business which is being done, because if goods are not manufactured or produced, they cannot be carried, and if they are carried and transported from one part of the country to the other, they are either being distributed, or taken to the markets of the world where they are sold. I take the tons of freight carried by rail, and I find that between 1875 and 1878 there were 26,745,861 tons, or an average of 6,686,465 tons annually. I take the period from 1879 up to 1895, and I find there were 281,675,302 tons carried; or during those seventeen years an average of 16,569,135 tons, as against six millions in the previous five years. Now, it cannot be possible that the people are able to produce and have carried sixteen million tons of freight a year, and yet be in a worse condition than they were when they were able to produce and have carried only six million tons a year. This I say must be regarded as an evidence of the development of the country and of increasing prosperity.

Taking the canals, I find the tonnage carried comparatively stationary, because there is a change as regards transportation by canals. It is now carried by railways. But I take the vessels on the inland waters between Canada and the United States, and what do I find? From 1876 to 1878 there were 6,453,018 tons, or an average for the three years of 2,151,021 annually. From 1879 to 1895 there were 46,051,214 tons carried, or an average during those seventeen years of 2,708,895 tons.

I take the vessels engaged in the coasting trade, and it will be understood that the coasting trade represents the carriage of the produce of the country from one part to another. Where manufactures or agricultural products are produced in one place and required in other places they are carried by railways, canals and steamboats, and these facilities enable us to distribute the products from points of production to the points of distribution. The coasting trade from 1876 to 1878 amounted to 20,211,642 tons, or a yearly average of 6,737,214 tons. Taking the seventeen years from 1879 to 1895 the total was 216,761,152 tons, or a yearly average of 12,750,656 tons. This is twice as much per annum as during the previous period. Accordingly, the people must have produced twice as much, and it has been distributed in our country by the action of the National Policy in keeping out the products of other countries.

I take sea-going vessels, and this statement represents what we are sending abroad. From 1876 to 1878 our sea-going vessels carried 13,192,000 tons, or an average of 4,364,397 tons a year. From 1879 to 1895 they carried 88,968,938 tons, or an average of 5,233,467 tons; I give this as evidence that this country is still progressing.

It is asked what has been the result of the increased mileage of railway. I reply that it has reduced the cost of freight for the benefit of the manufacturers and producers who must transport their products to that part of the country where they are sold. The average rate of freight in 1878 was $1.57 per ton, the average rate in 1894 was $1.45. I give this as evidence of the advantage which the country enjoys from the additional railways which have been built and the increased transportation facilities that we enjoy.

I now come to the condition of the people, to the commercial side of the country, and I ask what has been the result on commercial life in Canada, what has been the number of failures and the amount of the failures represented by those two periods? I take Bradstreet's table, and find from 1874 to 1878, five years, there were failures representing $111,487,000, or a yearly average of $22,297,400. From 1879 to 1895 the failures represented only $14,081,580 annually. This statement must be accepted as evidence that the condition of the country was better from 1879 to 1895 than it was from 1874 to 1878.

I take the development of the country with respect to railways. Ours is a new country and it has not yet reached anything like the maximum of development. We require transportation for the produce of one part of the country to another part, and also for our trade with foreign countries, and there is a very urgent demand for railways in every part of the Dominion. I take the railway mileage in 1875 and 1878. In 1875 it was 4,856 miles, in 1878 it was 6,143 miles, or an increase of 429 miles a year. That represents the number of miles of railway built during these years when the Reform party was in power. In 1878 I say the mileage was 6,143, in 1895 it was 15,627 miles, or 600 miles a year as against 429 miles a year. This increased mileage affords the means required by the people for the distribution of their products.

I take post offices as representing the conveniences of life. The number in 1874 was 4,706 in 1878 it was 5,378, or an increase during the year of 168. In 1895 the number was 8,832, or an increase yearly of 203 as against 168. This Government cannot be blamed for not giving the people postal conveniences and facilities for carrying on their private and business correspondence in the various lines of life in which they are engaged.

I take the amount spent on canals and railways and on public buildings. We expended from 1874 to 1878 on railways $19,294,227, a yearly average of $3,858,000; on canals we expended from 1874 to 1878 $13,302,217, or an average of $2,664,044. On public buildings from 1874 to 1878 we expended $3,732,405, or a yearly average of $746,438. On other public works we spent from 1874 to 1878 $3,811,291, or a yearly average of $762,258. Our total for these years from 1874 to 1878 for railways, canals, public works and public buildings was $40,158,140, or a yearly average of $8,031,622. In the years between 1879 and 1894 there was spent on railways $82,442,994, or an average yearly of $5,152,687, as against a yearly average of $3,858,000 while the Liberal Government was in power. We spent on canals, during that same period, $29,292,728, or an average yearly of $1,832,795. During that time we spent on public works $11,050,322, being a yearly average of $690,000. On other public works we spent, during that time, $18,147,488, or a yearly average of $1,134,218. Taking our expenditure on these lines during the last seventeen years, I find that it averaged yearly $8,808,345, while in the preceding period it was $8,031,624. I have shown you, Mr. Speaker, that during these seventeen years of Conservative Government there was, on an average, a much larger number of railway mileage built every year, a greater development of our public works, and more money spent on these public works and on public buildings. Therefore, I am correct in stating, that the people received a far greater advantage for the amount of money spent during these seventeen years, than they did from the money spent under the Mackenzie Administration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the public debt of Canada. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) told us that our people were burdened under an immense debt; that the present Government were responsible for running up that debt very rapidly, much more rapidly than their predecessors, and, therefore, that this Government were unworthy of the confidence of the people of this country. He told us, also, that the people of Canada would shortly be unable to provide for the debt, if it continued to grow much larger. Sir, the facts of the case do not bear out that statement of the hon. gentleman. The average yearly increase of the debt from 1874 to 1878, during the period the Reform party was in power, was $8,009,276. As against that I take the net debt of Canada during the last seventeen years, while the Conservative party have been in power, and I find that the increase during that period was annually only $6,630,136, as against over $8,000,000 a year under the Liberal regime. Therefore, if the debt of Canada is very heavy to-day, I contend that the Reform party is more responsible for increasing the burden during their time in office, than is the Conservative party under their administration. But, Sir, the only burden that the people of this country feel in connection with the debt is the taxes they pay in customs and inland revenue. The people of Canada, in this generation, or the next generation, or in the third generation, are not expected to pay the national debt. It is true, we pay the interest upon that debt and the sinking fund, and we do that by the customs and inland revenue duties principally. The other receipts going into the treasury from public works and post offices, do not represent a tax upon the people, because they get value in return for this service. Virtually, the tax upon the people is fully represented by the receipts from customs and inland revenue. Now let us look at the customs revenue for the past seventeen years, and let us see how it compares with the customs revenue when

Mr. Mackenzie was in office. In 1878 the customs per capita tax was $3.13, and in 1895 it was $3.47, a very slight increase indeed. In 1878 the inland revenue tax was $1.19 per head of the population, and to-day it is $1.54 per head. In 1878, customs and inland revenue together represented a tax of $4.32 per head, whereas to-day it is $5.01 per head. That is but a small increase, considering the great development which has taken place in our country from 1878 up to the present time, considering the increased population, which has to be looked after, and considering, also, the extensive country which has been opened up since then, necessitating railways, post offices and other conveniences of civilization to meet the requirements of the inhabitants. It has been said by the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), that our taxation is so heavy that the people of Canada cannot bear it. Perhaps the best way to answer that is to compare our taxation with that of other countries, and, when we do that, we find that Canada stands in a very favourable light. One year ago, when hon. gentlemen opposite were campaigning all through the country, they told the people what they would do, if they were entrusted with the management of the affairs of the Dominion. They told the people of Canada that their platform was "free trade as they have it in England," but they took mighty good care not to tell the people what "free trade as they have it in England" would mean to the people of Canada. Those hon. gentlemen opposite came back to Parliament the following year, but we do not hear one of them to-day mentioning anything about "free trade as they have it in England." They have given up that platform, and they turn to resolutions passed by a conference held in Ottawa in 1893, and they announce those resolutions as the platform of their party.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see what "free trade as they have it in England" means to the people of Canada. If it means reduced taxation, then it would be an advantage; but does it mean that? The customs taxes raised in England in the year 1895 amounted to $97,893,000, or $2.50 per head of the population of that country. Now, the inland revenue tax raised in England in 1895 amounted to $284,894,666, or $7.24 per head of the population. Add these two together, and you find that the English people are taxed to the extent of $9.74 per head from customs and inland revenue alone, under "free trade as they have it in England;" whereas the Canadian people, under our present system, are taxed to the extent of only $5.01, a very considerable difference indeed in favour of our system. Is the system of taxation in England a system which the Canadian people should accept in preference to their own? Would it likely be adopted by the Canadian people, or, if adopted, would it be more advantageous to them than the system under which our taxes are raised to-day? It would not, Mr. Speaker. It would necessitate, in many instances, direct taxation, and, if it should turn out, as is the case in England, that the people would have to pay $9 per head, instead of the $5 they pay in Canada, the people of this country are not very likely to be much elated by the English system. Let me compare the taxation in the United States with the taxation in Canada. In 1893, the Customs taxation of the United States was $3.04 per head of the population, and the inland revenue tax was $2.41 per head of the population, or, together, these taxes amounted to $5.45 per capita, while in Canada they only amount to $5.01. If the Canadian people are heavily taxed, or over-taxed, this comparison does not show it. Other countries have to raise money to carry on the affairs of the state, as we do, but they raise it in different ways; but the figures I have given show that they do not raise it in better ways than we do.

Now, what is the development of our country in connection with our export trade? If our exports are increasing, we must be prospering in some measure, whether small or great. I take up the returns, and what do I find? Of animals and agricultural products, in 1878, we exported $33,729,066 worth. Now, we are told that the farmers are suffering from the National Policy more than any other class in the community. If that were so, you would expect to find that they were exporting less to-day than they did before the National Policy was introduced. But we find, on the contrary, that in 1895 they exported, of animals and agricultural products, $50,106,898 worth. Fifty millions as against thirty-three millions—is that an evidence of retrogression or of progress, which? I think no person could prove to the farmers of this country that they are not better off as the result of that great increase in their exports. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) told us the other night that the farmers of the country were decreasing in number—that they were crowding into the towns and cities. He said that we had 10,000 farmers less in 1891 than we had in 1881. Well, if with 10,000 farmers less we can export nearly $20,000,000 worth of produce more a year than we did before, these people must be better off; and you cannot convince any farmer that he is not better off. Now, I will divide the exports into their different lines, and what do we find? The farmers of the country are changing their lines of production, and to-day they export more of animals, and their products than they did a few years ago, when the bulk of their exports consisted of agricultural products. In 1878, of animals and their products, they exported $14,100,604 worth; but in 1895 they exported $34,387,770 worth. Of agricultural products they exported, in 1878, $19,628,462 worth, and in 1895, $15,719,128. They exported less agricultural products in 1895 than in 1878, because they are turning their attention more to dairying and meat producing instead of to grain raising. Then, we take the products of our mines, and we find that in 1878 we exported $3,082,900 worth, whereas, in 1895 we exported $6,983,227 worth. In that case, our exports more than doubled. Surely that is not an evidence of decreasing wealth; it must be an evidence of a larger return to the people of the country. Of the products of our fisheries we exported, in 1878, $6,928,871 worth, and in 1895, $10,692,247 worth, or an increase of over $4,000,000. Take the products of our forests, and you find the same thing. In 1878 we exported $13,261,459 worth, whereas, in 1895, we exported $23,891,166 worth, an increase of over $10,000,000. I say that those engaged in this industry must have bettered their condition to the tune of $10,000,000 over what it was in 1878. Now, take the manufactures of our country. We are told by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that notwithstanding the National Policy, which was intended to protect the manufactures, we have done little in the way of developing that line of industry. I do not say anything now in regard to the great increase of the manufactured products for home consumption, to replace what was formerly imported from abroad. But, take the exports of the country, over and above the requirements in our own country, and we find that in 1878 we exported $2,700,281 worth of manufactured goods, whereas, last year our exports increased to $7,768,875 worth. That is a notable increase, and it must be taken as an evidence that the development of our manufactures is going on in a way that indicates that the country is prospering fairly well. If we take the totals of all these exports, we find that in 1878 we exported, in round numbers, $60,000,000 worth, and in 1895, $102,000,000 worth. Therefore, I say the people of Canada have bettered their position to the extent of $42,000,000 at least, which must be accepted as an evidence of the increasing wealth of the country. But I wish to deal now particularly with the products of our manufacturing industries. It was said by the hon. member for South Oxford that every promise made to the people by the Conservatives in 1878 were falsified in every respect. As I have said, one of these promises was that the people were to get better employment. Our manufacturers were to increase their output, better wages would be paid, and a more valuable product would be turned out, after the introduction of the National Policy. What has been the result? I take the capital invested in manufactures at three different periods to show that the country is really growing richer in that line. In 1871 we had $77,000,000 invested in the manufactures of the country; in 1881, $158,000,000; and in 1891, $329,000,000. Surely that is an evidence of the progress of the manufacturing industries of the country. Now, take the number of hands employed. It was said that the National Policy would afford more employment to workingmen. In 1871 there were 187,942 hands employed in manufacturing industries in the country; in 1881, 244,293 hands; and in 1891, 343,030 hands, an increase in 1891 over 1871 of 155,000 people who find employment in manufacturing industries, who could not have found employment before, because the manufactories were not in existence to employ them. But the hon. member for South Huron said the other night that the tendency to protection in every country was to reduce the wages of the people. Is that really borne out by the figures given here? I take the census returns, and what do I find? The wages paid in 1881 over 1871 increased 39.3 per cent, and the wages paid in 1891 over 1881 increased 63 per cent.

Mr. GIBSON. What in?

Mr. SPROULE. In manufactories.

Mr. GIBSON. Not a cent.

Mr. SPROULE. The wages that were paid in 1891 as compared with 1881 show an increase of 127 per cent. There is no denying that fact because the figures are there, and no one up to the present has dared to dispute their accuracy. On the face of that no person can claim that the tendency of the National Policy has been to lower wages. It has been the reverse. It has increased wages. Because by the increased development in manufacturing industries, the machinery turns out more products, the wage-earners become more expert, and consequently receive greater return in wages for their labour. They turn out more money value per man, and, therefore, get more wages and the result is what we find to-day.

Mr. GIBSON. Is the hon. gentleman aware that machinery displaces skilled labour?

Mr. SPROULE. Allowing for that, there is the undeniable fact that 112,000 more people were employed in 1891 than in 1881. That cannot be denied, notwithstanding the fact that machinery displaces labour. But what labour it displaces in one line it gives employment to in another, because the manufacture of the improved machinery entails the employment of additional labour to make it. The hon. gentleman is only strengthening the argument I have advanced. The improved machinery requires labourers to produce it, and these labourers have to be paid good wages. Taking the wages paid, I find that in 1889 they amounted to $59,429,002, whereas in 1891 they amounted to $99,762,441. And as a further evidence of the development, I give the raw material brought into this country and used up by our manufactures. I only go back the last ten years. If I were to go back to 1871, the comparison would show a still greater development. The raw material used up in 1881 by these factories represented $179,918,593 in value, but in 1891 it represented $255,983,219, showing an increase of $76,000,000 in those ten years. Now, this increase of $76,000,000 worth of raw material brought into the country gave employment to more hands and enabled them to turn out more products at greater wages. Take the value of the product, and what does that show with regard to the increased wealth of the country? Why in 1881 the value of the products in round figures was $309,000,000. What was it in 1891? It was $475,000,000, or an increase in ten years of $165,769,637, or 53 per cent. The value of the product manufactured in Canada brought back to the people in value $165,000,000 for their labour more in the year than it did ten years before that time. Is it fair to say that the country is not prosperous?

Now, we are told that our manufacturers cannot compete with foreign countries, that, notwithstanding protection, we are still unable to do much in that direction. I have here some of the lines they produced in competition with other countries, and I shall only give a few of the lines where I consider the development is fair.

Mr. GRIEVE. We say they can compete with other countries.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said it was folly for us to suppose that they could compete with foreign countries, but another hon. gentleman gets up and declares that they can. The hon. member for South Oxford says that on account of our limited area and climatic conditions, being a narrow strip of country, we cannot compete, while others of his friends say we can. What is the fact? I take agricultural implements, which may be accepted as a fair criterion, because in the manufacture of these implements we use up the iron and wood of our country and give employment to labour. Now, we keep out the agricultural implements which foreigners used to send us under the tariff of 1879, and we supply the wants of our country to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and in addition to that, we export $663,718 worth.

Mr. DEVLIN. Were they sold cheaper abroad than here?

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. DEVLIN. That is the question.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said the other night that we were selling agricultural implements to the farmers in Australia cheaper than to the farmers in Canada. He only showed how little he knew. Why, Sir, our implements are sold there at twice as much as they are sold to Canadian farmers. We are told that we are giving a drawback to our manufacturers to enable them to sell cheaply to the farmers of Australia and enable the products of Australia to be sold in this market in competition with our own. That is not the case. These implements are not sold cheaper abroad, but very much dearer.

But when they are sold out of the country, the Government think it wise to give a drawback on the raw material that goes into their manufacture, so as to enable the manufacturers to give employment to more labour, because by giving employment to more labour, they use up more raw material and produce a better home market for the consumption of the products of the farm in this country. In this way, it is beneficial to the farmers. In 1879 we exported only $79,811 worth. What did we export last year, after the National Policy had done its work? Instead of $79,000 worth, we exported $663,718 worth. Having manufactured all that was required at home, which represented a very large quantity, and which formerly we purchased from abroad, we exported besides $660,000 worth.

Then I take cotton. Now, we bring in raw cotton in very large quantities. In 1878 we manufactured and exported $1,418 worth. How much did we export last year? We exported $546,168 worth, or in other words, an increase of $544,750 worth. What did that do for the Canadian people? It gave employment to labour, and this labour furnished a consuming market for the benefit of the farmers and thus gave our farmers better return.

Take leather. In 1878 we exported $268,975 worth of leather. How much did we export last year? If the manufactures of our country cannot be developed by the National Policy, you would expect that the exports would not have increased. How much did we export in the last year? Instead of the $268,000 worth exported in 1878, in 1895 we exported $1,283,451 worth, or an increase of $1,000,000. Is that an evidence of development or otherwise?

Then I take household furniture and manufactures of wood. In 1879 we exported $300,000 worth. In 1895 we exported $988,804 worth.

The increased output of these few lines I have given, exported from the country in 1895 over 1879, amounted to $3,131,837. Now, is it not the rule all over the world, asked the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald), that protection does not give employment to labour, that it reduces wages, and does not enhance the wealth of the country. I think the arguments I have given prove the very reverse of that.

Has the National Policy helped the farmers of the country? We are told that above all other classes, the farmers have not been helped by the National Policy. I have already given you the fact that the farmers exported over $50,000,000 of produce in 1895, as against $33,000,000 worth before the National Policy was adopted in 1878; and this was in addition to supplying a home demand which had been supplied by imported products up to that time. I have some returns here showing the exports of the products of the farm. I have already given the figures in gross; let us consider a few details. Montreal is the port from which we send out the greatest quantity of agricultural products, and the returns of that port represent fairly the progress that is being made in the export trade of goods produced by the farmers of the country. The first item I take is cattle. In 1878 we exported from Montreal $1,300,738 worth. In 1895 we exported $7,303,556 worth, an increase of over $6,000,000 in that time. It cannot be denied that in this respect the farmers are doing better than they did before the National Policy. Of horses we exported in 1878 $497,375 worth, and in 1895 $1,544,838 worth. The value of sheep exported from Montreal in 1878 was $217,868, and in 1895 it was $1,738,049. Our exports of pork in 1878 amounted to $63,529, and in 1895 $21,397. Of bacon and hams we exported in 1878 $57,195, and in 1895 $801,123. The value of eggs exported in 1878 was $32,730, and last year $357,583. Then, I take the item of cheese. In 1878 the value of cheese exported at the port of Montreal was $2,345,536, while in 1895 we exported actually $10,966,189 worth. Remember, Mr. Speaker, these figures show only what was exported from the port of Montreal. Our total cheese exports last year amounted to $14,000,000. Of apples we exported in 1878 $96,706, and in 1895 $413,311. Take the total of these exports and what do we find? In 1878 we sent through this port, of the products of the farm, about $6,000,000 worth: 1888, $14,000,000; in 1893, $21,000,000 worth; in 1894, $23,000,000 worth, and in 1895, $24,000,000 worth—and this last figure does not represent the full year. And we are told that there are 10,000 farmers less in Canada than ten years ago. Can it be successfully contended that the farmers in Canada are producing less than they did, that they are not as well off as they were, that they receive less for their labour than they did before the National Policy? These figures prove the very contrary to be the result. Not only did the farmers export this large quantity of their products, but they supplied a home consumption which was made of benefit to them by the National Policy, a benefit of which but for the National Policy would have been lost to them. The National Policy was expected to keep out the products of the American farmer, which were being brought in to feed the Canadian mechanic, the Canadian labourer, and even the Canadian farmer, in many instances. I have a few figures showing the effect of the National Policy in keeping the home market for our home producers. I take some lines of farm produce—mutton, pork, bacon and hams, beef, meats, lard and tallow for home consumption. In 1878 the imports of these articles into Canada amounted to 16,486,780 pounds. In other words, we brought in $1,220,223 worth of these lines before the National Policy was adopted. A duty was put on pork, but we found that still the western states could produce more cheaply than the Canadian farmer, and the result was that western pork was still coming in. But in 1889, when this was increased to such an extent as to become an actual menace to that branch of our trade, we induced the Government to increase the duty. In 1889 we brought of these lines 32,993,761 pounds, or $2,285,073, to feed the Canadians, while the Canadian farmer was obliged to send his products to the foreign market and pay the cost of taking it there. As I have said, the Government raised the duty. And what was the result? Last year we brought in only 8,433,802 pounds in these lines. In other words, we kept out 24,000,000 pounds of American products which had formerly been brought in to feed the Canadian people. Instead of bringing in $2,000,000 worth of the products of the American farmers to feed the Canadian people as in 1889, by reason of the protective tariff we brought in only $585,361 worth. Will any one tell me, then, that the Canadian farmer is not benefited by the National Policy? When you gave the Canadian farmer the home market, you enabled him to produce more, and, as a result, he was able to export more, and this accounts for the increase of our exports from $33,000,000 to $50,000,000. Then, take the items of wheat, oats, pease, corn, cornmeal, oatmeal and flour. In 1878 we brought in of these $13,224,046 worth. And how much did we bring in last year? Only $2,393,361. What kept these foreign products out? Why, it was the tariff of 15 cents a bushel on wheat, 75 cents a barrel on flour, 10 cents a bushel on oats and 7 cents a bushel on corn. The result was that the Canadian farmer benefited to the extent of nearly $2,000,000 worth of a market at the time. That is how the National Policy has helped him. Then I say it cannot be successfully claimed that the National Policy has done no good. I have shown you that the country has been developed, I have shown you that the Conservative party, while they were in power, have built more mileage of railway, they have spent more money on public works, they have bought the conveniences of life to the people much better than was done in the preceding period. There are a larger number of post offices, we have improved the transportation facilities, thereby reducing the freights of the country, and by improving transportation and reducing freights, we have given a large return to the producers. The Canadian farmer, above all others, benefits by these improvements. Sir, to-day we are told that there is extravagance in every line, and we are asked to economize. We are told by the hon. member for South Oxford that this Government is a very extravagant one. Because they propose to expend some $37,000,000 next year, he says that the country is being run into debt to an extent it cannot bear. I will take his own words. This is what he said:

For my own part, I do not hesitate to tell the Minister of Finance that I consider a yearly expenditure of $40,000,000,— —or $38,000,000, altogether too large for the present resources of Canada. I say it is a disgrace and a shame to the Government that have been entrusted with our affairs, that they come down to us and ask for an expenditure of $38,000,000 a year for federal purposes.

He had only exaggerated it $2,000,000.

He said: What we want is retrenchment to-day, what we want is economy, what the people want is a reduction in the expenditure, and if they will elect the Reform party we will effect that economy, and we will give you the retrenchment that is not given you by the Conservative party. Now, let me say here a few words with regard to the economy of the Conservative party. While I admire any man for practising economy where economy can benefit, either the individual or the country, I equally admire the man who expends almost extravagantly when such extravagant expenditure is turned to useful account. We are not living in an age of the world, and in a country, where no development is expected. We have many millions of acres of land to be settled and to be developed, and we require, for years to come, a greater development than anything that has taken place during the last seventeen years. If our country is to be settled up, if we are to increase it from a population of five millions to one of sixty millions, like our neighbours to the south of us, with no more territory than we have, can we stand still at the present time? Can we economize, or can we go back? Is it necessary for the development of the country that we should spend more, or should spend less? I say in all frankness, it is necessary that we should spend more. If the country to-day is suffering from one thing more than another, it is from want of conveniences to carry on the trade of the country. In our harbours, our vessels cannot get to the docks on account of the shallowness of the water, and yet the economy that has obtained for the last two or three years has been so great that these necessary improvements have not been made, which we believe the country demands, and the country expects. Those people who are living hundreds of miles from a railway, require railway facilities just as much as the people in the older settled parts of Quebec and Ontario who have railways built with Government aid. Then, can we stand still? If our country is to stand still, then we may continue to practice economy. But if we are to develop in the future, as in the past, we must, in the nature of things, increase our expenditure. If we are to bring more people to this country, if we are to become a population of fifty millions, we cannot give them the conveniences of life with an expenditure which has only been sufficient for five millions. Were I in the position of a Finance Minister, or a member of a Cabinet, and were I endeavouring to shape and control the affairs of this country for the next few years, I would propose a much larger expenditure than is proposed by the Estimates now before the House. The country requires it, the country demands it, and the country will support the Government that gives it. If our country is to be developed as she ought to be developed, and we are to give the people the conveniences of life that they ought to have, we must spend more money year after year. The burdens of taxation are not great. I have shown you that they are less than those of the United States, in comparison to population, and they are still lower as compared with England, and they are lower as compared with every other country in Europe. Then why should it be said that the people are burdened by federal taxation? They are not burdened by taxation. Their present taxation is only represented by what they raise to pay the interest upon our debt, and to carry on the affairs of the country, and that we raise by a customs revenue, and by inland revenue. As we bring more people into the country, they will pay more taxes. Now, we are told that the debt of the country is too heavy, that it has been increasing rapidly. I say it has not been increasing out of proportion to the increase of population, and the development of the country: it has not been increasing rapidly. Even though we were obliged to borrow money to expend for the purpose of developing the country, we would be justified in doing so. But we are told that we have a very heavy deficit this year. Yes, we have a heavy deficit, and why? Because we have taken taxes off the people in the last two or three years. In 1891 we took off $3,500,000 in taxes on sugar alone. It is true, we added taxes to the amount of $1,500,000, but still that left a reduction of $2,000,000 in one year. Sir, I say we should not have reduced the customs revenue to that extent: in other words, we should have raised that money, and had we done so, we would have an ample amount of revenue to-day, as we had up to the time when we reduced the customs taxation, and we would not be in the position we are in to-day of having a deficit. We would have been able clearly to demonstrate to the country that the National Policy did what was aimed at when it was given to Canada. Until then, it raised a revenue sufficient for the wants of the country. Though we were expending, according to the needs of the country, the National Policy raised the necessary revenue. Now, if we had not taken off that taxation three or four years ago, what would have been the result, provided we had not imported any more during the last three years than we did in the previous three years? On sugar alone, what would have been the result? We would have had $8,000,000 more than we have to-day. If we had had that $8,000,000, we could have wiped out these deficits entirely, and still have more money to expend for the wants of the country. Last year we again took off $1,500,000 by a reduction in the tariff. I say that the condition of the country did not require it, it rather required that we should allow those taxes to continue to be raised. Now, the question is, in what shape shall we raise taxes? Shall we raise them by the present system, or shall we raise them by what the Opposition call a revenue tariff? I do not understand what they mean by a revenue tariff. Between 1874 and 1878 they had, I presume, what they called a revenue tariff. It was a 17 per cent tariff all round, a 17 per cent tariff that taxed the absolute necessities of life, such as tea, sugar and coffee. Then the Conservative party came in, and that tariff was raised a little higher, to about 19 per cent. It was raised, practically, on the same lines, but with the consequence that the rearrangement of the tariff protected the Canadian people, it was done for the purpose of protection. If the Reform party came into power, would they say that a 19 per cent tariff protected the Canadian people? The hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Paterson) said the other day: Our platform and our policy is to levy only such taxation as is necessary to produce sufficient revenue, and so to levy it that it will not have in it an element of protection, even incidental protection cannot be found in the tariff which we propose to introduce. Then it must be said of them: Well, you must raise a revenue, and you could rearrange the tariff in such a way that you could give protection to the Canadian farmer, you could keep out the American pork which is being consumed in Canada, you could keep out the American wheat that is being brought in to feed Canadians, you could keep out the American flour which is brought in to feed Canadians—you could do this, but you will not do it. You set your faces stubbornly and obstinately in favour of the obsolete principle of a tariff for revenue only. Does the Canadian farmer want men to control the destinies of Canada who would raise a tariff for revenue only—not protect them though he could if he would—or does he want a tariff that would protect his own interests at the same time that it raises a revenue? They tell the Canadian people that they would not do it if they could. They say: No matter whether we could do it or not, we won't do it. Now, if they came in tomorrow, they would have to raise a revenue. I suppose they would try to raise it on the same line they did between 1874 and 1878; we may fairly assume that they are not likely to change that system very much. But I believe the Canadian people will be very much more likely to trust the men who have protected Canadian interests, who have kept Canada for the Canadians, who have raised a revenue, who are developing the country, and who are still desirous of doing, in the future, as they have in the past. If they had taken my advice, instead of reducing the tariff they would have left the duties as they were, they would have raised additional revenue, they would have improved our harbours so as to facilitate navigation, they would have increased our railway mileage and brought the conveniences of life to the people in every part of the Dominion, making transportation for them easier and cheaper. So development has proceeded, and any Government that is not in harmony with it will not be promoting the best interests of the people. The Conservatives say, raise a revenue, but do it with custom duties. The Reformers say, raise a revenue, but while doing so, duties must not protect our manufacturing and other interests. I say the Canadian people do not want to adopt that mode of raising the revenue. Free trade as it is in England, we were told a year ago, was the panacea for the ills of the Canadian people. To-day we hear nothing of free trade. I have already told the House what it means, that it represents $9 per head instead of $5 per head levied on the people. It would represent direct taxation, instead of raising a revenue by means of customs.

Has the tariff raised a revenue? I need say very little more on this point, because I have proved that every year during the period up to three years ago, and last year we raised more than was needed for the wants of the people. The overplus during several years enabled us to put away a large amount for sinking fund, and meet other requirements of the country, until, three years ago, when the tariff was reduced, and reduced more, in my opinion, than it should have been. Has it given the Canadian farmer the home market? I have given figures which, in my opinion, unmistakably prove that it has given the Canadian farmer the home market, that it has been beneficial and protected him, and that to-day he receives the results of that protection. Has it reduced the cost of living to the people? I need not point to the fact that the necessities of life, so far as regards manufactured goods, are 45 per cent cheaper than they were in 1878. The National Policy is not responsible for all of this, but increased manufacturing and increased competition have followed as results of the National Policy, the increased development of manufacturing being largely the direct result of protection, and we find that, accordingly, prices of cotton, woollens, fabrics of all kinds are reduced in price, until to-day the people of Canada buy these goods, which represent their wearing apparel, at 45 per cent less than in 1878. Then, I ask, why should we discard this policy for some effete theory, or, at all events, some theory which belongs to another country? Has the National Policy given employment to the people? I have already furnished figures which prove that it has. Which party is likely in future to govern this country, which party will be chosen by the people to administer its affairs? In my opinion, the people will select the Conservative party, which, during seventeen years has developed the country as regards railway mileage, and in every other direction, the party which has given protection, which has given the home market to the Canadian people, which has protected the Canadian farmer, the Canadian manufacturer, the Canadian artisan, and the Canadian labourer. I have misjudged the people if they do not place their confidence in the Conservative party, if they do not accept the party that has given protection and developed our Dominion, and reject the Liberal party, which has put forward, as its platform, free trade, unrestricted reciprocity, or whatever else it may be termed. The people will select those who have governed this country so well in the past.

I desire, for a few minutes, to offer some remarks with respect to statements made during this debate. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said it would be of great advantage to Canada if we had the freedom of the American market for our fish. Some hon. members laughed, and wished to know how we would lose the American market. This occurred before six o'clock; but during the recess, some of the hon. gentleman's friends told him that we had already freedom to send our fish into the American market, and the beautiful argument which the hon. gentleman had carefully built up before six o'clock was demolished after that hour.

Mr. BOWERS. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that we have the freedom of the American market for our fish?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, for fresh fish. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) was speaking of exporting fresh fish from the great lakes and Manitoba, the hon. gentleman pointing out the great benefit that would accrue to the Canadian people if we had the freedom of the American market for that fish; but we have that freedom now. Then the hon. gentleman said: Put the Liberal party in power and I guarantee that within three years Canada will have secured reciprocity with the United States. That was an assertion ventured without furnishing any proof or any reason for the belief that this prophecy would be fulfilled. What reason is there to believe that the Reformers could get reciprocity with the United States any more than the Conservatives could secure it. Hon. gentlemen opposite were in power five years, during which time they made one effort, and it resulted in failure, and they went on conducting public affairs on the same lines. The Conservatives have tried many times to secure reciprocity, but they have failed. Nevertheless, this country is being steadily developed. Then the hon. gentleman who represents one of the Wellingtons (Mr.

Semple) said it would be a great advantage if Canadian farmers had to-day the benefit of the American market for their grain. He further declared that the National Policy had done no good and that it was of no advantage to the Dominion. Why? Because he said grain was always higher on the other side of the line, and that this was the case with all agricultural products; and the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. McMillan) gave figures to prove the prices on the American side were nearly always higher than in Canada. At the very moment the hon. gentleman was giving these figures, I looked over the Toronto "Globe," of February 6th, and found the price of wheat in Toronto as 85 cents. This was the highest price, but it was not the same quality of wheat, because it was not No. 1 Manitoba hard. The price at farmers' wagons was 85 cents. At the same date, the quotation for No. 1 hard at Duluth was 61 $\frac{3}{4}$ cents. It was quoted at Detroit at 75 cents, or 10 cents less than in Toronto, and the cost of transportation between the points would not exceed 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per bushel at through rates. If there was not a duty of 15 cents per bushel on wheat, this country would be flooded with the American wheat. Only a short time ago such wheat was 18 cents lower on the American side of the line than at Canadian points. The price of oats in Toronto was 28 cents per bushel, compared with 19 $\frac{3}{4}$ cents at Detroit. What great benefit would the American market give to the Canadian farmer for his oats when he could only get 19 $\frac{3}{4}$ cents in the States, as against 28 cents in his own country? The hon. gentleman further stated that if our farmers had not the National Policy to contend with they would be better off in their own market. It is impossible to see how the Canadian farmer could thus be benefited. On that day, mess pork was selling in Chicago at \$10.30, as against \$13.50 in Toronto, and \$15 per barrel in Montreal. Remember the price was \$15 per barrel as against \$10.30, and with such prices what would be the use of the American market to Canadian producers? Lard was sold in Toronto at 8 $\frac{3}{4}$ cents a pound, and in New York, on the same date, it was sold at 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound. What benefit would it be, I ask, to the Canadian farmer if he had the American market in that line?

I have little more to say, Mr. Speaker, in this debate. I listened to the very lengthy speech of my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) last night. It extended over four and three-quarters hours, or nearly five hours. I was somewhat amused at it, because the hon. gentleman referred to me as the member who was likely to follow him, and he asked me to take a note of what he was saying, and endeavour to answer it. Well, it would be a herculean task indeed for any one to travel over the same ground, and to attempt to reply to him. I thought to myself that life was too short, and time too valuable, and the cost of the Canadian Parliament too great on the country, to assume the task he invited me to. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) dealt with many subjects, and he mixed them up in every possible way. He spoke of the National Policy and free trade, the Curran bridge and the Franchise Act, the gerrymander and the Tay Canal, reciprocity, the Reform platform and Tory corruption, the Reform party and the duty on fish and eggs. In fact he wandered over the whole field of literature, politics, arts, and economy, and endeavoured to embellish his speech with a great deal that was in the field of romance, which was neither valuable or entertaining. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) is a medical man himself, and after hearing his speech I came to the conclusion that it must have brought to his mind the illustration sometimes given in answer to the question: What is chemistry? A medical student, a new beginner, who did not understand a great deal about the subject, once asked a professor: What is chemistry, and the answer was: The best explanation I can give you of chemistry, in a few words, is: You take an effervescent, add a deliquescent: there will be a precipitation, that is a conglomeration, and amounts to a demonstration, that is chemistry. That is about like the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald). You take it, and you add all these together, and you mix it up, and it amounts to a conglomeration, but not a demonstration. I do not think that, in the estimation of the House, it can lead to any value, either as to conclusions, or as to a proper understanding of the condition of the country. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) ground us out a speech of very great length. He was laborious and assiduous, and I believe, in his own estimation, he was presenting fair arguments to the House; but it struck me, that if the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan) could set his speech to music and present it to the House, it would be much more attractive; or, if he had put it in a hand organ and ground it out, it would have saved him a great deal of labour and would have accomplished the same result. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I wish to say, that in my opinion the hon. the Finance Minister gave to the House and to the people of this country a very intelligent, concise and business-like statement of the affairs of the country. I am sure that the judgment of this country will accord to him a meed of praise for what he and his party have done in the interest of Canada. I am in accord with him in every line he has presented; but as I have already stated, I think, that if the expenditure of his Government was a little more lavish it would be all the better for the progress of the country. I hope he will take a note of this expression of opinion, and be guided by it in the future. I am fully assured that the country will again return the same party to power, believing that it is the best party to govern Canada, the best party to conserve and protect our interests, and the best party to develop our country. I have no doubt in my mind that the Conservative party will again control the destinies of this nation in the next Parliament of Canada.

Mr. LISTER. I recognize in the speech of my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) a very old friend indeed. The hon. gentleman and myself came into the House, I think, in 1883, and every session since that we have had this speech with additions and statistics up to the time of its delivery. The only variation, Sir, has been the very excellent anecdote with which my friend wound up his speech to-day. The hon. gentleman tells us the old story. It does not appear that in all these years, the hon. gentleman has learned the first elements of political economy. It is the old story: the National Policy has done everything for the people of the country, not only as regards its imports, but it has aided and stimulated the exports as well. My hon. friend tells us that the great necessity is, the employment for the people, and he asks himself the question: are the people of this country employed. I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) to go to any village, to any city, including the city of Ottawa, and to ask that question of the working-people. He will find, Sir, that the answer is emphatically "no." Why, Sir, the working-people of the city of Ottawa look with delight when a snow storm comes, because that is the only means that hundreds of them have to save themselves from starvation and want during the long winter. My hon. friend congratulates himself upon the fact that if you go to the homes of the farmers of this country, there is no poverty to be found; but I ask him to go to the registry office of any county in Canada, and I venture to say without hesitation, that three-fourths of the farms, even in this very province of Ontario, are mortgaged to-day. And, Sir, all that the hard-working, industrious farmers of Ontario can do, is to make both ends meet at the end of the season. The hon. gentleman says: go to the farm houses and you will find they have sufficient to keep them from hunger and starvation. Is that all we have at the end of seventeen years, after the promises made by hon. gentlemen who control the Treasury benches, and have occupied them for these long years? Is that all they can say to-day: that after seventeen years, if you go to the farmers throughout the country, you will find that they have sufficient to keep them from hunger and want?

My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) talks about free trade in Ireland, and says, that free trade in Ireland was the cause of the people leaving the country. He simply ignores the fact that that took place some fifty odd years ago. He ignores the fact, that in Ireland they have no coal, they have no iron, and they have not the essentials for carrying on manufactures at all, and that whether free trade had been inaugurated in England, or not, the Irish industries so far as the linen and woollen trades are concerned, were bound to come to an end. Sir, the free trade policy of England did not ruin Ireland. The free trade policy of England has built up Ireland. It has given to her people cheap living, and it has enabled the people of Ireland to produce what that country is fitted to produce, namely, cattle, and other products, which find a ready sale in the near by markets of England and Scotland. As evidencing the prosperity of Canada the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) pointed to the deposits in the banks. I deny that that is an evidence of prosperity. I assert here unhesitatingly, that excessive deposits in the banks of the country show that there is no profitable employment for the investment of the money otherwise. That is always so. Where you find trade stagnant, where you find people unemployed, where you find men wanting employment and not able to get it, you find the surplus capital of the country in the banks, earning two or three per cent, instead of being invested in industrial enterprises which under other circumstances would produce a much larger return. It was so in Ireland in the days of the famine. Never before had Ireland so much money in her banks as she had at that time. The reason was that the industries of the country were paralyzed. There was no employment for capital, and it found its way into the vaults of the banks. So, it is in Canada. Go over this country from one end to the other, from the smallest villages to the largest cities, and the smokeless chimneys, the silent machinery, the idle workmen, will prove to you that this policy has brought about a condition of affairs which men who had a knowledge of political economy predicted years ago would be the certain result. What are the stages of protection? It is true, when first introduced, it appears to cause a prosperity—a false prosperity. That is the first stage—the stage of preparing to manufacture. The second stage brings the slaves of intense competition, which gives to the people of the country cheaper goods for the time being; but the inevitable result is that the industries are ruined, and the capital put in them is wasted. The third stage comes after the wasting of the capital, and is marked by the absorption by richer concerns of the various manufactories throughout the country; and, after their absorption, the closing down of many of them, the limiting of production, and the fixing of prices to the consumers throughout the country. These are the stages, the inevitable stages, of a protective policy; and, Sir, we are to-day in the third stage—the stage where the capital invested in manufacturing industries has been utterly destroyed and lost—the stage where the richer manufacturers have combined together and absorbed the smaller concerns from one end of the country to the other. Workmen have been thrown out of employment, doors closed, machinery shut down. Need I point to you New Glasgow? Need I point to you Hamilton? Need I point to you Dundas? Need I point to you hundreds of other places throughout this country where factories have been closed down and are to-day in the hands of monopolists and combinesters, who limit the output and compel the people of the country to pay a price only limited by what the tariff will permit them to charge. That, Sir, is the condition of affairs in Canada to-day, and that is always bound to be the condition of affairs under the working of a protective system. It never can be anything else. And when hon. gentlemen talk about returning prosperity, they talk about something that cannot be constant, because the circumstances that produced the condition we are now in will recur at ever shorter intervals. Over-production means the closing down of factories, the discharge of workmen, the paralysis of trade; and we can never be an exporting country so long as we have a protective tariff. Hon. gentlemen say that we have increased our exports. True, they have been increased to a small extent. But we can never be an exporting country so long as we have a protective tariff, because trade must be mutual—you cannot sell unless you buy. The cotton manufacturers of this country may export a few hundred dollars worth of cotton goods, to get rid of the surplus product which they cannot sell in the Canadian market. But that is no healthy sign; that is no indication that we are building up a foreign trade that is worthy of the country. My hon. friend says that the deposits in the savings banks have increased during the past number of years. He compares the deposits at present with the deposits in the period between 1874 and 1878. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this country has not been standing still for seventeen years. Surely we have made some advancement, in spite of the obstacles which have been put in our way by the Government. It is but natural that in the course of nearly two decades there should be some advancement. Deadening as this system may be the powers of our people, still, it would be absurd to say that a people such as we have in this country, would not make any advancement at all during those seventeen long years. The hon. gentleman points to the increase in the amount of life insurance since 1878, which he says has been enormous. Does not the hon. gentleman know that forty years ago people did not insure their lives at all—that only one here and there happened to be insured? Does he not know that even twenty-five years ago it was not a common thing to have insurance on one's life? Is it not a fact that the custom of insuring one's life has become very general within the last fifteen or sixteen years? Insurance associations and friendly societies have grown up everywhere; and the very difficulty of making a living in this country, much less of saving anything, compels a man, if he wants to make any provision for his family, to have an insurance on his life, or else to run the risk of leaving them paupers. This condition of things did not exist some years ago. Then men were able to make money and save money and make some provision for their families. But to-day the struggle for life is so terrible that men cannot hope to make any provision for their families except by means of life insurance. The hon. gentleman talks of the post office savings banks. Does he not know that it is only within the last few years that the post office savings banks have become a favourite place for the deposit of money? Does he not know that it was in the early stages of that system that the Mackenzie Government was in power in this country? Then, he says, look at the freight carried. The hon. gentleman seems to forget that during the last seventeen years the freight carrying of the country has been greatly increased. He seems to forget that all that has been paid for by the people of this country. He seems to forget that a great percentage of that is American freight, coming from the western states and finding its way to the seaboard through the Dominion of Canada. Then he points, with apparent delight, to the number of bankrupts since 1878 as compared with the number previous to 1878. Does not the hon. gentleman know that in 1874 a bankruptcy law was passed in this country? Does he not know that there were tens of thousands of bankrupts who up to that time could get no release from their liabilities unless their creditors were willing to discharge them?

Mr. SPROULE. It was not in 1874; it was in 1864.

Mr. LISTER. 1869, I mean. From that time up the people of the country took advantage of the bankruptcy law for the purpose of ridding themselves of the liabilities which they could not otherwise get released from. The year 1864 was before confederation. When my hon. friend talks about the increase of the public debt, I often wonder, in listening to this speech for the past thirteen years or fourteen years, that the Finance Minister has not taken up the figures of the hon. gentleman and given them to the House and to the country as the correct condition of affairs, but, strange to say, he seems to prefer his own figures and to ignore those of the hon. gentleman. Now, the hon. gentleman tells us that during the four years Mr. Mackenzie was in power, the debt was increased $8,000,000 per annum. That is correct, I believe. He tells us that in the seventeen years of protection the debt of the country has been increased on an average of six million dollars a year. There he stops. Frank, honest individual that he is, he would have the House believe that he was fairly stating the condition of affairs. Does not the hon. gentleman know—student that he is and lecturer of other people—that when Sir John Macdonald was defeated in 1874, he left fourteen million dollars of liabilities and not one dollar in the treasury to meet them? Why does not the hon. gentleman come out and be honest in his statement? Why does he make arguments and statements calculated to mislead the public? The public debt under Mr. Mackenzie was contracted to meet the obligations of the Administration that preceded him—men who had piled up the debt millions of dollars, and whose successors in policy and principles he wants to-day, in the face of the impoverished condition of the country, to be retained in office, in order that they may go on adding to our debt. And the hon. gentleman tells the people: Never mind, let them go on increasing it, you will never have to pay the debt. Why, they might go on increasing it by billions instead of by millions, if the hon. gentleman's argument was correct. Let us see what was the financial condition of the country as stated by Sir Leonard Tilley, when the Government of Sir John Macdonald went out of office and was replaced by the Mackenzie Administration. Sir Leonard Tilley said:

We are entering upon new and increased engagements which will require a very large amount of money, we are entering upon works which will require a large increase of our debt. We have $10,000,000 to expend on the Intercolonial, $30,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the canal system, which has been accepted by the Government, will involve an expenditure of at least $20,000,000. These are serious matters, as they will add $60,000,000 to our existing debt.

That was the speech of Sir Leonard Tilley, the Finance Minister of the Government which preceded the Mackenzie Administration. That was the state of affairs at the time Sir John Macdonald's Government went out of power. These were the liabilities which the Mackenzie Administration was called upon to meet, and remember, Sir, that when Sir John Macdonald left power he had cleaned out the treasury. There was not one dollar in it. And yet this frank individual, this honest member, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) gets up and tells us that the Mackenzie Administration added $8,000,000 per year to the debt, as against $6,000,000 per year added by the Administration he now supports. The hon. gentleman seems to have an obtuseness that one can hardly explain as being consistent with complete frankness.

He takes remarkable credit from the fact that the exports of this country are increasing, and that the great factor in that increase is the National Policy. What, in the name of common sense, has the protective duty on imports to do with increasing our exports? Why, it has no more to do with it than anything you can imagine. The exports of a country are regulated by the demands of foreign markets, and unless you levy a duty on exports, you cannot affect them by your tariff in any way. But the exports of the country show that our farmers are able to grow more products than our own country requires, that our own home market can consume, and consequently they send them abroad, and with the money they get in return, they have to buy the goods which they require at increased prices owing to the tariff imposed on our imports. Therefore, by your protective policy you reduce the profits of the farmers by enhancing the cost of everything they require for their own consumption.

Then the hon. gentleman talked about the export of cattle, the export of minerals, the export of timber. Again, I ask him, what has our protective tariff to do with our exports? Absolutely nothing. Our exports furnished no argument at all in favour of our tariff, because our tariff does not affect the price we get for them one way or the other. It affects the prices of our imports to the consumer by increasing their cost, but does not procure for him any additional price for what he has to export.

My hon. friend says that wages have increased. With unctuous voice and look, he turned up the old census of 1891 and figured from that, and he asked whether anybody could deny the figures he gave. Wages in Canada have increased, he said, on account of the National Policy. Why, the hon. gentleman is ignorant of the most elementary rule of political economy. Does he not know that labour is free to travel from one place to another? Does he not know that wherever wages are high, workmen will flock for employment. Does he not know that labour regulates itself? And labour cannot be higher in Canada than in the United States, because if it were, labourers would come from the United States to compete for employment here at higher wages, and the result would be a fall in the price. It is utterly impossible to increase the price of labour by protection. Have wages increased in Canada? I leave hon. gentlemen to answer for themselves; but I would ask if there has been an increase in Canada, has not there been an increase throughout the whole world? Have not wages increased in England during the last seventeen years? in Germany? in the United States? in every quarter of the world? So that, so far as the increase of wages in Canada is concerned, if such an increase has taken place at all, it is only in keeping up with the wage market throughout the whole civilized world. I state again that wages have not increased, that the labourers of this country are not employed, that to-day there is more destitution in Canada than people have any idea of, that it is more difficult for a labouring man to-day to make a living for his family than it has ever been in the history of the country before.

But, my hon. friend says, here is an evidence of the prosperity, here is an evidence of the great National Policy—we have been exporting agricultural implements away off to Australia; we have exported some hundreds of thousands of agricultural implements, and he compared the exports of these articles with the export of this class of goods in 1878. Sir, does not the hon. gentleman know that this policy has worked out the ruin, the absolute ruin, of almost every agricultural implement manufacturer in the Dominion of Canada? Does he not know that throughout the province of Ontario we had some 17 or 18 of these implement manufactories in 1879? In almost every small town was to be found an establishment for the manufacture of agricultural implements, employing from ten to twenty-five or thirty men. And, to-day, every one of these factories, I believe, without a single exception, are closed up, and the whole business is done by one great concern, the Massey-Harris Company of Toronto. To-day, that trade is in the hands of a monopoly because the policy of the Government has destroyed utterly every other concern of a similar nature throughout the country. This one stands alone, and it has absorbed the others, and is supplying the whole country with whatever agricultural implements may be required. Again, take the cotton industry of the country. In 1879, and for some years before that, we had cotton mills in various places throughout the country—in Hamilton, Dundas, Brantford, Montreal, and many other places. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were invested in these industries, the money of people many of whom were ill able to afford the loss of it, people who depended upon the income derived from their investments in this industry. Why, Sir, every dollar, every shilling of that money was lost to the original investors, and every one of the establishments, with one exception, I believe, is now under control of one company. That exception is the factory of Mr. Gibson, in Marysville. Many of the factories throughout the country are closed up, and all that are working, with the exception I have stated, are worked by the combination, which limits the production so that they may be able to charge every single cent the protective tariff will allow. Almost every industry of any importance throughout the country has been brought to this condition of monopoly by the resistless and inevitable working of this so-called protective policy, which is, and must ever be, a force for the destruction of the small manufacturers by their absorption of the larger and the formation of combinations by those who are able to hold out, with a view to limiting production and fixing prices at the highest figures, to the heavy cost of the consumers of the country.

Now, my hon. friend pointed out, with apparent satisfaction, the fact that we had increased the export of eggs. This was, no doubt, gratifying to him. His argument would go to prove that in 1879 the hens were not doing their duty. But, so far as this item of export is concerned, what I have said as to the tariff affecting exports, applies with equal force to it as to others. Then, the hon. gentleman says that our farmers supplied the home market. This home-market reasoning is wholly fallacious. If the farmer does not supply the goods to the home market, if he does not supply the articles for consumption in the neighbouring town, he will only have the more for the purpose of export. And he receives no greater price at home than he would for export, because the ultimate market fixes the price, and the price in the neighbouring town is the price in the British market, less the cost of transportation. Then he follows this up with the old argument, that goods are cheaper than they were in 1879. Admitted, Mr. Speaker; but what makes them cheaper? Is it because high protective duties are levied upon these goods? Is it not, rather, because of the fact that we have been steadily advancing, that mechanical ingenuity has devised new means to produce what we require, and produce it more cheaply than before? Never in the history of the world were goods so cheap as they are to-day; never were there such great facilities for manufacturing. And for these reasons prices must necessarily fall. Why, Sir, so great are the facilities for manufacturing that it is inevitable throughout the world that periods of depression must frequently come round, for over-production must frequently take place, and the result of that must be stagnation and paralysis of trade until consumption overtakes production.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond of stating—but they state it in the country more frequently than here—that the real difference between the Liberal and Conservative parties in the next election is the question of free trade and protection. Sir, that statement cannot be contradicted too often, for that is not the real issue dividing the two parties. That cannot, under the circumstances, be the real issue, and it is improper to mislead the public upon that question. The real issue between the parties is, whether we shall continue to have a protective tariff, or whether we shall adopt a revenue tariff, a tariff bearing heavily upon luxuries and as lightly as possible upon the necessaries of life.

Mr. DAVIN. Is that the issue?

Mr. LISTER. That is the issue, Mr. Speaker; at least, that is the greatest issue. The position of the Liberals is fairly set forth in the platform adopted by the convention held in the city of Ottawa. But, in spite of that, hon. gentlemen opposite continue to tell their people throughout the country, that the question between us is the question of free trade and protection, and they will go on saying, as my hon. friend from East Grey did, that, if the present system is abolished, those on this side of the House would be bound to favour a resort to direct taxation, and that the people will have to pay double the taxes they do to-day. How the hon. gentleman works that out, is more than I can understand. But we have this fact—that a revenue tariff is the easiest way of collecting the money necessary for governmental purposes. We have the further fact, that this is the way the revenue of the country has been raised for many years. And we have, still further, the fact, that the people of the country probably feel a customs tax less severely than they would any other tax, because they really do not know how much they have to pay in the form of taxes. The question, therefore, is not a question of free trade versus protection, it is a question of a revenue tariff versus protection. The hon. gentlemen would have the country believe that the policy they have been worshipping for the last seventeen and a half years is so perfect that it is impossible to improve it, is so perfect that any interference with it would have the effect of disturbing seriously the trade of the country. Hon. gentlemen know, and it is an open secret, that a protective tariff was adopted by Sir John A. Macdonald and his followers, not because they believed in the principle of protection, but because they believed the country was in such a position at the time that protection would take with the people, and in that way they would ride into power. Sir, it is well known that Sir Charles Tupper, who was the Opposition financial critic at that time, believed that in 1878 the hon. member for South Oxford intended to increase the tariff. It is well known that he sat in this House prepared to make a free trade speech against the proposition of the then Finance Minister; but when he found that there was to be no increase in the tariff, he asked for an adjournment, and he appeared in the House afterwards and made a protectionist speech. We have the evidence of Mr. Galt, the Finance Minister of the Conservative Government in those days, in which he speaks strongly against a protective tariff, and in favour of reciprocity with the United States. This is what he said:

Take the interests of the several provinces. Take, for instance, the interests of the province of Ontario. Can any one desire anything else than that their white wheat, their barley, sawn lumber, cattle, and a vast variety of other things should go free into the United States, their best and most convenient market? Can any one say that it would be less advantageous to Ontario that such should be the state of things rather than what obtains now? Certainly it must be that free access to the American market would be better, and, pro tanto, what would be better for Ontario would unquestionably be so for the other provinces. The province of Quebec has felt these restrictions upon trade more than any other province. The productions of Quebec are not of a character that will bear export to Europe, and the interests of that province are unquestionably in the direction of a restoration of free trade with the United States as early as possible.

That, Sir, is what Sir Alexander Galt, the Finance Minister of the Liberal-Conservative party in those days, says, that the restoration of free trade with the United States, as early as possible, was most desirable.

I therefore ask the members from Quebec to consider very deliberately whether they are pursuing a wise policy in sustaining the Government in anything that will have a tendency to excite the animosity of the people on the other side of the line, and thereby postpone the restoration of free trade relations, which the interests of this province most strongly demand. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have the same interests in the question. There is the very important question of the employment of the shipping, the sale of fish, and the production in the case of Nova Scotia of coarse grains to a very considerable amount that have found their way to the United States in former days, and of coal and sawn lumber. Well, Sir, under the circumstances, I think there can be no doubt as to the desirability of having free trade with the United States, and I contend that with these considerations before us, we should not take any course that will tend to postpone free trade beyond the earliest possible day; and I tell hon. gentlemen that any change in the policy of this country in regard to duties upon American produce, anything in the way of retaliation, is a most unwise and unstatesman-like policy to adopt.

Those are the words of Sir Alexander Galt, the then Finance Minister of the Conservative Government, and those words are as powerful to-day as they were the day on which they were uttered. I have stated that neither Sir Charles Tupper nor Sir John A. Macdonald were protectionists; and I have also stated that when they supposed that it was the intention of the Liberal Government to increase the duties upon imports from 17½ to 20 per cent, Sir Charles Tupper had prepared, and was ready to make, a free-trade speech in opposition to the proposal of the Government; but when he found that that was not the proposal of the Government, and being bound to oppose the Government under any circumstances, he appeared in the House and made a protectionist speech, laying down the policy of protection, and going to the country upon that policy, and carrying the country by it. From that time forward, hon. gentlemen like my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) have never been tired of praising the beauties of the National Policy. Even the leaders of the Government of to-day pretended to be in favour of reciprocity in 1891. We have had this protective policy up to 1891. At that time, distress prevailed in every section of the country. The people believed, as the fact was, that enormous sums were being extorted from them, not only by the Government, but by certain protected manufacturers in the country. An agitation pervaded the country from one end to the other in favour of finding new markets, in the hope that those new markets would relieve the congested condition of affairs, and restore prosperity to our industries. Then, Sir, in order to keep power, the Conservative Government of that day, in a characteristic way, said: We are prepared to go in for reciprocity with the United States. This, remember, although they had denounced it year after year, although their followers had said that they did not want reciprocity with the United States, the Government made a sudden turn and announced to the country that representations had been made by the Secretary of State of the United States Government, to this country, with a view to negotiations for reciprocity, when, as a matter of fact, no such negotiations had ever been entered into by the United States Government. At all events, in 1891, the Government went to the country—upon what principle? Upon what question? The whole question at that election was the question of reciprocity. It was not protection, it was not free trade. We had been in favour of reciprocity for years and years; we had advocated it upon every platform; the people believed in it; the Government saw they would be defeated, and so they adopted the policy of the Liberal party. They turned round from being protectionists and became, in a sense, free traders, or reciprocity men, and they went to the country upon that question. Why, Sir, my hon. friend from North Middlesex (Mr. Hutchins)—just to show you how that election was worked—was only returned by some forty odd majority. He printed a lot of little slips that he sent from his mill to everybody, saying: If you want $20 more for your horses, if you want 10 or 15 cents a bushel more for your barley, if you want more for your oats, vote for Hutchins, the candidate of a reciprocity treaty in this country. Upon every platform throughout the country, these men advocated reciprocity. They came forward and said: Why, we are in favour of reciprocity, we have dissolved Parliament for the purpose of negotiating a treaty with the United States, and giving to the Canadian farmer the markets of the United States for his products. And, Sir, many Conservatives were prepared to believe that. They also said to the people of the country: Why, if you put these Reformers in power, your cattle will be scheduled in the home market. They threatened the farmers, they made them believe that they were honestly endeavouring to secure what the people wanted, and on that ground they received thousands and thousands of votes which they would not otherwise have got. I have no hesitation in saying that if the Government had not resorted to that device in 1891, they would have been defeated, they would have been defeated at the polls upon the question of reciprocity with the United States.

But, as I say, upon every platform they met us with this statement: We are in favour of reciprocity; vote for the old man; it is the last time you may ever have a chance of giving him a vote. His policy and the Grits' policy is the same; vote for him and his Government will give the people reciprocity. Sir, as a matter of fact, they never made any negotiations with the United States, but they did send a commission to Washington for that pretended purpose. As a matter of fact, they grossly deceived the electorate of this country from one end to the other. Sir, that shows that these men are not honest when they say as my hon. friend said a few moments ago: Why, we do not want reciprocity with the United States, we do not want this Government to reduce the duties, we want to keep them as they are. I blame the leader, he says, for reducing the duties in 1892. But, Sir, we had Sir Charles Tupper in 1877 a free trader, and the Government went to the country in 1871 on the question of reciprocity, claiming to be the party of reciprocity, the party that could give the people of the country a reciprocity treaty with the United States. Then they found this beautiful figure, this magnificent structure called the National Policy, perfect in all its parts, if we are to believe the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1892 Sir John Thompson said that we must lop off the mouldering branches. We then had for the first time the statement made by the Government, which had always previously been denied by their followers, that a protective tariff was a tax. They had always claimed that it was no taxation and no burden on the country, but we got them to admit that by taking off certain duties they reduced taxation to the people. By their statement they admitted in plain terms that the duty they had imposed was taxation. In the election of 1891 these men were compelled to promise that they would take the duty off sugar. When they came to Parliament they took off the duty. Why? Because sugar was nearly double the price here it was in the United States, and so strongly had the feeling become in the country that the Finance Minister was compelled to come before Parliament and strike the duty off that article. While they were pretending to be reducing and taking off what they admitted were burdens, the Finance Minister and hon. gentlemen opposite will remember what occurred. The hotels of this city were filled with delegations from every section of the country, every interest was represented here, every influence that could be brought to bear on the Government and their followers was brought to bear in the most striking manner. The Government were threatened that unless they agreed to the wishes of these men they would withdraw their support and would no longer furnish funds to the Government for election purposes. Every threat was made by the different interests, and when the Finance Minister pretended to reduce the duties on certain articles he came down to the House the very next day and said the reductions were mere clerical errors, and the duties were restored. I venture to say that the result of the so-called tariff revision was that the duties were left higher than they were before.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

NELSON AND FORT SHEPPARD RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 26) respecting the Nelson and Port Sheppard Railway Company.—(Mr. Mara.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Where is the promoter of the Bill? I want some information.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the committee rise and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I object to the committee proceeding with any Bill—

Mr. FOSTER. I have already moved that the committee rise.

Committee rose and reported progress.

ST. LAWRENCE AND OTTAWA RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 25) respecting the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. McLeod.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I should like to obtain some information in respect to this Bill.

Mr. McLEOD. This Bill is one respecting the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway Company. The Canadian Pacific Railway has a lease of this road with its property, and there are some lots of land in Ottawa that are not productive. The company simply desire leave to sell those lots and appropriate the proceeds for improvements on the road, and substituting iron for wooden bridges.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

Mr. LISTER. When the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches were in opposition, and seeking to obtain possession of the comfortable places which they now hold, they represented to the country that the Government of Mr. Mackenzie was extravagant and corrupt.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LISTER. My hon. friend says "hear, hear," and no doubt he believes that the charges then made were correct. Sir Leonard Tilley, supposed to be an estimable man, then Finance Minister, iterated and reiterated these charges throughout the country, and pledged himself that if the people would return the Conservatives to power, he would reduce the public expenditure by at least $1,000,000 a year. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that at that time our annual expenditure amounted to about $23,500,000, or, in other words, Mr. Mackenzie during his five years term of office had increased the annual expenditure by about $200,000. Sir Leonard Tilley then pledged himself to the country, that the Government which he was opposing was extravagant and corrupt, and that if the people would endorse Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues, he would reduce that expenditure to $22,500,000. Sir, seventeen years have passed since then, and from the moment these gentlemen opposite took office, up to the present, the expenditure has gone on increasing year after year, until to-day we are confronted with the enormous annual expenditure of $38,000,000. And, Sir, the ex-Minister of Justice had the effrontery to stand up in this House and tell us, that this enormous burden of taxation could be borne by the people, that in fact it was not enough, and that it was the intention of the Government to increase that expenditure to at least $40,000,000 a year. That statement is of the most alarming character. The people of this country are now crushed down by taxation: the property of this country, from one end of it to the other, is depreciated, and I only state the fact when I allege, that farm property in Canada has depreciated by at least 40 per cent of the value of what it was six or seven years ago. Why, only a short time ago in the city of London, a widow was placed in the witness box to give testimony as to the value of her farm, bought twelve years ago for $6,000. Her husband had been killed in a railway accident and the property was sold, and she swore, that after cultivating the farm as well as the old homestead had been cultivated, and after having the place well kept up in every particular, that property sold last spring for $3,000, the amount of the mortgage upon it, and that was the highest price obtainable. That is but one instance of the condition of affairs all through the province of Ontario. Take the great city of Toronto, if you will, and I say here confidently, that the depreciation of property in that city is more than 40 per cent of its value seven years ago. Go, if you will, to the city of London, go to every town and village throughout this land, and the same story is to be told. Take the farming districts and the same condition of affairs exists there, in face of the fact that these hon. gentlemen opposite told us that the National Policy was to restore good times, and that bad times would never come again while that policy was in force. We were told by these hon. gentlemen opposite, that the National Policy would not only restore good times but that it would keep them good; that it would give to the labourers and mechanics of the country work; that it would have the effect of establishing large manufactories in every village; that it would have the effect of attracting large immigration to this country; that it would have the effect of increasing the price of products to the farmers of this country, and in fact, we were told, it would have every beneficent effect that it was possible for the ingenuity of these men to promise to the people. Sir, what a change has come over the spirit of their dreams. While such men as my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) tells us about the effect of the National Policy upon the farmers and labourers and mechanics of Canada; we have the statement of the Finance Minister himself, that in spite of all the Government can do, cycles of depression will come round. That was the first time such a statement was made by hon. gentlemen opposite; the first time that they ever admitted that they were powerless to stem the tide of bad times. If, then, the National Policy has not restored good times and maintained good times, of what possible benefit can it be? If we are to be enormously taxed for the purpose of retaining this policy, and if it is not profitable to the people of the country, what object can there be in keeping it on the statute-books? When my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) was Minister of Finance, he stated frankly the fact, that it was in the power of no Government to give the people good times by legislation, and that the only thing that could be done to benefit the public at large, was to leave as much money as possible in their pockets, and to take as little as possible for the public needs. He told the people that it was impossible to restore good times by a statute, and that cycles of depression would appear from time to time, in Canada, as in every other country. We all know that in 1877 and 1878, the depressed condition of affairs was not peculiar to Canada, but was experienced also by the United States and by the countries of continental Europe. In the face of all that, these hon. gentlemen opposite said, that they, the wizards of the north, could, by raising their wand, in the shape of a statute, and swinging it over their head, bring back good times to the people of Canada. They have been singing that old song ever since, notwithstanding the fact, that we have to-day the most disastrous condition of affairs in this country that I believe we have ever had since we were a Dominion. Who are the flies on the wheel now? Why do you not bring back good times? What do you complain about? If you were able to do it in 1878, why do you not do it now? Why do you not bring up the value of farm lands? Why do you not get the labourers of this country employment at profitable wages?

Some hon. MEMBERS. So we do.

Mr. LISTER. Why do you allow the citizens of Ottawa to pray that the snow may fall every day, so that they may get the job of cleaning it away in order to get bread for their families? Why do you allow workingmen in Toronto to go all the year round without being able to get employment? Pass an Act; swing your wand; bring back good times if you can; if you cannot, you are fakirs. Why, Sir, when the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) was in opposition, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said it was not in the power of a Government to restore good times by legislation, what did he say? He said: No man is worthy of the name of a statesman unless he can give back to the people good times, profitable employment and a prosperous condition of affairs. Where is that worthy now? Or was that one of his stretches of imagination for which he has become so famous? If he could do it then, we ask him, we conjure him, to do it now, and prove that he is the power he pretended to be away back in 1878.

These hon. gentlemen have been throwing dust in the eyes of the public. They would have the people of this country believe that they, with their magic wand, have something to do with the exports of the country. We have the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) getting up and telling us, with magnificently rounded sentences, how tremendously the exports of this country have increased during the last seventeen years. Why, Sir, the exports of the country depend upon the industry of the people of the country; and the Government have no more power to interfere with them than a man in the uttermost part of the earth. The workingmen and the farmers are the men who are entitled to all the credit; and it comes with bad grace from these gentlemen—because it looks as if they were trying to deceive the public—to suggest that their policy has anything whatever to do with the exportations of the country. What have they to do with the exports of cheese? It is the farmers throughout the country who make the cheese and send it to the best market. The only thing these hon. gentlemen could do, and perhaps they will do it yet, is to put an export duty on cheese. They put an export duty on saw-logs, and they may put one on cheese and eggs. That is the only way they could influence the price of these articles to the disadvantage of the people who have to export them. What has their legislation to do with cattle? Cattle are raised by the farmers of the country, and are exported to the country that will pay the highest price for them. If in the face of your policy, injurious as it is, the country is reasonably prosperous, and is making some progress, you are not to be thanked for it, because you have placed every possible obstacle in the way of the advancement and prosperity of the people of this country.

Sir, there seems to be nothing which these hon. gentlemen will not resort to for the purpose of carrying their point. In 1891 they went before the country on the cry of reciprocity with the United States. If they succeeded then, it was on the policy of the Liberal party which they took up, and because they told the people that if they were returned to power they would secure reciprocity; and there are men sitting in this House, dozens of them, now supporting the so-called National Policy, who went on the platform and told the people solemnly that the Conservative Government were pledged to secure to the farmers and the people of this country reciprocal trade with the United States. They were returned upon that cry, and if they had not taken it up, they would have been overwhelmingly defeated at the polls. They came back to this House with a majority of 25 or 26 or perhaps more; but, Sir, they put their tongue in their cheek and laughed at the men they had deluded. They made no honest effort to get reciprocity. The statement they made before going to the country was false in every particular, as was admitted by Sir Charles Tupper himself confessing that the statement of the Secretary of State of the United States was true, namely, that there had been no approach by the Government of the United States to this Government with a view to reciprocal trade.

Then, Sir, in addition to all that, they pointed out to the farmers of the country what a magnificent trade had grown up between Great Britain and Canada in the matter of cattle; and they said: "Allow these Liberals to get into power, and Great Britain will schedule your cattle, because American cattle will be allowed to come into Canada on certain terms; but retain us in power, and we pledge ourselves that the facilities and privileges you now have for shipping your cattle to the English market shall be continued." Sir, in three short months after these gentlemen were returned to power Great Britain scheduled the cattle from Canada, and Canada to-day occupies the same position that the United States does in the British market.

Sir, the Government of this country sold the great farming and industrial population of the country—the labouring classes and the mechanics. They sold them to their masters. The great National Policy could not be disturbed, because their masters said that it should not be; and rather than refuse them, rather than do justice to the great mass of the people of the country, they failed to carry out what they had promised, and yielded to the dictation of the men who had dictated the tariff which was adopted a few years ago. In olden times, Mr. Speaker, there was a despot who imposed tyranny upon the people, and called it liberty. This Government impose upon the people of this country a crushing taxation, and they call it protection. There is no man who gives the matter a moment's consideration, I think, but must confess that the imposition of taxes is a burden. The less the taxes are, the less the burden is; the higher the taxes are, the more the burden is. We admit that we must have taxes. It is admitted by all that the country must be governed, and for the purpose of carrying on the governmental machinery, it is necessary that the people of the country, who are protected in life and property by the laws of Parliament, should contribute for the purpose of meeting the expenses of government. That, Sir, is admitted; but I claim that we should take from the people of the country as little as it is possible to take. If you take from the people of the country a dollar where half a dollar should be sufficient, you are taking out of circulation, and depriving the individual of a certain proportion of the money that should be used for the purpose of carrying on his individual business. In other words, you are appropriating to yourselves, without consideration, without anything being given in return, a certain amount of money from every individual in the community. That, Sir, is wrong; that cannot be justified. I take it that there is no man who will contend that taxation should not be as light as possible, although hon. gentlemen opposite say that the effect of their taxation is not to increase the prices of products—not to burden the people; but that its effect is to give them employment, and that they are more than compensated by the employment given to the labouring and artisan classes, and by the reduction in the prices of manufactured goods. These are two statements that are not correct, because, as I attempted to point out before recess, the effect of protection was to tempt individuals who saw their neighbours making larger sums by reason of the tariff to invest their money recklessly in like enterprises, and the result has been simply disastrous. As a protected country cannot be an exporting country, the result, further, is that production overtakes consumption and causes stagnation and paralysis of business. All through this country are monuments, in every village, town and city, showing how men have been deceived, showing that millions of dollars have been utterly destroyed, which might as well have been thrown into the lakes. Families and fortunes have been wrecked, and any property remaining from this vast expenditure has fallen into the hands of a few men who were able to stand the storm, and who took advantage of the tariff by manufacturing sufficiently for the wants of their local markets and fixing the price so as to bring it within or quite up to the tariff mark. Only the other day a gentleman who supports the hon. gentlemen opposite told me he had been informed in his town that cotton in this country was cheaper than it could be imported for from England. For the purpose of testing this, he sent over to England for two bales of cotton of superior quality such as were shown to him. He paid the duty, and it cost him two-pence halfpenny a yard cheaper than he could buy it from the cotton agents in Montreal. If you take that for an example, and go the whole round, you will see that in the case of almost every article, the price is fixed according to the amount of duty charged.

I charge the Government with having been extravagant. The public expenditure of this country has been going upwards by leaps and bounds. There has been no restraint exercised by the Government on the public expenditure at all. They seemed to think that it was necessary, in order to secure themselves in office, to expend vast sums out of the treasury of the country. Let me give you some idea of the amount collected in taxes in this country. In 1878 we collected $22,375,000. In 1894 we collected $36,374,000, or nearly fourteen millions more than in 1878; and in addition to the enormous expenditure of last year, we have the further fact that its receipts do not come within $4,500,000 of meeting its expenditure. And in addition to all that, we had, as we do every year, to go to the British market and become borrowers. Our public debt is rolling up from year to year. Our fixed charges for interest are increasing from year to year, and yet the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) tells the people of this country that that is no burden on the people, inasmuch as they will never have to pay the debt. Will they not have to pay the debt? If they will not, they certainly have to pay the interest every year. And it is an alarming fact that we are paying to-day in interest nearly one-third of our total receipts. Millions of dollars are going out of the country from year to year to pay to the English bondholders the interest on the debt which we have created. One-third of the total taxation nearly of this country, is expended in the payment of interest alone, or over $10,000,000. In 1878 the expenditure was $23,500,000; in 1895 it was $38,132,000, or an increase of $15,500,000 in the public expenditure since 1878. If this country were increasing in population, if we were drawing population from the older countries of the world, there might be some excuse for it. But when we remember that in the last ten years, the increase of population was a beggarly 500,000, there can be no justification for the enormous increase in the expenditure of the country. Look for a moment at the public debt. In 1878 it was $174,957,000; in 1895 it was $317,048,000; that is to say, an increase in seventeen years of $143,191,000. Take the net debt if you will. In 1878 it was $140,000,000, and in 1894 $253,000,000, or an increase of $102,722,000 during those years. What does that mean? It means a debt per head on every man, woman and child in this country of $49.03, while the debt in the United States per capita is only $23.93, or our debt per head in the Dominion is $26.10 more than it is in the United States; and yet these men have the audacity to get up and try to persuade the people that Canada is a prosperous country, the most prosperous under the sun. In 1878 they called Sir Richard Cartwright a mixer and muddler of figures. They said: if you return us to power you will find no more deficits, your income will always be sufficient to meet the expenditure, there will be no ugly deficits to explain. Well, these men have been in power, and the largest deficit this country has ever seen occurred in a time of profound peace, and when they said the country was in a prosperous condition, namely, the year ending the 30th June, 1895. That one deficit was nearly as large as all the deficits that took place during the time of the Mackenzie Administration. Or, in other words, these men have had during these years $15,000,000 of deficits, and heaven only knows how much they will have in the future. It seems to me that we are not at the end. My hon. friend the Finance Minister boasted in the House that he had reduced the people's burdens by taking the duty off sugar more than it had ever been taken off at one time by any one Government, but within a couple of short years he restored the duty, not before, however, a great many of his friends had succeeded in getting in many hundreds of thousands of pounds of sugar.

The interest on the public debt in 1878 was $7,048,883, and in 1895 it was $10,466,294, although, as a matter of fact, the rate of interest has been largely reduced. We know that in 1878 the rate of interest was much higher than it has been in recent years; but in face of this fact, comparing a high rate of interest in 1878 with a low rate in 1894, we find that the interest upon our public debt has increased from $7,048,000 to $10,466,000, and it absorbs nearly one-third of the revenue of the Dominion. We know that in 1878 the rate of interest was much higher than it has been in recent years. But, notwithstanding this, we find that the interest charge upon the total debt has increased from $7,048,000 to $10,466,000. It is nearly one-third the total revenue of Canada. And the rate of taxation per head in Canada is $5.49, as against $4.11 in the United States. The ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace), in one of his meetings in the country, stated that the people paid duties of only 20 per cent, while under Mr. Mackenzie they paid 17 per cent. Sir, the rate of taxation upon dutiable goods in this country averages almost, if not quite, 33 per cent. In 1891 hon. gentlemen opposite were very eager, indeed, for reciprocity. In 1892 and subsequent years, their zeal seems to have relaxed to some extent. We hear nothing now about reciprocity, we hear nothing about any efforts being made to secure the markets of United States for Canada. In fact, when hon. gentlemen opposite speak upon the subject at all, they are rather opposed to having anything to do with the Americans. It would almost seem as if it were an unpatriotic thing to send our goods to the United States. They seem to think they can make some arrangements with Great Britain whereby she will put taxes upon the products of other countries and allow our goods to enter her markets free, we giving her certain compensating advantages. Now, let us look, for one single moment, at the position of this question. We exported to Great Britain last year, $61,856,000 of the products of Canada, made up principally of fish, products of the farm, timber, lumber, and so on. During the same time we exported to the United States, $41,297,000. While our exports to the United States were less than our exports to Great Britain, it must not be forgotten that in some years our exports to the United States make up the larger figure. But even on the figures I have given, we find that we exported to the United States, even with a high tariff, within about $20,000,000 of what we exported to Great Britain, with no tariff at all. If we could have sold that $41,000,000 worth of goods in Great Britain to greater advantage than we sold them in the United States we would have sent them there, for we could have done so without meeting any tariff obstacles. But we sent $41,000,000 worth of goods to the United States because we could get more for them than we could in England or in any other country. Some may say it may be true that you exported these goods to the United States, but the Yankees paid the duty upon them. I contend that our exports to the United States are of that class of goods upon which the importers do not pay anything like the whole duty. I contend that the Americans pay but a small percentage of the duty, if any at all. And why? Because we export to the United States, articles which they produce in sufficient quantities to meet their own wants. Therefore, in order to get the goods from Canada into that country the Canadian exporter must pay the way into the markets. Talk to a man who exports lambs or with a man who exports lumber to the United States, and he will tell you that but for the duty he would receive so much more for the goods he sends over. So, if we could get into that market free, it would mean an enormous saving to the people of this country on the great exports which they send to the United States, and an amount four or five times greater than we send to all the other countries in the world, except Great Britain. Therefore, I say, as Sir Alexander Galt said, that that market is of the greatest importance not only to Ontario, but to the maritime provinces. Now, let us look at the imports. We imported for consumption from Great Britain, $31,131,000, while from the United States we imported for consumption, $54,634,000. That shows the enormous trade carried on between the United States and Canada, a trade which might be increased enormously, as it was under the reciprocity treaty which formerly existed between these two countries. They want certain products which we can sell to them, and it pays us to send them to that market. As my hon. friend from North Middlesex (Mr. Hutchins) said in his campaign in 1891; If you want 20 per cent more for your horses, if you want more for your barley, more for your oats, vote for me, because I support the Government that is in favour of reciprocal trade with the United States. Sir, the total trade between Canada and Great Britain is $92,987,000, while our aggregate trade with the United States is $95,931,000, or $2,944,000 more than it is with Great Britain. Is there any man who will consider this question intelligently who will say that if we could strike down the barriers between the United States and Canada to a greater or less extent, it would not be of incalculable benefit to the farmers and to all classes in the Dominion of Canada? But, Sir, we set that to one side, and we take up visionary ideas and give the go-by to those reforms that will bring genuine benefit to the people of Canada. We subsidize steamship lines to Australia for the purpose of helping the trade of Canada—steamship lines running to a country that produces the same things that we produce, and produces them at cheaper prices. We subsidize fast lines—at least we intend to do it—to run between Canada and Great Britain, although we have abundant shipping upon the seas to do all the carrying that is to be done. We have all kinds of schemes involving enormous expenditure, instead of husbanding our resources. Instead of giving the people of the country a chance to restore themselves as fast as it is possible, to a condition of prosperity, we keep on with the bleeding process, drawing away their strength, day after day, month after month, year after year. And these deluded people supporting the Government of the day, listen when they are told that they are not hard up. They are told, your lands are not mortgaged. You do not find it hard to make a living, you are not hard up. It is all a mistake to suppose you are.

And so the people submit to further bleeding. But now the friends of the ex-Minister of Justice say, why, it is not nearly enough yet, we must have at least $40,000,000. Sir, let us look again at this wonderful system which the hon. gentlemen have inaugurated. They told us that it was to bring prosperity to the country; they told us that our trade was to be extended. They simply ignored entirely to elementary principle that a protective country can have but a limited foreign trade. You cannot sell unless you buy. To show that fact beyond any question, look at the blue-books of the Government as to our shipping industry. Why, Sir, in 1878, the tonnage of vessels built in Canada was 106,976; in 1895 the tonnage was 18,728, or a falling off of 88,248 tons. It is practically extinct. Upon the upper lakes of this country, vessels that were built twenty years ago are the only vessels now sailing, except the Beattie Line and the Canadian Pacific Railway boats. In every harbour you find old vessels rotting to pieces, but no new ships upon the stocks. That is the condition of affairs to-day, the policy of this Government has virtually extinguished the shipping industry of this country. Sir, their own blue-books tell a story that cannot be denied, a story that no Canadian can hear but with the deepest possible regret, a story which can be accounted for by one reason alone, and that is that you have placed barriers against the trade of this country, you have prevented the world from trading with us, and you have prevented us from trading with the world. You have granted subsidies to build railways, you have granted subsidies to build tunnels, you have granted subsidies to build bridges, you have done everything that can be done to unite the United States and Canada, but you have erected a tariff wall that renders all these works useless. Our people are isolated, our trade is diminishing, our shipping is practically gone, the country is in a condition of distress such as it never was in before. Let hon. gentlemen talk as they will, let them preach where they like, the facts are as I have stated, and as every one knows them to be. Every man who lives in this country from Vancouver to Prince Edward Island can testify that the statement I make here to-day is true. People are unemployed, farmers are not working at a profit, lands have depreciated in value; in hundreds and thousands of instances, they are not to-day of sufficient value to pay the mortgages upon them. Our trade has not grown as it should have grown. It is a paltry increase, talk as you will. To think that after seventeen years the total trade of Canada is very little more than it was in 1878, is a commentary on the policy of those hon. gentlemen, stronger than any words can express. Now, Mr. Speaker, this system of protection has been in existence for some seventeen years, and we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that during that time interests have come into existence under that tariff which have obtained a certain vested right. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that in every protected country, in the United States as well as Canada, when a protective tariff is introduced, its supporters say: All we want to do is to foster industries and get them started; the time will come when they will be able to stand alone, and then we will wipe off the tariff. But, Sir, these infants never obtain their majority. Election after election, decade after decade, they come forward and say: We are not able to stand alone; strike down the tariff wall, and you destroy the industries which have been built up. They always think that it is necessary that a high tariff should be imposed for the purpose of keeping them in existence. Be their contention right or wrong, they believe it. They have acquired, in their minds at least, a vested interest; and I say, pernicious as this system is, we cannot fail to recognize the fact that to suddenly destroy a protective system and to go back to sound economic principles might have the effect of disturbing trade for the time being. Although the return to sound economic principles might be justified, although it might be in the interest of the manufacturers themselves, as it certainly would be in the interest of the public at large, a sudden change of system might have the effect of disturbing trade. Therefore, I say that no Government, no intelligent men who might take office, could suddenly go from a high tariff to a revenue tariff. The process must necessarily be slow, a wise judgment must undoubtedly be exercised, the interests of every class in the community must be thoroughly considered. Sir, slow though it may be at first, that is the only possible way to bring back the country to sound economic principles. The Liberal party of this country are not enemies of the manufacturers of Canada, they want them to prosper, they are their friends. We believe that the policy of the Liberal party is a policy that will best advance their interests, and we believe that a high protective policy works an injury to the manufacturers. We believe that a revenue tariff, allowing raw material to be brought in free, would be an advantage to our manufacturing industries. We believe that a heavy tariff has the effect of multiplying industries to the injury of business where the market is a limited market, but there is no such danger where the tariff is a revenue tariff. Sir, this policy of the Liberal party, as I said a moment ago, must be pursued with moderation, must be carried out by business men, according to the dictates of wisdom; all classes of the community must be considered. I am sure I am voicing the feelings of the Liberal party when I say that any sudden change might possibly create a disturbance of the business of the country. Sir, I say this Government has imposed upon the country a system which I contend is pernicious in the extreme; I say they have been guilty of the grossest extravagance in the expenditure of public money; they have taken from the people enormous sums of money unnecessarily; they have added enormously to the public debt, much of it expended on useless public work; the whole governmental machine in the city of Ottawa is saturated with corruption. Hon. gentlemen may complain when we charge them with being guilty of corrupt acts, but the facts are before the world, and they cannot be repeated too often for the sake of those who are to come after them. Why, Sir, we have the fact that an hon. gentleman now occupying a seat in this House, was convicted of conspiring to defraud his country out of hundreds of thousands of dollars. We have the fact that that man, a close friend of the then Minister of Public Works, a man deep in the secrets of the political party to which he belonged, was sentenced to imprisonment by the judge, and we find the Government of this country, after two short months, upon certificates procured, no one knows how, pardoning criminals who have taken from the country hundreds of thousands of dollars. While to-day languishing in the prisons of Canada from one end to the other are to be found convicts who have been convicted of stealing trifling sums or committing trifling crimes, and they are serving their full time, and they will be disgraced for ever afterwards. The men with power and influence use it in some way, and the result of it is that on the pretense of ill-health these men have been released. Why, Sir, I venture to say that there are convicts throughout Canada who are dying through sickness, yet the appeals of those men perhaps are never listened to by the Government. We have in this country voted subsidies to railway companies and construction companies of which members of this House have been members, receiving from the Government of which were members thousands and tens of thousands of dollars, the company handing back money received from the Government to an agent for the purpose of corrupting the electors of this country in order that Canada may continue to be cursed by the Government which now holds office. We have it in evidence that Sir Hector Langevin swore to his election expenses at $917, while as a matter of fact those expenses amounted to $13,150, paid to him and borne by the "reptile fund" raised by public contractors and others throughout the country. In other words, every vote cast for Sir Hector Langevin cost $20—$20 not of his money, if it came out of his pocket I would not complain so much, corrupt though it be, but what we have is a member of the Government receiving from public contractors, or his agent receiving from public contractors large sums for the purpose of corrupting the constituency, and that very identical money paid out of the coffers of Canada into the hands of an agent used for the purpose of returning that Minister to power. That is but one instance.

In this country public money has been expended for useless public works, it has been squandered for the purpose of securing seats for members supporting the Government. Need I go further. What do we find? The Minister of Railways when charged with having advocated a plan for the building of the Tay Canal, his defence was not that it was required in the public interest, but he said that no money had been expended in his county and he thought some ought to be expended there. There was the answer of the man. Why was it expended? It was expended there for the purpose of influencing the electors of that county to return the hon. gentleman to this House. There was as much use for that canal as there would be for a ditch off this hill to a point below. The canal was not wanted, there was no use for it; canals such as that are out of date in these days of railways, but something had to be done to expend money. What do we find? The Government undertook the construction of the Tay Canal from the Rideau Canal. They constructed it to Perth, and in order that the member should have more benefit they extended it to his own mills, in order that his mills should have connection with the Tay Canal. That canal cost $476,178. It costs to keep it up $2,486 a year, and the total receipts from that magnificent waterway up to 1st January, 1894, were $135.76. No boat runs on the water except a little boat called the "John Haggart." As a matter of fact the net cost of running that canal is $2,360 over and above all receipts. Then if you add to that sum the interest on the investment at 4 per cent, you have $19,045 more, and the cost of maintenance is $2,486, making a yearly charge on this country of $21,531.14. The receipts, as I said a moment ago, amounted to $135.76, and there is a net loss to Canada every year and for all time of $21,395 annually. I say this is but a type of the waste and extravagance of this Government.

Then we have a lamentable condition of affairs in the county of Northumberland. What do we find there? It is with a feeling of astonishment, surprise and regret that I think in any county in this country there could be found men who would take the position that was taken in that county. We find a committee was appointed to sell positions of keepers of bridges and lighthouses, and an hon. gentleman supporting the Government—I do not say that any part of the money has gone into his pockets—issued certain promissory notes for his own election expenses. The committee was appointed to sell positions in the county for the purpose of paying indebtedness contracted for his election expenses. What do we find? A poor devil named Simpson paid $200, Gcodrich, Clouston, Brown, May and Fitzgerald paid from $125 to $250 each for those positions. They got them. These men who were in such a position in life as to be willing to take positions worth $200, $300 or $400 a year, were taxed $250. Sir, no man with any proper feeling can be found who will not resent such a condition of affairs. In the nineteenth century, in an intelligent constituency there have been found men who will use their positions for the purpose of selling public offices with a view to paying election expenses. It is drawing the thing down to a fine point when an hon. gentleman can get elected without any cost to himself, when the Government is good enough to recognize the nominations made and appoint nominees, the nominees giving a quid pro quo such as I have stated. Every department of this country has been proved to be corrupt. A Minister of the Crown appointed Mr. Senécal to the Printing Bureau of this country. For months and months Mr. Senécal demands and receives from everybody who sells to the department a tax on the purchase, thus robbing this country, because it was robbing it—and we did not attempt or pretend to get at the bottom of it—of over $50,000. Every man who sold to that Bureau and paid the tax could have sold his goods for that much less to the Government if that tax had not been exacted. Then, Sir, we have wasteful extravagance going on everywhere. No supervision, and nobody apparently to look after anything. Take the Wellington and Grand Trunk Railway bridges, commonly known as the Curran bridge: original estimate, $122,000; actual cost $430,000. Here are some of the facts about the Curran bridge: timber and lumber was certified for at 1,000,000 feet more than could have been used, stone cutting on the Wellington bridge should have been $3,000, when it cost $16,700. The Grand Trunk Railway bridge was worse. $12 was paid for work there by the Government, when the contractor paid only $4.50, and $20 was paid for other work while the contractor only paid $3.75. There was altogether in that business a clear steal of nearly, if not quite, $200,000. And, Sir, after the Government had noticed that these things were going on, instead of at once investigating and stopping payment to the contractors, they paid the contractors over $100,000.

Then, Sir, we have the Fredericton bridge, in the county where my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has gone to. The company was incorporated in 1885 with a capital of $20,000; the Government loaned them $300,000; they gave them a present of $30,000; the company bonded for $50,000, and the interest, amounting to $74,000, the Government paid one year's interest out of the money it paid to these people. In other words, the Government gave them $330,000, and the company gives back to the Government the sum of $12,000 for the payment of interest. That is to say, these individuals have received from the Government and elsewhere $34,414 more than the structure ever cost. And, Sir, I venture to say, that although this matter was brought before Parliament last year, there has not been one single dollar of interest paid on those bonds since 1895, although it was promised that the matter would be looked into. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance goes down to the county, and is a candidate in that county, and in order to show his gratitude to the electors of that county, he has promised to give the little town of Marysville a post office that will cost $30,000 or $40,000. Refusing it to towns like Woodstock, large business centres in the country, my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) suddenly sees that that little town of Marysville, owned by Mr. Gibson, bonded for $400,000, mortgaged to secure the bonds: he sees that little town should have a post office at the public expense. Why, Sir, every little village in Canada is entitled to the same consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) would not mind if I recall his attention to the statements he has just made, so that I may be sure that he reiterates them. One of his statements is, that the town at which Mr. Gibson lives is bonded for $400,000 under mortgage, and the other statement is that I promised them a post office to cost $30,000.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has in the Estimates this year a sum of $8,000 for a post office in Marysville. We know, Mr. Speaker, how this thing is worked. We know that they commence with a little sum, and that in the Estimates year after year there is a further sum to continue the post office. There is finally a sum to complete it, and if you go through the various public buildings in the nature of post offices throughout the country, I will venture to say you will find very few of them that did not cost from $20,000 to $30,000, and a great many of them in the smaller places from $30,000 to $50,000.

Mr. FOSTER. But I do not understand that my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) reiterates what he stated a moment ago, that I went down and promised a post office worth $30,000?

Mr. LISTER. I did not say that.

Mr. FOSTER. You did not say that?

Mr. LISTER. No, I did not.

Mr. FOSTER. My ears very much deceived me then.

Mr. LISTER. They must have.

Mr. FOSTER. The "Hansard" will not deceive you to-morrow morning.

Mr. LISTER. I would go and get an ear-phone, if I were you.

Mr. FOSTER. The "Hansard" will have a surprise for you in the morning.

Mr. LISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) promised them a post office.

Mr. LISTER.

Mr. FOSTER. That is better.

Mr. LISTER. Whether it costs $20,000 or $30,000 or $10,000, the place is not entitled to a post office. Neither its magnitude, its population, nor its business, afford any reason whatever for giving that town a post office, when large towns throughout the country are denied it. We know my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) of old. He is afraid to run in his own county. When he did run in his own county, what did he do? The first thing he did was to get a little post office for Sussex, and he actually got a bell put on top of it afterwards.

Mr. FOSTER. Is my hon. friend willing to vouch for either of these statements?

Mr. LISTER. Is there not a post office at Sussex?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. Did you give it?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not.

Mr. LISTER. Is there a bell on it?

Mr. FOSTER. You said so.

Mr. LISTER. Did I?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. There is a nice little tower on that post office.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there a tower on it?

Mr. LISTER. And there was a grant for a bell for that tower.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend say there is a tower on that post office and a bell?

Mr. LISTER. Is there a post office there, eh?

Mr. FOSTER. You are pretty wild.

Mr. LISTER. Well, now, it makes very little difference whether there is a bell on it or not.

Mr. FOSTER. Not much difference.

Mr. LISTER. Sussex has a post office.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. And Sussex got that post office from my hon. friend (Mr. Foster).

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry to say it did not.

Mr. LISTER. It did not; not since the hon. gentleman has been in Parliament?

Mr. FOSTER. No, it happened to get it before I came.

Mr. LISTER. Before you came? Very well, we won't hold you responsible for the Sussex post office, but I think you are responsible for the bell.

Mr. FOSTER. If the bell is there, I will take the responsibility for it.

Mr. LISTER. Then, we have another hon. gentleman sitting in this House, the hon. member for Montmorency, Arthur Joseph Turcotte. I think the Minister of Finance voted to whitewash him, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. LANGELIER. Yes, he did.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Arthur Joseph Turcotte was a member of Parliament. His firm had a contract with the Government, in which he was undoubtedly beneficially interested. Turcotte & Provost were the partners. The contract was made with Provost. The receipts went to the firm and were deposited in the firm name. Provost went out and assigned the contract to Larose, Turcotte's book-keeper. Turcotte received the cheques. They were placed to his credit in the bank, and yet, Sir, when arraigned before a committee of this House on the charge, and when these facts were all established. Mr. Turcotte was whitewashed, and it was declared by a majority of the House that he had not violated the Independence of Parliament Act. Mr. Joseph Turcotte could not be convicted, of course. Mr. Turcotte was the lieutenant of the Postmaster General in the city of Quebec, and he seemed to be quite indifferent about the charge from the first time it was made, although the evidence established beyond peradventure that the contract was held for his benefit, that he had received payment from the Government and that the money was placed to his credit in the bank.

Now, my hon. friends opposite did not want any more investigations. They had enough, apparently, and in a moment of weakness they consented, in the early investigations of 1891, that the witnesses should be sworn. But in 1894 a change had come over them, and they made up their minds that no witnesses should be sworn, and that only the statements of witnesses not under oath should be taken. Mr. Mulock moved, on the 19th of April, 1894:

That the witnesses should be examined under oath.

And the ex-Minister of Justice moved in amendment:

That the House would grant permission when it appeared to the House that by doing so the committee would be aided in the examination.

We did not succeed in getting that for some considerable time after the 19th of April. It meant this, that it depended on the wish and the will of the majority of the committee whether any witnesses brought before that committee should make their statements under oath or not. The Liberal party in the committee and in the House brought the matter before the attention of Parliament over and over again, and in the end it was conceded. The ex-Minister of Justice withdrew his objections, and it was finally declared by this House that all the witnesses who should appear before the Public Accounts Committee should be examined under oath. Sir, that incident only shows the Government's refusal first and their hesitancy afterwards; it only shows how desperately afraid they were of investigations taking place; it only shows how eager they were to keep control of the committee. Why, Sir, did they object to have the evidence taken under oath? What possible reason could there be for it? The reason, Mr. Speaker, and the only reason, is the one that must suggest itself to your mind, and to the mind of everybody else who has given the matter any consideration.

Mr. Speaker, it is now seventeen years since all the promises of prosperity were made to us by the gentlemen who then occupied the Treasury benches. It is seventeen years since they told us that the expenditure of the Liberal Administration had been extravagant and corrupt. Yet we have to-day, the spectacle of the public debt of Canada enormously increased and the public expenditure of Canada $14,000,000 a year more than it was then. We have the fact that the trade of the country is very little more than it was in 1879. Our people are to-day suffering under the burden of an enormous taxation. During those years the Government have squandered the public lands of the country through their friends. They have parcelled out the timber lands of the country to their camp followers. They have given away the natural wealth that belongs to the people of Canada and their posterity. They have expended fabulous sums upon useless public works—works that could return nothing to the country, either in money or in anything else. Fraud, speculation and maladministration have characterized their administration of public affairs. The people of Canada to-day are placed in the hands of monopolists and combinations, with no hope of extricating themselves while this Government is in power. The Act we passed against combinations is in fact a dead letter. Although it is well known that there are in this country to-day trades controlled by certain combinations, there has been no effort whatever made with the object of enforcing the law or relieving the people of the burdens which those combinations have cast upon them. Over $10,000,000 a year is required to pay the interest on our public debt. Deficit after deficit year after year stares us in the face; and besides what we have been able to wring from the taxpayers, we go every year to the English market, and borrow money from the English people to meet the ordinary expenses of the country. There has been no increase in our population to speak of—a beggarly 500,000 people in ten years. Our farm lands have decreased in value at least 40 per cent. Business is to-day in a condition of paralysis. Go where you will—go to any town you like in the province of Ontario, and there is but one story—that the people are making nothing. They are discontented and dissatisfied; there seems no light for them; there is nothing to awaken in them a feeling of hope. The Government says to them: You are prosperous. The Government say an expenditure of $38,000,000 a year is not enough; we ought to make it $40,000,000. How long will these brick-makers stand this condition of affairs? How long before they rise up in their might and power and drive out of office those who have thus misgoverned them and brought them to this deplorable condition? Our people are driven from the country, because there is no employment for them here. The best blood of Canada are leaving it in thousands every year. Our young men are seeking homes in the south, in the west, and everywhere except in their native land. Go to the city of Chicago and you will find thousands of Canadians, many of them occupying leading positions. Go to St. Louis, to Buffalo, to any of the large cities of the western states, and you will find Canadians there. Go to the great plains of the western states, and you will find many of the sons of our farmers helping to build them up instead of our own western prairies—driven from the country because there is no field for them here. And what have the Government given us in place of those people to whom we have lost? A subsidy of $750,000 a year for a fast line; which means that 250 of the best farms of Ontario are required every year to pay the subsidy. They have given a subsidy to a line to go to Australia, and they say they are going to establish a trade there. Why, Sir, the trade with Australia is the merest bagatelle; it is of no account whatever. That country produces the same kind of products that we produce, and much more cheaply than it is possible for the people of Canada to produce them; and you are only subsidizing ships to bring products into the country to enter into competition with the products of our own people. A few years ago the Minister of Finance took his little carpet bag and went to the West India Islands to make a treaty there. What has become of it? He has subsidized a steamer to run from Halifax to the West Indies, and it is true there has been a little increase of trade, but what is it compared with the increase of trade between ourselves and the great nation to the south? It is the merest bagatelle. The hon. gentleman seeks to establish a trade with every country except the people who want our products, who are our largest buyers, and of whom we are the largest purchasers on this continent. Sir, such is the condition of affairs in this country. But I venture the prediction, whether we go to the country sooner or later, that the verdict of the people of Canada will be in condemnation of the Government and its policy, and in favour of the restoration to power of the party which governed the country so wisely and so well during the four years from 1874 to 1878.

Mr. RIDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to intercept the vote on the motion that you do now leave the Chair. I feel that the occasion is altogether too important to allow it to pass by without entering my protest against the way in which the affairs of the country have been conducted during the last seventeen years. We are on the eve of a general election, and, therefore, it is important that we should calmly and seriously consider the present condition of our affairs. We were told that, by adopting the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite have been pursuing for the last seventeen years, this country would go on increasing in wealth and in population. We were told at that time that our industries were languishing, that Canada was being made a slaughter market for the benefit of foreign nations, particularly the United States. Now we have had seventeen years of this policy. The National Policy is a misnomer; Canada has always had a National Policy. It is not so much the policy as the administration of the affairs of this country under this policy, of which we have a right to complain. The hon. Finance Minister realizes that Canada is at present in a desperate condition. The commerce of the country is disturbed, and the financial condition of the country is also in a desperate condition. As a business man, I can say that I have never, in all of my twenty years' business experience, had so much difficulty in the collection of debts as I have had this past fall.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). That is the case of all politicians.

Mr. RIDER. Well, there is a cause for this. We were told in 1878 that one of the evils from which the country was suffering was extravagance and corruption on the part of the Mackenzie Administration. We were told that the expenditure, which was then in the neighbourhood of $23,000,000, was excessive, that these hon. gentlemen would, if they were placed in power, maintain the efficiency of the service and at the same time pay off the national debt. What has been the result? We find to-day that not only has the annual expenditure been increased by about $14,000,000 annually—and this to come from a population very little increased in numbers—but we find also the net debt has been increased about $113,000,000. Now, what does this mean. They try to lull us into a false security with the illusion that the debt is nothing. Why, they say, look to the mother country, a country deeply in debt, and in her debt consists her strength. But let us compare the conditions of the two countries and see how different they are. The debt of England is owned by English capitalists who are interested in each other's welfare, but the debt of Canada is due to foreign bankers, and it requires an annual withdrawal in cash from this country of $10,000,000. Is Canada in a financial condition of wealth to stand this drain which is seriously crippling the business of the country? I maintain not. Because the withdrawal of $10,000,000 per year does not decrease the principal or debt but merely goes to pay the interest, and when that much is withdrawn from circulation, the country parts are being drained almost to the white.

The Minister of Finance realizes that the country is in a desperate condition, but still he hoped that perhaps he could satisfy the country that he could repair this terrible state of affairs. He gave a long list of articles to show that he had really decreased the burden of taxation resting on the people. In his financial statement he mentions the following as being articles upon which he has reduced the duties, and he also gave a list showing where there had been increases. For the purpose of comparison, I selected a few of those articles on which there are reductions of duty as compared with 1893-94:—

Ale, beer and porter.....	$ 16,047
Earthenware and china.....	59,860
Fancy goods.....	41,023
Butter, cheese, lard and meats....	42,513
Silk goods.....	66,979
Spirits and wines.....	295,857

In the articles upon which there are increases are the following:—

Rice, &c.....	$ 66,641
Carriages.....	54,515
Cotton goods.....	70,752
Coal and coke.....	33,732
Leather goods.....	29,566
Sugar, all kinds.....	222,313

The hon. Finance Minister was inclined to take credit for having relieved the people of Canada of taxation. This relief, he claimed, was brought about by the reduction in the customs duties. There was a time when, in placing these duties upon goods, he said it was for the benefit of the country; but now when he pretends to remove them, he says the removal is for the benefit of the country. But what are the facts? At the last revision of the tariff, the tax was placed upon sugar, the consumption of which the hon. member for Pictou has estimated at 345,000,000 pounds. This means a tax that will fall upon the consumers of Canada at present to the extent of $3,923,000. Let us analyse this, and see what effect it will have upon the consumers of Canada. As I have said, the consumers of Canada will, by the action of the Government in placing the duty on raw sugar, be taxed nearly $4,000,000 extra; but while this much comes out of the people's pockets, the refiners will get $2,208,000, and the treasury only $1,715,000. Now, I wish to call your attention to an item in which I have always taken considerable interest, as it is an article that is largely produced, not only in the county which I represent, but also throughout the province of Quebec, and that is maple sugar. The Minister of Finance, in revising the tariff in 1894, was inclined to place a duty of 20 per cent on maple sugar, for what purpose it was impossible to ascertain, as we import little or no maple sugar and export a considerable quantity. I warned him of the danger of placing a duty upon that article because the United States were engaged in a revision of their tariff, and I feared it might result disastrously for the sugar interest. That hon. gentleman, however persisted in putting on this 20 per cent duty. This was done early in June. In August following the United States Congress met that by placing a duty of 40 per cent on maple sugar, thus seriously crippling a profitable industry in the province of Quebec. We were told that population was increasing under the benign influence of the National Policy. Well, as I said before, I have not so much fault to find with the National Policy as with the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. I believe that, as far as the National Policy is concerned, if the National Policy were all right and the amount of taxation levied by duties—I claim it is not—adjusted properly to bear equitably on all classes, and if the amount collected by the Government in excess of what was collected in 1878 had been used in the extinction of our public debt, then it would not have been so bad. As the electors are soon to be called upon to decide to whom they will give their confidence, I think it is my duty to place before you a statement of how the affairs of this country stand at the present time. I would like to call your attention to some figures relating to our population. In 1871 the population of Canada, according to the census of that year, was 3,689,257. In 1881 the population was 4,324,810. In 1891 the population was 4,833,239. Between 1871 and 1881, which is generally regarded as the revenue tariff period, the increase of population was 635,553, or an increase of 17·23 per cent. Between 1881 and 1891, which may be called the National Policy period, as the National Policy has been in full force during the whole time, the increase in population was 508,429, or 11·75 per cent. On looking into the details, I find that between 1871 and 1881 there was a decrease in population in twenty-seven electoral districts throughout the country, while in the period between 1881 and 1891 there was a decrease in eighty-four electoral districts. Why, Sir, if the promises made in 1878 had been made good, we should not have had a decrease of population in any county. I will give a summary of the returns taken from the census of 1891, showing the changes in population in these two periods:

Now, Sir, this goes to show that the National Policy, so-called, has had a most blighting effect upon the prosperity of the country, if its effects is to be measured by the increase in population. The Finance Minister, after giving a partial account of the difficulty in which we now find ourselves, thought he saw a gleam of hope in what he alleged to be the fact, that there was an increase of our exports over our imports. He claimed that for the second time in the history of our country our exports exceeded our imports by something over two million dollars. Now, Sir, I do not accuse the Finance Minister with intending to mislead the House or the country; but I find, in looking over the Trade and Navigation Returns ending 30th June, 1895, that such is not the case. The balance of trade is not yet in our favour, and that makes, it seems to me, the future of our country look still darker. When we are called upon to send annually ten millions of dollars of our circulation out of the country, how can we ever expect to get it back, with the balance of trade against us, except by the same old process of the past seventeen years, hiring the money and thereby increasing our annual obligations? We must bear this in mind, that while we are piling up the national debt by leaps and bounds, the money is not being expended in a way that adds to the value of the country. Judging from the depreciation in the value of real estate which has taken place throughout the country, we cannot but come to the conclusion that when our country is indebted to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars to foreign capitalists, our real estate is really worth that much less. Now, in looking over the Trade and Navigation Returns for the period mentioned, I beg to call your attention to page 520, giving a statement of our exports. We find there that our exports of goods, the produce of Canada, including coin and bullion, amounted to $99,794,922. On page 356 we find that our imports for the same period, of goods entered for consumption, including coin and bullion, amounted to $105,252,511, making an excess of imports over exports of $5,467,589. I find in looking further on in the Trade and Navigation Returns, which I suppose are made in the Department of Trade and Commerce, that they estimate the amount of shortage in the returns of the inland ports, at $3,300,090. I am sorry the Finance Minister is absent, because I would like to know upon what he bases this estimate. There is no doubt that there is a large amount of goods that go out of Canada of which we have no account, goods that go out by the underground railway, but from my knowledge of border traffic, I believe that where one dollar goes out in this way, more than five dollars come in, and if there be any estimate made of the shortage between imports and exports, the amount should be trebled, at least, when we take into consideration the amount of our imports. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Finance Minister sought to leave the impression on the House that in the revision of the tariff of 1894, there really was a reduction made to the extent of the duties. To convince myself upon this point, I have taken the trouble to go over the Trade and Navigation Returns, from which I made the following extracts of some of the principal items of import, showing the value of the goods imported, the duty paid, with the rate per cent :-

It will be seen that many of these articles are those which the farmer is obliged to use, and they are as much raw material to him as are wool and silk to the manufacturer. Take, for instance, kerosene. It is an article on which the people of this country depend for their light, and yet there is a duty on it at the present time of nearly 100 per cent. I claim that a revenue tariff, while less burdensome on the people, would, at the same time, produce probably more revenue to the treasury, if the duty on kerosene were reduced to a moderate duty, say 25 or 30 per cent, or 2 cents per gallon. I think the revenue would suffer but slightly, and farmers would have less cause to complain; but, at the present time, there is not enough kerosene or refined coal oil produced in this country to satisfy the demand. We imported last year no less than 6,000,000 gallons of oil. That is the Government's correct book-keeping, as shown in the Trade and Navigation Returns. But, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce is aware, probably half as much more comes into the country on which no duty is paid, and this is not giving fair play and doing justice to the people, because those living on the boundary line have this advantage, while those living twenty-five miles distant are compelled to pay the full price and the duty. The Minister of Finance gave this House to understand that the burden of taxation on account of the last tariff revision was really lighter, or, at all events, not so high as before the revision in 1894. What are the facts? Comparing the past with 1893-94, I find that upon dutiable goods imported in 1894 the rate of duty averaged 32 per cent, while during the past year it was 32½ per cent, showing that taxation has been increased by the revision last year. I wish to call attention to the item of wool in order to show how hon. gentlemen opposite endeavour to pull the wool over the eyes of the farmer. Wool is the finished product of the farmer, just as much as tweed or woollen cloth is the finished product of the manufacturer. What is the treatment meted out to the farmer in this case? Wool is placed on the free list. The farmer is brought into competition with the markets of the world, and the price has dropped to such a point that it hardly pays to care for it. While wool is to be considered as the finished product of the farmer, on which there is no duty, it is the raw material of the manufacturer of woollens and tweeds, and the duty is 33 per cent. On a suit of clothes made by a Canadian tailor from tweed manufactured in Canada there is a duty or a protection of 67 per cent. The duty on clothing averages 34½ per cent. If the tailor purchases his tweed in the Canadian market it will cost him nearly all what he has gained, so the tailor is in about as ridiculous a position as is the farmer under the operation of this tariff. We find the total amount of woollen goods imported as follows :-

WOOLLEN GOODS IMPORTED.

	Value.	Duty.	Per cent.
Cloths	$1,458,456	$473,099	= 32½
Coatings	600,821	200,043	= 33½
Tweeds	383,463	122,182	= 32
Clothing	814,879	279,174	= 34
Woollen goods, all others	4,675,876	1,453,066	= 32
	$7,933,495	$2,527,564

These figures are so clear that they do not require any comment from me. I have no doubt that the farmers of Canada already understand full well how they have been treated under the operations of the tariff. Why, they were told that these duties were levied to aid the manufacturing industries which would give the home market to the farmers for their products. We find according to the census returns of 1891, that in all Canada there were 39 woollen mills. This includes every little woollen mill throughout the country employing one hand or more. In all these mills there were employed: men, 587; women, 542; boys under 16 years of age, 117; girls under 16 years of age, 164; or in all 1,392 men, women and children found employment in the manufacture of tweeds and other woollen goods. And, for the benefit the Canadian market was to receive from this industry, the people were called upon to pay a tax to the manufacturers of $2,527,594.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I beg to call your attention to plank No. 2 of the Liberal platform, adopted at the Dominion Liberal convention held in this city in June, 1893. It is as follows:—

ENLARGED MARKETS—RECIPROCITY.

That, having regard to the prosperity of Canada and the United States as adjoining countries, with many mutual interests, it is desirable that there should be the most friendly relations and broad and liberal trade intercourse between them;

That the interests alike of the Dominion and of the Empire would be materially advanced by the establishing of such relations;

That the period of the old reciprocity treaty was one of marked prosperity to the British North American colonies;

That the pretext under which the Government appealed to the country in 1891 respecting negotiations for a treaty with the United States was misleading and dishonest and intended to deceive the electorate;

That no sincere effort has been made by them to obtain a treaty, but that, on the contrary, it is manifest that the present Government, controlled as they are by monopolies and combines, are not desirous of securing such a treaty;

That the first step towards obtaining the end in view, is to place a party in power who are sincerely desirous of promoting a treaty on terms honourable to both countries;

That a fair and liberal reciprocity treaty would develop the great natural resources of Canada, would enormously increase the trade and commerce between the two countries, would tend to encourage friendly relations between the two peoples, would remove many causes which have in the past provoked irritation and trouble to the governments of both countries, and would promote those kindly relations between the Empire and the republic which afford the best guarantee for peace and prosperity;

Mr. RIDER.

That the Liberal party is prepared to enter into negotiations with a view to obtaining such a treaty, including a well-considered list of manufactured articles, and we are satisfied that any treaty so arranged will receive the assent of Her Majesty's Government, without whose approval no treaty can be made.

This brings me to consider the condition of the trade between Canada and the United States. We were told by gentlemen opposite in 1878, that Canada was being made a slaughter market, as though the manufacturing industries of this country were being drowned out by goods brought in from the United States and other countries, and sold at a sacrifice. I would like to know, Sir, who would receive the benefit in such a case as that? If goods were being sold in Canada at a lower rate than the cost of production, would the advantage not be in favour of the consumers of this country? But let us take these hon. gentlemen upon their own grounds, and what are the facts? We find that in 1895 we imported from the United States $54,634,531 worth of goods, and in 1878 we imported only $48,631,729 worth, so that for the past year we imported $6,000,000 worth of goods from the United States, more than we did in 1878. Now, if Canada was a slaughter market in 1878 owing to the conditions of the tariff, how are we to consider it at the present time. Surely these figures show that it has not been improved in that respect. Then let us consider the state of our exports. Our exports to the United States during the past year amounted to $32,303,773, and in 1878 they amounted to $25,244,898. It seems that we have increased our exports to the United States by $7,000,000 since that period. This you will see, Sir, has been done in spite of all the difficulties and restrictions that have been placed by both nations in the way of trade between the two countries. It proves also that the natural market for many of our productions is the market to the south of us.

I wish to direct your attention, Sir, to the national debt of Canada. We were told by the Conservatives in 1878, that one of the advantages to be derived from a change in the Administration, was that the affairs of the country would be so ably and economically managed, that not only would there not need to be any annual increase in the charges to maintain the efficiency of the service, and to give the public all the improvements that were necessary; but that the debt would be reduced as well. Against that promise, held out by the men who now adorn the Treasury benches, or rather, by the men who are now adorned by the Treasury benches, let me place before you the actual condition of affairs at the present time. The net public debt of Canada in 1878 was $140,000,000 in round numbers; while at the end of June, 1895, according to the statement of the Finance Minister, our net public debt had grown to the enormous sum of $253,074,927, making an increase under the Administration of the present Government of $112,712,858, I find, Sir, that during the past seventeen years of the National Policy and the administration of the present Government, they have added an average annual increase of debt of over $6,500,000, while they have increased the annual expenditure in even a larger proportion. It seems to me that this is a matter which should cause grave apprehension to every man who has an interest in this country. Why, Sir, if we cannot pay our way in time of peace and prosperity, when can we ever hope to discharge our national debt. How can we confidently face, even rumours of war, not to speak of war itself. A few days ago, when the cry went forth that there was a possibility of war, the loyalty of the people prompted them to willingly give the administration any reasonable expenditure to improve the defences of Canada. When the thing blows over and we are brought face to face with the actual state of affairs, how can the people of this country place their trust in the hands of an Administration under whom, in time of peace, and they say, prosperity, we cannot pay our way? If we cannot pay our way in times of peace and prosperity, there must be something wrong in the administration of the affairs of this country. What good reason can be advanced why the per capita debt of this country should be larger than that of the United States? The debt of the United States was caused by a most cruel and expensive civil war. We have had nothing of the kind. The United States, in time of peace, like the mother country, have been annually reducing their debt, while Canada, in time of peace—and, if we are to believe the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, in time of prosperity—has been adding to its debt at an alarming rate; and the end is not yet. Why, Sir, the hon. Finance Minister acknowledges that for the past two years he has increased the public debt by over $11,000,000. What does this signify? It signifies that the increase of our debt for the last two years has actually wiped out the wealth of three average counties of Canada, just as if they were sold out under the hammer of the sheriff, according to the municipal valuation.

Now, Sir, I beg to place before you another table. I do this for the purpose of giving the people of the country an opportunity of knowing how the tariff of Canada is arranged—people who have no opportunity of finding out in any other way. I will first give you a list of the raw materials imported for the benefit of manufacturers, duty free:

Articles.	Value.
Diamonds, unset.....	$ 239,057
Grease, in the rough.....	283,778
Hides, raw	1,950,530

Wire rods for wire-makers.....	567,032
Steel rails for railways.....	838,144
Metals, N.E.S., for manufactures.....	1,905,154

I think that in this case, comment is unnecessary. You will look over this list in vain to find an article, the importation of which, duty free, is in the interest of the farmer. Now, let us turn to the other side of the shield, and consider, for a moment, the articles imported on which there is a duty—some of which I will mention, and many of the articles are such as cannot be produced in Canada, and on which a duty is simply a tax and an oppression, without even accomplishing anything in the way of aiding or encouraging manufacturers:

Articles.	Value.	Duty.
	$	$
Spices	162,707	26,706
Soda and baking powder.....	138,798	28,714
Rice	298,469	142,400

Agricultural implements.....	291,222	70,158
Window glass.....	256,365	51,275
Cement	251,918	81,068
Rubber goods.....	410,609	123,458

Cotton goods.....	4,218,168	1,200,820
Woollen goods.....	7,952,932	2,527,564
Coal, bituminous.....	3,376,517	877,625
Kerosene	414,420	400,000

I find, in estimating the average duties paid, that the duties paid in 1895 have been slightly more than those paid in 1894. Now, I beg to call your attention to our total exports of home produce for the year ending the 30th June, 1895, as made up from the following sources:—

The Mine.....	$ 6,983,227
“ Fisheries	10,692,247
“ Forest	23,891,166
“ Farm	50,106,898
Manufactures	7,768,875
Miscellaneous articles.....	85,938

Total..... $99,528,351

From this you will see that the farmers contribute towards the volume of exports over $50,000,000, or over half the total amount. Yet, Sir, I looked in vain to the tariff to find where the farmers have an advantage or where they are considered in any way. Goods which to the farmer would be raw material are taxed and taxed highly in every case. And yet the farmer is doing more towards building up the industries of the country than all the other classes together. What would manufacturers or business men depend upon were it not for the farmer? We find that the farmers are the best distributors of national wealth. When they are realizing good prices for their products, they are making local improvements, they are adding to the permanent wealth of the country; and why should not they be encouraged as well as others? Farmers are, in a sense, as much manufacturers as the manufacturers of woollen goods, of implements, of carriages, or any other class of industry, and the farmer is put to a greater expense. He has to depend more upon the results of the future than any other class; and it seems to me that when we consider the share that the farmers contribute to our export trade, they should be considered in every way possible, for their benefit. And about the only thing which this Government can put before the people to show that they have done something for the farmers in our Experimental Farm. Why, if a farmer tells the Finance Minister that wool is his finished product, the Finance Minister tells him: Why, see what we are doing for you. see what amount of money we are expending annually upon our Experimental Farm to help you—and the money all comes out of the farmers' pockets.

Now, in conclusion, I believe that it will not be necessary for me to make a recapitulation of the many facts which I have placed before you. I believe that the people appreciate, as they never did before, the state of affairs, and they realize that their only hope and salvation is in a change. This Administration has been tried quite long enough. They made in 1878 very seductive promises: and if these promises had been carried out, no doubt it would have been much better for Canada. The people realize that this country cannot be in debt to foreign capitalists without the property of the people suffering. They realize that $10,000,000 drawn out of the resources of the country to pay the annual interest on our debt, must be drawn at the expense of the business interests of the country, and a depreciation of all real estate follows as a consequence. I believe the people fully realize the consequences of the immoral Administration during the past seventeen years, and that when they once can have an opportunity of declaring their opinion, they will show to the men who now occupy the Treasury benches that they consider wilful waste means woeful want, and that, in the end, they are the ones who have to pay the bills and meet the extravagance of the Government. If the money of the country had been expended in an efficient and honourable way, we would have far less to complain of to-day. Although we have some very important public works, we have not one which has not cost from two to five times what it should have cost, and a young growing country like Canada is not in that position of wealth to stand any such extravagance. Why, last year, in discussing the Estimates, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) undertook to explain the increased expenditure necessary in the construction of the St. John's custom-house. The Estimates were largely exceeded and what was the excuse he gave? Why, he said, after the estimate was made, the Government decided to change the plan and make the building fire-proof. He gave that as a justification for the great increase of the actual over the estimated cost. That seemed very plausible indeed, and no one would have disputed it, but when we study the bills paid in connection with the re-building of that work and find that over 600,000 feet of lumber had been used in the construction of that fire-proof building, we come to the idea at once that lumber forms an important item when there is a deal on hand. When we come to the Curran Bridge we find not only excessive extravagance so far as the help is concerned,—a derrick getting three times as much pay per day for work done on a Sunday as it did on any other day—but we found a million feet of lumber disappeared and the Government have not yet been able to get any clue as to where it went. A million feet of lumber is a large pile and it seems to me evidence of the grossest neglect on the part of the Government, for which they can plead no excuse. Let me call your attention to a canal known as the Haggart Ditch, about three hours' ride from this place, upon which the country has expended about a half million dollars. Figure that as you may, the interest and the cost of maintenance will not come far short of $25,000 yearly charge on the revenue of Canada. And what are the results? Why, according to the statement of the Government, the total revenue received from that work was $146 a year. How then can the Government be justified? How can they be trusted with the construction of other important works, when they have shown such gross neglect and such wanton extravagance on these? The people are aware how the affairs of the Dominion have been mismanaged, and are only waiting for an opportunity to make a change, and they understand what a change will mean. They know that the affairs of the country are in a desperate condition; they know the debt of the country is increasing yearly; they know that the men who are now occupying the Treasury benches, administering the affairs of the country, are not able, in times of peace and prosperity, to make ends meet and pay their way. How can the Government plead for a continuance of confidence under such conditions? Can they believe that the people are so blind that they will continue giving them their support? No, Sir; I believe that the people have already come to a conclusion that a change must be made, that a change cannot be worse, but must in every way better the condition of the country, and they will confide the management of their affairs in the coming five years into the hands of the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I have a good deal of sympathy with my friend from Stanstead who has just resumed his seat. He complains that he has a great deal of difficulty in collecting his debts in the fine county of Stanstead. But I doubt if that is a strong argument against the National Policy, because he will find that that is the experience of all politicians while they remain in politics. I would recommend him to retire from politics, and he will then find it very much easier to collect his debts in Stanstead. The hon. gentleman refers to the exodus from the Dominion. I am one of those who believe that the exodus has little or nothing to do with the National Policy, as the National Policy has little or nothing to do with the exodus. The exodus from Canada commenced long before the National Policy, and it was equally as great during the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite as it was before or as it has been since. There is a class in this country who are strongly opposed to the National Policy, and they are opposed to it for what appears to them sufficient reasons. I refer to the importers of goods on which duty is collectable, and I am here to state that, according to my personal experience much of the agitation against the National Policy is owing to this class. A few years ago there was a very strong agitation against the duty on coal oil. That agitation commenced with the importers of that product. The duty on coal oil was reduced to the extent of 50 per cent. It is a most useful article for the poorer class in this country. But, though the duty was reduced 50 per cent, what has been our experience? It has been just the same experience that we have had with regard to other articles upon which the duty has been reduced—although the importers gained largely by the reduction, they did not reduce the price to the consumers by even so much as half a cent a gallon. The same is nearly always the case with goods consumed in this Dominion. Only a few years ago there was an agitation in Canada and particularly in Ontario in regard to the duties on anthracite coal. The argument was used, that as anthracite coal was not produced in the Dominion, the consumer unquestionably paid the duty upon it. From a revenue tariff point of view there should have been no objection to that duty. But although the 50 cents a ton previously imposed was taken off, our experience has been that anthracite coal has been sold in Canada just as high since the abolition of the duty as it was before. This proves conclusively that it was the middleman and the carrier who pocketed the profits of nearly half a million dollars a year since the abolition of that duty. In the case of coal oil it was the importer who benefited by the reduction, and this class benefited last year to something in the neighbourhood of $123,000, while the consumer did not benefit to any extent whatever. The policy of the Opposition appears to be, as my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) stated, free trade as against protection—free trade as they have it in England, I assume. In Great Britain they have free trade as nearly as practicable, and Britain is the only country on the face of the globe that has adopted free trade as a policy. But, notwithstanding the name, we find that they impose customs duties and excise duties besides a direct tax. In customs they collect about $100,000,000 a year and in excise about $130,000,000 a year. By direct taxation, under many forms, they collect no less than $270,000,000. In free trade Great Britain, therefore, we find that while by customs and excise they only collect $230,000,000, by direct taxation upon the people in various ways they collect $270,000,000 a year. Now, if that be the policy our friends opposite adopt, I have no hesitation in saying that the people, who have judged them fairly well in the past, will judge them fairly well in the future, and that they will have no such policy as that imposed upon them. In 1879, at the instance of the Conservative party, Parliament adopted the policy of protection. It matters little to the people of this country how much we import or how much we export. I do not see that that enters into the question, as our friends opposite would mislead the people into believing. I think the question for us is to ascertain what duty we have to pay on goods exported from Canada into the United States and other countries. My hon. friend from Lambton stated to-night that the people who export products from Canada to the United States pay the American duty on them. If that is true, is it not equally true that the people of the United States who export their products into Canada must pay the Canadian duty? Our people are, therefore, unquestionably interested in the tariff which the United States have adopted. But it would be idle for any one to say that the people of the United States ever consult the interests of Canada or any other country in regulating their tariff. They simply adopt the tariff which, in their opinion, is in the best interests of the United States. But, while that is the case, we in Canada feel that the tariff which they impose upon the products of which we have a surplus and for which we must find a market is of very great interest to us. It is not only of great interest to us to have the tariff of the United States as low as possible, but it is also in our interest that the tariff of other countries to which we export our products should be low also. But we find that other countries pay but little attention to our interests; therefore, the wise policy for us would be to pursue the even tenor of our way and adopt a tariff which, in our opinion, would subserve our general interests best, without any regard to the policy adopted by other countries. The object of a tariff is to raise a sufficient revenue. We know that in Canada no less a revenue than $40,000,000 a year will be required to serve our interests as efficiently as they should be. It is idle nonsense to say that the interests of the Dominion today do not require more revenue than they did from 1874 to 1878. As the country develops, a greater amount of revenue will be necessary to construct public works throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, besides maintaining the public services of the country. Now, I hold that the people of the United States pay but little attention to the interests of the Dominion of Canada when they adopt a tariff policy; yet, as I have already said, it is to our interest to ascertain what their tariff is, because in that market, as in other markets of the world, we are bound to find a place for the surplus products of our country. We find that agricultural products are very heavily protected in the United States. We find that animals are protected 25 per cent. They tax the products of the soil, of the mines, of the forest and of the sea, to a much greater extent than we tax their products of those classes. The object of the National Policy was not so much a reciprocal free trade, as a reciprocity of trade. The object of the National Policy was more to have a reciprocal tariff than to have reciprocal free trade. It is idle now to say that if the people of the United States continue to impose a high tariff on the products of this Dominion, it would be a wise policy on our part to abolish the tariff on the products of that country which come into competition with those raised in our own. The National Policy tariff, we are told, does not protect the farmer, is of no benefit whatever to the farmer. Now, I think I can speak from my own practical experience when I say that there is no industry in the Dominion of Canada so highly protected as the farming industry; I say, besides, that there is no industry in the Dominion of Canada which deserves protection to such an extent as the farming industry. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to smile. The manufacturers are protected, each one in his own line, but the farming industry is protected in all the lines. Not only the products of the soil are protected, but the products of the perfecting of beef and pork, which are incidental to the farming industry, are also protected. Let me call the attention of my hon. friends opposite to the protection which is given to the farmers by the National Policy, and I would like to know a farmer on either side of the House who would dare to advocate here, or in the country, the abolition of protection thus given to the farmers of Canada. Let me read several articles:

- Animals, living, n.e.s., 20 per cent ad valorem.
- Live hogs, 1½ cents per pound.
- Meats, n.e.s., 2 cents per pound when in barrel, the barrel to be free.
- Meats, fresh, n.e.s., 3 cents per pound.
- Canned meats and canned poultry, and game, extracts of meat, and fluid beef, not medicated, and soups, 25 per cent ad valorem.
- Mutton and lamb, fresh, 35 per cent ad valorem.
- Poultry and game, n.o.p., 20 per cent ad valorem.
- Lard, lard compound and similar substances, cottolene and animal stearine of all kinds, n.e.s., 2 cents per pound.
- Beeswax, 10 per cent ad valorem.
- Candles, n.e.s., 25 per cent ad valorem.
- Soap, n.e.s., pearline and other soap powders, pumice, silver and mineral soap, sapollo and like articles, 35 per cent ad valorem.
- Soap, common or laundry, not perfumed, 1 cent per pound.
- Castile soap, mottled or white, 2 cents per pound.
- Glue and mucilage, 25 per cent ad valorem.
- Feathers, undressed, 20 per cent ad valorem.
- Feathers, n.e.s., 30 per cent ad valorem.
- Eggs, 5 cents per dozen.
- Butter, 4 cents per pound.
- Cheese, 3 cents per pound.
- Condensed milk, 2 cents per pound.
- Condensed coffee, 30 per cent ad valorem.

I might go through the whole category of articles produced on the farm, directly or indirectly, to show that they are more heavily protected than the products of any other industry in the Dominion. Let me read another list:

- Beans, 15 cents per bushel.
- Buckwheat, 10 cents per bushel.
- Peas, 10 cents per bushel.
- Potatoes, 15 cents per bushel.
- Rye flour, 50 cents per barrel.
- Hay, $2 per ton.
- Vegetables, when fresh, or dry salted, n.e.s., 25 per cent ad valorem.
- Barley, 30 per cent ad valorem.
- Indian corn, 7½ cents per bushel.
- Dutiable breadstuffs, grain, and flour and meal of all kinds, when damaged by water in transit, 20 per cent ad valorem upon the appraised value, such appraised value to be ascertained as provided by the Customs Act.
- Buckwheat meal or flour, one-fourth of one cent per pound.
- Cornmeal, 40 cents per barrel.
- Oats, 10 cents per bushel.
- Oatmeal, 20 per cent ad valorem.
- Rice, uncleaned, three-tenths of one cent per pound.
- Rice, cleaned, 1¼ cents per pound.
- Rice and sago flour, and sago, 25 per cent ad valorem.
- Rice, when imported by makers of rice starch, for use in their factories making starch, three-fourths of one cent per pound.
- Wheat, 15 cents per bushel.

Wheat flour, 75 cents per barrel.

Biscuits of all kinds, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Macaroni and vermicelli, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Starch, including farina, corn starch, or flour, and all preparations having the qualities of starch, 1½ cents per pound, the weight of the package to be in all cases included in weight for duty.

And a large number of other products. There is a large number of such products. In fact every product of the soil is protected, and every other product indirectly produced on account of the farming or agricultural industry, is protected as well. And yet we are told that the farmers of Canada are not protected. When the question was submitted to them in 1878, in 1882, in 1886, and in 1891, they decided that their products are more heavily protected than any other products in this Dominion, and in 1896, I believe, they will give a similar decision. I say that the farmers who toil and labour, and who are the backbone of our country, should be protected, as they have been under the National Policy. But this was not the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite pursued while they were in power. We are told by one speaker after another that it was not the intention of the Liberal party to have free trade, pure and simple, all at once, but it is the intention to get free trade as they have it in Great Britain, by degrees, so as not to disturb trade to an alarming extent. They say they will pursue the policy which they followed between 1874 and 1878. During that time, the farmers were not protected, and if the Liberal party obtained power, we will find that the same policy pursued between 1874 and 1878 will again be pursued by them. In fact it seems to me to be the settled policy of the Opposition to restore the tariff which existed in Canada during that time. In that case the farmers of Canada will not be protected to any extent whatever. The products of the United States will come in competition with Canadian products free, while the people of the United States will pursue the course hereafter that they pursued when they were in power between 1874 and 1878. Notwithstanding the fact that the Liberal party in 1874 abolished the duty on all products of the farm coming in from the United States, the people of the United States did not reduce the duty on the products of the farm of this country. In that way the people of Canada, particularly the farmers, were placed in a false position, and were compelled to compete very unfairly with the people of the United States along the line. It is not only the farmers who will be prejudicially affected by the abolition of the National Policy. During the period the Liberals were in power between 1874 and 1878 they imposed a duty upon many articles in which the fishermen of Canada are very much interested. They imposed a duty on ships' materials, binnacles, bunting, cables, hemp or like goods, compasses, cordage, dead lights, deck planks, pumps, sail cloths, and many other articles required by the fishermen of the maritime provinces particularly, and in fact by fishermen all over the Dominion. The duty was abolished on all those articles by the National Policy; and in the interest of the labouring classes as well, the duty was abolished on tea, coffee, sugar and molasses and many other articles which were heavily taxed during the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite. I should be sorry indeed to find the policy of this country changed in such a way as is proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite. There was a convention held in Ottawa in 1893, one of the grandest conventions ever held in Canada. At that convention a policy was formulated, and as was said by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson):

It is amusing to hear a gentleman of the intelligence of the hon. member for Pictou rising in this House and saying that he is not able to understand what that resolution means. Why, Sir, to make that declaration is to rank himself as having less comprehension than is bestowed upon the great majority of the people of Canada. There was no trouble about understanding it in that vast convention that adopted it, as was evidenced by the acclaim with which it was greeted. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite take out of this, that the policy of the Liberal party is to raise the revenue of the country by direct taxation and wipe out the Customs tariff altogether.

The platform of the Liberal party, as adopted by this convention in 1893, was read by hon. gentlemen opposite one after another, and notwithstanding the fact that this was done not one attempted to explain any feature of it. In fact the very reason why it has been so acceptable to the Opposition is simply that it reflects very clearly indeed the policy of deception, slander and scandals which have been adopted by the Opposition from 1878 up to the present time. Let us see the first paragraph of it:

That the Customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, on a protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service.

That is a proposition which may mean anything. It is a proposition which may be defined in Ontario as meaning protection to the manufacturers and to the farmers. It may be defined in the maritime provinces as meaning anything else, and in this way the stump orator may continue misleading the people to believe that under the Liberal policy they can buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest, and in this way make a fortune for themselves. But they seem to forget the fact that it is necessary to raise a revenue. They must not forget the fact that it makes no difference which party is in power in Canada, a revenue of not less than $40,000,000 annually must be raised. Unless it is raised by customs, excise and other taxation which exists at present, the balance must be made up by direct taxation. But the merit of the first paragraph in the policy of the Opposition is how it can be utilized, not only in each province of the Dominion, but in every constituency. When canvassing in Cape Breton they may mislead the people to believe that it is not their intention to abolish the duty on coal. In Ontario they may tell the farmers that they will not abolish the duty on wheat. The millers of Ontario will be told that they will not abolish the duty on flour because it was not their intention to abruptly destroy the principle of protection, and it must be done by degrees. In this way they can cajole all the industries in this country to believe that notwithstanding that all other industries would be deprived of its protection that particular industry in the locality in which the stump orator speaks would be safe in the hands of the Liberal party.

The next paragraph in the platform is this :

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations.

If any person cannot understand that he must be very dull of comprehension indeed. To my mind it is as clear as mud ; any person can see towards the centre of the earth just as clearly as he can see through this paragraph of the Liberal platform. But if it is analysed it will be found exactly to correspond with the policy of misrepresentation, the policy of slander, and the policy of scandals upon which the Liberal party obtained power in 1874, and on which they intend in the near future, unless they should be disappointed, as they have been in the past, to float into power again. I have a great deal of confidence in the intelligence of the farmers. I am unable to believe that they can be duped or fooled into believing that their interests are not protected. I know that in Quebec and Nova Scotia the farmers cannot be fooled into such a belief. There are some industries of manufacturers who fatten animals on the products of the farm, which are not protected as well as they desire. There are bloated monopolists amongst the farmers as well as among other manufacturers. There are those who perfect the products of cattle and hogs, and who are interested in having the raw material for their particular line of manufacture imported free. They therefore advocate strongly in this House and in the country, to have corn and oats from the other side of the line, admitted free, in competition with these products of our own country, while they know that the high tariff wall which exists between the United States and Canada, prevents any exportation from our country to that country in similar lines of products. There is no enemy in Canada so seriously alarming to the intelligent agriculturist, as he who fattens his cattle by the fifty pair, or his hogs by the hundred, or engages in other lines of perfecting products of that kind. Then the Liberal platform goes on to say :

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property.

The National Policy has, they say. Is there any hon. gentleman opposite who believes that the National Policy has decreased the value of wheat ?

Mr. FORBES. Yes.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). How ? I pause for an answer.

Mr. GRIEVE. Has it increased it ?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). If the price of wheat has not increased, was that owing to the National Policy ? Does it follow as a cause and effect ?

Mr. GRIEVE. It was going to in 1878.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Any person who said it was going to do it in 1878, did not calculate that demand and supply always regulated the price, and that, when the supply was largely increased, the price of a commodity fell. It would be idle to tell the people of this country that the National Policy, which prevents the importation of United States wheat, without paying 15 cents a bushel, will reduce the price of wheat in Canada. It would be idle to tell them that the duty imposed upon pork, will cause a reduction of the price of pork in Canada. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite do not believe that the farmers of this Dominion are so ignorant, as not to realize the fact that the National Policy which protects heavily all the lines on which they are engaged, is not the cause of the reduction in the price of these commodities. And it is asserted again by the great Liberal convention :

That it has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of the few.

That is a statement which not one in the convention believed himself. It is a statement in line with the policy pursued by the Liberal party in the past. The next statement in the Liberal platform is :

It has checked immigration.

Any person who will examine the tidal wave of immigration from Canada will realize at a glance that this statement is sheer sophistry. If it has checked the tide of immigration, it must have turned it in the direction of some free trade country. But the fact is, that the emigration from Canada has been mostly to the United States, which is a more highly protected country than Canada itself. How, therefore, could the protective tariff check emigration into Canada ? If there is any sound deduction from that statement, it is this : That the only way to restore immigration into Canada from the United States is to increase the tariff, and in this way the tide of immigration might flow backwards into this country. If there is any value in the reasoning of the Liberals, that would be the inevitable result. Here comes another statement:

It has caused great loss of population.

I suppose this assertion is dependent upon the preceding one. The National Policy may have caused a large increase in the potato bug, and in small-pox and other influences which cause great loss of population, but there is otherwise no relevancy whatever in this assertion in connection with the National Policy. Again, they say :

It has impeded commerce.

Well, Mr. Speaker, our Trade and Navigation Returns prove that this is not a fact, and that the contrary is true.

It has discriminated against Great Britain.

This assertion has often been made in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite, and it has been as often disproved. They say :

In this and in many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

Well, Sir, I can well understand that those who are engaged in fattening hogs and cattle can realize that it has caused "in many other ways," great private injury. I can well imagine that those who are interested in the importation of coal oil, free of duty, also suppose they are injured by the National Policy. In fact, all importers, and all manufacturers who desire to have the products of the United States, which they use as a raw material, imported free, fancy that it is a great loss to themselves that these products are not admitted free of duty. But the poor agriculturist of Canada will realize that it is not in his interest that those who require his products should have the products of the United States, free of duty. Another assertion made by the great Liberal party in convention in Ottawa was :

That the highest interests of Canada demand the removal of this obstacle to our country's progress by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people.

This is a grand idea. It is in line with the idea that the people ought to be allowed to buy in the cheapest markets and sell in the dearest, in view of the fact that there is no civilized country on the face of the globe that ever adopted that policy, that ever intended to adopt that policy, or that ever will adopt that policy, while a revenue is required to maintain the various industries of the country and to maintain its government.

There is another assertion made :

That to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government.

This may imply anything. It may imply that it will be necessary to raise a revenue of $100,000,000, or a revenue of $23,000,000. It depends altogether upon what the needs of honest, economical and efficient government may be. In the history of the past the great advocates of economy, when they obtained power, were the most extravagant ever known up to their period. This has been the history of Ontario ; it has been the history of Quebec ; it has been the history of New Brunswick, and of Nova Scotia, and of Prince Edward Island, and of Manitoba as well. The Liberal party who obtained power in the several provinces of the Dominion, obtained power by professions of economy. They deluded the people to believe that when they obtained power, they would be economical ; but as soon as they obtained power, they were more lavish in their expenditures than their predecessors ; and if we can judge the future by the past, the Liberal party of Canada, when they obtain power, will follow the example of the Liberal party in the several provinces of the Dominion.

Another assertion that is made is :

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

Now, there is a grand idea underlying this declaration, and they can utilize it in very much the same way as they have been utilizing their policy in the late election contests throughout Canada. The necessities of life are now free to the people of this country. Every article that is useful or necessary for the existence or comfort of the labouring classes of this Dominion is free.

Mr. GRIEVE. Is sugar free ?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Sugar is free.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It is practically free, and so is flour, because Canada produces a very much greater quantity of that article than is necessary for the consumption of the people of Canada ; and, as long as demand and supply regulates the price, it will be free to the consumers of this country. In no other country on the face of the globe can the poorer classes live as cheaply as they can in Canada ; and they can live that cheaply simply because the National Policy has stimulated the manufacturing industries of this Dominion to such an extent that it has created competition among them, so that not only all the articles which are useful or necessary for the poorer classes of this country are free, but all other lines which might be classed as luxuries can be purchased by them cheaper than they can in any other part of the world. But is it not idle to tell the people that they can be rid of taxation altogether—that is, rid of customs or excise duties under a fiscal policy that can be adopted in this or any other country? It is simple delusion to mislead them to believe anything of that kind; but their intelligence is such that they cannot be deluded by such deception as the history of the past has conclusively proven.

There are a few other assertions made in that inexplicable fiscal policy that was adopted by the Liberal party in convention at Ottawa, the object of which is to deceive the people in the future as they were unfortunately deceived on one occasion in the past. It is based to a large extent on the idea that the people can be fooled to believe that they can buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest, that this country is ruled by a corrupt Government, that we are afloat in scandals, and that they themselves will be the paragons of perfection that they profess to be when they obtain power. But this is not the history of the past, as I think I can show from the utterances of one whose word will not be disputed by hon. gentlemen opposite. While the Liberal party was in power between 1874 and 1878 there were many scandals of the same class at that time as have been magnified by hon. gentlemen opposite during the past few years into political scandals.

Mr. GRIEVE. Name them.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). But the Opposition party of that day did not attempt to ride into power on such scandals. Their policy was well defined. They did not slander their opponents. The leader of the Opposition of that period defined his policy without maligning the character of his opponents. It was clear and thoroughly understood by the people of this country then, and it is clear and will be thoroughly understood by the people of the country hereafter. This is what the policy of the Opposition of that day declared in 1888:

That the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade.

That was a manly, straightforward policy. It did not malign the Government of the day. But we might refer to the scandals which existed previous to that time, under that regime, but I am not going to follow up the example set by hon. gentlemen opposite. I will simply quote an authority which no doubt they will approve of as one that cannot be disputed. It shows clearly whether scandals did exist during that period. It was written by the Premier of that day, and reads as follows:

Ottawa, 27th April, 1875.

My dear H—,—I have your note regarding C. I will endeavour to employ him within a few days at Thunder Bay on the commissariat staff, though I fear he is rather old, especially as his chief, B.'s father, is older.

I would like much to be relieved of the Public Works Department, but I cannot see my way to that at present. It is the great spending department, the possible great jobbing department, the department that can make or ruin a government at such a time as this, when $25,000,000 are in the power of its head to spend on public works. Friends (?) expect to be benefited by offices they are unfit for, by contracts they are not entitled to, by advances not earned. Enemies ally themselves with friends, and push the friends to the front. Some attempt to storm the office. Some dig trenches at a distance and approach in regular siege form. I feel like the besieged lying on my arms night and day. I have offended at least twenty parliamentary friends by my defence of the citadel. A weak Minister here would ruin the party in a month, and the country very soon. So I must drudge on as best I may, and carry out the experiment of doing right whatever happens, and trusting to have a majority in the House to sustain me, and when that falls, I will go out cheerfully, if not joyfully.

I am, yours faithfully,

A. MACKENZIE.

It appears that he failed and retired from the position of Premier of the Dominion. It ill-becomes those of whom their leader thus wrote to continuously claim that they are the party of purity, and in this way hope to mislead the people into imagining that their only safety is to depose the Government and place these gentlemen in power.

Mr. GRIEVE. Is that the statute you are referring to?

Mr. CAMERON. Well, it appears he felt there were very grave scandals in the Dominion. These scandals preyed upon his mind, and my poor old venerable friend, under the high pressure that was imposed upon him, pined away and died.

The National Policy is fulfilling its mission. It has protected the agriculturists of this Dominion by giving them the markets of Canada to as great extent as possible. It has in this way kept a very large capital in circulation in Canada, which would otherwise have found its way across the line. It has protected the manufacturing industries of this Dominion, and in doing so it has given an increased market to the agriculturist. It has fostered the fishing industries of this Dominion. It has given the fishermen the articles required by them for the prosecution of their arduous toil free. It has given the fishermen their bread free, their tea free, their molasses free practically, their sugar free, their coffee free. Everything that they require for the maintenance of life and for the prosecution of their industry is practically free, but during the regime of the Opposition many of those articles were taxed heavily, and a very large proportion of them 5 per cent. Besides this protection given to the fishermen, the sea coast and inland fisheries have been protected at a very heavy expense. Besides this, a bounty has been given to the fishermen of the maritime provinces, which is also a great protection to that industry. If the Liberal party should come in power, no one can doubt that they will restore the policy which existed from 1874 to 1878, with very slight modifications, which will be very seriously injurious to the agricultural industry and the fishing industry as well. The same may be said of the mining industry. The mining industry is protected by the National Policy, and if the Liberal party should obtain power, no doubt they will pursue the same policy with regard to that industry as they did during their term of office from 1874 to 1878. The poorer classes during that time were out of work, soup kitchens were the order of the day, and if they restore the policy of a revenue tariff which existed from 1874 to 1878, the fishermen will suffer, the farmers will suffer, the miners will suffer, the manufacturers will suffer—and while all those industries suffer, will any one deny that the labourers and artisans will proportionately suffer as well? In view of all these circumstances, I have no fear with regard to the result of the contest which is pending in the near future. Those who advocate free trade as they have it in Great Britain, or commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity, or a revenue tariff, will be weighed in the balance, as they have been during previous elections, and I have no doubt they will be found wanting. The people of this Dominion are too intelligent to be misled by empty speeches in this House. They are too intelligent to be misled by resolutions passed at a convention at Ottawa, which, from beginning to end, is misleading and inexplicable, except in so far as it enables a public speaker to deceive each section in this Dominion to which he addresses himself. The people, therefore, as a whole, are contented and happy in this Dominion. I have no hesitation in saying that in no country on the face of the earth are the labouring classes so well fed, so well clothed, and so contented as in this Dominion. That may or may not be the result of the National Policy. I believe it has been the result of the wise and judicious readjustment of the tariff which gave employment to our people and which has created as great a degree of prosperity as is practicable within reason. I feel that the people as a whole will be very loath indeed to go back to the revenue tariff policy which existed between 1874 and 1878. The result of the election lately in various constituencies is not a criterion by which to forecast the result of a general election. Verchères was carried, as I believe, under false pretenses. So was Antigonish, and Montreal Centre may be placed in the same category.

Mr. McISAAC. What were the false pretenses?

Mr. CAMERON. With regard to the School Bill. Of all the great questions that agitate the public mind to-day, the foremost is the School Bill. That was the first plank in the platform in Antigonish.

Mr. McISAAC. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the Bill introduced is the one promised to the electors of Antigonish by the Minister of Justice?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Practically the same Bill, and a very satisfactory Bill. My hon. friend from Antigonish (Mr. McISAAC) assured the people there that remedial legislation would be as safe in his hands and in the hands of Laurier, the leader of the Opposition and a Roman Catholic, as it could possibly be in the hands of Mr. Chisholm and Premier Bowell, who was an Orangeman. I have no hesitation in saying that such utterances had the desired effect with a few of the electors of Antigonish. I would ask my hon. friend if he is now disposed to oppose remedial legislation to which he was pledged during that contest?

Mr. McISAAC. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him? The Bill introduced is not the Bill promised by the hon. gentleman's friends in Antigonish. It is no approach to the Bill promised by the Conservatives in that county. There is where the false pretenses come in.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). So you are prepared to vote against it. We shall see. The same argument was used in Verchères, and in other places. It was unreasonable for a Catholic constituency to believe that remedial legislation would not be as safe in the hands of the hon. gentleman who now represents Antigonish and the leader of the Opposition as it could possibly be in the hands of the present Government, led by an Orangeman. But, if the people were deceived and misled, transpiring events will convince them of that fact, and we shall expect a different decision from the people of Antigonish, Verchères, Montreal Centre and other constituencies to which an appeal has lately been made. It is, therefore, unfair to judge popular feeling in the country by elections that have lately taken place, particularly in Catholic constituencies. But the Remedial Bill is now before the House and judgment must be passed upon it. Each member will be placed upon record; no one can remain any longer within the line of Torres Vedras. The record will show to the people the convictions of every man on that question and every one will be responsible for his decision. In view of all these facts I have come to the conclusion, and I have no doubt that a large majority of the people of this Dominion have come to the conclusion, that it would be unwise to depose the present Government, notwithstanding the many difficulties with which they have had to contend with of late, and replace them with men who proved incompetent to manage the affairs of the Dominion when they were in power. The leaders who then directed the fiscal policy of the Dominion are the very men upon whom their party depend to mould the fiscal policy in the future. It is, therefore, clear to an intelligent public that they would be making a great mistake by such a change. The School Bill having been decided upon, that obstacle removed, it would be a grave mistake to abandon the National Policy and the party that has carried it out so successfully for the last seventeen years. And I have no hesitation in saying, what has often been said in this House in the past, that hon. gentlemen opposite will never obtain power in this Dominion until they adopt the National Policy. They cannot again float into power on a sea of scandals. That happened once in this Dominion. But the sore experience which the people had of the unfortunate effect of that snap victory is fresh in the public mind, and it will not be repeated. Therefore, let hon. gentlemen opposite console themselves with the knowledge that the Liberal-Conservative party will continue its fiscal policy, the National Policy, and that they will rule Canada many years yet.

Mr. LARIVIERE moved :

That the second report of the special committee appointed to supervise the official reports of the debates of this House be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

LINDSAY, BOBCAYGEON AND PONTYPOOL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 27) respecting the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Company.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The practice has crept in of scarcely ever explaining any private Bills in the House when read. They are referred to a committee and discussed in a committee, and no doubt are all perfectly regular, but I think the practice is rather a mischievous one, and that we ought to have a fair explanation given of each of these Bills, at some reading or other, before they pass the House.

Mr. HUGHES. The Bill is not in my name but I know all the circumstances in connection with it. The reason for asking this extension is that the president of the road, who had it in charge, has been ill and obliged to go to England. The whole matter has had to be handed over to a new organization owing to the ill-health of Mr. Boyd, and for that reason the extension is asked.

Mr. MULOCK. Why did you not do any work ?

Mr. HUGHES. Owing to Mr. Boyd's ill-health.

Bill considered in committee, reported, and read the third time, and passed.

Bill (No. 39) respecting the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF FORESTERS.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 29) to amend the Act incorporating the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not know whether this Bill has been reprinted as amended in committee. The amendments there were very considerable, and really at this early stage of the session, I should think it would not delay the Bill at all dangerously to wait till the amendments are reprinted.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it would be more convenient for the House to proceed with the Bill reprinted. I think my hon. friend will not object to its going over for a day or two in order to get it reprinted.

Mr. EDGAR. That is all I wish.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 59) respecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company.—(Mr. Powell.)

NUMBER OF FARMERS IN CANADA.

Mr. GRIEVE (for Mr. Dawson) asked :

1. Number of farmers in Canada according to the census of 1891 ?
2. Number of agricultural labourers or farm hands employed ?
3. Value of land owned by farmers ?
4. Value of buildings ?
5. Value of farm implements and machinery ?
6. Value of live stock ?

Mr. FOSTER. The number of farmers in Canada, according to the census of 1891, was 408,738, and of farmers' sons, 240,768. The other questions cannot be answered from the census, as no questions were asked about values.

SUPERANNUATIONS IN DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. CARROLL (for Mr. Bruneau) asked :

Have certain employees of the Department of Agriculture been superannuated recently, or notified that they were soon to be superannuated ? If so, what are their names ; what are the grounds for superannuation ; how many years have they been in the Civil Service, and what is the age in each case ?

Mr. FOSTER. Certain employees of the Department of Agriculture have been superannuated, or notified of superannuation. Mr. H. B. Small, chief clerk and secretary, has been superannuated on account of age, and to promote efficiency and economy in the service. He has been twenty-eight years in the service and his age is 65. Three clerks, Louis D'Auray, Joseph Ferreol Dionne and Auguste Levêque, are under consideration for superannuation. The times which they have served, respectively, are, 24, 28, and 22 years. Their ages are 47, 61, and 46.

CAPE BRETON RAILWAY.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness) asked :

What quantity (1) of solid rock ; (2) of gypsum rock ; (3) of loose rock ; (4) of borrow pit ; (5) of earth ; and (6) of "hard-pan"—so-called—respectively, was excavated on section from station 210 to 250 whilst Messrs. Sims and Slater and their sureties conducted the work on the Cape Breton Railway, east of the Grand Narrows, in 1887 ?

Mr. HAGGART. There was excavated on the section of the Cape Breton Railway under contract with Messrs. Sims & Slater, between stations numbers 210 and 250, during the time they and their sureties conducted the work :—Solid rock, nil ; gypsum rock, nil ; loose rock, nil ; borrow pit, 581 cubic yards ; earth, 1,240 cubic yards ; hard-pan, 3,821 cubic yards.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness) asked :

What quantity (1) of solid rock ; (2) of gypsum rock ; (3) of loose rock ; (4) of borrow pit ; (5) of earth ; and (6) of hard-pan—so-called—respectively, was excavated on section from station 328.60 to station 592.80, being from 18th to 22nd mile, inclusive, east side Grand Narrows, whilst Sims and Slater conducted the works on the Cape Breton Railway, east of the Grand Narrows, between 5th May and 17th August, 1887 ?

Mr. HAGGART. There was excavated on the section of the Cape Breton Railway under contract with Messrs. Sims & Slater, between stations numbers 328.60 and 592.80, whilst they and their sureties conducted the work :—Solid rock, nil ; gypsum rock, nil ; loose rock, 2 cubic yards ; borrow pit, 10,269 cubic yards ; earth, 36,721 cubic yards ; hard-pan, 7,055 cubic yards.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness) asked :

What quantity (1) of solid rock ; (2) of gypsum rock ; (3) of loose rock ; (4) of borrow pit ; (5) of earth ; and (6) of hard-pan—so-called—respectively, was excavated on section from station 2.98 to station 108.58, being from 24th to 25th mile, inclusive, whilst Sims and Slater and their sureties conducted the work on the Cape Breton Railway, east of the Grand Narrows, in 1887 ?

Mr. HAGGART. There was excavated on the section of the Cape Breton Railway under contract with Messrs. Sims & Slater, between stations numbers 2.98 and 108.58, during the time they and their sureties conducted the work:—Solid rock, 52 cubic yards; gypsum rock, nil; loose rock, 189 cubic yards; borrow pit, 1,270 cubic yards; earth, 27,675 cubic yards; hard-pan, 2,098 cubic yards.

GRAIN STANDARDS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the hon. the Controller of Inland Revenue has received a petition from one or more of the Farmers' Institutes of Manitoba, containing the resolutions set out below and passed at a regular meeting of the Souris E. D. Farmers' Institute held in Melita, 22nd November, 1895:—

That whereas by a "Dominion Act" certain regulations are set forth whereby the grain standards of Manitoba and the North-west Territories are adjusted by a grain standard board each successive season, the conditions being such that a great injustice may be done to farmers of this province and territories. Said Act provides that No. 1 hard wheat shall be sound and well cleaned, weighing not less than 60 pounds to the bushel, and shall be composed of not less than two-thirds hard red Fyfe wheat.

And whereas the standard board so long as they do not conflict with the above conditions of the Act may make and frequently do make the grade of No. 1 hard wheat to weigh much over 60 pounds to the bushel, and to contain much more than two-thirds bushel red Fyfe wheat.

And whereas we are told that said standards are based upon collection of samples made each year from various parts of Manitoba and the Territories, we hereby suggest and do believe that the collection of such samples, being largely in the hands of the dealers and purchasers of said wheat, may be, and we believe frequently are superior to the average and beyond, this season for example, the general conditions.

Such variation of standards and uncertainty resulting from such conditions year after year is to the farmer a source of very great dissatisfaction and suspicion and must also cause confusion in the English or other outside markets as to what our standards really are.

And inasmuch as the Duluth wheat standards which regulate the grades of wheat grown in Dakota and Minnesota, where No. 1 Duluth weighs only 58 pounds per measured bushel and mostly hard red Fyfe wheat, where the average conditions are similar to our own, are of a more permanent character and remain practically the same every year, being regulated by an Act of the state of Minnesota, and give general satisfaction to both producers and handlers.

Therefore, be it resolved, that owing to conditions herein set forth, we the members of the Souris E. D. Farmers' Institute desire to express in the strongest terms possible our condemnation which makes it possible for such a manipulation of the grain standards as will not give us even-handed justice.

And be it further resolved, we are strongly of the opinion that the grain standard boards should be abolished and that all grading should be done under the Act, and that one hard wheat should be the same every year as now specified, 60 pounds to the bushel and two-thirds hard red Fyfe wheat, and that all other grades should be such as would meet the average crop conditions. We are also of the opinion that the lower grades, including rejected, should be capable of absorbing all frosted grain, instead of making frosted standards as now, and that all such grades should be made as permanent as possible.

Whether the Government has decided to have a standard not varying, but the same from year to year as suggested?

Mr. PRIOR. There is no record in the department of any petition from the Souris E. D. Farmers' Institute respecting the mode of erecting grain standards for Manitoba. I may say, however, that the department is now considering the whole matter, and is inclined to view the methods dictated by the Inspection Act, as quite open to improvement, especially those bearing upon the annual establishment of grain standards.

IMPORTATION OF TEA, COFFEE AND SUGAR.

Mr. GIROUARD asked :

1. How many pounds of tea, coffee and sugar were imported into Canada in 1878?

2. What were the duties levied on those several articles?

3. What was the quantity of tea, coffee and sugar imported into Canada during the year 1895? And what were the duties levied thereon?

4. What would have been the duties levied on the said articles, had they been subjected to the rates of duty that existed in 1878?

Mr. WOOD. 1. The following is a statement of the number of pounds of tea, coffee and sugar imported into Canada during the fiscal year 1878:—

	Pounds.
Tea	11,019,231
Coffee	1,831,800
Sugar	105,223,279

2. The duties levied on the several articles respectively, amounted to the following sums:—

On tea	$ 611,313.65
“ coffee	37,273.75
“ sugar	2,515,655.84

3. The quantity of tea, coffee and sugar imported into Canada during the fiscal year 1895 is:

	Pounds.	Duty.
Tea	20,610,733	$ 6,132.70
Coffee	3,433,470	7,464.83
Sugar	354,707,312	244,544.20

4. The duty that would have been levied on said articles, had they been subject to the rates of duty that existed in 1878, would have amounted to the following sums, respectively:—

On tea	$1,133,420.42
“ coffee	100,526.87
“ sugar	5,457,338.62

TIGNISH POST OFFICE.

Mr. PERRY asked :

What is the amount of revenue derived from the post office at Tignish, Prince Edward Island, for the six months ending 31st December, 1895?

What salary was paid the postmaster at Tignish for the six months ending 31st December, 1895 ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The revenue derived from the post office at Tignish, P.E.I., for the six months ending 31st December, 1895, was $411.42. The salary paid the postmaster during the same period was $170.

DUTY ON COAL OIL.

Mr. RIDER asked :

1. When was an import duty first put on kerosene and refined coal oil ?
2. Was it specific or ad valorem, and how much per gallon calculated on the basis of the imperial measure now in force ?
3. Was there an excise duty when imposed, and how much per gallon imperial measure ?
4. When did a reduction in the import and excise duty first take place, and to what rate was it reduced ?
5. What would have been the equivalent rate of duty ad valorem, if the import duty had been collected in this way according to the import of kerosene in the year 1878 ?

Mr. WOOD. At the date of confederation there was a specific duty on coal oil of 10 cents per wine gallon, which would be equivalent to 12 cents per imperial gallon. An excise duty was first imposed on 29th April, 1868, at the rate of 5 cents per wine gallon. In July, 1876, this was changed to 6 cents per imperial gallon. On 20th February, 1877, the customs duty was made 7 1-5th cents per imperial gallon, and on 21st February, 1877, the excise duty was repealed. The equivalent rate of ad valorem duty, based on the total value of imports and total collections, in 1878, would have been 32.7 per cent, and in 1895, 93.4 per cent, which is accounted for through the average price in 1878 being 20 cents per wine gallon, or 25 cents per imperial gallon, while the average value of coal oil in 1895 was 6 3/4 cents per imperial gallon.

THE TAY CANAL.

Mr. PERRY asked :

What was the cost of maintaining the Tay Canal during last season, including pay for keeper ?

What amount of revenue was derived for toll, &c., last season ?

What is the total cost of the work up to date ?

Mr. HAGGART. The cost of maintaining the Tay Canal during last season, including pay for keeper, was $3,188.60. The amount of revenue derived for toll, &c., last season, was $119.94. The total cost of the work up to date is $476,877.38.

MAILS TO MAGDALEN ISLANDS.

Mr. LANGEЛИER asked :

Has the Government, or any member thereof, received any petition or letter praying that the steamship "Stanley" be ordered to take the mails to the Magdalen Islands during the winter months as often as the weather and ice would permit it ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. On 21st June, 1895, Mr. T. E. Kenny, M.P., inclosed to this Department a letter from Messrs. Wm. Leslie & Co., of Grindstone Island, in which they ask that a trip be made to the Magdalen Islands during the coming January. As the proposal mentioned the steamer "Stanley" as suitable for such a service, the question was referred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, which controls this steamer ; and a reply was received, to the effect, that the steamer might be sent as far as Magdalen Island post office, but, owing to its drawing so much water, the steamer could not go to the Grindstone Island. This reply was communicated to Mr. Kenny, M.P., with a request that he would say whether this would be satisfactory ; but no answer was received from him, and the matter dropped.

Mr. LANGEЛИER asked :

Is it true that the instructions given to the captain of the steamship "Stanley" to carry the mails to the Magdalen Islands were countermanded ? If so, at whose request and why ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No instructions were given to the captain of the steamer "Stanley" to carry the mails to Magdalen Islands.

MAILS BETWEEN PICTOU, N.S., AND MAGDALEN ISLANDS.

Mr. LANGEЛИER asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to grant a bi-weekly mail service between Pictou, Nova Scotia, and the Magdalen Islands during the season of navigation ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This subject is now engaging the attention of the department.

GRAIN DUTIES.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked :

1. Did the firm of James Richardson & Sons, of Kingston, Ont., import from Buffalo, N.Y., during the year 1895, a quantity of about 50,000 bushels of Manitoba wheat for consumption in Canada ?

2. How much duty did they pay upon the said wheat ?

3. Have the Government refunded any portion of the duty, and if so, how much was refunded ?

4. What were the reasons which induced the Government to refund the said duties ?

Mr. WOOD. Messrs. James Richardson & Sons, of Kingston, Ont., imported 49,253 bushels of Manitoba wheat during the year 1895, by way of Duluth and Buffalo, N.Y. Duty was exacted to the amount of $7,387.95. The amount of duty so paid has been refunded. Remission of duty was made upon the Canadian identity of the wheat being fully established.

IMPORTS OF ALCOHOL.

Mr. RIDER asked :

Has there been any alcohol imported into Canada during the year 1895 on which a rebate of duty has been allowed? If so, how much and by whom has it been imported? From whence, through what port or ports, and how much through each port, and what portion of the duty has been rebated?

Mr. WOOD. There has been no rebate of customs duty allowed on alcohol imported into Canada during the year 1895.

THE TAY CANAL.

Mr. MULOCK asked :

What amount of revenue was derived from the Tay Canal during the season of navigation in the year 1895?

What amount of money was expended during the year 1895 for maintenance and management of the Tay Canal?

What is the total amount expended on the Tay Canal for construction, expropriation of land, damages, maintenance, repairs and all other accounts, and what has been the total revenue from the canal?

Mr. HAGGART. I have answered that question.

Mr. MULOCK. Only the first two questions.

Mr. HAGGART. No.

Mr. MULOCK. Excuse me. The third question asks :

What is the total amount expended on the Tay Canal for construction, expropriation of land, damages, maintenance, repairs and all other accounts, and what has been the total revenue from the canal?

The hon. gentleman did not answer that—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, the hon. gentleman asked me what the question is.

Mr. HAGGART. I gave the total amount expended on the Tay Canal construction, expropriation, land damages, maintenance, repairs, and all other accounts.

Mr. MULOCK. You only gave the revenue for one year.

Mr. HAGGART. The only answer I got was the one which I gave to the question.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, it had better stand over.

Mr. HAGGART. I have got the answer here to another question. The total revenue from the canal is $884.34.

Mr. MULOCK. The question is not all answered. The hon. gentleman has not given the total expenditure of all kinds.

Mr. HAGGART. The total expenditure on the Tay Canal amounts to $488,470.98.

Mr. WOOD.

ST. LAURENT WHARF—PHILIAS FILLION.

Mr. LANGEЛИER asked :

1. Is the Government aware that in 1891 a bale of oakum, furnished by it for repairs to the pontoon of St. Laurent wharf, on the Island of Orleans, was taken and kept by Philias Fillion, of the said parish, and sold by him to the boat-builders?

2. Is the Government aware that in the same year 1891, a piece of timber fifteen feet long and twelve inches square, and a chain furnished by the Government for the gangway of the St. Laurent wharf, were appropriated to his own use by the said Philias Fillion?

3. Had the said Philias Fillion purchased these articles, at what price, and has he paid for them?

Mr. OUIMET. Fifty pounds of oakum, at a total cost of $3.75, was supplied to Mr. Philias Fillion, and used by him to caulk the pontoon of the slip of the St. Laurent wharf during the summer of 1891. Mr. Fillion has always enjoyed the reputation of being an honest, respectable and faithful employee. If the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) will supply the department with the information upon which he has thought proper to make such a serious imputation as the one contained in his question, I shall at once order an investigation into the matter. The answer to the second question is, "No."

Mr. LANGEЛИER asked :

1. Is the Government aware that in 1891, a person named Philias Fillion, of St. Laurent, Island of Orleans, caused to be sawed and kept for his own use a portion of the timber furnished by the Government to make fenders for the wharf of the said parish?

2. Was the said timber sold to the said Philias Fillion by the Government? If so, for how much, and has the price therefor been paid?

Mr. OUIMET. The answer to both questions is, "No," but if the information is given, and the name of the informer, I will have an investigation made.

Mr. LANGEЛИER asked :

1. Were repairs made to the St. Laurent wharf, on the Island of Orleans, in 1888?

2. If made, were they made by contract or by day's work?

3. If by contract, who was the contractor, and how did he obtain the contract; by private contract or under award as the lowest tenderer?

4. If by day's work, who superintended the works, and what were his wages, and what is the total amount paid him?

5. How much timber was purchased by the Government for these works; was any left, and what has been done with it?

Mr. OUIMET. 1. Repairs were made to the St. Laurent wharf, on the Island of Orleans, in 1888. 2 and 3. These repairs were made by day's work. 4. The work was done by day's work; the superintendent of the work being Mr. Philias Fillion; his wages being $2.50 per day; and the total amount paid him was $50. 5. Five hundred and seventeen pieces of timber were purchased by the department for these repairs, at a cost of $98. The whole of it was employed in the work.

Mr. LANGELIER asked :

1. How much did the shed built on the St. Laurent wharf, on the Island of Orleans, cost ?

2. Were the works done by contract or by day's labour ?

3. If the works were done by contract, who was the contractor ; and did he obtain it by private contract or under award as the lowest tenderer ?

4. If done by day's work, who was the overseer of the works, and what were his wages ?

5. Was there any timber or other material belonging to the Government left, after the full completion of the works, and what has been done with it ?

6. What was the cost of the sheet-iron roof on the said shed ?

Mr. OUMET. 1. The shed on the St. Laurent wharf cost $450. 2. Work was done by day's labour. 4. The overseer of the work was Philius Fillion ; his wages were $2.50 per day. 5. No material was left after the full completion of the work. 6. The iron roof cost $77.

BONDED WAREHOUSE BETWEEN NEW BRUNSWICK AND MAINE.

Mr. COLTER asked :

Have the Government bonded warehouses, on the international boundary between New Brunswick and the state of Maine, been abolished ? If so, when ? If not, is it the intention of the Government to abolish them, and if so, when ?

Mr. WOOD. The answer is, "Yes." The collector at Woodstock, N.B., was instructed to close these warehouses by the 1st November, 1895.

PUBLIC MONEY INVESTED IN CERTAIN SECURITIES.

Mr. MULOCK asked :

1. What amount of public money of Canada is invested in securities of, or loaned to the Albert Railway Company, the Fredericton and St. Mary's Railway Bridge Company, the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, and the Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners, respectively ?

2. Has default been made in payment of interest on all or any of such investments ? If so, in which, and how long has such default existed, and what are the respective amounts of such arrears of interest ?

3. What security does the Government hold in respect of such investments ?

4. At what amounts are such investments valued in the official statement as to the net debt of Canada, as appears on page xxx of the Public Accounts for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1895 ?

5. Has default been made in payment of interest on any other assets which according to said statements are deducted from the gross public debt ? If so, what are the particulars of such default ?

Mr. FOSTER. The answer to the first question is : Albert Railway Company, $14,725.56 ; Fredericton and St. Mary's Railway Bridge Company, $300,000 ; Quebec Harbour Commissioners, $3,748,519.62 ; Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners, $81,760.97. The answer to the second question is : Default has been made in all. Albert Railway Company—No interest collected since 31st December, 1887 ; arrears of interest to 30th June, 1895, $6,613.71. Fredericton and St. Mary's Bridge Company—No interest collected since June, 1889 ; arrears to 31st December, 1895, $78,000. Quebec Harbour Commissioners—Very little interest paid ; arrears to 31st December, 1895, $930,463.06. Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners—They paid $15,000 under Act of last session, and after deducting this amount, the arrears of interest and sinking fund to 31st December, 1895, amounts to $26,924.90. The answer to the third question is : Mortgages in the case of the Railway Company and the Bridge Company, and debentures in the other cases. The answer to the fourth question is : To the extent of the principal in each case, as given in answer to question. The answer to the fifth question is : Nothing has been paid for some years on account of Grand Trunk Fourth Preference Stock, $121,739.65 ; and nothing at all on the Quebec Turnpike Trust Board, $20,000 ; Upper Canada Bank Stock, $750 ; and Earl of Selkirk, mortgage, $13,900.

ST. PETER'S CANAL, CAPE BRETON.

Mr. FRASER asked :

What amount was spent on the St. Peter's Canal, Cape Breton, during 1895 ? How long was the canal closed to navigation during the same time ? Is the work on the said canal finished ? If not, when will it be ? What amount does the Government expect to get from the contractor or contractors for failure to finish the work ?

Mr. HAGGART. The amount spent on the St. Peter's Canal, Cape Breton, in the year 1895, was $43,389.95. The canal was closed to navigation from the 16th December, 1894, to the 8th November, 1895, about eleven months. There is the work of rebuilding the east retaining wall required to be done to maintain the canal. No appropriation has yet been made for renewing that retaining wall. The Government have the matter under consideration as regards the contractors' failure to finish the work.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

On the Order,

That, in the opinion of this House, the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal, sacramental and mechanical purposes, should be prohibited by law.

Mr. FOSTER. It was understood that Mr. Flint's motion should stand over until the next private day. Mr. Craig, who was to have seconded it, is absent. Mr. Flint has a sore throat.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He will have to take something for his throat.

Motion allowed to stand.

THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, the motion which I have on the paper is one that I hope the House will regard at this time as specially appropriate :

That it is necessary to (1) the prosperity and progress of the North-west Territories, important to the stability and progress of the Dominion, and of great moment to the Empire that the North-west Territories shall be treated on a different footing from that heretofore ; (2) That the self-respect of the people of the North-west, not less than the material interests of those vast territories demands that the Territories shall not be treated on a plane of inferiority ; (3) That the climate, soil and conditions generally of the North-west are different from those of other parts of Canada, and a policy specially adapted to its needs and resources is called for in order that the settlers shall be rendered prosperous and immigration policies be made effective.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is a vote of want of confidence in the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly).

Mr. DAVIN. My friend the member for Bothwell says this is a vote of want of confidence in the Minister of the Interior. I beg to say that it is nothing of the kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The vote has not come yet.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, in the earlier clauses of this motion I refer to our treatment of the North-west Territories ever since we had anything to do with them. I consider that we shall have to take the North-west Territories more seriously than we have done. We have seen in the papers—and it has even been brought before the attention of the Empire—evidence of the readiness of the authorities at Washington, on occasion, to put on, or pretend to put on, their war paint. A short time ago we had a reference made to the attitude of the people of the United States and to the position of England, and that reference has attracted widespread attention. When the people of the United States talk about difficulties with England, they are not thinking of petty disputes connected with bickering republics in South America. They are thinking of Canada, and when they think of Canada, they are thinking of the North-west Territories and of Manitoba. We have had, as I have stated in this House before, visits to the North-west from prominent American statesmen ; and the impression these vast territories, with millions of arable acres, has made upon them, has been such as to wake them from the indifference with which they have regarded Canada generally, especially the North-west. A Mr. Thompson has published an essay in one of the American magazines in which he gives an account of a visit he made to the Territories in 1895. He stopped at Regina, stopped at Calgary, went up to Edmonton, and made, if I may say so, a literary survey of the country ; and what did he do when he went back ? He quoted official utterances on the part of the United States officials as to the unimportance of the North-west Territories and Manitoba, and told his countrymen, through this magazine, that they were entirely mistaken—that Canada had more than half of North America, and had to-day fertile regions stretching over the North-west Territories equal to seven or eight or nine of the greatest and most fertile states of the Union. Mr. Speaker, in the "Evening Journal," published in this city, there appeared on the 15th instant a leading article, the writer of which copied a long letter from an American doctor, I think in Philadelphia, which appeared in the London "Times." This gentleman argues that it is for the good of humanity generally, especially for the good of this continent and its peace, that the United States should wake up from their indifference and take Canada in hand. Now, the same writer, Mr. Thompson, points out that the waste lands of the United States have all been taken up. They are no longer these vast extents of fertile territory which that country formerly had ; there are no longer fields for their restless spirits to go to, and they are becoming anxious ; and there cannot be the least doubt that it would be a solution of one of the most difficult problems that concern the United States at present, if, by any possible arrangement, they could get hold of the vast territory which we possess. The reason why I give so wide a bearing to this question is my belief that the future of the Dominion, and perhaps the strength of the whole Empire, is involved in our treatment of the North-west Territories. I say that the prosperity and progress of the North-west Territories demand that they be treated differently. They have been treated too much on this line—that all you had to do was to open up the country, send railways in there, dot it with post offices, give it telegraph and postal communication, and give it a large share of provincial government, and that would be sufficient. I do not think that that has been sufficient in the past, and I am certain that it is not at present. There is one feature of our dealing with the North-west Territories which we shall have, in my opinion, to revolutionize. I mean the feature of immigration into these territories. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has said that this is a vote of want of confidence in my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly). When that hon. gentleman took charge of the Interior Department, he told us that he was going to give us a vigorous immigration policy; and some people, both in the newspapers and out of them, have charged that the hon. gentleman's policy was not as vigorous as he promised and as we desired. But, Mr. Speaker, I am bound to say that the Parliament of Canada did not give my hon. friend the means of prosecuting such a vigorous immigration policy as we expected.

Mr. HAGGART.

Mr. DEVLIN. Yes, but he has a majority in Parliament.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend from Ottawa County says that he has a majority in Parliament, but if he will look back to the debates in this House he will find—I do not know whether he was guilty in that particular or not—that hon. members on the opposite side have always denounced the amount of money that was expended on immigration.

Mr. MARTIN. Because it was wasted.

Mr. DAVIN. That is a point into which I cannot go just now; but I have heard criticisms in this House on immigration expenditure that did not bear on the question of waste at all, but were confined to the proposition that the amount put down in the Estimates was altogether too large a sum for such a purpose. What we want therefore—and I should like to know if my hon. friend from Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) will support me in this—is to have a far larger sum spent on immigration. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has frequently denounced the millions which he said had been spent within the last fifteen years.

Mr. MULLOCK. But the more millions you spend, the less immigrants you get.

Mr. DAVIN. No, immigration is a business like any other. If you put capital into it and manage that capital properly, you will have results.

Mr. LAURIER. It has been very badly managed, then.

Mr. DAVIN. I shall not go into that just now, because that would belong to more properly to a motion dealing with the administration of the vote for immigration, and that is not my purpose here.

Mr. McMULLEN. Nor anywhere else?

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who has been very quite this session, remarks that it is not my purpose to do so anywhere else. I hope that we shall hear from the hon. gentleman in this debate. He has been very quite. I rather think that his financial critical sphere has been narrowed by his leaders this session lest he might prove too injurious to them. Suppose we go on in the North-west as we have been going on. Suppose we only increase there in the ratio we have increased; the result will be that ten or twenty years will pass, and yet the North-west will not have its farms of 160 acres each, each containing a family, and what would be the result? It would be that the North-west Territories will not be the strength to Canada that they might be otherwise, nor the strength to the Empire which they should be. I lay stress on this. I say that if you are to fill up these Territories with an English, a Scandinavian, a Scotch and an Irish population, let us have them filled rapidly, and any vaporings about annexation may be laughed to scorn. In fact, I believe that any such vaporings may be laughed to scorn to-day. But, Sir, there is a great opportunity before our Parliament and Government at present with regard to out North-west Territories. That opportunity is this. The English people are thoroughly awake just now to the importance of the colonies. The opinion which obtained some twenty-five years ago, that the colonies were of little importance, is now at a discount, the English people are thoroughly awake to the importance of their colonies, and the notion of an Imperial Zollverein has undoubtedly made considerable progress. I believe that in the mood in which England is at present, you ought to be able to get the statesmen of England to join with the statesmen of Canada in a great immigration scheme. If you do this, if you turn the tide of immigration to the North-west Territories, if you do not confine yourself to the stray efforts made by charitable associations and the scanty efforts that can be made on the small sums hitherto voted by Parliament, we would get a considerably larger immigration from England than we have had in the past. Then, Sir, if a larger scheme be entered into, we ought to be able to get a larger immigration from Scandinavia than we have had, and a far larger immigration from Germany; and under those circumstances, I think that the first part of my resolution should commend itself to the House, namely, that it is of great importance to the stability and progress of the Dominion, and of great moment to the Empire, that the North-west Territories be treated on a different footing from that which has obtained heretofore. In 1891, or perhaps in 1890, I brought before this House a scheme for irrigation. Since that time, my hon. friend (Mr. Daly) has passed an admirable Bill—he was not then Minister of the Interior—dealing with irrigation, and the settlers of Alberta have made use of it. When I brought forward that scheme, I remember the then Minister of the Interior complained that I was casting doubt upon the North-west Territories as a fertile country. I need hardly say there was not much likelihood of my casting any doubt upon the North-west Territories as a fertile country. But what I said, and what has since been proved in Alberta, and what has been proved up to the handle in the United States was that you can get no better result from any land in the world or by any system of cultivation than you get from that soil than by means of irrigation. Irrigation makes you independent of the variations of the seasons. In other parts of the North-west, in all parts of Assiniboia, wherever we have had a partial failure of the crops, it has been due to drought. There is no part of the Territories where an abounding crop cannot be secured, year after year, if you have sufficient moisture. In India, among other systems, they have in the dry parts, far from rivers, a system of irrigation by means of wells. These wells are found to produce an enormous amount of fertility. In some parts of the United States, also, a system of irrigation by means of wells, has been introduced. Windmills are employed to pump up the water all the time, the water being distributed in troughs, and thence, through smaller troughs, to all parts of the land. The proposition I made in 1891 was this—that the Government of Canada, which had great advantages because it had complete power, should take into its own hands the providing of means of irrigation where it was known that the land was fertile, but where it was also known that the rainfall was not sufficient. There are parts of Assiniboia where we have farms, the occupants of which have to go great distances for water. Now, I hold that money appropriated for irrigation purposes could not be better spent than by providing water for these farmers, not exactly at their doors, but contiguous to their farms. If this were done, on every farm you would have a man sending letters abroad telling of abundant crops year after year, and of a condition of things enabling him to despise the mutations of the seasons. There is another point, one that, probably, would not commend itself to free traders or revenue tariffists, but that would commend itself to those of us who believe in protection, and who are not afraid of the sneers against "paternalism." I believe that there are parts of the North-west Territories where we ought to aid the farmers, through helping little bodies of farmers in establishing creameries where they are not able to do so themselves. Some assistance should be given, but not exactly in the form I suggested before. Some assistance was given some years ago in one part of my own district, and the result has been most gratifying; it has been such as to justify the Government in the course they took at that time. The second clause of the resolution is this:

(2) That the self-respect of the people of the North-west, not less than the material interests of those vast territories demands that the Territories shall not be treated on a plane of inferiority.

Mr. DAVIN.

I think it was in 1880 that I proposed that we should have full responsible government for the Territories; and what was done then was to pass a Bill—my late illustrious leader, the Right Honourable Sir John A. Macdonald was leading the Government, and it was his Bill—which gave us a small advisory board. And now we have a financial committee, which has not the right to advise the governor on any subject but finance. The powers of the North-west Territories are, I think, with the exception of one or two items, coextensive with those of a province. But, for what reason, I never could make out, we hesitate to give full responsible government to the Territories. The result of giving full responsible government would be to set that giant, the North-west Territories, upon its mettle. It is just as important, for instance, as British Columbia—much more important from one point of view—

Mr. PRIOR. Query.

Mr. DAVIN. From one point of view. My hon. friend may be quite certain that I would not disparage the importance of any part of Canada to Canada at large. I know full well the importance of that magnificent province of the Pacific. But what I say is that there is no part of Canada so important at this hour to Canada as the North-west Territories, with their boundless fertile acres awaiting the plough of the immigrant. If provincial government be good for the provinces, why should it not be good for the North-west Territories? We have a population—again to refer to the Pacific province—as large as that of British Columbia. That is shown by the last census. And we have more fertile land than any province or any two provinces in Canada. We have vast resources, mineral and agricultural, as well as resources of the forest, and the fishery. The same principle that leads us, as federalists, to give power to the province to deal with its own affairs, should lead us to give similar powers to the North-west Territories. Local self-government is based upon the principle that if you have Ministers on the spot who are closely interested in the local affairs, and have much better opportunities to manage those affairs wisely than persons at a distance, things will in a large sphere of civil government be better done. There is also the principle of the division of labour. We divide the work of the government in this country. We find that the provinces can do the purely provincial work better than it could be done here in Ottawa, and, of course, we are able to do the work that is allotted to us better than if it were scattered over five or six departments, in five or six different parts of Canada. What we want, therefore, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the most thoughtful people in the North-west Territories, is that the last link be given; we want to have the additional power that is necessary to cover the whole field of provincial functions, and we want to have the Ministers, as we virtually have at present. We have my friend Mr. Haultain, who is called the Premier; he is chairman of the executive. He has got another colleague, paid as much as a Minister, and he is a member of the executive. These, with two other gentlemen, are a committee of the House chosen by the House, to advise His Honour on financial questions. The result is, that instead of having a little executive responsible to the assembly, and responsible to the people of the North-west, you have a committee appointed to spend the money that we give them, a committee appointed by the assembly really to spend that money, as it is directed by the assembly. And what is the consequence of that? The consequence is, that the system of log-rolling still prevails. Now, Mr. Speaker, my friend Mr. Haultain, who is chairman of the executive, promised that he would get out of that; he promised that he would certainly give that up, and a step has been taken in the way of focussing the responsibility. But I cannot think that you can have the expenditure of money, say, for public works, placed in a satisfactory position, unless you have men as a body responsible to the assembly, and who shall hold that responsible position in face of the electors of the country. Under these circumstances, the result will be that you will have what seems to be necessary to our system of government, you will have the politicians, the people who take an interest in the affairs of that country, divided into parties. Nobody is more sensible than I am of the evils that can gather around party government. But all things are capable of degenerating into abuses. We cannot find anything in our human affairs that cannot be abused, and I cannot see how it is possible to work our constitution without having parties. In fact, we see, from the management of affairs up there, that, probably, there would be an economy, there would be a real economy, if there were an opposition, if there were parties in the House, a regular ministry, and an opposition to criticise the conduct of that ministry, and criticise its expenditure. I may say, in passing, that I do not see why we should not, in the theory of our constitution, acknowledge parties. It may be a useful thing to recognize what the writers call fiction. But, Sir, no fiction that has become an absolute fiction can be useful; in the nature of things it must cease to be useful. On the other hand, any real fact, anything that is a controlling fact, as party is, in the government of a country, it seems to me to be a great affectation on our part to refuse to acknowledge. Here we are, framing a constitution, and all the time ignoring one of the great wheels by which the country is governed. The third clause of this resolution is:

That the climate, soil and conditions generally of the North-west are different from those of other parts of Canada, and a policy specially adapted to its needs and resources is called for in order that the settlers shall be rendered prosperous and immigration policies be made effective.

Now, I forget who it was, when this motion was read—I believe it was my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies)—who seemed to think the last part, especially, was a reflection on the immigration policy of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior. What I meant was this: That, if you want to make your immigration policy effective, you must have the farmer in the North-west shaking hands, so to speak, and co-operating with your agent in England. If you do that, then, in my opinion, you will make that circle which will be one of the most effective and potent powers to secure your object. Not that I condemn in any way the immigration policy of this department, for I say that, so far as I have been able to judge, my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, with the means at his disposal, has done as well in securing immigration as any Minister could possibly do. But, when I speak of making it more effective, I mean that whatever efforts are put forward by the immigration function of his department, should be seconded by a contented and prosperous yeomanry in our North-west Territories. Now, Sir, to effect all this you will have, in my opinion, to make a new departure. In fact, the peculiarities of the conditions in the North-west Territories are such that you may gain immense results, almost immeasurable results, if you only adopt a wise, paternal policy. Such are the peculiarities of that country, and so different is it from most European countries, that it is not a country into which you may invite people accustomed to other conditions, and then leave them there without any further attention. Some of them will succeed when brought in in that way; but what I say is, that the true policy would be to exercise an interest in the settlers that go into the Territories, to devise schemes for the amelioration of their condition, and, above all, to see that the conditions are supplied that will fit the land they settle on, that will fit it year after year for producing, to a certainty, a good crop. Now, Mr. Speaker, a great bugbear against the North-west Territories used to be the frost. Well, I lay this down, that the frost is a comparative trifle in the North-west Territories. Give moisture, have moisture any year you like, have moisture in any part of the country you like, and, no matter how severe the frost, you will have results that will enable the farmer to prosper, that will enable the farmer to make money, that will enable the farmer to have his bacon, and his pork, and his flour, and to have all the conditions that are necessary to a contented and prosperous farm life. Well, how is it to be done? I have indicated one scheme that is, in my opinion, of absolute importance, and that is a scheme of irrigation by means of wells. That is not new in this House. I proposed it before, but it fell on deaf ears. In fact, the suggestion of irrigation at all, when I proposed it in 1889 or 1890, raised a certain amount of resentment in the minds of some of my hon. friends. I suggested at that time that we should have artesian wells. All parts of the country are not fit for artesian wells, but these parts fit for artesian wells can be irrigated in that way most successfully. I remember I gave an instance of what I have seen in Dakota. I was riding, and saw what seemed to be a lake. From the conformation of the country it was like the driest prairie country we have, and I galloped up to where the lake was, and said to a lad who was attending some cattle: You have a fine lake of water there: where does it come from, and where does it empty? He replied that it was purely artificial, that it was from an artesian well, and he directed me to where the well was. I rode there, and saw a pipe emptying water into a vast tank, the overflow passing down the side of the hill and in one of the hollows making a fine lake, useful for the watering of cattle and also for purposes of irrigation. These are the courses which I think should be pursued. Let me make a general proposition. In the North-west Territories we have, according to the last census, as large a population as British Columbia; we have an area transcending that of any province of the Dominion by many multiples: we have that which at the present time is one of the most important possessions a country can possess, and that is vast fertile plains; we have a population that man for man will compare with the population of any province of Canada. What we say is this, and we feel very strongly about it—we do not want to be treated on any other footing than that on which the provinces are treated. We do not want, for instance, to have this kind of feeling: Well, we can treat the North-west in a different way from Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia or Nova Scotia. The North-west wants the same consideration, the same means of asserting itself in the federation, the same means of making its importance felt, and it wants also to be treated with the same respect, to have its citizens, the men who have thrown in their lot with it and identified their lives with its development and progress, treated precisely on the same plane as the men are treated who live in the older provinces. A wholly different sentiment from that pervades the minds of all eastern politicians, I do not care whether they belong to the Liberal or Conservative party, a sentiment that the North-west can be treated differently, and that something will do for the North-west that would not do for British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario or Quebec. We entirely object to that attitude, we entirely object to that state of mind. We say that is not respectful to us, on the contrary it is quite offensive to us: and we say moreover, although that may be construed as a social or a civic sentiment merely, it is closely related to the material progress of those vast Territories on which so much can be built, out of which so much can be made for the Dominion of Canada, and out of which so much can be made for the Empire too. We say it would be a dangerous and bad thing, vicious in every possible way, if the people of the Territories, now when public opinion is being formed there, were deprived of those conditions for the production of the sense of dignity which exist in other parts of the Dominion. The view too much taken in the past has been, and it is the view taken in this House—hon. gentlemen cannot make any party capital out of this—it is the view that has obtained in this House, and probably obtains here yet—is what I would call the greengrocer view, the view of trying to make so much out of it. When I hear hon. gentlemen speak about the amount spent on the North-west Territories and speak of the debt incurred for the North-west Territories, they speak as though the Territories were not part of Canada, and that if the Territories have been brought into existence, and are now a great factor in the wealth of Canada, the North-west owes that to the Dominion; but I say here that Canada owes more to the North-west than the North-west owes to Canada. Eastern Canada, Ontario, Quebec and other provinces, have opened up the country, and we thank them for that. And whom have we mainly to thank for opening up the country? I think a good deal of thanks is due to the present Government, in regard to which it is said that this is a motion of want of confidence. But let it be considered for one moment as to what has been the result of the expenditure on railways going into that country, what has been the result of the expenditure in opening up that country. You have at the present moment a return of over 50 per cent to the wealth of Canada for every $100 spent in that country. Take Winnipeg to-day. The assessed value of property there is over $22,000,000, the assessed value of Brandon is $5,000,000 or $6,000,000, then there is the assessed value to Moosomin, Qu'Appelle, Wolseley, Regina, Moose Jaw, Medicine Hat, and Calgary right along the line, and leaving altogether aside the value of the farms, you have in the wealth brought into existence in these towns more than 50 per cent of the amount that has been spent in opening up the North-west. You talk about the debt. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) talks about debt, as though going into debt was some great evil. Going into debt and spending the money that has been obtained is no evil. Spending such money wastefully or squandering would be a great evil, it is true; but if you can borrow money at 3½ per cent and invest it so as to yield 10, 15, 20 or even 50 per cent, as some of our investments are yielding, this is one of the most advantageous results in the way of statesmanship the Government can accomplish. Let me say this about the debt, that if you will take the debt of Canada—and I will make this general statement as bearing on the North-west—for the time usually taken for purposes of comparison, sixteen or seventeen years, if you take the difference between the debt at that time and the net debt to-day, and then take the amount of capital that has been brought into existence by the expenditure of that debt. I venture to say that the whole increase will be wiped out as with a sponge, and a large asset will still remain. All that is true in every detail in regard to the North-west. I must not refer to a past debate, and I need not do so; but in the press and in other quarters I have seen some statements about the odd sections in the North-west Territories and I have been asked why I did not take up a question like the settlement of the odd sections of the country. As early as 1885, before I was a member of the House, I proposed a plan to the Government. It is on record in the Library, and hon. members have only to go there and they will see my plan. I proposed that the Government should buy back all the land alienated to the Canadian Pacific Railway and open all those lands to settlement. The six million odd acres that were brought back, were, I think, bought back at $1.50 per acre. Now, suppose that same price were given for what remains.

Mr. MULOCK. What quantity remains?

Mr. DAVIN. I expect there are about 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 acres still remaining, probably more. I maintain that you cannot do better than to buy back these odd sections and open them for settlement. Here is my point: Suppose you open them for settlement, and a farmer comes in, and brings in his family of four, and they eat and drink and travel; the railway company, instead of losing by alienating the lands which it was holding, at $3 or $4 an acre, would be the gainer. I must say, however, for the Canadian Pacific Railway, that they have been selling lands at a very low figure, and no complaint can be brought against them on that head. But, however low, or however high they have been selling, they cannot get such a good return for their lands, as the return they would get by having a farmer settled there, whose wife and children and friends would travel, as well as himself. On the other hand, the Government could not invest money better than by buying back these lands, because they would have the revenue swelled by the indirect taxation on the farmer. Besides that, if every settler is worth $1,000, then every family of three or four on a farm, would add considerably to the wealth of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I proposed this in 1885, and if my friend from Guysborough (Mr.

Fraser) were here, I would suggest to him that he should remember that. I cannot recollect that any member of the Opposition took the matter up when I spoke of it before; but a thing has occurred within the last two years that I am very glad of, and which has made a great change and a great improvement in the temper of this House. The hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition has visited the North-west Territories, together with my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), and my hon. friend from Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), and a number of leading men in the Reform party. The result of that visit has been most gratifying, and, in my opinion, most useful. In their speeches, whether in or out of this House, these gentlemen take a wholly different tone in regard to these Territories from what they were accustomed to. The fact is, that before visiting these Territories, they did not realize what they were; and I have never met a politician, whether of my own political thought or not, who would say that he had any idea what these Territories were until after he had visited them. But after visiting there, he never again has any doubt as to what a significance these Territories have for the people of Canada. He knows well that the battle of our national life will be fought and won, and that there, also, the greatest battle for the Empire can be fought and won. We are all of us—at all events in the party to which I belong—we are all of us in favour of what is called preferential trade within the Empire. That is nothing more than an Imperial Zollverein. Now, Sir, that idea was suggested, I forget how long ago, by Mr. Justice Byles, who, when he wrote his book, the "Fallacies of Free Trade," was not, I think, then on the bench, but was a thoughtful, able barrister, in London. Justice Byles pointed out how absurd it was for England, and how absurd it was for the colonies to remain apart, when by an Imperial Zollverein they could do the greatest possible good to themselves, commercially, aye, and especially for England, politically, as well. I say here, that if Canada is to be to the Empire what Canada is capable of being, those Territories must be filled up. If they are not populated, Canada cannot be the right arm, as she is capable of being, to the Empire. After all, Mr. Speaker, Manitoba and the North-west Territories should be looked at as one. If you go to the Lake of the Woods, and run a diagonal line right up to the Yellowhead Pass, you will find that all south of that you have got a vast region of fertile land, and from five miles on this side of the Rockies, right to the foot of the Rockies, you have coal fields that are themselves potentialities to the Empire. We have the finest coal beds in the world in the North-west Territories, we have the finest lands in the world and the greatest amount of them in the North-west Territories, and these are greatly needed for the development of Canada. In fact, they are the great conditions to the development of a country like this.

Mr. GILLMOR. And you have them.

Mr. DAVIN. We have them.

Mr. GILLMOR. That is right.

Mr. MULOCK. Why do not the people go there to develop them?

Mr. DAVIN. That is a very important question, and let me say in regard to that "why," if my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) had visited those Territories as I visited them, in 1882, and wandered around those fertile fields, and dug down eight feet in the richest loam,—

Mr. GILLMOR. Eight feet?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, eight and nine feet of the richest loam you could dig there.

Mr. GILLMOR. It would never exhaust you in the world.

Mr. DAVIN. It would not be exhausted for many a year.

Mr. GILLMOR. You could not plough that?

Mr. DAVIN. In the course of years you could.

Mr. GILLMOR. No, you would have to dig the top off before you could plough it.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend employs words differently from what I do. I like to hear my hon. friend (Mr. Gillmor) speak. Unless when he speaks on the tariff, he is a man of a cheerful turn of mind, but when he speaks on the tariff, he is the Mrs. Gumidge of the Reform party. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Mulock) asks the question: Why are not these lands populated? What I say is this: If you had visited these Territories in 1882 you would have thought, as we all thought, as I dare say my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) thought, that these Territories were going to fill up; in fact, that the population would flow into them. That was our opinion, and we were perfectly certain of it. And now take the calculations that were made by the hon. baronet, the Secretary of State, when he was Finance Minister. These calculations have been quoted here as though they were some reproach to him. Take the calculations made by my late right honourable friend Sir John A. Macdonald, as to how that land would fill up, how many thousands would be there in 1891, how much money would be got, and so on, and which calculations are quoted in the Liberal newspapers, and elsewhere as against the Conservative party. Sir, I say that the mistakes of calculation that were made were mistakes that were inevitable, looking at the conditions of the country at that time. No man, I do not care how pessimistic he was, how gloomy may have been his mental liver, how prone he may have been to take a jaundiced view of things—no man could visit those Territories in 1882 without believing that, in the course of ten or fifteen years, there would be millions of people there. As the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), who visited the Territories at that time, know, you could not visit any part of the world where the conditions promised more comfort or more prosperity for the farmer. Was it not natural, then, that sanguine men should make the calculations they did? The attitude of mind that was shown by Sir John Macdonald, and by others, at that time, was a natural one. It was sincere. They thought what everybody else thought. What made us go up there and invest what money we had in farm property? We thought people would crowd in, homesteads would fill up, and then they would come and buy from us the railway lands we had bought. Men like Sir Charles Tupper, the Secretary of State, and Sir John Macdonald, men of sanguine mind, naturally made calculations roseate with hope. Now, let me say this. There was more power in such calculations—aye, and more truth—than in the gloomy and despairing views taken by the hon. gentlemen who opposed them. There were two things in those calculations. There was, first, power—steam—go-ahead; in the next place, they were more true to what has taken place since. I heard Mr. Blake, I think when he was a member of this House—I certainly heard him out of the House—calculate that the Canadian Pacific Railway, as it was built, was an impossibility. We know how, at Aurora, he spoke of the impossibility of getting through the "sea of mountains." I say there was more consonance with the ultimate fact in the calculations of Sir Charles Tupper and Sir John Macdonald than in the somewhat gloomy vaticinations of those who opposed them. But, Sir, what form did the adverse criticisms upon their policy take? Their opponents went about, saying that the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway would ruin the country. What was the answer? The answer was: You will have such and such wealth in return; lands will be sold; and, as Sir John Macdonald pointed out—in 1891, I think it was—every cent of the cost of the Pacific Railway will have been paid. Well, Sir, every cent of the cost of the Pacific Railway has been paid, but not in that way.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend laughs. I did not expect anything else. They belong to the spirit that denies. They are a party wanting in faith. They are a party of political unbelief. They have no confidence whatever in the future of anything, and they can only realize that it exists when it accually comes before them. Well, Mr. Speaker, what I want to say is this, that the attitude taken by Sir John Macdonald, in consequence of these criticisms, continued too long. I remember when it was determined—I happened to be here in Ottawa at the time—determined, not by Sir John Macdonald, but by another gentleman, to close up the mile belt, and to close up Southern Manitoba; and a man whom we all honoured greatly, and whose memory we honour in this House, the late John Henry Pope, who was then Minister of Agriculture, told me of this, and said he thought it was a very serious step. I thought so, too, and I went to the Acting Minister and tried to argue him out of it; but I failed to do it, and Southern Manitoba and the mile belt were closed. It was a very bad policy. I commenced at once to attack the policy; and in the papers down in the east I was attacked for attacking the policy of the Department of the Interior of that day. To his honour, be it said, the late Sir John Macdonald, my leader of that day, wrote to me: "Don't mind these attacks upon you; you express the opinion of the country where you are, and it would be a most disastrous thing if you expressed the opinion of Ottawa; I have the utmost confidence in you—go on and express the opinions of the country where you are." And, when Sir John Macdonald was again taking charge of the Department of the Interior, I wrote to him in this language: "In the history of human ineptitude, there never was such a damnable—"

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, that was the word I used—"such a damnable act of policy as closing up Southern Manitoba and the mile belt." We got them opened up, and I went and saw Burgess. I said, "Burgess, I think the old chief must have resented the language of the letters I wrote to him."—I wrote in strong language. He said, "Not at all. He brought out the letter in which you spoke of the damnable act of folly, and he said, 'Burgess, when Davin speaks in that way, something is wrong.'" I had broken away from my conventional and inveterate reticence, and I had talked in the large language of the earlier gods. What I say is, that the party and the government that I support have piled up such great services to this country that they can afford to have mistakes of this or that man referred to. The result of their closing up Southern Manitoba and the mile belt, in the teeth of the advice of the late John Henry Pope and myself—against my persistent protest—was, as everybody knows who has lived in Manitoba, that there was a great deal of discontent and a great deal of retardation in the country. The results of that act linger with us to-day. Now, why was that done? The gentleman who closed them up spoke to me in this wise—and it illustrates what I want to strike. He said: "What is the value of land in Southern Manitoba to-day?" I said, "I believe it is worth about $7 an acre; but what do you mean by asking me that question? Do you mean that you would regard it as a private person would? There is the greatest possible difference between a trading corporation or a private individual and a government. The government, by holding lands at $7 an acre, may make a stroke of policy most foolish, but an individual or a corporation, the more they get for their lands, the more money they gain. The proper way for a government to treat districts, lands and territories, is to consider the country as a family, and to consider that all which makes for the wealth and advancement of each part of that family adds so much to the wealth of the family. What I want, therefore, is to rid hon. gentlemen of the idea of looking to the North-west with the view of making money out of it, or of getting an income out of it. The proper way to regard the Department of the Interior is not to regard it as a department from which to obtain income, but as the means of filling up the country with immigrants. The view of getting so much income out of the country is an entirely mistaken one. I hope that in these few remarks I have made my meaning clear. I mean that the development of these Territories is of vital importance to Canada and the Empire; I mean that they should be treated on the same footing of dignity as the other parts of the Dominion.

Mr. MULOCK. What do you propose to do?

Mr. DAVIN. I suggest that a very small change be made and that the local legislature be placed precisely on the footing of a provincial legislature.

Mr. MULOCK. Have it made into a province?

Mr. DAVIN. Have it made into a province. I am glad my hon. friend referred to that. Now is the time to do it. We see the folly of having small provinces down by the Atlantic. We do not want petty provinces—

Mr. MULOCK. No reflections on the maritime provinces.

Mr. DAVIN. I make none. But every statesman from the maritime provinces, with whom I have discussed this subject, has admitted it would be a good thing to have Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island all in one. It would be foolish to look forward to Assinibola, Saskatchewan and Alberta being made into separate provinces. The only persons who will clamour for that are people who have moneyed interests in certain towns. You will get a few people in Calgary to clamour for making Alberta a province, a few people in Regina to clamour for making Assinibola a province, and a few people in Prince Albert to urge that the Saskatchewan district be made a province. Everybody knows that you cannot expect to have in those Territories, for many a year, such a dense population as would justify the existence of three or four provinces there. I do not want to enter into particulars. I merely point out the way in which the North-west expects to be treated. Everybody understands how undesirable it is that I should particularize, but in every way we expect to be treated on a footing with the other provinces.

Mr. MULLOCK. I ask the hon. gentleman to particularize to the extent of telling us what his proposed remedy is, and in what way the Territories are now treated different from the other provinces.

Mr. DAVIN. Mainly this. At present the money voted is practically under the control of the assembly. Practically, the assembly controls it, although not technically. After this Government has handed it over to the assembly, the assembly is allowed to control it. Although this Government hold a certain control, yet that is never fully exercised. At present there are four gentlemen there, who are called the executive of the assembly. These gentlemen advise the Lieutenant-Governor as to the expenditure, and they are chosen by the assembly. What I propose is that we should have a small local government, just as they have in Prince Edward Island. It will not cost more than the executive costs at present. Mr. Haultain and Mr. Ross will draw a salary as large as two Ministers will in Prince Edward Island. I propose that they should be in a position to take a responsible course as do the Ministers in other parts. I propose, also, that all high officials, now chosen elsewhere, should be chosen from the Territories. But I do not dwell on that, because that follows as a mere corollary. That is what I mean by saying that we should be treated on an equal footing with the other provinces. The subject is one which should be treated in more detail and at more length, in order to do full justice to it. But I think I have sufficiently explained my views in order that we should take practical action. A very slight change in the law would be sufficient, but, of course, I do not expect anything to be done this session. The matter would require more careful consideration and a carefully prepared measure, so that I do not expect anything to be done this session. All I desired to accomplish was to give expression to the opinion of my constituents, and of the whole Territory, as to the matters I have brought before the House. I have ventured to make a suggestion that will entail some more expenditure. My remarks on that particular may, I hope, influence my hon. friend the Finance Minister, when preparing supplemental Estimates. There are certain practical things that may be done for the Territories in those supplemental Estimates. But what I wanted especially to clear from the minds of this House and of the Government is that the North-west Territories have in any way failed to give a good return for the outlay we have made there. The North-west at present, with its developed wealth, has so added to the assets of Canada that the amount of money spent in opening it up is a very minor matter, in my opinion, indeed. If once we accept the view that the North-west has paid its way, that it has no large debit against it, then, when the Council come to consider the proposals of expenditure, they will not be so unlikely to take an illiberal view as they would if the notion that somehow money had been spent there which had not met with an adequate return.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DALY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—THE REMEDIAL BILL (MANITOBA).

Mr. FOSTER. I move the adjournment of the House. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had a question to ask the Minister of Justice the other night, and I asked him to wait till the Minister of Justice was present. He can ask the question now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). At that time I had a disposition to complain of what seemed to me to be a breach of the privileges of the House in furnishing copies of Bills to the newspaper press before these Bills were placed at the disposal of members of the House.

Mr. DICKEY. Of course I am in the judgment of yourself, Mr. Speaker, and of hon. members of the House, as to whether a breach of the privileges of the House was committed. The fact is that the Remedial Bill, as to which a great deal of public interest was known to exist, was read the first time, and was put into the hands of the Clerk. As I understood the matter, any pressman was then entitled to inspect the Bill, and to make such copies or extracts from it as he thought proper. I had a number of copies over, about fifteen or sixteen, and I certainly did give those Bills to the members of the press, so far as they would go round. I also propose to say now that until you or the House rebuke me, I should follow the same course on a similar occasion, unless it be a breach of the privileges of the House, in which case I should be the last man to do it. Hon. gentlemen on both sides, of course, know the disposition which I made of the other copies of the Bill—it is not worth while for me to speak of that. I do not know that the fourth estate has any legal rights, but I would remind the hon. member for Bothwell that the estates of the realm that come up latest, generally get the greatest power—Kings first, then Lords, then Commons, and we do not know what the powers the fourth estate may turn out to be, constitutionally. It was simply for the convenience of the press that I gave out those Bills, and because I thought the members and the public would thereby more quickly become acquainted with the contents of the Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would rather make a summary for myself, and be the judge as to the presentation of that summary than to have any one else do it for me. The hon. gentleman will see that it places it in the power of the press of the country to mould public opinion, before there was an opportunity of any member having a chance to form a judgment upon the subject. It does seem to me that the duty of the Government is first towards this House; and if the members of this House are to receive a Bill after it has been placed at the disposal of everybody else, why, I think we will have to make important alterations in our practice. My impression is that the hon. member owes it to this House first to place the measure at its disposal, and to give to every member of the House an opportunity of perusing it, which has not been done.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask my hon. friend, how he would suggest a member of the Government should act? Is not the duty of a member of the Government fulfilled when he submits a Bill to the House and lays it on the Table, at which time it becomes the property of the House, and is in charge of the officers?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that he went very much beyond that.

Mr. LAURIER. It is quite possible that, owing to the importance of the fourth estate, which is increasing, the rule may have to be deviated from, but, so long as the rule is what it is at the present time, my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) is right, that communication should be made to Parliament before the distribution takes place. Until that rule is rescinded, it should be adhered to.

Mr. OUIMET. Where is that rule to be found?

Mr. LAURIER. I do not know that it is written, but a great many rules in the British constitution are unwritten, although they are very well known. I am surprised the hon. gentleman should have any doubt in regard to it. I have another reproach to make the Government. I called the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that, on 17th February, the Montreal "Gazette" published a synopsis of the Report of Penitentiaries. When it was published, the report had not been laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. DICKEY. I think the hon. gentleman has got me there. I brought the report down to the House, with a view to present it. It was, however, too late before I had an opportunity of doing so, and I left it in my desk for the Minister of Finance to present, but, being called away on public business, I forgot to mention the fact to him. I presented the report on the following day.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman should not forget the House in that way, and I suppose he will not sin any more.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 18th February, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

EXPORT OF SAW-LOGS.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Before you pass to the Orders of the Day, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that I had on the paper a notice of motion which, in yesterday's Order paper, appeared third on the list. To-day that motion has disappeared from the list. I only wish to say that, in the first place, I put that notice of motion on the paper so that the subject might be discussed, and asked the Government to allow it to stand until the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who is interested in the question, should be in his seat. I understand that he has been ill, and has not been able to be in the House so far this session. I would ask to have the motion reinstated on the Order paper in the same place it occupied before.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman is going into a discussion. I may say for the information of the hon. member that the order was dropped yesterday on being reached, in accordance with an arrangement made a few days before. If put upon the Order paper again, it cannot have its original place.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). If you will pardon me a moment, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that the order was placed on the paper—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE GOVERNMENT OF MANITOBA.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that the papers brought down this session covering the correspondence between the Government and the government of

Mr. DICKEY.

Manitoba have not been printed. They ought to be printed in time for the discussion of the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there is no doubt they should be printed; but that matter is entirely in the hands of the Printing Committee.

Mr. LAURIER. With the permission of the House, then, I would move:

That the papers brought down this session containing correspondence between the Government and the government of Manitoba be forthwith printed, and that rule 94 be suspended.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Report of the Auditor General on Appropriation Accounts, for the year 1894-95 (second and concluding part.)—(Mr. Foster.)

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the Government when I may expect a certain return which was ordered by this House in 1894. I made inquiries about it some fifteen or twenty times in the session of 1894, and each time received a promise that the return would be down in a day or two. I inquired, also, several times in the session of 1895, and each time was assured that it would be brought down. The return I refer to is one covering the details of the expenses of Canada at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893. I desire again to renew my inquiry of the Government, when I may expect this often-promised return.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to say that I will give immediate attention to the hon. gentleman's question, and will get information as to the matter he refers to.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Controller of Customs stated that he would lay on the Table yesterday or to-day, the return with regard to the quantity of corn brought in to be ground for human food. I would like to know when that return will be laid on the Table.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow that to stand until the Minister of Customs is in his place.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, no one can have listened attentively to this debate without feeling that it is regarded, as at least by hon. gentlemen opposite, the preliminary skirmish in the great impending battle which is to decide whether the Conservative party shall control the destinies of this country, as they have controlled them for seventeen years, or whether hon. gentlemen opposite shall be allowed to apply some of their nostrums for any of the real or supposed ills of the country; whether the principles which have governed for these seventeen years, and under which the country has made unparalleled progress shall be the principles to guide the country in the future, or whether the principles that hon. gentlemen opposite announce here and elsewhere, and into which it will be my duty briefly to examine, shall be adopted—principles, I may say, which prevailed from 1874 to 1878, a period not looked back upon with very great enthusiasm by Canadians. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is equally certain that hon. gentlemen opposite mean to win by a series of resolutions that were proposed at a convention which took place here in 1893, and of which they are so enamoured that one hon. gentleman after another has read them, so that they might be, to use their own classical language, “embalmed on the pages of ‘Hansard’”; and the hon. gentleman from King’s, N.S. (Mr. Borden), made it a peroration of his speech to read ‘in extenso’ all these resolutions passed at that convention. Sir, that convention was not an ordinary meeting of a great party; it was not one of the recurring meetings of a party at which the leading men connected with it take counsel together. That convention was a meeting at which all the wisdom of the Reform party was convened, and where they propounded certain theories; nay, Sir, it was a conclave, not made to elect a Liberal pope, because a leader had been selected some time before, but to issue a political syllabus denouncing Tory heresies, and laying down anew conflicting doctrines, calling largely on credulity and forbearance. Now, I propose, first, to examine very briefly these resolutions. I shall then take up what may be called the Liberal bible, a pamphlet containing all these resolutions, and the speeches delivered in 1893; and I shall go briefly through the speeches delivered and printed, and embalmed in that pamphlet, and sent round with authority, and I shall show that the programme is incongruous, that the speeches are incongruous, that the policy is incongruous, that the party is incongruous. Then, Sir, I shall take the pamphlet that was also sent out and distributed last year when it was thought an election was intended, distributed widely throughout the length and breadth of Canada, a pamphlet entitled “Principles, policy and platform of the Liberal party.” So important is it considered that there is a note signed “Alexander Smith, secretary of the Ontario Liberal Association,” in which the reader is told that “this pamphlet is not for general distribution,” it is only to be distributed to the faithful. Sir, there was a very good reason for that, because the same tactics precisely were adopted in these pamphlets that were adopted in 1882, when we had three or four programmes sent forth by the Liberal party, these three or four programmes conflicting with each other, some meant for circulation in the cities, and some for circulation amongst the farmers. Then, Sir, I shall inquire into the views, and I shall ask this question—because it is still necessary to ask it—I shall ask the question for my own behoof, and for the behoof of Parliament, and for the behoof of the country; I shall ask what are the views of the Liberal party in regard to the trade question? I shall want to know what their policy is on fiscal matters? Then, Sir, I shall take up some ordinary questions, such for instance, as the accusation that the Liberal party are guilty of harbouring annexationist sentiments, and I shall try, as best I can, to break a lance on their behalf and defend them, if it be possible, against the charge. Then I shall refer briefly to the progress Canada has made, as a reply to statements in these programmes, and statements in the speeches. Now, Sir, let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the programme. The first resolution refers to the tariff, and the second refers to reciprocity. These are the two great resolutions. Then we have one on purity, and I shall refer briefly to that, because I know how strong in virtue the party opposite is. Then we have one in regard to economy; then we have one in regard to land for the settlers, and it is the only thing in either programme or speeches that holds out any hope to the North-west that the other party will do anything for that section of the Dominion; and when I come to deal with that I shall show that they display the most profound ignorance on the land question. Then, Sir, I shall have to deal very briefly with the position they take up here on some minor matters. But the two main resolutions are the things that call for special attention just now. Now, the first one says:

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now upon a protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service.

Well, Sir, I confess I think that, in limine, I have a right to complain of that in the interest of the people of Canada. This programme is intended for the people at large, and I say that it is tainted with one of the greatest vices with which a programme could be tainted; that words are used in it in a non-natural sense, and that the propositions in it cloud up fallacies, roll up fallacies, with a view, apparently, I do not say with a conscious view on the part of the prominent men of the party, but it certainly looks as if it was done with a view of deceiving the people. Now, you will observe that the proposition there assumed is that the pro-protective principle is opposed to, and antithetic to, the requirements of the public service. Well, then, the seventh paragraph states that the protective principle has impeded commerce. With the customs returns in their hands, with the Year-Book in their hands, with the statistics of Canada in their hands, how can it be shown that the protective policy has impeded commerce? Then, we come to the eighth, and I call special attention to this :

It has discriminated against Great Britain.

And in this connection I would point to the second resolution, which is headed "Reciprocity." Can any honest man say, will any candid man on that side of the House say, that you can have reciprocity with the United States without discriminating against Great Britain? There is an implied censure here on the Conservative party for discriminating against Great Britain. Yet that is not the greatest sin committed by this little paragraph: the great sin is that the word "discriminate" is used, as men of the education of those who composed that resolution must have known, the word "discriminate" is used in a non-natural sense. The ordinary meaning of the word "discriminate" would be to frame a tariff that, in its construction would discriminate against Great Britain; it would not mean a constructive discrimination, which is the only discrimination which can have been in the mind of those who framed that paragraph. That is a very grave offence, because it goes to the very root of the sincerity of hon. gentlemen. Then, we have No. 10, which says that the way to help Canada over certain ills that it is supposed to suffer from, or was supposed to be suffering from in 1893, is to bring the Liberals into power, and this would hasten the return of prosperity to our people. Well, Mr. Speaker, the elections did not take place in 1894. A couple of years have elapsed, and if you will read the report of the Board of Trade of Toronto, and if you will read the bank reports, which were mentioned by the hon. Minister of Finance, and if you turn your eyes abroad and keep your ears open, you will find that prosperity has returned to Canada without the aid of hon. gentlemen opposite. Prosperity has returned, so that is not necessary. However, that is merely by the way. Then comes No. 12 of the first resolution that was adopted.

That it should be so adjusted as to make free or bear as lightly as possible upon the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

And then we have paragraph 6 :

That a fair and liberal reciprocity treaty with the United States would develop the great natural resources of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the meaning of suggesting that they would bring in a policy which would look for freer trade with England and with the world at large, and yet they want a reciprocity treaty with the United States. So much for these resolutions, of which I may say this, and it is the only terrible thing about them, that they are like thunderclouds, and carry within them the secret of their dispersion.

Most of us, I suppose, attended the fancy ball last night—that magnificent series of tableaux, that grandiose piece of living tapestry—and we must have been interested as we saw period after period illustrated by dance after dance. But, while my grateful imagination was instructed by delighted heart, and I felt this, that their Excellencies might have made even what seemed so perfect, yet more complete, if they had given us a modern dance, if those two august ladies, the Conservative party and the Reform party, had been there, with their respective courts, and if we had had Prime Minister Sir Mackenzie Bowell with his Conservative banner, and my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition with his Reform banner. But, under those circumstances, the Conservative party would have cut a comparatively humble figure, because the banner which Sir Mackenzie Bowell would have raised would be a comparatively plain one, for, under the Imperial and Canadian signs and emblems, there would be but one device, but the banner of the Reform party would be blazoned with many a policy and with many a device; and, while the steps—I do not know whether the Minister of Finance would have done anything in that way—with which the leader of the Conservative party would lead would be very humble and simple, the steps of the leader of the Opposition and of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and the waltzing that would be indulged in by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and the hon. and graceful member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser)—the display under these circumstances made by the Reform party would be very striking, and not only striking, but varied, indeed.

Hon. gentlemen opposite complain, in doleful tones, of misrepresentation. They complain that we misrepresent them; they complain that we say at one time they are revenue tariffists, at another time that they are reciprocityists, at another time that they are free traders, and I heard the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald), on Thursday, make that complaint in doleful and lugubrious tones. But the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), on Friday, appeared in a new character in this House in making his complaint as to misrepresentation. That hon. gentleman is not a man, in my opinion, used to the melting mood; he is cast in too stern a mould. But on Friday, at the beginning of his remarks, the tears seemed to course down his cheeks, while he complained that we accused him of going for free trade as it is in England, and that we accused him and his colleagues of wanting reciprocity, and, after turning a corner, very sharply and very deftly, where protection and coal oil and Liberal principles jostled, he said, and laid it down in his bandit style, that it was a scandal and a shame—and he was indignant and vigorous as usual, so far as was consistent with the lacrimosity of which I have spoken—that our policy is a revenue tariff, and the issue is between protection and a revenue tariff. We will inquire into this. As I say, we have this pamphlet here, and we have other pamphlets, and I will turn first to the pamphlet described as “Principles, policy and platform of the Liberal Party.” Here is what I will first read to the House. Something is said about the tariff, and other questions are mentioned, such as temperance, the superannuation of public officers, the abolition of Government House—on which the Liberal party has ranged itself in opposition to certain lines pursued by the Conservatives—and it is stated, “No doubt, the views of the Liberal party, as expressed by their leader in Parliament, will yet prevail.” I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, I put to every honest man who will read that statement, whether it does not suggest that the Liberal party has put upon its banner the abolition of Government House? Yet the leader of the Opposition, and no man on that side will dare to come forward and propose the abolition of Government House. The way it is put there is far worse than if it were absolutely stated that they had arrayed themselves against it, because it is adroitly and dishonestly suggested here. “The conclusion of the whole matter, briefly is this, that the Liberal party is a party of hope.” I have always known that of the Liberal party. Since I first began to study politics in Canada, I have found the Liberal party full of hope. I knew the Hon. George Brown, when he was leader of the party. I liked the late Mr. Brown very much; he was great and he was grotesque. But hope was the main element of his character, and hope has been the main element in the character of the Reform party for the last seventeen years, and hope will continue to be one of its main elements; but I would remind them that hope has often told a flattering tale. This is what the Liberal party does. “It grows on the decay of the principles opposed to it—its leaves have always the freshness of spring about them.” This indicates a growth of a fungus character, because it is not a party whose principles grow out of the root, having a vigour of its own and an organic life of its own, but it grows on the decay of the principles opposed to it. Then, “It appeals to the heart and conscience of the people for support.” “It seeks office”—and I ask attention to this phrase—“only to advance public interests.” “It levies taxes only for the interest of the taxpayers.” Here it is suggested that somebody else imposes taxes for somebody else’s interests. It asks for new legislation only that constitutional government may be strengthened, and the rights of citizenship may be enlarged. And then, this is the advice given to the readers of this pamphlet:

Keep to reason, to the sense of justice and the consciences of men. Appeal to this great, and in the long-run, unerring tribunal.

And the way they keep to a sense of justice, is by such ambiguous methods as I have described, and the way they appeal to the consciences of men, is by something that may fairly be branded with insincerity. I have said, Sir, that this party was an incongruous party, but I did not describe, as I should have, one of the main characteristics of the first pamphlet. The main characteristic of it, is the note that runs through it, and that note is a note of “Little Canadaism.” In this very pamphlet which is sent through the length and breadth of the land as the bible of the Reform party, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) speaks of Canada as being a small country. Sir, we will not hear of our Dominion being described as a small country. Twenty-three years ago the then leader of the Reform party, the Hon. George Brown, said to me: Canada is one of the richest countries on the face of the globe. Since then it has made great progress, and its incoherent wealth is not equalled by the incoherent wealth of any country in the world. Now, Sir, something occurred in connection with that conclave of the Reform party that was of interest. It was presided over by Sir Oliver Mowat, who is a great man. At that very convention he was described by the hon. member for L’Islet (Mr. Tarte) as a very great man. And, Sir Oliver Mowat tells us, that in his opinion Canada is a prosperous country, a country which utterly transcends what the United States was when it had a population of the same number. Sir Oliver Mowat takes the railways we have, he takes the number of post offices we have, he takes the amount of our bank capital, he takes all the elements of wealth we have in Canada, and he shows that the United States when it set up for itself, and when it had the same population as we had in 1893, had nothing like our conveniences of civilization and our facilities for prosperity and progress. In fact, Sir Oliver describes Canada in 1893 as a most prosperous country. I lay it down, Sir: that the prosperity of a country depends on its fiscal policy. I see that my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) seems to doubt that. I lay it down: that the prosperity of a country depends upon its fiscal policy. And, if my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) is doubtful about that, I can tell him that the leader of the Opposition lays down, in this very book, the same proposition; and not only that, but he says, he agrees with every word of the great Reform magnate and leader who presided over that convention. But when we analyse what the leader of the Opposition said, we find that he disagrees with Sir Oliver Mowat, although he is not at liberty to fight or quarrel with what was done at that meeting, because at page 23 of the pamphlet, his own description of the convention is :

It is a convention not to ratify cut and dry resolutions, but anxious that the policy adopted should come from the people themselves who are here represented.

In the very same breath my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) says that our ideal should be the fiscal policy of England, that our ideal should be free trade, and yet he declares for reciprocity. And of course he (Mr. Laurier) differs from the speech of Sir Oliver Mowat, and indeed that speech of Sir Oliver Mowat's, comparing it with all the other speeches instinct with what I will call little Canadaism, was as a grand Corinthian gateway leading to a little terrace of two-story tenement houses.

The hon. leader of the Opposition received a telegram from the Liberals of British Columbia, and my hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior) will be interested to know what the Liberals of British Columbia telegraphed on that occasion. They seem to be in as great a fog as Liberals elsewhere in Canada. This is what they telegraphed :

Sentiment here favours a policy of freer trade relations with Great Britain and her colonies, especially Australia, and reciprocity of trade with all other nations.

Now, Sir, it is hard to say what this means. It is absolutely void of sense, unless it means a pan-Britannic Zollverein. Reciprocity of trade with all nations outside the Empire must mean a tariff arrangement of reciprocal duties ; and freer trade relations with Great Britain and her colonies, would mean something closer. As that is the only meaning that can be rationally given to it,—if you suppose that a rational sense dictated the telegram,—then, Sir, that telegram instead of favouring the views put forward at the convention, is opposed to them. The leader of the Opposition denounces the tariff as a servile copy of the American system, and yet, in the same breath, he declares himself in favour of reciprocity, which would give us the American system, and which would give us a higher tariff for whatever carefully compiled list of articles we included in a reciprocity treaty. But, Sir, not only that ; but the leader of the Opposition denounces protection as fraud and robbery, and yet he tells us that it will be continued. At page 33 of his pamphlet, he indicates that if the Liberals get into power, he really would not alter this fraud and robbery at all. He says :

Nothing is more difficult—that is one of the evils of protection—than to wipe away protection, because under it interests have been established which every man who has at heart the interests of all classes must take into consideration. It is always easy to increase the tariff because by doing so you increase the private fortunes of certain individuals, but whenever you decrease the tariff, it has always to be done with careful consideration, and I am sure that when the Liberals are in power they will not be indifferent to this primary truth.

The primary truth is : that it is very difficult, if once you have a protective tariff, to alter it. It is very difficult he says, to get rid of the fraud and robbery, and so as the Montreal "Herald" assured us : if the Liberal party came into power, we should still have the fraud and robbery perpetuated. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) also says : We have stolen his thunder. Well, Sir, that phrase "tariff reform" is not a phrase that would be used by the Liberals. What they want is tariff revolution. Tariff reform is a phrase which would be used by men who believe in protection, and as a fact, it was a protectionist who used the phrase first, and it was then adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Speaker, let me ask : What can you make of such gyrating as that ? He wants a fair and liberal reciprocity treaty. He says our ideal fiscal system is the British system of free trade ; and then he says in a reciprocity treaty you have to have a well-considered list of manufactured articles. Then, what are we told on page 34 ?

Our immediate aim is a tariff for revenue only.

Now, are hon. gentlemen opposite in a position to complain of us if we do not know where they are ? Are they in a position to go to the country a few months hence and say that they have put a plain and square issue before the country, when a careless free trader might read these programmes and fancy the party were in favour of free trade, a revenue tariffist might think they were in favour of a revenue tariff, and a reciprocity might think they were in favour of reciprocity ? Well, Sir, I may say that I have watched with amusement for seven years the strenuous and steadfast manner in which hon. gentlemen opposite have nailed their weather-cock to the mast. Now Mr. Speaker, in regard to this inconsistency, I want to call attention to what the sub-leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), says, and let me say here in passing, that no one is to be condemned for changing his opinions. If opinions are changed from conviction, no one is to be condemned for that. To change opinions is the law of human progress. But, Sir, when you find that a great party seems at one time to cry out for reciprocity, at another time for free trade, and at another time for a revenue tariff, at the same time professing a high standard of moral virtue, I think you must come to the conclusion that you are somewhat in the atmosphere of the witches, described in Macbeth, where false is true, and foul is fair. The hon. member for South Oxford tells us, on page 44 of this pamphlet :

Liberty and protection are a contradiction in terms.

There is another instance of the non-natural use of the word liberty. He knows very well that that is not the meaning, as a rule, attached to the word liberty. But, Sir, he is not the only sinner. At Winnipeg, the hon. leader of the Opposition declared :

Protection was slavery, a bondage of precisely the same character as southern slavery.

There, again, is the non-natural use of language. It is pure rhetoric, and no one on analysing it would attach the least importance to it. Then, Sir, at page 43 the hon. member for South Oxford says :

Free trade, as far as our position allows us to adopt it.

And then at page 45—and I entreat your attention, Mr. Speaker, because it is really laughable—he is in favour of :

A decisive reform strictly on the line of a revenue tariff.

Then, at pages 46 and 48 we are told :

The Liberal party have always advocated—

And, of course, they advocate still—

Reciprocity with the United States in order, first, to destroy the protective system, and secondly, to obtain free access to the markets of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how can you make out the least consistency in such utterances as these by the hon. member for South Oxford within the space of a quarter of an hour, and within a few pages of this book, which is circulated as the Reform bible? Some explanation is due here. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) declares, in a speech, that Canada is in a most deplorable condition, and he tells us that he heard with the greatest delight the speeches that had been made. At page 54, he says :

I am delighted with the speeches I have heard to-night. Our leaders propose to follow the example of England in trade matters.

That is the impression left on the mind of an enlightened member of Parliament, who was a member of that convention, after hearing the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford. Yet, Sir, the same leaders, in the speeches referred to, declared that they were in favour of reciprocity, in order to get free access to the American markets, while everybody knows that you cannot get free access to the American markets except by adopting a tariff that will be much more protective than any we have ever had. Then the leader once more came forward and proposed a resolution. Amongst other things he did what I am going to refer to later—he compared the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) to St. Paul. In that speech, which you will find at page 73 of the pamphlet, the leader says :

I leave it to the workingmen if protection is anything else but slavery.

The very same sort of wild rhetoric that fell from the hon. member for South Oxford. Then we have the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) making a speech, and proposing the second resolution. He says :

We have advocated a reduction of the tariff and such freedom of trade as is consistent with the raising of the revenue necessary for carrying on the government of the country.

But on page 80, he says :

They are willing to negotiate a reciprocity treaty.

Then he becomes indignant, after his usual manner, and denounces any persons who ever hinted that the Liberal party were in favour of any other kind of reciprocity than a limited reciprocity. He says :

They were willing to negotiate a reciprocity treaty, and it was never understood that the tariff of the two countries should be uniform, or that Canada's control of fiscal questions should be interfered with.

Then how is the hon. member for South Oxford to get the goods of Canada into the United States free? So that we find that not only are the speeches of the two principal leaders inconsistent with themselves, but the speeches of one leader after another are inconsistent with the speeches of those of other leaders, and inconsistent with themselves. What does the second resolution say? We want a fair and liberal reciprocity, including a well-considered list of manufactured articles.

A well-considered list of manufactured articles will, I suppose, include some of our leading manufactures. If it does, what will happen? You will have free trade in these matters with the United States, and you must have a tariff the same as theirs. You cannot get over it. I cannot see how such a policy can be worked out, and I should be very glad if hon. gentlemen would go into it in detail. They ought to go into it in detail. Take one item, "Braces, suspenders, and parts of these." We import $71,000 worth of these articles, and we receive a duty of $24,000. Open a market with the United States, and we shall have to put on 45 per cent, instead of 35 per cent, and lose in duty some $10,000, and so on with other articles coming in now in part from Great Britain and in part from the United States, on which we will have to levy the Washington tariff, until we lose some five or six million dollars. Then, we must make an arrangement whereby so much will be allowed to the United States on our part, and so much allowed by them to us on their part. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) seconded the motion, and his remarks are most interesting. He said that he was in favour of throwing down the barriers. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not in his place, I am certainly sorry for the reason which compels him to be absent. He wanted to throw down the barriers between the two countries and give the people of Canada access to their natural market. He said :

We propose to give you the market for ducks as well as everything else—

But we may feel sure, Mr. Speaker, that his market for ducks, like everything else he proposes, is a "canard."

We propose to throw down the barriers of trade between these two countries and to give the people of Canada access to their natural market.

He then explains by amplifying :

In brief, my friends, the policy that is foreshadowed and described by this resolution will benefit the agriculturist ; the miner ; it will give a market for our iron ore, for structural material, for all this natural wealth in our mines which to-day is almost without value. It will give prosperity to our lumber trade ; it will benefit our fisheries ; it will benefit all the great industries of this country, except, possibly, some lines of manufacturing industries.

This is really very explicit. What it means is, that Canada would become a donkey-engine for the United States : the fireman to be the Yankee engine-driver. He sees, of course, that this would entail discrimination against England ; the adoption, in fact, notwithstanding loud-mouthed professions in favour of free trade and revenue tariff, of a much higher protective tariff than we have at present in Canada ; he anticipates the charge of disloyalty to Great Britain, and says he is not concerned with this. All he wants to ask : "Is it loyal to Canada ? Will it promote the interest of Canada ? Britain is looking after her own interests, and we may look after ours." And yet at the same meeting he voted for a resolution, charging the National Policy with discriminating against Great Britain. As we should shut out all the manufactures which we now receive from England, and which pay duty, which we could bring in from the United States free, we should, of course, lose some millions of dollars. And this is what the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says as to the way he would meet this :

It is said that this policy will deprive us of a large amount of revenue. If it increases the prosperity of the people, it will increase importations and this will tend to make up the revenue. We can raise up $3,300,000 of the loss from sugar by raising the duty one-fifth of a cent. Other increases and savings would easily make up the rest of the loss.

Of course, by putting a duty on tea, coffee, and the like, considerable revenue could be raised. What they are bound to show us is, what we shall gain as a compensation for the sacrifice. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) does not say positively that we shall gain anything. He said :

If it increases the prosperity of the people, it will increase importations, and this will tend to make up the revenue.

Why, marry come up ! This is statesman-like with a vengeance : "If it increases the prosperity of the people." But, suppose it doesn't ? He admits that we shall lose revenue, because we cease to import from England. But he thinks we shall grow so rich that over the high tariff we have imposed we shall bring in rare and costly articles which will add to the revenue. But how are we going to grow rich ? He himself admits that we shall have injured some lines of manufacturing industries. That is, some factories will either grow weaker, or shut down, and the officers and men go across the line, to be employed there. There will be so much less wealth in the country ; there will be so much less production ; there will be so much less demand for raw material ; our population will have decreased ; there will be fewer mouths to eat the farmers' bread, pork, eggs, roots, fruits, garden stuff. We are, as Sir Oliver Mowat showed, a prosperous people ; yet we are young as compared with the United States, and all our industries will have to go through an ordeal of slaughter-market competition from which only a few will emerge. Such cities as Montreal, Hamilton, Brantford, London, Guelph, Galt, Chatham, industrial centres in every province, from Halifax to Esquimalt, will feel the pressure ; some will succumb ; what shall we have gained ? Are the articles the farmer uses cheaper in the United States than with us ? Let us suppose it has happened. We have raised a still higher wall against England, and we have lost millions of revenue ; but what have we gained ? Take the classes Mr. Charlton enumerates as likely to be benefited. How has it helped the agriculturist ? The corn-fed pork has been brought in competition with the pork of the Canadian farmer—to take one item. Has that been of advantage to him ? I have here a table which shows the effect of the tariff, as regards the staples of the farm :

Speaker, were this duty to be taken away, the farmers would lose that home market which we have for those important articles. What has been the result? Let us now talk in the historical tense, of the change. It has been useful to the lumbermen, but it has hit the pork-raising farmer hard. Wheat has been sent to Canada across the line in train loads, as well as agricultural produce of all sorts, including butter and cheese, and the Canadian farmers' home market is gone. Then come the remaining classes which will benefit,—the miner, the lumber trade and the fisheries. I am not at all sure that these would be such large gainers. But suppose they would. First, they can well take care of themselves under a protective tariff, they are a small portion of the community, and, from what I can learn, they are not calling for a change. Can any rational man suppose for a moment that we should get any increase from importation? We should lose from five to ten millions or more, and instead of being independent, self-contained, with a national life of our own, we should become dependent. But to talk once more in the historical tense; let us assume that the change has taken place and that reciprocity, which is dear to the heart of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has become a fact. Many of our importations will come via New York, and importations for the United States will come via Vancouver. We must make some arrangement for distributing the taxation, or else either Canada or the United States will have an advantage, and neither of these countries will submit to that. What then will happen? Why, our Finance Minister will have to wait upon the action of his financial boss at Washington before he can do anything; all the members of this Parliament, on the night when the tariff is being made at Washington, will hang around the telegraph office outside to know what is being done at Washington. Why, Sir, a man would rather be a kitten and cry "Mew!" than be the Finance Minister of Canada or even a citizen of Canada, under such a condition of affairs. And suppose they have arranged a tariff in such a way as to be unpleasant to us, and we have appealed, and our appeal has been treated with contempt. We have objected again, and no notice has been taken of it. And somebody says: Appeal once more. For a moment the lion's blood in our veins, which has not been wont to run in the weak and sluggish current of submission, flames up, and we are ready to cry: "Appeal!" But a moment of reflection shows us that, at the bidding of greedy and mistaken politicians, we have sold our birthright for worse than a mess of pottage, and, in the language of Marino Faliero, we sigh:

But thou sayest well—we must be humble now.

When I look through the speeches of hon. gentlemen, look through their speeches here in this very book, I cannot but feel that, even while professing loyalty, they almost sneer at it. They say it "does not exude from our pores." That is the language of the hon. leader of the Opposition. And the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), the other day in Toronto, sneered at professions of loyalty. I hope he has read the article that appeared in the "Journal" of this city on the subject. Sir, when I read these speeches, when I hear such utterances on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, I would to God that I could put in words that could not die the shame, the rage, the scorn, of all that is young and generous in this Dominion of Canada at these false cries of mistaken economics, and these craven utterances of irrational, and unpatriotic, and unfounded fears. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me ask a question in regard to reciprocity. Hon. gentlemen opposite all assume that they could get it. I remember once being at St. Mary's, when a Liberal meeting was being held in the theatre there, and a gentleman came in and said to me: You ought to go across; they are pitching into you. So I thought I would go across, and hear what they were saying. They had ceased pitching into me, but they were setting forth all the great advantages that would accrue from the reciprocity treaty. And I was asked to go up on the platform. After some demur, I went up, and said to the people: I have no doubt that the speakers, before I came here, have been telling you of the advantages that would accrue from a reciprocity treaty; and, no doubt, after I leave the meeting, they will tell you of the advantages that would accrue from a reciprocity treaty. But, I said, ask them this question: Can you get it? And, if they say, We can, ask them: Why did you not get it when you were in power? You were in power from 1874 to 1878; why did you not get it then? They may say, We tried. So they did try. They sent their ablest man, the late Hon. George Brown. He went to Washington and offered reciprocity, which included a carefully-prepared list of manufactured articles. But, Mr. Speaker, the very moment he came to that, he struck a diplomatic snag, and no progress could be made. And I believe that the Government of that time—the hon. member for Bothwell was a member of it, and will be able to tell me whether I am right or wrong—passed an Order in Council, or made a ministerial note, that England could not be discriminated against; and that was in consequence of the strong cry throughout the country. And the moment they decided that they could not discriminate against England, the Washington negotiators said: Well, good-bye; we cannot talk with you. They cannot discuss reciprocity with us except upon the preliminary condition that we shall be ready to discriminate against England. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, all this talk—to use a word I have heard used by hon. gentlemen opposite—is mere buncombe, unless they can show the people how they are going to get reciprocity. Have they an abler man than George Brown was? Can they go further with the United States than they could in his time? At that time, as I was well aware, there was the most devoted feeling of loyalty to England; but, Sir, strong as was that feeling of devotion to the mother country then, at this moment it is still stronger. What chance, therefore, have you of being able to discriminate against England? Why, Sir, the very suggestion was sufficient to arouse a flame throughout the length and breadth of this land. And the bare fact that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) cannot refrain from these statements that he makes about reciprocity, these incautious statements that cause so much confusion and unpleasant feelings in his own party, is merely a proof that, like the Bourbons, he can learn nothing and forget nothing. Though he is one of the ablest men in Canada, he is really the greatest barrier to the success of his party; he is, in fact, the rogue elephant of the Liberal party of Canada, and they do not know what to do with him.

But, Sir, what are the evidences, even if you could get a reciprocity treaty, it would do you all this good? You must remember that the reciprocity treaty existed from 1854 to 1866, a peculiar period. For more than half that time you had a great war and the effects of a great war. If, even without any reciprocity treaty, you had at this moment a great internecine war going on below the international boundary line, the effect upon the prosperity of this country would be very great indeed. But times have greatly changed. Our trade with our neighbours has greatly increased since 1866; and the ratio of advantage, which was with them during the time of the reciprocity treaty, is really with us. And, then, let me put this problem to the thoughtful man, to the hon. member who is looking at me so intently now, the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor)—The total value of imports from Canada during the eleven and a half years of a reciprocity treaty was $247,095,709. Now, taking the same articles which we exchanged with them during that time, what is the exportable surplus in those commodities of the United States to-day? In the very commodities of which our whole trade during eleven and a half years was only 247 millions, the exportable surplus in that single year is $335,600,000. What chance, under those circumstances, is there that in those articles, with an exportable surplus of 88½ millions more in one year than the whole volume of trade during eleven and a half years—what chance is there, I say, that even if we had a reciprocity treaty, we should gain any advantage? Would not the bare fact that they have that surplus, and that Canada presents the lines of nearest advantage, force their goods across the line to us, instead of giving us a market for our goods? Now, those articles may be divided into three classes. First, there are articles which the United States now produce in such a large exportable surplus that a reciprocity treaty would open our markets to the United States rather than those of the United States to Canada. Then there are articles in which there would be an exchange because of convenience; and then articles in which the likelihood is that Canada, under the present conditions, would find a good market without exchanging the same articles. In wheat, wheat flour, oats, oatmeal, and all other breadstuffs, the yearly average import from Canada by the United States during the reciprocity treaty, was $9,628,472 worth, while the United States exported to all other countries, $42,350,077 worth. The value of the exports of the United States in those articles, during 1894, was $165,579,522. You have only to do a sum in proportion in order to see that instead of doing a trade of $9,628,000 worth when the United States had only an exportable surplus of $42,351,000, now, when they have an exportable surplus in those articles of $165,500,000, why the probability is that you would only do a trade with them of $2,500,000. All this talk about reciprocity is very easy.

First, you ask them: Can they get it for you; and next you may ask: Suppose they can, what is the value of it? Now, Sir, let us return from this reciprocity episode to the utterances of gentlemen at this conclave. Mr. D. McRae, of Guelph, Ontario, when speaking to the second resolution, which gave such pleasure last week to my hon. friend from King's, N.S., says, page 90:

I believe, therefore, that it would be for the benefit of our farmers if a policy were adopted which would give us free access to the United States markets.

A most naive remark. Can any one doubt it? The more markets we have the better. But suppose we had to pay too much for it. And, then, with still greater naiveté, he says:

I am glad that this is the second and not the first plank in the platform.

He sees the inconsistency, and he seems to prefer the first. He adds:

We have already adopted a resolution in favour of free trade with Great Britain.

He sees there is some inconsistency, there is some difficulty here. He says: We have adopted a resolution in favour of free trade with Great Britain; how, then, are you going to get access to the markets of the United States? The second resolution being in favour of reciprocity, and the first in favour of free trade with Great Britain, how are you going to reconcile the two? Why, Sir, it is like a man, at nine o'clock swearing loyalty to the British flag, looking up at that piece of bunting which has performed such wonderful things in the course of centuries, declaring that he is ready to live under it, and to die for it; and then, at three o'clock, changing his accents, and changing the Queen's English in his mouth, and pointing to "them Stars and Stripes," swears that he is ready to live under them, and die for them. The inconsistency is just as great in the one case as in the other. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, in the course he is taking in sending out those pamphlets, full of contradictions, and with these contradictory principles in his own mouth, and in the mouths of his leading colleagues, is proceeding into this battle the embodiment of a monstrous inconsistency. Why, Sir, he outdoes Don Quixote, and if he could succeed, would throw into the shade all the marvels of the Arabian Nights. With free trade for his talisman, and with reciprocity for his spellword, he thinks that by the magic of a revenue tariff he is going to chase the Tory cohorts. Why, Sir, a man who should declare to you that at noon-day he could fuse the sunbeams of the vanished mornings with the moonbeams of nights yet to come, would be a trifle of inconsistency and audacious pretension, compared with the hon. gentleman. Why,

Sir, if he could do this in a rational world—and I think Canada belongs to that sphere—if he could do what he thinks of doing, while talking in one second of a revenue tariff, and in the next, of free trade, and in the next of reciprocity, if he could get a rational people to entrust to him their destinies, he would be more astonishing than the magician who, by waving his wand, could present to you the arctic bear, sailing on icebergs, under equatorial suns, or the frosts of a torrid June nipping the rosebuds of an arctic December. Now, I have tried to put his inconsistency in as clear a light as I could, but I know what a herculean task I undertake, and I am not at all sure that I have done full justice to the extraordinary bearing, and the extraordinary versatility of opinions of the hon. gentleman. Well, Sir, Mr. McRae goes on and says :

I had the honour, during the past winter, of attending a gathering of representative farmers in the city of Toronto, the Central Farmers' Institute of Ontario, at which a resolution was unanimously adopted declaring in favour of an immediate reduction of the duties on British goods.

This is very instructive. This Mr. McRae is not a highly educated man like the leader of the Opposition; he is not an eminent lawyer like the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), he is not a kind of half financier and half sophist, like the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He is a plain man; but you see, after he has listened to their speeches, the impression left on his mind is such that he quotes with the utmost innocence, this resolution as a general declaration in favour of an immediate reduction of the duties on British goods. And they want reciprocity. Why, Mr. Speaker, I have compared that convention to a conclave. A conclave, we know, is a very solemn assembly that meets on very solemn occasions, and I have made some suggestions of comparison. But, looking at their work it was, after all, more like a vast political Dorcas society engaged in the manufacture of a patchwork political quilt, varied with all sorts of colours, and all sorts of stuff. Now, Sir, we have a Mr. Wise, to whose views I would like to call attention. But, before doing that, I should like to direct attention, by way of relieving the tension of the tariff question to what the hon. leader of the Opposition said of his associates at that meeting. The leader of the Opposition, if I may say so, may be likened to Hecate coming down to the witches in Macbeth, the hon. member for South Oxford, the hon. member for Brant, the hon. member for Queen's, and their supporters and colleagues, and as Hecate said to the witches that they will share in the gains, he suggests that they will be rewarded, and he mentions each one by name. "Sir Richard Cartwright, a man whose mental qualities are well known to you all, but whose qualities of heart are well known to me also." They are not known to any member of the party—that is a recondite virtue, they are well known to me. "Mr. Paterson, who is a power whenever he chooses to be a power." "Mr. Davies, a brave of the brave." "Mills, who knows everything and has read everything." I do not know whether it would be fair to add, digests nothing. "Mr. Charlton, whose commercial knowledge is eulogized." "Mullock, young in the House, but effective as a debater." And last, "our friend Mr. Edgar, whose qualities are well known to you." The hon. gentleman is afraid to particularize them; he finds that Mr. Edgar is the 'ne plus ultra' of moral interest his party affords. He must know the hon. member for Wellington better than I do, he must be able almost to apply the cathode rays to the hon. gentleman; indeed, the hon. leader of the Opposition must know his friends so clearly that they must prove an interesting study, but he has not helped us to get at the moral conscience and peculiar mental build of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). He simply says "our friend Edgar, whose qualities are well known to you." A little earlier the leader of the Opposition dealt with a great man in his party, who, he tells us, is to be a Minister of the Crown, the member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), and compares him to St. Paul. Sir, I am not so sure that it was not an instructive comparison. No comparison can be supposed to go entirely on all-fours, but the hon. gentleman compared the hon. member for L'Islet to St. Paul. And why? Because he had changed his opinions. But, Mr. Speaker, in this very pamphlet the hon. member for L'Islet says that he has not gone back on his past. But St. Paul went back on his past. Yet there is a singular similarity, I grant you, between the hon. member for L'Islet and St. Paul. We know the Apostle Paul had, and we know that the hon. member for L'Islet is a thorn in the flesh. The Apostle Paul, too, at a certain time described himself as ready to be offered, and that the time of his departure was at hand. I have no doubt, from all I hear, that the hon. member for L'Islet could say with truth that he was ready to be offered, or was about to be offered; and that the time of his departure was at hand. But when we go back and look at the mental and moral peculiarities, I am afraid we cannot see any strong foundation for the comparison. I have referred to the fact that hon. members spoke as though they were going to win. While reviewing the hon. gentlemen, who were his colleagues and his fellow-leaders, in the very same convention when some of them said he would soon be Premier, and Senator Power, in giving eloquent voice to the hopes that were throbbing the Reform party, said: I came down here because they said the Reform party was dead, and I wanted to see whether it was dead or not, but I find that there is life in the old dog yet—and that is all he could say. What was the note of the leader? At that meeting, where it should have been a call to victory, what were the words of a call to victory, what were the words used by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier)? Though he said—his mounting courage dashed with the pale cast of thought—"we hoped for victory, still, you know, that victory does not always come to those who expect it." Too true; and, as the hon. member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would say:

The earth hath bubbles as the water has,
And these are of them.

I wish for a moment to call the attention of the House to some statistics, and I will do so very briefly, as offering a reply to the statement made that the policy of the party with which I act has impeded commerce and kept back the country. We have the debt referred to as having increased. Well, if I may refer to a debate that took place yesterday, or rather repeat what I said yesterday, I pointed out that if you borrow money at three or three and a half per cent, and so invest it as part of the assets and capital of Canada that it realizes 10, 15 or even 50 per cent, one of the best things you can do is to borrow money, and one of the best transactions you can engage in is to go into debt. Since 1879 the gross debt of Canada has increased by $118,000,000. The capital invested in the Canadian Pacific Railway system is over $315,000,000; practically the whole of it has been invested since the National Policy was brought into operation. During the ten years since 1881 to 1891 the capital invested in manufactures was $189,600,000. These sources, Canadian Pacific Railway and manufactures, make up $504,600,000 in round numbers. Thus, in those two investments, the National Policy gave opportunities for developing the estate of Canada by $396,000,000 more than the increase in our public debt, to say nothing of other chances of profitable investment created or enlarged by the operation of the National Policy. Take the advance since 1861 in our wealth, and look at the growth of our towns in consequence of the debt. According to the census of 1891, we have in Canada cities and towns with a population of 100,000 and upwards, two, Montreal and Toronto; with 25,000 and less than 70,000, seven including Winnipeg. Of places with 10,000 population, and less than 25,000, eleven, including Vancouver and Victoria. Of places with 5,000, and less than 10,000, there were twenty-six, including New Westminster. There were forty-six towns with a population between 3,000 and 5,000. And if you look at the growth of the industrial interests of this country, what do you find?

The number of establishments in 1881 were 49,923, and in 1891, 75,768.

The capital invested in 1871 was nearly $78,000,000; in 1881, $165,500,000; and in 1891, $354,000,000. The number of employees in 1871 was 188,000; in 1881, 255,000; and in 1891, 368,000.

The wages paid in 1871 was $41,000,000; in 1881, $59,500,000; and in 1891, $99,750,000.

The cost of raw material in 1871 was $125,000,000; in 1881, $180,000,000; and in 1891, $256,000,000.

The value of products in 1871 amounted to $221,500,000; in 1881, $310,000,000; and in 1891, $475,500,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the face of such progress as that, I do not very well understand how hon. gentlemen opposite can say that our policy has impeded commerce and development. In the year ended on the 30th June, 1894, the total export and import trade of Canada amounted to $241,000,000 as against a total in 1868 of $131,000,000. It must be remembered that values have fallen since 1868, something like 33½ per cent, and on the basis of values of 1868, the Trade Returns for 1894 would stand at some $305,000,000. The increased volume of trade may thus be inferred. At the present day, 1895, the following is the estimated population of the principal towns, villages and cities, along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and its connections in Manitoba, the Territories, and British Columbia. Of places with a population of over 300 to 1,000, nine. Two thousand to 5,000 population, fifteen. The present estimated population of Winnipeg is 30,000; New Westminster, 9,000; and Vancouver, 20,000. The assessments are as follows:—Calgary, over $1,500,000; Vancouver, $19,000,000; New Westminster, $7,500,000; Winnipeg, $22,000,000; Brandon, $6,000,000; and North Bay, Sudbury, Fort William, Rat Portage, Regina, Moose Jaw, and a dozen other places have made great advance. Of the thirty-eight chartered banks of Canada, no less than ten have branches in Winnipeg; three in Brandon, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver, New Westminster; and at all other places along the line of any consequence, such as Regina there is a branch of a chartered bank. In Winnipeg it was found necessary, in 1893, to establish a clearing house, making the fifth in Canada, and its recorded transactions for the first half year amounted to $4,750,000. The transactions of the five clearing houses in Montreal, Toronto, Halifax, Hamilton and Winnipeg, amounted for the year 1895 to $981,000,000. Now, Sir, I referred to what the Board of Trade in Toronto has said, and let me just quote one or two sentences from that very weighty publication. The report of the Toronto Board of Trade contains the following:—

It is pleasing to note from the bank returns that the county is making progress; slow, no doubt, yet evidently gradually getting wealthier. In 1890 the bank deposits were $138,000,000, in 1895 they are $198,000,000. In Government savings banks, in 1890, $39,000,000 ; in 1895, $44,000,000. The policy of the banks has been of a conservative character, and this has had its effect in largely assisting to bring the business into a sounder condition. Let the banks adhere to the policy of lending all the money possible for sound business engagements—and none whatever for purely speculative enterprises.

And in at least half a dozen parts of this important publication, it is stated that Canada is recovering from the depression ; and the great progress that has been made by Canada is pointed out. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention and the attention of the House to what is of great interest to me, namely, the progress that has been made in the North-west. I have in my hand a tabular statement of the exports of cattle, sheep, and hogs, shipped from Manitoba and the North-west Territories to eastern points during the five years from 1891 to 1895. That statement is as follows :—

I am sorry to say that in these years there were no hogs exported from the North-west Territories, and more shame to our farmers, who ought to engage in that profitable industry. Now, Sir, I want to point out, and I do it in no spirit of rivalry, the great increase of the export of cattle from the North-west Territories, as compared with the export of cattle from Manitoba. Owing to our far larger ranches, and to other causes, you see that in the exportation of cattle, whereas, in 1891, the North-west Territories exported just about the same number as Manitoba, yet in 1895 the North-west Territories exported double the quantity, namely, 27,044, that was exported by Manitoba, showing, of course, a very great percentage of increase on a comparison with Manitoba, and an immense percentage of increase on the showing of the Territories themselves, in 1891. What it means is this, that the cattle trade in the North-west Territories is on the road to a development that will give us from year to year an ever-increasing exportation. The North-west Territories will not disappoint even the most sanguine hopes. But, as I have ventured to point out yesterday, the country has peculiarities of its own ; and before ranchers or farmers can succeed in it, they have to understand the country and its peculiarities of climate and soil, which require a special course of action. The quantities of wheat, barley and oats, in bushels, exported from the North-west Territories, so far as we know in the years 1891 and 1895, were as follows :—

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.
1895.....	1,884,552	7,669	187,947

In 1891 the North-west Territories exported 1,282,618 bushels of grain, and in 1895, 2,080,168 bushels, or an aggregate for those two years of 4,160,326 bushels. In opening this debate, the Finance Minister referred to an article in the "Nineteenth Century" on this subject : "Can the Empire Feed Itself ?" the writer of which, Mr. Laing, goes very fully into the question. Mr. Laing had visited the North-west, and in his article he demonstrates that nothing is easier than for the Empire to feed itself. All the Empire has to do, as was pointed out in the "Saturday Review," quoted by the hon. baronet in his speech before the board of trade at Montreal, is to direct its attention to sending emigration to Canada, and to the other colonies of the Empire, to Canada especially. Instead of emigration to go whither it lists, to grow up in families antagonistic, probably, to the Empire, let the British Government co-operate in an emigration policy with this Government, and nothing is easier than to put 50,000 farmers upon farms in the North-west Territories, as Mr. Laing suggested, and get the millions of bushels of wheat necessary to feed the Empire. He calculates for only twenty bushels to the acre to produce that result. Now, Sir, the hon. members of the Opposition who have spoken in this debate, and who have spoken in this pamphlet, although they contradict each other on the trade policy, one and all speak as though they were on the eve of coming into power. They sometimes say it in faltering tones, but it is quite clear their minds are full of the idea. Now, Sir, one question that will have to be asked, in addition to the question of preference as to the two policies, will be as to the men. The Apostle Paul of the party would be a Minister if that party came into power. I am told that he would get the Department of Railways and Canals. Well, from what we are told of his achievements in connection with railways, that would of course be very welcome to the people of Canada. Then, I am told, that the hon. member for King's, N.S. (Mr. Borden), would be the Minister of Militia. That hon. gentleman, when speaking here the other night, of that programme, although I believe he thinks highly of it, could not help showing that the reason he read it 'in extenso' was that he was rattled. Now, I do not think the country wants a rattled Minister of War. And the hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Forbes), I am told, is to be Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Well, Sir, I have no doubt that if ever that occurs, not only all the shrimps in what Æschylus calls "the streams of ocean," will forget that silence is not only golden but crustacean as well, and will break into a paean of triumph because of the promotion of their intellectual congener. Then, Sir, the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) wants, I believe, to be Solicitor General. And then, Sir, the Department of the Interior—that department which above all others requires an original mind, a man of resource, and still more, an honest man—that is to be handed over to—I will not breathe his name, I will not tell his dwelling place, I will not state his constituency; that is to be handed over to the Knave of Spades. When the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) becomes a Minister at the head of the Department of the Interior, I have no doubt he will find himself in a peculiar frame of mind. We are having so many historical allusions at present that I cannot keep from them. I was at the ball last night, and historical allusions are in the air. The leader has compared the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr.

Tarte) to the Apostle Paul, and I cannot help thinking that there will be conflicting mental emotions in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg, something like those in the mind of Wolfe on the eve of the glorious battle in which he fell. You remember that that gallant general, on the night before the battle, was in a pensive mood. He was thinking of the woman he had left behind him in England, and loved and intended to make his wife; and while in that pensive mood he sat down and wrote:

Two passions, strongly pleading,
My anxious heart divide;
Lo, there my country bleeding,
And there my weeping bride.

Well, Sir, the hon. member, if he becomes Minister of the Interior, will find himself—still pursuing the historical allusion—he will find himself, as Paul says, in a strait betwixt two conflicting emotions—the interests of the North-west Territories pulling one way, and all other interests pulling the other way. And he will parody the lines that Wolfe wrote:

Two passions strong beguiling,
Deprive this heart of rest;
Lo, there the Jack-pot piling,
And there the boundless west.

Of course, my hon. friend the member for Quebec West (Mr. Laurier) would be the Prime Minister, and I must say, that, if he held proper principles, and if he were associated with capable men, if he had a capable Finance Minister, if he had, in fact, a great number of things which are wholly impossible, I should not object to see my hon. friend arrive at that high position. But, with such principles—I do not care which one of them; I do not care whether he nails his weathercock to the mast in the shape of a revenue tariff, or whether he nails it to the mast in the shape of free trade, or whether he nails his weathercock to the mast in the shape of reciprocity—whichever one of them he would stick to in coming into power—I know well that none of them is as good for this country as the National Policy of the Conservative party.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I see that my hon. friend, the Æsculapius of the Liberal party, has come to life again. Under the stirring influence of a prospective conflict, his somnolent intelligence has woke up—and my hon. friend, he too, is to have a portfolio. In fact, I believe it is the determination of the hon. leader of the Opposition to create a special portfolio for my hon. friend that will be consonant with his amiable and interesting peculiarities. But, when I have to consider further, that it is not only an issue between the policy of the Conservative party and ours, but an issue also as to the men in each party—an issue between the composition of the one party and that of the other—and when I see the Opposition that I have been looking at here now in this House from the floor for eight years, and have been observing for the past seventeen years, and when I see that that Opposition is really made up of incompetent material, from which you could not expect anything like homogeneity—it is only a unit in name, it is only the name of the Reform party that keeps it together—I find that it has all the qualities of an interesting menagerie, and I cannot see how such a conflicting aggregate, weak in men and conflicting in principles, could possibly present itself in a favourable light to the electorate of this country. I cannot see how my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Laurier) could possibly, under the circumstances, give a good and strong Government; and I agree with what was said by the Finance Minister in this respect. I say, that never was there a time when the country ought to demand of any party that has its confidence as strong a Government as now; never was there a time when any party that has the confidence of the Government, could be guilty of so great a crime, or misdemeanour, if it does not give the country a strong Government. But, Sir, when I come to register my vote, or to counsel others how to vote, I will have to do it with the feeling that the principles—the contradictory principles to which I have alluded—could not possibly be brought into operation, and could not possibly entitle the party opposite to support, especially when contrasted with the policy which has obtained under the guidance of the Conservative party. The Liberal party offers no guarantee, no chance, no likelihood of giving a strong Government to the country. It offers no likelihood of giving such a Government as would challenge the confidence of the country; and, if the country wants a strong Government, it will have to look, not merely for a sound policy, but for a strong Government, to the Conservative party, as it has done since 1878.

Mr. BAIN. The issues that are before us to-day, it strikes me, have been hardly fairly presented by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. I do not propose to attempt the flights of eloquence which have graced that hon. gentleman's address, nor do I propose to criticise my political opponents as men unworthy of consideration, who are nailing their platform of hypocrisy to the mast and presenting it to the public. Sir, we are here to deal with the practical issues of the day. The question of all questions for us in the one question: Is the country progressing at this moment satisfactorily under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite? And this brings to my mind a quotation which is exceedingly relevant. A few days ago, a customer went into a merchant's shop in Toronto and asked whether business was improving. The merchant answered: We read that it is, in the newspapers, and are told that it is by the politicians, but I do not see it in the till. It is the till that is the practical test whether our business is a success or not, and not the eloquent phrases and the sneers that my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has so freely flung across the House to-day with respect to that large political party—for, I say, it is a large party—represented by the Liberal leader. Let him look back to the votes cast at the general election in 1891, and ask himself how many votes did his party carry the election by, and let him then take back his sneers and insinuations with regard to the party represented by the Liberal leader. I want to say to that hon. gentleman that the party with which he is associated has never yet dared to call together their friends in Canada to consult as to what platform they shall present to the electorate.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman excuse me. Sir John Macdonald did it twice—in Toronto, in Shaftesbury Hall.

Mr. BAIN. How long ago? I think my hon. friend is drifting back into ancient history. He is going back to the period when the great political leader Sir John Macdonald, who is no more, controlled the destinies of that party. It was subsequent to his leadership, I think, that my hon. friend from Assiniboia complained upon a certain occasion of the incapacity of those who administered our affairs, and declared that he could not afford any longer to furnish brains to run the Cabinet. But since the great leader passed away from the political arena, when has their policy ever been submitted for consideration of their supporters? I thought, when I listened to my hon. friend endeavouring to fasten the charge of inconsistency upon the political party with which I am associated, when he elaborated that idea that reciprocity as it is advocated in this country was inconsistent with freer trade relations with the mother country to which we are attached, and to which, I am bound to say without regard to political party, the great mass of the people of Canada are loyal to-day—I thought when I heard him that I should like to ask him, upon what did they carry the elections of 1891? What was it but reciprocity with the United States? The party with which the hon. gentleman is associated owes its success in 1891 to the presentation to the people of this Dominion of a platform of reciprocity. It was not then inconsistent with the maintenance of British institutions and British connection; but it was presented to the people as the one panacea for our troubles and our ills, and the National Policy was allowed to sink into oblivion for the time being. And yet, with the spirit that characterizes those who are inconsistent themselves, the hon. gentleman spurns the very policy to which his leaders owe their seats upon the Treasury benches to-day. On that occasion the great leader of their party anticipated the expiry of the term of Parliament by at least a year. Hon. gentlemen opposite, a year ago, stopped the printing of the public records and every other business to rush through the voters' lists and get ready for an election—and then they concluded they had better not. And so, since then, how have those hon. gentlemen appeared to the electorate of Canada? Have they had one consistent policy throughout? Have we not rather seen a series of strikes on the part of Cabinet Ministers, one after another going out and, after a time, coming back into the line again? And was there ever in the history of the Dominion of Canada such a pitiable exhibition as that witnessed when this House was assembled for this sixth session, when seven Ministers went on strike after the House had met and the Speech from the Throne been delivered by the Governor General? And yet we are lectured by this hon. gentleman for our inconsistency and for having a policy that they cannot understand; and we are told, forsooth, that all the wisdom and all the administrative ability is gathered into this Cabinet—a Cabinet that could not hold together even after having presented a programme to this House. Sir, the hon. gentleman with his classical reference and poetical allusions—and they are very beautiful—does not touch the practical questions that are at issue to-day. He occupies the same relation to the House and to the public as the man who is spoken of by a great writer some twenty-four hundred years ago upon a public occasion: "And lo thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, for they hear thy words, but they do them not." Whoever heard of the hon. gentleman succeeding in carrying any of his propositions through to a conclusion? Why, Sir, only yesterday we listened to his eloquent words with respect to the special treatment the North-west Territories should receive at the hands of this Government. And in past sessions we have listened to earnest pleas for the easing of the burdens of the community by changes in the tariff. But when it comes down to the practical part of the question, his speech may be anywhere, but his vote is solid with the Government.

Now, Sir, before I proceed to deal with the general issue now before the House, I wish to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to one thing which I hope I shall never be guilty of in dealing with questions before this House. I refer to his treatment of this pamphlet which was issued by the political leaders of the party with which I am associated. He read: "This pamphlet is not for general distribution." And then he stopped right there. But, though he stopped quoting, he went on to insinuate that the reason that the pamphlet was not for general distribution was that it was not in harmony with other utterances from the same source. But, Mr. Speaker, he took tremendously good care to leave us to accept his dictum, for he did not dare to present one iota of evidence in substantiation of that charge. Why? Because he knew he could not find within these two pamphlets the contradiction which he insinuated was there. The facts are simply these: This is a pamphlet in which the campaign issues are dealt with at greater length than is desirable for circulation to electors generally, as a matter of cost. For, Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind you that we have no contractors to draw upon when we want money to spread the political principles of our party. When we wish to raise money, we must put our hands into our own pockets and spend our own money; and, therefore, we must be economical. But, Sir, I dare the hon. gentleman or anybody else to find one contradiction between the pamphlet called "Facts for the people," and the larger pamphlet that my hon. friend meanly insinuated was intended for circulation in the country and not in the cities. Sir, I believe in a fair fight. The interests of the country are broad enough and valuable enough to all of us to have them fairly discussed. The hon. gentleman took occasion, in the course of his arguments, to utter some very cutting sarcasms with respect to the political leaders on this side. I do not propose to go over the whole record in connection with that matter, but there are one or two statements that I think require attention at my hands. For instance, he went on to quote from somebody out in the country—and I shall have occasion before I am through, to quote the speeches of Ministers out in the country which may not be quite so pleasant to the hon. gentleman—with reference to the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) and said that he resembled St. Paul.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not quote from any one in the country, but I quoted from the leader of the Opposition. The leader of the Opposition says it in the pamphlet.

Mr. BAIN. I was under the impression that the hon. gentleman quoted from Mr. McRae.

Mr. DAVIN. No, it is in a speech delivered by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Laurier) at the convention. I can give you the page, if you like.

Mr. BAIN. I do not dispute the hon. gentleman's statement. We will correct it, and say that he was quoting from a speech of the leader of the Opposition. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded, with his ordinary mode of criticism, to deal with the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Speaker, I do not presume that the hon. member for L'Islet sets up to be a saint, any more than the rest of us in this House, but I want to say to this House, and to the people of Canada, that, whatever may have been the history of the hon. member for L'Islet in the past—and I remember when he was the trusted leader of my hon. friend opposite, and there was not a word said against him then—whatever his reputation for veracity and honesty may be in the future, it will stand on its own merits, as will that of every other man here. But I say this House and this country owe a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for L'Islet, if for nothing else than unearthing all those scandals with respect to the Langevin-McGreevy contract. What are the facts—facts which were brought out in a committee a majority of whom was hostile to that gentleman, hostile, because he had left them recently, and was exposing some matters of their domestic history that they were exceedingly anxious should not be brought before the public. Yet, Sir, in face of those difficulties, what were the net results of that investigation? I speak within the hearing and knowledge of hon. gentlemen who can correct me, if I am wrong—was not the net result of that Quebec Harbour business just this, that they executed $2,000,000 worth of work, that they received for that work $3,138,000, and that their books show that $170,400 of that money had been contributed for political purposes to aid hon. gentlemen opposite? Is that a just and equitable mode of handling the people's money? We know some results, in addition to that, which did not depend on a parliamentary committee. We saw one gentleman, who stood in the position of first successor to the leadership of the great political party opposite—and I have never denied that they were a great political party, and that it was a laudable ambition in any man to aspire to occupy the position of leader of the great Conservative party. Sir, am I not correct in saying that that gentleman lost his chance of succeeding to the leadership, and passed from public life, degraded and discredited by the result of those revelations of iniquities that had occurred in the administration of his department? We saw two other gentlemen condemned to Her Majesty's prison, and they were released because of the leniency of the Minister of Justice, who said that it was bad for their health to let them remain there any longer. And, Sir, they got a light sentence, because the judge said he believed there were greater criminals behind them that had escaped. I leave the records of the hon. member for L'Islet in the hands of a discerning and discriminating public, who, I am satisfied, will give him credit in these matters. Now, any one standing by and looking at the discussions for the last twelve months in the journals that support hon. gentlemen opposite, will begin to ask himself: Well, who is running the Government of this Dominion? Have we not heard lectures from those hon. gentlemen about what the Opposition policy is and what they would do. Who do we pay for administering the affairs of this Dominion, I would like to ask? Is it the leader of the Opposition, or is it the men who draw salaries from the public till with careful regularity every month, whom we pay to look after and administer our public affairs? And yet, if we were to listen to those hon. gentlemen opposite, and to their statements, we would believe that the leader of the Opposition was the man who was responsible for the conduct of public affairs in this country? When the Cabinet is fully equipped, we have five members from Ontario, four from Quebec, two from Nova Scotia, two from New Brunswick, one represents Manitoba and the North-west, another represents Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia has one—altogether, we have sixteen members of the Privy Council. They are not all of uniform standing. A couple of them used to stand on the doorstep under the name of Controllers. They have moved inside now, and have the same status in the Privy Council as their brethren who draw $7,000 a year, and they draw $5,000. We pay a Premier $8,000, we pay eleven Ministers each $7,000 a year, and we pay two Controllers each $5,000. We used to have a Solicitor General, but he saw a storm coming that my hon. friend is so anxious about, and he quietly scuttled into shelter and left the Cabinet, and now he has found a comfortable judgeship. My hon. friend talked about public sentiment, and he glories in the belief that his political party is solid with the country. I just ask him to look at the trade metropolis of Canada, and look at the seat that that gentleman vacated, and ask himself, how this Cabinet stands with the business men of the city of Montreal. Why, Sir, when the Solicitor General carried that seat at the general election in 1891, he had over 1,300 of a majority. At the by-election the Government selected for their candidate a gentleman who stood high in the city of Montreal for personal integrity and honour. I do not say one word of the character of the gentleman who opposed him, but I say this, that if he is half as dark as he is painted by hon. gentlemen opposite, his election was one of the most scathing denunciations of the policy of the Government that my hon. friend supports, when we remember, that, whereas his predecessor was elected by 1,300 of a majority, my hon. friend who now represents Montreal, on our side of politics, was elected by 300 of a majority over a man with the highest personal reputation. Incidentally, let me say this, while I respect Sir Wm. Hingston's personal character, it is a discredit to the Government, and tends to lower the standing of the Senate in Canada, that even that gentleman, with his reputation and respectability, was placed in that chamber within two weeks of the election—a man whom the people had rejected, and yet he was appointed here to legislate whether the people wished it or not. Yet we are asked to respect a Senate created under these circumstances. Let it be remembered that I do not say one word derogatory to the personal reputation and character of that gentleman, but I protest against the conduct of the Government in wilfully setting at defiance, public opinion.

We have heard from the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) a good deal about our country, and he endeavoured by insinuation to convey to the public the impression that the party with which I am associated and the leader under whom we are acting has always sought to decry and depreciate this Canada of ours. Sir, I hurl back the insinuation, and I tell the hon. gentleman, through you, Mr. Speaker, directly and straightly, that the charge is unfounded and is untrue.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) is aware that it is unparliamentary to characterize any statement of an hon. member as untrue. I am sure he will withdraw that word.

Mr. BAIN. I have no wish to transgress the rules of the House. I recognize the fact, Mr. Speaker, that you have sufficient difficulty with members during ordinary discussions, and I accept your decision and withdraw the word untrue. But I may be allowed to say that the statements that have been sedulously made by hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to the position of the Reform party, and wealth, resources and development of Canada have been unfair and unjust to the great political party to which they are opposed. I will not take a back seat with even the most ultra-Conservative in this House as regards my belief in the resources of Canada and the great heritage we possess. I am satisfied that in the northern portion of this hemisphere we have as splendid a territory, with as vast natural resources, both partially developed and undeveloped, as can be found in any country on the face of the earth, without any exception. Not only so, I believe that the undeveloped resources of this country are untold in wealth as compared with anything we have yet touched. I believe, further, that in the great plains which my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) is so proud to represent, we have an immense area of country where the finest wheat, that which commands the highest price in the world's markets, is produced, and produced, as it was last year, in profusion and abundance. I believe that when our animal products are put on the market—I need not refer to our cheese, because it speaks for itself, and the reputation it has acquired leaves nothing to be said—when our animals are put on the English market, fattened as Ontario farmers know how to fatten them, and as the natural grasses of the great plains of the West make them without that supplementary feeding which Ontario farmers have to use, they are not inferior to any in the world.

Moreover, I have no hesitation in saying that our farmers are just as energetic, manage their business just as well, and are equally as well entitled to enjoy a share of the luxuries and comforts of this life as are any other men who labour under the sun. In fact, our protectionist neighbours to the south of the line have built up a high tariff wall to protect the United States farmers from the competition of the Canadian farmers north of the boundary. What do the heavy duties imposed over there on the agricultural products of this country entering the United States mean, if they do not mean that? What does the tariff which we have built up against the United States mean if it is not that we are not going to permit unfair competition by American farmers? It puzzles the ordinary citizen to understand how both of these propositions can be correct, and I leave the problem to hon. gentlemen to deal with. It does not occupy any place in our programme, and we are not called on to explain it. It was simply an expedient to throw dust in the eyes of the farmers and make them believe they were protected when somebody else was getting the real article and they were obtaining only the semblance of it. If the National Policy means anything, it means that one class of citizens is taxed to make the business of another citizen profitable. That is the primary principle of protection and the National Policy, and we say we do not propose to take money out of one man's pocket and put it into another man's pocket, and make his special business profitable. We propose to give the other citizen all the protection that it is necessary so far as regards the revenue required to conduct our public affairs, meet our obligations and pay one hundred cents on the dollar. But we say further, that the great mass of the toiling community of Canada are being taxed for the benefit of a limited few under the National Policy, and we propose to keep up the agitation until that injustice is withdrawn.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have had a good deal of trouble in understanding the political platform of the Liberal party. I want to draw the attention of the House to this remarkable fact, that since the last general election in 1891 two new political parties have grown up in this Dominion, presenting two new platforms to the people. Let me ask if there is not some reason for objecting to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, when both these new political parties that are bidding for support from the electors repudiate entirely the protection plank which hon. gentlemen opposite are so careful to present as the basis of their action.

Now, Sir, let me refer for a moment to the platform of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who maintains to-day that he is not a Liberal so far as the Reform party is concerned, that he has no association with them, and has no sympathy with them; in short, that he is as strong a Conservative to-day as he was in the good old days when he supported the Government now in power. And yet, here is a man trained in Conservative associations, possessing still Conservative sympathies, refusing to be allied with the political party that follows the leader in front of me (Mr. Laurier), and what does he say upon the trade question? I quote from his platform, as promulgated in 1893:

To promote tariff reform, such as will relieve the consumers, and especially the agricultural and wage-earning classes from the burden of taxation that they are now bearing, in consequence of excessive protection.

And again, he says:

To effectually and speedily accomplish the downfall of the combinations and trusts which have been created among many manufactures, whereby competition is prohibited and monopolies flourish.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are two statements diametrically opposed to the policy of the party to which the hon. gentleman was associated, and to which he claims he still belongs. How was it that his independent researches led him to believe that it was not in the interests of Canada that protection should exist as in times past?

There is another political party which has appealed since the general election of 1891 for the public support of the electorate of this Dominion, and, Mr. Speaker, that party received a great many flattering intimations of the kindly feeling that gentlemen opposite had towards them in the last Ontario elections. Why, Sir, what has been the result of the independent researches of the Patrons of Industry in this Dominion? I quote from their platform:

Tariff for revenue only, and so adjusted as to fall as far as possible upon the luxuries and not upon the necessaries of life.

Mr. TAYLOR. They got that from your platform.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Is there any protection in that, may I ask, Mr. Speaker; and yet, that is the party that my hon. friend who now speaks (Mr. Taylor) took assiduous pains to cultivate in the last Ontario general elections, and he then thought they were a splendid party. Here is the result of their investigations, and here is the platform they present to the public and upon which they appeal to them for their support.

Now, Sir, I had occasion to say that the National Policy had never been presented to the electorate on its merits in any one general election since it was inaugurated, because the Conservatives took very good care always to encumber that policy with some other preliminary, in a way that gave them a certain advantage over their political opponents. Once they dissolved Parliament a year in advance of the period of dissolution, because, as they said, there was so much capital waiting to be invested in the industries of Canada under this National Policy, and in order that it might not wait another year, they said: We will dissolve at once and make sure to get that capital to come into Canada. Did it come? No. Every candid man will say that it has not come. At another time we were presented with a redistribution of the constituencies, and with this remarkable effect, that there were a great many changes accomplished that tended to strengthen their political party, and tended to weaken the political party with which I am associated. Again, in 1891, the National Policy did not figure at all in the contest. The cry was reciprocity of trade with the United States. Sir, let me present you the evidence. I quote from the manifesto published in the "Empire" of February 3rd, 1891, on the morning when the first announcement was made to the public of a dissolution of the House, and the bringing on of the general elections. The "Empire" had this statement:

Acting on the advice of his responsible Ministers, His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to dissolve the House of Commons and issue his writs for a new Parliament.

Then they go on to recite reasons for that appeal:

In view of the foregoing statement the question will naturally be asked: What are the reasons which have induced the Government to appeal to the country at the present time? It is understood that the Dominion Government have, through Her Majesty's Government, made certain proposals to the United States for negotiations looking to the extension of her commerce with that country.

There was no protection in that, but the plea was for the extension of our commerce.

These proposals have been submitted to the President for his consideration, and the Canadian Government is of the opinion that if the negotiations are to result in a treaty which must be ratified by the Parliament of Canada, it is expedient that the Government should be able to deal with a Parliament fresh from the people rather than with a moribund House.

The Government do not think so now. I am inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, if I expressed a candid opinion, that if this Government was able to hold on to office, and if the constitution did not make them dissolve the House, they would stay until the Archangel's trumpet sounded, before they would bring on a dissolution. Further, the "Empire" goes on in this fashion:

It is understood that Canada will send a delegation to Washington after 4th March, the day on which the life of the present Congress expires, for the purpose of discussing informally the question of the extension and development of trade between the United States and Canada, and the settlement of all questions of difference between the two countries.

That was the time that they made the three minute visit to Washington.

This delegation will visit the United States capital, it is said, as a result of a friendly suggestion from Washington.

Appended to that, Mr. Speaker, must be some reflections that cannot be comfortable to the present Secretary of State, if he looks back to the part that he played in connection with the statements about these negotiations. But what I want to draw your attention to is this: the question to be discussed then was not protection, but the extension and development of trade between the United States and Canada, and this was the single reason assigned for the dissolution of the House. A few days after that there was a great public meeting held in Toronto and the Premier was announced to be there to tell the people about his policy. When the time came he was not able to be present, but he sent up the then Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson, and the present Premier announced that he would not deliver himself upon the policy, but Sir John Thompson was loaded up with all the facts in this matter.

I find in the "Empire" of the next day his statement of the reasons for the necessity of the appeal. After reciting the preliminary negotiations with Mr. Blaine, he goes on to say:

In the meantime, Sir, what would our position have been if we had not appealed to the country. It would have been said that in the very last hours of the existence of our Parliament we were endeavouring to make a treaty which would entirely change the business of the country and when we went to Washington we would have been comparatively weak in the hands of the men with whom we were negotiating, because they would know that instead of being there with the confidence of the country behind us we had to ask the assent of a Parliament which had already spent its last session before the negotiations had practically commenced. * * *

What we propose is that if you and the people of Canada accept the policy that we put before you now we will go to Washington with a Parliament behind us and we will be able to treat with Mr. Blaine with the assurance that the Premier of the country has the renewed confidence of the people of Canada.

My respected friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), whom I do not see in his seat, was at this meeting, and this is how the "Empire" records his introduction to that audience:

There were loud cries for "Cockburn,"

And he was reported as saying this:

I am sure we have enough of truth and fact in these speeches to enable us to keep firing volley after volley into the enemy until there is not a man left standing. We have been shown that the poorer we get the richer we become. We have been shown that as blue ruin stares us in the face, strange to say the capitalists of Europe were so simple-minded that with all their acuteness they lent us money at 3 instead of 5 per cent; and I am only in hopes that as the blue ruin continues we will be able to borrow our money at 2 per cent, and our Finance Minister instead of a surplus of three millions, will be able to hand us over a surplus of over ten millions—

But that, Sir, is only the introduction to the climax:

—and, in fact, to remit taxation altogether.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess

Mr. BAIN. Before recess, in referring to the election campaign of 1891, I had quoted from addresses delivered at Toronto, by the late Premier, Sir John Thompson, and by one of the Toronto members. On that occasion it will be in the recollection of the House, the Secretary of State, who was at that time our High Commissioner in London, visited Canada, and took an active part in the election contest. A few days after the occurrence of the meeting at Toronto, the "Empire," of February 8th, 1891, thus chronicles a public meeting held at Kingston, in which Sir Charles Tupper was announced as taking part. The heading was:

Sir Charles Tupper opens the battle in Kingston. The old war horse in fine fettle. The first public address of Sir Charles Tupper since his arrival from England.

And this is Sir Charles's statement with reference to the basis upon which the election campaign was carried on:

I have read with astonishment a denial that the United States is prepared to discuss the question of reciprocity with us. Well, you have all seen the announcement made by Sir John Macdonald in the most unmistakable terms. You have seen the despatch sent by Lord Stanley to Lord Knutsford that Canada is prepared to take up the discussion of reciprocal free trade—

Reciprocal free trade——with the United States. The policy announced is a sound policy and one that cannot fail to have a widely beneficial effect upon the commercial interests of the two countries. After the 4th of March, the United States government will be prepared to go into consideration of this question and ascertain what reciprocal trade relations can be carried forward. Her Majesty's government, moreover, looks with entire favour on the proposition; and I have it out of Lord Knutsford's own mouth that he would be delighted to see an arrangement of this kind with the United States on the lines of Lord Stanley's despatch.

The hon. gentleman who preceded me to-night was troubled with serious doubt as to how the Liberal policy of reciprocity of trade with the United States could be carried out consistently with the nature of our relations as a colony of Great Britain, and without discriminating against the mother country, while at the same time raising a revenue for the Dominion. And he said a good many hard things as to the impossibility of the various parts of the policy hanging together. Sir, I hand the hon. gentleman over to the leader of the House. I have read you the words of that hon. gentleman on February 7th, 1891. It is not for us, it is not for my leader, to reconcile these things, it is for the gentleman whom my hon. friend now recognizes as his leader, to show that there is nothing inconsistent in reciprocity of trade with the United States and the maintenance of our relations with the Empire.

Now, Sir, coming down to the practical application of these matters to our daily life—for I believe in being practical—I wish to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to the effect of application of the principles of the National Policy to the agricultural industry in certain respects. Let me draw your attention first to the position taken by the Government to the farmers of Canada in respect of the butter and cheese industry. I need hardly say, Sir, that so far as the development of the dairy interest is concerned, I am decidedly of opinion that at least within the bounds of the province of Ontario, the government of that province have anticipated everything that has been done by this Government that has been really effective in developing these industries. Hon. gentlemen tell us, for example, that they have given the farmers protection in respect of butter and cheese. The records of this House show that in the old days of the revenue tariff, in 1867, when the Dominion was formed, when there was no thought on the part of either political party of establishing a protective policy, a duty of 3 cents a pound was imposed upon cheese, and a duty of 4 cents a pound upon butter, for purely revenue purposes. To-day the duty is exactly the same as it was then. To listen to these hon. gentlemen one would think nothing had been done for that industry before they took the matter in hand. They tell us—well, I shall not give my own words for what they tell us, but I shall read the Minister's own language with respect to one branch of this industry. You remember, Mr. Speaker, that there was a very keenly-fought election in North Ontario. Never in the history of Canadian politics, I believe, did so many Ministers swarm into a county to exhort the people vigorously and persistently as to their duty, than in an election. It was a triangular fight. One of the new political parties entered the field to do battle for the cause they believed sound, and I am bound to say that they put up a splendid fight. On that occasion, the Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) was extremely anxious to show the farmers how kind and how benevolent the Government was, and how careful of the farmers' interest. And this is the way the "Mail and Empire" reports his statements to the farmers at Sunderland. I quote from the "Mail and Empire" of December 10th, 1895:

It was thought desirable to turn the energy of the farmer into other directions, and the production and export of a good, uniform quality of butter was considered one of the most profitable. With that object in view, butter was purchased at 20 cents a pound, and advertised and marketed by the Government. What was the result? The Canadian article ranks now with Danish butter in the English markets, which formerly led the van; and every dollar of $20,000 expended had gone back into the treasury, and our reputation has been raised—

Where?

—to the top notch in that market. (Applause.)

Then the paper goes on to say that it was intended to pursue the same policy in regard to other articles. A day or two after the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague), whom illness, we all regret to learn, has obliged him temporarily to leave this House, delivered a speech in that campaign. Again I quote from the "Mail and Empire," this time of the 11th December, 1895, in its report of a meeting at Beaverton, at which, it says, the Finance Minister and Dr. Montague were present. Toward the close of the doctor's address, when he was enlarging upon the blessings they had conferred upon the farmers:

"What about butter?" shouted a man in the audience.

In response, Dr. Montague told how the Government had established the Canadian butter trade upon a firm basis by means of a bonus and cold storage, and without the loss to the country of a single dollar. And the report adds that amidst cheers, the meeting was brought to a close after the doctor's telling speech.

Now, I admit that the metaphors are a little mixed there, but as I am reading from the report of the meeting, I am not responsible. But I want to draw your attention, Sir, to the actual facts. A few days ago, in reply to a question from the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) this reply was given with respect to the promoting of the butter trade:

In reply to a question by Mr. McMillan, Hon. Dr. Montague said that 51,748 pounds of creamery butter were shipped to Great Britain under the Government advance of 20 cents per pound.

The average net price realized in Montreal, for the whole shipment, after deducting all expenses from Montreal, outwards, was 14.28 cents per pound.

The highest price realized in Great Britain was 50 shillings per cwt., for 12 packages from the Government dairy station at Lennoxville, Que.

The lowest price realized in Great Britain was 63 shillings per cwt., for 6 packages.

Fourteen thousand, six hundred and eighty-three pounds of butter was the quantity sold in Montreal, as being in unsuitable packages for export to Great Britain. It was sold in Montreal at an average price of 21.34 cents per pound. After deducting the freight charges and selling commission in Montreal it realized an average net price of 19·87 cents per pound.

Mr. Speaker, I think it would have been financially in the interests of Canada if the whole of that butter had been sold in Montreal, and if not one pound of it had gone on to the English market, and I fail to understand how realizing 14·38 cents for the shipments to England can have established the character of Canadian butter at the highest notch, and made it rank alongside Danish butter in the English markets. Sir, that cannot have been done, because the elements to establish the statements of the Finance Minister are not in the transaction, and he must have been drawing upon his imagination for his facts when he was dealing with the people in Sunderland, or else the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) has failed to return the correct figures of the sales of that butter in the English markets. But if anybody wants to see the grade at which that butter stood in the English market, let him turn to the address made in this House by my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), and he will find there a detailed report of the condition of that butter when it appeared in the English market; and I will venture to say that the report does not justify the boasting in which members of the Government indulged when they went out to Cannington to pull the wool over the eyes of the farmers in that butter country. Before the Government entered into this transaction, the Dairy Commissioner had presented his views to the Montreal people, and I find in the annual report of the Montreal Board of Trade, the opinion of that body on this matter. As my hon. friend who spoke before me has certified that they are good and wise and true business men. I content myself with quoting their opinion on the action of the Government in going into the shipping of butter. You will find it in the report of the last annual meeting, and it is this:

The action of the Dominion Government in agreeing to pay advances at the rate of 20 cents per pound on creamery butter of finest quality, made between the 1st of January and the 30th of March, 1895, when for shipment to the British market, was strenuously opposed by this association, notwithstanding the full explanation of its objects and anticipated working given by Prof. Robertson, dairy commissioner, at a meeting held on February 18th. This protest was not successful in inducing the department to alter its course.

The result is that we shipped 51,700 pounds to the English market, which cost us 20 cents at Montreal, and we sold it there at a little over 14 cents. How it turns out that we did not lose a dollar by the transaction, as the Finance Minister claims, I fail to understand.

Mr. FOSTER. A slight mistake in the figures, that is all.

Mr. BAIN. This is a matter of considerable importance for the people of Canada, because I hold that the vice of the system inaugurated by the hon. gentlemen opposite is this, that it has encouraged everybody to look to the Government, and the public treasury, for aid in anything they undertake, and I will venture to say that that butter transaction would not have been gone into last spring were it not for the fact, as announced by the journals in the confidence of the Government, that the Government were getting ready to have the general elections not later than the month of May. I have said that the tendency of a protective system was to induce parties to apply to the treasury for help, instead of helping themselves, and that is one of the reasons why I object to it. It takes the manhood, it takes the incentive to independent action out of the people of this country. When our people go from home, when they go to the United States, they are able to hold their own against anybody. But it does seem as though the effect of this system was to demoralize the independent action of the people, and lead them to creep up to the treasury for the purpose of getting help every time they want to do anything. Now, I want to draw your attention to a short article that anybody interested can find in one of the newspapers on the files of the House—and it is not ancient history, either. I am quoting from the Stratford "Beacon" of the 1st of this month, February, and it is from a sketch made by their reporter, of the Black Creek creamery, out in Perth county, which is owned and operated by that veteran dairyman, the Hon. Thomas Ballantyne, and this is what the reporter said that he found when he visited that creamery:

They are handling this winter about 60,000 pounds of milk a week, from which about a ton of butter is manufactured of such a fine flavour that it commands not only the highest price on the Toronto market, but the highest for colonial butter on the English markets. Stratford and Toronto has been the market heretofore, but the output being largely increased this season, a number of shipments have been made to England to test the best market there.

The butter is packed in square 56 pound packages which are well steamed and soaked with salt brine and afterwards lined with parchment paper.

Shipments have been made weekly since the first of December, and the goods have always arrived in prime condition. The prices realized have ranged from 102 to 112 shillings for 112 pounds, only one small lot bringing the lowest price, the average being 109 shillings, which is almost 24 cents here. After allowing for freight, commission, &c., the butter which brought 112 shillings, should make the price here a fraction over 22 cents per pound, or 3 cents per pound more than could be realized in Toronto where the prevailing price for the best creamery butter has been 19 cents per pound. So that for this season, at least, England is the best market for high class butter.

Now, Sir, there is a case of individual enterprise, a man who went into the business himself, shipped on his own responsibility, and did not come to the Government and ask for help to get his goods on the English market. He looked at his market, he adapted his goods to the wants of that market, and the smallest price he realized was 109 shillings for 112 pounds, and from that up to 112 shillings. Just compare that with the operations of the Government as a trading company. The best they realized on their shipments was 90 shillings, and some were sold at 63 shillings for 112 pounds. When they got through they realized a little over 14 cents a pound, while Mr. Ballantyne realized to his customers here, 22 cents; and after they paid 3½ cents for making the butter they were still in a better position than the local market would have given them. But the reporter puts in this note of warning, and I commend it to the hon. gentlemen opposite when they go out into the country and tell the farmers that the English market is open to an unlimited quantity of Canadian butter. The reason that the price was higher in England this season than usual, was that our sister colony of New Zealand had had an excessively dry season, and the result was that her shipments to the English market were rather less than usual. Sir, I submit under these circumstances that the announcement of the Minister of Agriculture, in the early part of this session, that they would not go into the butter business any more, is justified by the financial exhibit, and that exhibit did not justify the statement the Finance Minister made in the country. Now, we have heard a good deal with respect to the development of the Danish creamery and hog product business. Any gentleman interested in that business, if he will take the trouble to look up the last page but one of to-day's Montreal "Gazette," will find one of the most interesting statements it has been my lot to read for some time, concerning the mode in which the Danish farmers are combining to put their hog products on the English market to the best advantage. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that notwithstanding all the talk of these hon. gentlemen about the Government encouragement of the butter and hog trade of Denmark, the Government never did encourage that business. It was conducted by private enterprise, and all the Government ever did was to offer some cash prizes as premiums at the exhibitions for the best qualities of butter and cheese. Now, the substance of the article in the Montreal "Gazette" to which I refer is simply this, not that the Government are building big factories to cure hog products to the best advantage to be put upon the English market, but that the Danish farmers are combining to create by their personal credit a fund to erect a packing establishment where their hogs will be cut up, packed and shipped to the English market under the most favourable conditions. After providing for the expense of cutting, shipping and packing, the net result is distributed to the farmers who have contributed, after taking out the working expenses of the operation of the scheme. The people themselves are developing this industry by co-operative establishments similar to other independent establishments here and elsewhere. They did not creep up to the Government for aid in their enterprise and the Government is not mentioned as having anything to do with it at all. I commend that to these men who believed that nothing can be accomplished for the community unless the Government dip into the public treasury for the purpose of helping them. Now, one word with respect to the cheese industry. Let me glance back for a moment at the history of that industry as regards the province of Ontario. I grant freely that the development of the cheese industry in the province of Quebec, and in the maritime provinces, and in the west, has been very large of late years. I grant freely that the dairy commissioner of the Dominion Government is entitled to a share of credit for that development; but I want to say that the Government are not entitled to the entire credit for the large development and improvement of the cheese industry in Quebec and the other provinces. In all these eastern provinces the officers of the local government have co-operated actively, and energetically, and successfully with those appointed by the Dominion Government for that purpose. I have no wish to place any of those parties in a disadvantage or unfair position. We are open here to discuss these questions on their merits, and the truth stands longest under any circumstances. But let me glance backwards for a moment at the industry of cheese-making, because the orators of this Government in the country are never tired of telling the farmers that the Dominion Government did all this thing for them. In 1872 the Dairymen's Association was incorporated by the provincial legislature of Ontario, and to aid them in establishing their enterprise, they gave them an annual grant of $700 to start with. From that time forward this industry has been steadily prosecuted by the energy of the people themselves. In 1888, when the Dairymen's Association met, both at Listowel and Peterborough—for by this time they had divided up into two branches—they adopted a scheme of having efficient cheese and milk inspectors visit their factories. At that time there were 707 factories in active operation in Ontario, and the returns show that 438 visits were made to 152 factories in that year. For a couple of years previous, those pioneers of the cheese industry in Ontario, men who are still actively engaged in it, men such as Mr. Ballantyne of Perth, McPherson in the eastern counties, Caswell of Ingersoll, and several others, had advocated and urged this mode of improving the quality of their product and placing their dairymen in a position where they could produce the best quality of cheese. In 1894 their Agricultural College in Guelph put a creamery into operation for the purpose of giving practical illustration of the mode of manufacturing creamery butter and training parties in the manufacture of that article. Where was it started? It was started in a building which, among those conversant with the locality, is known as the old cheese factory, and that was back in 1884. The cheese factory was in operation to give practical training in the manufacture of cheese, taking the milk in and making it up in the presence of those who attended for the purpose of acquiring the details of the operation. To-day what is the fact? A portion of the training of the Agricultural College is steadily devoted, year by year, to instructing parties in the manufacture of both cheese and butter, and the class which is taking advantage of the training has grown so large that only last week there was opened up a branch establishment at Strathroy, for the western part of the province, to relieve the pressure of the attendance at the Central College at Guelph, and give the people in the western district the benefit of thorough and systematic training. Under these circumstances, need we wonder that the development of the dairying industry in Ontario has been large and active. Let me quote from the words of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan). Speaking some years ago on the development of the cheese industry, which was carried out under the auspices of the Ontario government long before the Dominion Government ever thought of appointing a Dairy Commissioner, the hon. gentleman is reported to have said:

The cheese interest in Ontario derives great benefit from the work of Professor Arnold, who was employed by the Ontario government, who went from factory to factory, giving notice of his visit in advance and invited all the cheese-makers round to attend; took the milk from the wagons and put it through the various processes in their presence.

He goes on to say:

The advantage specially derived from that was that they got rid of what was popularly known at that time as leaky cheese, which very much interfered with the quality of our cheese in the market.

This work has been done by the enterprise of the people of Ontario. Need we be surprised that before the Dairy Commissioner was appointed at Ottawa, the development of the cheese industry went forward after this fashion: In 1870 there were 323 factories, and the output was 12,500,000 pounds; in 1880 there were 551 factories, with an output of 48,000,000 pounds; and in 1891 the business had grown so that there were 838 factories, with an output of 80,900,000 pounds. I am reading from the Ontario returns. Surely when the Dairy Commissioner was appointed in 1890, when the first vote was given for his salary, it will not be claimed that it was on account of his magic influence that the output rose to 81,000,000 pounds? No; the fact was that owing to the energies of our people, together with the systematic aid furnished by the provincial government, we had developed that enterprise, no thanks either to the National Policy or the Dominion Government.

We have heard a good deal from the Finance Minister in his Budget speech about the blessings of the home market that the National Policy had created for the farmer. These are his words:

Passing from these to the agricultural interests of the country, it is not saying too much, Sir, to say that from 1891 to 1895, these have shown a gradual, a continued, and a healthy advance. The home market has been constantly increasing. The increase in population itself from 1890 to 1895 has added to that home market. The increase of urban population which gathers in cities, and towns, and villages, and largely gathers there from the planting in these places of industrial establishments of different kinds, has largely increased. And, Sir, every thousand of the urban population is so much of the healthiest and best increase to the markets of the farmers of this country, for it affords a market near to them for products which would not carry to foreign markets, many of which are perishable in their nature, and for which a home market is absolutely essential.

How does the hon. gentleman pretend that the home market continually increased and that he gave the farmers a greater consuming population from 1890 to 1895? Here is the schedule of agricultural exports, and it shows that in 1890, of the articles of cheese, butter, potatoes, horses, sheep and cattle, &c., the value of $22,000,000 in 1880 were exported, while in 1895, we had to export of the same agricultural products $36,000,000 which we were not able to eat up at home. Does that mean an increase in the home market from 1890 to 1895? If I understand the object of the National Policy it was to create a home market; and yet, here the Finance Minister coolly argued that because in 1895 we had to find a foreign market for $36,000,000 in value of agricultural products, while in 1890 the value of the same articles exported was only $22,000,000, therefore the home market was increasing. I want to know at that ratio when the time will come when the home market will consume the agricultural products of Canada. If we travel backward at that rate, then hon. gentlemen opposite had better quit "booming" the home market, which they claim to have created, because if we have protected industries with heavy duties and at the same time tell the farmers that we are giving them a home market, and yet we are sending more agricultural products out of Canada, then when are the blessings for the farmers ever going to arrive? The Finance Minister rejoices in increased exports, and so do I, because when the National Policy was inaugurated in 1878 it did not improve the situation until the enormous crop with which the farmers were blessed in 1880 came to be put on the market the following season, and the money received for it began to find its way through the avenues of trade, the treasury began to realize there was any benefit in the National Policy. It was simply that Providence blessed them with a heavy crop, there was a large surplus, they had more money to spend and the farmers spent it. What does the National Policy do towards growing those 80,000,000 bushels of grain in the North-west which the Finance Minister has announced was the product of the Territories? What has it done to stimulate the production of the crop of grain? Has it made any one article which the farmer buys cheaper than it would have been if those enormous duties had not been imposed? What was it that led the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) the other year to be so anxious to have the duty on agricultural implements reduced to the farmers of the North-west? Was it not to lighten the burdens the National Policy imposes on the farmers? And when the people are called upon to pay high duties on everything they have to buy, I agree with the statement of the hon. member that it is a condition too grievous to be borne. But let me draw attention to the opinion expressed by an hon. gentleman who I think all parties will admit is capable of expressing an opinion on this subject, who is a practical farmer himself—I will quote from the manifesto or hand-book of the Patrons. This is the statement:

The cheese industry has grown rapidly in Canada, and protectionists say gleefully: "Yes, cheese is protected 3 cents per pound." In the States it is protected 4 cents. On protectionist principles it must be dearer there than here, so that our duty is useless. Practical cheese men, like Mr. D. M. Macpherson, Patron, M.P.P. for Glengarry, say with truth that if our duty had never been imposed at all the industry would have thriven with no less vigour. The natural conditions existing here, the climate, soil and water, coupled with the energy of the factory owners and the farmers, who had to resort to some other staple when wheat became unprofitable, have made the industry what it is.

These are the words of a man who does not draw $7,000 a year in a public office here in Ottawa, but he is a man who is engaged in the occupation like the Hon. Mr. Ballantyne himself. It continues:

Protection simply handicaps it. There were over a thousand factories in operation in this province in 1894. In each the machinery, piping, cloth, thermometers, curd knives, &c., are taxed; the duties on coal and iron increase railroad rates, the tariff on imports increases ocean rates, while the farmer who supplies the milk is taxed right and left. Altogether Mr. Macpherson calculates that protection does the farmer out of about a cent per pound on all the cheese made in the country, and out of half a cent or so on all the butter.

Mr. BAIN.

I sympathize with the view expressed by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) when he wanted the burdens taken off the backs of the farmers of the North-west, and which burdens were imposed upon them by the National Policy. Take, for instance, the extra cost that is imposed upon the farmers by the iron duties. Where does $4 a ton on pig iron that cost less than $11 a ton when brought into this country: where does that prove any blessing to the farmers. And so, on the wrought iron and steel, that under the tariff inaugurated in 1887 by the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) which imposed 50 per cent by the actual returns of the trade of the following years, on bar iron, that is a prime necessity in the ordinary operations of the farm. And these gentlemen opposite tell us that by increasing the output of the factories and enabling them to ship their goods out of Canada and sell them cheaper to farmers of other countries that compete with ours: they tell us they are conferring a blessing on our people by doing so. They give the manufacturers a drawback of 99 per cent on all the duty that is taken on the material that goes into the exported reaper, and under the blessings of the benign National Policy they collect every cent of that out of the farmer when he lives in Canada and uses that article. Why, Sir, what benefit has these blessings been to either the farmers of Canada or the United States? Last year we had to find a market in other countries for fifty million dollars worth of our farm products, after we had fed every man, woman and child that the National Policy had brought to Canada. We had to ship that surplus off to the world's market, and compete there with farmers who produced under cheaper and more favourable circumstances. Were the American farmers any better off? Look at the trade returns of the United States last year, and you will find that $67.50 out of every hundred dollars worth of the exports of the United States were the agricultural products of the farmers of that country. They had fed all the operatives that their protective tariff had procured for them, and they shipped out of the country $67.50 worth out of every $100 worth of surplus products that were produced in that country and sold. Now, Sir, in both these cases it is simply preposterous to tell us that the National Policy has been any benefit for the farmers. Let me draw your attention for one moment to the kind of competition that our farmers have to face, after they pay these high prices for their implements. They have to compete with the farmers of the world in the markets of the world, and against men who buy their implements less that cost imposed upon us. Let me read to you just two or three lines from the report of Mr. Peel, the secretary of the British Legation at Buenos Ayres. I want to draw your attention to this fact, that it is not a matter of two or three years ago, but it is a matter that occurred some time in the month of May, 1895, so that it is an up-to-date quotation, and it shows the competition we have to meet at the present time. He says :

No other country in the world can produce wheat more cheaply than Argentina. The actual cost of producing and delivering at the station, with the hiring expenses of the family, bags, threshing, and carriage, in a good year, is not over 9 shillings per quarter, and turned into our money means about 28 cents per bushel.

To raise the wheat, bag it, and ship it, and get it to the port of shipment for Great Britain, it costs the Argentine farmer less than 30 cents a bushel. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker—and I regret that it is so, as compared with our own position—while our magnificent wheat fields are unfortunately far away from the port of ocean shipment, a large proportion of the surplus wheat of Argentina is raised almost in sight of the ocean vessel that carries it to the English market. Now, I say, that when our surplus wheat products of the North-west go to England, they are handicapped by a long and expensive railway transit before they can get into the position of the products of the Buenos Ayrian farmer who raises his wheat within two or three hundred miles of the ocean vessel that carries it to the English port. Sir, Argentina has been boomed like many another country with vast natural resources, but it has been in financial distress for some years, and I point a warning finger to the Government here, and tell them that we had better go more moderately in increasing our debt and rolling up our public burden year after year, for fear we shall find our credit by and by ranking alongside the credit of the province of Buenos Ayres, and the other Argentine provinces. Sir, as long as our credit is good it does not take much statesmanship to get behind four millions of dollars in one year and borrow it in the English market. But, Sir, it comes back on the taxpayer of the country, and every dollar that is wasted unnecessarily comes out of the pockets of the people of this Canada of ours. It is for the producing population I plead: the wealthy can take care of themselves. I say that the man who has to earn his money by the sweat of his brow should not be handicapped for the benefit of somebody else, who drives in his carriage. Need I say that the development of Argentina, under these circumstances has been very marked. In 1883 they had six hundred thousand acres in wheat; in 1888 it had risen to two million acres; in 1892 to over three million acres; and in 1893 to five and a half million acres in wheat. It is, I say, cruel to handicap our Canadian farmers when they are obliged to face such competition on the open markets of the world.

Now, Sir, my hon. friend who preceded me said a good deal to us about the blessings which protection had conferred upon the Canadian farmer in respect of the heavy duties which had been imposed upon American agricultural products coming into Canada. He told us that one result was that we had shut out a large quantity of American products that would otherwise have competed successfully against the surplus products of Canada, and he quoted to us the quantities of pork and other products that had thus been shut out. Now, Sir, I want to read to you the actual facts of the situation at the present time. I quote from the Montreal "Gazette" of Friday, the 14th of February, and I commend to these gentlemen the prices ruling at the present moment when they talk so eloquently about the benefits of protection. Take, for instance, the Montreal hog market :

Live hogs were scarce, for which there was a good inquiry, and prices advanced $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per lb., the only lot on the market being sold at $\frac{4}{8}$ c. per lb. live weight.

Now take the quotations in Chicago as given by the telegraph on the same day: Hogs, \$3.65 to \$4.25 and \$3.95 to \$4.22 $\frac{1}{2}$. I would like to ask how you are going to pay $\frac{1}{8}$ c. per pound live weight of duty, and transfer these hogs from Chicago to Montreal and make the business pay. There is no protection there. Now take the quotations in the Montreal markets for beeves :

Good beeves sold at $\frac{3}{8}$ c. to $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; fair, 3c. to $\frac{3}{4}$ c.

In Chicago common to extra steers were quoted at from $3.20 to $4.65, and Texans from $2.35 to $4.10. And yet hon. gentlemen stand up and tell us that our tariff protects our farmers from the competition of the Americans; and these quotations are those at the centre of the American continent, and I give you the quotations at Montreal, our port of shipment. There can be no answer given by these hon. gentlemen. We ship our Canadian pork to England, and it has established a good reputation there, because it is of a quality and grade that exactly suits the English market. That is the secret of the development of our trade, and we have steadily increased our output and placed it on that market, while the Chicago market has averaged higher than ours; and yet hon. gentlemen tell us that it is the duty that keeps out the American product.

But I want to draw attention to another feature of the protection they promised for the agricultural population of this country. The Minister of Finance tooted very loudly about the development of our trade with Australia. Now, let me tell you how this Australian trade strikes one of the new political parties recently organized. I will quote, not from a Grit campaign sheet, but from a pamphlet issued by the Patrons of Industry, and this is the view they take of the development of the Australian trade :

In 1894 (Auditor General, S-4), a subsidy of $121,700 was paid to a steamship line running between Australia and Vancouver. The exports to Australia amounted to only $20,000, so that the cost to the taxpayer of selling goods was nearly 40 per cent. Of the $20,000, only $770 represented Canadian farm products. The items were:

Canned fruits.....	$113
Canned vegetables.....	110
Animal produce.....	646
	$770

I think I have heard of canned Australian meat being sold in the Canadian market. We are sending out canned fruits to Australia, and the extent to which we sent them that year was $113 worth.

There is not much, therefore, for the Canadian farmer in the export trade to Australia, to which such a large bonus is paid. The imports from Australia in 1894 were $142,000, and, if the bonused steamships are maintained, are likely to grow. Official returns, later than the regular trade returns, show that butter, tallow, canned meats, frozen mutton, fruits, etc., are being landed at Vancouver and Victoria. The frozen mutton landed at Victoria (Return from July 1st, 1894, to February 1st, 1895), was worth 3½ cents a pound laid down there, the butter 17¼ cents. The total imports of farm products at these two places during the seven months amounted to $10,000. Is a protectionist government justified by protectionist principles in bonusing ships to bring foreign competition upon the home farmer in the home market?

If I were to judge by the actions of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who preceded me, he does not believe that this is right, because on the Order paper of to-day I see a notice of a motion that the duty on butter should be increased from 4 cents to 6 cents a pound—for what reason? He says himself, manfully, to enable the North-western farmer to compete with the Australian farmer in the British Columbia market. Sir, I do not know how it strikes you; but it strikes me as supremely absurd to first bonus a steamship line to fetch Australian butter over to Vancouver, and then bonus Canadian butter from the western plains by an extra 2 cents a pound to enable it to compete with this butter which we bonus the steamship line to fetch in to compete with ours. I cannot comprehend that sort of thing. It is about as great a puzzle to me as the reciprocity policy of the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) is to my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia. The Patrons go on to say further:

Of the exports to Australia, manufactures constituted nearly one-third, and the principal item was implements, $79,000.

I think I have heard some orator here say that about $90,000,000 was paid for labour by the factories in Canada under the benign influence of the National Policy. How long would all these operatives be employed by an export trade of $79,000 to Australia?

Mr. BAIN.

And yet hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that it is a benefit for us to have an export trade, because it helps to keep the operatives employed, and the manufacturers will be able to sell cheaper to us at home. Sir, they will sell to us at home for just exactly the amount of the duty added to the price at which the article from the outside can be brought into Canada, and for no less than will just enable them to keep the market. You cannot do anything without employing an agent to go out and attend to it. Take, for example, this Australian business. The present First Minister (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) made a trip out there a year or two ago, and it cost the country $2,745 to enable him to go out there and look after this trade. Then he had a gentleman who was formerly a Canadian manufacturer, but whom the National Policy had ruined—and no doubt they thought it desirable to give him a job—and Mr. Larke was employed as our agent and sent out there. I am not saying a word against the energy and ability of Mr. Larke as an able business man, but we have had to provide his salary and expenses, and last year, from the 25th August, 1894, to 3rd June, 1895, he cost this country the neat little sum of $5,600. Then we established a Department of Trade and Commerce to look after this foreign trade, and the Auditor General's Report shows that that department cost last year, right here in Ottawa, for the salary and expenses of the Minister and his staff of officials the sum of $17,900. That has to be charged to this foreign trade. Then we have the subsidy paid last year for a trip once a month, of $121,600, solid Canadian cash, paid to encourage that trade. And our total trade was $530,000 both ways, and our total revenue $7,248 duties collected on that traffic. Now, the reason I object to all this is just this. That every dollar of that comes out of the pockets of the producing population of this country. And the return of the Statist, according to Bulletin 18, I think it is, of the occupations and the people of Canada, shows that only 19 out of every 100 are engaged in manufactures. And I will venture to say that the half of that 19 are engaged in industries that never were benefited by the National Policy. You do not mean to tell me that the blacksmith out in the country who repairs the farmer's wagon and does his ordinary work, or the girl who manufactures dresses and millinery in the small places throughout the country or anywhere else, is ever benefited by being protected against the competition of American blacksmiths or milliners or any one else. And yet, according to the showing of the Government Statistician, out of every 100 people, 81 have to feel in their pockets for their proportion of this money that benefits only the other 19. I say it is a crying shame, and that is one reason why I object to that branch of the National Policy. Now, the hon. Minister told us in glowing terms about another branch of our trade. Not to do him any injustice, I shall quote his own words :

Take the line to the West Indies and to South America, which, seven or eight years ago, was projected in this House, which received the assent of Parliament, and which was carried into execution. Every one knows with what opposition it was met by the leader of hon. gentlemen opposite and by his party. What has taken place? Why, Sir, with reference to the West Indian trade, whereas, in 1887, our total trade was but $4,000,000, in 1895 our total trade with the West Indies amounted to $8,500,000, an increase of about 112 per cent in our trade with those islands in those few years. And to-day, Sir, the West Indies, in its aggregate of trade takes the fourth or fifth place in the list of countries with which Canada is carrying on business. Is not that a magnificent showing? We have doubled our trade; we have raised it from $4,000,000 to $8,500,000, and at that the Opposition sneers.

Sir, I want to go below the surface for a minute or two, and ask whether the Finance Minister was not somewhat disingenuous when he put that trade in that form, and I ask the attention of the House to the details. He claimed that in 1887 our total trade was but $4,000,000, and that in 1895 it had risen to $8,500,000. Sir, I will not take the benefit of the development of the trade for the years up to 1887. I will go back to the good old days when we depended on the energy of our population, and when our trade was driven with the West Indies by our own people, without bonus, help or encouragement. Sir, the official trade returns of 1878 show that we sold to the West Indies $3,464,000 worth of the products of our own population. In 1895, we sold them only $3,377,000 worth. That was the market which this policy found for the surplus products of the people of Canada. We shipped to them, $3,464,000 by our own energy; and then we encouraged the trade and reduced it to $3,377,000. We imported in 1878 $1,033,000 worth, and on that we collected a duty of $341,000. In 1895, we imported $4,804,000 worth, and on that amount of imports we collected just $351,000. Sir, if these figures prove anything, they prove the very contrary of what the hon. Minister has stated, and I will tell you why. Where was the development of our trade? The Finance Minister is never done telling us about the blessings he conferred on us when he took the duty off sugar in 1891. In 1895, we imported from the West Indies 150,000,000 pounds of sugar valued at $3,325,000, and we did not collect a cent of revenue on it. The effect of the Government's policy was this, that we did not find a market for any increase of our own products and we stimulated the import trade by taking the burden off that trade. And in addition I draw your attention to the fact that the largest part of that trade was done with the Spanish West Indies, and that the Island of Jamaica alone, which is the larger of our West Indian colonies, sold last year to the United States five and a half million dollars worth, and bought from the United States $4,000,000 worth. And they were kind enough, when they made a reciprocity treaty with the United States, to put us on exactly the same footing, and did not discriminate against us, and yet we have not been able to gain that trade. Let me ask, what it cost us to increase that import trade in free sugar? In 1878, we had the trade, and it cost us nothing. In 1895, what is the position? The Finance Minister made a trip to the West Indies in 1890 to look up that trade, and we paid $1,300 for the expenses of himself and his secretary. My respected and genial friend who now occupies a Government berth in the post office in Hamilton, Mr. Adam Brown, was our commissioner to the Jamaica Exhibition, and it cost us $5,000 for his expenses. At the Jamaica Exhibition we spent $22,000. For five years back we have spent from $80,000 to $97,000 a year in steamship subsidies. In addition to all this, we have to have five consular agents, to whom we pay $250 per annum, a total of $1,250. I say, without hesitation, that the presentation of the case by the Minister of Finance was not a fair presentation of the facts, and that, when you look under the surface, you find that the more you do of that kind of business, the more money you are out of pocket, and the greater loss has to be borne by the taxpayers of the Dominion of Canada.

Now, Sir, let me look for a few moments at the nature of these four pages of reductions in the tariff that the Finance Minister has paraded in his Budget speech this session. Here is the statement given by the hon. gentleman :

In 1894 a general reduction of the tariff was made all along the line.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought I should evoke one of these pleasant exclamations from my hon. friend, and I had hoped to provoke another from the leader of the Opposition. But perhaps he will favour me with it yet. For both these hon. gentlemen, not on one, but on many occasions, have taken upon themselves to inform the country that in 1894 the Minister of Finance came down with good intentions, offering to reduce, considerably, the duties levied upon articles which entered into the consumption of the country, but that when we got before the House, the manufacturers scared him off, he ran his pencil through the reductions, and next to nothing was done at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Less than nothing.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman says, less than nothing. His statement is just as extreme as they always are. In that general reduction in 1894, it is estimated that $1,500,000 taxation was taken off the people.

And then he goes into four columns of reductions that were made in the tariff of 1894. I propose, for a few moments, to examine into the details of those reductions. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that my experience with some of the statements of the Finance Minister, with respect to various fiscal matters, leaves me to feel a little hesitation in trusting the lucidity and fairness of his attempts to expound to us the actual facts. Let me go back for a year or two, and recall to the House the circumstances previous to the revision of the tariff in 1894. I remember, Mr. Speaker, and so do you and other members of the House, that, in the session of 1893, there was a remarkable disposition among gentlemen on the other side to attack the National Policy piecemeal. One had a difficulty in connection with corn; another had a grievance about binder-twine; another was in trouble over agricultural implements. There was a feeling abroad that, to use the words of the late leader of the House, there were a lot of mouldering branches on the tariff that must be lopped away, in order to bring it into a healthy condition and make it more suitable for the requirements of the community. The Order paper was beautiful to behold in the early days of that session, bristling, as it was, with notices of motion by supporters of the Government, attacking various portions of the National Policy. Something had to be done to meet this difficulty, or there was trouble ahead for the National Policy. That is the reason why the Minister of Finance took up the question in his Budget speech of 14th February, 1893. He had promised his friends, that, if they would be quiet, and behave themselves, an investigation would be made into the facts and the duties would be cut down a little later on. He said:

If in the course of that investigation which is now going on, and which will be continued for some short time yet before a conclusion is reached, it be found that protection has been given to some industries which have no prospect at all of ever becoming fairly rooted in this country, it will become a question with this Government, whether or not it is not best to drop hot-house protection and give simply the reasonable and sufficient protection which is necessary in order to establish industries which, when established, will give some assurance of permanency and continued prosperity.

These, then, are the present lines. To lighten the scale of taxation, in so far as possible, and in doing that, we must make up our minds to pare down, as far as we possibly can, all expenditures that are not absolutely necessary for the service of this country; to refuse expenditure on works which it would not be proper for a wise and economical Government to set on foot and continue in the country; to, as far as possible, adapt the scale of protection to legitimate industries and to what is reasonably necessary in order to establish and protect them; to use the raw material of the country, in so far as it can be used, and to extend the free list as far as possible, consistent with the revenue requirements of the country, in order to bring about this lessened taxation and this lessened scale of protection. Information will be gathered during the next year; that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself, with two level-headed business men who control the Customs and the Inland Revenue, propose during the coming year not only to listen to the complaints and the pleas of people who come to Ottawa to see us, but we propose to supplement that by a personal inspection and investigation of the various industries of the country. We propose to go further. We propose that it shall not be said that only one class has the ear of the Government, but that every class, the agricultural, the artisan, the manufacturing, the producing, or any class, shall have abundant opportunity to make out its case before the Government or some member of the Government.

That was the preliminary announcement with respect to what they were going to do in the way of easing the burdens off the community, and lightening the tariff on a reduced scale of protection. Now, I have said that the Minister told us that the estimated reduction of 1894 was $1,500,000 of taxation taken off the people of Canada. On page 13 of the first part of the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1895, will be found a comparative statement of the duties on goods entered for consumption in 1894 and 1895, and the amount of the various imports and the duties collected thereon. The new tariff came into force at the end of March, 1894, and our financial year closed on the 30th June, so that it is the best comparison available at the present time, in fact, the only comparison to test the correctness of the statement that there was a reduction of the burdens on the people in reduced duties to the extent of $1,500,000. Here are the official figures. The total dutiable goods imported in 1894, in round numbers, were of the value of $62,779,000; the duty collected thereon was $19,380,000. In 1895, we imported of dutiable goods, $58,557,000, and we collected in duties $17,887,000. The percentage of the duties collected on the dutiable goods imported in 1894 amounted to 30.86 per cent. In 1895, a similar investigation shows a duty collected of 30.54 per cent, or a decrease of .32 per cent. It means that in 1895, as compared with 1894, the actual reduction of duties on the same relative values paid, was just $177,700, instead of $1,500,000. I put the official statement of the Trade and Navigation Returns against the unofficial statement made by the Finance Minister, with respect to his reduction. Both of them are important statements, and I leave the Finance Minister to settle the question with the Trade and Navigation Returns, and ascertain whether they are wrong, or whether he is not wrong himself. But he says that he put a large quantity of free goods, that were formerly dutiable, in the free list. Did he? If he did, Mr. Speaker, we did not import them, anyway; so that there was no economy for our people in the matter of free goods. Take the free goods imported for consumption, taking out coin and bullion. In 1894, we imported $46,000,000; in 1895, we imported $42,600,000, or a decrease of $3,400,000 of free goods; so it is plain that, if more goods were made, we did not import them; and in dutiable goods the decrease in imports was over $4,000,000. There, Mr. Speaker, was the secret of the Minister of Finance's difficulty with his deficit of over $4,000,000. He was exactly in the same position as my hon. friend from South Oxford in 1878, when the people's purchasing power was reduced through the pressure of hard times, and they bought less goods and paid less duty thereon. But I want to draw your attention to this important difference, that whereas in 1878 the duties were largely ad valorem, and the decreased values and the decreased imports decreased more rapidly the revenue of the Finance Minister, the Finance Minister of to-day had a better clutch on the throats of the people of Canada. He knew a thing or two better after his experience in the protective field for the last seventeen years. Now, what do we find? Let me quote to you a statement of the imports at the port of Montreal, as contained in the official report of the Montreal Board of Trade. This is what they say in the report of their last annual meeting, held a few days ago, speaking of imports at the port of Montreal:

While the imports decreased in value $5,000,000, the revenue from duty thereon was $400,000 in excess of that collected in 1894.

Sir, that is perfectly astounding. They imported $5,000,000 less goods, and yet the revenue was $400,000 more upon that reduced importation. Sir, the Finance Minister had got the consuming population of Canada by the throat, he had got them where they could not help themselves, and that was the difference between his position and the position of the hon. member for South Oxford when he was Finance Minister. There was just this difference, that, whereas then the people saved nothing, now it has been wrung out of them to the utmost farthing, and there have been deficits over and above. Who was it that invented the term "flies on the wheel?" They said a Government was no good that could not stop the deficit and the decrease in revenue. Who is the fly on the wheel to-day? With a deficit of over $4,000,000 in revenue, this Government cannot stop it, although they are able to extract $400,000 more of revenue out of a decreased import of $5,000,000 at the port of Montreal alone last year. Now, Sir, I want to pursue this investigation a little further. The hon. gentleman told us a little more about this transaction. After enumerating four pages of reductions, showing the old tariff and the new tariff, and the amount of saving effected, he says:

This list includes all the articles on which reductions have been made, and shows there was an important and significant reduction.

I leave him to settle that with the author of the Trade and Navigation Returns, which say there was $177,000.

And hon. gentlemen must take into account this fact—that this reduction in tariff was made at a time when reduction of the tariff was accompanied with the greatest difficulties. It was made at a time when prices were lowering in the United States, in Belgium and in every great manufacturing country; not only when prices were lowering as quoted in the regular markets, but when hard times had made it necessary for manufacturers to sell, if they could get cash, even if they had to sell at cost or less than cost.

The Montreal Board of Trade has a word to say about that part of the business, and they assign this reason for the increased revenue on decreased imports:

The low value of all staples in the past twelve months with reduced quantities imported. (2) Duties being largely specific, reduced value does not affect the amount of duty collected thereon, and a large increased duty off sugar imported that was formerly free.

There is the secret of it. They put it on to the article, and you had either got to do without it or pay the penalty. Now, if these reductions were made, that in the aggregate amount to $1,500,000, calculated by themselves, there is just this other alternative, that the hon. gentleman replaced those reductions—because I credit him with making a fair statement of the reductions. But he forgot to give us the other half of the statement, that is, the places where the increases were taken back or replaced, because, if our actual net payment of duties on the goods imported for consumption was only $177,000 less, there must have been large increases on other lines. Sir, I leave it to the opinion of any merchant who has during the last year imported a mixed invoice of goods, and he will say that on the invoice in the aggregate he paid a higher duty than he paid under the old tariff, because if the duties were reduced on certain items they were increased on certain others; and I submit it is not an ingenuous mode of stating the facts to the people to tell the reductions and leave out of account the increases, which come out of our pockets at the same time. Let me analyze the comparative statement which appeared on page 13 of the Trade and Navigation Returns last year, because it shows a number of the leading articles on which changes were made. The reductions on leading articles were in this ratio: on carriages the rate was reduced from 30·9 to 30·2, or 7-10ths of 1 per cent. It will be remembered farm wagons were made free. That was the ratio, 7-10ths of 1 per cent—that was the benediction bestowed on the farmers by the carriage reduction. Iron and steel were reduced from 28 to 26, a reduction of 2. Hon. gentlemen will remember how the Finance Minister talked to the House about the blessings he was conferring by taking the duty off window glass. Window glass was taxed in 1894 at 27, in 1895 at 26·8. So that is the net result of the reduction of duty on window glass, 2-10ths of 1 per cent. On paper and manufactures of, the reduction was from 32 to 31, or 1. Wood, and the manufactures of wood, secured a substantial reduction, from 26 to 22. The reduction on fancy goods was equal to 2-10ths of 1 per cent; and on the long schedule that contains the list known as unenumerated goods, the duty on those miscellaneous articles show, in 1895, a reduction of less than 1 per cent, as compared with 1894.

Now we come to increases. On carpets there was a very substantial increase, from 26.6 to 30. The cotton duties were beautifully readjusted. I admire, and can never cease to admire, the arrangement of the cotton tariff; he was an expert who furnished it to the Finance Minister, and of course he conferred a great boon on the people by giving them reduced duties. In 1894 the average was 28 4-10ths, in 1895 28 6-10ths, or an increase after the reduction of 1-5th of 1 per cent. On woollen goods the Minister was more benevolent. He came down to the House, and stated that the cheaper kinds of shoddy we need no longer shut out, and he therefore modified the specific duty. I venture to say there was some one behind who thoroughly understood the woollen trade. In 1894 the duty on woollen goods imported was 30, in 1895, after the readjustment, it was 31.7. The woollen men knew their business, and the Finance Minister did it for them. On books, periodicals and printed matter, the duty in 1894 stood at 20.6, and in 1895 it was increased to 26, an increase of nearly 6 per cent. So a boy trying to save a dollar with which to buy a book was charged by 6 per cent additional on the price of the little book which had to come into Canada. On two important lines of goods no change was made: on flax and hemp goods and on hats and caps, the duty remaining as formerly at 30 per cent. The net result of all these changes was that of the one million and a half of duties which the Finance Minister said he had taken off, the amount was reimposed, except to the extent of $177,700. At the same time those burdens are placed on the people, the Finance Minister makes it appear that reductions are made in the interest of the public treasury and the maintenance of our trade and credit.

I do not propose to say one unkind word as regards the manufacturing industries of this country. I know hon. gentlemen opposite have been in the habit of putting words in our mouths, and saying we are hostile to them. The battle of freedom has ever been thus. If you entrench a man with a duty of 50 per cent to protect his industry, he will declare before high heaven that he would die if it was taken off, but I never knew him to die yet. That is not the position which we occupy. We say it is humiliating to a business man to have him placed in the position of other men being taxed to sustain him in business. We favour a fair and equitable readjustment of the tariff, a readjustment of the tariff together with a larger free list of goods, including raw materials for manufactures, and we claim that such a readjustment would place the manufacturers in a better position and a less humiliating position than they occupy to-day. I disclaim any hostility to the manufacturers of my country. In my daily life at home I rejoice in the prosperity of some of those men when I see them grow up and prosper in Canada; but I did so long before the National Policy was inaugurated. It should never be forgotten that in 1878 we had healthy industries in the country and a large number of successful men engaged in manufacturing, and among the men with whom I come in contact daily I count manufacturers among several of my closest personal friends, and I would be ashamed to say that those men are impure and dishonest in business transactions. But I am here in the interest of the great burden-bearing community, the great labouring, the great farming, the great consuming population, and I ask justice for them, while I do not propose to do injustice to any other class. But that is the net result of all this travelling around the country by the Ministers and Controllers and other parties. They do not decrease the burdens of the people, and just so soon as Providence favours the farmers of Canada with a good crop and accompanies it with fair prices, and we begin to export increased quantities of agricultural products, just so soon will the machinery of the tariff yield its fruits of increased burdens, from which the country cannot escape even by a readjustment made by the Finance Minister. I want to quote from the annual report of the Manufacturers' Association meeting held in February last. They say this:

The Manufacturers' Association held their annual meeting in Toronto on February 27th, 1895. On the 14th of February, 1894, a largely attended meeting of the tariff and executive committees of the association was held in their office. They embodied their views in a communication to the Finance Minister, the receipt of which was acknowledged by him on the 26th.

As to the results of that communication on the readjustment of the tariff of 1894, here are their own words, in their own report:

It is but an act of justice to the committee to direct attention to the large number of changes that have been made in the tariff along the lines suggested in the recommendations, and that in many instances the language used in both is substantially identical. * * * * *

In many instances where the recommendations suggested that no changes be made in the duties upon articles therein enumerated no changes were made.

And they go on to congratulate the Finance Minister after this fashion:

It required the best generalship on the part of Mr. Foster and his protectionist colleagues to withstand the onslaught of the free trade enemy.

Quite a number of amendments were made to the Tariff Bill, and before its final passage it became modified to an extent that gives much satisfaction to the country—certainly to the friends of the Government.

Again, they say :

There never was a time since the formation of this association, 20 years ago, that its influence was stronger or more pronounced than it is to-day.

I am not speaking unkindly of that association. They stood up for their own interests ; but I want to draw the attention of the House to this particular clause in their report :

Quite a number of amendments were made to the Tariff Bill, and before its final passage it became modified to an extent that gives much satisfaction to the country—certainly to the friends of the Government.

Does not that imply, Mr. Speaker, that the Finance Minister did not carry out his first schedule ; that, in short, he took back-water and readjusted his intended tariff, and so "it gave great satisfaction to the country" ; that is, to the Manufacturers' Association. In short, these gentlemen—and I do not blame them—have secured the modifications from the Finance Minister that they wanted, and they congratulate him in the kindness of their hearts, in a corresponding degree. But I ask you, Sir, who stood around to protect the interests of the other eighty-one out of every one hundred of the population ? The Minister of Finance and the Controller of Customs walked around the country and professed to hear the complaints and propositions of the farmers, but the Minister of Finance came back and modified his tariff, and we have the evidence here, that it gave great satisfaction to the nineteen out of every one hundred of the population of this country.

There is one other comparison that I wish to make to-night relating to this tariff. It will be in your recollection, Sir, that we have had, repeatedly, very severe criticism of the statements of the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) with respect to the amount of duty that the present tariff imposes on British goods, as compared with goods imported from the United States. Without unfairly referring to any previous debate in the House, I think I may recall, that on repeated occasions, very severe and caustic language has been used by supporters of the Government—notably by the hon. member from Albert (Mr. Weldon)—in criticising the comparison that the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) had made. I do not propose to repeat those comparisons, but I do want to take what I believe, and what I think every fair-minded man will admit, is a fair and just test, that is, the imports of dutiable goods from Great Britain and from the United States in the year 1878 and again in the year 1895. I do it for the purpose of ascertaining whether the duties, as imposed in 1878, did or did not discriminate against Great Britain, and for the same purpose, to ascertain whether the duties imposed in 1895 did or did not discriminate against Great Britain, and also to discover what was the relative burden imposed on the dutiable goods imported from these two respective countries. I do it for this reason that outside of these two countries, the trade of Canada is a mere trifle, a mere drop in the bucket as compared with the business we do with the United States and with the mother country, and I am in the judgment of the House, whether in taking the dutiable goods, I am not taking a fair and equitable test. But, Sir, I want to say this : it is not necessary to put into the tariff that 10 per cent more, or 3 per cent more, or 1 per cent more, shall be imposed upon a piece of goods because it comes from Great Britain, or because it comes from the United States, for everybody knows that the tariff can be adjusted so as to catch the goods that sell cheapest in our markets and compete sharpest with the manufacturers here who are looking for protection. I think that is a fair statement, and I think that if the result of the operations of the tariff shows that we collect more duty on British dutiable goods imported, than we do on American dutiable goods, then we are entitled to say that the National Policy results in discrimination against Great Britain. Now, Sir, let us look at the figures. In 1878, we imported from Great Britain, dutiable goods to the value of $32,139,000, in round numbers, and the duty collected thereon was $6,445,000. We imported from the United States in the same year, $23,468,000 worth of dutiable goods, entered in both cases for consumption in Canada, and we collected upon these United States goods, $4,794,000. Let me turn to the percentage in both of those cases. The percentage on the dutiable goods imported from Great Britain in 1878 was 20.05, and the percentage on the goods imported from the United States was 20.38. It just amounts to this, Sir, that if we had applied the same tariff to the goods imported from England as to the goods we imported from the United States, we would have collected $106,000 more off the British goods than we did collect. Now, Sir, let us look at the imports, similarly classed, for the year 1895. Of dutiable goods, we imported from Great Britain, $23,312,000 worth, and collected thereon a revenue of $7,006,000. From the United States we imported $25,795,000 worth, upon which we collected $6,897,000. Now for the percentages in these two cases. On the British goods we collected an average duty of 30.05 per cent, and on the American goods an average duty of 27.12 per cent. The result is that if we had imposed upon the American goods the same duty we imposed on the British goods, we would have collected, in 1895, $684,400 more than we did. If that is not discriminating in practice against Great Britain, I do not understand what discrimination means. In 1878, we collected $106,000 less on the goods we imported from Great Britain than we did on the same value of goods imported from the United States, whereas, in 1895, we collected $684,000 more on the goods we imported from the mother country than the same rate would have brought if collected on the goods imported from the United States. Now, Sir, there is another matter to which I wish to call your attention, and it measures the value of the burdens the two governments have imposed upon the people of Canada. Speaking in round numbers, the average duty existing in 1878 was 20 per cent whereas the average duty in 1895 was nearly 30 per cent, one-half more. Sir, need I go any further to show that the practical result of this tariff is to discriminate against the mother country, in spite of the fact that these gentlemen are never done telling us how loyal they are to Great Britain and to British institutions.

Let me draw your attention for a few moments to another feature of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite; and again I have occasion to quote the Finance Minister:

In 1887 an agitation was raised, which became successful, for taking the duty off anthracite coal, which was supposed, and which did lie heavily upon the western provinces. The duty of 50 cents per ton was taken off, and from that time up to 1895, inclusive, the amount of $6,044,355 was remitted to the consumers of anthracite coal.

Mr. Speaker, I want to hand the hon. gentleman over to the tender mercies of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), who spoke here the other night. He distinctly stated that when the duty was taken off American coal, the American corporations gobbled up the whole proceeds, and that the removal of the duty had not saved one dollar to the people of Canada. That hon. gentleman is a supporter of the hon. Minister, and I suggest that the hon. Minister and he meet and settle the question. They tell us sometimes that our flag is parti-coloured. I point him to a parti-coloured flag at home that he has perhaps ignored, if the hon. member for Cape Breton is correct. But, Sir, I want to draw your attention to another reason than the desire to relieve the population of Canada, why the duty was taken off anthracite coal; and it becomes necessary for me to refer to a speech made by the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) when he was Finance Minister in 1887. This is the reason he assigns for taking off that duty; and as he was the Finance Minister who took it off, in my judgment, he knew whereof he was talking a good deal better than the Finance Minister does to-day. This is what he said:

Our present consumption is 250,000 tons of pig iron. To make this here would require 75,000 tons of coal. To manufacture it into puddle bars, merchant bars, and the various shapes and sizes into which it (iron) is made would require an additional 750,000 tons of coal, making a total consumption of 1,500,000 tons. It is on the ground that the development of the iron industry of Canada will tax the coal industry of this country to its utmost capacity in order to furnish the additional output that will be required, and with all the advantages of that increased development, that I am enabled to say to the House that although making anthracite coal free will take $497,000 away from the Government in revenue which we are now receiving—we would be perfectly justified in doing it, because the development of this iron industry would be giving to the coal mining industry a greater advantage and boon than that which would be taken away by the removal of the duty.

Mr. Speaker, there is the reason assigned by the man who took the duty off, and I submit that he knows: and he does not belong to this side of the House. He took it off because he was imposing additional duties on iron for the purpose of developing the iron industry, and he felt that the duty on coal at the same time would be too grievous a burden to be borne. On that occasion he increased the duty on pig iron from $2 up to $4 a ton, and the duty on bar iron from $4.50 to $13 a ton. These are two of the great staple articles that enter largely into the consumption of the country in every direction, and I care not how poor a citizen is, he cannot escape paying his share of those taxes. Sir, what was that burden imposed upon the people of this country for? For the purpose of developing our iron industry. Sir Leonard Tilley, when he brought down his Budget in 1883, hesitated to put duties upon such a staple article of consumption. This is what he said at that time:

Speaking of iron, it is one of the most difficult questions the Government has to grapple. Because iron used in the large portion of the manufactures of the Dominion to-day is to them a raw material, but the Government consider it so important an industry, that they are resolved to develop it if this can be effected by any legislation or moderate encouragement—as the value of iron when manufactured is mainly in labour—the labour of the country. The Government will submit a resolution that after 1st July next, for three years, $1.50 per ton will be paid on all pig iron produced in Canada, and $1 per ton the following three years as a bounty.

That was Sir Leonard's proposition. But Sir Charles Tupper, when he became Finance Minister, took a different view of the matter. He determined on a more vigorous policy. He imposed these heavy duties on the industries of this country, and in doing that he took away from the people far more than had been saved to them in the removal of the duty on anthracite coal. This is the way Sir Charles Tupper spoke of the prospective benefits of the policy adopted in 1887:

We have applied the National Policy to innumerable industries all over Canada with marvellous success. But, Sir, there is a field, perhaps the most important, still untrodden. There is a field still unoccupied that presents greater possibilities and greater opportunities than any other for developing Canadian industry and it lies at the very root and foundation of the National Policy in all countries where it has been adopted. I refer to the iron industry. * * *

Now, Sir, if there is a country in the world to which the iron industry is important it is Canada. And why? Because we possess the coal, and we possess the iron ore, and we possess the fluxes—having everything necessary to develop the great iron industry within our own borders—and yet down to the present moment we have left almost untouched—this enormous, this almost illimitable field for the extension of our National Policy.

After speaking of the central Ontario ores shipped across the lake to Charlotte and Oswego, and other American ports, he continues:

Well, from Oswego and Charlotte on the American side to the anthracite coal fields is only 150 miles. * * * You will have the ships that convey the ore to Oswego or Charlotte or to any of those places from Kingston, Cobourg, and Weller's Bay, bringing back the anthracite coal; and you will have the establishment of blast furnaces at Cobourg, Kingston and Weller's Bay.

Not to be one-sided, he assured the House that charcoal iron would under this policy, like cotton mills, be again established in Carleton, N.B.

Now, the protection of iron will give to the coal industry of this country such a development as will enormously increase the demand for labour in connection with the mining of coal and of ore.

Then he directed his attention to the great North-west. No part of the Dominion was forgotten.

You ask me about the great North-west. We have 50,000 square miles of lignite and bituminous coal there. On Big Island, in Lake Winnipeg, there is a valuable deposit of iron ore and any quantity of timber to make charcoal to convert it into iron. All it requires is the adoption of this policy in order to establish, at an early day, industries for the manufacture of iron in the North-west as well as in the other portions of the country.

And to be equal all round he did not forget British Columbia, but went on to tell that there were vast deposits in that province, also, and they were also given the assurance that their industries would be developed on the spot. Then, taking a glance down the vista of the future, he said:

Well, Mr. Speaker, twenty years ago iron rails were made in Toronto and Hamilton and within the next ten years we will make all our own rails.

That was in 1887. But there was one idea that was practical in all this transaction. While the burden was being imposed on the ordinary citizen, while the ordinary citizen might sweat and toil and pay his duty on every little bit of iron that he had to use in his industry to fix up his cart or wagon or in any one of the thousand odd jobs at home, he had to pay a duty; but the Finance Minister was wise in his generation, and he left the door open. Until such time as the rails were manufactured in this country, he allowed railway companies to bring in their rails free of duty. But he went on a little further to say:

We are only opening up this great question—
But he had an eye to the Canadian Pacific Railway and let in steel rails free.

We are only opening up this great question of developing the great industries of our country, and I have no hesitation—

He never had any hesitation when he was on that line.

—in saying that a more moderate calculation could not be made than the one I shall now offer the House, basing my calculation on the present consumption of iron. Leaving out steel rails, it is equivalent to 250,000 tons of pig iron. To make this you will require 750,000 tons of iron ore, 120,000 tons of limestone and 750,000 tons of coal to produce the first stage pig iron, involving a freight of not less than 1,625,000 tons.

Sir, that was a glorious vision for the railways of this country. Then he went on further to say:

To make it into puddled bars, merchant bars and the various shapes and sizes required would take 750,000 tons more of coal, or a total of 1,500,000 tons of coal.

Then a little further down he goes on to say:

Now, Sir, the result is that by the adoption of this policy you will give permanent employment to an army of men numbering at least 20,000, increasing our population from 80,000 to 100,000 souls, and affording the means of supporting them in comfort and prosperity. Now this estimate of increased population of 100,000 souls does not take into account the manufacture of castings and forgings, cutlery and edge tools, &c., or steel rails. Were we to manufacture these articles now imported, and why should we not progress steadily to that point, the population I have mentioned, of 100,000 souls would be no less than trebled.

Sir, is not the sarcasm of facts somewhat bitter towards the glowing lights of fancy that the hon. Secretary of State indulged in on that occasion. Nearly ten years are past, the people have borne the burdens imposed by that policy patiently all the way through, and what is the net result? Until the other day, when the Americans came over to the city of Hamilton, and after carefully exploiting the city of Hamilton and securing a large bonus from that city, and the donation of a large piece of land, started a furnace, not one single new blast furnace was started on the shores of Lake Ontario or anywhere else in the Dominion. Sir, the irony of facts is bitter towards the flights of fancy indulged in by the hon. Secretary of State on that occasion, when he was Finance Minister. But he was not the only man who soared aloft on that occasion. My respected friend who now reposes in the post office as a Government officer at Hamilton had also a word to say. He was then a member of this House, and endorsed everything that the then Finance Minister (Sir Charles Tupper) said:

Every statement made to-day in this House and ever since the policy has been talked in this House, has shown clearly and conclusively that the man who is most benefited by the National Policy is the farmer. In consequence of the National Policy he is given a market at his own door. If you tell the farmer he does not know his own business you will soon find out that he knows more about it than the hon. gentlemen who seek to teach him.

After stating he represented a city that had large iron industries, he read from a letter from the Ontario Rolling Mill Company, and mentioned the Hamilton Bridge Company and the Hamilton Pipe Company, as follows :—

We think changes made in the tariff will be found satisfactory, and will as intended rapidly develop the iron business. * * * * *
Increased wealth and population are sure to follow.

I suppose they are, but at this time of the day they are following eight years behind, and are not visible yet. How much longer will they have to follow before they come in sight of this, the long-suffering taxpayers of the population of Canada? But Mr. Brown went on to say further :

This bold and courageous policy advocated by the Government, I do not hesitate to say, is the cap stone of the National Policy.

And my respected friend from Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Taylor), who occupies the position of chief whip on the other side, was also carried away by the glowing appearance of things, and he read from the "Globe," this paragraph, dated from Watertown, N.Y., May 16th :

A party of New York capitalists are on their way for an excursion up the Kingston and Pembroke Railway, which runs through the richest iron region in Canada. Their object is to organize a mining company with a capital of $5,000,000 to develop this region.

And a little later the "Globe" correspondent said, on May 16th, at Kingston :

They arrive here at noon. To-night they hold a meeting to organize, and to-morrow inspect the company's property. Endeavours will be made for the establishment of iron smelting works here in view of the present high protection afforded iron men.

But, Sir, as with some other things the sting of this is in the tail. Here is the humble sentence at the end of the paragraph :

A citizen suggests a bonus of $100,000 to aid the new industry.

Five millions of dollars waiting to come into Canada, and all that is asked is a moderate bonus of $100,000 to enable these capitalists to start. All this money is on the way to Canada. It has been eight years on the way, and it has not got here yet. In the meantime we are bearing the burdens. I submit that the prophecies of the hon. Secretary of State have proven delusive, except as to the burdens upon the people.

Mr. BAIN.

But one effect of the policy has been to extract from the pockets of the taxpayers enormous sums of money for which no adequate return has been given. While I do not find fault with expenditure for public works when it is legitimately made, I do say that the expenditure exposed recently by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) who earned the eternal hatred and unceasing abuse of gentlemen opposite, by exposing an expenditure of $3,000,000 for $2,000,000 worth of work, cannot be too severely condemned. It is time, in the interest of the taxpayers, that the Government which would so mismanage the finances were turned out of office to make room for others. And, if gentlemen on this side of the House do not administer the public revenues better than the present Government has done, turn them out also and let others try what they can do. Let us have honest government in the interests of the people and not government in the interests of a few men who will draw their salaries and sit around and declare the country is prosperous. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be allowed to say one word as to the net results of these reductions announced by the Finance Minister as amounting to a million and a half of dollars. Sir, I put the case to you, as a business man. Suppose that your agent came to you and presented a statement to show that he had made reductions of expenditure, and left you with the impression that you had saved a large sum of money. And suppose that a few days afterwards the man who does your banking presented a statement showing the net results of a year's transactions proving that instead of saving a million and a half as represented by your agent the saving had amounted to only $177,000, what would you do with that manager? Would you not say that he had misled you, even if you did not use a stronger phrase. If such a statement were made of the assets of an estate with so little to justify it, surely the sheriff would intervene. Is the business of this country of less moment than any ordinary business transactions between man and man? I am in the judgment of the House when I say that these hon. gentlemen have not submitted a fair and honest statement of the financial position. I have given the facts; let the people judge.

If I understand the signs of the time, Mr. Speaker, the next thing that will be presented as a boon to the people of Canada is some grand scheme by which we are to be more closely incorporated in the British Empire. Some scheme of preferential trade between the mother country and the colonies is to be brought forth to dazzle the eyes of the electors and withdraw their attention from the National Policy and its practical results. Sometimes a period of steady prosperity and absence of interference from outside prevents a country like Canada, which has been consolidated into one vast dominion, from knowing its own strength or its own risks or its own feelings towards the mother country that has protected it and endowed it with so valuable a natural heritage, until some question arises that places in jeopardy the relations of that mother country to its colonies throughout the world. I venture to say as a Canadian that nothing has occurred in recent days which has more stirred the hearts of the people of Canada and make them feel how completely they are a portion of the great British Empire than the recent difficulty raised on the United States Monroe doctrine applied to the Venezuela question, when we were threatened with a rupture of the peaceful relations between the mother country and the United States, in which case Canada must have been the theatre of war, and when the Americans could strike at the mother country through Canada as one of her colonies. But what was the result of the feeling abroad in the country when the fact came home to the minds and hearts of our people, that our relations with Great Britain were jeopardizing our standing with the country to the south of us? Did we show a disposition to withdraw from the mother country in that hour of threatened calamity—a calamity that could not be too much deplored—of a war between the two great branches of the English-speaking people? No, Sir. From one end of the country to the other that fact stirred the hearts of our people to depths that had never been reached before. I venture to say that our people did not know till then the depth of their attachment to the mother country and its institutions. This event has quelled for a moment the slanders that have been spoken against the Liberal party with which I am associated that they are disloyal to Canada and to Canada's institutions. In the hour of Canada's need, did they talk to us after that fashion? When we were threatened with rebellion in the North-west Territories and when there was trouble amongst our own people on the plains, it was not gentlemen on this side who administered the affairs of the country, it was the political party who still wield the destinies of Canada. Did they then say to the young Liberals connected with the volunteer corps of this country: You are disloyal; you shall not go out to fight the battles of Canada and put down this rebellion? Did the Opposition in this House say to the Government: We do not believe in Canada, therefore we will not vote the supplies to put down this rebellion? No, Sir. The young men went to the front and offered their lives, some of them lost their lives, in defence of the institutions of Canada. And the Opposition here through their leader, said: We will vote you whatever money is necessary to suppress the rebellion on the word of the Minister that it is necessary, and we will discuss the whys and the wherefores of that rebellion afterwards. But, in the meantime, authority shall be maintained, and that rebellion shall be suppressed. Sir, in that hour of Canada's need, there was no talk of disloyalty, but in the hour when they thought they could take a mean advantage of a political party, when there was no danger in sight, then we find these men sneaking to the front with their charges of disloyalty, and saying to the great Liberal party of Canada: You are not loyal; we possess a monopoly of loyalty in this country. Now, Sir, with respect to our relations with Great Britain. I think the Secretary of State, in his address at Montreal the other day, was correct in saying that this is not a political question. But, Sir, I want to tell you that there will be a good many men behind him on that side who will be extremely anxious to make it a political question before the next campaign is over, if they can make a little capital out of it to help themselves over the stile, and get back to misrepresent the people in this House. That will not be the first time that misrepresentation has been resorted to by them. Now, Sir, do they present us with a scheme by which they propose to bear a share of the burdens? No, they ask the mother country to tax herself for our benefit. They talk grandly about the mother country. I heard the Minister of Finance, and I think I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) to-night, saying how easy it would be for the mother country to transfer 50,000 farmers into the North-west, to raise all the food products that are wanted to supply herself, independent of any other country, just as if, when these farmers were transferred there, the job was done. Why, we have been spending millions of dollars, and we have had half-a-dozen vigorous policies from these men, and we have not been able to get those farmers up there yet, and the mother country will have to do better than these hon. gentlemen have done, if she is to carry out their scheme. Now, I ask you, how is that to be accomplished? Do they propose to lighten the burdens that we impose on the Imperial goods coming into Canada, and thus strengthen the bonds that bind the two countries together? I do not understand that they propose any such thing. I remember a resolution brought up in this House, during the existence of the present Parliament, on this subject. In April, 1892, Mr. Davies (P.E.I.) moved the following resolution:

Inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada to her ports free of duty, this House is of opinion that the present scale of duties exacted on goods mainly imported from Great Britain, should be reduced.

Did the patriotic gentlemen opposite support that resolution? No, Sir, every mother's son of them got up in this House and voted against it. That was the kind of way they showed their patriotism to the British Empire. They are amongst that class of people who say and do not. Now, I do not think there are two opinions as to the relations that we should maintain with the mother country. But, if the scheme, as outlined by these gentlemen, means anything, it means that Great Britain in some way shall discriminate against other countries and in favour of her colonies. I do not want to make an unfair statement of the position assumed by these gentlemen. We have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite, especially last session, long statements from Imperial political leaders and public men, tending to create the belief that Great Britain was weakening on her trade policy and was travelling towards protection. You will find it permeates the whole speech made by the Secretary of State before the Board of Trade in Montreal. If you examine that speech carefully, you will find a large number of quotations, with dates and references, going away back to the days when the grand old man, Mr. Gladstone, and Lord Roseberry were administering the public affairs of Great Britain. Those gentlemen whom the Secretary of State quoted, were in opposition, and were, of course, quite willing to foment disturbance for the leaders, and make it difficult for them to keep their hold on the various classes whose interests clash in the matter of the public expenditure. I do not propose to quote to you the statements that were made under those conditions, but I want to draw your attention to the recent attitude of Lord Salisbury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not when they were in Opposition, but when they are charged with the administration of Her Majesty's Government, and are held responsible for the administration of that magnificent Empire and the development of its great resources. Sir, at a time when our trade is dull, and our Finance Minister had to admit a deficit of over $4,000,000 a year ago, and another deficit somewhat less for the present year, notwithstanding that he had rolled on more taxes, what are Lord Salisbury and his colleagues doing in England to-day? They are taking credit to themselves for a surplus accumulated by their predecessors in the development of the trade and industries of Great Britain. While we are struggling along with deficits, they have nine or ten million pounds sterling of a surplus in the treasury. And that is the country that these gentlemen tell us is travelling to destruction, which can only be averted by adopting protection and defending herself against the competition of other protected countries. Sir, it was only on the 11th December last that a deputation waited upon Lord Salisbury at the Foreign Office in London, and any one who wishes to read the original article, will find it in the London "Times" of 12th December, 1895. The deputation waited upon Lord Salisbury with respect to the duty on beer, hops and malt. I may as well give the House a short summary of the position assumed by that deputation, because I want to present to the House a fair statement of the position under which Lord Salisbury's utterances were made. The Earl of Winchelsea introduced the deputation that waited upon the Government. The Government were represented by the Premier, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Michael Hicks Beach, and Mr. Long, the Minister of Agriculture, the heads of the three leading departments. The Earl stated that they came as the representatives of the Agricultural Union of Great Britain, that had 500 branches, four rural councils and a central committee, and at the last election their agricultural programme had been accepted by 250 members of the English House of Commons. I draw the attention of the House to this statement as showing the extent and influence of the association that was represented in that delegation. He further stated that he did not ask the Government to make any change in the settled fiscal policy of the country with respect to free imports, but their ground of complaint was this, that increased consumption of sugar and imported barley and hops was seriously interfering with the production of barley and hops in East Anglia, and in Lincolnshire district particularly, where the sheet anchor of the farmer was sheep and barley. They made a statement that in 1891, 52,000,000 bushels of malt were used for brewing, and 1,157,000 hundred weight of sugar, that in 1895, while the malt had increased to 58,000,000 of bushels used, the consumption of sugar had increased to 2,260,000 hundred weight; this increased consumption of sugar in the manufacture of barley had replaced about 9,000,000 bushels of malt. They said moreover that the tax on beer as imposed by the Government amounted to 6s. 9d. per barrel, equal to 18s. per quarter on barley, and that meant a charge on an acre of land in that crop of £3 12s. They proposed that the duty on beer from English products be reduced 1s. per barrel, and that the loss of revenue be made up by imposing, say, another 1s. on foreign beer, raising it to 7s. 9d. per barrel, and thus prevent their lands from going out of cultivation as regards the production of those staples. They particularly guarded themselves by stating that they did not ask for the establishment of protective duties, but for a reduced duty on beer produced from English barley, malt and hops. What was the reply of Lord Salisbury on that occasion, after hearing that statement. He said:

I am glad to hear that your lordship did not pledge yourself to any theory, and as a matter of practical politics you did not urge any departure from the National Policy in respect of free trade. I observe that Sir F. Lockwood has represented me as having been guilty of trifling with the hopes of those who are interested in agriculture by promising protection for hops in a speech at Hastings in 1892, and abandoning that promise the other day. I never promised on that occasion, or on any occasion, any relief by protection, or held out any expectation that there would be a restoration of protection in this country. I distinctly disavowed any advocacy of such a policy. I was urging a totally different thing, and that was that our principles of free trade should not exclude measures for obtaining reciprocity. (Hear, hear.) There is no comparison between the two ideas of reciprocity and protection. On the contrary, so far was I from urging protection for British producers that I was urging that we should take measures to prevent our foreign competitors from using protection against us. (Hear, hear.) I am sensitive upon the suggestion that I have ever promised or urged upon any audience a belief that protection would return within any period to which this generation can look. I have thought it wise—although certainly your lordship's speech did not furnish ground for any imputation that you were unsound on this point—to reiterate those opinions, so that there may be no mistake, as to the view we take concerning the problem which lies before us, and conditions under which it must be solved.

That was the statement of the Prime Minister of England made on 11th December, 1895, when charged with the responsibility of administering the affairs of the great British Empire. I have to ask how much encouragement it gives to the statement of hon. gentlemen opposite, that England is about to adopt a policy of protection. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer was also present, and he referred to the matter somewhat after this fashion. After he had stated that he did not believe the contention as regards the increased consumption of sugar and malt being replaced by sugar was correct, and expressing his opinion that it would not amount to more than 1,137,000 quarters, the hon. gentleman said :

I am of opinion that no favour should be shown to foreign materials, whether Barley or sugar, in the way in which the duty is levied, and we are now investigating to ascertain if sugar is favoured at the expense of barley. You ask me to go beyond this. You disclaim any idea of protection. * * * * *

Two points, however, occur to me. I think you will have to show that your proposal is not really protection in another guise.

If you are to levy a beer duty, say 5s. 9d. on beer made from British malt and hops, and 7s. 9d. on beer brewed from foreign barley, hops or sugar, it may be alleged that this is protection of British products.

A second point is—you would hold out a temptation to brewers to say they brew their beer from nothing but British barley and hops and claim the lower duty. To prevent this would require a continual inspection of the process of manufacture as would be felt by the brewers to be infinitely worse than anything which occurred under the old system of the malt duty.

That touches the initial difficulty of this whole scheme of preferential tariff on foreign imports in order to build up trade between the mother country and the colonies and I present it as a contribution necessary for the solution of that difficulty. The conditions that obtain in Great Britain are evidently different from here, and this is obvious from the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and it is apparent that they would have to reorganize the whole fiscal system and impose duties on imports of foreign goods into Britain and to discriminate in favour of colonial goods, thereby establishing an immense system of Custom-house supervision over trade which would be embarrassing in the highest degree to the British Government, and create a complete revolution in their present fiscal system. Under these circumstances, until hon. gentlemen opposite meet and successfully disentangle these difficulties in connection with the matter, the cause of Imperial federation and the drawing together of the colonies in closer trade relations with the mother country will be found blocked in its initial process, and until they settle that problem it will be only a will-o'-the-wisp wandering around for the purpose of helping some men to get seats in Parliament in constituencies where the facts are not known. Mr. Long, Minister of Agriculture, expressed himself in sympathy with the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. So to-day the British policy stands exactly as it did in the days gone by, and as Mr. Chamberlain said the other day at a dinner, England was the only country that offered the condition for everybody to come into her ports and trade with her, without burden and without embarrassment. The people of Great Britain will have to abandon that proud boast when preferential trade as proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite shall take place. No man will be more willing to consider a reasonable proposition to draw the mother country and colonies closely together than myself, if the proposition presents any reasonable ground for working it out; but I submit that until the Secretary of State can come somewhere nearer to the facts in looking forward to the future than he did in 1878 when he imposed the iron duties, and gave us that splendid landscape of industries which was to be produced by his policy, we had better go slowly when he invites us to admire this grand panorama of imperial and colonial federation which he proposes to build up between the mother country and the colonies. Sir, we are proud of our connection with the mother country, and Canada has shown recently that she is sound on that question. But, Sir, I deprecate the man who tries to trade on that sentiment to pull himself into office, when his merits won't get him there. Now, Sir, one word and I am done.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. BAIN. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce laughed. My existence is not dependent on the breath of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, I have never owed a cent to him either longer or shorter in my political career, and he can laugh and sneer just as much as he pleases, but it makes no difference, Mr. Speaker, to me.

Mr. IVES. I did not laugh at the hon. gentleman. I do not know why he makes that statement. I was not listening to him nor paying the slightest attention to him.

Mr. LANGELIER. So much the worse for you.

Mr. BAIN. Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite have told us how their policy has developed this country. I shall give one example of how it has developed the province of Ontario. You remember that, after the census of 1881, the late leader of the party, Sir John A. Macdonald, who is the man who got the present Government their majority in this House, for they never earned it for themselves; he brought in his Redistribution Bill, and what was the position of affairs in the province of Ontario then? Under ten years of a revenue tariff our population had so increased that we were entitled to four additional members. I do not need to travel down through the record of the changes that the four additional representatives were made an excuse to make in the readjustment of the representation of that province. After we have had ten years of the blessings of the National Policy, what is the result of the last redistribution? The population of Ontario had changed, I grant you: it had left the rural districts and had flocked into the cities, but our number had not increased. We had not even kept even the natural increase, and the people had gone out of the country, and, instead of getting four additional representatives, as was the case after the redistribution of 1881, Ontario had to have two of her constituencies wiped out to enable the representation to follow the centres of population. Two of the oldest ridings in that province were wiped out, North Wentworth and Monk, in two of the oldest settled districts in the western part of Ontario. These two constituencies had to disappear to enable the representation to follow the changes in the population, and there was no increase of members, as there had been after the previous ten years. What was the story in the province which the Minister of Finance himself comes from? New Brunswick lost two members, and Nova Scotia lost one member. The pretty Island of Prince Edward also lost one, and the progress of our new country in the west, on which we had spent so much money to develop, did not make up for the loss that the older provinces had sustained. Is not that a pitiable position for the National Policy to be in after ten years? Is it not pitiable, when we look at the manner in which the National Policy was heralded forth to the people of Canada, and the promises that were made for it as a great boon to our people? Sir, that is the position to-day, and I leave it to this House, as showing indubitably, that, however we may flourish, according to the speeches of the Minister of Finance, the facts are against him and against his policy. I remember, in the early history of Canada, before I was in politics, when the issues that the Liberal party had to fight were of a different class. I remember, Sir, when our educational institutions were under the control of a state church, and when the man who did not bow his knee before the altar of that church, had either to go without a higher education or subscribe to the creed of that church; and yet he was a free citizen and, presumably, in a free country. I remember, Sir, when the public domain was set aside for the benefit of a special class in this country, and the rest of the community were excluded from it. I remember the fight our forefathers had to place the people of Canada in respect to religious institutions, and in respect to educational institutions, on one even, parallel line, without regard to their creed or to their complexion. Sir, that was the battle that was fought by the people who, in by-gone days, contended for the rights of the community. To-day, we are face to face with a system which says that one citizen shall be taxed for the benefit of another. I say, Sir, that the battle will go on until that also passes away, and until all citizens are treated free and equal, as they ought to be in the eyes of the community, and in the eyes of the law. And Sir, the battle will never cease, come it early or come it late, until the time is that all Canadian citizens shall be placed on a fair and equitable basis, and shall all be treated alike, as free citizens of a free country having free institutions.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bain), in opening his speech, stated that, in 1891, the Conservative party appealed to the country on the question of reciprocity. I think, if I refresh the hon. gentleman's memory, he will recollect that the policy on which the Conservative party appealed to the people of this Dominion in previous elections, was the policy on which they appealed on that occasion. The policy on which the Conservative party appealed to Canada in 1891 was, as he will remember, the old flag, the old man, and the old policy. Reciprocity has always been a part of the policy of the Conservative party, but we have demanded always that reciprocity shall be had on such terms as must be fair to Canada. No question of reciprocity will be considered, if it is to involve discrimination in favour of the United States and against importations from Great Britain. For many years we have had on our statute-books a statutory offer of reciprocity to the United States. I do not regard the question of reciprocity at the present time as a living question, because I do not believe that the people of the United States have the slightest intention of conceding to the people of Canada or to the people of almost any other country privileges such as some of the people of Canada at the present time would ask. The Hon. George Brown, in 1874, made an attempt, an ineffectual attempt, to secure reciprocity for this country. I do not think that there has been since that time such a change of feeling in the United States as would give us any hope that, even if it were desirable, they will consider the question of a reciprocity treaty in a limited form. I do not purpose, as the hour is very late, to follow the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) through his long speech. Had the hon. member been present at the fancy dress ball last evening in the Senate Chamber, I should have said, without any hesitation, that he must have assumed the role of Richard II. To-night he has budded out into a strong financial critic, endeavouring, as it were, to displace the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) on that side of the House. He seems to me a pretty good second; but I think I can say for the hon. member for South Oxford that he would not have wasted so much of the time of this House in repeating old platitudes that have been threshed out over and over again. How often have we been told in this House and out of it that the present tariff discriminates against Great Britain. It is such a simple question that I wonder how such an intelligent man as the hon. member for North Wentworth should have fallen into the blunder of supposing that it does so in a single instance. When any man will point out to me a single item in our tariff where the impost against British goods is higher than the impost upon the same goods coming from the United States, then I shall understand that there is a discrimination against Great Britain. But there is no such thing in our tariff, and it is impossible for hon. gentlemen opposite to show that the tariff is in this respect unfair:

With me protection is a conviction, not a theory. I believe in it and warmly advocate it, because enveloped in it are my country's highest development and greatest prosperity; out of it comes the greatest gains to the people, the greatest comforts to the masses, the widest encouragement for manly aspirations, the best and largest rewards for honest efforts, and a dignifying and elevating citizenship, upon which the safety and purity and permanency of our political system depend.

These, Mr. Speaker, are not my words; they are the words of a man whose name is well-known wherever the English language is spoken. They were spoken by William McKinley, at that time Governor of the State of Ohio. However, I can say with him that I am a protectionist on principle. I believe in protection. With me it is a conviction. I believe it is the only true policy for Canada at the present time—the only policy on which the affairs of this country can be successfully carried on. Were I living in the United States to-day, or had I been there at the time of the McKinley Bill, I no doubt would have been a Republican and would have supported that Bill. As a Canadian, I regret that ever that Bill passed; but the United States have just as good a right to do with their affairs as we have to do with ours. It is not for us to dictate to them, nor will we suffer them for one moment to dictate to us what kind of a policy we shall adopt. Hon. gentlemen have for years been declaring that the National Policy is a robbery and a fraud. Well, I am not going to quarrel with hon. gentlemen about the terms they use. Perhaps there is some justification for even that charge. In 1878, I admit, the National Policy did rob hon. gentlemen of the Treasury benches, and since then it has defrauded them of the privilege of returning. In that respect, it may have been justly designated by them as a robbery and a fraud; but if we take the verdict of the people again in 1882, in 1887 and in 1891, I think we have the assurance of the great electorate of this country that the National Policy is neither a robbery nor a fraud. Nearly every hon. gentleman on the other side who has spoken in this debate has endeavoured to explain what the policy of the Opposition is. It seems to me that that question is very much simplified from what it was some years ago. As I understand it, and I trust I am not mistaken, it is simply this. Both sides of the House admit that a revenue must be obtained. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that, in arranging the tariff, revenue only must be considered. We on this side say that not only should the question of revenue be considered, but also the question of protection to all the various industries of this country—agricultural, manufacturing, mining, or whatever they may be. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House say that the last vestige of protection must be swept away. That is the language of their leader, used in a speech delivered by him at a meeting in Markham some two years ago. If that policy is to be carried out, agricultural protection must be destroyed, and raw materials must be taxed, because the admission of free raw material is a species of protection. Free raw material, to my mind, is an essential in order to give us cheap manufactures. It has been stated in this debate that the free admission of raw material assists, not the consumer, but only the manufacturer. Now, I would ask simply this question: when the duty was taken off raw sugar, was it the consumer or the manufacturer got the benefit? Surely every hon. member of this House will admit that the consumer throughout the country who obtains his twenty or twenty-five pounds of sugar for a dollar, instead of paying the high price which prevailed previously, has received the benefit of the reduction, and not the manufacturer. The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, when in power, was to tax tea and coffee. We on this side of the House say that articles like tea and coffee, which cannot be produced in this country, ought to be admitted free. In 1894 over 20,000,000 pounds of tea were imported into this country. As compared with the rate of duty that was charged in 1878, there was a saving on that tea of $1,000,000 to the people of this country. However, I am not sure that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are all quite agreed on their line of policy. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) told the House, a few evenings ago, that he proposed to make a change of very considerable importance in the constitution of the Parliament of this country. He announced that he was in favour of the abolition of the Senate. I do not wish to discuss that question for one moment, but all I desire to say is that, instead of abolishing the Senate, increasing the Senate, so far as I can understand, is rather the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1873, when the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie came into power, one of his first acts was to attempt to add six members to the Senate, and since then I am not aware that the policy of the Liberal party on that question has changed. Had Mr. Mackenzie's proposition been carried out in 1873, it would have entailed an additional expense of $1,100 a year for each Senator, six in number, or $6,600 yearly, or a total of $145,000 for these additional members.

But with regard to the question of the tariff, they do not seem to be agreed. Although on general lines they may, yet amongst them we find some who cling to the protectionist principle. If I mistake not the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) is still in favour of protection on corn. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Allan) wants wine protected. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) a year or two ago—and I presume his policy is the same now—wanted the Government to exercise a paternal affection over Manitoba lambs. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has always been contending for a duty on canned goods.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman is quite incorrect about me. I never advocated protection on Manitoba lambs.

An hon. MEMBER. On mutton?

Mr. MARTIN. No, what I did say was to find fault with the Government for discriminating against the farmers in the North-west while pretending to pursue their policy of protection. I never argued for or supported it in any way.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I think I was not far astray when I said that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) a year or two ago, desired to exercise paternal affection over the Manitoba lambs. I accept his statement. I am not going to say, and I did not say that he asked for any special protection more than is given at present on Manitoba lambs. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) I believe, still wants protection on flax fibre. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) is still desirous of having the duty on coal oil, and if I mistake not the hon. member for Queen's, (P.E.I.) (Mr. Davies) is an advocate of protection to pork.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman. I am sure, does not want to misrepresent me. I am not an advocate of the duty on pork in the abstract, but I said before, and say again, that if you determine to maintain a protective system in Canada we must try,—it is such a vicious system—and make it bear as lightly on the country and equally on the people as possible, and therefore you must extend the same wrong to the maritime provinces that you do elsewhere.

Mr. HENDERSON. I accept the explanation of the hon. gentleman, but I say to the hon. member for Queen's that if he does not want protection on pork, the people of Ontario, whom the hon. gentleman addressed last night, will scarcely want him. In North Waterloo (Mr. Snider) who is the candidate of the Liberal party, has pronounced himself a thorough protectionist. He will not support any government that does not adopt the protection principle although he come out as a Liberal. Only a year ago, nearer to us than North Waterloo, we had the case of Mr. Frost, of Smith's Falls, a Liberal, the brother of a large manufacturer of agricultural implements there, who announced himself a candidate in the riding of South Leeds and Grenville, and issued a manifesto in which he declared himself in favour of the principle of protection, not only of manufacturing goods but of agricultural products—in fact the policy of a regular protectionist. I think it worth while to place on record some of his remarks, which are exceedingly pertinent. He says:

Gentlemen.—At the solicitation of a considerable number of the electors, particularly those belonging to the Conservative party, I have consented to become a candidate at the next general election for the Dominion. As the present Parliament may have another session before dissolution some may consider me a little premature, but the general experience is that when the cause is good the more time the people have to discuss and consider it the more zealously will they rally in its defence.

Hitherto it has been the practice of candidates for parliamentary honours to appeal to the prejudices of the people belonging to their respective parties. In announcing my intention to seek your suffrages for the approaching elections I do not appeal to your prejudices, but to your interest.

My platform is protection—protection for the farmer, protection for the merchant, and protection for the manufacturer. No class stand more in need of protection than the farmers, the mainstay and backbone of our grand Dominion, and it will be my constant care to watch over their interests in that connection, if elected, to the utmost of my ability; and while I cannot protect his crops from the influence of the weather, his pocket against the insinuations of glib-tongued agents of humbug merchandise, or his peace of mind against the designs of crafty lawyers, I can use my best endeavours to make a good market for him where his produce can be disposed of for hard cash instead of promissory notes.

And in similar terms he speaks of protection for the mercantile interests and protection for the manufacturers. I believe, and I feel the more assured in my belief on reading this, that there are more protectionists among the Liberal party to-day and especially among the farming community of the Liberal party than there have been at any time since the introduction of the National Policy.

Now, I would be very sorry to weary the House, especially at this late hour, but I trust you will bear with me a little longer. I desire to speak somewhat of the agricultural production of this country. Hon members on the other side have claimed that the farmer is not protected. I desire to show that he is. I feel assured there is no class of men in Canada to-day who have better protection and more satisfactory protection than our agriculturists. Let us make a list of the articles on which duties are paid on goods which are a product of the farm :

Animals, living, n.e.s.....	20	p.c.
Live hogs, per lb.....	1½	cents.
Meats, n.e.s.....	2	do

Honey per lb.....	3	do
Maple sugar.....	20	p.c.
Cider refined, per gallon.....	10	cents.

A very good list, in my humble opinion. Nearly everything that is produced on a farm has a protective duty to prevent competition from abroad in these articles. On the other hand, there are a number of articles that are imported by farmers that come in free of duty. Here are some of the articles admitted free :

- Animals for improving stock.
- Bees.
- Bones, crude.
- Domestic fowls to improve stock.
- Guano, bone dust and other animal and vegetable manures.
- Indian corn for ensilage.
- Oil cake and similar feeds.
- Rennet, raw or prepared.
- Sawn lumber, not dressed, or on one side only.
- Laths, palings, fence posts, &c.
- Seedling stock for grafting.
- Locust beans and meal for feed.
- Tea and coffee, and sugar up to No. 16 Dutch standards up to 1895.

So the farmer is protected on what he produces while what he needs to import largely comes in free of duty. I desire to make a reference to a number of these articles. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, made special reference to the hog product of this country. I wish to say something upon the subject, because, if there is one instance in which it can be plainly shown that the imposition of a higher rate of duty has benefited the farmer it is that of the additional tax put upon hog products about five or six years ago. The duty as it stands is : Live hogs, 1½ cents per pound ; mess pork, 2 cents ; hams, bacon and lard, 2 cents. Prior to 1890, in the province of Ontario, the industry of raising hogs was rather unsatisfactory. The importation of pork into this country was extremely large. It was then that the Government took the matter more fully into consideration and granted an increase of duty. The result of this increase was marvellous. In 1889 there were 835,469 hogs raised in the province of Ontario, but in 1894, nearly five years later, the number was increased to 1,142,133, an increase of 306,664, in value, over $2,000,000. This, let it be remembered, is for the province of Ontario alone. Now, let us go further and consider the effect of the duty upon the entire Dominion. In 1890, the imports of pork and pork products into Canada for consumption were as follows :—

	Pounds.
Pork.....	17,185,794
Bacon and hams.....	4,353,653
Lard.....	4,881,786
Total.....	26,421,233

The value of these imports was $1,458,286. This was an enormous import of hog products into a country which ought to raise, and has since raised not only the amount of hog products it required, but a very large amount for exportation. Then, the duty was increased to a rate sufficient to afford protection and to give the farmers courage to go into the industry of raising hogs very extensively. In 1894-95, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns for the year ending 30th June last, there was imported into Canada for consumption, pork products as follows :—

	Pounds.
Pork	3,203,023
Bacon and ham.....	826,882
Lard	190,921
Total	4,220,826

The value of these imports was $309,436. So that in 1895 the importation of hog products into this country was only about one-sixth of what it was in 1890—the direct result of the better protection that was given to this very important industry. But that is not all. Not only have we succeeded in supplying our home demand, but the impetus that has been given to this industry by the increased protection has resulted in an export very largely in excess of that of 1890. In 1890 our exports of Canadian hog products amounted to 7,730,971 pounds, of a value of $645,360. But in 1895 these exports had increased to the enormous amount of 41,930,348 pounds, value, $3,943,275—another of the results of the protective principle as applied to this important industry. It is a well-known fact that in the province of Ontario to-day and I fail to understand why the same should not be true of the province of Manitoba and the Northwest, nearly every farmer raises a considerable number of hogs. This has become one of the most profitable investments on the farm. And I may say that there is abundance of room yet in the markets of Great Britain to develop this industry, and I hope that the protection that has been afforded to the farmers for a few years past may long be continued and enable them to go on and develop the industry to a very much greater extent. But that is not the only result to be obtained from the increased protection that has been given for the past few years upon hogs and hog products. That protection has created an industry in this country in the slaughtering and packing of hogs. Buildings have to be erected and labour is employed in erecting them. Material had to be furnished, and thus further employment is given. Then a large staff of men must be employed continuously in slaughtering the hogs and packing the pork. Such an industry gives employment to a large number of people and provides a larger market for the farmers of this country, and helps in every way to benefit the farming community. The following are the figures showing the quantities entered for home consumption in three provinces in the year 1894-95 :

Ontario	$83,736
New Brunswick	61,151
Quebec	45,519

Hon. gentlemen will see that these were chiefly in the lumbering districts—mess pork for the use of lumbering men. On 10th February, 1896, only a few days ago, mess pork was quoted at $10.10 to $10.15 in Chicago ; in New York, on the same day, it was $10.75 to $11, and in Toronto, on the same day, the price was quoted at $14.50 to $15.50 ; a clear

Mr. HENDERSON.

$4 a barrel in favour of the Canadian producer of hogs and hog products. Surely, as I stated before, protection has benefited the farmer in this respect. Now, I desire to give you a statement made by a gentleman who, for some years, has been giving some attention to the prices of agricultural products, especially wheat, oats and pork—I refer to the president of the Lake of the Woods Milling Company. On the 1st January last, he was asked by a reporter of the Montreal "Gazette" his opinion with regard to the duty of pork, and he said :

Now let us have a talk about the pig. Canadian mess pork is worth from $11.50 to $12 per barrel—

That was in January ; it is much higher now.

—while American mess is quoted to-day in Chicago at from $7.35 to $7.49 ; so I ask you what kind of a figure the Canadian producer would cut if it were not for the import duty of $4 per barrel.

Of course, continued the president of the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, free trade in pork and oats would benefit the millionaire lumbermen, to whom we have handed over the greater part of our forests—the birth right of the people—for almost nothing. However, this is no fault of the lumberman ; but I cannot believe that the Canadian farmer will endorse a policy that would practically enable the lumbermen to import their supplies to his great disadvantage.

Such a record, I think, testifies to the wisdom of the Government in inaugurating a policy such as I have referred to. With respect to live hogs, I am aware that it is contended that they are not much higher in this country than they are in the United States. I examined the "Globe" newspaper of 10th February, 1896, and I find there that heavy packing hogs were quoted at $4.05 to $4.25 in Chicago ; fed hogs in Montreal, $4.25. But on 13th February, Chicago heavy packing and shipping hogs were quoted at $4 to $4.25, and Montreal live hogs were, as quoted by the hon. member for North Wentworth, $4.75. Now, the hon. member for North Wentworth propounded a question of which I could scarcely see the force. He said : How could you ship hogs from Chicago to Montreal, if you paid $4.05 in Chicago and sold them at Montreal at $4.75 ? The beauty of it is, that we do not want to ship hogs from Chicago to Montreal. The object of the tariff of 1½ cents a pound is to prevent the hogs of the United States, of which they raised in 1894 the enormous number of 44,165,000—I say, to prevent that enormous surplus of hogs being shipped into this country and breaking the market that is intended for our own farmers I need scarcely say anything with reference to the duty of 3 cents a pound on meat. That question has been discussed over and over again. Years ago, meats were imported into this country from Chicago, train loads were passing through the province every day, distributing cargoes in every town and village along the line, robbing the farmer of this country of the market to which he was fairly entitled for his butcher's cattle; but the present duty of 3 cents per pound absolutely prevents that. The value of the importation of fresh meat in 1894-95 was only $15,529; so that we have effectually obtained the Canadian market for fresh meat. It is a well-known fact that these train loads of meat are to-day, every day of the week, in fact, passing through over the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. It is not the little wire that seals the door that prevents this meat from being unloaded in the various towns and cities along the line of railway, but it is the law which compels the man who sells that meat to pay 3 cents a pound before he is permitted to unload a pound of it, that gives the market to the people of this country. In reference to mutton, the importation from Australia is so small that it is scarcely worth attention, $576 worth being the entire import last year, and on that we collected $201.60. On canned meats there is a duty of 25 per cent. That includes canned meats, canned poultry, and canned game. The hon. member for North Wentworth, to-night, in quoting the imports for canned meat, poultry and game, stated they amounted to $143,000. In this, I think, he made an error, as I find that for home consumption the total imports were $119,909, and of these imports of canned meat, poultry and game, only the value of $10,319 came from Australia. Now, I desire to draw attention to this matter, because a good deal has been made of the importation of Australian canned mutton into the city of Montreal, and it has been made to appear in some of the recent by-elections, that a very large amount of meat indeed was imported across the Pacific Ocean from Australia into this country. Now, the amount of $10,319 is credited to Australia for canned meats, poultry and game. When you take into consideration the price of canned mutton in Montreal, we can scarcely believe that any considerable quantity of it ever reached that city. According to the price-list of grocers in Montreal, Australian boiled canned mutton is sold at 14 7-12th to 18 3/4 cents per pound; roast canned mutton, 16 3/4 to 20 5-6ths cents; corned ditto, 16 3/4 to 20 5-6th cents per pound. We cannot conceive for a moment that any considerable quantity of canned mutton is consumed either in Montreal or in any other place in the Dominion of Canada at such prices as these. We know, however, that of this amount of $10,319, only a portion could have been mutton. In Australia there is an immense number of rabbits. So annoying have these pests become that years ago the Government of New South Wales offered a reward of $125,000 for a method of exterminating them. It costs nothing scarcely to can them, beyond the labour and tin; the animals themselves cost nothing beyond the trouble of killing. They are canned as other meats, and are shipped as game. From 100 to 200 tons per week, in the colder weather, are shipped to the city of London to be used as food, and large amounts are shipped into the Western States. Now, taking into consideration the fact that Australian canned mutton in Montreal ranges from about 15 to 20 cents a pound, and that game, which is included, and which is a part, no doubt, of the $10,319, is so cheap, the meat being obtained for nothing beyond the canning and the price of the cans, I think it is reasonable indeed to assume that a very large part of that $10,319, instead of being Australian canned mutton, is simply canned rabbit. If, however, the contention of the hon. gentleman is correct, that mutton is not sufficiently protected in this country by the imposition of a duty of 35 per cent on fresh mutton, or a duty of 25 per cent on canned mutton, then, the remedy is in the hands of the Government to place a higher duty upon that article, and secure for the Canadian farmer the entire market of the country. However, as I said before, I think that market has now been pretty well secured, as well as we could reasonably expect, when the total imports from Australia of fresh mutton last year was only $576.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman is quoting from the returns of two years ago.

Mr. HENDERSON. I took the returns for 1894-95.

Mr. MARTIN. I think not. I think the hon. gentleman took them for 1893-94. I admit the difference is not very great. Imports of mutton and lamb fresh, 1894-95, were 57,845 pounds, of the value of $3,097, for home consumption.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have given the returns for 1894-95. If I find I have given them wrongly, I will correct them in "Hansard." With respect to butter, a good deal has been said to-night, and I confess I was somewhat surprised at many of the remarks made by the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) with respect to the encouragement given to this country by the Dominion Government. The hon. gentleman does not seem to be in touch with the Government in this matter; he seems to prefer that no encouragement whatever shall be extended to an industry, which if cultivated along the line of the cheese industry will doubtless before very many years constitute one of the great industries of this country. I am sure it is important that the Government should lend all the aid in its power to develop this industry, and if possible secure our share in the market for butter in England, to which we are entitled by the high standard reached by Canadian butter. The imposition of the duty of 4 cents per pound seems to me to be quite sufficient to prevent the flooding of this market at the present time with butter from the United States. On February 13, 1896, New York quotations gave New York state creamery butter as 13 to 16½ cents, while creamery butter in Montreal was 20 to 21 cents. If there was not a duty of 4 cents per pound, it would be quite possible to send the creamery butter of New York state to Montreal, and prevent the sale there of our creamery butter, or at all events reduce the price from 20½—21 down to about 17 cents. Western dairy was quoted in New York at 10—14 cents; in Montreal butter of a similar quality was 14—15 cents.

As regards apples, the duty of 40 cents per barrel seems to afford fairly good protection, but I would not approve of any reduction. This is a growing industry in this country. No doubt in some years early apples are imported, but in the later part of the year we have no need whatever for American apples, and I would strongly favour the continuance of the duty of 40 cents per barrel.

With respect to barley and corn, it will be remembered that we have a statutory offer to the United States, that when the Americans are prepared to admit both corn and barley from Canada free of duty, we will admit both grains into Canada free of duty. I think that is a fair kind of reciprocity, and I feel assured that it is one of the best solutions which can be had to the vexed question of barley and corn.

With respect to the oat crop of this country, it may be contended that 10 cents per bushel is a very high duty, it being equal to 50 per cent at the present time. It may, however, be high at one time and not so high at another time. No doubt it appears to be high at the present moment. But if we take into consideration the fact that in 1894 the United States produced 662,000,000 bushels of oats, while Ontario produced only 70,000,000, and in 1895, 84,000,000, the disproportion being so great, and the quantity produced in the United States so large compared with what is produced in the provinces of Canada, it seems to be necessary to maintain this high duty in order to prevent the surplus of the United States from entirely destroying the market of the farmers for oats in this country. I desire to show how prices vary in different parts of the country. On Feb. 10, 1896, the price at Chicago was 19¾ cents, in New York, 25½ cents, in Toronto, 27-28 cents, and in Montreal no doubt a shade higher. If one-half of the crop of Ontario were to be sold at about half the difference between the Chicago and Toronto prices there would be the enormous gain of $2,100,000 secured to the people of Ontario.

I propose now to say something with respect to the wheat question. Hon. gentlemen opposite state from time to time, and in fact it is almost a part of every speech delivered on that side of the House, that the Conservative party in 1878 declared that under the National Policy they were going to raise the price of wheat. I think there is very little difficulty in showing that the

Mr. HENDERSON.

National Policy has succeeded in raising the price of wheat relatively.

Mr. MULOCK. Why does it not raise it a little higher?

Mr. HENDERSON. Hon. gentlemen are so much opposed to the present tariff that it would be almost dangerous to attempt to raise it higher. In 1894-95 we imported for home consumption only 499,212 bushels of wheat, showing that we have almost entirely secured the Canadian market for the farmers of Canada. 350,000 bushels of wheat came into Ontario, and 147,000 into the province of British Columbia; but we exported during that time the very considerable quantity of 8,225,689 bushels. Practically then I say we have secured the market of Canada for the wheat grown in Canada. A comparison of the prices of wheat in different countries and in different parts of the United States, also in the old country and in Canada at the present time is very interesting indeed. I regret the hon. member for South Huron is not in his seat at the present time, because I should like to draw his attention to quotations for wheat in Ontario from 1892 to 1894, as quoted by him in the House a few evenings ago. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman intended to deceive the House in any way, but undoubtedly in some way, in comparing the prices of wheat in the United States with those of Ontario, he made a mistake and took the prices of wheat in New York. There is a decided difference between the average price of wheat in the United States and the average price in New York. The market price of wheat in Ontario is obtained by the Ontario Bureau of Statistics from twenty-nine different markets for the whole year or for six months, and so an average is obtained, which appears to be a very fair system indeed. In 1894 the average price of wheat in Ontario ascertained in that way was 55 cents per bushel. In the United States the average price on the same basis, that is at the point of the farmers' delivery, was 49.1 cents, or about 6 cents below the average price per bushel in Ontario. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) in giving us the quotations of the United States markets from 1882 to 1894, inadvertently gave the quotations for the city of New York, which, of course, are much higher. As the hon. gentleman from South Huron has put on record the wrong quotations, I propose to-night to give the House the average prices of wheat for Ontario and for the United States during the last thirteen years:

Year.	Average price, Ontario.	Average price, U. S.
1882	$1.01	88.2 cts.
1883	1.05	91.1 "
1884	80.5	64.5 "
1885	81.5	77.1 "
1886	73.6	68.7 "
1887	78.4	68.1 "

Year.	Average price, Ontario.	Average price, U. S.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If my hon. friend would permit me, I would like to call his attention to the fact that Ash Wednesday has begun, and we have conscientious scruples about sitting on that day.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, my. I think we had better let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) disburden himself of his speech, because he wishes to keep Ash Wednesday also.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am obliged to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I may say I have no conscientious scruples myself against sitting on Ash Wednesday, but I would not like to interfere with the rights and privileges of any other member. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) is particular, and I wish to continue what I have to say to-night, so that I shall not be called upon again.

As I stated before, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the Conservative party have redeemed their pledge when they said that under the National Policy the price of wheat would be increased in this country. The enormous increase of the growth of wheat throughout the Dominion of Canada is, I think, something to be thankful for. During the last six years, as quoted in the report of the Ontario Bureau of Statistics, where they collect carefully all these facts from the returns of other countries, I find that the increase in the world's production of wheat from 1889 to 1894, amounts to 413,800,000 bushels. In Argentina alone, the increase during these six years was 64,000,000 bushels, and the increase in Canada during the same time was 12,000,000 bushels. According to the records, wheat sold lower in England on the Liverpool market in the year 1893, than it had done for 125 years previously. The causes of the reduction in the price of wheat are varied. Increased production probably is the greatest cause. In 1892 the world's production was 2,372,000,000 bushels; in 1893 the world's production of wheat was 2,389,000,000; and in 1894, the world's production of wheat was 2,588,000,000 bushels, showing a gradual increase from year to year, or, as I stated before, an increase from 1889 to 1894, of 413,800,000 bushels. Another cause of the low price of wheat in this country, and in all other countries throughout the world, is the largely increased production of low-priced labour countries such as Argentine, India, and Russia. So much is this the case that in the month of May, 1894, wheat from La Plata sold in England on the London market at 64 cents a bushel. Another cause of the decrease in the price of wheat must be attributed to the reduced cost of handling, improved machinery, elevators, and increased facilities for transport. Another cause is that substitutes have been found for wheat, and some countries are using something else instead of it. For instance, in Austro-Hungary the consumption of wheat per capita is 3·9 bushels; in Germany, 2·5 bushels; in Russia, 2 bushels; in Scandinavia, 1·4 bushels; whereas, in Canada, the consumption is 5·5 bushels, and in Great Britain, 5 bushels. From these causes we can readily discover the reasons for the largely decreased price of wheat the world over. Now, in 1882 the average price of wheat in London was 36 cents over the average price in Ontario; in 1884 the average price in London was only 18 cents a bushel over the price in the province of Ontario. In 1890 the average price of wheat in the city of London was 3 cents over the average price in Ontario; and in 1889 the average price of wheat in London was 1½ cents per bushel over the average price in the province of Ontario; and in 1888 the average price in Ontario exceeded the average price in London by 6 4-10 cents per bushel. On February 14th, 1896, only a few days ago, wheat sold on the Toronto market at 85 cents per bushel, and on the Liverpool market the same day the price of winter wheat was 83½ cents, or 1½ cents per bushel lower than it was selling for in the city of Toronto. Now, let us look for a moment at the price of wheat in the United States. The average price of wheat in the United States on June 5th, 1895, was as follows:—In Chicago, from 77 to 78 cents; and in Toronto, $1.04. On February 10th, 1896, wheat sold in Duluth at 60⅞ cents for No. 1 hard; at Milwaukee, wheat sold for 62¾ cents; at Chicago, wheat sold for 65 cents; at Toledo, wheat sold for 73¾ cents; at New York, wheat sold for 73¾ cents; at Detroit, wheat sold for 74¾ cents, white No. 1; at Oswego, wheat sold for 75 cents; in Liverpool, England, wheat sold for 83½ cents, and in the city of Toronto, wheat sold for 85 cents a bushel. Therefore, I say, comparatively speaking, that wheat in the province of Ontario is not only higher than it is in the United States, but higher than it is in the old country. We are told continually that the Liverpool market is the standard by which all values have to be gauged. Now, if the price of wheat in Ontario to-day is higher than the price in the Liverpool market, and the price in Liverpool in 1882 was 36 cents in excess of the province of Ontario, I think surely we have come to the time when we can fairly claim for the National Policy that the pledge of the Conservative party has been redeemed and that the price of wheat has been increased.

Now, I propose to deal as briefly as possible with another phase of the question. It is contended that the effect of the National Policy is not only to impose upon the people of this country a tax which goes into the Dominion treasury, but also to impose a tax of similar amount which never reaches the treasury. We have been told that the additional amount of taxation is $30,000,000 annually, and that in the seventeen years since the Conservative Government has been in power it has amounted to the enormous sum of $500,000,000. Now, I may say that for the last five years I have listened as carefully to the debates in this House, I think, as any hon. gentleman in it, and I have watched carefully for a single argument to establish the statement that the price of an article is of necessity enhanced to the consumer by reason of a duty being imposed upon it. Let me give you an instance where that is positively not the case. Last summer salt was quoted in Michigan at 60 cents a barrel; the duty on salt is 25 cents; but the price in Canada at that time was 50 cents a barrel. I would like to know how much of the $30,000,000 was made out of salt. In 1893 a factory in Brantford commenced the manufacture of binding twine. The necessary capital for carrying on the business was furnished by the farmers. They sold 800 tons throughout the province of Ontario. Apparently they were unable to manufacture all they required. Of the 800 tons which they sold they manufactured at the factory at Brantford 380 tons, they bought from the Ontario Government 180 tons, and from the Consumers' Cordage Company of Halifax 234 tons. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly apparent that the Brantford Company, which was organized exclusively for the purpose of giving farmers binding twine at first cost, and which was carried on with cheap money subscribed by the farmers themselves, must have reached the lowest possible price in the manufacture of this twine. It is not to be presumed for one moment that in the Central Prison any profit was to be made upon the twine manufactured there. Certainly the price of that was not enhanced by reason of the duty, any more than the price of the twine manufactured at Brantford was enhanced by reason of the duty. Now, the Brantford Company buy from the Consumers' Cordage Company at Halifax the large amount of 234 tons, at the ordinary rates and on the usual terms, and they sell this same twine to the farmers at the price at which they had sold their own—a proof conclusive to me that the Consumers' Cordage Company had made the twine cheaper than the company at Brantford and cheaper even than the Central Prison, because the company at Brantford claimed that a profit of

Mr. HENDERSON.

15 per cent had been made on the business that they proposed to carry on without profit. Let me give another evidence that the price of an article is not enhanced by reason of there being a protective duty upon it. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) last year, in addressing this House, to his own satisfaction apparently, fully demonstrated this matter. He said:

There are, they say, no taxes paid on woollens and cottons, and the other lines manufactured here. I wish to show that such statement is not correct. Last year, 1893-94, we imported manufactured cotton, $4,001,618. On that import we paid a duty of $1,139,068. The estimated consumption of cotton in Canada is $9,000,000 a year. Take the average duty of 30 per cent on $9,000,000, and you will find it will amount to $2,700,000. Now, we collected in duties on the manufactured commodities imported, $1,139,068, leaving a balance of $1,560,132, which went into the pockets of the cotton manufacturers.

To my mind, this is an extraordinary course of reasoning. The hon. gentleman simply assumed that there was 30 per cent paid on the \$9,000,000. After having assumed it, he asserts it, and after having asserted it, he believes it, and he asks us to believe it. Where is there a tittle of evidence in that statement to demonstrate to any man that the price of cotton goods made in this country was enhanced one fraction of a cent by reason of the duty imposed on cotton goods coming into the country. Those who know anything about cotton goods know that the printed cottons manufactured in Canada to-day are of the very finest quality. I mean with regard to wear. We have not the fancy patterns, because our limited market would not admit of the manufacturer securing all the patterns necessary to produce fancy cottons. But it is known to every Canadian woman that the Canadian prints are the best goods for wear and for washing that can be obtained. They are the goods used by the masses, and they are cheaper than any of the goods of a similar kind that can be imported from Great Britain or the United States. The same remarks will apply to flannellettes, Oxford shirtings and domestic cottons. I assert, from my experience, and from all I can gather from the business men and importers of this country, and I believe it to be a fact, that to-day the keen and cutting competition of the cotton manufacturers of this country has not only given us an article cheaper than the imported article, but has had the effect of forcing down the importers' prices; so that the importing of cottons to-day is not as profitable a business as it was before the introduction of the National Policy. So that not only have we cheaper Canadian cotton goods, but cheaper imported goods, simply because we have a protective tariff in this country. The hon. gentleman from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) took up the matter of starch and elaborated it in the same way. He says the consumption is 5,000,000 pounds and that the duty on the whole at $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents is \$75,000. We imported, in 1893, 44,000 pounds, on which we collected a duty of \$14,475, leaving \$60,527 in the pockets of the manufacturers. He simply assumed that that was the case, and then used that assumption as evidence that it was the case. I do not think that is the kind of material with which to convince the people that starch, either for laundry purposes, or for food, is dearer by reason of the National Policy; and it is a well-known fact to every family which has occasion to use those commodities that they are cheaper now by a great deal than they ever were previous to the introduction of the National Policy. An ounce of experience will go much further in this way than a pound of assumption. It seems to me absurd to suppose that, when there is only one pound out of every 114 pounds imported any such result could be obtained as the hon. gentleman seems to deduce from this.

But he seems to make the same illustration with regard to sugar. He says, take sugar, and demonstrates the whole thing to his own satisfaction. He has proved that the $30,000,000 tax which does not go into the treasury is not a myth, but a reality:

We imported, he said, in 1893-94 303,789,800 pounds free and 2,823,448 pounds on which we paid a duty of $22,230.66, which showed that the manufacturers sell the product refined up to the price at which it can be imported.

I would ask any hon. gentleman if it shows it? Is there an ounce of reasoning in the matter which would convince any man that the simple fact, as there stated, shows that the price is enhanced by a cent? It shows nothing of the kind. It will not bear that construction. In 1894-95 we imported from Germany sugar to the amount of 4,572,123 pounds, valued at \$127,807. Now, if we assume that this was all hard sugar, and that it was all of the same value, it would be an even price of \$2 80 per 100 pounds, but to that we must at least add 40 cents for freight from Germany, insurance, &c., which, I think, would be a reasonable allowance, delivered in Toronto, and that would make German sugar, which we all know is an inferior sugar that the people will not buy for ordinary purposes, but which may be used by confectioners, and others, if they can cover it up, laid down in Toronto, cost \$3.20 per 100 pounds. The duty then was 64 cents per 100 pounds, which would make \$3.84 for German sugar, an inferior article, not at all equal to the Canadian refined. What could you buy Canadian refined at then? You could buy it at Toronto, delivered into localities outside, at \$3.40 per 100 pounds, or 44 cents less than the price of German sugar, showing that our refiners were keeping fairly within the limits, and were not, as hon. gentlemen opposite continually tell us, taking the full advantage of the duty, and enhancing the price of the article in accordance with it. If such were the case, why would it happen that in New York, granulated sugar, on the 13th February, was quoted at 4 15-16, when in Montreal—not in Halifax—on the same day, it was quoted at $4\frac{3}{4}$ to $4\frac{1}{4}$, so that it was cheaper in Montreal than in New York. There is no one who will disagree with me, when I say that in all our tests, Canadian refined sugar is superior to the ordinary brand of sugar in the United States. Speaking on the sugar question in this House, during the session of 1876—this is a little bit of ancient history which I will read for the benefit of some of those new members like myself who had not the honour of a seat in the House at the time—Mr. A. G. Jones, Member of Parliament for Halifax, and who was afterwards taken into Mr. Mackenzie's Cabinet, said:

Refineries have been closed. If they could work under the present system, no application would have been made for a change; but it was impossible to keep open refineries in the face of the bounty allowed by the United States government. The Canadian Government have placed a duty on the raw material of 50 per cent, while there is only a duty of 40 per cent on the refined article, thereby giving the foreigners a very strong advantage; and he urged the Government to impose on refined sugar a duty at least equal to the bounty granted to refiners by foreign governments. He was willing to trade with the United States on fair terms, but if by a bounty system they tried to control our market and utterly ruin our interests, it was the duty of the Government to levy such duties as to at least place the Canadians on an equal footing with the foreigners. He pointed out to the Government that the men directly or indirectly connected with this business, which had been ruined, numbered thousands of people, and unless a duty such as we asked was imposed, it would be no use trying to do anything.

In the same speech Mr. Jones said:

The effect of the closing of the Canadian sugar refineries has been an advance of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound in the price of sugar in the Canadian market.

But the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) is not through with his illustration. He says the same thing applies to binders. He says that by reason of the imposition of a duty of 35 per cent on binders, the manufacturers are enabled to take from the farmer a duty of 35 per cent, less possibly the amount of duty on raw material which goes into the composition of the machines. Now if such were the case, if the farmers of this country had paid $35 more for each machine, when the duty was 35 per cent, than they would have paid if they were free then, when the duty was reduced to 20 per cent, they would have paid only $20 more.

This would be a reduction of $15. Now, I ask any farmer in this House, I ask any hon. gentleman in this House, whether, since the duty was reduced from 35 to 20 per cent, there has been any difference in the price of binders?

But possibly one of the greatest questions of the present day and one that has caused as much agitation as almost any other is the rebate that is granted to manufacturers on machines that they export to other countries. The Massey-Harris Company of Toronto,—although every other concern had the same privilege—exported in 1894, 3,385 self-binding machines. They received a rebate of duty on the raw material so far as they purchased foreign material which entered into the composition of these machines. On exporting the machines to Australia—I think that is where they were sent to—the Government allowed a drawback of the amount of duty they had originally paid. In this way the Government lost nothing; the country lost nothing. We collected $2.98 for each machine exported, and when the machine was exported we paid back the $2.98. But the country was the gainer in this that a large number of men were employed in making those machines and a large amount of money was circulated through the employment of the men. These men, while making these machines were consuming the products of this country and their presence gave so much of an extra market for the benefit of the farmers. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that by this reduction of the rebate we give foreigners an advantage over us in the sale of wheat, in the markets of the world. They tell us that the Australian farmer, being able, by reason of this rebate to get the machine $2.98 cheaper than they otherwise would, they are able to sell their wheat cheaper in the markets of the world than the Canadian farmer. And if the Massey-Harris people send machines to Argentina, the farmer in that country will have the advantage of us by $2.98 in consequence of the drawback. Now, Sir, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is an adept at figures, and I have no doubt he will be able to make for me a calculation showing just how much the price of a bushel of wheat in the Liverpool market will be affected, considering that the product of the world in 1894 was 2,558,000,000 bushels, by reason of the $2.98 drawback having been allowed upon one machine used in cutting some of that wheat. It would be something terribly small. A grain of sand compared with the highest mountain would not be in it. And yet, Sir, that is one of the strongest arguments that hon. gentlemen opposite are able to bring against the National Policy to-day. In order to make the matter a little more clear, for so much capital has been made out of this drawback, I desire to refer to the matter a little more definitely. I have here an extract from a newspaper that is not always friendly to the Government. The question was up last year a day or two after I asked the question of the Controller of Customs the reply to which gave the information as to the drawback and the number of machines exported. This is what this newspaper said:

It was brought out in the House of Commons yesterday that the Massey-Harris Company had, during 1894, exported 3,385 self-binding harvesters, and that the average drawback on account of the duty paid on raw material allowed and paid by the Government on each harvester was $2.98—two dollars and ninety-eight cents on a machine which is sold here for $110. Two dollars and ninety-eight cents represents the sum total of the tax on iron, on paint, on varnish, on wood, on steel, on nails, on screws, on bolts, on every mortal thing imported to make a self-binding harvester! Two dollars and ninety-eight cents is the enormous "tax" which the Grit papers have been agitating and sweating about all this time:

That two dollars and ninety-eight cents would be a mere bagatelle to the Canadian purchaser of one machine, even if he paid it—which he doesn't—but it enabled the Massey-Harris Company's employees to earn wages last year in the construction of no less than 3,385 self-binding harvesters. Put the amount paid for labour at $50 a machine, and it is found that that little drawback of $2.98 enabled the employees of the Massey-Harris Company to put nearly $170,000 into their pockets—not a penny of which could have been earned had it not been for the drawback.

A policy which during its infant year, enables Canadian mechanics to earn $170,000 more than they could earn without, and which does not add one cent to the price, in Canada, of the articles made, is entitled to be considered sound.

Well, Sir, I propose now to be a little more practical, if possible, in showing the actual effect of the working of the National Policy. We have heard, during the last few weeks, a great deal of theory. I think if we could bring some of the practical results to bear upon this argument it would tend to bring us to a proper conclusion. Results are what we are after, and if results are satisfactory I think we should all approve of the policy. I have the honour of representing a county, which, I think, can fairly be said to be one of the most industrial counties in the province or perhaps in the Dominion. I do not know of a county that, for its size, has so many industries—I mean of course, apart from the agricultural industry. I will enumerate some of these industries to show to what extent they really prevail. I give the figures from the census of 1891. In almost all cases the output is very much larger now than then:

Now, Sir, it is no wonder that the hon. leader of the Opposition, when addressing the electors in the town of Oakville, in this county, in 1888, in opposition to myself, speaking of the United States just across the lake, he said :

The United States is just at the end of my hand. Moreover, we have the same tariff, as it were. We have a protective tariff, and for many years to come we must have a high tariff. The hon. gentleman, in the county of Halton, would not have ventured to make any other statement than one favourable to the principle of protection. Now, in order to give you an idea of the value of the industry of the county of Halton, I proceed to make a comparison, and I want to be fair in this comparison. I will take my own county as the central one, and I will take the county of Wellington on the north, the county of Peel to the east, and the county of Wentworth, represented by my hon. friend who just addressed you, to the west. Here is a group of four counties. Now the following table will show how they compare with respect to industry :—

South Wellington includes the city of Guelph, which is scarcely fair to the county of Halton, because the city of Guelph has a population, I dare say, of about 12,000, and has some very important industries. But, notwithstanding that, I will allow Guelph to be thrown in with Wellington in the comparison against Halton. Let me repeat, the county of Wentworth, $320 per family; county of Peel, $405 per family; county of Wellington, which includes the city of Guelph, $483 per family; and the county of Halton, $671 per family, a very much larger average indeed than the counties either to the north, west or east of Halton. Now, let us see what effect that has upon the farmer, because this seems to be the question of the day. I have shown you that in the county of Halton, the output of the industries, and of necessity, the wages paid, are greater by reason of the large amount of industries that are fostered by the National Policy. If farm values are better retained in Halton than in other counties, I fail to be able to attribute it to any other fact than that we have among us larger industries, distributing money, week by week, which goes into the hands of labouring men, who immediately distribute it among the farmers and others, in purchasing supplies, thereby improving the farmers' market. Farm values in Wellington county, between 1892 and 1894, decreased $399,584, according to the statistics of the Ontario Bureau. I now refer to farm values, including land, buildings, implements and live stock. In the county of Wentworth, the decrease was $604,696; in Peel, the decrease was $1,135,666; but in Halton, where the average output of the industries is very much larger than in the adjoining counties, instead of decrease in farm values, there is an actual increase of $173,862.

The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) stated to this House that chattel mortgages were the last resort of farmers, and he argued that the number of chattel mortgages in the country showed that the farmers were going back. I will point out this with respect to chattel mortgages. In the county of Wellington there is one chattel mortgage to every 39 ratepayers, in the rural districts, most of whom are farmers. In the county of Peel there is one to every 39; in Wentworth, one to 47, and in Halton, one to every 48, showing again that the large circulation of money by reason of the industries, such as are fostered by the National Policy, acts in the interest of the farmers. The hon. member for South Huron, in making his comparisons, was, I thought, scarcely fair. He said:

But there is another form of securities, which is the last resort of the farmers and is resorted to when circumstances become very extreme—that is the chattel mortgage, and in the province of Ontario there has been a large increase in chattel mortgages. In fact in some parts of the province the system prevails to such an extent that it becomes difficult for the farmer to say when he should buy stock and when he should not, because the chattel mortgage general includes stock and implements.

After giving a statement, the hon. gentleman said:

This increase in a single year in chattel mortgages in Ontario shows the alarming extent to which our farmers are going back.

I take the statistics of the Ontario Bureau, and I find that of the total chattel mortgages of Ontario, farmers gave in 1890, 61 per cent in number, 39 per cent in amount; in 1891, 58 per cent in number, 36 per cent in amount; in 1892, 57 per cent in number, 33 per cent in amount; in 1893, 54 per cent in number, 32 per cent in amount; in 1894, 53.7 per cent in number, 30.7 per cent in amount; these statistics not bearing out what the hon. gentleman said, namely, that they would show that our farmers are going back.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think there is a quorum in the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. With respect to another question raised by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), the valuation of farm property, that hon. gentleman contended and argued, that farm values were decreasing. I am not disposed to waste much time on that matter. The hon. gentleman quoted statistics largely to bear out his contention; but I may say that, taking New England, Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, the decrease from 1880 to 1890, according to the statistics of the Ontario Bureau, was 9.4 per cent, whereas the decrease in Ontario was only 1.83. The value of live stock in the same states between 1880 and 1890 increased by 9.7 per cent, while the increase in Ontario was 16.2 per cent. The value of farm implements and machinery in the same time showed an increase in those states of 8.7, and in Ontario of 18.1. I think, therefore, we have nothing to complain of in this matter, that our values are well maintained, compared with those of the markets of the United States, with a population of 65,000,000, with which hon. gentlemen opposite are very desirous we should enter into negotiations. I propose to submit a few statements with respect to the value of the crops in Canada, as a means of testing the figures given by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) the other night, when he stated that the receipts of farmers from their farms in Canada were constantly decreasing. I take the statistics of 1891. The number of tons of field crops in 1881 was 11,576,317; in 1891, 15,092,227. Dividing this amount by the number of farmers, we find there were 18 tons of field crops for each farmer in 1881, as compared with 23 tons in 1891, the average value in the former period being $20.41, as compared with $18.18 in 1891. This would give the value of the field crop alone of each farmer in 1881 as at $360, and in 1891 as $430, an increase of $70 per farm in 1891 over 1881. Besides, the farmer has his beef, pork, butter, cheese, poultry, and, in fact, animals of all kinds and their products. I fear, Mr. Speaker, that possibly I may not be treating the House fairly at this late hour. It is not my intention to occupy their time very much longer, and the time that I do occupy I shall devote to another question. It has been stated that the population of this country has not increased as rapidly as it ought to have done. Many calculations have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite, to show that the people who ought to have been in this country have gone away and are somewhere else. I have before me a statement which is an old one, made some years ago by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and I propose to put it on record, in order that the people of the country may be able to read it, and to judge of what its merits really are. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) then said :

The population of Canada in 1881 was 4,325,000 ; the natural increase at 2¼ per cent per annum would be 1,100,000 ; the immigrants arrived, according to the Government report, 865,000 ; the natural increase of immigrants 110,000. The population as it should have stood in 1891, 6,400,000 ; but as it actually is, 4,830,000 ; missing 1,570,000.

His argument was, that one and a half millions of the population which ought to be in Canada in 1891, were missing, and had gone to the United States or somewhere else. Some other hon. gentleman made another calculation upon the same principle. I know it is familiar to every hon. gentleman in the House, but I desire to repeat it, in order that we may examine what I might term the absurdity of the results which would flow from such a calculation. Let us make a calculation in the same way for the United States, and we arrive at this result :

Population of the United States in 1880	50,155,783
Natural increase	12,733,262
Immigrants arrived per government returns	5,246,613
Natural increase of immigrants.....	667,199
<hr/>
Population as it should have stood in 1890	68,802,857
As it actually is.....	62,622,250
Missing	6,180,607

What became of the 6,000,000 more people that ought to be in the United States, in 1890, according to the calculation made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) ? We have not discovered whether they have gone to free trade Britain or not, but it seems to me that his calculation is so absurd that it requires no disproof. It contains its own refutation. The fairest way, to my mind to inquire into the growth of the country, is to take a longer period than a simple decade. Rome was not built in a day, and nations are not evolved in two or three decades, but it is the work of centuries. Now, let us look at the census of Canada for, say, fifty years, and let us examine the census of the neighbouring states of the Union equally favoured and equally well situated. We find the following results :

We have here an increase in the older provinces of Canada of 192 per cent in fifty years, as against an increase of 110 per cent in the New England States for a similar period. That is to say, the old provinces of Canada increased from 1,500,000 in 1840, to 4,500,000 in 1890, or three times the population of 1840. The New England states from a little over 2,250,000 in 1840, increased to nearly 4,750,000 in 1890, or two and one-tenth times only in the same fifty years. The province of Ontario increased in fifty years by 392 per cent, and the increase of New York state for fifty years was only 142 per cent. Ohio, another equally well-favoured state increased its population in fifty years by only 142 per cent, while the province of Ontario increased its population by 392 per cent. From 1790 to 1890, a period of 100 years, the population of the United States increased 18 fold, while in the same period the population of Canada increased 22 fold. Judging from these statistics, we have nothing to be ashamed of in Canada as regards the increase of our population. These figures show conclusive that the increase in the population of Canada has been far in excess of the increase of the population of some of the most favoured states of the union, and certainly far in excess of the New England states which were settled earlier, and which had a larger population than Canada, at the time from which I have taken the comparison. In the "North American Review" of 1887. Mr. Gladstone had an article upon the United States entitled "Our Kin Beyond Sea," and in it he spoke in glowing terms of the advance the United States were making in material wealth, giving it as his opinion that they would soon surpass England in this respect. From an article in the same review of May last year, by Mr. Michael G. Mulhall, on "The Power and Wealth of the United States" it would appear that Mr. Gladstone's prediction has been already signally verified. Mr. Mulhall is one of the first authorities in England, that is to say in the world, on statistics; and the conclusion to which he comes is that "If we take a survey of mankind in ancient or modern times as regards the physical, mechanical and intellectual force of nations we find nothing to compare with the United States in this present year 1895, and that the United States possess by far the greatest productive power in the world." According to his figures the average annual increment of the United States from 1821 to 1890 was $901,000,000, and he asserts that "the wealth added during a single generation—that is in the period of thirty years between 1860 and 1890—was no less than $49,000,000,000, which is more than the total wealth of Great Britain." This statement is truly astonishing. That the United States should in the last thirty years have accumulated more wealth than England can command altogether is the most striking exemplification that could be given of the tremendous strides of that nation in material prosperity. The interest for us Canadians in the subject lies not only in the fact that we have a rational curiosity as to everything affecting the great nation across the border and the British Empire, but also in the reflection that some of the causes to which American progress is attributed are to be found in qualities and conditions that we possess ourselves in as great, if not greater, degree than our neighbours. Mr. Mulhall calls special attention to the intellectual power of the great republic as seen in the fact that 87 per cent of the total population over ten years of age are able to read and write. "It may be fearlessly asserted," says he, "that in the history of the human race no nation ever before possessed 41,000,000 instructed citizens." It is largely to this fact that it is due that an ordinary farm hand in the United States raises as much grain as three in England, four in France, five in Germany, or six in Austria. In Canada we have a people whose primary education is not surpassed anywhere in the world, and whose physical stamina and intellectual vigour are certainly not inferior to those found in any section of the United States. By these qualifications we have the promise and potency of greatness, and the result is already to be seen in the marvellous strides made by our people in wealth, commerce and manufactures, in the means of transportation and in everything else that tends to bring power and prosperity to a nation. The United States policy is "their own market for their own people." Ours should be "Canada for Canadians." Whilst the United States have made such wonderful progress, we in Canada who have so much that is common

DAIRY PRODUCTS ACT, 1893.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No.67) to amend the Dairy Products Act, 1893. He said : This Bill is to amend the present Dairy Products Act, which was passed in 1893. It amends it in two particulars only. One is to prevent the misrepresentation of dates, that is, that no person shall, by any marks on his cheese, say to the buyer that that cheese has been produced in a certain month if it was not produced in that month, either by marking on it, by branding, or by representation otherwise. The Bill also provides for the registration of cheese factories and creameries, whereby each factory or creamery may, by application to the Department of Agriculture, obtain registration. This is only to apply to cheese or butter which is intended for export, and is not intended to apply to that which is intended for sale in Canada. These certificates of registration are to be issued by the Department of Agriculture, through one of its officers, who is designated; and then it will become illegal for any person to sell, offer, expose or have in possession for sale, cheese or butter intended for export which was produced in a cheese factory or creamery in Canada, unless the word "Canadian" and the registration number of the factory are placed upon it. It provides, of course, that the registration number is not to be removed after it has once been placed upon it. Then there is a provision by which registration may be extended from an individual creamery or factory to a district, under certain regulations. That will give to an organized district the advantage of registration and branding, when its product is fairly uniform, and when the district is under the same supervision, and is made up by the co-operation of a number of factories or creameries. These, I think, are about all the new points that are introduced.

Mr. MULOCK. Are there any charges for registration?

Mr. FOSTER. No, I think not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to inquire whether the Dairymen's Association, or the officers thereof, have been conferred with in reference to this Bill. The hon. gentleman is aware that in Ontario, and I think also in the other provinces, there is a large body of dairymen who are associated together, who have executive officers, and who take naturally an extreme interest in these matters. Has this measure been communicated to them?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I am informed that this legislation is in harmony with the general desire of persons who are engaged in the business, and who are representatives of their associations.

Mr. MULOCK. In response?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, really in response.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of Finance has told the House that this Bill would apply to butter or cheese for export. Surely that cannot be the case with respect to the first clause, which provides against misrepresentation. I suppose misrepresentation as to date of manufacture and character of cheese must apply to cheese for domestic as well as foreign manufacture.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that is so.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is unquestionably a very important Bill. This industry is in a fairly flourishing condition, and I honestly hope that any legislation which the Minister will introduce will not hamper in any way or interfere with the progress and growth of this very important and desirable industry in the country. While the Bill apparently provides that cheese sold by factories for export is to be stamped, with the month placed upon it, that rule is not to be enforced against men who purchase from the factory and afterwards export for themselves, unless it can be shown that the factory sold the cheese for export, and the cheese afterwards passed into the hands of a second party. I understand that this Bill will only apply to the factories. This provision is one that should be very carefully scrutinized when the Bill is in committee, so that the interests of this important industry should be guarded as regards cheese when in the hands of any party, and not merely confined to the factories. However, when the Bill is printed and brought before the House we shall have an opportunity of reviewing its different provisions; but I must be permitted again to express the hope that it will not restrict or interfere with the progress of such a desirable industry, one which has grown without any substantial aid of any kind either from this House or hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. FOSTER. The object of the Bill is quite opposed to hampering the growth of this great industry, and when it is before the House, hon. members will have an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. McLENNAN. Does the Bill provide for the date of manufacture being placed on the cheese?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a difference of opinion as to whether the date of the month in which the cheese is made should be put on it or not. The Bill, as presented to the House, will not contain a provision making marking compulsory. We can discuss that question when the Bill is before the House, when it will be open to hon. members, after a full discussion and expression of opinion, to take what course may seem to be the best course at that time; but at the present time, the Bill does not include a compulsory clause of that kind.

Mr. McLENNAN. We consulted the manufacturers throughout the country, the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec, and we found that 90 per cent wanted the date placed on the cheese, and the English purchasers, upon whom we have to depend for our market, also made a similar request. In my opinion, without the date placed on the cheese—and I have taken a great deal of trouble to inquire in this matter—the Bill is worthless. This is the whole ground of complaint in Great Britain, and it is the grievance which manufacturers of cheese in this country feel, because misrepresentation is made in regard to the date cheese is placed on the English market. I am aware, from inquiries made, that in October there were 600,000 boxes of cheese in cold storage, of the value of $3,000,000, and this cheese was all of early make. I believe June, July, and the early part of August, it being stored with a view of placing it on the English market in the fall and representing it as September make. This cheese, of course, had been long out of the hands of the farmers and manufacturers, and they could not possibly reap any benefit from the cheese being held over. It was sold by them at the current rate of the month in which it was manufactured and left their hands, and they ask that this marking should be compulsory. There are a few speculators, making money out of the cheese industry, who wish to prevent the date being marked on the cheese which is placed on the English market, though its largest and most respectable dealers are favourable to the branding of the date, and, no doubt, the small price received in the spring is largely due to the enormous quantity placed there late in the season. When this Bill comes before the House, and we consider its details in committee, I trust hon. members will insist on the date of manufacture being placed on the cheese, for if it is not marked, in my opinion, and I think I may say in the opinion of those most interested, whose opinions I have taken the trouble to ascertain, and 90 per cent of whom favour marking, the Bill will be useless. When such a large proportion of people want such legislation I cannot see why they should be prevented from having it, for, I repeat, it is most important that the date should be stamped on the cheese. When I introduced my Bill, this was the principal point covered by it, and the Minister of Agriculture promised me that the date would be placed on it, and so I did not think it necessary at the time to press my Bill in the House; and I have the statements of the newspapers that the hon. Minister declared it was his intention to carry out the principles of my bill in its entirety. I had also a promise from him personally in connection with the Bill I introduced, and relying upon this promise, I have been willing to wait and see what would be done, but now I will insist on my Bill being put before the House, and I will take the sense of the House as to whether the date should be placed on the cheese or not. If it is not placed on it, then I for one, and I think the majority of the House, will declare that this Bill now as introduced amounts to nothing.

Mr. MULLOCK. The hon. gentleman has mentioned that the opinions of 90 per cent of those engaged in the industry favour stamping cheese with the date. Will the hon. gentleman tell the House what is the significance as between June and July cheese? I suppose you would have a margin of one month?

Mr. McLENNAN. The question was thoroughly discussed in our committee. It was claimed that there was a prejudice in Great Britain against July cheese. Some of our people and our manufacturers say that July cheese is better in some seasons than September cheese. It is put forward as an argument by the parties who are against stamping the cheese with the date of manufacture that there is a prejudice against July cheese. We say, however, that the way to do away with this prejudice is to stamp the cheese. The idea is to place our cheese before the people of Great Britain fairly, squarely and honestly, and I do not think either the Government or this country would lose anything by dealing with the people on whom we depend for our market honestly. Hon. gentlemen are no doubt aware that the United States, owing to some of their cheese being filled and other frauds committed, have to a large extent lost the British market. I do not think our people, in dealing with this large and most important industry, can afford to place anything upon the English market except products they are prepared to back up and declare that it is just what it is represented, and that it is not cheese the product of any other month than the month it is claimed to be. If we want to be fair in this matter, there cannot be any wrong committed in stamping the month of manufacture on the cheese before it is placed on the English market. It is our duty, and it is the duty of those interested in the welfare of our cheese industry, to make every effort to pass legislation which will place the products on the market fairly and honestly, and do away with any suspicion that the English people may have in regard to Canadian cheese.

Mr. McSHANE. I did not hear distinctly the remarks made by the hon. member for Glengarry. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman stated that 90 per cent of our merchants engaged in the cheese trade have asked that cheese should be branded?

Mr. McLENNAN. I said the men who made the cheese, and the men who owned the factories, and the farmers who are interested in the matter, asked that the cheese should be branded with the month of its manufacture. Not only 90 per cent of these, but more than 90 per cent were in favour of the proposal, because a great many who answered this communication were presidents and secretaries of companies who represented their directors and shareholders as well as themselves. Therefore, I can safely say that more than 90 per cent of the people directly interested in the production of cheese, have asked that legislation should be passed to provide that cheese should be marked with the month in which it was manufactured. The manufacturers and farmers throughout the country believe that the speculator is using the cheese to his own advantage, and to their detriment. I can tell you more than that, Sir. The speculators who get the ear of this Government, and of this House, and who have more power and influence than the honest farmer who is not so forward in pressing his claims as strongly as the men who are making money under the present system at his expense. These speculators wish to keep things as they now are. The draft of this very Bill which is introduced to-day was prepared by Professor Robertson, during last session of Parliament, but it does not provide that the cheese should be marked with its proper date. I will answer the hon. gentleman from Montreal (Mr. McShane) again. I say that this legislation is demanded by the farmers who furnish the milk, and by the manufacturers who make the cheese. We pass laws to punish the farmer, criminally, if he supplies milk of an inferior character, and I contend that when that same farmer asked for legislation to protect him in his industry, this House should back him up in his demand. I am fully confident, Sir, that the House will do so.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, it is not only the cheese-makers and the farmers of Canada who have asked for this legislation, but a demand for it has been made, also, by the boards of trade of the city of London and the city of Bristol, England, both of which issued circulars to the cheese-makers of Canada, stating that it would be in their interest to have their cheese branded with the month and date of manufacture. As my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan) has stated, there were 500 circulars sent out, and of this number, 370 answered in favour of the day of the month being placed upon the cheese in the factory; there were twenty answers indefinite, and only eight or nine opposed to it. Of this I am perfectly certain, that the Dairymen's Association which met in Stratford last year, or the year before, were unanimously in favour of having the cheese branded. And, Sir, in consequence of the feeling in England that there is a fraud perpetrated by representing cheese other than what it is in reality, we in Canada ought do everything possible to remove the impression that we are attempting to commit a fraud by putting July cheese on the market as September cheese. One of the dealers from Montreal stated before the Agriculture Committee that he owned a cold storage in Montreal, that cheese went into that cold storage, and that when it went out it was not branded with the name of the month on which it was made, but it was branded as being made a month later. It is the duty of the Government to have this provision embodied in the Bill. I am very much of the same opinion as my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), who has taken such a deep interest in this matter, that without this provision the Bill would be perfectly valueless so far as the farmers are concerned. As a farmer, and as one who is interested in cheese factories and creameries, I say it is of the utmost importance that the month and the date should be placed on the cheese.

Mr. McSHANE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to object to the remarks made by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan). I am speaking for the merchants of Montreal—

Mr. SPEAKER. I thought the hon. member had already spoken.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman only asked a question.

Mr. McSHANE. I desire, Sir, to say, on behalf of the cheese merchants of Montreal—the men who really built up that business—that they never lent themselves to any trickery in the trade, or to anything wrong in connection with it. The hon. gentleman from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) may be correct in applying his statements to other parts of the Dominion, but I can most decidedly say that they do not apply to Montreal. I am here to speak for the merchants of Montreal who are engaged in that business, the men who do the cheese trade of this country, and on their behalf, I say, that they have never shipped any cheese under false pretenses, nor branded it with any other brand than was represented to them by the factories from which they purchased it. When the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) speaks of merchants as being guilty of trickery, I hope he does not include the merchants of the city of Montreal.

Mr. COCHRANE. They admitted it themselves.

Mr. WELSH. I am fully in accord with the statement made by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan). I would also suggest that the name of the province from which the cheese comes should be marked on it, as well as the name of the month of manufacture. Although I come from a very small province, yet we take very considerable pride in our cheese, and it is a very important industry with us. I rose to make the suggestion that the cheese should be branded with the name of the province.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE WINDING-UP ACT.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) (for Mr. Geoffrion) Bill (No. 68) to amend the Winding-up Amendment Act. He said: The Bill is for the purpose of extending the time at which the Winding-up Act may be brought into operation. This measure was required to cover the case of the Banque du Peuple, and I have been asked to move its first reading in the absence of the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion). That hon. gentleman will no doubt give further information when the second reading is reached.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

I.C.R.—OFFICIAL INTERFERENCE IN AN ELECTION.

Mr. MIGNAULT asked :

Whether the Government are aware that Mr. Augustin Laverdière, agent for the Intercolonial Railway at Lévis, made use of the name of Mr. Pottinger, Superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway, in order to influence the votes of the employees of the railway, at the last municipal election held at Lévis? If not, will they make inquiry into the matter? And what means will they adopt to prevent a repetition of the abuse?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government is not aware that Mr. A. Laverdière made use of Mr. Pottinger's name in order to influence the votes of the employees of the railway at the late municipal elections at Lévis. Inquiry will be made. Not being aware of any abuse having occurred, it has not been necessary to consider any steps being taken.

CAPE BRETON RAILWAY.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness) asked :

Between what stations and on what miles of railway on the contract of Sims and Slater on the Cape Breton Railway, east of Grand Narrows, was the amount of $7,709.20 paid to sub-contractor D. T. McDonell, of McDonell & Cameron, for excavation of "hard-pan," by the Railway Department, in 1895?

Mr. HAGGART. The amount of $7,709.20 was paid to Messrs. McDonell & Cameron for excavation of hard-pan on Sims & Slater's contract on the Cape Breton Railway, east of the Grand Narrows, between stations 35 and 107-45 on the first, second and third miles.

FREE TRANSMISSION OF NEWS-PAPERS.

Mr. DEVLIN asked :

To what, if any, newspapers in Canada has the privilege of free transmission by post been refused during the last three years? Is it not the case that such privilege is enjoyed by and granted to newspapers generally in Canada? Is it true that the privilege in question was refused to "Town Topics," a newspaper published in the city of Montreal? If so, why?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This department has not recorded the names of the publications to which free transmission is refused, but only of those to which free transmission has been granted. Free transmission is granted to papers complying with the statutory provisions. The privilege of free transmission was not granted to the paper entitled "Town Topics," the reason being that it did not comply with the statutory requirements, the publisher being unable to produce a list of subscribers.

SOULANGES CANAL—SECTIONS FOUR, FIVE, SIX AND SEVEN.

Mr. CASEY asked :

1. Who is the contractor for sections 4, 5, 6 and 7, Soulanges Canal?

2. Has he, as stated in the last Report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, practically abandoned the work, after doing the easiest parts of it?

3. Has he made claims against the Government, arising out of such contract? If so, of what nature and amount?

4. Were these claims disputed by the Government, in whole or in part, and to what amount?

5. Has the Government engineer reported on such claims, favourably or the reverse, in whole or in part; and what amount, if any, does he recommend should be paid?

6. Has the Minister of Justice been asked to report on such claims? Has he done so, favourably or the reverse, in whole or in part? What amount, if any, does he recommend should be paid?

7. What decision has the Government or the Minister of Railways and Canals arrived at, in regard to paying such claims, in whole or in part? What amount, if any, has been paid?

Mr. HAGGART. 1. Mr. George Goodwin is the contractor. 2. The superintending engineer reports the work practically abandoned upon the ground that, latterly, the work has not been prosecuted with the same vigour as was previously the case. 3. Yes, he has made a claim arising out of the contract. 4. The claim is in connection with the forming of water-tight embankments. 5. The claim would probably amount to $100,000. 6. Yes, the claim was disputed in its entirety. 7. Yes, the Government engineer has reported unfavourably on the whole claim. 8. The Minister of Justice has been asked to report on the claim. 9. He has reported favourably to the contractor's contention in full. 10. The Minister of Railways, in the interpretation of a contract has to be governed by the advice given by the Justice Department. 11. No part of the claim has been paid.

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. EDGAR asked :

1. Is the Government aware whether the directors of the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company (Limited) have issued any of their first preference mortgage bonds authorized by 55-56 Victoria, chapter 37? If so, to what amount?

2. Have this company paid to the Government any, and if so, what portion of the monthly penalty of $5,000 for each month during which their works remained uncompleted, as provided by chapter 4 of the Statutes of 1888?

Mr. FOSTER. It is understood that the company has issued all of the first preference mortgage bonds of $300,000 at par. With reference to the second question, the Government has no power to enforce penalties which have been repealed by chapter 12, section 2, of Act passed in 1891.

THE QUEEN VS. ST. LOUIS.

Mr. Edgar asked :

Has a decision been given by the Supreme Court in the civil action brought by the Government against Mr. St. Louis, the contractor in connection with the Curran Bridge?

What was the amount claimed by the Government?

What is the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court as regards the claim of the Government or any claims of the contractor?

Mr. DICKEY. No judgment has been given by the Supreme Court in the civil action brought by the Government against Mr. St. Louis.

The amount of the claim is $91,902.

This is a legal question, and as such is a matter of opinion.

THE VENEZUELAN QUESTION.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the Government to the fact that we have in the Library here several old maps—some French and some Dutch—which give the boundaries of the Spanish and Dutch possessions in South America, and, according to which the boundary line drawn is at least as extensive as the present claim of the British Government. Now, these maps may be in the Foreign Office of England, or they may not, and it seems to me, that it would be a proper thing, and in the public interest, if the Government were to order copies of those maps and have them placed at the disposal of the Foreign Office. There is a map of Mr. Delisle, who was first geographer of the King of France, of 1722; there is also a map of Popple and Mitchell, dated 1774, giving the boundaries of Venezuela, or Andalusia and Surinam; also an atlas of the whole continent of America from 1680 to 1838; Danville's map of the north part of South America, 1776; and also Mortier's map of 1740. There is also a map of Robert de Vaugondy, who was geographer to the King of Poland, bearing date 1771.

All of these extend the boundary of Dutch Guiana as far west as the mouth of the Orinoco River, and some of them follow up that river for a considerable distance. It seems to me, it would be a proper thing to have copies of those maps made and sent to the Foreign Office. If the Foreign Office is already in possession, of course, no harm is done; if not, they will be a valuable addition to their collection.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I desire to thank the hon. gentleman very much for drawing the attention of the Government to this very important matter, and to state to him, that the Government will at once communicate with Her Majesty's Government, to ascertain if Her Majesty's Government has these maps in its possession. If not, copies will be made and forwarded without delay.

FIXING GRAIN STANDARDS.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior), if he will lay before the House the papers in connection with the fixing of the standard of grain last year, and also verbatim report of the meeting held in Winnipeg, which was made, I understand, by a Government stenographer. I make this request on behalf of some people who have written to me and who are interested in the grain trade.

Mr. PRIOR. In reply, I would say that I shall inquire in the department, and find out whether the reports are there, and the evidence; and if so, I shall lay them on the Table.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to call attention to a matter which, I think, should be clearly understood. I notice that a number of tabulated statements appear in the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), which were not read to the House. Now, it has been understood that nothing should be printed in "Hansard" but what is delivered before the House. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), last year was, refused permission to hand a tabulated statement to the "Hansard" reporter, as read, and had to proceed and deliver it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member is going too far. He must not make a speech, but confine himself to putting the question.

Mr. GIBSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to have this matter clearly understood in the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Members of this House, in past years, have desired to be granted the privilege of putting in the "Hansard" tabulated statements, without reading them, and which they wished to include in their speeches, but their request was invariably refused. I think it is quite right not to allow this privilege. Certainly, we do not want our official reports to be burdened with speeches and statements not delivered, as is the case with our neighbours across the line. In their legislatures, very often, whole speeches are printed in the official reports and sent out as the utterances of members, which were not delivered at all. I do not think we should permit any such practice here. It is better that we should have an understanding that, unless in some special cases, nothing should be printed in our "Hansard" which has not been delivered by the member addressing the House. I quite admit that, in the case of a Finance Minister, when delivering a very long speech which will, of necessity, contain quite a large number of tabulated statements, an exception might be made, but in no other case should an exception be allowed. No private member should be allowed to have printed in "Hansard" tabulated statements that he did not read to the House. I hope that the "Hansard" Committee will decide as to the course to be adopted in future. If that privilege is to be granted to every member in this House, we may fully expect that it will grow enormously in size. It is desirable that we should keep it within proper limits, and also avoid exposing the staff to the enormous amount of work which this privilege will entail, if it be allowed to degenerate into common practice. Whatever may have been done in the past, I think that now we ought to be ready to express an opinion on this point. If this privilege is given to any member of the House of handing in statements and having them printed, we should let it be understood, and should allow all the members to share the privilege, even if it does result in making a "Hansard" that a man will have to bring a wheelbarrow in order to take home with him. I think the House should make it understood that this privilege is not to be granted in any case except that of the Finance Minister who has such a long statement to make involving, necessarily, long tables of figures.

Mr. FOSTER. It would have been all right if it had been on superannuation.

Mr. McMULLEN. No; when I made my speech on superannuation I read every figure that appears in "Hansard."

Mr. DAVIN. In my speech as it appears in "Hansard," there is a tabulated statement with the following title:—

Statement of Manitoba and North-west cattle, sheep and hogs shipped to eastern points during five years—from 1891 to 1895 (both inclusive).

It occupies altogether the space of about three-quarters of a column. Of that statement I read four items—four extended items—and after doing so I said that with the permission of the House I would hand the statement to the reporters. I did that because I have observed that it is the custom in this House when members have long tabulated statements to present—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DAVIN. Allow me for a moment. I say I have observed that. It may not be invariable; but I have observed that it is done, and that when the House does not object, the statement appears though not read in full. Of course the House sometimes does object and calls for the reading of the statement. Of course it is only a way of asking the House whether they would have the tabulated statement read. It is not so very large a table in this case, but my hon. friend—

Mr. McMULLEN. Is that page 1975?

Mr. DAVIN. You mean 1985.

Mr. McMULLEN. No; 1975.

Mr. DAVIN. The remark I made first refers to that. I read four items in that tabulated statement, which statement would make a single column of "Hansard." In regard to this other statement, I read all that is there about the cattle from 1891 to 1895, and connected the lines concerning 1892, 1893 and 1894. As to the other statistics that appear, I read them in full. Now as to the Debates Committee, of course no member of that committee has any privilege distinct from or superior to those of any other member of the House. I had no conversation with the reporters on this subject, either with the head reporter or with any subordinate reporter. I handed in the statement as I said I would. If my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) had objected at that time and had said "read," I would have read the whole tabular statement. But if I remember, Mr. Speaker, the occasion when this question was really seriously important was that an hon. member had a long series of tables to read and wished to place them on "Hansard" without reading them, and the House objected. I am within the hearing of several of my colleagues on the Debates Committee, and I am sure they will agree that that committee would never give the least privilege to any of its members that was not enjoyed by other members of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. This is a question of some importance to the House at large and it has not come up for the first time. We have had similar discussions on two or three occasions to my recollection, and the rule that has been generally understood to apply was that the "Hansard" reporters should take notice of nothing except what actually falls from the lips of hon. gentlemen who addressed the House. There was, however, an exception made in favour of the Minister of Finance who, in his financial statement, must bring forward long tabular statements which it would be wearisome for the House to listen to and for him to deliver. Under the circumstances the privilege has been extended to him in handing in the financial statement to the reporters. But, with this exception, I think we should impress upon the members of the House the necessity of adhering closely to the rule that "Hansard" should contain nothing but what is actually said in the course of debate. Of course there may be temptation to depart from the rule; but when it is brought to the attention of the House, I think we should take occasion to re-assert the rule and see that it is adhered to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no doubt that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) when he was addressing the House called attention to this statement and said that he would hand it to the "Hansard" reporter. It is within my recollection that, on many occasions that has been done. At the same time, I entirely agree with the view stated by the hon. leader of the Opposition that we should confine the "Hansard" to reports of what actually falls from the lips of the speakers in debate.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think there has never been an occasion, except in the case of the Minister of Finance, when a proposition of this sort has been made to the House and has not been objected to. On several occasions, members, instead of reading detailed statistics which they had prepared, have proposed to hand them into the "Hansard" reporter, objection has been taken. And when my hon. friend from West Assiniboia, the other day, said he proposed to hand in these statistics, I myself objected, because I thought it was not good to adopt such a rule. If once we permitted that sort of thing, we might increase the size of "Hansard" indefinitely, to the disadvantage of the public.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry to find that I have not been living up to my privileges. All hon. gentlemen seem to agree that an exception was made in the case of the statement of the Finance Minister. I have never understood that such was the case, and I have never asked such a privilege except during the last Budget speech, when I proposed to hand in a long list of articles upon which the tariff had been reduced, and some hon. gentleman objected; and so I read it through. I have always submitted to the rule made for members generally.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Before this motion is withdrawn, I would like to know what we are going to do about this tabular statement that has been put in. It has crept in in an abnormal, or, at least, unusual way; what are we going to do with it? If it remains it will stand as a precedent for others to go and do likewise. While I am willing to extend every privilege to the hon. member for Assiniboia, because he speaks but seldom in the House, I do not know what we should do with him on this occasion. If he reads it now, I presume it will be allowed to remain; if not, it will go where a great many of his other speeches go.

Motion to adjourn, withdrawn.

MAIL COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. YEO. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to draw the attention of the Government to the irregularity with which mails to and from Prince Edward Island have been transmitted for the past two or three weeks. In some instances the people of the Island have been three or four days without receiving a mail. I wish to know whether the agent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or the Post Office Inspector of Prince Edward Island, have full authority to act on their own judgment in forwarding the mails, or whether they are authorized to employ boats not in the service of the Government, when there are not sufficient Government boats to convey the mails. I have understood that in some instances there have not been enough Government boats to carry the mails, and although the boats are available, they have not been employed.

Mr. COSTIGAN. From all the information that I have in connection with that service, I am sure no blame is to be attached to the officers conducting it. Of course, we know this has been a remarkably rough season, and unusual quantities of ice have to be met.

INTERCOLONIAL ARBITRATION.

Mr. EDGAR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the attention of the leader of the House for a moment. During the session before last, a motion was unanimously adopted in this House, which I had the honour of moving, seconded by the present Minister of Justice, and supported by Sir John Thompson, in favour of approving, on the part of Canada, of a resolution which had been passed by the Congress of the United States, and also passed by the House of Commons in England, in favour of settling disputes between those two countries, as far as possible, by arbitration. I would like to know from the Government whether that motion has been communicated to the two countries who are referred to in that motion. At this time particularly, I think it would be interesting to know what has been done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will obtain the information and communicate it to the hon. member.

Mr. LANDERKIN.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. CASEY. Before you pass to Government Orders, I wish to inquire again about a certain return that has been promised me for some little time. I moved for two, one in regard to correspondence with the High Commissioner as to his present visit to Canada, which I have got; and the other, in regard to correspondence between the High Commissioner and the Government concerning his duties, &c., which has not yet been laid before the House, and which I have not yet got. The one I have received is so interesting that I shall take an early opportunity of pointing out its peculiarities; and I hope we will get the other, which may prove to be still more interesting, at as early a date as possible. Perhaps the Secretary of State might know something about this correspondence with the High Commissioner.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I presume there will be no difficulty in laying that on the Table. My attention has not been drawn to the last correspondence mentioned. I think the hon. gentleman said he had received an answer to the first order; the other will be brought down very shortly.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND TUNNEL.

Mr. PERRY. I desire to ask the Finance Minister when we may expect to have the map showing the boring across the Straits of Northumberland, as promised more than a month ago.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask my hon. friend to put a notice of motion on the paper, and it will be passed when we go through the Order paper with unopposed motions. The map will then come before the House, and will be a matter of record in the House. Otherwise, if brought down privately, it might get lost.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. DEVLIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Postmaster General, if it is the intention of the Government to persist in refusing to extend the ordinary privileges of transmission by mail to the paper called "Town Topics"?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I can only tell the hon. gentleman what I have already said. The transmission of these papers is regulated by statute, and, until the proprietor of the paper complies with the requirements of the statute, I cannot break the law and make an exception in favour of that paper, when several others have been refused on the same ground.

Mr. DEVLIN. The Postmaster General knows that the law is constantly broken in that respect.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, I am not going to break it this time.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) Before this motion is adopted, Mr. Speaker, I hope I may be allowed to offer the House and the country a few remarks. My arguments may not have the merit of novelty, rising as I do to address the House after so many eminent gentlemen, on both sides, who have taken part in this debate, within the last few days. But as this is the most favourable opportunity for members expressing their views on all questions in connection with the general policy of the country, I could not remain a silent spectator on the battle-field, when the future destiny of the country and the millions of the people are at stake. These are very extraordinary circumstances, and the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are also in a very extraordinary position. We are passing through a period of acute commercial depression. Distress is also prevailing, to an extraordinary degree, in the rural districts. Now, the hon. gentlemen who administer the affairs of the country, have, for some time past, adopted a very extraordinary attitude. The way these hon. gentlemen quarrelled between themselves, is still within the vivid recollection of this House. The House also remembers that the Ministers who had left the Cabinet, the bolters, as they are known in common parlance and in the press of the country, accused their leader of lacking the necessary pluck and vigour, and declared him unfit to retain his high position in the Ministry. The hon. Prime Minister, is also on record as having, in reply to those accusations, qualified his colleagues as traitors to their country and to their chieftain.

Owing to the circumstances I have just related, the Government find themselves placed in a very extraordinary position : and, in order to extricate themselves out of that difficulty, it is now easily understood what means they resorted to. As they perceived that the power was about to escape them, they contrived to call back from beyond the sea a gentleman who had been, in the past years, a powerful fighter in the active politics of the country. They thought that the presence of the High Commissioner among them would restore order within the ranks of the party. And we have been witnesses to a very moving spectacle, indeed, when the hon. gentlemen, who had vied with each other in reciprocating insults and abuse, were seen, one fine morning, during the crisis, shaking hands, and I would almost say hugging each other. Sir Charles Tupper's return to Canada has been surrounded with a certain mystery, but, owing to the indiscretion of the Conservative press, it finally transpired that Sir Charles Tupper had come back to Canada to take the leadership of the Conservative party. Now, this powerful man, this heaven-fallen saviour, was to be the new cement destined to bind together the party that was going to the dogs. It behooves us then to devote our attention to him, and in that connection I may be allowed to quote an editorial from a journal which was and still is the leading Conservative organ, although its name has somewhat been altered since these lines were published. I quote from the "Mail" of Toronto, of June 9, 1891 :

There can be no doubt that the wires are being actively pulled for Sir Charles Tupper at Ottawa by his son, with his other special adherents in the Cabinet, as well as by members from the eastern provinces, to which as a reward for their loyalty to him in the late contest he has promised "even more than justice" in the division of the spoils. His professed withdrawal from Canadian politics has deceived nobody, at all events since his proceedings in the late election.

The paper goes on to say :

Of the system which Mr. Blake deplores, Sir Charles Tupper has notoriously been the chief agent : all that is worst in it and has tended most to debase the national character is familiarly connected with his name, which may be said to be a household word of corruption. Nor has he like his late chief succeeded in convincing the people that except when he is doing the dirty work of a political party his hands are clean ; or that, if he governed the nation, its honour, while it might be in danger from such exposures as that of the Pacific Railway scandal, would be secure against a deeper stain.

His name is at this moment unpleasantly connected with a suspicious commercial affair in England. He will protest his innocence, of course, but his word, unhappily, is that of a man whose veracity is much impugned, and who does not scruple to use stolen letters. It is too evident what sort of scene would be enacted by his accession to power. He is the prince of political cracksmen, no doubt, but he cannot afford to purchase ability, even of so rare a kind, at such a price as that of continued and increased demoralization.

The appointment of such a man at the head of the state would be not merely the inauguration of violence and corruption, unredeemed by any true wisdom or statesmanship ; it would be the signal for a disruption of the community and for a moral civil war.

This editorial is certainly significant, coming as it does from the "Mail," which, on the day following the death of Sir John Macdonald, thus characterized the political career of the hon. gentleman who has since that time, been installed in London, and has lived there, in high style, at the expense of the country, and who has now come back from England to the rescue of the Conservative party, at the very moment the people are repudiating that party. But, this opinion, of the great Conservative organ is by no means a solitary one. Let me quote from another Conservative journal, published in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. This paper, in its issue of the 12th January, contained an editorial from which I extract the following :—

During the past six years we have had some of the most revolting political atrocities which have ever blackened the fair fame of any country, and that too in a country where there is no excuse for impure politics.

There never has been a time when honest men were more needed than now. The Tory party has again brought to the front one of the ablest men that Canada has ever produced. Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., is a man of indomitable will, able and unscrupulous. He can, without doubt, do much to carry the Tory banner onward to victory, but is he worthy of it? No man in public life in Canada has so often been called upon to defend himself from the attacks of his enemies or to answer to his friends. To-day, the attack against him is entirely on the lines of his corruptness and utter lack of sound principles.

Is the Conservative party so lacking in honest men or men of ability that it cannot present a cabinet of upright men worthy of the honour and confidence of a great people? We think not.

The series of disreputable and blackguardly squabbles which have disgraced this country during the past few days ought to bring a blush of shame to the face of every honest elector. It is full time the Carons, the Haggarts, the Montagues, and men of such ilk were relegated to obscurity. They should never have been in the Cabinet, and having once resigned, they should never have been taken back.

To place Sir Charles Tupper at the head of the Canadian Parliament with such men supporting him would be a crime before high heaven.

Such are the terms in which this paper hails the advent of the heaven-sent-fallen saviour of the Conservative party. So also spoke of him, a few years ago, the Toronto "Mail," which warned its readers beforehand that Sir Charles Tupper would protest his innocence, of course, but that his word, to quote the very words of the Conservative organ, was that of a man whose veracity was much impugned. This House, the other day, was a witness to the fact that the hon. gentleman could indeed protest his innocence. Hardly had he been presented to the House, hardly had he taken his seat, when he felt conscious of the tremendous weight of the unbridled corruption and bribery resorted to in his favour at the recent election contest in Cape Breton, and fully understanding that he would be arraigned before the House of his opponents, he made up his mind to face the storm. After coming back in triumph from the electoral district which he now represents in Parliament, he hurled against his opponents the charge that in the contest between him and Mr. Murray, the sum of $25,000 had been sent down to buy the seat from under him. When, after the hon. gentleman had taken his seat, the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), brought up the question before the House and asked to apply for a committee of this House to make an investigation in regard to the moneys which were spent in Cape Breton, and to prove that the statement had no foundation whatever, the Government declined to comply with the hon. member's demand, and the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) accepted the statement and the assurances of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), but in the same breath, suggested that his statement was well based. Whence I infer that what the "Mail" stated a few years ago proves perfectly true. Scarcely had the hon. gentleman taken his seat in this House, when he began by protesting his innocence, and not only that, but he attempted to exculpate himself by throwing back upon his opponents the charge laid to his door both by one of my hon. colleagues on this side and by public opinion in the country. He had brass enough to state on the floor of this House that the unbridled corruption and bribery practised during the electoral contest at Cape Breton had been resorted to, not by his own friends, but by the Liberal party. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask you, is there a man who will believe that the Liberal party is in a position to incur such heavy expenditures for the purpose of carrying an election? The Liberals cannot command the resources which the men in power have at their disposal, the more so as the Liberal party is now controlled by as scrupulous men as ever were at the head of the party. Even supposing that the Liberal party were inclined to resort to bribery, where could they find the necessary money for such purposes? You, Sir, are well aware that, with nothing but private subscriptions to depend upon in carrying on an electoral contest, a party can only raise a sufficient sum to pay legitimate expenses. How then could the Liberal party have raised such considerable sums as that mentioned by the hon. Secretary of State for the purpose of fighting this battle and preventing the election of this would-be saviour of the Conservative party, a party doomed to ruin. Plain common sense tells you, Sir, that such an assumption is baseless. We have read the statement made by the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, who have taken part in the contest. They have stated that this charge was utterly groundless; still, that did not deter the hon. Secretary of State from re-stating his charges and attempting to substantiate them. The hon. gentleman, who has just been recalled from London, was very costly to the country while in England. For my part, I would not feel sorry for his having been called back here, were his return to the country to result in relieving the public exchequer from the enormous expenditure incurred through his playing the part of a "petty king" on the other side of the Atlantic. It may perhaps prove of interest, in that connection, to see how much he has cost us. In the first place, he drew from the coffers of this country

$10,000 a year, and in addition to that, a bonus of two thousand dollars a year. Last year the contingencies of the office amounted to $8,687.72, and he had full control over all those expenses. We paid for two first class clerks, $3,500 ; for a second class clerk, $1,100 ; for two third class clerks, $1,250 ; and, in addition to that, $1,000 for messengers, or a total of $28,887.72 for the fiscal year. An hon. friend makes a remark to the effect that the hon. gentleman is going now to cost the country much more than he did heretofore. I beg to dissent from his view in that respect, for I am of opinion that he will not be very long in power. In 1889, the hon. gentleman drew from the public coffers $33,789.90 ; in 1890, $31,434.17 ; in 1891, $42,044.83 ; in 1892, $28,872.42 ; in 1893, $29,388.56, and in 1894, $28,887.72, or a total for six years, of $194,357.90. So, I was warranted in saying that it was a capital idea to have recalled the hon. gentleman, as he may possibly henceforth cost less to the country, the more so as I am under the impression that he cannot very long keep afloat the Conservative party, which is already touching bottom. That the hon. gentleman's arrival was surrounded with mystery, Sir, it is still within the recollection of this House. We were told by his friends that as a matter of form he was sent for by the Premier to discuss the East Atlantic Service, the Pacific Cable, and other schemes of a similar nature ; that is why, we are told, it was deemed necessary to send for the hon. gentleman to come over to Canada. Now, Sir, I have very good grounds for the opinion that the hon. gentlemen did not tell us the truth, when they said that Sir Charles Tupper had come over here on such an errand. No, Sir, it was not on diplomatic grounds that he was sent for, but he came over here at the request of the bolters, of the traitors, as the Premier called his colleagues. He came over to Canada for the purpose of taking a hand into a conspiracy, the upshot of which was to make him the leader of the Government. I must confess, Sir, that I am no great admirer of the Prime Minister ; and although, on the main, in his official capacity, I have nothing but praises to bestow, still, it is the political man and his party we are called upon here to judge. The hon. Premier and his party will soon step down from power, and the sooner the better for the country in general. Now, Sir, if I recite these facts, it is simply to show that our Ministers are not truthful, or that they tell the truth only in as much as it suits them to speak it. In spite of all his loud-mouthed professions, I say that the hon. Premier will be unable to ward off the storm which is going to sweep him and his party from power at the next elections, for public opinion gives no uncertain sound on the matter. As to the main object of the hon. Secretary of State in returning to Canada, there is no room for doubt. Some of the Premier's colleagues wanted to throw him overboard in view of the impending elections, and the hon. gentleman was sent for to take the leadership of the party, as I am going to show. When the Cape Breton election was over, the Secretary of State stopped at Halifax, where he was tendered a banquet by his political friends. The president of the banquet was a member of this House, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), who, when eulogizing the member elect, stated that Sir Charles Tupper was not only a member of the Government, but he further hailed him as the leader of the Conservative party. On reaching the city of Montreal, the same incident occurred, when Senator Drummond, the president of the banquet, announced in a formal manner that the Secretary of State was the leader of the Conservative party, and that to his keeping was to be intrusted the future of that party. And within a few days from that date, did we not hear the son of the Secretary of State, on coming out of Rideau Hall, after a banquet, exclaim, as reported by the newspapers :

My father did not come over here simply to be a Cabinet Minister, but to be leader, and he will be at once.

Should those facts prove correct, I am perfectly warranted in the conclusion that Sir Charles Tupper, when coming over here, and intriguing with some of his colleagues, stated that he was merely here on official business, he deceived the country ; for, the plot had been hatched before he came over to this country, and he was brought over here to supplant the Prime Minister. Now, I shall pass on to another question, which was discussed at great length by all the hon. members who have taken part in the debate. Some hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured to show that the country had enjoyed great prosperity under the National Policy. But I think it has been conclusively demonstrated, in my opinion, that far from deriving from the National Policy the benefits which its framers so loudly proclaimed at the outset, the country has been less and less prosperous under it, and that the promises made to the people were falsified in every respect. I have already had the opportunity of stating my views on that subject. I think protection may be useful and even sometimes necessary, to foster new-born industries in a country, just as you help a child's first tottering steps, so it may be necessary to lend a helping hand to infant industries which are being introduced into a country. But time and again have I protested, and still do I protest, against the protective system now in force. Under fallacious pretenses, this system is made use of to favour a small class of our population, to the detriment of the masses. From the last census the capital invested in the manufacturing industries of the country amounted to $354,620,750 ; and the value of the products, to $476,258,886. As the cost of the raw material was $256,119,042, and that of labour, $100,663,650, if you add up both sums, you have a total of $356,782,692, and by deducting the latter sum from the total value of the manufacturing products, it will be seen that the manufacturers of the country have realized, in one single year, the sum of $119,476,194, or about 33 per cent of profits on the invested capital. I gather, moreover, from the census that 367,000 workmen have found employment in the industrial establishments of the country; now, from the figures I have just quoted, it would appear that the manufacturers realized a profit of $273 on each workman. Now, when the agricultural classes, when the labouring classes, feel the pinch of want, if not of actual destitution, is it fair to maintain any longer a system which operates in the interest of the few, to the detriment of the people in general? And I may have asked the hon. gentleman who knows something about agriculture whether, under the best and most favourable circumstances it gives a yearly return of more than 4 or 5 per cent on the invested capital? I unhesitatingly declare, speaking from my own experience, as an agriculturist, that in ninety cases out of a hundred, it does not pay over 3 per cent. Being an agriculturist, by profession, I may claim to be pretty fairly posted up about the actual position of the farming community, the yield of the lands, as also about the depressed condition of the farmers in the country. Therefore, I say it is unfair, nay, it is legalized robbery to maintain a protective system which favours only those who least than any feel the need of protection. But in order the better to size up the true state of affairs, and the actual results of the National Policy among the farming classes, let me quote the returns of the last census in connection with the movement of our population. From these official data, it will be seen that in the province of Ontario, out of 92 counties, 38 have lost in population; in the province of Quebec, out of 65 counties, 28 show a decrease. In New Brunswick, out of 15 counties, 8 have lost in population; in Nova Scotia, 8 counties, out of 19, show a decrease, while Prince Edward Island, with 3 counties, shows a decrease in 1 county. These are not evidences of returning prosperity, because the prosperity of a country is gauged by the increase of its population. Whenever a locality is progressing, it is evident by the increase of its population, and the same criterion applies to the country in general. Where, then, from the official returns of 1891, it is shown that our rural communities have lost in population, this is incontrovertible evidence of a want of prosperity, brought about by a vicious fiscal policy. During the late elections, we, on this side of the House, Sir, have had to do battle for the cause we believe sound, and every time

Mr. LEGRIS.

I had occasion to be present, I heard the Conservative candidates and their friends loudly proclaim that they were in favour of tariff reform. They also advocated a tariff which would help us to gain free access to the markets of the United States. But, granting they were in earnest, I say they will be powerless to prevail upon the Government to grant to the agricultural classes what they themselves believe to be in the interest of agriculture. The Government, Sir, well understood the necessity of reforming their tariff policy, as was evidenced by their efforts to lop off the mouldering branches, two years ago. We have all been witnesses to the attempts then made by the Government in this House at tariff revision. It is within the recollection of this House that the Finance Minister brought down a new tariff which introduced a number of important changes, and that the lobbies of the House were filled with delegations of influential manufacturers from every section of the country, who came down here to watch over their own interests. I do not find fault with them for that, as they are business men and bound to take that course. Still, the members of this House who represent the rural constituencies of the country should have helped us to prevail upon the Government to maintain the proposed changes in the tariff. I just stated, a little while ago, what to me seems to be a fair and rational proposition, when advocating protection to a certain extent in favour of new-born industries. But it is quite the reverse that now takes place. To begin with the sugar industry, we are all aware of the fact that the millionaires who monopolize it, were enabled, under the existing tariff, to realize profits amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars yearly, and even of one million dollars, over and above the reasonable profits they could realize, were not the protective policy in force. When we see long established industries, as perfectly equipped as the sugar refinery industry is, enjoying as it does as good a position as it can possibly command, in any country, owing to the best facilities afforded by railway and water communications, when we see, I say, such industries in the hand of millionaires who have built fortunes for themselves out of the profits realized therein, I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether it would be unfair to readjust the tariff in connection with that industry from a revenue standpoint, as laid down in the platform of the Liberal convention? I come now to another industry, the flour industry. As everybody in this House knows, there is a duty of seventy-five cents a barrel on flour. Do flour-mills still require protection? Were they not extant, previous to the inauguration of the National Policy? We are in a position to compete successfully in that line on the markets of the United States and of the world. We have great transportation facilities, we have cheaper labour here than they have in the United States, and the difference in the price of labour could secure sufficient protection to the millers and sugar refiners of the country. They no longer need protection, nor any special favours at the hands of the Government. The Government, in maintaining those duties, merely wish to favour their friends, and speaking for myself, I may say that I could never help thinking that these were so many favours bestowed on political friends and handsomely redeemed by the latter at election times. And when the hon. the Secretary of State told us that $25,000 were spent in the Cape Breton election, that was probably the basis of his opinion as to the amount expended by his party. Enough has transpired within the last few years to give us an insight into the enormous sums that have come out of the pockets of the people, under the cover of protection. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), a Conservative, told the House the other day that the National Policy had raised the price of wheat in the province of Ontario. I never entertained the least doubt about this fact, and I have over and again openly stated my views in that respect before the electors of the province of Quebec. I have always maintained that protection had for effect to raise the price of the articles on which duties were placed, and should the hon. member for Megantic rise again in his seat and tell the House that he is selling groceries cheaper this year than he used to sell them before the protective policy was inaugurated, he will delude no man of sound sense to believe that protection does not result in enhancing the price of the articles on which duties are imposed, and no business man will accept his statement. The protective system cannot make a nation prosperous in general, but I contend that it tends to raise the value of nearly all the articles upon which duties are imposed. Now, I say that when you place a tax of 64 cents per hundred pounds of refined sugar, the refiners are not so stupid as not to avail themselves of that duty, and know very well how to pocket 55 or 60 cents more on their sugar. Those gentlemen, the sugar refiners, have enjoyed long enough this privilege, and we want to relieve the people of this tax. We want the tariff to be so adjusted as to benefit the public treasury instead of protecting the monopolists in the country. As I said previously, I am of opinion that a protective tariff may sometimes be useful, in order to foster and prop up new born industries. I am sure the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Dugas) coincides with the view I have expressed, so far as the tobacco-growing industry is concerned. I am aware that the hon. gentleman on several occasions, has advocated that view on the floor of this House, in the interests of his constituents and that he has, as well as several other gentlemen, advocated some measure of protection, in order to encourage the growing of leaf tobacco, and to induce the agriculturists of the country to engage in that kind of industry which, through protection, would become more paying. The hon. gentleman is quite aware of it, but the Government do not see what benefit they could derive from protecting in that way the farming classes, and the hon. member for Montcalm and the other members who support his views are still waiting for what, in their opinion, and rightly so, I believe, would tend to protect the farming interests, not only in his constituency, but throughout the country. Tobacco holds to-day a considerable place from a commercial standpoint, and the Government, while allowing foreign leaf tobacco to enter this country duty free, interferes with the growing of our native crops; whereas, should an import duty be placed on foreign leaf tobacco, as it has already been suggested, such action would result in checking the importation of the foreign article and fostering the cultivation of the Canadian tobacco, through the inducement offered to our manufacturers to use the native leaf, thus opening a market to our tobacco growers. That would, of course, result in further developing our native industry, and the growing of tobacco which is a comparatively easy industry. This is an infant industry to which might judiciously be applied the protective system. But I regret, with my hon. friend, that the Government so far turned a deaf ear to the voice coming from the rural districts, asking for a small measure of protection in favour of our domestic grower and of our native industry. In 1878, the hon. Secretary of State, addressing this House, spoke as follows:—

The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) ought to know that, if governments are good for anything, they are good to increase the prosperity of a country by Acts of Parliament, or to meet difficulties in which a country is placed from time to time, and which require legislative interference.

Now, have the Conservatives increased the prosperity of the country through their policy? I have shown, on the contrary, on pretty good grounds, that the country to-day is in a more critical condition than it was a few years ago. Then, the hon. gentleman goes on to say:

We say, moreover, that you may thus not only give them the means of paying the taxation, but you may bring people into the country to assist in paying, and retain those who would otherwise be driven out of it.

Let us see whether that prophecy has been fulfilled. According to the census our population has increased in the following ratio:

1871-1881..Nova Scotia	52,772	13
1881-1891.. do	9,951	2¼

We all know, Sir, that the last decade was noted for the enormous expenditure of millions of dollars which have flowed out of the public treasury for the construction of considerable works undertaken by the Government. Such was also the case with our provincial governments. Our municipal governments have also incurred a considerable expenditure. If, therefore, we find, in 1891, that the country, although favoured with this enormous expenditure of public moneys, has not progressed as rapidly as it had during the previous decade, it may reasonably be inferred that there is something rotten in the actual system. True, the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories have somewhat progressed, though that progress has fallen far below our expectations and the promises made by the Ministers of the day. It is on record that Sir John Macdonald repeatedly declared that in 1891, the population of Manitoba would number one million inhabitants at least. It is also on record that Sir Leonard Tilley boasted that enough money would be realized out of the sale of our public lands in Manitoba and the North-west Territories to reduce the public debt by one hundred millions of dollars in 1891. It is also on record that Sir Charles Tupper reckoned on a yearly yield of one hundred millions of bushels of wheat, in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Now, what is the result, up to date? The population, far from being 1,000,000, only numbers 346,391 inhabitants. Our public debt, far from being reduced, as promised, shows an enormous increase, and the sale of public lands scarcely meets the expenditure incurred, while the yield of 100,000,000 bushels of promise, boasted of by Sir Charles Tupper, scarcely amounts to 18,000,000 bushels. Such are the results of this policy of deception, and it is but right that the facts should be put on record, and that the people should know whether they are warranted in reposing, in the future, any confidence in the men whose promises have been so egregiously falsified in the past. In 1878, Sir John Macdonald, referring to the National Policy, in this House, spoke as follows:

That such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home.

Mr. LEGRIS.

And Sir Charles Tupper, addressing this House in the same year, spoke as follows:—

The policy the Government has pursued has had the effect of depopulating the country. It has sent away the most skilled and intelligent labour, the finest sons of Canada, to a foreign country to obtain employment their own country denies them.

These comments were levelled at the Government of the day, when these gentlemen, of course, tried to point out that the Liberal party had not managed the affairs of the country with intelligence, but that they, if returned to power, would bring back the golden age, stop the exodus, reduce the public debt, and make of Canada a land of plenty. We find to-day, Sir, that all these promises have been falsified and that never have the agricultural classes been less prosperous than they are now. The people of this country want a change of policy and other men, honest men, who understand better the requirements of the country. You remember, Sir, that the Liberal party, in June, 1893, met in convention in this city, and agreed upon a policy which was endorsed without a dissentient voice by the Liberals of Canada, through their representatives at that convention. These resolutions read as follows:

We, the Liberal party of Canada, in convention assembled, declare:—

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service;

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few;

It has checked immigration;

It has caused great loss of population;

It has impeded commerce;

It has discriminated against Great Britain.

In these and many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people;

That to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government;

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, as to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We believe that the results of the protective system have grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country, in the light of experience, is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

The issue between the two political parties on this question is now clearly defined.

The Government themselves admit the failure of their fiscal policy, and now profess their willingness to make such changes; but they say that such changes must be based only on the principle of protection.

Could, Sir, a more appropriate, a fairer policy be formulated than the one I have just partly quoted? It is laid down in that programme that we want to readjust the tariff so as to promote free trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States. Were Great Britain to close the doors of her markets to our dairy products, under some pretense, as was the case with the export of our live cattle, it is easy to conjecture what crisis this state of things would bring about, and the depressed condition our farming interests throughout the country would pass through. The English market is our natural market and to secure, in the future, this market, which has proved so beneficial to our farming interests, should be the aim of a wise and sound policy. The Liberal party, in their convention of 1893, advocated any measure in that direction, and those also were the views expressed by the motion brought down by the hon. member for Queen's P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). As to our trade with the United States, although it is not quite so large as that we are carrying on with Great Britain, still it may be said that it is of very great importance to us. From the tables included in the Trade and Navigation returns for 1895, I gather that while we have exported to England $61,856,990 worth of goods, our exports to the United States amounted to $41,297,676; that we imported from England $31,131,737 worth of goods, and from the United States $54,634,521 worth of goods, from which it is easy to size up the value of our trade with both countries. Our trade with Great Britain, amounted to $92,988,727 worth of exports and imports; and as to our trade with the United States, in spite of all the difficulties and restrictions which have been placed in the way of trade between the two countries—and I say so unhesitatingly—difficulties which have been largely thrown in our way by the fiscal policy of our Government—in spite of all the barriers which block the way to our products, our trade with the United States has reached a total of $95,932,197. The province of Quebec exported to Great Britain $38,401,518 worth of products, and imported from the same country $13,882,688 worth of goods. The same province exported actually to the United States $9,279,156 worth. They imported actually $19,430,150. According to the official returns, the total trade of Quebec with Great Britain amounted to $52,284,206, and with the United States, to $28,700,306. Our trade with the United States is quite important and we are perfectly aware that the United States is a first class market, where we can find an outlet for many products which we cannot export to Great Britain. Could such a desirable state of things be brought about, could we secure freer trade with the United States, even somewhat to the detriment of our trade with Great Britain and of certain industrial classes, I have no hesitation in saying that our country would be enormously benefited by it. When distress prevails among agricultural classes, then the business men we meet in cities tell us that money is scarce and trade paralyzed. Is it not a fact that the leading merchants in our cities, before giving large orders, ascertain first whether prosperity prevails among the farming community. Merchants draw their information from the country, and they rely mostly upon the farmers. Before giving their orders, they first consult the requirements of the farming community and they take no important steps in their line of trade, which is not grounded on their forecast as to the purchasing power of the farming community. So with the manufacturers, and I find only one case where a different state of things prevails. I mean the present Government. The poorer the Government are, the more expenses they incur, and the larger are the deficits, as I soon shall prove. Our friends, the Conservatives, have one standard argument to oppose us, when told that far from there being prosperity, distress is prevailing in every section of the country. The argument I have met with on several hustings is to the effect that the savings banks overflow with money, and there is not a single member on the other side who does not believe he has gained his point when advancing that argument. Let me quote the very words uttered by the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), in the House of Commons, in 1878, in answer to Mr. Oliver:

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) had alluded to the large amount of money in the banks as proof that the country was now prosperous; but on the contrary, this was always evidence of depression in commerce and in manufactures. When commerce was active and manufactures were flourishing, people did not deposit their money in the banks, but instead, invested it in the manufactures.

Gentleman of the Conservative party, such is the answer given by one of your leaders, by one of the Ministers, to the standard argument resorted to by all the stump speakers of the party. When the country is prosperous, people do not deposit their money in the banks. There are quite a number of industries in the country which are in jeopardy, through the want of capital invested in them. The hon. gentlemen like to boast of the immense mineral wealth of the country; they talk of the immense territory not yet opened up to settlement; and where there is plenty room for all kinds of enterprises. But, Sir, if fear did not prevail through the country, if confidence in the future existed, the millions deposited in the chartered banks, to quote the words of the Hon. Mr. Haggart in 1878, would be invested in the manufactures, and in commercial enterprises. Conservatives often tell us that they do not understand our policy, and what we mean by tariff reform or revenue tariff. Well, Sir, I am going to answer them in the very words of one of the leaders of the hon. gentlemen opposite, one who enjoyed the greatest authority and prestige in the party, Sir John Macdonald himself. In connection with this very plank of our policy which they pretend not to understand, listen to what Sir John Macdonald said, in addressing the House, on the 7th March, 1878 :

The hon. the First Minister very truly said, some years ago, that they, the then Opposition, were not called upon to find a policy for the country ; that the responsibility of finding such a policy rested with the Ministry of the day ; and that the constitutional duty of Her Majesty's Opposition, the constitutional duty that was thrown upon them was to criticize the administration and legislation of the Government, to hold them in check, to warn them when they were going wrong, to censure them when they had gone wrong, and generally criticize and observe upon the course of administration and legislation. If the Opposition chose to take a further step, they might do, certainly, but it is not forced upon them, and it is not forced upon them in reference to any subject. It is not forced upon the Opposition to find a new policy with regard to matters of revenue, and tariff and expenditure ; they could not, of course, because they have not the power to do so.

As far as matters of tariff are concerned, it is impossible for the Opposition to enter into details or explain before the House and the country their policy ; they have not the material ; the Government alone have the opportunity, and the only opportunity, of collecting the facts upon which a tariff can be formed.

This language is clear and explicit enough to warrant me in saying that those who, through party interest, pretend not to understand the Liberal policy on that vital tariff question, must admit that Sir John Macdonald has amply answered for us. I have already shown, on the very authority of the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches, that their previsions and statements when in opposition all tended to point out to an era of returning prosperity, should they come into power. Allow me to show you, Sir, to what extent they have redeemed their pledges. The data I am going to quote are taken from the report of the Department of Agriculture, and shows the expenditure incurred for immigration purposes, and also the number of immigrants landed in this country, since 1882 :

Mr. LEGRIS.

Year.	Expenditure on Immigration.	Number of Immigrants landed in this Country.
1882	$215,329 24	112,458
1883	373,957 71	133,624
1884	511,608 83	103,824
1885	423,860 90	79,169
1886	257,384 93	69,152
1887	341,236 39	84,526
1888	244,789 09	88,766
1889	202,499 26	91,600
1890	110,091 96	75,067
1891	181,045 28	82,165.

In 1892, we made an expenditure of $177,604.82. Here I may remark that the system has been altered. The report of the Minister of Agriculture no longer mentions the number of immigrants landed in Canada, that branch having been transferred to another department ; and I must confess that the report is so mixed up that I could not unravel it ; so I shall content myself with giving approximate figures. In 1883, our expenditure for that purpose amounted to $180,677.43 ; in 1894, to $202,232.52 ; in 1895, to $195,688.97. For the last four years, the approximate number of immigrants landed in Canada was 150,000. The sum total of immigrants, above mentioned, amounts to 1,070,351. According to a calculation based on the natural increase of our population, and which I deem pretty accurate, we should add to the number of immigrants, eight hundred thousand inhabitants. On adding up the number of immigrants to the natural increase of our population, that gives a total of 1,870,350 inhabitants. If you add up that number to that of our population in 1881, that should give a total of 6,924,810 inhabitants, while, according to the census returns, and by adding up an increase in the same ratio for the preceding years, we have a population amounting but to 5,337,189. We have therefore lost the considerable number of 787,971. For a country like ours, where there is room for a hundred million people at least, that is a most deplorable state of things. Such a state of affairs is evidence that there is something wrong somewhere. I have already had the opportunity of protesting against the expenditure incurred for immigration purposes, a policy, which, to my mind, far from favouring our interests, is directly opposed to it. The Government have expended large sums of money to assist the passage of new-comers, having an imperfect knowledge of our manners and laws, often picked up the lower strata of European towns, while we have allowed the exodus to take away our farmers, the backbone of the country, to the United States. I challenge the Government, I challenge any member of this House to point out a single fact, a single act that has been done, in order to prevent our fellow-citizens from migrating to the United States. What inducement has been given them to go and take up lands in Manitoba and the North-west Territories? Has any movement been set on foot to send settlers to the North-west either from the province of Quebec or from any other province, at a time when our young men go and work in American manufactures? Have any means been devised to stop the exodus and keep our fellow-countrymen in Canada? Have any inducements been offered them, such as those offered the pauper immigrants picked up in the streets of the great European capitals? Have any of those inducements been offered those of our farmers who were forced to leave the country and go to the United States? Has any attempt been made to settle them in the immense prairies of the North-west? No, Sir, while our compatriots were allowed to leave the country, we had an army of salaried officials charged with recruiting immigrants, to take the place of our own compatriots. So, the immigrants recruited abroad by our agents slipped through our fingers, and we lost at the same time a considerable number of our citizens. How is it, Sir, that we did not yet stop that stream of immigration? In this connection, it may not be out of place to recall what the hon. gentlemen said on the subject in 1878, and particularly the truly sensible language fallen from the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals in 1878. How is it that the hon. gentleman who has occupied a seat on the Treasury benches for so many years has never tried to prevail upon his colleagues to give up that foolish immigration policy; a policy which has cost the country millions of dollars, sums amounting, from 1881 to 1895, to $4,617,590.23, for the purpose of enticing here strangers, while the Government allowed the country to be slowly bled to death by the loss of so many of our compatriots who kept swelling the ever-growing stream of the exodus. The Hon. Mr. Haggart, on the 1st of March, 1878, addressing the House of Commons, spoke as follows:—

The Government ought to abandon their immigration policy of spending large sums of money—about $200,000 annually—in inducing a class of immigrants to come to this country, such as had no comparison to the class we were losing every day. Their efforts should tend to the directing of our young men to that region; and the money that was spent on Mennonites and Icelanders could be more profitably employed in assisting them to that country. They could not understand why foreigners had money advanced to them to pay their passage, were looked after and directed the whole way, while there was not even an arrangement made by which they might be in any way assisted to the same destination.

He hoped to see the sum heretofore voted for that purpose dropped from the Estimates.

The hon. Minister, when in the ranks of the Opposition, gave expression to his hope to see that item dropped from the Budget. How is it, then, I ask the hon. gentleman, through you, Mr. Speaker, that he has not yet succeeded in prevailing upon his colleagues, now he is a Minister, to cut off that expenditure? Why did he not speak to them the very same language he used, when in the Opposition? The views expressed by the hon. Minister and the truly sensible remarks uttered by him at that time ought to furnish ample food for thought to those who are aware of the extravagant expenditure incurred by the Government under the pretense or for the purpose of directing immigrants towards Manitoba and the North-west Territories. All fair minded men will admit that the Minister then spoke the language of common sense. And when we arraign the Government for the policy they have been pursuing up to this day, we are warranted in taking such a course, owing to the fact that the policy is now applied on a much larger scale. In view of the increasing expenditure in the other departments of the civil service the Government ought to drop entirely the sums wasted on immigration. I come now to another question, which is not without its importance. I want to point out to the House in what proportion the Government have let the expenses increase in the different public departments.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was about showing the House that the Government have increased the expenditure in the various public services in a way not at all consonant with the progress made by the country in various respects, and especially in reference to population. In 1878, Canada had a population of 4,133,347 souls, in 1895, having regard to the proportional increase according to the results stated by the census, the population should have numbered 5,377,189 souls, which is an increase, from 1878 to 1895, of 24 per cent. The following table shows in what proportion the various public services were increased from 1878 to 1895:

	Cost.	Increase.
	$	Per cent.
Civil government in 1878..	$23,370
do 1895..	1,422,000	72
Legislation in 1878.....	618,035
do 1895.....	941,570	52
Mounted Police in 1878....	325,000
do 1895....	646,000	92

	Cost.	Increase.
	$	Per cent.
Indian Affairs in 1878.....	421,000
do 1895.....	955,000	126
Superannuations in 1878.....	106,000
do 1895.....	265,000	149
Militia in 1878.....	615,000
do 1895.....	1,574,000	154
Net debt in 1878.....	140,362,069
do 1895.....	253,064,927	82
Gross debt in 1878.....	174,957,268
do 1895.....	318,048,754	82
Interest in 1878.....	7,048,883
do 1895.....	10,466,000	48

The total increase is over 100 per cent.
Population only increased 24 per cent.

Now, according to these figures, we may estimate the net debt per capita, in 1895, at the sum of $47.06, and the gross debt at $59.11 per head of the population, men, women and children included. Now, if we take a family of ten, which is not an uncommon thing among our country folks, we find that such a family is indebted, thanks to this Government, in the sum of $591. Politicians meet this with the statement that this debt will never be paid. It is quite possible, but, nevertheless, there is one thing sure, and that is that the people of this country are most positively and certainly burdened by the interest on this debt. The expenditure in 1895 amounted to the enormous sum of $38,132,005, which lays on our population an expenditure of $7.09 per head. Now, with the system now in force, with the men who are governing us, can we have any hope to see a little more wisdom prevail in the management of the business of this country? I do not believe it. It would be unreasonable to believe it, and there is positively nothing upon which we might ground an opinion likely to give us any hope that the general management of the affairs of this country would be better carried on in the future. If we wish for a change, if we are anxious to have more wisdom in the management of our affairs, we must change the men who form part of the present Government and replace them by able men. We have had for a long while the opportunity to show this House and the country that the hon. gentlemen opposite are unable to withstand the pressure brought to bear upon them by their friends, and we know that the nearer the elections, the stronger is the pressure. It is therefore impossible to believe that they would withstand this pressure and prove wiser in the future. Moreover, we have constant evidences of the contrary. A simple glance thrown at the reports published in the "Canada Gazette" shows that the expenditure and the public debt of the country are steadily increasing. The January issue of the "Canada Gazette" gave $321,898,871.90 as the debt of the country. It is a large increase over the official statement of the year ended on the 30th June,

Mr. LEGRIS.

1895. At the rate the gentlemen opposite have been going, the ordinary expenditure since 1879 has increased annually by the enormous sum, I might say, of $860,520 per annum, and if we only take last year, it is easy to find that during the year 1894, the expenditure has exceeded that of 1893 by the sum of $770,962.62. This year, 1895, it exceeded that of 1894 by the sum of $546,975.53. At that rate, it is difficult to foretell when we are going to stop. The hon. gentlemen opposite have shown an extraordinary propensity to push on the Government into that direction, and if we look at the Budget we are called upon by the Government to vote, it is easy to find the same tendency, the same course, the same progression in the increase of the ordinary expenditure. This increase which forms a large sum, is composed of expenses that might be controlled by the Administration. For instance, we find that in the interest on the public debt, there is an increase of $250,983.60. It is plain that this item cannot be controlled. But it is the result of the Government's extravagancy. As long as the credit of a man is good, he may borrow; but he must not forget that at the end of each year, he will have to pay the interest, if he cannot repay the capital. The Government are just in the same position. The loans they are steadily raising without any reason and without increasing their prosperity are the cause that the amount referred to with the interests bear more heavily upon the people. A closer consideration of the Budget which the Government are about asking this House to vote this year shows a large increase in money items. Thus, in the civil government, there is an increase of $9,000 over last year. The administration of justice will cost us, this year, $3,765 more. The penitentiaries, $11,539.70. I do not know whether the Government intend to continue to send to the penitentiary the people whom they should send to the gallows, and at the same time to treat them like lordlings. But I wonder why the Government should not be able to meet the expenditure on account of the penitentiaries with the same sum as that appropriated for that service last year. The superannuations show this year the large increase of $37,000. I will have later on an opportunity to make a more extended reference to this. As regards the militia, they are striking deadly hard. The increase this year will be $372,716. Are we to understand that the Government intend promoting militarism here as they do in European countries? Are we to understand that the Government hope, with such an increased expenditure, to make the militia more efficient without, however, taking the means to improve the officers and the leading people themselves? For it is to the knowledge of the country that the militia officers are not equal to their position. And how could it be otherwise when, for several years past, the Ministers at the head of this department are only transitory in the department? How can we expect that these Ministers could force the reforms required and likely to make the militia efficient? After all, in this part of America, what is there to threaten us to such an extent as to induce the Government to impose upon the people such heavy charges for the militia? It seems to me it is better to take peaceful means and continue to live in favour with our neighbours. It is better to manage the public affairs with more wisdom than was shown prior to 1885, so as to avoid having recourse to arms to put down a revolt in the country. The Department of Railways and Canals will cost us, this year, $80,540 more than last year; the Public Works, $247,270; the lighthouses and coast service, $23,640; the inspection of steamboats, $1,300; the fisheries, $7,600; the Geological Commission, $22,000; the Indians, $80,263.52; the Mounted Police, $30,000; and under the item "Miscellaneous," $4,389.11; the Customs, $25,095. It seems to me it would have been an easy matter to make a decrease in this department as, for several years past, it is to the knowledge of any one that the position of Collector of Customs, in Montreal, was vacant. However, no one ever heard that the service had suffered by it. It proves that it would be an easy matter to curtail the expenditure since, the chief officer being away, the collection of customs was made in a satisfactory way for the Government and the public. The inspection of weights and measures and electricity will cost us $1,150 more this year. For the Public Works there is an increase of $4,750; and the Post Office will cost us the trifling additional amount of $240,780.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. member (Mr. Legris) that he is not in order in discussing the Estimates, item by item, on a motion to go into Supply. I speak with a great deal of hesitation as I am not familiar with the French language, but I understood the hon. member to be referring to different items in the Estimates.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman did so, but I do not think he specially referred to them with a view of discussing them. He is merely showing the increased expenditures this year, as compared with last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I might observe that the hon. the Minister of Finance himself went over a great many of the items of the Estimates in his Budget speech, in comparing the expenditure for this year with the expenditure for last year.

Mr. FOSTER. At least the hon. gentlemen opposite ought to be courteous enough, if they will not allow us to discuss the Estimates in the Committee of the Whole, not to discuss them themselves.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am the first to bow to your ruling, but I think your interference now is due to the fact that you have not quite understood the point I was making. I am discussing no item of the Estimates; I merely refer to the items as to which the Government are asking us an increased expenditure, in order to point them out to the attention of this House. It seems to me that after the deficit we have had last year, the Minister of Finance should have been wise enough not to increase the ordinary expenditures, as is shown by the Estimates brought down. According to the figures I have given, we come to the conclusion that the Government had a deficit for the year 1894 amounting to $1,210,332. He reached the end of 1895 with another enormous deficit of $4,153,875. At the end of 1896, according to the present prospects, he will have another large deficit. I have listened very closely to the hon. the Minister of Finance and I easily understood that he merely grounded his calculations upon the hope that the receipts will be larger. But we must bear in mind that we are on the eve of a general election and politicians know that there is no popularity to be won by a Government going before the country with such a deplorable financial position as the one we are in now. This is why the hon. the Minister of Finance made a great effort to have it believed that he is hopeful. He has heaped large deficits from year to year, which would not have been the case had the Government acted with good judgment and looked at the position from the standpoint of the interests of the country. Having regard to that and for one conversant with the ability of the Minister of Finance in handling figures, it is easy to understand that the year 1896, according to his own anticipations, will balance by a deficit, and a rather large one at that. This is certainly no bright position for the Government nor a very encouraging one for the country. And, in order to show that the position in which the Government now stands requires a prompt remedy, I will quote what the hon. Secretary of State himself (Sir Charles Tupper) said in 1878. We find the following statement which I am going to read, at page 448 of "Hansard" for that year:

But I want now to invite the hon. gentleman's attention to what he has just said. What does he tell the House? He tells the House now that he does not propose any additional taxation; that he proposes to submit no measure by which this great calamity, this great disaster, this ruin to the credit of Canada, shall be averted, although he shows that on the 10th of this month he has a deficit of $617,610.

Such were the words uttered in 1878 by the man whom the hon. gentlemen opposite have called from London to try and bring back the stray sheep to the fold, the man who has come from London under the pretext of a diplomatic mission, the light which has crossed the ocean at their request to lead the Conservative party to a new victory. He considered as a great calamity, as a great disaster, as a ruin to the credit of Canada, the fact that the Government, in 1878, had a deficit of $617,000, and now these hon. gentlemen strut on the Treasury benches and are pleased with their good management when they have a deficit of four million dollars and over in a single year. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is an alarming position for the country, when it is considered to what extent we have gone in the matter of taxation. During that time, while the Government reach the end of each year with a deficit more or less large and ranging in the millions, has the public debt remained stationary? No, Sir, since in 1893 it has increased by $549,605.17, in 1894, it has increased by $4,501,989.87, in 1895, it has increased by $6,895,897.61. Is that not a nice balance-sheet, and what will the hon. Secretary of State now say? Will he remember his big words of former years? Will he say that it is a great calamity, a disaster, a ruin to the credit of Canada? I now wish, Mr. Speaker, to call your attention to another point. The hon. members will remember quite well, that the Government imagined and put under consideration a few years ago, the project of a line of fast steamers between Canada and Great Britain. To promote the enterprise, we all know that a large bonus was granted to any company that would carry it out. Now, the scheme has not yet materialized. If it was necessary, we could accept it, for, when a thing is necessary, one may make sacrifices to secure or realize it. But, if we look at the Trade and Navigation Returns, we find that, in the year just ended, 1895, 10,335 loaded vessels and 3,383 unloaded vessels, that is, under ballast, entered into the ports of the Dominion. The arrivals at Halifax were 901 loaded ocean steamers and 29 under ballast; at Quebec, 229 loaded vessels and 115 under ballast; at Montreal, 296 loaded vessels and 41 under ballast. 1,164 loaded vessels and 12 under ballast cleared from Halifax; 251 loaded vessels and 3 under ballast from Quebec; 381 loaded vessels and 5 under ballast from Montreal. Why should they attempt to establish by dint of money a new line of fast ocean steamers if not for the sole purpose of allowing a few people to receive the bonus which the Government are willing to grant, which is set at $750,000 per annum during five years, and $500,000 during the next five years, making the trifling sum, should the scheme succeed, of $6,250,000 which the people will have to pay for that wild scheme. The wants of the country do not require such a service. Do they think they can establish between Canada and Liverpool a line of fast steamers likely to compete with those that ply between New York and Liverpool? We have not yet reached such a stage. We are not in such a financial position as to be so lavish of our money. And governments, as well as individuals, must govern their expenditures according to their resources. I say, therefore, it is not wise, it is even bad management on the part of the Government to throw to the winds and upon the ocean the millions of the people without any necessity. I now wish to refer, in order that the Ministers might hear my remarks, to another point that well deserves the attention of this House. The hon. gentlemen are constantly besieged by their friends, and in order to win the favours of certain influences, they like to please their friends whenever it is possible. I have no objection to that, but we have reached a point where it would be wise to put a check on it, even though the Minister of Finance had himself to mount guard around the Treasury. I do not intend to review all the departments, but I may be allowed to begin with the head of the party. For some years past, we have indulged in the luxury of eighteen Ministers to manage the affairs of a population of about five million souls. I would see no harm in that if it did not cost us so much. Is it possible, indeed, to believe that a small country like ours cannot be wisely governed without our having this nice family of eighteen Ministers seated on the Treasury benches? If we look at the other civilized countries, we can find no such thing anywhere else. For instance, Great Britain, with a population of thirty-nine millions, has only ten Ministers. France, with a population of thirty-nine millions, has likewise but ten Ministers. Germany, with forty millions, is governed by twelve Ministers. Italy, with a population of 28,500,000 souls, has only eleven Ministers; Spain, eighteen millions, 9 Ministers; Japan, forty millions, 12 Ministers. European Russia, whose population numbers eighty-five million souls, and its dependencies, twenty-eight millions, making altogether, one hundred and thirteen millions, has only twelve Ministers. The United States, with a population of about seventy millions, is governed by eight Ministers, who receive the same salary as ours. For we pay here $9,000 to the Prime Minister and $8,000 each to twelve others, and then we pay $6,000 a year to each of three more, who are possibly apprentices. It is true we have two Ministers without portfolios, which make the number of eighteen, to govern a population of five million souls. I now wish to call your attention to a state of affairs which has often been demanded by my hon. friend the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen. I refer to this host of former civil servants who are now state pensioners. Allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that whenever I referred to this before the electors, they found the system such an odious one that sometimes they would not believe me. The fact is we have here a superannuation system which is inconceivable and intolerable, even by those who are supposed to profit by it. This system is odious. I am going to give you a few figures to show its imperfections. It is not even popular among the public employees, for they are compelled to pay, as long as they are employees, a percentage on their salaries, and when they die they have nothing to leave for the support of their families. That is particularly unjust and intolerable in many cases. But what is still more reprehensible is the abuse the Government have made of it, and every government is supposed or liable to make abuses. Every civil servant ought to do what common people do, they ought to think to their old times and take their precautions by saving something in order to provide for their wants when their time of superannuation will come. How few are the citizens in this country who can say to themselves that at a given time, ceasing all work, they could rely upon a pension, whatever it be, if they have not saved while they were able to work! This system does not even receive the approval of the officers of the civil service. After their death it does not provide in a sense the way for the wants of their families. Moreover, it is very dangerous to place this superannuation fund into the hands of the Government. It is the present Government who have chiefly contributed to make this system intolerable by the way they have carried it on. To evidence it, I have only to quote the list of the superannuated civil officers list which appears in the Public Accounts and the Auditor General's report for the year 1895. According to that list, we find that there were, in 1895, 560 superannuated civil officers. Of this number, and in order to show the abuse which was made of the system, I will mention the fact that there were 94 who had received each over $5,000, 62 over $10,000 and 45 over $15,000. W. R. Mingaye, who at the end of his 34 years of service had reached the handsome salary of $3,800 a year, was superannuated eight years ago with an allowance of $2,508, and he has already received $20,900. J. P. Leprohon, who received a salary of $2,205.56, has been superannuated for thirteen years with an allowance of $1,546.92, and he has already received $20,199.62. John Kidd received a salary of $2,300 a year, he has been superannuated for thirteen years with an allowance of $1,564, and he has already received $20,462.33. P. LeSueur, who received a salary of $2,400, was superannuated seventeen years ago with an allowance of $1,195.04, and he has received until now $20,215.68. René Kimber, who received a salary of $2,400, has been a state-pensioner for twenty years. He has an allowance of $1,047.80, and he has now received $21,150.80. S. M. Passon, who received a salary of $2,200 a year, has been a state-pensioner for sixteen years, with a yearly allowance of $1,540, and he has now received $24,260. John Howe had a salary of $2,000. He has been a state-pensioner for nineteen years, he receives the modest sum of $1,399.86, and he has now received $26,597.34. A. Woodgate received a salary of $2,400. He has been a Government pensioner for twenty years, with a yearly allowance of $1,552.32. He has now received $31,501.40. John Leslie who received a salary of $3,500, has been a state-pensioner for fifteen years, with $2,449.92, and he has received the trifling sum of $37,667.52 in way of allowances. F. P. Rubidge received a salary of $2,400 a year. For twenty-four years he has been a state-pensioner, with a yearly allowance of $1,663. He has now received the trifling sum of $39,916.60. E. A. Meredith, who had a salary of $3,600 a year, has been for sixteen years a state-pensioner, with an allowance of $2,520. He has also received the trifling sum of $42,000. John Langton, who died during the year, had an allowance of $2,716.44, and he had received in this way $46,000. I have given these informations to this House in order to show the abuses which were made of the Superannuation Act. Must we believe that the Ministers have waited till these civil officers were in an advanced age in order to superannuate them? No, Sir, they superannuated them when they want to place a friend, which is a frequent occurrence. In order to show that age is no consideration for superannuation purposes, we find that on the list of this year, there were 175 officers superannuated under sixty years, 71 under fifty years, twenty under forty years, and we find some who were superannuated in a still less advanced age. Thus we find that Honoré Ferguson was superannuated at thirty-five years; E. A. Pelletier at thirty-four years; Jos. Osborne at thirty-two years; G. W. Grant at thirty-one years; J. T. McCaffery at thirty years, and Jos. Bradbury at twenty-nine years. But we find cases even by far more interesting than these. In the province of Quebec, the good party, the party with good principles, need to send from time to time a missionary to preach the good doctrine; they confide that care to a man named Charles Thibault, a pensioner of the Dominion. They send him where he is rather unknown, for as a rule he is worth nothing when he goes twice successively in the same place. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works knows that quite well. The Conservative party use Mr. Thibault to work for them. You see, it is so good a party, a party with good principles, and Mr. Thibault is the advocate of these good principles of the Conservative party, principles of honesty, fairness and loyalty. They have only to sign to Mr. Thibault and at any time he is ever ready to sacrifice himself. Mr. Thibault was appointed on the 22nd December, 1880, secretary of the Dominion Board of Arbitration. It was nothing more than a sinecure, and I am sure Mr. Thibault, during the nine years he held that position, did not give anything tantamount to a month's work.

It was a real sinecure to encourage this gentleman, who had the gift of the gab, to go and preach the good doctrine in the rural districts for the Conservative candidates and against the Liberal candidates. During nine years, Mr. Thibault received a salary of $2,000 a year, for doing nothing. He has therefore received an amount of $18,000. During that time he contributed $286.79 to the superannuation fund. The Government having found out, some fine day, that this useless commission had already cost enough to the country, decided to do away with it. With it went likewise the salary of Mr. Thibault, but thanks to the Administration, he was made a pensioner of the Dominion at the age of 49 years. He is now sure for his lifetime—and he looks as if he was going to live long—of a yearly allowance of $759.96. I need not say that such a favour has not lessened his zeal and that whenever some one has to be sent to preach the good doctrine, if they think Mr. Thibault is not too well known in the place, they have only to sign to him and he goes. Another very interesting case is that of Mr. Vankoughnet. This gentleman was superannuated against his will, as shown by a letter that is to be found in the "Hansard" of 1894, page 3748. He was only 57 years old, in good health and more able to discharge the duties of his office than the gentleman who succeeded him. He is now living in England with a yearly allowance of $2,112. But they had to find a place for Mr. Hayter Reed, who now earns a salary of $3,200 a year, in the place of Mr. Vankoughnet. Another interesting case is that of Mr. John Tilton, Deputy Minister of Fisheries. He was only 54 years old when he was superannuated. He lives here in Ottawa, in good health, and I am even told that he attended the ball given this week by His Excellency the Governor General and that he still does well. This gentleman will receive during his lifetime $1,536 a year of the people's money. Let us also see the case of Mr. Gustave Lamothe, postmaster in Montreal, superannuated four years ago with an allowance of $2,000. This gentleman was able to discharge his duties for a long time yet, but they had to place Mr. Arthur Dansereau, who had well earned his grade. I do not blame him for having accepted that position, but I blame the Government for having abused a law that should no longer be in our statute-book. It is to our knowledge that, on the 14th June, 1894, the hon. member for North Wellington introduced a motion for the repeal of the Superannuation Act, but the Government, with their compliant majority, voted against it and it was lost. A few days later, the then Prime Minister, Sir John Thompson, introduced a resolution to allow the judges of the Supreme Court, whenever they would like to get superannuated after a certain length of service, to receive an allowance equal to their salary. We know that these gentlemen receive a large salary. The Chief Justice receives $8,000 a year, and the other justices $7,000 a year. Well, the Government wished a principle to be accepted which went further than the existing state of affairs, by guaranteeing the judges an allowance equal to their salary. This resolution received the support of all the Ministerial members, with the exception of the hon. members for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) and Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier). This superannuation system has led to the following results:—In the year 1895, the receipts were $67,670.64; the expenditure for the same time was $265,385.77, or a net loss of $197,715.13. From 1871 to 1895, the contribution of the civil officers to the Superannuation Fund amounted to $1,306,764.72, and the state disbursed, during the same period, $4,036,349.27, or a loss of $2,729,574.55. Have we not the right to accuse the Government who allow such an unjust and burdensome law to remain in the statute-book? Let the civil officers do as common people to secure their living in their old age. They are not a privileged class. The salaries we pay them each year are certainly enviable, as evidenced to the Ministers at every day. When a vacancy occurs, they know better than I do by what a lot of claims they are besieged. Then why should they impose a new burden upon the country by making that superannuation secure for the employees who no longer work for the state? It prevents them from saving and spending with discretion. In my initial remarks, I quoted the first part of the platform of the Liberal party adopted in the convention of 1893. I will now continue to give further extracts of this platform which deserves, in its entirety, the support of the people of this country. The second resolution has reference to commercial reciprocity with the United States, the third condemns the corrupt actions of which the Government for several years, was guilty. Is it not a cause for humiliation, Sir, for a patriot to think of the boodling that has been going on under the very eyes of the Government? From the disclosures made before a committee of this House in 1891 to the building of the famous bridge called Curran up the river, it is a humiliation for the country to find that amongst us and under the supervision of the responsible Ministers, such gigantic boodling as that exposed these last years has been committed. No one can deny that enormous sums were stolen away from the public treasury through various public works which the Government caused to be made. I will not go into details which are sufficiently known to this House and this country. I only refer to this by the way in order to show how wise, fair and reasonable in every way is that section of the platform of the Liberal party. The fourth resolution calls for a curtailment of the administrative expenditures. It is none too soon for this curtailment to be made. I have shown already how the Government have from year to year increased the expenditures. I have shown that this increase is a large one in the various departments controlled by the Ministers. I have no doubt whatever that a business man, a commercial firm who would manage the affairs of the country as they manage their own, I say I have no doubt that such a man, such a firm would curtail the expenditures by several millions every year without in no wise lessening the efficiency of the public services. The fifth resolution of the Liberal platform condemns the reference to Royal Commissions of charges preferred against a Minister. We have been witnesses to such farces in this House, and it is plain that if a Minister, taken in the deed, as was the case in recent years, is allowed to refer his case to the decision of his friends, if he has all the control in his own hands, if he is allowed to choose himself his judges and even choose the counsel for his accusers, as the case has happened already, there is no doubt that the expediency of a reform is not to be discussed, and that a royal commission in such conditions is merely a farce played at the expense of the public. Through such means the Ministers can always cause themselves to be exonerated, as the case has happened a few years ago. Through such means they can escape the sentence they deserve. The sixth resolution condemns the Elections Act. It is nothing short of a gigantic inconvenience in the making of the electoral lists. It is perfectly useless. Before it was passed, the federal elections were held under the lists made by the municipal council in each municipality. There was no complaints, at least, there could be no serious ones, against the lists made by the municipal councils. This system gave more facilities, and was a good deal more fair than the one we now have. It was more just and wiser. It did justice to the public and to the voters, which the present federal lists do not. The fact is, we are on the eve of a general election and it will be held under lists two years old already. A great many people, since the lists were made, would be qualified to vote at the next election, but they will not be able to do it because their names are not on the lists, and a great many others will vote without being entitled to vote, having lost their qualification since the lists were made. And then, what a lot of work the making of these lists entails to the candidates! To what frauds are we not exposed, we who belong to a party adverse to the Government! Should another government come into power and allow the same lists to continue in force, the same frauds could be perpetrated against the adverse party. This only illustrates the more the imperfections of this Act and of these electoral lists. And that is why the platform of the Liberal party condemns the Elections Act. The Liberal party expressed a desire to return to the old system of lists made by the municipal councils. We must not forget, moreover, that these electoral lists are a very heavy charge on the finances of the country. The last lists have cost the enormous sum of $235,396.97. By going back to the lists of the municipal councils, we would escape this expenditure, to say nothing of the inconvenience and frauds which are now perpetrated. The seventh resolution condemns the gerrymandering as done by this Government. Here is another electoral device which deserves the severest condemnation. To give an idea of it, I will mention a single fact. After the census of 1881, the necessity arose to readjust some counties in the province of Ontario. Then, what did the Government do? They made that readjustment from the sole standpoint of the interests of a political party, and what was the result? The result was that, at the last general election, the Conservative candidates received in the province of Ontario 186,000 votes, and that number returned 59 members of this House. The Liberal party received 182,000 votes, and these voters only returned 33 members. Now, here is the conclusion: It required 9,950 votes to return a Liberal member and 3,150 to return a Conservative member. Is that just? Is that the intent of the Constitution? Is that, Sir, what was expected of this readjustment? The Government, I fancy, is well satisfied with the result, for we know that at the last session, they considered for a long while a Bill to gerrymander anew the counties of the province of Quebec, and, I suppose, of the other provinces as well, and I do not know by what fear they were prevented from introducing it in this House. Mr. Speaker, we want the electoral body to declare themselves in all equity and fairness with respect to the questions that are agitating the country. The eighth resolution of the platform of the Liberal party calls for a reform of the Senate. It is a serious matter, but I have no hesitation in saying that the public opinion in the Dominion is against the Senate as now constituted. The Senate no longer represents anything except the interests of the political party which appointed the Senators, who compose the other House. If we want the Senate to have its raison d'être, if we want the people to believe in its efficiency, we must at least reform that institution by giving the various bodies in the country the right and advantage to be represented in that honourable House. The Senate must not be a tool in the hands of the Government. I know the statement I now make will likely be used against me, as there are still some places in the country where they believe that the Senate is of divine institution, the same as they believe that the legislative council in Quebec to be of divine institution. And I am not living far from certain places where they believe that. This is why I say that I am now possibly laying myself open to criticism; but I make the statement through conviction, and if there should be any doubt about it, we have only to look at what is going on in the other House. We will merely see there is a body willing to forward the interests of a political party, the ruling party. There are, no doubt, exceptions, but they are scarce, and it cannot be otherwise since the Government choose in their ranks the most zealous supporters of their actions, good or bad—especially the bad ones—those who have earned their grades in the battles they fought for the party. Can any one believe that a politician is able, from one day to another, to put off the old man and forget the political party that has installed him in a senatorial chair? No. The politician who leaves the House of Commons or any other part of the Dominion to go into the Senate deserved that honour by the services he has rendered to his party. He is a true partisan, willing to do anything for the support of his party. We are therefore right when we call for, if not the abolition, at least a reform of the Senate. Let me quote a quite recent case to show to what extent such a reform is urgent. We have just had in Montreal, the commercial metropolis of the Dominion, an electoral contest which was vigorously carried on by both the political parties. We know the result of it, we have the pleasure, we of this side of the House, to have amongst us the choice of the Montreal voters. The man who deputed the hon. Mr. McShane that mandate to the Commons is a thorough gentleman, of a respectability beyond any reach. But the people did not approve of the course he was supporting. This gentleman is a prominent physician who never indulged in politics; therefore his candidature caused a general surprise. Suddenly caught by the desire to serve his country, he offers his services to the electors of Montreal who decline them because of their want of confidence in the Government. Now, what has happened? The day following that election, Sir William Hingston is made a Senator. Can we help suspecting that there was an understanding between him and the Government? This gentleman, who was rejected by the people, is installed in the Senate to revise the actions of the hon. Mr. McShane who was elected by the city of Montreal. This is nonsense, and I say more, such an anomaly is not consistent with the spirit of the constitution. There are in the Senate about a dozen Senators only who are not willing to support this Government. Suppose there was a change of administration and these gentlemen were firmly bent on—they say the old man is sometimes obstinate—suppose they took a fancy to overthrowing the Administration which should not be that of their predilections, could not they do it? Surely they could. Now, these hon. gentlemen would be in opposition with the people. They would prevent a government, the choice of the people, from administering the affairs of the country. I say such a system should be tolerated no longer and that a reform of the Senate is now a commanding issue. I consider I cannot better show that the platform of the Liberal party deserves a universal approval than to quote the last resolution adopted by the great convention. It is the eleventh resolution, which reads as follows:—

That this convention desires to express its entire confidence in the leadership of the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, and its administration of his brilliant eloquence, his endearing personal qualities, and his broad and statesmanlike utterances upon the public questions of the day.

Such is, Mr. Speaker, the last article of our platform and does not the difference strike you between that which exists in our ranks and that which exists in the ranks of our opponents, the hon. gentlemen opposite? See what confidence we all have in our chief, and that confidence is unanimously shared by our friends of the other provinces who belong to a different race. There he was sincerely recognized by the Liberal party as the unquestionable and unquestioned chief of this great party. There we have stated that we praised and recognized his wants. We feel well satisfied that the ship of state, under his able direction, could not be steered otherwise than in the right course and for the greatest benefit of the Dominion. Our leader is a man worthy to command that ship. We are united because we recognize in him the power to govern us. We are united and there is the guarantee of a great triumph. We will succeed because we have in our leader a man having the strength required for the government of a great party. If on our side there are no conflicting opinions, no internecine strife, if we are not witnesses to such quarrels as we have seen a few days ago among our opponents the hon. gentlemen opposite who, but yesterday, were wrangling one with the other, and calling themselves traitors on the one hand and old silly men on the other, as has happened to the great horror of the country, it is because we have a leader whom we love and respect. Our party is not composed of men ready to wrangle one with the other. We have confidence in our leader, and this is the ground for our belief that we will carry the next general election. We believe that the Canadian voters share our views and we trust them, they will show their confidence as we show ours, and notwithstanding the firm will of our opponents to stay in power, this very power will slip away from them. This is why we will go before the people with the utmost confidence that we will see the ship of state confided to the care of our able leader. Lastly, we have reason to believe that the harmony which prevails in our party will continue so in the future and prepare the destinies of this country.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish at the outset to dispel any fears of hon. gentlemen that I propose to make a long speech by announcing that I am not able to understand nor speak the French language, and I am precluded from replying to the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me. Now, Sir, in this very long debate which has lasted for a number of days a great deal has been advanced on both sides relating to what to-day is the great question which is before the country, I refer to the fiscal policy of the Government and the fiscal policy of the Opposition. I do not propose, at this late stage of the debate, to enter into this question at any length. However, I am pleased to be able to know that hon. gentlemen opposite have placed themselves on record in this debate as still giving allegiance to the old principles of the Opposition, in every form and shape to the National Policy as enunciated by the Government. Not only has the statement of the leader of the Opposition, announced by him through the province of Ontario last summer, been assented to and applauded by hon. gentlemen opposite, but it has been intensified more than last summer. On the part of the Government and the Administration there has been a fixed adherence to the principles of the National Policy, namely, that it should have a protective bearing on every industry in the country, and that every industry susceptible or capable of being fostered and nurtured should have a friendly hand extended to it. In this debate great attention has been paid to the agricultural interests, and for a short time I propose to devote myself to that aspect of the case. It cannot be denied that in the province of Ontario, likewise in the province of Quebec, agriculture is a great calling, if I may so term it, and in the constituency I have the honour to represent, such is particularly the case. I do not believe the agricultural interests of the country can be advanced altogether by legislation, although the legislation enacted by the Government since 1878 has had a most salutary effect on the agricultural interests of the country. I am totally at variance with the principles of hon. gentlemen opposite, when they intimate that every vestige of protection must be eradicated and abolished root and branch. I am averse to the principle enunciated last year by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), that he was in favour of the total abolition of duties on pork, and on oats and other productions of the field and on other products which farmers largely produce in which they are greatly interested. But while I believe our agricultural interests have been fostered by the policy of the Government, still I believe there are other ways in which the farmers can be assisted, and that is by bringing the markets of the old world, which are, after all, the markets of the whole world, closer and more in touch with the people of this Dominion; and in that connection I propose to touch somewhat at length on the advantages of water-borne freights as being advantageous as compared with those carried by rail, and more particularly as this subject very much interests the people of the riding which I represent.

The principle of the advantage of carrying freight by water is an old one, and as far back as seventy years ago we find the United States were projecting waterways for opening up the country, and with that end in view they constructed what is to-day known as the Erie Canal. To-day we find that canal, which is, comparatively speaking, only a ditch, paralleled by half a dozen railways, with the great metropolis of New York as its terminus, which carried to it over 100,000,000 bushels of grain last year, carried 50 per cent of that freight. We find further that the people of the state of New York of their own free will last year voted $11,000,000 to be expended in enlarging and bettering that canal. So to-day it is an important question in the United States that with the growing trade of the western states, growing to such an extent that they believe the Erie Canal and the railway system will not be capable of transporting it to the seaboard, it is now proposed to extend the Illinois Canal from Chicago to reach the Mississippi River, and by erecting vast elevators at the mouth of that river make that canal a rival of the Erie Canal. So we find that in Canada propositions are made from time to time in regard to carrying grain by water. We find that years ago it was projected to construct what is now known as the Trent Valley Canal. We find, too, the people of this city and this neighbourhood projecting a canal by way of French River to the shores of Georgian Bay; and that in years gone by the Administration of that time saw the absolute necessity of connecting Lakes Erie and Ontario by means of what is now known as the Welland Canal. But the point I wish to impress on the House is this, that not only in the construction of canals for trade to connect large bodies of water as Lakes Huron and Superior, but wherever there are stretches of water that can be made available for the carriage of freight of various kinds, then and there an attempt is made to utilize those water-stretches. I have no fault to find with some of those progressive enterprises, but looking at the magnitude of the public debt, for it is a large debt, it is evident that a very economical course should be followed and every economy and care exercised in projecting these public works. I propose to refer to the project for enlarging the canals so as to make them available from fresh water to salt water. A few years ago the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison), whose absence in the House every hon. member sincerely regrets, particularly as the cause is serious illness, introduced a motion to the effect that the deepening of the St. Lawrence Canal was advisable, and that the Government should undertake the enlargement of the canal system through the St. Lawrence and by way of the Welland Canal as a means of connection with the upper lakes. In the discussion that ensued it was made quite plain that the expenditure necessary for the purpose would amount to $100,000,000, a sum which is utterly impossible for the Dominion to incur for such a purpose. Against the advocacy of deep waterways there are many reasons why it is an impossibility for this deepening and extension work ever being carried out. I contend that even if to-day the work were undertaken and completed and were to day in a finished state it would not be possible for large vessels, constructed as vessels are and equipped as they are for ocean freight vessels, to ply on our canals. When one considers the immense cost and capacity of those vessels it will be seen that they cannot be taken up the canals by way of the Sault and on to Port Arthur and Duluth and take in grain cargoes, because it is well known by experience that it does not pay to load ocean-going vessels with freights except they be of a mixed character. So the question of the construction of the canal to the depths suggested with a view to the traffic of ocean-going vessels is out of consideration. In regard to the other plan which has been supported by the people of Ottawa, namely, water communication by way of the Ottawa and French Rivers to Georgian Bay, that scheme would cost $16,000,000, according to the figures submitted by gentlemen composing the delegation which waited on the Government the other day. In that connection I have this further to say, that the line of this canal would be through a country which is not by any means an agricultural district, and the great distance involved in passing would be a grave difficulty to its efficient operation. As to the other proposition which I have broached, the construction of the Trent Valley Canal, that is a project which I believe demands the serious consideration not only of the counties which border upon that canal, not only of the western part of the province of Ontario, but of the whole Dominion. That waterway, or rather the utilization of the water-stretches of the Trent Valley Canal, has been before the people for the past seventy-five years. The Imperial Government, seeing the necessity of having a waterway from the upper to the lower lakes, took upon themselves this construction then, and to that end part of the work was undertaken. Year by year portions of it have been constructed, and to-day the result is that we have received, as a result of applications to the Government of the day, fairly large appropriations, and while those who are interested in and represent constituencies along the line of the canal are thankful to the Government for what has been done, still they contend that larger grants should be made in order to push forward the work. Let us look at the map of Ontario, and glance over stretches of water running from Georgian Bay to Lake Ontario, and what do we find? We find that commencing near Orillia a canal would have to be built from Lake Simcoe to Balsam Lake; from there by way of the lakes and utilizing the river navigation we could have water communication through to Lake Ontario. Now, making a comparison of distances. If you take a vessel leaving Port Arthur, passing down Lake Huron to the Welland Canal, and going thence to Kingston, in the course of that trip she has accomplished a distance of 782 miles; while, on the other hand, by way of the Trent Valley Canal we find that the vessel, when discharging her cargo at Kingston, would have only traversed a distance of 535 miles. We look hopefully forward to the settlement of the great North-west. We view with pride and admiration the strides she has taken. We know that in the past year 60,000,000 bushels of grain were raised in that country and that the major portion of it was exported. And yet we have seen, to the discredit of Canada, ay, Sir, even more than the discredit of Canada, that 75 per cent of that grain which should have been carried in Canadian boats and exported from Canadian ports, and which should be a trade all our own, passed out of the port of New York. Why is that so? It is simply because we have not the system of canal communication which we should have, and the construction of which is only a question of money. Transportation is, and has been, and always will be, the question, and that is the question which to-day stares the people of this Dominion in the face, if they hope ever to make a success of the great North-west. Now, Sir, let us take the computation that there was exported from the North-west Territories that large amount of grain last year, and no one can prophesy what will be exported in the next ten years. Are things to continue as they have been in the past? Are we to have the mortification of seeing American vessels carrying our grain from the port of Duluth and from Port Arthur to Buffalo, then to be transhipped in American barges and carried on to New York? Here is a proposition, which if carried out in its entirety would result in this: the carriage by Canadian vessels from Port Arthur and from Duluth to the port of Midland, and the placing of that grain in Canadian barges, thence passing through to Montreal. It may be contended, and it may be thought at first sight, that the port of Montreal would be at a disadvantage by reason of climate, compared with New York, but it must be remembered that all the grain moved from the North-west is dependent upon the opening of navigation upon the upper lakes, and so as soon as navigation closes upon the upper lakes, so soon is the port of New York closed to that trade as well as the port of Montreal. Now, Sir, what does it mean, apart and aside from its national importance, because I contend it is a matter of great national importance to know and to feel that the millions and millions of bushels of grain that are grown in the North-west which may be brought either to Port Arthur or may be brought by the American lines of railway that are now connected through to Manitoba and the North-west to the port of Duluth. The result, as I said, would be this: the carriage of grain from Duluth and Port Arthur to Midland and the carrying forward from there in grain-laden barges through to the port of Montreal. That means not only the employment of Canadian labourers upon these vessels, but it means also the investment of a large amount of money in Canadian shipping. But it is not only the national importance that the construction of the Trent Valley Canal appeals to us. It has a mission outside and beyond that, and that is that having a coast line of 1,500 miles along the numerous rivers and lakes which it travels, the result would be the opening up of that country and its progress and development. Every bushel of grain that is forwarded must have deducted from it a certain amount of cost for freight and every cent that is lessened on the carriage of the grain places so much money in the pocket of the farmer. Thirty million bushels a year would, I contend, be a low estimate for carriage through the canal, and the saving on that alone should the saving be only two cents a bushel, would mean the enormous amount of $600,000 saved in a single year. But it is not only in respect to the grain trade that the Trent Valley Canal appeals to the people from a Canadian standpoint. We must also remember that it would be a lively competitor to the Erie Canal itself. Bear this in mind, that for every three trips a vessel can make from Port Arthur or from Duluth to Midland, she can only make one trip to the port of Kingston. For every two trips that are made to Kingston three can be made to Buffalo, and the result is, that Canadian vessels, instead of being employed in the trade of transporting grain from Port Arthur and from Duluth, and there transshipping it into barges, content themselves with carrying it to Buffalo, and the Canadian grain thus carried is then hurried on by way of the Erie Canal. Look at the immense quantities of lumber that are exported from Canada. I think I am within a conservative estimate when I say that 100,000,000 feet of lumber per year are exported from the northern shores of the Georgian Bay, and from points along the routes of this canal. When I say that that enormous quantity of lumber can be carried at a much less expense by water-borne freight than otherwise, then it appeals to thinking men that the construction of the canal should at once be accomplished. Why, Sir, the completion of that canal means this: not only that we have a waterway to Montreal, but a glance at the map would show this freight could be carried from the port of Trenton on Lake Ontario, across to Ogdensburg, to Oswego, and to other points which have connection and communication with the Erie Canal, and thence to New York. But it is not only in respect to the out-borne freight that the canal could be used to a very great extent, because it would also be of great service and accommodation in the matter of import freight. Along the line of the canal there are many towns of great importance, such as Peterborough, which is quite a manufacturing centre; Orillia, Barrie, and others I could mention. These towns to-day are compelled to bring in by lines of railway every article they import. Every ton of soft coal, every ton of hard coal now brought into these towns is carried at very high rates by the railways. Sir, the construction of this canal would mean that barges after having delivered their cargoes of grain at Montreal could in turn be laden with Nova Scotia coal, and taken back to these different towns along the line of this canal. Again, in turns these barges passing through to the American side and discharging their cargoes of lumber or their cargoes of grain, could bring back hard coal, and necessarily the result of the double freight would be the lessening of rates each way.

Now, Sir, I am not going to find fault with the action of the Government in the past in reference to the canal, and particularly their action for the last year or so, because very fair appropriations have been made for the work; but I do say that this Government should stand committed to the construction of the Trent Valley Canal at the very earliest opportunity. I contend that, although other propositions are projected, these other schemes should not be undertaken until at least we have in view the almost completion of this national work.

There is another matter which I shall ask the indulgence of the House, while I deal with it for a little while. It is by no means a new question. I refer to an export duty being levied on pine saw-logs. I regret that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), whom I am pleased to see in the House to-day after his serious illness, is not at present in his seat. This question has long been before the people of Ontario, and before the people of the whole Dominion. During the whole course of the long discussion that has taken place on this question in the House, and outside the House too, there has not been a newspaper, nor has there been any hon. gentleman in Parliament who has risen to defend this iniquitous principle of permitting the exportation of saw-logs from this country to the United States; save except the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton).

And his reasons have been plainly manifest, and his reasons have been plainly advanced. I do not blame the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), as he had a perfect right to act as he has done in that regard. But I make this statement, which the facts have shown to be correct, that in every year during the last eight or nine years, there have been exported from the shores of the Georgian Bay to the United States, from 300,000,000 to 400,000,000 feet of saw-logs. I say this more, Sir, that there has been a direct and most violent attempt on the part of those exporting the saw-logs to suppress the truth of the returns. That has been amply shown during the past year, when two or three vessel-owners have been promptly fined by the Customs Department for making undervaluations of the quantity of logs they have exported. I ask, what does all this mean? The export from this country every year of 300,000,000 feet of saw-logs means that a large number of mills are working on the other side of the line, the owners of which, if deprived of those Canadian saw-logs, would be compelled to come to Canada and have the lumber manufactured here. I am going to read for the benefit of the House a short extract headed Bay City, to prove the truth of the statement I make of the quantity of logs exported. This statement is made by Mr. Thomas Pitts, the head of the firm of Pitts & Co., exporters of saw-logs:

Between 250,000,000 and 300,000,000 feet of logs are annually imported from Canada. An export duty would compel us to go to Canada to manufacture our lumber. Along this coast from Saginaw to Cheboygan it would turn 20,000 men out of employment that earn annually in the neighbourhood of $5,500,000.

That is a startling statement—that the Government of Canada, by their policy of permitting the export of logs from this country, are depriving 20,000 men of employment in Canada. By the National Policy, the Government have imposed high protective duties in order to foster certain industries in this country; and yet here it is pointed out by an American lumberman that the Government of Canada, by their suicidal policy—because it is a suicidal policy in this respect—are depriving this country of the employment, annually, of 20,000 men. The statement I have read amply proves that I have not over-stated the quantity of saw-logs exported; and if better proof were wanted, I could refer to the Customs returns, which show that from one port alone, some 150,000,000 feet were exported last year. Now, I have brought this matter before the House time and again. No hon. member has ever risen to defend the practice. The Government have promised consideration of the question time and again. I have presented indignant protests from the people of the Georgian Bay district. But the result has been the turning of a deaf ear to all our representations.

Mr. BENNETT.

I can tell the leader of the Opposition that he could carry every county on the Georgian Bay if he would announce that he was in favour of imposing an export duty on saw-logs. But I am sorry to say that among the hon. gentlemen behind him are to be found those who are the fiercest in denouncing an export duty. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has, throughout all these negotiations, acted in the most shameful manner, and I regret that he is not here to-night—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that word. The hon. member has acted in a manner that I would be ashamed of. He has acted in a manner that I think would not redound to the credit of any Canadian. I would not make any statements to-night relative to that hon. gentleman were it not that what I say I have stated in his presence on previous occasions. Two years ago, when the United States Government were offering to the people of Canada free lumber and the opportunity of having the most preferential privileges with respect to all articles in the wooden schedule, it was only by the action of the hon. member for North Norfolk, in connection with that very memorable letter which was written at the time, that those privileges were prevented. I admit, to-night, that the hon. member has never acknowledged in this House that he was the writer of that memorial. He has put upon myself the test of proving that he was the writer. At the time I expressed the opinion that the hon. gentleman was the writer. But I will do the hon. gentleman the credit to say that I heard him publicly announce in the recent campaign in North Ontario that he was not the writer of that memorial, but that it was an unwarranted use of his name, if his name was used in that connection. Well, Sir, I have only this to say, that, coming after two years, the denial seems rather late. But perhaps it is right and fair to accept his positive denial made on that occasion, and to express my regret that any injustice should have been done to him in attributing to him the authorship of that letter. If the hon. gentleman has only seen fit, at this late stage, two years after date, to announce that he was not the writer, I think he stood very much in his own light in failing to make the denial two years ago. Now, I have only this to say to the hon. Minister of Finance, that this matter of the suppression of the export duty should receive more serious consideration at the hands of the Administration than it has received in the past. I hold in my hand to-night a protest from the town of Penetanguishene, a town which is largely interested in the manufacture of lumber, also a memorial from the county council of the county of Simcoe, also a letter from a prominent saw-mill owner in the town of Penetanguishene, Mr. C. Beck, all praying that an export duty be levied on saw-logs. Now, it may be asked, in the face of the fact of this wholesale exportation of logs from the country, the fact that so many men have been driven out of the country, and the fact that so many men could be attracted to the country were the manufacture of saw-logs into lumber required to be carried on in Canada, why the Government do not interfere and abate this evil. Well, I have only to say this, that I believe the inaction of the Government in the matter is due to the influence exercised by the lumbermen of the Ottawa Valley. That must be the reason, because those gentlemen who are interested in the export of lumber to the United States are opposed to an export log duty being levied by reason of their fear that there would be a return to the payment of $1 per thousand, of duty on lumber exported from this country to the United States. In answer to that, I have this to say: At a time when the state of Michigan was cutting a great deal of lumber from American logs, at a time when no Canadian logs were being sawn there, at a time when they were not depending, to any great extent, on Canada for their lumber, there was a duty of $2 a thousand against Canadian lumber entering the United States; and we did not hear of the saw-mills of this country being closed then. On the contrary, the saw-mills of both the Ottawa Valley and the Georgian Bay were running; and to-day, with the Americans still more dependent on Canadian logs for the manufacture of lumber—in Michigan almost wholly so—how could it be detrimental to Canadian lumbermen if even $2 a thousand were imposed upon it? I am not going into the abstract question of those who does or who does not pay the duty. That is a very large question. But I have this to say, and it appeals to every man's common sense, that when a purchaser must have an article, it is the purchaser that pays the duty, and not the seller. Now, I trust that the hon. Minister of Finance will bring this matter before his colleagues, and that in the coming summer we shall not have the mortification of seeing millions of saw-logs carried away from this country; that the men who have been driven out of this country will be given the opportunity of returning and earning thousands of dollars in this industry, under the stimulus of a patriotic policy.

As I stated at the outset of my remarks, I do not propose to discuss the trade question as a whole. I have spoken of the two questions which particularly concern the constituency I have the honour to represent, and to these two questions I trust the Government will give their most serious consideration. On the trade policy, as a whole, I have only this to say, that, judging by the experience of the past, I believe the people are favourable to the National Policy; I believe that they will, as they have already done on several occasions, evince their firm and abiding faith in a policy calculated to build up our manufacturing industries, and will not show themselves recreant to that policy, when the appeal is made to them to pronounce upon the issues of the day. No doubt, in the campaign which must take place now in a very few months, a most unfortunate cloud has loomed up on our political horizon, which hon. gentlemen opposite hail with the greatest acclaim and delight. Having been foiled in the fight on the fiscal policy so often, having been foiled in 1887, when they made an appeal to race and religion on the Riel question, they are, to-day, trying the same tactics, and making a similar appeal; but I believe they will be foiled again, when the time comes for the electorate to pronounce their verdict. I believe that, when the smoke from the Manitoba school question shall have rolled away, the people will be prepared to pass judgment on the great question of the day, namely, what fiscal policy shall predominate in this country for the next five years to come; and I am confident that they will again give a verdict favourable to the men who have administered the affairs of the country during the past fifteen or eighteen years, honestly and faithfully and to the best of their ability, in the interests of the whole people. I am confident that, despite the protestations of hon. gentlemen opposite, despite their charges of dishonesty against the Conservative party, the people of this country will be kind to the faults of the Conservative party, such as they have been, and, endorsing the fiscal policy of the Government, will return the present Administration for a further term of office.

Mr. MARTIN. I shall not endeavour to make any particular answer to the address of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, so far as he dealt with the two particular questions in which his constituency is interested. But I might just say this about the Trent Valley Canal, that I remember very well hearing a deputation address the Government from some of the counties lying along the route of that canal, a year or two ago, and urging that the canal should be built; and I remember very well hearing the then Premier of the Dominion, Sir John Thompson, telling the gentlemen who were asking for an expenditure of public money upon this canal, that it would depend very much on the kind of support which the Government got from the territory through which this canal would go. There had been some allusions in the interview to moral support; but Sir John Thompson said that that was not very satisfactory, the Government required something more tangible than merely moral support; so that, probably, the Government will not be able to decide on any very vigorous policy as to the completion of the Trent Valley Canal, as a part of our inland water communication, until this question of what kind of political support the territory is prepared to give the Government, has been decided.

As to the question of the export duty on logs, the hon. gentleman has certainly made a very strong statement against the Government. He has made the statement that no one in this House supports the refusal to place an export duty on logs; but, in spite of that, in spite of the fact that he and others representing the Georgian Bay district and supporting the Government in the House, had shown most conclusively, session after session, that the imposition of an export duty upon logs would be a great advantage to Canada, and would be no disadvantage to any part of it, the Government have refrained from adopting that policy. Well, I certainly do not feel inclined to defend the Government in that matter. The hon. gentleman has made his case against the Government; and I certainly agree with him that it is very strange indeed that, while there is an hon. member on this side who is prepared to give, and does give, reasons which to him appear satisfactory, and which, I must say, to me appear quite reasonable for that policy, the Government themselves have never come out and given their real reasons for adhering to a policy which the hon. gentleman has so effectively condemned time and time again. So much for what the hon. gentleman has said.

As he said, he did not make any lengthy reference to the questions which are really being considered in this Budget. I intend, briefly as possible, to allude this session, as I did last session, to the speech to which the hon. Finance Minister, in pursuance of regular custom, treated this House, with regard to the financial policy of the Government and the financial condition of the country. And, Mr. Speaker, I have again, this session, as I had last session, to complain of the Finance Minister, that, on examination, a great many of the statements given by him to this House as accurate, turn out, upon examination, to be very incorrect indeed.

In the first place, I shall allude to the statements made by the hon. gentleman with regard to the question of excise. It is rather difficult to understand the statement as made by the hon. Finance Minister. He appears to be endeavouring to obtain some glory for the Government in connection with the increase in the amount of money that has been obtained by the Government in excise duties. And he endeavours to contrast the policy of the Government in this matter with that of the Opposition, without in any way pointing out where the policies differed, but simply taking for granted that whatever the Government's policy may have been, the policy of the Opposition was the reverse.

Taken in connection with that, and illustrating to a certain extent the difference that exists between the two Administrations in the collection of revenues as regards the incidence of taxation, this may be noted—that the excise revenue is now nearly twice what it was in 1879-80.

It is very difficult, indeed, for me to understand how the Liberal party can possibly be held responsible for what occurred in the year 1879-80. When we look at the facts, we find reason for the hon. Minister of Finance selecting the year 1880 to compare with the year 1895, rather than selecting the year 1878, which was the last year during which the Liberals were in power. The year 1880 was nearly two years after the time when the hon. Minister's predecessors left office. The reason he selects it evidently is that the excise of 1880 was only $4,253,424, while the excise for 1878, the last year of Liberal administration was $4,867,401, an excess over the other of $613,977. Well, Mr. Speaker, surely, if the hon. gentleman desires to contrast the two administrations with respect to this matter, it would be much more reasonable and much fairer that he should take the year 1878, for which the Liberals are responsible, than the year 1880, as to which the Liberals have no responsibility whatever. So we find that in this case his calculations fall short a matter of over $600,000. Then he goes on to say:

As this excise taxation is, to a large extent, what may be called voluntary taxation, its higher rates and the larger amount accruing from it, are to be considered, together with the fact that the rate of customs taxation has been, at the same time, reduced, as I have stated, attaining the low figure which it did in 1894-95.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is a bold contention of the hon. Finance Minister, in contrasting the policy of the two Administrations, that the Customs taxation had been falling in Conservative times, as compared with the times of the Liberal Administration. No other meaning can be taken out of what the hon. gentleman has said, for he goes on to say that these two facts taken into consideration together show the difference in taxation of the two Administrations. Now, what low figure did the customs taxation reach in 1894-95, as compared with that of the Liberal Administration in its last year, 1878? Taken on the basis of free and dutiable goods, the rate in 1878 was 14·03 per cent; in 1895, it was 16·99 per cent, an increase of nearly 3 per cent. On the basis of dutiable goods, it is still worse. In 1878 the rate was 21·39 per cent; and in 1895, instead of falling, as the hon. gentleman claimed, in this paragraph, it had risen to 30·54 per cent. Now, of course, the hon. gentleman knew that perfectly well; he is, in fact, much better aware of what the real figures are with regard to these matters than I am. What I object to is the attempt that is made in statements such as this to prejudice the case, and lead the people of the country, who have not the opportunity to investigate these facts and learn the truth of the matter, to believe that there had been an increase in the excise duties during the period of Conservative administration, and, at the same time, a large decrease in customs duties. The Finance Minister's speech is the campaign document of the Conservative party; it is printed at the expense of the country, and sent out in large numbers as an authoritative statement of the real state of the country's finances. But we find, all through, attempts such as this, to several of which I shall have to refer, at what seem to me deliberate misstatement of the facts. What must we say, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. gentleman says, as I have already quoted:

As this excise taxation is, to a large extent, what may be called voluntary taxation—

What he means by that it is quite beyond me to understand.

This higher rate and the larger amount accruing from it, are to be considered, together with the fact that the rate of customs taxation has been, at the same time, reduced, as I have stated, attaining the low figure which it did in 1894-95.

Now, the hon. gentleman was not comparing the state of affairs in 1890 or 1891 with the state of affairs in 1894-95, as to which, possibly, he might have shown some slight fractional decrease of customs duties; but he was comparing the finances of the Liberal Administration with the finances of the Conservative Administration, and he makes the plain statement that while the excise duties have been increasing, the customs duties have been decreasing. Further on in his speech the hon. gentleman refers to the fact that since 1888 the expenditure of the country had remained practically stationary. He seems to have come to the conclusion that an expenditure of thirty-seven millions of dollars on account of consolidated fund is a normal expenditure for this country, and he congratulates himself, the Government, and the country, that since 1888 the expenditure had remained practically the same. But we have the fact, as shown by the public records, that for the year which we are now considering, 1894-95, the expenditure rose to $38,132,000, or $1,132,000 more than what the hon. gentleman himself says is our normal expenditure. This is a rather striking commentary upon the very large promises that the hon. gentleman made us in his Budget speeches of 1894 and 1895, when he declared that was the intention of the Government to meet the difficulties with which they were confronted, through the falling off of importation and of revenue from customs, by living within our means. The hon. gentleman proposed to avoid these ill-visaged deficits, as to which he had so much to say when he was able to speak of the deficits of his opponents, by keeping the public expenditures within the public revenue. The answer of the colleagues of the hon. gentleman to these promises, made in 1894 and in 1895, is the fact that the expenditure for 1895 was $38,132,000, or $1,132,000 more than the hon. gentleman lays down as a fair average expenditure, and the one which he says was the average from 1889 to 1895. It seems very hard to understand, if the hon. gentleman's principle is a correct one, that the expenditure should remain moderately stationary, as he claims it has done, from 1888 to 1895, how is it that the expenditure in the last year of the Mackenzie Administration was only $23,500,000, and has now risen to over $38,000,000? The fact is, that in 1886 the expenditure jumped up suddenly on account of the rebellion in the North-west Territories, and this was an expenditure for which the hon. gentleman's party was entirely responsible. But, apart from that view of it, taking it as an exceptional matter, taking it as a matter that is not likely to happen very often, we could fairly deduct the increase over the natural expenditure for these two years, 1885-86, caused by the North-west rebellion, in order to get at what was the real expenditure of the Government for those years. But we find that, while the expenditure in 1886 was largely increased by the payments of debts incurred on account of the rebellion, the Government seemed to have tasted blood in the expenditure of that money, and they have never yet been able to reduce it from the point which it reached then, because, while it jumped up then, it never went back, for the hon. gentleman takes the expenditure of 1888, two years later, and a larger sum than it was in 1886—he takes that as the normal expenditure of the Government. The hon. gentleman's friends having had the pleasure of spending so much money, were never able apparently, to get back to the figure they had indulged in prior to that date. So we find that, from 1878 to 1888, the date the hon. gentleman selects as the one since which he has been able to keep the expenditure stationary, the gross expenditure had risen from $23,508,158 in 1878, to $36,718,494 in 1888, a period of ten years, making a total increase during those ten years of $13,215,336, or an annual increase every year of $1,321,533, or, as the House will notice, just about the sum by which the hon. gentleman himself, during the year just closed, exceeded his ideal expenditure of $37,000,000. In other words, in spite of the promises on the part of the Minister of Finance, in spite of the good resolutions on the part of that hon. gentleman, the Government of which he is a member finds it impossible to meet the ideas of their friends, finds it impossible to administer the affairs of the country, without steadily going from bad to worse, and continually spending more and more money, increasing the annual expenditure, as I have shown, in the ten years prior to the date he has alluded to, by $1,300,000 every year. He still goes on, even at the present time, in face of the present difficulties, and in the midst of hard times, after his strong promises to this House made in his recent Budget speeches—he still goes on in 1895, and makes an expenditure of just about that sum, $1,300,000 more than he did in 1894. Now, I have to allude to another inaccurate statement of the hon. gentleman. He is always talking about his reduction of the sugar duties, and the large sum of money he has saved to the people of this country by taking the duty off sugar. In that speech he tells us that the sugar duties for 1895 would have been $5,475,000. I have endeavoured, Mr. Speaker, to check the hon. gentleman's figures on that point, but I find it quite impossible to tell what the sugar duties would have been, taking the importation given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, because the sugar duties, as they were when the hon. gentleman abolished them, were upon a sliding scale, according to the polariscope test, and, unless we have the imports shown according to that sliding scale, how is it possible for the hon. gentleman to tell what those sugar duties would have amounted to in 1895? I find, in looking back over the years prior to the time the duties were taken off sugar, that the importations and the different kinds of sugar were not at all uniform—they varied a good deal from year to year. The only way I can see to arrive at a fair estimate of what the sugar duties would have been, would be to take the total amount of sugar imported, say, in 1891, the last year of the sugar duties, and take the revenue that that number of pounds produced, and, if you calculate the sugar duties in that way, instead of producing the sum of $5,475,000, as the hon. gentleman claims they would have done in 1895, the amount of sugar duties in that year would have been $4,977,750, or, an error in the hon. gentleman's calculation of $497,245. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to notice this strange thing indeed. Of course, it is quite possible that an hon. gentleman, even of the great ability of the Finance Minister, in making these calculations, should occasionally make an error; but it is a strange thing to notice that, in every case, the error, when discovered, is always in the hon. gentleman's own favour. He never, by any chance, makes an error in giving too small a sum where a large sum is to his advantage, or giving too large a sum where a small sum is to his advantage. In this matter he makes an error in his own favour of just about $500,000. The next matter to which I wish to refer in the hon. gentleman's speech is his reference to the post office. There has been an agitation in Canada, more or less influential, in favour of the reduction of the postal letter rate to 2 cents, in conformity with the rate adopted by the United States. The hon. gentleman, however, tells the House that the day when any reduction can be considered in this department of the Government is a long way off, and he starts out with the information that the deficit in the Post Office Department last year was $800,000. I find that statement to be quite incorrect, because the deficit of the Post Office Department in 1895, instead of being $800,000, as the hon. gentleman stated, was really $1,060,389. In arriving at this deficit the hon. gentleman has taken the revenue of the department and deducted that from the expenditure, as shown in the Public Accounts under the head of post office. But the hon. gentleman has taken no account of the very considerable item of $259,542, which he would have found referred to in the Auditor General's Report as that portion of civil government which is chargeable to the Post Office Department, that is to say, the salaries of the Postmaster General, of the Deputy Postmaster General, and the long list of clerks and employees which the department in Ottawa pays under the head of civil government instead of post office, but which is entirely an expenditure in connection with the Post Office Department, and which would not be incurred if the Government did not carry the mails. So that surely if we are going to determine what the loss to Canada is in connection with the Post Office Department, we must take the actual expenses for all purposes in connection with it, and deduct the actual revenue received from it. If we do that, we find that the total expenditure charged in the Public Accounts to Post Office is $3,593,649, the net revenue is $2,072,789, leaving the deficit to which the hon. gentleman referred, namely, $800,857; but adding to that the portion of expense of civil government which is entirely chargeable to post office, namely, $259,543, we get really an actual deficit of $1,060,389. I think it is a matter of fair complaint in behalf of this House that the Finance Minister on a simple point of public accounts like this should have made a very inaccurate statement, that the deficit in this department was only $800,000, whereas, in fact, it is over $1,000,000. Then the hon. gentleman tells the House that the postal rates cannot be reduced because of the great expenditure necessarily involved in carrying letters and papers in the North-west and other parts of Canada. The inference to be drawn from that is that in my part of the country, that is to say in the North-west, the expense of carrying on the Post Office Department's work is so great on account of the scattered population that there is where the whole difficulty comes in. But that is not where the deficit comes in. It is caused by the reckless extravagance with which that department is managed, the large number of persons employed, persons not needed by the department; and in support of that statement allow me to call the attention of the House to the accounts of the Manitoba division. That division comprises Manitoba and the Territories, the country to which I understand the hon. gentleman referred. The expenditure of that division is as follows:—For ordinary mail conveyance, $81,245; salaries, $51,719; railway service,

Canadian Pacific Railway, exclusive of the main line, $29,964; main line, Canadian Pacific Railway, about 1,100 miles at $105 per mile, $115,500; Alberta Railway, $276; Manitoba and North-western, $4,516; Northern Pacific Railway, $5,815; post office inspector, contingencies, $1,466; Winnipeg post office, contingencies, $1,893; Winnipeg salaries, $39,324. The total expenditure of the Manitoba division was $331,718. Deduct from that the net revenue, after deducting allowance for salaries, $50,000 odd, which amounts to $145,911, there is a deficit for Manitoba and the Territories of only $185,807, out of a total deficit of over $1,000,000. So the attempt made by the hon. Minister to fasten the responsibility for the deficit on the expense incurred in the North-west is not successful. In addition to what I have said about the great extravagance and recklessness of the Government in the management of this business, I may draw attention to a few matters which have undoubtedly added to the deficit of the department. In British Columbia and in the North-west Territories the hon. Minister is paying for carrying the mails fully double the amount that need be paid, if the Government were to take the ordinary precautions that business men would take under similar circumstances. Let me refer hon. gentlemen opposite to the cost of carrying the mails from Battleford to Saskatoon. This service is done by the firm of Leeson & Scott, under a contract entered with that firm without any tender whatever, at the price of $7,049. This contract has been held by the firm for ten or twelve years, and no attempt has been made to get the work done at a less rate, although at one time a gentleman, understanding that tenders were desired, undertook to do the work for $3,120. That is one of the largest sums, but I may say that almost all the contracts in connection with the post offices in Manitoba and the North-west are not let by tender, but are given for periods of four years to favour the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, and parties who charge $7,000 instead of $3,000 for work done. I find that the same thing occurs in the province of British Columbia. In that province a large sum is paid for the carrying of the mails from Ashcroft station to the Cariboo mining district. For many years the British Columbia Express Company have been receiving from that contract $24,000 a year, and I am told, that this sum paid for one year's work would buy out the whole British Columbia Express Company; and would equal the value of all their capital and all their stock. I am told also, that if tenders were ever asked for, and if the Government gave other people an opportunity to compete for this contract, other institutions would be very glad indeed to do it for one-half the price which this favoured company receives. The trouble does not arise from the question of the rate of postage, but it arises from the manner in which the affairs of the department are administered, as is the case with all the other departments which are under the control of this Government.

I have to complain of the hon. the Finance Minister departing from what appeared to me to be the plain facts of the case. He made very elaborate comparisons as between his Government, and the Government led by Mr. Mackenzie from 1874 to 1878. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) stated what is perfectly true: that during the years of the Mackenzie Government in office, there was a very serious period of depression in the country, and he claims that during the years from 1890 to 1895, the same depression was experienced in Canada. I dispute that entirely. I say that until the year 1893 there was no serious depression in the world's business; at all events, not upon this continent. The year 1892 was a particularly prosperous year, as is shown by the reports of commercial agencies, and by all the evidences we can have at hand. Late in the year 1893 the crisis came, and as has been pointed out by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) and by his friends in the House, it was some time afterwards, as is usually the case, before the effects of the depression were felt in Canada. The year 1891, so far as business generally was concerned, was a prosperous year, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) takes 1891, 1892 and 1893, and he claims that they were years during which Canada was suffering from a depression, not arising from anything connected with the fiscal policy of the Government, but arising from matters extraneous to Canada and her fiscal policy. In support of the statement which I make that these years were not years of depression similar to the years of the Mackenzie Administration, I shall quote from the expressions which hon. gentlemen opposite themselves, put in the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General in each of these years. In the year 1890, the House met on the 16th of January, and His Excellency said:

I may fairly congratulate you on the continuance of the progress and prosperity of the country.

In 1891, the House met on the 29th of April, and His Excellency said:

The season in which you are assembled has opened auspiciously for the industries of our people.

In the year 1892, the House met on the 25th of February, and His Excellency said:

It affords me much gratification to meet you at the commencement of the parliamentary session, and to be able to congratulate you upon the general prosperity of the Dominion, and upon the abundant harvest with which Providence has blessed all parts of the country.

In 1893 Parliament met on the 26th January, and His Excellency spoke as follows:—

In meeting you at the commencement of another session of Parliament it affords me pleasure to congratulate you on the continued progress which the history of the past year unfolds with regard to Canada. The increase in trade, as illustrated by the exports and imports during the period for which the official returns have been prepared, has been most gratifying, and that increase has continued down to the present time with promise that the volume of trade during the current year will exceed that of any year in the history of the Dominion.

That was on the 26th January, 1893, and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), soberly and seriously in his Budget speech which goes forth through the country as a campaign document on behalf of his party, claims that the year 1892, as to which these remarks were made, was a year in which Canada was suffering from the same kind of world-wide depression which it suffered from in the years 1875 and 1876, during the Mackenzie Administration. Then when we get down to 1894, we see nothing in the Governor General's speech as to the effect upon Canada of the crisis which had occurred in the fall of 1893. The House met on the 15th of March, 1894, and His Excellency said :

My predecessor was able to express gratification to you last year on the increase in trade and on the continued progress of the Dominion. It is gratifying to me to observe that the expectation which was then formed—that the volume of trade during the then current year would exceed that of any year in the history of the Dominion—has been fully realized, and that Canada's progress continues with every mark of stability and firmness.

The crisis had taken place in the fall of 1893, and we see from the Governor General's speech of 1894 that at that time there was apparently no sign in Canada of any effect of the hard times. But, when we come to the year 1895, last session, we hear from His Excellency as follows on the 14th of April :

The depression in trade which has prevailed throughout the world—

Not a word of it before, so far as Canada is concerned, in any of the previous Speeches of His Excellency. But in 1895, in reference to the year 1894, when, for the first time, some effect was felt in Canada from the depression that occurred in the United States, we find His Excellency saying :

The depression in trade which has prevailed throughout the world for the past few years has made itself felt in Canada, but fortunately to a less degree than in most other countries.

In further proof of what I say, the hon. Finance Minister himself quotes from a speech made by the retiring president of the Toronto Board of Trade, Mr. Stapleton Caldecott, in which that gentleman said :

The year 1895 has been for the most part a year of quiet recovery from the depression of 1893-94.

Mr. MARTIN.

Not of 1890, 1891 or 1892, all of which years the hon. Finance Minister included in the series of calculations with which he regaled this House in his somewhat lengthy Budget speech, but the depression of 1893-94.

The restoration of trade has not been quick, but has gradually been getting better.

And so on. It may be said that during those years—and the same might apply to the years prior to 1890—the Liberals had been claiming that trade in Canada was not as good as it ought to be. That is quite true. Ever since the National Policy was introduced, the Liberals have pointed out continually that the effect of that policy has not been what was claimed for it by its advocates. But that is a very different proposition from the other proposition, that trade in Canada was depressed, not on account of the National Policy, but on account of a world-wide depression, more particularly the depression in the United States. The hon. Finance Minister undertakes to show that in 1891, 1892 and 1893, we were suffering in Canada from a depression over which we had no control ourselves; and his reference to the fact that during those years the Liberals were pointing out in this House and out of it that the National Policy had not had the effect in Canada of improving times, as it had been promised to do, but rather that it had the effect of making times worse than they otherwise would be, is no proof whatever of the hon. gentleman's assertion that in those years the depression we were suffering from in Canada had come upon us from the outside, as was admittedly the case during the whole time of the Mackenzie Administration. So that, if I am correct in that, the hon. gentleman's whole long list of comparisons, filling page after page of "Hansard," in his endeavour to show how much better the Conservative Administration had withstood a period of hard times in Canada as compared with the Liberal Administration, falls entirely to the ground. On the other hand, if we take the facts as they really are, and take those years when depression from the outside had its effect on Canada, the years 1894 and 1895, we shall be quite willing to compare the effect upon Canada of the hard times in those years with the effect of the hard times in the period from 1874 to 1878; and we can also challenge comparison of the manner in which the Government of that day met the serious hard times which they had to deal with and the manner in which hon. gentlemen opposite met the crisis they had to deal with. Let us look at the trade returns. In the period of the Mackenzie Administration, the total trade of the country fell off from 1874 to 1875, $16,500,000; from 1875 to 1876 it went on getting worse, falling off $27,000,000; from 1876 to 1877 it recovered $1,000,000; and from 1877 to 1878 it fell off $3,000,000. As showing that the period of hard times was still affecting Canada, even under hon. gentlemen opposite, in the following year, from 1878 to 1879, it fell off worse than ever—$19,000,000. These figures show—and I fancy the statement is not disputed by the hon. gentleman, because he starts with it—that during the whole of that time, from 1874 to 1878, there were outside influences affecting our trade. The state of commercial matters in the United States was influencing the state of trade in Canada. But when we come to look at the years to which the figures in the hon. gentleman's comparison refer, we find that from 1890 to 1891 the total trade was about the same. But there had been an increase in trade from 1889 to 1890, of $14,000,000. That increase remained from 1890 to 1891, about the same. From 1891 to 1892 there was an increase of $23,000,000. Does it look as if we were suffering from a world-wide depression—from trouble in the United States—taking these two facts—that the United States had a prosperous year, and that Canada had an increased trade of $23,000,000. From 1892 to 1893 there was a total increase of trade of $6,000,000. But from 1893 to 1894 when the hard times did affect Canada, we found a falling off of $6,500,000 in the total trade, and from 1894 to 1895 we had a falling off of $16,500,000. These were the two years when the depression in the United States did affect Canada, and the two years which it is fair to take in making a comparison with the five years during which the Mackenzie Administration were in power. Now, let us see how matters were under the two parties, and how the two parties dealt with an occasion of that kind. Mr. Mackenzie's Government had deficits during their whole period amounting to $4,488,000, and a surplus in one year amounting to $935,000; so that in the five years they had a net deficit of $3,553,314, or an average of $700,000 per annum. Now look at the two years, when the same influences came to bear upon Canada, under the auspices of the Conservative party and the National Policy. In 1894 the deficit was $1,210,332; in 1895 it was $4,153,875; or in the two years the deficit amounted to $5,364,207, making an annual deficit of $2,700,000 during the two years of hard times under Conservative Administration, as compared with an annual deficit of $700,000 in the five years of hard times of the Mackenzie Administration—$700,000 as compared with $2,700,000, or only about one-quarter as large. That is a comparison I can fairly make, and one which shows in favour of the Liberal party, so far as it shows anything. I refer to it because the hon. Finance Minister has, year after year, made it a point that the amount of the deficit of a government was a fair test of its financial ability. I deny that, I take no stock in it, I say that there may be circumstances under which a deficit is more to the honour of a government than a surplus. It certainly was wise on the part of the Mackenzie Government, met as they were by this period of hard times, instead of increasing the taxation largely, as they might have done and thus obtaining a surplus, despite the falling off in customs importations—it was a wise thing for them to submit to deficits rather than unduly increase the taxation of the people. Making a comparison on the basis on which the hon. gentleman himself has insisted so often, we find that during the Mackenzie period the average deficit was only $700,000 per year, while during the two years of similar hard times under hon. gentlemen opposite, their deficit was nearly four times that amount.

Take it the other way, and a much fairer way, take it on the ground of expenditure. What did Mr. Mackenzie and his Government do, in so far as expenditure was concerned, when they found that they had to face difficulties over which they had no control, difficulties brought upon them by the world-wide depression and the commercial crisis in the republic to the south? They held a firm hand on the expenditure and only increased it during the five years they were in power by $200,000. This Government, on the contrary, when they met hard times, instead of reducing their expenditure, as they had a very good opportunity to do, increased it from $23,000,000 to nearly $37,000,000. They actually increased it in 1893-94 $770,973, or four times as much in one year as Mr. Mackenzie did in five years; and going on from 1894 to 1895, they increased it by $546,980; or in the two years $1,300,000, or over seven times as much in the two years of hard times as Mr. Mackenzie did during his whole five years hard times. Now, the hon. gentleman does not like a deficit. He holds that it is a sign of very inferior financing, a sign of great financial weakness in the party. Unfortunately he had a deficit in 1894, a very respectable one. He had a deficit in 1895, the largest but one in the history of Canada, and everything points to his having a very respectable—even more than a respectable deficit in 1895-96. Then how does the hon. gentleman get rid of it? By a calculation the hon. gentleman does away with the deficit which he is going to have this year of about $3,500,000. He does away with it, because he says that from the 20th of January to the 30th of June, there is going to be a sufficient increase in customs importations to do away with this $3,500,000 deficit, which he will certainly have if his imports do not increase; and I cannot help admiring the extreme exactitude with which the hon. gentleman is able to calculate the exact sum which he is going to derive from the customs importations. Although that must necessarily be a pure matter of guess, the hon. gentleman tells us that he expects to get from the 20th January to 30th of June a customs revenue of $17,439,826. It really is most amazing that the Finance Minister should be able to figure down these receipts to the very dollar; it is a wonder he did not furnish us with the number of cents as well.

If he took the importations at the same ratio as from the 1st July, 1895, to 20th of January, 1896, we might allow him to make a calculation of that kind, but he does not do that. He makes the importation a largely increased one from 20th January to the 30th June, and he is then able to calculate exactly to the dollar how much customs he is going to have from this increased importation. Then the hon. gentleman dealt with the question of Estimates, and he told us that there are increases this year in the Estimates, but that those increases are in the case of the items which last year were decreased. Now, we had very great doubt on this side of the House last year, when the hon. gentleman brought in his Estimates, showing considerable decreases in certain departments of the Government. We suspected then that these decreases were made with the view of having the elections which, it was then expected, would take place before another session was called, and we find that our anticipations in that matter were quite correct. Because, when we look at the Estimates of this year, we find that these decreases have disappeared, and that, in every case, except possibly in the case of immigration, they have been made up. And I fancy, when we get the Supplementary Estimates for 1895-96, we shall find that the decreases proposed for 1895 and indicated in the Estimates for that year, have wholly disappeared. When the Supplemental Estimates of this year come down—and the hon. gentleman has promised to bring them down shortly—I think it will be seen that the Government, having decided that it was not in their interest to bring the elections on at the time when they first intended, have lapsed into their old system of extravagant expenditure. I fancy we shall find that the departments have gone on and spent the money, and that the Government will come here with Supplemental Estimates, and ask to have that money appropriated, after it has been spent. I think, Mr. Speaker, that discussions in this House, session after session, as to how much money Parliament will vote for the Government for each department are, to a large extent, a farce. It seems to me the Government pay no attention to the appropriations. They come down and ask for a certain department so much. A discussion takes place as to the reasonableness of the amount, and the appropriation is made. But the Government pay no attention to the appropriation, but go on and spend what they see fit, and, after the money is gone, they come here before the financial year has elapsed and ask for authority to spend it. So that, under the practice we have in financial matters in this Parliament, the old idea that the representatives of the people hold the purse-strings and control the expenditure of the country, is entirely departed from, and Parliament only sets its seal upon expenditures incurred by the Government without any authority from the House, and, in fact, in defiance of the authority given by the House.

One of the increases to which the hon. gentleman referred in his remarks, is the increase in the Post Office Department of $240,780. I think that other members of the House, perhaps, on both sides, will agree with me in saying that there was comparatively little new information in the Budget speech of the hon. Finance Minister this year. But, it seems to me, that, if the hon. gentleman had desired to give interest to his speech, he had an opportunity to do so in discussing this item, by giving to the House and the country information as to how much the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's grant for mail service has been increased since last session, and under what circumstances that increase took place. We should like particularly to know, whether it is true, as stated in the newspapers, that no sooner had Parliament been prorogued last year than the Government, without any authority from this House, proceeded to increase largely the grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for mail service. The hon. gentleman vouchsafed us no information whatever upon this subject. He was quite well aware that the Liberal press generally has commented vigorously upon the action of the Government in this matter. He must have been well aware also that the hon. Postmaster General had made several statements to the press on the subject not consistent one with the other. But, while he tells us that the item for the Post Office Department has been increased by $240,780, he gives us no information upon this matter to which I have referred, which would have been of the greatest interest to the House and to the country. However, when we get into the Estimates, we shall, perhaps, be able to find out something from the Government as to what was done in the particular matter.

The hon. gentleman has told us that, in conformity with long-established practice, there would be, this year, some supplemental Estimates. I remember very well that last year the hon. gentleman undertook to reform this old practice. In his Budget speech, he made the announcement—an announcement, I may say, which was very well received by the House and, I think, by the country—that there would be no supplemental Estimates that year, that there, in the Estimates which the House had to consider, were to be found all the Government's demands for the year. The hon. gentleman, it is true, was not able to adhere strictly to his promise in this case. But I think that the House and the country would be inclined to forgive him for that, for it was certainly a radical departure, it was certainly a departure in the right direction; and, if the hon. gentleman was not able entirely to control his colleagues and subordinates, at least he had declared himself on the right side. But we find that in this matter, as in others, the hon.

gentleman's attempt to reform his own party has had to be abandoned. And this year, in an off-hand manner, he tells us that, in conformity with the old practice, we are to have supplemental Estimates. I can hardly congratulate the hon. gentleman upon his attitude, and I would have been much better pleased, and, no doubt, the country would have been much better pleased, if he had made a second attempt, which might, perhaps, have been a successful one, to carry out the policy which he announced last session, of having no supplemental Estimates. When we consider that the Estimates that we discuss in this House, especially in a session like this, when we meet at a reasonable and proper time of the year, are for a period commencing six months ahead and ending eighteen months ahead, and the Government have all the recess to prepare, they ought to be able to come into the House and say: Here are our Estimates of what will be necessary for the public requirements of this period. And the hon. gentleman's experience in the office of Finance Minister seems to have convinced him that that is a proper policy and a proper way to treat this House. But the hon. gentleman has not been strong enough to control the policy of his party in this matter, and we find that this year he abandons his position. I fear that we shall find this session, as we have found in other sessions, that the principal Estimates, the Estimates which require the most consideration, the Estimates which require the most careful watching on the part of the House, will be those Estimates which will come down as Supplementary Estimates, and which are nearly always brought into the House at such a late period that they do not and cannot receive the careful consideration of members of this House. Why, we found in 1894 that railway subsidies, amounting to four or five million dollars, which should have been in the original Estimates, according to the hon. gentleman's own ideas—an idea which, I am happy to compliment him upon, and to support—were brought down after many, probably a majority, of the members had left, wearied with the length of the session, and had gone to their homes. Parliament was compelled to hand over to the Government that large sum of four or five million dollars for the purpose of subsidizing railways, without giving them any practical consideration, without getting any further explanation from the Government as to what these expenditures were for, why they were granted. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this state of affairs is bad, that the Government, in this respect, is not treating either Parliament or the country fairly. I regret very much, indeed, that the hon. gentleman's very fair attempt, and, considering all the circumstances, fairly successful attempt, of last session, to make a reform in this matter, and to treat the House better, and to conduct the Estimates upon a more business-like principle, has not been endorsed by his party. I am afraid, Sir, that the lapse from virtue in this respect is not altogether unconnected with the fact of the arrival in Canada of the Secretary of State, with the presumed intention of revivifying the great Conservative party. I am afraid that his ideas as to finance are radically different from those of the hon. gentleman who holds the office of Minister of Finance at this time. I am afraid that the hon. gentleman who holds that office has not been successful in convincing his party of his own ideas in this respect, and that this falling back into the old system of supplemental Estimates, is to be attributed to the greater strength in the party of the hon. gentleman, whose advent has been heralded with so much gusto by hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, in 1894, the Minister of Finance made another announcement to the House in connection with the finances of the country. He seemed to regret that during his administration, and the administration of his Conservative predecessors, the debt of Canada had been very largely increased, and he endeavoured to palliate that increase by referring to the large number of valuable public works which had been added to the assets of Canada; and upon the whole it seemed to be abhorrent to his ideas that this debt had been allowed to go on piling up, year after year, and he announced that it was the intention of the Government to call a halt. He told us that the great public works of the country were practically completed, the Sault Ste. Marie Canal was about done, the other canals had been practically completed, the expenditure in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway was over, the Intercolonial Railway capital expenditure was at an end; and he congratulated himself and his party, and the country upon the fact that we could now rest upon our oars, and stop this continual addition to our debt. Well, I have no doubt that was the idea of the hon. gentleman, I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman himself, with some ideas upon finance, with some ideas, probably, of economy, with some desire, probably, to put a brake upon the reckless manner in which his party had, during their seventeen years of office, ran up the public expenditure from $23,500,000 to over $38,000,000, and increased the public debt over $100,000,000—I have no doubt the hon. gentleman was sincere when he made his Budget speech in 1894 and promised that he was going to put a stop to this kind of thing. But how has it turned out? Has the hon. gentleman succeeded? No; because we find that in 1894 there was an increase in the public debt of $4,501,987—keeping up the old record, going the old pace, the hon. gentleman's ideas all right, but the ideas of his party not in unison with his own—in 1895 an increase of debt amounting to $6,891,897, or an increase of debt, after the hon. gentleman's statement, of over $11,000,000. That does not show that the hon. gentleman's anticipations were correct. Of course, some of this was attributable to the deficits; but the hon. gentleman, when he made his speech, knew about the deficits, and anticipated them; yet he was going to stop adding to the public debt. He was not able to carry out his anticipation in that respect, but was obliged, by the course of circumstances, by the extravagant character of the party with which he is connected, who are always talking about the money they have spent, the development of the country, and all that kind of thing, ideas which apparently the Finance Minister himself does not entertain—he was obliged to yield to the demands of his party. He seems to have some conservative ideas in this matter, he seems to have some notion of the terrible burden which an increase to the public debt causes to a new country like this. It is not the mere spending of money, it is not the mere question of adding four and a half millions in 1894, and nearly seven millions in 1895, as the Finance Minister well knows; but it is the large increase to the annual charge for interest which this causes to the country, which makes it difficult for a Government, no matter how economical they are inclined to be, and impossible, so far as this item is concerned, to effectuate a reduction in expenditure. When the Liberals come to power they will be confronted with that difficulty, in 1896, as they were in 1874. They will again be confronted with the difficulty that they will have to provide money to pay for the excesses and reckless extravagancies of their predecessors in office. I regret very much that the sound ideas which the Finance Minister personally seems to entertain with respect to matters of finance are not the ideas of the party to which he belongs. I regret for the sake of Canada and for the sake of the Liberal party, because when that party assumes the burden of governing the Dominion they will regret that his ideas had not more play, for instead of our having an increase of $100,000,000, nearly doubling the debt in seventeen years, a very much less increase under economical management and under honest management would have given to this country even better public works than this administration has been able to give it for this largely increased debt, because the money has not gone to increase the assets of Canada. A large portion of it has been wasted, a large portion has been stolen through the maladministration, the carelessness and worse of hon. gentlemen opposite; at all events, the money borrowed has been spent, and while we may not be alarmed, and may not consider it necessary in our time to repay the principal, we are compelled month after month to meet the excessive annual interest for this largely increased debt, which increased interest amounts to a very large sum indeed. If there was one thing more than another on which the Finance

Mr. MARTIN.

Minister complimented himself it was in regard to the sugar duties and the great saving he had been enabled to make to the people by removing those burdens. But we find even on that matter the hon. gentleman has been obliged to modify his position. The sugar duties are equal to 23 per cent as against 42 per cent under Mr. Mackenzie's regime. Even in this matter, which I think has occupied from 15 to 20 per cent of the space in the hon. gentleman's Budget speeches for the last five or six years, space occupied in congratulating himself and praising himself through his party for the tremendous benefits conferred on the people by removing the sugar duty, he has been obliged to impose $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a pound on sugar, and this on account of the low price, amounts to about 50 per cent of the duty imposed in Mr. Mackenzie's time. There is one little matter in the hon. gentleman's speech with which I was very much taken, and it was that the hon. gentleman was able to show an increase in the export of manufactured articles. The hon. gentleman seemed to be quite delighted to find that the National Policy had increased the exports of manufactured goods. One would have imagined that that would have been one of the principal results of seventeen years of the tariff, and that he would long ago have been able to congratulate the country on a large increase in the export of manufactured goods, which this policy was adopted to foster. The hon. gentleman seemed to have that idea in his mind, that he should be able to congratulate the country on the great success of the National Policy in this particular, and he told the House that the export of manufactured articles in 1890 amounted to the value of \$5,741,184 and in 1895 it had risen to \$7,768,875. The hon. gentleman might have gone back to 1878, and he would have found that without the National Policy, designed to foster exports of manufactured goods, the value of such exports was \$4,127,755. So after twelve long years of taxation, of protection and of National Policy, the hon. gentleman was enabled to announce increased exports of manufactured goods by a little over \$1,000,000. But the hon. gentleman was afraid to go back very far, and so he selected the period from 1890 to 1895, in which he found there had been an increase of about \$2,000,000. I could take the tariff, and if we were not very much pressed for time, and if we were not necessarily brief in our remarks on the Budget, I could take item after item and show the amounts taken out of the pockets of the people and put not into the public treasury but into the pockets of manufacturers, and not to the amount of \$4,000,000, not to \$7,768,875, but more, much more, during the past seventeen years. I could give such a list as would occupy two or three hours, these being cases in which money was taken from the pockets of the people and placed in the pockets of the manufacturers. The hon. gentleman apparently thinks that the exports of manufactured goods are large, but such is not the opinion of any independent man who will look at the subject from a business standpoint, especially remembering that the National Policy was introduced for making by a hothouse process Canada a manufacturing country, by changing this Dominion from its natural position as an agricultural, mining, fishing and lumbering country with a fair proportion of manufactures, into a purely manufacturing country. The National Policy was instituted for the purpose of setting aside nature and converting Canada into a purely manufacturing country at the expense of the other great industries, agriculture, mining and lumbering. Yet we find this to be the result, that while the Mackenzie Government without a National Policy was able to export of manufactured goods the value of over \$4,000,000, this Government, with a National Policy which has been in force seventeen years, is only able to export manufactured goods to the value of \$7,500,000. I have no hesitation in saying that if the Liberal policy had been continued, the value of exports of manufactured articles would have been very much beyond the present value, because that was a policy which was not intended to establish manufacturing industries by hothouse process, but was a policy under which manufactures adapted to the country grew strong and vigorous, developed naturally and were able to send exports abroad because these industries were well settled in the country and not because they were supported by a prohibitory tariff. All through I find the hon. gentleman making most inaccurate statements. He cannot even make an incidental reference to a matter of current commercial history without exaggeration. He tells us that the smelter at Hamilton has been completed, and that the proprietors had spent \$400,000 upon it. Just as I heard that from the hon. gentleman's lips, I read in a newspaper that it was part of a bargain between the smelter company and the city of Hamilton, that in order to get a bonus of \$50,000 from the city they were bound to expend \$400,000. But on account of their having only spent \$300,000, they were making application to the city to be relieved of the forfeiture of bonus incurred in that way. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) converted the real post office deficit of \$1,000,000 into a deficit of only \$800,000, but it was very peculiar that in a matter which seemed to be in his favour, he figures out \$100,000 too much. He could by no possibility say it was \$200,000 or \$250,000, but he had to go \$100,000 beyond the mark. The hon. gentleman made the following peculiar statement:—

But, Sir, if the home market for agricultural products has increased in that respect, so also has the foreign market as shown by the exports of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the exports show that Canada has been supplying the foreign market; but surely the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) won't claim that his policy has increased the foreign market. I heard the hon. member (Mr. Henderson), from my native county, seriously tell the House the other night, that the National Policy had increased the price of wheat, and I understood that his remarks applied to the province of Ontario. When the National Policy was introduced, it was promised by the friends of hon. gentlemen that it would increase the price of wheat for the farmers; but during the last five years the difficulty in the North-west and Manitoba is that the price of wheat has been steadily getting less all the time, and the Conservative orators up there tell us that it is quite impossible to increase the price of wheat, and that the Government of this country has no control over the foreign market. But the Minister of Finance seems to dispute that, and I judge from his statements that he has increased the foreign market. Well, Sir, if the National Policy is able to increase the price of wheat in Ontario, as the hon. member (Mr. Henderson) says, what defect is there in the National Policy that it will not increase the price of wheat in Manitoba? I asked the Finance Minister to bring his great abilities to bear on that question. Surely if the National Policy increases the price of wheat in one province its influence should be Dominion-wide, and it should increase the price in another province. The late Secretary of State (Mr. Montague) told us last session that the National Policy did increase the price of wheat in Manitoba, but the unfortunate part of it was that at the time the price had increased the Manitobans had no wheat to sell. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), in the course of his remarks, referred to Mr. Meighen, president of the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, as a great authority on political economy and the National Policy. Well, Mr. Meighen is a great admirer of the National Policy, and he is quite pleased with a fiscal policy that will increase the price of wheat at a time when the wheat has all left the farmers' hands and gone into the hands of Mr. Ogilvie and himself. I am rather inclined myself to agree with those Conservative speakers in Manitoba, who for five years past have been telling us that the National Policy has no effect whatever upon the price of wheat.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Except to lower it.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know whether it lowers the price of wheat or not. I hope not. There is something lowering the price of wheat, but whether it is the National Policy or not, it is very hard for me to say. We find from the Trade and Navigation Returns that the export of wheat from this country to Liverpool has very largely increased during the past few years, and we heard from the hon. member (Mr. Bennett) that Manitoba and the North-west produced 60,000,000 bushels of grain this year, and that most of that grain had gone out of the country. If 60,000,000, or anything like it, has been exported this year via New York—as the hon. member (Mr. Bennett) told us very regretfully—surely the price obtained for that wheat in Liverpool could not have been influenced in any way, shape or manner by the National Policy. From my experience, I can point out one way in which the National Policy has lowered the price of wheat. Very often, in Manitoba and the Territories, we have considerable frost. It has been considered more or less unpatriotic to acknowledge that; but there is no use denying it. Along with Dakota and Minnesota and the great North-west generally, we are subject, and always will be, I fancy, more or less subject to frost. It has not been at all serious in recent years; but every year a certain percentage of our wheat is touched with frost, and very considerably damaged. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is always a better market for damaged wheat in the United States than there is in any part of Canada or in the old country, and, year after year, we have found ourselves unable to send our frozen wheat into the United States, in consequence of the existence of their duty upon wheat; and, so far as that duty is caused by a retaliatory tariff on this side, to that extent the National Policy tends to reduce the price of damaged wheat in Manitoba. The reason why damaged wheat has a better market in the United States is that there is a large poor class in the large cities who will buy inferior flour made from inferior grades of wheat which can hardly be sold at all in Canada. So that we are placed at a disadvantage, at any rate, by the National Policy of the United States, which is closely linked with ours.

The hon. gentleman, in his speech, dealt considerably with the question of protection to agriculture. I have noticed that hon. gentlemen opposite all have a good deal to say about that; and, possibly, in some parts of Canada, in very small sections, where there is a local market, there may be some advantage derived from agricultural protection. But that advantage is entirely offset by the great disadvantage it is to other communities in those sections. We find that exemplified very well in British Columbia. In certain portions of British Columbia, where there is agricultural land, the agricultural protection is an advantage to the farmer; but it is certainly a great disadvantage to the development of the country. Take the Kootenay mining district, a new district which is being opened up, and which is dependent almost entirely on the United States for everything. It is found a great disadvantage to the development of that district that the people have to pay a large duty on everything that is brought in. While the agricultural protection may be of some slight advantage to a small section of agricultural land which communicates at some distance with that mining district, the disadvantages to it and to the development of British Columbia as a whole, depending so much as it must on its mining industry, must be apparent. And it seems to me that it works even against the farmers indirectly, because, unless the mining interests and the country generally are developed, the farmers cannot expect a market for their products.

Now, I have to deal with another statement of the hon. gentleman—that in 1894 he decreased the duties by $1,500,000; and I would ask the time of the House to read his statement and his proof of that statement:

But I want to ask the hon. leader of the Opposition, and my hon. friend opposite me (Sir Richard Cartwright)—the latter of whom said, in 1894, the reductions in the tariff were less than nothing, the former declared that they were next to nothing—I want to ask them whether or not it is possible for them to revise their opinion, and whether they propose or not to put before the House statements which will place the matter clearly in the eyes of the country, so that the people may judge whether hon. gentlemen opposite or I have made the correct statement. I propose to submit a list of the articles on which reductions have been made, showing the extent of the reduction on each article, and this list extends over the whole range of imported goods. It is as follows.

That is offered as a proof of the hon. gentleman's statement that in 1894 he reduced the taxation by $1,500,000. Now, how would a person naturally expect to find him going on with the proof? One would naturally expect that, in giving each item, he would give the old rate of duty, the new rate of duty, and the reduction, as he has done. Then I would have expected to find another column showing how much the actual reduction was—how much of the $1,500,000 was reduced on horned cattle, how much on the next item, how much on the next item, and so on; and I would have expected at the foot of this table to find that all the reductions added together, amounted to a sum much larger than $1,500,000; and then I would have expected him to go on and give the items on which he had increased the duty in 1894, and figured them out in the same way, and that then the difference between the decreases and the increases would have amounted to the sum of $1,500,000. That is, if the hon. gentleman was going to prove his statement in the way he started out to prove it. But the hon. gentleman does nothing. He simply says, "Here is a list of items on which I have reduced the duty; therefore, there was a saving to the people of $1,500,000." He makes no reference whatever to the fact, a most patent fact, that there were large increases in that very same tariff revision. Now, Mr. Speaker, at some trouble to myself, I have endeavoured to supplement the hon. gentleman's table in the direction I have pointed out, and, when I have gone through this table, we shall see whether there is the reduction he claims. It is very hard to believe it possible, because, when we take the dutiable articles in 1895 and the amount of duty obtained from them, and compare that with what it was in 1894, we find that there was not any reduction at all, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) pointed out, but that there was a slight increase. So that it is very hard to tell where this $1,500,000 comes in. Therefore, I have gone to the trouble of going through the list which the hon. gentleman has given, and finding out how much the reduction has amounted to on each item, and I shall be able to point out very clearly the real effect of the protective tariff in many instances by referring to the decreases and the increases which the hon. gentleman made in the year 1894. Take the first item, animals, living. On horned cattle, the reduction is 10 per cent, and the amount, $3,560. Take the amount of duty that was obtained from this article in 1895, the first year when the hon. gentleman's tariff came into force, namely, $7,129, and, as the hon. gentleman just took off 10 per cent, there was a saving of half that, or $3,560. On sheep, the reduction was 10 per cent, or half the amount collected under the 20 per cent tariff, which was $12,000, leaving to the hon. gentleman's credit, $6,000. On hogs, $524 duty was collected under the higher rate, and the reduction of one-half cent a pound gave $175. The hon. gentleman was very careful to say he did not put in everything, but he gave us some very small amounts, and I do not know what he left out. He did not leave out hogs, which came to the large sum of $175. With regard to those three items—horned cattle, sheep and hogs—it seems to me this reduction in duty is a direct violation of the hon. gentleman's policy of protection for agricultural interests. If the policy of protection be so good that hon. gentlemen talk about so much, how is it that the very first three items the hon. gentleman selected in 1894 on which to reduce protection were these three items of horned cattle, sheep and hogs, which the Conservative party claimed so much credit for protecting. I really hope that Conservative speakers will not put me down, after these few remarks, as advocating protection on horned cattle, sheep and hogs, because, surely I am at liberty to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that they are violating their own ideas, without being responsible myself for those ideas. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not inviting an increase of duty or protection on these three articles, but I am pointing out hon. gentlemen opposite in one breath blow themselves up to the skies for having given protection to the agricultural industry, and then in another breath point out the great services the Conservative party has performed to Canada by doing exactly the opposite, reducing the duty on these agricultural products. The next item is baking powder. I regret very much not being able to give the hon. gentleman credit for anything in taking in baking powder, although no doubt he is entitled to something. He reduced the duty from 8 cents to 6 cents a pound, or 25 per cent, on packages less than one pound, but, unfortunately, in the Trade and Navigation Returns there is no discrimination as to baking powder in packages of less than one pound, and I have not been able to find out how much the hon. gentleman saved to the country on baking powder, and therefore my calculation will be wrong to that extent. The hon. gentleman will be entitled, on giving the information, which, no doubt, he can get, to any of the benefits from the reduction in duty on this article. The next item is bells. The hon. gentleman reduced the duty on bells, except for churches from 30 to 25 per cent, making an annual saving to the country, in 1895, equal to $930. Then comes brass and manufactures of, nails and rivets, and burrs, reduced from 35 to 30 per cent, and saving $155. Wire, which was 15 per cent, the hon. gentleman reduced to 10, and thus saved to the people, on that item, $260, in 1895. The next item is sweetened biscuits. There is another item where I am not able to give the hon. gentleman credit, because in 1894 all kinds of biscuits were at 25 per cent, and in 1895 sweetened biscuits were 27½, and it was only sweetened biscuits that were reduced in 1894; and as the Trade and Navigation Returns do not discriminate between sweetened and not sweetened, I have not been able to find out how much the hon. gentleman is entitled to credit for in this item. The next item is macaroni and vermicelli, on which the duty was 2 cents per pound, now reduced to 25 per cent ad valorem, making a total saving of $1,360. Barley was 15 cents per bushel before, now it is 30 per cent, making a reduction of $520, and this is another violation of the hon. gentleman's policy of protection to agriculture. British gum, dextine, sizing cream, and enamel sizing, reduced from 1 cent per pound to 10 per cent, ad valorem, gives a saving to the country of $2,895. Brooms, the hon. gentleman reduced from 25 to 20 per cent, making an actual saving to the country of the large amount of $45 on the importation of 1895. The whole importation is $224, and the saving in duty, $45. All through the tariff, we will find instance after instance, where the hon. gentleman has been able to make very much larger reductions and still have practically no effect on the importation at all, because there is no importation worth speaking of. The next article is buttons, of vegetable, ivory or horn, on which there is a saving by the reduction of duty of $2,380. Then on buttons of hoof, rubber, vulcanite or composition, there is a saving of $230, and on all other buttons, n.e.s., a saving of $4,115. On candles, paraffine and wax, there is a reduction of duty amounting to $195, and on cane or rattan, split or otherwise manufactured, the reduction amounts to $1,060. Carriages, formerly 35 per cent, now 25 per cent, total saving, $4,780. There is some difficulty in making this out because there is a sliding scale, but the amount I have given is the result of the closest calculation I can make. Cases for jewels, saving, $805; clocks, saving, $10,500. One of the few of what I call substantial savings in the hon. gentleman's tariff is in this item, because clocks are an important matter and the hon. gentleman has reduced them from 35 per cent to 25 per cent. Clothes wringers, formerly $1 each and 30 per cent, now 25 per cent each and 20 per cent. Importation, 1,997; saving, $3,000. Taking the value of each machine as not less than $2 the present protection on clothes wringers is 32½ per cent. The old protection was 80 per cent. I have looked into this matter somewhat because it is a case that illustrates the hon. gentleman's tariff. In 1893, the importation was 384; in 1894 it was 709. In 1895, when the hon. gentleman made a substantial reduction in his tariff, the importation was 3,941. Now, I think a fair estimate of the number of clothes wringers used in Canada each year is 100,000. At $2 apiece this would represent a total value of $200,000. The duty, if all were imported, would be $65,000. There actually went into the treasury in the form of duty on clothes wringers in 1895, $1,997. Allowing $3,000 to allow a good margin, we have a total of $60,000 taken from the pockets of the people through the duty on clothes wringers if my calculations are right. The actual amount of duty collected was about $2,000, so that there was over $60,000 taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada for wringers and put not into the treasury but into the pockets of the manufacturers of clothes wringers. Tar and coal pitch, now free, saving, $2,195; cocoa mats and matting, saving, $355; cocoa-nut dessicated, saving, $1,635; coffee, extracts of or substitutes, saving, $720; coffee roasted or browned, not imported direct, saving, $775; coffee, roasted, ground and substitutes, n.e.s., $595. On these preparations of coffee the present duty is 75 per cent. I would like the advice of the Finance Minister, if he would give it to me in a case of this kind. This is a specific duty. According to the hon. gentleman's statement in his speech, respecting roasted and ground coffee the duty is reduced from 5 cents a pound to 3 cents a pound, but on extracts of coffee not roasted and ground 2 cents a pound and 10 per cent. Now, there is apparently a reduction in duty, but when we come to translate the specific into an valorem duty, we find that, while the duty in 1894 was 23 per cent, the duty in 1895 is 75 per cent. What am I to do in a case of that kind? As a matter of fact the hon. gentleman has increased the ad valorem duty from 23 per cent to 75 per cent, but he has decreased the specific duty, so that according to this calculation he is not entitled to the reduction. I have, however, solved the difficulty by giving the hon. gentleman full credit for his reduction, viz.: $720 in one case, $775 in another, $595 in another. The real fact was, however, that the result of the duty was to increase the burden of taxation upon the people of Canada by $800. Collars of cotton and linen, xylonite and celluloid, saving, $2,305. The present duty is just about 50 per cent on that article, showing that the great bulk of the protection goes into the pockets of the manufacturers and not into the treasury of the country. Copper and manufactures of nails, rivets, and burrs, saving, $70; copper, old and scrap, saving, $325; copper in pigs, saving, $1,305; copper, seamless drawn tubing, saving, $2,840; copper, ignots, sheets, plates and sheating, not planished or coated, saving, $345; copper in bars, rods and bolts. Here is another item I was not able to find. The hon. gentleman is entitled to whatever reduction there is in that case. Cordage, cotton, saving, $930; cotton clothing, including corsets, saving, $8,185; cuffs of cotton, &c., saving, $270. The duty on cuffs is still 54 per cent; and, as the importation only amounts to 3,015, it is apparently prohibitory. Dressing harness, leather and shoe, saving, $1,770; drugs, dyes, chemicals and medicines, saving, $1,675; sheet glue, saving, $11,415; liquid glue, saving, $500; liquorice paste, saving, $4,420; liquorice in rolls and sticks, saving, $2,160; yeast, compressed in bulk or mass of not less than 50 pounds, saving, $3,385. In the case of yeast in lots of less than 50 pounds and yeast cakes, the duty runs from 4 cents to 8 cents a pound. The total import is only $29 worth, showing that the duty is prohibitory. In fact on lots of less than 50 pounds the duty is 70 per cent. But yeast of the value of $84,162 is imported in the mass, on which the hon. gentleman made his reduction. The hon. gentleman has evidently made this reduction in order to help the bakers. So far as the general public is concerned, he left yeast, or yeast cakes, and small lots of yeast, still at the very highest specific duties, running from 4 to 8 cents a pound, because the whole amount of yeast imported into Canada was only $29 worth. Earthenware and china, brown or coloured, $730; decorated, printed or sponged, $8,200; white granite, $9,700; manufactures of earthenware, n.e.s., $315. Feathers, ostrich or vulture, $5,250. Fertilizers, $1,900. Blackberries, gooseberries, raspberries and strawberries—this is another case that I do not know what to do with. The hon. gentleman decreased his specific duties, and increased the ad valorem duty, according to the great fall in the price of fruit. According to his own claim, there would have been a saving of $6,310; but the actual rate of duties ad valorem translated into the ad valorem of 1893, was 29 per cent, while in 1895 it was 27 per cent. Plums, $1,135. Furniture, $13,165. The whole amount of furniture imported was only $263,254, showing that the duty on furniture was almost prohibitory, because $260,000 worth of furniture is only a very small part of the amount of furniture used in the Dominion. Glass, etc., flasks and phials, of eight ounces capacity and over, insulators and so on—it is difficult to find out exactly what the saving is, because the Trade and Navigation Returns are not the same in both years; but taking 1893 as a basis, when there was an importation of 150,000 dozens, it would be $7,500, and I give the hon. gentleman credit for that amount. Silvered glass, bevelled, $360. Gunpowder and other explosives, gun, rifle and sporting powders, $2,430; gun, rifle and pistol cartridges and cartridge cases, $3,835; gun wads and percussion caps, $830. Gutta percha and India-rubber belting, $830. Writing ink, $1,660. I am taking the items just as the hon. gentleman gave them in his speech, and I give the hon. gentleman credit for the exact amount, as near as I can figure it out, of the saving on each of these items. Iron and manufactures of iron—agricultural implements, binding attachments, $90. This is one of the great reductions from 35 per cent to 20 per cent. Drills, seed grain, $2,370; harrows, $2,310; harvesters, $12,315; mowing machines, $7,210; ploughs, $4,470; reapers, $150, or a total of $28,915 that the hon. gentleman saved to the country by his reduction from 35 per cent to 20 per cent on a certain class of agricultural implements last session. Iron, bar and round and galvanized, $15; bar iron, rolled and hammered, $14,955. The duty is still 29 per cent. Cast iron pipes of every description, $5,305. In 1893 the duty on these was 63 per cent; in spite of the hon. gentleman's reduction it is still 44 per cent. I may say that these pipes are an article in which the hon. gentleman would do well to make a much further reduction. His reduction was from $12 a ton and not less than 35 per cent, to $10 a ton and not less than 35 per cent. Iron pipes are very much in use in British Columbia for the purpose of hydraulic mining, and I think a duty of 44 per cent upon an article which is so much required for developing a growing industry in that new province can be denominated by no less strong a term than an outrage. In justice to a new province like British Columbia, where there are prospects of great wealth on account of minerals and deposits of auriferous gravels which can only be developed by means of hydraulic mining, it would be well if the hon. gentleman and his Government were really interested in the produce of the western part of Canada, to remove the duty upon these iron pipes, which is found to be a serious impediment to the progress of the mining industry in British Columbia. Engines, other than fire, and locomotives, $755; hardware, builders, hardware, $8,765; iron and steel sheets—now, Sir, I would like to draw the attention of the House to this item. The hon. gentleman reduced the duties from 12½ per cent to 5 per cent. 12½ per cent does not appear to be a very large duty, but apparently it was practically prohibitive, because we find that in 1893, when the duty was 12½, there was only $35,258 worth imported, and the duty realized was $4,407. When the hon. gentleman reduced the duty from 12½ to 5 per cent in 1895, the imports rose from $35,398 in 1893, to $707,974 in 1895, realizing a duty of $35,398, and the saving to the country was one and a half times that much, because the old duty was 12½, and the new duty was only 5. I have been able to give the hon. gentleman credit, in this calculation, on the item of iron and steel, to the amount of $53,045. I think that item illustrates in a forcible manner the contention of the Liberal party that a large reduction in the duties could be accomplished, and a corresponding increase in the revenue obtained at the same time. There is no doubt many other items such as this where, by reducing the duty from 12½ to 5 per cent, the hon. gentleman has been able to increase his revenue from $4,407 in 1893 to $35,398 in 1895. You will find item after item like that, if you go through the tariff list where there is a reduction of that kind. Iron is a heavy article, and by reason of distance of carriage and freight rates 12½ per cent is practically, so far as this class is concerned, almost prohibitive. By reducing the duty to the reasonable rate of 5 per cent, the hon. gentleman has made one of the heaviest savings in the whole list; and as I say, we are able to credit him on this item alone with over $53,000. Iron in slabs, blooms, puddled bars, etc., $15,730. The old duty was 50 per cent, the new duty is less than 30 per cent. The hon. gentleman would have been able, by making the reduction in duty to secure a saving to the people of $15,730 on that one small item. Locks of all kinds are still 32½ per cent; saving $1,665. Portable steam engines, $865; threshers and separators, $640. There is still a duty of 30 per cent on these machines, which is practically prohibitory, and yet it is an article for which the people of the North-west are obliged to pay a large sum out of the proceeds of their crops. Sewing machines, which also go into almost every family, pay a duty of 30 per cent; the total saving was $1,675. Type-writers, which still pay a duty of 27½ per cent, $1,115. All other machinery showed a saving of $24,755. Malleable iron and other castings, $10,820. Nails and spikes, composition, $300; nails and spikes, wrought and pressed, $1,700. There is still a duty of 30 per cent on this item, which is practically in use in every household in Canada. Nails, and spikes, cut, $1,070. There is still a duty of 36 per cent, it being formerly 48 per cent. Nails, wire, $1,875, the duty is 46 per cent, formerly it was 92. Foreign cut and wire nails, even under the reduced tariff, are kept out of Canada. Plough plates, and other plates for agricultural implements, $1,465. Pumps, $3,325. Railway fish-plates, $4,355, the duty is still 42 per cent. Here is an item on which the hon. gentleman should make a reduction, light rails for tramways. The hon. gentleman allows heavy rails for ordinary steam roads to come in free, but these light rails which are used for tramways for carrying ore, are heavily taxed. Safes and doors, $215. Screws, iron or steel, commonly called wood screws, $245. The duty has been reduced from 6 cents to 3 cents per pound, but it still is equal to 35 per cent, and is absolutely prohibitory. Formerly it was 70 per cent. Screws of one inch, and less than 2 inch, have been reduced from 8 cents to 6 cents per pound, $235; the duty is now 52 per cent, formerly it was 69 per cent—it is, at all events, prohibitory. Screws of less than one inch have been reduced from 11 cents to 8 cents, making the duty 49 per cent against 67 per cent formerly. The saving is $100. All these duties on wood screws are prohibitory. These screws, however, are used in almost every family, and the duty, with the exception of a few dollars, goes into the pockets of the protected manufacturers. Scales and balances and weighing beams are 30 per cent, formerly they were 75 per cent, $1,095. Skates, $1,830. Stoves, are 27½ per cent, although they are used throughout the country, $925. Swedish rolled iron nail rods show a saving of $1,065; boiler tubes, of $3,235; other wrought iron tubes, $7,405, the protection being 53 per cent, as against 58 formerly. On barbed-wire fencing the duty, which was formerly 70 per cent, is now 35, but it is still practically prohibitory. The saving was $3,195. In 1893 there was no barbed-wire fencing imported into Manitoba, but in 1895 there was an importation of $621, at 35 per cent. Wire, covered, $2,535. Surgical and dental instruments, $1,935; steel ingots, $3,115. Saws, $2,200. Manufactures of iron and steel, not classified, $14,080, although the duty is still 27½ per cent. On the whole of the iron schedule the duty collected in 1895 was $1,507,864, or a rate of 29 per cent. If that had been brought down to a reasonable revenue tariff or 20 per cent, which is a fairly high tariff on manufactured iron, there would have been saved to the people $500,000, besides all the money that goes into the manufacturer's pockets. There is an opportunity for the hon. gentleman actually to get somewhere near $1,500,000. If the hon. gentleman had gone right along with the iron schedule, he could, by reducing the rate of duty from 29 to 20 per cent, have made a wholesale saving of $500,000. I give the Finance Minister credit, however, for intending in his original proposition to make a considerable reduction in the iron schedule; but the Manufacturers' Association got together, prepared their brief, sent a deputation here, and when the hon. gentleman got through with the iron schedule, he was only able to make a paltry saving, instead of saving half a million. Then we come to jellies, jams and preserves, on which there is a saving of $6,320, although the duty stands at 34 per cent. Lead pipe and lead shot, $155. Leather, sole, $3,210; calf kid, lamb and sheep skins, $8,345; upper leather, dressed or glazed, $4,725. Japanned, patent or enamelled leather, $765, and other leather and skins, $540. Then there is manufacturers' leather harness, on which there is still a duty of 30 per cent, $2,000. Leather belting, $1,075; Manilla hoods, $75; gas, coal oil and electric light fixtures, $1,295; still 27½ per cent. Milk, condensed, sweetened, $1,010. Plumbago, $125; black lead, $700; plumbago, manufactures of, $820; mucilage, $310. Oils—Now, Mr. Speaker, here is another case in which I do not know what to do. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) reduced the duty on kerosene oil from 7½ cents to 6 cents, and, according to his claim in his Budget speech, he would be entitled to count that as a saving, but the difficulty is the ad valorem duty. In 1893—I take 1893 for comparisons of this kind because 1894 was a broken year, and partly under the hon. gentleman's new tariff and partly under the old. In 1893 the ad valorem duty was 93-3-10th per cent, and in 1895 it was 93-4-10ths per cent, or 1-10th of 1 per cent more, ad valorem, than it was in 1893. The Finance Minister is not entitled to any thanks for his decrease on coal oil on the ad valorem basis. However, in order to be entirely fair to him, I have given him credit for the whole reduction, which amounted to the large sum of $77,455, although we still have the enormous ad valorem duty on coal oil of 93-4-10ths per cent. With regard to the products of petroleum, I am again in a difficulty. Apparently, on the specific reduction the Finance Minister would be entitled to a credit of $4,580; but the ad valorem duty on these products in 1893 was only 67 per cent, while the ad valorem duty in 1895 was 103 per cent. Hon. gentlemen will understand why it is that, while there has been a reduction of the specific duty, there is an increase in the ad valorem duty, arising from the fact that there has been a very large fall in the price of the article.

Mr. CLEVELAND. No.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes. The hon. gentleman will see that my figure is right. If you take the ad valorem duty of 1893 on the products of petroleum, you will find it amounts to 67 per cent, whereas the ad valorem duty in 1895 amounts to 103 per cent, or nearly 30 per cent increase. While the Finance Minister did, as a matter of fact, reduce the duty from 7 1-5th to 6 cents per gallon, the ad valorem duty has increased. However, I have been generous with him, and I have given him credit for the $4,580, although, as a matter of fact, he ought to be debited with that amount. The Finance Minister also claimed that there was a saving to the people on essential oils of $3,000, and lubricating oils, $8,700. Paints and colours, $5,600; putty, $290. Manufactures of paper bags and sacks, $1,460. The hon. gentleman took credit in his statement for ruled, boarded and boxed papers, but I find, on referring to the tariff, he made a mistake in that. For there was no decrease at all, and the duty still remains at 35 per cent. However, I will give him credit for it, as it only amounted to $370. Again, strawboard, $1,625. Paraffine wax, $1,640; it is still 30 per cent, and was formerly 45 per cent. Lead pencils, $2,900; pocket-books, and purses, $2,875. Lard, tried or rendered, $1,915. Meats.—

Now, here again we come across the hon. gentleman's agricultural products. He made a very large reduction in meats, and still he considers that agricultural protection is a prominent quality of the National Policy. It is about the only thing in connection with the National Policy that hon. gentlemen opposite are not prepared nearly to admit has been entirely exploded. They still think they can persuade the farmers that there is something in agricultural protection, although, as a matter of fact, the market of the farmers is determined by conditions entirely beyond the control of the National Policy. However, on meats the hon. gentleman, so far as bacon, hams, shoulders, and sides are concerned, is entitled to $8,270; canned meats, $3,725; dried and smoked meats, $1,300; other meats, salted, $510. Sand-paper, &c., $3,225. Sauces and catsup, in bottles, $5,500. The present duty is 35 per cent, although the former duty was 51 per cent. Sauces and catsup, in bulk, $600. The entire importation of these commodities amounted to $409. The present duty is 35 per cent, and the former duty was 91 per cent, but the present duty is still entirely prohibitory, as the importation shows. The amount imported in 1893 was $827, and, although the hon. gentleman reduced the duty, the imports only increased $1,171, showing that this duty, so far as a matter of revenue was concerned, is a farce, a delusion and a snare. It is entirely a duty for the purpose of giving the manufacturers of sauces and catsup in Canada so much additional profit. Soy—the hon. gentleman saved to the country $350 on soy. Former duty was 58 per cent, and the present is 35 per cent, which is also prohibitory. Flax-seed, $1,170. Soap, laundry, $5,700; harness soap, $80; soap, perfumed or toilet, $13,000; powders, pumice, &c., $6,445. Preserved ginger, $125. Sugar candy, $4,810. Glucose, or grape sugar, $5,510. Spirits of turpentine, $3,925. Binder-twine, $3,000. Cotton twine—another article I cannot find in the returns. Twine of all kinds, $1,200; manufactures of twine, hammocks, and lawn tennis nets, $575. Varnish, japans, dryers, &c., $3,265. Tomatoes, fresh, $1,310; tomatoes and other vegetables, in cans, $2,055. Wood and manufactures of, including: barrels containing petroleum, $7,825; caskets and coffins, $330; plain mouldings, $150; gilded mouldings, $1,080; hubs, spokes, fellos, $130; shingles, $125; show-cases, $560. Present duty 35 per cent, former duty 57 per cent. Woodenware, pails, tubs and churns, $635; picture frames, $1,540; veneers of wood not over 16½ inches thick, $1,475. These are all the decreases the hon. gentleman claims credit for in his speech. He says he overlooks some, but as I find items as small as $45 in his savings, I do not think the items he overlooked amount to very much.

Now, I have prepared a statement of the increases the hon. gentleman made at the same time, and I find, overlooking some of the smaller increases, the following amounts to be charged against him:—Feathers, n.e.s., increased from 25 to 35 per cent, $1,660. Cocoa shells and nuts, chocolate and other preparations of cocoa, n.e.s., which were free, put at 20 per cent, $12,700. Spices, unground, increased from 10 to 12½ per cent, $2,815. Albumenized paper, increased from 25 to 30 per cent, $1,800. Printed books, increased from 15 per cent to 6 cents per pound, $15,345. Acid, acetic and pyroligneous, now 165 per cent, formerly 84 per cent; imports fell from $8,987 to $4,154, about one-half; increase, $3,320. Olive oil, increased from 20 to 30 per cent, $1,750. Scrap iron, increased from 15½ to 31 per cent, $33,990. Sugar above No. 16, ½ cent per pound, $45,915. That was in 1895, and while I give it here, I take it off at the end, so as to get at the increase in 1894. Sugar below No. 16, $1,726,680. Molasses, $9,040. Velvets, velveteens and plush fabrics, 20 to 30 per cent, $16,780. Elastic webbing, formerly free, now 20 per cent, $14,360. All fabrics composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, &c., former duties; value of 10 cents or under, 22½ per cent; from 10 cents to 14 cents, 25 per cent; over 14 cents, 27½ per cent; present duty all round, 30 per cent; average of old duty in 1893, 27 per cent; making a total increase in these articles, which everybody uses, of $86,920. Socks and stockings, wool and cotton, 10 cents per pound and 30 per cent, increased to 10 cents per dozen and 35 per cent, or, translating it from specific to ad valorem, formerly 33 per cent, now 41 per cent, an increase of $38,255. Carpets, increased from 25 to 30 per cent—Brussels, $16,155; tapestry, $18,570. Ready made clothing, formerly 10 cents per pound and 25 per cent, now 5 cents per pound and 30 per cent, or an increase from 32 to 34 per cent ad valorem, $16,295. Spirits, 12½ cents increase in 1895, $103,000. Taking off the sugar, molasses and spirits as belonging to 1895, the increase of duties which the hon. gentleman managed to impose on the country by his reduced tariff of 1894, figured out in this way, amounted to $326,630, while the decrease he made amounted to $614,890, or a net reduction in duties in 1894 of $288,260 in actual fact, as against the hon. gentleman's statement, unsupported by a single iota of proof, of $1,500,000. That is as near as the hon. gentleman can get, and I would like to point out that even on that we have fairly to take off all the tax on coal oil—on which as I have pointed out, there was no decrease—amounting to $77,455, which makes his net decrease, in his much wanted tariff reduction of 1894, after months had been spent by himself and his colleagues in going through Canada from one end to the other inquiring where the reductions could be made, amounts to a paltry $210,805. And he had scarcely got that tariff into force before he was obliged to come down here and make increases in the duties on sugar, molasses and spirits, amounting to $1,838,720, doing away entirely with his decrease of 1894, and making a net increase of $1,550,460 in the two years. That corresponds a great deal more nearly with the calculations we get in looking at the total amount of the dutiable articles, and taking the duty upon that, although they do not exactly correspond, and the reason is plain—because it does not follow that there is relatively the same importation each year. In one year there will be a larger importation of articles, upon which a higher duty is placed, because when we calculate it, we will find that the duty on dutiable articles in 1893 was 30·3 per cent, in 1894, 30·8 per cent, and in 1895, 30·5 per cent. So that taking the average of duty, calculated upon dutiable goods all through, and comparing the year 1893, when the old tariff was in force, with the year 1895, when the new tariff was in force, we find that for this decrease of $614,890, the hon. gentleman is not really entitled to credit, because there has been a general increase in the average of duty which wiped that out. But the hon. gentleman says it is not fair to calculate the duties upon the dutiable goods alone, but that you must take the free goods. The hon. gentleman credits himself with having made a large increase to the free list in 1894. That is one of the favoured boasts of the hon. gentleman and his organs. Let us examine that for a moment, and it will not take long, because the additions to the free list practically amount to nothing. The hon. gentleman gave the different items in his speech which he added to the free list. The first is coal tar, on which there was a duty of 10 per cent and which is now free. In 1893 the duty amounted to $21,932, and the saving would thus be $2,193. The next item is copper, formerly 10 per cent, and now free. The duty amounted to $166,694, making a reduction of $16,694. The next item was flax seed, formerly 10 cents per bushel, and now free. The duty amounted $12,637, and the amount saved is $1,171. The next item is hubs, spokes and felloes, on which the duty was formerly 15 per cent, amounting to $877, and the saving $131. Then we have manilla hoods, on which formerly the duty was 20 per cent, and the amount collected $392, making a reduction of $78. Shingles, on which the duty was 20 per cent, and the amount of duty collected $1,631, giving a reduction of $326. The total amount in duties thus remitted by putting these articles on the free list is $20,593. That is all that free goods matter amounts to. Those six items are the only ones in 1894 which the hon. gentleman took off the dutiable list and placed on the free list, and the entire saving was $20,593. While it is true that if the hon. gentleman takes the whole amount of importations in 1895, he gets a lower rate than he had in 1893, it arises not from the fact that he took any articles of any account off the dutiable list in 1894 and put them on the free list, but from the accidental fact, which is just as likely to go the other way in 1896, that in 1895 there happened to be a larger amount of free goods imported than in 1873. This is a matter which varies from year to year, over which the hon. gentleman has no control, and which does not depend in any way on the course he took in 1894.

I have not much more to say. I intend to allude briefly to some very extraordinary calculations which I imagine the hon. gentleman borrowed from his newly arrived colleague from England, with regard to farming operations in the North-west. The hon. gentleman proceeds to tell us, alluding to the question of preferential trade, how he would make up 100,000,000 bushels of wheat for the English market. He told us that 50,000 farmers with 100 acres each, raising 30 bushels to the acre, would produce 150,000,000 bushels, and could send that over to England. Now, I do not think that the farmers in Manitoba and the Territories now can be said to cultivate 100 acres each. It would be a large average, indeed, to give to each farmer 50 acres instead of 100, so that to treat all accurately we have to divide the hon. gentleman's number of acres into half. Then he takes 30 bushels to the acre. Well, in 1893, in Manitoba, we grew 15 6-10 bushels to the acre; in 1894 we grew 17 bushels to the acre; and in 1895, the bonanza year, when we had one of the finest crops we ever had, we produced 25 bushels to the acre; and I can say from actual knowledge, having been in that country some 14 or 15 years, that the average in Manitoba will fall considerably under 17 bushels to the acre. Then we have to consider that we cannot export all our wheat. We must keep enough for seed, about 2 bushels to the acre, and enough to feed the people, so that on the whole the hon. gentleman's 30 bushels to the acre will have to be divided into half. Instead, therefore, of 50,000 farmers being able to raise that amount of wheat you will require four times that amount. It will require, not 50,000, but 200,000 farmers, and that would require a population, at any rate, of 2,000,000 people. The actual population in Manitoba and the Territories, after all these years of expenditure, after all the millions of dollars the Government have expended in developing that country, and in spite of the promise of the Secretary of State with regard to this 640,000,000 bushels of wheat and the wiping off by the proceeds from the sales of lands of the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway, amounts to 200,000. So that the hon. gentleman, in order to accomplish his estimates, would have to increase that population by 1,780,000, and according to the speed at which he is going, it will take him just 130 years to do this, although he says he is able to do it practically at once, because, he says, there are 50,000 farmers, and they will not be beginning to touch the agricultural land, they will be just beginning to nibble at it with 100 acres each. Fifty thousand farmers you could get in no time; and yet when we come to examine the hon. gentleman's facts, we find that at the rate of progress which Manitoba and the Territories have made since 1878 up to to-day, it would take 130 years to accomplish the hon. gentleman's estimate.

Then the hon. gentleman told us how the butter and cheese industry would be stimulated. They require butter and cheese in the old country. Why, he said, we would have 50,000 farmers, with 50 cows each. Has the hon. gentleman the slightest idea how many farmers there are in the North-west who have 50 cows each? I do not think there is one. I do not think there is a bona fide farmer in Manitoba or the Territories that has 50 cows producing butter and cheese. And yet, by a mere wave of his hand, the hon. gentleman is going to bring into existence 50,000 farmers, each of them the owner of fifty cows. These 50,000 farmers must be in addition to the other 50,000. If the hon. gentleman is going to accomplish that he has got a very big job on hand, because as I say, I do not think there is a single farmer who has got fifty cows or even half that number. I do not suppose there are 100 farmers in the country having twenty cows apiece and using them for the purpose of producing milk and butter. We should have to add another 130 years, making it 260 years before we could accomplish any such thing as that. The hon. gentleman would show much better judgment and much better taste, it seems to me, if instead of making absurd calculations such as I have referred to, which ignore the conditions of the country and the real state of affairs, he would consider what has happened in the North-west since he came into power, and base his judgment upon what has actually occurred there within the last sixteen or seventeen years. If he did so, he would be obliged to consider the action of his party with regard to that country. The progress of that country has been most disappointing, not only to the people up there, but to the people of Canada generally who have looked to that part of Canada to increase rapidly in wealth and population, and add to the ability of Canada to pay its immense national debt. Hon. gentlemen opposite have done everything in their power to retard the progress of that country. They began with the most incapable and most imbecile administration of the land laws, changing the regulations at short intervals. We have heard members supporting the Government denounce in the very strongest language the manner in which the Government administered the land laws during that period in the history of the North-west when public attention was so generally directed to it, and when immigration was setting towards it. At one time they had a pre-emption of 160 acres, then they made it 80 acres; then they did away with it altogether. At one time they allowed a man to take a second homestead, then they withdrew that privilege. They closed up the most available parts of the country, including the mile-belt, thus preventing settlers going close to the railway. They drove settlers out in thousands, creating discontent everywhere. Then, when they came to deal with the question of railways, they tied the country up under a great monopoly. They not only gave the Canadian Pacific Railway a monopoly in the North-west Territories, over which they had control, but they undertook to fasten that monopoly on the province of Manitoba, over which they had no control; and it was only after years of agitation, after great political unrest in Manitoba, that that province was able to get back its rights in respect of chartering railways from any point in the province to any other point within the province. The hon. gentlemen have themselves to blame for much of the retardment that that country has suffered, as it was caused by their unfortunate, their stupid policy of encouraging railway monopolies there. It was not alone the actual damage to existing railway lines, the main evil was the feeling among the people that they were under the heel of a huge monopoly, thus preventing development and retarding enterprise. Further, in the management of the land, hon. gentlemen opposite have used the public domain, not for the purpose of encouraging settlement, not for the purpose of increasing immigration, but for the purpose of helping their friends by allowing them to speculate in the public domain, creating colonization companies and chartering railway companies to which land grants were given. They have not learned, in spite of all these years of disappointment, in spite of these years of retardment of the country, for very recently we saw the Government handing over to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company all the odd sections in that magnificent part of the province of Manitoba known as the Lake Dauphin settlement, one of the finest parts of the province and one with no railway in it. The Government deliberately handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company all the odd sections in that country, thus making it impossible, so far as a land grant is necessary, to get a railway into that portion of the country, for the Canadian Pacific Company are not under any obligation to build a railway there. That section is eighty miles from a railway. The settlement is building up; but it is retarded simply because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were able to bring sufficient influence to bear upon the Government, were able to sufficiently to help the Government in their elections in 1891, to induce them to commit this great wrong upon Manitoba and upon Canada.

Large sums of money have been spent to encourage immigration to that country. I make the statement because I believe it to be true, and I believe I am expressing the opinion of the people there. Conservatives as well as Liberals, that practically all of that money has been absolutely wasted, that it has been spent without any regard to the purpose that should have been kept in view. The only result has been, as I pointed out a year or two ago, the importation of a few pedlars into Calgary. A large number of friends of the Government have been having trips to the old country for the purpose of bringing immigrants, but bringing none. Favourite preachers, such as the Rev. Mr. Benson, of Ottawa, have been sent to deliver lectures there at $100 each lecture. Large sums of money, running up into millions of dollars, have been appropriated by this Parliament to encourage the development of that country, and this money, instead of being used for the purpose intended has been squandered, has been distributed as a matter of favouritism, without any result so far as immigration is concerned. The Government last session reduced the immigration appropriation from $200,000 to $170,000. So far as I am concerned, I would just as soon have had it cut out altogether. I do not believe that it is any good to the country. I think it would be better to save the $170,000 than to pretend to have a lot of useless political hacks, played-out politicians, pretending to lecture in the old country. I notice in the Auditor General's Report that one of them found it cold travelling in the old country, where there are no stoves in the cars, and he provided himself with a rug, which he charged to the Government. He said he was travelling around on Government business, and so he ought to have a rug. And so they go, spending their salaries, pretending to lecture here and there, giving lime-light pictures, and wasting all this money. Do you wonder, Sir, that, under the circumstances, we have so few people in the North-west? The hon. gentleman talks about getting four million more people, and the result is, that we have only got 220,000. Then, another matter in which the hon. gentlemen are to blame for retarding that country is the position they have put us in with regard to freight rates. We are absolutely at the mercy of the railway that has been built there by public money.

Mr. DALY. The Northern Pacific.

Mr. MARTIN. They got some public money, I admit; they got $1,750 a mile. They built in Manitoba over 300 miles of railway, and I defy the Minister of the Interior to point, from one end of Canada to the other, to a subsidized railway that was built for anything like that sum. You must remember that at that time the province had invested in that railway $1,100,000, a railway that was likely to prove unprofitable, that was likely to prove an annual loss, as the Intercolonial Railway does; and this company came along and gave us a check for $1,100,000, bought our railway from us, and all we had to do was to subsidize it to the extent of $1,750 a mile, for something over 300 miles. Yet the hon. gentleman has the temerity to allude to the Northern Pacific.

Mr. DALY. It would require your gall to refer to it the way you do.

Mr. MARTIN. Everything I say is true. Sir, right alongside that railway, on both sides of it, to the north and to the south, runs a branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which receives from this Government a grant of 6,400 acres a mile for each mile, which land they have been able to sell at an average price of $5 per acre, making $32,000 per mile, which the hon. gentleman's Government has given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for building a branch to the north and another to the south of this line which we got built as a competing line, for a bonus of $1,750 per mile. The hon. gentleman, after all his subsidy, has left us entirely dependent upon the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with regard to freight rates. We have absolutely no control. The hon. gentleman sent a commission out there, and they inquired into it, and found the rates were reasonable. We knew they would before they went; they were officers of the hon. gentleman. They knew what they were wanted to do, and they did it. The people of that country do not think the freight rates are reasonable, but they have no redress. The Liberal party proposed, when that contract was going through the House, that the Government should take absolute control of the freight rates, as they were practically building the road. It cost Canada over one hundred million dollars, and it was a small thing to put into the hands of the Government the power to say that they should not charge unreasonable freight rates. Why, the people up there consider that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company just figure out how much they can live upon, the least starvation wages that the farmers can exist upon, and then they say : You can have that much for your wheat, and we will take the rest. One large farmer out in the Territories had a large crop one year, and he put it into the cars and it made a train-load. Then he said to the Canadian Pacific Railway : Haul the wheat down to the market and take half of it, and give me the other half. But the company would not do it, they wanted more than half. Well, Sir, we can not blame the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. They are a business institution. They put their money into this road as a speculation, they got absolute control of the freight rates, and we do not expect them to settle these freight rates in our favour. When they consider the question of freight rates, they are going to settle it from the standpoint of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. But the people say that the Government made a great mistake when that contract was going through the House, that they did not accept the suggestion formally placed upon the Journals of the House by the Liberal party in the House, that the question of freight rates should be absolutely under the control of the Government. It was a reasonable thing to ask, considering the fact that the Government were really building the railway. Now, Mr. Speaker, in addition to all these things, in addition to their outrageous land administration, in addition to the railway monopoly by which they prevented us for some time from building this Northern Pacific, in addition to the manner in which they have used the public domain for the speculator, in addition to the way in which they have wasted the immigration money, in addition to the fact that they have allowed the company absolute control of the freight rates, not in the interest of the people, but in the interest of the company, as a climax to all these things, is the imposition on that portion of Canada of the National Policy. Whatever argument there may be in favour of the National Policy in other parts of Canada, there never has been the slightest tittle of an argument in favour of that policy in an agricultural community like Manitoba and the Territories. What possible good could it be to that country to have manufactures fostered in Canada ? What possible advantage could Manitoba or the Territories receive from a home market such as was promised to the people of Ontario and the people of Quebec ? We argue that there is nothing in the question of a home market ; but suppose we admit, for argument's sake, that there is, we say that a home market for farmers must be adjacent to the manufactories, if they are to be able to sell their butter, and their garden products, and the various other products of the farm. But it could have no possible effect upon a country like Manitoba, whose market was Liverpool, who send their wheat to the old country, who send their products out of Canada ; and, therefore, there never was the slightest justification for the National Policy in that country. We have suffered terribly from it. The people went up there, many of them, indoctrinated with Conservative ideas, and, having voted in the east for the Conservative party, they continued for some years to vote in Manitoba for the Conservative party. But they have abandoned that. The Conservative party in Manitoba and the Territories is dead, it is annihilated, it is obliterated. The hon. gentleman and his leader, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, went through that country, and nobody knew they were there. The hon. leader of the Opposition went through that country, and his progress was a triumph. He was welcomed in every part, he was met by admiring and enthusiastic crowds. The Minister of Finance went to Winnipeg, and, I am sure, he has a most disagreeable recollection of the evening he spoke, shivering in the cold, to some 300 or 400 people. The leader of the Opposition came to that city, and there were more people hanging on the roof of the building trying to hear the words of wisdom and eloquence that fell from the leader of the Opposition than there were at the hon. gentleman's meeting : and that was not intended as a personal slight to the Finance Minister, because it is recognized in Manitoba, as I think it is in most other parts of Canada, that the hon. gentleman is probably the ablest man in the Cabinet, but it was an expression of opinion on the part of the old Conservative city of Winnipeg, which never sent a Liberal to Parliament till I was elected there, that the people were done with the National Policy and done with the Conservative party. There is no chance for the Conservative party in Manitoba or the Territories. The only chance they have is that the Patrons and Liberals will be foolish enough to run two candidates—that is the only possible chance for the Conservatives in any portions of the country and for the reasons I have mentioned. Hon. gentlemen opposite have perhaps a little arrangement by which they will be able to steal four constituencies, but that is apart from the question under consideration. The people have come to the conclusion that the National Policy is a mistake in that country. The Board of Trade of Winnipeg, three-quarters of whose members are life long Conservatives, most of whom had never given the Liberal party a vote until they voted for me, appointed a committee to consider the question of the tariff, and the report of that committee, adopted unanimously as it was by the board, is one of the strongest and most logical and conclusive condemnation of the National Policy ever adopted in Canada. So I say for all these reasons the Conservatives of Canada are entitled to the condemnation of the people of Manitoba and the Territories, that the roseate picture and showing of the Minister of Finance never will be fulfilled in that country under a policy of that kind, not because the country is not capable of attaining the result he has figured out, but because the policy holds back the country, and the people there are only waiting until hon. gentlemen opposite see fit to give us an opportunity of registering our votes to show that the people at last fully realize and appreciate their situation, and that they are prepared at that time to give a lease of power, so far as their votes will give it, to a party whose policy and platform are opposed to frequent changes of land regulations, that is opposed to railway monopolies of every kind, is opposed to the granting of the public domain for the use of speculators, is resolved to expend immigration money purely for the advancement of immigration and not for the purpose of favouring political friends, is opposed to allowing a largely subsidized railway to control the question of freight rates, and above and beyond everything is opposed to a tariff for protection, and favour a tariff for revenue, and for revenue only.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, it is with a good deal of reluctance that I venture to add a few words to a discussion which has already taken up a great deal of the time of this House, and I hope that hon. gentlemen will pardon me for a few minutes. We are accustomed to hear from hon. gentlemen opposite all manner of arguments with regard to the want of prosperity in this country. We are accustomed to hear arguments to the effect that there is no measure of prosperity in any industry in Canada. I was amused and surprised a few evenings ago to hear my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Bain) make a certain statement to this House, and I have taken down his words. He said:

That he entered a business establishment in the city of Toronto where a friend of his was engaged in business, and he asked the question of his friend: Is business improving? And his merchant friend answered: We read that it is in the newspapers, and we are told that it is by the politicians, but I do not see it in the till. It is the till that is the practical test.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I happen to be possibly unfortunate enough to be engaged in business, and I can speak from experience, which is, perhaps, more than other hon. gentlemen in this House can say. Although I am engaged in business, unfortunately, I cannot see the signs of prosperous times in my business, but, on the other hand, I am willing to admit that that is largely because I do not attend to my business. I undertook to engage in other business. I undertook to come to this House to represent the people of my constituency, at the most urgent request of a great many of them, and when I did this, I took the risk of my business going on. It may be the same with my hon. friend's merchant friend in the city of Toronto. His mind may be running in a direction other than that which would bring money into his till, and he may not be able to give that attention to his business which his business requires. It is not always an evidence of the measure of prosperity in business to find that the money does not come into the till. I say that with the facilities which exist in this country at the present moment for the carrying on of business in a prosperous way, business people should make business a success if they attend to it, but the great misfortune is that, in many cases, people are not satisfied to engage in one business, but they must engage in many lines, and so one or the other must suffer. That may be the case with the merchant friend of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bain), I feel satisfied. I say that most any man, aye, most any fool, reckless and extravagant though he be, can to some extent make his business appear prosperous for a time. But no matter how good or how bad the times are, it takes a wise man to make business a permanent success. I was more than surprised to hear an argument of that kind given to this House by a gentleman, whom I hold in the highest respect, for his intelligence and for the fair arguments which he usually presents. Now, coming, as I do, from a distant part of this Dominion, and coming, as I do, from an isolated—until a few years ago—part of this Dominion, I think that I ought to be in a position to speak as to the measure of prosperity witnessed by the people of my part of the country; and I think I can give satisfactory reasons to this House for attributing it to the policy of the present Administration. In the first place, instead of going to a man's till to obtain evidences of prosperity, I say that the proper places to go for evidences of prosperity in the country are the custom-houses, the railway stations, and the commercial and shipping establishments of the country. There you find the records of trade and of business, and these to my mind ought to be the best evidences as to whether prosperity exists in a country or not. It is and has been for many years a common custom on the part of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, more particularly the hon. ex-Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright), to charge the Administration with corrupting the electors in the eastern part of this country, when they have brought measures before this House with a view to the encouragement or the establishment of any industries in that part of the country, or with a view to aiding in the construction of railways or the improvement of the transportation conveniences of the country. It has also, I am aware, been a practice of a number of our Liberal friends from the provinces to the east, to charge the Administration with doing everything for the people of the upper provinces—with doing things for the people of the upper provinces at the expense of the interests of the people of the lower provinces. Those arguments have been used in this House and out of this House, that I shall have to ask the patience of the House for perhaps a little longer time than I otherwise should on an occasion of this kind, particularly when this discussion has taken the long range it has, and has occupied so much of the attention of the House as it has already occupied.

The first effort to establish a trade between Canada and Nova Scotia was made in the year 1825. Up to that period there was no trade between the upper and the lower provinces. A subsidy of £1,500 was granted by the Quebec government and £750 by the Nova Scotia government to a steamer to run between Quebec and Pictou, the steamer being called the "Royal William." The trade in 1866, before confederation, between Ontario and Quebec and the lower provinces amounted to $2,000,000. In the first year after confederation it had increased to $4,000,000, of which $3,000,000 was done through United States ports and by the Grand Trunk Railway. In other words, there was only $500,000 of that trade done through our own ports and by our own shipping, because at that time we had no railway. The Intercolonial Railway was opened in 1876 down to Pictou and Halifax; the Canadian Pacific Railway was opened in 1889; and the Intercolonial Railway was extended to the town of Sydney, in the most easterly county of this Dominion, in the year 1890. We have developed since that time, and, through those channels of trade which we have established, an estimated east bound trade carried over our railway to the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, of about $28,000,000, and an estimated west bound trade over our railways between those provinces of about $16,000,000, and about $1,500,000 carried by the railways of the United States. In all, including the volume of trade done by the shipping passing up and down the St. Lawrence, we have a trade of about $60,000,000 done by our own people, the employment in carrying and handling going to our own people, as well as the profits being put in the pockets of our own people. I am of opinion that this statement is a very good evidence of the satisfactory development of trade between the provinces of this Dominion during that period. The imports into the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in 1876 were estimated at about $40 per head of the population of those provinces. A calculation based on the increase of the population of those provinces would give us an importation at the present time equal to $36,000,000. Deducting the present imports of those provinces, amounting to about $13,000,000, there remains $22,750,000 as the consumption of the people of those provinces, the whole, or at least the greater part of which represents the consumption of the products from our own provinces. In the lower provinces we have made advances in our industrial production; but we have not, I am sorry to say, made the same advances as the people of the upper provinces. There are reasons for that. We have only been able to open up our communications by rail and by water within a few years, so that we have not had the time nor the opportunity to develop our trade as rapidly as the people of the upper provinces. I have the record of the business done by the Intercolonial Railway, and I find there that the quantity of freight carried over that railway, consisting chiefly of flour, manufactures and coal, in the years between 1877 and 1878 averaged 477,019 tons. I find that the tons of freight carried in 1879 over the Intercolonial Railway amounted to 510,861, and that the carriage increased in 1893 to 1,388,081, or an average in fifteen years under the Conservative Administration of 1,033,999, as compared with an average of 477,019 during the years 1877 and 1878. The quantity of flour included in this carriage amounted to an average of 44,624 barrels in the two years, 1877 and 1878, as compared with an average of 82,073 barrels during the years from 1879 to 1893. As regards manufactures, we find that in 1877 and 1878 the average tonnage of manufactures carried over the Intercolonial was 92,083 per year, as compared with 239,739 tons during the fifteen years from 1879 to 1893. With regard to coal, we find that the average carriage during those two years of 1877 and 1878 was 100,230, as compared with 369,054, during the fifteen years from 1879 to 1893. I cannot see what hon. gentlemen opposite could look for in the shape of development of trade, if they do not find it in these figures. I say that this development could not have taken place, were it not for the building of our railways and the inauguration of the policy which was inaugurated in 1879, and which has proved so satisfactory to the people engaged in those industries. Now, the shipping employed in the coasting trade, in 1888, in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Quebec, amounted to 10,863,330 tons, which is 1,700,000 tons greater than the tonnage engaged in our ocean commerce, and 2,300,000 tons greater than what passed through the Suez Canal, and 5,730,000 tons greater than passed through the "Soo" Canal. This trade has been developed through the influence of our protective policy. Coming home to the constituency that I have the honour to represent in this House, I find that in 1868 we had coming to the ports of Sydney and North Sydney, Cape Breton, 226 vessels, with a tonnage of 27,343. In the year 1874, and I wish hon. gentlemen to make a note of this, as this was the time when hon. gentlemen on the other side undertook to administer the affairs of this country; they found that the shipping amounted to 1,506 vessels, aggregating a tonnage of 396,725 tons. Well, Sir, after five years' rule of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, we find that that shipping, instead of increasing, as it did up to the time they took it in charge, and as it did after they left office, decreased in this way. Instead of having 1,506 vessels entering our ports, we only had 1,085; and, instead of having a tonnage of 396,775 tons, we only had a tonnage of 240,324, under their five years' administration. Where was the development our people were looking for? We could not find it. Our people found their trade going down. The Liberal-Conservative party came into power in 1878, and undertook to legislate for the benefit of the people in 1879, and what do we find was the result? We find that, while this tonnage of vessels entering the ports in my constituency was at 240,324 tons, the number of vessels that entered in 1895 those same ports amounted to 4,779, as against 1,085, and the total tonnage amounted to 1,261,721, as against 241,000. Now, where is the hon. gentleman on that side of the House who can look for better evidence of prosperity than this? We come now to the production of flour. I can well remember the time when this House undertook to legislate for the people who produced flour in Canada. I can well remember that a great many people whom I have the honour to represent, and a great many people from the maritime provinces found it very difficult to support a duty on flour in the interest of the people of the other provinces. Well, Sir, during the six years from 1874 to 1879, we had an importation from the United States of a large quantity of flour, amounting to 725,477 barrels, imported by Nova Scotia. The province of New Brunswick imported 340,051 barrels; Prince Edward Island imported 148,356, or an average in four years of 120,000 barrels by Nova Scotia; 56,000 barrels by New Brunswick, and 8,000 barrels by Prince Edward Island. During the next four years, from 1880 to 1883 we imported in Nova Scotia 209,916, or an average of 52,429, as against 120,000, average during the years our opponents were in power. New Brunswick imported 105,306 barrels, or an average of 26,326, as against an average of 56,675, when hon. gentlemen opposite held office; and we had in Prince Edward Island an importation of 19,335 barrels, or 4,834 barrels per year, as against an average of 8,089 barrels per year and a total of 48,356 during the time our opponents were in power. In the five years from 1884 to 1888, we imported into Nova Scotia, 201,950 barrels, or an average of 40,309 per year; New Brunswick, 60,185 barrels, or an average of 12,037; and Prince Edward Island, 17,297 barrels, or an average of 3,459. During the five years from 1889 to 1893, we imported into Nova Scotia, 37,341 barrels, or an average of 7,446 a year. And I believe that since that time the importations have come down to about 2,000 barrels a year. New Brunswick imported 13,105 barrels, or an average of 2,601 barrels a year. Prince Edward Island imported 3,118 barrels, or an average of only 623 barrels a year, as against 8,089 barrels during the period of administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. What I wish to impress upon the House is this, that while, at the inception of this protective system, we found that this feature, intended for the benefit of the people of the upper provinces, was a hardship, still we felt that by supporting this policy we were giving the people in the upper provinces a market, which, under other circumstances, they could not get, because our communication had been almost entirely with the United States up to the time this duty was imposed on flour. Now, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House may say that it makes no difference to them where they get their flour, so long as they get it cheap. But I cannot concur in a sentiment of that kind. I hold it is the duty of the people of one province to trade, as far as possible, with the people of the other provinces. It was for that purpose that the people of these provinces entered into the combination which makes the Dominion of Canada. We entered into that confederation with a view to the development of interprovincial trade. We adopted the National Policy with the same object. And I hold that it would be highly improper for any citizen to advocate the carrying on of business with other countries while the several provinces can provide within themselves the articles required.

Now, I come to consider the total trade of this Dominion, before and after the adoption of the National Policy. The total trade of the Dominion for six years before the National Policy, I find to be as follows:—

1874	$217,565,510
1875	200,957,162

1876	174,176,781
1877	175,203,355
1878	172,405,454
1879	153,455,682

So that the aggregate trade that hon. gentlemen opposite found at $217,000,000, when they came into power, they left at $153,000,000 when they retired. And these are the people who complain to-day that the trade of this country is not in a prosperous condition. Now, take the years from 1889 to 1894, inclusive:

1889	$204,414,098
1890	218,607,000
1891	218,384,000
1892	241,369,000
1893	247,638,000
1894	240,999,000

So, during this period under the present Government, the trade increased from $204,000,000 to $240,000,000. Now, let us compare the bank circulation—and I think this ought to be one of the best evidences of the development of business in the country. In 1874, when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power the bank-note circulation was $27,000,000. When they went out of power, in 1879, it was down to $19,000,000. I find that in 1894, under the administration of the Liberal-Conservative party, the bank-note circulation has increased to $31,000,000. Now, what was it that caused that increase? Could it be any want of prosperity or of business development in the country? By no means. Nothing can be a better indication of business prosperity in a country than a large bank note circulation. Another evidence on this point is in the bank discounts. In 1874 the bank discounts were $116,412,000; but in 1879, at the end of the term of office of hon. gentlemen opposite, they had fallen to $96,760,000. In 1894, under the policy of the present Administration, I find the bank discounts have increased to $217,195,000. Is not this clear proof of a large increase in business? We hear a great deal from hon. gentlemen opposite of the taxation the people of this country have to pay. One of the best indications of the amount of our taxation is the amount of net interest we pay. I find that in 1888 our net interest was $8,891,000; in 1889 it was $8,843,000; in 1890 it was $8,704,000; in 1891, $8,506,000; in 1892, $8,777,000; in 1893, $8,656,000; or nearly $200,000 less than our net interest in 1888.

Instead of our net interest increasing, as hon. gentlemen opposite try to lead the people of the country to believe, we find that, notwithstanding our increased expenditures, notwithstanding that we spend a large amount of money in the development of the various interests of the country, our net interest has come down from $8,891,000 to $8,656,000 in the six years. Is that an evidence of higher taxation? I cannot see it. In the face of these facts, I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen opposite can undertake to indoctrinate the people of this country with the belief that they are more highly taxed year after year. Now, the average duty collected from the people of this country ought to be good evidence as to whether the taxation is growing, or whether it is growing in undue proportion. I find that in 1888 the annual expenditure chargeable to revenue was $36,718,000; in 1889, $36,917,000; in 1890, $35,994,000; in 1891, $36,341,000; in 1892, $36,765,000; in 1893, $36,814,000. Now, Sir, I find that during those six years, notwithstanding the large amount expended by the Government in developing the various interests of the country, in building railways, and in the construction of public works of various kinds—and we hear a great deal about the extravagance of the Government in respect to public works—in face of all that, I find that our expenditure chargeable to revenue under that head has remained practically stationary during the last six years. Now, Sir, our opponents do not attempt to say that our expenditures are stationary. They say that we are increasing our expenditures from year to year, that we are expending a great deal of money to corrupt the electorate, with many other statements of that kind. Now, where does the money come from? Certainly, the people are not taxed to pay it, beyond the figures I have just given. Turning now to another point, that of tariff taxation, we find from the trade returns that so far from there being any trend upwards, the trend, especially of late years, has been distinctly downwards. During the period between 1888 and 1893 the average rates per cent of duty paid on all goods entered for home consumption in Canada were as follows:—

1888	21·57 per cent.
1889	21·65 “
1890	21·21 “
1891	20·06 “
1892	17·56 “
1893	17·38 “

Instead of this rate increasing, it has decreased to the extent of 4 per cent. Now, is that not one strong evidence against the pretensions of hon. gentlemen opposite? I am astonished to hear the kind of arguments given in this House, and outside of this House, by hon. gentlemen opposite. They make their statements without giving any facts, they make reckless statements, and they never give the House or the country any facts to show the correctness of their statements. These figures must tell, they cannot undertake to say these figures are incorrect. I take them from the public records of this country and they ought to be the best authority. Now we come to the subject of free goods. Under what is known as the Cartwright tariff, in 1878, we imported free goods to the amount of $30,619,000. Now, we hear in this House a great deal, and we see, especially, a good deal in the Liberal press of this country, about the alleged fact that the importation of free goods are not as large as they ought to be. Well, let us compare the importation of free goods during the time they regulated the quantity of free goods that came into this country with the quantities that enter the country at present, including last year. Instead of having $30,619,000, as we had under the Cartwright tariff, of free goods coming into this country in 1878, we had last year $50,314,000 worth of free goods. That, I think, is an answer to the charge that we have not the quantity of free goods entering this country that we ought to have. Now, there are a number of articles which enter into the consumption of the great masses of the people of this country that are not of small importance to them. In tea we find that in 1878 we had entered into this country for the consumption of the people 9,772,334 pounds, on which they paid a duty of 5 cents a pound, aggregating $488,616. To-day they do not pay a cent on tea, and have not for years. Now, we all know that tea is an article of almost universal consumption, and I believe that it is especially used among the poorer classes. In the article of green tea, which does not enter so largely into the consumption of the poorer classes, we find that 9,425,553 pounds came into the country in 1878, which paid duty at the rate of 6 cents a pound, aggregating $566,133. We find that coffee came in to the amount of 2,965,601 pounds, paying a duty of 2 cents a pound, amounting to $59,312. During that year we find that 303,793,677 pounds of sugar came into this country, paying a duty of $2.45 per hundred-weight, aggregating $7,442,945. We find that coal oil came in to the amount of 6,545,815 gallons during the year, paying 7·15 cents per gallon, yielding a duty of $471,298. We find that the people of this country paid these large duties on those articles I have enumerated, aggregating $9,028,304. Mr. Speaker, what do the people of this country pay to-day on these articles? The only article, of those I have just named, which pays taxes to-day, is the article of coal oil, on which we collect $392,748, as against $471,298 at the former period. We all know that the article of coal oil is much more largely consumed now than it was at that period, and that possibly it would be safe to estimate the quantity used by our people now as three times as much as it was in 1878. The difference between what comes in to-day, on which we pay $392,000 duty, and that which came in at that time, on which we paid $471,000, is manufactured in Canada, in the province of Ontario, and it is for the protection of that industry we pay those duties. I say as one of those who share largely in the payment of that duty, who buys largely that article, pays the duty and disposes and distributes it to customers, that I do not altogether find fault with the Government for protecting the industry. I express that opinion because there are industries in my own province whose protection I desire, and protection to which was given before I came to this House. If the people of Ontario have an industry which requires protection in the interest of the people engaged in it, I am willing that a duty should be imposed to assist it. If the people of Nova Scotia have an industry which requires protection for its development, we expect the people of Ontario to be willing that protection should be given. So I support protection to coal oil, although some people in my province find fault at being called upon to pay the duty. I think that arises from various reasons. It arises from the fact that they use this argument for the sake of party politics; again, they use it for another purpose, because they are too narrow-minded to give the people of other provinces those benefits which they want for themselves.

Mr. McDougall (Cape Breton).

The Liberal party argues in favour of free trade. We hear a great many people say that if we had free trade as it is in England, this country would be more prosperous. I propose to give to the House some facts and figures in connection with that policy, and to draw a comparison between the effect of that policy on the people there and the effect of the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party on the interests of Canada. In free trade England taxes were collected in 1893 as follows: the total collections on customs amounted to $98,000,000. Of this amount $50,620,000 was collected on tobacco; on tea, $16,995,000; on coffee, $865,000; on wines, $6,346,000. In all $74,820,000 was collected on those four articles which I have named, out of a total of $98,000,000. The duty on tea in England is 8 cents per pound, 2 cents higher than the Liberal party here imposed on tea when they were in power. On coffee the duty is 4 cents per pound, 2 cents higher than was imposed by the Liberals. There are other taxes in England, and I wish to point out to the people of this country that were we to adopt the system of free trade, instead of what is known as the National Policy, we should have to adopt similar measures to those resorted to in England for the purpose of raising the revenue to carry on the government. The British customs tax on tea, 8 cents per pound, is the largest single item of customs, with the exception of tobacco. I find that British customs taxation on coffee amounted to $900,000 a year, on raisins and currants to $1,500,000. Here we have, then, about $20,000,000 of British taxation imposed on these two items, which are usually considered necessaries. Then there are the house duties, amounting to $7,000,000. There are income and property taxes amounting to nearly $70,000,000, and a man can do no business without meeting stamps at every turn. Every legal document or bit of commercial paper must bear a stamp, varying from one penny to several pounds. A man cannot receive a deed or promissory note or even give a receipt unless it bears a revenue stamp, which must be paid for. A man goes and pays his quarter's rent, and the receipt given must bear a stamp. So it is that at every turn the people in England have to bear these burdens in order to raise the necessary revenue. I should like to know if hon. gentlemen who advocated free trade for this country,—and there are people in my own province who undertake to advocate free trade,—are prepared to go before the electors and explain the methods by which we would be obliged to raise the revenue of the country under the system of free trade, because if they presented a true representation to the people of Canada there would not be a baker's dozen returned to support the leader of hon. gentlemen opposite. The people prefer to have the taxes levied as they have them levied to-day and as they had them for the last fifteen or sixteen years.

I come to another point, and that is the commercial failures of the country. During the period from 1875 to 1879 the failures in Canada were as follows: In 1875 the failures were in value, $28,843,000; in 1876, $25,517,000; 1877, $25,523,000; 1878, $23,908,000; 1879, $29,347,000; or an average of about $26,000,000 a year. That is the average failures in Canada during the period when hon. gentlemen opposite governed the country. What has been the value during the last sixteen years? The average has fallen from $26,000,000 to $12,000,000. Is that evidence of prosperity, or is it evidence of the opposite? Is it a justification of the contention of the Liberal party that this country is not prosperous, or is it a justification of the contrary? No better evidence than these statistics could be given with respect to the country's prosperity, with respect to the change that has come over the commercial interest of Canada during the last sixteen years. I must ask the forbearance of the House for a few minutes longer while I give some evidence with respect to the condition of the people in free trade England. At the beginning of the year 1895, hon. gentlemen will remember that there was considerable distress in free trade England, and it became necessary for the people to engage in a system of investigation into the condition of the poor, and the circumstances which led to this distress. In February, 1895, the London "Times" reports as follows:—

HARD TIMES IN ENGLAND.

Pauperism Greater than at any Period since 1871—Great Distress all Over the Country—Unemployed Number 1,750,000.

The distress among the waterside population of London, says the "Times," especially in the east end, is widespread. All over the country in fact, the long continued hard weather has thrown large numbers of people out of employment, and measures are being adopted in most of the large towns for relieving the consequent distress. In all the large manufacturing towns soup kitchens have been established, and free meals given to the poor children attending the elementary schools. The ordinary charitable organizations have been very much overtaxed. In London the Mansion House unemployed committee has called a special conference to consider the situation. The Queen has sent to the Metropolitan Visiting and Relief Association, through the Bishop of London, £250, to assist in alleviating the distress in the poorer parts of the metropolis. The Prince and Princess of Wales and the Duke and Duchess of York have sent large gifts of food, clothing and coals to Archdeacon Farrar for distribution among the poor of the parish of St. Margaret's, Westminster.

Increase of Pauperism.

Whitworth St. Cedd writes to the "Times" calling attention to the growth of pauperism in Camberwell. He says: "I believe that the increase in the number of persons applying for relief in Camberwell is out of all proportion to the increase of population. This increase, until the present winter, has not been marked by any sudden fits or starts, but it has been going on steadily since the year of the great dock strike. The number of persons who received relief in Camberwell during the half year ending Lady Day, 1890, was 11,668, and the number of such persons in the half year ending Lady Day, 1894, was 15,731, an increase of 4,063, or at the rate of 34·82 per cent. The sufferings which our poor have had to endure during the recent severe weather defy all efforts of description, and I fear that they are only the forerunners of still greater sufferings in the near future. The Board of Guardians, and the vestry and private philanthropy have done all that it was possible to do towards alleviating the distress, but the doubt arises whether these humane and well-meant efforts may not in the long run aggravate the evil, since they only palliate a frightful national disease which ought to be extirpated. It is not a parochial, but an Imperial affair, which cries urgently for the intervention of the highest statesmanship. The number of persons who received relief in Camberwell during the week ending Saturday last, February 16, was 13,235, whilst the number of such persons in the corresponding week of last year was 7,182, an increase of 6,053, or 84·28 per cent. Prevention is better than cure. The causes of the frightful poverty we have about us is not, I think, far to seek. And if the suspicions that are lurking in the mind of the public can only be turned into convictions, sentiment will have to give way to common sense, the exercise of a little of which would wipe out the greatest blot upon the Christian civilization of the 19th century."

House of Commons Committee.

The select committee of the House of Commons, appointed to consider the prevalent distress and the increase of the unemployed, having elected Mr. Campbell Bannerman, chairman, has begun to hear evidence. The first witness was Sir Hugh Owen, permanent secretary to the Local Government Board, which has oversight of the administration of the poor law throughout the United Kingdom. In Sir Hugh Owen's opinion, the severe weather was the immediate cause of the unexceptional distress prevailing. Before the frost set in the amount of distress did not appear to be exceptional, but after the cold weather began, in some of the working class districts, applications for relief increased to an enormous extent. Pauperism in the metropolis was greater in the first week of February than in the same period in any year since 1874. The Local Government Board had issued a circular to local authorities, suggesting the provision of work for the unemployed when the circumstances of the district admitted of it.

Mr. McDougall (Cape Breton).

Keir Hardie, M.P., Asks for £100,000.

Keir Hardie, M.P., a member of the committee, was the next witness. He said he desired to correct the impression left by the evidence of Sir Hugh Owen as to the extent to which destitution prevailed. His point was that, outside what might be called the official view of the situation, there was a great deal of distress of which the select committee were specially called to take cognizance. In practically every industrial centre in the country there was an unemployed committee, with whom he was in regular correspondence. The report of the unemployed committee was that in Leeds, exclusive of those in receipt of parochial relief, there were 10,000 absolutely destitute. The secretary of the Dockers' Union in Liverpool, who was also the labour correspondent to the Board of Trade, telegraphed him: "Estimated number unemployed 18,000 destitute men, women and children, about 15,000 apart from poor law statistics." From Glasgow he was informed there were 5,000 destitute families and 8,000 unemployed. The trades council of West Ham undertook a census of the entire borough during January, a large number of workers being engaged in the undertaking, and the result showed that of those visited 44,690 were wage-earners, that of this number 28,383 were in full work, 6,176 were casually employed, and 10,131 were out of work. With the existing state of matters the guardians found themselves unable to cope. All over the country special relief committees were at work. It would, however, be a mistake to assume that when the severe weather passed the distress would pass with it. There would remain a large number of persons unable to find employment, whose lot would probably be worse than in ordinary years in consequence of the charitable funds being exhausted. What he would suggest would be that a sum sufficient to meet the requirements of the case, say, £100,000, should be set apart by the Treasury to supplement local effort.

Mr. J. Wilson (Durham)—What is the sum total of the unemployed, according to your returns?—The returns are not complete yet, but the sum total will not fall far short of a million and three-quarters.

And how far would the £100,000 go in the way of relieving destitution?—According to the rate which relief is now being given, it would probably last out to the end of March, when the spring brings extra employment.

Liverpool Workhouses Overcrowded.

At a meeting of the Liverpool Workhouse Committee a report was read showing that there were 3,792 inmates of the workhouse. This was the highest number ever recorded, and was attributed to the severe weather. The overcrowding rendered it very difficult for the work to be properly performed in every department. Dr. Alexander wrote that the infirmary wards were stuffy and unhealthy. A letter from Dr. Robertson stated that the medical staff was greatly overworked in consequence of the increased number of patients, and two of the medical gentlemen had broken down. He suggested that an additional house surgeon should be appointed, as these were insufficient to cope with the work. No fewer than seven nurses were off duty ill, and the wards in the hospital set aside for measles were being utilized for medical cases. It was at present impossible to take in measles cases for the corporation. The clerk said he had instructed Dr. Robertson to get additional medical assistance, if absolutely necessary, and, as regarded the nursing staff, all that could be said was to hope that the present state of things would end with an improvement in the weather, as it was impossible to get nurses. At a meeting of the Toxteth Park (Liverpool) guardians statistics presented showed that there were 1,079 inmates of the workhouses, compared with 1,069 last week and 979 at the same period of last year. It was reported to the West Derby (Liverpool) guardians that there were 2,092 inmates in the Walton workhouse, as compared with 2,049 the preceding week and 1,925 in the corresponding week of last year; while there were 361 persons in the Belmont road workhouse, as against 369 last week and 328 in the corresponding period of last year. The Mill road infirmary contained 709 patients, the numbers in the preceding week and corresponding period of last year being 676 and 606. The crowded state of the workhouses in Liverpool and suburbs is the more notable in presence of the exceptional efforts made outside of the poor law to cope with the distress. The city police force has been utilized as a relieving agency, and, with generous help from the public has been enabled to dispense relief in the best manner in the emergency. Many other agencies are also working in the same cause, while there is a great deal of indiscriminate giving.

That is a statement which I think is worthy of the consideration of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, when, in the face of the conditions that have existed in this country during the last fifteen years under the present Administration, they talk of a change that would bring about such a system of government as they have in the old country, under which circumstances of that kind are published. Nothing could be more wrong than the advocacy by these hon. gentlemen of a policy which would bring us to the brink of the danger of arriving at such a condition of things as is illustrated in that article.

Now, there is one industry in which I take a more particular interest than other industries to which I have made reference, that is, the coal industry. In the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, and Prince Edward Island we have no coal deposits. Practically, our coal properties are limited to the province of Nova Scotia; and the coal properties under development are largely confined to the constituency which I have the honour to represent. We have large undeveloped coal areas in some of the other counties in the province of Nova Scotia, and we have, also, some undeveloped areas in the province of New Brunswick. Previous to the adoption of the National Policy we had practically no market for our coal in the lower provinces, particularly in the eastern portion of the province of Nova Scotia. We had coal mines at Pictou and at Cumberland, which occupied more central positions within the province than the coal mines of the county of Cape Breton. These coal mines, therefore, had an advantage in our local markets over the coal mines of Cape Breton. In the year 1850, the total production of coal in the province of Nova Scotia, including Pictou and Cape Breton—the coal in the county of Cumberland was not developed at that time—amounted to 180,084 tons, of which 118,173 tons, or about 66 per cent of the total output were marketed in the United States. This sale of coal was made in the face of a duty, at that time, of 24 per cent. That duty was continued for three years. In 1854 we got free access for our coal to the markets of the United States, and, during that year, our sales there amounted to 139,125 tons, while our total production was 234,812 tons. We enjoyed the advantage of that free entry up to 1867, with the result that in 1866 we had increased our sales to the United States to 404,252 tons, and our total production to 558,520 tons. The bulk of our coal was marketed in the United States. In 1867 the United States imposed a duty of $1.25 a ton on our coal, which practically shut it out of that market. We struggled with the industry up to 1878, when our sales in the United States had come down to 88,000 tons, and subsequently to about 13,000 tons. The duty of $1.25 was continued till the year 1872, when it was reduced to 75 cents a ton; yet that did not give us any advantage, because the coal industry of the United States had arrived at such a state of development during the time the duty of $1.25 was imposed against us, that it was impossible for us again to gain entry into the markets of the United States, even with the duty reduced to 75 cents a ton. In 1878, and, if I remember rightly, a year or two previous to that, an appeal was made to our representatives in this House for protection to our coal industry—such protection as would give us a home market within the Dominion, which was then being supplied by the coal mines of the United States. This House, at that time governed by the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, refused any concession of that kind to our coal producers. In 1878 the present Secretary of State announced to this House and the people of the constituency I represent, his policy for the protection of our coal industry, and for promoting its development. The hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) addressing a meeting of 7,000 people, largely mining people, in the county of Cape Breton, stated that if his party were returned to power, they would adopt the policy known as the National Policy, which had for its object the protection of the native industries of the country, among them, the coal industry. The people of that county, and the people of Canada, took the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) and his leader, the late Sir John A. Macdonald, at their word. The people returned them to power, and on their advent to power they gave us protection on coal. I propose to show the results of that protection. I might say that at that very time I had the honour myself of being a representative, for the first time, to Parliament in the Assembly of my province, and I remember very distinctly that one of the first acts I undertook on behalf of the people of my county was to ask my colleagues in Parliament and in the government to provide some means of coming to the relief of the suffering miners of my county. We had a large number of mining people out of employment, without means and without credit, and we were obliged to seek aid from the government for them, in the distressing circumstances in which they found themselves, owing to the want of that legislation which they had asked this House to provide years before, but which this House refused to provide. The aid was granted in some cases, as shown by the official records. I thought it my duty to ask as little as possible, because the more generally this aid was distributed to our people, the less could any one particular locality be entitled to. However, I was able to get some aid for those who were in most distressed circumstances. Sir, that was the last time I had to ask for aid on behalf of our mining classes. A change of government took place here and a change of policy as well, happily for the country and happily in particular for our coal industries. To-day, instead of those people being in need of assistance, they have money deposited in the banks, they have very comfortable homes, and they live as well as any class of people from one end of this land to the other. I might refer to a circumstance which did make a little difference in the comforts of those people, within the last year or two, to a considerable extent. As hon. gentlemen of this House are aware, the system under which our coal mines are operated underwent a change two years ago. This change brought about a change in many other ways, and as a consequence a few at least of our people cannot call themselves as comfortable or as regularly employed as they used to be from the time that this policy of protection for coal was inaugurated until the change referred to.

Now, in 1878, our total production of coal was only 770,603 tons. We marketed that coal as follows:—

88,475 tons	(largely slack)	in the United States.
61,861	"	in Newfoundland.
83,710	"	in the province of Quebec.
115,245	"	in the province of New Brunswick.
279,172	"	in the province of Nova Scotia.

Well, Sir, after the experience of this policy of protection, we find that our coal mines in the year 1894 were able to produce 2,109,742 tons of coal instead of 770,000 tons which they produced at the inception of this policy and which they had the greatest possible difficulty marketing even then. Well, where did they find a market for this coal? Not in the United States. We find that in the province of Quebec instead of a market of 83,000 tons, such as we had in 1878, we have a market now for 877,743 tons. In New Brunswick we have a market for 221,000 tons; in Prince Edward Island we have a market for 63,000 tons; and in Newfoundland we have a market for 97,000 tons. In the United States we marketed only 79,000 tons; and in Nova Scotia the total consumption has increased from 279,000 to 671,883 tons, and our exports to the West Indies and other countries amount to 7,323 tons. Here is a total production of 2,109,742 tons nearly all marketed in our own country, used by our own people, used for the development of the industries of the country, used for the operation of railways, used in every possible way in which fuel can be used. Well, then, instead of having to go to the United States or any foreign country for a market for our coal, we created by this policy, a market for ourselves, and control it for ourselves to a very large extent. We have, however, coming to this country a quantity of coal still from the United States, and I regret very much that we have that quantity of coal coming into this country. We have coming into the province of Ontario principally the bulk of our total importations, and I would like to point out that it is the duty of this Government, to go a step further in order to give us better facilities for reaching more of our own markets than we can reach now. I refer to the improvement of our canals, to the necessity for deepening those canals at whatever cost, so long as it is within reasonable bounds. Nothing could be done that would tend more to increase the importance and improve the trade volume of this country, particularly between the lower provinces and the upper provinces, than the deepening of our canals and making it possible for our ships from the east to reach the furthest west. I say that the industries of the country are such as to furnish sufficient trade to make it possible for vessels to obtain cargoes going west and return with cargoes going east. With opportunities of that kind, I do not think that there is any object for which the moneys of the people of this country could be better used than for the purpose of creating means by which interprovincial trade could thus be developed. I have no desire to see the debt of this country increased more than is absolutely necessary, but I am quite willing to take the responsibility of supporting any measure of this House which will have for its object the improvement of our natural channels of trade. From the time I occupied this seat up to now, I have given my earnest support to the building of railways from one end of Canada to the other, and I have no reason to regret my course. Whether it be a railway that went thousands of miles to the west, or one that came past my door, I feel I only perform a duty that I owe to my country and the people, when I support measures brought before this House for the building of railways. We have seen a good deal, within the past few years, of the efforts made by the people of the United States to protect their coal industry. An effort was made by a certain portion of the people of the United States, a few years ago, to obtain free coal, but the number of people who made the effort in that direction was very small. But, when we learn that such a strong protest was made by the bulk of the people of the United States against interfering with the protection of that industry in that country, we should at once see the necessity for making similar efforts to maintain the protection we have upon the industry in this country. Having been able to increase our production from what it was in 1878 to what it is to-day, having increased our production and created a market within our own territory, it is our duty to stand by that industry as loyally as by any other in the country. In the United States the quantity of coal mined is about 180,000,000 tons, an average of three tons for every man, woman and child in the country. In Canada we mine a quantity equal to only about three-quarters of a ton per head of our population. If the United States can mine three tons per head and find a market for that quantity, is that not of itself a reason why we should follow the plan under which they built up that industry? For this industry is one which employs a very large number of people. It employs railways; it employs our shipping; and those who are engaged in mining and transporting coal are in the mass large consumers of the productions of other classes. If the people of the United States have good reason for standing by their own protective policy and preserving their own markets, thereby developing this industry and giving employment to a large number of people, is it not doubly necessary for us to take the same course with regard to our coal industry? We find that last year there were produced in the whole of Canada, including British Columbia as well as the lower provinces, 3,719,170 tons of coal. The exports from the province of British Columbia amount to 908,232 tons, and those from the province of Nova Scotia to 111,731 tons, a total export of 1,019,963 tons, leaving for consumption in Canada coal of our own production to the amount of 2,699,207 tons. We have an import into the Dominion of 1,603,154 tons of anthracite, and 1,500,550 tons of soft coal, a total of 3,103,704 tons. Thus we find that we consume in Canada 2,083,741 tons more than we produce. It becomes the duty of the people, if we are going to adhere to their policy, to adopt such means as will give us the benefit of at least the principal part of that market of over two millions consumed beyond the amount of production, seeing that they are able to produce three tons of coal for every man, woman and child in their country, while we produce only three-quarters of a ton. But if, as I said before, our channels of trade are improved, we shall be able to send coal into Ontario, and if we do we shall take in exchange from Ontario the products of the industries in which the people there are engaged, and not the products of Ontario industries alone, but the products of those west of Ontario.

Now, I should like to occupy a little of the time of the House in reading a few extracts from statements made by gentlemen in the United States on the subject of trade relations with Canada, in the course of which they made reference to the coal industry. The committee of the United States Senate in 1889 dealt with this question of trade relations with Canada. I find that a gentleman, Mr. J. L. Batchelder, of the Boston Coal Association, was the first witness. He is reported to have said:

The duty on soft coal into Canada is 60 cents per 2,000 pounds, which is about the same as the duty upon Nova Scotia coal imported into this country, which is 75 cents per 2,240 pounds. The Canadians have no anthracite coal, so impose no duty upon such coal, consequently we send there yearly about 2,000,000 tons.

They do not send us 2,000,000 tons, but only about 1,500,000 tons.

If the duties upon coal should be removed it would make no difference in our sales of anthracite coal in Canada, while as regard soft coal, the 30,000 tons that we take from Canada now might be increased to 60,000 tons—

Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, the increase they are willing to allow us with free entry of coal into the United States is only twice as much as their imports of our coal that year or a total of 60,000 tons. During the past year, I think, our sales amounted to between 60,000 and 70,000 tons. They believed that so thoroughly was their coal business developed that we would find it impossible to get into the markets of the United States against their product. He goes on to say further:

With the duty off, Canadian coal landed here would be higher than Pennsylvania coal, for it would not be laid down here so cheaply as can our own coal.

Now, if we adopted a system of free trade in coal with the United States what would be the result? While we have now a market for from 800,000 to 1,000,000 tons within the province of Quebec for consumption in parts of Ontario as well as Quebec, we should lose that market, and should gain only an increased market for 30,000 or 40,000 tons, according to their calculation. This would be the result of the change which so many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are so anxious to bring about. Another gentleman who gave evidence was Mr. F. H. Odiorne. He said :

The shipments of coal from Nova Scotia have been declining for a number of years, due to the fact that development of mines in this country has so stimulated competition as to reduce the price of coal to a point that cuts off Canadian competition.

The total production of coal in Nova Scotia in 1887 was 1,519,684 tons, and in 1888, 1,576,692 tons. The total shipments in 1887 to the United States were 73,882 tons, and in 1888 they were 30,198 tons. The removal of the duty on coal would doubtless enable them to sell 50,000 tons of coal here in New England. For our iron industry we should get no coal from Nova Scotia, for they have none that can be compared with ours. The Pictou coal alone would be suitable for use in the iron industry, and its use, even with the duty removed, would be impracticable, because of the expense. The removal of the duty would simply lead to reciprocity, and then we should sell more soft coal in Canada.

Well, later on in that investigation, Mr. L. G. Burnham said :

He favoured reciprocity, believing it would be a benefit to the whole country, and that as far as the coal trade is concerned, its sales would be largely increased in that country, while importations of coal would not be increased to any extent. In 1885 we exported from this country to Canada, of anthracite and bituminous coal, 1,900,000 tons ; in 1887 a little over 2,000,000 tons, and in 1888, upwards of 3,000,000. During that time we imported a very small portion, probably about 1,000,000 tons of bituminous coal from the British provinces. Our coal is much better, and has nothing to fear from Canadian competition.

Now, I do not wish to detain the House by quoting many extracts, but I will quote one more, and that is from the evidence of Mr. Jonathan A. Lane, president of Boston Merchants' Association. He gave evidence as follows :—

He thought that commercial union offered the only practical solution of our commercial relations with Canada—

I wish hon. gentlemen on the other side to make a note of this. There was a time when they were interested in commercial union.

—that under such conditions there would result an enormous increase in the trade between the two countries, and that our industries would be greatly stimulated. Under such conditions, too, a vast and magnificent field would be opened to American enterprise and capital, and when it is remembered that Alaska returns a 25 per cent dividend, the possible value of this country (Canada) to our capital can be estimated. To Senator Hoar, Mr. Lane stated that the association for which he appeared represented men of all shades of political predilections, but that in this matter they forgot politics, and regarded the question from a business standpoint only.

It will be seen that Mr. Lane is in favour of commercial union. He is very frank, too, in giving his reasons for desiring such an arrangement. He was even more frank a few hours later on the same day, when, addressing his brother merchants at the close of the Merchants' Week, he then put it this way—and I would like the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) to make a note of it, as he is speaking about relations with the United States :

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton).

Speaking of our relations with Canada, he said that that was a part of our country which was unfortunately left out at the time of the revolution. He then spoke in favour of reciprocity with Canada, and said that people had but little idea of the value of its resources to this country. A great deal is heard of forming closer relations with the countries of South America and it is said that it is time for us to push our trade in that direction, but there are many obstacles in the way. There are, however, no obstacles to our gobbling up our neighbours on the north.

Sir, this is the language of Mr. Lane, president of the Boston Merchants' Association, this was his scheme for "gobbling up Canada," this was his scheme for "gobbling up the country to the north" of the United States ; and I presume this House may consider that language a good explanation of the reason why we heard so much in this House, and out of it, throughout Canada, about commercial relations with the United States, and the question of commercial union. However, these gentlemen in their evidence said nothing about unrestricted reciprocity. Now, there is a class of people in this country who use very strong arguments to the effect that the manufacturers and other people engaged in small industries in this country, are affected by the imposition of this duty on coal. Now, instead of giving arguments to this House from our own standpoint, from the knowledge we should have with regard to the consumption of coal in our own industries, I will take the liberty of giving to the House some of the arguments used by people in the United States interested in this industry, when it was proposed that the duty on coal entering the United States should be abolished. I think these arguments should hold good in behalf of our contention. Our coal consumers consist chiefly of our manufacturers, and our railway and steamboat companies. Now, while I admit that our railway people pay the great bulk of the duties that are paid on coal coming from the United States and the lower provinces, I contend, at the same time, that the development of this country which has brought about a condition of trade that provides business for these railways, ought to be a justification for asking these railway people to give some consideration for the benefit they receive ; while a certain portion of our people are engaged in the mining interest, and while that industry should be protected as affording a means of livelihood for themselves, and as a means of investment, it is only fair that those who get the benefit of the development of that trade, of the interchange of commodities that are produced in the various provinces, and the greater part of which pass over these railways—it is only fair, I say, that these railway people should be compelled to pay their own proportion of the expense of the government of this country in that way. Now, Mr. Wm. Connell, the president of the Anthracite Coal Operators' Association of the United States, believes that the repeal of the duty on bituminous coal will seriously injure the anthracite coal industry, though no duty is now levied on anthracite coal. He is reported as saying :

It is a common delusion that our anthracite industry is not concerned in this matter. Apart from the general fact, upon which the entire protectionist system is based, that you cannot cut off a finger or a toe of the body politic without sending a thrill of pain throughout the entire system, I desire to say that our own community is directly interested. The figures of anthracite production for the past few years show that the present growth is almost entirely confined to the smaller sizes—pea and buckwheat—and more especially buckwheat—are being used more and more for mechanical and industrial purposes. The demand for these sizes naturally comes from the east, from New England, New York, and seaboard area. Put Nova Scotia bituminous coal into these markets at prices underselling the home anthracite shipper, and what do you do? You destroy his market, curtail his opportunities for trade growth, and by just that much inflict a blow upon all those industries and activities that hinge upon the steady operation of our anthracite mines.

If this argument holds good in regard to the removal of the United States duty off coal coming into that country, with how much stronger force must the same argument apply to our position, when we consider that a country that has brought that industry to the state of development to which the United States coal industry is at present, with a total production of 179,000,000 tons, with a home market for every ton of it, with a capacity for yearly increase in production, and a corresponding increase of consumption. Coming again to the argument that certain classes of the people, such as the industrial classes, pay this duty. I find this argument was used in behalf of the coal producers of the United States when this question was being discussed with a view to the removal of the duty on coal in the neighbouring country :

In 1889, the last year for which we have complete statements, 299,559 persons were employed in coal mining. Not another of the mining industries employed 100,000. Iron ore production employed but 38,707, not quite one-eighth as many; gold and silver production together, but about one-sixth, lead not one-tenth, and even the quarrying of all kinds of stone only about one-third. Not a single manufacturing industry employed as many persons. The nearest approach is lumber mills, which employed 286,197; the second manufacturing industry in rank on the basis of employees is foundry and machine shop, the third clothing manufacturing, and the fourth cotton goods. Coal mining employs 100,000 more persons than boot and shoe making, including factory and customs work and repairing, 200,000 more than furniture making, 150,000 more than iron and steel furnaces and rolling mills, 200,000 more than the manufacture of cigars and cigarettes, 80,000 more than the manufacture of calico goods, 175,000 more than woollen and worsted mills, and 250,000 more than the manufacturing of silk and silk goods.

There is another reason why they demand consideration for this industry in legislation in the United States, which is put as follows :—

We, therefore, insist that in view of its importance as an employer of labour, in view of the large sum paid annually in wages, and in view of the relation between wages at the mines and value of production, in all of which stands pre-eminent among the manufacturing and mining industries of the United States, coal mining demands a consideration that it has not received in framing tariff legislation.

In but five states of the union, viz., New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Ohio and Illinois, did the total number of persons engaged in all manufacturing industries, and the total wages paid in the industries exceed the total number of persons engaged or the wages paid in the United States in the production of this article that has been contemptuously termed a raw material.

I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite, and more particularly the leader of the Opposition, term coal raw material. A further argument was used, to this effect :

An industry that can make such a showing, that employed 299,559 persons in 1889, and 341,943 in 1892, that paid $109,130,928 in wages in 1889, and $138,596,278 in 1892, is entitled to demand that no legislation shall be proposed, much less enacted, that shall in any measure interfere with its prosperity. It insists that it shall not be injured to give sanction to a phrase, "free raw material," and above everything else it denies the right of Congress to injure its multitude of workmen in the interest of any other industry.

Nor should this industry be injured that the coal miners and producers of other countries may be benefited. American producers and American workmen who work and produce in the United States are entitled to our market against all comers, even if those who would enter them are American citizens who choose to invest their capital in other countries. That the capital now invested in Cape Breton mines is largely from the United States is no reason why the protection now given coal should be reduced or removed in order that this coal may take some of our markets. Indeed, in view of the fact that this capital pays a tribute to the government of Nova Scotia on every ton of coal it helps to produce, it would seem just that it should bring something to the government of the United States.

If this argument is good for the United States, why should it not be good for us? As to the cost of fuel in some of those industries, I beg to quote the following :—

Among the chief industries in New England are the manufacture of textiles and boots and shoes. The total value of the manufactures of wool in the United States in 1890 was $338,231,109, the total value of all fuel used in this production was $3,894,492, or 1.15 per cent. The value of all cotton manufactures in 1890 was $267,981.

721, and of the fuel used in this production, $4,252,088, or 1.58 per cent. In the New England states the total value of all cotton manufactures was $181,112,453, and the value of fuel consumed, $3,113,008, or 1.71 per cent, a little above the average. These are census figures and show in these industries, at least, how fallacious is the claim that free coal will or could reduce the price to the consumer.

These figures show the fallacy of the claim that free coal would reduce the price of fuel. I quote the following:—

This can be shown still more definitely. In a brochure on "Free Coal for New England," Col. Wm. Lamb says: "Mr. Galloway C. Morris, of Philadelphia, informs me that the mills of Fall River produced in 1891, 602,850,000 yards of finished material on a consumption of 177,300 tons of coal. Allowing the full duty of 75 cents per ton to be the increase of the cost of this coal to the mills by reason of the duty (which I do not, however, admit), then the additional cost of producing this amount of goods by reason of the tariff is .022 cent per yard.

I might quote opinions on the same lines with respect to the cost of coal, in carpet, woollen, boot and shoe manufactures. This opinion is expressed:

In view of all these facts, is it not absurd to demand free coal in order that cost of manufactured products to consumers may be reduced? Even if the price of coal in New England were reduced by the amount of the duty, and experience shows it would not be, the reduction per unit would be so small as to make it impossible to reduce the retail selling price as a result.

These are facts which I have thought necessary to submit to the House, not only in favour of maintaining our present duty on coal, but in favour of increasing, if possible, that protection, and make it so that our coal producers could command a greater portion of the market within our own country. It is unreasonable for us to expect that we have any chance of getting admission to outside markets. I say, however, that we have a chance of developing our market more than is at present done, and we should have a chance of improving the facilities for reaching our market, and thereby increasing our production, and, at the same time, increasing the demand for the commodities that our people require, and which are produced in other parts of the Dominion to which we look as a market for our coal. It is unreasonable for our neighbours to expect that we will give them free coal and be taxed on articles that furnish them means for carrying on business in this country. With these remarks, with which I am sorry to have detained the House, I beg to say that, from my knowledge of the general condition of business throughout the country, and of the state of development of our various industries, under the present Administration, the people of Canada have no reason whatever to desire a change, to accept any of what appear to be the foolish and absurd propositions which emanate from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton).

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McDougall) has given the House a very long address, in which he has endeavoured to point out some of the particular advantages of the National Policy to the province from which he comes. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall), in the course of his remarks, suggested that the duty on coal should be increased. Well, I do not know how far the manufacturers of Ontario and the manufacturers of the western part of this Dominion, are prepared to comply with a suggestion of that kind. The present duty on coal tends to increase the cost of manufacturing, and it has been a serious draft upon those who are engaged in many lines of industry. I doubt that they would be prepared to accept further burdens in that line. Of course my hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) is largely interested in the coal question, and I presume he does not feel any sympathy with those who are struggling under the burden of taxation imposed by the present tariff.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Will the hon. gentleman excuse me a moment. I have not one cent interest in coal, nor never had.

Mr. McMULLEN. The section of the province from which the hon. gentleman comes is deeply interested in coal, and no doubt he would like very much that the duty should be increased in order to shut out any chance of competition there might be, and any chance of our manufacturers getting cheap coal. My hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) referred to the amount of tonnage that passed the "Sault" Canal last year, as an evidence of prosperity. But if the hon. gentleman would analyse the statistics in that connection he would find that about 90 per cent is American tonnage, and that only 10 per cent comes to or from Canada. It is all nonsense to try and base an argument in favour of the National Policy on any such matter as that. The hon. gentleman is a resident of Grand Narrows. He has taken quite an interest in the Intercolonial Railway, and he has commended the vast expenditure of the Government on that line. No doubt the hon. gentleman feels that, because I understand that the operators of the road at the present time are very kind to him. I believe that the train which passes the Grand Narrows stops half an hour there to enable the passengers to visit his hotel and spend their money. That is no doubt a very great advantage to him and doubtless he feels very grateful for the privilege. The hon. gentleman spoke about the net interest we pay on our national debt, and he told us that the per capita burden was less now than it was some years ago. I quite admit that paper and ink can produce almost anything, but the answer to all such arguments is simply this: In 1878, when the Mackenzie Government went out of power, the total revenue of the country was about $23,000,000, and taking the population of that time as 4,000,000, this would give a tax of $5.75 per head. Now, my hon. friend will not deny that our present revenue is about $38,000,000, and taking our population at 5,000,000, if he figures out that correctly, he will find that our present tax amounts to $7.60 per head. That is a complete answer to the miscalculation of the hon. gentleman. He talks with regard to free goods, and he says that $50,000,000 worth of free goods are admitted into Canada. That may be true, but let me ask him, what advantage is that to the people generally? Are not the goods admitted free for the purpose of helping the interests of the manufacturers? Does he not know that a manufacturer can import goods free of duty, but that anybody else importing similar goods is charged a very high duty. Take, if you like, the simple article of window blinds. If a man manufacturing window blinds imports linen of a certain width he gets it free of duty, but if another man wants to import it, not for that purpose, he has to pay the duty. In that way a great many manufacturers are permitted the advantage of having, even manufactured commodities, imported free, not because they are in a raw condition, but simply because they enter into use in connection with some manufacturing concern. This is the reason why there is such a large amount of goods admitted free of duty. It is a benefit to the manufacturers, but what benefit is it to the people at large. The hon. gentleman took credit to his party for having reduced the duty on tea. Well, Sir, the reason they removed the tax from tea was simply because the Americans had removed it, and they found that if they continued it, the difference in the price to the people of this country, as compared with what was paid in the United States, would be such a glaring evidence of the increased taxation to which our people were subjected, that the Government thought it was better to remove that tax on tea. The hon. gentleman spoke of the English Stamp Act, and he says that, if they have free trade, yet they have the Stamp Act in force. Surely my hon. friend is not so ignorant of the history of the Stamp Act as to charge that it was introduced at the same time as the introduction of free trade. England had a Stamp Act long before they had free trade, and it is only a remnant of their old system of taxation which has not yet been wiped out. Then, again, the hon. gentleman told us about failures in this country, and he said that during the years of the Mackenzie Administration there were more failures than during the term of office of the present Government. Well, Sir, if the hon. gentleman looks over the records for the present year he will find that there never before were so many business suspensions in Canada. There never has been greater financial depression in the country than at the present time, and the best evidence of the fact is that large failures are taking place almost every day throughout the Dominion. The public press of the country will bear me out in that regard. If he wishes for any other evidences of the positive pecuniary difficulties of our people, let the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) go over the chattel mortgages in the different counties and towns and cities of Canada, and he will find that more such mortgages have been filed during the past few months than ever were filed in Canada before. That is a clear indication that our people are suffering from serious financial depression. When a man is driven to the necessity of chattel mortgaging his household furniture and his stock, that is positive evidence that his financial condition is becoming exceedingly embarrassing; and if you look at the files of mortgages, you will find that up to the present time there have been more chattel mortgages in Canada, week after week, and day after day, from midsummer last, down to the present time, than ever there have been before. That is one of the most reliable of proofs that the people of the country are financially embarrassed. The hon. gentleman talked about the poverty of England under free trade. Well, Sir, the record of England under free trade is the brightest this world affords of the progress and prosperity of any nation. When England adopted free trade in 1846, her national debt was £850,000,000, but since that time she has reduced her debt by over $900,000,000, notwithstanding that she has during the same period paid the cost of all her wars, including the Crimean war, the Indian mutiny, and others requiring immense expenditure on the part of the nation. She has reduced the number of her paupers over 50 per cent. She has reduced the number of prisoners in jails over 70 per cent. She has enormously improved the general condition of the people who were formerly suffering under the heel of the system of protection. The labouring and industrial classes of England—indeed, all classes—were never in a better, or more prosperous, or progressive condition than they are to-day under free trade. The best evidence of that fact is, that you do not find these classes agitating for a return to protection. There is some little agitation for protection amongst the farmers, who fancy that it might do them some good, although the more intelligent of them clearly realize that, if they had protection, it would only be a very short time till the landlords would pocket all the advantages the farmers would gain from protection, by correspondingly increasing rents. The hon. gentleman dealt very exhaustively with the question of coal. He looks upon that industry as a very important one in the section from which he comes, and, I presume, that he advocates the continuation of the duty upon coal simply because he thinks it would tend to increase the number of miners employed, and generally to improve the condition of the people in the county he represents.

Now, Sir, I wish to deal with a general question, that is, the question of our national debt. I claim that what a debt is to an individual, what it is to a city or to a province, it is also to the Dominion. A man who is suffering under financial embarrassments, resulting from his borrowing large sums of money for which he has mortgaged his property, realizes the same experience that this Dominion is virtually realizing to-day. What is the fact? We have to-day a net debt of $253,074,927, to which we may add a considerable sum on account of the deficits of last year and the present year. The present Government have increased the debt, since they took office to the 30th June, 1895, by $15,541,716, or, an average yearly increase of $3,108,343—an addition for every day the sun rose since they took office of $8,516. The anticipated increase from the deficiencies to which I have referred, to the 30th of June, 1896, amounts to $4,250,000. Now, if we refer to the very large amounts of interest which this country has been paying on its national debt, we shall find out, to some extent at least, the reason for the enormous drain of money to which our people have been subjected. In 1891 we paid for interest on our national debt, $9,584,136.74, and for charges of management $184,711.47. In 1892 the interest on the public debt was $9,763,978.34, and the charges of management were $176,036.62. In 1893 we paid for interest on the public debt $9,806,888.45, and for charges of management $212,690.83. In 1894 we paid for interest on the public debt $10,212,596.13, and for charges of management $166,444.39. In 1895 the interest on the public debt was $10,466,294.44, and the charges of management were $162,590.31. To these sums should be added commission and exchange, but, omitting them, I find that in those five years we have paid in interest and charges of management, $50,736,377.72. I have given these figures to show how gradually and how certainly our interest charges are increasing from year to year. That sum makes an average payment of $10,147,273.54 every year for the last five years. Now, the interest on the public debt for the year ending 30th June, 1895, was $10,466,294.44, the charges of management $162,590.31, and the premium, discount and exchange, $116,359.91, which makes a total payment for that year on account of the public debt of $10,745,244.66, or $29,439 for every day, or the price of seven farms at $4,200 apiece. That is the amount it takes every day to pay the interest on our national debt. If an accountant worked ten hours per day, every day except Sunday, he would have to count over to a person on the other side of the counter prepared to receive the interest money, $3,433 every hour, or $34,330 every day, to pay the interest on our national debt. This is a very important matter, when we look at it in this way. When we realize what an enormous drain this is upon the resources of this country, is it any wonder that our people are becoming impoverished? This Government have increased the debt of this country in seventeen years by $112,712,857.18. At 4 per cent, which the interest amounts to, when you include the cost of management, premium, discount and exchange, this requires $4,508,514.28 of interest every year. This means that they have increased our interest for every day, of 313 days, in the year by $14,404, or $1,440 per hour for every day of ten hours, since they came into office. In 1894-95 the deficit, as I have already said, was $4,153,875.58. Now, to show where some of this money is gone is exceedingly important, and I will draw attention to some of the things in which it has been largely invested. When the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie went out of power in 1878, the Intercolonial Railway was 744 miles long, the total cost of that line was $36,091,065.85, and the capital account of that line was then closed. But when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, they reopened that capital account, and added to the mileage of that road to the extent of 653½ miles. It was understood at confederation that the Intercolonial was a necessity. It was a necessity from two standpoints. First, if possible, to increase the interprovincial trade; and in the second place, to give us an outlet to the sea-board, independent of our neighbours. For these purposes, it became a part of our contract at confederation, but there was no understanding that it should be added to, to the extent to which it has been. If these additions had been lucrative investments, if they had paid the interest which the country is called upon to pay on them, no one would have objected; but, notwithstanding the fact that now there is something over $55,000,000 sunk in that road, on which the people are paying $2,200,000 per year interest, for which we do not get one brass farthing in return, it has not yet earned sufficient to meet the annual expenditure in any one year. That is the condition of the road to-day. We were to have one ocean port, but I find we have now no less than six. The total capital expenditure I have already given, and the increase in seventeen years on the mileage and construction of the Intercolonial has added a further expenditure to capital account of $18,916,873.35; and by the expenditure of that money, there has been added to the interest charge of the people of this Dominion, $756,674.92 per annum, or $2,417.50 for every day in the year.

Now, we come to examine into some of the transactions in which the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) took an active part when he was Minister of Railways. We all remember Mr. Onderdonk and his contract for the western section of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We know very well, from the records, that that contract was let to Mr. Onderdonk, a Californian contractor, at something like $226,000 over and above another tender. The objection on that occasion was that the other tender was only marked good for three days, but that point was adjusted. That was made right, but, after all, the tender was awarded to Mr. Onderdonk. After that, the specifications were reduced, so that $200,000 more in the way of an advantage was given to Mr. Onderdonk. These altogether amounted to $426,000, which he had the advantage of starting with. Then, afterwards, when we came to deal with him, at the winding up of the contract, under an arbitration that was held, it was declared that we had to take over a certain quantity of rolling stock; and that arbitration awarded Mr. Onderdonk $72,665 for that rolling stock. But the Government, for some reasons that have never been made plain to this House, and through some influence which they have never explained, allowed the award to be raised to $202,000. Then, again, the Government paid the Canadian Pacific Railway $15,000 for transporting the rolling stock to Quebec that was taken over. We were to get twenty-nine locomotives, and 397 flat cars; but in place of that, we only got eight locomotives and 180 flat cars; and in these various ways, a very considerable amount of money was lost on this western division. Take all these figures together:

On the contract	$ 220,000
Rolling stock award	202,000
Paid Canadian Pacific Railway for haulage	15,000
Award to Canadian Pacific Railway for imperfect work, the work not being done according to original contract.	575,000
Expenses of award	100,000
Total	1,118,000

So that, in all, we wasted, by careless contracting, or by giving to Mr. Onderdonk an advantage he never should have had, and for reasons that have never been explained to this House, the sum of $1,118,000 of the people's money.

It would take too long to go over all the different items whereby the annual drain on our treasury has been seriously increased, and to point out the sacrifices that have been made in the way of investments; but when we come to compare our country and its condition with the condition of the country across the border, we find that in Canada, where we have had peace, where we have had no war, of any consequence, and no extraordinary expenditure, our per capita tax is over $6.50, while the per capita tax of the United States is only about $5.75. And then the taxation of the United States is going downward, while the tendency of taxation in Canada is upward. It is said that in Canada the Dominion contributes considerable to each of the provinces, in the shape of a per capita allowance, and that the central Government in the United States pays no such contribution. That is very true, but in the United States the yearly pension expenditure was $145,086,249. That is something we have not got in Canada, and, besides, they have a diplomatic service which costs them $1,796,502. We have nothing of this kind, if we except our expenditure in connection with the offices of High Commissioner in London, and our agent in Paris—two officers who, in my opinion, have given no return to this country, whatever, for the money spent in keeping up them and their staff. Since 1869, the Americans have reduced their war debt over $60,000,000 a year, down to 1891, when it stood at $841,528,462, or $12.32 per capita, and interest, 37 cents per head. The net debt of the Dominion is over $50 per head, and the interest charge over $2 per head. This shows very clearly how rapidly we in Canada have been running into debt. We have been borrowing money in an exceedingly imprudent manner, and spending it still more imprudently. It has been wasted in enterprises that give us no return, and to-day we find ourselves in this position, that we are paying enormous interest, annually, upon money sunk in public works and improvements that are yielding very little or nothing in return. Since confederation, there has been spent on public works, about $225,000,000, and about $60,000,000 on Dominion lands. How much has been wasted in our expenditure on public improvements? Investigation shows that on an expenditure of $3,000,000, there was stolen or lost, $964,000, or 33 per cent. Take the value of the lands we have given away, at $2 per acre, we have given away $120,000,000. Take cash paid in taxes, or borrowed money, $225,000,000. This means $345,000,000 that we have spent, and if we have lost proportionately on all those sums expended what we lost in the McGreevy matter, the country has lost $115,000,000, which, no doubt, has found its way into the pockets of political sharks, anxious to get money in any shape, by contracts or otherwise.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

CANADA AND MICHIGAN BRIDGE AND TUNNEL COMPANY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 42) respecting the Canada and Michigan Bridge and Tunnel Company.—(Mr. Ingram).

(In the Committee.)

On section 2.

Mr. TISDALE moved:

That the clause be amended by adding after the word "bridge" in the second line the words "and its approaches."

This makes it clear that this clause applies to the approaches of the bridge, as well as to the bridge itself.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. INGRAM. Before the Bill is reported, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that a similar Bill is now before the Congress of the United States, and there, I understand, a gentleman representing one of the western states, proposes to introduce a certain amendment. That amendment, I understand, is in this line—to add a clause that the contractors of this work shall not employ any other class of labour but American labour. Having received word of this only this afternoon, I have been precluded from giving notice of an amendment. But, with the consent of the committee, I would like to move the following as an additional clause to the Bill:—

In the event of the Congress of the United States or the legislature of the state of Michigan passing any Act or making any amendment to the Detroit River Bridge Bill compelling the contractor or contractors to employ American labour only in the construction of such bridge on the American side of the river, the said contractor or contractors shall employ Canadian labour only on the Canadian side of the river.

I understand that there are members of Congress who are not in accord with the amendment suggested by the gentleman to whom I have referred, and they are desirous of having an expression of opinion, showing what Canadians think of such a section. So far as I am concerned, and I think I express the view of the majority of this House, and of those present in this committee, I believe Canadians do not appreciate amendments of this kind, especially on work such as this, to be built across an international river, and partly over Canadian waters, and partly over United States waters. It seems to me that a gentleman making such an amendment as that in Congress is entirely overstepping the mark, and I think that the proposal, if carried out, will tend to cause bad feeling between the two countries. I would be glad if hon. gentlemen present would give expression to such an opinion, deprecating any such proposal.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Of course, it is understood that this can be moved only with the consent of the committee, no notice having been given.

Mr. HAGGART. This is a very important amendment, and notice ought to be given of it.

Mr. INGRAM. I should have been glad to give notice had I had the opportunity. But surely the fact that no notice has been given does not debar hon. gentlemen in this House from saying whether they do or do not believe in the principle advocated by the representative in Congress of one of the western states. If such an amendment is carried, I shall be in a position, at a later stage, to move in this matter, which I intend to do.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I do not think there is any intention on the part of the committee to raise any objection to this amendment. If the Americans refuse to allow Canadians to cross the water and work on that great work, of course we should have the right to keep the work on this side the water for Canadians. I do not see how there could be any objection to that. This is an international bridge, and if they want their own people to work on their side, why should we not have the same right on our side?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Amendment withdrawn for the present.

Bill, as amended, reported, and read the third time, and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 41) respecting the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company.—(Mr. McGregor.)

Bill (No. 29) to amend the Act incorporating the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters.—(Mr. McGillivray.)

Bill (No. 34) to consolidate and amend certain Acts relating to the Nipissing and James Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

CHIGNECTO MARINE RAILWAY.

Mr. POWELL moved second reading of Bill (No. 59) respecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company. He said: This Bill, in the form in which it is now before the House, will have to be amended. Although I am responsible for the Bill and have it in hand, I may say that I had not read it, although I suppose I should have done so before it was really introduced. The sole object sought to be accomplished by the Bill is to extend the time for the completion of this work. There may be involved in the clauses as they are drawn here—in fact I so mentioned my opinion to the draughtsman of the Bill immediately after reading it—certain other privileges that are not intended at all to be compassed by this Bill. The sole object is to extend the time for the completion of the work, and I will undertake before the House that when the Bill gets into Committee of the Whole, it will be so amended as to meet the sole object its promoters have in view.

Mr. LAURIER. With the explanation that has just been given by my hon. friend, I would suggest to him that it would perhaps be more advisable to withdraw that Bill, and have it redrafted. The Bill, as it now reads, is misleading; and perhaps the hon. gentleman will better serve the interests he has in charge, if he adopts this suggestion. I understand that no time will be lost by it, that the Bill will hold the same rank as at present.

Mr. POWELL. The only question that arises is that of time. If I am assured that it will cause no additional delay. I will agree to the suggestion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suggest that the debate be adjourned till Monday, and that will enable the hon. gentleman to introduce the Bill in the proper form. I make that motion.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

IMPERIAL LIFE ASSURANCE CO.

Mr. COATSWORTH moved second reading of Bill (No. 64) to incorporate the Imperial Life Assurance Company of Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the reason for introducing this Bill? I think this is a new company, and it could be incorporated under the general Act; that, at all events, was our intention when we passed the general Act. What special privileges does the hon. gentleman want to secure by this Bill?

Mr. COATSWORTH. The Bill happens to stand in my name. I have not read it, and cannot give any explanation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the debate had better be adjourned.

Mr. COATSWORTH. No; no doubt the Bill is all right—I am satisfied it is a Bill that should go through. The Bill happens to stand in my name, but it is the Bill of the chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee, and he requested that it should be put in my name. I really do not know what the Bill is.

Mr. LAURIER. So nobody can explain the Bill. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 60) respecting the Thousand Islands Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 61) to incorporate the Toronto, Hamilton and Niagara Falls Railway Company.—(Mr. Bennett.)

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair, I was going on to point out the very extravagant expenditures which had been incurred during the last eight or ten years, and the results of those expenditures. I have shown that we have been obliged to borrow money very largely, and the money has been spent in many ways that are not conducive to the interests of the country, and the Dominion is obliged to pay interest on that money year after year, and in this way the demands on the people have, unfortunately, very largely increased. I desire now to make some reference to the annual expenditures. The ex-Minister of Justice stated in his speech a few evenings ago, that it was impossible to conduct the affairs of this country for less than $38,000,000 a year. I want to point out, in my humble way, how I think very large sums of money could be saved. We have unquestionably increased our expenditures very rapidly, and we have reached a period in the history of this Dominion when the earnest co-operation and assistance of people of all shades of politics is required to reduce the annual expenditure to an amount within the means of the taxpayers. We contend that an expenditure of $38,000,000 annually is altogether too high. I am now going to point out some ways in which very large reductions could be made, notwithstanding the statement presented by the ex-Minister of Justice.

I find that in the last five years we have expended the following sums on immigration:—

1881	$181,045
1892	177,604
1893	180,677
1894	202,235
1895	195,652

Or, in all, we have, during the last five years, since the last general election, expended $937,216 on immigration, or nearly a million of money has been thrown away. We know we have brought to our shores a certain number of immigrants, but we are also aware, from the census taken in 1891 that there is hardly one of those immigrants to be found; we have not retained our natural increase. It is an exceedingly imprudent act, in the present condition of our finances, to continue such an expenditure on immigration, when we are accomplishing nothing thereby. We know from the records laid before the House, from the Auditor General's Report, that we have some forty-five immigration agents in the United States, scattered over different points, trying, if possible, to secure the return of Canadians who have gone to that country, and we know we have had very poor results, indeed, from the very large expenditure in connection with the effort made in that direction.

Another head under which, I think, we could save a large amount, is printing and advertising. Last year we spent the following sums on advertising:—

1891	$60,201
1892	46,220
1893	41,890
1894	44,690
1895	35,161

Or, in all, we have spent, during those five years, on advertising, $228,175.

Then I take printing, the expenditure on which, outside of the work done at the Printing Bureau, was as follows:—

1891	$215,608
1892	190,755
1893	190,409
1894	224,935
1895	188,075

In all, we have spent on printing during those five years, $1,009,722. Adding printing and advertising together, we have spent since the last general election, $1,237,889. In looking over the items during the present year, I find that the "Mail and Empire" received $1,906; "World," $1,163; Hamilton "Spectator," $1,731; Regina "Leader," $1,588. I contend that this expenditure is reckless and unnecessary, in view of the drain on the people's resources, that it virtually amounts to throwing the money away.

I will now take the legal expenses. During the last five years, these expenditures have been as follows:—

1891	$ 94,055
1892	103,936
1893	141,424
1894	101,076
1895	98,683

Or, in all, we have spent for legal services, outside of the Department of Justice, with all its staff, with a Solicitor General, with a Minister of Justice, and a deputy Minister of Justice, a sum no less than $539,197, of which one firm in this city was paid, last year, $18,044. My reason for drawing attention to these sums is simply to point out that, in my humble opinion, very considerable savings could be made, if the Government were disposed to cut down expenses and put a stop to this unnecessary drain upon the resources of the people.

I wish, Sir, to refer to the expenditure on Indians in Manitoba and the North-west. In 1891 we spent in this connection $833,187.77; in 1892 we spent $740,072.92; in 1893 we spent $761,265.80; in 1894 we spent $776,400.95; and in 1895 we spent $761,105.22. In these five years we spent in all upon the Indians, $3,872,032.66. Now, Sir, where has that money gone? We will see. The salaries at Ottawa cost $58,400 a year; travelling expenses and salaries of officials in the North-west and Manitoba cost $313,630, or, in all, $372,030.07 have gone for salaries at Ottawa and salaries and travelling expenses in Manitoba and the North-west, during the last year. Deduct that from the total of $761,000 expended, and we find that fifty cents on every dollar spent for maintaining the Indians has been applied to paying officials. Now, Sir, under that item alone a very considerable saving could be made. I know that the Minister of the Interior has told us that the utmost economy has been observed in the expenditure, but I commend this statement to him in the hope that less will be spent on officials in future. I wish now to read an item which is to be found in the Auditor General's Report in this connection. H. J. Wickham, a lawyer, I presume, was paid $3,031.34 for legal services rendered to the Cayuga Indians, very probably the tribe located in the riding of the Minister of Agriculture. Let me call the attention of the House to some of the items included in this lawyer's bill. It appears he was under the necessity of going to Montreal on a trip. He stopped at the Windsor Hotel and he charged in his bill $4.50 for the day; $3.95 for wines, $2 for extra meals, 75 cents for a fire, and $1 for cigars. That is a sample of this gentleman's charges for a day's visit to Montreal in connection with Indian affairs.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that charged to the Indian account?

Mr. McMULLEN. It is charged to the Indian account, and charged in the bill of the Indians.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) By whom?

Mr. McMULLEN. By H. J. Wickham for legal services in connection with the Cayuga Indians. I call the attention of the House to this, because it clearly shows how extravagantly that money is paid out, and that it is virtually squandered in a great many cases.

Now, I am sorry that the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) has left the House, because I wish to point out to him that there could be a considerable saving effected in the office of the High Commissioner. I have taken considerable interest in that office ever since it has been my privilege to sit in this House, and I have made a calculation in order to ascertain if the country has received an adequate return for the immense sum of money spent in connection with that office during the last five years. In 1891 the High Commissioner drew $16,442.96. This does not include anything appertaining to the office of the High Commissioner, but is simply his salary and sums connected with his residence in London, such as tax on income, parochial tax and other such items. In 1892 we paid him $16,050; in 1893, $16,934.24; in 1894 we paid him $15,799.15; and in 1895 we paid him $15,681.48. In these five years we have paid $80,907.83 for the services of the High Commissioner in London. When we take into consideration the labour performed by the High Commissioner in the service of this country, and when we remember the unfortunate incidents connected with the scheduling of our cattle and sheep, it must occur to every reasonable man that we are paying this money and getting no return for it. I can well remember when Sir John Macdonald introduced the Bill for the purpose of buying a residence in London to permanently locate Sir Charles Tupper there. Sir John Macdonald then stated across the floor of the House that he expected that when our contract with those who conducted our financial affairs in London ended, he had not the slightest doubt but that we would be able to make use of Sir Charles Tupper as our financial agent, and that we would thus save double the amount which it was going to cost us to send the High Commissioner to London, and keep him in residence there. Well, Sir, we have since had the confession of the Finance Minister that when he was in London he found himself utterly unable to make use of Sir Charles Tupper as financial agent, or in any other capacity connected with the Finance Department. As I said before, in view of the limited services that have been rendered by the High Commissioner, I believe we could well dispense with that office altogether. I admit that he made one treaty. It was called in this House the "little French Treaty," and the Government, for two years, hesitated before they decided to ratify that treaty. In my humble opinion, it would have been better, in the interests of the country, if it had not been ratified. However, the Government chose to ratify it, and that is all the evidence we have of any services having been rendered Canada by the High Commissioner. We find further that the office of the High Commissioner in London, including the items I have already given, costs us as follows:—

1891	$27,589 19
1892	27,536 38
1893	28,856 59
1894	28,887 72
1895	29,352 55

During these five years we have spent upon the High Commissioner's office, including the money we paid himself, $142,222.43. Now, Sir, I contend that we could very well dispense with that office and with the High Commissioner. I do not much wonder that the High Commissioner was willing to come to Canada to re-enter the Government, with the hope of keeping in power the party that has kept him so comfortably in London for so many years. I have no doubt that he is looking back very anxiously and very earnestly to the day when he may be reinstated in that office, if the approaching elections should go in favour of the Government. Let me now take, Sir, the amount that has been drawn from the public treasury by the Secretary of State and his family since the year 1889, two years before the last elections. We will include two years before that. In 1889 we paid them $33,780.26; in 1890, $31,343.17; in 1891, $42,044.83; in 1892, $29,338.50; in 1894, $28,887.72; and in 1895, $28,681.48; or, in all, in those years, $194,166.96, or an average outlay of $32,361.16 every year. This, of course, included the services of the commandant of the Military College at Kingston. Well, Sir, I know a little about that college, and I feel positively certain that were it not that Commandant Cameron is the son-in-law of Sir Charles Tupper, he would never be kept in that institution. I know from students in the institution that he is not even making an attempt to perform faithfully the duties of commandant to that college. It is one of the duties of the commandant of the Military College to be the personal friend and intimate of every student in the college; but although there are 60 of them there this year, I would venture to stake my sessional allowance that if you put them all in a crowd, he could not pick out 20 of them by name in the whole 60, he knows so little about them. Instead of being called upon to keep officials of that kind, who are virtually national blood-suckers, doing nothing at all for the salaries they draw, I think it is time the country dispensed with their services; and we have had too many such men in Canada.

Now, I want to draw attention to some of the schemes set on foot by the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) when he was here before. We have a very vivid recollection of many of the schemes of which he was the promoter at that time. We know that he set on all fours, in a very eloquent and forcible way, the scheme for the construction of the Oxford and New Glasgow Railway, which virtually duplicates the Intercolonial Railway. The construction of the main line of the Intercolonial was a necessity, in the interest of the country, and was agreed to by both Reformers and Conservatives; but there was no necessity of duplicating it, especially by a line running through a country that could well afford to contribute its share towards its construction, just as the counties and other municipalities in western Ontario have done. Instead of that, by the influence he exercised, the hon. Secretary of State secured the construction of that road entirely at the country's expense; and to-day the people of this country are paying the interest upon its cost, while it is paying nothing in return.

We know also that the hon. gentleman set on all fours the question of the construction of the St. Charles Branch. That was to cost $130,000, and before it was completed it cost $1,740,000, and there are, I understand, still claims to the amount of $20,000 which have not yet been adjusted.

When the hon. gentleman was here before, he also, in a very eloquent speech, gave a highly-drawn picture of what would result from the establishment of smelting furnaces for the purpose of manufacturing iron in Canada. He asserted that something like two or three millions of money was waiting ready to be invested in the erection of smelting works. He said that this scheme would increase our population at least 200,000, and he promised that we would have smelting works at different points all the way from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He named several towns, among them Port Hope, Cobourg, Weller's Bay, Kingston and Toronto, where smelting works were to be established. The result was that his followers in the House gave their confidence to the scheme, and the duties on iron were increased, and that increase has been continued to the present day. Yet we have not had a single smelting furnace erected since that scheme was projected, except one which has recently been erected in Hamilton; all the others in the country were in existence before. Now, Sir, that was a very serious change in the tariff for the users of iron. The farmers were struck by it more than any other class. But when the change was made the iron-mongers, the boards of trade and the chambers of commerce of England remonstrated very strongly against it. They sent resolutions and did everything they could to prevent the increase in the duties, which would hamper and hinder the trade in iron between England and Canada. But, Sir, there was no retreat in the policy; the increase went on. I wonder how hon. gentlemen opposite have the face to urge on England concessions in favour of Canada, when the policy they have pursued for the last seventeen or eighteen years has been a direct slap in the face of England, in the matter not only of iron, but of woollen goods, cotton goods and fabrics of all kinds. They talk very glibly and finely about England giving Canada and the other colonies a preference in the British market; but it is a wonder to me how they can make a proposition of that kind after having acted in such a hostile manner towards the mother country for so many years.

Then, when we made the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway, we know what a glowing picture the hon. gentleman presented of the prospect of opening up the North-west country—what an enormous quantity of grain would be exported from there. I am going to read to the House his utterance upon that particular occasion. In 1883, Sir Charles Tupper read to the House of Commons the following estimate made by the Department of the Interior. He said:

Having given the subject my best and fullest consideration, I estimate that the receipts of this department from the sale of agricultural and coal lands, timber dues, rents of grazing lands and sales of mineral lands other than coal, with the royalties from the minerals, between 1st January, 1883, and 31st December, 1891, both days inclusive, will amount to not less than $58,000,000.

The actual amounts received not only from sales, but from pre-emption and homestead fees from 1883 to 1891, as given in official Year-Book, are as follows:—In 1883, $925,962; in 1884, $788,136; in 1885, $288,594; in 1886, $321,279; in 1887, $412,318; in 1888, $404,282; in 1889, $441,761; in 1890, $328,141; and in 1891, $292,254; making, in all, in these years in which we were to receive $58,000,000, the sum of $4,202,727 which we have actually realized. Now, this is pointing out the fallacy of many of the propositions which the hon. gentleman made, when he occupied the very distinguished position in this House before. We earnestly hope that his return may bring with it a fulfilment of some of those prophetic utterances. It would be a grand thing for Canada, if we could get that $55,000,000 out of the North-west lands now. It would tend very considerably to relieve our depleted treasury; and, if we could turn out the 640,000,000 bushels of wheat which he predicted would be produced by that country in the course of a few years, that would be, indeed, a great boon. But it appears these statements of his, uttered from time to time, in this way, secured the confidence of this House, and the result was, that we went into a lot of gigantic schemes which have resulted in an enormous increase of our debt, on which we have to pay interest, and on which we get no return.

I desire to say something with regard to the policy which has been the subject of discussion in this House a great many years. I refer to the policy of protection. I want to point out, as clearly and distinctly as I can, the manner in which that policy has operated on the consuming masses of the people. While that policy has been discussed both on the stump and in the House, I believe there are thousands and hundreds of thousands in this country yet who have never realized the way in which their money is taken from them under the operation of this protective tariff; and, to-day, they find themselves financially hampered, without being able to understand how it is they are in such a condition. Now, I admit that incidental protection is a pardonable thing. It might possibly exist under a revenue tariff. I admit also, that moderate protection is very plausible. It would catch on with a great many people. It is a tempting policy to consider, but I contend that the kind of protection under which we are suffering has led to anomalies, and is a gross injustice and nothing short of an outrage upon the consuming masses. It is also a prostitution of the governmental power that brought it into force, and keeps it to-day on our statute-book. The Conservative party themselves, we have reason to believe, never had confidence in protection. They have never shown that they had. It was introduced in 1878, and in 1882, the very first time they went to the country after protection, was the year in which all the gerrymandering took place. Then, in 1887, we know very well, because the investigation in the Public Accounts Committee showed it, that very large amounts of money were stolen, and were sent into the different constituencies for the purpose of buying them up, and that object was, unfortunately, only too well accomplished. Then, in 1891, we know very well that the Government did not go to the country on the question of protection at all, but on the question of reciprocity with the United States, and we know, further, how grossly they deceived the people of this country by the manner in which they presented that question to them. We have frequently discussed in this House the statements that were made by Ministers of the Crown on the stump, with regard to the invitation which they declared they had received to go to Washington and negotiate a treaty. We know perfectly well how the farmers of this country were grossly deceived on that occasion. We know that the Government said they had been invited to go to Washington; but we know that, when Sir Charles Tupper went to Washington, he withdrew that statement and admitted that the position taken by Mr. Blaine with regard to the origin of the whole matter was the correct one. He was forced to admit that the whole business did not originate with the United States, that no invitation was sent by the American Government at all, but that the British Minister at Washington acted under the suggestion of the Government here, which suggestion was made for the sole purpose of accomplishing the end in view, namely, to carry elections on that cry, which they would never have carried otherwise.

The hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) said in this House, that the consumers pay no taxes on home-manufactured goods. He said that the only things on which they pay taxes are the goods imported into this country which are subject to taxation. I want to show that, on the goods manufactured in this country, the consumers pay a heavy tax also. Take, first, cotton goods. The total importation of all cottons, including all kinds, dressed goods, winceys, &c., during last year, as set forth in the Trade and Navigation Returns, amounted to $4,218,168. The duty paid by the people on those imports was $1,200,820.75, or an average of 28½ per cent. Now, if you take the Trade and Navigation Returns, page 63, you will find that we imported cottons, unbleached, bleached, and printed and checked shirtings, &c., to the amount of $2,605,278, on which the duty paid was $763,711.73, or an average duty of 29½ per cent. Now, the average consumption in Canada of these cottons in a year is about nine million dollars. The statement of the cotton manufacturers will prove that that is about the correct estimate. Last year, their entire manufacture was $8,451,724. Now, on that nine millions, the consumers in this country pay the duty, because these goods are sold up to the point at which they could import with the duty added. Therefore, the Canadian consumers paid tax in the way of protection on the nine million dollars they consumed, which amounted to $1.80 per head of the population. Of this nine million dollars, $6,394,722 worth was manufactured in Canada. The protection on that is 29½ per cent, or $1,854,469. The treasury got in taxes on cottons imported, $763,-

711. The people paid, altogether, in duty on the imports and protection on the home manufacture, $2,518,180, or, out of every $3.30 taxes on cottons paid by the people, one dollar went into the Dominion treasury and $2.30 into the pockets of the cotton manufacturers. Now, I give the statement that the manufacturers themselves present in the census. Take the census book C, vol. 3, page 120, and you will find the following statement, cotton mills in Canada:—

	Capital Invested.	Products.
5 in New Brunswick	$2,733,000	$1,750,000
2 in Nova Scotia	574,983	426,850
9 in Ontario	3,415,430	2,618,204
6 in Quebec	6,483,906	3,656,170

Now, this makes 22 in all. The entire capital is $13,208,121, and the entire products of those mills in the year in which the census was taken, amounted to $8,451,724. The total amount paid in wages was $2,102,603, and the total value of raw material, $4,208,253. That makes a total of $6,310,856. Taking that from the gross product, you have a net profit of $2,140,868, or 16 per cent upon the invested capital, including buildings, machinery, land, and working capital. But, Sir, we must not forget that a very large percentage of this stock was watered. We know perfectly well that, in some cases, mills were bought for 50 cents on the dollar, or even very considerably less than that, and were put into the combination at full price, and there has been the percentage I have stated paid upon the entire investment. Now, I wish the Finance Minister were here to explain to me where the cotton manufacturers got this money, if they did not get it out of the public. The hon. gentleman says that the people paid no protective duties upon what was produced in Canada. I would like him to explain, then, how it is that these manufacturers themselves report that upon their entire investment they realized 16 per cent, and that upon a considerable amount of watered stock.

Now, let us take the case of sugar. From the 3rd May, 1895, when the duty upon sugar was increased to 30th June, 1895, the end of the fiscal year, we imported sugar entered for home consumption—according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, page 221—to the amount of 36,216,286 pounds, the value of which was $648,610. The duty collected was $181,081.78, or 28 per cent. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, page 280, we imported, of free sugar, from July 1st, 1894, to May 3rd, 1895, 309,302,296 pounds, value, $6,703,359. Now, 6-10 cent of protection would give $1,855,813.77. Then, the manufacturers would have at least half of the imported free sugar on hand for the simple reason that very large importations took place immediately before the duty went on. Taking 150,000,000 pounds as the half, then the ½ cent duty put upon that would amount to $750,000.

That gives a total of $2,605,813.77. The Government received, in duty, $181,081.78. So that the people paid, in all, $2,786,895.55. On the consumption of sugar last year, out of $16.40 paid in protection, $1 went into the Dominion treasury, and $15.40 into the pockets of the sugar refiners. Now, if you will take their own statement, you will find it corroborates mine. I refer to the census of 1891, book C, volume 3, page 323. This shows that there are eight sugar refineries in Canada. Capital in land, $323,500; capital in buildings, $1,494,200; capital in machinery, $1,846,000; working capital, $2,258,700; a total of $5,922,400. Now, the wages paid, according to their own report, is $709,811; raw material, $15,023,500; a total of $15,733,311. The value of the entire product of these eight refineries was $17,127,100. Deducting all charges for raw material and wages, and you have a net balance of $1,393,789, or 21.8 per cent, say 22 per cent of interest on the investment. Allowing 5 per cent for wear and tear of machinery, there would still be a profit of 17 per cent on the invested capital. Now, what I want the Finance Minister to do is to point out where this money comes from, if, as he says, the people do not pay it. Remember, this is not my calculation; it is their own, as given in the census returns. It is to be found in the census returns, at the page I have given. It will be difficult for the hon. gentleman to show that this money does not come from the consumer.

Now, let us take the case of wall paper, another item of which a considerable quantity is manufactured in Canada. The consumption of wall paper in this country, the Finance Minister says, is about $500,000 a year. It is about that. I will first give you my estimate of the people's experience in wall paper, and then I will give the report of the manufacturers themselves, as given in to the census enumerators. We imported wall paper to the value of $6,482, upon which was paid a duty of $2,268.87. A duty of 35 per cent on $300,000 worth of wall paper, manufactured in Canada, would make $105,900. Adding the duty collected, $2,268.87, would make $107,268.87 that the users of wall paper, including the duty, virtually paid to the manufacturers of wall paper in Canada. For every $47 duty and protection paid on wall paper, the Dominion treasury got $1, and the wall paper manufacturers got $46. Now take the statement in the census returns, made up from the statements given by the manufacturers themselves to the census enumerators. It is in the same book C, volume 3, page 357. It will be found that we have four manufacturers of wall paper in Canada. Invested in land, $25,000; invested in buildings, $58,000; invested in machinery, $53,050; working capital, $230,600; a total of $366,650. The raw material that was used was stated to be $133,700, and the wages paid were $56,600; a total of $190,300. Take that amount from the value of the manufactured product which, according to their report was $355,000. Taking that from the amount, it leaves a net surplus of profit of $164,700, or 45 per cent upon the working capital invested, land and machinery. That is their figure, it is not mine. Now, I contend that the people of this country have paid that enormous sum year by year. That is largely the cause of their poverty, and they are not aware of the fact that they are being bled in this way. Now, I will take the consumption of starch, about which my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) said something. I am going to give what the starch factories themselves report to the census enumerators, and I think that will be better authority even than what the hon. gentleman may produce, or what I may produce. The Minister of Finance says that the consumption of starch in this country is about five million pounds a year. One and a half cents a pound protection upon this quantity amounts to $75,000. The treasury got last year $15,084.65, leaving a net sum of $59,915.35. Thus, out of every $5 in taxes and protection on starch, the country got $1 in taxes and the manufacturer got $4. That is the statement with regard to starch. Now, I will see what they say themselves to the census enumerators. On page 319 of the same book we find there are eleven starch factories in Canada. Land value, $6,300; buildings, $59,000; machinery, $71,000; working capital, $304,200; in all, $440,500. They say that the raw material costs them $237,000; wages, $69,250; value of raw products, $306,250; total value of products, $489,850. Deducting the cost of wages and raw material, $306,250, you have a profit of $183,600, or 41 per cent on every dollar invested in Canada in starch factories. Well, it may be said that the men who manufacture starch pay duty on the corn. But I want to draw the attention of my hon. friend from Halton to this fact, that they report that the raw material cost them $237,000. If they import corn, the duty is unquestionably added on that amount. But why should they import corn? What are we encouraging manufacturing institutions for, if not for the purpose of building up the home trade and causing a demand for home products? We have plenty of corn in Canada. Why not manufacture out of Canadian corn? Besides, there is a large amount of starch in Canada that is manufactured out of potatoes and other commodities besides corn. So that there is no argument in saying that they have got to pay a duty on corn, because in their raw material they unquestionably include the duty, and they state under their own hand to the census enumerators in this country that they make on the entire investment 41 per cent. That is certainly a very handsome profit to make on their money. Any man would be glad to invest money that would give him that profit every year. Now, take spades and shovels. The reason I am giving these items is to show that the statement made by the Minister of Finance is most fallacious. The idea that the consumers in this country pay no duty on the home products will not be borne out, either by the statement of the manufacturers themselves or by the experience of the people. Of spades and shovels we imported, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, page 114, 6,136 dozen. The duty collected was $8,923.34, or $1.45 per dozen. The Gananoque Spade and Shovel Manufacturing Company turn out 9,000 dozen annually. The protection is $1.45, which amounts to $13,050. The Dominion treasury got in duty upon spades imported $8,923.34, which made the gross amount that the people of this country paid on spades and shovels $21,973.34. Now, where does the money go? Out of every $2.46 paid by the people of Canada in taxes and in protection upon spades, $1 went into the Dominion treasury and $1.46 into the pockets of the Gananoque Spade and Shovel Manufacturing Company. That was the net result in regard to spades and shovels, and the census returns will show that that is the case in almost every instance. Now, we will take the next article, salt. Salt is a commodity that is used by the entire community. We have twenty salt factories in Canada, as you will find in Census C, vol. 3, page 284. Capital invested, $44,480; buildings, $111,400; machinery, $70,500; working capital, $181,740. That makes an entire amount of $408,120. Value of raw material, $119,700; wages paid, $67,690. These two sums amount to $187,390. Value of articles produced, $342,920, leaving a net profit of $155,530, or 38½ per cent upon the invested capital in connection with salt. Now, take agricultural implements. We had 221 factories in Canada. Capital in land, $345,948; in buildings, $980,935; in machinery, $933,216; working capital, $6,364,704. All these sums put together make $8,624,803. Raw material used is stated to have been $3,126,966; wages paid, $1,812,050. These two sums make $4,939,016; value of products, $7,493,624; raw material and wages deducted therefrom leaves a net profit of $2,554,608, or 29.6 per cent on the entire investment. Now, this is according to the report given by the 221 agricultural implement factories in Canada to the census enumerators. By that report they admit over 29 per cent interest on their investment. Now, we know very well that this policy has brought about a great many combinations in Canada. For instance, I was reading a note that was published in the "Mail" of April 15th, 1893:

At a meeting of the Cut Nail Association held here to-day, it was decided to maintain the combination in cut nails. Among the firms represented at this meeting were the Pillow & Hersey Co., Peck, Benny & Co., S. R. Foster & Son, Moore & Co., and the Star Manufacturing Co. The Maritime firms were all well represented, and the threatened cut in prices was fully discussed. The secretary accused the Maritime men of having already cut the figures of the combine. The gentlemen from the East explained, however, that they had misunderstood the terms of the agreement, and had no intention of committing a breach of faith. This explanation was accepted, and the manufacturers present unanimously agreed to sustain the existing prices. The combine was then strengthened by the admission of Moore & Foster, of St. John, N.B., and the Star Manufacturing Co., of Montreal, into the association.

This proves clearly that we have a combination on those lines, and that, in almost every line of manufacturing, combinations have been formed, and manufacturers have taken advantage of the consumers with respect to prices, under the decided protection they enjoy under the tariff. We have no quarrel with, nor antipathy to manufacturers. All we want, is to see that the principle of justice is maintained between consumer and manufacturer. We hold that in Canada we have the raw material and all the necessary conditions to produce many commodities we want, and our manufacturing institutions, under ordinary circumstances, should be in a position to produce those commodities as cheaply and as of good quality as any other part of the world. Living is cheap here, and many other things are cheap, and our manufacturers should be willing to compete with any country having a revenue tariff simply. In order to show the results presented by the census, I will quote from the table at page 382, volume 3: Number of establishments in Canada, 75,968; capital in land, $31,466,342; in buildings, $60,303,043; in machinery, $81,401,247; working capital, $181,451,136. These different items of capital amounted, in the aggregate, to $354,620,750. The raw material used was of the value of $256,119,042; wages paid during the year, $100,663,650; total value of articles produced, $476,258,886. The value of the raw material and the amount of wages deducted from that sum leaves a net profit of $119,476,194, or 33½ per cent upon the investments in land, machinery, buildings and working capital. This is the statement of the manufacturers of Canada themselves, embodied in the census of 1891. We find protection works about the same way in the United States as in Canada, and that the people there have been fleeced under the operation of that system, as well as here. Hon. Mr. Springer selected a line of articles, the aggregate importations of which were of the value of $194,464,758. The domestic products in the same line were of the value of $2,440,502,649. The duty paid and protection given amounted to $751,403,395. The United States treasury got out of that sum $194,464,758; the manufacturers received $556,938,637; in other words, the treasury of the United States got 23½ per cent, while the manufacturers obtained 76½ per cent. There is one peculiar feature about protection. On the American side, the protectionists say they impose protection to keep cheap Canadian products out of the United States market. In Canada, our protectionists say that they impose protection to keep out cheap American products from the Canadian market. So, while the Americans are protecting their people against the cheap products of Canada, the Government of Canada is protecting our people against the cheap products of the United States. It is very singular that the same fear appears to actuate the protectionists of the United States and those of Canada, that Canada might be flooded with cheap American products, and vice versa. There was one individual, Mr. Lubin, in the United States who suggested a plan whereby the farmers would be relieved of the gross oppression to which they are subjected under the operation of protection. Mr. Lubin proposed that an export bounty should be paid upon United States wheat and all United States products, the result of the export bounty would be to cause an increase in the price of products on the American side. He would apply his theory practically to last year's wheat crop in this way: the crop was about 545,000,000 bushels. About 145,000,000 were exported, at an average price of 60 cents per bushel. An export duty of 20 cents per bushel would have cost the Government $29,000,000. But it would have raised the selling price of all the wheat in the country 20 cents per bushel, and thus would have put $109,000,000 more in the pockets of the farmers than they actually received. This policy was proposed as a relief to the farmers. What is the result? Although some of the Grangers approved of the proposition, as well as many other farm organizations, it is needless to say that his plan was pronounced by economists and manufacturers as utterly impracticable.

I am glad to see the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) in his seat, because on one occasion lately, when speaking, he put a question to me, and I promised to answer it, and I am going to give him the answer to-night. I am going to speak on the question of reciprocity. Canada ships to the United States products to the value of $33,777,000, and to the British Isles, $57,500,000. I am going to answer the hon. gentleman with bald, bare facts, abstracted from the Trade and Navigation Returns, with which he will, doubtless, be satisfied, and, if the facts are not correct, I promise him an apology. Our exports of animal and agricultural products to the United States last year amounted to $8,276,236, and we paid duty to get them there as follows:—

Mr. McMULLEN.

	Value.	Duty.
Horses.....	$510,765	20 per cent.
Cattle.....	19,210	20 do
Sheep.....	346,746	20 do
Poultry.....	36,574	3c. per lb.
Bones.....	27,853	20 per cent.
Eggs.....	275,827	20 do
Pease.....	352,321	50c. per brl.
do split.....	5,616	20 per cent.
Wheat.....	10,258	20 do
Flour of wheat.....	10,706	20 do
Hay.....	979,914	$2 per ton.
Hops.....	8,884	8c. per lb.
Malt.....	4,479	35 per cent.
Maple sugar.....	8,082	30 do
Clover seed.....	95,134	20 do
Grass.....	20,320	20 do
Trees, plants.....	7,732	Free.
Potatoes.....	238,977	10c. per bush
Vegetables.....	103,599	10 per cent.
Lime.....	75,058	10 do
Wool.....	1,046,726	Free.

I would call the attention of my hon. friends opposite to these figures. They will see that in every case where an article is free of duty we export very large quantities of it to the United States. Just look at the amount of wool we exported, for instance. Do they not see some significance in that fact?

Mr. WELDON. Would my hon. friend forgive me if I interrupt him for a moment. I assure the hon. gentleman that I am very unwilling to interrupt him. My question was a very specific one, but the hon. member misunderstood me. It was this: Whether, if his party were returned to power he would use his influence with Sir Richard Cartwright, the Finance Minister to be, to strike off, or to largely lower, the duties on wheat, and oats, and beef, and butter, and pork, and the like, coming from foreign countries?

Mr. McMULLEN. I say in reply to my hon. friend that in my humble opinion, and I believe it is shared in by nine-tenths of the intelligent farming community of our province, the brightest and best days the farmers of our country ever saw would be seen, if they had a renewal of the old reciprocity treaty they enjoyed from 1854 to 1866.

Mr. WELDON. Answer the question.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask my hon. friend—

Mr. WELDON. Answer the question.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am answering the question. I would like to ask my hon. friend: If the party that he supports did not go to Washington and offer to renew that reciprocity treaty?

Mr. WELDON. Answer.

Mr. McMULLEN. Did they not offer to renew that treaty ?

Mr. WELDON. Answer the question.

Mr. McMULLEN. You are not prepared to answer that question, and you dare not deny the fact, because you know they did, and we all know they did. As far as I am concerned, I am prepared to say here : That the farmers of this country are ready to exchange natural products with the people of the United States. We are perfectly willing to exchange with them if they will exchange with us.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has forgotten the assurance he gave me. I cannot refer to a past debate, but I may say, the hon. member promised me to answer the question, and now he will not answer it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I have given my hon. friend (Mr. Weldon) the answer. I am prepared, if he turns up the debate and reads the question he put to me, to give him the answer, because I want to deal honestly with my esteemed friend, and I am dealing honestly with him. I am telling him the feeling of the farmers of Ontario, and I am quite certain that my statement is correct. We know very well that hon. gentlemen opposite did offer the United States reciprocity in natural products. But, when they found they could not get it, they came back and said to the people of this country : Well, it would not do you any good, it would injure you. Sir, it is a very singular thing that all the men of ability and wisdom which our country has brought forth, have been in favour of reciprocity with the United States. I would like my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) to name a single distinguished man in the history of Canada who was not in favour of extended trade relations with the United States. Can he name one who was opposed to reciprocity ? I heard him mention, a short time ago, the name of Hon. Joseph Howe. Well, Joseph Howe was a pronounced advocate of reciprocity all his life. I have a long list of distinguished names here, and I find that Sir A. T. Galt was a pronounced advocate of reciprocity ; Sir John Rose was a pronounced advocate of reciprocity ; Sir George E. Cartier was a pronounced advocate of reciprocity ; the Hon. George Brown, all his life advocated extended trade relations with the United States ; Sir John Macdonald was in favour of reciprocity ; the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, one of the ablest statesmen Canada ever had, an honest man among a thousand, he was in favour of reciprocity ; and I am glad to be able to say that my esteemed friend (Sir Richard Cartwright), an experienced parliamentarian, has always been in favour of reciprocity. I fail to find a man in the galaxy of our distinguished countrymen who has not been an advocate of reciprocity ; and my esteemed leader, Hon. W. Laurier, is also an advocate of reciprocity with the United States. That fact is reliable evidence that reciprocity would certainly be an advantage to the country. I admit that the present Minister of Agriculture is disposed to say that reciprocity would not be of advantage to Canada. Well, Sir, I am quite willing to place the opinions of the distinguished statesmen I have named, in opposition to the views of either the Finance Minister or the Minister of Agriculture, and to let the country draw their own conclusions.

Mr. WELDON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to read "Hansard ?"—he appealed to "Hansard." The question I put to him was this :—

Will the hon. member bring it about that the duty on farm products shall be struck off, and that there shall be free trade in these articles ?

The hon. member answered :

I say to the hon. gentleman that the debate on the Budget will be the proper time to discuss this question, and I will answer him then.

Will the hon. gentleman answer ?

Mr. McMULLEN. I will answer my hon. friend by saying, yes. Is that satisfactory ?

Mr. WELDON. Yes, that is an answer.

Mr. McMULLEN. I say the farmers of our country are ready and willing to-morrow to have free trade with the United States in natural products. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the Government of which he is a supporter professed that they were going to get that ; and there was nothing they promised the people of this country which they so sincerely regretted that they did not accomplish as reciprocity with the United States. But, Sir, I believe we made a very great mistake in ever attempting to get reciprocity through the hon. gentlemen who are now in power. I will read a despatch that was sent from Washington to the Chicago "Daily News" on this very important question ; I think it is worth drawing the attention of the House to it. It was dated 9th February, 1891, the time the negotiations were going on, and reads as follows :—

For the time being a good share of the brains and vigour of Canada's Cabinet has been removed to Washington. The delegation of officials arrived here to-night to take up and attempt to push forward the halting and hitching negotiations toward Canadian reciprocity and the many other questions mutually affecting the United States and Canada. The personnel of the party is not calculated to help the cause, as George E. Foster, Minister of Finance, who is one of the party, has long been one of the fire-eating Tories who has contended against reciprocity and has been intensely hostile to the United States and its institutions. Sir John Thompson, Minister of Justice, and the Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, acting Minister of Customs, the other Cabinet officers in the party, have not been so openly hostile to the United States, although they have long been identified with the anti-American policy which Sir John Macdonald pursued.

Minister Foster has only recently been persuaded to solicit for reciprocity. Less than a year ago he declared that Canada could only be contaminated by commercial or other relations with the United States. "We want nothing to do with the United States," said he, "and Canada's course of wisdom will be to mind her own affairs and see that the United States minds hers." This utterance was on the eve of Mr. Foster's departure for the West Indies, where he expected to inaugurate a huge plan of reciprocity with the southern islands by which Canada would undersell the United States. But Minister Foster's West Indies scheme was a total failure, and he has now concluded to solicit reciprocity from the United States.

Mr. Blaine is fully aware of the anti-American character of the visiting Canadian delegation, and this will probably operate in making the negotiations amount to nothing. Mr. Hitt, of Illinois, who has long voiced Mr. Blaine's views on Canadian affairs, is decidedly of the opinion that if reciprocity with Canada should come at all it will be after the bigoted Tory element having such leaders as Foster is displaced by the growing Liberal party of the Dominion, which makes cordial relations with the United States the chief feature of its platform.

That is the opinion that was entertained in Washington at the time with regard to the visit of those people. In connection with the question that was put to me by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) I may say that I think it will be fully realized in a few years—I do not know but it is partly realized now—that the very best outlet the North-west could have for its surplus wheat is the markets of St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Chicago. The reason of that is that pretty nearly all the virgin soil in the United States has been taken up, and it is not producing, and will not produce without a considerably increased tillage and manuring, the very excellent crops that they have been accustomed to in past years. The wheat export of the United States is running down year after year, and it will not be very long until that country will be an importer instead of an exporter of wheat. Under these circumstances, there is no country on the face of the earth that could supply the demands for that article more conveniently and satisfactorily than our North-west; and I have no doubt that the people of the North-west will begin to realize before very long that the opening of that market to them for their surplus product would be a national blessing.

Now, Sir, I wish to refer to some remarks that fell from the hon. ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). He gave us a very long speech on this very important subject. I understood him to intimate that he was making a campaign speech. I presume he was. He appeared to be pretty well supplied with scraps of all kinds. I presume that there are a certain number of clerks usually appointed to gather these items for hon. gentlemen opposite; and when a man is supplied with a well-prepared brief, it becomes a very easy matter for him to make a speech. We on this side have to do all that kind of work for ourselves. We are not able to keep clerks at the country's expense to do it for us. Hon. gentlemen opposite are favoured in that respect. The ex-Minister of Justice said something with regard to immigration. He was lauding very loudly the recommendations made by a certain Mr. Thompson, who had visited the North-west, and had given a very glowing account of the resources and prospects of that country. I have been through there myself, and I certainly entertain very high hopes of its ultimate success if it were only properly managed and prudently governed. If the land had been kept for the settler and the money for the Crown, as was suggested by Mr. Blake many years ago, I believe the North-west would now have a great many more settlers than it has. It is very unfortunate that there has been so much muddling and bungling in our entire system of settling up that country. Large tracts of choice lands have been handed over to colonization companies and railway companies, and many men who went there to settle have been driven from one point to another before they could find a desirable location. I have letters in my possession, at present, from people living in the North-west, who complain bitterly of the treatment they have received at the hands of the Government. They complain that in some cases they made homestead entries, and yet, in order to satisfy ranching companies, they were deprived by the Government of their homestead entries, turned out of possession, and their buildings torn down and destroyed. This very unfortunate condition of things shows very clearly how reckless the Government have been with regard to their whole land policy in that country. If the incoming settler had been told: Go and take up your location wherever you like, the only condition is that you must become a permanent resident of the country—such a policy would have doubled the population there to-day, and the country would be now in a much more prosperous condition.

Now, the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) drew attention to a Mr. E. A. Thompson, who, he said, had gone through that country for the purpose of investigating its prospects for settlement, and had made a very glowing report of its future. Well, I notice by our Auditor General's Report that this man Thompson was hired by the Government. He was picked up away down in California, and sent from there on a tour at the expense of the Government. All his expenses were paid, no doubt he was sent in a Pullman car, and every attention paid him for the purpose of obtaining from him this glowing report. That is a very poor way of obtaining glowing reports of that country. That country will bear investigation by men who want to go there for the purpose of settlement, and does not require to be boomed up in that kind of style. There is another thing we are doing in this connection. We have some forty-three immigration agents—at least we had recently—in the United States, trying to hunt up men and get them to come back and settle in Canada. I do think that money spent in that way is simply squandered uselessly. The hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin), in discussing the Government policy the other night, said that the prosperity of a country depended upon its fiscal policy. I was quite pleased to hear him make that statement. I think that if we will now consider the general condition of the people of this country, and apply our present fiscal policy to that condition, and make that policy responsible for the existing state of affairs, our people would not hesitate in declaring that they had too much of protection. The general condition of the people of this country was never, in my humble opinion—and I have been closely mixed up in the business affairs of this country for the past forty years—worse than it is to-day. I do not think the embarrassments of the people, the pauperized condition of all classes, was ever so evident as it is now. Why, we have in all our cities and towns, in this very city of Ottawa, honest labour willing to go to work to-morrow, if they could get work, to earn an honest living, but who can get nothing to do. You will find that that is the condition throughout this country in our cities and towns. I do not remember any period when that state of affairs existed to the extent to which it does to-day, and I hope we are coming close to a period when the people will be no longer subjected to such an unfortunate condition of things. Sir, I contend that this is not time to load down the poor labouring mechanics and artisans with 30 or 35 per cent duty upon the clothing they wear, upon the articles they use, upon the spades and shovels with which they have to gain their living. I say that this is no time to keep up protective duties that constitute such an enormous drain upon their resources. In place of doing that, immediate relief should be given in the way of reducing taxation by giving them every commodity they want for every day's use at the lowest possible price, by collecting from them nothing to support those who are in the manufacturing line, by imposing on them duties only required for the necessities of the country. We ought to return to a tariff that will simply produce the sum necessary to meet the demands upon the Dominion treasury. Such a tariff is, in my opinion, the only honest tariff. I do not think that we have any right by law to take money out of one man's pocket and put it into another's, when you give the one from whom you extract the money nothing in return. A few days ago we passed a loyalty resolution, we pronounced our loyalty to the mother land. I am glad to say that we did it unanimously. But, Mr. Speaker, if we are so loyal, why should we not imitate the example set by our mother country, why should we not follow her in her fiscal policy and taxation? Let us give British fair-play to all our people within our borders, and to every man justice; let us have British liberty; let us have British freedom and British rights; let us do away with the miserable schemes and intrigues by which the party opposite is endeavouring to hold the Treasury benches of this country against its opponents. Let us have no more gerrymanders—that is un-British; let us have no more graving dock scandals, no more Kingston dock scandals, no more Curran Bridge scandals, no more Printing Bureau scandals—let us have no more cut-throat Governments that are pronounced by the head of the Cabinet as ready to take his political life; and then let us follow out the high and dignified principles laid down by England, and the noble example set us by our mother country, in place of adopting those miserable, truckling disreputable tricks and efforts to hold on to power by schemes and intrigues, and by lavishing the people's money right and left for that purpose. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they can point to a single instance in England where public buildings have been peddled round from door to door for the purpose of buying constituencies. Can they point out to a single instance in England, under any Government, where post offices, and other public buildings, are erected in little hamlets, in order to secure the people's vote? Take the record of this Government for the past fifteen years. They have put up public buildings here and there without any regard to their necessity, but simply wherever they thought they would be most calculated to carry a constituency, while places in which those buildings are really needed have to do without them. Take the town of Woodstock. Simply because it happens to be the centre of a very strong Reform district, it has never been given a post office, although the postal revenue there every year runs up to $16,000, while at Marysville, where the revenue is only $1,800 a year, and the rent paid only $60 a year, we are asked to make a grant for a post office, and while in many other places not any more deserving we are called on to make similar grants. I think, on all these grounds, it is high time the people should take hold of this whole question of fiscal policy and the policy of annually keeping up our expenditure, without consideration for the financially depressed condition of the people. It is high time that the people should decide unanimously to put a stop to all these evils, and elect a Government which will administer the affairs of the country honestly and economically, taking as little money out of the pockets of the people as possible, and giving the people what they are entitled to. I believe that we have a grand country. I have travelled over most of this continent, and I know of no portion whose future, in my humble opinion, is brighter than that of Ontario, or even portions of the North-west and of the province of Quebec. If we had only an honest and economic Administration of our public affairs, which would free the people from the financial trammels to which they are subjected under the present condition of things, which would let them have what they require at the lowest possible price, and secure to them the best and most convenient and most lucrative outlets for their surplus products, I believe that we would rise out of the restricted and hampered condition under which we are now suffering, I believe that we would start once again on the road to progress, prosperity and wealth, and become a great and wealthy country, inhabited by a peaceful, contented, prosperous and loyal people.

Mr. PERRY. I think I may fairly ask the indulgence of the House while I say a few words on this all important question. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the way by which the Government shall raise the money required for public purposes, and the way they shall expend the money extracted from the pockets of the people is a great question, perhaps the greatest that can come before the people of this country. There is no doubt the Government do collect the taxes. They pass laws to raise the money and are very sharp in the execution of them. But they are not so exact in appropriating the money to the best advantage of the public service. Having the public accounts before us, having the estimates before us, we find that large amounts of money taken from the people are wasted, not to say stolen. For instance, consider the money spent on the Tay Canal. We find that over three-quarters of a million dollars have been spent on this gigantic work, and the revenue collected in a year is $119. I have taken the trouble to put down the figures showing the amount received by the country in the form of revenue from the Tay Canal. I was in hopes, by the way, that they would change the name and call it the Haggart Canal. In answer to a question asked of the Minister of Railways and Canals, I was informed that the total expenditure on the Tay Canal up to that date, was $476,877. The cost of maintaining the canal was $3,188, or, for ten years, $31,880. The interest for ten years on the above would be $203,500, or a total of $712,257. The revenue for ten years has been something like $1,000, leaving a balance against the canal, of $711,257. I presume that the cost of this canal is one of the amounts entered as an asset as against the gross debt that now stands at something over $300,000,000. If this is one of the assets which help to bring the net debt down by twenty-five or twenty-six millions of dollars, the country can judge what is the value of some of these assets. In the first place, we spent $476,000, and now, by additions we are paying interest on $711,257. And still the Government will keep this as an asset against the gross debt of this country. Sir, the net debt of this country is enormous; it is almost more than the people can bear. It stands at something over $50 per head of the whole population, men women, and children. For a family of ten persons, the debt amounts to $500, and for a family of five, $250. The interest paid upon the debt is simply appalling. I find that we are paying interest on sinking fund and debt to the amount of something like $13,000,000, or more than one-third of the total revenue of this country. We learn from the public records that even last month the national debt of this country was increased by $2,000,000. And, notwithstanding all this extravagance, notwithstanding all that has been wasted in the Tay Canal and similar works, when I asked the Minister of Public Works the other day if he were prepared to appropriate $2,000 to repair the Tignish breakwater, his answer was that the Government could not afford to spend the money. The Tignish breakwater has cost altogether something less than $8,000, and the revenue of the Tignish harbour, which is made by building this breakwater, is something like $100 a year. And yet they can spend $476,000 on a work which yields a revenue of only $119. It looks as if they intended to leave it like the West Point breakwater, to go to pieces and drift away. The reason is that Prince county have declined to send a representative to back up the Government in these, and in other transactions, for it is because the representatives of Prince have been Liberals and the Government—I will not say Tory—have been Conservatives. I would like to draw the attention of the House to the annual waste of money of which these hon. gentlemen are guilty. On referring to the Public Accounts, I find that they have paid for legal advice or legal pleading in the courts, $223,556. No doubt they had to spend a good deal, because the Solicitor General, who recently resigned, was not under the control of the Government. All done up in Ottawa, I suppose. I find the following names in the Public Accounts of parties who have received over $1,000 for their services. The amount paid for law practice is altogether, $98,683. The first name I see here is that of Aikens, Culver & Company, of Winnipeg, $1,634. Now, it would be amusing to know what services these gentlemen rendered to the Government, what amount of money they realized out of the cases which they pleaded on behalf of the Government. There is Mr. C. P. Angers, from Quebec, $1,201. I would like to know what services he rendered to the Government. J. A. Belyea, St. John, $1,277;

F. J. Bisailon, Montreal, $1,000; Borden, Ritchie & Company, Halifax, $10,602. Now, Mr. Speaker, what cases were going on in Halifax on behalf of the Government, or against the Government, in connection with which they had to pay over $10,000 for law advice? Next, I see C. P. F. Conybeare, $1,327; Drake, Jackson & Company, Victoria, $1,825; E. E. Gilbert & Sons, $1,821; J. S. Hall, Montreal, $4,146. I would like to know what services these gentlemen rendered to the Government of Canada for which they were entitled to the sum of $4,146. Harris, Henry & Cahan, $1,077; F. E. Hodgins, Toronto, $2,474; J. A. Legris, Coteau Landing, $1,548; O'Connor & Hogg, Ottawa—their fee is so large that I am almost afraid to mention it, $18,044. Now, in the name of common sense, the least the Government could do would be to lay a statement before this House, showing the services rendered by Messrs. O'Connor & Hogg. E. B. Osler, Toronto, $2,050; Christopher Robinson, Toronto, $4,641. Now, this amount of $98,683 has all been misspent, it has been handed over to the friends of the Government, partisans of the Government, in order to keep them attached to the Government. I am sure the Government are not in a position to satisfy this House that this money has been expended for the public benefit. We have a Minister of Justice, and until recently we had a Solicitor General. I am sure that these two gentlemen ought to be very well able to conduct the law business of this Government. We pay the Minister of Justice $7,000 a year, and a Solicitor General, I think, $4,000, for doing this work. But this is not all the gaspillage of which these gentlemen were guilty during the last year. They thought proper to patronize the press all over Canada, and they did it to the enormous amount of $223,556. There appears in the Public Accounts the names of certain gentlemen who have been in receipt of over $1,000 for pretended services rendered to the Government during the last year. There is the Halifax "Herald," no doubt, a pet paper on behalf of the Government. It is ready to swear every moment by what the Government says. It has been paid for advertising, $1,048, and for printing, $1,874. I find here the St. John "Sun," another pet paper that must be kept on the hands of the Government. It has been paid for advertising $640, and for printing, $6,604. Now, I would like to know what this gentleman has printed and published for the Government, what services he rendered to the Government for that great sum of money. I find here the Moncton "Times," another Government paper, a paper that very nearly died not long since, and the Government, feeling that the death of that paper meant the death of the Government around Moncton, came to its assistance, giving it $191 for advertising—they might as well have made it $200—and for printing, $7,506. There is another paper in Moncton, called the "Transcript," but that received no favour from the Government. Why was not that printing given out by tender? Every gentleman in this House knows well that the Moncton "Times" is not the only daily paper published in Moncton; every gentleman knows well that there is another paper there, and, I must say, a smarter paper than the Moncton "Times." There is the Moncton "Transcript," and all that can be said against it is that it is a Grit paper, it is a paper that will not dance attendance, or go on its knees, to please the Conservative Government of Canada. It is independent, but you will not find the name of the "Transcript" figuring on this account. I find a little further, the Hamilton "Spectator." Well, the Hamilton "Spectator" is a Government paper, published in the interest of the Government. It is a good deal more modest than the Moncton "Times." I suppose it is not quite so barefaced. He got $1,731 for advertising, and $112 for printing. The Ottawa "Citizen," which is, no doubt, the mouth-piece of the Government here in Ottawa, has also been very modest; it has only received $1,467 for advertising, and $1,457 for printing. The Montreal "Gazette" for advertising has received $1,057, and for printing, $868. The Quebec "Chronicle"—I am sorry my hon. friend for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) is not in his place, perhaps he could tell us what the Quebec "Chronicle" published, or did, for the amount placed to its name, $744 for advertising, and $1,477 for printing. The Regina "Leader"—Where is the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin)? I understood he was the owner of that paper. The Regina "Leader" has received for advertising, $598, and for printing, $990. Now, I would like to know what the Government had to do that required this large sum to be paid in advertising and printing in Regina. There is also another paper here, called the Regina "Standard." Whether it is the same paper, I do not know. I presume they are closely connected; they are near relations to each other, and I make no doubt they have divided the spoils between them. The "Standard" is a little more modest in charging for advertising, it only charged $36; but, when it comes to the printing business, he charges $4,358.

Mr. DAVIN. I am sure the hon. gentleman would like to be informed that the "Standard" is a strong supporter of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. PERRY. Well, I am glad to have that information. I really thought that all the people in and around Regina were Conservatives, that they were all followers of the hon. member for Assiniboia. I find some people there, even the editor of a paper, are Liberals.

Mr. DAVIN. I will explain how that is. As a fact the patronage is given to the "Standard," $4,000; but it is not given by this Government directly at all. Nor is the patronage of the Regina "Leader," with which I am in no way connected now, given by this Government, but by the North-west government; however, as we have not full provincial powers in the Territories yet, it appears in the public accounts as though this Government gave it all. That may possibly give a point to the hon. gentleman as to how it is that the "Standard," which supports the leader of the Opposition, has such a heavy amount of patronage as compared with the "Leader."

Mr. PERRY. That may be all very well, but if I understand the hon. gentleman aright, it is public money after all, it is money taken from the people by the imposition of heavy taxes. I do not care whether it come out of the pockets of Peter or Paul; it represents money collected under the tariff of the Finance Minister, and some of the money came from Tignish and Miminegash.

Mr. DAVIN. Let me explain to the hon. gentleman. There is no tariff at all in that matter. That sum of $4,000 paid to the "Standard"—and the "Standard" is a deadly enemy of mine—is given for printing the ordinances. So, as I say, there is no tariff there at all.

Mr. PERRY. I have no objection to allowing the hon. gentlemen to put himself right. He has not, however, improved his case. This is public money belonging to the revenues of Canada. I observe there is a paper called the Yarmouth "Times" which received $240 for advertising and $1,300 for printing. The Toronto "Empire" is very moderate; I do not see how it can live with the small amount put down to it, $1,160 for advertising and nothing for printing.

Mr. DAVIN. It died of inanition.

Mr. PERRY. These are not all the sins of which the present Government have been guilty. The Minister of Finance in the Budget speech tried to make the taxpayers believe that the country was rich, well off, and that the people should be thankful to the hon. gentleman and his National Policy. He is very apt to pride himself on his announcement that there is a balance of $4,145,806.15, upon which he says interest is apt to be collected on behalf of the Government of Canada, and he puts down the items. We find among them, Albert Railway Company, New Brunswick, $14,725. I am sorry to find New Brunswick is so much demoralized—I did not expect it. Then there is an item Quebec Harbour Commission, $3,748,519. I presume this is part of the amount of which McGreevy and Connolly extracted about $1,000,000, for which we have nothing. Then there is the Fredericton Bridge Company, $300,000. I see the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is looking at me very earnestly. I suppose he could give me some explanation. Then there is an item Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners, $81,760. I am sorry the ex-Minister of Public Works, who represents that locality, is not here to explain what was done with the money, and whether it is likely to be refunded. These sums were loaned by the Government for these works from which they have not received anything and from which they are not going to receive anything. As to the item of $300,000 for the Fredericton Bridge Company, the interest has not been paid, much less the principal. The loan to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners of $3,749,000 has not been returned, nor has payment been made of the interest. What is the use of retaining these accounts; why try and thus blindfold the public? These sums together amount to $4,145,000, to which may be added about $750,000 sunk in the Tay Canal, making in all about $5,000,000, which have been extracted from the taxpayers, which might as well be wiped out as no good can come from retaining these items. I will allow the country to judge these matters. I can feel a little sympathy for the Government for they are on their trial. I feel sorry for a criminal in the box, and I feel sympathy for the Government. They are being tried before a court of lawyers, and some of them are very able lawyers too, but their precarious position will come when they are placed before the jury of the people at the polls. That is the time they will shiver, for their days are numbered. They have failed to do justice to certain portions of the Dominion because the electors there did not see fit to send supporters of the Government to this House, and for no other reason. While they follow such principles, they can never expect to have the support of the people, even their own political friends will condemn them. A great many Conservative electors are possessed of a spirit of justice, and they are not actuated with the spirit that they would like to see every Grit in Canada exterminated. They believe that the Liberals of this country are a useful institution, and that bad as we are off, we would be a great deal worse off were it not for the Opposition in this House. Now, Sir, we find these men opposite boasting of their loyalty to the mother country, but, to my mind, actions speak a great deal louder than words. It is all very well for members of the Government to talk about the old flag, and what they would do, as long as they are behind the bush, and how they would fire a rifle, although some of them perhaps never saw one in their lives. But what have they done during the past eighteen years of their Administration? How do they show their loyalty to the mother country? Why, Sir, I find to-day that the volume of trade between Canada and Great Britain is $7,000,000 less than it was during the last year of the Mackenzie Administration. Is that loyalty to the mother country? Will they deny that their National Policy has destroyed the trade between Great Britain and Canada? I say these gentlemen are not loyal. They are not loyal to-day, nor were they loyal two days after Parliament met. At a most critical time, when the mother country was threatened with war by almost the whole world, and when these Cabinet Ministers should have been united and in a position to advise the representative of the Crown, what were they doing? Why, Sir, they were tearing one another, skivering one another, as Paddy says; and trying to kill one another politically. Mr. Speaker, look at the duplicity of these gentlemen. They sat with the present Premier for twelve months, and the people of the country were under the impression that everything was going on smoothly. They called Parliament to meet on the 2nd of January, and when Parliament met His Excellency read a speech which was put in his hands by the Ministers of the Crown. There was no sign of disloyalty in that speech. The second or third paragraph made reference to the remedial legislation which this House was called together for the sole purpose of passing, but three days after the House met half the Cabinet Ministers resigned. They abused their Premier. They said he was no good. that he had no brains, that he was not worthy of their support, and they accused him of everything but treachery. They also slighted His Excellency the Governor General. They never took into consideration that this was a time in the political history of the country when the Cabinet should have remained steadfast and united. How would it be if during that time war was declared on England by Germany or the United States? Where were the Cabinet Ministers to act in that emergency? But, Mr. Speaker, more to their shame, more to their disgrace, and more to the humiliation of this country, these men swallowed the pill and went back to serve under Premier Bowell. They have never explained the reason why they left the Cabinet, and they have never explained the reason why they went back. Gentlemen on this side of the House, and I presume on the other side of the House also, may imagine the reason. It may be that they could not agree on the Remedial Bill, and I have no doubt that that is the case. We were told some time ago that the first Bill framed by the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) contained 119 sections, and we know that the present Bill has only 112. I would ask the Ministers what has become of the other seven clauses and what did they contain? Were these seven clauses the only clauses that were put in the Bill to make it effective? Were these seven clauses inserted in the Bill in spite of the seven kicking Ministers, I would like to know? I see two Ministers of the Crown before me, and I suppose they could tell if they liked. I cannot compel them to speak, but as a representative of the people,

I say it is due to this House and due to the country that we should know about these seven clauses. I know that the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has his whole soul in that Bill, and I know that he did not go back to the Cabinet after these seven clauses were struck out.

Mr. DAVIN. Which Bill?

Mr. PERRY. The Remedial Bill. Is the hon. gentleman so far gone that he does not know what Bill I am alluding to? If he is prepared to come to the rescue of the Government, and tell me what has become of these seven clauses, then I will be satisfied. But, Sir, they cannot answer it; it is impossible for them to answer. But the Cabinet Ministers may depend upon it, that when they face the electors at the polls, that question will be asked; and if they are not able to answer it satisfactorily, I can only say, the dear help them. As I said before, the Government can afford to squander money where they have friends; but where they suppose they have no friends, or where the electors do not think as they do politically, the people have no chance of getting any consideration from them. They say we are prosperous—that this country is doing well. Well, Mr. Speaker, it was only the other day that I saw in the Ottawa "Citizen," a paper that is always ready to back up the Government—and I could almost see the tears of the editor on the paper—the statement that there were 1,500 men idle in Ottawa; in the capital of the Dominion, where there are to-day 400 or 500 gentlemen from different parts of this country, sitting here for three or four months, and where one would think everybody ought to be prosperous. At the same time, a little lower down in the same column the editor said, "Thank God, the snow fell; it has given employment to the people." He did not say "Thank God, the Government have sent the snow," and he did not blame the Government for these men being idle; but I do, and I thank God that the snow came in order to give them work to make a living by it. To my knowledge there is worse than that. There are starving families in Ottawa, and in Montreal; in every part of Canada there are men out of work; and what else can we expect when we find the trade of Canada lessening every day under this beautiful National Policy. And still hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that it is the great policy of the day.

Now, Sir, I was a little amused the other day to hear my friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) praising the National Policy. In fact, he said that under the National Policy the farmers were well protected. For fear I might misrepresent him, I will quote his words from "Hansard." He said:

I say that the farmers who toil and labour, and who are the backbone of our country, should be protected, as they have been under the National Policy.

Well, I would like to know how the poor farmers are protected under the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite boasted that they were giving a free breakfast table to the farmer. They tax the article of sugar, which I suppose the Minister of Finance would not claim to be a luxury, but a necessary of life to the poor man. The chair the poor farmer sits on at his table is taxed 30 per cent. The little table at which he eats his meal is taxed 30 per cent. The linen cloth that is spread over the table—I presume the members of the Cabinet will not deny the privilege to the farmer to have a linen cloth on his table—is taxed about 35 per cent. The knife and fork and spoon he eats with are taxed 30 per cent. The common earthenware the poor farmer uses—because he cannot afford chinaware—to drink his tea or coffee with is also heavily taxed. Do you mean to tell me that this is the way to protect the poor farmer, by taxing everything he uses? His plough is taxed, his harrow is taxed, his axe is taxed, his scythe is taxed. The nails he uses to put up his building are taxed. The horse nails used for shoeing his horse are taxed. The iron that makes the horse-shoe is taxed. His coal is taxed. Everything else he uses is taxed. I will not say that his beer or whisky is taxed, because he cannot afford these luxuries. By the time he pays his taxes to this greedy Government that can never get taxes enough from the people, to satisfy them, he has very little left. My friend from Inverness went a little further. He seemed to be very much interested in the platform of the Liberal party which was adopted by the great convention held in Ottawa in June, 1893. In fact, when I heard him quoting the planks of that platform, I had an idea that he was going to become a convert to Liberalism; but I am afraid he was not. He said:

The platform of the Liberal party, as adopted by this convention in 1893, was read by hon. gentlemen opposite one after another, and notwithstanding the fact that this was done not one attempted to explain any feature of it. In fact the very reason why it has been so acceptable to the Opposition is simply that it reflects very clearly indeed the policy of deception, slander and scandals which have been adopted by the Opposition from 1878 up to the present time.

I want the House and the country to understand the charges my friend makes against the Liberal party, not while they were in power, but during the time they are in opposition. He speaks of "deception, slander and scandal." Why, Sir, who would have the hardihood to stand up in this House or out of it and accuse the Liberal party of deception? How could we practice deception, even if we were inclined to do it? Where is our power to act? Then he speaks of slander. Well, what is the meaning of slander? I wish I had my dictionary here to find out. Is it that an hon. member of this House made certain charges against certain individuals of having misapplied money, and that those charges were brought home and two gentlemen were sentenced to jail for twelve months? Is that what my hon. friend calls slander? Or what does he mean by it? Is it because the Liberal party in this House have the hardihood to stand up in their places and show the misdoings of the present Government? Then he is not satisfied with that charge, but he adds the word "scandals." Can the hon. gentleman point me to one scandal that the Liberal party have been guilty of—one single individual scandal? Even my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) could not do it. Is there any gentleman in this House, or out of it, who will accuse the Liberal party as a party of scandal?

Mr. AMYOT. Why not?

Mr. PERRY. I am not speaking of the Liberal party in Quebec. I believe there are a good many guilty of scandal in the province of Quebec, and my hon. friend must not think that his bosom friends in the province of Quebec are so pure and guiltless of scandals as he pretends. My hon. friend has made this accusation, and I say it is right and proper for the Liberal party to place themselves right upon this matter. This charge will go broadcast through the country, and if not contradicted here, a great many people in the country might be inclined to believe it. But, Sir, I do deny it in toto, and I fling it back in the teeth of the hon. member who had the hardihood to make this statement, when he must have known that he was not telling what was actually the facts. Then he is so much in love with the platform of the Liberal party that he quoted one plank in the platform, as follows:—

The customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service.

My hon. friend is not satisfied with that plank. His idea is not to have a tariff for revenue purposes, but a tariff for the purposes of allowing the Government to squander money as they have done during the past eighteen years. Then he went on to say:

There are bloated monopolists amongst the farmers as well as among other manufacturers. There are those who perfect the products of cattle and hogs, and who are interested in having the raw material for their particular line of manufacture. They, therefore, advocate strongly in this House and in the country, to have corn and cats from the other side of the line, admitted free, in competition with these products of our own country.

My hon. friend finds fault with a few farmers well to do. I presume there are so few of them in the county of Inverness that he thinks it is wonderful to see a farmer doing well. But, Sir, there is not a class of the people in this country that I would sooner see well off than the farmers. They are the bone and sinew of this country, but, to my sorrow, under the administration of the present Government, their welfare has depreciated very much, indeed. Even their land is going down in value. From my own knowledge, I know that their lands have depreciated, under the administration of this Government, one-third in value, since 1878. Then my hon. friend went on to say :

The Liberals claim on every platform that the National Policy has decreased the value of farm and other landed property.

Well, he knows that himself. Every hon. member here knows it to his sorrow. I know it, and am sorry to have to say that such is the fact. Then, a little further on he quotes again from the Liberal platform:

That it has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few.

Well, is not that a fact. Have we not millionaires to-day in Canada who have made their millions by bleeding and taxing the poorer classes of the people, the farmers, labourers, and artisans? Why, we know well that the manufacturers to-day in Canada are bleeding the consumers, and here is an admission taken from the Year-Book. Manufacturers and workingmen should give some study to the statistics of the census compiled by Mr. Johnson, who is the Government statistician, and also the statistician for the purpose of protectionists. In order to glorify protection, the figures had to be made as big as possible. What is the result? Read the statistics in regard to manufacturers taken from the Year-Book :

Capital invested	$353,837,000
Value of product	478,416,000
Cost of raw material	255,883,000
Cost of labour	99,768,000
Number of hands	367,000

I ask the manufacturers if these figures are all right. They are those gathered from themselves by a protectionist Government agent for the glorification of protection. If they are all right, look at what is discovered by them. Deducting the cost of labour and raw material, $355,746,000 from the value of the product, $473,416,000, gives an annual profit of $119,700,000 upon an invested capital of $353,837,000, or a profit of 33 4-5 per cent per annum. That is their profit, according to the official records of the Dominion Government of Canada, and this is the result which I find. That after the manufacturers have paid everything, they have $119,000,000 to divide among themselves. Going a little further, I find that the average wages paid is $272 a year, and that on each man employed the manufacturers made a profit of $326. Is it any wonder that these working people are so poor? Is it any wonder that they are getting poorer and that the manufacturers are becoming millionaires? Then he goes on to say, with reference to the charge that the National Policy has checked immigration :

Any person who will examine the tidal wave of immigration to Canada will realize at a glance that this statement is sheer sophistry.

He denies that we have lost population since 1878 in Canada. Every man in this House knows well that, to our sorrow, we have lost population. I have the census returns here, and I will take the province of Nova Scotia, county by county, to show how they are progressing in the matter of population. Annapolis in 1881 had a population of 20,182, and in 1891 the population was 19,350. Antigonish in 1881 had a population of 18,060, which, in 1891 had fallen to 16,114. Cape Breton shows an increase from 31,258 in 1881 to 34,244 in 1891. I suppose, the coal mines there and the floating population has been the cause of that increase. Colchester had a population of 21,720 in 1881, which, by 1891, had increased by 40. In Cumberland in 1881 there were 27,368 people, and in 1891 there were 34,529. There is an increase of 7,161. In Digby the figures are, 19,888 in 1881 and 19,897 for 1891, an increase of 16. In Guysboro' the figures are, for 1881, 17,888, and for 1891, 17,195, an increase of 13. Halifax city shows an increase from 36,100 in 1881 to 36,496 in 1891, an increase of 395. In Halifax county, from 31,817 in 1881 the population increased to 32,863 in 1891. In Hants in 1881 the population was 21,359, and in 1891, 22,052. Inverness, the county represented by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron), had a population in 1881 of 25,651, and in 1891, 25,779, an increase of 128. That is the increase of population in ten years in the county represented by the hon. gentleman. And he still has the face to ridicule the statement that Canada has lost population under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is time these statements should be contradicted; it is time that the people should understand the true position of public affairs in this country. I have often noticed that hon. gentlemen on the other side, when addressing the electors, as it seems to me, try to keep the people in the dark, instead of telling them the real position in which they stand. Now, it was stated here that the National Policy has impeded commerce; and the hon. gentleman also laughs at that and wants to make it appear that such is not the case. But we know very well that the trade of Canada to-day is less than it was some years ago; we know that the trade of Canada is not improving. He says there are a few other assertions he is willing to let pass, but he says, here is the great platform upon which the Conservative party came into power in 1878, and this is the horse that is to carry them into power again :

That the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy—

The platform is not in accord with the National Policy, as it is declared to-day. This was to be merely a readjustment of the tariff. We know that, when Mr. Boyd telegraphed to Sir John Macdonald what he meant by the new policy, and whether it was to be a protective policy, we know very well that Sir John answered that this was to be merely a readjustment of the tariff.

—which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion—

I admit that the National Policy has fostered manufacturing; but I deny that it has fostered agriculture or mining.

—that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home—

Has it done that? The census returns prove that between 1881 and 1891, counting the immigrants that came to Canada and the natural increase, we should have had a total increase of 1,700,000 souls. And the same census proved that all we kept to increase our population was something less than 500,000. Is there anything to show that the National Policy has kept population in Canada? Is there anything to show that it has encouraged immigration?

—will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade.

Where are we, so far as reciprocity is concerned? Are we any nearer to it, after these eighteen years of the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, than we were in 1878? It is true, that in 1890 and 1891, a short time before the general election, the Government took a step toward making an offer to the American people looking toward reciprocal trade relations between the two nations. But we find that the statement they made before the elections, and on which they ran the election, they were going to have reciprocal trade with the United States, was simply a bid for the endorsement of the public. They knew the people of Canada, especially the farmers, would catch at that very quick. The people believed it, and they returned the Government again. But shortly afterwards, in January, 1891, we find that Mr. Blaine wrote a letter to Mr. Baker, in which he says:

I authorize you to contradict the rumours you refer to. There are no negotiations whatever on foot for a reciprocity treaty with Canada, and you may be sure that no scheme for reciprocity with the Dominion, confined to natural products, will be entertained by this government. I know nothing of Sir Charles Tupper coming to Washington.

Mr. PERRY.

Now, there is a flat contradiction by Mr. Blaine; and we know that the Secretary of State, the ex-High Commissioner—I do not know whether he is High Commissioner yet—has never seen fit to contradict that. And here we have the humiliating spectacle of Sir Charles Tupper being obliged to swallow the statement which he made before the people of this country. Now, let me give you some instances of our export trade with the United States:

	1890.	1893.
Horses	$ 1,887,895	$1,123,339
Cattle	104,623	10,032
Poultry	105,612	52,114
Eggs	1,793,104	324,355
Wool	235,436	228,030
Flax	175,563	124,082
Barley	4,582,562	638,271
Split peas	74,215	4,214
Hay	922,797	854,958
Malt	149,310	19
Potatoes	303,915	259,176
Rye	113,320	3,302
Total	$10,453,352	$3,624,892

Does that go to show that our exports of farm products have increased during those years? These figures are taken from the official statistics, and they show that during these three years our export trade of farm products in the articles I have named has depreciated 300 per cent. Does that show the prosperity of this country? What else but the National Policy has been the cause of this? The hon. gentlemen opposite know well that the American people have built a Chinese wall, but they felt that one wall was not enough, and so they built another, just as high as the American wall. I say, Sir, that instead of building that wall, they should have endeavoured to negotiate a fair reciprocal trade treaty with the American people. We know very well that time and again the American people have told them that they will not reciprocate on farm products alone. The American, Mr. Speaker, is a shrewd man. He knows the value of dollars, and he knows how to make them. He knows when he is properly dealt with, and he knows his own interests just as well as the people of Canada. He knows well that a reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United States in farm products would be opening a market in the United States for the Canadian farmer for all these articles I have read, while not one of them would come into Canada. Therefore, there would be no reciprocity in those articles. But the Government of the United States have made a schedule of manufactured articles, with the natural products of the United States, and they have offered that if these were admitted free of duty into Canada, they would admit our farm products that I have enumerated here duty free from the United States. But the Government of Canada have not thought proper to do that, and that is one of the great reasons why the people of Canada are suffering to-day. Now they say that the tariff does not oppress the
