I am speaking strongly about this because there is not very much in the Prime Minister's speech to which I have any objection. He puts his point of view and that is all right. But it is something else again when the Prime Minister in a casual conversation makes a quick interjection at a cabinet meeting and asks somebody whether he will accept the prime ministership and then rises in his place on the floor of this house and says that a man should not be left in the cabinet because he did not accept that invitation, because he did not say, "yes." I submit that is doing that member an injustice with regard to which I think he has a right to defend himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend one further question? Did I not at a subsequent meeting of the cabinet say that if the government felt that they had to take the course of introducing conscription at that stage I was quite prepared to resign, and that I would like to know if any of them would be prepared to take my place?

Mr. RALSTON: The Prime Minister can make his own statement with regard to what took place at other meetings of the cabinet. I am discussing the meeting of the cabinet, the procedure of which the Prime Minister disclosed. I am not discussing any other meetings of the cabinet.

I say that that proposition is not a proposition which can be upheld. I want to say further that I am complaining now of the Prime Minister having brought this up, having held this against me and having told the people of Canada that I was derelict in my duty because, having made a statement to this house and having undertaken a certain policy which I believed was the policy of the government and although my colleagues would not agree I must stay in the cabinet unless I was willing to take the responsibility of forming a government on a casual invitation such as I have described.

I want to say that if the proposition were that a man had to stay in the government or else be prepared to form a government and lead a party it would be a serious deterrent to men undertaking cabinet responsibilities. It means that cabinet marriage is till death or defeat or acceptance of the prime ministership doth us part. That would be the individual's position. On the other hand, the Prime Minister could cut the knot at any time and transfer his affections elsewhere.

I am speaking with regard to my own position. Mr. Speaker, the matter of assuming further responsibilities is for the individual man according to his own conscience or his own sense of his own capabilities and shortcomings. It is not a matter of a rule to be laid down by the Prime Minister or to be dictated by anybody else. I undertook the task of Minister of National Defence at the request of the Prime Minister on the tragic death of my friend, the late Norman Rogers. I have carried on the job and given my best to it. Whether I have succeeded, history will have to judge. I confess that I should have liked to finish the task, but that has not been possible.

I know a few of my own weaknesses. One of the many perhaps is that I am not flexible enough. I was born that way. I am too old to change. I have not any ambition but to be a good Canadian, and I know my place is not on the dizzy heights of leadership but in the more humble valleys working with my fellow citizens. I have no inclination, much less aspiration for preferment in public life, and such modest services as I have given have been from a feeling of duty and a hope that I am contributing something, within my capacity, to this land of ours. I neither felt nor feel any duty to take on responsibility for which I am convinced I am not suited.

I am saying this in case there is any more answer needed to the Prime Minister's snap invitation. I have dealt with it in that way. I have been serious about it, because, as I said a moment ago, I felt that as a colleague I was entitled to something better than that from the Prime Minister in view of all that has taken place between us. I understand, of course, that he had his tremendous difficulties, but I had mine.

The situation which I had been facing in the last two months meant the most serious and vital decision of my whole public life. If I may be quite frank about it, when I did make this recommendation I foresaw that there would be resentment from my friends, that there would be a good deal of, shall I say chortling or at least some satisfaction on the part of my political opponents. Worst of all, I would not have the opportunity of finishing the job which I had taken on. But I had to make that decision, and I am saying that in the presence of the Prime Minister to let him know, as I know he does know, that I have had some difficulties as well as he.

When I left the cabinet it was not with any sense of any dereliction of duty, or that I would have to stay and form a ministry. It was made quite clear to me that the place for me was not inside, but outside the cabinet.

I do not think I am going to take much of the time of the house with the matter of the resignation. The Prime Minister has dealt with it at some length himself. It was all dealt with in the correspondence. It has been gone into thoroughly, but there is one impression which the Prime Minister left which I should like to clear up. The impression which I gathered was that he indicated that the difficulty between us and the point on which we parted was a question as to the time limit which should be given for the appeal which was proposed to be made in connection with N.R.M.A. recruiting.

I mention this only for the purpose of clearing this up once and for all if I can. It is quite clear from the correspondence that that was not the issue on which I felt I had to leave the cabinet. The basis of my resignation was the refusal to accept my recommendation. I have no complaint about that, since the cabinet had a perfect right to refuse it. When the question of making an appeal came up I put before my colleagues two points; one was a practical one, namely, the practicability of the appeal and the delay which would follow and the likelihood of success. The other point concerned the policy. We discussed the matter for some time. I do not need to go into the details here because I shall go into them later on in connection with another point.

We discussed the matter of the appeal for some time. I pointed out the necessity of having these men at once. The time which would be taken in making an appeal; the experience which we had had in the past; the fact that an appeal was nothing new, that the department had been constantly making appeals to N.R.M.A. men; the fact that when you enlisted an N.R.M.A. man you could not be sure that he would be a trained infantry man, he might be a gunner, an army service corps man or something else; the fact that the man might not be physically fit—all these things had to be taken into consideration. It made for uncertainty and delay which was extremely dangerous from my point of view having regard to the urgent need which I knew existed.

We had made arrangements in the hope that the recommendation would be accepted in time for a sailing on November 27, but that necessitated the taking of some preliminary action by way of medical examinations on November 1. I pointed out that if that were delayed it meant a delay of another month. Well, we discussed that matter; the appeal was still pressed, and I asked for overnight to consider that matter. Then I wanted to know, where do you go from there? Supposing the appeal is made, what is the policy of the government? Is the policy of the government that if the appeal is made, and fails; in other words, if there are not sufficient general service men to send the number, 15,000, I had asked for, is it the policy of the government that N.R.M.A. men be sent? And I could get no assurance on that point at all.

Further than that, I found that the government as a whole, certain colleagues excepted, did not consider that the government was bound to that policy by the Prime Minister's speech in 1942. The Prime Minister interjected there, I think, or indicated that it was all a matter of the heart that a man put into it, that that was really what was the important thing, that he had been consulting General McNaughton and that General McNaughton felt that he could get these men by voluntary means, and he mentioned something about a previous resignation of two years ago which had not yet been withdrawn. I rather got the impression that he thought he might accept that, but he did not say so in so many words and went on to speak of General McNaughton again and that he was willing to take on and that he thought he should be invited to do so. Of course I promptly indicated to him that I would send him my resignation at once.

That is the conclusion of the story of the resignation, and I hope that the matter will not be rehashed again, because it is not at all important. I am out of the government, as far as that goes. I have been allowed to serve this country—and I thank the Prime Minister publicly for it, as I did in my letter of resignation—at perhaps the most serious and crucial time in her history. I have appreciated that. I have appreciated the associations that I have made. I have no regrets whatever. To me it seems that the matter of my resignation or the exact circumstances of it are neither here nor there, but that also seems to have had to be discussed all over again the other night, along with these other side issues I have referred to. What I thought was much more important was the question of the need of these men and how they should be sent.

These are the matters, although they are really outside the general issue, to which the Prime Minister referred and to which I felt I had to refer.

I wish now to refer to a statement which the Prime Minister made again the other night in connection with this matter of shortage. I want to correct it, because I am afraid the house and perhaps the country may get the idea that there is no shortage until the end of the year. As reported at page 6599 of Hansard, he said:

> I want to make clear that the minister assured us that, as far as the records showed, the probability was that a critical situation would not arise until the beginning of the new year, but that he thought it might become acute at that time.

I am afraid that I have again to take issue with the Prime Minister. I was more concerned than anything else about the immediacy and urgency of the shortage. I remembered the discussions which had taken place and the statements which had been made. I recall the discussions which took place in cabinet. I presume that it is my fault that I did not make it clear, but I do remember some of the discussions, and there is no doubt in my mind but that I made it clear beyond peradventure that an actual shortage existed owing to the fact that the pools were down and that we were just on the thin edge. I remember having pointed out that there was a short term as well as a long term problem. I remember that it was said, "Well, we are doing pretty well if we keep them up to strength." I explained the pools and why they were formed. I remember that the chief of staff's own memorandum mentioned that the 15,000 were wanted for an infantry pool. I remember that he also mentioned the fact that he wanted to send to Italy so many men for the purpose of forming a pool there, and so many men to France. I remember that I took occasion on almost the last day to read to council a memorandum from the present adjutant general on the necessity for maintaining pools, and I endeavoured to impress on everybody concerned that there was at present an actual immediate need to build up the pools, not just a probable "critical situation which would not arise until the beginning of the new year." The point was that we could not meet the need immediately because we could not get those men over soon enough, but if we took prompt steps it would reassure our men and our commanders.

With regard to the Prime Minister's statement that there was a possible shortage in the next few months, I have already indicated that a probable considerable shortage was ahead in December and that it was getting worse every month from then until May. I pointed out that the units would be down in strength, not in the next few months but in the next eight weeks, and that the units went down further each month.

I submit that the statement by the Prime Minister on Monday gives an entirely wrong impression. What we have to show to this house and to this country in order to get support for the sending of these men is, not what the situation is if we get the 16,000, but what the situation will be if we do not get them. That is what I had been endeavouring to show to the Prime Minister and to council and, so far as I could, in the statement I made to the press in correction of the Prime Minister's statement, and that is what I want to refer to now, in order to come to what is really the heart of the matter, namely, the situation with regard to our need.

Here are some of the conditions which make these men necessary. First, the reserves or the pools of trained infantry reinforcements which had been established overseas have been almost if not entirely depleted to the point of exhaustion. Additional infantry reinforcements are needed at once to reestablish them. Second, the forecasts show that we are sailing so close to the wind that it would appear that by the end of January not only shall we be without reserves, but our infantry units themselves will be in the aggregate slightly under strength. When I left the cabinet the figures showed that there would be a considerable shortage by the end of December; I mean a shortage in the strength of the units themselves, with no pools whatever. I referred to this in my public statement of November 12. I understand that since that time the estimates of casualties have been revised downward and the departure of certain detachments being remustered in the United Kingdom has been hastened, so that now the estimates for the end of December show an aggregate surplus; that means, a surplus over the strength of the units, not over the strength of the pools. It means some surplus to apply to the pools, which, however, would disappear in January, even after using up all the trained infantry now available. That means there would be no pool whatever of trained infantry reserves at the end of January.

When I left the cabinet I forecast that we would have a small deficit even at the end of November. That would be within a month after the statement made by the Prime Minister. In other words, when I retired we faced a situation where we might reasonably expect to have just about enough men to fill units to the end of November, but with no real reserves. During December the position would get worse, and at the end of December not only would we have no pool, but the units themselves would be under strength, and the unit strength in the aggregates would grow weaker month by month in 1945. The only substantial difference between the figures compiled before I left the cabinet and the figures of the day before order in council P.C. 8891 was passed is that any actual shortage in units strengths develops, under the new figures, in January instead of December. The point is that even on the revised figures there is a substantial shortage for December because the aggregate surplus is far too small a number to provide sufficient pools in the battle areas in the United Kingdom.

The tight position now forecast for January or February gets tighter each month of 1945, and by the end of May we find ourselves with the units under strength to the extent of several thousand and with no trained reinforcements immediately available. To use the minister's expression, we shall be "far more than going into the red—quite deep". Any reinforcements which might be prospectively available have to be earmarked to meet prospective casualties.

Now these statistics may change. They have changed since I left the cabinet. They are, after all, statistics. They can never be proved or disproved. What they do show is that in reinforcements for infantry we are working with no "backlog", instead of having an adequate reserve as we have for every other branch of activity either in war or in business. The fact that we may have paper figures which would show that we might from time to time get together enough men in the aggregate to bring the units up to strength if they were concentrated in one area is not good enough. We must have a margin and a substantial one.

Would we think for instance that our medical people were doing their job if the stores of, say, anaesthetic were maintained only on the basis that the quantity kept on hand would just about serve the average number of patients who would be expected per day? Would we not expect them to add twenty-five per cent or fifty per cent to be sure that some wounded soldier would not be placed on the operating table only to find that he was one more than was expected, and that he would have to wait until they sent to the stores in Rome, or perhaps until a ship came in bringing additional supplies from the United Kingdom? You say that is absurd. Is it any more absurd than to try to comfort ourselves with the statistical conclusion that at the end of any month our units should be pretty well up to strength, subject to "ifs" like the following: if the casualties are no higher than expected; if casualties are incurred in numbers and times to correspond with the days when reinforcements become available; if the convoy arrives on time; if it brings as many as are needed; if the other battle area does not ask for some of the men we are expecting; if there are no interruptions or delays in training; if some of the training is omitted; if those who have been wounded and are counted on as returning from hospital are sufficiently hardened; if restriction of leave is imposed; and if there is no sickness, absence or other wastage among the reinforcements. Mr. Speaker, it is those "ifs" and some more which make reinforcement pools or reserves absolutely necessary.

The need for these additional reinforcements did not arise from having suffered more casualties in the aggregate than had been forecasted. The need arises because the casualties incurred by the infantry have been a very much higher proportion of the aggregate casualties than had been estimated, and the estimates for the future are based on that experience. Those estimates of casualties had been made on the most careful calculations based on experience in various theatres and in consultation with the war office. It has turned out, and this applies to our allies as well, that while the estimates with regard to the other arms of the service have been adequate, the basis of those estimates for infantry casualties has proved from actual experience to be in error.

I want to stop here to emphasize the necessity for having adequate reinforcement pools or reserves overseas, both in the United Kingdom and in the battle areas, and in that connection to say something of the actual conditions which I found while in Italy, northwest Europe and the United Kingdom.

It can be stated without qualification that reserves or pools of trained reinforcements are a fundamental part of the organization of any field army, just as much as reserves of ammunition or equipment. An army cannot just depend for reinforcements on the periodic arrival of ships and the number they carry. There must be some substantial cushion to provide for numberless contingencies which must be guarded against. The reinforcement reserve in the United Kingdom is the heart of the reinforcement organization overseas, and it supplies the smaller pools in the battle areas. These battle area pools are absolutely essential. The pools are intended to provide a reservoir directly behind the forward area from which reinforcements can be drawn promptly as casualties are incurred.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Reinforcements are sent from the United Kingdom pool to the battle areas periodically. In Italy, they are received only once a month; in northwest Europe once a week. These periodic dispatches of reinforcements may not come in time or in sufficient numbers to be available to replace current casualties. Arrival of reinforcements may be delayed. Losses may at certain times be exceptionally heavy. It is most desirable that losses be replaced quickly. If they are not replaced, there are less men for the job, with the consequent additional strain. If they are not replaced, morale is bound to be lowered. It is all very well to say that units may be filled up by the end of the month or the end of the week, but what about the days and nights in between? And so pools of reinforcements in the battle areas ensure that reinforcements are available to the units when needed. It ensures that they are not dependent for their reinforcements on the arrival of a convoy, or the uncertainties of how many the convoy will bring due to shortages in the United Kingdom or in another battle area.

It means everything to men in the line to see new men come in beside them to fill the gaps while the battle is on. The men can understand shortages if they know that there are no reinforcements available, but it is different—and I found this particularly in Italy—when the men know that we have these trained infantry men of the N.R.M.A. in Canada who can be made available.

In Italy I visited the reinforcement unit and most of the infantry battalions. I talked with the men themselves, and time and again I got that same story—about having to go back in the line repeatedly, or not having leave, or being short-handed, when trained N.R.M.A. men could be made available to give them relief.

At the end of September, just before I left Italy, the pool of trained infantry reinforcements was down to between ten and fifteen per cent of what had been planned, and infantry reinforcements were so scarce in the United Kingdom that the only addition they were getting was in the monthly convoy to arrive in about two weeks, bringing not even enough trained infantry men to meet the casualties which would have been incurred in those two weeks.

The corps commander in Italy pressed strongly that the pool be reestablished in the area sufficiently strong to relieve the tight situation and ensure prompt replacement of day-to-day casualties.

In northwest Europe the acting army commander impressed on me another reason for maintaining an adequate pool in the battle area; that even well-trained reinforcements coming into the line for the first time have to be helped and advised by their battle experienced comrades. He made the point that if the unit is allowed to get down in strength through reinforcements not coming in promptly it puts an added strain on men in the unit to absorb a large number of new men coming in all at once, and fighting efficiency is lowered.

In a word, casualties should be replaced promptly as they occur so that there would be smaller numbers to be absorbed, instead of allowing shortages to accumulate and expecting a weakened unit to absorb a large total at one time. This was another reason making it so necessary to reestablish an adequate pool immediately available behind the units. Fighting efficiency calls for continual instead of periodic reinforcement.

The acting army commander also explained to me that shortages in the infantry battalions were generally due to casualties suffered by the rifle companies of the battalion. He pointed out that the fighting personnel of the rifle companies numbered only about sixty per cent of the battalion and that, although a shortage might appear to be a small proportion of the whole battalion, it would be a much heavier proportion of these fighting personnel, with a corresponding weakening effect on the capacity of the battalion for aggressive action.

The acting army commander pressed very strongly for a minimum infantry pool at a figure which I considered entirely warranted.

I found that on account of the heavy infantry casualties, the infantry reinforcement pool which had been established in France on D-day had been completely exhausted, and that at one time there had been aggregate shortages in the units themselves of over 3,000. This had been gradually overcome in aggregate numbers, but not in individual units, by vigorous efforts to retrain men from other arms as infantry. No pool had been built up. The week I was there, there would be sufficient infantry in aggregate numbers available in the area to bring the units up to strength. To do so would leave only about ten per cent of what should have been on hand to provide the pool for which the acting army commander had asked. Some people have the idea that striving to keep units up to strength means trying to achieve an ideal condition. They think of experiences in the last war when units held the line with strength substantially reduced. Experience in the last war is no guide. In the last war battles were short, the objectives were limited and long static periods intervened. In this war a battle is a series of continuous offensive operations, or, to put it the other way, a battle is a continuous series of offensive operations. That makes it most necessary that units, while they are in the battle, be reinforced on the move to keep up the momentum of the operation and each unit's fighting efficiency. That does not mean that units are kept in the line a longer time than they should be. They are withdrawn and replaced constantly by other units. It only means that, while they are there, the activity is more intense, and to support men and the success of the operation the ranks should be filled up promptly.

Just here I wish to mention one point with regard to the reinforcement system. An impression that I feel sure is wrong has got abroad with regard to the system which is in practice overseas. I am speaking now both of Italy and of northwest Europe, because the system in Italy was copied in northwest Europe. There is the idea in some quarters that when the battalion itself wants men it requisitions the brigade, and the brigade requisitions the division, and the division the corps, and then the corps requisitions the echelon. Well, that is absolutely fallacious. What is done is this: the reinforcements generally are under the reinforcement group which is directly under the second echelon, the second echelon being located fairly well back. That reinforcement group is fairly well up but in, shall I say, a comparatively secluded and safe place. The reinforcement group throws off forward battalions of infantry, artillery, army service corps, and so on at the army road-head. From there again there are sent further forward into the corps area or into the divisional area companies of reinforcements to be directly behind the units so that they will be available, not to be sent from away back at the group, but available immediately to be sent to the different units themselves. The requisition does not come from the brigade to division to corps to army; the requisition comes direct from the unit to second echelon which has charge of the distribution. Second echelon immediately advises the people having charge of these men up in the corps or divisional area to release direct to the unit. In other words, in requisitioning men the unit by-passes brigade and division and corps and army, and requisitions straight back to second echelon, and in filling the requisition second echelon gives orders direct to the people in charge of the reinforcements, away up in the forward area behind the units, and these men are released direct to the units. That is how speedily it is done under the system we have. All that you need are two things, transport and men, and you will get your reinforcements very quickly indeed. We had a situation in France at one time where the group was so far back and the forward troops were moving so fast that it took about six days to get the reinforcements up. When I was there the reinforcements were in the forward reinforcement battalion within about ten miles of the front line. The reinforcements in the corps and divisional areas would be even nearer to the front. Please do not get the idea that units get down in strength and have to wait a week for all these requisitions to go back to the brigade. There is a complete shortcut between the units and the second echelon which has charge of all the reinforcements.

I have spoken of Italy and I have spoken of France. Now a word about the main pool in the United Kingdom. That pool has to be kept up, so that it can supply and maintain, and, if the need should arise, supplement the battle area pools. The pool in the United Kingdom, through the battle area pools, has to be sufficient to provide against shortages in strength which may be anticipated for a month or two ahead; it has to meet the successive and increasing monthly shortages in strength anticipated in 1945; it has to meet unexpected situations when battle casualties may be more than estimated; it has to meet the additional wastage due to increased sickness in the winter months; it has also to provide replacements for men with long service overseas who may be given well deserved leave, and generally it has to afford assurance of man-power against all the other contingencies I have mentioned. The plain fact was that under the stress due to the unexpectedly high proportion of infantry casualties it had not been possible, with the volunteer resources available, to reestablish any adequate pool of trained infantry in the United Kingdom. Nor on the estimates presented by the department were there prospects of any such infantry pool being established unless large numbers of trained N.R.M.A. infantry men were utilized. All the infantry reinforcements which could be made available have had to be sent forward just as rapidly as possible from the United Kingdom to the battle areas to replace casualties. The result was that the infantry units of the Canadian army were operating not with any adequate pool of trained available reinforcements immediately behind them, but rather on a hand-to-mouth system dependent on what could be supplied direct from time to time with the precarious uncertainties of retraining, shipping, sickness, and the impossibilities of accurate distribution between the two battle areas.

Further than that, as indicated, it looks now as if by the end of January there will be no pool at all. From then on there will be a shortage in the aggregate strength of the infantry units which will increase month by month. When I was talking about the pool I was talking about the aggregate pool, and I was not content to make plans based on leaving the infantry units of the Canadian army in any such risky position with regard to reinforcements. We do not take chances on ammunition and equipment. We make excellent and right provisions for ample reserves. You cannot afford to take chances when human lives are at stake. Furthermore, we have to remember that in Italy to-day there are over ten thousand men who have been overseas for more than four years and in the battle areas more than six months. I talked with many of these men. I told them I would give the matter of leave attention as soon as I returned. When I got back the plan for leave was worked out in consultation with my officers. A day or two before my retirement word was received that transportation arrangements could be provided. The plan was awaiting the opportunity to be presented to the war committee at the time I resigned. Since that time I understand it is the same plan which has been approved and announced by my successor.

These men in Italy deserve the utmost consideration, and if the sending of these N.R.M.A. men as reinforcements can help to relieve the strain on them, then I think we are in duty bound to send them.

These are some of the conditions I found in the field. That is a bit of the background from which I felt we must plan for the future.

I consulted General Eisenhower; I consulted General Sir Henry Maitland Wilson; I consulted General Montgomery; I consulted General, now Field Marshal, Alexander and I consulted General McCreery as to the future and I consulted our own commanders as well. Before I finish I am going to mention a word with regard to the prospects of the future course of the war.

After visiting the battle areas I consulted with the chief of staff, Canadian military headquarters, General Stuart. He and his officers had been making every endeavour to meet the changed situation in infantry by re-mustering from other arms, and had succeeded in providing sufficient numbers of trained infantry in northwest Europe to create a small surplus over the unit strengths. He found, however, that by this process he was not able to reestablish pools and at the same time keep units up to strength. He had reviewed the situation with his officers, and before I went to Belgium I had been over the whole position with him.

On my return from Belgium on October 12 we had further conferences, examining the figures and endeavouring to assess the needs, and the possibilities of meeting them with the resources at hand and what were estimated to be prospectively available. As a result of these conferences, I cabled the Prime Minister on October 13 indicating my apprehensions about the reinforcement situation and that I was coming back to Canada immediately. I left for Canada on the 16th, arriving on the 18th, accompanied by the chief of staff, Canadian military headquarters, and saw the Prime Minister that afternoon.

On the 19th the chief of staff, Canadian military headquarters, made a written report to me that, after going over the situation, the only solution which he could see was to find an additional 15,000 trained infantry reinforcements to add to the total infantry reinforcement pool overseas on or before December 31, 1944. He also asked for a certain addition to each of the monthly dispatches of reinforcements from Canada in 1945. He recommended that if the numbers required could not be found in the general service personnel in Canada, the terms of service of the N.R.M.A. personnel be extended to include overseas service in any theatre.

In view of my observations in the battle areas, and after most careful consideration of the figures and of all the relevant factors, I placed this recommendation of the chief of staff, C.M.H.Q., before the war committee at a meeting held the same day, October 19, which was continued on the 20th, and then before a special meeting of the cabinet on October 24. The question then arose as to the source from which these trained infantry men could be obtained before December 31. Here was the situation. Fifteen thousand trained infantrymen were needed at once to build up the overseas pool. Commencing January 1, 1945, a certain additional number of trained infantrymen were needed to be included in the ordinary monthly dispatches of reinforcements from Canada. The chief of the general staff, General Murchie; the adjutant general, General Walford, and their officers made an exhaustive examination of all possibilities of finding the 15,000 trained infantry reinforcements for the pool and the monthly increase for the first six months of 1945, as required by the chief of staff, C.M.H.Q. They were able to provide only sufficient to meet the monthly increases. This was accomplished by demoting non-commissioned officers and utilizing infantry tradesmen, although paying them respectively at the rates for N.C.O.'s and tradesmen for a certain period; by accelerating dispatch of certain infantry; by dispatching certain other arms for retraining as infantry in the United Kingdom. Only about seven hundred of these would be available in the battle area in January and the bulk in February and March. The net result was that this additional 4,500 did not provide anything towards the 15,000 pool, since it would just meet for a five-month period the additional monthly increase that had been asked for by the chief of staff, C.M.H.Q.

The chief of the general staff suggested two possible courses of action. One was the reduction of infantry battalions from four rifle companies to three, making corresponding reductions in the strength of the units in other arms. The other was the disbanding of one infantry division. He stated a number of weighty objections to either of these courses. He pointed out that the adoption of either of them was a matter of government policy, and that before a decision was reached to accept either of these suggestions it was essential that the field commanders be consulted. I agreed with the objections of the chief of the general staff to either of these courses. I considered further that when trained N.R.M.A. men were available, Canada's duty at this crucial period of the war was to support our men in the line, and that our obligation to them, to ourselves and to our allies was not to relax but to go on with the task to help shorten the war.

The third suggestion made by the chief of the general staff was to extend the terms of service of the N.R.M.A. personnel to permit their dispatch overseas. While recognizing that it was a matter of government policy, he stated that, based on purely military considerations, the adoption of this course in his opinion would meet the requirements which the chief of staff, C.M.H.Q., had put forward, both as to numbers and without disruption of the organization and fighting efficiency of the Canadian army. To make a long story short, every available source from which trained infantrymen might be procured was examined, Canada, the United Kingdom and the battle areas themselves. The conclusion was that we had exhausted those possibilities, as far as immediate need was concerned.

As is well known there must be ten soldiers, or nearly that many, in the lines of communication, at the bases, in support and in the various services which are vital for the purpose of servicing the troops to every man in the front line, but generally speaking most of those ten men do not meet the specific standards for the front.

I thought that perhaps when my successor took over he would find some possible source of supply which had been overlooked; but, from what the house knows, I think he has come to the same conclusion that I did. So when people ask me why a few thousand infantrymen could not be supplied from the many, many thousands of soldiers in Canada and the United Kingdom, while I could go over the figures and tell them where all these men are situated, what they are doing and what their qualifications are, I think the short and quick and, I hope, convincing answer is that the present Minister of National Defence, with his experience, has made the same inquiries and has become convinced that men are not available from these sources to meet the immediate problem.

It was under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, that I considered I had no other alternative but to recommend that N.R.M.A. personnel be made available, and I did so. There were 8,000 N.R.M.A. infantrymen who could be ready for combat at an early date, and 8,000 more who could be ready in a month's time. In addition, there were 26,000 N.R.M.A. men considered suitable material as infantry reinforcements who could be remustered and trained as infantry. I thought no time should be lost in getting them to the United Kingdom. The immediate position was that there was a lack of reserves. We were living from hand to mouth. The prospective position was that there would be not only a lack of reserves but shortages in strength even before these N.R.M.A. men could reach the battle areas. The best estimate was that at least two months would elapse from the time it was decided to send the men until they could reach the battle areas. That is, if the decision were made, say on November 1, the first 8,000 men could not be available in the battle area until between January 1 and January 15. Every day that went by meant one more day in which the infantry units of the Canadian army would be without assurance of adequate reinforcement provision. In the hope of favourable action, and in order to have everything in readiness for sending these additional trained infantrymen overseas at the earliest date possible, I had tentative arrangements made for a special sailing near the end of November. The whole matter was thoroughly discussed at many meetings, both of the war committee and of the cabinet; my recommendation was not accepted and, as the house and the country know, my retirement as minister took place on November 1.

Let me recall here that these 15,000 men would be, as it were, a lump-sum addition to our reinforcement reserves. The need could not be met by the gradual dispatch of these men on the monthly instalment plan. They were in addition to all the general service men who could be provided by the regular monthly dispatches, and they were in addition to the extra 4,500 which had been found by the chief of the general staff. The only source from which to get them was from the trained N.R.M.A. infantrymen whom we had been holding in Canada as potential reinforcements.

That was the situation before the cabinet. It was under these circumstances that it was suggested that a further appeal be made to N.R.M.A. men to enlist. I want to point out what the house already knows, since it has been discussed so much, that there was only one group sufficiently trained to qualify to meet the urgen need, and that was the N.R.M.A. infantrymen. I must confess I felt that the appeal would be impracticable and futile. The only question was whether or not the appeal ought to be made in order to say that every effort had been put forth. This is what I told my colleagues when we were discussing the appeal. A little while ago I said that I made two points. One was the practical point; the other was the question of policy, as to what would happen if the appeal failed. In the Department of National Defence we had a good deal of experience with regard to the enlisting of these N.R.M.A. men. Altogether we had enlisted about 42,000 of them. Most of these had enlisted in the early stages of training while, as one might say, they were in the receptive stage and had not acquired fixed ideas. We had enlisted 6,500 since D-day; 2,915 in June, and they were down to 850 by October. The total number we had enlisted from April to October was 10,016, or an average of something like 1,400 a month. But it must be remembered that these N.R.M.A. men whom we enlisted were not all infantry; they were artillery, army service corps and every arm of the service; they were men in A category, men in lower categories for other services, categories too low for infantry, and so on. So that from the over-all members of N.R.M.A. men who enlisted we cannot judge very much as to how many infantrymen we might get.

Well, we had attempts at recruiting regiments. We appealed in particular to a French-speaking regiment, offering that they should go overseas if 500 enlisted; that was the usual offer we made. A very few enlisted. I want to say that was not confined to the French-speaking units. We had exactly the same experience with an English-speaking unit. Perhaps a few more offered to enlist, that is to say conditionally, if 500 went over, but in each instance I can say that we had less than fifty unconditional offers of enlistment.

There was a good deal of talk in this house about the experience we had had out west in connection with the brigade which went to Kiska. We had there a brigade which had gone on offensive operations, which had been with the United States troops, and which had been regarded as top-hole, so far as troops were concerned. These men deported themselves magnificently, and there were very few desertions when they sailed. They got along splendidly when they got there, and went through their training manoeuvres in the Aleutians. But those men who were prepared to take on that Pacific operation, on the morning they landed at Kiska, just happened to find that the Jap was not there.

There was a group we thought would be interested in, and anxious perhaps to go overseas, if they could go as a unit. Well, what did we do? We put on a campaign—and I assure you, it was not any sideshow. We had three V.C.'s there—Major-General Pearkes, Colonel McGregor and Major Triquet. We had padres, officers, N.C.O.'s—everybody—to see these men and to interview them individually. Each battalion was vying with the other to see how many men they could get to enlist to go over. Out of a total strength of, I believe, 2,432, the total enlistments which we got from the brigade amounted to 769. That was a three weeks' campaign. And these were not all infantrymen; it included men in other arms of the service who belonged to the brigade, as well.

We knew only too well the likelihood—or rather the unlikelihood—of any possible campaign which would produce 15,000 trained infantrymen, or anything approaching that number.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the date of that enlistment campaign for the Kiska men? It was a year ago, was it not?

Mr. RALSTON: About May.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Last May?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, last May. In that case what we finally did was this: we enlisted men from other units on the west coast, filled the Kiska units up, and they did go over as a brigade. They had worked so hard in the campaign that we thought they might go over, and we did send them over as a brigade.

I only mention this to the house—and may I add that the government knew that this was the experience we had had. It may be that we were dumb recruiters. It may be that we did not know our business, and that our officers did not know their business. Certainly they tried, and they gave a report in connection with the whole operation which indicated what the difficulties were, a report which, it seems to me, would be helpful to anybody who was going to undertake a special campaign again. The house will not forget, however, that the campaign has really been going on continuously and the N.R.M.A. men we have been enlisting month by month have been the result of continued faithful efforts.

I come back to this: we had that experience. In order to get just as much information as possible as to the possible prospects of fresh endeavours, we communicated direct with the general officer in each of the districts of the Pacific command, to ascertain from him what he thought of the possibility of a campaign—a campaign not on a military level, but one in which the Prime Minister would take part, in which the Minister of National Defence would take part, and in which other ministers would take part. The campaign was suggested for ten days. I suggested it for ten days, and he suggested no campaign was any good for ten days. Finally he said that he thought if the campaign went on for three weeks, with all these other agencies engaged that it might be possible—he could not promise anything—but he would say that at the outside you might get 1,500 trained infantrymen.

That was the situation, and those were the reports which we had. Those were the reports we had to consider in connection with this appeal. On the other hand was the fact that every day which went by meant that these men were just one day later in getting to the battle area. These men could be coming in in dribbles of ten on one day, twenty on the next and fifty on the next, and you would not be able to handle it administratively. You would have to wait until the last man came, or until you got at least 1,000 or 2,000. The result was that it did seem to be administratively impracticable, and the prospects of success seemed absolutely negligible. That was the situation.

Hon. members know what took place. General McNaughton came in, and he felt that these men could be got by voluntary enlistment. He made a speech at Arnprior in which he indicated the desire to get volunteers. At that time he did not mention the N.R.M.A. men at all. Later he spoke at Ottawa. At that time he did mention N.R.M.A. men; his remarks were not addressed directly to them, but he was saying that encouragement would be given to those men to come in.

Then the Prime Minister made an address on November 8 in which he did address these men and their families directly, and asked for their support. The D.O.C.'s came in on November 14, and a report was made and the matter discussed. I think the minister felt that he got some encouragement from that, because he made an announcement that the conference had considered the subject, and that there was confirmation in his mind of the idea that these men could be got by voluntary enlistment. That was the position with regard to the matter of the appeal, about which I referred when I mentioned my resignation.

The minister had advised the Prime Minister on October 31 of his belief that the men could be obtained by voluntary enlistment. I knew the experience we had had—and the government knew, too. The minister took over on November 2. He knew that we were specially short of infantry, and that untrained infantry would not do. He would know that if our troops were out of the line now they would probably be in in January, and that these troops would be most useful to them; and if they were to be obtained by voluntary enlistment the enlistments had to be rapid and effective. The speech at Arnprior was on November 5, I believe it was, and then he spoke again in Ottawa either on the next night or on the night following that.

Then, as I say, on November 14, the D.O.C.'s came in. That means that nearly a month after I came home the first really active step was taken to get N.R.M.A. men to enlist voluntarily. As I have already said, if these men were sent on November 1 they would not get to the battle area, to be of much use to reestablish pools which were going to be short in December.

As I have said, after conference with the D.O.C.'s the minister in a press statement indicated that his belief was confirmed more than ever in continuing the voluntary policy to provide reinforcements. That was on November 17. But within a week, namely on November 23, the minister came to this house and advised us that the D.O.C.'s had told him frankly that they had not much hope that our requirements would be met, but that they had loyally undertaken to make another effort. Then he went on to say:

> This they have now done, and I must admit that the results have not been adequate. I am advised that there are very many N.R.M.A. men who will not volunteer under present circumstances but who are quite willing to be sent overseas.

I was not in that campaign at all; but I want to say this that the Prime Minister did mention—and I do not think he was quite fair to the officers—that the officers had not cooperated—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some of them.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, some of them. I do not know about them all. But I know some who would cooperate to the very limit, no matter what you asked them to do, if it were for the army. And I do not think, with regard to the great bulk of the officers—and not only the officers, but the staffs as well—that the government, or any of us, can have any complaint with the way in which they endeavoured to carry on, under the conditions which I have described.

The Prime Minister also mentioned the big interests or the big influences. Well, as he knows, probably the biggest influence or perhaps the most important was the Canadian Legion, which felt that they could not take part in the campaign. They had their own reasons for that. I assure you that I never had very much of the support of the Canadian Legion in connection with volunteer campaigns, but they did not take the strong attitude which they took in connection with this campaign. There were practical conditions which were fairly well known and which were I think fairly well appreciated.

It all adds up to this: I felt that from November 1 until November 14 no step was taken to get the district officers commanding together, the men who knew more about this thing than anybody else. I felt that that was a very serious delay which could hardly be explained. I came home and perhaps I was too anxious about this thing, but I did have it on my soul and I did believe that these men ought to go. I still believe that they ought to go and I believe that they could have been gotten away on November 27 if action had been taken promptly. We had the whole programme and the whole time table worked out.

I do feel badly that the first address which was made by the minister was simply an address indicating that the best hope was the voluntary system and asking everybody to help. I am not criticising the minister; I am not saying this harshly; I am simply saying what I felt. I felt that the only place to go for these men was the camps in the west, because that is where the men were.

It seems to me that the first thing that should have been done in connection with the campaign was for the minister to have flown out there immediately to gather his officers together. That was not done. The Arnprior speech was made and then the Ottawa speech, and then the Prime Minister's speech was made on November 8. As I say, that appealed to these men, but you cannot do recruiting at long distance, either for general service or for N.R.M.A. men. It is like an evangelistic meeting; you have to have hand to hand work. Apparently it was felt that every effort and every expedient had been exhausted. I felt that there had been a series of delays and that is what concerned me in connection with the matter—and I am speaking very mildly. I had considered that if there were to be prospective success a very large number of men had to be obtained by a certain time and it had to be short.

I felt that neither the Prime Minister nor the minister recognized the necessity for the promptness of action which was essential in order to meet this urgent situation. I want to credit the minister with this: after three weeks, when he found that his advice in connection with this matter was wrong, he said so forthrightly, both to the house and to the government.

On November 23, the same day the minister spoke to the house, order in council P.C. 8891 was passed and laid on the table of the house. It authorized the minister to dispatch overseas to the United Kingdom and/or to Europe and/or the Mediterranean theatres such personnel in such numbers as may be approved by the governor in council who are serving under the N.R.M.A. or who are or may be from time to time hereafter required in the opinion of the minister for training, service or duty within the localities of service I have just mentioned.

The number of 16,000 was expressly provided by the order in council. It provided for the further approval by the governor in council for the sending of those who might hereafter be required in the opinion of the minister. I had asked on October 19 for 15,000 men immediately. The question arises at once whether, if such action had been taken by the governor in council while I was still minister, I would have accepted it, and the answer is that undoubtedly I would have accepted it, not because I considered it was satisfactory or a proper way to deal with the matter but because, above everything else, I was concerned in getting those 15,000 men just as quickly as possible.

I would have felt that as the minister responsible for the administration of the army I could not afford, in the interests of the troops themselves, to have rejected such action, but I certainly would have registered the strongest protest possible against the half-hearted, piecemeal method adopted. I would have pointed out that, once the decision was made to secure the service of N.R.M.A. men, once it was extended overseas, that decision should not apply to any one group of men in the N.R.M.A. but should apply to that force as a whole. To apply it just to part of the force was to perpetuate the system of two different armies for Canada.

That was inherent so long as the N.R.M.A. were obligated only for service in Canada. There was then a clear and uniform distinction between all N.R.M.A. men and volunteers. The former were for service in Canada and the latter were for service overseas, but the moment the principle was accepted that N.R.M.A. men were for overseas service, then in my view it should be carried through by actually obligating all the men for overseas service and helping to remove the rankling distinction which would be even more pronounced against those who still retained the status of service in Canada only.

I would have pointed out that the result would be to create an additional division in the Canadian army. First, there would be general service men for service anywhere. Then there would be N.R.M.A. men for service in certain designated theatres. Then, there would be N.R.M.A. men for service in Canada only. All the difficulties that have existed, not only in administration, discipline and the utilization of non-commissioned officers, but in the sense of discrimination where there are different areas of service, would be multiplied. Further than that, there would be complaints of discrimination in selecting certain N.R.M.A. men and extending the scope of their service, while leaving others with only the obligation to serve in Canada.

This was not my idea alone. It was envisaged by the Prime Minister in 1942. When he was asked a question by Mr. Douglas, he replied, as reported on page 4564 of Hansard:

> When the government decides that it is necessary and advisable to resort to conscription as a method of raising men for service overseas, an order in council will be passed dealing with members of the forces as a whole. It will not be a matter of passing a series of orders in council, but one order in council will cover the entire force.

My second objection would have been that if the N.R.M.A. men are to be used overseas, they should be subject to exactly the same scope of service as the general service personnel. I believe that these objections hold good to-day, and I urge upon the government just as strongly as I can the adoption of the procedure which the Prime Minister promised would be adopted, that of passing one order in council and making it applicable to the whole force.

Notwithstanding these objections, it was so important beyond anything else to have these men immediately that I would have accepted the action taken and battled out, if I may use that expression, the objections I have stated in an endeavour to secure the method which I consider should have been adopted.

I come now to the motion and amendment before the house. I did not know there was a subamendment and I have not seen it. My one objective and determination, and I may say struggle, from the day I arrived home from overseas has been to get additional trained infantry men overseas quickly to reinforce our magnificent fighting men. That still is my objective whether I am in office or out of it. In the midst of all the confusion and contradictions and upsetting incidents of the last five years I have been determined to keep my eye on the ball. I considered, and so recommended, that it was necessary to send N.R.M.A. men for that purpose.

My immediate objective was to get the additional 15,000 men from the N.R.M.A. trained infantry. To-day, if the declarations of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence mean what I understand them to mean, the sending of 16,000 additional men from N.R.M.A. as rapidly as they can be dispatched is assured, and the principle is laid down by order in council that N.R.M.A. men are to be available for reinforcement purposes, and it is said by the minister that further numbers will be sent as required. I do not think the principle is laid down by the order in council itself that they are all included in the order in council, but the principle has been established by the order in council that N.R.M.A. men are available, and the minister has said that further numbers will be sent as required.

That result has been achieved by a combination of circumstances unique in the history of this dominion. Public opinion has made itself felt so powerfully that it could not be disregarded. The resolute stand of certain former colleagues in the cabinet has put that mighty influence into positive action. Any part that I have had could only succeed because of the vigorous and staunch support of those two forces.

[Mr. Ralston.]

I am far from satisfied with the delay which these three weeks have cost and with the lack of a sense of urgency which has been shown. I am far from satisfied with the piecemeal method that has been adopted or the halting attitude it indicates. I have already stated my objections to that method. But, now that at last action has been taken, I am determined that neither my dissatisfaction nor those objections are going to deflect me into doing anything which may in the slightest delay further the sending forward of these reinforcements.

With that paramount objective before me I have considered well how I should vote on the motion before the house, and on the subamendment—which, I understand, has been ruled out of order—and the amendment, in order to get the one thing accomplished which matters most. I can speak now only of the amendment and the motion.

I can say this regarding the amendment. I have already indicated my opinion of the advantages of the method it proposes. I believe the time has come when the proper course is to make all N.R.M.A. men subject to the obligation to serve overseas. I have registered that opinion. But to vote for the amendment is far more than registering that opinion. The amendment is, in fact, a motion of want of confidence because if it were carried, the government's motion would be lost; and the government, instead of driving ahead, as it must do, to dispatch the 16,000 reinforcements from the N.R.M.A. and the further reinforcements required from time to time, would cease to function, and the whole matter of dispatching these men, which I have so earnestly advocated, would be thrown into the realm of uncertainty and suspense.

I have come to the conclusion that I will not by my vote permit that to happen. I have worked too hard in my humble way to help to bring about the changed policy of the government to jeopardize or give any excuse for delaying the prompt dispatch of these 16,000 men overseas. If the amendment were carried, I confess that I cannot, and I doubt if anyone can foresee clearly or with any reasonable certainty what would happen about the sending of these men. There would follow attempts to form a new government, the probable necessity of any new government having the assurance of the support of the house, and the delays and uncertainties which are inevitable in a course of that kind. Or, instead of the formation of a new government there might be dissolution of the house and a general election. Either one of these alternatives, while some people might regard them as preferable to the present situation, would constitute in my judgment a definite deterrent to the quick dispatch of these reinforcements. That action, in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of the great body of members of this house, and of the country at large, is at the moment the supreme consideration. I was not asking for a change of government at this crucial period of the war. I wanted reinforcements and I wanted them quickly. I was not asking for a general election to plunge this country into acute political turmoil for the next two months. It was reinforcements I wanted.

If this house supports the amendment it renders abortive, for the time being at least, all that has been won, and the goal—the sending of these men who are urgently needed overseas—which is now directly in sight, will be lost in the thickest of confusion and political controversy. I want to be practical, and to vote against the motion either indirectly by voting for the amendment or by voting "no" on the motion itself, would, in my opinion, be voting for delays and confusion and greater uncertainty in the sending of these needed reinforcements for our troops overseas.

To put it bluntly, I think that, unsatisfactory though the method is, action is more important than method, and I believe that these men will be dispatched more quickly and more certainly if this house completes the action which the government has at last taken, by approving the motion, than by any other course which the house can take at the present time.

With the powers under this order in council sanctioned by this house, there can be no excuse that trained men are not available. There can be no excuse for straining at getting the last volunteer or for curtailing such privileges as would be granted when manpower is adequate, and there can be no excuse for not extending further the provisions for leave for men in the battle areas, with long service overseas. There is one thing more, and that is that I doubt if the minister's programme of dispatch is sufficiently rapid to provide all he should have to reestablish reinforcement pools as quickly as that should be done, having regard to the conditions which face him now and in the near future.

He will be held responsible for accelerating the dispatch in every way. And one other point I am assuming, unless the Prime Minister states otherwise, that if the government motion carries, the future orders in council specifying additional numbers of men will be passed and put into effect without any reference back again to this house for a vote of confidence or other approval.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I take that to be clear from the minister's statements to the house.

I have mentioned these points specially, but what I want to emphasize is this, that this house and the people of this country, and I myself, will hold the government—and particularly the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence—to strict account for carrying out vigorously and without wavering their declared intention to reinforce the army with well-trained men from the N.R.M.A. to the fullest and fastest extent possible.

It is on this understanding and for these reasons, and one other, namely, the confidence which I have in certain of my former colleagues, who have contributed in no small degree to the changed attitude of the government, that I shall vote against the amendment and for the motion.

Mr. Speaker, the war is not over. Our efforts in the days before us must not be relaxed for a moment. A desperately stubborn enemy faces us in Italy and northwest Europe fighting on every hill, before every village and for every farm. We must go all out to beat him back into his corner, and the more he is cornered the bitterer will be his defence until he is finally overcome.

Such pauses as have occurred in the advance into the Low Countries have been the inevitable result of a fast-moving campaign handicapped by lack of full facilities for supply. There is no thought of retiring to winter quarters and digging in.

Mr. Churchill said on November 15, "The new fact that stares me in the face is that extremely heavy fighting is continuing week by week and will certainly last for a long time". General Eisenhower on November 21 said, "There is a job here for every man fit for battle that we can bring in, and it's up to every man back home to give him everything he needs—that is my prescription for victory."

That prescription must be for us all. There is no easy road to peace. The German army has proved that it can absorb terrible punishment and still come up fighting. Our men in Italy have a saying that they are always attacking the last hill, and that when they reach the top they always find that the Germans have built another behind it.

We must jostle him, hurry him, harry him, pound him, give him no rest, give him no time, give him no chance to build up successive lines of resistance. We must keep him on the run. It is not an easy task. It is one that will require the last ounce of strength that we can put forward. Driving him into his corner is not enough. We must build up all the weight, all the power and all the determination we can muster for the knockout and victory and peace.

Just for a moment, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word about the Canadian army. There was placed on to-day's Hansard, so that it might become for all time part of the records of this parliament, the story of the great exploit of Major David Vivian Currie, which won for that young Canadian army officer the empire's highest battle honour, the Victoria Cross. Leading a mixed force of tanks, infantry and men from other units, with all his officers either killed or wounded under repeated attack by German tanks, German guns and other German formations, for three days and three nights this officer rallied and led his men, visiting them, advising them, encouraging them, and at the end he had the supreme satisfaction of seeing that his task had been accomplished. The position had been held and the escape route of a large number of Germans cut off.

That officer was born with no silver spoon in his mouth. He was, in civilian life, an automobile mechanic and welder. He is typical of the Canadian army, an army of civilians, who have turned themselves into soldiers and who in the process bring honour to themselves and glory to the land of their birth.

That citation, Mr. Speaker, which stands on Hansard, factual and formal though it is, impressed one thing on our minds with stark and striking reality. That one thing is the fierceness of the struggle in which our men and our allies are engaged. This man had to fight alone. All his other officers were killed or wounded. Alone for three days he and his gallant band of Canadians had to face the full might of the enemy's attack. It is because such attacks are being made and will continue to be made until the power of Germany is finally broken that I press the urgency of the situation that now confronts us, that I urge this house to lose no further time in taking the steps necessary to give our men overseas the utmost assistance and support. It was because I had seen for myself the conditions under which our men fought; it was because I felt that no one should ever be able to say that we had failed in our duty to these men, that I took the position which I did on my return from my last visit overseas. When this war is over, and when men like Major Currie and those fighting with him in all three services return to Canada, the destiny of this nation will largely have to be shaped and directed by them. They will have to take their places in the public affairs of this dominion. The tasks of peace will fall to their younger and stronger and fresher hands. They will be great tasks, tasks calling for every last item of strength and skill and courage. When they lay aside their arms and assume the duties and responsibilities of civilians and citizens I and we all want to be able to look them in the face and say ,"We did not fail you." I want and we all want them to feel that Canada was worth fighting for and worth living for—worth, if needs be, dying for. We want these men to feel, when they return, that they have come back to a land which was proud of them, a land which appreciates their heroic service, a land that has proved that appreciation not by words only but by its deeds and by its actions on their behalf and in their support.

If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, since probably this is the last time that I shall have an opportunity of addressing the house on matters of this kind, I should like if I might to put on Hansard a message which I sent to all ranks of the Canadian army and civilian staffs and also a recognition of the services of the officers. This was the message I sent to all ranks of the army and civilian staffs of the Department of National Defence everywhere:

> On relinquishing the duties of Minister of National Defence, I want to express to all ranks of the Canadian army and to the members of the civilian staffs my most sincere appreciation of their whole-hearted devotion to duty during the arduous time of preparation and through the fiery tests of battle.
> To our fighting troops, I pay highest tribute and send humble admiration for their endurance, their courage and their amazing achievements in the face of unprecedented difficulties. With them I remember also the skilful and self-sacrificing labours of medical officers and nurses and the devotion of the padres and members of the auxiliary services.
> To those who have toiled without reserve in the less spectacular but highly important tasks of organization and training and supply, I express deepest appreciation. Their work has been to fortify Canada's men and women on the battle lines.
> As my distinguished successor, General McNaughton, takes over the responsibilities of the department, I confidently ask every man and woman to give to him the same unflagging help and intelligent industry that has meant so much to me and to Canada during my four and a half years of office.
> There may be many long days and many rough places before the enemy is completely overcome. The Canadian army will never falter until the task is done. I am proud indeed to have been associated with this grand company of fighters and workers for victory. Good luck, great success, and my warmest thanks to you all.

I want, if I may, to put on record my sincerest appreciation of the work which has been done by the officers of the Canadian army. The accomplishment of the army in the field stands out as a magnificent example of hard fighting in the most difficult circumstances, but I wish to speak more particularly at the moment of the faithful work of the staff and others responsible for counsel and advice in our endeavour to support the men in the battle areas. From the officers in the lines of communication back through the administrative training establishments overseas and from there back to Canada and throughout the country, all have worked faithfully and tirelessly and with no other purpose than to see to it that the men in the battle positions wanted for nothing that could be supplied them. The burden of this work has fallen most heavily on the shoulders of the chief advisers. But everywhere throughout the administrative staffs, officers and men have worked long hours, often with no apparent recognition but always unselfishly and with high purpose to ensure that men, ammunition and supplies were available when they were wanted and when they were needed.

To the army commander, to the former chief of staff at C.M.H.Q. and the officers who worked with him, to the chief of the general staff and the heads of the branches at national defence headquarters, to the general officers commanding, to the district officers commanding and camp commanders in Canada and to all the officers and men who have loyally carried out the work under their direction, I extend my warmest and most heartfelt thanks.

As regards the men of the Canadian army, I have seen them at close range. I know their walk and their talk. I know their bearing. There is no swaggering, but there is quiet confidence born of having proved themselves and the fact that they know it. I visited the men in Italy who have been there for sixteen months. Over ten thousand of them lead with four years overseas service and more than six months in the battle area. These men and their comrades have gone from Pachino to Rimini. By day and by night, over rough, tough ground against a battling enemy they have kept on driving forward. Mile after mile and height after height have been taken. Sometimes the assaulting battalions have only gotten half way up, but their comrades came through and completed the task. Even with ranks thinned they never wavered. To-night they are in the midst of the ditches and the hedges and the dykes of the soaked Po plain. They are fighting on and holding down German divisions. If they did not fight on, those enemy divisions would add to the strength of the hun forces which their comrades would have to meet on the threshold of Germany.

In northwest Europe the army has had a succession of holding, gruelling, fighting and dearly won successes: Caen, Falaise, Trun Gap, Bois de Londres, the occupation of Dieppe, siege of Calais and Cap Gris Nez and that most intricate difficult operation on the Scheldt, every foot desperately contested, and every enemy resistance overcome. The way was finally paved to the use of the key port of Antwerp as the base of great operations.

In Italy and in France, in Belgium and in Holland, and on the edge of Germany, sometimes under strength, but with indomitable courage, they have endured the strain. The days will come soon when the great battles—the last we hope—will be fought. And, Mr. Speaker, there will be gaps in the ranks. Those gaps cannot wait for the men to be trained and transported to fill them. I tell you and you know it, and this house knows it, that on the estimates there will not be enough trained volunteers to fill those gaps. But we have in Canada to-day the trained infantry men who have all these years been enrolled as potential reinforcements for such a time as this. They have never said they would not go. They say they will go when they are sent. They were to be sent if necessary, and the responsibility for making the decision for them is on the shoulders of every hon. member of this house. Part of them are to be sent now. We are assured by the minister that the rest will follow if required. He has assured this house that while he still hopes the voluntary method will be effective—I am quoting his words now—"my first duty, my first purpose is to maintain our forces overseas to the strength which has been decided; and those forces will be maintained by any method." Again I lay it on the government, and particularly on the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, that there be no halting and no delay in providing amply for the needs. We cannot escape it; not only the N.R.M.A. men, but our own men in Italy, Belgium and Holland are awaiting the decision of this house. I said, Mr. Speaker, that there would be gaps in the ranks. Each man in this house has the responsibility for saying by his vote whether those gaps will be filled.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sure this House of Commons to-night has found itself for the most part in the utmost agreement with the great speech which the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) has just concluded. I am satisfied that the reactions which I myself had to that speech will in a large measure be the reactions of the country when they read it to-morrow. I was pleased indeed that the remarks of the hon. member for Prince were, for the most part, altogether moderate, because after the attempts that have been made from time to time during the last four or five days to shoulder upon him responsibility for a situation which everyone of us, I am sure, now agrees exists, he might have been forgiven if he had shown considerable heat and resentment. I must say that for myself I do not think I could have shown such forbearance or Christian spirit as he exhibited. That merely illustrates the difference in temperament between us.

Certain things have emerged from this speech which, I am sure, will commend themselves to the country, and, I am satisfied, to the membership of this house. One of those things is that beyond peradventure infantry reinforcements are needed and needed badly and are now overdue; that is to say, the preparation for sending them over, and the country will hold responsible for that delay and for any bloodshed that occurs as a result of that delay two men, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the present Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton. Make no mistake about that. Six precious weeks have been lost.

There are other portions of the speech to which I desire to refer, and perhaps to analyse at some considerable length. I crave the indulgence of the house at this hour, ten-thirty by the clock, to ask for the adjournment of the debate. I could go on, but I confess to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the hon. members of this house, that I have been greatly stirred by parts of the speech of the former Minister of National Defence. I have a keen desire to analyse that speech to do him justice and to commend portions of it—and it will be the major portion—in which he laid the position before this parliament. Therefore, sir, I propose at this time, with, I believe, the concurrence of the Prime Minister, the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would just like to say to my hon. friend that when he asked me if I would be agreeable to his not continuing very long I indicated to him that I would be pleased to meet his wishes. That was before he had made the remarks which he has just made concerning myself. May I say to him that I will be only too pleased to be a little more considerate of him than he has been of me to-night. I give him the privilege of adjourning the debate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am quite willing to go on.

On motion of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) the debate was adjourned.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Thursday, November 30, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

Mr. ROSS (Hamilton East):

1. How many conscientious objectors are there in Canada?
2. How many in each province?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can answer the question now; I happen to have the figures here. The total number of conscientious objectors in Canada is 9,329; by provinces: British Columbia 668; Alberta 1,101; Saskatchewan 2,129; Manitoba 2,820; Ontario 2,551; Quebec 26; New Brunswick 2; Nova Scotia 29; Prince Edward Island 3.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REFERENCE TO DEBATE ON PRIME MINISTER'S MOTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question without notice. As the Prime Minister has spoken, as Colonel Ralston has spoken, as General McNaughton has spoken, and as the leaders of the opposition have spoken, is it not now in the best interests of all concerned that the debate be concluded? Is it not a waste of time and money to continue further?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is not for me to take away the liberty of any member of parliament, but I have no doubt that hon. members will see the wisdom of the question asked by my hon. friend and will be anxious not to prolong the session unduly.

THE WAR

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN MAINTAINING VIGOROUS WAR EFFORT—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION OF THE PRIME MINISTER

The house resumed from Wednesday, November 29, consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort, and the proposed amendment of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Quelch.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to make a ruling on the amendment to the amendment, submitted by Mr. Quelch seconded by Mr. Shaw.

The motion before the house is:

That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

Mr. Graydon moved an amendment as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and the following words substituted instead thereof: this house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice.

Mr. Quelch moved an amendment to the amendment. The first paragraph of the subamendment is as follows:

The unqualified assurance to our men on the battle fronts that they will receive at once ample material supplies, and adequate reinforcements; and the use of all persons in any of Canada's armed services in any theatre of war in which they may be required.

It has relevancy in that it refers to the motion and the amendment, but it is qualified by the other sections of the subamendment which deal with policies following the war, and have no relevancy either to the main motion or to the amendment. One cannot approve and disapprove the same document and the amendment to the amendment must be considered in its entirety.

Paragraphs 2, 3, 4 and 5 of the amendment to the amendment should be brought before the house in the form of a substantive motion. The object of the motion is to aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort. The amendment to the amendment deals with matters which are intended as peace-time policies.

I would refer to a decision by the Hon. Mr. Black, the Speaker, on May 4, 1934, page 640 of Beauchesne's third edition, which decided that on a motion to appoint a select committee for the purposes of considering the accounts of a government-owned railway, an amendment to empower the committee to consider also the accounts of a private company is out of order and should be brought before the house as a substantive motion.

On May 21, 1940, I gave a ruling which will be found on page 647 of Beauchesne's third edition. I ruled an amendment out of order on the ground that an amendment must not raise any question which can only be raised by a distinct motion, after notice.

The amendment to the amendment which we are now considering raises questions which can only be raised by a motion after notice.

Yesterday I ruled the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) out of order, and the opinions which I then gave are equally applicable to the amendment to the amendment which we are now considering and I would repeat if the house accepts the subamendment the main amendment would be eliminated and the only question before the house would then be the main motion as amended by the subamendment. The result would be that the mover of the main amendment would be deprived of his right to obtain an expression of opinion either original or in an amended form by the house on the policy stated in his amendment.

For these reasons I rule that the subamendment is not in order.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I rise to-day to take part in a debate on a subject which is one of the most important that has ever been brought before the house or the country. I do so because I realize that tremendous events are now taking place and that the possibility of good or ill that may flow from the deliberations in this House of Commons at this special session may be of the greatest importance. I hope that what I may say to-day will be wise and judicial. I trust that I shall not be offensive even if I speak strongly.

I rise first to say that the issue before this house and the country—and in my view the only issue—is that which relates to steady reinforcements for the armed forces overseas, and that no other issue should be allowed to becloud it. Notwithstanding the invitation of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) to curtail the discussion, I believe it is imperative and in the national interest that the views of my colleagues and myself should be fully presented to this house. I reaffirm the fundamental principle that is embodied in the amendment to the resolution now before the house, namely, that reinforcements for our armed forces overseas should be pressed to its ultimate and logical conclusion without limitations of any character or equivocations or reservations, mental or otherwise.

I wish to say further that the offer which was made yesterday by my colleague, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) on behalf of the leader of the National Progressive Conservative party, to cooperate with any government that will fully implement the policy of adequate and immediate reinforcements, still stands, and it is not a mere political gesture.

In the course of his speech on Monday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that the convulsion in the country was an engineered convulsion. So far as I am able to ascertain from the facts I deny that assertion from A to Z. I say that the convulsion which has swept over this country in the last three or four w eks, and which is still foremost in the heart and mind of every member of our community who is thinking about it—and I believe that includes the entire population of this country—is based upon a condition that has been growing in intensity ever since D-day. I think this whole thing started because of reports given by servicemen overseas in letters to their relatives. I know that in my own community reports were received from men in the northwestern European theatre of war to the effect that reinforcements then on the ground were wholly inadequate; and I certainly believe the communications which I myself have received from overseas, notwithstanding the position on paper, notwithstanding the theoretical position that has been given to us in secret session and open session, indicate that there is and has been inadequate provision in the northwestern European theatre of war to meet the ever-increasing casualty lists that are flowing in daily. I suggest that the only organized campaign which focused the attention of the public on this immense issue was that which flowed from the Canadian Legion. If there is any body of public opinion in this country that has the right to focus attention on so vital an issue as this, surely it is the veterans of the last war, who know what reinforcements mean, and whose position cannot be better emphasized than was done by the magnificent speech of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) last evening.

To say that there is a cabal among certain elements of this country outside of this house who want to seize the reins of power is to say something that could not be farther from the truth. If that were so certainly some communications would have been had with the membership of this party. I want to give assurance to this house and to the country that none of us has ever been approached to form a conspiracy simply for the purpose of getting rid of the present Prime Minister. What public opinion outside of this house has done —and expression has been given to it by the great metropolitan newspapers of Canada—is to focus attention on a critical situation which we now know existed, and which still exists and will not be adequately taken care of by the right-about-face policy of the Prime Minister and those of his cabinet colleagues who have turned face with him.

I listened to the Prime Minister's speech with the utmost attention. I shall have something to say about it presently. During the course of that speech I asked myself this question when he was making a plea, not directed to me especially but to his own faltering followers, to the effect that they should vote confidence in him.

An hon. MEMBER: They will.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Possibly they will. But he was making a plea to his followers to vote confidence in him, not on the policy that was in effect on November 22 when he put his motion on the order paper. What was the policy then? The policy then was a continuation of the voluntary system of reinforcements for the army overseas. Is there any dispute about that? That was the fundamental basis of the resolution of confidence that is now before this house. Then something happened, to use the words of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power)—and I regret that he is not in his seat—in a matter of moments, and a right-about-face was made by the Prime Minister and the majority of his colleagues. A position was taken which the hon. member for Quebec South felt he could not support; that was, they reversed the traditional policy of the Prime Minister and his government which had been in effect since before the war started. They dumped into the debris of past history the policy of voluntary enlistment and adopted, after a gunshot wedding, the policy they had derided for five long years. In the light of that I ask myself this question. How can I vote confidence in a government which has one policy at half-past six Thursday evening and another policy, diametrically opposed, at half-past ten of the same evening?

Mr. CLEAVER: Read Hansard for 1942.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have read Hansard for 1942; I helped make Hansard for 1942, and that brings me to a point which I might as well deal with now. In January, 1942, I had the honour of moving in this house a resolution which I have under my hand, which definitely declared the position of this party with respect to this great man-power question that has been before this country ever since that time, and that has been bedevilled by the actions of this government from time to time. We made it absolutely clear that the time would come—and the time has come—when this whole question of reinforcements necessitated by casualties overseas would have to be met man-fashion, and that in our view, having regard to the position which undoubtedly would develop but which did not develop for several years, in due course of time this country would find that the voluntary system would fail and resort would have to be had to the only other alternative. What was the position in 1940? Up to the fall of Dunkirk the war effort of this government was a moderate war effort in accordance with the pledges that were made to their supporters in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Absolutely. If you do not believe me I will page the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) and he will give you day and date. I am not going to thresh over that old straw, except to follow it up by saying that after Dunkirk there was an entire reversal of the attitude of the government, and very properly so. That was brought about by two reasons. The first was the force of public opinion in Canada, which was shocked at what was taking place on the continent. Then I venture to claim the credit, along with my colleague the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), for having had a very large measure of success in reshaping the policy of this government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; hon. members may laugh, but as long as I live I will never forget the day my colleague and I interviewed the Prime Minister and made certain requests or demands whatever you wish to call them, and out of those requests and demands there evolved the mobilization act. I asked the Prime Minister to take authority from the parliament of Canada to assume any and every power that might be absolutely necessary for this nation to wage total war, on the theory that not only was this country itself in danger but that civilization was in danger and that the enemy ought to be met and defeated in the only theatre of war where we could make an effective defence of our own country as well as of the principles of liberty and civilization to which we all adhere.

We got the mobilization act, but we got it with a hamstringing limitation that outraged patriotic public opinion in Canada. Public opinion flared up against that limitation. What was the result? The result was the plebiscite. I venture to say that if the Prime Minister had asked this house to be released from that limitation his request would have been granted unanimously. Perhaps I am too optimistic in saying that, but I know that as far as this party is concerned unanimous consent would have been given without reservation. Well, we had the plebiscite. The Prime Minister said that the plebiscite gave his government no mandate for the inception of a policy of conscription. On the face of the technical aspects, I agree. On the face of the question submitted to the electors, technically speaking that is correct. But the reaction of public opinion to the vote, from one end of Canada to the other save and except one portion of this nation, was that the government had a green light and a mandate from the people of this country to go ahead and put into effect a man-power policy that would result in the total utilization of all our forces, our man-power forces, in every field of human endeavour that was necessary to win this war. The Prime Minister resisted that mandate in and out of season, in and out of his cabinet. From his own standpoint he was justified, because the Canadian army was not in action and up to D-day the casualties were very limited.

I well remember the debate on bill 80. I well remember the stand taken by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) on that occasion. I well remember the speech made by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston). I well remember the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and I well remember the speech made by the hon. member for Quebec South. All these hon. gentlemen endorsed the principle for which we were contending at that time, but in order to preserve the solidarity of the cabinet and because at that time the pressure for reinforcements was not as great as it would have been had the casualties been greater, they were content to let the situation ride on the theory that when it became tense; when the situation became such that reinforcements were required, the necessary order in council would be adopted by the government of this country, and these men of the home army I shall not insult them by calling them zombies; I never have done so publicly—would be utilized to the fullest possible extent as a result of the conditions that would then exist. That was the meaning taken by the hon. member for Prince from the Prime Minister's statement, "not necessarily conscription, but conscription if necessary." If necessary why? Not because of conditions in Canada; not because of conditions in the Liberal party in Canada or certain supporters of the Liberal party, but because of conditions in the actual theatre of war, where men were going to be needed urgently and in full measure. That was the understanding of ninety per cent of the people of this country in regard to the Prime Minister's reservation.

The Canadian forces went into action in Italy some thirteen or fourteen months ago; I have not the exact date in mind. A very much larger force had the honour and the glory of taking part in the invasion of north-west Europe. I knew then in my own heart—and I am sure every hon. member in the house who is true to himself, his own thoughts, his own reason and his own convictions was in the same position—that the sternest part of this great European war was about to begin, and that that was the only theatre of war in which this great battle would be waged and won. I knew in my own heart, as I am sure the former minister of national defence knew in his, that when that great day came, the casualties suffered by the gallant Canadian army, and especially the infantry branch, would not only carry sadness to a great many homes in Canada, but would also place additional responsibilities upon the government of the day to see to it that the position of our fighting men was taken care of to the utmost extent of the capabilities of the Canadian people.

That is what I am striving for to-day. I am not going to thresh out here this afternoon the old question of conscription, because I have neither the time nor the desire to do it. We already have conscription. And by the same token the principle of conscription was written into the laws of this country before parliament was summoned. I point to the Militia Act, the terms of which are invoked by the order in council now before parliament. The principle of conscription is inscribed in the mobilization act, now that the limitation is taken away from it.

Let us not deceive ourselves by saying that this is a debate on conscription. Conscription is an accomplished fact; it is the law of Canada and the will of the Canadian people. Now we have before us this one problem: How shall we give effective support to the law of the country and the will of the great majority of the people of Canada? Immediately we are faced with this problem: How shall we fully implement the law, and action under the law?

That was the issue round which the battle waged in the cabinet. I know what the oath of a privy councillor is; I know it is a most searching oath. But the lid was opened first, to a degree, by the Prime Minister in his radio speech, and then by the hon. member for Prince. And surely the hon. member for Prince was justified, as he claimed, in lifting the veil further. Through the correspondence we have had revealed the issue raised within the cabinet. But I suspect that only half the story has been told. I suspect that we do not know all of it, and that we probably never will. I am not pausing now to ask that it all be told; but I do know that the minister of national defence of that day parted company with his colleagues on a matter of profound and fundamental principle.

I shall not allude to the manner of his going. Some say he was kicked out; possibly it can bear that interpretation. But I prefer to say this—and to say it in his honour—that when he found he could not carry the convictions of his leader in the policy which he advocated, one which he knew was fundamental and absolutely necessary, man-fashion he resigned his portfolio, although it was the wish of his heart to carry the war effort through to its conclusion. That privilege was denied him. It was denied on what grounds? On the ground that the Prime Minister determinedly set his face against full implementation of the pledge he made to the country in June of 1942.

Mr. CLEAVER: That is not true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You say it is not true? Will you be good enough to keep quiet and let me continue?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I demand that I be permitted to proceed without interruption, especially from a backbencher.

Mr. CLEAVER: And the hon. member's remarks about the plebiscite are equally untrue.

Mr. ROWE: Let the Prime Minister speak for himself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have only a few minutes more in which to speak, and I desire to utilize them to the best of my ability.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not understand that. I take it that the hon. member is acting leader of the opposition, and that therefore his time is not limited.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the house is good enough to grant that, very well; but I did not understand it. I am in the hands of the house. Of course if I have the privilege of speaking longer I shall not proceed at such great speed as I have. I find it very trying to speak so rapidly.

Mr. SPEAKER: The leader of the opposition spoke to the main motion. Now the acting leader of the opposition is speaking on the amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am grateful to Your Honour.

An hon. MEMBER: The leader of the opposition moved the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): And so did the leader of the opposition speak on the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He moved it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, if I have not full concurrence of the house—and I gather I have not—I shall try to obey the rule. For that reason I desire that there shall be no interruptions, and especially from those irresponsible members among the back-benchers. Of course I understand that old game—the game of throwing a speaker off his trend of thought. I have tried it myself, sometimes with success, and also sometimes without success. I do not know whether I have the consent of the house to proceed beyond the time allotted to me, but—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am in the hands of the house. If I am denied my privilege in connection with this speech, I shall have to be content.

May I now make some few observations in connection with the speech delivered yesterday by the hon. member for Prince. If ever any man in the course of a deliberate debate and argument proved the premise laid down by this party in its amendment, then certainly the hon. member for Prince proved it to the hilt yesterday. He showed, as our amendment points out, that the only thing that matters is the immediate and constant reinforcement of our armed forces overseas. He did it better than I could do it, because he has full facts and information which are denied to me, except as I get them from him and from other members of the government who have that knowledge within their breasts.

Before I proceed further, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that my position as to the time I am permitted to speak should be regularized. I should like to know whether I have the privilege of going beyond the forty-minute rule.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would be a misfortune if the hon. member were left with any grievance, and I personally would let him have as long a time as he likes.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is the wish of the house, the hon. member may continue beyond the forty minutes.

Mr. WHITMAN: I have no objection to that; but I do suggest that he withdraw the term "irresponsible" as he applied it to the back-benchers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. WHITMAN: I think it applies to the hon. member who is now speaking.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not include the hon. member for Mount Royal. When I made that observation I was speaking only about the hon. member who was interrupting me.

Mr. CLEAVER: And I would ask the hon. member for York-Sunbury to withdraw a misstatement of fact, one which I do not think he made intentionally. I know he would not want the record to be incorrect. He said the plebiscite vote was definitely a mandate for conscription. I would like to refer him to his own broadcast—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that at all.

Mr. CLEAVER: —where he said:

> You are not called upon, by this plebiscite, to declare for or against conscription for overseas service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that at all; I did not say any such thing. What I did say was that after the plebiscite vote was over the public assumed that it was a mandate and so expressed themselves through the public press.

Mr. CLEAVER: You assured the public that they were not voting for conscription. I have a copy of your speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is in the record.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the house agree that the hon. member shall be allowed to continue?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister gave very grudging consent on the theory that he did not want me to have a grievance. I shall have no grievance if I have to sit down after forty minutes, because I find that my physical capabilities are not sufficiently great to allow me to sustain a big effort like this for any greater length of time. But I do thank the house and I thank the Prime Minister for allowing me to proceed, because there are some things I still desire to say, though not at any great length.

When I was interrupted I was referring to the speech to which we listened last night. I asserted, and I reassert now, that it proved the premise laid down in the amendment moved by this party to the motion at present before the house. The hon. member for Prince did that better than I could, because he has fuller information. Is there any doubt in the mind of any hon. member in this house who heard that speech, is there any doubt in the minds of the public generally who have now read that speech, that the hon. member for Prince, the former minister of national defence, was right in the position he took, and that the Prime Minister was wrong in the position he took? Remember that the Prime Minister's position, as indicated by his radio speech and the exchange of correspondence with the hon. member for Prince, was based upon the theory that the government's policy was to be a continuation of the voluntary principle. The hon. member for Prince demonstrated beyond peradventure that that policy of voluntary enlistment had failed. Any man who assumes that he did not prove the proposition which he laid down, which he supported by evidence that has not been controverted here, is wholly at fault, if my judgment and intellect are to be trusted. I want to say to the Prime Minister that his radio speech and the communications he had with his former Minister of National Defence were, in the light of the speech of the hon. member for Prince, based upon false premises, upon premises which he cannot substantiate here.

As a lawyer who has for many years been accustomed to producing evidence in court I think I know something about the question of the weight of evidence and the credibility which should be attached to evidence. It is my view, and I hold it without equivocation or reservation, that the hon. member for Prince proved last night, and in the interchange of letters, beyond peradventure that which I am striving for to-day, that is, the establishment of the principle of reinforcements and more reinforcements now for the men who are fighting overseas for you and me. The situation outlined by the Prime Minister in his radio speech and in his correspondence was intended to support and uphold a position which he changed in a matter of minutes. For what policy are we now voting?

Mr. ROWE: There may be another before the vote.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I could not vote confidence on the basis of the policy of the government on November 24 because that was a negation of the facts as we knew them then and know them now. That position has been abandoned. Why? Has it been abandoned on a question of principle? I put that to the Prime Minister. Did he abandon his support of the voluntary system because he believed that the voluntary system was no longer a good system? The answer cries "No" to high heaven. He reaffirmed his faith in the voluntary system in the speech he made to this house on Monday afternoon last. Was it on the basis that General McNaughton, himself a declared believer in the voluntary principle, could do the impossible? General McNaughton was very frank with us in the house. Of course he would be frank because he is not a politician—yet. He will rapidly become one if he stays in the company he is now keeping. I have no doubt in the world that General McNaughton was sincere when he expressed the opinion to the Prime Minister, and subsequently to the public of Canada, that he could get volunteers for the reinforcements so urgently needed overseas. I do not question his sincerity in that connection; all I question is his judgment. I will go further and say that when he made the statements he did at Arnprior and at Ottawa, General McNaughton had been away from the front for over a year; he was out of touch with public opinion in the country, and he had not the true facts of the position before him.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He said so himself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Subsequently in this chamber he admitted in manfashion that his information was wrong, and he reversed his position. The government suddenly, in a matter of minutes, to use the language of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), reversed its traditional policy and decided to work under the order in council that was laid on the table on Thursday last. That certainly was a sudden conversion. Talk about the conversion of Saul of Tarsus; Saul had nothing on the Prime Minister of this country. I have never known as complete a reversal of policy in the whole history of this Dominion of Canada. I defy you to find a parallel for the proposition which has been presented here.

They were either right on November 22, or they were wrong. They were either right on November 24, or they were wrong. According to the Prime Minister, and according to the statement made by General McNaughton, they came to the conclusion that they were wrong in their premises, and they then took up the policy that they had derided for years; they adopted it as their own child. They did this notwithstanding the fact that they had both given expression to the conviction that the policy was in every respect a bad policy for Canada. They became the foster fathers of this policy.

I ask the right hon. gentleman and I ask the members of this house: how can you trust those two men to put into effect a policy of great national import when they have both declared that they have no belief in it, a policy which the Prime Minister has condemned for years and years? How can I vote confidence in a government which is putting into effect a policy in which the leader says he does not believe? The two things are incompatible. All you have to do to get the answer is to state the proposition. There cannot be any faith in a government which, at the point of a gun levelled against them by members of the cabinet itself, some of whom I am looking at this very afternoon, reverses itself overnight. What faith can this country have that the government will put such a policy into effect and carry it through to a successful conclusion, without evasion, without equivocation or discrimination? It just cannot be done; the people of this country understand that it cannot be done, and I would like to prophesy that it will not be done.

I regret more than I can say, and I say this more in sorrow than in anger, that the member for Prince who made such a valiant defence of the principles and objective which he espoused, and who last night established beyond peradventure the soundness of the position that he advocated in the cabinet and outside—I regret that he has retired to Torres Vedras and that he is not going to carry through. That is not like the member for Prince! The member for Prince has always impressed me as having great determination. If you do not believe that, just look at the shape of his jaw! I have always understood from my study of physiognomy that a man with a jaw shaped like his had great determination in his make-up, and I am sure he has. But I regret to say that the member for Prince is not carrying through. The country expects something more from him. He realizes that the carrying through of the policy which he extracted at the point of a gun from the Prime Minister depends upon certain colleagues of his in the cabinet, and I am just afraid that those colleagues have not enough strength or power in the cabinet to see that that policy is carried through. I am afraid that when the meeting of this house is over and there comes a lull, when things are quieted down in the country, as the government hopes they will quieten down, the policy of reinforcements laid on the table on Thursday last will be more or less forgotten.

I have read and reread that order in council, and I say that it is not a clear, distinct and unequivocal statement of the principle which the member for Prince asked for. The member for Prince asked that all these N.R.M.A. men be made available for active service overseas in the theatres of war—all of them, not merely 16,000. He asked that all of them be made immediately available. Has he got that? I suggest that a proper interpretation of that order in council shows that it is directive and not mandatory, that it may be implemented or may not be fully implemented in spite of the declaration made here last night and by General McNaughton; and if the government can get enough of these home defence troops to volunteer they will be used, as General McNaughton told us in his first statement, which impressed me as the truth, only to make up the deficit. There is no assurance in the order in council or anywhere else that the rest of these N.R.M.A. men who are physically fit will ever be utilized in the active army of this country—and that is what we want. We want this order in council to go all-out, and we want the government to implement it on that basis. I venture to say to the Prime Minister that the public will not be satisfied with anything less. If that is negatived by the government it will only be transferring the battlefield to the country, because the veterans of this war, and I am sure from my information the men overseas, want that and just that and nothing less than that, and will never be satisfied with anything less than that.

And so I tell the Prime Minister that we intend to press with all the force and all the vigour at our command to have him go all-out in the utilization of the home army men so that there never may be any doubt that there will always be a reservoir from which reinforcements may from time to time be dispatched overseas to take care of critical situations on the battlefield which I am afraid are only just beginning. Is there anybody within sound of my voice to-day who believes that this war will be over in January, February or March?

An hon. MEMBER: The Prime Minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not believe the Prime Minister in his heart believes that. We all hoped it would be. Certainly

I hoped it would be. I have loved ones over there, like everyone else in this house, and we all hoped that we would see them again. But there is no certainty as to when victory will come. Take a map and sketch a circle around Germany and you will agree with me that the battle zone to-day is just on the perimeter of fortress Germany. The heart of Germany, shattered as it may be by the gallant bombings of the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F., is still unconquered and our men have a long way to go before they march into Berlin. The casualties will be heart-rending to many. The thought I have in the back of my mind is that we must never in word or thought or by lack of action desert them, and we can only fully support them if we have an order in council passed that will once and for all make these men available as reinforcements in any theatre of war. I am not including Japan as one of those theatres of war, because that is another consideration altogether. I am reminded, however, that Canada was one of the first of the belligerent nations to declare war against Japan, and that Canada probably has done the least among the allied nations to make war on Japan.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Kiska?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know about Kiska. The intention was good—

An hon. MEMBER: And Hong Kong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do not mention Hong Kong, because it only conjures up sadness and sickness of heart. Hong Kong was a tragedy and I do not want to refer to it. I allocate no blame at this moment for Hong Kong, because history will reveal, when the true facts are made known, who was responsible for Hong Kong. In the meantime I am placing no responsibility. Why? Because the facts have never been fully disclosed to the Canadian public.

Now I want to say a word with respect to the Prime Minister's position. The Prime Minister insinuated that nobody but himself could carry on government in this country. The Prime Minister stated in effect that it was King or anarchy. The very implications of that statement are an insult to every member who sits on this side of the house and an insult to the intelligence of the Canadian people. I say to the Prime Minister very frankly, I resent the statement that only he can give stable government to this country. I say to him that some of his colleagues were capable of forming a government if he would step aside, and, if they refused to do so, then I state very emphatically and distinctly that the king's government would have gone on. It would have involved certain eventualities. Well, worse things might happen than those eventualities. Speaking for myself and myself alone, because I have not canvassed the situation with my colleagues, I hold the view that this whole position will never be settled or clarified until the people of Canada clarify it. In my present state of health I may not be there, but I hold that view and those who believe as I do will be there to put it before the public when that occasion comes, whenever it may be. However, I am dealing with the present situation.

I wonder if the Prime Minister thinks that this group of eighteen old tired men he has around him represent all the brains in this country. With the possible exception of one or two who I think are very able men—two of the best men have gone—I wonder if he thinks that any one of his colleagues could not be dispensed with overnight without a ripple in the national life of the country. I look at the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). I do not single him out for any particular purpose, but I wonder what would happen if he were to resign his seat to-morrow. Do you think the clocks would stop or the mails would cease to go? Do you think there would be any national calamity if the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) were to go back to Windsor and resume his law practice? I do not think anything would happen. He would probably be happier. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Gibson) holds, I believe, rather strong views on this question of reinforcements, on this policy to which his leader has come. I wonder if any great national catastrophe would take place if he were to disappear from our midst. I do not think it would be much of a loss, and I do not say that with any disrespect. I jump now to the Minister of Mines and Natural Resources—

Mr. CRERAR: Mines and Resources.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mines and Resources. He has pretty nearly run his course in the political sphere anyway, and I think he would welcome retirement from the Prime Minister's cabinet, provided of course he was adequately looked after. And then I turn my attention to the Minister of Public Works, who has had the courage to come into the house this afternoon.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member would withdraw that word "courage"; and I do not mind my motives being judged by the hon. gentleman's party.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I withdraw it. We will not waste time over it.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We are not wasting time. You should withdraw it, as a gentleman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope I am a gentleman, and if it is offensive I will withdraw it immediately. I will say that he has seen fit to come back and occupy his seat rather than sit behind the curtains, and we welcome him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think any of my colleagues need any defence at the hands of anyone, but I would ask my hon. friend whether in extending to him the extra time that has been given him this is the way he is showing his appreciation of that courtesy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Speaker has ruled that I am entitled to the time, and I thought it might relieve the tension—

An hon. MEMBER: Your time is up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know where that interruption comes from. That is the only contribution the member for Kings ever makes to these debates. I thought it might relieve the tension and add to the gaiety of the nation if I were to review these gentlemen briefly for the edification of hon. members and of themselves and myself, and I would not like to be shut off because I was just coming to the cabinet representative from my own province. The cabinet minister from New Brunswick has elected to stay with the government. I wonder if he has heard from the people back home.

Mr. MICHAUD: I have heard from the people back home, and so has the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not catch what the hon. member said. If the Prime Minister objects I will not go over the whole of them, but I will gather them all into an omnibus and say that with the exception of two or three valiant souls over there, holding two different views on this particular question, if the whole of them were to disappear there would not be a national catastrophe, and they could be replaced from among the eminent gentlemen who perhaps ought to be occupying some of the seats they now occupy.

I am about through. I wish to say this to the house and to the country, that there is only one issue before the Canadian public today. It is this: Shall we stand behind the men whom we have sent overseas? Have we confidence in a government that has reversed its traditional policy and adopted a policy which it does not believe in and which I do not believe it intends to implement? How can I vote confidence in a government of that character? My conscience would not let me do it, and my constituents would not let me do it either.

My last word to the hon. member for Prince is one of regret. He said he could not vote for the opposition amendment, and the reason he would vote for the affirmative motion before the Chair was that to adopt the amendment would delay reinforcements. I deny the truth of his premises. There have been war-time elections in Australia, in New Zealand and in the United States—a very bitter one there within the past few weeks. I do not remember a more bitter presidential campaign than that which ended on the seventh day of November in the neighbouring republic. I ask in all seriousness, did that interfere with the operations of the high command in Europe and Asia and in other theatres of war?

Mr. RALSTON: That was not on an issue such as there would be in this election, namely, the issue of conscription for sending needed reinforcements overseas immediately.

Mr. ADAMSON: The presidential election was fought on the personal effectiveness of the war effort of the President. If we had an election now it would be on the personal effectiveness of the Prime Minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am very glad that the hon. member for Prince has made the statement he has. He qualifies his position on this basis—

Mr. RALSTON: I do not qualify my position.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He suggests that I should qualify my position. Do I understand that? He suggests that on this basis, that because this election would be fought on the question of reinforcements for overseas service.

An hon. MEMBER: No; on conscription.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The battle of conscription is over long ago. That is settled. We have it. I page the hon member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) as to whether that question is not settled as far as the statute law of the country is concerned, and implemented to a degree by the order in council before us. His answer will be undoubtedly, yes. There is no doubt about that legal position. That battle is settled. The only issue now is that full implementation shall be given to the policy that the government has now adopted.

The former minister of national defence had grave doubts as to the sufficiency and efficiency of this order in council. I shall not take the time of the house to analyse it as I had intended to do. He had grave doubts last night as to the sufficiency of the order in council to carry forward a steady stream of reinforcements out of these N.R.M.A. men before and after the 16,000 approved and now authorized go overseas. That is why he put the Prime Minister under questioning. If hon. members will turn to page 6677 of Hansard they will find what he said. He served notice on the Prime Minister that with the powers of this order in council sanctioned by this house there can be no excuse for trained men not being available. Here are his words:

With the powers under this order in council sanctioned by this house, there can be no excuse that trained men are not available. There can be no excuse for straining at getting the last volunteer or for curtailing such privileges as would be granted when man-power is adequate, and there can be no excuse for not extending further the provisions for leave for men in the battle areas, with long service overseas. There is one thing more, and that is that I doubt if the minister's programme of dispatch is sufficiently rapid to provide all he should have to reestablish reinforcement pools as quickly as that should be done, having regard to the conditions which face him now and in the near future.

He had grave doubts as to the efficiency of the order in council from the point of view of time. I think that is a fair interpretation of it. Then he went on and raised a note of warning to the Minister of National Defence, his successor in office. He said:

He will be held responsible for accelerating the dispatch in every way.

Then he went on:

And one other point I am assuming, unless the Prime Minister states otherwise, that if the government motion carries, the future orders in council specifying additional numbers of men will be passed and put into effect without any reference back again to this house for a vote of confidence or other approval.

The Prime Minister answered:

That is correct.

On what basis does he make that assumption? There is no undertaking by the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence that a further order in council will be passed at the expiration of the order in council sending over the 16,000 men or at any time. Parliament will be away and he will do as he likes. What I wish this government to do before this vote is taken is to give a solemn undertaking that the order in council—and this is what I asked the Prime Minister to do the other night—will be clarified, and that there shall be not the slightest cause for doubt as to the mandatory authority of the order in council to take every man that is necessary should the occasion arise, and before it arises, to reinforce our men overseas. It is because I think there is an equivocal position, among other reasons, that I propose to vote against this motion of confidence.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that while the house gave the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) the opportunity greatly to exceed his time, if we are to be fair to all hon. members of this house the rule should be enforced. I do not know whether you made a ruling, sir, but I would draw your attention to the rule which states that the mover of the amendment having spoken and taken time, no one subsequently should exceed the forty-minute rule.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will the hon. member who has just concluded his speech permit me one question rising out of his remarks?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. I will not undertake to answer it until I hear it.

Mr. SLAGHT: I do not ask the question to embarrass the hon. member in any way. But speaking as the leader of his party and having regard to the amendment which reads:

. . . by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war.

I understood him to say that that did not include Japan. I ask him now whether it does include enforced service in Manchuria, China, Burma and India?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member can take his own interpretation from it and I can take mine.

Mr. SLAGHT: I asked for yours.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not under cross-examination here. I have been speaking under a great strain and I decline to submit myself to cross-examination at this time.

Mr. SPEAKER: In view of the discussion with regard to the extension of time, may I say that the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) spoke last night for over two hours, and the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) spoke to-day for almost an hour and ten minutes. I take it the sense of the house is that no further extension will be given to any speaker. That being so I will enforce the rule.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In connection with that point, is it a fact that once consent has been given to an hon. member he may speak as long as he wishes after his forty minutes are up?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no time limit set with the privilege of giving the speaker more than forty minutes. It depends very much on the taste of the speaker that he does not exceed what would be a reasonable privilege.

Mr. L. P. PICARD (Bellechasse): Sanity and reason are seldom present at the birth of great national or parliamentary crises. The present instance is a further proof that mass emotional outbursts may develop into a situation such as to cause certain steps to be taken in the governings of the nation which may in turn incite other people to react in a way such as to cause friction and unrest.

For five years now this country has been at war. For five years this parliament has, on the whole, heard few dissenting voices to a war effort as efficient as it could be made. For five years Canada's participation in the war, whether in the military, in the industrial, in the agricultural, or in the financial field, has been acclaimed by the united nations leaders as a most wonderful achievement, which has taken a young country from the ranks of the new-born nations into the status of a full-grown power which stands now fifth in importance in military and economic strength. This has been done, Mr. Speaker, because the country as a whole understood not only that Canada's participation in the war was unavoidable, but that it was necessary in order to safeguard the nation against tyranny and slavery. This has been done because the country was whole-heartedly behind the methods followed by the government up to now in its management of the war.

Let us first look at the Canadian accomplishment in the military field. As in all other countries, the navy and the air force were on a voluntary basis; yet Canada has enlarged its navy a hundredfold and its naval personnel numbers to-day about 90,000. The R.C.A.F. grew rapidly on a voluntary basis under the guidance of the former minister of defence for air (Mr. Power) and has become one of the most efficient weapons of the allies. The commonwealth air training plan, also under the authority of the former minister, has been a source of strength of the air forces of Britain and of all the other parts of the commonwealth. This is all part of our country's achievements in the last five years, and it was done without any form of compulsion. In passing I may say that the personnel of the air force now numbers about 200,000. As to the Canadian army proper it numbers at present about 400,000 men for general service, which means service overseas, all enlisted by the voluntary system.

After the fall of France we put on the statute book a measure prescribing compulsory service for the defence of Canada in Canada and the territorial waters thereof. Everyone in this country subscribed to this measure, because no Canadian has ever objected to fighting in the defence of his own country. The trouble in Canada started when the conscriptionist elements in the cabinet yielded to the pressure of the Tory press and forced the government to bring in bill 80. Events have proved that there was no real urgency in regard to that bill, since two years and four months elapsed after it was passed, over the opposition of myself and quite a number of other hon. members, before further pressure and the threat of a cabinet rupture brought about an order in council applying bill 80 to the extent of sending 16,000 men overseas between now and the end of January.

The whole country is in agreement as to the aim and duty of the Canadian people to do all they can to bring the war to a speedy successful conclusion. The only thing that has ever divided us is the method by which the Canadian army should be recruited for service overseas. In the last war this question split the nation asunder, leaving scars which took years to heal, some of which were still painful when the present war started. The same question split the British nation in 1916; the measure providing conscription in England was passed only eighteen months after the start of the last war, following a long debate which brought about the resignation of some members of the cabinet on the principle of conscription. In this war it is still the question that divides public opinion in many, if not all, of the British dominions; and the Tory press, the Orange lodges and the technocracy groups cannot blame the French Canadians or Quebec for the situation which exists in other parts of the empire.

I have often thought, Mr. Speaker, that my compatriots of English origin should be thankful for the presence of the French-Canadian element in this country. That is so not only because Canada was discovered, explored and settled by them; not only because, five years after the fall of Quebec, French Canadians refused to help the American colonies in their war of independence, though it might be noted that had they accepted American arms and agreed with the suggestion of the emissaries sent from the Lafayette group in France and fought with the American forces, there were so few British soldiers in the country at the time that there might have been no Canada to-day. English Canadians should be thankful not only because we fought side by side with the British in 1812; not only for the contribution we have made generally to Canadian history, Canadian culture and the development and advancement of the country. They should be grateful to us, as an agent of unity among themselves, as a sort of national scapegoat on which to blame everything that goes wrong. Any isolationist doctrines preached in Canada must always be of French origin, according to the press. In the United States Colonel McCormick, Cissie and Joe Patterson, Hamilton Fish, Lindbergh and even the beautiful Clare Boothe Luce can always be called isolationists; there is never any attack on their racial group. In Canada, however, if some man of the type of Groulx or Laurendeau gives an isolationist statement to the press, immediately you see all through English Canada, "French Canadians against war effort." They blame it on the whole racial group.

In Britain, in Northern Ireland, in Australia, in New Zealand and in South Africa, people have opposed to the limit conscription during this war, and they have prevented the passage of measures imposing conscription for overseas service in some of the dominions, while in South Africa they have prevented the imposition of conscription of any kind; yet there are no French Canadians in those countries, there is no Quebec that can be blamed. In Canada a question which could remain only the subject of discussion as to the merits or demerits of a principle has become the cause of racial disunity and parochial prejudices.

Let us see first from official statements what opinions were expressed on the subject by leaders in the British isles and the commonwealth. Two years ago during the debate on bill 80 I gave many such quotations; to-day I shall give only one. In 1916 Mr. Asquith, the prime minister, was speaking in the House of Commons. At that time, sixteen months after the beginning of the war, he said:

> My objection to the employment of compulsion for the purpose of recruiting the army under existing conditions has not been based at all upon abstract attachment to a principle. It is based upon an entirely different ground, namely, that the employment of compulsion under existing conditions would forfeit what I regard to be of supreme and capital importance, that is, the maintenance of the national unity. That again is an abstract objection, but when translated into concrete terms—

I beg of my hon. friends that they note this. Many hon. members are smiling these days, when we talk of national unity, but this is not just an abstract expression. Mr. Asquith said:

> —when translated into concrete terms it means this; if you were to apply, I do not speak of any particular method, but any method of coercion or compulsion, without something in the nature, I will not say of universal, but of general consent, you would defeat your own purpose.

That was not the statement of a nationalist from Quebec; it was the statement of the prime minister of Great Britain during the last war.

When I spoke during the debate on bill 80 two years ago and gave the quotation I just read one hon. member asked: "Can you quote Churchill on this?" I had not under my hand the book in which I could find that reference, so I had to let it pass at that time. To-day I have it, however. On May 20, 1941, when Mr. Churchill was asked in the House of Commons whether he would not reconsider the question of conscription for Northern Ireland and whether he would make any statement about it, he replied:

> The question has for some time past engaged the attention of His Majesty's government, and I hope to be in a position to make a statement on the first sitting day after this week.

The next week, on May 27, 1941, Mr. Churchill said:

> My right hon. friend the member for Antrim had a question on the order paper about the application of conscription to Northern Ireland. I said a week ago that this matter had been engaging our attention. We have made a number of inquiries in various directions, with the result that we have come to the conclusion that at the present time, although there can be no dispute about our rights or about the merits, it would be more trouble than it is worth to enforce such a policy.

This is the statement in the British House of Commons by none other than the foremost leader of the allied nations in this war. Now let us go to Australia. Unfortunately we have not all the Hansards of Australia, but I believe hon. members will trust me if I quote from the Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire. After the first year of the war the government of Australia decided to recall all their troops, serving on all fronts, and to bring them back to Australia. They already had, as we have in this country, compulsory service for Australia. On February 12, 1943, they passed a law imposing compulsion for service in the southwest Pacific zone, but a few months later a proposal was made by a member named Blackburn, who I do not think possibly could have been French, in these words, and I would ask hon. members to mark the similarity between Australia and Canada in this regard:

That this house, reaffirming the policy upon which the majority of its members were elected, oppose the imposition of any form of compulsory service outside of Australia and the territories of the commonwealth.

That was at a time when they had American armies and the American navy fighting alongside them in the Pacific. And yet people got up in the house and proposed that the application of conscription for the south Pacific zone be restricted, and that from now on they would all stay in Australia as it was when the conscription law was first enacted.

Again let me quote from the Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire, because we do not have the official report of debates of South Africa for these last years. Not later than March of this year Prime Minister Smuts declared this, as reported in the Journal:

The Prime Minister went on to speak of South Africa's war effort, and explained that while they had to-day larger forces in the field than at any previous period in the war, it was not easy to keep them up to full strength for various reasons. For one thing, they were volunteer forces. They could not conscript their armies, their people, as other countries were doing.

That was in a British dominion that has filled its engagements. There was no conscription, and no French Canada which prevented it.

Now we come to something of even greater interest, and more closely connected with the situation in Canada. I again quote from the Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire, where, under date of March 3, 1943, I find this, in summarizing the speech of Mr. S. G. Holland, leader of the opposition in New Zealand:

He had said before, and he repeated it, that there was no justification for the number of men under arms in New Zealand.

Then the Minister of Industries and Commerce for New Zealand, the Hon. D. G. Sullivan, is summarized in this fashion:

They were critical of the extent to which men were being used in the armed forces—there was a cry that not enough was being done. Now there had come a sudden change in the criticism, and they were told that the government had entered into too heavy commitments. . . . To-day—

And that was in 1943—

—it looked as if the security of the dominion was better than it had been and might justify some relaxation in the matter of military commitments. But they could not afford to relax entirely.

That was a year and six months ago. There was a member of the government speaking of relaxing. The government could not say what numbers of men they were going to allot to the various services, and that the rest of the people were to go into industry.

Now let us come to the causes of differences of attitude in Canada on the methods of recruiting the army—and not as much on the question of principle as on its reaction among certain elements in this vast country which comprise one-third of the population. I refer of course to my own French-Canadian compatriots.

I recall earlier that during the American revolutionary war French Canadians remained loyal. The same happened in 1812, when we fought side by side with our friends the British who were in Canada. But from 1812 to 1898 there has been no war in which Canada has been called upon to participate. For eighty-six years, for three generations of men there has been no war in which Canada, either for the empire or for its own defence, has been called upon to participate. Now, as you know very well—and it is a known historical fact—during those eighty-six years no encouragement was ever given to anybody of French-Canadian origin in Canada to join the army, for fear he might use unwisely some knowledge he would have acquired, despite what they did in 1812. But we have in a club to which I belong in Quebec, the Garrison club, a frame containing the names of men who were on the walls of Quebec on such-and-such a night in 1850. In that list there is not one French name. There have been a few sons of families who had not chosen to make serious studies in law or medicine, or one of the other arts, who went into the army and took commissions, but we had a very small number of militiamen. In fact I discovered the other day that one of my ancestors was in the army in 1792, and died while serving. I cannot be sure whether he died at war or not.

These things are to be taken into account. In 1898 when the South African war broke out there was little sympathy for it in French Canada. We now find that a large proportion of broadminded British people believe that the South African war was a war of conquest and an unjust war. Canada stood in the same position as it did at the start of the present cabinet crisis. Laurier was faced with a difficult position and menaced with a rupture of his cabinet, and he had to send forces over there. So far as the break up of unity in the country on military matters is concerned, that is the starting point.

That is the moment the trouble started. You saw Bourassa going around Quebec, spreading trouble, spreading nationalist sentiment and separatist sentiment. You saw this sentiment growing and growing in the elections of 1904, 1908 and 1911. In 1911 they succeeded in destroying Laurier in that province. Some of our opponents say that the Liberals are responsible because in Quebec the people are against conscription. I would ask whether or not the Liberals, by keeping for French Canada a political outlet in following a large national party, have not served the country well. If they had not taken the attitude they took in 1917 the whole of the province of Quebec would have gone nationalist and separatist, and we French Canadians would have suffered from it. Canada as a whole would have suffered. But due to the broadmindedness and the understanding of Laurier, who gave them an outlet in a national party, French Canadians were kept in a frame of mind which permitted them to collaborate in confederation, and they carried on for twenty-seven years in that fashion.

We are not responsible for conscription. That has been started by the nationalists, and by those people who believe that there should be two countries in Canada instead of one. But we of the Liberal party have fought against it. Laurier maintained national unity. He felt it was his duty to maintain a political outlet by means of a national party for French Canadians. And because of that attitude we were able afterwards to reestablish and reunite with the rest of Canada in cordial relations, and to play the part which has been played, under this government, from 1921 to the present.

I now come to the situation the government had to face prior to its passing order in council 8891. For five years, as I said before, the country has contributed an efficient war effort under the guiding hand of the Prime Minister. Yet for five years a powerful machine has been at work trying to undermine public confidence in the Prime Minister—and I say this, no matter what the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) may say. I say that it has been at work trying to undermine public confidence in the Prime Minister, and to convince the country that everything would go wrong unless a union government were formed, or unless a Tory administration were in authority. A rumour-spreading, lie-whispering, mud-slinging monster has run amok unscrupulously risking to wreck the whole effort of the country, and with only one aim in view: the destroying at all costs of confidence in the Prime Minister, and the promotion by all means of Tory Conservative interests.

[Mr. Picard.]

This campaign waged relentlessly has laid the foundation for the attacks repeatedly made in the house in the name of patriotism and national duty on the methods followed by the government in recruiting the army. Unable to attack the governmental record of administering the war effort without scandal and the squandering of public moneys; unable to find fault with the economic policies of the government; unable to deny the wonderful industrial production directed by the government, which supplied our armies and those of our allies with weapons of war; unable to attack the achievements brought about in the agricultural field by the wise planning of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner); unable to question the efficiency of the management of the air training plan and the R.C.A.F. by the former Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), or the splendid record of the Canadian navy, the Tory Conservative machine has pinned its hope of success on dividing Canadians among themselves on the question of conscription for overseas service. The old motto, "divide in order to govern," was again to the fore. No matter how much the welfare of the country would have to suffer, no matter how much the war effort might be hampered, the one question, the only question that was apt to divide public opinion in Canada had to be brought forward and made into a symbol of disunity. Distrust had to be sown in one part of the country against the other, and vice versa.

While in English Canada the Tory organization, supported by the Tory press, represented the government as not waging an efficient war effort, and acceding to the views of Quebec in the matter of compulsory service, in French Canada the people who through all their political life had been friendly to the Tories are masquerading as independents. They are accusing the government, and I use their own words, of "betraying Quebec." They criticize the whole war effort and accuse those of us who have supported all government measures exclusive of bill No. 80 of being tools of English Canada and of causing great harm to our racial group. You will see them probably during this debate doing the same thing and asking us to disapprove all that we have co-operated in doing in the execution of the war effort. They have campaigned against Godbout in the same way and have based all their attacks on Godbout's approval of the war effort. The present premier of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis, has said that if he had been premier at the time the N.R.M.A. would not have been enacted, that it was not necessary; that bill No. 80 would not have been enacted because he would have been strong enough to prevent it. Now the cry is raised in Quebec: "Duplessis is back in power and the government has been forced to implement bill No. 80 and Duplessis could not prevent it."

We therefore have to face a monster with two heads and two bodies but with one common aim—to destroy confidence in the government in order to get into power.

I think I can say that most of us in Quebec of the Liberal faith have done our best toward the war effort. We have fought and campaigned to have all the measures pertaining to the carrying out of the war understood and approved by our population. The only point on which we differed from our colleagues of the other provinces was in connection with bill No. 80 and the latest order in council authorizing the sending of N.R.M.A. men overseas.

If I believed that when that order in council was passed the security of Canada was at stake unless we sent a few more thousand men overseas, I could have approved it and tried to have it understood in my province. But I cannot believe that, nor can I believe that without these few men the outcome of the war will be changed or even delayed.

The whole trouble is that our military experts want to make good the commitments they have made, even if they prove to be too large. I think personally, although I am not a strategist or technician in warfare, that the spreading out of our forces on two vastly different theatres of war was a great error of judgment. Instead of having two divisions in the Mediterranean area in Italy and three in western Europe, I think we should have had them all on the same front in a Canadian army. For one thing it would simplify the question of reinforcement pools, and, secondly, it would permit the keeping of three or four divisions in the line while one or two were withdrawn temporarily "to refit, to reequip, to rest, to recuperate and to refill the gaps in their ranks," as was said by the former minister of national defence for air.

By sending these divisions alternately to the front and withdrawing others, our men would not be subjected to the strain they have had to endure. The sending of 16,000 unseasoned troops will not change the procedure followed at present or make for more security for those who are now there. If we have taken too large a chunk of the front, let us be sensible and correct our mistake. With a population of twelve million, Canada has not at its disposal the vast reservoirs of men that the Russians or the Americans have, and cannot be expected to compete with them.

I am not in such bad company in saying this. As I stated earlier, the Minister of Industries and Commerce for New Zealand, speaking for the government, and the leader of the opposition, both spoke of relaxing their military effort because the country was no longer in danger. Canada is no more subjected to danger from the outside than is New Zealand. I admit that we have to do our utmost in other theatres of war to help bring victory about, but let us not do it in a way to endanger the success of the whole war effort, industrial, agricultural as well as military, by enforcing methods which do not, as Mr. Asquith said in 1916, meet with the approval of all the population or which, in the words of Mr. Churchill, speaking of northern Ireland, would cause more trouble than it would produce good results.

I personally am convinced that by order in council 8891 the government has taken steps that were not necessary for the security of the country or imperative for the winning of the war; therefore I cannot approve the action of the government in this regard.

Let us look at another element that entered into the decision of the cabinet and to which both the Prime Minister and General McNaughton have referred—the mounting wave of public opinion, growing into an hysterical panic in certain parts of the country, and provoked and kept alive by the Tory press. This is all based upon the wrong belief that unless the N.R.M.A. recruits are sent overseas, the sons and relatives of good patriotic Canadians will be incurring more dangers in the battle line. The creation of this artificial state of mind will bring grave responsibilities upon those who have built it up for political purposes. I would be the last to ignore the seriousness of such a condition prevailing in the country. I despise those who have brought it about, but I have sympathy for the government which has had to face it. I understand the difficulties, but I am forced to say in all honesty that if such a situation existed, if such an impasse had been reached when public opinion was dangerously split into opposite and irreconcilable views, if a change in policy had to be faced, it might have been better, in order to preserve the confidence of the nation in those whose business it is to run the country, to give way to others to apply such measures.

I say this reluctantly because I have more confidence in the Prime Minister than in any other man in public life, and I know that my constituents, except for the passing of bill 80 and order in council 8891, even now have more confidence in the Prime Minister than in any other leader. They believe he is a good administrator of the nation, yet they cannot understand or excuse a man whose personal opinions are admittedly, even at this moment, favourable to the voluntary method, weakening under the pressure of his conscriptionist ministers. My fear is that this conduct will increase that tendency in the public of a province to distrust the statements and declarations of public men, while in the rest of the country it will appease but temporarily the worries of those whose attitude on this question has reached a state of hysteria.

I regret all the more that I feel compelled to say this to the Prime Minister because my whole mature life has been spent in the surroundings of this cabinet. I arrived in Ottawa in 1925 and I was here until 1930. I was here again from 1935 to 1940. All that time I was under the then minister of justice, the late Mr. Lapointe. I have seen the close association of Mr. Lapointe with the Prime Minister. I have seen them working in harmony and unity, whether in Canada in an effort to bring about better relations in this country between the component elements of the nation, or whether it was in London during the imperial conferences of 1926 and 1937. They then worked in unison to have this nation recognized as an independent state equal to Great Britain and united to the mother country only by bonds of a common allegiance to the crown.

I know the role the Prime Minister has played in the building of a strong and prosperous Canada. I consider that his imprint on Canadian history will be considered the most remarkable of modern time. I am convinced of his sincerity when he says:

> If there is anything to which I have devoted my political life it is to try to promote unity, harmony and amity between the diverse elements of this country.

I think history will recognize that that is so. I wish to say in passing that I am convinced that had not Lapointe's health been impaired and had not his death deprived Canada of one of its most able sons, his weight in the councils of the nation would have strengthened the will of the Prime Minister to prevent some of the measures which have divided us and at times taken our minds away from Canada's wonderful accomplishments in the war. Never has a man's passing away been so sadly felt, especially when we realize that his presence might have been such an agent of cohesion and of unity.

It is all very well to quote some of his words, but I want to say to the Prime Minister that other words spoken by him have had even a stronger influence upon his province. I need not quote them to-day, now that conscription is law, and it is the duty of every good Canadian not to arouse people against the law of the land.

I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot see my way clear to voting with the government on this occasion. I have said and I will repeat that I am taking this stand reluctantly because of my admiration and sympathy for the Prime Minister. I wish also to state that I am not doing this only to please the people I represent, because my proximity to public men, to which I referred a moment ago, has taught me that public favour is fickle and of little consolation if one's acts are not based on conviction. The attacks of the so-called Independents and the Nationalists in Quebec on the former minister for air, who made the painful but conscientious gesture of parting with friends on a matter of principle, are another proof that the value of one's actions is always judged according to a person's prejudices and is readily distorted for political motives. I am taking this stand solely because in conscience I think it is the only logical one for me to take.

I repeat that I have confidence in the Prime Minister. I will go so far as to state that I do not think that Canada could have at this moment a better leader. I am convinced also that he is best suited of any national leader to represent Canada at the peace table and to reorganize things in the post-war period. But as I said, I consider that voting for the main motion as it is drafted means an approval of all the government's actions up to the date of the vote, and that includes the passing of order in council 8891, and no sophism or specious reasoning can change this fact. Just as I have been opposed to bill No. 80, I am not convinced that order in council 8891 is necessary for the security of Canada or advisable at this stage of the war, having regard to conditions existing in the country. I cannot find it logical for me to vote for the main motion, and even less so, of course, for the amendment moved by the Progressive Conservative leader. But lest this attitude be construed as a disapproval of the efficient pursuit of the war, instead of just a difference of opinion as to the method of recruiting the army and an opposition to conscription for overseas service as provided for in bill No. 80 and in order in council 8891, I do now move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker):

> That all the words of the amendment after the word "that" in the first line thereof be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house will aid in maintaining an efficient war effort but it does not approve of compulsory service overseas."

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to try to answer the arguments of the member for Bellechasse, (Mr. Picard) who has just preceded me and has moved an amendment. All I wish to say is that should the amendment be adopted by the House of Commons the effect would be that Canada would be deserting her boys overseas; and neither I nor any other member of the Progressive Conservative party in this house, nor any Tory so-called from coast to coast, has the slightest intention or deserting our lads overseas no matter whatever else may befall.

In this debate several members have been rather flippant in their remarks about Tories and Toryism. May I say to them and to this house and to the Canadian people that there is one thing about the Tories and that is that whenever the call to arms goes out, whenever this country is in danger, there is no doubt that the Tories in Canada will do their share and that their sons will give their share of the blood that has to be given. That is one of the main reasons why I am proud to be a Tory.

This afternoon I propose to speak as a representative of one of the greatest constituencies in Canada, a constituency which has already given hundreds of lives in this war and has thousands of young men overseas; also as a representative from a province which has given to the armed forces of this nation 45·8 per cent of its total male population between the ages of eighteen and forty-five—a percentage second only to that of the great little province of Prince Edward Island.

I speak also as an infantryman in the last war and as one who is vitally and personally interested in many of the young Canadians who are now in the infantry or about to go into the infantry units overseas and whose lives are in danger at this time, whose lives may be snuffed out needlessly if the wrong action is taken by the House of Commons on the issue before it to-day.

There are two things upon which the House of Commons and the country should insist now. They are these: in the first place, that the 16,000 N.R.M.A. trained infantry personnel should be dispatched overseas at once, instead of by monthly instalments extending through the spring months to next April. The latter course is the compromise plan that has been proposed by the new Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, and obviously it means that these fully trained infantrymen are not to be sent to the front as quickly as they could be.

The second is this, that before the house adjourns an order in council should be passed requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel, whether now or hereafter enrolled, to serve in any theatre of war. This is absolutely vital, because, over and above the 16,000 to which reference has been made, there are the 26,000 N.R.M.A. men who are fit to be remustered into the infantry and to go overseas to reinforce our infantry troops there. There are also young men who will be called up under the N.R.M.A. every day from now, and the position should be such that they too can be sent to reinforce the infantry. If this nation is to be certain of reinforcing its men overseas, then these 26,000 men and the new draftees are needed and they will have to go overseas. That has been made perfectly clear not only by the former Minister of National Defence but also by the present minister. These are the two points I wish to stress before the house to-day.

Now I plan to say something in support of my proposals. When the ex-minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) came back from overseas he gave the government a warning. The whole story is out now, or at least there is enough of it to make the picture about as bad as it could be. He warned the cabinet that a substantial number of additional trained infantry were needed overseas. He did not say they were needed in the future; he said they were needed quickly. Repeatedly, in his statements to the public, to the press, and in his speech yesterday, he has stressed the time element and emphasized that there was great urgency. He pointed out that there was going to be a shortage overseas in the units at the end of December or early in January and he asked that N.R.M.A. troops be sent. That was the obvious thing to do, because these N.R.M.A. troops are the best trained infantrymen in Canada. They were and still are the only big block of trained troops available as a reserve either in Canada or overseas. In my own province of British Columbia we have had the sixth division. The men of that division have had training by brigades. They have had battle training and combat training of every description. One of their commanders said a week ago:

> We have the largest body of home defence troops here who have been trained purely for combat duty. They are in a high state of training and discipline and would be almost immediately ready to go.

The ex-minister had a plan to meet this situation. It was in the first place to send 8,000 fully trained infantrymen during the present month of November. They would have been on the high seas now if he had had his way and the support of the cabinet. He said last night that they were to sail from the shores of Canada on November 27 and they would have been in the line early in January. He explained clearly that they would have made up the shortage in our units at the present time soon after January 1 and would have reestablished the pools in the battle areas.

The second part of his plan was to send 8,000 more of these men during the month of December. By that time they too would have been fully trained infantrymen. That would have meant that in all there would have been 16,000 fully trained infantrymen overseas before the end of the year. Then the remaining 26,000 in Canada were to be remustered under his plan and made available and trained as infantrymen so that they would be ready for overseas as quickly as possible.

In his speech last night, at page 6672, the ex-minister said with reference to these 26,000:

> In addition, there were 26,000 N.R.M.A. men considered suitable material as infantry reinforcements who could be remustered and trained as infantry. I thought—

And these are the key words.

> —no time should be lost in getting them to the United Kingdom.

So that he had a clear-cut honest plan for meeting the tragic situation in which he found our lads overseas.

What was done about it by the cabinet? One would think that any Canadian cabinet would have agreed at once to his plan, thereby giving the boys overseas the benefit of the doubt. We have always contended in the house that the lads who came back from the last war were entitled to the benefit of the doubt in connection with applications for pension, and so on. That of course was quite correct. How much more important it is that the lads now overseas doing the fighting and offering their lives should get the benefit of the doubt. But they did not get it; the government did not give them the benefit of the doubt. The government had a duty to make certain that these men overseas were adequately reinforced in time. And remember what it meant to take a chance in the way the government did take a chance. It meant risking tired men having to carry on without proper rest out of the line. It meant, as one press correspondent from Italy said the other day, that one volunteer rifleman had to try to do the job of two. It meant that wounded men had to go back to the line before their wounds were properly healed. It meant reinforcements being used who had not had full training or who were in a poorer state of training than men in the N.R.M.A.

[Mr. Green.]

I have here a letter from the Women's Auxiliary of the British Columbia Regiment, the Duke of Connaught's Own Rifles. The menfolk of these women are serving in Holland as the 28th Canadian Armoured Regiment (B.C.R.). This is a regiment with a wonderful record in the last war, the old 7th Canadian infantry battalion, one of the outstanding regiments of Canada. With reference to the situation of their husbands and sons, these women write to me:

> Our husbands and sons, as the 28th Canadian Armoured Regiment (B.C.R.), are fighting to-day in Holland. We know—

And these women are in a position to know, because they hear from their husbands and sons.

> We know they are understrength and we know too many of the costly expedients that have been adopted in an attempt to keep it and other regiments near establishment.

What was done by the cabinet? There was delay, there was talk, Colonel Ralston was forced out, General McNaughton was brought in. Then there followed three more weeks of delay. Finally the cabinet made a partial surrender and by this very act of surrender proved that Colonel Ralston was right. In fact there is not an hon. member in this house who can honestly say to-day that Colonel Ralston was not right. His stand has been justified time and again since we assembled here a little over a week ago. The cabinet made this partial surrender only after tremendous pressure from the Canadian people who will not brook uncertainty or delay in giving help to their boys overseas.

There has been quite a lot of talk about disunity in this issue. The suggestion is made that because one province feels one way the other eight should hang back and not press for adequate reinforcements for their boys overseas. If that is to be the law in Canada; if a minority can have that vetoing power over the majority when the lives of the sons of Canada are at stake then there will be no nation of Canada very long. We cannot have a nation if the minority is to have its way on a vital issue of this kind.

On the second day of this session the government brought in a plan which is set out in P.C. 8891. This plan permits them to send overseas a maximum of 16,000 N.R.M.A. personnel; but the real policy of the government was laid down by General McNaughton the other night and will be found at page 6534 of Hansard, and I draw the attention of the hon. members from my own province to this statement particularly. The real policy is as follows:

The policy is to have voluntary service, and there will be an extension of that principle only where it is necessary to met deficiencies in our army overseas.

I emphasize the word "only". This plan is a political compromise, Mr. Speaker. There can be no compromise with death overseas. That is out for our boys over there and I suggest that it should be out for the government in Canada.

Then to go on with the plan which was brought in by the new Minister of National Defence, General McNaughton: In the first place he arbitrarily postpones the shortage to the end of January or early in February. Colonel Ralston said that it would be at the end of December or in January. The evidence we have heard in the house proves conclusively that Colonel Ralston is right. The new minister says: "Oh, no, the shortage is at the end of January or early in February." He cuts Colonel Ralston's first 8,000 fully trained infantrymen almost in half, to 5,000, and they are not to be all N.R.M.A. troops. Some of those are to be general service personnel. Several times during his remarks General McNaughton made it perfectly clear that some at any rate of this first draft would be general service personnel. They are now going in December rather than in November. There you have another month's delay. It all adds up to this, that only 5,000 of those fully trained infantrymen who are so badly needed overseas now, instead of Colonel Ralston's 16,000, are to be available for the critical period. That is the difference between the plans of the former Minister of National Defence and the present one. It is a difference of 11,000 fully trained infantrymen available overseas where they are needed at once.

In the meantime the regular reinforcement stream is to go over. I suppose so many thousand will be going every month. One would have thought that General McNaughton would put in that stream the other fully trained infantrymen. Instead of that this reinforcement stream is to contain only general service personnel. That will be found in the general's statement on page 6571 of Hansard. All of this reinforcement stream are to be general service men who probably are not so well trained as the N.R.M.A. infantrymen in Canada, and many of whom no doubt will be such men as ordnance men or carpenters who have been carrying on really as tradesmen for two or three years. They are in no physical condition to go over right away. They have not the proper military training. They are being rushed over to fill the gap while these fully trained N.R.M.A. infantrymen are being left here. It will also include the young lads of eighteen and a half years who are being called up and rushed over because they had enough spirit to volunteer for service anywhere. That is what this wonderful new policy means in human lives.

Then under the compromise plan 5,000 N.R.M.A. men are to go over in January less certain general service personnel. We do not know whether there will be 4,000 N.R.M.A. men or 4,500 or 3,500. We have no idea how many there will be.

Mr. GARDINER: You got the figures the other day.

Mr. GREEN: We did not get the details of them. I do not want to be interrupted.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to call attention to one thing. My hon. friend did get the details.

Mr. GREEN: I have the floor and I do not yield to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend did get the details the other day and he knows the exact figure.

Mr. GREEN: I have the floor.

Mr. ROWE: We have had three sets from the Prime Minister now.

Mr. GARDINER: And you will get another.

Mr. ROWE: The minister is jumping in and trying to justify them.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. gentlemen got the figures which showed that the figures you are using are 5,000 out.

Mr. GREEN: The other 6,000 of this maximum of 16,000 are to go over on the instalment plan. We are to have 2,000 in February, 2,000 in March and 2,000 in April, which, of course, delays the finish of the movement of the 16,000 infantrymen. It may be, Mr. Speaker, that there is no intention of sending over all of the 16,000. Certainly there is no intention of sending them all over before April of next year.

Mr. McLARTY: As required.

Mr. GREEN: No provision whatever is made under the compromise plan for sending over the 26,000 who are to be remustered. Nor is there any provision for sending over those who will be enrolled from now on as N.R.M.A. personnel. Under the order in council there is no power to send these other men over. Before that is done there must be another approval by the cabinet. Perhaps there will have to be an approval for each additional 1,000 men. I should say that for all practical purposes it will be impossible to get such approval. The cabinet is hopelessly divided on this question. Some of them are so bitter and determined about it that they can delay, or perhaps prevent the sending of one man over the 16,000. At best, even if additional men are sent, there will be argument and delay, and at that time there may not be a minister with enough backbone to resign because the right thing is not being done. Then the Canadian people will never know until it is too late how they have been let down by their own cabinet.

Obviously the proper thing and the Canadian thing to do is to provide that these 26,000 men and those enrolled in the N.R.M.A. hereafter can be sent overseas as reinforcements. They are absolutely necessary to make certain that there are adequate numbers of men in the reinforcement pools. This house can do no less than make certain. We have no right to gamble with the lives of our young men. General McNaughton himself stated that there would be a second shortage of men overseas late in the spring or in the early summer. That will be found at page 6520 of Hansard. He said:

> Should casualties continue at the higher rates, there is a possible prospective shortage of fully trained infantry, which may come late in January or early in February next.

And that prospective shortage is under his new compromise plan. Just yesterday we had Prime Minister Churchill warn us that the war would run into the summer. Some time before he had said "early summer". Yesterday he said, "Take out the word 'early' and leave it that the war will run into the summer." Everyone knows the terribly costly fighting there is likely to be in the interim.

Apparently the government is hoping for additional volunteers to meet that second prospective shortage. At the same page General McNaughton said:

> The forecasts have not as yet been carried through the summer, and all I can now say is that the situation then will depend on the rate of recruiting for general service in December and in the following months.

Yet it is almost certain that all the volunteers enlisting from now on will be required to keep up the regular reinforcement stream. So that I repeat, Mr. Speaker, and I submit that it cannot be disproved, that the new plan is obviously a political compromise. It is a cunning political subterfuge; and if it proves to be an inadequate compromise the mistake will be paid for not by the members of the cabinet or the members of this house, but with the lives of young Canadians overseas, through lack of adequate, trained reinforcements. This house and the Canadian people must never permit any government to gamble with the lives of our sons.

[Mr. Green.]

There is only one way to make certain of these adequate and continuous trained reinforcements. That is to do just as we have suggested in our amendment and require all N.R.M.A. personnel, whether now or hereafter enrolled, to serve in any theatre of war. This is what the great majority of the Canadian people want. This is what the majority of the members of this house want and what they would vote for if they were free of the party whip. The Canadian people have long since seen the folly and deceit of this two-army system. No government policy could have been more demoralizing to a people. For some time past the draftee army has been a huge, costly diversion to try to satisfy eight provinces and at the same time not offend Quebec. In both respects it has failed. The man-power policy of the present government has set province against province, the general service soldier against the draftee, and now the new compromise plan is setting draftee against draftee. The man-power policy of the Canadian government has brought about the meanest, lowest kinds of compulsion, both in trying to force these young men to go active and now in the treatment of the draftees themselves. It has brought about this situation, that with ample, fully trained infantry in Canada, it has allowed our boys overseas to go short of trained reinforcements and has forced into the line young Canadian lads not fully trained. Yet under the government's compromise policy the N.R.M.A. plan is to continue, if you please; we are still to have the two-army system. There is still to be the coaxing and the bluffing of men to go active. There is still to be all the bitterness, all the inequality of service and sacrifice, and this plan is to be administered by a government that has been greatly weakened by the loss of two of its key ministers and by the events of the last month.

I appeal to the private members of this house of all parties. We cannot go back to our constituencies leaving this question of reinforcements in the air, where it is now. We must make absolutely certain in the first place that all the trained infantry draftees are sent over from Canada at once, and in the second place that all N.R.M.A. personnel, whether now or hereafter enrolled, are required to serve in any theatre of war. This would mean that we would have only one army for Canada, and I hope then we would have an army in which all our young men are given equal treatment. This is the only way to make certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements for our army overseas.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say the time has come, and in fact is long since past, for the government of Canada, the House of Commons of Canada and the parliament of Canada to adopt an honest, courageous manpower policy that is in line with the straightforwardness of the Canadian people.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I must say I was surprised at the words of the last speaker, who suggested that he was proud of being a Tory because the Tories would always do their share and their sons would do their share of the fighting. I submit that this conveys the suggestion that the hon. member is proud of being a Tory because of that fact, and therefore conveys the insinuation that other parties are not ready to do their share, and that the sons of those belonging to other parties do not do their share of the fighting. If it means anything that is what it means; otherwise there would be no reason to be proud of belonging to the Tory party. It is the old story of wrapping themselves in the flag.

An hon. MEMBER: They have not pulled down the flag.

Mr. TUCKER: Neither has the Liberal party.

An hon. MEMBER: No?

Mr. TUCKER: No, and I will give my reason for that statement.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They have disgraced it.

Mr. TUCKER: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether in the whole history of Canada any other administration have made as great a direct contribution, in the loss of members of their own families, as the present administration; and it ill becomes the official opposition to speak as they have through the mouth of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I would remind them now, when they are talking in such brave language, that the official opposition went to the country in 1940 under a leader who was not beyond asking for support in the province of Quebec on the ground that there would be no overseas conscription. He took that stand as the leader of the party, and he was supported by his party. We had the spectacle after that of the acting leader of the party rising in his place in the house and, after being elected on that pledge, inviting the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to break the pledge and to vote for overseas conscription, without in any way consulting the people. That is not consistent with the language used by the last speaker. Why did their leader at that time take the stand he did, if it was not in order to try to preserve national unity? If it was all right for the late Doctor Manion, the leader of the Conservative party at that time, and under whom they went to the country on the issue of preserving national unity, is it not a proper procedure to-day?

After a great deal of anxious consideration I have decided to support and to second the motion moved by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), that "this house will aid in maintaining an efficient war effort, but that it does not approve of compulsory service overseas."

During the 1940 election campaign I, in company with practically every member of the house, sought the support of the people on the understanding that if they would support our war effort they could rest assured that it would be conducted on a voluntary basis, and that there would not be conscription for overseas service. Not only did we have the assurance of our own leader to that effect, but also the leader of the then Conservative party took that stand, and so did the leader of the C.C.F. I thought I was quite safe in inviting votes in my support, as supporting the government in its war effort, but on the definite promise that there should not be conscription for overseas service. On that basis the support of the whole country was sought.

I well remember that in September, 1939, there was some worry as to whether or not the country could enter the war as a united unit, because of what had happened at the time of the last war when, after war was declared, conscription was imposed by the majority upon the minority. It was because of our experience in the last war that these explicit pledges were given to the Canadian people, in order that they might support the war effort unitedly on that basis.

Those pledges were given in this chamber, in my hearing. And when the premier of one of the provinces of this country attacked the war effort of the government and went to an election on the issue, some of the leading members of the administration went into Quebec and asked for the support of that province of the war on a voluntary basis. In that they achieved an overwhelming victory, and the people of this country from one end to the other applauded that action. No fault at all was found with it.

Then in 1940 we went to the country on the very same policy. I believe that when people make a deal with their eyes open that deal should be respected. If we have gone into this war as a partnership on an agreed voluntary basis; if we have done our very best on that basis, and received the support of the whole country on that basis, then nothing short of actual danger to the country's existence, or a loss of the war, would justify our departing from that position.

Some people might say it was an unwise thing to do. But if at that time or in 1940 the British government had been asked whether it would rather have the support of Canada on a voluntary basis, through her declaration of war, or have Canada abstain from coming into the war because we could not unite in our effort and because we could not go in on an unqualified basis, but preferred to wait outside the war for two years, as did our great ally to the south, I venture to say that the British government would have said to us, "By all means come in on our side at this crucial time." I am satisfied that we went into it at that time as a united people, because we were able to come to that understanding. I am satisfied, further, that it was because we were at the side of Great Britain in 1940, when she was on the verge of suffering defeat; that it was because Canada stood at her side with the one trained organization in the British isles—the First Division, which was fully equipped and ready to operate, and which was the only organization in that position—and that it was because our airmen were in the skies and our navy in the seas, that the situation was saved. It was just that little bit of extra support, I believe, that did it. That was a crucial time, and I believe perhaps the decision of our leaders at the outbreak of war may very well have prevented our losing the war in 1940.

I submit, however, that to-day we are not in that crucial position—and I make that submission most sincerely. The two conditions which might have justified us in not living up to our pledge to the Canadian people to the effect that there would not be compulsion for overseas service, namely the conditions, first that our very existence as a country is in danger or, second, that we are in danger of losing the war, do not now exist.

Having given that pledge, and having received the support of our people, which perhaps enabled us to avoid losing the war at a crucial time, through our being at the side of Britain and our commonwealth, we are not now justified in departing from that pledge merely because we think it is preferable to do otherwise, now that the crisis has passed. I do not think that is a proper way to treat the Canadian people.

It is not a matter of balancing between what is better and what is not so good. If we are not absolutely in a position where, to save ourselves or to keep from losing the war, we must impose conscription, then I think we are in duty bound to adhere to the pledges we gave at that time. I do not think anyone would argue that we are not now assured of victory. I do not think the sending of those 16,000 extra men for the support of the infantry would make the difference between victory and defeat.

Mr. JACKMAN: Get over there and see.

Mr. TUCKER: I was there last time, and I offered my services and gave them for two years this time. I have given altogether over four years of my life in the service of my country. I do not want any such interruptions.

Mr. JACKMAN: Then you ought to know, in that case.

Mr. TUCKER: And I do know. I know how much harm conscription did when it was attempted at the time of the last war, and just how little good it did.

If I may be permitted to proceed without interruption—and it was quite uncalled for—I would say that Australia, which has been in greater danger than Canada has been, still has not seen fit to impose conscription on her fighting forces for service north of the equator. This means that they are not in a position to send by compulsion men to fight on the islands of Japan, where only Japan can be defeated. Yet Australia manages to keep her forces reinforced, despite the fact that she has not yet imposed conscription. In addition to that there is the fact that she has a far greater proportion of her troops who are not enlisted for overseas services than has Canada at the present time.

Let us now consider South Africa. She manages to fight her war and keep her troops in the field. And I suggest again that South Africa still is in greater danger than Canada is to-day.

Then, what about Northern Ireland? There, again, there is no conscription to send troops for overseas service. And in none of these cases so far as I know have specific pledges been given to the people that there would not be conscription for overseas, as it has been given to the people of Canada.

To insist that we must send 16,000 troops overseas in spite of the pledges we gave at one stage in the war, and to pretend that it is a matter of life and death when, as a result of actions in which we have taken part, hundreds of thousands of Europeans have been freed, and are now in a position to fight and are anxious to fight is to raise an issue which is unjustified in the light of Canadian history. We are telling them that their efforts must be limited because we cannot give them the arms for which they are pleading. All those people are willing and ready to fight; there are probably 200,000 or perhaps 500,000 Frenchmen and Belgians who are crying out for arms and equipment in order to take their part in defeating the foe.

The argument for overseas conscription is based upon several different grounds. One is that if we do not pass this measure we shall not have adequate reinforcements for five divisions, or practically six divisions when you take into account the corps and army troops. The first thing I should like to suggest is that in my humble judgment the figures which have been given to me do not indicate that we cannot adequately reinforce those five divisions by using men who have already enlisted or are now enlisting, who are trained and ready to go. I am satisfied that a reasonable period of more or less non-active fighting and holding the line which Canadians might be permitted to do in the light of their tremendous exertions since D-day, the acquiring of the channel bases and the capturing of the Scheldt estuary, would enable that lag in infantry reinforcements to be overtaken.

We have been assured over and over again that the over-all reinforcement situation is adequate and satisfactory, that there have been more infantry casualties proportionately than casualties in the other services. We have been told that these people can be remustered and be ready after something like six weeks training. I submit that the deficiency with regard to the infantry could be made up by our troops remaining for a short time more or less inactive to rest as they are at the present time. They would not need to remain inactive very much longer to have a position where all would be well so far as the infantry is concerned. That is leaving out of account what can also be done by remustering.

The suggestion has been made that Canada is under obligation to have her troops fighting continuously in the line. I would call attention to the fact that the United States 9th army just went into action recently. There is no obligation upon an army to be fighting continuously day in and day out. The Canadian corps during the last war withdrew from the line some time in April, 1918, and did not go back until August 8.

Mr. GREEN: There were some divisions in the line all that time.

Mr. TUCKER: There was one part of one division in the line part of the time, but the bulk of the Canadian corps was out of the line. It was thrown in at the Germans with such strength as the spearhead of the allied attack on August 8 that it broke them. I fancy that we are entering a period on the western front when climate, mud and so on are going to restrict activities somewhat whether we like it or not. I make the prediction that if the finding of the general staff that the over-all reinforcement situation was satisfactory was correct, that there was sufficient provision for over-all reinforcements, then the present situation is such that with a reallocation of a proper number of men to the infantry there will be no difficulty about providing adequate reinforcements without sending over 16,000 draftees by compulsion. I am not alone in that thought. A member of the cabinet who has resigned, the former minister of national defence for air (Mr. Power), said this when speaking in the house recently:

> By all reports, the number required even of infantry, in which arm alone there is said to be a threatened deficiency, is comparatively small. The lowering of the rate of casualties by periods of comparative or total inactivity would wipe out the margin of deficit, if any exists, and restore the balance.

The former Minister of National Defence for Air undoubtedly has the confidence of the people of this country and I feel sure that we can accept his statement at its face value. As far as I am concerned no figures have been given me to show that those figures are incorrect.

There is another thing I should like to draw to the attention of the house. There is nothing magical about five divisions. I find it difficult to understand why at a time when we are actually sending back to civil life thousands and thousands of fully trained aircrew it is felt necessary in order to make a proper war effort to send over 16,000 unwilling infantry men. Put those aircrew men into bombers and fighter planes, and I submit that they will make a greater contribution toward the defeat of Germany than two or three times their number of unwilling draftees who are sent overseas by compulsion by virtue of the decision of this government.

If our only purpose is to make the greatest possible contribution to winning the war, why do we persist in reinforcing five divisions and demobilizing thousands of trained aircrew? It seems to me, and I have a right to this opinion, that it would have been far better to break up one of those divisions if necessary to provide reinforcements that way, and use these trained aircrew who would have done much more damage to Germany than a division which might be broken up in order to provide reinforcements for the boys in the line or 16,000 draftees sent over by compulsion.

There is nothing unchangeable about having five divisions in an army. There is nothing set about it. It is a matter of our making our greatest contribution, and I suggest that the way to do that would be to make use of these men who are willing and anxious to fight instead of putting the emphasis upon these unwilling men.

This demand for conscription for overseas service is also made upon the ground of equality of service and sacrifice. Attacks have been made upon French-speaking Canadians and upon other Canadians of foreign origin. The suggestion is made that the only way to have equality of sacrifice is by the use of compulsion. Despite the fact that over fifty per cent of the people of Saskatchewan are of non-English speaking origin, that province does not need to take a back seat to any other province in her contribution to the war.

Of those who have been killed in action and who are presumed to be dead from the constituency of Rosthern that have come to my attention—and that is all I can speak of—to the total of fifty, the proportions are as follows:

	Per cent
English, Irish, Scotch and other English-speaking origin	26
Ukrainian	18
French-speaking	12
Mennonite	12
German	20
Scandinavian	4
Hungarian	8

I put these figures on the record to show that we are building up a nation of Canadians regardless of their racial origin. These figures show that under a policy of allowing people to offer themselves freely in the defence of their country there has been a response from all peoples regardless of their religious beliefs or racial origin.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, when I think of the thousands of young people of the Roman Catholic faith who have laid down their lives in the defence of their country in this war I deplore the activities of a certain gentleman by the name of Shields who is going up and down this country maligning the people of that faith, and I contend that men of all parties, not only of the Liberal party but of the official opposition and of all parties in this house, should make it clear that they disapprove these unwarranted attacks upon people of another faith who have made such a splendid contribution not only by their sweat but by their blood and sacrifice in the winning of this war and in sustaining and building up the country in time of peace.

As I say, the volunteer method was working magnificently in this country. No other country in the world of our strength, of our population and our wealth, has made the wonderful contribution that this country has made, and on a voluntary basis. Will anybody here say that, had we been faced with the disunity that an attempt to force compulsion at the start of the war would have brought about, we could have accomplished anything like the magnificent effort we have made in this war? Nobody will say that; and since we have gone into the war on that basis my regret is that there should have been carried on a campaign which did not start yesterday, when apparently there was more need than formerly for reinforcements, but was going on two years ago, yes, three years ago, since when there has been an insistent demand for conscription and attacks upon the Prime Minister because he would not impose conscription. The present opportunity has been seized upon because it was thought that at last the great Prime Minister of this country, who has led this country in a war effort that I say is unparalleled in the experience of all countries of the world for a country of our population and wealth could be overthrown, his party broken behind him, and he himself driven from public life. Incidentally I have no doubt that the forces of reaction which hate and oppose that great programme of social and humanitarian measures which the Prime Minister has laid before parliament this session saw in this agitation for conscription an opportunity of destroying the greatest Prime Minister that Canada has ever seen.

A great deal has been said about the home defence troops, and a great deal has been said in bitter criticism of them. Many of them are known to me. Some of them served with me while I served in the army in the present war. I know why a lot of them have refused to go active. It is because they were called up when they felt that they were absolutely needed at home. I know cases where the last boy at home in the family, with a brother overseas, has been called up, leaving the aged father and mother to attempt to carry on the farm alone. Some of them have brothers paratroopers, and others have brothers in different branches of the armed forces. I know their situation intimately. They considered that if they went active and went overseas they could no longer help their aged parents or families to make a living on the farm. They refused to go active. They believe that they never should have been called up, and if it had not been for the activity of certain people in Saskatchewan who were not carrying out the government's policy but instead were calling people up from the farm who never should have been called up, hundreds of these young men who are in the home defence army never would have been called up at all. I know whereof I am speaking.

On January 14, 1943, a reinforcement arrived at one of the battalions on the west coast. They numbered 195, and at the time I made my canvass there were exactly thirty on fatigue and other duties, leaving 165, and of that 165 only seventeen were not farmers—and that in spite of the well-established policy of the government that young farmers should not be called up if they were needed at home on the farm. Of that 165, thirty-eight had already received postponements on the ground that their services were necessary on the farm. Yet they were called up and placed in the home defence army. That is one of the reasons why a lot of these boys, some of whom have brothers overseas, have refused to volunteer. I deplore the attacks on these boys, calling them zombies and all the rest of it, as most of them are fine young fellows.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. TUCKER: I wish to summarize some of the arguments which I used before the dinner hour as to why I oppose the government's policy as outlined in order in council 8891 providing for a limited measure of compulsory service overseas. I argued that such a measure was not absolutely necessary in order to defend the existence of our country or to achieve victory and that therefore it should not have been brought in at all.

In a country composed as ours is, so largely of minorities, the utmost good faith must be maintained in the treatment of those minorities, and if an undertaking is given to minorities and is to be broken without overriding and overwhelming reasons, then the very basis upon which a country is constituted as ours is, in large part of minorities, will be broken down and we shall not be united; we shall be a country made up of warring factions. I say therefore that, in view of pledges given at the commencement of the war, this measure should not have been introduced because there was no need for it from the point of view of defending the country against external enemies or for the purpose of achieving victory.

I also argued that it was very doubtful whether this measure ultimately would provide more reinforcements for overseas than would have been obtained had we continued with the voluntary system. What will develop in the days that lie ahead will in my opinion demonstrate the truth of that statement. I argued that if we break up the unity of this country, in which an amazing amount of work has been accomplished in our war effort, we shall not be able to make the same contribution to assisting the other united nations in winning that we have made as a united dominion. One of our greatest contributions has been in the direction of providing foodstuffs for our allies, providing shipping and munitions of war, and so on. On that basis we have made a contribution which I think transcends that of any other nation of similar population and similar wealth. If we disrupt our unity at this time, anything that we may accomplish as a result of that will not compare with what we could still do as a united nation. What we can do united would far outweigh any little good that might be obtained by securing a few more men, if we do secure them, for overseas service by the method of compulsion.

After all, each of us is entitled to his own opinion; but in the light of the figures given by the general staff with regard to the general reinforcement situation, if those figures are correct, I am not satisfied that there is any necessity for us to resort to this measure in order to make up the deficiency in infantry reinforcements resulting from a wrong allotment of men in the last four or five months. I am satisfied that a dispassionate examination of those figures will show that a reasonable amount of remustering, together with a reasonable chance given our troops to serve for a short time in a quieter part of the front, would have enabled us to meet that slight discrepancy in lack of infantry reinforcements without resorting to this policy of compulsion.

If we were to return to civil life thousands of men, many of whom have been taken from our farms, they could make a great contribution to the cause of the allies in the production of food and in providing other necessary supplies—the men who do not desire to volunteer to go overseas. In my opinion it would be better to have those men return to civil life than to carry out the proposed return, in effect, to civil life of thousands of trained aircrew men from the R.C.A.F. Those men in the air force who are anxious to take a real part in the war could be given a chance, and their contribution would far outweigh the contribution that may be made through the dispatch of these men by compulsion for service overseas.

There is no reason to insist on having five divisions in the army at any cost, and a fixed and lesser number than we would provide in the air force. Our contribution should have been based upon an endeavour to do our utmost on the basis on which we started out and which we have carried on so successfully up to the present time. We could have made a greater contribution on that basis than we can by the introduction of this measure of compulsory service.

Then there is the question that we face a troubled world. We may have to face another such time as we faced in 1939. I hope that will never happen, but I did hope that we would meet this crisis if it comes as a united nation. Had we been able to do so we could have faced whatever the future had in store for us, with every confidence in our ability to meet the events that might come. Now, however, we have broken up the unity of the country, how badly I do not know. I hope that irreparable damage has not been done. Such damage may have been brought about but I hope not. At any rate it is very greatly to the credit of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that he held out against this measure as long as he possibly could. History, I believe, has already recorded that the attempt at conscription in the last war was a failure and did more harm than good, and history will record once more that this attempt at conscription in the present war will have been an equal if not a greater failure. It was imposed upon a Prime Minister who saw its dangers and resisted it to the very last. History will give him the greatest amount of credit for the fight he put up in that regard. I repeat, I hope the damage that has been done, if any, has not been irreparable. I trust we shall be able to get together and co-operate, regardless of racial origin or religious creed, so that we can build up a country worthy of the volunteers who have gone forth to defend us against our enemies. To use the words of the former minister of national defence for air (Mr. Power) when he addressed the house last, I would express the hope and prayer that "with the advent of external victory and peace, peace and understanding may come within our own country."

Mr. SPEAKER: Since the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) moved his amendment to-day I have been considering the question of the relevancy of it. The amendment as moved by Mr. Picard, seconded by Mr. Tucker, was:

[Mr. Tucker.]

That all the words of the amendment after the word "that" in the first line thereof be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house will aid in maintaining an efficient war effort but it does not approve of compulsory service overseas."

The first requisite of an amendment is that it must be connected with government administration. The amendment as proposed does not connect the government with the maintenance of the war effort. It is of no purpose to make such propositions in the house because they are in their nature hypothetical. The words I have already quoted from the amendment are, "This house will aid in maintaining an efficient war effort."

The amendment is not complete in its form. It is the expression of a general opinion which may be moved in any public body but has no connection with the business of the house.

The object of the house is to suggest, approve or disapprove of the government's policy. The amendment does not relate to government action, is irrelevant to both the amendment and the main motion.

For these reasons, together with those already given in connection with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Acadia, I find the amendment out of order and I so rule.

Hon. P. J. ARTHUR CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères): I am not without realization of the gravity of the situation and the anxiety which exists in the minds of many people in Canada, as well as in the minds of the hon. members who represent the people of Canada in this House of Commons, but I felt that I could not give a silent vote on a motion of this kind and that it was my duty to express my opinion in all sincerity and frankness and to make my position clearly known before the house and the country. I hope that I am well enough known by all hon. members of this house for them to understand that even if I use a certain amount of heat in the expression of my personal and sincere opinion it is not due to the fact that I have any rancour in my mind toward any hon. member who does not share my views, or that I want to exercise any kind of vengeance against anybody with whom I have been associated in the past. I cannot avoid becoming heated when expressing views at any meeting. I cannot imitate other people when they express their views coldly, calmly and without raising their voices. At times I envy them, and particularly the former Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). I cannot bring myself to believe that being in the situation in which he was yesterday, I could have reasoned my case as calmly as he did. Our temperaments are not the same. At times I regret that I have not the temperament of those who are capable of arguing their case as the former Minister of National Defence did.

It was refreshing, Mr. Speaker, to listen to a speech like the one which was delivered before and after six o'clock by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). It is not very often that we French Canadians hear in this House of Commons an English-speaking voice defending the position that we are taking, expressing views which are similar to those that we entertain and using the same arguments that we ourselves are using in support of our own ideas. I thank him for the kindness of his speech, which, nevertheless was a very strong one from the point of view of reason and knowledge, as well as being an expression of real Canadianism. I congratulate him upon his frankness in expressing his point of view and upon having argued so well, so clearly and so energetically in support of it.

I also desire to congratulate the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), who made an excellent speech and who has expressed to a very large extent sentiments which are mine at this time as they were when I debated bill 80.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it were permitted to an humble member of the House of Commons to congratulate you as a judge of our procedure; if it were permitted to a lawyer arguing a case before a court to congratulate a judge upon the wisdom of his decision, I would congratulate you upon the decisions that you have been rendering in declaring out of order the subamendments which have been proposed to the motion of confidence moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). In most cases what is the object or rather what is the effect of these amendments? I am sure they are proposed in good faith, but what is the result? It is purely and simply to becloud the issue and prevent the common people from understanding what is really at stake before parliament. I have had enough experience in this House of Commons to notice that the public do not always understand what is going on in the house, because of the beclouding of issues which is caused by numerous and successive amendments and subamendments, which most of the time drown the question under a lot of words and are only an enunciation of principles and programmes which are the very opposite of the object that those who have moved the motion have had in mind. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that if the rules of the house permit amendments and subamendments to a motion of this kind, in reason and in common sense, they should be modified to allow the government to be free to ask for a vote of confidence according to their wording of the motion, and then not have to face a vote of confidence on a motion amended expressing the views of opposing parties.

The government has come before the house asking for a vote of confidence. We shall vote on it, and we should vote on it the way it has been drafted, and not be afraid to say "yes" or "no" and express clearly the approval or disapproval of the government's policy. I see no necessity of an amendment to bring into the light the word "conscription". The word "conscription" is in the wording of the motion. The word itself is not there, but the spirit is there because the motion of the Prime Minister reads as follows:

> That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

"Its policy". What is the policy of the government to-day? A policy of conscription for service overseas. That is the policy of the government; and an hon. member rising in his place in this house and voting for the motion made by the Prime Minister would vote for the policy of conscription, because the policy of the government is a policy of conscription as it has been stated by the Prime Minister himself and as it is stated by the order in council which is before the house at the present time. There is no possible escape from that position. Those who are disposed to vote for the government and thereby vote confidence in the government on that motion should be able to face the situation squarely and not try to vacillate or hesitate and try to hide behind some amendment or subamendment. They should face the issue as it is. It is sufficiently important to deserve full consideration and a frank vote on the part of members representing the electors of Canada.

I am probably one of those who have been accused by some hon. members and particularly by the press, of not having properly led the province of Quebec, of not having given proper direction to the people of that province. They say that Quebec is in such a state of mind because of the attitude of her leaders. In a very humble way I have been for a certain time one of the leaders of public opinion in the province of Quebec, and before this House of Commons I have nothing to retract; I have no excuses to offer; I have nothing to take back from what I have told the electors of my province. What I said there was approved by the Prime Minister, with whom I was then associated. What I said there was approved by the leader of the opposition during the last electoral campaign. There was no divergence of view as between Liberals and Conservatives in regard to conscription for service overseas. We all said that this policy was no good for Canada; that it had been a failure in the past and would be a failure in the future. Why agitate that question before those who are not well informed, and say that Quebec is in this position because its leaders have not been true to their duty? I have been true to my duty, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been, as Ernest Lapointe has been and as others have been. We have spoken the truth, and what we have said in the province of Quebec we have repeated on each occasion and at every opportunity that has been given us in other sections of Canada, with the same courage, the same conviction and the same feeling of a real Canadianism.

I feel somewhat proud, Mr. Speaker, to have been able to face the electors of the province of Quebec at certain times with policies which were not very popular. I remember the days of 1939. The policy of the government, which had decided to participate in the war, was not well understood at that time, and there was some agitation. The late Ernest Lapointe and your humble servant went to the province of Quebec to explain the position of the government; to aid our fellow-countrymen in understanding the situation; and what did we get? We got the approval of the province of Quebec, in favour of Canada participating in the war. It was not an easy task, let me tell you, to argue with our fellow-countrymen in the province of Quebec at that time, but we did it. We did not shirk our responsibility; we did not turn away from the task. We faced the situation as we found it, and we argued with the people of Quebec, with a large amount of success. Since that time we have continued to do so, and there has been no trouble in my province, even though a certain number of my compatriots felt that they had been unfairly treated, that they had been insulted, that they were being called zombies by people who were irresponsible and who never had the courage to face the electorate in any section of Canada.

Let me say this, Mr. Speaker. We are accused of not having furnished as many soldiers as other sections of Canada. My answer to that statement is that the flow of blood on the battlefield is never measured by arithmetical calculations. That is not the way to appreciate the sacrifices of a section of the population of a country. In Montreal the other night I made a statement which I am going to repeat now, because I am not afraid to repeat here anything I say outside the house. We have done more than you English-speaking Canadians of British descent. You have only obeyed the call of blood. You have answered the sentiments of your heart and mind. What we have done could only be done through reasoning, and judging the situation as a judge would do when deciding a case presented to him. It is not a case of reasoning with you; it is a case of sentiment, and I understand you. For a moment, if you wish to understand me and the French Canadians, reverse the picture, if you please. Try to imagine Canada as part of a French empire, with the descendants of British citizens in the minority. Can you tell me that if that French empire, of which you would be part, were in danger you would be as enthusiastic in defending that empire as would be the Canadians of French descent? To any man who would say that he would have the same views and sentiments I would reply that he is not sincere.

Think of the position in which we are placed. Think of the concessions which the French Canadians and their representatives have been making to bring about and maintain unity in this great land of ours. I have no time to enumerate them all, but go over in your minds the concessions that were made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, by Ernest Lapointe and by myself, at the risk of losing support and, indeed, with the loss of support in certain quarters of my province. We are here in the House of Commons, all friends, and as members of a family capable of understanding the truth. Where are your concessions, you British Canadians, in favour of the French Canadians? What have you ever done to preserve unity between the two great races in Canada? Unity has been maintained owing to concessions made by French Canadians in this House of Commons and elsewhere. These are strong words, but they are the truth and no one can dispute them. The political history of our country is there to sustain my statement.

We are in a difficult situation, but it is no more difficult in the province of Quebec than in the province of British Columbia or in the province of Nova Scotia, where not very long ago, when soldiers were parading the streets of a city, a young girl called them zombies. One of them left the ranks and, with his rifle, broke the window from which that young girl was insulting the soldiers who were walking on the street. There is no more agitation in Quebec; there is less agitation in Quebec.

I know that for the last two of three days the newspapers have said that the troubles in British Columbia are attributable to a few French Canadians who form part of the units that are there. Where is the reasonable man on this earth; where is the reasonable man in this House of Commons, who will say that the handful of French Canadians would be capable of making a demonstration, unmolested, in five or six localities in British Columbia, if the soldiers who are there with them did not have the same views, and if the people watching them did not share their views to a large extent?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, no.

Mr. CARDIN: It would be impossible for a handful of French-Canadian soldiers to cause any trouble or create any difficulty in British Columbia if there had not been sympathizers among members of the majority in that province. The facts are there; you cannot deny them. When the first demonstration took place in Vernon the Canadian English newspapers said that over ninety per cent of the soldiers were of English descent.

There is no use in trying to evade the issue, and to throw the blame on us in the province of Quebec. That problem is largely political. And, Mr. Speaker, I have still ringing in my ears the speech of the man who has been doing a lot for the war effort of Canada, and without whom we would perhaps be in a worse position than we are at the present time. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is not the lowest man in this house; he is not the lowest man in the cabinet of the Prime Minister, and he said, even in the United States, that this agitation was mostly political. I say the word of that man deserves consideration. That man deserves respect.

I have the greatest respect in the world for Colonel Ralston. He is a man of his word, an honest and sincere man. That is what I have said in the province of Quebec. So I believe. I know him well enough to say that. But I am under the impression that, even in the face of the wonderful record of Colonel Ralston, the record of the Minister of Munitions and Supply is still more important, and that he has done even more to help the war effort of Canada. He said it was political agitation. In all sincerity, and without wishing to hurt the feelings of anyone, I must say that I am afraid this has now become a political issue on both sides. I regret having to say that.

One thing has been made clear during this debate, and that is that conscription is here. It has been here since 1942, no matter what may have been said in my province. It has been here and it has been applied since 1942 in connection with the Aleutian islands. Conscription is the law of the land. The Prime Minister has said so in his speech, and there is no denial of it. It is here to such an extent that, in making his motion for confidence, the Prime Minister said to members of the House of Commons: You are not voting for conscription; it is a thing of the past; this is not the question to-day; you are just voting to-day to express your opinion as to whom you think would be best qualified to carry from now on the war effort of Canada. That is a clear indication, if one requires one, that conscription has been with us since 1942. It has been with us not only in principle but in effect. And, as I have already said, it has been put into operation in connection with the Aleutian islands, and other places where our troops have been sent.

I cannot understand why, after five years of our admirable contribution to the war, a contribution which has caused countries throughout the world to compliment Canada and to express their surprise with respect to our achievement, it becomes necessary, practically at the end of the war, to propose conscription, a policy concerning which we had been hesitating and vacillating for so long.

A few days ago the distinguished Prime Minister of Great Britain spoke. His words were brought to us by the newspapers, and also by a gallant soldier from the other side, the hon. member for London (Mr. Johnston), who spoke the other day. Mr. Churchill said in the House of Commons in London that the character—not the war effort—that the character of the war effort of Canada was admirable. That is what he said. It was a compliment to our system of voluntarily waging war, and it was that system which caused the Prime Minister of England to say that the character of the war effort of Canada is admirable.

It is, in fact, admirable. Why should we now change our policy? Oh, we have heard many touching words about the soldiers on the other side. Mr. Speaker, the soldiers on the other side have gone there of their own free will, and in glory. They have not waited for conscription. They have gone there, prompted by a conviction that was in them. They have volunteered to help their country and to help the empire and—if we want to speak poetically—to help assure the freedom of the world. But, Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to think that those who have been gallant enough to hasten to the other side voluntarily are now changing their minds and asking that others be sent to help them, through coercion. That does not properly represent the feeling of the soldiers of Canada on the other side.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Shame.

Mr. CARDIN: No, no, my friend, that is not "shame".

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is just nonsense.

Mr. CARDIN: If it is "shame," my hon. friend should have addressed the same remark to the soldiers of South Africa, to the soldiers of Australia and to the soldiers of Northern Ireland.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: No.

Mr. CARDIN: That may be your view, but you cannot get away from the fact that there is no conscription or coercion there. May I say to my hon. friend from Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair): with your intelligence, with the brightness of your mind, with the great future that probably lies ahead of you because of the gifts with which Providence has endowed you, I am sure you will agree with me when I say that when standing in front of the monument of a volunteer hero one feels pride mounting to his heart, but when kneeling at the grave of a conscript a degree of sadness enters the soul.

Many of the men over there do not know what they are fighting for. Many of the people in the united nations do not know what they are fighting for. Fine words have been uttered, and compliments have been paid, but if you look at the bottom of things you will discover that most of the countries making up the allied nations are in the end—it may be a secondary consideration—looking after their own interests.

If I size up this situation correctly, it has been brought about, firstly, because of the necessity of reinforcements and, secondly, because of the agitation that has existed in Canada, which in the end penetrated into the cabinet. I do not know if these are his words as reported in Hansard, but if my hearing is correct I understood the Prime Minister to state that the word "necessary" had two meanings, one having to do with military needs and the other having to do with the inside situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Advisable" was the word.

Mr. CARDIN: It is said that the crisis facing us at the moment is due to two main causes: first, the necessity for reinforcements, and, second, the trouble existing in the country and the necessity of avoiding crisis No. 2. Crisis No. 2 is the threatened resignation of a certain number of ministers who share the views of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston). The hon. member for Prince indicated that himself in the speech he delivered yesterday. Is it not an extraordinary spectacle to hear a minister who has resigned say: I am going to vote for the government and against the amendment of the opposition in order to expedite the sending of soldiers to the other side, and in order not to lose any time in sending reinforcements across the ocean; but I am not entirely satisfied; I am going to keep my eye on the ball; I am going to watch the government in this connection, and I rely on those in the cabinet who share my views to see that that policy is put into effect without any slowing down?

Is that not a most extraordinary situation? A man resigns from the Cabinet, leaving behind him three or four men who share his views and who, if necessary, will extend the crisis in which we are at the present time. So extraordinary a situation has never before existed in Canada and I doubt if it will ever exist in the future. Speaking for myself and for many other Canadians, I say that this country is entitled to know who precipitated the crisis, who caused the change in policy of the government, who brought about the decision which was given to us on November 23.

We were called here to consider a policy of voluntary service which was to be explained to us by General McNaughton. I have not the time to refer to the tragedy we witnessed when General McNaughton was forced to explain and justify a policy of conscription when it had been announced the day before that he was going to explain and justify a policy of voluntary service. The day after we came here we had a policy of conscription; that is what was explained instead of a policy of voluntary service. General McNaughton had to explain the policy of coercion and conscription which the government had decided to put into effect. Who was responsible for that? Was it those whom the former minister of national defence left behind him to watch the fort after he had decided to get away from the situation? The public of Canada ought to know who those ministers are who share the same views as the hon. member for Prince and who were ready to resign from the government. We ought to know them. They ought to stand up and take their responsibility before this house and before the country.

It is said that an election is to be feared. An election was held in the United States, as was said this afternoon, and elections have been held elsewhere. An election was held here in 1917 and no one was killed. Laurier fought for his policy in 1917. He was defeated, but he accepted his defeat gracefully. He did not lose any prestige in Canada; he was even greater than he was before. His name is greater in Canadian history because he had the courage of his own convictions. The Prime Minister has quoted the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the late Ernest Lapointe in an effort to justify his attitude, in an effort to justify this policy of conscription. He should have quoted the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Lapointe in favour of the voluntary system and denouncing the very stand which two or three ministers have forced him to take and who threatened to resign if conscription were not put into effect.

Why are we in need of reinforcements? After the death of the late Norman Rogers, the Department of National Defence was divided into three departments, with a minister at the head of each. Those three departments competed for recruits for their particular services, and that is the cause of our trouble. We tried to do too much for a country of our size and population. As an hon. member from western Canada said the other day, probably we undertook too much. If that is the position, why not, like men, adopt a policy such as has been adopted by Australia and reduce the extent of our activities on the other side? Why should we try to compete in a race with Britain, the United States and Russia to win the laurels of victory, to try to win a crown of greatness, when in reality we are only a colony in the British empire, and are not, as I said when speaking on bill 80 in the House of Commons, really an independent and sovereign country? Why should we try to have a war effort which will be superior to the war effort of any other allied country participating in this war? There is no sense in that, Mr. Speaker. We have gone beyond our capacity. We have not enough material for the coat that we have been trying to put on the Canadian people. Let us be more generous to our own people; let us be more reasonable; let us act in accordance with what we can really do. Let us not be ashamed of doing what the Prime Minister of Australia did, when accompanied by his own general staff, he discussed with Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt and their respective staffs the possibility of reducing the numbers of Australia's armed forces in order to help the civilian and war industries of Australia. Why should we not take a similar attitude? That would have been the manly attitude, instead of following the impractical policy we are attempting to put into effect.

Something has been said about an election. Why bring up that issue at this time? Well, Mr. Speaker, can any member of this house be unaware of the fact that the government has been preparing for an election for the last six months and that all the documentary procedure necessary for an election is already in the hands of the returning officers? Even the ballots are there, ready to have the names of the candidates printed on them. The Liberal organization in Ottawa has been restaffed, and a man from the province of Quebec has been brought in from the eastern townships to prepare French-Canadian literature to be distributed in the province of Quebec. I have received a certain amount of that literature, preparing an appeal to the electorate. Why should we be afraid of an election? The sooner we have one, the sooner the clouded atmosphere in which we are now living and have been living for the past five weeks or more will disappear and the sooner we shall be able to follow a policy that will be in the best interests of Canada as well as in the best interests of the allied nations. I am not afraid of an election, whatever opposition may be reserved for me, whatever opposition I may meet from men coming from the party with which I have been for so long closely associated. I have not ceased to be a Liberal, but I contend that my party, alas, has been moving toward the other side, towards the imperial and Tory spirit.

My time is running short, Mr. Speaker, and there are many other things I had in mind to speak of, but I want to observe your ruling and show that I am an obedient servant of Your Honour.

Let me in conclusion say just a word about my friend and former colleague, the former Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and I am sure that he will pardon me for this reference. I listened to his address with very great attention. Without moving from my chair, throughout the whole length of his speech I followed it as best I could with my limited knowledge and understanding of the English language. He made a good speech, possibly not as good as the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) suggested this afternoon, but on the whole it was a very good speech. At least it was the speech of a very sincere and trustworthy man, a man who, whatever his opinions may be, deserves the respect and the confidence of every member of this house, and I will be the first one to pay him that compliment. But when the Prime Minister raised the point that probably he, (Col. Ralston), had been a little slow in bringing before the Prime Minister and the cabinet the gravity of the situation I thought that part of my friend's speech was a bit weak. He did not bring forward anything very definite to show that he had long before informed the Prime Minister of the crisis that was looming up on the horizon. He said that he did not want to disband the draftees. Well, he said that when I was a member of the government in 1942, when there was no request for conscription from the military authorities. All that he has brought to the house, except for the statement made on his return on October 18, are things that he has been saying since 1942, and there was nothing definite about them, nothing to justify the Prime Minister in thinking that there was a real danger threatening as a result of not having the necessary reserves for the reinforcement pools on the other side. I repeat that my good friend was a little bit weak in that part of his speech. Perhaps he can justify himself, in saying that his officers were not any more pressing in their demands. In my humble judgment that is the situation; he was not very strong in his argument in answering the Prime Minister on that point.

I want you, Mr. Speaker, to allow me just a moment or two more, and I am most appreciative of the kindness of hon. members in sitting and listening to me. I am not probably in age the oldest member of this House of Commons, but I am the only one who has been sitting continuously in this house for over thirty-three years. Let me say that I am older than the Prime Minister from the point of view of continuous sitting in this House of Commons. I have the profound satisfaction of having done everything I could to discharge the duties of my office, and to be honest with my fellow Canadians, to be frank with my people. And now, in the evening of my life, we have reached a time of crisis in Canada, the consequences of which I can very readily foresee. I have never taken offence when any man opposed his views strongly against mine. I have never taken offence when members of the House of Commons objected strongly to my views. We cannot always be of the same mind; we cannot always be of the same opinion; we cannot always entertain the same sentiments and feelings in our hearts and minds. Being human beings, we are bound to have differences among ourselves. But the best thing to do is to try to reconcile as much as is humanly possible the conflicting opinions that we hold and to try to unite in this country, and bring together as much, as is humanly possible, the different elements composing the population of Canada.

There are not only English-speaking and French-speaking people in this country. People of other races form part of the population and they have become good citizens of Canada and are ready to express real Canadian views. In the evening of my life, from the point of view of age and of parliamentary service, let me through you, Mr. Speaker, and from my place in the House of Commons, address just a word to the citizens of the province of Quebec and ask them, whatever may be their sentiments, whatever may be their feelings at the present time, to be calm, to take things easy, to reflect before acting, and to remember that they are not only citizens of the province of Quebec but at the same time citizens of Canada as a whole, who desire to see their country in the not distant future, and with the will of all concerned, become a great and independent country.

They are as much interested as I am, as much interested as others are in the future of our great land, and they should do all they can to help to build up, on the foundation of confederation, a great and prosperous country which, with the help of God and the concerted effort of those who are in authority, before long will be a country of which we shall be proud and in which we shall have great honour.

I ask my fellow-Canadians in the province of Quebec to be firm. They have a right to be firm. I ask them to be energetic. They have a right to be energetic, and nobody can deprive them of the freedom of speech, of the freedom of expression of their own opinions, even if they do not agree with the majority of the citizens of Canada. But they ought to express those opinions in all sincerity and in all honesty and be careful not to hurt too much the feelings of the majority of the citizens of this country. I know, from my long experience in parliament, that the people of the province of Quebec, the French Canadians, have many friends among the English-speaking population of Canada. They have many friends in all the provinces from one ocean to the other, who on many occasions have expressed that friendship, and their understanding of our situation, of our state of mind, of our mentality, of our point of view. I say to my French-Canadian compatriots: Be careful my friends, my brothers; be careful not to lose the advantage of the friendship which we now enjoy to a greater extent than ever before in the English speaking provinces of Canada. Let us speak openly; let us respect the opinions of others, but let us be careful not to cause any damage to property, not to injure the life of anyone. Let us await in calm and patience the hour when we shall be in a position to express as Canadians and as electors our opinion of what has been done to-day and what may be done to-morrow.

Having these sentiments in mind, I hope, with all the sincerity I am capable of, and pray from the bottom of my heart, that a guiding light will appear upon the horizon of our country, to rise high in our sky and that under such a sign of salvation, men of good will may get together, dispense with the military caste, which is a source of trouble, and reach a brotherly understanding between Canadians of all races and creeds in making Canada a great and glorious country. That guiding light, I also pray, will help us to think of Canada first and always, before thinking of any other country, however great that country may be.

In the present crisis, which is causing so much trouble in the world, if you put aside the brilliant rhetoric of the leaders of the great allied nations, you will find back of their literary utterances, behind all their fine words, and more particularly at all the conventions that are taking place at present to deal with the aftermath of the war, the clearly expressed desire to promote the interests of their respective countries. Those great leaders and their followers are thinking of their respective countries first and are doing what is best, each in the interests of his own country. Let us imitate them and think of our country first of all and of the welfare and greatness of our beloved land.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, after having read to the house the order in council "directing" the Minister of National Defence to send to the various theeatres of war in Europe and the Mediterranian, 16,000 recruits already trained under the Mobilization Act, 1940, for the defence of Canada, requests parliament to support him by a vote of approval and confidence.

To enjoy the confidence of someone, one must deserve it. Could it be claimed that the government who do not fulfil their undertakings, who violate their most solemn pledges, deserve a measure of confidence? Surely not, and I shall quote the testimony of the Prime Minister himself in this connection.

On January 26, 1942, he stated, as reported in Hansard:

> The present unhappy state of the world is, in large part, the result of broken pledges. Nazi Germany has erected bad faith and the broken pledge into a principle of action.

And, on April 8, 1942, he added in a radio speech:

> It is the trust reposed by the people in the given word of the government that has maintained national unity.

In the Prime Minister's own terms, the present unhappy state of the world is the result of broken pledges.

Let us briefly review the pledges taken. I shall quote brief excerpts from speeches delivered in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister, in which he repeats his pledges concerning conscription for overseas service. Here is what he said on February 25, 1942:

> When the war came in Europe and this parliament met to decide whether Canada would enter the war or not, a declaration was made by the government of the day that, if Canada did enter the war, there would not be compulsory service for overseas, but that service for overseas would be by voluntary enlistment. . . . No more solemn undertaking could possibly have been given by the people. . . .

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I cannot hear the hon. gentleman because of the noise in the chamber.

Mr. RAYMOND: And, on June 18, 1940:

> Once again I wish to repeat my undertaking, frequently given, that no measure for the conscription of men for overseas service will be introduced by the present administration.

On January 26, 1942, he recapitulated his pledges as follows:

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I ask hon. members to keep silence if possible, particularly those behind the curtain, because it is impossible to hear what the hon. member is saying at the present time.

Mr. RAYMOND:

> My colleagues and I . . . have made it equally clear that service outside Canada in the armed forces of Canada at sea, on land and in the air . . . shall be freely undertaken.
> Before war came, the government gave a solemn pledge that in the event of war, we would follow that policy.
> When the war came the pledge was solemnly reaffirmed. At the general elections during the war itself, that policy received the overwhelming approval of the people of Canada.

In the light of these statements, these pledges and these undertakings, is it possible to give the government a sincere vote of confidence which would constitute an endorsation of the order in council implementing conscription for overseas service? For my part, it would be breaking faith with my constituents.

The Prime Minister claims that he has been relieved of his pledges by the plebiscite. I have already proved to this house that such was not the case, and I have based my contention on quotations, some in particular from Mr. Lapointe's speeches. They represented a pact for the duration of the war, the fulfilment of which he could be relieved by the anti-conscriptionists alone. However, his claim is disproved by his own words since, on Monday last, he stated again that the plebiscite did not refer to conscription.

In that event, how could he be relieved, by the plebiscite, of his undertakings concerning conscription? He has no mandate to impose conscription; on the contrary, the elections of 1940 from which his mandate originates, directs him to avoid conscription.

The plebiscite has provided additional evidence of the small measure of confidence that may be given to the Prime Minister's statements.

During the plebiscite campaign, he formally stated over the radio on April 24, 1942, that the plebiscite did not refer to conscription, and he added:

> Surely you cannot allow parades of young men carrying banners and shouting "Down with conscription" to weigh on your decision, when this question is not even involved.

However, a few days after the vote, he introduced bill No. 80, implying conscription for overseas service, stating that it was a logical sequence to the plebiscite vote.

Sometimes he says yes, sometimes he says no, according to the needs of the moment, and he requests our confidence. Thus the public are being deceived by actions which are contrary to previous statements.

A review of the developments which have taken place in recent years shows how we have been misled. Before the outbreak of the war, our self-governing status was loudly proclaimed and the Prime Minister did not scruple to say that we had nothing to do with foreign wars. But in 1938 war clouds were gathering in Europe and we learned long afterwards, in a speech delivered by the Prime Minister at Prince Albert, in 1941, that if England had gone to war he would have favoured our entry into the struggle. This is a peculiar sort of self government. We go to war when England goes to war; when she refrains, we also refrain.

Last May, 1944, the Prime Minister said before the British parliament in London that "we had entered the war of our own free will and not as the result of a formal obligation." But on September 1, 1939, two days before England declared war, the Prime Minister stated that in the event Great Britain went to war to fight aggression, the government had already decided to request parliament for authority to cooperate closely with Great Britain. We are free, declared the Prime Minister, but each time England decides to go to war, we go to war. A peculiar freedom.

In other words, the Prime Minister endorses the principle of self government in his statements and imperialistic tendencies in his acts.

During the special session of September, 1939, when I opposed participation in the war, I said: "If we approve participation, it will lead us to conscription, if the war lasts long enough." Mr. Lapointe replied that those who, notwithstanding his statements against conscription, claimed that conscription would be passed, sowed the seed of disunity. Unfortunately, my predictions have materialized. Conscription is in our statutes and it is being implemented.

The government proceeded step by step, ending up with this order in council. According to the statements made by members of the government during the general election of 1940, our participation was to be moderate, but it has now become an all-out affair.

The mobilization act, passed in June 1940, which was intended specifically for the defence of Canada in Canada only, has become, following the passage of bill 80, a conscription measure for overseas service and it has been used to blackmail and intimidate N.R.M.A. men into enlisting for overseas service.

Although they had been trained for the defence of Canada within Canada, the N.R.M.A. men, or should I say the conscripts, found themselves overnight, following the passage of bill 80 in 1942, subject to overseas service. However, in governmental circles, it was still claimed that we were operating under the voluntary system. Some voluntary system! It was conscription camouflaged in various ways such as the unfair persecutions of men who refused to volunteer for overseas service, as it was frequently proved to this house. But the Minister of National Defence replied that he did not intend to interfere with the methods of recruiting for overseas service. Moreover, he was forced to admit that called-up men were meant to be used as reinforcements overseas.

As recently as November 8 last, in a broadcast, the Prime Minister, after stating "that he was now sure that there was no longer any need for men for home defence" added: "We shall continue to call up young men as soon as they have reached military age, for training and compulsory service." However, the members of the government were still repeating that the voluntary system was in force.

Why, therefore, draft these men who are not needed for home defence unless it be exclusively for overseas service? If they had wanted to enlist voluntarily, they need not have been conscripted.

I thought that quibbling would at last be abandoned after the passing of the order in council of November 23 ordering the dispatch overseas of 16,000 men drafted under the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940. But no, the Minister of Justice in a statement to the press again resorts to quibbling. "The order in council," he said, "authorizes the dispatch to Europe of 16,000 men drafted under the N.R.M. Act if a sufficient number of volunteers, from among those draftees or from elsewhere, should there remain any elsewhere, who are well enough trained do not come forward in time to be included in the new detachments about to leave". Such a statement is liable to mislead the public.

In the first place, the order in council not only authorizes but orders, let no one forget it, the dispatch of 16,000 men drafted under the N.R.M. Act. It is not stated therein "if a sufficient number of volunteers do not come forward"; the word "if" is not used, it is purely and simply an order to dispatch them overseas. Moreover, those 16,000 men are recruited among draftees. There cannot be any talk about volunteers. According to the Oxford dictionary, a volunteer is "a person who voluntarily enters military service". Now, all those who have been called for training under the N.R.M. Act of 1940 are conscripts.

The impression is given that they will be asked, before they leave, to sign as volunteers. What a joke! They are already conscripted for overseas service. The order to dispatch them has been issued.

It is just as if, before the execution of a man sentenced to die, one asked him if he were willing to put the rope around his own neck.

I beg the government to be frank enough to call a spade a spade. They have labelled the conscription measure a mobilization act. Conscripts have been termed recruits, and conscription is now being described as conditional voluntary service.

Let us put an end to this quibbling and dodging, if we would not have the people lose all trust in public men.

The Prime Minister spoke of a cabinet crisis. Another will develop, one far more baneful to the country, the confidence crisis which the Prime Minister has been nursing along these past few years through his deceitful attitudes, at one time equivocal, at another time inconsistent. In a speech I made on June 18th, 1942, I warned the government against such a crisis, which was already being felt. It has been intensified and the action taken by the government in passing the order in council of November 23rd but adds fuel to the fire.

Why should conscription be applied more strictly by the direct method now in use? Is it to increase a war effort which has already reached exaggerated proportions? Anyone computing our contribution can assert that our war effort, in terms of our population and resources, surpasses that of any of our allies. So the Prime Minister has stated over and over again with great pride. In financial sacrifices, we are second to none, as I have indicated to the house by means of comparative tables which have never been disproved. Besides, they were based on official figures.

Alone among British dominions, alone among the allies, we have presented England with billion dollar gifts. Yet, we have no material interests to defend in the war.

The losses we have sustained in manpower, in terms of our population, are no less than those of any of our allies. Still we pay the price for the mistakes of others who brought about the war. Our soldiers have been sent to every battlefield—they have been at Hong-Kong, at Dieppe, in Africa, in Italy, in India, et cetera—in short, wherever a battle has been fought, and yet it is not considered enough.

If we must resort to conscription to supply the army with reinforcements, it means that too much is asked of Canadian troops. A country with a population of eleven and a half million cannot play the part of world policeman. It is high time we realized this and limited our front-line activity rather than consider conscription. Strange to see, the government resorts to this measure at a time when the other British dominions who have a greater stake in this war than our own not only have refrained from resorting to conscription for overseas service but have decided to reduce the strength of their armed forces.

No reason was overlooked in order to justify our participation in this war on an exaggerated scale; the loftiest of humanitarian motives were appealed to; we were told that we were defending freedom, civilization, small nations, et cetera, et cetera—

The facts speak for themselves.

We declared war against Germany because England had done so, and because Poland had been invaded. However, barely a fortnight later, we witnessed unmoved the invasion of that country by Russia. Three months later, on November 30, 1939, we witnessed the dastardly attack against Finland by Russia. Later on, in June, 1940, the Baltic states, Lithuania, Latvia and Esthonia, were in turn invaded by Russia, despite a pact of mutual assistance dated October 10, 1939, between the U.S.S.R. and these Baltic states. About the same time, Russia annexed Bessarabia which she had taken away from Rumania. Those are facts.

In conclusion, Germany invades Poland and we go to war against her. Russia violates the boundaries of six countries, including Poland, but instead of fighting her, we welcome her as an ally and extend our help to her. That is another inconsistency which gives us grounds to question the alleged motives of our participation in the present war, and which is not calculated to enhance confidence in public men.

The latest action of the government will increase the disunion which already exists. A nation has the right to compel its citizens to fight for its defence but not for the defence of other countries, especially when that nation has already accomplished a war effort of such magnitude.

Confederation was based on two fundamental principles: provincial autonomy and respect for the rights of minorities, and from a national standpoint, autonomy of Canada with regard to England.

Who are those who threaten national unity? They are the people who think as imperialists rather than as Canadians. I do not hesitate to say that in Canada there is but one way of fostering national unity, and it is to act as Canadians. Before closing, I wish to voice a thought which I have already expressed in this house.

Canadians of French extraction are first of all Canadians; they are devoted to their country, Canada, and they want to develop it in harmony and peace with Canadians of other racial origin. They do not like war but, as history shows, they do not fear it when their territory has to be defended. They object, however, to being compelled to defend other people's territory by bringing ruin on themselves.

Too often has the Prime Minister resorted to the argument in favour of national unity, to find justification now in asking for a vote of confidence on a policy most likely to destroy that unity.

Mr. W. E. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, it was not originally my intention to take part in this debate, but some remarks made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and by the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell) have caused me to change my mind.

Before proceeding further, however, I should like to pay my compliments to the hon. member for London (Mr. Johnston) upon his maiden effort yesterday. It is a measure of his service to Canada that, having been a member of the House of Commons for four and a half years, this has been his first opportunity to address the house. I for one believe that his effort was one of such distinction as to equal his war record.

May I also make a few remarks respecting the address to-night of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). All of us envy his manifest talents, and we know that those talents have been and will be used in his own province to uphold the honour and dignity of the House of Commons. But there is one thing I should like to say, something which affects me rather closely.

The hon. member did say—and I regret it, and with respect must disagree—that soldiers overseas as a whole do not or may not understand what they are fighting for. There are many things I am not sure of in this world; but there is one thing of which I am sure, and that is that there are not any soldiers overseas who do not understand what they are fighting for.

When the order in council was passed and made public last week I had thought there would not be much debate, because the leader of the opposition had appealed to us to eliminate politics. The order in council so firmly and clearly carried out the policy of the government, as I have known it for the past two years, that I therefore considered there would not be much difficulty. To the contrary, however, we now have an amendment, in these words:

> This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice.

This amendment divides itself into three parts, and I believe it is an attempt to combine two ideas, so as to becloud both of them.

It says, first of all, that we have failed to provide trained and adequate reinforcements by requiring certain actions in respect of N.R.M.A. personnel. It is true that the order in council does not require certain services of N.R.M.A. personnel, but it is not true to say that this government has not provided adequate and trained reinforcements.

On that point I should like to digress, and give my own experiences overseas as an illustration. In England there is a reinforcement unit for all arms of the service. I speak particularly of the Canadian Armoured Corps. Many months ago, before we went into action, the reinforcement unit would have only a few men in it; officers and men would come to me and say, "The reinforcement unit is empty; why do we not have conscription?" I would counsel patience and very shortly another ship would come from Canada, with the result that the reinforcement unit would be filled. As the recruits received their additional training and went forward to the field units, the reinforcement unit would become depleted and we would have the same scene reenacted by the same officers and the same men. There would be the same gloomy outlook and then another ship would arrive to fill the reinforcement unit. No matter how often that happened, they just could not believe that it would happen again next month.

To some extent that is the situation which I have found in this house on the two or three occasions that I have been here. It seems that the opposition and a section of the press have created at regular intervals a thought in the minds of some of the public that all was lost, that the future was black and that nothing would do but that this government, powerful though it may be, should give way to another government of an indefinite and, may I say, dubious origin. When these so-called crises are over, I often wonder what they were all about. This government, aided by the united efforts of the Canadian people, has gone forward in its own way and produced a war effort second to none in the world. Perhaps the opposition members are a bit like my friends overseas, they just will not believe the evidence of their own senses.

However, there is a significant difference between this amendment to our motion and amendments moved in the past, as referred to yesterday by the hon. member for London (Mr. Johnston). As he said, those amendments provided for national selective service which could mean different things to different men. This amendment makes no reference to that subject; it speaks only of N.R.M.A. personnel. I am wondering if national selective service has been thrown overboard by the official opposition as they have so many times thrown overboard other platforms, programmes and leaders.

There is another feature of the amendment about which I should like to speak, namely, the reference to the government failing to assure equality of service and sacrifice. I must apologize if I have not heard my hon. friends' explanations in bygone times as to just what that phrase means, but my own experience has been that there is no system which will provide for equality of sacrifice. The best of us is always the most daring; the best will always go forward recklessly. He will take additional risks for the sake of his comrades and nothing will make him act any differently.

Reference is made also to equality of service. For many reasons that may sound good, but I do not know of any system which will provide for equality of service. Service is best given by the man who wishes to give it, and any job is best done by the man who wants to do that job. I am not suggesting that the N.R.M.A. personnel would not make good soldiers; they will; but I repeat that we want initiative; we want enterprise; we want every man doing the job that his heart and soul is in.

Reference is made also to adequate and trained reinforcements. During the past few days I have heard the Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, say that 16,000 draftees are all that he requires for the present emergency. The hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) will correct me if I am wrong when I say that he recommended some 15,000 men a short while ago. When both those gentlemen are in substantial agreement I am prepared to reject the amendment which says that we have not provided trained and adequate reinforcements. I hope the house will forgive me for referring to something I said about two years ago about the present Minister of National Defence and the former Minister of National Defence. I was speaking about the Canadian army and its probable use in the future and I said:

> It will be led by young officers who, with their troops, have been trained for that day by one of the greatest soldiers of the British empire. More than that our army had been planned and equipped by one of the ministers of this government who knows what an army ought to be and has created it accordingly.

I am glad that both these gentlemen have given the house and the country the benefit of their wisdom and experience. I do not know of any other two men who are held in such high regard with respect to the planning and use of the Canadian Army. As I say, when they are in substantial agreement I feel completely safe in adopting their opinion.

I should like to say something about reinforcements as I understood them overseas. We in the armoured corps never had any difficulty about reinforcements. In Normandy trained reinforcements in sufficient numbers were available at all times and in all places. I understand that since July 25—prior to that I can speak from personal knowledge—there has been no shortage, nor has there been any shortage anywhere except with respect to infantry. That shortage does not exist to-day, but it is said it will exist in the immediate future and for that reason this government has met the emergency, I believe, to the satisfaction of this country.

I have heard it said many times in the past that with one good battle there would not be reinforcements enough for the Canadian Army.

We fought a good many battles; the Canadian Army stood up to its losses; they beat the Germans and they will continue to do so.

I should like to speak for a moment about the most persistent campaign which has been waged with respect to trained personnel or, in the words of the people I refer to, untrained personnel, that have been sent abroad. This campaign has been directed to the next-of-kin of our soldiers, the intention being to discredit this government by saying that soldiers now fighting in the Canadian Army have not had a fair chance, were not sufficiently trained for the occasion.

I do not know of a commander in the Canadian Army who would take the responsibility of sending untrained men into battle. Every reinforcement unit commander is personally responsible for seeing that every man who leaves the unit has been adequately trained. This campaign of misrepresentation is to my mind explained to some extent by the attitude which was displayed in this house last week by the official opposition. They came here on Wednesday, and the look on their faces plainly showed that they meant and expected to enjoy this session of parliament. The look on their faces belied entirely the expressed desire of their leader that they should eschew politics. With an expressed desire that there be no politics, that the sole purpose was to provide reinforcements for the men overseas, one would have thought that under those circumstances they would have applauded the announcement that this government was going to send reinforcements. But instead, the announcement in this house was received by them in silence. I think one hon. member said something about surrender.

May I refer for a moment to the campaign which was waged at least in the province of Ontario, attempting to show that the home defence army was a problem that pertained almost exclusively to the province of Quebec. Surely the publication of the figures that 15,000 of the home defence army are from Ontario and 22,000 from Quebec shows clearly that it is not exclusively a Quebec problem. There was one feature of this campaign that was particularly discreditable. In the province of Quebec there are many wives, mothers and sweethearts who are daily awaiting mail from their loved ones abroad just as eagerly as those in the other provinces, and just as anxiously fearing a telegram from national defence headquarters. I had the honour to serve in Normandy alongside French-Canadian units, and I want to tell the house that they served just as courageously, just as stubbornly and just as effectively as we did. I would have thought that when I got back to this country Canadians would have been showing publicly our respect and admiration for the French Canadians, but on the contrary, I found a campaign being conducted which could only add to the burdens of their next-of-kin in the province of Quebec by deriding that province for the very considerable effort it has made in the Canadian armed forces.

With respect to the voluntary system of enlistments, I was astonished at the suggestion that this government had made a change of face. I never doubted at any time that the first and foremost intention of this government was to reinforce our army whenever reinforcements were necessary, and this is the first time since the war began that any responsible person has suggested that we needed to use any other method of obtaining reinforcements than the voluntary system. This government has provided reinforcements by a different method with a minimum of delay. It is true that the Prime Minister did everything he could to make the voluntary system work, and I doubt if we can hold that against him. I for one do not. It is also my opinion that we should not hold against him the fact that we are at present dispatching only 16,000 draftees overseas, because that is all that are required in the present emergency.

Something has been said in the house as to the necessity of equality of conditions. Personally I favour the voluntary system and want it encouraged and continued. I understand that as a result of the efforts of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) some 500 French-Canadian draftees have enlisted for active service. All I can say in my own riding is that if the province of Ontario will do likewise we shall have a very good army. I understand also that whereas three weeks ago our weekly enlistments from the home defence army were at the rate of 170 they have now reached over 800, and I hope that keeps up. I would much prefer, and I know that the men overseas would much prefer, that every soldier reaching France and Italy would come as a volunteer, and I would not agree to any system which would take away from the present draftee or young man reaching military age the right to volunteer to serve this country.

The leader of the C.C.F. group suggested in his remarks that we had three or four armies. I am sorry, but I cannot understand that. It seems to me that there are but two. First, we have the general service men who are liable to serve in any theatre of war anywhere. Second, we have all the N.R.M.A. men, who are liable for service in Canada and in the European theatres of war. In Canada there are something like 60,000 draftees and a number of thousands of general service men. Among the general service men there are a good many who, because of their age or medical category or ability, are not fit for the front line. Let us be realistic and not send them. There is no use in depriving these men of the amenities of home by sending them abroad, because they would only add to the burden of maintaining our army overseas, which in my opinion should consist of the largest number of fighting personnel and the smallest number of administrative personnel consonant with efficiency. Similarly among the 60,000 draftees there will be a good many who for the same reasons cannot at any time be sent to the front line. For that reason the order in council, as I understand it, provided that the Minister of National Defence should have the right of selection, and I know his first choice will be to send abroad the best trained and the best fitted men to fight in the front line.

To come to the main motion before the house, it is, as defined by the Prime Minister, a vote of confidence that he is asking, based solely on a vigorous war programme. He has expressly limited the motion to that interpretation. In so doing I think he has done less than justice to himself. He has deprived himself of a very considerable advantage by excluding a vote of the great confidence which this house enjoys in his known ability, in his advanced social programme and the extensive and generous treatment that he is giving to wounded and discharged servicemen. But those considerations having been excluded there remains but one question before us: Has this government met the wishes of the Canadian people in the past and in this present emergency in such a way as to be acceptable to them? I defy any member of the opposition to say that any other government could have done better than this government has done in the past four-and-a-half or five years. I will go farther and say that in no other democratic country engaged in this war has any government received so little substantial criticism as has this government. It must be obvious, from what has been said in this house to-night and from the antagonisms which have been arising in the country during the past two or three weeks, that no party could carry on government in this country unless it were truly representative of all sections of our people; and, Mr. Speaker, I say that there is no government which has done so much as this one in the past and is doing so much at present to represent all sections of this country and to smooth the way between the two great racial groups in Canada, to provide an adequate social programme for the future, and to compose the economic differences between our different groups. For that reason it seems to me it would be fatal to assume that any other government could carry on at this time. This government and this government alone is capable of keeping the Canadian people united behind a maximum and effective war effort, and that to me is the deciding factor to-night. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote against all the amendments and for the main motion.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): First of all I wish to pay my respects to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I understand that he has been at the front and has been wounded. But the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) has without a doubt tried his very best to befuddle the issue that is before the house at the present time. He has absolutely befuddled the issue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You can laugh as much as you like, you on the government benches—

An hon. MEMBER: Do not get excited.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I am not getting excited, but what did the hon. gentleman say? He said there were plenty of reinforcements overseas, but he was speaking only of the armoured units. That is all he was speaking about; that is all he said. That is all he knew about; that is the only unit he was in. But that is not the issue at stake to-day. What we are here for in this sitting is to try to get infantry reinforcements for our boys overseas as quickly as possible. They should have been there two or three months ago, and a returned man rises in his place and says we have plenty of reinforcements. He mentioned the fact that the former Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) asked for only 15,000 men. Let the hon. member not go out of the chamber; I want to tell him where he is wrong. Fifteen thousand men; that is all the former minister asked for. Yes; but he asked for those immediately, and he is surprised that they have not already been sent overseas. But the hon. gentleman mentions 16,000 men who are in this order in council and, as we were told in the house, the 16,000 men are supposed to last until May of next year.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes; that is true. Sixteen thousand; that is what the order in council said; that is what you were told right here on the floor of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Address the Chair.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You come out of your tunnel and you will be all right. All you have done is sit in your chair throughout this session and last session and make a noise. The hon. member said there were plenty of reserves overseas. Well, we had General McNaughton on this floor and he said there were not plenty of reserves overseas for our forces. We had the former minister of national defence on the floor and he said there were not enough infantry reinforcements there. You had your own Prime Minister say the same thing, and he is right at your shoulder now. Yet you belie his own words; you absolutely belie his words.

Mr. GARDINER: You missed part of the speech; he said the same thing.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The Minister of Agriculture can get up and make a speech afterwards. The hon. member also mentioned the faces of the opposition when he came into the house; he said there were smiles on those faces. Well, there were smiles on those faces and I will tell you why. Members of the opposition have been very much concerned over the condition of things as they are overseas and have been doing their very best to try to cover up their feelings, and I do not think any member of this house has any right to rise in his place and try to belittle a person because once in a while there is a smile on his face. The hon. member also took exception to the fact that the opposition said there were two armies. There are two armies and there always will be as long as this government is in power. The order in council takes just 16,000 of the 68,000 or 70,000 of the N.R.M.A., and it still leaves two armies. Some people say there are four armies, but I will not go into that at the present time.

The hon. member also praises the present government. He said that no government could have done better in the war effort than this one. All I can say to him is that no government could have done worse. I can say this, however, and I will say it in all fairness to the people of Canada. Canada has done wonderfully well in this war—not the government; the government has not done it. In spite of the government Canada has done a good job.

In 1942 we were told that if this government ever had a change of heart in regard to the sending of men overseas parliament would be called together and there would be a vote and no debate. We were called together, and the first thing we had was a speech by the Prime Minister, a speech that will go down in history—

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You say, "hear, hear". Yes; it will go down in history as the swan song of the Liberal government. It was a speech which the boys overseas will wonder at, a speech which the boys in the fighting fronts will wonder at. I will not say they are wondering what they are fighting for, but they will wonder what kind of government we have here at home. That speech must have been a humdinger. I heard it and it was like the speech of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce, a rather befuddling speech. The Prime Minister, through the wartime information board, had 87,000 copies printed, and an official of the board said that the speech was regarded as factual and non-political, making public a considerable number of facts and figures which had not been known. The former Minister of National Defence certainly showed that it was not factual, that the whole set-up of the Prime Minister was absolutely out of line and not just according to the facts.

I wonder what the director of salvage would say to the Prime Minister of the country for issuing 87,000 of these booklets. I have one of them here. They were sent out to schools and to different organizations. Now, the salvage organization pleads with the people to save paper because it is needed for shells and bombs, but the Prime Minister does not practise what his different organizations try to preach.

With reference to reserves overseas, I am going to read an extract from a letter, not written this year but dated December, 1943. The hon. member over there said that all troops were sent over thoroughly trained.

Mr. MITCHELL: Did you say 1917?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No; 1943.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was wondering where you were in 1917.

An hon. MEMBER: He was not even a zombie.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No, I was not a zombie in 1917. This is from a major of the Canadian army now invalided home:

The class of men we get as reinforcements are pitiable. Some of them have been in our branch of the service for three years and we have to teach them gun drill in the front line. The system of training over there must be all wrong, or the people responsible slacking on their job or lamentably ignorant of what a soldier should know. It is rather unfair to expect us to train them here under fire; certainly unfair to the men, and they are a good type of men, too.

Then he goes on:

We have had a terrible struggle to capture Ortona, in my opinion the toughest the Canadians have ever experienced.

That man has been invalided home and will never be able to walk again.

The speech of the former Minister of National Defence showed exactly what kind of man the Prime Minister is. When the Prime Minister heard that the fathers, mothers, widows, wives and children of the men fighting overseas were demanding that help be sent to their sons, husbands, fathers and friends, then and then only did he have a right-about-face, and he had that only when his members told him that they would not have one chance in the world of ever getting elected unless he did have a right-about-face. A chameleon changes colour to correspond with his surroundings; the Prime Minister of Canada changes his face. The Prime Minister watches to see the way the wind is blowing and then he tries to blow the easiest way.

We must have support for our men overseas and we must have it at once. The powers-that-be seem to have a different idea about sending the N.R.M.A. men overseas. I shall not go into the order in council because I have not the time, but we need the men at once to support our troops overseas. There are men over there who have been in hospital not three times but many times. There are men listed on the casualty lists as being wounded and in hospital who, when the lists have been checked, have never been wounded at all. They have been put in hospital because they were absolutely exhausted. I know of one man who was marked down as wounded, but he was in hospital from sheer exhaustion because he went through eleven days and nights without sleep and proper food. They had two days' food for eleven days. They were going so fast they could not be caught up with. That was the time they needed reserves.

There is no reason under the sun why we should fool ourselves in thinking that this war will be over soon. We have to remember that our men and our allies are getting into German territory, and the closer they get to that territory and the farther they get into it the harder the Germans are going to fight. They know that at this time there will be no armistice; it will be unconditional surrender and you can rest assured that the Germans will fight to the very last ditch. Our infantrymen are fighting at the present time without any rest or let-up. Just the other day I obtained this casualty list which I hold in my hand, and on it I read the names of two Peterborough boys, one Roy Moore, 43 Frank street, Peterborough, and the other his brother, Edward Moore, at the same address. That is a common occurrence in casualty lists to-day. We find one, two, three or more boys of a family wounded and perhaps two or more wiped out. I have kept track of the casualties in the Peterborough area. I have a book here giving the names in alphabetical order. The pages of that book have been practically filled since June; some of the men are wounded, some missing and some killed, and some seriously wounded. When you see a casualty list like that it is all the more reason why we should get support for these men who are fighting for us.

I have here an extract from a letter of an intelligence officer. I have the letter on my desk upstairs. I shall read only part of it, as follows:

If the people only knew how true Connie Smythe's charges were I'm inclined to think that the pot would soon boil over.

I may say right here that the pot has boiled over.

The section that I am with covers the reinforcement units, and having covered that area for more than a year now, I am in a position to know something about what Smythe was talking about. And you can imagine the effect it is having on the boys, knowing they are playing politics back home and the situation so critical here.

By that he meant the King government. The men overseas are doing a wonderful job. One reason why I am very much interested in seeing that support is sent over is that I have here a list of the men in the Canadian army overseas from Peterborough city only. The list covers thirty-three pages up to January of last year of men from Peterborough only, not counting the county. Canada has an obligation to these boys. Some of them are dead, passed to the great beyond, having sacrificed all for their country. We have an obligation to all the boys overseas and to their wives, children, fathers, mothers and relatives. We cannot let them down.

I have received letters and telephone calls saying that the Prime Minister, in not wishing to support our boys overseas, must have a very cold heart. I will not say he is cold-blooded, and I shall tell you why. Last summer when the temperature was running around 98, 100 and 105 degrees in the House of Commons chamber the Prime Minister came into this house on one occasion, wearing a tweed suit and vest, when every hon. member was fanning himself trying to keep cool. One day one of the hon. members said: "How can he wear a vest in this weather?" And another hon. member a short distance away said: "It is quite understandable; that man could not have red blood in his veins, he must have ice water."

Mr. MITCHELL: There is a limit to this, Mr. Speaker. Let me make this observation to my hon. friend: I do not remember his name being mentioned in the dispatches in the last war.

Mr. FRASER: (Peterborough West): No; it was never mentioned in the dispatches in the last war; neither was the Prime Minister's.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He was doing something.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I am just telling you the story people across this country are telling at the present time.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are the same age as myself; what were you doing in 1917? I should like to know if what I say is true.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Just keep on talking. We have in hospitals overseas some of those men who fought at Dieppe. I know of two brothers who fought together there, and came through safely. Then they went to France. One was killed before his brother's eyes, and only a few weeks later the other was wounded. Another brother was in Italy, and he is missing. One family in my district has five boys overseas already; one still remains in Canada, but he has signed to go overseas.

An hon. MEMBER: Have you lost your place?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No, I have not lost my place; I am watching the time, because I want to make this as short as possible. Both in this house and outside the question has been asked, why are the people of the rest of Canada so bitter against the French Canadians.

Mr. HOWE: They are not.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is perfectly correct; they are not bitter against the French Canadians, but they are bitter against the Prime Minister and his government which has played favourites with the French Canadians.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is not so.

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is so. Only this session in this house I had occasion to ask why in Quebec creameries were allowed to collect cream every other day—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: For goodness' sake get on with the war.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):—while in Ontario they were allowed to collect cream only once every four days.

Mr. DORION: It is the same in Quebec.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is not.

Mr. DORION: It has always been the same.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Not according to the wartime prices and trade board. There are many other similar instances I could mention, but I am not going into them to-night. That matter has been brought up, however, and I wanted to answer it. The Prime Minister and his government are to blame for any disunity that exists in this country.

I intend to vote for the amendment offered by my party. We ask for no favouritism toward anyone; that all be treated alike; that all be given the same chance, no matter who or what they are. It should be all for one and one for all immediately. We must give our fighting forces support, and continued support. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has chipped in a number of times, but at this time I do not think it is right to play politics. This is a time for action. Men should be on their way overseas right now, but General McNaughton said that help would not get over there until late in January.

In conclusion, let me say that I am not going to vote for the main motion, after hearing the Prime Minister's speech, in which he said he did not know the conditions overseas; after hearing him blame somebody else for his own neglect; after listening to the speech of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston), and after the secret session. All these things convince me that it is not right to vote for the motion. I am more than ever convinced that the boys overseas need help, and need it right away. If this government cannot conduct an all-out war effort instead of party action, as they have been doing or attempting to do, then I say it is time to change governments. The Prime Minister says there will be anarchy in this land if there is a change of government I doubt that very much. I have faith in the Canadian people, even if the Prime Minister has not.

Mr. F. G. HOBLITZELL (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the inevitable has happened. The time of reckoning was bound to come, and it is already upon the doorstep of this government. In my opinion this is the result of not having an honest man-power policy from the very start of this war. To me, as to many others, it is the result of political promises made by all parties. At the very outset of the war we were told what a terrible conflict lay ahead. Promises were made that we would never have conscription. Those promises should not have been made. I have never hesitated to tell the members of this house and the people of Canada just what my views were. I set forth those views very clearly during my election campaign, during the debate on the plebiscite, and during the debate on bill 80. I would refer hon. members to pages 300 and 301 of Hansard for February 3, 1942; to page 725 of Hansard for February 19, 1942; to pages 3961, 3962 and 3963 of Hansard for July 6, 1942, when I spoke in support of bill 80. At all times in expressing my views on conscription I have been mindful of the position in which hon. members from the province of Quebec found themselves. In this connection I call to the attention of the government the courageous statement made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) as it appears in Hansard for June 24, 1942, at page 3671:

> If they had talked of Canadian interests in the war, they might have been able to convince the French Canadians to accept a compulsory measure at this time; but not having contributed to bring that about, I do not think the government can expect its supporters from the province of Quebec to go back to our people now and attempt to convince them overnight that conscription for overseas service had become a matter of life or death for Canada. I would be willing to risk myself in such an effort if I had received any help before. But I cannot do it in a week. You cannot all of a sudden, overnight as it were, change the lifelong sentiments of a people.

There, Mr. Speaker, was a frank request for a little help and assistance in order that the hon. member might clearly outline to his people the policy of the government. I wonder what help and assistance, if any, he and the other hon. members from that province received. We are asked to support a motion which is in effect a vote of confidence. We are told that the fact that this order in council has been passed and is in effect has nothing to do with the vote of confidence; apparently we are going to accept this order in council, along with many thousands of others, for what it is worth. It is to be regretted that we, as the elected representatives of the people of Canada, were denied the privilege of expressing our views on this measure by a vote in this house. Only when the government does accept the will of the majority of the elected members can democracy in its true form prevail. However, we are told that we shall have to support the government's policy—or else! I wonder just where is that true form of democracy which we often speak of and for which we are fighting. Yet, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the wording of this resolution is almost the same as that given by the government in the British House of Commons, through the motion of Mr. Attlee on June 27, 1942. That was a vote of confidence by all parties to carry on their coalition government and not along partisan lines.

The last few days we have listened to some startling evidence, and I for one, have no hesitancy in stating my confidence in the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston). His great anxiety at all times has been to make sure that the boys in the service receive ample reinforcements. I have heard him speak often in this house, and I am sure all members will agree as to his fine qualities and above all his sincerity. Why, then, was this order in council not given to the former minister of national defence? We heard the evidence that this was all he was asking, for the present. Then, may I ask, what was it that changed the government's decision?

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I am in full accord as to the purpose of the amendment to the main motion, and would have supported it. However, after hearing the grave situation as outlined by the former minister of national defence, I consider that the real issue before the house at this time is to see that reinforcements are sent overseas without further delay. I feel it my duty also to put aside any personal views and differences in this regard and to express the same views as the former minister has done. I will therefore vote for the main motion, but I want to make it very clear that I am doing so not as a party supporter but as a duty I owe to Canada and the fighting forces who are fighting for that love of freedom and way of living which is so dear to us all.

Canada's part in this war has been greatly to the credit of the Canadian people. The discreditable part has been in party politics. What the great majority of the people of Canada want is action—and action at once.

Ever since the last war I have felt that conscription was the only fair way of mobilizing man-power. I know there have always been two different views on conscription, and I would like to close my remarks by quoting from what Abraham Lincoln said:

Voluntarism is the unprincipled dodge of cowardly politicians. It has ground up the choicest seed of the nation. It has consumed the young, the generous, the patriotic, the intelligent, and the brave, and it has wasted the best moral, social and political elements of the republic, and left the cowards, the shirkers and the moneymakers to stay at home and procreate their kind.

Mr. EMMANUEL d'ANJOU (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr Speaker, the masks have been thrown off, the betrayal has been consummated. After Mr. Godbout, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), the hon. member for Quebec East, declared, a few days ago, that the province of Quebec would consider herself betrayed if conscription for military service overseas were forced upon the country.

Indeed, Mr. Godbout stated at one time that it would be a crime, a betrayal, if the government imposed conscription for overseas service, and he added that he would resign if a single Canadian was sent overseas against his will.

Mr. Godbout was surely convinced that the Prime Minister of Canada would not make the unbelievable about-face of November 23, 1944.

The order in council implementing conscription in all its rigour—and I could add in all its hideousness—is the logical and unavoidable conclusion of the result of the plebiscite of April 27, 1942.

Eight provinces voted "yes" by a tremendous majority, while my province, the province of Quebec, replied emphatically "no" to the government which requested to be relieved from its pledge never to impose conscription for service on foreign soil. Therefore, the government has no mandate to impose conscription upon the province of Quebec.

The government has promised the province of Quebec that they would never resort to compulsory service for overseas. The Right Hon. the late Ernest Lapointe had declared in the House of Commons that the province of Quebec would never stand for conscription for service outside Canadian territorial boundaries. The same Mr. Ernest Lapointe stated in the House of Commons that the representatives from Quebec in the federal government had agreed to Canada's participation in the present war under one condition: that conscription be never introduced by the present administration. During the debate on the plebiscite bill, I said:

To me, the plebiscite bill is the screen behind which lurks the monstrous features of conscription.

[Mr. Hoblitzel]

Events have proved me right and I shall therefore keep on opposing with all my strength the party and the government who have hatefully and brutally deceived the whole population of Quebec.

When the voters of Rimouski constituency honoured me by sending me to this house as their representative, I have pledged myself, on my honour, to forsake and oppose the Liberal party if they did not stand by their promise to refrain from enforcing conscription for overseas service. I have kept my promises despite the acts of betrayal and the reversals of policy of the present Liberal government, and I have crossed the floor of this house to take a seat among the members of the Bloc Populaire Canadien, because that party's platform embodies the ideas and principles for which I have fought since my entrance into public life and to which I intend to remain faithful as long as providence grants me life and the electors of my constituency continue to give me their confidence.

Mr. Speaker, those who advocate conscription, are the war profiteers, the vultures of high finance, who pile up huge fortunes while thousands of young Canadians shed their blood in foreign lands. Those young Canadian soldiers are dying upon the battlefields of Europe and Africa and they are denied the supreme comfort of being buried in the folds of a Canadian flag. Yet, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand have flags of their own, and their soldiers are proud to fight under their own flag and not under the banner of another country. If Canada has no flag of its own, the sole responsibility for that fact rests upon the Canadian government.

During twenty-five years the Liberal party has declared its absolute and irrevocable opposition to conscription for service overseas.

In the electoral campaign of March, 1940, that same Liberal party renewed its pledge never to enact compulsory military service for overseas. The Liberal party has broken all its pledges and broken its most solemn promises.

The citizens of Canada have been deceived, they have been betrayed, and elementary justice commands that they punish those unscrupulous politicians who have been unfaithful to them, who brazenly deceived them and betrayed their confidence.

Mr. Speaker, I have been, I am now and shall remain opposed to conscription. I shall therefore have no hesitation in voting against the motion of the government leader, knowing that I shall fulfil my duty to my electors, my race, my province and my country Canada, which I love above all and which, I hope, will become independent in the near future.

On motion of Mr. Mayhew the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Friday, December 1, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

POST-WAR CIVIL AVIATION

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE AT CHICAGO—PRESS REPORTS AS TO POSITION WITH RESPECT TO FREEDOM OF THE AIR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. To-day's press carry dispatches from Chicago stating that Anglo-American delegates to the international civil aviation conference have agreed to disagree on the main issue of freedom of the air. I should be glad if the Minister of Munitions and Supply, under whose jurisdiction these matters lie, would give a report to the house with respect to the conference, and at the same time indicate Canada's position now in view of the alleged failure of the conference to reach complete agreement.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I regret to say that I was unable to attend the later sittings of the air conference in Chicago on account of the sitting of this house. The protracted session has made it impossible for me to return to the conference, therefore I am not familiar with the position at this moment. I shall be unable to answer my hon. friend's question until the delegates return and make a report and until I am able to understand the nature of the proceedings.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the minister give some undertaking that if the delegation returns before the house rises some report will be given along the lines that I have suggested?

Mr. HOWE: I will undertake to give the house a report as soon as a report can be prepared; but I sincerely trust that the house is not going to sit until then. There are many things, in addition to the session of the house, which require the attention of the government.

CANADIAN ARMY (RESERVE)

INQUIRY AS TO FUTURE ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Defence, but I do not see him in his seat at the moment. Perhaps some other minister may be able to answer on behalf of the government. It has been brought to my attention on more than one occasion during the last month or so that the situation with respect to Canada's reserve army, formerly known as the non-permanent active militia, is becoming more acute as the days go on. I am told that in some centres the attendance is tapering off and in the minds of both officers and men there is a feeling of uncertainty as to the future of the reserve army. They are awaiting at the moment a full declaration of government policy with respect to the part this army is to play in the future in Canada. The patriotic citizens who are giving much valuable time from their civilian activities to maintain this volunteer citizen army have made an important contribution to our war effort, and I think some clarification of their position is in order. I would therefore ask that the government make a declaration in the matter so that a definite and clear-cut policy will be known to the officers, to the men and to the Canadian public.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before I refer to my hon. friend's question may I say that I am pleased, as we all are on this side of the house, to see him back in his seat to-day. I will bring to the attention of the hon. the Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, the question my hon. friend has asked, and endeavour to see that an answer from the minister is given to the house on Monday.

THE WAR

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN MAINTAINING VIGOROUS WAR EFFORT—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION OF THE PRIME MINISTER

The house resumed from Thursday, November 30, consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): I think that everyone in this house will be in accord with my first remarks. I am sure that all hon. members noticed in the press this morning that Major Alan Chambers, member for Nanaimo, the county next to the constituency which I have the honour to represent, has won the Distinguished Service Order. He has brought great credit to himself, honour to the country, and honour and distinction to his own constituency as well as my own. I am extremely proud therefore to be able to refer to it at this moment. Further, I have a telegram from Major Chambers which he wishes me to read to the house. He has been in the army for over four years, and has been overseas for two years. He was with the Canadian troops in Sicily and is now serving in northwest Europe, where he has distinguished himself as is evidenced by this citation to-day. Before reading this cable I want to make two observations in connection with it, one as to the place from which it was sent and the other as to the time at which it was sent. He was overseas and therefore was not subject to the many demands that have been made upon the rest of us in this house. Whatever decision he arrived at was his own decision. I should like hon. members also to note the date it was sent. It was written in London on November 18, five days before this session reconvened. His wire is as follows:

Reference special session. Regret military service France prevents attendance. Quote my stand on question remains same as stated my speech Ottawa May fourth, namely when the army requires trained reinforcements they must be available. If the only trained men available are required for battle and will not volunteer they must be sent anyway and sent in time to meet the battle demands.

What I have to say from now on must not be confused with the statement of Major Chambers. Each hon. member of this house must stand on his own feet and do what he thinks best. So, Mr. Speaker, may I now state my own position as clearly as possible.

In 1942 I urged the people of my constituency of Victoria to vote yes on the plebiscite. Further, I voted with the government in support of bill No. 80. Before coming east last January to attend the 1944 session I told my executive that in my opinion the issue of conscription would be before the house before the end of the session. I thought it would be remarkable if Canada were able to undertake an offensive with all her forces, and maintain all her wartime industry, including shipbuilding, the building of planes and all the wastage on the battle line, without a weakness being discovered somewhere. It was on that premise that I told my executive that if the man-power situation was such that reinforcements were demanded and we could not get them under the voluntary system, I would be supporting conscription. That situation has now arisen. We have been told by both the former and the present Minister of National Defence that there is a serious shortage of men in the infantry; therefore I am supporting the order in council, and I support it as I understand it. Having questioned the Minister of National Defence in this house and having listened to his statement, I understand the order and the policy of the government to be that all physically fit men in the N.R.M.A. will be put into training camps and properly trained and conditioned, and that 16,000 will be sent over between now and May 1, 1945, with more to be sent over if and when necessary. If my understanding of the order is not correct I ask to be corrected, because on that understanding I am supporting the resolution of the Prime Minister.

I referred to the 1942 plebiscite and to my support of bill No. 80 to indicate that I have not been a victim of pressure from any source whatever, though one must take into consideration the opinion of the majority of one's constituents. In all this, however, I hear but one voice other than the dictates of my own conscience and the workings of my own mind; that is the voice of Canada's bravest sons calling for help while they are fighting our battle for freedom. In my opinion that help must be forthcoming, regardless of any consequences. I do not blame the government for stopping to consider alternatives in this matter of reinforcements, if there are any, to consider what might be the result in this country, and to count carefully the cost to Canada as a whole before taking this stand. To me that has taken real courage, greater courage than was required by those who faced the same situation in 1917, because we know what happened then and we can perhaps judge more accurately what may happen in the future. I will give this government my full and best support as long as it endeavours in every way possible to get sufficient men overseas to support and relieve those already there. When a man is obliged to leave the fighting front there must be some other equally reliable and equally well trained man to whom he can throw the torch. I believe the present government can and will do that, and until I think differently I will support it.

I want to emphasize here that I have never been an advocate of limiting our war effort, either as to money, material or man-power. I think perhaps some hon. members will remember a letter which was circulated early in the war, quoting excerpts from a speech I made in my home city, in which I said that Canada should be prepared to give Great Britain anything she wanted that we could give her, and that we should mark the cost on our cuff until the war is over. My position in that regard has not changed. I maintain it, not only in respect of goods or foodstuffs or munitions, but in respect of the supplies of men.

I realize that in taking this position I am intimating that I am not satisfied with the aid that has been given to Great Britain. The fact is that I am quite satisfied; but I think it would have been better for us had we proceeded in another fashion. When we come to settle the cost of sending materials and supplies to Great Britain we must remember the long past, when to so great an extent Canada was dependent upon the mother country for protection and support, and even for financing. We shall have also to consider the present; because this is not Great Britain's war; it is a war of freedom-loving peoples against the oppressors. Therefore our support is not given to Great Britain but rather to ourselves. If we take these two items we find that we almost wipe out any credit balance which might have been placed on our side of the ledger. And if we add to that what is going to happen in the future—our desire to continue trade with Great Britain and our desire that at this time she should have everything she needs in the way of foodstuffs, building materials, and everything else, then I think that whether we wish it or not we would have to write off the balance.

I repeat that I would not have limited our contribution, and that I do not see how we can limit it, when we promised at the beginning of the war that we would go shoulder to shoulder all the way, to the maximum of our materials and man-power, and to the end of the struggle. How, then, can we impose any limitations?

Let me say a word or two about conscription. Much has been made of the point that at heart the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not one who believes in compulsion, and that General McNaughton, who has taken over the portfolio of national defence, is not in favour of it. I wonder who among Anglo-Saxons is in favour of compulsion? We adopt it when we have to—and this is one time when we have to. But unless conditions warrant it I do not think that at heart any of us wants to say, "you must do this" or "you must do that", whether it be to fight or to do something else.

It is my belief that a condition has developed to-day under which we have to say to the 60,000 young men in Canada under the N.R.M.A. that when we are in desperate straits we cannot tolerate a group of that size not doing its share.

I should like at this point to read a paragraph from a letter I received this morning, and which I believe sets out the two sides of the question. It says:

> My two sons, Ernie and Frank, were the only two who cared to stay on the farm with me. I found it very hard to get along alone.
> Her husband was an ex-soldier, and he has gone.
> We hope Frank will be entitled to come on leave at Christmas, as he enlisted on September 3, 1939. I might say we have six sons in the army and one in the navy.

Now, in view of those facts one could argue against conscription. Here is a family of loyal people, people who are possibly more emotional than some others—and these can be found in other parts of Canada. I know of similar situations in Quebec where through their emotions people have gone beyond their limits. In my view they should not have been allowed to do so much. We should not permit seven boys from one family to serve in the armed services; and had we had a selective process that might not have happened.

But it can also be argued: Have these seven boys the obligation to fight for all that Canada stands for in the way of freedom and advantages, in the opportunities it offers for establishing homes, and in education? Have they that right? Is there any justice to have all seven of them fighting, while probably a neighbouring boy does not fight, and still enjoys those same privileges in Canada? I think you will agree with me, sir, that the subject can be argued both ways. I agree with General McNaughton when he says that he will hold open the doors for voluntary enlistment. We have enlisted in this country under the voluntary system over 900,000 young men and women. We have 60,000 under the N.R.M.A., or less than seven per cent. Are we now going to close the doors for voluntary enlistment to all the young boys who come of age between now and the end of the war, or shall we give them the opportunity to say for themselves, "Yes, of my own accord I am going to enlist. I am not going to wait to be forced, through conscription." I believe we should leave the door open to the boys with spirit and patriotism who would enlist voluntarily.

I have heard it argued in the house that we might have proceeded in a different fashion, that we could have shortened our lines. I am not a military man, but I think that is one argument to which one might easily pay some attention. Probably we could strike harder and oftener if our forces were less scattered, but not being a military man I have to accept the advice of those who have been over there. Suppose we do shorten our line; suppose we take out our men every once in a while to give them a rest—God knows I would like to see that done; suppose we treat them as they should be treated, we still have not got over the fact that there are 60,000 men here in Canada. I do not believe that all those 60,000 are unwilling to fight. I should be surprised if one-fifth of them actually did not want to go over. But no matter how small the proportion may be, they should be called up.

I want to say a word about the general service men. I met quite a few of them when I was home. Some of these men have been in the army for two, three and four years. One man who came into my office just before I left for Ottawa had the white chevron and four red chevrons, indicating that he had had five years' service in the Canadian army. He also had the maple leaf on his ribbon. I assumed that he had been overseas but he told me that he had got that for a Cook's tour. Two other boys who came in to see me had not been over either. They told me that the Department of National Defence had asked them to try to convince the N.R.M.A. boys to go active. They said, "What chance have we to convince those boys? They merely say that we are hiding behind the general service badge on our uniform; behind our backs they will say that we, not they, are the zombies."

Just here may I say that I think that word should be barred from use in this house. No Canadian who is good enough to wear the king's uniform should be called a zombie. These boys went to Kiska when they were asked to go. They went up there on a draft put into effect by an order in council similar to the order in council we have here. They were prepared to meet the Japs quite bravely, and it is not their fault that the Japs ran away. I was in Gordon Head when these boys came back from Kiska. At that time the word "zombie" was becoming quite popular, but not one of those boys knew its meaning. I doubt if one out of a hundred knows its meaning to-day. Let somebody give the Canadian people the actual meaning of that word and then let us in the House of Commons refrain from using it.

That is the position in which you put the general service men. They have no chance of recruiting these other men when they are up against that. But there is something else to be considered. One of these men who came in to see me was quite well known to me. He holds the rank of colonel, and he told me that during the five years he had been serving in Canada the difference between what he received as an officer serving in Canada and what he would have received had he been serving overseas amounted to $13,000—made up of income tax and loss of gratuities. I think you will find that quite a number of these young officers, non-commissioned officers and men will be ready to go over. While some of them may be hiding behind their general service badges, I believe the number is comparatively few.

I want to say one word about the resolution itself. It reads:

> That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

There are two points in that motion of which every hon. member should take notice. I do not think they have been mentioned as yet. The first is that there is a definite promise by the government that it will maintain the momentum of Canada's war effort in order that it may become one of the greatest war efforts of any country of like size in the world. If they fall down in that promise, I as a supporter of the government will not hesitate to tell them about it. The second point is that an appeal is made in the motion to every member of this house, regardless of party or regardless of where he comes from, to exert every effort to help this government to maintain this war effort. When a member gets up in this house and votes against this motion he must act according to his own conscience.

Mr. JACKMAN: The hon. member has placed an interpretation upon the order in council; I should like to ask him if he has consulted with any responsible minister of the crown as to the interpretation which the government places upon it.

Mr. MAYHEW: Let me quote from a statement which I think the hon. member will accept. I read from page 6610 of Hansard:

I need not repeat the order which is P.C. No. 8891; I think it will be found on examination that it contains precisely what I said in terms I would do in 1942. The order in council P.C. 8891 applies to all personnel who are serving or may serve in consequence of having been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

And then one or two lines further on:

That is, one order in council covers the entire force.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to refer briefly to certain remarks which have been made this week by some hon. members. Let me refer first to the hon. member for London (Mr. Johnston). In his remarks on Wednesday he stated that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to conscription, everyone knew what he meant. I find on page 6606 of Hansard of November 27 the word "conscription" as defined by the Prime Minister. He says:

The policy was set forth in June, 1943—

I believe he meant 1942:

—and it has been defined in the words:

"not necessarily conscription, but conscription if necessary. And I might add the words, "to the extent only that it is necessary."

The word "necessary" appears twice and I will not attempt to put my own definition upon it. Instead, I will quote from the correspondence, filed in this house, between the Prime Minister and the Hon. J. L. Ralston. At page 8 of the correspondence the following appears in a letter from Colonel Ralston to the Prime Minister on November 6.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Yesterday, and I presume the same will happen to-day, there was constant reference to the hon. and gallant member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) by name. The rules of the house dictate that an hon. member should be referred to by the name of his constituency, and I would ask hon. members to observe that rule.

Mr. WHITE: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I am only sorry that we cannot still refer to the hon. member for Prince as the Minister of National Defence. However, the following statement appears at page 8 of the correspondence:

There is disagreement between us on the vital point as to the meaning of the word "necessary." Your view, recently expressed, is that you consider it means "necessary to win the war," "necessary to defend Canadian soil," "necessary to avert some great calamity or catastrophe."

The letter proceeds:

I took the word "necessary" to mean primarily "necessary to keep our overseas army reinforced. I always thought that this was the meaning given to the word in council and parliamentary discussions. There is, I think, a vital and fundamental difference betwen us on this point.

I need hardly point out that the hon. member for Prince is a very outstanding counsel and I do not think anyone will say that he is not quite capable of defining the word "necessary." I hope therefore that the hon. member for London understands clearly in his own mind just what the Prime Minister meant when he said, "not necessarily conscription but conscription if necessary, and I might add the words, to the extent only that is necessary."

The same member referred to the stand and the attitude of this party towards conscription. Speaking for myself, Mr. Speaker, as far back as March 11, 1941, and on many occasions since then, I have advocated in this house that only by means of conscription would there be any semblance of equality of service or sacrifice, and at that early date in March, 1941 one was almost regarded as guilty of treason if one even mentioned the word "conscription" in this house.'

Yesterday an hon. member said that there could be no such thing as equality of service or sacrifice, or words to that effect. In the small village in which I reside, with a population of only around 1,100, there was a company formed as part of the Hastings-Prince Edward regiment. That regiment landed in England on December 19, 1939. They went to France in 1940 for a few days and returned. They took part in the invasion of Sicily and Italy and have been in the thick of that battle ever since. Can anyone suggest that the boys in this regiment, and the boys in all other regiments who landed in England in December, 1939, have not more than fulfilled their full obligation and duty to this country? Surely the time has long gone by when these boys should at least be given an opportunity of returning to Canada, their places being taken by men of the N.R.M.A. Can anyone suggest that there is any equality of service or sacrifice when you think of these boys who landed in England in December, 1939 and realize at the same time that we have here at home 60,000 young men?

The other matter to which I wish to refer is a statement made last night by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin). He made a somewhat similar statement in this house when he spoke on bill No. 80 in 1942. Last night he said, as reported at page 6708 of Hansard:

> Where are your concessions, you British Canadians, in favour of the French Canadians? What have you ever done to preserve unity between the two great races in Canada? Unity has been maintained owing to concessions made by French Canadians in this House of Commons and elsewhere.

All I wish to say to the hon. member is this. I for one would like the hon. gentleman to place on Hansard, so that all the country may know and understand, just what these concessions are that the French-speaking Canadians have made in favour of English-speaking Canadians.

I fully realize that this debate deals only with reinforcements, that conscription is not the issue, since, as has been stated many times, conscription passed and became the law in Canada in 1942. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), who I regret is not in his place, to give the house a legal opinion as to when it became necessary for any government to pass an order in council and then to have a vote of confidence in the government before a statute of Canada could be enforced. Further, can the Minister of Justice give any other instance when such a ridiculous procedure was followed? For conscription for service overseas has been the law in Canada since bill No. 80 was passed late in 1942, and it was the duty of the government to enforce this act.

I realize that the Prime Minister imposed a condition at that time, but that was a condition imposed by the Prime Minister himself, because bill No. 80 contained no such restriction. Bill No. 80 was passed and men called up and serving under the N.R.M.A. were liable for service outside Canada. Bill No. 80 was passed as a result of a plebiscite, and irrespective of what the Prime Minister may say as to what the question in the plebiscite ballot meant, I say that the great majority of the people of Canada felt that when they were voting on the plebiscite if they voted "yes" they were voting to send men overseas called up under the N.R.M.A., and if they voted "no" they were voting against sending men overseas.

It was with rather bad grace that we heard the Prime Minister say that the voluntary system has broken down and that the present crisis is due to lack of cooperation by members of the opposition and the general public. Since when has it become the duty of opposition members of parliament and of civilians outside of the House of Commons to raise recruits for the armed forces of Canada? I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the full responsibility for securing necessary recruits and men for the armed forces rests squarely on the shoulders of the Minister of National Defence, and this duty and obligation cannot be shifted by any words of the Prime Minister so as to fall upon members of the opposition and the general public.

It is perhaps well to review briefly the attitude of the Prime Minister since 1940 in regard to calling up men for service. In 1940 the mobilization act was passed. I remember how on that occasion the Prime Minister objected to the delay in the house in getting the bill through, and I wondered at that time what great new marvel would happen. And then we had the super-farce of the thirty-day training plan; then the law was changed to four months training, and later to service in Canada for the duration of the war. Then, when public demand became insistent, we had the farce of the plebiscite, and after the plebiscite the will of the majority of the Canadian people was disregarded, because the Prime Minister imposed a joker by a condition that there would be an order in council and a vote of confidence in the house. Since that time we have had two armies—the general service and the home defence armies. We have had conscription by the backdoor method, by compulsion, shame and coercion.

It is rather late in the day for the Prime Minister now to try again to evade the issue. The order in council passed last week is at the best only a half measure, because we are still going to have at least two armies, perhaps three, perhaps four. How can we have any confidence, with this new change of front, that this new order in council is to be enforced in a just and proper manner? How do we know for certain that parts of this country will not be discriminated against?—because the present Minister of National Defence made it very plain in this house that he was not in favour of compulsion. In Hansard of November 23, at page 6529, we find these words with reference to the voluntary system:

> I have made a confession of faith in it for us and under our conditions, and I certainly am not the one to use compulsion any more than I can possibly avoid in order to make good the deficiency in the situation which otherwise would exist.

On the same day, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), the minister said:

> I have no intention of using compulsion except to meet a deficiency, and having regard to the purpose we have of maintaining the strength of our armies overseas.

In face of these statements how can the Prime Minister expect hon. members to vote confidence in his government, which is to administer the carrying out of this order in council? Mr. Speaker, I submit that if we are to have compulsion, or conscription—call it what you may—for service overseas, the only fair and just way is immediately to make all men now enrolled under N.R.M.A. and all men who will at a later date be enrolled under N.R.M.A. available for service anywhere in the world. For after all, why should 16,000 men be discriminated against? I for one cannot blame them for protesting. If the Prime Minister wants to have a vote of confidence in his government I say to him, let him end once and for all this farce of two, three or four armies.

The Prime Minister plainly indicated in his speech on Monday that his last-minute repentance was brought about only by a threat of other resignations from his cabinet, and he made it clear that he was not in favour of the change. He has attempted to lay the blame for this crisis on the opposition, on certain people in Canada and on certain sections of the press. But who in Canada has more interest or more concern in the matter of seeing that the boys overseas are properly and adequately reinforced than their parents, their sisters, their wives, their sweethearts? The letters from overseas and the reports from many men and officers lately returned from overseas have given much information as to the growing need of reinforcements. So that why should not the general public make their voice heard?—because I hope this is still a democratic country. But apparently anyone who holds a contrary view to the Prime Minister is condemned.

When this situation developed, one would naturally have thought that the Prime Minister and the war cabinet would have taken immediate action, but instead of immediate action there was delay. It was not until November 1 or 2 that the Prime Minister, hoping to find some way out, secured a new Minister of National Defence, one who thought that he could obtain the necessary reinforcements by voluntary enlistment. When the new minister of National Defence gave this advice to the Prime Minister he stated on being questioned in the house that he had enough facts before him to give this information. Therefore one can only assume that on that day the present Minister of National Defence had full knowledge of what the former minister of national defence had reported to the war cabinet, that he knew the required number of monthly recruits to go forward each month, that he knew that at least 15,000 additional men were urgently needed, that he knew how long it would take these men to reach the front, that he knew the average monthly record of enlistments, that he knew that the average monthly casualties were double the number of monthly enlistments, that he knew what the district officers commanding across Canada thought on whether or not these men could be secured by voluntary enlistments; and he must have known the type of warfare we were now entering, because he describes it at page 6521 of Hansard. Yet, with all this information, the Prime Minister and the present Minister of National Defence still thought that they could get the men by voluntary enlistment, and they were willing to take a chance; they were willing to risk a gamble rather than take the course the great majority of the Canadian people demanded. They were willing to take this chance despite the expert advice that had been tendered to them by the hon. member for Prince, who had recently returned from overseas and who stated in his report that he obtained his information from the battalion commanders in both Italy and France.

Who in the world, Mr. Speaker, could give better and more accurate information than battalion commanders in Italy and France? And I would point out that the hon. member for Prince recommended to the war cabinet that 15,000 reinforcements were needed and needed at once, and he stated very definitely in his speech on Monday last that these men were to reach the reinforcement pools by December 31, 1944. Yet, under the policy of the present Minister of National Defence, we have a plan whereby 16,000 N.R.M.A. men will go forward between now and May, 1945. Instead of 15,000 men going forward in December he plans to send only 5,000. These men will arrive at a date from four to six weeks later than the date planned by the hon. member for Prince. How can the present Minister of National Defence be satisfied that these men will arrive in time or that 5,000 will be sufficient to make up the pools, when the former minister of national defence asked for 15,000 men? At page 6671 of Hansard, November 29, he has set it out very clearly:

> Fifteen thousand trained infantrymen were needed at once to build up the overseas pool. Commencing January 1, 1945, a certain additional number of trained infantrymen were needed to be included in the ordinary monthly dispatches. . . .

The Prime Minister in his speech made reference to the great concern he had always felt for the boys overseas. Yet when the gravity of the situation was revealed to him on the return from overseas of the hon. member for Prince, one would have expected that he would take immediate and energetic action to meet this situation. The policy of evasion, twisting and turning continued. He refused to take immediate action. Anything to avoid conscription, although the Prime Minister admits that he was committed to this policy from 1942 on.

How can the Prime Minister contend, when he has already stated in this house that he is not a military man and must depend upon his military advisers, that the information given to him by the hon. member for Prince was not correct? He was told that the need was urgent and that the time had arrived for sending N.R.M.A. men overseas at once. All he did was to change his minister of national defence and cling to the hope that these men could be secured under the voluntary system.

The Prime Minister made a radio speech on November 8, and at page 5 of that speech the following statement appears:

> Colonel Ralston's report to the government disclosed an immediate problem which had to be faced. That problem is to find the means of speeding up the flow of fully trained infantry reinforcements to meet, not an actual shortage of reinforcements now, but a possible shortage in the next few months.

Contrast that statement, Mr. Speaker, with what the hon. member for Prince said at page 6671 of Hansard which I have already quoted. In that statement he said that he asked for 15,000 trained infantry reinforcements for the overseas pool on or before December 31, 1944. I should like to say to the Prime Minister that inasmuch as the wartime information board has seen fit to distribute across Canada at public expense 87,000 copies of his radio speech, surely it would not be asking too much to have the wartime information board distribute across the country 87,000 copies of the speech of the hon. member for Prince so that the public may have all the facts before them.

Every possible delay was adopted to avoid the issue, even the calling of parliament. Only at the last minute, and due to pressure by certain members of the cabinet, was there a half-hearted change of front. Much has already been said in the house about this order in council, but what assurance, Mr. Speaker, has the public that its provisions will be carried out? How can the public be assured that the infantry pools overseas will not once more become exhausted? How do we know that certain members of the cabinet will not object and block the passing of further orders in council? The only course the Prime Minister can take is to pass an order in council before the house adjourns providing that all men now enrolled in the N.R.M.A. units and all men to be enrolled in the future will be available for service overseas. Let us once and for all end this policy of evasion, coercion and discrimination. If this course were taken it would satisfy a large majority of the hon. members of this house, it would satisfy a large majority of the Canadian public; it would satisfy the Canadian Legion; and, need I add, it would greatly hearten and encourage the boys in both Italy and France.

How can the public be assured that this order will be carried out when you read what the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said in Chicago, as reported in a Canadian press dispatch of November 15? The statement is as follows:

> Conscription for overseas service in Canada is "rather a political question than a question of meeting an urgent need," reconstruction minister C. D. Howe said to-day. . . .

Apparently when the minister made that statement, if he is correctly reported, he had full knowledge of the report made by the hon. member for Prince, but he said it was not an urgent need. Further on the minister is reported as saying that he did not believe it was a question of meeting an overwhelming need.

How can the public have any faith or confidence that this order in council will be enforced? At the tail end of the report this amazing statement appears:

> Canadian effort would continue to be concentrated on the European theatre until the job was done there, but "when the European is finished our troops, our navy and our air force will transfer to the Pacific to finish up that job."

Before the house adjourns I should like the Prime Minister to state whether or not that statement is correct, because only a few days ago in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I believe, as to whether there had been any commitments so far as the Pacific is concerned, he said that the matter was still under consideration and he was not able at the present time to give any information. If this statement is correct, it seems strange to me that such an important announcement should be given out in a foreign country.

I should like to concur in the suggestion made yesterday by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), that before the house adjourns each member of the cabinet should declare in this house whether or not he is satisfied and content with the order in council that has been passed. There are among the members of the cabinet and among all other groups and parties in this house many members who are veterans of the last war and of this war. These hon. members know far better than civilians what war is like. I should like to know if there are any soldier members of this parliament who concur in the views expressed in the house last evening by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), or who hold similar views. Hon. members who are veterans do not need to be told what war is like. They know what battle fatigue is; they know what the front line is like; they know how hard it is to carry on when the strength of the unit is down. Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker, that on the shoulders of the soldier members of this house rests a far heavier responsibility than on the shoulders of hon. members who have never served in an army overseas. I would say to you, soldier members, just put yourselves to-day in the place of the boys overseas. If you were short of reinforcements, would your thoughts not turn to the Canadian parliament? You would say that there are many soldier members of parliament who know and understand just what war is, and we can depend on them. We know they would take whatever action is necessary; for no soldier would ever let his comrades down.

Soldier members of parliament like all other soldiers belong to that great fraternity, the war veterans. That fraternity is the greatest fraternity in the world, because in it race, colour and creed do not count. It does not matter where you come from; your occupation and your politics do not count. You are accepted in that fraternity only because you have proved yourself to be a man. To join that fraternity, Mr. Speaker, there is an initiation fee, the highest of any in the world. You must offer your very life to join that fraternity, and often the initiation fee is paid in full.

In closing I appeal especially to the members of the soldiers' fraternity in this house to insist that before the house adjourns the necessary order in council be passed whereby all N.R.M.A. personnel and all enrolling in future under that act will be made available for service overseas.

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I have but a few words to say. I do not think it is necessary to make long speeches to give the reasons why some of us are against conscription and others are in favour of it, while a third group is accepting it as an expedient to avoid more trouble in this country, or so they say. Where is the guiding light to which reference was made last evening? I do not know. As far as I am concerned I am and all my life have been opposed to conscription and to any form of coercion. I expressed my views in 1942, when we discussed bill No. 80, and I am of the same opinion to-day. All the reasons that have been given since last Thursday, for the adoption of order in council P.C. 8891 dispatching to the European theatre of war 16,000 draftees, have not convinced me of the necessity for that decision. On the contrary, during this debate it has been shown that there has been lack of good will and lack of competence somewhere in using the voluntary system as it should have been used. No reasonable man in Canada will deny that the more than 750,000 volunteers from a small country like ours could have been organized and sent to different lands in such a way that reinforcements would have been available from within the ranks of that comparatively large and gallant army of volunteers. I am not a military expert, as many other hon. members have admitted they are not, but in playing any game you must bear in mind that you should not play it unless you are prepared to replace some, if not all, of your men as the game goes on; and this should be decided before the game is started.

I realize that this is not the time for recriminations. We must face realities and accomplished facts. We have not been called here to say whether we are in favour of or against conscription. We have been called to decide whether the present administration is to continue in office until the end of the war, with a policy of conscription, whether full or limited; or whether we are to hand over the administration of this country to another group of men who, according to their own affirmation, will continue this policy of conscription to a greater degree in order to attain total conscription. Is this not the situation, Mr. Speaker, since you ruled out of order the amendment moved yesterday by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard)? In this house there is an increasing number of hon. members who are openly against conscription, but I am inclined to believe that in their hearts many others still favour the voluntary system. May I draw to the attention of those who, like myself, are ready to do their utmost to prevent conscription for overseas service, by any means at hand, that they are not working to that end by simply voting against the motion of confidence presented by the right hon. Prime Minister, or by voting against the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in order to be fair to all, and to give every hon. member an opportunity to express his views fully, I urge you to accept the following amendment to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, moved by myself and seconded by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Fauteux):

That all the words of the amendment after the word "reinforcements" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"by using to the best advantage the general service personnel in Canada and the volunteers overseas without resorting to conscription for service overseas."

Mr. GRAYDON: In view of the fact that the mover of this amendment to a government motion is parliamentary assistant to one of the ministers of the crown, I should like to ask my hon. friend if his resignation as parliamentary assistant has already been given to the government?

Mr. JEAN: I have already tendered to the right hon. Prime Minister and to the Minister of Justice my resignation as parliamentary assistant; but that does not mean I am not going to do my duty just the same.

Mr. ROSS W. GRAY (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, in 1942 I opposed the taking of the plebiscite, because I felt that the issue to be faced was not a question of conscription or voluntary service. The issue of conscription had been decided by the National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940. There remained only, therefore, the question of the restrictions and limitations contained in that bill. I was of opinion that the responsibility for deciding that particular question rested solely upon the shoulders of the elected representatives of the people in parliament, rather than upon the people to be decided by way of a plebiscite. The government having been released by the people from any moral obligation they felt was binding, it was my opinion, as expressed in the debate on bill No. 80, that full effect should be given to the manifest desire of the majority of the people for the immediate removal of that restriction, the taking away of any limitation with respect to the services of our armed forces, and the passing of the necessary order in council forthwith.

In March 1943, with the casualties of Dieppe as an object lesson of what would lie ahead for our fighting men, I closed my speech in this house by asking for immediate action, in these words:

Mr. Speaker, the crucial months are at hand. Can we say that we are ready? Are we to continue to sidestep this issue until we are in an emergency? Time has been kind to us. It has been on our side. But soon the starter's gun will be raised. The men are on their marks. Will we be there to take the baton at the end of the first lap? At the end of the second lap? Will our reserves be marshalled to lead the way over the finish line? That, sir, is a question which must be faced, not in the heat of battle, but now before it is too late.

[Mr. Jean.]

I would be less than human did I not call attention to my appeal on that occasion, not to wait for an emergency, not to delay until the heat of battle, but to act at once.

On July 10, 1944, speaking on this same issue, and with our casualties in Normandy mounting daily, I again urged the government to remove the territorial jurisdiction restrictions, and to compel the N.R.M.A. men, now fully trained, to proceed overseas at once. No action was taken.

Before discussing the matter as I view it on this first day of December, 1944, I feel it is only fair to the government that I recall to the minds of hon. members the attitude of other parties in the house. The government is being strongly condemned by the official opposition and the C.C.F. for the manner in which it has handled the subject of service in the armed forces during these years of war. Let us see how those opposition groups have acted.

The official opposition, in 1944, after forty-seven days of debate on the war appropriation measure, without bringing in any direct motion such as stands in their name to-day, did bring in, at the end of an amendment to the motion to go into ways and means, commonly known as the budget debate, a clause which meant, according to the mover, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), that N.R.M.A. draftees were to be demobilized and turned back to the farms, factories and forests until needed.

In case hon. members opposite may say, no, I shall place upon the record that statement. In this way we shall let the house and the country decide what was the policy of the official opposition only five months ago. This is the paragraph as it appears at page 4341 of Hansard:

For the honour of Canada I urge upon the government that they now remove the political halo that surrounds this most ridiculous camouflage and to turn these able-bodied men back to the farms, the factories and the forests where they can produce for victory until they are marshalled for the more vital service for which they were conscripted.

Can this house imagine the position in which the country would find itself to-day if that policy had been followed? Instead of finding men fully trained, mobilized and ready to proceed overseas in this emergency, we would have found them scattered to the four corners of Canada.

And now, sir, what about the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation? The C.C.F. would not have had any reinforcement problem; they would not have had a veteran problem; for this is the party that would have allowed Britain to bleed and die before sending any expeditionary force to her aid.

This is the party which was led by the present leader, and went through the country in 1942 urging the people to vote for the plebiscite but, at the same time, telling its supporters not to worry, because they would vote against the government bill removing the restrictions when it was brought before the house. And they did, every last man of the party. This is the party which, at a session in Montreal as late as June 1944, with the fate of the invasion still hanging in the balance, was passing a resolution—"to send reinforcements overseas?" No, Mr. Speaker, a resolution condemning the British Labour party for continuing to collaborate with the Churchill government. This was the party, which, after stating that the issue was reinforcements, and reinforcements only, and after imputing political motives to other parties, on November 27, Monday of this week, moved a sub-amendment covering the full range, military and economic, in an endeavour to place the whole platform of the C.C.F. before the public, and take advantage of the publicity arising out of this session.

I now come to the immediate question before the house. Had the government, having recognized the need and the urgency, come out four-square on a policy of unrestricted compulsory service, I would not be speaking as I shall in this house to-day. However, when I find the Minister of National Defence driven to the point where, against his will, he resorts to a limited order in council saying that, yes, he will continue the voluntary system even to this extent—and I quote his words—

> I have no intention of using compulsion, except to meet a deficiency and having regard to the purpose we have of maintaining the strength of our armies overseas. . . .

—and when I find that the country is still to be saddled with two armies, one voluntary for service anywhere, and another conscripted, which may or may not be used, I must in justice to my constituents in Lambton West, who sent me here to do my duty as I see it and with, I believe their full support, protest against this half-way measure. There is no half-way house to victory. There must not be any half-way house in our effort, now that this step has been taken.

It is true, as the Prime Minister has said, that conscription is not the issue in this debate; but this is true only in the broad sense of the word. Conscription will always be an issue, as long as the Minister of National Defence clings tenaciously to the voluntary system. Surely he must realize that we have exhausted the alphabet in our endeavours to secure volunteers from the N.R.M.A. men. By that I mean from "A"—appeals to their manhood—to "Z"—zombie characterization, and without success. "If you want us, make the order cover any or all," is their cry. By what magic does the minister feel he can succeed where others have failed? If the policy of conscription is settled, then in my opinion it becomes only a question of fair and equal application, to prove that it is the most democratic system yet evolved.

Mr. Churchill, speaking on the application of conscription, used these words:

> There is nothing undemocratic about this measure; it is the most democratic thing we have ever done. Provided that no exceptions are allowed, it will wear away differences between class and class.

I might add that here in Canada, to use the same words, provided that no exceptions are allowed, it will not only wear away differences between class and class, but it will wear away differences between race and race.

Mr. Churchill continued:

> And it may also be the beginning of a far more broadly and evenly based society than we have ever known . . . almost everywhere we see hesitating, cautious governments, and resolute peoples. Here at home, the spirit of the people is far ahead of the government, and perhaps even of parliament, also. . . . This is a time when prejudices must be abandoned on either side, and a true comradeship established between all parties and clases throughout our loyal, anxious land.

Here in Canada we see the government hesitant on this particular subject matter, and the people resolute. Here in Canada we have an opportunity of abandoning prejudices and moving forward with a common purpose.

It has been said in the house on many occasions, and it was repeated by the Prime Minister in his recent radio address, that conscripted men will not be well received by the volunteers overseas. Speaking as one who served for three years in the last war as a private soldier, I believe that to be a fallacy handed down to us by the general staff, and that is my reason for submitting this opinion. When a soldier dons the uniform of a private he gives himself over to the army. He discovers a world in which his private personality and his private will no longer count; he becomes a number rather than a name. He becomes part of a vast machine. He had little time in the last war and he has less in this one to think for himself, let alone argue the merits of the voluntary or the conscriptive system. Provided that he has sufficient training, in a few days the draftee becomes absorbed in the machine; perhaps he becomes a casualty and some one else steps in and fills his place. And so the ever-grinding wheels of war move on.

Sometimes we ask what kind of man this soldier who has been overseas three, four, five or more years will be on his return. Will he be the man we knew, or will he be a stranger? Will he be bitter, or will he be hopeful? Will he come back with confidence, or will he be disillusioned? Will he understand this order in council, or will he be more confused than ever?

If we had taken a firm, resolute stand on this issue, not the timid one suggested by the Minister of National Defence by which the draftee can proclaim himself a volunteer up to the moment he crosses the limits of our territorial waters, then we as members of parliament would have regained some of the respect we have lost during these years of hesitation and indecision. As it stands, we are leaving our next step in doubt—a dangerous situation.

Mr. Speaker, I have presented these facts as I see them. I realize that there are other opinions just as sincere as mine, and in the hope that this may be the last time I shall speak in this chamber on this subject may I thank my French-Canadian colleagues especially for their tolerance of my viewpoint. On more than one occasion hon. members surrounding me here have stated that while they cannot agree with me, they do appreciate my sincerity of purpose. For that I am truly thankful.

The government has adopted what the Prime Minister has termed "limited conscription." In so doing it has left the system open to misunderstanding and abuse on the part of certain sections of the press and the general public, and it is open to violent complaints by the draftees of inequality in its application.

Feeling as I do about this subject, I must ask myself what my duty is in the light of all the existing factors. This issue began on a matter which should have been settled by the pure mathematics of need. Let me repeat that in my opinion this matter should have been settled on the pure mathematics of need. I do not think the general staff, the former Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) or the cabinet can escape their joint and several shares of the blame in proportion to their responsibility for the condition in which they found themselves on October 19, 1944. In the meantime the issue has assumed the character and proportions of an emotional crisis, threatening the very roots of our confederation. This being true, there comes a time in the life of every member when his own opinion, his constituency and his party must be submerged in the common interest of the dominion as a whole.

How can I best serve that common interest? Can I do it by supporting the amendment for which I have much sympathy, or by voting against the amendment and accepting the motion, coupled as it is with a definite undertaking by the Prime Minister that our men will never again lack reinforcements? Looking then to the future and with the lessons of the past taken to heart, I shall vote against the amendment and in favour of the main motion.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the hon. member (Mr. Gray) who has just taken his seat. I admire his stand on the matter of reinforcements, but I do not think I shall be able to follow him completely. He referred to the amendment which was moved to the budget by this party in 1944 to the effect that N.R.M.A. men should be demobilized. True enough, there is a paragraph in that amendment which points out that the government has failed to make effective the full mobilization of our financial, industrial and material resources as well as our man-power, but is maintaining a so-called home defence army at a cost to the taxpayer in excess of $150 million per annum, and it was suggested that they could provide greater national service to this country.

I should like to refer to the amendment which was moved by this group this year to the speech from the throne. It reads:

> That the following words be added to the address in reply to the speech from the throne:
> "We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have:
> (a) Failed to make adequate provision and to implement promises already made for the immediate needs and employment of the men and women of the armed forces on demobilization;
> (b) Failed to provide adequate measures whereby agriculture can make its maximum war- and peace-time contribution through a stable and effective long-term programme;
> (c) Failed to establish such a national code for labour as will ensure maximum production and give to labour its rightful place in our national partnership; and failed to provide for the correction of the unfairly coercive and restrictive clauses in the 1943 wartime wages control order;
> (d) Failed to lessen bureaucratic controls and regimentation and to recognize and restore the supremacy of parliament; and failed to halt the continuing infringement of provincial rights and the centralization of authority.

At all times we have said that there must be reinforcements for our fighting forces. I remember well the amendment which was moved in 1942 to the speech from the throne. That amendment embodied the principle contained in a brief which the Canadian Legion executive had presented a few months previously to the Prime Minister and his cabinet.

That brief urged an all-out war effort and total conscription of the man-power of this country. I have never veered from that stand. I shall deal with this some time later in my remarks during the forty minutes ahead. I shall prove that we have been consistent in our stand ever since I have been a member of this house.

This is one of the most important debates in the history of this nation. The issue is the question of reinforcements for our men at the battle fronts. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did not know that there was a reinforcement problem until the Minister of National Defence returned from his trip to the battle front in October, may I say to him that the relatives in this country of the Canadian boys on the battle fronts knew full well that there was a serious problem during August and September of this year. The mothers, wives, sweethearts and other relatives of our fighting boys are the people of Canada who are responsible for this organization against the half-hearted piecemeal policy of the present government. This organization was started right in the homes and among the families of our fighting men.

May I state my position with respect to the secret session that we had this week. I should like to tell the people of this country that the first thing I did at three o'clock on that day was to ask to have a clarification from the Speaker of the House of Commons. Both the Speaker and the Prime Minister made it very clear to me that anything which might be spoken outside that secret session was distinctly a matter that would rest with the conscience of each individual member, that each individual member should decide what might give comfort to the enemy. I have seen service at the front and I think I can judge as to what would give comfort to the enemy. There was much of that discussion which would be of very little interest to the enemy. I shall refer to some of the statements made at a later stage or at some future date, but I wanted to make my position perfectly clear as to what the regulations were with respect to the secret session.

This is a strange situation which the Prime Minister has been creating over the past twenty-seven years. We had "no conscription" in 1939. Then there was the thirty-day training of 1940. We had home service in 1941, and in 1942 we had the plebiscite in which eight provinces voted "yes" overwhelmingly. In 1943 we had conscription if necessary, but not necessarily conscription. We had an order in council making some 16,000 men under the N.R.M.A. available by King-scription—not necessarily conscription but King-scription. That is in 1944, so that step by step this King-scription for overseas reinforcements has reached the stage we see now. There has been great unfairness in the meantime and great partiality under the call-ups to date. This last order in council of November 23, as explained in this house by the new Minister of National Defence, only aggravates the entire situation. May I refer to page 6556 of Hansard:

Mr. Ross (Souris): There has been considerable discussion to-day about the 16,000 men who will be called up under the new conscription policy which has been announced. In choosing those men or any proportion of them, will it be done on a per capita basis in the military districts across Canada from which they originally enlisted?

Mr. McNaughton: No; they will just be taken from any part of Canada.

I think the people of Canada realize that military districts represent the provinces throughout the dominion. There may be some slight variations, but generally speaking that is as close as we can get it. This, in my opinion, certainly creates a greater distinction than has existed. As has already been pointed out, it divides the N.R.M.A. army into different sections. We would not have had the trouble we have to-day throughout Canada if this had been a general order taking in all N.R.M.A. men. But these chaps are asking the question, "On what basis am I going to be chosen while somebody else is not?" This order, I repeat, has aggravated the entire situation, which has been so unfair up to the present time. You have only to compare this step-by-step policy which has been put into force by this government since the declaration of war with the manly draft policy announced in the United States on the day they declared war and forming a part of that declaration, issued on the same date. The American soldiers over there have a national pride which has never existed among the soldiers of this country. I have discussed this point at different times. The soldiers of the United States are proud of their draft system, because under that system there is no distinction and they have not the rancour that exists in this nation of ours.

We are assembled here to deal with the reinforcement problem, conscription having already been introduced and enforced by this government. The correspondence between the Prime Minister and the former Minister of National Defence, now the hon. member for Prince, which correspondence has been tabled, clearly proves the inconsistency of the Prime Minister. If in this country there is a threat of anarchy now, as was stated by the Prime Minister, it comes as a direct result of the false leadership and citizenship of the present Prime Minister and his present King-scription policy.

The Prime Minister is not a military man and he has never visited our men on service in the theatres of war. Probably he is the only head of an allied nation who has not visited the servicemen in theatres of war or at the battle front, and in my opinion that is very important. Nothing has done more to establish the morale of the fighting men than these periodic visits of Churchill to the front. Think again of the President of the United States, under his great physical handicap, doing the same thing. I think that has had a great effect on the morale of the citizens of those countries. I might say also that Sir Robert Borden, during the last war when he was Prime Minister, went and saw the men in the front line. I remember how thrilled I was as a man in the front lines to see the Prime Minister come to the battlefields at that time. It meant a great deal to me in those dark days.

Last autumn it was stated that young Canadians without sufficient conditioning and training were becoming casualties at the front. I have some personal knowledge of that so far as my own neighbourhood is concerned. I think of one family about twenty miles from where I live. Early in August they received that sad cablegram intimating that the youngest of three boys on service had been killed in action. I can remember how that young man felt a few months ago when he first received his draft call. His father being an ex-serviceman himself, these boys naturally volunteered for active service. When they received their draft call they volunteered for active service because they would not think of asking for deferment or postponement; it was not in their blood. I shall never forget the occasion on which I drove to that little village to attend a memorial service one harvest day and the bitter words of anguish expressed to me by the mother concerning all parliamentarians. If you knew exactly the situation that exists there you would fully sympathize with that lady.

That was only one of many such cases in that neighbourhood during August and September, where casualties were being reported. Men had not been enlisted long enough to be properly conditioned and trained and were being reported as casualties time and again not from one unit but from many. At the same time we had, not one unit, but units of N.R.M.A. men coming from a distance, some of them not being able to speak good English, and they were taking in the harvest on some farms where parents were receiving cablegrams informing them that their sons had been killed. At the same time some of these other men had been under the N.R.M.A. for three or four years. You can imagine the bitterness that has been created throughout southwestern Manitoba in consequence of this situation. These are actual facts. I have case histories of my own in my particular corner of the country, and I can assure the house that the feeling which has been engendered as a result of N.R.M.A. men coming out, many from large cities, who had never seen a farm, and being set to work on farms where every male member of the family of military age had volunteered, is something that does not make for a healthy situation.

I think of another chap from my vicinity, a lad under twenty years of age with just a few months' service. He had been reported as having been wounded three times in August. I cannot tell you how severely he was wounded, but his relatives were notified that he had suffered three times in August, and before the end of that month the sad message came to say that he had been killed in action. You can conceive the feelings of these people throughout that part of the country.

This is a policy with which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has had a good deal to do. As Minister of National War Services he had to do with the registration that was made in this country, but little had been done otherwise. Some of us realize what the state of his mind is to-day as to reinforcements. I would not embarrass him at this time with the statement he made in secret session about reinforcements for overseas, but it is not a healthy situation.

The former minister of national defence, now the hon. member for Prince, went overseas and visited the battle fronts during October to ascertain for himself the actual facts, and I commend him for that manly stand and for his decision to do as he did. He cabled to the Prime Minister from London on October 13 indicating his apprehensions, and he reported personally upon his return on October 18. He said it appeared clearly enough that the volunteer personnel would not be made available to meet the needs and that there was no alternative but to recommend that N.R.M.A. personnel be sent overseas as reinforcements. He felt that this was necessary to fulfil our pledges to our fighting men.

The Prime Minister rejected that recommendation made by practical men from the battle front, the then minister of national defence and his chief of staff, General Stuart. Both of these honourable gentlemen have resigned as a result of that rejection. The Prime Minister then called on General McNaughton, a man who about a year ago was relieved of the command of the Canadian army, in my opinion for good and sufficient reasons, which may be known to the public after the close of the war. I will not press the matter further now, but I am satisfied that when the story can be told this statement of mine will be proved. He said he could succeed with the volunteer system and he was sworn to office as Minister of National Defence on November 2. This was done, despite the fact that he is reported in the press on October 26, 1944, to have stated that he knew nothing about the reinforcement situation and the reports of untrained casualties, professing that he had been away from the whole situation for a considerable time and that he knew utterly nothing of the situation before the previous week. Two weeks after assuming office the new minister called a meeting in Ottawa for November 14 of the general officers commanding military districts across Canada, and they told him that, in their opinion, these men could not be obtained voluntarily, although they were willing to make another try after their meeting, and as a result one of these officers commanding a military district resigned his position to prove his good faith in the matter. Still, a week later, the minister stated that the voluntary system would be satisfactory. His comrades overseas and in Canada are thus betrayed in their greatest hour of need.

On November 22, the day this house assembled, the Prime Minister gave notice in Votes and Proceedings of a vote of confidence motion in the policies of this government. On Thursday, November 23, he presented an order in council which reversed his avowed policy, and we are asked to vote on the original motion. What are we to think of such a condition as that? How are we conscientiously, as we have been asked by previous speakers to-day, to support the government on its policies in view of that situation?

The Prime Minister made reference in, I thought, rather slighting terms to the stand of the Canadian Legion. Let me say right here that no organization in Canada has done more to assist in an all-out war effort than has the Canadian Legion. I was a bit disappointed to hear the ex-Minister of National Defence state the other evening that they had not given him much assistance. I do not think he had really considered the seriousness of that statement, because it is not in keeping with the facts as I know them.

Mr. RALSTON: I as speaking about the voluntary recruiting campaign.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Correct. I am just coming to that. Before I forget it, may I say that either in 1941 or 1942 the then Minister of National Defence wrote every member of the House of Commons urging them to assist in every way they could in the matter of voluntary recruiting. I well remember the time when I was privileged to return home and attend a very large gathering of the Manitoba command of the Canadian Legion which was then being held in the east end of my riding. I appealed for recruits in every part of the province, and I defy any member or members of this government from my province to come forward and state when and how he or they endeavoured to carry out the appeal for recruits on a volunatry basis for this government to the extent that I have done. If they did so, I have not known of it.

As to the reference to the Canadian Legion, it may not be realized that 16,000 of their ex-servicemen have enlisted in this war; they have also some 84,000 sons and daughters in the war, and I do not need to take the time of the house to go into details of the manner in which the organization has assisted voluntary recruitment throughout Canada. There is a great debt of gratitude owing to members of that great organization at this time.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend permit me a moment? What I was referring to was the active recruiting campaigns. I just mentioned in passing at the time that there was some complaint, in connection with the present campaign, that the legion had not participated.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I indicated what I thought was a fact, that the legion had not officially entered into recruiting campaigns to any large extent in the past. If I am wrong about that I withdraw it. I can say quite clearly and emphatically that the legion have assisted in many, many branches of our war effort; but in connection with the voluntary campaign I had not remembered that the legion officially had taken a particularly strong or active stand. If I am wrong I certainly withdraw it. I myself am a member of the legion, and am only too happy to make acknowledgment of everything that the legion has done; they have given outstanding service, and it has not just been in the department of recruiting alone, it includes leave, rehabilitation, dependents' allowance and various other things which they have taken up with me, and as to which they have been most active and helpful. At the same time I certainly cannot speak too highly of the fine example set by enlistments of my old comrades, the legion members themselves, and their sons and daughters.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I accept the hon. member's statement. I know that he has been an efficient and effective member of the Canadian Legion. That is why I was surprised that he made the statement he did, and I doubted if he intended the meaning it conveyed in print. He has been an excellent member of the legion.

I spoke to some extent about the Manitoba command. I wish to refer just to one wire, among many telegrams and letters which I have received and which I will not take the time of the house to read. This wire is from the president of the Manitoba command of the legion, Mr. C. Rhodes Smith, who also is a Liberal member of the Manitoba legislature, and I am proud to think that we have citizens who at this time rise above party on this great issue.

J. A. Ross, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Manitoba command Canadian Legion which embraces your constituency and comprises one hundred fifty branches strongly urges you acquaint yourself with statement issued by our dominion council November sixth addressed people of Canada regarding necessity for conscription in view urgency of situation and requests your support of same in forthcoming session.

C. Rhodes Smith,
President.

I do not know that it was necessary that I should do this, because on November 10, 1941, as is recorded on pages 4210 and 4211 of Hansard, I spoke and endorsed in full the Canadian Legion brief which had been presented on October 21 of that same year to the Prime Minister and the cabinet. I think probably I was the first member of the house to do that. The independent Liberal member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) about the same time took the same stand; we were the first to do so. In proof of my stand on that date, I quote some of my remarks. While endorsing the Canadian Legion's brief, which was presented to the government on October 21, I said:

At this time, after all that has happened, as one soldier to another might I suggest that he—

Colonel Ralston.

—shake off the cloak of political expediency and cabinet solidarity, and really face the critical national situation in which we find ourselves. This is not a matter that affects his department alone. . . . I believe the situation overseas is much more critical than many people throughout Canada realize.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Ever since the fall of France I have taken the definite stand that, whenever D-day arrived—and I had no idea when it would be—we were going to suffer considerable casualties; and as the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) said, from previous experience we would have to provide heavy reinforcements when those casualties occurred. In his three-hour discussion the other night the Prime Minister spoke of the five years of conflict. True enough, but let me remind him that it is only six months since D-day, and the great bulk of our infantry casualties have been incurred during that six-months period—not over the five years but over the past six months. It was for this expected situation that I had been so concerned ever since the fall of France and other countries during 1940.

I had an experience a couple of days before I left to come to this session. While travelling on the train I met an old gentleman who had come to this country from mid-Europe. He was talking to a neighbour of his who comes from northern Manitoba. He stated to his neighbour that he had three sons in the services, one active and two in this drafted army. The tears were running down his face as he told us of the embarrassment which he felt in his own neighbourhood because of this situation. He said, "You know, I come from Europe, and I have always supported the Prime Minister and his government." "But," he said, and I will not repeat exactly the expressions he used, "if he and his spineless government had passed that one order making all of these boys available for overseas service, I would not live in that state of embarrassment with my neighbours to-day, and I would be proud of all three sons." It is not the easiest thing in the world for a father to tell young men of twenty-four or twenty-five years of age or thereabouts what their duty is. They have an opinion of their own. He places the blame distinctly on the Prime Minister and his government.

I think of a woman, a neighbour of mine, who, as a girl in her teens, during the last war witnessed her father go to war in 1915. Since 1939 she has seen her husband, a brother and a son go to this war, and her husband is now a casualty. That is only one of many cases in this country. It has been said by many of these people that one who is not a father cannot possibly realize just what this terrible situation means. Think of the woman I have just mentioned, and the womanhood of Canada who are so interested in the support of our gallant fighting forces overseas to-day. Surely they are entitled to some just consideration in this issue.

In my opinion there are only two or three ministers now on the government front benches who carry great weight or the necessary degree of confidence of the Canadian public. The public has much greater confidence in these ministers and the minister who was forced to retire than they have in the Prime Minister. We had the example of Chamberlain and the difficulties in Britain when he called on Churchill to succeed him without an election. If the few ministers I have referred to are determined to carry on our war effort on a party basis and under the present Prime Minister, then democracy, for which our boys are fighting, should be allowed to function.

The house will remember that the other evening the Prime Minister said that he was indispensable in this house—he did not use those exact words—when he dealt with the matter of a minister of his cabinet assuming the leadership. The retired Minister of National Defence dealt with that pretty fully and proved the insincerity of the gesture. There is no argument about that.

If a minister of the government is not prepared to assume the responsibility, then the democracy that our boys are fighting and dying for to-day should be allowed to function. Speaking for myself, I am convinced that there would be an alternate in this country, that a man would be found in whom the public would have faith. I do not want to be misunderstood in what I am about to say, because my colleague, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) made it very clear in his statement the other day, for which he said he had the authority of our leader, that we offered to cooperate with any government under a proper leader for the prosecution of the war. I say that under democracy that alternate would be the Hon. John Bracken, a man well versed in the science of government. He has at this time at least six elected members in this group—and I am not one of them, so do not misjudge me—who would be stronger ministers than the average of the ministers of the present government. I am going to name two or three other individuals whether the people like it or not, because I consider it my duty as a citizen of Canada very much concerned about this whole situation. He has the Hon. Charles P. McTague, who has resigned from the bench, something that a man very rarely does in Canadian history, a man with a lot of ability. He has Henry Borden, who was coordinator in munitions and supply, an able man. He has James McDonald, who has had wide experience in finance, and there are many others.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Are any of these men in parliament?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am satisfied that Mr. Bracken could obtain the services of strong and outstanding Canadian citizens who have refused posts under the present Prime Minister.

A general election was recently held in that great nation to the south of us, the United States of America. I know that the retired Minister of National Defence has found some objection to the possibility of an election; but any of the hon. members who followed the election campaign in the United States know that the issue there was chiefly the president's leadership during this war. It could not be taken away from the leadership of that great president. People understood that that was the issue. If there was an election in Canada to-day you could not take the people away from the one issue, the lack of leadership in Canada. Voting took place early last month in the United States without all the cruelty and the other absurdities which the Prime Minister spoke of the other night in his all-out plea to retain office at all costs.

My colleague, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, spoke of our offer to cooperate under proper leadership which is now so lacking in this government. But the citizens of Canada, and more important the men and women overseas have no confidence in the present Prime Minister or the present Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton. That reminds me of an article I saw in a newspaper the other day: "This team will bear watching." The ex-minister has taken on something if he is going to watch them and obtain reinforcements in the numbers that are necessary. I think that statement is relevant at this time, that that team will bear watching In fact, many people across Canada do not and cannot trust either of them. The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence said that they do not believe in the policy which was set forth on November 23. Members of the present cabinet are distinctly divided on this issue. Let me repeat, as other hon. members have done, that I think they should rise in their places in this house before we adjourn and state where they stand on the matter of future orders in council for reinforcements.

There is rancour and unrest throughout the country. For all of this evil the Prime Minister, with his political evasions and manoeuvres, is directly and wholly responsible.

Read the speech of the former Minister of National Defence—the most damning indictment of a public leader ever pronounced in a Canadian parliament or probably in any democratic parliament of the world. There can be no mistake about this. The former minister told of the various inaccuracies in statements of the Prime Minister about a cabinet council meeting. He quoted from Hansard contradictory statements of the Prime Minister. He said that he believed in the amendment proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), but that to vote for it might defeat the present government, that an election now might impede the sending of reinforcements and that he has the Prime Minister's word that further orders in council will be passed if required for reinforcements.

I cannot understand what the Prime Minister's word could mean to the ex-Minister of National Defence at this stage, taking his own speech as proof. How can he accept the statement with no further assurance? I put it to every hon. member in this house. What would the Minister of Agriculture say about the passing of further orders in council to send reinforcements overseas? What would other ministers say?

On March 30, 1939, at page 2419 of Hansard the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

> I expressed in this house the view that it was extremely doubtful if any of the British dominions would ever send another expeditionary force to Europe. The present government believes that conscription of men for overseas service would not be a necessary or an effective step. Let me say that so long as this government may be in power no such measure will be enacted.

Then on July 22, 1942, at page 4564 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

> When the government decides that it is necessary and advisable to resort to conscription as a method of raising men for service overseas, an order in council will be passed dealing with members of the forces as a whole. It will not be a matter of passing a series of orders in council, but one order in council will cover the entire force.

On November 23, 1944, at page 6516 of Hansard, the Prime Minister placed on record a copy of order in council P.C. 8891, setting forth the policy of the government with respect to the extension of service of N.R.M.A. personnel, but limiting it to 16,000 men and to certain theatres of war. What are you going to make of his further promise to see that these things are done, in view of the three quotations I have read from Hansard. The second statement to which I referred was made in reply to a question asked by the then hon. member for Weyburn, now Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan. On that same day I was questioning the Prime Minister and pointed out what had been done in England, asking him if he would follow the same course if he had to enforce conscription. At that time I said:

> . . . many people throughout the country, especially in the armed forces, have not very much confidence in the government as constituted with the present leader; they pin their faith to the ministers of the armed forces.

That can be found at page 4565 of Hansard for July 22, 1942. If that was the situation, then I ask hon. members, what must be the situation to-day among members of the armed services and their dependents both overseas and in Canada?

My time is getting rather short, Mr. Speaker, but I want to ask every hon. member of this house conscientiously to rise above party and past prejudices and heed the penetrating appeal of the ordinary family people across this country to give them the assurance for which they are asking. They are not asking it for themselves. Let there be an end to obstructive evasion in the face of a human need which is at once so urgent and so clear. I shall support the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Peel asking for an all-out war effort. I cannot agree with the halting attitude expressed by the ex-Minister of National Defence the other evening and supported this afternoon by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Mayhew), the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) and others, who think there might be some difficulty about getting men overseas during an election. Frankly, I do not want an election—

Mr. ROEBUCK: You are wise.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): —but I feel that I must do everything in my power to see that reinforcements are provided for our lads overseas. There is nothing I will not do, at any time, no matter what may be the sacrifice, to see that these reinforcements are provided. I cannot follow the argument of the hon. member for Prince, who left the cabinet, who pointed out all the inaccuracies of the Prime Minister up to a given point, but then said, "I must support this government because the Prime Minister has made another promise, and I must give him another chance." I just cannot support that halting attitude, which was taken also by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., the hon. member for Lambton West and others, including the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), who went right to the brink, who stated that they believed what is embodied in our amendment but simply could not agree with this party. The amendment I intend to support reads:

This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war, and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice.

A moment ago I believed the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) cut in with a remark which I ignored at the time, because I had not much longer to speak. He stated that I was wise in not wanting an election. This government has an up-to-date political organization in operation. As the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) stated last evening, they have had all their publicity ready for many months; as a matter of fact I believe the Prime Minister indicated the other evening that they could have had an election two years ago and that he would have swept the country. I know something of the reports coming to the head office of this Liberal organization in regard to the situation throughout the country, and after studying the Prime Minister's proposal it seems to me that he is more concerned about winning an election than about reinforcements for overseas. I believe that to be a true statement of fact. While I do not want an election, I have no fear of one. However, I am more concerned about reinforcements, although I cannot be bluffed by the Prime Minister or any other member of the government on this issue at this time.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house, moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), asks that this house shall aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort. As one of those coming from the main soldier city of the dominion, a city which in two wars has contributed so many men, I regret to say that I cannot support the motion. I have come to that conclusion purely from the point of view of the soldiers. This house knows very well the steps that were taken by this government from the time it came to office in 1935 until the outbreak of war and since; and the policy has not been by any means productive of a vigorous war effort, nor have they maintained it.

As far as voluntary recruiting is concerned, I do not believe it was given the chance it should have had. As you very properly said in a ruling the other evening, Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of this house either to approve or to disapprove the policy of the government. That is also the duty of this opposition, because often in the past criticism has been a tonic that has caused the government to take action. I am glad that the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) has been vindicated in the action he took, that his judgment and wisdom in regard to overseas reinforcements have been upheld, but he should have gone farther. I have never, during the last war or between the wars or during this war, spoken on this matter as a partisan, nor am I a partisan in the strict sense of that word. My duty is to the soldiers overseas. As the former minister said in the last two lines of the letter he wrote to the Prime Minister, his first duty as a minister was to the troops overseas. I believe that in that stand he has the overwhelming support of the people of Canada. In my opinion the way the minister was turned out of office, after having taken the stand he did, was not creditable to the Liberal party or to the government of this country. I believe that the verdict of the people as a whole is that the House of Commons is better than the cabinet; they have shown that in the last two weeks. The House of Commons is vastly superior to the government of the day, and the public, back in the constituencies, are far better than the House of Commons; they know more than we do. The other day I referred to the great losses that have been suffered. Over a thousand boys from the secondary schools of my city have lost their lives during the present war. In almost every block in my constituency there has been a casualty during this war, some boy wounded, missing or killed. I believe that the present government on the man-power question and equality of service has been everything by fits and starts, and nothing very long.

I was not very anxious to take part in this debate and would not have done so but for the large number of letters I have received since we adjourned last August, and the casualties we have suffered in the Mediterranean area, in the low countries and in France. I have been astounded and almost appalled to read the daily reports issued by the government showing the casualties suffered. In days like these I believe moderation should be the supreme law for all, but we should be sane and honest with one another and with our soldiers overseas. I speak what I believe to be the truth. I would not hurt or offend any person in this house by any remark I might make, but we cannot all think alike, and I must say, temperately and moderately, that what I believe to be the truth should be said in a crisis such as this. I believe that we should pursue a policy of malice toward none and charity toward all, even though we cannot see each other's point of view. It has been said that England invented the phrase, "His Majesty's Loyal Opposition", and that took place under a Tory government, with Danby who invented the party system. This made criticism of the administration as much a part of parliamentary life as the administration itself. As I have said, in times past criticism has stirred this government to action.

As I said in the house the other day, the government has turned a complete somersault from voluntary service to conscription, and I must say that does no credit to the party system. In less than twenty-four hours the government of the day and the new minister made a complete change. I did not ask the new minister any questions; I did not want to do so; I felt sorry for him in attempting a hard task, since I had known him for so long. I believe that it is an error in wisdom and judgment on his part, and it would have been far better if he had left things as they were, and not accepted office. He would have received more support from the soldiers and the people of this country.

As I survey the ups and downs of our man-power policy since the beginning of the war I am reminded of the words of Tennyson's "In Memoriam":

Let knowledge grow from more to more.

That is badly needed in the House of Commons to-day, in connection with this question. But Tennyson, in his "In Memoriam," justifies the wishes and the judgment of those on the opposite benches who have supported a total war, and all-out aid for our soldiers overseas. He says:

Our little systems have their day
They have their day and cease to be;
They are but broken lights of thee,
And thou, O Lord, art more than they.

This system of voluntary enlistment had run its course months and months ago. Why did Brigadier Mess resign? I can remember that before the house adjourned in August the former Minister of National Defence projected a most elaborate publicity programme in an effort to do his utmost to put the voluntary recruiting system on its feet. Appeals were made in the secondary schools. I am sorry to say that it would have been far better if they had stayed out of the schools.

However, a real effort was made. That system was dead and gone long ago, beyond recall. I saw the stores and rooms which were opened in support of voluntary recruiting. Day by day I passed those stores, but I never saw a soul in them, with the exception of some officials. I do not criticize the officers of the department, because I know they did their best. But I believe that system of voluntary enlistment was finished, in this country.

I can remember meeting hundreds of soldiers who have returned home with wounds, after the heavy fighting in Italy, France and the low countries. I have seen them at the railway stations as they have travelled on the trains, as they have been in hospitals and in their homes, and I have received many letters from overseas. One after another has told me that the voluntary system was wrong and unfair, that it was unjust and produced inequalities of service and treatment. They have pointed out that it has used people on one side of the street in one way and the people on the other side in another way, without any equality of service and sacrifice. That was where the first mistake was made. We should have had a different system from the beginning of the war.

This is a changing war. It changes from day to day, from week to week and from month to month. That applies, too, to the equipment and the instruments of war. Something should have been done long ago to remedy the present situation. As I see it, this is not a conscription debate. One day in the house I asked the Minister of Justice of that day about this matter. I believe that was at a time shortly before the outbreak of war. In reply to my question he told me that the conscription act of 1917 was still on the statute books, and it is also in the Militia Act and in the N.R.M.A. I believe my question to that effect could be found in Hansard.

Then, we have had conscription for home defence and defence of adjacent territory since the passage of bill No. 80. In addition to that we have had it through the draftees' policy which has been followed for the last two years. But, after condemning the former Minister of National Defence the government turns right around and adopts the policy of conscription, which in my opinion is not total conscription at all under their order in council.

There is no use in our trying to trifle with the public in that fashion. We are told that 60,000 draftees have been called, and of that number the Prime Minister admits that 42,000 are available for army training. Sixteen thousand of them have had some training, another 8,000 are almost completely trained, and 8,000 more about half trained. Twenty-four thousand of them require further training, but in a few months would be ready to take their place in the line.

I am not one who will join in voting in favour of this motion. My vote will be a strictly non-partisan vote, but I will vote against the motion. I am not going to join in any "Te Deum" of praise. I am not joining in any hallelujah chorus, because it was the people back in the constituencies and the press who compelled the government of the day last week to reverse its policy.

Between the two wars the profession of arms was openly laughed at in this chamber. Some said that it was demoralizing, and that all public bodies should oppose it. Those people even went into the schools and supported the policy of pacifism. I am a humble member of a church which agrees with the thirty-nine articles, one of which states that it is lawful for Christian men at the command of the magistrates to take up arms and to serve in the wars.

When I see the efforts which have been made to secure volunteers I must say I am at a loss to understand how the voluntary system lasted as long as it did, because it is not adapted to a war like this. I admit that the resolution now before us is skilfully drawn, but it is full of pitfalls, and it does not mean what it says.

What has been the policy of the government? One day it is a policy of voluntary enlistment, and the next day it is a policy of conscription. There are different points of view; first there is your own view, there is the right view, and there is the other fellow's view. And let us not forget the other fellows' view, and have respect for it. There is "change and decay in all around I see" in this building. This is a most important question that has been placed before the people of Canada. From the start the government has attempted to wage a Liberal war; it did not want any help or advice from the opposition. The result was that the government has not waged the war effort it should have waged.

During two wars and in the period of depression between those wars I supported national service, and equality of service and sacrifice. The people want to know the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, about this matter. This problem is their problem. But the government could not make up its mind last week, even for twenty-four hours. It is conducting the war, and it is a duty of the government to conduct that war overseas, so long as it is the government of the day.

In the last war a million men went from the dominions to fight. We know that 130,000 of them fell on the field of battle. They went there under their own status, sovereignty and autonomy. They went to the side of the mother country; her cause was the cause of all, and what they did changed the history of the whole civilized world.

I can remember quite well the period between the two wars when 200,000 youth were coming out of our high schools every year. I can recall the actions of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and his supporters. The other day he attacked the Conservative party, or the Progressive Conservative party as it is now called. We do not need to be called the Progressive Conservative party because we have always been progressive. Some of us between the two wars advocated a policy of rearmament, national service, full publicity of foreign affairs, complete service and sacrifice and of every citizen doing his duty. The dictators solved the unemployment problem in their countries by preparing for war, and we should solve our unemployment problem by preparing for peace.

We must use our natural resources to even out the trade cycle. I contended that full use should be made of the 200,000 youth who were coming out of the high schools yearly during Hitler's ascension to power from 1935 to 1939. I contended that they should have military training instead of having to ride the rods. An apprenticeship system extending over three to five years should have been set up. These youths could have learned a trade and gained some knowledge of our key industries. They should have been given this training, along with their board and lodging and some pocket money, and deferred pay and physical and military training during the depression that engulfed the whole world.

If that action had been taken when the war broke out we would have had 25,000 trained mechanics and pilots for our air force. But nothing was done and I never heard the gentlemen to my left make any protest. Most of them were not even in the house then; some were. They believed in complete pacifism. They thought the war would never come. They argued that we could depend upon Washington and the league for any defence that we needed. Why have we had to go through all these elaborate ceremonials during the past month?

Since the war started we have had a plebiscite; then we had a census; then we had bill No. 80, and then we had a national selective service register. All this was done when it was the plain duty of the government to wage a total war with total conscription. There should have been a policy of sending adequate reinforcements overseas weekly and monthly as they were needed. These reinforcements should have been sent to our troops who had borne the heat and burden of the day, some of them for nearly four or five years.

What did the government do? It showed a magnificent disregard for the need of a proper survey to show the true facts, and it relied on tradition for the conduct of the war. It operated on old and obsolete war rules; it took the provincial and parochial view of the man-power situation, and there has been no equality of service or sacrifice. It has resorted to the old system since 1940. When I review the situation, when I recall the excuses, coma, inertia, doubt, fear, delays, procrastinations, postponements, fireworks and somersaults that have taken place, I am driven to believe that the government's action is something like what a soldier said of the charge of the Light Brigade which he witnessed: "C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la guerre." "It is magnificent, but it is not war."

That has been the policy of the government for some time until the minister gave a proper report. Everybody knew that reinforcements were urgently required. Everybody knew that reserves were needed overseas, but until the report of the minister was brought down, nothing was done. The minister had a plan to do it now and do it right, to do it for all time, for yesterday, to-day and forever—to provide total reinforcements of draftees at once.

I have no further confidence that the government will ever solve this question. The whole policy of the Prime Minister has been nothing but shadow-boxing and window-dressing at a time when the main issue has been the absolute and immediate need for reinforcements overseas.

We should not speculate too much about the end of the war, even though Mr. Churchill tells us that it may end by next summer. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) made a prediction, but I do not know whether he was telling a fish story. He said that the war was about at an end. As I say, that may be a fish story in connection with which he is an expert, but the fact is that we should not be prophesying about the end of this war.

No doubt the German army will be beaten. The dictators made the greatest preparations for this war, but we sat and did nothing. The democracies which had made no preparations have beaten the dictators at least so far. If the necessary reinforcements were provided, the war would be shortened. No one can tell when the Germans will capitulate. They are a tough crowd of thugs and murderers, ten times as tough as they were from 1914 to 1918. They are the toughest crowd that has ever been turned out in the history of military warfare. A bunch of terrorists, brigands and murderers are now at the head of Germany. They have seized power and they can keep going much longer. They are going to keep going; the fighting will be much harder, and our casualties will be much greater.

Nobody has as yet offered any plan as to how Germany will be curbed after this war. Fortunately the war is being carried to them, but after the war is over we are likely to have lots of trouble with them. One good thing is that many of the young Germans who would be likely to give us the most trouble are being destroyed. Russia and Poland have a plan; they are going to keep one or two million Germans and make them work to rebuild their countries. Those Germans will have to work just for their food and clothing. The same policy should be followed by the low countries, France, Czechoslovakia, Belgium and Norway. Camps of these Germans should be established to rebuild these different countries.

I have a few constructive remarks to make to the government in this connection, but before I do so I should like to refer to the fact that Mr. Churchill has just had another birthday. There is one thing about the British constitution; the British have acted the same way in this war as they did in the Crimean war when they put out the Quaker and they put in the pugilist. This pugilist had a birthday yesterday, and he is the one pugilist who is going to give these dictators a complete knock-out in a very few months. I have every respect for our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) expressed yesterday. One great advantage of the constitution of the mother country is the fact that in peace or war it can change itself to meet any circumstance or situation. It is said that the British cabinet under Aberdeen during the Crimean war was the greatest cabinet since the Reform Act, 1836; yet that cabinet was put out.

As Sir Walter Bagehot says in his textbook, "The Law and English Constitution":

> Under a cabinet constitution at a sudden emergency this people can choose a ruler for the occasion. It is quite possible and even likely that he would not be ruler before the occasion. The great qualities, the imperious will, the rapid energy, the eager nature fit for a great crisis are not required—are impediments—in common times. A Lord Liverpool is better in everyday politics than a Chatham—a Louis Philippe far better than a Napoleon. By the structure of the world we often want, at the sudden occurrence of a grave tempest, to change the helmsman—to replace the pilot of the calm by the pilot of the storm. In England we have had so few catastrophies since our constitution attained maturity, that we hardly appreciate this latent excellence. We have not needed a Cavour to rule a revolution—a representative man above all men fit for a great occasion, and by a natural legal mode brought in to rule. But even in England, at what was the nearest to a great sudden crisis which we have had of late years—at the Crimean difficulty—we used this inherent power. We abolished the Aberdeen cabinet, the ablest we have had, perhaps since the Reform Act—a cabinet not only adapted, but eminently adapted, for every sort of merit then wanted, who, when he feels the steady power of England behind him will advance without reluctance, and will strike without restraint. As was said at the time, "we turned out the Quaker, and put in the pugilist."

During the first days of this parliament one hon. member used some remarks which I did not then concur in. The statement was made that the ministry should resign. I take issue with this position. As I have said before, the people elected this government with 178 seats. They were elected by the Canadian people, and therefore the responsibility rests upon the government to conduct the war as long as they are the government and to make an all-out effort so that our troops shall receive the necessary reinforcements.

I agree with what the member for Dufferin-Simcoe said with reference to the Prime Minister. I believe in moderation, especially in these days, and I have already given my reasons why we cannot all share the same views. I suggest to the government, however, that the army needs men. There are too many men now in the R.C.A.F. Why could we not have a division of R.C.A.F. infantry organized? I have seen dozens of these young fellows just out of high school, and many of them spent all summer and all fall erecting wooden structures in connection with the training in No. 1 manning pool. They were devoting their time to this work night and day. I suggest that a ground division of R.C.A.F. infantry could be organized, because I have seen many of these lads marking time day after day and they would be glad to go active.

I would ask the government what has been done to transfer available men from the R.C.A.F. for service overseas. Another thing I would point out to the government is that only about one-eighth of one per cent of the men overseas are getting home this Christmas. I suggest, in order to aid recruiting, that something should be done to extend the time of our soldiers in Canada over Christmas and New Year. They should have three or four days additional for travelling. I have seen letters from mothers in my constituency saying that their boys just managed to get home from the maritimes and had to go back on Christmas evening.

These serving men should be looked after by the government. Why can there not be more transportation for them? Transportation is provided for different people travelling all over Canada. Look at the control boards. The trains throughout the country are crowded with people who could very well make room for our fighting men. We have people travelling with missions to the old land and to the United States. In fact, we have in Washington a small expeditionary force there. There is no trouble about transportation for them; why should our soldiers overseas not get transportation home with all the aid our navy and shipping can give if we had reinforcements?

As regards these 16,000 men for whom the order in council makes provision, we could raise from fifty to sixty or seventy thousand men if we went about it properly. Many of our young soldiers of eighteen or nineteen years of age are being killed, and others have been overseas for three, four and five years. They should be brought home for keeps, and something should be done about that immediately.

This is a war that is changing from month to month and I should like to see some clarification of this order in council. I do not want to bother the new minister with questions, but there is one important matter that I would bring to his attention. I would ask him this question: Does a civilian lose his rights when he joins the army? When the war broke out we had no army, no navy, no air force, nothing; we had to start from scratch. We have a citizens army in this country because we had to start from scratch. But it seems that when certain soldier people discuss matters of vital concern to the country action is taken to curb them. If they wish to express an opinion concerning a military question, the question of volunteer service versus compulsion, steps are taken to prevent them from expressing their views. Should all their civilian rights be taken away from them because they join the army? No one has any right to take away the rights of our citizens. They have not done so in the United States. Look at the campaign that has been carried on in that country. No such attempt has been made to prevent men from expressing their views. Nor have I heard of any such action having been taken in England. I hope the new order will be cancelled.

I brought this matter to the attention of the former minister. I pointed out to him that apparently a citizen has no rights when he joins the army. The former minister two years ago abrogated the order and it became of no effect. The same should be done here.

May I offer some other suggestions to the government. I would say: Keep out of the secondary schools for recruiting. The secondary schools have cadet corps, military training and all that kind of thing, but for those of sixteen and seventeen, the application was refused by the board of education for Toronto.

I have yet to hear anyone sum up the cardinal principles of the new elaborate recruiting policy. Another thing I object to is this. I know some of the commanding officers; I have known some of them for a great many years. I do not believe that it was wise to use any compulsion to adopt a system that was through, with respect to these commanding officers when they came to Ottawa, in the discussion with the new minister. One of these men came from Winnipeg, a fine citizen and a good soldier, and he has resigned. He would not put up with it. I venture to say that if some of these men could tell us what was going on at that time hon. members would agree with me that instead of having the new minister here we should have had the commanding officers. I am sure they could tell more than the present minister. I have not spoken ten words to him since the war started, but I have always had a great respect for him. I believe, however, that he showed poor judgment in becoming a politician.

We should have the reports of the heads of military districts before us. I asked the former minister a question about this in the house with reference to the dispatch of troops to Italy and why they were kept in England for four years. I asked why it was that we had no soldiers with General Montgomery in the march across the desert in Africa when there were tens of thousands of Australians and New Zealanders, Indians and troops from South Africa. There were none from Canada. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe he said that in any event it was not the duty or the function of the commanding officer overseas but primarily the duty and function of the minister. I think he answered the question correctly. I have always had a great admiration and respect for the people of Quebec. I have expressed it on many occasions, during both the present war and the last war. In the debate on August 4 last on foreign affairs I said that France would always be a great nation, and made other remarks in that connection; and I compliment the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) upon having called yesterday upon the citizens of his province to obey the law, remain calm and not destroy property or use unlawful means.

Let it not be forgotten that Britain has sustained half the losses on the sea and in the air while some of our present allies were neutral; and, as I have reminded the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), but for the mother country during two years after Dunkirk, we would have known the awful horrors of war on our own soil, not only in Quebec but in Ontario and the maritimes; we would have suffered the gestapo, the whip, the loud speaker, the concentration camp, and the removal of thousands and tens of thousands of our citizens to Germany to work.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exeeded his time.

On motion of Mr. Tremblay the debate was adjourned.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GRAYDON

REFERENCE TO AMENDMENT MOVED BY A PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANT TO A GOVERNMENT MOTION

Mr. GRAYDON: May I rise to a question of privilege? It has to do with the question of the amendment which was moved to a government motion this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice. As my hon. friend moved the amendment it occurred to me that it was a strange procedure, having regard to the fact that no notice had been given of his resignation as a parliamentary assistant. I asked him then—I do not know whether the Prime Minister was in the chamber at the time—if he had resigned, and he said that he had. It seemed to me that it was a pretty important point, because it was a major amendment against the government motion made by the right-hand man of one of the major ministers of the crown. I do not think it is enough for my hon. friend to say that he has resigned; I think the resignation must be accepted by the government; I do not believe that a parliamentary assistant can just walk out of his job while he is moving an amendment and afterwards move back into the position again, without the public—in common street parlance—feeling that there is "a nigger in the woodpile" with respect to the whole matter. I do not want the Minister of Justice to be suspected by the public as being one of those who were engineering a move of that kind, and I think the fact that the parliamentary assistant has resigned—

Mr. JEAN: On a point of order—

Mr. GRAYDON: I am on a point of order myself. May I finish? If the parliamentary assistant has resigned, and if his resignation has been accepted by the ministry and he is out once and for all, that, I think, removes the possibility to which I have referred. But he cannot be out and in at the same time. I suggest that the matter should be made perfectly clear, and I would like to have tabled on Monday, by the Prime Minister, first, the letter of resignation of my hon. friend, and also the acceptance by the government—which, of course must have occurred before now.

Mr. JEAN: I strongly object to one remark of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), who said that I had engineered this amendment this afternoon with the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent).

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): He did not say that.

Mr. JEAN: The Minister of Justice did not know anything about this amendment before he came into the house. I gave him my resignation here in the house this afternoon, and I gave my resignation to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend if he gave his resignation to the Minister of Justice or to the Prime Minister before he made the motion?

Mr. JEAN: Before I made the motion.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member is perfectly sure that that is so?

Mr. JEAN: I am perfectly sure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the questions my hon. friend has raised, I recall that the parliamentary assistant to the former Minister of National Defence also tendered his resignation. He did it for reasons of his association with the minister, and asked me if I would accept it. At the time I was not too sure whether it was desirable to accept it, and I was far from sure that it was the custom in the British parliament with respect to parliamentary assistants to have resignations necessarily follow the resignation of the ministers whose assistants they were. I wrote Mr. Macdonald that I was in doubt about just what the procedure should be. I said, as far as I recollect it, that as parliament might not be lasting very long, I doubted whether there was any necessity one way or the other. Mr. Macdonald was himself not too sure of the course he should take. However, he did subsequently say that he wished to have his resignation accepted, and I accepted it.

I must say that I do not think there is any reason why a parliamentary assistant should not be just as free as a minister or any member of parliament to take whatever course he wishes to take in giving expression to his views in parliament. There is no reason why a hon. member who holds the position of parliamentary assistant should tender his resignation just because he intends to make a motion in the house. I can understand a parliamentary assistant feeling that he would wish to have his motives above question and that no doubt should be left in the mind of anyone that he wished to be free and untrammelled in the attitude that he would take either for or against a particular course in the house. The hon. member wrote me to that effect; he stated that he wished to be released from a position where anyone could misunderstand the motive that he might have in—he did not say, as I remember, in bringing forward a motion; it was, in any course he might take during the present crisis. When I read his letter I replied to him that I would have a word with the Minister of Justice about it; that, seeing that he wished to have perfect freedom and not to be misunderstood or his actions misinterpreted in any way, if the Minister of Justice were agreeable I would be agreeable to releasing him from his duties. But I very much hope that this crisis is not going to last indefinitely, and I am also hoping that circumstances may be such that the government may be in a position to ask the hon. member to reconsider his position later on. Certainly we are not going to adopt a course in this house whereby, if a member of the House of Commons becomes the assistant of a minister, he is thereby to be hamstrung in the matter of his perfect freedom to introduce a motion or to refrain from introducing a motion.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice as I understand his purpose, wishes to prevent any doubt or suspicion from arising as to his perfect freedom of action. He has taken that course and will be released from duty in order that his actions may stand out as something being done without fear or favour in any direction.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at six p.m.

Monday, December 4, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

"CONSCRIPTION IF NECESSARY"

Mr. BRUCE:

In view of the disagreement between the Prime Minister and the former minister of national defence about the meaning of the phrase "conscription if necessary", what is the exact meaning of that phrase, as used by the Prime Minister in his 1942 speeches?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, this question might, I think, be dropped.

Mr. BRUCE: I do not think as yet we have had sufficient elucidation of the question by the Prime Minister. I should like to have a little more information as to the meaning of that phrase.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All other hon. members of this house apprehend the situation quite well, and I hope my hon. friend may find it possible to do the same.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

SELECTIVE SERVICE REGULATIONS—PROSECUTIONS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Have any persons received payment from the federal government for services rendered in connection with the securing of prosecutions against persons charged with violating national selective service regulations?

2. If so, what are the names of the persons who have received such payments?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

PAYMENT OF ARMY PERSONNEL TO PERSUADE N.R.M.A. MEN TO GO ACTIVE

Mr. LOCKHART:

Have any returned members of the armed forces, awaiting discharge, or any other persons, been paid, or offered remuneration by the national selective service offices of M.D. No. 2, Toronto, to persuade prospective members of the N.R.M.A. personnel to go active when called up for examination?

Mr. MARTIN: There has never been any remuneration offered or paid by mobilization staff of national selective service to induce men to enlist for general service.

R.C.A.F.—JAMES A. SHARPE

Mr. POULIOT:

1. From what date has Mr. James A. Sharpe been employed as, (a) private secretary to the Minister of National Defence for Air; (b) air secretary and (c) acting or assistant deputy minister of the Department of National Defence for Air?

2. Did he enlist in the R.C.A.F. and, if so, when?

3. What was his rank at the time of his enlistment?

4. From what date to what date has he been in the R.C.A.F.?

5. Did he receive any promotions, and, if so, (a) what were they; (b) when were they granted to him; (c) why?

[Mr. Bruce.]

6. Where, from what date and to what date, did he do his training as a R.C.A.F. officer?

7. What are the experience and training required of, and the duties of, (a) a pilot officer; (b) a flying officer; (c) a flight lieutenant; (d) a squadron leader; (e) a wing commander, and (f) a group captain?

8. Did he resign from the R.C.A.F., and, if so, when and why?

9. Did he at any time serve overseas in his capacity as an officer of the R.C.A.F., and, if so, from what date to what date and where?

Mr. POULIOT: Answered verbally. Dropped.

Question dropped.

CANADIAN ARMY—MILITARY CATEGORY G.O. 139

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What is a G.O. 139?

2. On what date and for what reason was such military category established?

3. To become a G.O. 139, must one sign with the active army?

4. Are G.O.'s 139 considered members of the active army?

5. Since the beginning of the war, how many G.O.'s 139 have been appointed in each military district?

6. In military statistics, are G.O.'s 139 counted as members of the active army?

7. What procedure is followed to become a G.O. 139?

8. Upon whose recommendation are they appointed?

9. What is their badge?

10. Are they sent overseas before the mobilized men? If not, for what reason?

11. Are returned volunteers called upon to reinforce the list of G.O.'s 139? If not, for what reason?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. An officer or soldier of the non-permanent active militia of Canada who has been called out on service pursuant to general order 139 of 1939, being an order of the Minister of National Defence made pursuant to order in council dated 26 August, 1939, (P.C. 2396) is sometimes referred to as G.O. 139.

2. (a) 26th August, 1939.

(b) To provide personnel for purposes pertaining to the organization of the Canadian Army.

3. No, but only personnel who are already members of the N.P.A.M. can be called out on service under G.O. 139.

4. Personnel called out under G.O. 139 are placed on active service only in Canada and to that extent are "active personnel" of the Canadian Army.

5. This information is not readily available. Numbers at present employed are as follows:

	Officers	Other Ranks
M.D. 1	23	83
M.D. 2	67	185
M.D. 3	37	102
M.D. 4	34	186
M.D. 5	17	70
M.D. 6	18	48
M.D. 7	15	40
M.D. 10	14	52
M.D. 12	32	54
M.D. 13	9	49
Pacific Command	26	100
Total	292	969

6. Those employed with the active army are shown in statistics of the active army. Those employed with the reserve army are shown in statistics of the reserve army.

7. Personnel who may be called out under G.O. 139 must be personnel who have already been appointed to or enlisted in the N.P.A.M. Such appointments or enlistments are on a voluntary basis. They are selected and detailed for employment in accordance with orders issued by the adjutant-general. The established procedure respecting documentation and medical examination and taking on strength of the units in which they will be employed is followed.

8. Officers on recommendation of district officer commanding, other ranks on recommendation of officer commanding unit.

9. They have no distinctive badge. They wear their rank insignia and they wear the badges of their respective units.

10. No. They have been called out for service in Canada only and have been placed on active service in Canada and not beyond. A large proportion of those originally called out became general service members of the active army and most of those remaining are of age or category unsuitable for overseas service.

11. If a returned volunteer has been discharged from the active army and later enlisted in the reserve army he may be called out.

LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD—YUKON TERRITORY

Mrs. NIELSEN:

Is the authority of the national wartime labour relations board the same in Yukon Territory as in other parts of the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: The authority of the national board in the Yukon territory is wider than in other parts of the dominion because businesses which are ordinarily under provincial jurisdiction are, in the Yukon, under the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada.

NORTH WEST FIELD FORCE, 1885

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What action has the government taken to pay those covered by an order in council of August 4 last as members of the Northwest field forces, 1885, the set out allowances therein, and what is the cause of the delays in payment?

2. How many have applied for this form of aid?

3. Will they receive any cash payment before Christmas next?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. The order in council made former members of the North West Field Force, 1885, eligible to apply to the war veterans' allowance board for an allowance under The War Veterans' Allowance Act. In each case, it is necessary for the board to obtain evidence of service in the North West Field Force and as to the applicant's economic status before an award is made. In some cases, also, the applicant must arrange to cancel old age pension.

2. Thirty-nine; as at November 30, 1944.

3. With respect to a number of applications, progress is sufficiently advanced that the board expects payments to begin well before Christmas.

*CANADIAN FORCES—GASOLINE ALLOWANCE TO PERSONNEL ON LEAVE

Mr. BREITHAUPT:

Has the Department of National Defence given consideration to the adoption of a gasoline allowance of one gallon or more per day per man to members of the three armed services while on leave?

Mr. HOWE: If I may answer this verbally the matter is not one for the Department of National Defence, and for some months past the oil controller has made arrangements under which returned men may be provided with gasoline sufficient for their requirements while on leave in this country. The formal answer prepared by the department is as follows:

It has been departmental policy for some time to issue to each man returned from overseas on leave, or on embarkation leave before proceeding overseas, coupons totalling twelve gallons of gasoline. This allotment is made upon application and is given to the applicant even though he is not the owner of a motor vehicle, provided he produces a letter from the owner of a motor vehicle agreeing to allow the applicant the use of his car.

PENICILLIN

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What contract or contracts, if any, have been made by the government for the manufacture of penicillin in Canada?
2. Are these contracts exclusive?
3. What price is provided for such manufacture?
4. What persons, firms or corporations have so contracted with the government?
5. Is Mr. Harry Bronfman of Montreal, late of Yorkton, Saskatchewan, interested in any way in any such contract? If so, what is his interest?

Mr. HOWE: This question will be answered in due course, but I would ask that paragraph 5 be dropped. The answer to that paragraph is no, but I would point out that to the best of my knowledge Mr. Bronfman has not lived in Yorkton, Saskatchewan, for twenty years, so that it would seem to be rather an unnecessary smear to put the question in this way.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. PERLEY: Do I understand that the first four paragraphs will be answered later?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the minister to say the question was dropped.

Mr. HOWE: Only paragraph No. 5.

Mr. PERLEY: That was just put in for purposes of identification.

Mr. SPEAKER: The first four paragraphs will stand and paragraph 5 will be dropped.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PRICE SPREADS COMMISSION, 1934

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What action has been taken by the government on the recommendation made in the report of the parliamentary committee on "Price spread and mass buying" under the chairmanship of Hon. H. H. Stevens sitting February 13, 1934?

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE COMMISSION, 1926-28

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What action has been taken by the government on the recommendations in the report of the royal commission on customs and excise (1926-27-28) under the commissioners: Mr. Justice Brown, Mr. Justice Wright, Mr. Justice Roy, in the following instances: (a) breweries and distilleries, British Columbia; (b) Gainsborough liquor report No. 10; (c) dominion distributors report No. 10; (d) Yorkton distributors report No. 10?

WINNIPEG PACKING PLANTS—SWIFT CANADIAN COMPANY—R. B. HUNTER

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Is Mr. R. B. Hunter, formerly manager of Swift Canadian Company Limited, at Winnipeg, in the employ of the government, or any branch or department thereof? If so, in what capacity, and what remuneration is he receiving?

2. How many men were moved to Winnipeg during the period from October 15, 1944, to November 30, 1944, to work in the packing plants in the Winnipeg area? How many men were laid off from Winnipeg packing plants during the same period?

3. How many men moved to Winnipeg as set out above had their transportation paid by the federal government?

J. T. LETOURNEAU

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has Mr. J. T. Letourneau of Lisieux, Saskatchewan, been employed by any department of the federal government during the past year?

2. If so, what salary, expenses or other money does he receive?

CANADIAN FORCES—CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S LEAVE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What arrangements have been made across Canada for men of the forces and services to travel home for Christmas and New Year's leave?

2. As an aid to recruiting, could not time be allowed in addition to the usual five-day leave, as our country is a land of great distances for travelling to and fro, as the men have no choice in their location?

3. What action is the government taking with respect to an allowance for time spent in travelling to and fro for a few days over the five-day rule?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD

Mr. FAIR:

During each of the fiscal years 1930-1931 to 1943-1944 inclusive:

1. What amount was collected from soldier settlers under the soldier settlement board?

2. What was the annual cost of administration?

3. How many signed quit claim deeds or were served with thirty-day notices to vacate?

DUMBARTON OAKS

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Will the Prime Minister tell us to-day, or to-morrow if that is more convenient, when members of this house may expect the report on the Dumbarton Oaks conference?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The countries represented at the Dumbarton Oaks conference were the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United States, and China. No other countries were represented, and therefore I am not in a position to give to the house any report on the conference from Canadian sources. I shall endeavour to ascertain what report may be available for publication coming from the conference itself and will seek to table that, but that is all I can promise to try to do.

CANADIAN ARMY (RESERVE)

INQUIRY AS TO FUTURE ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): On Friday last the Prime Minister indicated that he might be in a position to-day to answer my question relating to the reserve army and the policy of the government with respect to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Acting Minister of National Defence will answer the question.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): The answer has been prepared by army officials, but inasmuch as it was very long, extending over three foolscap pages of single spaced typewriting, I asked if they could not abbreviate the answer. They are doing that now, and I will table it to-morrow.

PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

JUSTICE—RESIGNATION OF MR. JEAN—CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Friday my hon. friend asked me if I would give to the house the correspondence between Mr. Jean, parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice, and myself. On Friday afternoon, December 1, I received the following letter addressed to myself, as Prime Minister:

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I deeply regret to have to tender my resignation as Parliamentary Assistant to the Honourable the Minister of Justice.

You will understand, I feel confident, that during the present crisis I may think it preferable to release myself from any administrative connection with the government, in order to take my responsibilities as a member of parliament with full liberty of conscience.

I wish to thank you very sincerely for having entrusted me with this position of parliamentary assistant. It was indeed a privilege to have the opportunity of serving in my humble way under your administration.

Yours very truly,

Joseph Jean.

To this communication I replied on the same date, December 1 in the afternoon, as follows:

Joseph Jean, Esq., M.P.,
Parliamentary Assistant to The Minister of Justice,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Jean:

I have just received your letter of to-day.

I can understand your desire to be perfectly free to take or to refrain from taking, without fear or favour and without the appearance of either, any particular course of action you may deem advisable in the present crisis.

While I do not believe that to maintain such a position it is necessary for you to be released from the duties you have assumed as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice, I shall nevertheless be pleased to discuss the matter with my colleague, and if Mr. St. Laurent agrees that to ensure against the possibility of any misinterpretation or misrepresentation of your position, it is advisable to release you from your duties as his Parliamentary Assistant, I shall act accordingly.

I need not say that, except for the reasons expressed in your letter, I would not consider, as I know the Minister of Justice would not consider, taking any action which would deprive the government of your valuable services, which, I need not assure you, have been deeply appreciated by the Minister and myself.

With kindest regards,

Yours sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King

The Parliamentary Assistant's resignation was accepted, and an order in council was passed to that effect, dating the resignation as from December 1.

WARTIME INFORMATION BOARD

REQUEST AS TO PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF SPEECH OF MR. RALSTON ON NOVEMBER 29

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In order that the public may have both sides of the issue fairly before them, will the Prime Minister direct the wartime information board to publish and circulate 87,000 copies of the speech made in this house by the former minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) on November 29, 1944? This would correspond to the number of copies of the Prime Minister's speech, in defence of the voluntary system, as given over the radio on November 8.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have made it a practice not to give direction to the wartime information board. I have given no direction with respect to any publication relating to this present crisis.

Mr. ROWE: Did the wartime information board take the responsibility themselves without direction from any minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The board has power to act on its own authority in a matter of this kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is always the indirect method, though.

THE WAR

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN MAINTAINING VIGOROUS WAR EFFORT—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION OF THE PRIME MINISTER

The house resumed from Friday, December 1, consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Jean.

Mr. L. D. TREMBLAY (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, the undeniable seriousness of the happenings which have motivated the sudden summoning of the house is such that we realize, perhaps more than ever before, the weight of responsibility which is ours. Last Monday, before making to the house his outspoken and remarkable statement as to the present situation, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) while referring to the resignation of the former minister of defence, spoke as follows:

If anything were necessary to emphasize the gravity of the issue that has so suddenly arisen, it would most certainly be found in the words of my former colleague and all-time friend, the former minister of national defence for air (Mr. Power). He has brought to the house, in a very few words, the real nature of the question which is before this House of Commons at the present time. In a word, the issue of conscription has, once again, come to the fore, and it has brought to the fore once again the most serious kind of controversy which this parliament has had at different times to face.

However, Mr. Speaker, at the very outset of the present conflict, and even before, as well as in 1940, when the various parties were soliciting the support of our citizens, the leaders themselves, recalling sorry past experiences and knowing full well that nothing more than conscription could provoke the most serious kind of controversy which this parliament has had at different times to face, took the positive and solemn pledge, in clear, precise and explicit terms, of never under any circumstances resorting to conscription in Canada again. I wish to put on record those very pledges made by the ones who had authority to make them in the name of the people of Canada. At page 2426 of Hansard for 1939 we find this statement by the Prime Minister himself:

In a war to save the liberty of others, and thus our own, we should not sacrifice our own liberty or our own unity. . . . Profits could and would be rigidly controlled, and profiteering suppressed. But men's lives and men's wills cannot be put on the same basis as goods and profits. . . . Let me say that so long as this government may be in power, no such measure will be enacted.

At the very same session, and debating the same subject before the house, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, whose passing we so deplored in Quebec, and who was then minister of justice as well as, I believe, the recognized leader and spokesman for the province of Quebec, had this to say:

Now I am going to touch a subject which is a delicate one. The French Canadians will never agree that any government has the right to force them to military service on the other side of the ocean. In 1917 that was my view, and I have never altered it. I believe that conscription in 1917 was a blunder of frightful magnitude, and that we are still reaping the sad and sorry results of that ill-conceived policy. I was pleased that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition—

And that was the late Doctor Manion—

—said yesterday what I have myself learned, that the results did not in any way justify the taking of the risk.

And a little further on, Mr. Lapointe had this to say as reported on page 2468 of Hansard of March 31, 1939:

I think I am true to my concept of Canadian unity when I say that I shall always fight against this policy; I would not be a member of a government that would enact it; and not only that, but I say with all my responsibility to the people of Canada that I would oppose any government that would enforce it.

For the benefit of all hon. members, and particularly for the benefit of the loyal opposition which is seated, sir, to your left, I should like to quote what the leader of the Conservative party said on this question. I may have to quote Mr. Manion at length, but it is necessary in order to make my point quite clear. This is what Mr. Manion said, as reported on page 2440 of Hansard of 1939:

There is the extreme view that we should, that we must, participate in all the wars of Great Britain to the last man and the last dollar, without question or discussion. That is condensing the viewpoint to a definite statement, but I think I am stating it fairly. The other extreme view is that we must participate in no war unless we are directly attacked.

And again:

Considering all these facts, and remembering the strong views held by both extreme sides, I see a very grave danger to the dominion unless some fair compromise policy is adopted. It seems to me that persistence in either of these extreme views, to the ignoring of the very large group who have the other extreme view, means the disruption of Canada, possibly civil war in case there was an international war in which Britain was engaged, perhaps the ultimate break-up of the British Empire. In the last war the conscription of men to go to the front caused violent racial antagonisms, much disharmony, bitterness and misunderstanding—conditions from which as yet we have not wholly recovered; and on top of that I believe I am expressing the opinion of authorities when I say that it was of no real value so far as the empire was concerned.

Mr. Manion had this to say in conclusion:

It seems to me, therefore, that we must adopt a sane middle course in order to preserve a united Canada and, indeed, to maintain this empire. The policy that I suggest is the one which I gave three days ago in an interview: first, that there should be no conscription of Canadians to serve outside the borders of Canada; second, that we should have full co-operation with the British Empire short of the conscription of men to serve outside our borders.

In view of these statements, I ask any man who is willing to think for a moment whether it is surprising that the initial feeling of amazement created by the unexpected adoption of order in council P.C. 8891 should now be replaced by a deep and general feeling of distrust? The people who placed their trust in us rightly feel that they have been deceived. Is it not elementary and logical that they should arrive at this inevitable conclusion when they are confronted with the events of the last few days? How could we be so misguided as to think that it could be otherwise? In fact, only a few hours before the introduction of this compulsory measure the most competent authorities on the matter expressed their unfailing faith in the voluntary system.

Has it not been by the use of the voluntary system that our country has been in a position to raise such an excellent, such a gallant, such a marvellous army, and that our Prime Minister was in a position only a short while ago, speaking before the representatives of the United Kingdom and the member nations of the British commonwealth, to express the pride of Canada in this army? I ask how it is that this system has become discredited overnight after having given such splendid results. In the light of the statement made by the Prime Minister last Monday, some parts of which I shall quote, it is no wonder that our gallant soldiers who are fighting for us have been denied the results they have been expecting from the voluntary system of recruiting.

After the appointment of General McNaughton as Minister of National Defence —that great soldier, that picked man, that keen patriot who in the worst crises of his country always answers "here" to the call of duty, this is what happened. First, let me refer to what was said by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), and I quote from page 31 of Hansard of May 20, 1940:

May I pause here to pay a tribute to the government for having appointed him to lead the first division. I have great confidence in General McNaughton, and so have the Canadian public. As evidence of my wanting to be fair, let me say that they could not have made a better appointment. The Canadian people applauded the appointment of General McNaughton.

After the appointment of General McNaughton as Minister of National Defence this is what happened, and I quote the words of the Prime Minister as reported on page 6604 of Hansard of November 27, 1944:

General McNaughton brought his officers from all parts of the country and explained to them that the policy of the government was a policy of voluntary enlistment. They have tried—or I believe many of them have, but I also believe some of them have not tried to get voluntary enlistments. That was the policy of the government to make it succeed, all would have had to work for it with all he was worth.

How was the public appeal supported? The moment that we started on the public appeal, that moment the opposition to anything of the kind—

I ask the house to note these words:

—on the part of the interests that lie behind this organized effort to force conscription began to make itself felt in every direction—in the press, by meetings, resolutions by veterans' organizations, representations to members and so forth, with the result that instead of the appeal reaching the ears of the people, the ears of the people were dinned by the efforts that were being put forth by those who were determined they were going to have conscription no matter what the cost might be.

Can we believe in the sincerity of those who claim that conscription is necessary, no matter what the cost may be, in order that our fighting men should get the required reinforcements, when they themselves systematically opposed the public appeal and deliberately refused their cooperation when that was requested in order to get reinforcements by the voluntary system?

I wish the house to understand and the whole country to know that the rebuffs did not come from the province of Quebec. For the information of the house I quote from a statement given to the Canadian Press by Brigadier Edmond Blais, O.C., military district No. 5, Quebec. This statement was published in the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, November 22, under the heading "Blais confident Quebec will furnish support battalions":

Brigadier Blais, O.C. military district No. 5 here, said to-day he had "complete confidence" that plans he has worked out for furnishing supporting battalions to two Quebec district units overseas would be successful.

"I want to make sure my two units—the Royal 22nd Regiment and le Regiment de la Chaudiere—never go short of men", he said. "When I have my boys in hand, I am willing to guarantee that they will go wherever they are needed."

Brigadier Blais said further:

"It's just the way you do it that counts. The soldier of to-day needs a special approach. We can't get a boy to come with us if we insult him. If you approach him right and show him where his duty lies, he'll work for you." No, sir, we can't get a boy, surely not a French-Canadian boy—Il est né d'une race fière—to come with us if we insult him.

May I ask if this has been understood in every military camp and training centre throughout this Canada of ours? I most emphatically declare that unfortunately the opposite has too often been the case. In most of our English-speaking provinces—and I am happy to pay them this well-deserved testimony—the civil population as a rule have extended a sympathetic and heartfelt welcome to the young recruits from Quebec. But in many of our camps in these same provinces, our young men have been constantly subjected to contempt, insults and pestering from non-commissioned and commissioned officers, and even from ignorant superior officers, who could not understand their language and who treated them as suspicious foreigners rather than as Canadian compatriots. These gentlemen—if I may so call them—most obviously ignored the fact that our federal state is a bilingual state, as is attested by section 133 of the British North America Act, which makes Canada juridically the country of all Canadians. They ignored the fact that it is not the races that are federated in Canada but that both races, as a result of our constitution, are joint owners of the soil and territory of the same country.

May I ask who exactly are "the interests that lie behind this organized effort to force conscription," as the Prime Minister put it, and who are hysterically supporting the full and all-out conscription policy of the Tory party as well as receiving the latter's wholehearted support? They are the all-time opponents of this government whose policy it is and always has been rigidly to control profits and suppress profiteering, and stubbornly refuses to put men's lives and men's wills on the same basis as goods and profits. Have they given any thought to the possible cost of their persistence in their extreme views, while ignoring the very large group who hold other views? Have they pondered Mr. Manion's apprehension clearly stated in 1939 that their very persistence in this extreme view might mean the "disruption of Canada, possibly civil war" and, perhaps the ultimate "break-up of the British empire itself"? Sir, it is my firm conviction that they have not, any more than they have given any consideration to the alarming statement made by that strong-hearted Canadian, the former minister of national defence for air (Mr. Power) when he said at page 6594 of Hansard of November 27, 1944:

> It may be that for some time to come the day has gone when men of similar ideas and principles can meet and join in common action across the Ottawa river. . . .
> Millions of honest, decent people in all parts of Canada and of all shades of opinion are in the process of hating and reviling one another.

That, sir, is the consequence of this controversy. I do not want to prolong unduly and, as I perfectly realize, uselessly, this debate, but I do want to add that we who long before this war very strongly held and very frankly expressed our view that Canada should no more participate in extra-territorial wars; we who have in spite of our feelings and in order to maintain unity agreed to share the sacrifices which our participation would impose; we who have done magnificently—under very ungrateful circumstances, may I say—we whose sons and daughters are in the thick of the fray shoulder to shoulder with their English-speaking compatriots, unaware I do hope, of the infamous campaign which is being waged against their own province—we cannot and do not approve a policy of compulsory service overseas which we strongly feel is neither necessary nor advisable.

In a democracy, if democracy is to survive, the majority have not the moral right, though they may have the power, to force upon a minority an obligation which they know this minority is unwilling to assume, especially when that majority, through its authorized and constitutional leaders, have pledged themselves never to impose such an obligation on the minority.

The Prime Minister recalled on Monday, November 27, in this house, that when he asked parliament to authorize Canada's participation in the war, hon. members were all of one mind with respect to one of the conditions under which we would be prepared to take part in the conflict, and he stated this conditon as being: "that there should be no conscription for the sending of men overseas." The only question I now want to ask this parliament is this: Who has broken the pledge?

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): It is not my intention to follow in detail the remarks of the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay) who has just taken his seat; but I do take exception particularly to one remark that he made, namely, that in the different camps throughout Canada there has been discrimination so far as the French Canadians and the English Canadians are concerned. I have had the honour to command two large camps in Canada. I have had both French and English Canadians in these camps, and I can say truthfully to this house that I do not know of one instance where there was any difference between these two races. They have played together, worked together, drilled together and slept together, and never has there been any trouble between them. Therefore I feel that in justice to the Canadian people, both English and French, I should make this statement. I know also that overseas our men feel they are all Canadians and that there is no difficulty of the kind the hon. member has mentioned.

Before I enter on my general remarks this afternoon I should like to refer to a matter which is perhaps rather personal. In the course of his fine address a few days ago the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston), the former minister of national defence, expressed his regret that he could not finish the job he had undertaken as minister of national defence. He also extended to the officers and men who had worked under him for the last four or five years a word of thanks. I should like to say to the hon. member for Prince—I see he is busy at the moment—that as one of the officers who has worked under his department for the last four years it is a matter of personal regret to me that he has not been able to finish the work which he undertook. I wish to extend to him my personal thanks for the help which I received as an officer while working under him. I would not presume, Mr. Speaker, to speak for all officers and men in the Canadian Army, but I feel he has had the respect and admiration of practically all of the officers and men who have served under him. I am sure that he has their respect in the stand which he has taken on this reinforcement matter. But that respect may be dimmed because of the action which he feels it is now incumbent upon him to take. I do not think he is carrying his ideas to their logical conclusion; I do not think he has gone far enough.

This is not a question of voluntarism versus conscription. So far as this country is concerned the question of conscription has been settled. But we still have the two systems in vogue in Canada, and I wish to make my own position clear. The hon. member for Dorchester referred to our leader in 1939. I say without any hesitation, Mr. Speaker, that I disagreed with my leader in 1939 so far as conscription was concerned. In my own constituency—and it is well known in New Brunswick—I ran against an anti-conscriptionist and under a conscription platform. Therefore my attitude has been consistent throughout.

I should also like to quote from my remarks of 1942 when the question of the plebiscite was before the house. I quoted then and I shall quote now a statement which was made by Abraham Lincoln in 1863. I think that statement is just as true to-day as it was then. He said—I am quoting from page 165 of Hansard of January 29, 1942:

> Voluntarism is the unprincipled dodge of cowardly politicians. It has ground up the choicest seed corn of the nation. It has consumed the young, the generous, the patriotic, the intelligent and the grave. It has wasted the best moral, social and political elements of the republic, and left the cowards, the shirkers and the money-makers to stay at home and propagate their kind.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. From time to time this question has been attributed to Abraham Lincoln—

Mr. BROOKS: There is no point of order.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I wish to challenge the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. BROOKS: I will accept Mr. Lincoln's words and not the words of Mr. Gladstone, although there was a Gladstone at one time who may have compared favourably with Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. GLADSTONE: An attempt has been made at the libraries in Ottawa and in Washington to trace this quotation to Mr. Lincoln, and it has failed.

Mr. GARDINER: He did not say it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us take it as an academic problem.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to quote further from the remarks that I made on that occasion, which will be found at page 165 of Hansard of January 29, 1942.

Mr. McGEER: When did Lincoln speak in Hansard? The hon. member surely cannot quote Lincoln from Hansard.

Mr. BROOKS: The hon. member is just awakening; he does not know what is going on.

Mr. McGEER: Who said Lincoln said it?

Mr. BROOKS: At that time there was a vote of confidence before the British house as there is a vote of confidence before this house at the moment. What happened in England at that time? Here is what I said on that occasion:

When Churchill came before the British House of Commons for a vote of confidence, the vote stood 464 to 1—practically unanimous. Why? Because Churchill makes and leads public opinion in that country. It was a magnificent tribute to a great leader and a great statesman, a man who tells his people what is needed and sees that those needs are carried out, as far as is possible for him to do so. He offers no apologies or excuses. He said to them, "I make no promises". I commend that to the people of this dominion and to the members of this house. We make too many promises. If we had not made promises which we could not fulfil, we would not have been in the position in which we are to-day. A wise man is Mr. Churchill. He makes no promises, and he holds no plebiscite in his country during war time to find out whether he should be relieved of those promises to satisfy new conditions.

I quote these words, Mr. Speaker, to show that we have not had the leadership in this country since the war started that we should have had. Great Britain has had the leadership of Mr. Churchill. He has not only given leadership to his own people, he has given leadership to the world. The United States has had the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt, their great president. Russia has had the leadership of Mr. Stalin. In this country we just drift along without any leadership and without anything definitely settled.

Going back to the issue of voluntary enlistment, the hon. member for Dorchester said that it did not receive the support of this dominion. I would ask him, where did it receive that support? I can speak for my own province, and I think I know something of the maritimes generally; I know that in those little provinces by the sea the voluntary system has been a success. In some towns there is hardly a young man left to carry on the ordinary work, ordinary employment, and I know that men from outside the maritime provinces have been brought in to carry on the work in the pulp mills, in the woods, and in other industries because our own young men are absent; they are not there to do that work because they are overseas fighting. When anyone says therefore that the voluntary system has not been a success in our particular provinces he is saying something that is an absolute mistake. So far as Canada is concerned it has been a failure from the very beginning.

The other night I listened to the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) when he said that he had spoken to 2,500 people here a few days ago—2,500 young French Canadians, or to the French-Canadian people—and it occurred to me at that time that this hon. member might very well have spoken to other nationals in this country than French Canadians. He would have been well qualified to speak to them, because there are other nationals who have not done as well as some of our French-Canadian people.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I was also present at the meeting, and I may say that it was a meeting of all sorts of people.

Mr. BROOKS: He said he was speaking to French Canadians.

Mrs. NIELSEN: No; it was a mixed audience.

Mr. BROOKS: If I had one drop of French-Canadian blood in me I would have resented it, knowing what I do. Let us be Canadians. The Minister of National War Services has been going out in the last two or three weeks making passionate appeals. The point I am making is these hon. members are just four years too late. It has also been mentioned in the house that the military authorities in the different districts did not give the support to the measure which they should. I can only speak for two military districts, and perhaps I have no authority to speak for them except for information I have myself. In district No. 7 there has been an effort in the last four or five years to obtain all the recruits they could from N.R.M.A. men who have come into service, and I know that the results have been very satisfactory. I also know that in district No. 6, when this order went out asking the district officers commanding and other military men in the districts to try to get as many recruits as they could, the district officer commanding No. 6 called every camp commander and commandant into Halifax. The matter was explained to them, and while some of the officers started to grumble a little at first, the officer commanding said to them: "This is a matter which it is not for us to question in any way. I do not know what your personal opinions are and I have no intention of giving my personal opinions. This is the policy of the government and we are asked to carry it out, and as good soldiers it is our duty to do our best to see that it is carried out."

These were the instructions given at that meeting, and I know that at that meeting plans were laid for every commanding officer to go out and try to do his best to get N.R.M.A. men in his command to go active. I remember one commanding officer who stood up and said: "It is going to be a very hard job, and I will tell you why. My men are veterans." We were all amazed at that, but he went on to explain. He said: "I mean they are veterans in this sense. They have been through many campaigns. First, they were asked to enlist when they were members at the basic training centre. Afterwards there were attempts to enlist them and get as many of them as possible when they were in the advanced training centre. Efforts were made to get them when they were in units before they came to me, and now that they are in my outfit there is nothing but the hard core left and it is impossible for us to get more men."

The situation which that officer explained as to his men was the situation all across the country, and while the present Minister of National Defence may not have known it I am quite sure it was known to the former minister of national defence, as it was known to practically every senior officer from one end of Canada to the other.

As to the need of men, I think it was known that there was a need of men even before the member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) went overseas. He had his fears at that time and he went to England, to Italy and to France. What did he find? He found that our reserve pool was empty in England, that it was practically empty in Italy, and practically empty in France, and at what time? Not at a time when there was no fighting going on but when there was the severest fighting that Canadian troops have engaged in during this war. Is it any wonder that he hurried back to Canada and placed before the Prime Minister the situation as he found it? To the people of Canada and to us, the only wonder is that nothing was done at that time. The hon. member suggested that there should be 15,000 men. He did not suggest that they should be sent over in December. He did not suggest that they be sent over in January, 5,000 of them. He did not suggest that for the three succeeding months there be 2,000. The minister came back to this country and told the government that 15,000 men were needed immediately to fill the pools and give a backing of reserves to the men who were fighting overseas.

And there is hard fighting. I listened the other day to the Minister of National Defence as he described the great west wall where thousands and tens of thousands of slave labour in the last three years have been building a wall of concrete and steel, built in depth, and, as he said, where guns can play in every direction. This is certainly going to be an enormous task for all troops, allied and Canadian.

But besides the west wall there is also the matter that General Eisenhower has told us about, the matter of crossing the Rhine. He says it will be one of the most stupendous and one of the hardest of military operations carried on in a great many years. I point out these things to show the great need of men at the present time and the need of keeping up our reserves until the war is over. I contend that we are not sending even this small number soon enough. The government should have adopted on October 13 even this meagre policy which they are now adopting. I know something about the time it takes for men to get from the west coast over to England, or to the pools. I know something of the funnel through which men are poured out of Canada into ships to cross the Atlantic. It takes practically eight days to move across this country, and then they will give these men embarkation leave, which means another week. It takes another one or two weeks to cross, all taking up four weeks, and when the men arrive in England, after being on the train for a week and at their homes for another week, after waiting for a boat, and after crossing, they are in no condition then for service. It takes two months to get these men into the lines. I say this should have been started long ago, instead of just now.

Then again, if five thousand men are selected from the troops on the west coast, what assurance have we that five thousand men will reach the ships at Halifax or whatever the port may be? My practical experience, even with men who have volunteered, is that the number reaching the ships will be far short of that. They have to be medically examined again when they land at the transit camp. The other day General McNaughton spoke of sickness, measles, mumps, and so on. Hundreds of men will be quarantined as a result of these diseases. There is also the question of men absent without leave. These men coming from the west coast will be dispersed to every little hamlet and village across Canada. I know in days past, even with men who had volunteered, after they came from the training camps in the west and went home, dozens and dozens were absent without leave for long periods of time, and in fact many have not shown up at the camps since. What will be the situation among these men, with the attitude they are taking toward going overseas? I say there will be not hundreds but thousands of men who will never land at the port of embarkation in time.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are not suggesting that they should be absent without leave, are you?

Mr. BROOKS: I am not suggesting anything, but from practical experience I know what will happen, as every officer knows who has had anything to do with these matters.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a normal thing.

Mr. BROOKS: It is going to be an abnormal thing and greatly accentuated under these conditions. The men who went before volunteered. These men are being forced to go, against their will. What would have happened if the total N.R.M.A. personnel had been selected; what would have been the result? It would have been what the minister asked for; we would have every pool filled back of the lines. The pool in England would have been filled; the pool in Italy would have been filled; the pool in France would have been filled; every fighting unit at the front would have been up to strength. It would mean also that wounded men, who at present are being sent back to the line after recovering from their wounds, would have more time in which to recuperate. They are being sent back much sooner than they should be, I believe, and much sooner than they would be if we had plenty of reinforcements. It would mean also that more men would return home. The former minister of national defence has recommended that 450 men be sent home each month, and I commend him for that action. Many of these men have been overseas for four and five years. Four hundred and fifty is only a drop in the bucket, only one man in a hundred. If more men were sent over, more men could be brought home for a rest. These men are being sent home for only thirty days. I have had some experience in that connection. Men who have been brought back on prisoner of war escort, or on compassionate grounds, and who are being sent back overseas, are complaining bitterly. They say they have not time to settle their domestic affairs, and I want to say to this house that many domestic affairs will have to be settled when this war is over. These men have not time to look after their business. They come home for some particular work they wish done. By the time they get straightened away and come to do the work they want to do, it is time to leave. They have come to me by the dozen, trying to get their time extended. I say that not thirty days but sixty days should be granted these men, and this could be done if this government would send over the number of reinforcements required.

Then there is the question of better selection. Among military men there is a process known as scraping the pot, and for the last three or four months we in Canada have been scraping the pot to get men. What do we mean by that expression? Well, when a commanding officer builds up his establishment sometimes he finds a young man who, while physically fit and able to pass all the examinations, still is not considered strong enough for combat training. It may be that he is just out of school, so that he is kept as a clerk in the orderly room, or put in the quartermaster's stores, or sent to the army service stores. This goes on in every camp across Canada. Again, a commanding officer may find a man thirty or thirty-five years of age who would be considered a little too old to undertake the strenuous training of the camp, and he is given special duties. He may be in category A, but he will be put in the cookhouse, or given some other more or less sheltered job. These are the men we have been scraping from the pot for the last three or four months. These are the men who are now being given training and sent over to reinforce our boys at the front, when the most strenuous fighting is going on that our army has ever seen. Not long ago in my own camp 300 of these men came in. I remarked to some of my officers that they did not look to me like satisfactory reinforcements for the infantry. Just a few days later 500 other men came in. I saw them march past my window in the orderly room, and remarked to my adjutant, "That is a fine looking lot of men, as good looking as any men we have had in this camp for some time. They will make good reinforcements." He replied, "Those men are not reinforcements. They have been sent over here from Sussex to help with the apple picking." They were young, virile men who would have made splendid reinforcements for any unit. There was no comparison between the two groups. We were sending over three hundred men whom we had scraped out of the pot, yet here were these five hundred men, twenty, twenty-one and twenty-two years of age, being sent out to pick apples.

Then there is the question of families who have lost sons overseas. Just before I left Windsor I was called long distance by my wife in Sussex. She had been visited by a man who had been wounded during the last war and who had five sons overseas in this war. Within two months two of his sons were killed in action; the second was reported killed just the day before he went to see my wife. Another son had been wounded twice and was back in the front line. He wanted to see if I could not get in touch with someone in order to have the son who had been wounded twice removed from the front line and put in a safe place. He said, "If anything happens to this boy it will kill my wife." That is not an isolated case; there are many similar cases across Canada. Again I say, if we had sufficient reinforcements and reserves such men would not have to go back into the lines; there would be plenty of men to go in and do the fighting. To me, and I think to almost any military man who has any knowledge of the subject, these 16,000 men we propose sending overseas are considered too little and, for some purposes, also too late.

I do not wish to weary the house, Mr. Speaker. I listened with great respect and attention the other day to the former minister of national defence. I was intrigued by this statement of his:

> I know a few of my own weaknesses. One of the many perhaps is that I am not flexible enough. I was born that way. I am too old to change.

It is a good thing for this country that the hon. member was born inflexible. It is a good thing for the men overseas that he was born inflexible; because, while we have not a full loaf, through his inflexible effort I feel we are getting half a loaf. But I do not think his speech carried him entirely to a logical conclusion. I should like to have seen him maintain his inflexibility to the extent of accepting the Prime Minister's challenge to form a government. Had he done so I can assure him he would have had great support from the people of Canada, and would have had support from members who sit in this chamber. Things have come to a strange pass when the will of one man in this country can nullify and frustrate the will of the great majority of the people.

We are asked to vote confidence in the policies of the government; we are asked to vote confidence in the Prime Minister. We are asked to vote confidence in what is even less than half a measure, and in no way meets the requirements of the men overseas. This is a policy which has encouraged, indirectly—but nevertheless I believe has encouraged—young men in one part of Canada to tear down the flag and to trample it into the dust, to tear down the flag of a country which for one whole year stood alone, the flag which has been carried into France, into Belgium, and into Holland. The British flag is not being torn down in any of those countries. I can remember, and every other returned man will remember, that at the time of the last war we entered certain liberated parts of Belgium and France. I remember well the efforts made by those people to honour that flag. Paper was scarce at that time; but the people found bits of paper, coloured it and made British and American flags. They took pieces of coloured cloth and sewed them together in an effort to make something which would resemble the British flag.

We are asked to vote confidence in a government which has kept two armies in this country, one to fight and one to do nothing. We are asked to vote confidence in a policy which has cost the overburdened taxpayers of this country between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000 each year—and for no useful purpose; a policy which has made us the laughing stock of other nations; a policy which has made us ashamed before our own people.

The house should support the all-out policy of reinforcements as recommended in the amendment proposed by the official opposition. What would it do? First it would assure our men overseas that they would have ample reinforcements. Second, it would assure mothers and parents—yes, the people of Canada—that their boys overseas would have all the required reinforcements. Third, as one hon. member has said, it would assure that there would be no discrimination in the N.R.M.A., and that all men would be used the same. That is what the carrying out of the amendment of the opposition party would do for the people of Canada.

The other night I listened to the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) speak about the call of blood. Well, this is a call of Canadian blood. Surely we are a Canadian people. We may be French Canadian, British Canadian, Jewish Canadian, or whatever you wish, but the fact is that we are a Canadian people, and it is the blood of those Canadians overseas that is calling. It is Canadian blood calling for reinforcements, sending out a Macedonian call, asking us to come over and help them. Fifteen or sixteen thousand men scattered over this period of time is not enough. The only answer this house should give is that which would bring about full implementation of the amendment submitted by the official opposition, and the sending of badly needed reinforcements consisting of those men in Canada upon whose training we have spent so much.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, May I first of all compliment the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Brooks). I have not heard him speak often in the house, and I think the house is not richer for the infrequency of his utterances. His manner of speaking to us this afternoon has been such as to indicate that. We know him to be warm-hearted and unquestionably sincere, and I have no hesitation in expressing my compliments to him. That is not to say however that I agree with a very great deal of what he has said. I believe upon further consideration he will realize that he has been over-vehement on many points, and that he has been equally vehement when inaccurate as when accurate. On the whole that means that he is most often, inaccurately over-vehement.

The hon. member quoted Lincoln as having said "Voluntarism is the unprincipled dodge of cowardly politicians." He was inaccurate on that. Speaking in this chamber on February 5, 1942, after using this quotation, the present Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) said:

> This language has been used in a number of newspapers, the first reference to it having been found in the Canadian Airmen; and when we tried to track it down we found that the man who had written the article had lost his notes. I have in my hand a letter from the library of congress indicating that the most careful search has been made of Lincoln's speeches, correspondence and books, and there is no reference to any such statement in anything that Lincoln ever said.

Mr. ROWE: The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life.

Mr. MAYBANK: I shall deal in just a moment with the hon. member who has interrupted. As was stated at that time by the Minister of Health and Welfare, there may be some synthetic logic in that statement, just the same. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) had a perfect right to speak as he did, and to use as his own expression the words: "Voluntarism is the unprincipled dodge of cowardly politicians"—which would mean that it is his view that all his colleagues, or practically all of them, including the hon. member who has just interrupted, are of that stripe. There was practically no one in the Conservative party who did not adopt the idea of voluntarism, and it was as much then a dodge of cowardly politicians as it is on this day of Our Lord.

I rose mainly to record my opinion upon the matter of confidence or no confidence in this government, and upon allied subjects that have arisen in the debate. I have no hesitation in saying that I shall vote for the main motion and against any amendment that I have seen so far. The position taken by the government in applying the overseas features of the mobilization act to draftees in Canada comes close to the policy that I have advocated for a long time. Despite some of the remarks that have been made previously in this debate I would have thought that I was the first person in this house to espouse publicly the idea of sending draftees over the water. However, in view of what the last speaker said, that he campaigned on that basis in 1939, it would appear that he preceded me. At any rate I shall not quarrel over precedence. It is a fact that I advocated such a policy for a long time before the date of the plebiscite and again at the time of the plebiscite. I advanced the same view when bill No. 80 was before the house. So that I have been consistent, and my attitude is well known.

I see quite clearly that the order in council before the house indubitably does apply to all N.R.M.A. personnel, so far as liability is concerned, with an immediate movement of 16,000, which is the admitted number that is now required. The last speaker made reference to the wastage between the commencement of the movement and the point of embarkation. I would point out that since the order obviously does apply to all, unquestionably more than 16,000 will be dispatched to the points of embarkation to allow for all forms of wastage which have been mentioned by him.

In view of the fact that, as I have said, the order does apply to all N.R.M.A. personnel so far as liability is concerned, the Conservative amendment is, as is usual with that party's offerings, "off the beam." It is right enough in showing that Burma, India, China and Japan are not dealt with. That is the only merit the amendment has in the circumstances of the case, if that can be called a merit. I do not, however, regard it as a merit; I look upon that as a demerit. I consider that this is not the time to discuss the methods of carrying on the war with Japan, and I might well question the wisdom of using these same methods to aid three hundred million Chinese. At any rate, this is not the time.

I shall vote for the main motion for the reasons advanced by the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston), and also because I am fully convinced now that our boys will indeed be adequately and fully reinforced by the dispatch of troops to their side. As support for my view I should like to quote a sentence or two from an article by John Bird which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune, a man and a paper by no means friendly to this government. I quote from the Winnipeg Tribune of November 29, 1944, as follows:

> First and foremost our men overseas are going to get reinforcements. That is what this is all about in the nation's mind. All these political manoeuvrings are garbage compared with the essential thing, reinforcements. That has been taken care of.

Whenever it has arisen this has proved to be one of the most difficult subjects to deal with in Canadian life. We are all agreed about that. There have been misunderstandings on both sides of the Ottawa river. The Prime Minister has said that some people regard this matter as a symbol of domination of the French-speaking minority by the English-speaking majority. I do wish most fervently that they would wipe out all such thoughts from their minds. There is no sound reason for them.

The position is this: A situation has arisen—its cause does not matter for the moment—where it is necessary to reinforce, to succour, to aid our boys who are making great the name of Canada. The expression, "our boys" applies to our French-speakers as well as to our English-speakers. The Canada whose name they are making great belongs to us all.

To harbour such thoughts is really to nurse a persecution complex, and that is unworthy of the great characters in French-Canadian history. It is complained sometimes that English Canada does not understand French Canada; and there is an element of truth in the charge. We should do better, and we will try to do better; but I ask my friends from the province of Quebec—of whom I have many, and I value their friendship most highly—to try a little harder also to understand us. As a beginning I would implore them to stop thinking of us as not being simply and integrally Canadians.—We are nothing else. Above all I ask them to stop thinking of the Reverend Tommy Shields and the Globe and Mail as though they truly represented us. They do not. The one is serving some kind of financial crowd and the other is a mere bigot. Remember that such people are the cross we have to bear; give us your sympathy because of that, not your adverse judgment. Better still, do not give them another thought.

I cannot subscribe to the idea which has been advanced that a conspiracy in the form of a pressure campaign caused this crisis. When infantry casualties were fifty per cent over expectations a crisis was inevitable. Only 34,000 infantry were involved and the monthly losses were 5,000 instead of an expected 2,500. In those circumstances we were of necessity marching forward to a crisis of some sort. But concerted action there most certainly was. Right across Canada all the agents of the cabal that wants a chore-boy union government swung into action. This was their devil-sent chance. Any historian in the future reading our papers will have no difficulty in coming to that conclusion. It is amusing to note the reason given by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) a few days ago, when he was acting opposition leader, for rejecting the claim that there had been a conspiracy. The reason he gave was that neither he nor any of the members of his party had been approached to join the conspiracy, and therefore no cabal could have been operating. Of course the failure of the modern emulators of Guy Fawkes to make contact with the members of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition does not support a denial of the conspiracy, but the hon. member's delineation of himself and his colleagues as the natural people to be lined up by conspirators is indeed interesting from an interested person.

For quite other reasons I would accept his statement wholeheartedly that he and his colleagues were not approached. It is natural that his self-estimate would be different from my appreciation of the situation. My view is that the wilful men who were desirous of wrecking things knew that they could count on these thirty-nine; that they would fall into line quite readily. "Why consult sheep," they would say. The Port Hope Conservative meeting, you remember, bypassed the elected Conservatives, and Meighen did not consult them when he picked Bracken.

Most people have a desire to be practical, and they must be so if there is to be any advance at all. When we come to talk of things practical and of people practical we have to think of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), in my own province, for his impracticality stands out at once; it sticks out like a sore thumb. According to him, the only solution for to-day's problem is a general election. He may say that he did not say that, but he will be only thoughtless if he denies it was his proposal. He urged that the Prime Minister resign and that he suggest to His Excellency that John Bracken be asked to form a government. Mr. John Bracken! Mr. Bracken, who so far in his meanderings and peregrinations and wanderings has not seen fit, or managed, to have himself made a member of this house which the hon. member for Souris wants him to lead. The hon. member's suggestion is that Mr. Bracken will bring in several new men at once—another new defence minister—and other defence ministers—Mr. McTague probably as Minister of Labour—with the Department of Munitions and Supply, and its air problems added, to have a new head—and so on with all the rest. Most of these men he wants to be with Mr. Bracken are not even members of parliament! As soon as they are sworn in, the country is to have an election, during which all the sails of the departmental ships are to flap idly in the wind. For an election is certain. Mr. Bracken would have to meet the house at once. That is elementary. There may be political uncertainties, but the attitude of this House of Commons toward John Bracken is not one of them. No one will follow Bracken.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the people of Canada?

Mr. ROWE: Speak for yourself. Let the people say.

Mr. MAYBANK: I mean no one except this official opposition of thirty-nine members, and even some of them might turn out to be not very dependable followers of Mr. Bracken. That would not surprise. The English, you know, never did become enthusiastic over Benedict Arnold.

The point I wish to make, however, is to express the impracticality of the hon. member for Souris, who can think only of an election.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You are afraid to have one.

Mr. MAYBANK: Perhaps it would be proper if we took time out to laugh at and with the hon. member.

This Mr. Bracken who has been mentioned in the midst of this crisis was not found in a place where he could help. Every member of the House of Commons has been in deep travail of spirit these many days. I except no one from that, whether his views are as mine or whether they are contrary to mine. It is a fact that all members of parliament, of whatever shade of opinion, have been in deep travail of spirit these many days. John Bracken could only employ his time at a party convention getting ready for an election. He seeks to supplant the present member for Neepawa (Mr. MacKenzie). The measure of the two men can be gauged by the activities of Bracken the electioneer, contrasted with MacKenzie the member for Neepawa, who walked away from his constituency convention to come here to attend to the nation's business. He was not obsessed by self.

It was at that Conservative convention that Mr. Bracken used the word "cowardly" with reference to the Prime Minister. Of all men he should not speak that way. That he is acting without responsibility does not absolve him. I realize that he is as irresponsible as the Globe and Mail and the Reverend Shields whom I have mentioned. But we do not need a microscope to detect the characteristics that distinguish Mr. Bracken from all other people.

Just consider the position. This leader and this Conservative party are unique in the history of political parties in Canada—unique in the history of political parties in England—unique in the history of political parties in any part of the British empire—or in the United States—unique in the history of political parties anywhere in the world. There have been probably thousands of political parties and maybe tens of thousands of leaders, but never from the earliest time to now has there ever been a party or a leader whose sole attribute or claim for notice was fear, nothing but fear. To make an egregious case rise still higher, just note the nature of the fear. The fear is not that Mr. Bracken may endeavour to enter the precincts of this chamber from some constituency and be defeated. That is not the fear. It is that if he were to run for election he would actually be elected; that he would be chosen to represent a Canadian community and have to assume some responsibility for his words and deeds which, of course, they know would be ruinous, both for the party and for the man.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Does not the same thing apply to the new Minister of National Defence just now?

Mr. MAYBANK: The nature of their fear indeed accentuates the uniqueness of the political phenomenon I have described.

As a footnote to this story, without bothering to reply to the hon. member who has interrupted, may I direct Your Honour's attention to a brief history of a peculiar naval strategy. Some people think that the Italian fleet did not give a very good account of itself in this war. Well, it did not get hurt, did it? It stayed in harbour; and if the Italian admirals had kept it in harbour more closely it would have finished this war completely scatheless. Even as it was, that fleet was nearly intact when peace came for it. Now, that strategy of the Italian admiralty is the source, and spring, and motive, and inspiration of the managers of the Conservative party and of its leader. They have emulated it well. By reason of such close imitation they will finish probably just about as the Italian fleet did, in just about the same position or nearly the same, as when they started. With respect to honour and with respect to pride of service their position will likewise be identical with that of those home-staying seamen.

I had not intended to speak in this fashion. I rarely do so. Had it not been that persons sitting to my left in the Conservative party, have continuously since this session started undertaken to fight an election in this house with their organizer, John Bracken, on the hustings, I should not have done so, but I think it is about time it stopped. I believe I have not spoken in this manner before and I hope it will not be necessary for me to do so again; but if these people are to continue the tactics which they started some days ago and to engage in mud-slinging and epithets instead of reasoned argument, then it will be necessary, distasteful as it may be, to turn attention to them again.

There is one other point I wish to mention. Unfortunately at the moment we have not a regular minister of defence in the house. I agree that it is regrettable. However, I should like to draw something to the attention of the government which I believe should be corrected. We are going to carry on—I believe it is right that we should—a voluntary system and an N.R.M.A. system. By the way, I think that policy is right for this reason. There are numbers of people who will yet desire to volunteer, and I think they would desire to be able to keep the distinction between being called up and being volunteers.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is that the wish of Winnipeg South?

Mr. MAYBANK: The politically-minded member for Souris interrupts, but it is hardly worth while responding.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That would not apply to the government?

Mr. MAYBANK: I find that we have established, perhaps unwittingly and unintentionally, a distinction between men who are discharged on coming back from overseas and men who are discharged after having spent all their time in Canada. When I was in Winnipeg I ran into a number of cases of men who had come back. They had been getting trades pay. Their rate was two dollars a day. Because they were not promptly discharged they were reduced to one dollar and fifty cents a day, the pay of an efficient soldier. It is very important to such men because apparently it affects the seven days' pay and allowances for each six months of service. Also, should there be hospital treatment some time in the future, to which they are entitled, it would affect that, because, as every person knows, while they are in hospital they are on pay and allowances. The rate of pay both for the seven day grant and when in hospital is the rate upon discharge. The contrary seems to be the case of men whose service has been purely Canadian. True, in the case of those men they do not get the seven days' pay and allowances; therefore there is nothing to consider in that connection, but usually that man gets discharged within the necessary time limit and is not penalized in any way.

I have a memorandum from the paymaster's office in which he seems to controvert the idea I am putting forward, but upon a close reading it is not fully controverted. What I have been describing is apparently a fact because people are going out of the army with that much less money in their pockets.

I wish to say, in closing, that that condition should be corrected and corrected at once, and when corrected it should be made retroactive to every person of the class I have described who has been discharged so far. I am quite sure that it will be agreed by everyone that this is just elementary justice. I only add, in closing, that with respect to justice just as with respect to charity, the maxim, "He gives twice who gives quickly," applies with full force. Therefore I ask the government to lose no time in correcting the situation.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): When this special sitting of parliament was called it was assumed by the Canadian people, I think, and by the hon. members of this house that we were being convened for the purpose of considering reinforcements and the method by which adequate reinforcements could be sent overseas as quickly as possible. The temperature of the Canadian people was running quite high on that issue. Various reasons have been advanced in this chamber for the precipitation of the crisis. Some hon. members, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), have intimated that it was deliberately organized by certain sections of the Canadian press and certain other interests who have been seeking to divide the Canadian people on the question of conscription ever since the war began. I believe that there is much truth in that assumption. I saw something of it during my own campaign in February, 1942. I am convinced, however, that that is not the whole truth, nor does such an assumption account for the full upsurge of public opinion on this question in some of our provinces.

There have been and still are many people in this country who believe honestly that conscription is the only way of securing sufficient man-power with as little discrimination and as little inequality of sacrifice as possible in a modern war. There are many others who believe that conscription of man-power should be accompanied by other forms of conscription. These people—and I include myself in both groups—are still of that opinion. It is also true that many people in all the provinces, not in one only, do not believe in the conscription of man-power for overseas service under any circumstances. I take it that they too are sincere. They have every right, with the rest of us, to hold that opinion. They also have every right to express that opinion. It is true that certain interests intent on securing the conscription of man-power, regardless of the consequences—more intent indeed on the conscription of man-power than on securing any other form of conscription—have put forth considerable effort to bring this question to the front. Some of the spokesmen of those interests who have shouted loudest and most consistently for the conscription of man-power have, in almost the same breath, shouted loudly for a reduction in excess profits and other taxes.

The campaign for the conscription of man-power slackened off in 1942 and 1943, for two reasons. First there was no immediate and apparent need of reinforcements. More important, I think, those chiefly interested in that campaign feared that an intensified demand for the conscription of man-power would also lead to a public demand for other forms of conscription that they themselves did not welcome. While there was a willingness on the part of the Canadian people to accede to conscription of man-power if needed, there was also a considerable public demand that such conscription should be accompanied by other forms of conscription. I personally know of large numbers of industrial workers and large numbers of farmers who have seen on every hand wealth being accumulated out of the war and who were and are still opposed to the conscription of man-power without a corresponding conscription of wealth. Emphasis on conscription, and certainly public opinion regarding the sending of trained men overseas immediately for reinforcements, has changed somewhat in recent weeks. That change has not been brought about entirely by the organized efforts of those who have been pressing, even if at times half-heartedly, for man-power conscription only. The government itself has played into the hands of these interests, whether because of the division of the Canadian army which made three reinforcement pools necessary and which, on the evidence of General McNaughton himself, complicates the question of reinforcement, or whether because the voluntary system failed, or because the government was not kept informed of the extent to which the reinforcement pools were being depleted during July, August and September, or probably for all three reasons together the government itself has played into the hands of those who wanted man-power conscription only.

It was not in my opinion the organized efforts of these interests, whose efforts found little response with the Canadian public during the early years of the war, but the failure of the government and its military staff to provide adequate reinforcement pools during the past few months, that has precipitated this crisis. Added to that is the fact that the first intimation of the need came not from the general staff to the government and from the government to the Canadian public. The first intimation came to the Canadian public in letters sent from overseas to relatives in all parts of Canada.

I still cannot understand why even the Minister of National Defence was not properly informed of the actual conditions until he went overseas and saw them for himself. If one wanted to be critical one could readily infer that the organized efforts to secure conscription were not all confined to interests in this country. Once that need became known to the Canadian public through letters from overseas that public, already having too little confidence in the government's policy, became intent on securing what reinforcements were needed by whatever means were necessary. During the first few days of this sitting I received from my constituents more than one thousand requests for the sending of N.R.M.A. men overseas immediately. These people were not all organized; hundreds of these letters came from constituents who had worked for me during my election on a policy of total conscription. These citizens saw the possibility of their men overseas suffering unduly for lack of reinforcements. That situation took precedence over all other considerations.

At the time we were called together it was assumed that the government would stand by its policy of voluntary enlistment; but in view of the situation into which the government had gotten itself, I fail to see how it could, having regard to the opinion of the majority of the Canadian people, have chosen any course other than that of sending men already trained overseas immediately. I admit quite frankly that I for one was pleased to be able to write to my constituents and tell them I was sure they would be relieved to know that by virtue of this order in council tabled on November 23 reinforcements would immediately be made available in sufficient numbers to meet at least the immediate emergency.

I am confident that these people, whose genuine concern was the welfare of their loved ones overseas, would be grateful for that measure of relief. It is not for me to judge whether or not the high command, by dividing our Canadian army, has made the reinforcement of that army too difficult. That can only be judged later when the history of this war is written and when more information is available to the public. It is a matter requiring the careful study and consideration of the government. It is not for me to judge whether the military authorities have exhausted all the possibilities of the voluntary system. What I know is that the voluntary system as it exists to-day has become a voluntary system in name and theory only. I cannot for the life of me see how a man who is given a limited time in which to become a volunteer or go overseas as a conscript can still be called a volunteer when he volunteers under such measures of compulsion.

The facts are that our army has been divided; the voluntary system had failed to provide reinforcements; men at the front were suffering and were likely to suffer more for need of reinforcements. To meet that need I can see no other adequate means than that of sending men already trained. We had a situation which the majority of the Canadian people could not accept with any degree of complacency.

The question now before the house is whether or not we shall support the government "with respect to its war-time policy"—these are the words used by the minister on page 6607 of Hansard; and more particularly in "giving effect to what has been decided"—page 6608 of Hansard. I presume the Prime Minister means by "what has been decided" order in council P.C. 8891. And what reasons does the Prime Minister give for our supporting him? He tells us at page 6610 that it will not help the army to defeat the government. Then he assures us again—I quote from page 6613:

> If I cannot get enough support out of my own party to feel sure that the men of my own party are behind me without depending on those who are politically opposed, then my resignation will go in to the Governor General. . . .

Again, at page 6614 of Hansard the Prime Minister implied, though he did not actually say, that at present there was no one in the cabinet to whom he could turn to form another government if he should be defeated. He further implied that no one in the entire country could be found to assume that responsibility. I want to ask, Mr. Speaker, if it is really true that after leading his party for twenty-five years, during eighteen of which he has been in office, the Prime Minister has no other colleague sufficiently trained and experienced to take his place should he, for any reason, be taken from us at a critical period in our history. Or is it equally true that there is not in this country another man who could step into the breach caused by the Prime Minister's removal from office? Surely if true that is a tragic situation for a democracy. I think we have the right to consider whether that is the actual situation or whether the Prime Minister was merely rehearsing some of the arguments he intends to use in the next federal election. We have had other great men in Canadian history whose loss has been felt, but this is the first time in our history that I can recall any man, however great, claiming to be indispensable. In my opinion the Prime Minister's argument is a weak one on which to appeal for support. We cannot feel justified in voting, on those grounds, to support a policy of which we do not approve.

The former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) has given us the same argument in other words. We are told that we must vote confidence in this particular policy, as represented by this order in council, and confidence in the present ministry to enforce it, even though the hon. gentleman himself admitted that he is not satisfied that the order in council will meet all our future needs, unless it is supplemented by others. Nor did he evidence great confidence in some members of the present cabinet to carry out that order. But he told us that failure to support the government would cause delay in getting reinforcements overseas. On the other hand General McNaughton told us, the second day he was before the house, that action had been taken already; that certain units already had been ordered to concentration depots for dispatch overseas and that these units would go overseas whether or not they volunteered. The former minister gave us to understand that all these details had been worked out by his staff before General McNaughton took over and before the order in council was passed. If that be so, would a change of ministry really result in delay? Already two important war ministers have left the cabinet, not because this house has given a vote of no confidence. We are obliged to ask ourselves whether a no confidence vote on this particular policy really would have any drastic effect in connection with the enforcement of this order in council.

In my opinion the Prime Minister and the former minister of national defence are attempting to place this house in a very awkward position. Under threat of failing our boys overseas we must vote confidence in a government policy in which we may or may not have confidence, but in which the men in the forces with whom I have spoken certainly have no confidence. Those of us in the opposition groups are in a still more difficult position by reason of the Prime Minister's statement that he will not carry on if he does not get sufficient support from members of his own party. We in the opposition are in the position that even if we vote confidence in his policy, for the purpose of hastening reinforcements overseas, the Prime Minister may still refuse to carry on if he does not get sufficient support from his own followers in this house. In my opinion the Prime Minister and the government can be assured of a vote of confidence if they will bring in a more straightforward, forthright policy that will provide reinforcements and bring about a more vigorous prosecution of the war than we have had so far. If the Prime Minister is concerned only with providing adequate reinforcements at the earliest possible day, and with maintaining a vigorous war policy, I think he can obtain the full support of a majority of this house by passing a forthright order in council which will remove all doubt as to the matter of reinforcements and provide for a much more vigorous war effort, a policy which will mobilize the resources of this country behind that war effort to an extent to which they have not been mobilized as yet. At page 6602 of Hansard the Prime Minister said:

> There are only two methods of obtaining results . . . one is the voluntary method and the other is compulsion.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the order in council tabled on November 23 does not commit the government to one or the other; it does not call for either conscription or a voluntary effort. It merely coerces men into voluntary enlistment. It can only result in further discrimination, inequality of sacrifice, and dissatisfaction. Nor have we any assurance that this measure will meet the future reinforcement needs. That will depend, I think, upon whether we accept the general tenor of the statements made by the present Minister of National Defence on the first or second day he appeared before the house. I realize, of course, the minister's difficulty in having to revise, on a few hours' notice, a speech quite evidently prepared in defence of the voluntary system, and then using it to defend this hybrid order in council.

Many of our constituents are asking us to-day if the government, in its reluctance to enforce the terms of this order in council, will continue to comb volunteers from other branches of the forces. That in reality is the policy the government has been following. Men have been forced into the infantry from the army service corps, the medical corps, the artillery and other corps, merely because they had volunteered.

I should like to give the house one case in point. This is the military story of a young soldier, regimental number H-18581, and the information is given to me in a letter from his brother, who is now a flying officer in the R.C.A.F. This boy enlisted in the Royal Canadian Artillery on December 20, 1943, and was trained as a transport driver. After his basic and advanced training as such he was posted overseas, arriving in England on July 2, 1944, and while there continued his training as a transport driver. The following facts are taken from letters written by this soldier to his parents and brothers.

On August 12:

> I have been moved to a new place with fellows from the armoured car corps, engineers, army service corps and even the air force. We did not know why we were moved, but we are apparently now in the infantry, the Rocky Mountain Rangers, a western outfit.

On August 16:

> We have again been moved to another station, still in Yorkshire, a new place just recently opened up.

And from his letter of August 17:

> As yet we have had no infantry training.

And again on September 3, two weeks later:

> They are sending us overseas in a few days and I don't want to go. Don't think I am yellow, but we have had so little training that I hardly know one end of a rifle from the other. Guess I'll have to trust in God and keep ducking.

Then on September 11:

> My new address is 2-C.B.R.G. We crossed the channel 7th September landing on a beach about 3.30 a.m. Only three of the fellows that trained with me in the artillery are not here.

Then, again on September 14:

> I am now with the Black Watch of Canada.

That young man was killed in action in Belgium on October 9, one month and two days after he crossed the channel with, according to his own words, not enough training to be able to tell one end of a rifle from the other. Our constituents are asking whether this kind of combing and remustering will continue while the government tries to bolster the number of volunteers. I say it is unfair to the men themselves, and unfair to the units to which they are attached.

Reference has been made to the subject of a general election. I do not believe the majority of the people of Canada want a general election fought on the conscription issue. They do however want legislation or an order in council which beyond all shadow of a doubt will provide adequate reinforcements for the future, as well as the present, and legislation which will mobilize all the resources of the country for the further prosecution of the war. I feel certain a majority of members in this chamber would support such a measure were it introduced by the government. In my opinion that is the only form of conscription that can possibly receive the support of the majority of Canadians in all the provinces. From this special session of parliament the country wants two realities; first the type of legislation to which I have referred and, second, a ministry in sympathy with that legislation, one upon which they know they can rely to carry it out. Anything less will not satisfy the majority of the people of Canada, nor can it satisfy the majority of members of the house, regardless of how they vote, by reason of their desire to stand by our men overseas.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I do not often refer to what has been said by other hon. members; but on this occasion I shall allude briefly to what two previous speakers have said. My first observations are directed to the remarks of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) who has just taken his seat. He has not always been so fixed in his opinion respecting full-out support for overseas. Although I did not look up the reference before coming to the house, as I had not anticipated what he would say, still I have a clear recollection that he and his party voted unanimously against the amendment of the Progressive Conservative party in 1942, which called for all-out enlistment, all-out financial support, and all-out support all along the line.

However, I do support what the hon. member said respecting the present—perhaps I should say recent—voluntary system. I have made inquiries all across Canada about the voluntary system. On other occasions I have said that more than once I have been shocked beyond measure by the methods used to force young men in Canada to enlist in the active army, or even to enlist at all. From the beginning I have felt that this is every man's war, and that each and every one of us should give the same service, or should serve where best he can carry on, in the opinion of the authorities.

I was not surprised by the hon. member's opening remarks, wherein in my judgment he again proceeded to attack employers of labour. Not having been an employer of labour the hon. member, in common with most members of his party, entertains the idea that all employers of labour—I believe he referred to them as industrialists—are everything they should not be. However, those of us who have given employment to large numbers of men know differently. We know that the vast majority of industrialists have rendered a great service to Canada, and I believe that knowledge is shared by those who are employed.

May I now refer, but only briefly, to the address of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank). It is not my habit to use unkind expressions in respect of anyone. I am sure hon. members know that in my record in this chamber I have refrained at all times from making personal attacks. The fact is that I have held a high opinion of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. On numerous occasions he has delivered excellent addresses in the house. They have contained much information, and have been a credit to him. So that I was especially sorry to-day to hear him make two personal attacks, one of which was upon the Reverend Doctor Shields. It is not my business to defend Doctor Shields, because he is quite able to defend himself, and I have no doubt that in due time he will take the hon. member to task. But to call Doctor Shields a fake or a faker, as I thought he said, is not, in my judgment, proper language to employ in respect of anyone outside the house who is not here to defend himself.

Then the hon. member referred to the Toronto Globe and Mail. What I shall say about that newspaper I can say, too, about a multitude of other newspapers in Canada. So long as I have read it—and that covers a good number of years—the Globe and Mail has been a stout defender of British connection. It has stood in defence of the maintenance of British connection and British ideals. I will go further and say that under present conditions, as well as in the past, I am convinced that the Globe and Mail is absolutely unpurchasable by anyone who may have the funds with which to purchase it. I mean its editorial and other opinions are not purchasable. If they were purchasable I am sure the large number of full-page government advertisements which have appeared in the Globe and Mail from time to time since war broke out would have had an effect long ago. I am sure that the editorial columns of the Globe and Mail, of the Toronto Telegram or other papers could not be influenced even though this or any other government purchased every full page of advertising space available. I am sorry indeed to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre attack this great newspaper. It is a great newspaper.

Now to my own remarks. When I decided to go home on Friday evening I arranged with the whip of this party to try to get fifteen or twenty minutes, either to-day or to-morrow, because I did not expect to be here on Wednesday. At that time I felt that I would not take over fifteen or twenty minutes, but in the meantime I have been home. I cannot speak for other ridings, but I am sure that any member from Ontario who went home to his constituency, especially a member from Toronto where the enlistments have been almost en masse, got such an earful that it would take more than fifteen or twenty minutes to say what he would want to say.

Anyone who attends a theatre in Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton or any other Ontario city will be greatly surprised at the indication of the unpopularity of certain members of this government when their pictures are thrown on the screen. When the picture of the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) is shown he gets a great hand, but when the pictures of certain other members of this government are thrown on the screen they get anything but a hand. I was sorry to see these demonstrations of opposition to certain members of this government.

In my opinion we came here for three purposes: first, to find out why the voluntary system broke down; second, to hear of the programme to send adequate reinforcements overseas and, third, to hear why the former minister of national defence was ousted from the cabinet. By Wednesday we shall have been here for two weeks and up to now we have heard many speeches. One took over three hours; two of them took more or less an hour each, and many others have gone forty minutes. I believe the shortest one I heard was the one delivered by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray).

What are the startling and stark facts that came out of those speeches. I took the trouble to read the speech of the former minister of national defence quite carefully because it was full of information. As I read through it I said to myself that he was making a masterly address, that he was giving the Canadian people a great deal of information with which to back up their opinion about this matter. But as I came near the end of his speech and read where he said he was going to vote for the motion, I said to myself, "This is figuratively a grand example of the cow that gave a fourteen-quart pail of milk and then put her foot in it." I was sorry when I reached that point because he had done extremely well up to then.

Here are the facts as I wrote them down, and I have tried to put them in chronological order. No. 1: In June, 1944, the minister was advised by the chief of staff that heavier reinforcements were required, were urgently necessary. He in turn advised the war cabinet, perhaps not just on that day. No. 2: In June he discussed with the other two defence ministers their letting up a little on their recruiting to allow him to obtain more infantry recruits. No. 3: during the summer a programme was initiated—I am not sure whether this was initiated by the former minister or the staff—of remustering from one branch of the service to the other.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

22 he advised the war cabinet, which apparently at that time was discussing what could be done with the N.R.M.A. personnel, that he could not allow the N.R.M.A. personnel to be interfered with, that he might need them for infantry reinforcements, or words to that effect. No. 6: On September 23 he sailed for overseas to examine the situation on the various fronts. I congratulate him upon taking that action because that is what a minister should do; he should make himself familiar with everything that is required.

No. 4: In August he received a telegram from overseas, which later he presented to the cabinet, stating that a serious shortage existed in the units overseas. No. 5: On September

No. 7: On October 13, having made his inquiries, he cabled to the Prime Minister—I presume stating that he was returning shortly —that he desired a meeting of the cabinet in order to place before them the results of his inquiries overseas. I believe he arrived home on October 18. No. 8: On October 19 he received a report from the chief of the general staff that the only solution of and remedy for the question of the depleted pools and the low numbers in the units overseas would be the taking of 15,000 personnel from the N.R.M.A., and he so reported to the government.

No. 9: Then followed a week of what I presume were hectic discussions behind closed doors in the cabinet, during which the minister tried to convince his colleagues that he had to have 15,000 N.R.M.A. men. I have no doubt that he supported his proposal with the best of arguments. No. 10: On November 1 the minister either was asked to retire or resigned voluntarily. I do not know which it was and I imagine the public will never know just what happened. No. 11: On November 3 the new minister came into office and abandoned the proposal of the former minister. The new minister decided to carry on the voluntary system which the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) has aptly described as anything but a voluntary system. However, it was put into effect in any event.

No. 12. On November 23 last we had P.C. 8891 brought down by the government, which meant an abandonment of their previous support of the voluntary system and the adoption of compulsory service overseas of some 16,000 men of the N.R.M.A. That was a piecemeal measure.

The next fact was that the minister stated in the course of his remarks that there are overseas in the Canadian army now—I presume on two fronts—some ten thousand men who have been overseas for from four to five years. Further inquiries showed that many wounded soldiers, because of lack of sufficient reinforcements in the pools, had to be sent back again into the front lines before their wounds were wholly healed.

Lastly was the fact that the units were generally undermanned.

There in startling chronological order is the stark statement of what the minister found overseas and I am sure that Canadian people everywhere who read his address were startled by his revelations. I know the people of my riding were, and I believe they read every word of it because those with whom I came in contact when I was home on Saturday all seemed to know all about it.

The new Minister of National Defence decided to carry on with his fetish of the voluntary system.

Davenport riding is a great riding, Your Honour, and the men of Davenport riding have enlisted almost en masse in this war as they did in the last. In the last war enlistments were particularly heavy in the north end of the riding, which had been settled by many thousands from the old land, some of whom had not been here very long, and when war broke out they volunteered to a man for service overseas to fight with the British empire, because that is what it means. We cannot fight a war in Canada, Your Honour. If Canada is to fight, we want to keep the war out of Canada, and the only way in which we can do that is to fight the battle on the high seas and on the battlefields of Europe.

The people of my riding have enlisted en masse in this war also. I know one family with seven sons, everyone of whom is in the service. I know of another family with six sons, everyone of whom is in the service. I know many families who have five sons in the service, and numerous families in my riding have four sons in the service, or three sons or two sons, and many of course have given their only son. Davenport is a riding that all down through its history has rallied to the defence of the empire and its men have volunteered to go anywhere to fight. To volunteer to fight in Canada only—I do not know what kind of fighting that would be. But the men of my riding have volunteered to fight overseas. That is the kind of man who helps to hold this empire together. Davenport riding has sent so many overseas that its branch of the British Empire Service League, the Earlscourt branch, is one of the largest in the British empire, and close by are two other branches of the British Empire Service League, which is an indication of the martial spirit of the people of my riding. I am proud to represent them because my own Scottish blood goes back generation after generation, and in all countries we have been a military race.

About three weeks ago I attended a commencement meeting in Oakwood collegiate, in my riding, where every year I give gold medals to students for oratory, and at that meeting they read off the list—about 1,000 names—of the young lads of Oakwood collegiate and roundabout who have enlisted in this war, some seventy to ninety of whom have already made the supreme sacrifice. How many have enlisted from the other collegiate in my riding, Bloor street collegiate, I do not know, but the number must be great. If every school in Canada had enlistments of its students to the same extent there perhaps would have been no necessity for compulsory service in this country, and the fact that they did not enlist in as large numbers as the young lads did from the collegiates in Davenport has forced the young men from my constituency to enlist to the extent that they have. I am proud of the young heroes who sat on the platform of Oakwood collegiate a few weeks ago, some of them having come back from overseas. Consequently, Your Honour, Davenport riding certainly needs little compulsion. I do not know how many more could enlist from my riding, certainly not very many. From the very beginning they have been in favour of all-out service, not only by Davenport, but by every other riding.

There have been cases of men holding so-called key positions who have not enlisted. On one occasion I was in a factory where I saw a notice posted up to the effect that if any employee felt that his position was of great importance to the war effort, if he spoke to so-and-so in the company, arrangements would be made to keep him in the plant in his present position. I know the case of a hairdresser who is now holding a key position in an aeroplane factory. He has to do with assembling wings. I cannot imagine how a hairdresser can be indispensable in the building of aeroplanes when so many mechanics and women are available to do that work. That man should have been in the army if he is eligible. There are many cases like that in Canada, of men holding so-called key positions who have been aided and abetted in holding on to those positions.

I want to mention the case of a man who came to see me last night because his is typical of thousands. Cases of this sort have been mentioned before but are worth repeating. This man is in the air force. He is a university graduate, a capable and brilliant young man. He succeeded in passing all the tests required of him in the air force and went on and studied the course. He has been in the air force for two years, but now he has been mustered out. He told me last night that he had been ordered out of the air force and that he must remuster into the infantry. His case is only one of many, and I think this treatment of these young men is wholly unfair. Thousands of these young men have spent a long time preparing themselves for the air force or for some other particular branch of the service, perhaps following in their father's footsteps in the last war; and now all of a sudden, because we have not had compulsory service in this country, and because there have not been sufficient enlistments in the infantry service, these young men who have served a year or more fitting themselves for a particular branch of the service are mustered out and remustered into the infantry. My hon. friend the member for York South mentioned the case of a young artillery man, and his case was typical of many.

Something was said about petitions, letters and the like. I received over 10,000 names. Nobody can tell me that these men and women sent letters and signed their names to petitions just for the mere fun of doing it. I give them credit for sincerity. I believe the vast majority of them are fathers, mothers, wives, sisters and brothers of men overseas. They have had, as I have had, many letters from overseas bearing out what the former minister said, that units were undermanned and the wounded were being sent back before they were restored to health. I met a father on the street in November. I hope he does not read what I am now going to say. He felt very badly, naturally. His son wrote that he was badly wounded but that he had recovered. Then he received another letter from the son saying that he had been ordered back into the front line again. In the letter to his father he intimated to me:

> I am not quite well, but am ordered back to the front. I am still wearing the bandage on my arm, but God has been good to me. He saved my life in all the actions I have been in and I trust Him to do it again.

He was sent back into the line with a bandage on his arm. Well, the father received a message a few days ago that his son was killed. He was unfit to go into the line, but because of lack of reinforcements he was sent back. I wish to ask who is responsible for that.

Mr. ROWE: The government.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, I am not going to place the responsibility. But there is something wrong with the whole organization in the country when such conditions obtain, that a boy has to go into the line again, again and again until he is shot to death.

Another father came to see me on Sunday. His boy has been over there for three years. He has been wounded twice. The first time he was wounded very badly. He was placed on board ship to go to England for recuperation, I presume, but the unit became so depleted and the pool so empty that, after being on the ship for two days, he was taken off and sent back into the line again. In a letter to his father the boy writes something like this:

> I was too weak to go into the line. On getting there I was too faint. . . .

I presume, to go right in close. I am not familiar with the military set-up although I listened very carefully to the former minister's description of it. They told the boy he would get along more quickly if he were within sound of the guns. His father said:

> It is too bad. Within sound of the guns. He may easily get killed listening to the guns and not actually taking part in combat.

There is the situation, and as someone has previously said, a large part of the agitation going on in Canada to see that the fighting men overseas are adequately reinforced, as is their right, comes from the receipt of letters from overseas by parents. The newspapers obtained these letters. I give credit to the Toronto papers, Your Honour, for having the courage to publish these letters. They have published hundreds of them. They have come from ridings all around the city. I believe it is the publication of these letters that has stirred up public opinion as I have never seen it stirred up before. It would do anyone good to go to a theatre in Toronto these days. In an Ottawa theatre on Thursday or Friday night and in both these fighting cities that have sent multitudes of boys overseas it would do your heart good to see them cheer when the picture of the former minister of national defence is thrown on the screen, and I am sure you would feel badly as I did, to hear the boos when other pictures are thrown on the screen. That is public opinion, and public opinion in Ontario today—I cannot speak for the other provinces—has been worked up as it has never been before.

The former minister of national defence said the other night that he would watch the new minister. I myself have not a lot of confidence in the new minister. He stood on the floor of this house on two or three different occasions and took time to point out his adherence to the voluntary system. I cannot have a lot of faith in a man of that kind enforcing the compulsory system. I would have had faith in the former minister because he recommended it and his recommendation was accepted by the incoming minister twenty-two days too late. The former minister said his programme called for the sending overseas of troops on November 27 to support the men over there. His recommendation called for troops from the N.R.M.A. personnel. A whole month has gone by, and dear knows how much time will go by before these men go overseas. Major Conny Smythe brought up something like this before. I have heard his remarks discounted, but they were well supported on Saturday by Major "Tiger" Welsh. His remarks appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail of Saturday last and I shall quote some of them:

> As typical of conditions, a draft of replacements from an anti-aircraft unit was sent to his anti-tank unit and, apart from not knowing anti-tank weapons or methods, turned out to be "largely cooks and clerks with little knowledge of ack-ack and had to be sent back to regimental headquarters."

If that is a statement of fact—it is not for me to say, but here is a reputable major making the statement—then I say it is a sad state of affairs. It is a terrible thing to have the units overseas undermanned and the pools in the same condition. I do not think any father in this house who has a son fighting overseas would want to see his son supported so ineffectively.

Further on, the major says:

> But our infantry has been reinforced, insufficiently, of course, with untrained men or men trained in other highly specialized technique such as artillery, while artillery itself suffered from lack of trained men. There is all the difference in the world in this war between numerical reinforcements and trained reinforcements.

I have no doubt that this is right. I do not know anything about it. I for one am deeply sorry that our Prime Minister for whom I have and have had a particularly warm personal regard, did not do exactly as the President of the United States did. I remember that during the presidential campaign of 1940 the President of the United States, if I remember correctly—I have not written his remarks down, although I heard them—and his opponent the late Mr. Willkie, told the people of the United States in the summer of 1940 that they could not think of sending American boys overseas to fight again on the fields of Europe. No, they could not think of it, but once they got into the war they did it immediately.

Mr. POTTIER: Once they were attacked.

Mr. MacNICOL: We have been attacked from the beginning. They did it immediately. Had the Prime Minister of this country, particularly after the plebiscite vote which was so overwhelmingly in favour of an all-out effort, come out for all-out service, as the military service vote called upon him to do, I believe he would have had almost the united support of this country to carry on an all-out war effort. I wish he had done it, but he did not do it and here we are to-day with I do not know what. I have little confidence that the proposal is to be carried out because the new minister said, in answer to my question and questions of other hon. members, that in regard to the 16,000 from the N.R.M.A. he would send them if required to fill up the units. That is not what the people want. The former minister said that there were 10,000 men overseas who had been there for four years, and God knows it is time that they had the chance to get back home for a rest. They cannot get back here again if we are to send over only 16,000. God knows, a boy wounded two or thr times should not be sent up a fourth or fifth time, but I have here the report of one lad who was injured for the sixth time. On Saturday I went to see many people. I had received many letters and I went to see some of those who had written to me. One mother told me that her son had been fighting for seventeen months and had been in hospital six times and she said it was enough to make her see red. Is it any wonder? This is everybody's war.

Someone spoke about enlistments. Well, I am not going to discuss enlistments by provinces, but I will say this. I went across to the other side south of the 45th parallel of latitude in the state of Maine, in Vermont, in New Hampshire and in Massachusetts, where there are large numbers of good people, good citizens, who formerly came from the province of Quebec. I am sorry I mentioned that province because there are few who have a warmer feeling for the province and for the people of Quebec than I have. I will not be guilty of saying an unkind word about them. I have never done so and I never will. But on the other side, south of the 45th parallel of latitude, former Quebecers are enlisting because they have to. There is no trouble there. They are fighting. And in the United States there are some six million people of German extraction and five million people of Italian extraction. Altogether there are approximately fifteen million people of axis extraction, but there is no trouble there. They are marching up and enlisting because they are called upon to do so.

Mr. GARDINER: They have not enlisted in any larger percentage than here, not as large.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not prepared to argue that point.

Mr. GARDINER: That is a fact.

Mr. MacNICOL: I did not invite that remark from the minister, but if I looked into it, maybe I could show him that he is wrong.

Mr. GARDINER: You cannot show me that I am wrong.

Mr. MacNICOL: In spite of what the minister has said, they are all subject to be called up under their system.

However, to proceed with what I was saying, another lady told me that one of her sons had been overseas for almost five years and she thinks it is time he had a chance to come home. I agree with her. Any young man overseas for four or five years ought to be able to come back, but this is not possible if you are sending only 16,000 from the N.R.M.A. The public want the whole of the eligible N.R.M.A. to go overseas and then their husbands and sons and brothers overseas for four years and more will have a chance to come home. The former minister said something of that sort himself. I have another report of a lad who was overseas in the air force for two years and was thrown out. One man told me that he has four sons overseas and he said, "For God's sake, get tough; we cannot win this war unless we are tough; we cannot win it by pussy-footing." I wish I could do something in some capacity; I would be glad to do it. I have another report of a husband who had been overseas for about five years. He is now forty years of age. In my opinion all those of forty years and four years or more overseas should be home for a rest.

The workman is not given a chance. He goes to selective service and is sent on a job and he has to go. Why is it not the same in the army? It should be the same. That is precisely the question that one man, the father of two sons, asked me. I have a letter from a mother who has twin sons in Italy. They have been overseas for three and a half years. I do not see why her two sons should remain there so long without a furlough while others are not sent at all.

In conclusion, may I say this. When I was home on Saturday I read in the newspapers something about a proposal that had been made in the other house, to use the language that we are obliged to use with reference to that place, to the effect that the life of this parliament be extended. I am utterly opposed to the extension of the life of parliament. I do not believe in it and I have never done so. I listened to what the Prime Minister said so ably when the matter was mentioned before, and I could not agree with him if he went back on what he said on that occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will stay with you.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope he does not fall for the agitation to extend the life of parliament. He can count on my support in bringing on an election.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I think I have attended certainly as many and perhaps more of the sessions of this house in uniform than any other of the uniformed members. In all my appearances here, and in the considerable number of times I have spoken, I have attempted to keep such remarks as I had to make in the house free from any suggestion that I have at any time used the experience it has been my privilege to have in the armed forces of the country for my own advantage or for political purposes. I make no apology for the fact, and it is a fact, that in such contributions as I have made to the debates of this house during the last four sessions I have attempted to keep as free as possible from purely political discussions, not because I am not interested in political discussion or that I see any great objection to it, but because I have felt that at times this might have proved to be a limitation on the service I was anxious to give and was endeavouring to give to the armed forces in my capacity as a soldier. To-night I do not propose to depart from that practice, although I make no promises for the immediate future.

During these years, I have, of course, made political speeches in my own constituency in the nature of reports to my constituents, and have taken part in the political activities of my constituency. But I am most anxious that the single purpose I have in mind in coming to this session of the house shall not be confused with any other issues which might be in my mind.

In 1942 my constituents in Winnipeg South indicated by a ratio of approximately twelve to one their desire that this government should take any and every step, including conscription, to assure adequate reinforcements to our soldiers overseas; and in the debate on bill No. 80 I stated that I would advocate and support conscription if it were required in order to reinforce our forces overseas. The people of my constituency, and I as their member, meant what we said—literally. I have never at any time qualified that declaration. I have supported the government in the light of that fact, and because I have believed in the policies of the government and in the leader of the government. I make no boast and offer no apology for saying that to me Canada, her sons and her honour are a first consideration. I have not cried "wolf" when there was no wolf, and I have no intention now or at any subsequent time of accepting less than that which in my judgment is adequate to meet the need as I see it.

After nearly four and a half years in uniform, mainly in Canada but also in Newfoundland and Great Britain, I am not ignorant of the Canadian army, its personnel, its organization, the composition of the forces, their capabilities and their needs. I am not unaware of the contribution Canada has made in other phases of the war effort. I appreciate the extremes of opinion that exist in this country. I know that much of this opinion is real and is based upon honest conviction. I also know that too much of it has its basis in prejudice and emotional stress. It has not taken me the nearly ten years I have been in this House of Commons to realize that in this house an hon. member is all too seldom placed in the position where he can give a simple yes or no to any proposition that comes before him. I am aware that it is the responsibility of an hon. member to think in terms of to-morrow as well as of to-day; that the duty of an hon. member is not only to the living but also to those as yet unborn.

For me, Mr. Speaker, the issue in this session is simple. On the facts as I understand them I was and am unwilling to take the risk, which in my judgment we would be forced to take, if at this time we refused to resort to conscription of N.R.M.A. personnel to reinforce our overseas army. For me the hour has struck which, when I spoke on bill No. 80 in 1942, I realized might come. May I add that neither at that time nor at any time since have I had the slightest doubt that the Prime Minister of this country meant what he said, as I in my humble capacity meant what I said, during that debate in 1942: "Conscription if necessary." My decision in regard to conscription was taken during the course of that debate. It was my own decision, and it left me with no problem once the facts were made clear, as they have been since the beginning of this session. I am gratified, therefore, although not surprised, that this government has kept its pledge. The crux of the matter before us this session is the question of reinforcements. The question of conscription was settled in 1942.

I have said that I am impressed with the need for a dependable stream of reinforcements. I cast my first vote in France as a youngster of nineteen or twenty. I knew what it meant to be one of seventeen people standing up to do a job which should have been done by fifty people. I do not pretend to think that a conscript, except in individual cases, is man for man the equal of a volunteer soldier, but I do know what it means to a man standing in the position in which I once stood to feel completely confident that somebody is standing behind him, that the people at home have not abandoned him and that in point of numbers, whether or not in point of efficiency, the chain of support is not broken, so that he does not have the feeling of being forgotten or abandoned. I will leave no stone unturned, as far as my influence may go, to see that this assurance is in the minds of the men who volunteer to fight for this country. But I differ sharply from those who suggest that the man in action to-day does not know what he is fighting for. I do not suppose any army ever organized anywhere knew as well what they are fighting for as does the present Canadian army. I do not think it requires the fanaticism which is common in some armies. We know what can happen under the pressure of fanatic appeal, and I know from experience as well as from observation how fanatic appeal will break against the solid phalanx of men who know why they are there, men who know that behind them stands a country from which they know reinforcements will come.

The number to be sent now is in my opinion adequate to meet the need. My interpretation of the order in council—and the government's statement leaves no doubt—is that all of the N.R.M.A. men now serving, or yet to be enrolled, are and will be available as required in the United Kingdom, in Europe and in the Mediterranean. It is clear that this is conscription, with all that it implies; and I deprecate greatly the statements of some of our hon. friends in the opposition who attempt to make it appear that that is not what it is.

I accept the fact that behind those 16,000 men who have now been notified by the government that they are to proceed as reinforcements stand another 26,000 who are in process of being readied for a similar departure, if and when their services are required in the field of battle. Whether they go as volunteers or conscripts is only of psychological importance, because these are the 42,000 bodies, the 42,000 physical beings or personnel who were not standing in line. And, according to my interpretation of the order in council—and I think I can understand what I read—those who did not stand in line now stand in line. That, to me, is accomplishment of the essential thing, namely a dependable stream of reinforcements, bringing new confidence to those who fight.

Now, to those who declare that this government will not proceed along the lines I have accepted, I can only say that I believe it will. Because I believe it, I will vote confidence in the government; I will vote confidence in those men who, in my judgment, are not only best qualified to carry out this policy, but also in fact the only government which could give effect to the policy I desire, definitely, positively and in time.

For those who have reached this decision only after heart-searching—and some, I feel quite sure, in some trepidation—I have only this to say, this question to ask: Is it reasonable to doubt that he who has swallowed the camel will strain at the gnat? Conscription, by the application of the extension of territory to N.R.M.A. personnel is, in my opinion, clear and concise; and any attempt to belittle or becloud the issue is not in the interest of that to which all of us who assembled here in this chamber on November 22, gave, at least, lip-service. We were here to see that the men who needed reinforcements would get them.

Some one has spoken of this vote of confidence as "suspended sentence". I shall not advertise the publication which used that expression, because it has been very well advertised in the house recently. May I hasten to add that I do not hold this view. I have no doubt of the sincerity of purpose behind the declaration of the order in council. If I did not have that confidence I would vote for the amendment.

Now, as always, as a private member, I, and those whom I represent in the house, may say and do say to those to whom we give our trust: You must not fail us. Mr. Speaker, I have no fear that they will fail, and for that reason I shall vote for the main motion.

[Mr. Mutch.]

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, before I engage the attention of the house on the more specific subject now under discussion I want to digress for a moment to bring to the attention of the government a matter which has just come to my notice, through the mail. I have reference to a communication just received from overseas dealing with discrimination, as they call it, against the volunteer fire service which went overseas, after having quit their good jobs in this country. These men are urgently appealing to the government to place them in the same position, for gratuities and other benefits, as members of the armed forces are entitled to. I bring this matter to the attention of the government, simply because of the urgent plea which has just reached me from overseas.

I consider it the duty of every hon. member to reflect the view of his constituency as best he can with respect to the issue now before parliament. Last week I returned home with the determination that I would satisfy myself as to the actual sentiments of the people in my constituency—because, after all, that is what we are expected to reflect. I returned home and held consultations with some of the heads of organizations that have written me in the past two or three weeks. I have no doubt the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has received, as I have, copies of many resolutions, which I shall not quote in detail. However, these are groups such as associations of business men and women, Daughters of the Empire, veterans' organizations of all descriptions, and scores of individuals. I say that these represent a true cross-section of my constituency. I say, further, that their representations have not been made on a political basis.

The opinions expressed in the resolutions I have received—and I repeat that I believe copies have been sent to the Prime Minister—are supported by letters received by mothers and fathers from their boys overseas. If the Prime Minister will summarize the intent and purpose in these resolutions I believe he will agree with me that he will have a clear conception of actually what is in the minds of the people from my constituency—and what I believe is fairly well representative of the whole of Canada. They want reinforcements sent overseas at once, and they want no limitations on those reinforcements. I imagine the Prime Minister has received several hundred copies of the ballot which was prepared by the Canadian Legion. This was published in my local paper, alongside one addressed to myself. The one addressed to me was dated November 16 and it reads:

As the member of the federal riding of the county of Lincoln, I call on you to do all in your power to have the home defence army made completely active immediately, and available for overseas forthwith. I ask you demand a recorded vote on this subject, if brought up in parliament.

That was signed by one of my responsible constituents. As I say, alongside that was another ballot addressed to the Prime Minister which reads:

As a citizen of Canada I request that you make the home defence army completely active immediately, and available for overseas forthwith.

Those were both signed by the same individual who is known to me personally. That is the sentiment expressed by the people of my constituency. Never in my experience have I seen the people in my constituency wrought up to the extent they are at the present time. I was interested in what the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) said this afternoon but I do not intend to be quite as modest I do not think that what has happened has anything to do with the Prime Minister personally; it is simply an expression against the policy he is following. All one has to do is to go to a picture show to find out what happens when the Prime Minister's picture appears on the screen. As I say, I have never seen the people so wrought up. I repeat that all this is not against the Prime Minister personally, it is simply because of the serious situation that has arisen overseas.

Over the week-end I found the people of my country definitely thankful for the revelations made by the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston), for the clear and concise way in which he has presented the situation to them. Even though the former minister of national defence has revealed the means by which these conclusions, ending up in the order in council, were arrived at; even though he has revealed part of what occurred in the war committee when there was no doubt something in the way of an internal war started, the people are not satisfied with the back-tracking he indulged in at the finish of his speech. I say this in all sincerity. I am simply trying to indicate how these people whom I made it my business to get in touch with over the week-end are thinking.

The Prime Minister knows that there has been a wave of adverse public opinion sweeping across the country because of the evasions of the government during the past few weeks. The true situation has now been revealed. The Prime Minister, may try to lay that on the doorstep of the official opposition, if he likes; he may say it is a malicious press, if he likes; perhaps he may criticize the Canadian Legion, but I want to say that not only the Canadian Legion but every veterans' organization in the country have taken the same stand. Surely the Prime Minister knows that as well as I.

For the moment let us leave out the reference he made to the official opposition and to the press. May I pause here to say that perhaps we owe a debt of gratitude to the press, to the scores of papers across this country which have taken a firm stand on this situation. I want to say a word about the veterans' organizations in particular. These organizations are made up of the fathers and mothers of the boys overseas. Many of the fathers served in the last war; they served well and they know what war is. Among this group is to be found the true basis of the unrest that has swept across this country. I say that advisedly because I found out where this criticism is coming from. As I say, in the statement made by the hon. member for Prince the true reason for this unrest has been revealed.

The present Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, has admitted up to a point that this situation does exist and is of a serious nature. The Prime Minister admits it; but he still appears to evade the issue; he still appears to be trying to avoid sending all-out reinforcements to the boys overseas. I say most definitely that because of this evasion the people of this country have lost faith in the Prime Minister and in this government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. LOCKHART: That is all right; you can laugh, but make no mistake about it. I attended a meeting on Saturday night and I was asked to review the situation. I should like to indicate briefly what I said to that group of representative people. It was not a political meeting; it was a group of people who were associated together in a particular way, and I happen to be a member of the organization. During the course of the meeting I was asked if I could indicate what the present position was. The reference was to the situation that was being discussed in parliament.

I referred to the statement made by the Prime Minister, I think on November 8. I referred also to the statement made by the present Minister of National Defence. I referred at a little more length to the statement made by the former minister of national defence. I pointed out that the Prime Minister and General McNaughton had declared emphatically that the voluntary system must continue. I pointed out that parliament had been assembled on that understanding. I pointed out that the first evasion as I saw it was in the irregularity in the way the session was opened. I said that the Prime Minister had indicated—I had not the Hansard before me to quote his exact words—that he would introduce a motion of confidence in the government, but I pointed out that the vote of confidence up to that point—and the Prime Minister will correct me if I am wrong—was on the voluntary system only.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has just said that I will correct him if he is wrong. I hope he will not ask me to do that because he has been wrong so often that I would have to be interrupting him all the time.

Mr. LOCKHART: Will the Prime Minister tell me where I am wrong up to this point?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am trying to allow hon. gentlemen opposite to speak without interruption and I hope they will not trouble asking me any questions because I do not intend to answer them.

Mr. LOCKHART: We met here on November 22 on the assumption that the discussion was to be on a motion approving the voluntary system. I pointed out that on November 22 the official opposition introduced the principle of their amendment which is now before the house but that it was then ruled out of order.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I ask if my hon. friend was addresing a veterans' organization?

Mr. LOCKHART: I shall have something to say about the Department of Labour before I get through.

Mr. GARDINER: So you do not answer questions either.

Mr. LOCKHART: When we met here on November 22 no one suspected that the government would execute a somersault on the question of voluntary service overnight and that on November 23 the Prime Minister would introduce the order in council at three o'clock in the afternoon, providing for the drafting of 16,000 N.R.M.A. men for service overseas. Perhaps there was somebody behind the scenes who knew what was going on, but whatever was happening behind the scenes or in the war committee or elsewhere between November 22 and November 23 was not revealed until the government indicated the reversal of its policy on voluntary service on November 23. Within twenty-four hours this drastic change had come. Then followed the admission of General McNaughton to this chamber, and it was quite evident that he had not changed his mind on the voluntary system; in fact, he said so in this chamber. Almost his first words on November 23 in this chamber indicated his stand on this matter. I interpreted the words of the new Minister of National Defence to this group of people as meaning that he did not believe in the reversal of policy of the government which had been made within twenty-four hours, and I indicated what General McNaughton said he intended to do in carrying out the overnight reversal of policy of the government. I was asked on what I based my opinion, and by good luck I happened to have in my brief case a copy of Hansard of Thursday, November 23.

An hon. MEMBER: You must have been prepared for it.

Mr. LOCKHART: This was not a political meeting and I never expected to say a word.

Mr. GARDINER: Then I would like to hear one of your political speeches.

Mr. LOCKHART: I interpreted the stand of the new Minister of National Defence on the government's overnight change of policy; I was asked on what I based my opinion, and so I turned to page 6529 of Hansard of November 23, where in the second column I find that General McNaughton, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), said this:

> What is correct is this: where we have general service personnel, N.R.M.A., who have converted, if they are entirely suitable and are up to the standards of training which we require of them—and that cannot be stated in simple terms across the whole business, because some of the training will take advantage of facilities. We shall have people at certain stages in Canada, and certain places, and as regards others we shall want to use our facilities in England for working out. As long as there are suitable general service personnel available to fill the requirements, it is our intention to use them. We propose to make good whatever deficiencies there are from N.R.M.A. personnel.

It was on that assertion by General McNaughton and others that I based my opinion. Then I went on to read the next two questions, on the same page of Hansard, as follows:

> Mr. Green: So that the government's policy means this, that there may not be any N.R.M.A. personnel sent over at all between now and next May?
> Mr. McNaughton: Perfectly correct—if there were, as I see signs developing already to indicate, a most satisfactory start in the conversion of N.R.M.A. men. We would not use this authority, then, in any way, and I would be the most thankful man in this room.

Mr. Green: N.R.M.A. men will not be sent overseas if you can possibly avoid it?

Mr. McNaughton: I have no intention of using compulsion except to meet a deficiency, and having regard to the purpose we have of maintaining the strength of our armies overseas.

It was upon these statements of General McNaughton's that I based my opinion. I also pointed out, without giving away any secrets, that what had happened in the secret session only strengthened that opinion. That was as far as I went. I think any hon. member who was present at the secret session will agree that the information given in secret only strengthened the position that I took. Then I was referred to the address which the hon. member for Prince made in this house and I repeated as nearly as I could some of the statements that he had made. I pointed out that he had particularly stressed to the house the urgency of the situation, and that he had told us about the war behind the scenes here in Ottawa, and I undertook to see that those present at the meeting got copies not only of the Prime Minister's speech but the speech of the former minister of national defence, which promise I carried out. So that they are in a position to form their own conclusions as to what I told them. I was asked if the speech of the former minister of national defence was available and I said, "yes, in limited numbers." Then I was asked this question—I think the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) referred to it—if I did not think that the speech of the hon. member for Prince should be circulated across this country, in the manner referred to by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough. I stated that I entirely agreed. They did not know of the suggestion the hon. member had made; the idea came from themselves, and I thought it was a worthy one. Perhaps the Prime Minister will even yet consider it worth while carrying out. I suggested to my audience that they might write to the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, and gave them his address, but they did not think it worth while; they said I appeared to have all the facts, and they would be glad to have a few copies of the speech.

There is confusion of mind among our people; it is growing, and with that confusion their anger is also on the increase. I tell the Prime Minister that it is directed against the government and that he must take personal responsibility for it.

A highly respectable and reputable citizen, a prominent business man in my constituency, rose to his feet in this meeting and asked permission to read a letter and then to ask a question. He had just received the letter from his son in Italy. It stated that the hon. member for Prince, whom I will refer to as the former minister of national defence, had been in Italy one week earlier and had left the assurance that he would deal with the urgent situation immediately upon his return to Canada. Apparently this boy had that definite impression. I think the hon. member for Prince is to be commended for giving that assurance to the boys, for goodness knows they needed it. I need not remind the house to what extent the hon. member kept his word to the troops; he did so, perhaps, up to a point. The reason why he did not go farther was not of his own making, and it is obvious to the house. The Prime Minister and a number of the members of the war committee would not allow compulsion to be put into effect for overseas reinforcements. That is the statement I made to the meeting, and I believe it is correct. Some time between six p.m. on November 22 and three p.m. on November 23 the government changed their opinion. I pause to wonder if it did change its opinion, or was it a case of compulsion of another form? I do not know; I leave it to the house to decide. I am not so sure that there was an actual change of heart. Anyway, stormy scenes were enacted, and resulted in Canada losing a very capable minister of national defence, a man who assiduously applied himself to the job before him, a man who took the trouble to go overseas and get first-hand information and who assured the boys over there that he would stand back of them. What is more, according to this letter, they had the impression that these reinforcements would be over soon. I ask hon. members if the former minister of national defence did not make it clear to this house that reinforcements were going forward at once, in goodly numbers. I was asked if I really believed that the former minister of national defence intended to implement his promises. My answer was that he had staked his public career on it and resigned his office on the strength of it, so that I felt that the hon. member had conscientiously tried to discharge his duties and carry out the promises which he had made. Not much more need be said on that point. Events followed, and they continue to follow. People are aroused as never before. The end is not yet.

I desire to convey this to General McNaughton in a kindly way, and if I transgress a little in referring to him I crave his pardon. But the boy who wrote this letter, and who has been in Italy for a year and a half, spoke of General McNaughton as "their Andy," and he added that "if Colonel Ralston had left

'Our Andy' on the job the boys in Italy would not be crying out for help at the present time." I leave it to the judgment of this house and of the people of Canada to what extent that is true. To my mind the irony of the situation is appalling.

Mr. ROWE: He was "their Andy" a long time ago.

Mr. LOCKHART: I wonder what the boys in France, Belgium, Holland and elsewhere overseas are going to say when they read the speeches of the Prime Minister, the former minister of national defence and the present Minister of National Defence. They should have all this information; yes, and I am going to make sure that they do get it all. Then we shall wait for the next mail and see just what the boys overseas have to say on the general situation.

I see that the Prime Minister gave an indication that his motion would be one for an all-out vigorous war effort. He implemented that statement by using the same phraseology in the motion he presented to the house, but he skilfully avoided any reference to voluntary enlistment or anything of that kind. Yet every hon. member knows that that was the policy of the government up to three o'clock on November 23.

Then he referred to the marvellous war effort which Canada had made. Many of us know something about the marvellous accomplishments of Canada. I know something about what has been done by the manufacturers, by the farmers, by the factory workers, and by the women; but I often wonder, when listening to their speeches, whether the Prime Minister and some members of his government—I do not say, all—are afflicted with the same superiority complex—

Mr. ROWE: Inferiority.

Mr. LOCKHART: Well, this is a superiority complex, I fear. I wonder if they think that all the great and valiant achievements of our manufacturers, industrial workers, women and farmers would never have been effected if their government had not been in power. It is ridiculous to think that the same people could not do the job under any administration. After all these marvellous achievements—I say, by the people—we are now missing the boat on the most important issue, namely, reinforcements for our weary and worn-out boys overseas, particularly in the infantry. This is on the eve of victory, so the Prime Minister says. I say that we have a long, hard and tough road ahead of us, and the Minister of National Defence so told us. He pointed out to us in this house, partly in secret session and partly in open session, some of the things we have to combat before we are through. However, the Prime Minister still seems to think we are on the eve of victory. He speaks of anarchy unless we vote confidence in the handling of the reinforcement crisis overseas. Well, the house knows now whether it can vote confidence in the government or not, and if it is satisfied with the way in which this situation is handled, that is up to every individual member. But I say that when they get home to their constituents some of them may find the picture a little different.

We will take the Prime Minister at his word, unless he is skilfully evading again, as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe says he is. Be that as it may, the people accept the statement of the Prime Minister that we are not to have an election. My people accept that statement; I accept it. But my people will not accept and I will not accept the deliberate evasion of the issue to get reinforcements overseas to our boys at once. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, the boys overseas will not accept it either, and I can produce many letters here. On behalf of my people I call on the Prime Minister to accept the principles embodied in the amendment moved by the official opposition to get behind our weary lads overseas by making every man in the defence of Canada army, called up now and in the future, available in any theatre of war.

In 1942 the Prime Minister declared that but one order in council would be required if compulsory service was necessary. Does the Prime Minister still say this is not necessary? How can he, when he has overnight passed a restrictive order in council accepting the principle, one which the new Minister of National Defence states openly he is not particularly in sympathy with? The statement was made in the house on the afternoon the order in council was passed. I call upon the Prime Minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LOCKHART: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling. However, I have one or two sentences which I should like to finish. I call upon the Prime Minister to rescind order in council 8891 and come out courageously for our boys who need help at once. If the Prime Minister will do that, the purpose for which this house was convened will have been served. If he will not, I for one will not vote confidence in the Prime Minister or in the fragments of his administration. If that is a challenge for an election the Prime Minister can take it or leave it. After my trip home over the week-end, I am satisfied that my people will not countenance any more of the pussy-footing that Canada has been subjected to since the former minister presented the true picture to the people. So far as my people are concerned, I back them up 100 per cent in one of two things: Either make the defence of Canada army called up under N.R.M.A., now or in the future, available in any theatre of war, or do as was done in the United States—let the people settle the issue.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I cannot help remembering that it was two years ago last week, on November 30, 1942, that I was elected as member of the House of Commons for the constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay. I believe I can assert that I have fulfilled as well as possible the mandate that was given me, although the task of representing the people for the past two years has not been a very easy one. I know that my coming to this house did not please everybody, but I believe no one can deny that I have been faithful to my electors in taking the stand I have taken during the past two years.

I believe in democracy. I therefore believe that we are here to be the spokesman for our electors and not to be the tools of a party or of some outside interests. I must say that I was never so happy as I am now to be independent of all political groups and thus to be enabled to speak freely. That is the reason why I will do my utmost to discuss on its merits the question that is before the house to-day, not forgetting the gravity of the hour.

I will also try to refrain from rousing passions, because I believe that at a time like this those who take this opportunity to play politics for the benefit of one group or another render very bad service to their fellow citizens. I wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, and to offer my congratulations upon, and my thanks for, the magnificent speech delivered last week by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). In this connection I wish to congratulate also the member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris). These hon. gentlemen have shown us that in spite of the malicious campaign of the last few weeks there are still in other provinces men of good will who can understand the sentiments of the French-Canadians, together with the fundamental basis of Canadian unity.

Before proceeding further, I should like to call the attention of the house to the meaning of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the subamendment moved by the member for Mercier (Mr. Jean). As regards the amendment of the opposition, I should like to know if those who wish to support it are aware of the fact that in doing so they will admit that the government has already ordered all the personnel of home defence to go overseas. In fact, if I take the amendment and endeavour to understand it I shall try to read it in a different way from that in which it is worded, and it would read as follows:

> This house is of the opinion that by requiring all the N.R.M.A. personnel, whether now or hereafter enrolled, to serve in any theatre of war, the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements and has failed to ensure equality of service and sacrifice.

Do you not think the members should be entitled to know exactly whether the Progressive Conservatives do admit that the government has already conscripted for overseas all the N.R.M.A. personnel?

With regard to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier, if we deal with it as I have dealt with the wording of the amendment moved by the opposition, in order that we may understand what it means, this is what we get:

> This house is of the opinion that by using to the best advantage the general service personnel in Canada and the volunteers overseas, without resorting to conscription for service overseas, the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements.

I think the electors of Mercier will be glad to know what their member really wants in connection with the prosecution of the war; and by the amendment he has moved they will learn that their member has found that the present government has not done enough up to date, but that what he wants is a much more vigorous effort with conscription for overseas, because his motion constitutes blame on the government for not having imposed conscription for overseas.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before beginning my remarks on the present debate, I wish to deal with a statement made last week by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose), in which he referred to me. The hon. gentleman has often alluded to my activities in the political field and as recently as last week he stated that I had fascist leanings. I wish to say to the hon. member for Cartier that, before questioning other people's loyalty, he should think of what and where he was at the beginning of the war. On the other hand, I do not admit that the hon. member for Cartier has the right to speak for French Canadians in this house.

Mr. Speaker, we must, no doubt, ask ourselves to what purpose we are gathered here at present, and the answer to this question is to be found in the statement of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), made on Wednesday, November 22, in which he listed the reasons for the recall of parliament at this time.

I find at page 6505 of Hansard the following statement made by the Prime Minister:

Mr. Speaker, the present meeting of the House of Commons has been occasioned by the controversy which has arisen out of the resignation on November 1 of the Hon. J. L. Ralston as Minister of National Defence, and the desirability of affording to hon. members an opportunity of discussing all matters in reference thereto, and in reference to the situation which has since arisen, and which is a matter of first importance to parliament and the people of Canada.

Now, what was that controversy between the right hon. the Prime Minister and the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston)? The explanation is to be found in a letter tabled on the same day in the House of Commons, and recorded at page 6506 of Hansard. I shall read the end of a paragraph which enlightens us upon the nature of the said controversy. I quote:

The only difference—

I am reading from a letter written to the Hon. J. L. Ralston by the right hon. the Prime Minister.

The only difference which exists is one of the method or methods of meeting this fundamental vital necessity.

That is the reinforcements for our troops overseas. I repeat:

The only difference which exists is one of the method or methods of meeting this fundamental vital necessity.

Now, what happened? After this meeting of Wednesday, November 22, we returned here and Thursday, the 23rd, in the midst of a most impressive silence, the famous order in council 8891 was read. It is my contention that from then on, the reason for which we had been called here no longer held inasmuch as the disagreement which had existed regarding the methods of reinforcement for our troops overseas had been dispelled or was no longer of any account. For that matter, it is the former minister of national defence who so informed us, in a statement which he made on November 23, page 6524 of Hansard:

I know a little about the things about which General McNaughton has been talking. There is little difference between him and me. The only difference as I understand it, is that the general said there was a difference between us respecting policies. I think he rather attributed to me the policy of conscription for conscription's sake or conscription whether necessary or not. My policy has always been, and it has been frequently announced in this house, conscription when necessary, and I was following that policy when I made the recommendation I did which was not accepted by the government. I hope that the general will accept that correction, because there is no difference between him and me so far as the matter of policy is concerned. I understand his policy to be the same, that is to say, conscription when necessary.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that after the sitting of November 23 the controversy no longer existed, and it was also obvious that there was no longer any reason for the debate which was to take place thereafter.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): The hon. member must know that there was a substantial difference. The former minister of national defence wished to send overseas, I understand, 42,000 N.R.M.A. men instead of 16,000.

Mr. DORION (Translation) On the strength of the statement made and repeated by the former minister of national defence—and I do not think that I am mistaken—more has been granted to the present Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, than has been requested by the former incumbent. Unless I am mistaken, the former minister of national defence had requested 15,000 men, but his successor was allowed 16,000. But the figure is of no consequence whatever. As I said before, a decision has been taken on the matter of principle, and all that remained for us to do was to take cognizance of the settlement of a disagreement between the former minister of national defence and the right hon. the Prime Minister. So definitely indeed had the matter been settled that order in council 8891 authorizes the Minister of National Defence to send overseas all necessary troops, all the men he sees fit to dispatch, without the necessity of again referring the matter to the house.

The proper interpretation of this official document will be easier, I believe, if we seek the spirit in which it was made. In order to get a better understanding of it, I refer to certain statements made some time ago by the former minister of national defence and his colleague of the naval services (Mr. Macdonald). First, I shall quote the following words of Hon. Mr. Ralston as reported in Le Soleil, of July 28, 1940:

Our front line is on the English channel and we must place on that line all we have even if it means running short here, stated the hon. Mr. Ralston, Minister of National Defence, to-day.

This was according to a Canadian Press dispatch from Ottawa. Here is another statement, by a minister still a member of the cabinet, reproduced in the Montreal Standard of October 24, 1940. Hon. Mr. Macdonald is reported as saying:

> We have sent men, ships, guns and aircraft overseas and we shall send more and more as long as there remains a Canadian dollar unspent and a single Canadian citizen to take the defence of freedom.

Mr. Speaker, I claim that the moment order in council 8891 was tabled, the die was cast, and in view of present and past statements of authorized persons, I say that this order must be constructed according to said declaration, and that, therefore, the ensuing debate is absolutely unwarranted. Not only is this debate unwarranted since November 23, but I blame the government for starting a discussion which has provoked a campaign of abuse toward the province of Quebec. It is probable that, had we returned home on November 23, the outburst of fanaticism sweeping certain sections of the country might have been avoided.

In support of this contention, I shall quote a few words from one of hundreds and hundreds of letters, which in my opinion serve no useful purpose, which we receive every morning:

> Canada must not permit the province of Quebec to blockade the national support of our armed forces overseas.

The blame is always placed on the province of Quebec. And this abusive and fanatical campaign against Quebec continues. I repeat that if this debate had not been started, we would not have been called here in Ottawa to receive such letters which come from all sections of the dominion and there would not be such a campaign by eight provinces against the province of Quebec. Further, the present debate is absolutely useless for, after all, this issue of conscription which has been discussed for two weeks, has been settled definitely and in principle long ago. To my mind it was first settled by the visit made by the right hon. the Prime Minister to Hitler in 1937, about which we knew nothing before August 11, 1944. What took place during that visit? I wish to repeat the statement made in this house on August 11 of this year by the right hon. the Prime Minister:

> I do tell this House of Commons to-day that my visit to Germany had as its objective to make it perfectly clear that, if there was a war of aggression, nothing in the world would keep the Canadian people from being at the side of Britain. That was known to the German government at that time, and my action in the matter was fully known to the British government; but I did not talk about it at the time, for it is just as well that some of these matters should not be spoken of until later years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, from that very moment, not only had the principle of participation in the war been decided upon as the result of a visit of the right hon. the Prime Minister to Hitler, but the principle of the enforcement of conscription, with all the consequences it entails to-day, had by that very fact been accepted.

Another happening also shows that this debate is useless because, once more, this discussion on conscription is only the consequence or the outgrowth of what has taken place in the last five years. The declaration of war by the Canadian government in 1939 could not but involve the enforcement of conscription for overseas service with which we are faced to-day. Is there a level-headed man in this country who, in 1939, when Canada declared war, has not immediately said to himself: No matter what is being said, no matter what the people of this country may do, conscription for overseas service will certainly be resorted to before long.

A third event to which I refer is the mobilization act of 1940. Again I say that at that time conscription was necessarily decided upon. Therefore, this debate that has been going on since last week is absolutely useless. The Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons for Wednesday, June 19, 1940, give us the following account of what happened then:

> The house then resumed consideration in committee of the whole of Bill No. 43, an act to confer certain powers upon the governor in council for the mobilization of national resources in the present war:
> And the debate continuing.
> Objection was raised against a ruling by the chairman of the committee (Mr. Vien) on a point of order, and an appeal being made to the house:
> Mr. Speaker resumed the chair and the chairman of the committee made the following report:
> When the committee was discussing section 2 of Bill No. 43, an act to confer certain powers upon the governor in council for the mobilization of national resources in the present war, Mr. Lacombe moved the following amendment: "That all the words after "Whereas" be deleted and the following substituted therefor: 'the government's war policy must be free and voluntary'." The chairman ruled that proposed amendment out of order because it could not be moved during the discussion of section 2 of the bill, and in view of the fact that, under the provisions of rule 76 of the house, consideration of the preamble is left until all the clauses have been disposed of.

Reference to the record of that time shows that the right hon. the Prime Minister himself, on that day, requested that a vote be taken on the motion of Mr. Lacombe to find out, so he said, who were in favour of it. The Votes and Proceedings record that two members, only two, voted against participation in the war: Mr. Liguori Lacombe, member for Laval-Two Mountains and Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix, member for Quebec-Montmorency. The vote was taken on Mr. Lacombe's motion, as requested by the Prime Minister. I see here a list of names which I feel bound to read, to apprise the public of the truth and prevent the parties mentioned from ranging the stand they have taken as reported in the Votes and Proceedings. Here are the names of the members from the province of Quebec only, who voted against Mr. Lacombe's motion:

Authier	Gauthier
Bercovitch	Gingues
Bertrand (Laurier)	Hallé
Bertrand (Terrebonne)	Jean
Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon)	Lacroix (Beauce)
Blanchette	Laflamme
Bonnier	Lafontaine
Bourget	Lalonde
Brunelle	Lapointe (Lotbinière)
Cardin	Lapointe (Matapedia-Matane)
Casgrain	Leclerc
Cloutier	Leduc
Côté	Lizotte
Denis	Marier
Deslauriers	McGibbon
Dubois	Mullins
Dupuis	Picard
Durocher	Pouliot
Eudes	Power
Ferland	Rhéaume
Ferron	Ryan
Fontaine	Sylvestre
Fournier (Hull)	Thauvette
Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont)	Tremblay

Mr. Speaker, this list reminds me of a ditty well known among our people, and these names will probably be used henceforth in connection with that song whose theme is "Ah les beaux noms, les beaux noms canadiens" (Beautiful, oh beautiful Canadian names!).

The fourth event which gave rise to the present situation is the speech from the throne of 1942, in which the government announced the holding of a plebiscite to request that the Canadian people release them from past pledges. On page 2, column 1 of Hansard for 1942, the following paragraph is to be found in the speech from the throne:

> My ministers accordingly will seek, from the people, by means of a plebiscite, release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

When the vote was taken, on the main motion moved by Mr. Fournier (Hull) the following members from the province of Quebec voted against the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As for the others, they naturally voted in favour of the address.

Bertrand (Terrebonne)	LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency)
Bourget	Lizotte
d'Anjou	Parent
Gauthier	Pouliot
Lacombe	Raymond
Lacroix (Beauce)	Roy

They are the only ones who, at that time attempted, but too late already, to oppose the law of conscription, the enforcement of which we are deploring this very day.

That is why I say that this conscription issue has been determined—it was determined, as I said before, by all the incidents to which I just referred. In conclusion, it is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that we were very far from that free, voluntary and moderate war effort promised in the speeches delivered by Liberal leaders on the declaration of war. In September, 1939, the war which was to be waged was a pink and easy war, according to statements made by the public men of those days and those who were responsible for the administration of national affairs. All that has changed, unless there was nothing true in all that, if we are to judge by the situation which is laid upon us to-day.

Mr. Speaker, I heard the other day the Prime Minister evoke the memory of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe in an attempt to convince the hon. members of the province of Quebec to give him their support at this juncture. If the Prime Minister had cared to put before the house what purported to be the opinion of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, he would no doubt have referred to a speech which he delivered on September 9, 1939, and he would have detached the following excerpt. I quote:

> To those who criticize me to-day and who claim that I have changed my views, let me say that I am quite willing to show them the text of the speeches which I made on many occasions during the war. The change came on the conscription issue, which unfortunately was projected into the field at the time and which has sown the seed of discord of which even to-day we are reaping the bitter fruit.

And a little further on, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe said:

> Every speech that has been made has shown that this will be a gigantic conflict.

He was aware therefore of the enormous war effort Canada would have to make. In spite of that, he made the following statement:

> If Canadians go to the front line of battle they will go voluntarily as Canadians, under the control of Canada, commanded by Canadians and maintained by the Dominion of Canada.

And further on he added:

> The other school consists of those who also close their eyes to realities and are promoting courses which disunite Canada—because such measures will never be accepted or enforced by and in a most important section of the country. The whole province of Quebec—and I speak with all the responsibility and all the solemnity I can give to my words—will never agree to accept compulsory service or conscription outside Canada. I will go farther than that: When I say the whole province of Quebec I mean that I personally agree with them. I am authorized by my colleagues in the cabinet from the province of Quebec to say that we will never agree to conscription and will never be members or supporters of a government that will try to enforce it.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, had the right hon. the Prime Minister really been drawing his inspiration from the acts and policies of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, he would not have attempted, the other day, to take advantage of certain statements, to request of the members from the province of Quebec a vote of confidence on the conscription motion that is presently before the house.

Numerous sub-amendments were offered in the course of the debate. Of course, I do not wish to make an exhaustive review of those that were ruled out of order. As regards the sub-amendment of the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean) I said a moment ago how it should be viewed. Nevertheless, those sub-amendments which were submitted to us gave us the opportunity of wondering what are the real tenets of the groups which advocated them. The first was drafted by the C.C.F. party. It was immediately apparent that, in view of the theory I have just expounded, we could not support it, for it stemmed from the doctrine and principles which form the basis of the general policy of the C.C.F. party, a policy that, to me, appears unacceptable, especially by the province of Quebec. As far as I am concerned, I take this opportunity to disclaim any misconstruction, as attempted in certain quarters, of statements I have previously made, and which I do not deny, but which must be given their true meaning. I must say that I am far remote from the C.C.F. party as I cannot accept the socialist doctrine of that party. I am in favour of private enterprise provided it is duly controlled by the government, because otherwise—and that is to a certain extent, the situation which obtains to-day—it is rather private enterprise which controls the government. For my part, I wish that the development of private enterprise should continue in this country, but, as I say, under the rigid control of the government in power.

As regards the amendment of the Progressive Conservative party, I said a few moments ago what it amounts to. That amendment is nothing short of a request to the House of Commons to put all our manpower at the disposal of the government, so as to provide our armies overseas with an increasingly large number of men, regardless of the country's needs and regardless of consequences. The aim is to deprive this country of its manpower, no more, no less, but to whose benefit? I wonder. That is why that amendment moved by the Conservative party can certainly not have our support.

In regard to the main motion, it is obvious that, for several reasons, we cannot support it. The chief reason is that its adoption would constitute a vote of confidence in a government whose policy is absolutely opposed and contrary to that it advocated during the 1940 electoral campaign. Hence, we claim that the present government has no mandate to enforce the policy which it now carries out. We should vote against this motion because all the members sitting in this house have not been elected to enforce the present policy of the government. Therefore, if we wish to comply with the mandate with which we have been entrusted, if we wish to be honest with our electors, we must of necessity vote against the main motion.

The second reason why we must vote against this motion is that we claim that at the present time we have gone much too far in a war effort entirely out of proportion with our means; and that in 1939 and after 1940 in particular the dominion government has made commitments which far exceeded this country's abilities and resources. In 1939 as in 1940, if we had not rushed in blindly in order to display an unimpeachable loyalty by doing more for the war effort than any other country in the world, if we had remained within the reasonable limits of a war effort in keeping with the resources and manpower of the country, I contend that we would not find ourselves in the present emergency. What will the principle laid down in order in council 8891 lead us to? I read in the newspapers the other day that, according to certain figures which were supposed to be official, we had at the present time about 900,000 men in the armed forces. Any country which has 10 per cent of its total population under arms has reached the limit of its effort according to experts in vital statistics. Although we are at war because parliament has so decreed we are not really threatened in this country. If we consider, as it has often been stated in this house during the last two sessions, that we have fed the European countries and raised an army which almost reaches the limit of 10 per cent of our population, that is why I say that before the end of the war is reached, we shall find out, but too late, unfortunately, that we have gone far beyond our means.

Another reason for voting against this motion of confidence is our claim that the present government, in spite of what they have endeavoured to represent to our people, is not the administration conducive to national unity. I shall go further and assert that the Liberal party, now in power, is a factor of national disunity. If the present situation, which we deplore, exists in our country, it is because for more than thirty years the Liberal party in the province of Quebec has stirred up and encouraged grievances, to gain political advantages. For the last thirty years the province of Quebec, as I pointed out in greater detail in a speech I made here on February 10, 1944, no elections, either federal or provincial, were held in which the Liberal party did not exploit to its advantage the feeling opposed to all participation in external wars. Evidence of unfailing loyalty is now the order of the day, as was demonstrated a short while ago by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) who saw fit in his speech, to attack the independent members who sit in the house. I quote the following from page 6694 of Hansard:

. . . in French Canada the people who through all their political life had been friendly to the Tories are masquerading as independents. They are accusing the government, and I use their own words, of "betraying Quebec." They criticize the whole war effort and accuse those of us who have supported all government measures exclusive of Bill No. 80 of being tools of English Canada and of causing great harm to our racial group.

The hon. gentleman, whose party for thirty years campaigned in the province of Quebec asking the people to vote against the party responsible for war in 1914-1918, now tries to assume a feeling of loyalty, which dims that of our most imperialistic fellow citizens. There is another passage I wish to quote from his address. On page 6695, I find the following:

Now the cry is raised in Quebec: "Duplessis is back in power, the government has been forced to implement Bill No. 80 and Duplessis could not prevent it."

Does the hon. member for Bellechasse wish to insinuate that we have conscription to-day because the Union Nationale is in power in Quebec? This places a terrible responsibility upon the federal government. These were the words uttered in this house on November 30, in the speech to which I refer.

Recently, at a meeting held in his constituency, he again attempted to make political capital out of the 1914 war. I find in Le Soleil of November 25, 1944, the following:

Mr. Picard thanked all his friends for having expressed their opinion. He cautioned his audience against fomentors of discord, against the so-called independents, who are Conservatives in disguise, and the heirs of those Tories who in 1917 spoke against conscription but voted for it.

[Mr. Dorion.]

He is now trying again to raise that prejudice on which the province of Quebec has been fed for thirty years by the Liberal party. In that report from Le Soleil this most laughable explanation was given by the hon. member of the fact that he had not crossed the floor of the house, as some other members had done:

Some hon. members have seen fit to cross the floor of the house to sit on the opposition side. That is but a gesture. A member can just as well uphold his principles while keeping his seat, and moreover, in my case—

And here is the comic part of the statement.

—the seat which I now occupy is already on the left of the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, we have another reason for voting against the motion of confidence, and it is because I claim that, since the beginning of this war, the government—and the responsibility therefor weighs especially on the ministers from the province of Quebec—has never taken the trouble to indicate true figures about the share of the province of Quebec in the war effort. At the beginning of November, when the Prime Minister spoke over the radio, I heard some statistics which had already been requested in this house but which we had not been given because it was said that their disclosure would have been detrimental to the public interest.

Had the ministers from Quebec taken care to show under its true light the nature of that province's contribution to the war effort, I claim that it would have been possible, in a large measure, to prevent the campaign of abuse and fanaticism which is so apparent at the present time.

This is another reason why I propose to vote against the main motion.

Another thing. It is obvious, in all this, that the French-Canadian ministers who have broken their pledges to the province of Quebec, their constituents and their fellow-citizens, have not done everything in their power to prevent the passing of order in council 8891. Moreover I am convinced that if the ministers from the province of Quebec had not been afraid and had had the courage to defend what it is their duty to uphold in this house, this order in council would probably never have been passed. I say that if the right hon. the Prime Minister had also had the courage to defend the stand which he had consistently taken since the outbreak of war, I am convinced that he would readily have obtained the vote of confidence which he intended to request on November 22 in support of the voluntary system. If the right hon. the Prime Minister had had the courage to maintain the stand which he had taken since the beginning of the war and if it had been necessary to go to the country, I am convinced that he would have been returned to power with an even larger majority than he has today.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): Would you have voted for it?

Mr. DORION (Translation): Certainly. We must not depend too much on this campaign of political frenzy stirred up at the present time to ascertain the real feelings of the Canadian people. We must realize also that in the English-speaking provinces, there are people who understand the situation. That is why I claim that they lacked courage or tried, once again, to deceive the whole country.

(Text) In closing my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize the fact that, very fortunately, a certain press together with some individuals, seem to have seized this question of reinforcements to raise an anti-racial struggle in this country.

We often hear of Canadian unity in these days, and I wonder if those who preach it very loudly know what it is.

One must not forget that unity does not mean unification.

One must not forget that, in this country, there are two races with two different mentalities.

The French Canadians do understand that the English Canadians can still hold some close ties with the country they left not long ago, even if it be one or two generations ago, but it must be understood that you will never make Britishers out of the French Canadians.

I am sure that if our English-speaking fellow citizens went to the trouble of learning and of knowing the sentiments of the French Canadians, they would refrain from raising such issues as the one with which we are now confronted.

I am one of those who believe that there can still be understanding between the two races. But the majority must not try to overrule the minority and force it to submit to all its wishes.

Democracy, in a country like ours, cannot mean the domination of the majority over the minority; there must always be some understanding between the two; otherwise, it is not democracy; it is tyranny.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I realize that this is a momentous occasion and that it does not call for long speeches. I shall accordingly make just a few remarks in order to clarify the stand I intend to take on that most important matter, conscription of men for service overseas.

Before I do so, my good friend the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) will no doubt permit me one observation.

I must congratulate him on the dignified and sincere way in which he has made his remarks, and I must tell him that I am becoming convinced that he is beginning to be truly independent.

The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay has, perhaps involuntarily, left the house under the impression that those who voted against the motion introduced by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), on June 19, 1940, in connection with mobilization bill No. 80, voted for a war effort that was neither voluntary nor free. If my hon. friend will refer to page 952 of Hansard for June 19, 1940, he will find that the vote taken in this house on that date was on a ruling by the Speaker. The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains had moved an amendment reading as follows:

> That all the words after "whereas" in the preamble of the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "the government's war policy must be free and voluntary."

Now, on that occasion the chairman ruled from the chair that the amendment was out of order. An appeal was made from his ruling and a vote was taken.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Will the hon. member for Labelle permit me to interrupt him? The right hon. the Prime Minister, as my hon. friend no doubt remembers, personally requested that a vote be taken, after a remark by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), and he stated that he wanted to know the opinion of some hon. members of this house on the matter, making it a matter of principle.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): The right hon. the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 952: "Have a vote." He said nothing else. But it is nevertheless true that, notwithstanding all the statements that were made, the vote was not on the intrinsic merit of my hon. friend's motion—

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): The hon member will perhaps let me make another remark. If he will read a little further, he will see the reply made on the same day by the Prime Minister to the hon. member for Lethbridge. He will notice that the Prime Minister stated: "For a long time I have desired to know the opinion of this house." He made it a matter of principle.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): The right hon. the Prime Minister may have been seeking the expression of opinion, but the vote took place and is recorded in the sessional paper of the house. It was not taken on the intrinsic merit of your motion. I do not believe the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay wanted to leave the house under a mistaken impression.

Secondly, he made some so-called comments, expressing the hope that responsibilities would be shared and that the Quebec provincial government would not interfere in this matter of conscription. I agree with him in that respect, but I would very amicably suggest that he advise his good friend Mr. Duplessis not to pass another order in council as he did last week, order which came to the cognizance of members of the house and in which he registered a protest against conscription, without the least effect.

We are free, of course, to think what we like of such a move, but to my mind it indicates nothing but political tactics.

Mr. ROY: He does not agree with the Liberal policy.

Mr. LALONDE: I will come to that, and my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Roy) will notice that there is but little difference between his opinion and mine, and I hope the premier for the province of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis, will not claim later that he was unable to prevent conscription. This year's election in Quebec was fought on a federal issue.

Mr. ROY: In 1939 also, the campaign was based on a federal issue.

Mr. LALONDE: Yes, in 1939 as well as in 1940 and 1944.

After a few opening remarks, Mr. Speaker, I will now resume the debate before the house. Bill No. 80, passed in 1942 by the present parliament, recognized the principle of the conscription of man-power for overseas service. Like a number of other Liberal members, I voted against bill No. 80 and against conscription, as evidenced by the records of the house. Therefore, I am able to state to-day that I have been as good as my word and that I have not broken faith with my constituents to whom I had promised that I would not vote in favour of a compulsory measure.

The right hon. the Prime Minister gave his word that, before bill No. 80 was put into effect, the House of Commons would be consulted and an order in council passed to that end. For five years the right hon. the Prime Minister managed to steer clear of the reefs. For five years he has faced the storm and held the fort against the might of various opposition groups which tried to force the enactment of such a measure. Yet, a few months prior to the end of the war, he gives in before the pro-conscription push. Order in council 8891 was passed on November 23, authorizing the Minister of National Defence to conscript 16,000 additional N.M.R.A. recruits. I emphasize the word "additional", for it implies additional commitments as far as the men are concerned. I claim, therefore, that the hon. Minister of National Defence now has the right to call 16,000 additional draftees.

Mr. Speaker, here is a full right-about-turn on the policy announced a few days earlier, here is conscription as denounced by the leader of the Liberal party for the past twenty-five years as well as by the late Hon. Ernest Lapointe, the late Hon. Fernand Rinfret and others. Here is conscription as I censured it myself, in this house, in my speeches to my constituents and in the newspaper of my riding. Here is conscription against which I have agreed to struggle unless it is absolutely necessary to save Canada, our beloved homeland.

I admit, with regret, that the explanations advanced by our military authorities and ministers, far from satisfying me that conscription is necessary to save Canada, have convinced me more than ever that the right hon. the Prime Minister and the Liberal government have been the victims of fully ripened and premeditated schemes, that the former minister of national defence has failed to rise to the occasion and could not curb the tory influence of the military bureaucracy which controls our army. Even in June 1944, it would have been easy to foresee and avoid the catastrophe and the conflict which now threatens to disrupt the Canadian confederation, had proper action been taken.

The former minister of defence (Mr. Ralston) admits that he was informed in June 1944 that reinforcements would be required at the end of the year, that is in December. What did he do? Did he take any action with a view of promoting voluntary enlistments? As far as I know, he did nothing of the kind. He admitted having received in August a telegram informing him that the situation was becoming worse, he admitted at page 6662 of Hansard that he did not communicate that telegram to the war cabinet. It was only after the receipt of a second telegram that he decided to submit the latter to his colleagues. Meanwhile did he do anything to promote voluntary enlistments? No, as far as I know, he did nothing. At page 6597 of Hansard, the right hon. the Prime Minister stated that it was not before the month of October that the former minister of defence submitted for the first time to the cabinet the matter of conscription draftees. Ever since June, conscription was in the mind of the former minister of defence, and he then had to do something. But did he do anything with a view of promoting voluntary enlistments among French Canadians whose units seemed to have suffered particularly heavy casualties on the Italian front? No, in that respect again, he did nothing. And furthermore I wish to congratulate the Minister of National Defence for admitting frankly, as shown by page 6661 of Hansard, that the government does not possess at army headquarters, here in Canada, figures and data showing the number of reinforcements in the United Kingdom and Italy, so that one day he decided to make a tour of the European fronts to ascertain the situation of our armies which even our government did not know.

I feel that the war cabinet, the government and the people were deliberately left under a false sense of security. We have been left in a state of doubt, of uncertainty. Daily reports of our casualties and reinforcements should have been available here in Ottawa, so as to enable us to reinforce our brave soldiers on twenty-four hours' notice. There has been in this regard an unpardonable lack of organization, the serious consequences of which must be borne today, and which, in the judgment of the country unfortunately fall upon the shoulders of a man who is not responsible for it, the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada. The chiefs of staffs of our army should alone bear the full responsibility. I have carefully listened to certain speeches, which invariably implied—but never adduced positive evidence—that the province of Quebec did not do its share in this war.

We did more than our share in agreeing to the declaration of war, but did so on the express and essential condition that there be no conscription for overseas service. Mr. Speaker, we assented to mobilization for service in Canada, for the mobilization act was based on the unavoidable duty every man in this country is required to fulfil, since he must defend the soil he loves and cherishes. In the province of Quebec, we accepted the taxes, we concurred in the loans, in fact, we subscribed generously. We agreed to the gifts of raw materials, guns, shells and so on, made to our allies totalling one billion dollars in 1942, one billion in 1943, and $800,000,000 in 1944. We accepted our share of responsibility in this war, Mr Speaker, and cooperated in the maintenance of national unity in the country, a condition essential to the success of the gigantic task we had undertaken in the interest of humanity as a whole.

We did not jib when French Canadians were asked to enlist that they might defend the cause of humanity, but was anything done to promote voluntary enlistment in Quebec? Not to my knowledge. On the contrary, I assert that everything was tried to discourage any attraction French Canadians might feel for service in the active army.

As a matter of fact, I know young draftees who could not speak a word of English, but who were sent to English-speaking units and dispatched, like so many heads of cattle, to the Pacific coast, in hostile surroundings, where they could not feel at home, and if perchance they did not obey orders given in a language they did not understand those young French Canadians were frequently made a laughing stock for English-speaking members of the active army. How could our compatriots be expected to volunteer in such unfavourable circumstances, when they were sent to places far remote from their province.

The Prime Minister said that the voluntary system failed on account of the campaign waged, after the appointment of the Minister of Defence, by the Tory organization of the other provinces which incited the people to follow their basest impulses. That campaign was launched by the Tories. In February, 1944, the Saskatchewan Conservative association passed a resolution calling for conscription for overseas service. On June 19, at Guelph, Ontario, Messrs. Bracken and McTague both demanded, in a public meeting, conscription for overseas service. On June 20, Colonel Drew, speaking in Winnipeg, also demanded the immediate enforcement of conscription for draftees. On June 27, at Ottawa, Mr. McTague again took up the cudgels for conscription and upbraided Mr. King for his stubbornness in refusing to send draftees overseas. On October 5, in Toronto, Colonel Drew made another plea for conscription, and on October 10, in Montreal, Mr. McTague blamed Mr. King for his failure to enforce conscription.

I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that this clique which for years has been opposing the present government is much more anxious to bring about the defeat of the Right. Hon. Mr. King than to see the downfall of Hitler. I know that my views will not be shared in some quarters, but I am sincere about it.

These incidental remarks must not, however, make us lose sight of the only issue: the motion of confidence moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister, which reads as follows:

> That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

The vigorous war effort mentioned implies the order in council passed on November 23. Now, this order embodies the decision of the government to implement conscription for overseas service. As I have stated, I am not convinced that such a measure is necessary and timely; this half-measure is only one step removed from the total conscription demanded by the Conservatives in their amendment which reads as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and the following words substituted instead thereof:

"This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice."

Then comes the motion of the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean) in which I concur wholeheartedly; it is worded as follows:

That all the words of the amendment after the word "reinforcements" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"by using to the best advantage the general service personnel in Canada and the volunteers overseas without resorting to conscription for service overseas."

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the first two proposals which both include constituent elements of a measure I do not endorse. I will, nevertheless, vote for the sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier and against the amendment submitted by the Tory party. I do not, however, forget the wonderful achievement for which the right hon. the Prime Minister deserves credit in this war. Surely our people understand the difficult situation with which he is faced, and sympathized with him. The right hon. the Prime Minister no doubt realizes the unbearable position in which have been placed many of his supporters who have constantly stood by him in times of stress. He is aware that a group of our colleagues, of whom I am one, have received a very definite, clear and explicit mandate. I have concluded a solemn agreement with my constituents, and I do not want it to be said that I betrayed them.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Earlier speakers have stated that the subject of this debate is not the principle of conscription, as that has already been decided. It was decided in the debate on bill No. 80 in 1942 when the government was given power to introduce conscription for overseas service if necessary. To-day's debate centres rather on the problem of supplying immediate, adequate trained reinforcements to the army overseas. I myself was overseas when the debate on bill No. 80 took place, so that perhaps the house will pardon me for a minute if I take time to make clear my stand on the issue of conscription.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

At the outbreak of war I believed in the voluntary system of enlisting the army, the air force and the navy in this country, and like almost every other member of the house I campaigned on that issue in the spring of 1940. Those, of course, were the days of the so-called phony war, when we all had a Maginot-line complex and felt that we could blockade the Germans into submission with little use of man-power. At that time the only bitterness in our armed services was among those who had volunteered and could not get into the service because they were so flooded with recruits.

At the time of the fall of France, however, my attitude towards conscription changed very greatly, and that change was crystallized by my service overseas. In Britain I saw democracy at war where everyone shouldered the responsibility assigned to them according to their ability to carry that burden. Those medically fit took part in the fighting services as they were directed; those who were unfit, those who were too young, those who were too old, those who had special abilities were directed into employment by the state, with fire-watching and A.R.P. work in addition, men and women alike.

Out of this equality of service and sacrifice came unity, a real unity such as Britain has never seen before, people of every class united by common sacrifice in a common aim, a unity which gave the people of Britain the courage to stand the dark days of the blitz undaunted and unafraid. I therefore declare myself unreservedly in favour of total conscription in time of war, and I intend to adhere to this belief even more strongly in time of peace because I am quite sure that if every Canadian citizen knew in time of peace that if war came he would be obliged to take his full share of the fighting and the sacrifices, then our people in peace time would be all the more resolved that this nation should pursue a course which would avoid war.

There are many I know who sincerely believe that the enforcement of total conscription in this country will set one part of the country against the other and contribute to national disunity. I feel that there is much more serious threat to national unity; if we do not have some uniformity of service and sacrifice it will not be one section of the country against all the rest; it will be a bitterness in every street of every city, town and hamlet in this land, a bitterness between the men and the families of the men who have volunteered and those who have shirked every appeal to carry part of this nation's burden.

Coming now to the matter of adequate, trained reinforcements, I do not intend to use any of the welter of figures which have been given to this house in the last few days. Like my friend the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), I cannot remember which figures I learned in open session and may use, and which I learned in closed session and may not use. One fact, however, has emerged during this session; that is, that the Canadian infantry overseas are perilously short of trained reinforcements, and that immediate action must be taken to sustain them. This news is supposed to have surprised the cabinet. It surprised the people of Canada even more, for two reasons. First, in the press appeared the news that the Canadian army overseas was short of reinforcements, and at the same time we were told that we had in this country 130,000 general service men, together with 70,000 conscripts. How could we be short of men overseas with such a reserve in this country? I know our military men in this house have given a break-down of all those soldiers into so many categories; we are assured that the army has combed out all the fit fighting men from the more than 130,000 general service who are available, and we are told that these men number only some 5,000. The people of Canada do not accept that, and I do not accept it either, because there is a much simpler standard, which was given in the press at the same time, in regard to the use of man-power. I refer to the announcement of the winding up of the British commonwealth air training plan, which was undoubtedly one of Canada's greatest contributions to the fighting front in this war. The press announced that the scheme was being wound up; that we had trained so many aircrew there was no need to continue the scheme. Everyone here knows the long and intricate training needed to fit aircrew for battle; the many instructors needed both in the air and on the ground; the very great number of groundcrew required to service the aircraft and man the fields. But this plan, which turned out over a quarter of a million graduates, at its very peak used 101,000 men. So that the people of Canada may well wonder what the army is doing with 130,000 general service soldiers in this country, and may well feel, as I feel, that the army has not used its man-power as well as the air force.

There is a second cause of bewilderment, also more or less connected with the air force. At this time the people of Canada see one branch of our armed services, the army, desperately pleading for men. Such is its desperation that we are here in special session because of that crisis. At the same time in the daily press the announcement is made that another branch of our armed services is refusing to enlist men and, more than that, is discharging 70,000 of the very type of men the army is trying so desperately to get. What is the reason for this? Why should the air force find it so easy to get recruits and the army find it so difficult? It is not simply a matter of comparison, the army against the air force; it goes a little deeper than that. Since the start of the war every little break has been given the air force. From the start they were better dressed. Airmen wore collars and ties; they travelled tourist while soldiers travelled colonist; they were paid better; they got more commissions and faster promotions. Airmen slept between sheets while soldiers slept between blankets. All these little things built up and made the air force a very much more attractive service for the young chap who wanted to serve his country. These things, I think, were principally due to the driving force of just one man, the former minister for air, whom I regard as the greatest single loss the air force has sustained in this war.

If this preferential treatment had brought no good result of course I would be very much against it, but there is at least this to be said for it; it caused the army and navy to raise their standards a little in the direction of those of the air force. There is, however, one difference which is of very great importance in the present discussion of reinforcements. The former minister brushed over it very quickly in his statement, when he said that all anyone needed to do was read the records of the joint air training scheme to see what his attitude was. I refer particularly to the matter of relief from operational fatigue. Let me explain this. During the battle of Britain the planes and the pilots were so few that the dauntless few fighter boys of the Royal Air Force went up again and again against the enemy without rest or respite, until they were finally shot down. The same thing, of course, was true in the early days of bomber command. They had few planes and few pilots, so that the same men went out night after night against Germany. But as the production of planes and aircrew increased the R.A.F. were able to set up a definite tour of operations, 200 hours of combat for a fighter pilot and thirty trips for a bomber crew. That meant that aircrew no longer had to go on and on until the law of averages caught up with them and they were killed. At the end of a tour they were taken off and given a rest; then they served a period as instructors and finally came back to fight again.

Our former minister went further than that, however, and fought for recognition of the principle that no set standard of operations could apply to all men alike. Some lads take thirty trips right in their stride with no apparent ill effects at all. Others do suffer from fatigue. After all, these Canadian boys of our aircrew are not professional killers of the nazi stamp. They are just boys, gently reared in Canadian homes; and some find after a few trips that the strain of taking those bombers up night after night, through flak and searchlights and night fighters, then limping back home with a crippled plane, together with the strain of seeing their comrades wounded and killed in the same aircraft and the strain of coming back in the morning and seeing that comrades in other aircraft did not return, mounted until finally the condition called operational fatigue set in. Our minister fought for recognition of the principle that for those chaps their operational tour was honourably ended, and to that end he instructed the R.C.A.F. squadron and flight commanders and squadron doctors to watch carefully so that, when this fatigue set in, the man should not be expected to continue until the end of his tour, which would be unfair to him, unfair to the crew and unfair to this country. Instead, he is immediately given a rest and leave at home, then a tour of instruction, after which he is fit to go back and fight again.

Therefore, in calculating the supply of reinforcements necessary for the air force squadrons, there were two calculations to be made: reinforcements for casualties, namely deaths, injuries and sickness, and reinforcements for relief. In this house, in both open and secret session, there has been a long discussion of the problem of reinforcements for the army. In every case the gauge has been simply the number of casualties. If our reinforcements exceeded the casualties, things were satisfactory; if our reinforcements were not up to our casualties, the situation was grave. When the honourable and gallant member for London (Mr. Johnston) made his maiden speech in this house, after four years of service overseas, he recited just a few of the major battles fought by the Canadian first division in Sicily and Italy, starting at Pachino and Agira, across the straits of Messina and up the Italian boot; dogged fighting, village by village, hill by hill, river by river, when quite apart from the bombing, the shelling, the strafing and the mines expected in warfare, the spirit of every soldier is tried by the heat and cold, the dreary monotony of army life, the mud, the sand, the filth, the endless diet of bully beef, the remoteness from everything left behind in Canada. But there is no operational relief for our men in the infantry as in the air force, because we have not adequate reinforcements.

Nothing can illustrate this better at this time than a letter which was passed on to me through the courtesy of my good friend the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), to whom it was addressed, although the writer is a constituent of mine. She did not write me, probably because she thought I would be unsympathetic. I have already communicated the contents of this letter to the Minister of National Defence, and I shall be very glad to table the letter if anyone wishes me to do so. This woman writes of a neighbour's boy:

> The father fought in the last war and is a total disability veteran. The three boys are in the service, two overseas, one in the navy just back from overseas. The boy I am going to speak of is about twenty-five, in the Seaforths, went over in the first draft, in 1939, a volunteer, has seen action and plenty of it. He was in England for quite some time and as a dispatch rider was in a serious accident necessitating his being in a plaster cast for six months due to two cracked vertebrae and a fractured shoulder. He went back into action after that, landed in Italy and was wounded in both hands; still did not get home, and has seen continuous action since. His mother received a letter the other day saying he was in prison. It appears he was in an advance with some other chaps. He was on the roof of a building and a shell blew these other two chaps to pieces, all over this boy, and stunned him. He was badly shocked over this affair and begged to be allowed to come home. His nerve is gone and, as they refused his request he said he could not go in the line again, as he had had enough. Now the boy is far from being a coward, but he told his mother that he has seen so much blood and dead and dying he can't stand any more. . . . Five years seems a long time for a boy to be away from home. The Christmas at home would give him heart to go back and fight again.

I can say flatly that if this lad were in the air force that condition of operational fatigue would not have been permitted to go to that extent. The other evening I had the unpardonable rudeness to interrupt the magnificent speech delivered by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) when he said he did not believe that volunteer soldiers would want to be relieved by conscripts. Does anyone think that soldier would care whether it was a conscript or a volunteer who gave him respite from the lines?

The army now announces that those with over five years overseas service may be brought home, 450 at Christmas, and 250 each month thereafter, if shipping permits, if the reinforcement situation permits—and a series of other ifs, which the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) recounted the other day. At the present time we have over 10,000 men overseas who have been there for four years or more.

So that even if the "ifs" come through it will take three years to bring those troops home in rotation, for one month's leave. Some of the chaps can therefore look forward to serving seven years overseas before they will get home for a month's leave. And all this happens because we have not got sufficient reinforcements —not just to replace the casualties, but to bring relief to those who have done the fighting over there for so long.

It is for this reason I believe reinforcements should be provided not just to replace the number of casualties, but two or three times that number to stand behind the men who are fighting, so that there may be a rotation of front-line men. If it is the policy of supreme command to hammer, hammer, hammer the enemy without respite, I do not think it is the business of a member of this house to criticize that policy. But it is the business of this house to see that it is not the same Canadian lads in the line who are doing all the hammer, hammer, hammer and that they are replaced and rotated with fresh men. And so I cannot be content with a policy which is going to supply only 16,000 reinforcements from the N.R.M.A. army until next May.

The air force has gone one step farther now than have the other services. It has announced a policy of retirement to take place immediately. It is to apply first of all to those with overseas service, second to those with more than three years' home service, and then two years service. Those with more than two years home service will then be free from military call-up, although this week that period has been raised to three years home service.

While as an airman I am happy to see the air force again take the lead, yet as a member of parliament I cannot approve. Every volunteer in the armed services, whether he be in the navy, the army or the air force, joined the service to fight for his country, in the service of his choice, for the duration of the war. I cannot justify airmen having two years home service being discharged to civilian life, while a man in the Seaforths, overseas for five years, who has been on the job for that length of time, does not get that chance. Again, of course, this is a matter of reinforcements. If the army had reinforcements they, too, might properly be released, if they had given long service. I believe that any system of retirement and discharge now brought to bear, should be uniformly applicable to all three branches of the armed services.

At the present time we find great discontent among N.R.M.A. soldiers because, at last, some of them are called to give active service. At the same time, for the first time we have real discontent in the air force, but for the very opposite reason. Some of them feel that they have not had an opportunity yet to give that service they had hoped to give when they joined.

Every man who joined the air force joined as a volunteer. He enlisted to do overseas service, and most of them, there is no doubt, expected to be overseas within a short time. However, because of the demands of the British commonwealth air training plan over 100,000 of them were kept in this country. Most of them, however, had hoped that some day they would get overseas. Now ahead of them they see discharge. And with a feeling of self-reproach—and hon. members know there is no reproach as bitter as that—many of these men now feel that they have almost a zombie taint, because their service has been confined to Canada.

The question is what to do with these men. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) suggested the other night that they be kept in the air force, and that our blows against Germany should be increased. There is a limit to the number of men we can put into the air force, in aircrew. At the present time in Canada there is a great surplus of aircrew. Overseas there are three operational aircrew, at least, for every operational aircraft. The tremendous supply of bombs and petrol needed to supply our daily raids of thousands of bomber and fighter aircraft, over Europe, are undoubtedly taxing our supply lines to the limit. Sending more aircrew overseas would simply add to the congestion and the strain on supplies. If there is one thing this war has taught us it is this, that victory will not be won through air power alone. In the end we still need the men on the ground, who go ahead of the tanks, to achieve victory.

Then, why are not these airmen transferred to the army, where they are needed? In our army, as General McNaughton has said, there have been transfers from ordnance and from service corps and other branches, to the infantry. But because we have not full conscription we do not transfer men from the air force to the army, as they do in Great Britain. Someone will say: If these men are so anxious to serve, why do they not join the army themselves? Quite a few have, but there are one or two very simple reasons why more have not done this.

First, there is the attitude of many airmen who say this: Why should we volunteer a second time, and this time not in the service of our choice, when there are 70,000 trained soldiers in this country who have never volunteered, even once, for any service? Bringing in total conscription would dispel that attitude.

Second, there is an understandable reluctance to serve in a new service, under strange regulations, after serving years in the air force.

The third reason is a much more direct one, namely the matter of pay. General McNaughton has explained that when a non-commissioned officer from some other branch in the army is remustered to infantry, as a private, his pay is held at the old level for six months. The air force has done better than that. When they remuster a man from aircrew they protect his pay until he can regain the rank he held formerly. But when a man transfers from the air force to the army he falls back to private rank—which does not bother him, particularly. But his pay also falls back to $1.50, and that makes a lot of difference to him. These men, when they joined the air force, adjusted themselves to their pay of $1.50. As they served in the air force and their rank went up, their pay went up, too, and they and their families took on new obligations. It would be unfair to ask these men to drop back to $1.50 a day on volunteering a second time.

To circumvent these conditions I made a suggestion some weeks ago to the former Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), that an R.C.A.F. regiment be raised, similar to the R.A.F. regiment of Britain, or the Herman Goering division of the German luftwaffe, open only to men now in the air force or the air cadets. While it would be just another army infantry unit, as far as fighting is concerned, yet within the regiment it would still be air force. The R.A.F. regiment have preserved that illusion by allowing the men to keep their blue caps, to keep the R.A.F. regimental numbers, to keep their R.A.F. designations of rank, and certainly our regiment could do the same. Such a regiment would have many attractions to R.C.A.F. personnel which the ordinary army service would not have. It would still be the air force in spirit; it would be a unit of men who speak a common language. It would be a proud unit composed of men who have volunteered, not once but twice in the one war to serve their country. It would be a unit which would require very little training, because all the ground-crew and aircrew have elementary training in ground warfare and, of course, are accustomed to military discipline. It would be the only chance offered to many thousands of keen men in the air force, who have been kept through no fault of their own at desks and shops in Canada, to get active service overseas.

The R.A.F. regiment in England serves only for aerodrome protection, but in Libya and in Sicily they gave valiant service right in the line. There were no infantry troops in the Afrika Korps in Libya which were equal to the Herman Goering division. We have a much better example at home in the United States marines. After all, they are only soldiers recruited from the navy. If the conditions I have outlined are met I believe an R.C.A.F. regiment could be raised at least of brigade strength within a month.

There is one other reason why I believe the whole N.R.M.A. army should be placed on active service. I think practically everyone in Canada is agreed that in any system of demobilization of our armed services the basis should be first in, first out. The air force is now carrying out this policy with its announced system of retirements and discharges. General McNaughton has announced that that will be his policy for the army. Therefore, this can only mean that he intends to keep the N.R.M.A. conscripts who do not go overseas, in uniform in Canada until every volunteer is demobilized. This means that either they are to be kept in uniform in idleness at a tremendous cost to the taxpayer, or they are to be farmed out in labour battalions as Hitler did in pre-war Germany, to be placed at work in civilian industry or in the construction of public works.

Nothing is gained financially by putting soldiers into industry. By the time you provide for a soldier's pay, his allowances, for dependents' allowances, for food, clothing, medical and dental care, there is very little difference between that and the usual labour pay.

While the use of soldiers may be justified in cases of national catastrophe such as floods and fires, it is difficult to justify the use of soldiers in civilian industry or on government works. I want to make myself very clear on this issue. I am not one of the military caste who believe that Canada's only worth-while contribution can be made by sending every able-bodied man into the firing line. Modern warfare is fought with much more than just men. Canada has made a magnificent contribution in the production of food and munitions and other implements of war, a contribution which many of our allies cannot make because they have not our resources and our factories. Certainly we shall not be helping to end the war quickly if we so drain our man-power for the fighting fronts that we cannot maintain our obligations for food and munitions.

It may be that we have over-reached ourselves in supplying men for the armed services. Other countries have done this, but they have acknowledged that they have done this and taken action to correct the situation.

Gallant little New Zealand has made a contribution on the fighting front which I think is unequalled by any other united nation, but they found they had over-reached themselves and they returned men to the farm and the factory. If we are in a like position, then we should do the same. It is not the conscript who should be returned to civilian life; it is those who have given the longest service in the army, the air force and the navy. They are the ones who should be sent back.

Nor should these men come from just one branch of the service, the air force. The Minister of National Defence for Air should have no difficulty in justifying his sensible policy for the air force, but can the Minister of National Defence tell the army in Italy and the army in northern Europe that airmen with short service, some of them going into the civilian air reserve with just fifteen months' service, are to be discharged to civilian life, while chaps overseas with five years' service are to be given no hope of relief or discharge or leave? Can the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services tell his sailors who have served five bitter winters in the little ships out on the north Atlantic that this course is fair? Can the Prime Minister tell the families of these soldiers and sailors that it is fair to demobilize airmen who have had only short service and allow them to pick the cream of the civilian jobs now available, whilst these men are kept overseas?

When New Zealand retired her men she retired them on the basis of length and character of service. The men of the army of the Nile, the men who fought in Greece and Crete, who marched under Montgomery and Auchinleck, were the ones who were given first choice at retirement. So must we do. If the entire N.R.M.A. army was placed on active service, then we could have an orderly process of discharge based on length and character of service. There would then be no necessity of holding 70,000 men in idleness all over the country, nor would there be any necessity of using labour battalions in industry.

Summing up, I believe that if the whole N.R.M.A. army is placed on active service, adequate and trained reinforcements in excess of those required to meet any casualties will be available, and so a proper system of operational fatigue relief could be set up for the army. Second, I think it will give a great lift to the morale of the men overseas, and even a greater lift to the morale of their families here in Canada if they know that adequate reinforcements are on the way.

Third, with the full use of the N.R.M.A. army I am quite sure that very quickly volunteers would come forward from the air force if they could do so under the conditions I have outlined.

Lastly, demobilization on a straight basis of length and character of service could be easily carried out without holding men in idleness or without putting them Hitler fashion into labour battalions to be used in industry.

If the order in council had put the whole N.R.M.A. army on active service without reference to any theatre of operation, then I would not have spoken to-day and I am sure that this debate would have been wound up a week ago. There have been vague and evasive assurances given at long length to the effect that the order in council did not necessarily limit the reinforcements to be obtained from the N.R.M.A. army to 16,000, that other orders in council could be passed if necessary. Apparently that word "necessary" has been a difficult word for this house to understand.

If that is the case, how much simpler and more direct it would have been not to mention any number but simply to put the N.R.M.A. army on active service? May I remind the house that no orders in council are necessary to send any size draft of general service men overseas—they just go. I am even more opposed to the restriction on the theatres of operation. There is no mention at all of Japan. Active service men in all branches of the service enlisted voluntarily for service anywhere and I cannot understand this sudden restriction in the service of conscripts. The government has announced already its policy for the Japanese war. It is that volunteers are to be called afresh. This means that brave and willing hearts who have fought so long will be again expected to volunteer, while those who have shirked all calls to duty will be again protected.

Let us look ahead to the Japanese war. If, as may happen, one phase of that war goes against us and we are short of reinforcements for one branch of the armed services, are we to have this sorry spectacle of parliament convened once again to make conscripts available for the Japanese war?

In conclusion, I find that the issue before the house is immediate and continued supply of adequate trained reinforcements for the Canadian army overseas. There are those in the house who think the government is doing too much; there are others in the house who think it is doing enough; and there are some in the house who feel that it is doing too little. If it were simply a matter of voting for or against the government motion, those who think the government is doing too much and those who think the government is doing too little in this matter would be lumped in the same position, so that I think it is quite proper that amendments are being put forward to clarify the situation. I quite agree, however, with the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères when he says that some of the amendments have done nothing but becloud the issue. The C.C.F. and Social Credit amendments tack on bits of their social philosophies and give ample reason to appeal to both conscriptionists and anti-conscriptionists in the next election.

The Conservative amendment—perhaps I should not say Conservative because if it were Conservative I would have no hesitation in voting against it because I am not a Conservative. I am a Liberal and a supporter of this Liberal government, but I need not go into detail to discuss the position of a government supporter who is not in complete accord with the government on one feature of its policy, as that has already been admirably done by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) and the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris). I need but say that my supporters have no doubt of my Liberalism because they nominated me last week knowing the stand I take on this question.

The issue is not Liberalism versus Socialism or Toryism. I realize that several of my Liberal colleagues have made speeches which indicated that they felt very much as I do on this issue, that all conscripts should immediately be placed on active service at the disposal of the chiefs of staffs, but in the closing moments of their speeches they have found reasons why they should not go that far but should support the government motion. I feel, like some of them, that some elements of the Tory party are striving to make political capital out of this crisis, but I do not feel that this motive is at all confined to the Conservative party in this house. I feel, like them, that the government policy on this subject is vague and elusive, and it is precisely because of this that I want to make sure to the people I represent that there is nothing vague or elusive or evasive about the stand I take.

The amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition states:

> This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice.

I think hon. members will realize that this sums up in simple and direct language the views I have advanced this evening, and as I cannot talk one way and vote another way I shall therefore vote for that amendment.

If that amendment is defeated I shall vote for the government motion, with the realization that half a loaf is better than no loaf at all, that 16,000 reinforcements out of the conscript army is better than no reinforcements at all out of the conscript army.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, rising to speak after the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), I want to express my deep and sincere appreciation of the splendid, lucid and clear-cut stand that he has taken on the issue before us to-night. I am sure that every member of this house must have been thrilled by the references of this man who has served his country overseas and has seen the workings of conscription in Great Britain, who has seen the policy which the government there have put before their people under the inspired leadership of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill. He has given to the house, I believe, a true, lucid, frank and forthright view of our armed forces. May I in turn humbly, yes apologetically, give what I conceive to be the viewpoint of the home front.

If there was any doubt as to the immediate need of trained reinforcements for our army before November 22 last, that doubt has now been dispelled. Doubt has given way to alarm. The former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston), after five years of loyal obedience to the will of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), after having made a thorough investigation of the situation overseas with respect to reinforcements and having come back and exhausted his efforts, even his patience, in trying to abide by the wishes of his colleagues that he support the voluntary system of enlistments for overseas service, has reluctantly resigned his office in despair at the government's policy. He recommended the sending of 15,000 N.R.M.A. men at once, and more to follow monthly, as reinforcements for our men overseas. His fear of catastrophe drove him to leave the government. The courage of his colleagues in dealing with that recommendation of his, faltered, and thereby they lost a true and trusted colleague. The Prime Minister then called on General McNaughton to continue the policy of voluntary enlistments which the former minister of national defence after five years of effort had found to be a failure. General McNaughton assumed the responsibility, in his own words, without full knowledge of the task. He, too, tried the voluntary system. Three weeks passed by and that system did not prove a success. His failure brought panic throughout Canada. It brought about the summoning of the 245 members of this House of Commons to an emergency session. A party caucus was called by the government. Urgent cabinet council meetings were called and P.C. 8891 was passed. What did it do? It vindicated the stand taken by the former minister of national defence. It showed that the voluntary system had failed. It proved that trained reinforcements were required at once. It proved that more would be required later. It threw voluntary service out of the window. It changed the government's policy overnight. That order in council provided for the compulsory sending overseas of 16,000 N.R.M.A. personnel within the next six months, if, as and when required. But in the words of the new Minister of National Defence not one of these men should be sent over, yes unless against his will or against his hopes, because General McNaughton would be a happy man if none of them were compelled to go overseas. I refer to the arguments of the hon. member for Vancouver North in answer to that proposition.

What did the order in council not do? It did not adopt the recommendation of the former minister of national defence. It did not in any way cure the situation he found. It did not provide for the sending overseas of 15,000 N.R.M.A. men now, with more to follow monthly. It did not pacify public opinion. It did not give assurances of adequate trained reinforcements in the future for service overseas. Yet we are now asked to vote confidence in the government on its policy. What policy, may I ask? The order in council was passed and tabled at a time when this government, on November 22, were emphatically adhering to the voluntary system. The Prime Minister was emphatic in his denunciation of any compulsion for sending N.R.M.A. men overseas. On that basis was the notice of motion tabled in this house? Or are we asked to have confidence in the right-about-face policy of the government in casting out of the window their pet theory of voluntary enlistment, in rejecting a minister of national defence who for five years had persistently tried to meet the wishes of the Prime Minister and his colleagues, who had done all he could, under their philosophy, with all his military officials, to make, if his power could make, voluntary service fill the bill, and had failed? Or are we asked to vote confidence in the piecemeal present-day solution, a hand-to-mouth policy of compulsion, grudgingly conceded and not given with a spirit which would show a will to make it work? The Minister of National Defence, on November 23, the first day of his appearance in the house, showed us beyond any doubt that his spirit was not in the act.

Our spirit, Mr. Speaker, must be in the war. Our spirit must be with our men overseas. Our spirit must be to accomplish this task. It cannot be in anything less than that. And then they ask us to support what government? A government headed by the present Prime Minister who, time and again, has said he would not head any government that would bring in compulsion for overseas service, and who has convinced the members of this house that he is not a believer in compulsion. Yet he would have members of this house and citizens all over the Dominion of Canada believe that he is the man who is saving them from the compulsory method of service overseas. Or are we asked to vote confidence in a government of nineteen cabinet ministers who, having served five years, bring us to this war-time emergency, having seen the panic which has arisen among the people to-day, having seen this special session called and witnessed the about-face of the government itself, have not yet risen to their feet in this chamber to explain to the people how they have discharged their duty in their respective portfolios? Is it not remarkable that the Prime Minister, alone in his cabinet excepting for the deposed one, the discharged one or the resigned one, has stood in this house to give the Canadian people their impressions of this situation?

How can we vote for a government with a party following of 167 members among whom there are none willing to accept the leadership, and none willing to accept the responsibility of following any other leadership than the present Prime Minister, a government that will have no other leader than the present Prime Minister, a government who, in the words of the Prime Minister himself, are to have King or anarchy? This is a sad spectacle.

The former minister lost faith in his colleagues and left them. The ministers who remain have lost faith in themselves as leaders. None of the nineteen will accept the challenge of the Prime Minister—if, which I doubt, it was seriously given—to accept their responsibility in this day of emergency, to do their best to form a cabinet, to form a government, to solicit support, to carry their country through this crisis.

The people have lost faith in all of them. The army, the war veterans, the legion, the public press—denounced as it has been by the Prime Minister—have lost faith in him. The people of Canada have lost faith in all of them.

I cannot understand the situation. Surely Canadian soldiers and Canadian people deserve better things from the Canadian parliament. Surely the Prime Minister is not the only man in Canada who is indispensable. Surely there are men in this house and in this country able to lead the government; and surely there are hon. members willing and anxious to rise to the occasion and provide a leader who will satisfy public opinion and the spirit of our armed forces, our veterans and our newspaper publications, yes, who will give us the inspiration, the leadership and the courage of a Churchill or a Roosevelt.

We are invited to abhor the very idea of an election. Yet our great neighbour to the south can go through an election in time of war, and under our great British institutions we have seen minister after minister resign from the cabinet of Great Britain, accepting the honourable situation of being at odds with their colleagues, and the country carried on.

I do not think there is any doubt in the mind of any Canadian that, in the cabinet to-day we have three schools of thought. How, then, can there be cabinet solidarity? There is the King-McNaughton school, which will accept pressure under conditions of panic and will adopt the policy of compulsorily forcing some 16,000 N.R.M.A. men overseas, and yet they are against compulsion. Then there is the Colonel Ralston school, composed of those who, like the hon. member for Vancouver North, originally believed in the success of the voluntary system but have faced realities with courage, with conviction, with patriotism and with loyalty, and, abandoning the hope of voluntary service, have accepted the necessity at a time of crisis of recommending and adopting compulsory service overseas. We have also the Major Power school—I wonder how many of the cabinet belong to it—who say in effect that we Canadians, for the sake of those who hold the opposite principle as a fundamental article of faith, must, regardless of circumstances, oppose at any cost compulsion for overseas service. In the cabinet those three schools of thought were definitely in opposition to and in collision with each other. How under those circumstances can there be cabinet solidarity? This is not a healthy condition; it is not right; it is not fair to our Canadian soldiers or our Canadian people.

I say the Prime Minister has lost the confidence of all the Canadian people and should resign. Another should take his place, pledged to a courageous, all-out compulsory service policy. It would then be the duty and the honour of all hon. members to lend to a new man or to new men all our faith, all our support, all our hope and all our inspiration in carrying out to the utmost our commitments, our responsibilities and our obligations in connection with this war.

Six weeks have elapsed since the emergency arose. This parliament has been called to send our soldiers the necessary aid and to reassure our people. We members who have met have been asked to take courage in our teeth and convert action into achievement. Have we done it yet? Certainly not. We should do it now.

Possibly this war could be won without Canada. Possibly we could diminish our efforts and restrict our undertakings and let our other allies carry our load. Surely no Canadian can bow to this. What right would we then have to celebrate victory? What right would we then have to a seat at the peace table? What claim would we have to a say as to what policy should be pursued in post-war reconstruction or as to the form of the peace terms? Canadians should not tolerate the thought. We must perish the very thought of detracting, of diminishing, of withdrawing from any of our commitments, any of our obligations or any of our duties. We must do our utmost. Domestic unrest is alleged as one reason why we should pull our punches. Surely domestic unrest should not interfere with the life struggle, the struggle for existence itself, which is our responsibility to-day and which, in the words of the Minister of National Defence, is increasing daily. The toughest struggle is yet ahead, he says.

How fortunate we are in Canada to-day. Our homes are all here. Our civilians are not enslaved. Our living conditions are satisfactory. We have no aeroplane attacks; we have no submarine attacks; we have no artillery bombardment and no robot bombs. Not one house has been destroyed by enemy action. In the motherland one-third of the homes have been destroyed. They have suffered all this; we have suffered none. Our army has fought in a general way, in an extensive way, only since D-day, since July last, although two divisions did valiant service in Italy. But we did not have any all-out intensive fighting until D-day in July last, and yet our shortage of reinforcements commenced to pile up the following month.

What excuse is there for this government in our having had this crisis arise at all? What reason have we to fear anarchy, in the words of the Prime Minister, because of our failure to follow him? What right have we to slacken our efforts? Now is the time for us members to get a government in Canada which will inspire our people to their utmost effort. Now is the time for this house to show courage. The Prime Minister has lost the confidence of the people. Now is the time to get and to assist a government under a courageous and inspiring leader. It is not a time to let party allegiance or personal prejudices interfere with our national duty. It is not a time for any member of this house to go home and say that he felt, because the past had produced certain results, that the crisis would work itself out, that our Deity would do the job for us or that our allies would accept our responsibility.

We at home cannot afford to be rubber stamps for the present policies of the present government under the present leadership. I think the situation is very well set out in an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal, a part of which I will read with the indulgence of the house. It appeared on Friday, December 1, 1944, in a journal which I believe more than any other paper has been quoted by members of this house, yes, and by the Prime Minister himself only recently. I quote:

> For what parliament knows, and what the country knows, is that all the hurt and humiliation of these weeks would have been avoided had Mr. King, in the first place, kept his pledges—accepted Colonel Ralston's recommendations, and used the authority which the country gave him in 1942. The flouting of pledges; the protracted cabinet debates; the discreditable dismissal of Ralston; the pitiful fiasco with General McNaughton; the spectable of parliament summoned to do one thing and then asked to do another; the tragic rancour and unrest throughout the country; the misrepresentation throughout the world of the Canadian war heart; the possible fatal delay in sending reinforcements—for all of this evil Mr. King, with his political evasions and manoeuvres, is directly and wholly responsible. If there be those to doubt this, let them read the speech of Mr. King's former Minister of Defence—the most damning indictment of a public leader ever pronounced in the Canadian parliament in our time.

Whether the Journal be right or whether it be wrong, there is not a member in this house who cannot say that the opinion therein expressed is a very popular one with a large section of the Canadian people. I ask therefore, how can we expect unity, solidarity, devotion to duty and our utmost effort under those circumstances? I think that we members of the House of Commons, coming here for this short time, must do something. If we do not take courageous action now, the future of Canada will be upon our heads.

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, December 5, 1944.

The house met at three o'clock.

DUMBARTON OAKS

TABLING OF PROPOSALS FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF GENERAL INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I informed the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that I would see if there was a report on the Dumbarton Oaks conference which it would be possible to table. I hold in my hand a publication entitled Dumbarton Oaks Proposals for Establishment of General International Organization as Agreed upon by Representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and China at Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, in October, 1944. There is included in the publication the text of a press release which I issued regarding the Dumbarton Oaks proposals on October 9, 1944. This is the only publication I am in a position to table, and I now table two copies in French and two in English—and have pleasure in sending one to my hon. friend, with my compliments.

CANADIAN FORCES

RESERVE ARMY—STATEMENT OF POLICY AS TO ITS ROLE IN THE FUTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I think the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald) promised yesterday, that if possible, he would give some report, or lay on the table a declaration of government policy with respect to Canada's reserve army. I should be very glad if he would do so at this time.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, speaking for the Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, I should like to give to the house a short statement as to the policy of that department as regards the reserve army.

1. In so far as our post-war military commitments and requirements can be foreseen at present, the reserve army will continue to play the same important role which it performed in the years before the war, and which it has so abundantly fulfilled during the anxious days of this war.

2. In this connection I would refer the house to the statement appearing in Hansard of February 14, 1944, in regard to the reserve army, and made by the then minister of national defence. In that statement the splendid contribution to the war effort by that force was brought to the notice of the house. Its role was stated as follows:

(a) To maintain throughout the country continued interest in the Canadian Army and its activities, and to set the example to all citizens of preparedness at all times.

(b) To provide a continuing flow of reinforcements, for the forces overseas, by training young men of preenlistment age.

(c) To back up the civil authority responsible for the enforcement of law and order, if required.

(d) As a trained reserve to support the active forces available for the defence of Canada if the military situation should deteriorate.

(e) As a basis for expansion of the active army should the necessity arise.

3. It is intended to modernize the reserve army and to develop the efficiency of the force.

4. The reserve army is the name now given to that portion of the pre-war non permanent active militia which has not been mobilized for active service. The non permanent active militia is the framework of our national military organization in peace time. It is the policy to ensure the continuation in the post-war period of this framework which will then become again the major portion of our military forces. The men who have gone from these reserve units and who now fill the ranks of the mobilized active units will return to the reserve army and they and their units will find their military family association maintained so that there will be no break in the continuity of service and tradition of each regiment.

5. It is not possible at this time to assure each regiment individually that it will be continued or that it will be continued in its present type. The organization of our forces must depend upon our needs and must reflect modern tactical organization, and it is always possible that units may be required to change their type. However, to the greatest possible extent present units of the reserve army will be perpetuated in some continuing role. These are matters which are kept under constant review by the responsible military staff.

6. It is hoped that this statement will give assurance to the members of the reserve army that their work is important and that it is in the national interest that it should be continued; and that it is the intention of this government to protect the continuity of the reserve units to the greatest extent possible in the post-war period.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thank the minister for his declaration of policy, which I think has been awaited with eager expectancy by those connected with the reserve army.

CLOTHING ALLOWANCE—POSSIBILITY OF MAKING INCREASED PAYMENTS RETROACTIVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to bring another matter to the attention of the minister, perhaps by way of notice because I realize that in his dual capacity he cannot be expected to answer offhand questions relating to national defence. However, I would ask if he would ascertain for the house whether or not consideration has been and is being given to the question of making retroactive the present allowance for clothing to personnel discharged from the armed forces. I ask this question because a number of those discharged prior to the change of government policy in this regard have been inquiring why at one stage of the war a man was given a clothing allowance of $35 on discharge, at another stage $65 and at still another stage $100. I wonder if the minister would get that information for me.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): I shall be glad to discuss with the Minister of National Defence the point raised by my hon. friend, but I may tell him that up to the present the policy has been, as he has indicated, not to make these allowances retroactive. We changed to the higher rate some time early this year, I think, and at that time it was not our intention to make the increase retroactive. Up to the moment therefore the policy has been against the retroactive feature, but I shall be glad, as I have said, to talk the matter over with the Minister of National Defence.

EMBARKATION LEAVE FOR MEN COMPULSORILY ASSIGNED TO OVERSEAS SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Arising out of a telegram which I received just a short time ago, and of which I sent notice as quickly as I could to the minister who, I assume, is acting minister of defence, I am asked to obtain information whether draftees conscripted for overseas service will be allowed the usual embarkation leave, or will be allowed embarkation leave, and if so, how many days will be allowed. The inquiry comes from responsible citizens of my riding.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): The answer to my hon. friend is, yes, they will be allowed embarkation leave. The minimum leave, I understand, is forty-eight hours.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S LEAVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Have any amendments been made to the regulations regarding Christmas and New Year's leave, or are any under contemplation? When may a reply be received to this question, in the interest of those who have to travel long distances? Are amendments to the regulations going to be considered before the house closes?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): I prefer to give my hon. friend an answer to this matter, tomorrow, if that will be satisfactory to him. I should not like to speak on it offhand, without looking up the regulations.

Mr. CHURCH: This was made an order for return yesterday, but the return will not be presented in time. It would help recruiting if something was done about it at once.

BEEF CATTLE

MARKETING CONDITIONS—EMBARGO ON EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to draw another matter to the attention of the government, which might also be treated as a notice and dealt with later at greater length than they may care to deal with it at the moment. I refer to the congestion of cattle which is so acute at present in the stockyards across Canada. In this connection I would mention the shortage of stable accommodation for live stock during the coming winter months, and also the fact that I understand a number of farm organizations have brought this situation to the attention of the government and have asked that the government give consideration to the lifting of the embargo on the export of beef cattle from Canada to the United States, even if it is only a temporary measure, in order to relieve the situation which seems to be so serious. I should be glad to have a statement of government policy on the matter as soon as the government see fit to give it.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I am sorry I was not in the house when the leader of the opposition began his question, but I take it he is asking for information as to the position in relation to the marketing of beef cattle and the possibility of reopening the American market.

Yesterday I made a statement to the agricultural conference being held in this city at the present time. This is the conference that has been held each year since the beginning of the war, to lay out plans for the succeeding year. Plans are now being laid out for the crop year 1945, beginning in the spring. At that meeting of representatives of the different farm organizations and the provincial departments of agriculture, I stated that last week we consulted with the persons in Washington who are concerned with this matter, and the information we received was to the effect that they are experiencing just as great difficulty in handling cattle through their processing plants as we are experiencing on this side of the line, and the suggestion was made that we should not send beef cattle to the United States at the present time. That is the attitude taken there, and of course we are respecting that attitude. On the other hand, we have had representatives of the British government here for some considerable time now, off and on, suggesting that they are most anxious to have our beef in Great Britain. This year we have sent Britain 103,000,000 pounds of processed beef, which represents more live cattle than we have ever sent, at least in recent years, to the United States and Britain combined. We have an agreement with Britain under which they will take all the surplus beef we care to send them during 1945, and only at the end of last week they and we entered into an understanding that a similar agreement will be made for 1946. This means there is a market in Great Britain for all the surplus beef which is in sight at present in Canada, and there is a need for that beef in Great Britain from the point of view of the prosecution of the war. It is the wish of the Americans that we should process that beef and send it to Britain ourselves, rather than send it to the United States to have it processed and sent to Britain under their lend-lease arrangement. There is just as great difficulty being experienced in the United States, both in relation to labour and in relation to plant capacity, as there is in Canada. So that the three-way understanding is that we should market this beef in Britain if at all possible, and an attempt is being made to do so. The marketing agreements are being concluded which will make this possible.

The extra cattle that are on the markets across Canada at the present are not finished beef cattle. Any blockades on the market have resulted from the fact that for some reason or other people have been marketing very considerable numbers of cows, younger cattle and plain beef cattle. These are not the cattle for which there is likely to be any demand in the United States, to begin with, or which there is sufficient demand for here at present. As many of these cattle as can be turned into beef are being boned and put in the form of processed beef that can be shipped to Britain and utilized as food at the present time. Because we are able to announce that there is a market assured for 1946 we believe that at least the yearling cattle will be got off the market and fed by someone somewhere else. The assurance is given that the present price for finished beef will prevail right through 1946, so that farmers who have been looking for the war to end within the next three or four or probably six months and were therefore anxious to get out of the production of beef because they felt that there would not be a market for beef towards the end of next year now have the assurance, because of the arrangement entered into with Britain, that they can go on and feed their cattle and get rid of them at as good a price two years hence as they can get now. We believe that that will aid considerably in getting some of the stock cleared off the markets. In any case the suggested solution that has been made of opening the American market is not available to us at the present time.

Mr. SENN: The minister says that arrangements have been made or are being made with the British food ministry to send Canadian beef to Britain. Can he give us any idea of the price that is anticipated?

Mr. GARDINER: It will be an extension of the contract now existing, which is a two-year contract covering 1944 and 1945. The contract will be extended for one more year at the same price and for at least the same quantity.

Mr. FAIR: Following the reply just given by the Minister of Agriculture in connection with the prices for live stock sold on the markets and for which the packers are guaranteed their prices by the meat board, may I ask if any guarantee has been given to the farmers or the live stock producers as to the price they shall receive when they sell their live cattle on the market?

Mr. GARDINER: The present position is that there is a ceiling price on beef right across Canada, and under the agreement which we have with Britain the price at which beef is being sold is related to that ceiling price. I am speaking of finished cattle ready for slaughter. The price that is being paid for finished cattle on the markets right across Canada is a price which bears a proper relationship to the price at which beef is selling on the market. I have had correspondence from the province of Alberta no later than to-day; in fact, I answered one of these letters just before coming down to the house, indicating that there is little complaint with regard to the price obtained for cattle ready for slaughter. The complaint is with respect to cattle brought on to the market which are not ready for slaughter and which somebody must take off the market and feed before they can be sold on the market. There is no way that I know of in which we can compel one farmer to pay a higher price for feeder cattle to another farmer who wants to get rid of them when the deal is between those two farmers directly. They may live side by side. There is no feasible way of doing that unless we had someone at every place where this exchange of cattle takes place to grade the cattle and establish their value. But so far as cattle brought into the packing plants and sold ready for slaughter are concerned there is a proper relationship between the price of the cattle and the price of the beef that is sold from those cattle.

Mr. FAIR: My question had particular reference to finished cattle. I think that if the minister will look over the records for the past seven or eight weeks particularly he will find that there have been a whole lot of complaints, regardless of any letters he has had from Alberta. The farmers are entitled to protection which they are not receiving.

Mr. QUELCH: Arising out of the statement of the Minister of Agriculture, I should like to know whether any action is going to be taken as regards giving free freight on shipment of grain to the drought areas, so that the farmers there may be encouraged to hold their live stock until they are in a position to dispose of them satisfactorily.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no arrangement that I know of in connection with shipments to areas which have had poor crops during the last year. The practice in the past has been that any arrangements of that kind that can be provided for within the bounds of a province are made by the provincial government, but so far as I know nothing has been done.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I ask the Minister or Agriculture whether any precaution has been taken by his department this year to provide against such mishaps as occurred in respect to the marketing of finished beef last spring? The minister will remember there was a great deal of difficulty as regards price and also in obtaining ready markets.

Mr. GARDINER: Earlier in the session I announced to the house that the old system of ceilings and floors was changed as a result of the experiences we had last year, and we hope that the result this year will be a much better condition than we had a year ago. That was taken care of in the arrangements that were made last spring.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): The Minister of Agriculture has referred to the beef situation as being quite satisfactory, that is with relation to well-finished animals; but what about animals which are standing in the stockyards for nine or ten days, waiting for a buyer to take them off the market? Surely a temporary market should be provided to take care of those. Take bologna bulls and canner cows and boner steers; they are not going out for feeding, they have to be processed, and it is up to the packer to take care of them. This is something for the beef board to look after. Will the minister tell me what he is going to do about it?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRYCE: But I want an answer.

WARTIME INFORMATION BOARD

STATEMENT ON PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF PRIME MINISTER'S RADIO BROADCAST ON NOVEMBER 8

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to supplement a reply that I gave yesterday to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) regarding the distribution of the broadcast which I made on November 8. I wish to make it perfectly clear that as President of the Privy Council I am responsible to the house for the activities of the wartime information board, and I take full responsibility for their action in distributing the broadcast.

The broadcast, as hon. members are aware, was in its essence an appeal by myself as Prime Minister for public support of the recruiting campaign for reinforcements by voluntary enlistments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That seems to surprise some hon. members, but that is the fact.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was only a minor point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It contained significant information which the people of Canada were entitled to have, and which it was desirable to have made known as widely as possible. If the appeal was to be effective it was obviously necessary that it should have a wide measure of public support.

The distribution of the broadcast by the wartime information board was at the instance of the cabinet committee which had been formed to further the appeal for voluntary enlistments. If ever distribution was justified it was justified in the case of a speech making a national appeal on a matter of urgency, the importance of which was everywhere recognized.

Hon. members may be interested to know that in the twenty-six days since November 8, the date on which the broadcast was made, 6,297 men have volunteered for general service in the Canadian army, and of this number 2,701 are from the N.R.M.A., and 3,596 from the general public and the reserve army. These figures I understand represent the largest enlistment for a similar period since the outbreak of war.

May I say to the hon. member for Parkdale that in giving what he will recognize was an immediate reply to his question of yesterday I was misled by its wording as to the particular speech to which he had reference. My hon. friend's question was as follows:

> I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In order that the public may have both sides of the issue fairly before them, will the Prime Minister direct the wartime information board to publish and circulate 87,000 copies of the speech made in this house by the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) on November 29, 1944? This would correspond to the number of copies of the Prime Minister's speech, in defence of the voluntary system, as given over the radio on November 8.

I thought for the moment by his reference to something corresponding to a speech delivered in this house that the hon. member was referring to the speech that I made in the house and to the speech that the former minister of national defence made in this house. The speech I made in the house has not been distributed, so far as I am aware. In reply to the statements I made in my broadcast over the radio, the former minister of national defence issued a statement on November 12, just a few days later. So far as my first statement was concerned and the first statement of the former minister of national defence, those two statements correspond and both have been given fully to the public.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word? I accept the Prime Minister's explanation, of course, but I would just like to add that I think the public is entitled to receive full information as to the crisis which brought us together, and they will not receive that information unless it is distributed and made available for them to read, including the statement made by the former minister of national defence in this house, which was in effect a further reply to what the Prime Minister had said in his radio broadcast.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the hon. member for Parkdale that, as he is aware, the public will get its information as to the speeches made in this house from the official record of the debates of this house, that is to say, from Hansard. I do not think the public would thank the hon. member or any hon. member for giving over the radio at full length the speech made by myself or the speech made by the former minister of national defence in this house.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the Prime Minister would be good enough to amplify his statement as to the number of men who have enlisted by stating how many of them volunteered before the order in council was passed and how many of them volunteered afterwards.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not that information at hand.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the Prime Minister will get it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall see.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT—POSITION OF UNEMPLOYED ELDERLY WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Arising out of information I have received, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour what is the position regarding older people who have been employed during war time, in so far as benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act are concerned, if they are laid off work because of age or declining efficiency.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. member for Vancouver East for having given me notice of the question. One of the principal conditions for the receipt of benefit under the Unemployment Insurance Act is that the claimant is capable of and available to work, but unable to obtain suitable employment. That is in section 28, subsection 3 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940. If an elderly person made claim for benefit, the official handling the claim would look at his employment history, and if he had been recently employed that would be evidence that he was capable of and available for work. If an employer laid him off because of declining efficiency, it might be—and each case would have to be judged on its merits—that suitable employment for the claimant would be of a slightly lighter nature than his previous employment, possibly with some modification of his employment conditions. There is no age ceiling under the act, and we have in fact paid benefits to claimants who were about eighty years of age. It should be remembered that unemployment insurance is protection for employable people who become unemployed; it is not intended as a substitute for health insurance or for old age pensions, which are separate parts of the social security scheme.

NON-FERROUS METAL INDUSTRIAL WORKERS—WAGE SCALES—INQUIRY AS TO ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Unfortunately I have not had an opportunity of giving him a copy of my information, which I will send him with my question, but it is of sufficient importance, I believe, to be brought up in the house. It arises from a resolution passed by one of the locals of the United Mine Workers of America, the Brass and Copper Workers Union, local 811. They ask whether a royal commission is being set up to investigate the wage scales of the non-ferrous metal mining and production industry.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I think the hon. member should have addressed his question to myself. No consideration is being given to the setting up of a royal commission with reference to the matter that my hon. friend has just mentioned. I have received delegations from the organization concerned and the matter has been referred to the national war labour board, and the organization has been informed that the board is going to make an investigation.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is there—

Mr. MITCHELL: Just wait a minute.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not hear you.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend was wrong in the first place in the name he used; he did not know the name of the organization he was talking about. The national war labour board is going to undertake an investigation of the subject-matter of the representations made by the organization concerned.

CANADIAN FIRE FIGHTERS

QUESTION OF GRATUITIES FOR VOLUNTEERS WITH SERVICE IN UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I have had several communications, which were referred to last evening, from our fire fighters overseas. May I ask the proper authority in the government to indicate whether any reconsideration has been given as regards gratuities for these men, or whether the policy is to remain the same? I have to reply to four inquiries from overseas.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I may inform my hon. friend that the whole question is now receiving the government's attention.

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN MAINTAINING VIGOROUS WAR EFFORT—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION OF THE PRIME MINISTER

The house resumed from Monday, December 4, consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Jean.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in resuming this debate at this time I intend to refrain as far as possible from anything in the nature of repetition; also, as is always my custom, from anything of a personal nature. I believe, after having read the debates in 1917 in connection with the Military Service Act, that this debate in the main has been on a very high plane, and one worthy of the highest traditions of parliamentary government in this country. On all sides of this house, regardless of where we sit, hon. members have made sacrifices in this war and their families have been affected as possibly never before in any war in our history. When we in this house can do what we did the other evening, when those who disagree with the member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) can listen to a message of sincerity from him, and those who disagree with the member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) can give him the hearing which he received, parliamentary government in this country has touched a high plane in the discussion of public affairs.

I am going to epitomize in a very few words the stand I shall take to-day. I believe, sir, that the vast majority of the people of the country do not want partial conscription; they demand impartial conscription. They demand reinforcements. The trust that rests upon us on behalf of those who serve cannot be discharged by accepting order in council 8891, which in its very essence establishes rationed conscription, politically designed and by its very nature denying equality of service and of sacrifice everywhere in Canada. That order in council perpetuates the discrimination and the inequality of service that characterize the administration of the N.R.M.A. in Canada. By selecting 16,000 to go overseas and failing to say to the rest that they too shall be trained and sent overseas according to their training and fitness, we endanger the last vestige of unity in this country.

I believe that the keystone of Canadian unity must be equality of service. Racial dominance will never bring unity in Canada and there is no question of racial dominance in the demand on the part of His Majesty's opposition that the principle of equality of service and of sacrifice everywhere in this dominion shall be made a reality. I say that if out of this order in council there comes a continuation of the kind of administration that we have had in the past under the N.R.M.A., the order in council will do still more towards arousing the passions of the Canadian people.

To-day this country, as a result of the unfairness in which the administration of the National Resources Mobilization Act has been conducted, is torn by grievances, some legitimate and others accompanied by prejudice and by senseless bigotry, and I ask you sir, and through you the government, even at this late hour, to ensure that all provinces in Canada shall be equal under this administration; for only through equality among all the provinces will there be Canadian unity—and by equality I mean equality in responsibility as well as in benefits.

I try to understand the argument of those who look at the matter from another point of view; I try to appreciate what they have in mind; but I cannot understand the point of view of any member of this house who denies the common responsibility which every individual in this country has to the service of the state. Indeed a common responsibility is part of the law of the country, and it was brought in by members from the province of Quebec who demanded that in the building of this country, that in the assuring of equal sacrifice, that principle should be embodied in the law of the land. And it is.

I am going to refer to the Militia Act, because I believe that much of the talk in opposition to conscription fails to take into consideration the fact that conscription for service overseas has been a part of the law of the country since 1868, with the responsibility of every person in Canada to serve. That legislation was introduced by the Hon., afterwards Sir Georges Etienne Cartier, who gave Canadians a message that should resound to-day. That message was that there can be no confederation, there can be no unity as between two divergent races, unless there is a common acceptance of our equality and of responsibility of service to the state by all.

Under the Militia Act everyone between the ages of eighteen and sixty is liable for service. In passing it provides that anyone chosen to serve by ballot may secure someone to be his substitute in military service. That is still the law of the country. I come now to the sections in question. Section 64 reads:

> The governor in council may place the militia—

Which is defined as the military forces of Canada.

> —or any part thereof on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Emergency is defined as a condition of war, invasion, riot or insurrection.

Who placed that portion of the act on the statute book of Canada? Another great Canadian of French origin, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in 1904. Yet my friends rise in this house and say that there is no responsibility for service beyond the confines of Canada. The legislation to which I refer was first the product of the mind of the Hon. Georges Etienne Cartier and secondly the product of the mind, as a result of experience, of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I would point out that Mr., afterwards Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who was minister of justice at the time, made the following statement in the debate on the Militia Act in 1904—quoted at page 2194 of Hansard of 1917:

> The governor in council may send the militia of Canada out of Canada at any time when deemed necessary for the defence of Canada. If, in the opinion of the governor in council, it should be necessary, because of a war going on in India, to send our militia out there for the defence of Canada, they may, in the exercise of their discretion, do it, because they are the sole judges of what is necessary to be done in defence of Canada. But we do not think it advisable that that power should be absolute and unrestrictedly in the hands of the governor in council. We think it advisable that the period during which they may exercise that power should be restricted and that parliament should be called together and be consulted at the earliest opportunity. Parliament must be summoned in fifteen days and then the whole matter will be in the hands of the people's representatives.

In other words, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick recognized that under this act—and the government is proceeding under this act to-day—contained in the Militia Act our militia may be sent for service anywhere in the world. The last section of order in council 8891 reads as follows:

> Further, all personnel so dispatched or who may at any time be dispatched are, pursuant to section 64 of the Militia Act, hereby placed on active service beyond Canada for the defence thereof.

I should like the Prime Minister to explain whether parliament was called together pursuant to the powers contained in section 66 of the Militia Act, which provides the following:

> Whenever the governor in council places the militia, or any part thereof, on active service, if parliament is then separated by such adjournment of prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall be issued for the meeting of parliament within fifteen days. . . .

Was parliament called together pursuant to that section of the Militia Act, after the decision of the government to send these men overseas?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, they had not decided that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The provision is still there, Mr. Speaker. No one can be sent beyond Canada unless parliament is called together within the period named therein.

In 1917 Sir Wilfrid Laurier accepted that principle. He accepted the principle that our men should serve anywhere in the world for the defence of Canada. All he asked was that there should be a referendum to determine what the people of Canada wanted. Well, we have had a referendum in Canada on the question of conscription. The Prime Minister himself admitted that fact on January 26, 1942. Towards the end of his speech he was dealing with the submission of the plebiscite question to the people of Canada. He said, as reported on page 51 of Hansard:

> It will be seen that in seeking freedom for itself to act on all matters pertaining to war in accordance with its judgment, the government is taking a course which will remove all legitimate excuse for controversy, and the course best calculated to maintain the unity of the country in this time of war.

Mr. Homuth: Then what will they do?

Mr. Mackenzie King: That will depend in part upon what my hon. friend and those who are round him will do.

Mr. Homuth: Do not worry about us.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I am quite prepared to trust the people; my hon. friend certainly is not. Just here may I pause to say that if my hon. friend is afraid that the people will pronounce against conscription, for that is what he has in his mind, and he is still prepared to have conscription put into force without any reference to the people, then I should like to know how he expects that the unity of this country is going to be maintained.

In other words, what that means is this: On January 25, 1942, the Prime Minister in submitting the question of the plebiscite to the Canadian people was endeavouring to secure from them a vote on the question of conscription, and he so stated. It is true that in June, some months later, after the result of the vote, he said that at no time had there been any intention on the part of the government to consider the vote as one on conscription.

Every condition necessary to the carrying into effect of the Militia Act has been met. We have the law; we have had the referendum. Now at a period in our history when the reinforcement situation is as serious as it is the government produces an order in council; it is rationed conscription. In one part of Canada the government can say it covers only 16,000; in another part of Canada it can say, as General McNaughton said, it may not cover anybody, and in still other parts of Canada those who support it will be able to say: Well, it covers everybody if you read it carefully. Rationed conscription will not meet the demand; rationed conscription will not assure unity in this country; rationed conscription will destroy unity. The Prime Minister should answer this question. He has answered it only indirectly so far. He failed to answer it the other day when it was put by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Mayhew) in the course of a very fine address. The question to which the people of Canada have a right to an answer, not by explanation, not by evasion, but by direct answer, is this: Do you or do you not intend that every man in Canada called up under the N.R.M.A. who is fit for overseas service shall be rendered available to be sent overseas?

To-day the Prime Minister said that there had been a very large enlistment during the past few days. Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been enlistments, but I ask you to understand the circumstances under which that enlistment is taking place. I have a letter here which will give some indication as to why these 2,701 N.R.M.A. men enlisted during the past few days.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Because there is no more sabotage.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: "There is no more sabotage." Let me say to the Minister of Fisheries that when he delivered a speech recently in Valleyfield, Quebec, no hon. member in this house had ever done the harm to Canadian unity that he did in that speech. "No more sabotage", says the Minister of Fisheries. I say to you, sir, that on November 8 the minister made a statement that there would never be conscription; that the war was over; that never would he alter his opinion. Why is he in the cabinet?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I never made the statement that the war was over.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The press said you did.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): If the hon. member is taking the article that appeared in certain newspapers and acts on them as if they were true, then he will be wrong for a long time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Why don't you deny it?

Mr. ROWE: When is your resignation coming?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The only denial I received is the denial that he predicted that the war was over. There is no denial of the other statements, and the people of Canada want to know. I ask the Minister of Fisheries if he is any more anxious to-day, is he any more desirous to-day than he was on November 8, to assure that the reinforcements shall be sent overseas? That is the question the people want answered.

Mr. DUPUIS: By voluntary means.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So far as the hon. member is concerned I am not going to enter into any controversy with him. I am dealing with a member of a cabinet which is supposedly based on solidarity, but where there is such a diversity of opinion as indicated by statements appearing in the press in the month of November. Because of that diversity I find it impossible to understand how they are able to hang together.

When I was interrupted I was dealing with the question of enlistments, which the Prime Minister mentioned to-day. Here is the kind of representation that is being made to these N.R.M.A. men. They used to have what they called the N.R.M.A. squeeze. But that squeeze is no longer in existence. To-day—and I take the responsibility for saying this—and for the last few days, representations are being made to the N.R.M.A. men at Petawawa. They have been advised that if they now enlist, instead of being sent overseas compulsorily they will have their enlistment for active service antedated six months. The result is that instead of receiving only $7.50 per month, beginning now their allowances are to be dated back six months.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Bribery.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Furthermore, the representation is being made that if they enlist now they can secure the voluntary service medal in one year instead of eighteen months. Furthermore, the non-commissioned officers in the home defence army at Petawawa have been advised that if they go active their ranks will be confirmed. The only active men who can have confirmed ranks to-day are those in a low category, who are unfit for overseas service. This type of conduct is discrimination against the men who volunteered in the service of this country.

In his great speech the other evening the hon. and gallant member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) gave us more than a peep into cabinet council: he opened the door. He did not have to tell us as much as he did, because the speeches of certain members during the last month have revealed the attitude of members of the cabinet. I shall now refer to them briefly. They reveal that there is no unity in the cabinet! Unity there must be, if this legislation is to be enforced fearlessly, definitely and assuredly, to maintain our reinforcement situation overseas. Are the ministers in agreement? I have been amazed at the silence of the ministers of the crown in this debate. The hon. and gallant Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) made a speech the other day in which he said this:

> I hope that not a French-Canadian conscript is sent overseas. Reinforcements are needed, and should come as volunteers.

He has continued a campaign such as that to which I have just referred.

Then, we have the statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who, by the way, since making that speech on November 6, has been even more silent than usual. This is what he said, as reported by the press and undenied, as was the statement allegedly made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand), until it was denied to-day in part. This is the statement of the Minister of Justice:

> Colonel Ralston, who is a great Canadian, believed that a coercive measure had become necessary to provide our armies with reinforcements should the war last several months longer. I am convinced that if the government had agreed to look at the question in this light, the vast majority of the province of Quebec would have felt that they were betrayed by their English-speaking fellow-citizens. That would have been disastrous. . . . They may be mistaken, but they will not betray you.

That is the statement made November 6. Let me turn to it again, where he said that there was but one line of action, and that was volunteer action. Then he added this:

> National unity would have received a destructive blow in such a way that it might have taken decades to rebuild it.

Sir, through you I ask the Minister of Justice this question: Was he speaking for the record on November 8, or has he, too, changed his opinion since that time? What is the reason for the change? To-day we have conscription, partial though it be. Is he to-day of the same opinion as he was then?

And now we come to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), who delivered an address in Chicago in which he said that so far as this question was concerned it was a political question rather than a question of meeting an urgent need. Well, Mr. Speaker, he had before him the representations of the hon. member for Prince. He had before him General Stuart's memorandum of October. He had before him General Murchie's memorandum of October. And yet he said it was a political question rather than an urgent need. Has there been any change in his views since November 16, when that speech was made?

The view taken by the former minister of national defence that there is urgent need for reinforcements, is the view of all of us, reinforced by what we heard in secret session. The government had before it the information when those statements were made.

I shall now deal with the Minister of Fisheries, when he said:

> The King government has shown itself able, through the voluntary service policy, to raise an army which is the pride of the country. And it still believes that the latter's efficiency would be maintained by the same policy.

What took place between November 20 and to-day? What took place in the cabinet between November 20 and the bringing in of this order in council?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The gun; the gun.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When the people of Canada first read about this order in council there were many who felt that it would be carried out. What hope is there of the implementation of that order in council, even as it now is, in the hands of a cabinet divided in discord, speaking in a confusion of tongues, as they did between November 2 and November 23, and reinforced now by General McNaughton, who on the floor of the house made the statement that he was going to continue the system of voluntary enlistment and, in answer to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) said he could not say that any who were conscripted would be sent overseas by May 1?

I must hurry on to deal with one other matter, namely, our amendment. It covers two propositions accepted by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) in the brilliant address he delivered last night, one which only experience and vision could have prompted. He supports us in this, and the former minister of national defence says we are right. We insist that all men in the N.R.M.A. army be available for reinforcements, to maintain and sustain our troops overseas. We demand on behalf of the people of Canada assurance of equality of service and of sacrifice. In the former minister's remarkable address he excoriated the government; he revealed the inner workings of it; he showed the hopelessness of any expectation of a united and relentless maintenance of our overseas army. Then, after an excoriation the like of which this parliament has never heard, he ended by saying to the Prime Minister, "I believe in the opposition's amendment, but I will support you. You stand indicted on what I have said. All I give you now is this warning: don't do that again." Don't do that again. What opportunity are the members of this house going to have to say to the government that it must carry out this policy? I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that as soon as this house is adjourned there will be very little hope that the members of it, reinforced by public opinion, will be able to demand what the people of Canada have asked us to demand and have asked us to continue to demand, regardless of the press which sometimes says that we should return home. We hear the voice of the people in all parts of Canada. It has been said that the aroused feeling of Canada was organized resistance. It was organized by the common emotions of men and women who have given their all. Let me tell you of one man in the Prime Minister's own constituency, an Indian by the name of Arcand, a man denied citizenship, but a man who has nine sons in the armed forces of this country, with one son who was turned down as unfit. The message of that man, not a citizen, unable to vote, denied equality with the rest of us, is: "Won't you do something, you members of parliament, to see that my boys overseas are assured of reinforcements?"

I should like to have dealt with all the amendments, but I have not time. I want to deal with one of them, however, and then I shall be through; that is the amendment of the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean). The hon. gentleman's amendment amounts to this. It asks that the membership of this house shall vote non-confidence in the government on conscription, and then shall turn a mental somersault and support the government in its policy of a vigorous war effort. That is the situation. It is designed—I cannot say intentionally—to allow those hon. members to support the government and at the same time remain on friendly terms with their supporters. It enables them to take diametrically opposite stands, to speak out of both sides of their mouths, depending upon where they were speaking. I suggest, sir, that the people of Canada have the right to know what, if any, arrangements were made in regard to the bringing down of this amendment. The Prime Minister stated last evening that he did not want to answer any questions, but there is one question I believe he should answer. Has the Prime Minister at any time during the last week or so given an assurance to any group or bloc or member of parliament that this is the last order in council that will be brought down by this government? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has kept very quiet on this subject but the other day Mr. Charles Bishop, a distinguished member of the press gallery, said: "Sixteen thousand is the limit for the Honourable J. G. Gardiner." We should like to know whether 16,000 is the limit and also whether or not any promise has been made to anyone that no more will be sent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I answer my hon. friend at once? I have made no promise to anyone.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is exactly the point I have been making. The Prime Minister dare not tell the people of Canada that he intends to assure that the additional 42,000 men are made available for overseas service and that there will be further orders in council. The answer he gives me is simply this: "I won't tell you that. I won't tell the people of Canada that." Well, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada want an answer to that question. They want to know that we are not shadow-boxing with this problem.

Why the provision that the N.R.M.A. men shall be made available for service only in Europe? Speaking in Chicago the Minister of Munitions and Supply said: "When the war is over in Europe we are going to send our troops, our airmen and our navy over to the Pacific." On September 18, 1944, at Quebec, Mr. Churchill said that the Prime Minister of Canada demanded and insisted upon Canada's participation in the Pacific area on the conclusion of the war in Europe. Why, therefore, are these men not made available for service anywhere? Why is their service to be confined only to one part of the world?

Finally I ask the Prime Minister another question, and I think the people of Canada have a right to an answer. Will he give the assurance that in the administration of this order in council every part of Canada will be represented according to population, as nearly as possible, in order to assure equality of service and of sacrifice? You may say to me, sir, that the people do not want that assurance. My reply is that they demand it. They know there has been no equality up to the present. The records of "Canada at War" will tell their own story. Those records will indicate still further discrimination unless we have the assurance that the present course will be discontinued now.

I conclude, sir, by simply saying that there are hon. members all over the house who will say privately that they believe in everything in the amendment. There is no politics in it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right. That has been our stand since 1940. I did not expect any other response to that statement, because hon. gentlemen opposite have been so much accustomed to that that they judge us over here by the same standard. I say to the government now, unless you assure equality of service and of sacrifice, unless you give us an answer—not the sort of answer that the Prime Minister gave me a moment ago but an unequivocal answer, one that the people can understand, that will bring together those who voted "no" on bill 80 and those in the cabinet who have been vociferous in the denial of the need of reinforcements—unless we have that assurance we shall return to our constituencies with our people convinced that we in this house have not discharged our responsibilities.

To the government I say this: You have an overwhelming majority but, sir, that majority does not represent the viewpoint of the people of Canada on the question before us, and if the Prime Minister will not answer my question I say that his government does not represent the people. You have over there an arithmetical majority. You have over there a mechanical majority. But that mechanical majority is but a meaningless survival in so far as the opinion of the people is concerned.

As we approach the end of our term, no one on this side of the house, so far as we are concerned, wants an extension of parliament. But we do say this. If the government has taken the measures which it says it has, and has these men on the way overseas to assure reinforcements, there is no reason why the confidence of the people of this country in this government should not be tested by an election. Reinforcements are on the way, but a divided cabinet will carry out the policy, a cabinet in which there certainly are members who do not believe in that policy. There is only one way in which this matter can be decided, and that is not by an extension of the life of parliament but by giving the people an opportunity to speak and by giving them it now. Then you will get an answer that will demand equality of service and sacrifice in this war.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make my position clear with reference to this most important matter. This house is doubtless aware that I am retiring from public life at the conclusion of the present parliament. I have so notified the executive of our great district of Parry Sound and with regret have told them that for personal and other reasons I find it impossible to become their candidate again. It is no secret to hon. members that I have on occasion differed from my party on questions of policy and that I have not hesitated to say so, either in committee or on the floor of this house, and particularly has that been so in connection with the subject of monetary reform, on which question I entertained strong views. I make no apology, Mr. Speaker, for having differed from my party on that subject, nor for the time which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) and I occupied in committee and before this house a few months ago, because, as a direct consequence of our disclosures there made, one of the great chartered banks of this country which it is not necessary for me to name was forced only a few days ago to disgorge and pay to the public treasury $2,200,000 as additional taxes for the year 1943 which up to this late date they had improperly retained out of their earnings of 1943 under the guise of an undisclosed inner reserve fund. Some of the other banks are still to follow, and when the full amounts have been recovered it will be seen to represent a very heavy tax as applied to the smaller taxpayers of this country. My colleague and I are well content to leave it to the judgment of the people of Canada as to whether our efforts on their behalf were not fully justified.

It may interest parliament to know that the sum I have just mentioned, $2,200,000, is a greater sum than it costs this country to maintain parliament each year because on the average, sitting 125 days, it costs to maintain both houses, the Senate and the House of Commons, with all the help required both part-time and full-time $1,850,000. And remember, there is more money yet to be recovered from the banks.

My colleague and I were reviled by prominent members of the Progressive Conservative party, with the single exception of the member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), to whom I accord full credit for his courageous stand, and as well by prominent members of the Liberal party, as timewasters and funny money men. It is not easy to differ with your party, but I believe that many great reforms for which the Liberal party in this country has been responsible within the past fifty years have been largely due to the fact that it is of the essence of Liberalism that men within that party are justified in refusing to answer the crack of the party whip when they believe they are right in opposing it, and it is to the glory and credit of the Liberal party that that should be the case. Let me make this comment. The very opposite prevails with my Tory friends across the floor, and hence the origin of that well-known expression "a hidebound Tory."

When I came to Ottawa at the opening of this adjourned session on November 22 I had fully made up my mind that unless the government undertook to send the necessary reinforcements from the trained draftee army in Canada to meet fully the needs of our boys overseas I would vote against the government, and I made my position in that regard very clear to some friends of mine in the cabinet and to other Liberal friends. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the course advised by General McNaughton and adopted by this government is the proper course to take in the light of all the circumstances to-day—and I am using there an expression which the Prime Minister has many times used and which I believe has governed him in the course which he has charted for us.

Let me say here that I believe the course taken by the former minister of national defence is one deserving of great credit, and not the least does he deserve credit because after reviewing the entire situation he has decided, and has so announced, to vote against the Tory amendment and to vote for the resolution of the government. I join with him with confidence in that course and I adopt the reasons which he gave to the house that brought him to the decision that that is the proper course to adopt in the interests of Canada. But in addition to the reasons he put forward I have some further reasons which I desire to state.

General McNaughton has taken full responsibility and has given his assurance to this parliament of his determination to do what? I quote his exact language. "We are determined," he said at page 6519 of Hansard:

> . . . with all the strength we have that our troops in action will not lack for reinforcements to carry forward our part in the war in northwest Europe and in Italy. We intend to march forward with our allies to crush Germany finally into defeat and to confirm the safety of the peace which follows. There is no doubt about this intent. That has been stated by the Prime Minister on behalf of all in clear, explicit terms.

General McNaughton further said on the same page:

> It is absolutely necessary to the confidence of our fighting forces in the European theatres that there be a substantial reserve of reinforcements made available overseas. The absence of such a reserve might mean casualties that would not otherwise be incurred.

He also paid a tribute to his predecessor, the former minister of national defence, in these terms, at page 6524:

> Mr. Speaker, in closing I would just like to express my appreciation to my predecessor in office. He left me the most of his personal staff, without whose loyal aid I could not possibly have carried through the tasks and duties of these last three weeks. I am deeply obliged to him and to them for all that they have done to serve the public interest in this matter.

In that situation, and in the ability and integrity of General McNaughton, I have great confidence and faith, and my opinion is that of the great and overwhelming majority, not only of the people in Canada, but of the members of our armed forces in the actual theatre of war; they share my confidence and faith in General McNaughton.

I have listened closely in this debate, and so far as I recall no member of this parliament has challenged either the ability or the high integrity of General A. G. L. McNaughton, our present responsible Minister of National Defence. Let me place upon the record some very important expressions of confidence in him which were made public at the time of his resignation as commander in chief.

In December, 1943, I read from my personal organ the Globe and Mail, an extract from its issue of December 27, 1943—across the front page in heavy type, the main headline is, "McNaughton Resigns." It is followed by a front-page article by Ross Munro, from somewhere in England, date-lined December 26. The following extract is taken from page 2 thereof:

> Popular Commander
> General McNaughton's overseas leadership has had a full measure of achievements and deep satisfaction which compensated him for much of his toil. The growth of the Canadian force from one poorly equipped division to a full blown army under his extremely popular direction has been one feature, but apart from the development of fighting formations, the general also took a deep interest in the development and manufacture of war equipment, munitions and weapons.

While Canada's No. 1 soldier was overseas, he has never forgotten his scientific interests which he applied to war problems to save Canada's fighting men.

Before being selected on October 6, 1939, to take command of the Canadian First Division, General McNaughton was president of the National Research Council of Canada.

New shells, new mortars, new guns and vehicles have been put into their hands to a considerable degree through his insistence. The Canadian force is now one of the finest equipped in the world.

General McNaughton has been a military leader in the top bracket among the allied commanders in Britain. His troops are considered among the elite in the United Kingdom —well trained, well disciplined, fit and full of enthusiasm.

Who is there to gainsay that description? Practically all the newspapers across Canada containing articles on General McNaughton were laudatory, and properly so. The Montreal Star of December 27, 1943, had an editorial entitled, "A Great Soldier Retires." The Family Herald and Weekly Star of January 5, 1944, had an editorial entitled "A Great Man Retires." Let me give the house something from across the water which appeared at that time; here is a British view. As published again in the Globe and Mail of December 29, 1943, there appears with heavy type in the lower left-hand corner of page 11, the heading, "McNaughton Lauded by Daily Express." This was cabled from London with the dateline December 28 by the Canadian Press. I quote:

In an editorial on the relinquishment by Lieutenant-General A. G. L. McNaughton of his command of the Canadian Army overseas, the Daily Express said to-day:

"Britain will treasure the memory of that December morning in 1939, when he arrived with the first Canadian contingent. It was high generalship to have inspired, trained and equipped a growing army through all these weary years of waiting without the stimulus of battle", the newspaper said, adding:

"Fate robbed General McNaughton of the pride of leading them as battle approaches, but not of the satisfaction of leaving them as a splendid fighting force to his successor."

Our Minister of National Defence is the man who raised, trained and equipped this very army we are discussing, which army's future has been committed to his hands in the matter of reinforcements; and, as a responsible member of this house, speaking only for myself, I say to him that we shall look to him, in carrying out the solemn pledge he has given to this parliament, to give special heed to the following matters. I do so with, perhaps, some temerity, but I feel that I may be serving a useful purpose.

First, that he will require the commander in chief and the commanders in the two theatres of war, and of the pool in England to make full, regular, accurate reports of the exact conditions of the Canadian pools of reinforcement, and I make bold to suggest to him that these reports should come through to his desk in Canada as often as every twenty-four hours, even though such reports contain merely the two words, "no change".

Second, that ample advance reinforcements be sent forward from Canada to fill the needs so reported to him from time to time.

Third, that he should repeat and emphasize the instructions to all responsible officers in the theatres of war that no men who have been wounded are permitted to return to the front line unless and until they have made entire and complete recovery with a proper period of convalescence.

Fourth, that the men in our Canadian army on active service, who have been abroad for years, and who have seen front-line fighting, should be granted home leave with the opportunity of returning to Canada and being replaced by reinforcements. General McNaughton, the house will recall, has already advised us that this is a special feature of his proposed administration.

If these directions are carried out under his command, as I believe they will be, then, so far as this problem is concerned, nothing else matters, and the situation is fully met.

I desire to bring a further matter to the attention of this house, and perhaps particularly to that of the hon. and gallant member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), whose brilliant address yesterday I enjoyed so much. I refer to the amendment which the Tory party have placed upon Hansard, and upon which we shall be required to vote.

Their house leader, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) moved, seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), their amendment, which I find at page 6622 of Hansard of November 27, and which reads as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and the following words substituted instead thereof:

"this house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice."

I desire the house to note the special care which has been taken in the wording of that resolution under which this party would require all N.R.M.A. personnel to serve in any theatre of war. To my mind the meaning of those words is absolutely clear and free from doubt. Any schoolboy will tell you that "any theatre of war" means any part of the world where war is being carried on. My charge against the Tory opposition, or as I should say, the Progressive Conservative opposition—

Mr. HOMUTH: It never matters what you call us anyway.

Mr. SLAGHT: I am going to suggest a new name for you before I get through. Be patient.

Mr. HOMUTH: Go ahead. I have a few for you too.

Mr. SLAGHT: My charge is that they are not being sincere with parliament or with the country in placing an amendment of that kind before the house and supporting it with a lengthy speech from the house leader and other members, and then four days later putting up as acting house leader the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson)—I believe he is behind the curtains—to state on November 30, very clearly, that that is not the policy of their party and that their party is not ready to support our allies, the United States and Britain, and is not prepared to make our men available to fight against Japan, notwithstanding that, as pointed out by my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), we have pledged ourselves to help the United States with Japan. Let me quote what the hon. member said as reported at page 6688 of Hansard, in reference to our army:

> . . . and we can only fully support them if we have an order in council passed that will once and for all make these men available as reinforcements in any theatre of war.

The hon. member pointed out that there were some aspects of his speech in which he spoke only for himself, but he was speaking as acting house leader, appointed by his party to that task, and this is what he announced to this parliament and to the public of Canada. To continue:

> I am not including Japan as one of those theatres of war, because that is another consideration altogether.

What sort of pledge is that for a great national party? Hon. members opposite know that Canada has declared war on Japan and is at war with Japan. It is the old Tory dodge of saying one thing and pretending that it means another, and trying to get the voter both going and coming, like the gentleman who was selling hymn books and playing cards. I suggest it is political trickery of the most deplorable type. I was astonished when I heard the member for York-Sunbury make that statement, the amazing statement that, under the amendment which that party is asking us to vote for, Japan is not included as one of the theatres of war and that Japan is another consideration altogether. Immediately on the conclusion of his speech I asked him if he would permit me a question arising out of his remarks. He said he would, but he did not undertake to answer until he heard the question. And then I proceeded to ask certain questions at page 6690 of Hansard of Thursday last, November 30. In doing so I made it expressly clear to him that in speaking as leader of his party, having regard to the amendment as to any theatre of war, he had said that it did not include Japan, and I pressed him to say whether it would include enforced service in Manchuria, China, Burma and India. Let me read what took place:

> Mr. Slaght: I do not ask the question to embarrass the hon. member in any way. But speaking as the leader of his party and having regard to the amendment which reads:
> ". . . by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war."
> I understood him to say that that did not include Japan. I ask him now whether it does include enforced service in Manchuria, China, Burma and India?
> Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): The hon. member can take his own interpretation from it and I can take mine.
> Mr. Slaght: I asked for yours.
> Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): I am not under cross-examination here. I have been speaking under a great strain and I decline to submit myself to cross-examination at this time.

The acting leader of the Conservative party was dealing with the very terms of their amendment, and he put this house off with the subterfuge that they will not declare whether their policy includes enforced service in Manchuria, China, Burma and India.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I interrupt my hon. friend—

Mr. SLAGHT: Why do they not treat the house to a little candour?

Mr. GRAYDON: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman?

Mr. SLAGHT: No, I prefer not. Wait until I have concluded.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend a question on a point of privilege? Some pretty hard and severe things have been said by my hon. friend—

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. gentleman has every chance to make his position clear.

Mr. GRAYDON: I want to make the position of this party clear, and I would like to have the opportunity, if I may, to say—

Mr. SLAGHT: I am not yielding my rights to the hon. member. I will answer any questions that my hon. friend likes to ask on his own time. Now, what about his party leader? Mr. Bracken, at the very time that the member for York-Sunbury, acting as leader of his party in this house, made the statement that Japan was not included, and when I asked him the question, was, if my eyes did not deceive me that day, hiding behind the gallery clock, in the gallery right over here.

Mr. ROWE: And Mr. McNaughton was up in this gallery.

Mr. SLAGHT: The leader of my friend's party is sometimes over here, behind me, where I do not get a chance to see him—

Mr. ROWE: And Mr. McNaughton is hiding here now.

Mr. SLAGHT: How I would have liked that day to have the right to turn to him and ask him to stand up and answer my question.

An hon. MEMBER: You may get the chance.

Mr. SLAGHT: Where do they leave the question, this great party? They leave it right here. The acting house leader, the member for York-Sunbury, authorized to lead his party, says in effect that he is too tired to answer. Too tired to answer! The real leader—

An hon. MEMBER: He is an old man.

Mr. SLAGHT: I do not say that, but we are dealing with their position as they have taken it, because it is the old Tory dodge, that of riding two horses, wishing to have it both ways, going and coming. They have an eye on the election and on the country when they put up such a performance as this.

Mr. BOUCHER: You are afraid.

Mr. SLAGHT: The acting leader is too tired to answer. What about the real leader, the absentee leader? I hope he is here to-day. He ought to be across from us, sitting right here, open to question and ready to answer. He ought to be helping us in time of war and leading his party if he has the ability to lead. But he finds safe refuge behind a gallery clock, sometimes behind a pillar; and he has been doing that for two long years except when he has taken time off to hire halls across Canada to go out and preach party political doctrines in time of war. That is the compliment I have to pay him. May I suggest that the reason is that he is too timorous. The other is too tired while the real leader, who has had a rest for a few years, is too timorous to answer my question. What a party! Now, if they are looking for a new name I commend this to the member for Waterloo South, who interrupted me on the question of names. If they are ready to change their name, if they think the present one is not working too well, I will in good faith offer them a new name for their party—the tired and timorous party.

Mr. BOUCHER: That is a smart one.

Mr. SLAGHT: They can be popularly know as the "T and T" party—not TNT, because that has some real power behind it. Through the course of their own amendment as officially refined and repudiated, when you strip it bare, there runs a scheme. There ought to be several actors in the scheme to help them to rig up the amendment and make it sound good. Then the house leader spoke on it and made an able address. Let me compliment him on it. He did not retract anything from it. Then sickness overtook him and the new hero was sent into the house to represent the party. He got up and announced that Japan is not included in the theatre of war. That is the trick and that is the scheme that I wish to denounce. I want to suggest that it is all done with an eye on the election, to play both ends against the middle, to ride two horses at one time, like the old maid who went to market with a basket on each arm, one for the peanuts and one for the bananas.

Mr. ROWE: That is mostly peanuts.

Mr. SLAGHT: Are we to vote, am I to vote to throw the country into the turmoil of an election which would undoubtedly delay the sending of reinforcements?

Mr. HOMUTH: Why would it delay sending reinforcements?

Mr. SLAGHT: Of course it would. You cannot run this country with a leader behind the gallery clock.

Mr. HOMUTH: Did the United States election delay the war effort?

Mr. SLAGHT: Let me conclude with one word to—

Mr. GRAYDON: The man who handles reinforcements is behind the clock.

Mr. SLAGHT: There can be only one answer to this question. The men overseas must be reinforced, and arrangements have been made to provide reinforcements.

Mr. ROWE: That is why an election would not matter.

Mr. SLAGHT: The country is so situated that no alternative government could take over if the present Prime Minister resigned, without dissolving the house, and every hon. member knows it.

Mr. ROWE: You know better than that yourself.

Mr. SLAGHT: If the house were dissolved and an election called it would mean at least seventy days' delay, and defeat the very purpose of this debate. What kind of service do you think you would get in this country if that happened?

Mr. ROWE: It would not mean a day's delay.

Mr. GRAYDON: An election would step it up.

Mr. ROWE: You are afraid to go to the country, that is why.

Mr. SLAGHT: There is a volume of noise from a very large source. Our task, Mr. Speaker, is to provide reinforcements for the overseas army, to provide them when they are needed, and nothing else will do. Because this country has no workable alternative government before it, we must go forward, I submit, with the plans already made.

Just a word to my French-Canadian friends. I have the greatest admiration for them. I think I see better than some men the difficulties that have confronted them in the past and confront them now, and sometimes it makes me boil when men want to impugn the courage in battle of the French Canadians. I remember some time ago joining with twenty thousand French Canadians and English-speaking Canadians in the square in front of this building and bowing my head and raising my hat in tribute to Robillard and Morin, two young French Canadians.

I wish to conclude my remarks by making an appeal to every hon. member of this house. I wish to do it in the words of Abraham Lincoln, uttered in the second inaugural address, seventy-eight years ago. These words are almost prophetic in their application and are just as true to-day as they were at that time. They are just as true in their application to the present situation as they were to the Americans at that time. Mark them, and let me read them:

> With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I was not allowed to interrupt my hon. friend. He desired that it should not be done and that is his right. But I do wish to raise a question at this time. It is a very simple one. May I say that I approach it with a sense of profound pity and sorrow. I regret that an hon. member of this house, for whom I always had a high personal regard, attempted to insert into his address this afternoon what may be regarded as the rough-and-tumble of peace-time politics, which is definitely out of place at this time.

Mr. SLAGHT: If my hon. friend has any questions to ask me, I am here to answer them.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am going to ask Your Honour to see—

Mr. SLAGHT: Before the hon. member can make a speech he must conform with the rules of the house. He is not in conformity with the rules at this time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely I have some protection on a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has raised a question of privilege. I should like to hear the question.

Mr. GRAYDON: The question is this: My hon. friend referred to the leader of my party—

Mr. CLEAVER: Let him get himself elected.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will my hon. friend from Halton come out from behind the barn and sit down? May I say—

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. member for Halton is not behind the barn.

Mr. HOMUTH: He is under the barn.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I am not to have protection in this house I want to know it now, because I am relying upon that protection.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has raised a question of privilege and he is entitled to state it. I now ask him to do so.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CLEAVER: I rise to a question of privilege. The leader of the opposition said that he was speaking on a question of privilege on behalf of Mr. John Bracken. Mr. John Bracken is not a member of this house and has no right to the privileges of this house.

Mr. GRAYDON: I ask to have the right to state my question of privilege.

Mr. GARDINER: Don't abuse other people while you are doing it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am now being interrupted by a member of the cabinet as well; but I think—

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest that you do not abuse other people while you are asking for that privilege.

Mr. ROWE: You are pretty good at that yourself.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may state his question of privilege—

Mr. GRAYDON: May I—

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): You are just sore, that is all.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I have had to appeal for your protection on previous occasions. This, I think, is the worst I have ever experienced. I hope it will stop now.

An hon. MEMBER: It is your own fault.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I am not going to be allowed to speak I should like to know it. Surely there must be some power in this house to prevent interruptions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. members will kindly give the leader of the opposition the opportunity to state his question of privilege without any interruption.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to Your Honour that while the hon. member for Parry Sound was speaking in the vein in which he did, he referred to the fact that the Hon. John Bracken was timorous.

Mr. SLAGHT: Who is he?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We do not know him.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I have more interruptions. My hon. friend attempted to interrupt me when I was speaking previously. Surely I have some rights in this house. I appeal to the membership of this house to allow me to finish my statement. If they are not going to do so I will have to sit down and abide by the ruling of the house itself.

Mr. McGEER: A member has the right to speak to a question of privilege in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot say what the question of privilege is until the leader of the opposition has stated it.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for Parry Sound said that the Hon. John Bracken was timorous, and then proceeded to make some slighting remark respecting his being in the gallery.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right, too.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am afraid it is impossible for me to go further. I am sorry to say that this is the first time since coming to the House of Commons that I have been refused a hearing. I am not going further with it.

Mr. SLAGHT: May I reassure my hon. friend in this way—

Mr. HOMUTH: You are through.

Mr. SLAGHT: He asked me a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROWE: It works both ways; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the leader of the opposition wishes to state his question of privilege I shall be glad to listen.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have tried five times, and I am not going to try again.

Mr. SLAGHT: Speaking to the question of privilege—

Mr. ROWE: It works both ways; sit down.

Mr. SLAGHT: Speaking to the question of privilege—

Mr. ROWE: A rule should work both ways.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SLAGHT: The house leader of the opposition made the statement that the hon. member for Parry Sound had referred to the fact that—

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member has not risen to a point of order. He has finished his speech, and he is out of order when he stands up now.

Mr. ROWE: It should work both ways.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Mr. Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that this is a question of privilege.

Mr. SLAGHT: Speaking to the question of privilege, the leader of the opposition put it this way, that the hon. member for Parry Sound—

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: Quack, quack, quack!

Mr. HOMUTH: The leader of the opposition rose, but he did not have an opportunity to put his question of privilege to the house. The hon. member for Parry Sound has nothing to answer, and therefore he is out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Solomon.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. member will not ask me to decide upon the question of privilege until he has stated it. I should be glad to hear the question of privilege.

Mr. HOMUTH: What is your question of privilege?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We have a new speaker.

Mr. SLAGHT: The leader of the opposition said that the hon. member for Parry Sound had referred to the fact that the Hon. John Bracken was timorous. In other words, if it be a fact I certainly referred to it. Let me say to him—

Mr. HOMUTH: Order.

Mr. CASSELMAN: The Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. SLAGHT: In the use of that word I meant that he—

Mr. ROWE: The Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. SPEAKER: From what I have heard there is no question of privilege.

An hon. MEMBER: Disgraceful.

Mr. ROWE: Your steam roller is wearing out.

Mr. ARMAND CHOQUETTE (Stanstead) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in this debate on account of the extraordinary circumstances in which conscription has been accepted as an integral part of the present Liberal government's policy. I must admit that, being a new member of the house, I have found it an exciting drama, although, in the end, I feel somewhat worried and depressed in the knowledge that such an important step as that taken a few days ago, should have come out of a political upheaval rather than as the natural sequence of serious discussions.

As far as I am concerned, the matter is now perfectly clear. The government have resorted to compulsion as a method of reinforcing our troops overseas and have made conscription an important part of the Canadian war effort. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) solicits a vote of confidence to pursue that war effort and, in so doing, requests us to support his conscription policy, which is now wholly part of that effort. My colleagues from Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) and Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou) have already clearly expressed the opinions of our group, as endorsed by the great majority of the Quebec population and by an increasing number of people from other parts of the country.

I do not intend to repeat what they have already said on the matter, although I realize that it is impossible to put too much emphasis on their arguments if we intend to give our fellow-citizens of other extraction a clear idea of our views and if we wish to attain, in this country, to a mutual understanding based on equality and fair play. That is the price of unity in Canada and any other solution to the problem can only perpetuate the disunity between the two major racial groups.

I now wish to refer for a few moments to certain parts of the speech delivered by the Prime Minister last Monday. Indeed, it was an astonishing speech in which even more astonishing arguments were expounded. I may add that it was not a matter of principle and of military emergency which was in the mind of the Prime Minister on that fateful evening of November 22 when occurred the most sudden political about-face ever recorded in our parliamentary history.

As I said before, it was not a matter of principle or military emergency. It was a matter of political expediency. And to illustrate my point, I shall quote here the portion of the speech in which the Prime Minister related, in sentences well chosen for his future biographies and on a tone of mixed candour and cynicism, how, as soon as he was made aware of the urgency of the situation, he placed the whole problem before his ministers hurriedly convened in the council rooms. The Prime Minister said:

> I made a passionate appeal to every one of my colleagues—I think I may so describe it—not to press for any extreme position; to be as united as they possibly could, yielding up the extreme position, whether it was for all-out conscription under Bill 80 or whether it was for no conscription, realizing that there and then we were face to face with a situation which meant that if we could not agree and could not meet parliament the next day in as united a position as was possible, the only result would be that I would have to announce, on behalf of the government, that we were not in a position longer to carry on because the division in the cabinet was so complete as between those supporting the one point of view and those supporting the other.

As the hon. members can judge from the words of the Prime Minister himself, no question of principle was involved; the situation to be faced at the time was merely political. No mention was made of the necessity of reinforcements, because that was admitted by the ministers. On that night, nothing but the instinctive desire to survive with his cabinet was in the mind of the Prime Minister and permeated all discussions that took place around the council table. To show the trivial nature of the situation, I shall quote again from the same speech:

It was in those circumstances, as a result of the deliberations of that night, with members of council responding to the appeal to do everything possible to come to an agreement, that we were able to agree on the passing of an order in council which, without resorting to all-out conscription, would ensure the men at the front being guaranteed the necessary reinforcements.

There was a first crisis, then a second one. Thus did the Prime Minister, with his undeniable liking for historical analogies, record the various phases of the political upheavals which occurred during these last weeks and which, as I said, brought about the adoption of conscription.

Mr. Speaker, I claim that, in all that time, instead of two there has been but one crisis, that which involved the survival of the government and ended in the passing of the order in council. That such an important and serious decision should have been taken not as a result of a complete review of our military position and our national interests, but as a consequence of a compromise between opposite views of various members of the cabinet, passes the imagination. This order in council appears as a political manoeuvre of the worst kind, when we realize that the lives and well-being of thousands of our youth, the hopes, fears and tears of countless fathers and mothers have hung and still hang to such a degree on the immoderate desire of a man, or a group of men, to remain in power.

I shall go even further. In 1939, I opposed our participation in the war and, had I been privileged to be a member of the house at that time, I would have voted against our entering the conflict. I still hold with all my soul and conscience to the same views and the events of the last five years have convinced me more than ever that our participation in the present war has been our greatest mistake since 1914. The hon. members around me may repeat to their heart's content: Think of the glory and prestige Canada deserves for taking her place at the side of Great Britain in her struggle against Germany.

Frankly, I fail to see why the glory and prestige of a nation should be measured by the streams of blood and tears shed by her sons and daughters. War can only be a final means of defence and any other conception of this art could be nothing but a return to barbarism when might was right, and when, as a consequence, the military art was considered as the height of attainment and brought certain privileges to those who had mastered it.

My hon. friends can also tell me: "This is a fight for civilization, Christianity and freedom", but I do not believe them. I did not think so in 1939 and, had I altered my opinion in the meantime, the imperialistic leanings flaunted by some of our allies and which will completely pervade for some time to come the war effort of the united nations would inevitably have prompted me to change my mind. I must admit, however, that had I been convinced, in 1939, that we were fighting to preserve civilization, Christianity and freedom, I would have been ashamed to contemplate a moderate participation, a restricted war effort, and to reject unreservedly total conscription of wealth and man-power as did our political parties and particularly that which is under the leadership of the present Prime Minister.

May I say again, however, that I did not believe those statements because, amongst other things, those who claimed to profess them did not act as though convinced of their truth. I would not be too critical, for even though the highest moral values hang in the balance, few men are able to rise entirely above the intrinsic shortcomings of human nature. Yet, there are limits and the spectacle which the government has made of itself these last few weeks, both in cabinet meetings and in the house, oversteps, in my humble opinion, the bounds of the most elementary moral sense one expects to find in public men.

My ministers were forsaking me; my resignation was imminent; there was no one to replace me, and had the government been defeated, Canada was threatened with anarchy. Here in substance are the main arguments advanced by the Prime Minister to justify his right-about-turn in adopting conscription. Strange to say, in dealing with such an important measure which imperils the lives of thousands of young men, no appeal was made to the exalted ideals of civilization and Christianity, nor to the more limited interests of our country, nor even to military needs. Could it be that we no longer believe in these ideals or that military operations are now directed to some other end? Time will tell.

I maintain that political strategy is at the root of the recent order in council. The Prime Minister himself has admitted as much; he adds, however, that there was no one to replace him and advances that reason for putting conscription into effect! The Prime Minister considers himself indispensable and it would seem that, in order to keep him in power, the sacrifice of a few lives and the violation of a few principles are well worth while. Mr. Speaker, do you know of any philosophy more harmful to government by the people than that of one man's indispensability? It justifies every act of tyranny and betrayal, and I remember hearing it uttered by the leaders of the countries we are fighting in this war.

How can we believe that the Prime Minister is the only man in the house able to assume leadership of the country? Were it so, I would be forced to the conclusion that minds and hearts have become dangerously enfeebled by a continuous nine-year period under the Liberal regime if, here or elsewhere in Canada, stalwart men can no longer be found who are able to assume the responsibility of leadership. Such is not the case, however, and the other day, Colonel Ralston raised the curtain a little higher on the Prime Minister's real intentions when he pointed out that his leader, in offering his post, hypothetically speaking, to his cabinet colleagues, was carried away by a rhetorical outburst.

The day following the Prime Minister's speech, two powerful mouthpieces of the present government, the Toronto Star and La Presse of Montreal ran the same headlines: "The defeat of King means anarchy". Mr. Speaker, proper government of a country, of a democracy, can never depend on a single man. Recognition of such a principle constitutes the first step towards dictatorship, and I claim that such extremely dangerous propaganda threatens the maintenance of our free institutions, since it is even more pernicious than ideologies imported from foreign countries. Have no fear, the eclipse of some man or other will not cause anarchy in Canada, but the turmoil which now troubles the minds and hearts of our citizens can perhaps be traced to the insidious tactics of one who betrayed his plighted word, broke his solemn pledges, one who now attempts to throw our people into a panic by brandishing before them the spectre of anarchy in public administration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a special appeal to the ministers and members from my province. I know most of them personally. In their private life they are worthy people, endeavouring to earn an honest living and lead their families into the paths of duty and honourableness. I shall, however, point out to them that public life is but an extension of private life, affording new opportunities, on a larger plane, of practising those virtues so essential to social peace and well-being.

They will answer that the requirements of politics differ from those of private life. That may well be, but, nevertheless, they should never stand in the way of honour nor of respect of the plighted word. These expressions should have the same meaning and the same limitations, whether they apply to a member of parliament or an ordinary citizen. Honour and respect of the plighted word demand at this time that all the members from Quebec, from the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) down to the lowliest representative, register a unanimous protest against the government's policy, by withdrawing their support; and I beseech the Prime Minister to ask others than the French-Canadian members of his party to disgrace themselves and to follow him in the meandering paths of compromise and trickery and to permit them to keep what they cherish above everything else and what has heretofore been the pride of our people, the word of honour.

I realize, however, that the Prime Minister is determined. In the course of his public life, he has deserved the reputation of a skilful and wily politician. The government's about-face on the evening of November 22 could well be looked upon as the final act of a lamentable tragedy. As I said before, the Prime Minister is determined, and there is a last act which is so akin to the whole drama that, unquestionably, both sprang from the same clever mind. I refer to the sub-amendment moved last Friday by the former parliamentary assistant to the minister of justice, the hon. member for Montreal-Mercier (Mr. Jean).

What, after, all, is this sub-amendment if not a further government scheme to create further confusion? It is thought that several French-Canadian liberal members will support this measure and then support the motion of confidence moved by the Prime Minister. Can anyone imagine a more ridiculous and dismal situation?

I say to my hon. friends from Quebec opposite: conscription is of your making. You have carefully paved the way for its introduction by your submissiveness and your passivity; you have helped shape it by your approbations and your guilty acquiescence; you have for years coddled and fondled it as a beloved child. And now that your grateful leader throws it into your lap, you reject and repudiate it. You refuse to recognize it as your own.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): My hon. friend will allow me to say that later the Liberal members from Quebec voted against bill 80 which recognized the principle of conscription for overseas service. I would ask him to be fair towards those members.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation): So much the better if there are exceptions.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): There are more than a few, and my hon. friend should take note.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation): But the record speaks for itself; it is authentic and significant. Let us thumb the pages: 1937, vote of approval for armaments; 1939, vote in favour of the declaration of war and of the dispatch of an expeditionary force to Europe; 1942, approval of the plebiscite, of bill 80 and of billion-dollar gifts; 1943 and 1944, approval of further billion-dollar gifts and of a total war effort. And throughout this period, each year a vote of confidence was given to the man who was the prime mover. No, you can no longer deny it, conscription is your creation, your legitimate child.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): With the qualification I mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation): To disapprove conscription and approve the war effort of the government seems to me, Mr. Speaker, a flagrant contradiction.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): Your leader approved the military estimates in 1938.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation): Since November 22 last, conscription has been officially recognized as an integral part of our war effort. It is a logical consequence of the government's policies. But the guilty person is the leader of the present administration; he presided over its launching after making it unavoidable by his policies, and he has promised to enforce it to the limit. It is futile and misleading to make a show of condemning the act and then to absolve its sponsor, of opposing it and then express confidence in its chief author.

By all means, Mr. Speaker, let us put an end to all that; let us have no more such quibbling and hateful scheming. Let us have the courage of our convictions and, above all, let us have the courage to face all their consequences. The order in council imposing conscription is not a compromise between two opposite points of view. It is purely and simply a recognition of the principle of coercion for service overseas under bill No. 80. The authority conferred on the government as regards the dispatch of draftees overseas is general and the number of draftees so dispatched can be increased should circumstances require.

In closing, I wish to comment on some statements made the other day by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) in the speech he delivered in this house. He referred to isolationist utterances of such people as Groulx and Laurendeau. I do not know what he means by isolationist utterances, because that expression has been construed in a number of different ways and according to the needs of entirely opposite causes. However, if he will permit me, I shall remind him that the two men whose names he mentioned, Canon Lionel Groulx, one of our most prominent historians, and Mr. André Laurendeau, provincial leader of the Bloc Popluaire Canadien, are among those who reflect most accurately the views and feelings and an overwhelming majority of our compatriots. And I do say, with them, that we do not want to isolate Canada from the rest of the world no more than we want to separate the province of Quebec from the other parts of the country. We are above all Canadians and we wish that Canada as a whole should belong first to its citizens and that it should be the heritage of each and every one of us. We demand complete independence for our country and I do not think that the fact of being supreme masters of our destinies could isolate us from other countries and raise a China wall between ourselves and our neighbours.

Mr. Speaker, those are fables deliberately spread by politicians much more concerned with the unity of their own party than with national unity. We consider the whole of Canada as our motherland and we are bent on making it our motherland everywhere. That is the reason of our claims, that is the reason of our struggles. To bring about the recognition of the whole of Canada as our motherland, is the noble object we have assigned to ourselves. It should be not an English or a French Canada, but a Canada where both races would enjoy the same rights, the same privileges and the same opportunities, not only in Quebec but also in the eight other provinces of the dominion.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, we meet here at a time of great events which are shaping the future of the whole world. Our course should be in keeping with the lofty purpose of those who are driving forward to victory without counting the cost. The political fortunes of any government or of any member of this parliament are wholly unimportant. The one thing that matters is the full and unreserved support of our fighting men in these crucial days of mounting military struggle when every man, every weapon and every ounce of strength are needed to finish off our tottering enemy before he can regain his strength and his military resources. It is from that point of view that we must examine the facts.

The units of our land forces are in need of reinforcements and in desperate need, as we now know. We have in Canada many thousands of men in various stages of training. The one question for us to answer is whether we have the courage to meet our honourable obligations to our fighting men and see that all men physically fit in uniform will be available as reinforcements without any reservations as to numbers or procedure. That, Mr. Speaker, I submit is the one and only issue before this house. The people of Canada want all-out use of its man-power. They will not be satisfied with any half-hearted and uncertain measure such as the one now before us, and our men overseas most certainly will not be satisfied with anything but honest, open-handed support.

We are told that this course will send 5,000 men over as reinforcements next month. That is not enough. We have been sending that many month after month for years. Normal wastage from sickness and accident would call for that many men under present conditions. It will do very little to bring the fighting units and reinforcement pool up to strength.

It has been claimed by General McNaughton that we got no help or very little help from conscription when it was imposed in 1917 in the last war. Nothing could be farther from the truth. By this means, in the ten months following conscription in the last war the average of recruits obtained was approximately 16,000 a month. The contribution made by Canada's armed forces to the triumph of the last 100 days of the last war was the result of conscription honestly applied. It should be no less to-day. By this limited conscription we are hoping to secure only 16,000 men. If the 156,000 that were obtained under conscription in the last war constituted very little help to reinforce the four divisions then operating in France, what use will 16,000 men be to reinforce the five divisions overseas to-day? This half measure which is proposed will solve nothing. Sixteen thousand draftees are to go, but when, we do not know, and the new Minister of National Defence has not enlightened us. But what of the other 44,000 draftees now in uniform, and what of the thousands who will be drafted during the next few months as they come of age? Are they to fight or are they not? That is what our men at the front wish to know. Already there is a deep and burning sense of injustice in the minds of our fighting men in the active army. Now a new type of injustice is to be introduced between different groups of draftees. What a spectacle for our allies at a time when their respect and goodwill are so important!

The Minister of National Defence replies that the compulsory system produces inferior fighting men, at a time when the full load of battle on land is being borne by the men of Britain, the United States, Russia and other allied countries whose armies were all raised by total compulsory use of man-power. What strange arguments we have heard! The government is to compel a limited number to serve, but it still does not believe in doing it in that way. The new Minister of National Defence makes it appear that it would be a grievous sin against national unity if we employed our men in uniform where those men would be of some use. Then in the very act of sinning in this way he vigorously proclaims his unblemished virtue because he has not sinned still more.

This is simply one more shameful episode in five long years of eager searching for the line of least resistance. When we hear of the bitterness which might be caused if we do our duty here, let us all remember the bitterness there will be in the minds and hearts of young men about to risk their lives for our freedom if they learn that once again they are to have some vague formula in the place of reality. Two years ago it was "conscription if necessary but not necessarily conscription." Now, at this turning point in the world's history, when General Eisenhower tells us that every man is needed at the front, we have a new formula offered us, "compulsion if necessary but not necessarily compulsion."

Unless the members of this house show that they are red-blooded men, worthy to be called Canadians, and demand the all-out use of our soldiers in uniform wherever they are needed, we shall be shamed before the whole world and we shall have sown in the minds of the best of our youth seeds of injustice which may bring stern retribution when they return again to their homes in Canada.

The hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston), the former minister of national defence, returned recently from the fighting fronts in Italy and northern Europe. What he saw and heard convinced him that reinforcements are desperately needed in the infantry. The former minister of defence is a competent observer. He knows from the experience of three years as minister of defence that the voluntary system will not produce adequate reinforcements. Accordingly, the conscription of able-bodied men of military age for service overseas is imperative. Our men at the front are asking for trained reinforcements. The wounded in the hospitals are pleading for help for comrades still locked in mortal combat with the enemy.

This is a matter of men's lives. Gallant soldiers are spilling their blood while we talk. Brave boys are dying on the Rhine while this government manoeuvres for votes. Any cabinet minister who shrinks from the duty of sending reinforcements is not worthy to occupy a place in the government of Canada. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will not discharge the sacred duty of his office which he has been entrusted with, he should efface himself in the national interest; he should make way at once for a real war leader who is prspared to enact and enforce total conscription to maintain our gallant fighting forces in full strength.

In the speech made by the Prime Minister on June 10, 1942, he said, as reported in Hansard, at page 3234:

> It is not the intention of this government to resort to conscription for service overseas unless circumstances should arise which would render the use of compulsion imperative, such for example as the maintenance of the necessary reinforcements for Canada's army overseas.

The former minister of defence says that this time has arrived. However, the Prime Minister dismissed his trusted friend the former minister of national defence because the latter did not give him the advice he desired. His action reminds me of an old friend who never liked to give up his liquor, and when advised to do so by his doctor, got over the difficulty by calling in another doctor. In the same way the Prime Minister would not take Colonel Ralston's advice, but, like my friend, called in another doctor who gave him the advice he wanted. This advice was tendered by General McNaughton in spite of the fact that only a week before he had refused to express an opinion on the reinforcement situation owing to lack of knowledge, because he had been out of the army for nearly a year.

Declarations were made by the former minister of national defence, the minister for the navy and several other ministers in regard to the adoption of conscription for overseas when necessary. I need not repeat those statements. May I say to them that their opportunity has now come to show that when they speak they mean what they say and that the integrity of their word of honour means more to them than the trappings and emoluments of office.

We are led to believe that so bankrupt is the Liberal party in leadership, and this by the Prime Minister, who ought to know, that if he resigned there is not one in his government who can replace him and the government of the country could not be carried on, that it is a case of "King or anarchy." This statement should be resented by at least two or three members of his cabinet. The vote of confidence by his followers for which he is now asking means nothing because they were elected four years ago and the views of the citizens of Canada to-day are overwhelmingly against the Prime Minister and his government. Neither would an affirmative vote retain the confidence of the troops overseas, who are very much perturbed by the limited proposals made by the government.

No country has been so humiliated as we have been by our Prime Minister, who stands condemned before the Canadian people. May I congratulate the former minister of national defence upon the very frank statement he made a few evenings ago, in which he repeated with even greater emphasis the imperative need of additional reinforcements overseas by the end of December. If the Prime Minister had accepted his advice these reinforcements would have left Canada last month in ships already arranged for and been over there in time.

Although the Prime Minister is primarily responsible and must bear the major part of the blame for this delay, the present Minister of National Defence must assume his share of responsibility, as must also the other members of the cabinet. We do not yet know what this delay in the arrival of desperately needed reinforcements will cost in the lives of our brave men at the front, but whatever the cost, the parents and wives and relatives of those men will hold the Prime Minister and his government responsible.

The present Minister of National Defence has said that arrangements were made soon after the passage of the order in council, for ships to transport 5,000 additional reinforcements towards the end of December. The situation which the former minister of national defence envisages, namely, that there will be a delay in sending these reinforcements unless the present government receives a vote of confidence is not a logical one. The order in council has been passed and is now in effect, and the movement of troops has started and will continue even should there be a change of government or a general election. The activities of the United States army did not cease during the presidential election, nor did those—

Mr. RALSTON: That was not run on the question of conscripting needed men to be sent overseas immediately.

Mr. BRUCE: There was a considerable controversy in regard to the army during that election. Nor did the activities of the armies cease in Australia or New Zealand during the elections held in those countries. The officers in charge of the administration of defence, the navy and the air force would continue to function even if we were driven to the extremity of having an election at this time in Canada which, although I would deplore it, I do not think would be altogether a misfortune.

May I repeat that the reasons given by the hon. member for Prince for supporting the motion are, in my judgment, unconvincing and illogical, and his whole argument would justify him in supporting the amendment proposed by the Progressive Conservative party which, from his own statements, represents his views as well as ours.

The Prime Minister the other day made much of the fact that he had asked each member of his cabinet in turn if he would take on the duties of Prime Minister if he, the Prime Minister, resigned, and they all declined. This was a characteristically empty gesture, just such as the one the Prime Minister made to Mr. John Bracken when he said he would not oppose him if he stood for election in Selkirk. He knew quite well that no Liberal or Conservative could be elected there. He made the same gesture to Mr. Meighen in South York and everyone knows how faithfully he carried it out. Death or the electorate alone will separate the Prime Minister from his office.

In order to keep the record straight I would like to affirm that at no time did I agree with the policy of the then leader of the Conservative party, Doctor Manion, in regard to conscription. I have always felt, as I have indicated in a number of speeches made in this house, that conscription of man-power was the only way to ensure equality of service and sacrifice. At that time I favoured a national government because I believed that it was only in that way that we could get a maximum war effort and preserve national unity.

Moreover, I was imbued with the necessity of having as leader of the government at this critical period of the war a man who himself knew by experience what war meant. In my first speech as a member of this house on May 24, 1940, I gave reasons why the present Prime Minister should step aside and make way for a man who had distinguished himself in the field of battle. Everything that has occurred since in the conduct of this war under the present Prime Minister has amply justified the position I took at that time.

I wish to refer now for a moment to the question that was brought up by the Prime Minister's suggestion that he would visit the governor general and advise him as to his successor. There is not the slightest doubt that a retiring Prime Minister has no right even to offer advice as to his successor, let alone have it accepted. It is entirely within the discretion of the crown to ask or not to ask for such advice. There is also not the slightest doubt that even if the crown chooses to ask for such advice it is not bound to follow it. There is certainly ample authority for this position as far as the United Kingdom is concerned; and in the absence of very strong and positive proof to the contrary, the presumption is that the same rules hold in Canada.

I need refer only to Lowell's "Government of England", which book I have under my hand, 1920 edition, volume 1, page 34, where both the rule and the reasons for it are admirably stated. Marriott's "This Realm of England", at pages 25, 329, 340-1, 350, confirms the same viewpoint. Jennings in his "Cabinet Government", at pages 20-46, also confirms this practice. The case of Mr. Galdstone's retirement in 1894 is, of course, classic and conclusive. There was no crisis, no question of a change of party or anything of that kind; merely a question as to which of Mr. Gladstone's colleagues should succeed him as head of the Liberal government carrying out precisely the same policies as Mr. Gladstone's government. Queen Victoria did not even ask for Mr. Gladstone's advice as to his successor, although he was fully prepared to give it if asked, and not even Mr. Gladstone, with his unequalled experience and authority, had the temerity to offer the advice unasked. That will be found in Morley's "Life of Gladstone", volume 3, at pages 512-514. If I had time I would read it to the house.

As to Canada, I may refer to Sir John A. Macdonald's clear and explicit statement of the true constitutional doctrine in Pope's "Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald", at page 316; also Sir Richard Cartwright's statement in his "Reminiscences", the volume of which I have here, at pages 117, 119, 120 and 121.

In 1926 the Prime Minister appeared to claim for himself, among other non-existent rights, the right to name his own successor. As will be seen on page 1 of Sir Richard Cartwright's reference, this claim has never received any support from even the most biased authorities.

If a government is defeated in the house or at the polls the modern rule would appear to be that the crown must, on the retirement of the government, send first for the leader of the opposition. Only if the leader of the opposition refuses to take office is the crown at liberty to consult others; and it may then consult whom it pleases. When a prime minister retires without having been defeated in the house or at the polls the crown may consult whom it pleases. This is certainly Jennings' view and appears to be Lowell's. This view may be found in Jennings' work on "Cabinet Government". Hon. members may read it if they wish. It seems clearly good sense.

Again, the presumption is that the same rule holds in Canada as in Britain, and that presumption can be overthrown only by clear and positive evidence to the contrary. So far as I am aware no such evidence exists.

Mr. King, in his letter of July 3, 1926, told Lord Byng that he "could not assume the responsibility of advising Your Excellency to send for Mr. Meighen". That will be found in Dawson's "Constitutional Issues", at page 75. There was no need for him to assume any such responsibility. If there is one point in British constitutional practice which is firmly established, it is that the crown is not obliged to accept, or even to ask, the advice of an outgoing prime minister as to who his successor should be, even if the same party remains in power. The authorities for this statement are legion.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, may I say that if this country wants chicanery, instead of fidelity to our fighting sons and to our honour, then the Prime Minister is the right man to keep in charge. If we want twistings and contortions and political gymnastics, he has had more experience than any other man alive. If the Canadian people are true to themselves and still have regard for common decency, respect for our past and our name in history, they will take command of this crisis and insist upon the selection of a leader in whom the nation can have confidence, one who will surround himself with the best brains to be found in the country, either within this house or without, members of any political party or of none, men who know the meaning of sacrifice and of honour.

[Mr. Bruce.]

To be indifferent to the call of honour, to desert our hard-pressed and hard-fighting sons and brothers, is to make this country infamous forever.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make some brief observations in this important debate which is before parliament and this country. History will record it as the most important and far-reaching in its consequences, not for a day, a week or a month, but down the years to come.

The government of the day under the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has a war record, to date, second to none of the allies fighting with Canada in the same cause, on land, on the sea and in the air, for victory and peace. In my humble judgment, since the war started in 1939 the government of the day has received from all parties and groups in the house considerable support pertaining to the war. This is as it should be. We are all united for victory and peace. The government of the day has also received strong support from all the people in every province in its victory loans, with every loan oversubscribed by millions of dollars. The people of Canada, wherever they live, east or west, north or south, are war conscious, not politically conscious. They want the government to go on with the war without hesitating, and the government of the day or any other government that might be formed, should beware. The voters who send members to parliament are not thinking of political parties or candidates at the next election. They are working and praying for victory and peace, and that our gallant men overseas will never lack reinforcements.

I now come to the mounting casualties as shown in the army lists we receive each day, and I am afraid these casualties will continue for a long time. Do not let us fool ourselves by thinking and saying this war will be over in a few months. We must fight, and with all our might, to the bitter end.

To my hon. friends from Quebec I wish to say briefly that all down through the years since 1925, when I was first elected to parliament, they have been very kind to me. I have many close friends who come from Quebec. I do not hold the same views on conscription that they do, but when I retire from political life I shall always cherish my friendship with them.

I should like also to pay sincere tribute to the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston), the former minister of national defence for air (Mr. Power), the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and I should like also to wish the new Minister of National Defence, General McNaughton, every success in his new responsibilities.

My riding in Ontario, the county of Perth, is very strong for conscription. A very large majority voted "yes" in the plebiscite, as the records will show.

In closing, may I say that I sincerely hope that before the January session commences the Minister of National Defence will be able to send overseas all the reinforcements needed by our fighting men. With this in mind I will vote against the amendment and in favour of the main motion.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): It may be a somewhat surprising statement to make, Mr. Speaker, but I am going to commence by saying that in my opinion this meeting of parliament has been entirely unnecessary and a waste of time and public money. Let me tell you why I make that statement. In 1942 this parliament adopted legislation which gave this government unlimited power to carry on the war that it had declared in 1939. The government needed nothing further from parliament to enable it, in the words of the Prime Minister's motion, "to maintain a vigorous war effort." At each session parliament has voted ample sums of money. The people of Canada have lent the government all and more than has been asked of them with which to wage war.

For this war this government had the experience of the last war as a guide. The government of that day attempted to keep its army on the battle front up to strength by voluntary enlistment. It failed. That was nearly thirty years ago, and it was proved then beyond any doubt that it could not be done. There was no reason to believe that the voluntary system would be successful in this war after it had been proved a failure in the last war. The plans of the government in this war entailed a much larger fighting force than in the last war, which made it all the more difficult to keep that force up to strength. What this government should have done, as it knew at the time and was derelict in its duty in not doing, was to have adopted compulsory selective service from the beginning of the war, with equality of service and of sacrifice for all. If this had been done there would be no meeting of parliament here today; there would have been no crisis; there would have been no disunity. That would have been the law of the land for the past five years, just as it has been in the United States and most of the other allied nations.

As an illustration of the unfairness of the voluntary enlistment system let us suppose that another member of this house and I were young men again, healthy and fit in every way for army service and in a position to answer the country's call. The other man volunteers. He goes forth to war, offering his all; perhaps he gives his life. Should I be allowed to shirk my duty and remain at home in safety and comfort, perhaps also profitably, while he gives his very life for me? I do not think any hon. member would say that was fair, but that is what the voluntary system of enlistment amounts to. The loyal, brave men go; those not so brave stay at home, while battles are fought and lives are lost on their behalf. That is the policy of this government. In my opinion every healthy inhabitant of Canada of war age owes his life to the state. The man of money owes his money to the state; and when the state needs that money it takes it without compunction. How much money would the government get from income taxes if it took only the money of those who volunteered to pay?

Before continuing to discuss the policy of the government and its effects let me bring to the attention of the house a press report with regard to the treatment accorded our men in the way of transportation when returning from the front. This is a letter published in the first issue of the new weekly, The Overseas Mail, published in Montreal. The Vancouver Sun copies it, saying that it knows nothing about the publication and nothing about the writer of the letter except his palpable sincerity. The facts, however, are supported by the word of hosts of others in uniform who have gone through the same experience. This is his story:

Editor, Sir: Now please don't get me wrong, because this isn't a grouch. I just want to know something in a quiet sort of way.

Why is it that us men who left Canada three or four years ago and went overseas boasting about how good our country was, come back to find we have got to eat a good many of our words? The other day I arrived back for 28 days' foreign service leave, along with a crowd of R.C.N. ratings, some soldier casualties, and a few Royal Navy lads on duty.

We disembarked at New York, and were treated by the American Red Cross exactly as if we were Yanks ourselves. You know the kind of thing they give you. . . . The moment you land you're handed doughnuts, a cup of real coffee (for a change), a chocolate bar and a container of milk if you want it. It makes you feel good, and kind of proud to be "home", even though you have to remind yourself you're still in the states.

You see the amazed looks on the faces of the British sailors, and you think well, that's impressed them a bit, anyway.

Then they put you on a swell pullman train with bunks for everybody and plenty of good food in the diners, served the way you remember it used to be. So you keep on crowing to the British boys about it always being like this in Canada.

Then suddenly, you hit the border. And you're no sooner across the border into Canada than you, and the wounded pongoes, and the R.N. are transferred into an ancient, dirty, colonist car where you are crowded in four to a seat for a 24-hour journey, and where the filth is literally knee-deep. And smell!

They give you your grub in a central galley and you carry it back to your seat to eat it. The plates often aren't clean and you can't keep the cinders out of the stew—and even without the cinders the stew can't compare with the ordinary rations you've been getting in Britain for quality.

The train I was transferred to at the border was all that and worse. It would have been bad enough if they'd given us that sort of hard graft from the start in New York—and remember that we had one guy with both legs amputated and another with only one arm and the dressings still on it, and another guy with something the matter with his eyes—all France casualties. But when they treat us good to the border and then make us look so cheap once we're in Canada, well, it makes you wonder what the score is.

Surely there isn't a shortage of railway carriages, now that the big troop movements are over? Even in Britain we never travelled as crumbily as on that journey, even in the middle of the blitz!

I'd just like to know the answer so that I won't have to feel ashamed the next time I meet one of the British sailors on that draft.

That is something for the government to consider and to rectify.

To resume, the government of former days and the government of to-day tried to keep their armies in battle up to strength by voluntary enlistments, and both failed. The former minister of national defence did all he could to make that system, the policy of his leader, successful. He tried for nearly five years, and then he went over to the battle front and consulted with the officers commanding there. They called for reinforcements. He saw for himself that they needed them. He returned to Canada and reported to the Prime Minister and to his cabinet colleagues the dire need of the volunteer army for reinforcements and told them that they could not be had by voluntary enlistment. That should have been enough. The former minister of national defence was not speaking as one without experience. He has a proud war record, a record that some of his colleagues should envy. He speaks by the book. What did the government do? Did they answer the call for help from our gallant men over there, the call relayed to them by the former minister of national defence? No, instead they turned a deaf ear to the call of these men in their extremity. Why? Not because they did not believe that help was needed, but because they feared that if available help were sent they would lose some political support in a certain part of Canada.

The Prime Minister cast about him for a Moses to lead him and his government out of the dilemma in which they had placed themselves. They thought they had found one in General McNaughton, who told them he believed he could get the sorely needed help by the old, played-out voluntary system. What reason was there to suppose he understood Canada better than the former minister of defence who for five years had tried it out and found it a failure?

The former minister of defence was forced to resign. He was replaced by General McNaughton. It did not take General McNaughton five years to fail, or five months to fail. He failed from the beginning; he is failing now.

What happened? The former minister of defence recommended to the government that the men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act be sent on active service in answer to the call for help from the men on the battle fronts. For that he was forced out of the cabinet, and within a remarkably short time his successor finds that his predecessor was right and he, McNaughton, was wrong. The government of which he is a member surrendered and adopted a policy of limited conscription.

General McNaughton, now Minister of National Defence, is opposed to that new policy, even declaring in this house that he will not carry it out unless he is forced to do so. Imagine a minister of the crown saying that of the policy of his government, that he will not carry it out unless he is forced to do so! He disagrees with the policy of his government, but he does not resign his lucrative position as a member of the government.

Since his appointment to his present office as Minister of National Defence he has made two public speeches, one at Arnprior and one at Ottawa. In both those speeches General McNaughton not only defended the voluntary principle as against conscription, but insisted upon its superiority. He especially asked the Ottawa audience of veterans to hear the exact words he used at Arnprior. He said he advised the government—

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, when the present speaker, the hon. member for Yukon, was in your Chair I happened to be one of the humble members, and he would not allow me to read a telegram. Therefore I take objection that he reads his speech.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The previous speaker, the former Deputy Speaker, has just read his.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): General McNaughton said he advised the government, when he was summoned "to form and lead the Canadian army overseas", thus:

I made it clear that we could carry our effort to success if we based it on a voluntary system.

Again he remarked:

I say if that army had been raised otherwise than by the voluntary method we would have had no army worthy of the name.

Mark those words, "no army worthy of the name."

What about the British army? Is the British army "no army worthy of the name"? Would General McNaughton say of it that it is "no army worthy of the name"? It is a conscript army. Why should a British conscript army be any better than a Canadian conscript army?

When the Americans joined the British in Africa to drive the Germans out, followed up to Sicily and to where they are now in Italy, will General McNaughton say of them that they are "no army worthy of the name"? The American army is a conscript army. Have the American armies in France shown themselves to be "no armies worthy of the name"? Would General Eisenhower say that of them?

What about the Russian armies, armies which fought so magnificently at Stalingrad, at Leningrad and in many other hard-fought battles in which they defeated and rolled back the Germans? Would General McNaughton say of them that they are "no armies worthy of the name"? They are all conscript armies, all the armies of these countries to which I have referred. Who in this world should sneer at them and say, as was said of the Canadian conscripts, that they would be "no army worthy of the name"? Why should a Canadian army called up for service under the National Resources Mobilization Act be "no army worthy of the name"? That is what the Minister of National Defence would say of them.

One matter of which this house has not been informed and of which this country has not been informed is as to why the present Minister of National Defence is in Canada at all and not with his men overseas, to use the Prime Minister's words of him, for this is how he described him, "He, the builder, the first commander of the Canadian army. I knew there was no man who had the interests of the army and the men overseas closer to his heart". If they are so close to his heart, why is he not over there with them? Not because of ill health. We had that from him; he announced it when he came home. You only have to look at him now to know he is in good health. If he could not have carried on as supreme commander he, if they were "so close to his heart", might have stayed with them, have been with them where they are now on the battle front instead of leaving them to go into battle without him. He came home, was promoted after coming home, and on top of that he treats himself to a cabinet plum worth from $12,000 to, if he can be elected, say $16,000 a year.

That is not McNaughton the soldier, the idol of the army, the idol of Canada. That is McNaughton the politician, the fallen idol, the idol with feet of clay.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is desirable that Your Honour should hear what the hon. member is saying. May I say to him that if I have not interrupted him time and again in his references to General McNaughton it is because I have been considering the source from which his remarks are being made.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I am quite willing to have the Prime Minister or anyone else in the world consider the source from which my words came, and I think the source will be found quite as reliable and quite as respectable as some other sources.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Who wrote it?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): If General McNaughton, as the Prime Minister said of him, really "had the interests of the army—"

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): "—and the men overseas close to his heart—"

An hon. MEMBER: It is not a commander's job to be in the front line.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I am a member the same as you are, and am entitled to speak my mind.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have risen to a point of order, and I want to know whether the rules have been changed so that everyone can read his speech.

Mr. CASSELMAN: This afternoon the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) read his.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Skeena has called attention to the fact that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) is reading his speech. I need not point out the rule that an hon. member may not read his speech.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell him you are reading someone else's.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I must admit I made copious notes and I make frequent references to them. I am quite sure they would have just as much effect on the hon. member who has just objected if they were extemporaneous as if they were written; he probably would not understand them anyway.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I may not understand the rules, but I have been told what the rules are.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I am glad they are having some effect on somebody.

If General McNaughton really "had the interest of the army and the men overseas close to his heart—"

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): —and is such an ardent advocate and supporter of the system of voluntary enlistment—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. General McNaughton is not a member of the house and is therefore perhaps not entitled to the privileges of hon. members; yet the remark which the hon. gentleman has just made, that if General McNaughton had the interests of the soldiers at heart he would do certain things, is one which I do not think the hon. gentleman would care to address to General McNaughton in his present capacity. I hope therefore that the hon. gentleman will exercise moderation.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Fish of one and flesh of the other.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Bracken?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is not a minister of the crown and never will be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One rule for one and another for another.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Do I understand the Speaker to object to my making references to the present Minister of National Defence?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman perhaps did not hear what I said. What I said was that if General McNaughton, not being a member of the house, may not be entitled to the privileges that members enjoy, he is nevertheless a minister of the crown in charge of the department of defence, and I suggest to the hon. gentleman that in his references to him he should not impute motives which are neither friendly to General McNaughton nor such as would come in justice from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is a matter of opinion.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I regret if what I have said, and my manner of speaking do not meet with your entire approval, Mr. Speaker, but I am sure that if General McNaughton, having ceased to be a soldier and gone into politics, is going to be as thin-skinned as the remarks made here on his behalf to-night would indicate, he had better get out of politics. If the government wants volunteers, if the present Minister of National Defence wants volunteers—and I say that in all humility, not wishing to offend him—they are going about it in the wrong way. The government's policy, the minister's announced policy, his every utterance, are all the greatest deterrent to voluntary enlistment that could be devised, and I will show you why. What does voluntary enlistment now mean? What does it result in? It results in this. For every volunteer that comes forward one draftee remains safely at home; for every hundred volunteers one hundred draftees remain safely at home, while volunteers take on their duties. Could anyone say that is fair. This order in council, as I see it, is not fair even to the draftees because it does not take them all but picks out a few and leaves the rest. Under these conditions it is no wonder that the voluntary system has failed. Can young men be expected to volunteer under such conditions to take the place of draftees whom the government keeps at home? As I have said, and I have illustrated it to the house, the policy of the government and of its spokesman, the Minister of National Defence, tends in fact to wreck and to hamper the policy of voluntary enlistment. You could not make a stronger argument against it than they make themselves.

Instead of limiting it to 16,000 reinforcements to be sent over a period of months and months in the dim and distant future, and perhaps not all, if the present Minister of National Defence has his way, if the order in council had made all draftees liable for service where war is being fought, where they are needed and desperately needed, and where our fighting men are calling for them, then there would be an incentive to volunteer, but not under the policy of this government or the policy of the Minister of National Defence. The government could then have fairly said, even at this late date, that its policy is that of maintaining a vigorous war effort. But surely the government does not expect the people of Canada to agree that its policy of sending a comparatively small number of draftees, in all possibly 16,000 over a period of time, when 60,000 are available now, is a policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort. Surely that does not add up.

If the government will now replace that order in council, which limits the number of draftees who may be sent to the war to 16,000, with an order in council under which all draftees will forthwith be sent to reinforce the men in the firing lines, that would be a policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort, and I would support the government in that policy, but not in the present makeshift policy.

Mr. HUGUES LAPOINTE (Lotbinière): Before proceeding with this debate I should like to make one remark about some of the words which I heard expressed by the hon. member who has preceded me with reference to the Minister of National Defence. Members may have different views as regards the policies of the government, but one thing on which I think everyone will agree is that a man who, like General McNaughton, has built up the Canadian Army and made it what it is now, should at least have a decent reception in this house. I understand that the hon. member and his family have a very nice war record. I say, sir, that makes it worse because, before being a politician himself, he was a soldier and as such he should have had the decency to watch his words.

I do not wish to prolong unnecessarily the debate on the motion before the house. However, I would feel lacking in my duty to those whom I represent here and I owe it to myself in all justice to explain, why I shall vote as I intend to do on this motion. It is not my intention to discuss here the relative value of conscription as opposed to the voluntary system of enlisting men for our army. Any arguments that I might expound or any facts that I might state before the house would be but a mere repetition of arguments and facts which are already known and which I have had occasion to express in previous debates. Furthermore I feel that it would only be discussing an issue which to all intents and purposes has already been decided. I believe that my views on this issue are well known and I have seen no reason yet to change them. I have always believed, and I am still of the opinion, that the voluntary system is the only practical system of recruiting an efficient army in the circumstances in which we find ourselves in this dominion. Suffice it to say that this system has not, as some hon. members would like us to believe, been a failure in this country. It has provided Canada with an army of great strength whose deeds will live forever in the most glorious pages of our national history. It has sent into the sky an air force which has done and is still doing all of its share in blasting from the skies the once feared German luftwaffe. It has sent across the seas a navy which has now reached the third rank, after the British and the United States, among the navies of the united nations. Surely, Mr. Speaker, a system which has brought about such achievements cannot rightly be termed a failure. No, that system has not been a failure, and it can still bring about adequate results if certain individuals and responsible bodies in this country will use it for the purpose for which it was intended and not as an instrument to overthrow the King government.

However, the situation now is such that whatever may be the views of hon. members on this issue nothing can be changed. We are faced with an accomplished fact, and hon. members are now asked by this government to support it in the prosecution of a vigorous war effort. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself said that the vote on the motion which he presented could not be interpreted as a vote in favour of or against conscription for overseas service, or as an approval or disapproval of order in council P.C. 8891. However, I do recall that in 1942 when bill No. 80 was presented to the house the Prime Minister said, I believe, that when this government passed the order in council necessary to put into effect the powers granted to it by bill No. 80 hon. members would be given an opportunity to show either their approval or their disapproval of such an order. If we are to take the Prime Minister's words as regards the meaning of the present motion and reconcile them with the views he expressed in 1942 then, the present subamendment as I see it, after the subamendment presented by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) was declared out of order, is the only way any hon. member may have of expressing his views on or his approval of the order in council.

I was elected to this house for the first time in the general election of 1940. Speaking for myself alone, I wish to say that the only reason I received such support in the riding which I represent is that I was the official Liberal candidate. The people of Lotbinière, like the other citizens throughout this country, had heard the solemn pledges which the leaders, not only of our party but of all parties represented here except, I believe, the New Democracy party as it was called at the time, had taken concerning the conscription issue. They believed the leaders of our party; they put their faith in them, and they elected me simply because I was following these men. They believed that the tradition of the Liberal party of which I was the candidate, and the doctrine which had always been preached, rightly or wrongly, was one of no conscription, and they elected me to follow that doctrine.

I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that I was not the one to assume certain undertakings and in the name of the party to make pledges to the people. I simply followed in the footsteps set by my leaders, and by the leaders of the other parties, as I have already said. Now, I believe—I may have illusions in this connection—that I have attended as good a political school as any other hon. member in this house. I have always been taught that politics was not a game of diplomacy, but that it was the most serious task to which any man could devote his talent and ability, and that to represent one's fellow citizens in the House of Commons was possibly the greatest honour and privilege to be vested in any man. I was also taught that pledges and promises once given had to be kept. I repeat, I am speaking only for myself. I may have been politically unwise when I followed the lead given by the head of our party during the general election. It is possible that I should have anticipated that the crisis such as the one we are going through now would eventually result; but I do say this: personally I cannot go back on the word which I solemnly gave to the people whom I represent in this house, especially when I am not convinced that this order in council was necessary for the winning of the war and the security of Canada. Furthermore, as regards this point, I will not permit any man to doubt my sincerity or impute any political motives to my action. It is purely a question to be settled as between myself and my own conscience. It may be considered as a selfish attitude to take, but I would rather withdraw from public life than have it be said by any man who had placed his faith in me that I had failed to keep the word I had given.

One hon. member stated the other day, following a subamendment which was presented, and had conclusions similar to the present one, that if that amendment were adopted by the house it would be considered that we were deserting our boys overseas. I do not believe I am a deserter. I am not more of a deserter, anyway, than some hon. members who refused to give their full support to the policy of the voluntary system, when that policy was the only means of providing reinforcements for the men overseas. No one in the house knows more than I do what the boys at the front are going through. At the same time I do not believe that the sending over of 5,000, 10,000 or 15,000 N.R.M.A. personnel will change the situation. I do not believe that it will relieve the pressure on the men now at the front, because that is not the way things take place. These men will be distributed all over the front. They will be swamped among other men who are already there. And, as the former minister of national defence for air rightly pointed out, there is not one commander, no matter of what level he may be, who will take out his experienced men and replace them with N.R.M.A. personnel, no matter how well trained they are. They will just fill in the gaps at times; and the same men who have been carrying the fight throughout will keep on plugging ahead. I know that, because I have seen it done. I do not know how it was done during the last war. I was not there; but I know the way it is done now.

I heard the hon. member for London (Mr. Johnston) praise the men of the infantry on the Italian front. All he said of the men on the Italian front is true of the men in north-western Europe. They are the men who, supported by the air force, the artillery and the armoured corps, are winning the war. No amount of bombing or shelling can capture an objective. It takes men on their feet to go forward against fire, and to dig out the enemy from his defences. And that is what they are doing. It is exactly because of the very nature of the duty which an infantryman must perform that you need a man of determination, of character and of courage who will go forward under any conditions, in order to fill the ranks of the infantry.

I do not challenge the courage of any of the N.R.M.A. personnel, as other people are willing to do. There is no monopoly of courage on the battle front—although there seems to be some here in Canada. And on that point I should like to remark that the so-called zombies—which, incidentally, is a term I never heard until I returned to Canada—exist not only in the N.R.M.A. personnel. Every country has been blessed with them. You will find them in Canada. You will find them in this country in some of our services, under the disguise of general service men. You will find them in the United States. You will find them in England. It is the same the world over, I expect.

This debate and the campaign which has been carried on throughout this country, to some extent has had for its purpose playing on the sentiments and emotions of mothers, sisters and wives. I ask those people, and I ask hon. members in the house who may have sons in the infantry in the front line to-night: whom would they rather have to-night in a slit trench along the front line, fighting it out, possibly holding back a counter-attack under the most intense conditions; whom would they rather have, the man who is there because he wanted to go there and who will stay there to fight it out and die, if necessary, or the man who is there simply because order in council P.C. 8891 was passed by this government?

I was interested the other day to read the comments of war correspondents who were writing about the reception our draftees might receive overseas. I recall that one of them seemed dubious about the manner in which the men at the front would receive them, while another one expressed the thought that the front-line soldiers would be glad to see them. I do hope that is the case. I have questioned members of the forces who served during the last war, and who were there in the front line when conscripts arrived. That is one of the reasons why I do hope this correspondent was right. But I must say I doubt that statement, and I doubt it as much as I doubted the statement made by certain commanding officers here in Canada to the effect that the draftees were eager to go overseas, and were just waiting for the government to assume its responsibility. Events of the last week proved that I had at least a pretty good reason to doubt those statements.

Another reason why I cannot agree on the change of policy is the consequences which I fear will result from that change. In my mind, what is even more important than the fact that possibly 15,000 Canadians will be sent to serve overseas, against their will, in spite of the pledges made by the government, is the fact that for a long time the people of Canada will have lost some of the faith they usually have in their public men. In my opinion the value of our parliamentary institutions is based upon the good faith which can exist between electors and the men they have chosen to represent them. I fear very much that as a result of this changed policy Canadians in all provinces will no longer have in our public men that confidence which I believe is so necessary in democratic institutions.

Irrespective of the complexity of the problem now facing us, the fact remains that one responsible party which, for many years, shaped the opinion of the majority of the people in this country, has brought into force an act which is absolutely contradictory to all its pledges and undertakings. It is not the judgment which the electors may pass now, at a time when the country is going through a period of mob hysteria, that is important; it is the judgment they will pass after the war is over, when they can analyze the facts in their true light, in an atmosphere of peace. I, for one, do not want to share in any way the responsibility for a policy whose enactment by this government may in future undermine faith and confidence in public men. Certainly I do not want to criticize the Prime Minister unduly. I realize as well as any one, and better than some people, the situation in which he has been placed, and I should like to make my own the words pronounced in this house a few days ago by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard). I for one am convinced that no other man in this country could have governed and achieved the success the Prime Minister has achieved in the last five years. In this crisis he had the courage to remain at his post and to lead, at times alone, one of the most difficult, most extenuating and at times most pathetic battles in our parliamentary history. It is a tragedy that at this period of the war, when victory appears certain, he should find himself at such an impasse, and that he should be forced to adopt a policy which, rightly or wrongly, is creating in Canada a state of national disunity. The whole career of the Prime Minister has been consecrated to the edification of a truly Canadian nation. As the hon. member for Bellechasse well said, history will show that no one in this country will better deserve to be termed a nation builder.

I deeply regret that because of the wording of the motion now before the house I am not able to express to him the confidence I have in his ability to run this country during the difficult times through which we are passing. However, I do not see how I can vote with the government on the main motion, thereby expressing my confidence in the leadership the Prime Minister has given, since I cannot completely dissociate from the motion the order in council which was passed two weeks ago and which is now part of our war policy. I believe I truly express the sentiments of the people whom I have the honour to represent here when I tell the Prime Minister that there is no one else whom they want to see as the head of the government of Canada, but on the other hand they cannot forget the breaking of a pledge which to them was sacred. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the task to which the Prime Minister has devoted his whole life, and the national unity which he succeeded in realizing in Canada, will not come to an end because of the present issue. I trust that, once the turmoil of this battle is ended, Canadians will realize at last that they should not be separated from one another, that they should not hate one another because of a mere political issue.

I returned to Canada not quite three weeks ago, and in closing I ask the indulgence of the house to let me tell of one incident which occurred while I was in France. Over there I served with the Regiment la Chaudière. We were part of the eighth Canadian brigade, one of the assault brigades which landed at H-hour on D-day, June 6. The next morning, through the actions of the previous day and after counter-attacks during the night, I found that I had lost more than half of my company. I reported that fact to my battalion headquarters and asked that reinforcements should be sent to me immediately. It happened that on the previous day the craft which was bringing our reinforcements had been sunk, and the reinforcements had not arrived; but I did get reinforcements that same afternoon. And the men who came to reinforce a company of the Regiment la Chaudière were men from the Queen's Own Rifles of Toronto, men from the Regina Rifles, men from the North Shore Regiment of New Brunswick; and they were glad and proud to do so. That night, while certain unpleasant things were going on, I was thinking to myself, "I wonder how many people in Canada would believe such a thing could be true."

There were no differences of race or creed on the beaches of Normandy on D-day when a tank unit from Winnipeg supported an infantry unit from Quebec. There was no national disunity on the airfield of Carpiquet, when men from the North Shore Regiment of New Brunswick and men from the Chaudière Regiment of Quebec fought side by side, supporting each other. There was no national disunity on the hills of Falaise, when boys from Montreal and boys from the west went forward together against the common foe. There was no national disunity on the cliffs of Calais and Boulogne when men from Toronto and men from the lower St. Lawrence fought together and pushed jerry back into the sea. Surely if the men at the front can achieve this national unity and attain this spirit of brotherhood the people back in Canada, and especially hon. members of this house, can fight the war on the home front following the example set for them by our Canadian forces overseas.

I regret to have detained the house for so long, Mr. Speaker, but I am at my last point. I would go as far as to say that in my opinion, and I believe on this point I represent the opinion of many of the men overseas, if here in Canada we cannot achieve a community of spirit; if we cannot learn to understand one another better, then the hardships, the miseries and the losses we shall have suffered during this war may well have been in vain.

[Mr. H. Lapointe.]

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity of complimenting the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lapointe, Lotbinière). His address for the past half hour has been like a breath of fresh air in this chamber after most of the stuff to which we have listened to-day.

I wish to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it was not and is not the intention of the members of this group to occupy very much of the time of the house in discussing the subject now before us. We came to this session with the realization that the members of the House of Commons had been convened to discuss a matter of urgent public importance in which all of the people of Canada were vitally interested, and like most of the other members of the house we came here with very little knowledge of the actual facts in the controversy between the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as it appeared, and the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston).

In the time at my disposal this evening I shall try to place my own views on this matter before the house. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) made a clear and concise statement of the position of this group and then went on to move an amendment which in our opinion, if acted upon, would be the only real solution of this problem. Indeed, had that been the policy since 1939, and were it the policy now, I am reasonably sure that the members of the house would not be here discussing this matter at this time.

Let me say at the outset that the people of my own constituency are interested in this matter purely from the national point of view. There is no conscription problem in that end of the country because, when you attain the age of eighteen years on Cape Breton island, if you do not go into the service you simply do not eat. There is no employment there; there was none when the war broke out; there is still no employment for those leaving school and very little for those who are returning from this war. I say that because it is not a constituency problem. Everyone who is eligible for the service is either in the service or he is frozen to his job in an essential war industry if employed.

When we left to come to this session of the house our conception was that the issue was not conscription but immediate reinforcements for our armies in action on the different battle fronts. My mind was made up before coming to the house that what I would have to guard against was becoming inveigled by political catchwords and slogans by those who were seeking to make political capital out of an unfortunate situation. I say that for this reason. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar indicated, it was my privilege to pay a short visit with him and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) to England, France and Belgium in September and October of this year. When I left England to return to Canada I came back with certain definite impressions, and perhaps the first was that the people of the north American continent little realize how fortunate we are to be living on this side of the world, free from all the miseries, hardships, confusion and the uncertain future facing those on the other side of the Atlantic.

My second impression was that Canada had in the field, in the air, and at sea, armed services that were second to none in the world. I came back very proud indeed of our boys in northern Europe and in the air force and our navy personnel. I think that in the European theatre of war they have done perhaps one of the best jobs that has been done by any army in that field.

My third impression was that in Europe the toughest fighting, and the heaviest casualties, I believe, are still to come. The allied armies on the Rhine facing the Siegfried line are up against a system of fortifications three hundred miles in length and about thirty miles in depth, constituting the greatest fortifications the world has ever seen, and those fortifications are manned by a fanatical army that has been taught nothing but to hate and kill. That is what our boys are facing.

When this issue of reinforcements was raised I found it hard to understand because, during the entire period that we were in England, where we met with Canadian army personnel both at the top and the bottom, I never heard one word about a shortage of reinforcements, with one exception. I did meet boys back from Italy who said that in that country the reinforcement problem was somewhat tense and had been for a year past. But with that exception we heard nothing in England about a shortage of reinforcements.

We had the experience in Belgium and France of spending a night with those responsible for the routing of reinforcements to the line units, and again there was no intimation of a shortage. We spent a short period at staff headquarters where, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar indicated, the direct question was asked of one who had the responsibility of directing the army reinforcement situation at that time, and his answer was that the situation was quite satisfactory. That was on the 2nd of October. We spent part of an afternoon in the forward reinforcement camp. I would not hazard a guess as to how many men were in that camp, but it was quite a large number, and again we heard nothing about reinforcements.

Coming back to the French coast we spent a night and part of a morning in the reserve reinforcement depot there, where there were quite a large number of men in the camp. We also spent a little time on the beaches with those who were in charge of the camp. Everything else was talked about but reinforcements. There was no indication given of any shortage. So that, Mr. Speaker, when I came to this house I say that I came here with my mind made up because of that experience on our visit to England, France and Belgium, meeting those in the field who were directly responsible for reinforcements, to analyse the situation as it was placed before us in the house. I could not understand the agitation in the press; it did not make sense to me. My reaction to most of the stuff which appeared in the newspapers was that someone for political reasons was endeavouring to raise an issue which was not nearly as tense, based on my experience, as the propaganda would indicate.

On coming to the house we find that two ministers have resigned from the government, and for opposite reasons: the former minister of national defence, because he had made a recommendation that the N.R.M.A. army should be conscripted for overseas service; the former minister of national defence for air, because the government had passed an order in council implementing, at least partly, conscription. That is rather confusing to the Canadian people.

On the matter of resignations, my impression is that to resign from the cabinet at a time like this is not a solution. While the ex-minister of national defence, perhaps under the stress of circumstances at that time, felt inclined or obliged to take the stand that he did in order to focus attention on the matter, I personally do not think it is the action which should have been taken. I believe that had the then minister of national defence stuck to his guns, remained in the cabinet, asked for a session of the house and placed the matter before it, he would have been supported in the action which he advocated at that time. The fact of the matter as I see it is that the action taken by the government under order in council P.C. 8891 is the action which he recommended at that time. But it is rather confusing to the people of Canada, and more so, I think, to service personnel overseas, to find that kind of situation here. It is an indication that the issues at stake in this war are not fully appreciated by people who have a distinct and direct responsibility. However, it was, of course, the prerogative of the men who took that action so to do.

I could not quite follow the former minister of national defence when he spoke about the responsibility for the situation in which we now find ourselves. He made an excellent speech, a factual speech; but there is one point which is not clear in my mind. He admitted at that time that there was a telegram from General Crerar to General Stuart. General Stuart was then in the city of Ottawa. That telegram was sent on August 26. General Crerar's telegram indicated that there was a shortage of reinforcements at that time.

Mr. RALSTON: No. My hon. friend is quite mistaken. The telegram which I referred to was a telegram from General Stuart at Canadian military headquarters to General Murchie here. He is mixing this up with another telegram which was mentioned at another session when he speaks of the General Crerar telegram.

Mr. GILLIS: I may be mixed up in the generals.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And the war. Generally mixed up.

Mr. GILLIS: There are very few in this house who are not mixed up—that is my impression—of course with the exception of myself! The fact of the matter is that there was a telegram in August which indicated that there was need for reinforcements. I am not blaming the ex-minister of national defence for this, but what I am saying is that there is something wrong somewhere in the Department of National Defence, or this matter would not be in the condition it is. The "alibi" is that there is a shortage of reinforcements, but we are remustering over in England, and we think we can take care of the situation. I say nothing against defence officers in the field; I think we have as capable a general staff directing the fighting forces in France and Belgium as you will find in any part of the world; but any defence official in England, responsible for seeing that these reinforcement pools were kept up, with the situation as it was in France and Belgium at that time, when our army was constantly in action, as it was also constantly in action in Italy, who thought he could keep his reinforcement pools built up by remustering other service personnel in England was very short-sighted, to say the least. In my opinion the person who made that decision is at least partly responsible for the situation in which we now find ourselves. That was in August. Consequently, I think, the former minister of national defence has a grievance—at least I would have if I were in his place—against someone in the defence department. If I had to leave Ottawa and make a trip personally to Italy, France and Belgium in order to see for myself exactly what the situation was, and found when I got there that the situation was perhaps 100 per cent more serious than was indicated to me by my officials in England whom I depended on, I would feel I had a grievance against that particular department and I would want to see it straightened out. That is why I say that the former minister of national defence, who in my opinion was not responsible for the situation but was let down by someone, should not have resigned from the cabinet but should have remained in it and cleaned up the department, because something is wrong somewhere there.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is it going to be done now?

Mr. GILLIS: I do not know. But certain arrangements have been made. There is now a Minister of National Defence who, knowing the army and the military set-up as he does, certainly will not repeat that performance. He is as cognizant of the situation as it exists overseas and in Canada as any member of this house, and perhaps more so, because he is in a position to have the facts.

With respect to the order in council itself, I wish to make as clear as I can the position so far as I and the other members of this group are concerned. We have an army in the field; that army is fighting a war for certain definite social objectives; it is fighting against tyranny and aggression; and it has to be supported in all circumstances. We must see that it is reinforced and kept up to strength, and that leaves are given as often as possible if that can be arranged. But when you are speaking in those terms you must think in terms of this order in council. Personally I do not regard the order in council as adequate. I do not believe that making available now, in the way you are making available, 16,000 N.R.M.A. personnel is going to meet the bill. I believe this performance will be repeated within the next two or three months unless we do something definite now which will give the boys overseas the assurance that they are going to be backed and backed solidly right along the line in every theatre.

The first thing we have to ask ourselves is this, have we in Canada the man-power to reinforce approximately six divisions in the field, with these six divisions constantly in action? We must determine that. Personally I do not believe that with the population we have, with the machinery of production we have to maintain in this country, we are in a position to reinforce the army in the field constantly in action—and it will have to be constantly in action. Someone said a few days ago that he disagreed with the policy adopted by Eisenhower in keeping the army constantly occupied. My impression is that that army has to keep hammering and smashing all over the front. The hun can have no respite, because if you give him a month or two in which to rest, with the possibility of developing the V-2 weapons, there is no knowing exactly what turn the war will take. You must therefore keep pounding him night and day so as to give him no opportunity for reorganization and changing the war with new weapons.

Mr. GARDINER: I have listened to the statement by hon. members to the effect that the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) criticized Eisenhower two or three times in this house in the last day or two, and I would suggest that the speech of the hon. member for Quebec South ought to be read. He is not here to speak for himself, and having heard him discuss that question before he discussed it in the house I wish to say that at no time did he criticize General Eisenhower's policy or actions. He says what that policy was and what he was doing, and then he goes on to say that "we are told," not by Eisenhower but by some other people in this country. He does not criticize Eisenhower at all.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not mention any member of this house. The Minister of Agriculture presupposes—

Mr. GARDINER: He is the only person who is said to have criticized Eisenhower. I am quite sure that the reference is to the hon. member for Quebec South.

Mr. GILLIS: I said I heard that policy criticized and my conception of it was that it was a criticism.

Mr. GARDINER: I am pointing out that that is not the intention of it.

Mr. GILLIS: It may not have been the intention, but I am expressing my opinion now and I say that if we are to win the war we have to keep smashing forward constantly day and night. I have no desire to get into a discussion about this. At page 6592 of Hansard of November 27 the former minister of national defence for air (Mr. Power) said:

> The strategy of General Eisenhower, supreme commander of the allied forces, publicly proclaimed, is to strike the enemy again and again and to give him no rest and no respite. We are informed that in order to carry out this Eisenhower plan of war, reinforcements must be available and at hand to refill battalions and units within twenty-four hours after the casualties occur. I think I should draw to the attention of the house, and of the thousands of mothers, wives, sweethearts and dependents of those now in the front line, that this repeated return to battle, instead of making for fewer casualties among their loved ones, might very easily make for more. . . .

And so forth.

Mr. GARDINER: Read the next sentence.

Mr. GILLIS: I could read it all night, but it would not improve it.

Mr. GARDINER: He states what Eisenhower's policy is, and he goes on to say that we are told certain things. It is not a criticism of the policy at all.

Mr. GILLIS: I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will take a note of the time. For the benefit of the Minister of Agriculture I will continue the quotation:

> No commander will take his experienced men out of the unit and undertake an engagement with only the newly-arrived, however well-trained they may be. It seems to me that the logical thing, the reasonable thing is to take men out of the line temporarily to refit, to reequip, to rest, to recuperate and to refill the gaps in their ranks.

That is a criticism of that particular plan.

Mr. GARDINER: It is a recital of exactly what Eisenhower did.

Mr. COLDWELL: That was the criticism that the former minister of national defence for air made of General Eisenhower.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no criticism in that.

Mr. COLDWELL: The criticism was made here.

Mr. GARDINER: He simply states that is what any general would do, and it is what Eisenhower did.

Mr. GILLIS: As I was attempting to say, I believe that in the long run, if that plan of action is carried out, it will mean fewer casualties. It will mean a saving in the loss of life.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is Eisenhower's plan. You are right and he is right.

Mr. GILLIS: If the war is allowed to drag and if these V-2 weapons are developed no one knows what will happen. Anyone who has had to live in England has some realization of what it will mean not only to those at the front but to civilians behind the line. All these people realize that getting the war over as soon as possible is the job for the peoples of Europe and of the world. We must be cognizant of that fact.

What I attempted to call to the attention of the house was the man-power that we have available for military purposes in Canada, and when I say that, I think part of our difficulties at least has been a faulty man-power policy from the start. We overdeveloped the mechanized units; we overdeveloped the air force, and we failed to make provision for what the last speaker to-night realistically pointed out when he said that you do not win wars without infantry. The infantry has to go in and take hold of territory or you will not win a war. But we failed to realize that.

There were many reasons for that in the beginning of the war. Everyone assumed that this war would be won in the air. There is another reason why we find ourselves in the present situation, and while it is not my prerogative to defend the Prime Minister, I like to be fair. I will say this, therefore. Over a year ago I heard prominent men broadcasting in this country, one of them from the United States, urging us to get ready for an early termination of the war. The war was nearly over. That was the sentiment on the other side for some time in certain circles. You remember there was a plan to assassinate Hitler. Many of the dignitaries running this war were in on it and they believed they would make another negotiated peace with the German junker generals. We were going out of production in this country for a while in war materials. We did not need more shells. The same applied to the United States and to Britain. That plan did not work. Maybe that is why we were trying to remuster. It was said that the war would be over in a short time. As a result we were caught in a trap which some of the dignitaries who have the responsibility of conducting the affairs of the war were going to spring, and it did not work.

That is perhaps one of the reasons why we are in this situation to-day, and we are not alone in this, as far as I can see. To fill up the infantry units in Britain they are remustering the air force. I have talked to many R.A.F. boys in this country who were on their way home, recalled to go back to infantry units from the air force. So that the whole thing has been developing for some considerable time. Someone has been responsible, and I do not think you can throw the whole responsibility on any one particular person in this country—that is, if we want to be fair about it and not just to use the issue for political purposes, because I consider it is the meanest and smallest political game that could be played.

I said that I was sceptical of whether we have the man-power in this country to operate our machinery, take part in agricultural activities and keep up war production and the other things that are essential parts of the war and reinforce approximately six divisions constantly in action in the field. There may have to be a reorganization of the military forces. I hold in my hand a table which appears in the publication "Canada at War", No. 41, dated October, 1944. I do not wish to read the table because I believe every hon. member in the house has a copy of it. But I find that in Prince Edward Island 46·5 per cent of the man-power in the age groups eighteen to forty-five are in the forces. That is a large portion of the man-power of that province. It must be remembered that a large percentage of those who are left in that age group are in essential jobs or are medically unfit for military service and are eking out an existence in some industry. As you go down the list you find that Nova Scotia has 45·4 per cent of that age group in the services. I believe that someone in the Department of National Defence should sit down and study that table or have the statisticians work on it to find out whether Canada can take that number of men from its industrial set-up and still maintain food production and other requirements in this country and at the same time reinforce the anticipated casualties in the next six months in the kind of fighting that we are to meet on the Rhine.

I believe that splitting up the Canadian army and having it fight on two fronts was definitely a mistake. I believe the reason for the acute reinforcemnt problem in Italy is that when the second front opened across the channel the war in Italy was considered as just a sideshow. They were kind of forgotten; they were overshadowed by the larger operation in France and Belgium and they were neglected. I believe they have gone through some of the toughest fighting of any of the troops in the field to-day. I have had a lot of letters and talked to a lot of boys from that front. I am convinced that there was a very serious shortage of reinforcements on that front and hardships suffered by men who have gone back into the line on two or three occasions after being wounded and hospitalized, men who should have had a period away in convalescent areas fitting themselves up if it was necessary for them to go back again.

I do not think the order in council is adequate. I believe that the government is going to have to face up to the situation. I believe that the Canadian people, if they are honestly approached on any matter and the need is proven to them, will support the government in any action that they may take to defeat those who would impose a system of totalitarianism throughout the world. I find the people generally in the country have a greater realization of what is at stake in this war than the hon. members in this house.

I also find that with respect to all of this criticism of Quebec—I am not criticizing them; they are the victims of a faulty political education for the past forty or fifty years—the thing that has to be driven home to the people of Quebec is that this is not an imperialists' war; that we are not fighting this war for Britain, for the United States or for any other country. This is a world revolution, and out of this world revolution is going to come a changed era of society. It is going to be as decent and intelligent as we, the peoples of the world, make it. Unless we get in there and accept our responsibilities and see that the social objectives for which we are fighting the war are established when the war is over, then winning the war on the military front is not going to suffice.

In my opinion the system of capitalism has had one war too many—three wars in one generation. Practically everybody in the world to-day in the age groups to which we belong has seen the repercussions of the two previous wars. We see that very clearly to-day in Greece, in Belgium and in France, where the peoples of those countries are not accepting domination from another military machine to replace the one they have just got rid of. They are striving and reaching for a say in the kind of government they are to have in the aftermath of the war.

The people of this country are neglecting their franchise. Probably if they lost it once as the peoples throughout the world with the exception of the British empire and the United States have lost theirs, they would realize the importance of it and the obligation and responsibility that they have to see that it is properly exercised. They have never had to fight for it, that is why they do not appreciate it.

The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) offered some criticisms last night. What I liked about his remarks is that he recommended something. I should like to support that recommendation. I think the greatest reservoir of man-power for military purposes that we have in Canada to-day is the air force which is being demobilized. They have been in uniform; they know discipline; they have some knowledge of weapons and foot drill. The hon. member recommended or suggested that if these units were utilized as infantry units and formed into air force battalions, which would keep them together, they could be retrained in a short time. They would be proud of that unit. They would fight together because most of them have been in a team for the last three or four years. I believe that was a sensible and logical suggestion on the part of the hon. member for Vancouver North. I am not going to go into the figures, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to close by saying I think that specific recommendation made by that hon. member is one which should be probed and probed realistically by the Department of National Defence. Second, I would recommend a study of the table of figures I mentioned a while ago by the Department of National Defence along with the other departments, because the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has a man-power problem. We are depleting the farms. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has a man-power problem. Every minister in the cabinet has a definite responsibility to the country. There is not much use to cure a reinforcement crisis in France and Belgium and create another crisis within the country in regard to food, fuel and the other essential war requirements.

I am sceptical of the adequacy of the order in council passed by the government. I wish to close by saying that in so far as I and the members of this group are concerned our first responsibility is to see to it that those who are now on the battle fronts are adequately reinforced without any equivocations. Second, I wish to draw to the attention of the government the fact that if the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is considered, as some hon. members have so expressed it, an effort on the part of the members of this group to focus attention on their own particular political programme, nothing is further from the minds of this group. What we are trying to do, and this government will have to do it at some time in the future, is to guard against what is taking place to-day over in the occupied countries—an invasion without a plan for the future. In the aftermath of this war you are going to have to mobilize man-power, resources and everything that go with those things, to provide ways and means for those now serving overseas, and who are making it possible for us to decide these matters as a free people. They must have employment, a job and all that goes with it and, following this war, there will have to be a plan to mobilize resources, man-power and all those other factors necessary to implement the social objectives for which the war is being fought.

This will be the responsibility of the government. And if it is not done in that way, then some will do it in another way, and perhaps we shall see in Canada what is taking place in other countries where no plan was provided for what might follow after the invasion.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, rising to speak at this critical time in our national history I do so with a sense of responsibility such as falls upon any member of parliament who speaks in the House of Commons.

We were called to Ottawa to receive information from the government, and I hope to give it some advice in these days of national concern. I am sure all hon. members regret that an incident of this kind, if it may be so described, should occur after these years of war. I speak not only for myself, but for my constituents, and, I believe, for the people of Canada when I declare that in its conduct of the war this government has done a magnificent job. After these years of struggle and anxiety it seems most unfortunate that the condition which confronts us to-night should develop in what we hope may be the dying days of a long war. Certainly victory is assured, although it may not come as soon as we might expect.

The business of the session is to try to find a method for increasing reinforcements for our boys overseas, a continuous stream of fighting men who will enter the ranks of those gallant lads who have put up such a magnificent battle since D-day. We ask for a number of men sufficient to assure that we shall finish the job. With that object in view I do not think we should consider the fate of any government, nor should we fear a general election. I repeat, in achieving the object we have in view, namely the reinforcing of our fighting men overseas, we ought not to fear either the fall of a government or a general election. We were called to Ottawa to examine information which would be submitted to members. After receiving that information, I should like to discuss the subject, with sincerity. I want to be able to vote with conviction.

It seems to me that in the examination I intend to make to-night, slight as it may be, there are three facts we must keep in mind. First, we must remember that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is anti-conscriptionist; second, that the new Minister of National Defence (Mr. McNaughton) is also anti-conscriptionist and, third, that the province of Quebec is anti-conscriptionist. Over the radio and throughout the press we heard rumours to the effect that there was a lack of reinforcements for our fighting men overseas. Some have referred to these rumours as propaganda circulated by the opposition. I am not so sure they had that object in mind; but after being in public life for nearly twenty years and in this parliament for twelve years, I can quite understand that they would seize the opportunity to make political capital. Perhaps that is their right. I do not for a moment believe it ever occurred to any hon. member of this house to do anything that would interfere with our war effort overseas.

The rumours continued and evidence began to accumulate showing that there might be some foundation for them. So that the then Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who in my opinion knew the facts better than anyone else, who had at heart the interests of the fighting men and the general organization of the army at home and overseas, decided to make a personal inspection and get the information at first hand. Well, the information he brought back was to the effect that our reinforcement pools were at a very low ebb and that the boys, after months of battle without a chance to rest, were still grim and determined but tired. Upon reaching Canada the minister immediately submitted his information to the government, suggesting that the volunteer system had not furnished reinforcements in sufficient numbers to take care of the actual situation and that 15,000 of our N.R.M.A. personnel should be dispatched overseas forthwith. I believe that the minister did his best to give the cabinet a true picture of the situation, and then the matter was left with the Prime Minister and the government.

We all know what happened, and it did not take long to happen. The former minister either was asked to resign or resigned because his recommendations were not accepted, and in his place was put the anti-conscriptionist to whom I referred earlier in my remarks, which is a fact that should be kept in mind. We had evidence that General McNaughton considered the voluntary system preferable to the draft system, and accordingly he was given an opportunity to see if he could not make the voluntary system work. I am sure General

McNaughton had only one thing in mind, namely to find men to support our boys overseas. Believing in the voluntary system as he did, he started out with that thought uppermost; he asked his commanding officers throughout the dominion to come to Ottawa, and here they had a conference. Following that conference we were told that a new attempt would be made to entice, persuade or advise our home defence army to go active. Then we had reports in the newspapers that these officers told General McNaughton that they did not believe this would supply the numbers required, but that they would go back and do their best. The inference was left that the generals were fairly well agreed that something might come out of this new infusion of life into the voluntary system; but we have on record the fact that Brigadier R. A. McFarland of my own district, No. 10, resigned because he did not agree with those statements. Then occurred one of the strangest somersaults that I ever saw take place in the political life of this country, when an order in council was passed practically adopting the scheme that had been recommended by the former minister of national defence. This proved beyond a doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the former minister was right and that the new minister, together with the Prime Minister and the remainder of his government who supported him, were wrong.

Now I think I have the right to give you the position I have held throughout these years of war. I have been in favour of conscription for service in any part of the world where our interests may be threatened. Having held that view, I do not expect to change it now; nor do I expect you to take my word for the declaration I have just made. I am going to take you back to the records of Hansard, to a speech I made in this house on February 18, 1937. The organization known as the United Farmers of Manitoba had their annual convention that year at Neepawa before I came here for the session, and I was a delegate. Remember, this was two and a half years before war actually broke out; but there were rumours of war; the war clouds were gathering and could be seen by any one who was at all observant. At that meeting this organization passed a resolution which I submitted to this house, declaring that if we must go to war all the resources of this country should be used in the prosecution of that war. In regard to that resolution I said, as reported at page 994 of Hansard for 1937:

> The Canadian people expect that if we must go to war all the resources of the country will be employed in the prosecution of that war. I believe that in the nation's interest we should conscript . . . the resources of the fields, of the forests and of the mines, and all the accumulated wealth.

In 1942 I again found it necessary to place myself on record in this house. That was on the occasion of the referendum in 1942. Hon. members will recall that the speech from the throne in 1942 declared that parliament would be asked to approve the submitting of a plebiscite to the people of Canada to release the ministers of His Majesty's government from the promises which they had made in 1940. I did not think that we needed a referendum at that time. It is a slow process at best and very expensive, and I felt that we had in this house 245 members representing the whole Dominion of Canada from one end to the other and that we were the proper ones to decide whether the ministers of the government should be released from their promises. But the Prime Minister declared that he had no other recourse than to submit the question to the people because it was to the people that he had made the promise, and I am sure now that he was right. But on that occasion I used these words on the floor of the house:

> I had hoped that the question of conscription would escape the turmoil of party politics. I believe that the Prime Minister, with his knowledge of the situation, and the need for vigorous and aggressive action, would have accepted the responsibility or else allowed the house to decide the issue. Now the initiative has been taken by the politicians, with results, I fear, detrimental to Canada.

I think it is only fair to say, after witnessing almost two weeks of debate that the issue has in a measure got into the hands of the politicians. My advice at that time was not taken, and the very fact that the issue has got into the hands of the politicians proves that my fears then were well-founded. I went on to say in the latter part of my speech on that occasion:

> As a final word I want to add that my action will be justified as a gesture of tolerance, in order to preserve unity in our beloved land.

I have told the house that I supported the Prime Minister's policy of a plebiscite, not that I believed that it was the proper course, but because, after listening to several speeches from members of the house, I believed that there was a lack of tolerance among Canadians and I supported the government to show that I was doing what I could to promote tolerance. I concluded with these words:

> The plebiscite is a delaying action, I admit. Future events will test its wisdom. At any rate I am giving the government the benefit of the doubt. If the government, or the opposition, or any individual member of this house has served any interests other than the welfare of his country, may God forgive him; the nation dare not, and in my opinion never will.

It is well for the house to remember that that was my record prior to the summoning of this special session.

The member who preceded me, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), said something about disunity in this country and said that it was largely a matter of education. Perhaps lack of education would have been a better term. But I think he is right. I ask you sir, can we build up a united nation in this country on a separate school system? I want my friends from Quebec to understand that I am their friend and that they are my friends. We are all Canadians. But I do say that the foundation of disunity in this country is our separate school system. Let us get our Canadian children into national public schools and let them all be taught Canadianism. Let them all be taught the same lessons. I have heard men argue in the house that we should have a Canadian flag. I have never had much desire to change the good old union jack. I love it. But I love Canada better, and if we decide to adopt a national flag for Canada I shall be all for it if it will help in making this a more united country.

I wonder when some one will be elected to this house who is big enough and brave enough and bold enough to speak to the people and say: We are going to build a Canadian country here; we are going to deal out fair play to everyone living in it, and when you accept responsibilities as a citizen of this country then we shall have unity and fair play. But we must all do our duty.

I noticed in the press the other night that we have 9,329 conscientious objectors in Canada, and to my horror I found that Manitoba has the most of any province—2,820. Those people are bred conscientious objectors and draft evaders by our educational system and by legislation that has been passed by this parliament. I will mention some of the sects that we have admitted to Canada. We admitted the Mennonites in 1873 and granted them exemption from military service. I will say this for the Mennonites. I live among many of them, and not so far from them, and they are some of the best citizens of Canada. Many of them are dying for Canada on the battlefields of Europe in this war. But they would have been still better citizens if they had not been granted this special privilege of military exemption.

Then I am thinking of the Doukhobors, whom, thank God I do not live alongside and never have. They seem to flower particularly in the fair province of British Columbia. They were admitted to this country by special legislation in 1898 which granted them exemption from military service. They have settled in their own communities and the only weapon they ever use in defiance of the law is to parade in the nude. They will not fight for their country; I do not believe that they will fight even for themselves. Had we seen to it that their children were educated to become Canadian citizens the story might have been quite different.

Then we have in the province of Manitoba the Hutterites, a lot of them. They also claim that they have special privileges. I do not believe that they were granted special privileges, but they claim them. They left the United States because they were told by the authorities there: If you will not fight for this country, get out. So we welcomed them over here; they came to Canada and settled in communities where they gradually shoved Canadians out of the district and founded their own separate schools where their children are not taught to become good Canadians. They are not taught Canadianism at all. That is why I am bold enough to say that our educational system is all wrong; it must be changed if we are to have a real Canadian country.

I noticed that Prime Minister Churchill the other day, in referring to the United States, said that they are the greatest naval, military and air power in the world to-day. The United States went through the throes of settling their country, as Canada is doing now, but they had a national school system. I have no doubt that they have their sectional problems, especially the negro question, but observe their position to-day. Their men are not holding back and saying, "We are exempted from military service because you gave us that right when we came to this country." They are enlisting, and if not as volunteers they go anyway, because the selective draft system is in force, and no one is exempted if he is physically fit. That is the sort of policy which made that nation great. For us, who live alongside, theirs is a great example.

I wonder whether the Prime Minister would be annoyed—I think not; I certainly would not read this if I thought he would be—if I mentioned something which happened at the time of the plebiscite. I did not think the plebiscite was the proper course; I thought that it was an evasion of the responsibility of government, and that we, the representatives of the people, were the ones who should decide. Accordingly I wrote the Prime Minister this letter on January 23, 1942:

Not being in accord with your stand on the conscription issue I deem it my duty to inform you that I will not support your policy as announced in the speech from the throne.

If you decide that my seat on the government side of the house is no longer tenable I will be pleased to accept a location opposite.

There was no answer to this letter, but I was called into the Prime Minister's office. After presenting my point of view, and he giving his point of view, I still maintained that I could not vote for his policy. This was his reply, "Leader, you vote according to your conscience. That is what I intend to do. As for going on the other side of the house, stay where you are." I thought that was fair, eminently fair; I appreciated it and I thank the Prime Minister to-night.

I am an independent. I will never surrender that independence, political or otherwise, to anybody or any association while I have breath in my body. When I went home and told my executive that I no longer wished to sit with the Liberal party and that I would rather run as an independent and take my place as such in this house, they said practically the same thing as the Prime Minister did: "You stay where you are; you are doing good work for us."

And so, Mr. Speaker, when I stand here to-night and boldly state some of the things which I have done, it is not in anger; it is just from a sense of duty. My people have confidence in me. What a terrible thing it is to abuse that confidence! I hope I am never guilty of it.

Just a few weeks ago I was renominated for my seat of Portage la Prairie on the old ticket of Liberal Progressive. I said, "I will be your candidate, but you will have to accept me as I am and I will be bound by no party ties." That was published in the western papers. I received the nomination. When I tell you to-night that I am not voting confidence in the present government, I recognize it is going to affect my position at home. It may be that they will not want me to run under the Liberal Progressive banner. That is fine with me. If the people of Portage la Prairie want me to represent them in this house as an independent member they will find some other vehicle upon which to send me here. It may be that they will want me to continue. It may be that the Prime Minister will say, Leader, I do not like your sentiments; I do not like the way you expressed them; nevertheless, vote as your conscience dictates, and remain on this side of the house.

Some confusion has been evident in speeches made by certain hon. members in this chamber, and it is indicated in newspaper articles that the minds of various hon. members are a bit confused as to how they shall vote. Far be it from me to advise them. Some of them are going to vote for the government because they put in a limited measure of conscription. Others are going to vote for the government if they do not go any further. Other Liberal members intend to vote against the government because they will have nothing to do with conscription whatsoever. But to me there is no confusion. Free from all party ties, and as an independent member of this house, I wish to say that I will vote against the government, and can do so with a clear conscience.

Mr. AZELLUS DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, to-day, as in 1942, during the debate on bill No. 80, which I opposed, I am anxious to explain to the house the stand I feel bound to take in the present circumstances.

In this house and outside, I have often declared and I repeat now that I am against conscription of Canadians for military service overseas; I have not modified my opinions on that score whether the measure contemplated be limited or unlimited, partial or total. However, I might not be completely averse to a form of conscription which would apply exclusively to those who wish to impose it on their fellow-citizens!

If I am at present the lowly representative of St. Denis constituency, it is because I have supported, with the leaders of the Liberal party, during the 1940 election campaign, a war effort on a voluntary basis exclusively. But we are now called upon to support or reject the present policy of the government, including an order in council ordering the sending on overseas service of sixteen thousand of our young men on a compulsory basis.

As I have stated in the first part of my remarks, in 1942, I opposed the passing of Bill No. 80 because it constituted an admission of the principle of conscription for overseas service and I feel bound to oppose its implementation much more energetically to-day.

Unfortunately, bill No. 80 has become the law of the land by a majority vote of the members of this house. Since then, I have felt that the only man who could avoid or delay to the extreme limit the implementation of a measure which is evil from every standpoint, was the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). That is why I have supported and defended him, instead of opposing him and attempting to discredit him, to lessen his prestige and power, as some ultra-nationalists from the province of Quebec have done, when they should have known that their one-sided propaganda of hatred and slander was gradually, but surely, undermining the prestige of the only man who was able to ward off a recurrence of the dark days of 1917. By such manoeuvres, they have succeeded in rousing eight of our provinces against the other.

Thus, they were helping the cause of the Tories, of the conscriptionists, of the Toronto two-hundred and of pastor Shields and they must assume a good part of the responsibility for what is happening to us to-day.

I fully realize the situation with which the Prime Minister was suddenly confronted, but I cannot conceive why this situation could not be foreseen and averted.

Our man-power contribution to the allied war effort should have been limited to the number of volunteers which until now compares favourably with that of the other nations, if our total population is taken into account.

For political reasons, certain Imperialists and Orangemen charge that French Canadians do not enlist in sufficient numbers and, strangely enough, they are the same people who, by setting up all kinds of difficulties and provoking injustices, have prevented them from doing so. One may well wonder that, despite all this, there should be so many French-Canadian volunteers.

No consideration or respect is shown to N.R.M.A. men whether they be French or English speaking, and yet these men have done nothing worse than comply with the laws of the country. They are insulted, they are called "zombies", and yet a large number of them are now in our armies overseas where they are risking their lives to defend the homes and the property of those who insult them so contemptibly.

French-speaking Canadians have no less courage than Canadians of English descent; they are as conscious of their duty to their country and more so than the trouble makers who try to bring about disunity.

I do not want you to think for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to withhold the required reinforcements and equipment from our soldiers overseas. They have already been assured of such reinforcements by the provisions of order in council 8891, but I regret that the lack of foresight, strategy or good faith, no matter on whose part, has forced the government to resort to compulsion.

I shall therefore vote against all the amendments and subamendments moved by the Conservatives, the C.C.F. and the Social Crediters, who would like to send the whole of Canada to England or Europe.

I shall support with pleasure the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Montreal-Mercier, limiting our war effort to the voluntary system, and, finally, I shall vote against the main motion.

On motion of Mr. Dupuis the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Wednesday, December 6, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. JEAN

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. DORION IN DEBATE ON MONDAY, DECEMBER 4

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, on Monday, December 4, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) said at page 6781 of Hansard:

> With regard to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier, if we deal with it as I have dealt with the wording of the amendment moved by the opposition, in order that we may understand what it means, this is what we get:

Then the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay proceeded to redraft the subamendment which I had moved. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member has not the right to change the subamendment which I have moved, and he should not make an argument on my subamendment as he has redrafted it. I do not think that the version of my subamendment which he has given should appear in Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was not aware until the hon. member spoke that another subamendment had been moved. What is before the house now is the main motion, the amendment of Mr. Graydon, the leader of the opposition, and the subamendment moved by the hon. member himself. That is all that is before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): And the hon. member's amendment speaks for itself.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE ON WEDNESDAY—QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

Mr. SPEAKER: Government orders.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, are we taking orders of the day as we did last Wednesday?

Mr. SPEAKER: This is Wednesday, and the resolution dealing with Wednesday's proceedings is still in force. That resolution is to the effect that the order of business on Wednesday shall be the continuation of business interrupted by the adjournment of the house on the preceding day, without questions and orders of the day being proceeded with.

Mr. COLDWELL: I call to Your Honour's attention the fact that last Wednesday the orders of the day were called and there was discussion on matters of urgent importance. To-day's Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day contains Questions and Orders of the Day, and before the orders of the day are called I have a question to ask of the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: There are no routine proceedings on Wednesday, in accordance with the resolution passed by the house, and therefore we proceed directly with the government order. The hon. member for Labelle spoke before the orders of the day were called. I am now calling orders of the day.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before the orders of the day are called may I ask the Prime Minister a question of which I sent him notice this morning?

Mr. SPEAKER: My understanding of the resolution which the house passed was that we would proceed with the business for the day without questions being asked on the orders of the day, for the reason, as stated by the Prime Minister, as I recall it, that he did not wish to have ministers in their seats on Wednesday to answer questions, and therefore there were to be no questions asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then your ruling is that we should proceed with the adjourned debate, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is my understanding of the terms of the resolution.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but—

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not a ruling; it is a resolution of the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would point out to Your Honour that in asking a question on the orders of the day I am simply following the precedent set last Wednesday.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not aware of questions having been asked last Wednesday. If there were any questions asked, it must have been by unanimous consent.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say a word, Mr. Speaker? The session is drawing pretty near to its close, and I think we can get over this difficulty if the Prime Minister and the government, with the unanimous consent of the house, would make an exception to the resolution so that questions may be asked of the ministry. I think that would meet the wishes of hon. members generally. I join with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in asking that that be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. members will recall that during the earlier portion of the session the house did adopt a resolution with regard to the procedure on Wednesdays, which is the procedure just outlined by Your Honour. I trust that, as just suggested by the leader of the opposition, the session may be speedily concluded. Otherwise I would wish to adhere to the resolution as passed by the house. If it is the desire of hon. members however, to have questions called I would ask that course be permitted at the present time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the Prime Minister to say that the orders of the day will be called and that questions may be asked on the orders of the day.

LIBERATED COUNTRIES

EVENTS IN GREECE, BELGIUM AND ITALY—QUESTION OF NON-INTERFERENCE

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the grave implications of the British government's attitude towards events in Greece, Belgium and Italy, and particularly its reported refusal to accept Count Carlo Sforza, a leading democratic opponent of fascism, as either premier or foreign minister of Italy, and in view of the part played by Canada in the liberation of and other assistance to these countries, will the Prime Minister inform this house regarding the attitude of his government towards these events, and to reported statements made by Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden concerning them?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. leader of the C.C.F. group did send me in writing the question which he has just asked, and I think it advisable to give him my reply as I have it in writing.

I may say that I share my hon. friend's concern about the very confusing situations which the armies of liberation have had to contend with in some of the countries which have suffered most from nazi oppression. I should not like to make a difficult and ungrateful duty even more difficult to perform by offering comment from this distance on day by day developments, in dealing with which the main responsibility must inevitably fall on the allied commanders. The three countries mentioned are all within theatres of active operations in which the needs of the war against Germany must still be the chief factor in framing policy.

In Italy, and indeed even in Greece, the corruption of dictatorship had undermined effective political institutions before nazi control completed their destruction. It has, therefore, been an extremely difficult task to improvise reasonably representative administrations, pending the re-establishment of democratic methods, under which political responsibility clearly rests with the people. Transitional difficulties and disturbances should not, however, create any doubt in any man's mind about the determination of the united nations to respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): I sent a notice of certain questions to the Prime Minister and I should like to have an answer which is more informative. It is true that we have had an answer, but I would say that in view of the uncertainty and confusion in regard to the European situation we should have a concrete statement of policy at this time. My questions were:

In view of the reported participation of British troops in fighting against Greek resistance forces and Greek civilians, will the Prime Minister tell this house if any Canadian troops are stationed in Greece, and if so, did they participate in any of the reported actions?

The second part of the question was based on a statement from the United States State department. In view of the unequivocal statement issued by the United States state department, dissociating the American government from the present attitude of the British government, which is one of intervention in the liberated countries in the choice of governments and public men for such governments, as is the case in Italy, Greece and Belgium, will the Prime Minister give this house public assurance that the Canadian government will abide strictly by the policy of non-interference in the internal affairs of liberated countries, as enunciated by our ally and neighbour, the United States of America.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A moment ago I received the questions which the hon. member has read to the house. As far as I am aware, and I think I should know, there have certainly been no Canadian troops in Greece as suggested in the question the hon. member asks, and there is no reason therefore to assume that they had any participation in any of the reported actions there. With regard to the second question, as the hon. member has intimated, I have already replied in a general way, but if he wishes to have a more specific statement as to the government's policy on non-interference in the internal affairs of liberated countries, I have no hesitation in giving the assurance that this government has no wish to interfere in the internal affairs of liberated countries where that can possibly be avoided.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

QUESTIONS WITH RESPECT TO EXTENSION OF TERM OF PARLIAMENT AND DISSOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I delayed asking the question of the Prime Minister which I desire to ask him now, until some time at or near the close of the session in which we are now engaged. It is this: I think the house and the people generally would like to have some declaration and clarification by the Prime Minister of the government's intentions regarding the possible extension of the parliamentary term which expires on April 17 next. Some mention has been made of this in another place; there have been many references to it in the press; and, while our position in opposition to any extension has been made very clear, I think the Prime Minister ought to indicate, now the session is drawing near to a close, what the government's intentions and policies are.

At the same time it would be well if he would clear the air of numerous speculations which have appeared, and which no doubt he has seen, as regards what will happen if there is no dissolution of parliament before its term expires. In other words, it would seem possible that when the term of parliament expires on April 17 the government might go on for quite a length of time without announcing the date of the election or issuing the writs. These are matters on which the Prime Minister may wish to make some statement to the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the house and the country know very well what my position has been right along with regard to the extension of the term of parliament. I am against it. I have right along been against the extension of the terms of parliaments and legislatures. When the constitution fixes a term within which the people are to exercise their right to send their representatives to a new parliament I think the constitution in that particular should be respected. I wish again to assure the house and my hon. friend in particular that nothing has been further from my thoughts, at any time, than to have an extension of the term of the present parliament beyond that which is fixed by the constitution.

As to the other question, whether the government, should it be continuing in office up till the time of the expiration of the term, would then seek to take a long time before it would ask his excellency to proclaim an election, may I say I have not so much as a thought of anything of the kind. My desire is that, without an appeal to the people if at all possible, the government should continue in office, discharging its duties as a government called upon to administer affairs in time of war, so long as the war continues, this to avoid the necessity of an election during war time. That, of course, implies that the government is going to be sustained in office as a result of the vote that will be taken at this particular time. I have never thought it advisable, if it could be prevented, that there should be a general election in Canada while men were fighting at the front, unless that became obviously necessary. On one occasion I spoke at some length on the kind of situations that might necessitate a dissolution while the war was still on. I was addressing members of my own party at the meeting of the National Liberal Federation on the 27th of September last year. If hon. members are at all interested in what was stated at that time I could repeat it, but I think what I then said is known to all present here.

So far as I can see at the moment, the endeavour will be, if the government is sustained, to carry on without an election while the war continues, so long as that may be possible, but not beyond the period fixed by the constitution.

As to how it is to be decided at what time the war has terminated, I notice that the Prime Minister of Great Britain has had occasion to speak on this matter on two or three occasions; and Mr. Churchill has said it may well be that this war will not terminate suddenly or in a way that will be wholly apparent to everyone; that there may be guerilla warfare for a period, and that it may be difficult therefor to fix any date at which it can be declared that the war is at an end. Decisive battles will be fought at some time—I think one is being fought at the present time; there may be others—but there will be decisive battles which I should hope will make it apparent that the allies have conclusively won the war. In determining what would be a reasonable time at which to make an appeal to the people, the question as to whether the decisive battles are over, is one that I personally would feel should be taken into account.

As to fixing a date months after a dissolution before the government would have writs issued for the general election, is to my mind wholly unthinkable. No one who has held the position I have held over these last five years could fail to wish to have an opportunity given the people to express their views once the chance comes.

CANADIAN FORCES

RESIGNATION OF DIRECTOR OF ARMY RECRUITING—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have two questions to direct to the acting minister of national defence: I hope he has received copies of them, as I wanted him to have the general trend of my questions before him. One is this. I understand that a new director of army recruiting has been appointed by General McNaughton; he will take the place of Brigadier J. A. Mess, who has recently resigned. In view of the interest taken by the public in this change I would ask the minister to table such letters and correspondence as may have passed between Brigadier Mess and the Minister of National Defence or any member of the government relating to the brigadier's resignation.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): I know nothing of the circumstances surrounding the retirement or resignation of Brigadier Mess, but I shall be glad to discuss this whole matter with the Minister of National Defence this afternoon.

PUBLICIZING OF ACTIVITIES OF UNITS IN ACTION OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I direct a further question to the acting minister of national defence? In my morning's mail from overseas a constituent of mine, who at the moment is a major in the Canadian army serving in Holland, makes the following suggestion:

There is one thing I feel should be done, and that is that security should be relaxed sufficiently that Canadian regiments may be mentioned by name in Canadian papers. Units over here are very proud of their traditions, and it would be a great morale-builder if the units were mentioned by name more often, both for the men here and for the families and auxiliaries who are behind them at home.

I would therefore ask the acting minister of national defence to take this matter up with the minister so that consideration can be given to this proposal. Perhaps that policy is now under way, because I think all of us, particularly those who are connected with Ottawa and district, bulged with pride over the newspaper accounts last night and this morning of the brilliant role which the Princess Louise Dragoon Guards of Ottawa played in the capture of the city of Ravenna, one of the nazi strongholds in Italy. As appears in the papers to-day, there is the following citation with reference to that unit which is now known as the Fourth Reconnaissance Regiment:

> . . . a brilliant encircling movement by the Princess Louise Dragoon Guards which outflanked the city and forced the enemy to withdraw to avoid being trapped.

I only add that because it came to my attention after I had framed my question with regard to the other matter.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): As the leader of the opposition says, mention has been made from time to time of the achievements of Canadian units. What I would suppose his friend in the field is desirous of having arranged, however, is more frequent and more immediate reference to these units than is now the case. I shall be glad to go into the matter with the Minister of National Defence to see whether more frequent and more immediate references can be made.

SUGGESTED EXEMPTION OF SOLDIERS' CARS FROM GASOLINE RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): On August 10 I asked the Minister of Munitions and Supply a question with reference to extending the provisions of the gasoline rationing regulation, which applies to war workers using cars, to soldiers who have cars and who use them going to and from camps. I said:

> Outside the camps, coming along the road, they pick up privates and give them a lift into the city. I see no reason why the provision should not be extended to include soldiers as well as war workers.

I would like to have an answer from the minister. He said he would see the oil controller. I think it would help in recruiting, because in view of the bus shortage and lack of trains I think the provision should be extended to soldiers who are doing their duty.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The requirements of a soldier depend upon his category. If he has business requirements in connection with his duties, gasoline is allocated accordingly. Of course while he is in actual service gasoline is furnished by the military authorities. I know of no injustice being perpetrated and of no inequality as between the position of soldiers and that of civilians. As I told the house, provision has been made for soldiers on leave whether or not they own a car, and for soldiers returning from active service. In taking care of these categories I think we have avoided any possible hardship to men in uniform.

Mr. CHURCH: Why should war workers have it and not soldiers?

INQUIRY AS TO NUMBER OF R.C.N.V.R. MEN EMPLOYED ON THE RAILROADS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I wish to direct two questions to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs. My first question is directed to him in his capacity as Minister of Defence for Naval Services. Will the minister make a statement to the house regarding the number of men who volunteered for service with the R.C.N.V.R. who are now employed under civilian supervision on the railroads or elsewhere? Will the minister in his statement indicate the pay which these men receive and whether or not the pay and working conditions of these men are similar to that of similar groups of N.R.M.A. men?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): That question should go on the order paper; but if the house should adjourn to-morrow until some day next year my hon. friend may not get an answer to his question; therefore, with the leave of the house I will answer it now briefly. First with regard to members of the R.C.N.V.R. on leave, I may state to my hon. friend that with the exception of a few individual cases where leave has been granted to men from the navy to return to agriculture, fishing or to essential industry, there are no men on leave at the present time. When such men do go on leave to agriculture, fishing or an essential industry, they are sent on leave without pay, and therefore they receive whatever the prevailing rate of pay would be in the particular industry concerned.

LEAVE TO CANADIANS DISPATCHED TO AUSTRALIA—CHRISTMAS LEAVE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Will the minister in his capacity as acting minister of defence make a statement to the house regarding the number of Canadians who are reported to have been dispatched to Australia, and indicate in that report the unit to which they were attached and whether or not the numbers of that unit who had already been overseas for three years were given any home leave before being sent to Australia?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): I may say that Canadian personnel consisting of nine officers and sixty-three other ranks were dispatched from Canada to Australia in July and August, 1944. They did not proceed as a unit but were individuals lent to the Australian forces to assist in training such forces in the use and maintenance of technical equipment, much of which had been produced in Canada, and to operate and maintain the equipment during this training period. Prior to dispatch all such personnel were given leave.

In addition, several Canadian officers were dispatched from Canada to Australia during 1944 to attend courses at Australian staff colleges or for short attachments to the Australian forces to study operational conditions in the Pacific theatre. In all cases these officers were given leave prior to dispatch.

Furthermore four Canadian officers were sent from the Canadian army overseas for short term duty in Australia, one as an instructor on interchange, and three as candidates, to the Australian war staff college. Three of these four officers proceeded to Australia direct from abroad and their route did not permit of leave in Canada. One officer proceeded from abroad via Canada but time did not permit granting leave in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: While we are on the question of leave, may I ask a supplementary question? I understand that service personnel are to be given five days' leave at Christmas. We have a number of young men from various parts of the western provinces, particularly Saskatchewan, serving on Vancouver island. It takes them two and a half days to reach their homes from Vancouver island and two and a half days to return, which means that they are unable to get home for Christmas if they are tied down to five days' leave without any provision for travel. I am not suggesting that the government may be able to do this, but I should like to know if they would give consideration to cases of this kind in order that the boys may be able to spend what may be their last Christmas leave at home.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I may say to my hon. friend that the same question has already been raised in the house by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), and I may tell the hon. member who has just asked the question and the hon. member for Broadview that the order passed by the naval services, which I think is substantially, if not exactly, the same as the order passed by the other two services, provides for five days' leave to be taken in either the Christmas or the New Year period. I may say, however, that no travelling time is allowed in this five-day period; but where long distances have to be travelled, personnel may be granted their annual leave or the unexpired portion of annual leave in conjunction with the special five days' leave. Annual leave carries with it travelling time in addition to the leave period.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO RELEASE OF EX-SERVICE MEN FROM INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I am sorry I have not been able to give him notice. I have received information to the effect that several ex-service men of the present war with service overseas have received their release from several large companies in Toronto. These men have had ninety days or less service with the companies. I understand that shortly there are more to be released who have six months' service or less, and later there will be some released with twelve months' service. I am informed on good authority that they are being replaced in those factories by female labour. I may say that these ex-service men are just being added to the ranks of those who are already looking for jobs. So far as employment is concerned, is there any priority for ex-service men? Would the minister care to make a statement in this connection?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I do not know anything about the factory to which my hon. friend refers. There are 150,000 employers in this country and my hon. friend refers to one of them. I think at least he will excuse me for not knowing anything about that particular industry. If he will give me the details I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was interested in the principle of the thing. Is there any priority of employment for ex-service men?

Mr. MITCHELL: There is priority of referral, yes.

INQUIRY AS TO OPERATION OF PACKING PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. CARDIFF (Huron North): Will the Minister of Labour inform the house whether or not the packing plants of Canada have been operating to capacity in the last three months? After he answers that question I have another one to ask. If they are not operating to capacity, why not?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I can say to my hon. friend that employment in the packing industry of this country is the greatest in the history of Canada.

Mr. CARDIFF: That does not really answer my question. I asked if they had been operating to capacity in the last three months.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am speaking now from memory, for three months is a long time; there are twenty-six working days in a month, and that must be multiplied by three. But I can say that in the last three months employment in the packing industry of Canada has been equal to the greatest in our history.

OTTAWA CIVIC ELECTIONS

USE OF GOVERNMENT FRANK ON CIRCULAR LETTER FROM OFFICE OF UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I wish to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) an envelope which bears the frank of the Under Secretary of State and which was addressed to a civil servant and stamped "Ottawa, December 1," containing a mimeographed letter signed by Mr. Coleman, Under Secretary of State, telling civil servants that they had enough time to vote, and also a circular, "Vote Phelan for Mayor." It is a bilingual circular, one side in English and the other side in French. I hope both ministers will inquire into the matter. Mr. Phelan is an employee of the Department of Labour. This concerns three ministers, including the Secretary of State, and I hope they will form a court martial to investigate the matter.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): This was brought to my attention on Monday or Tuesday of this week and I took the matter up with Mr. Phelan, who said he had no knowledge of how it happened.

Mr. REID: It did not do him any good anyway.

Mr. MITCHELL: As the hon. member says, it did not do him any good. At any rate, this envelope is open and I assume that it was given to my hon. friend open. It is within the realms of possibility that the dodger, or whatever you call it, was put into the envelope when it was open.

Mr. POULIOT: I want an investigation into the matter. It should not be left at that because it concerns three ministers. Phelan is one of the minister's friends.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I might say a word since the name of the Under-Secretary of State has been drawn into the matter by the member for Temiscouata. I am not aware of all the particulars in connection with the circular; I do not know who distributed it. I suggest, however, that to draw the name of the Under-Secretary of State into this house in a controversy of this kind is something which is not desirable in the interests of the public service. I suggest that whatever action he took would be not only justified but justifiable.

Mr. POULIOT: His name is on the envelope and on the stencil.

Mr. McLARTY: I know nothing about that, but I am quite sure that if it is there it is in accordance with the regular procedure that has been followed.

Mr. POULIOT: There is all the more reason to investigate.

BEEF CATTLE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF CONTRACTS BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not in his seat because I wanted to make a request of him. He made a statement yesterday that certain contracts had been entered into between Canada and Great Britain for shipment of Canadian beef overseas. I should like to ask if these contracts could be tabled to-morrow, as the house is going to adjourn shortly.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In reply to my hon. friend's question may I say that the Minister of Agriculture is attending a conference at the moment.

Mr. SENN: Yes, I understand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall direct his attention to my hon. friend's question. I have no doubt that he will exercise good judgment in his reply.

THE WAR

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN MAINTAINING VIGOROUS WAR EFFORT—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION OF THE PRIME MINISTER

The house resumed from Tuesday, December 5, consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Jean.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate may I say that I fully realize the seriousness of the situation, but I am more at ease when I know that I am to express my views to a distinguished body of men who cherish British institutions and world liberty as we understand it. Indeed, a state of complete confusion exists at present in this country. The temper of the people is upset and their otherwise good judgment is disturbed. The body politic is threatened with total disruption. What is the cause of this state of affairs? Why should a large number of the families and friends of our soldiers overseas be disturbed and anxious? Is it because at the front some of our soldiers, or I may say even one of our soldiers, may be abandoned or left alone while his comrades are falling on each side? Will a single soldier be left alone? If that should be true I, as one of the members of this house who have many relatives at the front, would be the first to feel some anxiety, and to ask our government to see that this state of affairs should be corrected.

Is it true, Mr. Speaker, that unless we, the Canadian people, send immediate reinforcements to the extent of 16,000 men, the Canadian forces at the front will be left without help and support? I claim that this is not true. I ask any hon. member of this house who is endowed with a balanced mind, whatever may be his military experience, to rise in his place and say that if a single position on the front line in western Europe, no matter how small, should be left undefended because of casualties, the chief of staff behind the lines would not send immediate reinforcements to fill that gap. If there is a single man in this house or outside who would dare say the chief of staff would refuse to fill that gap, I am ready to resign my seat. Where is that hon. member? If that is not true, why stir up prejudices in this country? Why put fear in the minds of the mothers, the families and the sweethearts of our great soldiers overseas, that our boys are going to be left without support? I think many hon. members of this house have discovered the trick and have brought the plan into the open; but it is good that such things should be repeated, and I am going to take the trouble to repeat them now.

Our military authorities may say that it would not suit the pride of the Canadian nation to allow a Polish regiment, a Belgian regiment, a French brigade or an English brigade, as the case might be, to fill the gap caused by casualties suffered by the Canadian army. That is perfectly correct. If our pride is wounded in that way, very good; but sometimes we as a nation are justified in measuring the dimensions of our national pride. I claim, basing my remarks on military authorities of other nations, that Canada has undertaken too much for its potential man-power. If we take count of our actual strength at the front, both in Europe and in Italy, according to the information given by high authorities, we find that we have six divisions, two and a half in Italy and three and a half on the western front. Is this all we have to show for our war effort, as far as man-power is concerned? No, sir. We have in our air force and navy approximately another five divisions, which makes a total of eleven divisions for a country of eleven million people, or one division for each million of the population of this country. If we take this as a basis for ascertaining what should be the man-power of others of our allies, we come to these figures: the British isles with a population of 47 million should have forty-seven divisions. It is true that they have to face the music in many parts of the world, but as far as I know they have only one division on the western front and perhaps two or three divisions in Italy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is perfect nonsense.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am here to be corrected.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is armies.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is what I meant to say —armies. The British isles have one army on the western front.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How do you know they have only one?

Mr. DUPUIS: And one army in Italy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How do you know that?

Mr. DUPUIS: The Canadian people have one corps, the second Canadian corps, on the western front. On the western front the United States have four armies and the French have one army. That is the picture of the western front. According to the population of the British isles, which is 47 million, on the basis of one-half there should be twenty-two divisions of men in the army, excluding the air force and the navy. To divide that number again we would have eleven divisions in Asia and eleven in Europe.

I think we can safely conclude that our man-power behind the front line is quite strong to-day, and it is much stronger when we consider the strength of the United States. Continental United States has a population of 132 million. Dividing that by two gives sixty-six divisions which should make up the armed forces of the United States. We have been told, I suppose because of their fear of the enemy, that the United States expect to have seventy divisions on the western front in the near future, but to-day there are only four United States armies in the front line. It means that behind the line there is the potential man-power of the armed forces of our allies, which I am sure should relieve a little bit the anxiety which has been purposely created in order to stir up prejudice in this country. What are the facts about the infantry strength of the allied nations?

Mr. JACKMAN: Give us the German strength.

Mr. DUPUIS: You are not talking to a German, my hon. friend, you are talking to a man who has fought and is still fighting to preserve the liberty which your party wants to destroy.

Mr. JACKMAN: I congratulate the hon. member, but I am asking him what he knows about the German strength.

Mr. DUPUIS: You are talking to a man whose great grandfather fought as a captain of militia in 1812-14 to keep this country under the British crown. Without false humility let me say that you are talking to a man whose grandfather, the son of the ancestor I have referred to, died to obtain responsible government in this country and get rid of the little group of financiers and privileged men who in 1837 were trying to destroy unity and keep the riches and natural resources of the country away from the masses of the common people. German talk! I hope my hon. friend will not say that again.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not believe the hon. member understood the question I asked him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. JACKMAN: Order yourselves. What I was asking my hon. friend, who appears to be a military expert giving the relative strength of our troops, was if he knows what are the German forces that we have to meet.

Mr. DUPUIS: My hon. friend was very clever to distort his first question.

Mr. JACKMAN: You misunderstood me.

Mr. DUPUIS: I take your word.

Mr. JACKMAN: You had better.

Mr. DUPUIS: I have been asking myself who has been behind all the turmoil that has been created in this country. I am sure that even the hon. member who has been acting as leader of the opposition knows in his heart that behind the whole movement are the same privileged classes, a similar handful of men who want to accumulate the riches of this country at the expense of the labouring classes and the farmers. He knows perfectly well that that type of endeavour is not peculiar to this country.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is my hon. friend referring to me? I have not followed his speech.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am talking about the former leader of the opposition.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is a new experience for me to be accused of being a rich man.

Mr. DUPUIS: I said that the hon. member knew in his heart who were behind this movement. It is a small group of rich men who control the industry of this country. They want to create a smoke screen of prejudice against race and religion for the sole purpose of achieving their aim. Their aim is very simple—they want the head of the Prime Minister. They are the direct descendants of the daughter of Herodias.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to deny that I am any relation to Herodias. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that I do not belong to any privileged class. I am not a rich man, but I do hope that I am a loyal supporter of our soldiers overseas.

Mr. DUPUIS: So am I. As I said, this movement is not peculiar to Canada, it is to be found all over the world. Hon. members know as well as I that human nature is the same wherever it may be found and at any period of history. Here is one place where I differ from my friends of the C.C.F. I believe that complete equality of wealth and riches is a utopia, because in every country there are men with greater talents than others who by their toil, their thrift and their ambition become rich. That is perfectly legitimate, and I am in favour of it. When they become rich they naturally control some part of the natural resources of their country and some share of its industry, and in so doing they help to develop the country and provide opportunities for their fellow men to earn money. That is perfectly proper. But where the line should be drawn is at the point where these ambitious men become so unreasonable that they abuse their riches and their strength and power. They had that class in the United States, and it was of this privileged class that Woodrow Wilson, a great president of our neighbouring republic, wrote in his book, "The New Freedom", the following words:

> We ought not to permit passion to enter into our thoughts or our hearts in this great matter, we ought not to allow ourselves to be governed by resentment or any kind of evil feeling, but we ought, nevertheless, to realize the seriousness of our situation. That seriousness consists, singularly enough, not in the malevolence of the men who preside over our industrial life, but in their genius and in their honest thinking. These men believe that the prosperity of the country is not safe unless it is in their keeping. If they were dishonest, we might put them out of business by law; since most of them are honest, we can put them out of business only by making it impossible for them to realize their genuine convictions.

Then listen to this:

> I am not afraid of a knave. I am not afraid of a rascal. I am afraid of a strong man who is wrong and whose wrong thinking can be impressed upon other persons by his own force of character and force of speech.

In Canada, Mr. Speaker, this class, a few but very powerful men, are working behind the scenes and using their power to spread in this country prejudices against race and against religion, for what purpose? I repeat, they want to get rid of the present government, and I will tell you why. The present government is headed by one of the most distinguished statesmen in the world, who has amply demonstrated during many years past that he is on the side of the common people and the working classes. The Prime Minister many years ago showed his friendliness towards the working classes by having the fair wage law made a part of the law of this land. Later on he provided the opportunity for the labouring classes to organize and get together to better their working and living conditions and to secure higher wages. This legislation did not please the privileged class, those who control industry in this country, because in helping the labouring classes to secure higher wages and better living conditions the legislation took away too much of the riches of the privileged class; so they were against it. It is the Prime Minister who is responsible for these laws. Later on he was responsible for bringing in legislation to control combines in this country, as well as many other laws restricting the powers of the privileged class, and during all these years that privileged class have been anxious in their hearts to find ways and means to get rid of such a man because he stood in their way. That is the cold fact.

Later on this government headed by the same Prime Minister passed social legislation, for what purpose? It was passed for two purposes. The first purpose was to distribute more equitably the wealth of the nation among the labouring classes, the farming class and the middle class—wealth which had been unduly accumulated by and unjustly kept for the privileged class. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that that privileged class was pleased to see that legislation passed? Oh, no; they got behind the curtains to organize and find ways and means of destroying King at all costs. Their attitude was: King is the man that should be hated and got rid of, and we must get rid of him.

I have said that the Prime Minister and his government passed that social legislation for two purposes. The first purpose was to distribute more equitably the wealth of the nation. The other purpose was to try to stop the subversive elements which are active not only in this country but all over the world. Without being a seer I am convinced that the real intent in the heart of the Prime Minister in passing that social legislation was to set up Canada as an example for all the nations of the world and to entrench in this country a sound system of government with which extremists on both sides would be satisfied, thus preventing communism from taking over the reins of administration in this country. I believe that at the same time his object was to try to get control of this country out of the hands of that little gang of abusers that we call the privileged classes.

I am in duty bound to say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister, without any hope of securing favour and without fear of the results, that if ever there was a man whose consistent purpose it has always been to do his utmost to help the poor and the unfortunate, the forlorn, the abandoned and the neglected, the common classes—not only of the province of Quebec as some of our friends have insinuated, but of the whole of Canada, to help those who need help and sympathy and are entitled to their legitimate share in the development of this country and the happiness which is due to any British subject who lives under the union jack, it is the Prime Minister of this country. It is said somewhere, in reference to Papineau:

> Il fut toute une époque et longtemps notre race
> N'eut que sa voix pour glaive et son corps pour cuirasse.

I should like to paraphrase these words of the poet and apply them to our distinguished leader:

> There was a whole epoch and for a long time the common, ordinary people of this country had nothing but his voice as a sword and his body as a cuirass.

I have paraphrased this saying so as to apply it to the first minister of this country—not to try to help him, for he does not need my help. But every one of us, whatever our political allegiance, who is fair-minded must admit that the burden which he has carried so many years, and especially during this dreadful war, is a very heavy burden and one which must have taxed his strength and energy. It is the duty of every man in this house and this country, especially those of us who come from the lower class, to tender him a friendly hand because he has played a great role in the destinies of this country.

I would refer now, Mr. Speaker, to the attitude taken by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party, the purpose of whose amendment is to put power in the hands of the government against Quebec. An expression dear to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is "equality of sacrifice". In his last speech he said in effect: I am not satisfied with the terms of the order in council, but if I could be assured that these 16,000 men would be taken in equal proportion from each province, that would satisfy me. Far be it from me, Mr. Speaker, to do anything to stir up prejudice. If to-day prejudices in the sister provinces of this great dominion are at their peak, I would not like to contribute in any way to a like feeling in my own native province. But may I say to the hon. member for Lake Centre, who is prone to demand that Quebec do its full share, and who insists even violently that it be so: I am satisfied that in the circumstances in which we live, Quebec has done a very large share, larger even than may be justified. May I call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that, when the problem of the Doukhobors and other conscientious objectors comes before the house, everyone who is responsible for these people admits that the government is absolutely powerless to make them obey the law. This has been admitted in this chamber by ministers of the crown. Are these objectors very numerous, Mr. Speaker? Less than ten thousand. Yet the authorities are unable to compel this small group to be law-abiding citizens.

But when it comes to the position of French Canada we are told that they must do their duty, that if they do not do their duty there will be revolution; to obtain the legislation which they desire from this government they stir up hostile sentiment all over the country. So, because disturbances occur in certain parts of the country it is contended that the Prime Minister and the cabinet are bound to pass a law to satisfy these people. It is against Quebec: that is very fine. Poor Quebec! If it were not so serious it would be pitiful, coming from friends in this country who otherwise are freedom-loving people; people of British descent, people by whose race great things have been done. May I tell those who are doing their best to arouse prejudice in order to obtain their goal, that perhaps it is high time they relinquish their grip on the natural resources of this country by which their fortunes have been made, and allow other classes a share. In this connection I cannot do better than cite the sublime example of those great peers of England to whom Sir Wilfrid Laurier made such eloquent reference. He said:

> I know of no spectacle that reflects greater honour on humanity than the spectacle of these peers of England, these rich and powerful nobles, stubbornly fighting to eradicate a host of venerable abuses and sacrificing their privileges with calm enthusiasm to make life easier and happier for a larger number of their fellow beings.

Nobody, Mr. Speaker, can induce me to believe that the descendants of these great men who sacrificed their personal interests in behalf of the common people of England, in the abolition—for instance—of the rotten boroughs—that the liberty-loving descendants of these men who are to be found everywhere in Canada would not support me, a French Catholic fellow citizen, in removing any occasion of hardship or injustice. Therefore, why not leave these minds, why not leave the people with their ordinary well-balanced minds, the minds of Britishers? Why stir up prejudices? Why put into the hearts of the mothers, the sweethearts, the brothers and the fathers of our heroic soldiers over there the fear that these poor boys are to be abandoned and sacrificed because the people of Quebec refuse to do their duty, when we know perfectly well that that is an absolute falsehood? I beseech my fellow citizens, through you, Mr. Speaker, to cease this campaign, to come to the fold, to unite with us. I do not care who may be in power; the hour is too grave and the time too serious.

What is the use of one part of this country trying to struggle against another part when those boys at the front give us so sublime an example, as was eloquently expressed the other night by the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Lapointe)?

To summarize my views on this subject, on the one hand we find a part of the country completely disturbed by this falsehood in regard to reinforcements; on the other hand we find a part of the country—and mind you they are not only French-Canadians—suffering injustice, people who nevertheless are doing their duty; people who are going to be taken by force, no matter if in the past, up to the present time, they have been refused the privilege and the opportunity of taking part in the development of the natural resources of the country; no matter if they have been abandoned and sacrificed. They are forced by law to go against their will to fight in Europe, as reinforcements, when we know perfectly well that this is not necessary. At all events I, as a humble citizen, coming from the lower class and having sworn to myself to give whatever I could during my life, however modest it may be, to help the class from which I am sprung, am very much disturbed about the legislation which is now before the house. Shall I give confidence to my Prime Minister? Yes. But to be in favour of order in council 8891? No; not because I am French Canadian but because I know that this order in council has been passed by a means which is not appropriate to a democratic country. At the same time, am I to support the Prime Minister now that this order in council has become the law of the land? I repeat: support the Prime Minister, most decidedly; but for conscription, I cannot.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are on the spot, aren't you?

Mr. DUPUIS: I speak for myself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are on the spot.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am not afraid of being on the spot, but I am sorry for those who have put the country in such a useless position. At any rate, no matter if some of my fellow members in this house are laughing at me, no matter if I am ridiculed, I find the situation too serious, and in such circumstances, when the national soul is disturbed, when the people are unable to discover a solution for these difficult problems, I cannot do better than repeat the words of our King. Early in the beginning of this the greatest of all struggles, before Christmas, 1939, he said to a man who stood at the gate of the year: "Give me a light that I may tread safely into the unknown."

The reply was: "Go out into the darkness and put your hand into the hand of God. That shall be to you better than light and safer than the known way."

I would like you, Mr. Speaker, and every one of my fellow citizens and fellow members to do likewise. Let us put our hand in the hand of God, and let us have faith, so that this country may pass safely through these difficult times and continue to move forward to that beautiful destiny which has been reserved for it by Divine Providence.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON: (York West): Listening to the address which we have just heard I thought of certain lines from the poet Arthur Clough:

> Thou shalt not kill; but need'st not strive > Officiously to keep alive.

We listened the other night to a point of view, expressed by the hon. member for Lotbinière, to which I take extreme and absolute exception. Coming as it did from the hon. and gallant member, I must respect it, but unfortunately that is more than I can say for what has gone on this afternoon. Apparently we are losing sight of the old simple virtues which were expressed by Pericles when he said that freedom is given only to those who are willing to fight for it.

If ever there was a time when freedom of religion, when all the four freedoms in fact were in desperate danger, it has been during this war. Let there be no possible doubt about that. Then the hon. member made comparisons and, I think, suggested that somebody else might do our reinforcing for us. I think that is wholly despicable to come from this Canadian parliament.

Our war effort was compared with those of the United Kingdom and the United States. The last figures I had indicated that the United Kingdom had in the neighbourhood of seventy-seven divisions and the United States had armed forces of something like eleven million personnel. For us to complain that five divisions and two armoured brigades is excessive for our population is to do something that will not hold water. Australia with a population of some two-thirds of ours has or has had in her armed forces something in the neighbourhood of 800,000 personnel. I shall deal with that a little later in my speech.

At the moment I wish to say something concerning this question of conscription that has not yet been mentioned. In the feudal days armies were raised by the individual baron or lord, and they were his own private armies. There was considerable trouble with that method all during Plantagenet days, and the right of the king versus the right of the barons was directly the cause of strife. Then we passed from the feudal method of raising an army to the professional soldier and the mercenary. That was reasonably satisfactory for a short time, but the value of the mercenary ended with the war of the American revolution, which in many ways was the first real war for freedom. But still the method of raising armies by the professional caste or the professional soldier continued right through Napoleonic times. During these wars the civil population of the country did not suffer unless they were more or less in the line of battle or in a blockaded part of the territory being fought for. All that changed with the war of 1914-18. This was the first real world war, a war on a national scope, where every citizen of every belligerent was affected by it. The traditional policy of Great Britain of voluntary enlistment and voluntary service for war had to go by the board in that war. It went by the board with a considerable struggle, but it was necessary that it go in order that Great Britain would survive. The same thing happened in Canada.

With the outbreak of the present war, an infinitely more complete war than that of 1914-18, we saw that no citizen, no civilian anywhere in the world could escape. Everybody was affected by the consequences of the war. Therefore to continue to rely on an archaic system of raising armies is wrong. That system is absolutely outmoded. But there is another feature that enters into the question. We in Canada have passed from the small nation country that we were in 1914. We are now a major belligerent and we cannot compare our effort with that of Northern Ireland where compulsion has yet to be enforced. We are a major belligerent and as such we have great responsibilities. I believe, and I strongly believe that from the start, that we should have had, call it conscription or any other name, from the day we entered the war, and I am quite convinced that there would have been no trouble either after the fall of Dunkirk and the fall of France or after Pearl Harbor. In my opinion the Canadian people are ready to accept their responsibility.

An article concerning this question appeared in the press this morning and I think it is of sufficient importance to read to the house. It comes from a United States paper, the Newark Evening News. The last paragraph reads as follows:

[Mr. Adamson.]

A volunteer system for fighting axis armies in this war is an anachronism. Does Canada, with its exposed Pacific coastline, think that volunteers can defeat Japan? The volunteer system is one of those luxuries of liberal tradition which have had to be given up in this war in the interests of national survival. The United States gave it up without protest because we knew we had it to do.

There is a factual statement from a neutral source in this argument.

I wish to go very briefly into my position in this matter since the beginning of this parliament. On July 31, 1940, at page 2211 of Hansard I had this to say:

I see no end of this war except through invasion of the enemy countries by the British army. In that event it is likely that we shall need our entire resources of man-power. I believe the government should realize that and make preparations in the year to come.

That was in almost our darkest days after the fall of France. I continued on the same page:

This is a war of machines; . . . The slogan of the British tank corps, "Be lavish with steel but stingy with blood," expreses the point of view of every officer who has anything to do with the fighting services and might well be adopted by all of us. The most valuable element in an army, and the one which takes longest to replace, is man-power.

A machine can be replaced in a short time, but it takes eighteen years to replace a man and the country loses its greatest asset. Therefore, in order to save life, I urged that we should redouble our efforts to produce the machines of war. Those remarks were made in the days when our whole effort was to get every possible weapon into the hands of those defending the last bastion of freedom, where people were patrolling the coasts armed with nothing more than clubs. That is how great the danger was in those days. Therefore the first necessity is machines. Man-power and machines were stressed from the start. On May 8, 1941, at page 2687 of Hansard, I said:

It is almost criminal folly to delude ourselves into thinking that we are going to be able to get through this war without large military forces. . . . Thank God that we have had no casualties. But we must expect them, and the time to expect them and prepare for them is now. To-day every fighting man is an expert, a specialist, and he takes time to train. If he becomes a casualty, he cannot be replaced by a raw recruit. That recruit must be a trained man, and the time to train the reinforcements is before the original soldier becomes a casualty, not afterwards. That time is now.

There is one other point, and it is an extremely important one, namely, that the surest way to have a long casualty list is to send untrained troops against the enemy.

So you see that the danger of sending untrained troops against the enemy was brought up in this house in 1941. Then in 1942, during the famous plebiscite debate, at page 294 of Hansard for February 3 of that year, I said:

The time has long passed when compulsory selective service for any part of the world has been of paramount necessity. This parliament should have enacted the necessary legislation after Dunkirk and the fall of France. The need now is even more imperative than ever. It is possible that it may already be too late. I believe that the declaration of war on Germany should have been preceded by a selective service act . . . there can be no half measures in waging war.

Then on February 18, 1943, at page 522 of Hansard, I said:

There is no military operation so hazardous as attacking, over a considerable body of water, a well-fortified shore base. . . . I do not know precisely the situation with regard to our trained reinforcements overseas. I believe, however—

In the light of what has happened I think this is significant.

—that they are insufficient to maintain the Canadian army at striking-force, shock-troop efficiency for an intensive campaign of even medium duration. It is therefore probable that the powers given to the government in the plebiscite may have to be invoked, and that soldiers in the home defence army may have to be sent outside of Canada as reinforcements for our troops fighting against Hitler.

I want to put that very clearly on the record, because when the government talk about training, equipment, and infantry casualties coming as a surprise, I do not believe they have any excuse for not knowing what to expect. To-day we have that statement backed up again by a technical officer, a gunner, who puts his statements in print very clearly and specifically. I refer to Major Welsh, who says:

But our infantry has been reinforced, insufficiently, of course, with untrained men, or men trained in other highly specialized technique, such as artillery, while artillery itself suffered from lack of trained men. There is all the difference in the world in this war between numerical reinforcements and trained reinforcements.

Peter is being robbed to pay Paul. And Peter is desperately needy himself. By this I mean, for instance, we smash up anti-tank units to try to fill infantry gaps, and we are moving in Italy into the Po valley, which is ideal for Germany's tanks. The boys will be crying for anti-tank regiments there. And what breaks my heart is that this is being done by a country which always subscribed to the belief that a man should never be used if a shell would do the job.

I want to impress upon you, Mr. Speaker, and upon this house that my continued and continuing requests for complete national service in any theatre of the war, for adequate, abundant reinforcements, was based on that last sentence of Major Welsh's statement: "Do not send a man to do the job if you can send a shell." And worse, do not send a desperately tired man. Abundant reinforcements, if you have them, are the greatest life saver any army can have.

It has been suggested many times that in connection with our army we are biting off more than we can chew. That point was brought up this afternoon, and it has been brought up on other occasions. We have three divisions of infantry, two armoured divisions and two armoured brigades. With the supporting corps and army troops this would mean a combat strength of somewhere around 200,000 men, as a matter of fact rather less than that. We have heard in this house, in both open and secret sessions, great surprise expressed that the casualties suffered, particularly by the infantry, were fifty per cent higher than had been estimated by the general staff. Why this surprise? Surely with the experience of mobile warfare in Africa and Italy, and with the information available from the United Kingdom to guide us, we could have altered our estimates even during midsummer of this year. Again, indicating the information that one could gather from general knowledge, at page 296 of Hansard for February 3, 1942, in discussing this very question of reinforcements, after the formation of the five-division army, I said:

The plan will impose but a light burden indeed on our man-power, because it will require enlistments of but between six and seven thousand a month for the army.

I suggest to hon. members that in the light of events that estimate, which was a matter of general discussion at that time, has turned out to be not far from the fact.

Now we come to the present crisis, and I think it is worth while to go over the matter again very briefly. On August 6 General Crerar sent a telegram to C.M.H.Q. Apparently the adjutant general's branch at C.M.H.Q. did not instantly inform N.D.H.Q. of the contents of that telegram. In the first place I think that was an amazing action. Knowing this branch, however, I am not surprised. Then we had General Stuart undertaking the policy of remustering the army, apparently without consulting Ottawa, because he knew of the antipathy of the government to conscription. This is an even more amazing action.

Then on September 22 the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) went over to Europe after having, no doubt, impressed upon the war committee the seriousness of the situation that then existed. He went to Italy, then to northwest Europe where he found, as he stated so clearly in this house, that the situation was worse than he could possibly have believed. He wired the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that he was coming home three weeks earlier than he had intended and that he had something urgent he wanted to discuss.

What happened? The Prime Minister knew or must have known what the then minister of national defence wanted to discuss. He must have known that he would not have curtailed his trip to the continent by fifty per cent unless it was that one subject which he feared, the one subject which had been the Prime Minister's political philosophy for all his life—the talisman by which he has won all his elections—his nemesis, conscription. He must have realized that the message which would be brought to him would be bad and that it would demand immediate imperative action by the government.

What happened? In the Prime Minister's own words, he consulted the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. McNaughton), whose views he knew were in favour of the voluntary system. He did that so that when the former minister of national defence arrived home he would have a running mate or someone ready to jump into his place if he was adamant. And he would have us believe that he saved the day. That may have been a political manoeuvre, but it was one of the worst things that has ever happened in the political history of this country.

The former minister of national defence arrived home and told the Prime Minister that not only was there a shortage of reinforcements in the pools, but that they were practically empty and that there were actual and visual shortages in the units themselves. Not only that, the minister pleaded with him. There were cabinet meetings day in and day out, but the Prime Minister was adamant. He made the move he had contemplated, thinking he had weathered the crisis and pulled a rabbit out of the hat.

Fortunately the people of Canada at long last rose in their wrath and said, "This shall not be; this cannot happen; we will not stand for this." Protest meetings were held from one end of the country to the other. High officers, generals, resigned, and there was a threatened break-down of our whole military system because they and the people knew that the voluntary system had broken down and that there were no reinforcements. The suggestion has been made in this house that that movement in some way came from the wealthy, from the Conservatives, from pressure groups and from newspapers. Let me tell you that in my riding the pressure came from the people in one of the poorest districts in one of the suburbs of Toronto. If there was any pressure put on me it was put on me by the poor working people of this country. I think you will find that that is what happened all across the country. The common people rose as one man and demanded action, and, thank God, they got it. So much for the past.

What about the future? The former minister of national defence has left the cabinet and he cannot be sure that the policies he fought for will be carried out. But he has said that he left certain members in the cabinet who will carry out those policies. That is rather like the ichneumon fly which lays its eggs in the body of its victim, the eggs hatching and finally devouring their host. Here we have five or six ministers in the cabinet pledged to carry out an action which the ex-minister of national defence demands. The Prime Minister, however, and several other members of the cabinet, particularly the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), have definitely said that they dislike it.

That is the situation to-day. That is the situation upon which this house is to vote. We are being asked to vote confidence in this government on that situation. How can we do it? With a divided cabinet, with the prime mover of this policy outside the cabinet, with the present Minister of National Defence against the policy, with the Prime Minister against the policy, how can we trust the present cabinet? I say that by all the rules of logic this house cannot support the motion standing in the name of the Prime Minister.

We are told that we are going to get 16,000 N.R.M.A. men. The order in council is definite about the number; it limits it to 16,000. Let us see what that will do in the way of providing reinforcements. It has been said that we must not give out information which would aid the enemy, and I agree with that so that I shall endeavour to express pool reinforcements as a time factor. The target of trained men in the pools should be expressed as a function of time and perhaps it would be simpler to express it in an algebraic manner. Let X be the men in the pools, trained and ready for action, and Y the estimated casualties per month. The equation of X over Y would give you at the end of every month your cushion of reinforcements as a function of time. What do we find. We find that X over Y at the end of December can be expressed as half a month. X over Y at the end of January is three-quarters of a month and will never up to the end of May be much in excess of one month's reinforcements. In view of the fact that the general staff have underestimated casualties, particularly infantry casualties, by fifty per cent in the past, I say, Mr. Speaker, that this allotment of N.R.M.A. men does not give us an adequate cushion for the reinforcement pools, to provide trained men behind the front line and to provide adequate training of the men who are to be sent into battle. That is another reason why I cannot support the present motion in the name of the Prime Minister. There is great room for error in the present calculations. I have emphasized that I have been talking about infantry casualties, and infantry only, because up to the present time the infantry has been the service where the major miscalculation of casualties was made. But from now on, so far as the Europen war goes, we are in a different type of war. We are entering the siege phase. We are entering the phase which requires all our arms to be attacking as a unit. We are not in the war of movement any longer, not in the war of ports and coastal liberation. We are attacking over the Cologne plain, if you will, over the fortified area which Germany has been building up for years, and which is her historical line of defence, and we have to get over that fortified area before we can get into the heartland of Germany. How long that will take I do not know, but that is the task now before us. That is another reason why I say that these 16,000 men do not, in my opinion, give us the necessary assurance of adequate reinforcements. That is the second reason why under no circumstances can I support the government's motion.

There is another question, and it is this. It can be summed up by asking, when is a volunteer not a volunteer? Or what is the difference between a volunteer who volunteers when he has reached the transports at the dockside and the man who goes forward under compulsion? That is a very important question. I do not believe that there should be any difference. That is a question which must be answered. When General McNaughton was on the floor of the house I asked him to see to it that no distinction would be made between the man who fights outside this country and the volunteer, because I disagree with the voluntary system in that feature.

In closing, I wish to say one thing about an election. The argument is being made that the war effort of this country would stop if we had an election. That is not so. The ex-minister of national defence disagreed with me. If we had an election now it would be almost a direct parallel with the election that was held recently in the United States, because the order in council has been passed and the government is committed to the policy of conscripting 16,000 men. The election would be fought on the effectiveness of the present government. It would not be fought on the conscription issue because the conscription issue has been settled. That is over. Conscription is no longer an issue because we have conscription for overseas service. The only place where conscription would be discussed is perhaps in nationalist Quebec where the people say that the government has gone back on its pledges. But conscription has been an issue in the province of Quebec for the past quarter of a century in every election, and so it would be no different there now.

I would like briefly to discuss the Japanese war, or the Japanese phase of the war, phase II as it is called. We cannot consider that we have done our duty as a world power unless we play our part in the Japanese war. Once the war in Europe is over, the world will not be at peace. The world will not be at peace until the war in Asia is over too, and none of us, particularly in Canada, because we are a Pacific power, can relax for one instant in our efforts until the Japanese enemy is destroyed as completely as the German enemy. This is going to take large forces of men. We have to invade the Japanese homeland, just as we have to invade the German homeland, and when you invade any country you do it with the infantry. That has been proved over and over again. To think that we can ease ourselves behind the sure shield of the navy and the air force of the United States and Britain into peace with Japan or into the happy conclusion of the Asiatic war is an awful fallacy, and an extremely dangerous one.

I got this letter from an airman friend of mine who is serving in India. It is short, and I wish to read it to the house to show what the present vacillating policy of this government has done for Canadian prestige in India. The writer says:

R.A.F., India.
Nov. 16th.

My dear Adamson:

I am to-day in the very humbling position of having to make excuses for my country. To-day throughout the world people are reading that Canada is far from one hundred per cent behind the war. The inference is that the Canadians are lukewarm in their sympathies. This I cannot believe.

Knowing my feeling of dismay at the news that Canada is not likely to be able to provide replacements for her troops in the field, I can imagine how the fighting soldier must feel.

Are Canadians at home so self-satisfied, so secure, so smug that they cannot rise up in protest at such an attitude as that of the present government? If they are, then some forceful education is needed.

I had hoped that at the close of this war Canada would have placed herself in the position (which she should be capable of assuming) of a major world power. But she'll fall far short of that if she is unable or unwilling to maintain the comparatively small army which she has put in the field.

I know you will do your best to ensure that the fighting soldiers are properly supported. Good luck to you.

May I point out, in conclusion, that this letter is a challenge to every hon. member. We think of ourselves and we would like to think of ourselves as Canadians, citizens of no mean state; but unless we get over this provincialism as manifested by the actions of the present government, we shall never rise to man's estate—nationally—never.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, one of the gentlemen who sit up above your head in the press gallery has commented on this debate in the following terms:

So various are the approaches to the current political row that it would be virtually impossible to pick out one sentence from the whole of Hansard and have everyone agree that it was the real truth of the matter.

I am not so optimistic as to hope to correct that impression, but I wish to summarize as briefly as I can some of what appear to me to be the real truths of the matter which I have been discussing for several days with my fellow-members from Quebec. All hon. members of this house may not agree with the conclusions I propose to draw from them. But I appeal to all hon. members to consider carefully and dispassionately whether they do not represent a true statement of the factual background.

I believe that Canada's participation in this terrible war to the magnificent extent to which it has been and is being realized was absolutely essential to the survival of this nation as a nation of free men. I believe that had it not been for the heroic and obstinate and successful resistance of the people of England, Scotland and Wales during 1940 and 1941, we here in Canada would now be either dead or slaves of nazi victors and masters. I believe that this heroic, obstinate and successful resistance purchased the time necessary to enable the people of the north American continent to appreciate the terrible menace which threatened them all as free men and also the time required to muster their resources to the extent necessary to meet and to overcome the menace. I believe that, as has already been asserted in this debate, this resistance of the people of England, Scotland and Wales, heroic and obstinate and valorous and glorious as it was, might have proved to be insufficient without the presence in that citadel of freedom of General McNaughton and his gallant Canadian troops. I believe that, without the contribution of our airmen in the mighty battles which were fought over the skies of the British isles, without the contribution of our navy to the maintenance of the life line between them and this continent, sufficient time might not have been purchased to prepare all that the defence of our lives, and homes, and liberties has required and still requires. I believe that the time thus purchased had to be used, and I think it was used, both for the purpose of making the men and women of this continent conscious of the danger that threatened the world, and for the purpose of mobilizing our resources to meet total war by waging total war against it.

Now, total war, for this young nation and probably also for our powerful neighbours to the south, did not mean only a great expansion of our navy and our air force and the raising of the largest expeditionary army that this country could properly maintain and equip, but also meant great intensification in our agricultural production to meet the indispensable food requirements, the establishing and manning of hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of new industries to turn out the indispensable implements of warfare, and the entirely new conceptions and technique of finance to finance a total war through our own domestic monetary machinery.

Even now, Mr. Speaker, we must still remember that all that has to go on and must be kept in proper balance until full victory is achieved.

I also believe that this time we must pursue our victory to such a conclusion that never again may any Germans or Japanese living to-day or any of their children dare to threaten the peace of the world and endeavour to enslave it. I believe that this nation must continue to contribute its full share to the joint efforts of that gallant company of free nations pledged and determined to achieve and to consolidate that kind of victory.

I believe that our Canadian men in our navy, our army and our air force, who have fought and are fighting in that gallant company, have done so and are doing so at our instance, for us, so that we who are sitting here to-day and those whom we represent in this assembly may continue to live and to enjoy and to operate our free democratic social institutions.

It is for us, for you and for me, Mr. Speaker, and for our colleagues in this house and for those whom we represent that these men are enduring, are bleeding, are perhaps dying this very day, while we are here talking and debating as to how best we can act so that the numbers of them who may become casualties shall not be increased.

Up to the evening of November 22 I sincerely believed that that object could be best achieved by adhering to the voluntary system, the system under which over 900,000 of our bravest and best have offered their services in this great cause. I believed that sufficient additional reinforcements might still be obtained by that voluntary system. I also believed that our infantry troops having had two pivotal jobs to do and having done them with great success but also at severe cost during long periods of intense activity, they might properly have compensating periods of normal activity or quiet during which the normal flow of reinforcements into our pools would make up for the heavy strain that had been put upon these pools during the preceding weeks of intense activity. This seemed doubly true, in view of the great numbers of fighting men in northwestern Europe, of the coming into line of the French army and of the Belgian army to do their share. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has told the house that on November 22 General McNaughton himself, in conference with his staff, had come to certain conclusions and had presented them to the government on the evening of that day. As a result of that presentation I had to bring my mind to bear upon two different aspects of the problem, which had not before impressed me as they had perhaps already impressed some of my colleagues.

One was, that without adequate infantry units equal to any tasks which the fortune of battle might at any time bring into being, none of our troops could venture into the fighting line and our whole fighting effort would remain paralyzed. I was made to realize that our infantry troops make up only one-fifth in number of our fighting arms, and I felt that we could not expect periods of comparative or total inactivity for these infantry to wipe out any margin of possible shortage of infantry reinforcements, if those periods of comparative or total inactivity had to be shared by the other four-fifths of our fighting units and all of them remain out of action. That was something that just could not be allowed to happen. I readily imagined what use nazi propaganda might make of this appearance that the Canadian forces were no longer in the fight. Would it not have been used to the dreadful purpose of stiffening resistance and promising the German people that it was an example which other allied forces might soon be disposed to follow and that all they had to do was to hold on long enough and they would wear us all out? Who can tell what prolongation of this terrible conflict that might have meant?

The other aspect I had to consider was the possible psychological effect of adequate reinforcement pools in the battle areas and in England. I was impressed by the consideration that the possible inadequacy of such pools might affect the morale of the men in the fighting line to an extent that would make them more vulnerable in battle; this in turn might mean casualties that would not otherwise be incurred.

That consideration was also of great weight, one which each one of us had to face in his own conscience. Those men in the fighting lines are fighting our battles for us at our behest, and their lives must be guarded in every way that is dependent upon action that can be taken from here.

On November 22 it appeared that for the reasons which have already been discussed, or at least for some reasons good or bad, the numbers required for these substantial reserves might be larger than were apt to be provided in time by voluntary conversion of trained and fit personnel in our N.R.M.A. forces and general service, and no one but a fit and already trained man could meet those requirements. I therefore heeded the passionate appeal which the Prime Minister has told you he made to every one of his colleagues. I fully realized the possible and probable reactions among a great many in my province to my conduct in accepting to go on when any measure whatsoever of compulsion is added to the voluntary system for service overseas as the policy of the government. But I came here to do a war job, and because it was felt by the Prime Minister, rightly or wrongly, that I could be of some help, I feel I must still go on, whatever may be the increase in the difficulties of the task, so long as it is made apparent to me that these difficulties arise out of facts which have a bearing on the security of the men who are doing so much more for us than anything we can do for them.

I still felt and I hoped that compulsion might not be necessary to secure in time the required number of fit and trained men. In view of the magnificent success of the voluntary system in the last few days and the mounting numbers of fit and trained men now coming forward, there is still ample justification for that feeling and that hope. But no chance could be taken about it, and I decided that I would stand or fall with the Prime Minister. I may add that I have taken and I still take both comfort and pride in that decision. I also take comfort and pride in the knowledge that so long as any N.R.M.A. men are available, whether now in service or hereafter enrolled, adequate and timely reinforcements are fully assured. And that being fully and amply assured, who can begrudge me such comfort and pride as I can get out of the fact that the increase in the conversions from N.R.M.A. status to general service seem to indicate that, with the passing of the order in council itself, no actual compulsion may ever have to be resorted to?

The all-important fact is that the reinforcements will be neither insufficient nor delayed. Some members of this house wish to register again their opposition to the legal extension of the locality of service of these N.R.M.A. men. I refer, of course, to the subamendment of the hon. member for Mercier. But a majority is apt to be recorded against that subamendment, and if such should be the case I appeal to them to accept that democratic decision in a democratic way. I am sure they can do so without accepting the concept of democracy which is sometimes asserted, the concept that it is both a legal right, and a proper exercise of that right, for the majority to assert its will at all times and in all occasions regardless of the feelings and views of the minority and of the reasons for such feelings and views. That is not my concept of the kind of democracy suited to free men; the kind of democracy for which the free nations are waging this war. It is not the kind of democracy which was envisaged by the fathers of confederation; or not the kind of democracy which will bring to full fruition the constitution that unites in one nation the various elements which make up our Canadian people.

The will of the majority must be respected and it must prevail. But I trust that, here in Canada, the majority will always, as it is doing in this case, assert that will only after giving due consideration to the feelings and views of the minority and to the reasons for such feelings and views, and then only to the extent to which the majority is sincerely convinced that the general interests of the whole body politic require that it be thus asserted.

Much feeling has been stirred up over the issue now before this house. We each of us have our own views as to how and why this has come about, but whatever be those views and whatever be the causes, yes, and whenever there may be room for blame and recriminations, there has come into existence a real and grave situation which had to be met and which had to be dealt with.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Believing as I do that the majority in this house, after giving its best consideration to the facts which have been brought to light in this long and earnest debate, is sincerely convinced that the passing of this order in council P.C. 8891 was necessary to the proper conduct of the affairs of the Canadian body politic as a whole, and believing as I do that whenever the majority, after full consultation and mature deliberation, reaches a conclusion of that kind, it is proper the minority should accept it and loyally assist in carrying it out, I appeal to all the members of this house, whatever may have been their individual views—whether to do more or to do less than the order in council provides—to unite and to assert to the men overseas that this nation, from one ocean to the other, stands pledged to a victory that will be decisive and that will endure.

Mr. Speaker, we have been urged in the course of this debate to keep our eye on the ball. We must keep our eye on the ball, but the ball is the decisive and enduring victory itself. And decisive and enduring victory still requires as well both the heroic efforts of our navy, our army and our air force, and the full and continuing cooperation of all our farmers, fishermen, foresters and miners; all those who toil in our shipyards, our factories, our munitions plants, our transportation systems, our laboratories, and our administrative offices; all the members of our national war finance committees, yes, and all those to whom they make their periodical appeals for further funds. There is still a job for each and every one of us to do, and it can be done only through the united efforts of us all, whatever be our individual views about the best methods to raise men for military service overseas.

Let us neglect nothing that is necessary for victory, but on the other hand let us strive to avoid doing or saying anything that is not really necessary and that might destroy or impair the unity which has made and is still required to make our efforts strong and constant and successful.

Mr. HARRY R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): To support the administration in its motion—

> That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

—gives no indication of where an hon. member stands on the vital question of reinforcements for overseas. It is purposely designed to mean all things to all people. It implies a complete trust in the government, a government whose policy is diametrically opposed to what it was on November 22, 1944, when this house resumed its sitting. Then the government was against sending fully-trained draftees overseas. Now it has accepted the principle and will send a token reinforcement of draftees. One is asked to support this government, right or wrong. Even the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) does not have confidence in the government; he has confidence only in a few members of it whom he is trusting to dominate the council, supported as they will be by public opinion which apparently must be kept at fever heat. It is to be regretted that the country must continue to emphasize its differences. Already through the refusal of the government to send needed reinforcements overseas the Liberal government have imperilled the carrying on of a vigorous war effort. How can my Liberal friends on the government benches have confidence in the present government to maintain a vigorous war effort which His Majesty's loyal opposition has for the moment forced upon it?

The Progressive Conservative amendment calls for maintaining a vigorous war effort by the passing of a forthright order in council based on the following amendment, namely:

> This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice.

The public and the troops overseas will be satisfied with nothing less than a positive order in council giving Canada one army just as it has one navy and one air force. Not only have we two armies, but the N.R.M.A. army is now split up into those who have to go overseas and those who do not. As the former minister of national defence, the hon. member for Prince said, I believe the time has come when the proper course is to make all N.R.M.A. men subject to the obligation to serve overseas.

How can one support an administration which is at sixes and sevens within itself, which is divided no one knows where, when or how, and as I shall endeavour to show shortly, is not a government in the proper sense because there is no cabinet solidarity or collective responsibility about it whatsoever. A humble reader of "Pilgrim's Progress" will remember that is it impossible to have confidence in Mr. Facing-Both-Ways. One further point that I should like to deal with at the end of my remarks is perhaps the single one which differentiates the stand which I take from that so ably put forward by the hon. member for Prince, namely, danger of a wartime election in Canada to the sending of reinforcements overseas. If Liberal members of this house will examine the Progressive Conservative amendment they will find that there is not a word in it that is not demanded by the great majority of the people of Canada. Can you go back to your constituencies and explain your position if you do not support that amendment? The delay in sending reinforcements, the forced overnight change of policy, the uncertainty of enforcement of the new policy owing to the strange mixture in the present cabinet—all these things are well known to your constituents. Will you refuse to represent the wishes of your constituents as well as the wishes of the great majority of the people of Canada? Perhaps you will say that the policy of the Liberal government is just what is contained in our own amendment. That is what the hon. member for Prince says he and his trusted colleagues are going to make it. We have no copyright, sir, on the ideas contained in the amendment. Make them government policy and I for one will continue to support that policy.

We came here on the matter of reinforcements for overseas. Many of us had evidence of the need beyond any possible doubt. We listened to the account of the situation, to the account of the means of providing trained reinforcements. The former minister, the hon. member for Prince, said at page 6667 of Hansard:

> When I left the cabinet the figures showed that there would be a considerable shortage by the end of December; I mean a shortage in the strength of the units themselves, with no pools whatever.

The volunteer man-power barrel had been so scraped that the last 4,500 men had been raised as follows: (a) accelerating the dispatch of 1,500 infantry; (b) sending directly overseas 1,500 other arms to be remustered over there; (c) demoting N.C.O's to the number of 750 and giving them the pay of their former rank; and (d) using 750 infantry tradesmen and giving them trades pay although using them as general duty men. Out of the 60,000 N.R.M.A. personnel in Canada there were 16,000 trained infantrymen and those were the only available reinforcements to meet the emergency. That was the situation. The loyal opposition, the country at large and particularly the women of Canada forced the hand of the government, proved the sham of the last attempt to cause draftees to go active, and on November 23 the order in council was passed authorizing and directing the Minister of National Defence to send 16,000 draftees overseas. It was not until November 24, however, that the house was assured that units of the N.R.M.A. personnel had been designated for overseas service and that reinforcements would go immediately. Whether or not they finally become volunteers has no bearing on the immediate necessity.

We are asked to vote confidence in what? In a government headed by a Prime Minister who refused to send needed reinforcements overseas; who would risk a further indefinite attempt to make an impossible voluntary system work after five years of trial and exhaustion; who if the attempt failed would, in the words of his former minister, "give no assurance that draftees would be sent as reinforcements"; a Prime Minister who quibbled about the meaning of "necessary" and "if advisable." Both his former minister and the people of Canada thought they understood what "necessary" meant, and certainly the boys overseas knew what it meant. His attempts to becloud he issue by raising extraneous matters, such as when the cabinet was informed of the necessity, the alleged breaking of the privy council oath, et cetera, fail to forgive him his refusal to recognize the urgent necessity for reinforcements when that necessity was pointed out. Can we have confidence in a Prime Minister who even in an all-out war effort refuses to recognize the principle of equality of service, even as he did in 1917; who, like the present Minister of National Defence, accepts the principle of voluntarism as an article of faith? We do not believe in overnight conversions brought about by public pressure. "A man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still". How can we have confidence that a policy diametrically opposed to their fundamental beliefs will be honestly administered and fully carried out by the Prime Minister and his Minister of National Defence? What is the position of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston)? At page 6675 of Hansard he said:

> . . . I certainly would have registered the strongest protest possible against the half-hearted piecemeal method adopted. I would have pointed out that, once the decision was made to secure the service of N.R.M.A. men, once it was extended overseas, that decision should not apply to any one group of men in the N.R.M.A. but should apply to that force as a whole. To apply it just to part of the force was to perpetuate the system of two different armies for Canada.

The former minister urged the passing of one order in council, not four as have been passed already with more to come, to place all soldiers in Canada on the same footing. It is true that the principle of sending draftees overseas has been laid down and accepted, but has the government promised that furthur numbers will be sent as required? Having no reliance in the leader of the government and none in many of his former colleagues, on what is the hon. member for Prince relying? He says:

> Public opinion has made itself felt so powerfully that it could not be disregarded. The resolute stand of certain former colleagues in the cabinet has put that mighty influence into positive action.

Who are these certain former colleagues? Is the hon. member for Prince willing that the whole country should rely on his trust in a small handful of undesignated ministers? I think that is too great a responsibility for even him to assume. Is he not taking too much upon himself when he says:

> . . . I myself will hold the government—and particularly the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence—to strict account for carrying out vigorously and without wavering their declared intention to reinforce the army with well trained men from the N.R.M.A. to the fullest and fastest extent possible.

Mr. RALSTON: That sentence does not begin with "I myself".

Mr. JACKMAN: Does anything hang on that?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly. It begins, "this house and the people of this country."

Mr. JACKMAN: Then I will add those words to it:

> . . . this house and the people of this country, and I myself—

Mr. RALSTON: I would not have expected my hon. friend to garble it the way he did.

Mr. JACKMAN: I hope I have not distorted the meaning of it.

Mr. RALSTON: The meaning has been distorted, because the hon. gentleman made the point that I was taking the sole and full responsibility.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think the former minister is taking upon himself a very great responsibility.

Mr. RALSTON: I am taking a responsibility, but it is my own; I am not taking it for anybody else. I am indicating who are taking it.

Mr. JACKMAN: Nevertheless the country well knows the position.

Mr. RALSTON: I only suggest that when my hon. friend quotes something he should quote it all.

Mr. JACKMAN: I have admitted to the minister that something may have been left out, but it was not with any intention whatever of placing any undue responsibiliy upon him. I want to say, however, that the country knows the hon. member for Prince is perhaps the central figure in this episode—and it might still be a tragic episode if the answer is not satisfactory—and if I read the membership of the government party correctly, upon his actions will depend the actions of a great many others in this house. Perhaps whether or not the government will stand or fall will depend upon the action the hon. member for Prince has taken. And I have every right, and it is my duty—

Mr. RALSTON: Not to distort a quotation.

Mr. JACKMAN: If anything hangs on it, I withdraw it, although it is not very important. Technically the minister may be quite correct, but I have every right to point out on what the minister is placing his reliance.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I would ask that we revert to motions so that I may make a brief statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house we will revert to motions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: During the recess I invited the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore) to come to my office to see if some agreement could not be reached as to the winding up of the present debate. There seems to be a general desire that the debate should not be prolonged further. There can be no doubt that if it were to continue for any length of time it would have an unsettling effect rather than otherwise throughout the country.

While it is the wish of all the leaders of the different parties and groups not to curtail speeches which hon. members may wish to make, nevertheless our hope is that hon. members may find it possible to curtail the length of their speeches so that the house may, if not this evening at least early to-morrow have the divisions taken on the several amendments and conclude with its present business by voting on the main motion, if possible before to-morrow night. One suggestion was that we might sit late into the evening to-night, but an alternative thought was that the house might meet to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock. Perhaps by so doing it would be possible to conclude before the evening. At all events, if it could be understood that we will work to that end, hon. members who wish to do so might feel free at least to make reservations tentatively to get away at night. Whether they would be able to leave at night would depend on whether the divisions on the several amendments and on the main motion were taken before adjournment at night. With the permission of the house, I therefore, move, seconded by Mr. St. Laurent:

> That on Thursday, December 7, 1944, and every day thereafter until the completion of the present business the house shall meet at 11 o'clock a.m., and that in addition to the intermission from 6 to 8 o'clock p.m. there shall be an intermission from 1 o'clock to 3 o'clock p.m.

I hope this motion will meet with general approval.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I take this opportunity of asking the Prime Minister a question which I did not ask him when we met privately to-day or on the orders of the day, but which perhaps is of some importance. Will there be any other government business brought before the house this session other than the business now before us?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There will be no other business at this sitting, but of course I cannot say whether there will be another sitting before the session is over.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I meant at this particular sitting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, there is no other business.

Motion agreed to.

THE WAR

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN MAINTAINING VIGOROUS WAR EFFORT—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION OF THE PRIME MINISTER

The house resumed consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Jean.

Mr. JACKMAN: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess the hon. member for Prince drew my attention to the fact that I had not quoted all of the extract which I read, that starting where I did I may have attributed unfairly to him a sense of self-importance which he would be the last to claim. I am glad to have this opportunity of giving the question in full, and I quote from page 6677 of Hansard as follows:

I have mentioned these points specially, but what I want to emphasize is this, that this house and the people of this country, and I myself, will hold the government—and particularly the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence—to strict account for carrying out vigorously and without wavering their declared intention to reinforce the army with well-trained men from the N.R.M.A. to the fullest and fastest extent possible.

That in no way changes the point I was endeavouring to make, namely, that the hon. member is seized with great responsibility, perhaps more so than any other hon. member, in the action he proposes to take on the motion and the amendment now before the house. No one is more willing to sacrifice himself for the men overseas than the hon. member for Prince. As in the last war when he was colonel of his battalion, he would not ask any man to do anything which he would not himself do. So that he should not now accept a trust or be an example to others to accept the same when a breach of that trust will mean a lack of needed reinforcements overseas. Having failed in the cabinet, how does the hon. member expect to succeed in his objective outside the cabinet?

Was there ever a vote of confidence in this house which was not supported by speeches by the various ministers of the crown? The Prime Minister made a speech when he introduced the motion, and that speech was subsequently devastated by the hon. member for Prince. Mention has been made already in this house of the speeches which were made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) before the passing of the order in council, and he alone has spoken in this debate. Mention was also made of the speech of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) and the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who spoke of our material contribution to this war.

May I remind the Minister of Agriculture that mutual aid is but a measure of how many less men relatively Canada has on the fighting fronts as compared with some of our allies. Do not prate about war production, particularly about our gifts, until you measure our relative contribution on the fighting front. Let the ministers who may be for or against the application of a full man-power policy in Canada stand up and be counted.

Usually in an important debate, and surely this is the most important debate this parliament has seen, ministers start off at three o'clock in order that what they say may be the highlight of the day. In this debate they are singularly silent. What have they to be ashamed of? Are they endeavouring to put themselves in a position where they can say to one part of the country that they are in favour of sending reinforcements and to another that they are against compulsion? One should not accept the fruits of office without also accepting the responsibilities.

The people of Canada are entitled to know just where each member of the cabinet stands on this vital issue; otherwise how can they place any reliance in their future actions which may decide whether or not their sons and husbands are to have a fighting chance? Let each member of the cabinet definitely declare himself. The public have no right to make assumptions. A vote on the motion as worded does not mean taking a stand on further reinforcements. In the case of the former Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), when I heard of his resignation I did not know whether it was because the government had gone too far for him or whether, when he said in his great speech in favour of the plebiscite in 1942, he felt that the time might come when he might have to part company with his constituency, that he thought the government had not gone far enough.

I think most of us understand where the Minister of Agriculture stands in this matter, but he has not declared himself in open session. Policies hang on personalities and it is impossible to divorce one from the other or to speak of one without the other. The public are demanding that the various ministers who support the policy of "Conscription when necessary" and interpret "necessary" as needed reinforcements hereafter as well as now should speak; otherwise how are they to be identified beyond peradventure of doubt? The Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), and the Minister of Health and Social Welfare (Mr. Claxton)—what of them? And what of the position of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand)? Given the same information, and the information is now common knowledge, I am sure that many of these gentlemen will have the same instinctive reaction that I have. We should all hang our heads in eternal shame if we let down our sons and brothers overseas. That and nothing else counts. The former Minister of National Defence has not named them, but he knows who they are, those colleagues of his in the cabinet upon whom he is depending, and the people of Canada are entitled to know in whom he puts his reliance. If they do not know the stand of these ministers, what assurance can they have? If the ministers are not brave enough to declare themselves in open parliament, what trust can we have in their actions behind closed doors where they are subjected to the dominating personality of their leader, where the ties of party loyalty can be urged, where a multitude of extraneous matters can be brought in to becloud the main issue? Let them here declare themselves in order that the people of Canada may know in what manner of men they are asked to put their trust. Let the people of Canada know that it is for political reasons that these hon. gentlemen who hold portfolios do not speak. Are they leaders of this country or are they political pawns? Are they looking to their futures and not to the lives of our boys overseas? It may be politically expedient not to be on record as personally favouring a policy of one army for Canada, but that is the only way through which continuous needed reinforcements can be assured. Your actions speak louder than words, and the principle of conscription for overseas has been adopted by your government. The people of Canada, however, are in a sea of doubt as to what your future course will be. Assure the troops overseas, assure the wives and mothers in Canada, that there will be a continuous flow of needed reinforcements. Are the members of the cabinet afraid to commit themselves on a matter affecting the lives of our men overseas? How can we have confidence when perhaps a minority of the cabinet believe that the sending of draftee reinforcements is necessary, when perhaps even at this moment the Prime Minister holds their resignations in his desk, and if it suits the convenience of the Liberal government he may hold those resignations in his hand? Is it possible that only the Prime Minister knows what is the future policy as to reinforcements? Is that the reason for the silence of the various ministers?

What of the principle of cabinet solidarity? What of the principle of collective responsibility? Just as a house divided against itself will fall, so will a cabinet that is rent with internal dissension. As Maitland so well puts it, cabinet solidarity is essential to parliamentary government and means three things: (1) political unanimity; (2) common responsibility to parliament, and (3) submission to a common head.

We understand the Prime Minister's conception of cabinet solidarity when he ousted his former minister. If he now has political unanimity in his cabinet since he did a right-about-face on the reinforcement issue, he should be able to tell the house that the fundamental principle of reinforcements overseas has been adopted by every one of his ministers, or does his overnight conversion apply to some of the ministers only and as to 16,000 reinforcements only.

The hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) can have no confidence in the head of the government. His confidence is in certain of his former colleagues. But cabinet solidarity means submission to a common head. Who then is the head of the present Liberal government? Or is the former minister of national defence leaning on a reed? The impossibility of the present situation could not be better described than in a quotation from Lord Salisbury in 1878 which is given at page 217 of Jenning's "Cabinet Government":

> For all that passes in cabinet each member of it who does not resign is absolutely and irretrievably responsible, and has no right afterwards to say that he agreed in one case to a compromise, while in another he was persuaded by his colleagues. . . . It is only on the principle that absolute responsibility is undertaken by every member of the cabinet who, after a decision is arrived at, remains a member of it, that the joint responsibility of ministers to parliament can be upheld, and one of the most essential principles of parliamentary responsibility established.

After the Prime Minister's interjection of yesterday that he had made no promise to anyone, the cabinet must be more divided than ever. As long as this country has a Prime Minister whose words have to be most carefully scrutinized for their import and meaning there can be no confidence in the government. Unfortunately unless some of the overwhelming majority of Liberal members vote for what is right, this country may be undone and the men overseas may be without reinforcements.

Let me again illustrate the lack of consistency and faith which the former minister found in the present administration. At page 6666 of Hansard the hon. member for Prince had this to say:

> Further than that, I found that the government, as a whole, certain colleagues excepted, did not consider that the government was bound to that policy by the Prime Minister's speech in 1942.

Are the people of this country to be satisfied with an overnight change of mind, extracted at the point of a gun, and the passing of a wholly inadequate order in council which continues the two-army system in Canada? With the chief protagonist of necessary reinforcements from the only available source now outside the cabinet and the new convert holding his office, what reliance, what trust can we place in this government? Already the Prime Minister probably wonders whether he did not make a mistake in surrendering too soon to the opposition forces?

With an administration unfriendly to the order under which it operates, can the people of Canada expect a just carrying out of that order in council? The German war, to say nothing of the Japanese war, may last much longer than any of us expect. Is this government making available the greatest number of men possible who will be ready as trained reinforcements six months or a year from now? Where is the cabinet solidarity or the consistency on which the hon. member for Prince is relying? What was his own experience, according to his statement at page 6664 of Hansard:

Let us see what the situation was. Was anybody opposing a position hitherto taken by the government? I was proposing to carry out the policy of the government, which was the policy of sending N.R.M.A. men if necessary. I was not opposing any position which had hitherto been taken by the government.

And then later on, at page 6665:

It was made quite clear to me that the place for me was not inside, but outside the cabinet.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) believes in cabinet solidarity when it suits his book, but not when it does not. After the former minister's statement, how can the people of Canada have confidence in the exercise of a power given to the Prime Minister under the National Resources Mobilization Act and the War Measures Act? What interpretation will be again put on "necessary" and on "advisable in the best interests of Canada"?

Let me give the last and most recent example of the Prime Minister's political evasiveness. On page 6677 of Hansard I find this statement by the hon. member for Prince:

There is one thing more, and that is that I doubt if the minister's programme of dispatch is sufficiently rapid to provide all he should have to reestablish reinforcement pools as quickly as that should be done, having regard to the conditions which face him now and in the near future.

He will be held responsible for accelerating the dispatch in every way. And one other point I am assuming, unless the Prime Minister states otherwise, that if the government motion carries, the future orders in council specifying additional numbers of men will be passed and put into effect without any reference back again to this house for a vote of confidence or other approval.

To which the Prime Minister replied:

That is correct.

Then the hon. member for Prince continued:

I take that to be clear from the minister's statements to the house.

I have mentioned these points specially, but what I want to emphasize is this, that this house and the people of this country, and I myself, will hold the government—and particularly the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence—to strict account for carrying out vigorously and without wavering their declared intention to reinforce the army with well-trained men from the N.R.M.A. to the fullest and fastest extent possible.

It is on this understanding and for these reasons, and one other, namely the confidence which I have in certain of my former colleagues, who have contributed in no small degree to the changed attitude of the government, that I shall vote against the amendment and for the motion.

But what did the Prime Minister say yesterday in answer to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who said, as reported in Hansard at page 6809:

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has kept very quiet on this subject but the other day Mr. Charles Bishop, a distinguished member of the press gallery said: "Sixteen thousand is the limit for the Honourable J. G. Gardiner." We should like to know whether 16,000 is the limit and also whether or not any promise has been made to anyone that no more will be sent.

To which the Prime Minister replied:

May I answer my hon. friend at once? I have made no promise to anyone.

Does that not fly in the face of the statement in reply to the hon. member for Prince, reported on page 6677 of Hansard, namely, "That is correct"? But if one examines that statement one can see that it can be taken to refer to the procedure under order in council rather than to the substance, namely that additional numbers of N.R.M.A. men will be sent overseas as reinforcements. This country is tired of dealing with words; and the hon. member for Prince, in view of the Prime Minister's statement, "I have made no promise to anyone", can no longer be held bound by his undertaking to support the government motion.

What is the opinion of the individual cabinet ministers on this vital subject? Either we have the essentials of cabinet government or we have not. The cabinet is of divergent views. The people of Canada can have no assurance of what the policy of that cabinet is as to overseas reinforcements. It is a situation which is untenable and one which cannot be tolerated in view of the fact that the lives of our fighting men hang on which way a majority of those holding divided opinions are swayed. No; a government cannot exist where there is no unanimity of opinion on a matter of such grave policy. A cabinet divided against itself will not stand.

Liberal members can have no assurance. I ask them to put it on the low grounds of political expediency, that a clear, definite order in council should be passed doing away with the two-army system in Canada. I ask them to put it on the highest ground, needed reinforcements for overseas, which means all available reinforcements.

The hon. member for Prince has said that much as he agrees with the ideas expressed in our amendment, he will not vote for it because it would be a vote of want of confidence in the government and that, if it were defeated, the whole matter of dispatching the 16,000 reinforcements from the N.R.M.A. would be thrown into the realm of uncertainty and suspense. As has already been pointed out, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Commonwealth of Australia and the United States of America have all had general elections during the war. In no case has the election interfered with the carrying on of a vigorous war effort.

So much for the general principle; what of its particular application at this time to Canada?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time his expired.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any soldier member need apologize for taking the time of the house to declare his stand on the reinforcement problem. I want to repeat, reinforcement—not conscription. I think it will be equally obvious that the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) must have prepared his speech before this agreement to shorten the debate came into effect. We have had conscription in effect for some time, the only trouble being, as I see it, that it is conscription for a limited number and for a limited area.

At all times I have stated that I believe the volunteer soldier to be superior to the conscripted one. I still believe that, and always will. The time has come, however, when all that matters is that the infantry shall have help, either volunteers, or men from the N.R.M.A. or both. Nothing else now matters but that the infantry shall be guaranteed all possible reinforcements.

Early in the war I took exception to Canada endeavouring to maintain an army. I said that, with the man-power drain to maintain a large and splendid navy and air force, with the man-power drain to maintain an expanded war industry, and with the man-power drain to supply food on a scale such as we in Canada had never been called upon to supply it, we could not also maintain an army.

In the last war we were unable to maintain four divisions with proper and ample reinforcements without breaking up the fifth division. Why try now to maintain six or seven divisions? I believe that the most effective fighting weapon you can have is not only a well-trained army but one that has at all times ample reinforcements, and that, above all, the men serving in the army should know that they have an ample supply of reserves both immediately adjacent to the units and in the reserve. Does any hon. member believe that the infantry think now they have ample reserves immediately available? Surely everyone knows that our infantry have not sufficient reserves now available—not here but across the ocean where they are needed.

Surely it is the wish of every Canadian that we at once make provision, by voluntary methods or by conscription or by any other method, to ensure that the men have not too little reinforcements and too late. Rather they should have too many and too soon.

It is not clear to me now, and it never has been, why our staff did not make ample provision for sufficient reinforcements for such a very small percentage of our army that was in the infantry. It would appear to me that too much of their time was taken up with concentrating on the promotion of some of those in the higher ranks. I do know that if we had as big a reserve as we have of generals and colonels protecting the Lord Elgin hotel we would have plenty of reserves everywhere.

Why is it that after all this time we have only 8,000 trained men available and 8,000 almost trained men available in the N.R.M.A. from these large and expensive camps, with the instructors that we have? It does not make sense to me, and it has not been explained properly what the staffs were doing to permit such a condition to arise. It is no use speaking of mistakes in the past. It is time now to speak, however, in order that we may not repeat the mistakes we made previously. I do not claim to have any more military knowledge or experience than any soldier member of the house, but I do say that the people of Canada, and the men who will return after the war, will never forget. And why should they? If we send over 5,000 men now, perhaps that will give an ample reserve under present conditions. But what if the ship is sunk? Here I bring as my witness no less a person than the hon. and gallant member for Lotbinière (Mr. Lapointe), who last night, in my opinion, made one of the finest and most eloquent speeches delivered in this house. Let me say that as a soldier the hon. and gallant member need take a back seat to no soldier member in this house at any time. Last night the hon. member pointed out that reinforcements were delayed to him, for a short period fortunately, because one of the barges had been sunk. Now we are talking of sending over a driblet of 5,000 men. What if the ship is sunk when taking over those 5,000? What if an epidemic of mumps or diphtheria hits the men? What if they should suffer untold casualties in the battle that lies ahead? I do not think any member would care to predict what casualties may occur in the terrible war that we are still facing—and let me say, without claiming any knowledge as a military man: Do not think for a moment that the hardest part of the fighting is not ahead of the Canadian army.

Will anyone say that none of these possibilities may become a reality? I for one will not accept the responsibility of saying to the men or to their families at home afterwards that we thought help would arrive in time.

My riding was not unanimous for the plebiscite; it was about seventy per cent for and thirty per cent against; and here let me say a word for the Canadian Legion. Unfortunately there was left by two members of this house an inference not altogether favourable to the legion. I do not think they intended it, for possibly they spoke without knowledge. The government asked me to go back to my riding and endeavour to get a favourable vote at the time of the plebiscite. I in turn asked the Canadian Legion to put over the campaign and they did so in their own time, by their own efforts, and at their own expense. There are many fine organizations in Canada, but there is no organization so exclusive or so favoured as the Canadian Legion, for the simple reason that no one can get into it by right of money or of might, or anything else. The only way you can be a member of Canada's finest organization is by right of service in His Majesty's forces.

Nothing matters but that our men should have reinforcements and that these should be sent to them right away. I am trying to-night to obey what I gather is the understanding as the aftermath of the meeting of the Prime Minister and the two other leaders concerned, and I sincerely hope that the rest of his followers will keep faith as I do and not take too long in speaking. But having listened to some of the eastern members I may tell the Prime Minister and the other leaders that I have not much hope of their wish being fulfilled.

I was told twice by the leading isolationist in the house, my hon. friend in the corner, that I would not be re-elected. I would sooner be defeated doing what I think is right than be re-elected doing what I think is wrong. This, I believe, the fathers and mothers of our soldiers will approve, to the disappointment of my isolationist friend in the corner when the election rolls along. But no matter, my own Liberal association approve my stand in this matter; what happens to me is immaterial. The important thing to every member of the house is not his own political future but the future of the men who are serving overseas.

The day on which the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) resigned I was asked my stand on the controversy as we read it in the press and heard it over the radio, and from what I said on that day it would be easy for me to vote otherwise than I intend to vote now. I said at that time that I had every confidence in the former minister. He had just made a trip overseas and, I presumed, had consulted his advisers, and if he said that reinforcements were needed, and needed now, there was only one answer—send them. Later, speaking to the Canadian Legion just before I left, I made a statement which I should like to quote from the daily press of Vancouver under the heading, "I Have All Confidence in Ralston."

> Mr. Cruickshank, Liberal member for the Fraser Valley, said that until he has attended the special session and has heard first hand the details of the reinforcement situation, there was little he could add to his previous statements on the matter.
> I have every confidence in Colonel Ralston, and with a vivid recollection of the terrible shortage of reinforcements while serving in mud and water during the last war, it is my opinion that nothing must be allowed to stand in the way of sending every volunteer or conscripted man necessary to maintain our units at full strength.
> Colonel Ralston was a noted soldier during the last war, has headed our department of national defence that raised, equipped and trained our splendid army.
> He has made a personal investigation and after consultation with his staff has made the definite statement that more men are needed now. That is good enough for me. Nothing else is as important as seeing that our Canadian boys have every support.

Since then the hon. member for Prince has spoken and stated his stand, and now I must state mine. I have a vivid recollection of the shortage of man-power during the last war and the need of ample reinforcements. I had to make a decision, a decision caused by lack of ample reinforcements at the time, a decision far more difficult than the one I have to make to-day. The day we entered the Courcellette area it was my duty as company sergeant-major to tell the men that because of the heavy battle expected and our shortage of men no matter who was wounded no one was to be detailed to take him to the nearest dressing station. It was up to the wounded man himself to try to struggle back at night, alone through mud and shell fire as best he could to where stretcher parties might find him. Every soldier of the last war remembers when going into the line the delays caused by shelling of cross-roads, a check on map directions, or barb wire underfoot or overhead. During one of those halts a request came back to me for a stretcher-bearer. I asked who was hit and the word came back to me, "Wally". I went ahead with the stretcher-bearer. Wally was lying against the side of the road with one side of his jaw blown off. I said, "Are you all right?" He could not speak, but nodded his head. A couple of moments later the order came to advance, and I went on with the company because I did not have sufficient men to detail anyone to look after him. That night I made up my mind on ample reinforcements to keep the infantry at full strength at any and all times. I have never changed that opinion and I never will. Wally was my only brother. That is why I am voting for the opposition amendment. If the amendment is defeated, then like my colleague, the hon. and gallant member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), I will vote for the main motion, because I realize that even 16,000 reinforcements out of the N.R.M.A. personnel are better than none at all as desired by the isolationists who will vote against the government.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I have listened with deep interest to the speeches which have been delivered by hon. members on all sides of the house. Quite often they were carefully drafted and were the expression of most interesting views about conscription of men for overseas. I have listened to a great many debates, but this one is the most important that I have listened to during the twenty years I have been a member of this house. Twenty years is a long time. I have spent that period of time as the faithful servant of the party to which I belonged, and I was proud up until I had to cross the floor of the house. Some people may believe that the order in council passed by the government about conscription for overseas service was the cause of my action. It was not. It was the occasion that prompted my decision in this matter. It was the drop of water that made the glass overflow. I have at first stood by my party so long as I agreed with them, and afterwards so long as I hoped that I could possibly agree with them. But when the measure was full and there was no possible hope, and when I considered that the leader of the Liberal party had become a desperate case, the only thing I had to do was to come here to breathe fresh air. My language may seem hard to some hon. members of parliament, but I have been brought up in the Liberal doctrine. I said so not long ago, and I was precluded by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself from stating to the house why I was a Liberal.

The main reason why I have crossed the floor of the house is that the Prime Minister, who is more liberal in his speeches than in his actions, since the beginning of the war preferred to take advice from his opponents to taking it from his supporters. How often did I see him cross the floor himself, not as I did, to remain a free man, but to talk with the then leader of the opposition, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) oftener than he ever did with the present one. And, sir, one must remember that the real leader of the Tory party which we call the Progressive Conservative party was not the hon. member for York-Sunbury; he was just a figurehead. His chief was Arthur Meighen. When the then leader of the opposition was giving advice to the Prime Minister he was conveying the views of Arthur Meighen himself to the leader of the Liberal party. This I objected to very strongly, to have Arthur Meighen as the dictator of the once Liberal party. And once when the Liberal members in quite a large number opposed bill No. 80 in 1942, salvation came to the Prime Minister in the way of support from the Conservative opposition then led by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, the former Bennett minister. The Prime Minister was so grateful to him that early in the session of 1943, when the then leader of the Progressive Conservative party took for his excuse his bad health to resign the leadership of his party in this house, the Prime Minister paid him such a tribute that it was engraved on the silver tray which was presented to the then leader of the opposition, with a fine dog, the friend of man. Who would have expected that? I have told this to some good Liberals in my constituency, and they would not believe it. I am telling now something that has not appeared in the press but which is nevertheless true, and Hansard is there to prove it. The Prime Minister has always been fond of paying greater tribute to his opponents than to his friends. That was what he said to the hon. member for York-Sunbury, the then leader of the opposition, because he was a life-saver for the government, not to maintain the doctrines of the Liberal party but to keep the Prime Minister in the seat he occupies as leader of the government. So that if he occupies those high functions now it is thanks to the benevolence and stupidity of the Tory party. How can they oppose him now? We had a union government at that time.

Then the Prime Minister will remember that during the last general election, while he confined himself in Laurier House, it was the man who was his right arm but who was a sick man, who died a year later, whom he asked to go throughout Canada and preach the doctrines of the Liberal party. In the winter of 1940 Liberalism was not preached throughout the land by the Prime Minister, the leader of the Liberal party; it was preached by a French Canadian of my county, Ernest Lapointe, as the then leader in spirit of the government. He was practically the leader of the government at that time, as he had led the government so ably in the house when the Prime Minister was defeated in 1925, after his speech at Richmond Hill. Mr. Lapointe was a sick man; he had been a sick man for years, but still he undertook that task. He did not do so only to keep the party in power; he did it for a noble cause. I am sure he was sincere. He was ready to do anything to promote Liberalism in this country.

I was deeply moved by the brilliant speech which was delivered yesterday by the son of Ernest Lapointe, and which was a vindication of his memory. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Lapointe), that gallant officer, has proved that courage may be found in the House of Commons as well as on the battlefields of Europe. He was not one who had been overseas on a Cook's tour surrounded by brass hats. He was in the thick of the battle, during which half his unit was killed. He came back to tell this house things that had to be told. They were told in a way that was worthy of his father, worthy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, worthy of the grandfather of the Prime Minister and of all the great men who have been in public life in this country. I pay the same tribute to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Hallé). The hon. member for Lotbinière came from the western front. The other hon. member, Lieutenant Colonel Hallé, came straight from Italy. Here we have two men who have been witnesses of the war, in the thick of battle. I respect and believe them, more than I believe the brass hats who infest general headquarters here in Ottawa, who have never been in any theatre of war but who want young men to be sent overseas to take their places there. I well remember that I was called to order by the Prime Minister because I said the brass hats were pompous. What a thing! I told him then that if these men were shedding their blood for their country, it was in scratching their fingers with red tape.

What is the feeling in this country, Mr. Speaker? There are two groups of people, those who favour conscription and those who oppose it. Those who favour conscription cannot understand the gossip which we witness in this house between old men who have passed military age, who give their views and relate their experiences and say, "Well, you said this." "No, I said that." "No, I said this." "No, you said that." It is like, "After you, my dear Gaston." "After you, my dear Alphonse." It is most incredible. That sort of thing earns the contempt of the people of Canada. They are strongly against it, and they are not interested in such things being said in this house. They are interested in what is done by the government, things of which the government is ashamed. When since the beginning of the war have we had the truth about the policy of the government? I remember distinctly, sir, that at first conscription was not mentioned; it was not even included under mobilization. We were to have the mobilization of our natural and material resources for the greatest possible war effort, but no conscription whatever. That is what was being said. I am on record in that connection; the Prime Minister himself has put on record what I said in caucus before conscription was imposed.

Before concluding my remarks I must say that the advice of the Liberal party has never been sought in regard to any measure brought down by the government, while the advice of the opposition has been obtained. The Prime Minister said in this house that in caucus I had proposed to raise a regiment for the defence of Canada in my constituency within a week. That was about June 18 or June 20; I have the record in my house, but I know it so well that I do not need to read the book. Hon. members will remember it also. I offered to raise a regiment in my own county, and the Prime Minister told me that that would be the greatest possible mistake, that it would hamper the work of the farmers, the lumbermen, those working in essential war industries making munitions and arms, and so forth. What the Prime Minister said was plausible, but on the other hand all the men and women who have done so much for the war effort have been and are still being ignored by the government. Apparently their contribution does not count. From the start of the war the only ones who were doing their duty toward the war effort, according to the government, according to the wartime information board, according to the CBC and according to all government publications, were not those who had complied with the law, the young men who were first called recruits, then draftees and then N.R.M.A. men; it was only those who had volunteered even though they remained in Ottawa to wage a war for increases in salaries, allowances, bonuses and all that. Those were the brave men.

At the start of things there was a misconstruction of words. The word "conscription" was only a reminder of the abuse which the Quebec people had taken under the so-called union government in 1917, 1918 and 1919.

About a month ago I met a prominent Tory in Toronto. He asked me how I could justify what had been said by Mr. Lapointe to the effect that the hands of Arthur Meighen were dripping with blood. I told him that in the first place I did not know whether Mr. Lapointe had used that language, but whether he had or not I knew that it was true. After the war was over, there were men paid by the Department of Justice of the Meighen government to run after draftees and shoot at them. Imagine that! The allied forces had stopped firing on the battlefields of Europe, but here in Canada because some farmers had not forgotten the pledge of Borden not to impose conscription on farmers they were treated like convicts, they were treated like the enemy. When I was elected in 1924 one of the first letters I wrote was to Mr. Lapointe asking for the files in connection with those individuals who had been paid by the government to shoot at their brothers. What did Mr. Lapointe tell me? He said, "Jean-François, the war is over, we must have peace in this country, do not insist on having those files." That was the language used by Mr. Lapointe in answer to my request.

To summarize my point let me use an expression which once fell from the lips of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). It may seem to us that we have done too much. If too much has been done it has been to excuse the government for not having imposed conscription according to the letter as well as the spirit of the law. That was the guiding star of the policy of the government, the fear of an offensive by the Tory party. They are not dangerous. I stood alone before their most powerful man, R. B. Bennett. I am still here and he is across the sea, and not in the army.

The Prime Minister is witness to the fact that I have fought battles for the Liberal party. He will remember that all the great leaders of the Tory party came to speak against Jean-François Pouliot in Témiscouata county. First there was the Calvinist Arthur Meighen, then there was the bombastic R. B. Bennett and then the non-conscriptionist, R. J. Manion. They all came; they were listened to, but when the time came to vote they were all forgotten.

I have tried to help the Prime Minister in every way. Many times I have helped to make matters smooth for him. How many times did I warn him against oncoming danger? I did that many times, not for anything in return but simply for the satisfaction of my own conscience, my own patriotism and because of the friendship that existed between us. Very often I was subjected to humiliation because I delayed leaving the party.

The Prime Minister must remember when he toured the Gaspe peninsula in 1932 or 1933. I sent him a wire asking if he would meet some of my constituents at my home. He graciously acceded to my request and one night, although the weather was very bad, about eight hundred people came to my home to shake hands with him and with Mr. Lapointe. The Prime Minister must remember that for a time I used to send his photograph as a wedding gift to young couples in my county. The Prime Minister must remember also that I have deprived myself of valuable books on the occasion of his birthdays as a token of my admiration for him.

But that is not all. In 1930 when Mr. Houde, who is now running for mayor of Montreal, was leader of the provincial Conservative party in Quebec, it was suggested that the Liberal members should support his opponents in the Montreal election. I succeeded in having a different order given and all members except one decided to refrain from taking any part in the campaign. When the general election came around I went to see Mr. Houde, and at my request—the Prime Minister with another member of the cabinet was informed of the matter at the time—Mr. Houde refrained from taking any part in the federal campaign. Imagine, sir, he was elected by 42,000; he was the leader of the provincial group. All that was done to help the Liberal members on the island of Montreal, and it was done by the member for Témiscouata from away off in the country, just for the sake of the party and to prevent the party from being humiliated more than it was. Mr. Houde kept his word and kept away from the fight, and when that bombastic Bennett came to Maisonneuve Mayor Houde refused to preside at the meeting.

Afterwards, at the time of the padlock law, when the late Mr. Lapointe was ready to deal with the matter in a summary way, I sent a memorandum to the Prime Minister to inform him of the danger of such action. But I pass quickly over that.

In the provincial election of 1934, after the Prime Minister had stated in my presence at a meeting in the Chateau Laurier which was presided over by the late George P. Graham, that Mr. Hepburn was his leader in Ontario, I campaigned for Mr. Hepburn because I thought it would be a good thing for the party, and in the following year I returned to Ontario counties to speak for some of my colleagues in this house in the federal election. Two weeks before the date of the election, at a general meeting which had been organized by one of my best friends, the late Harry Anderson of the old Globe, I predicted, and it proved to be true, that sixty out of sixty-five supporters of the Liberal party would be elected in the province of Quebec on October 14. That was not only published in the Toronto papers but carried by the press agencies and published all over Canada.

I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, that from the beginning of the war the government has boosted only those who would volunteer and has ignored the others who are doing so much for the war effort here in Canada—our farmers, our railwaymen and those engaged in other war industries. They have been ignored completely. Why? The man in the cab of a locomotive and all the members of the train crews are exposing their lives daily, just as do those who work on explosives in munitions plants and so on, but these men are considered slackers. I have had to fight for them, and I did secure amendments to the national war services regulations which benefited not only my own constituents of Temiscouata but even the constituents of those members who dare to insult the province of Quebec at the present time. That is on record. I shall not show the letters of appreciation that I have received from officials of the department concerned; I shall keep them. But, sir, if I am here to-night it is because I have suffered mental cruelties for so long in belonging to a party which has been ignored by the Prime Minister from the start of the war. I do not know whether he takes the same attitude with his colleagues in the cabinet. If so, I understand why they are divided.

I remember that in 1936 Miss Agnes MacPhail, referring in the house to the election posters of 1935, on which were the three words "King or chaos", said that the wording should have been "King and chaos". I was scandalized at the time. I did not believe that that could ever be true. But now here it is; we have it.

Did I not warn the Prime Minister three and a half years ago, on the afternoon of February 21, 1941, that he was to be stabbed in the back? On that occasion did I not warn all the English-speaking colleagues of the Prime Minister, including the minister for naval affairs, the then minister of pensions, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and even the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) and many others? I did so because I had confidence in the Prime Minister, because I still hoped against hope that he would be true, not to his promises, but to our expectations. But, sir, on that memorable occasion the former minister of national defence was not defended by any one of his colleagues in the cabinet. He was defended by the then leader of the opposition, to whom the Prime Minister paid such a tribute when he left the leadership.

Not only that, but when the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) said that the Prime Minister was not qualified to be prime minister in time of war, that the one who was qualified was his colleague, the then minister of finance, and the late minister of national defence, who read the book that the hon. member for Parkdale had in his hand? Who brought embarrassment to the hon. member for Parkdale just to save the skin of the Prime Minister if it was not the member for Temiscouata himself?

My colleagues may be surprised that that was some time after I had left the Liberal caucus. Why did I do so? I did so for a very good reason, because there is no freedom of speech in that room. I was prevented by the Prime Minister himself from saying what I thought of the then minister of national defence, that he was incompetent. Since I was precluded from expressing that judgment in that room I could not breathe there any more, and I left.

I returned last spring to offer my good wishes and to say godspeed to the Prime Minister before he left for England. I did not want the death of a sinner; I wanted his conversion. But here we see the Liberal party embodied in a man who takes advice from his bitterest opponents, until he falls in a muddle. We are in a muddle now. Who is responsible for it? The Prime Minister cannot cast any blame on me, because I warned him. I warned him against himself. He did not listen to me. He listened to the opposite party, the party that is now making an amendment for his downfall.

I could speak for hours on this subject; I could speak for days and weeks and months. But I will conclude by reminding the house that the time has come for the "Great Divide". The members of the cabinet live in a false security. Ottawa has always ignored the public opinion of the Canadian people, but I can tell you they are fed up; they want a change; they want leadership. It is the time of the "Great Divide". The Liberal party as a party—I do not speak of my old friends who belong to it—is dead. The Prime Minister has killed it. It is just as dead as the Tory party.

Mr. ARMAND CLOUTIER (Drummond-Arthabaska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on February 17, 1919, death came to a great Canadian statesman, one whom the gracious queen Victoria had called the "silver-tongued speaker", Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

We reverently preserve many a memory of that great public man who spent long beautiful years in Arthabaska, a town of my constituency which will always be proud to have numbered among its citizens this great Canadian, this famous patriot, who has remained the symbol of national unity and a model of straightforwardness and fair play toward all nationalities and sectional groups in our fair country.

This illustrious Canadian has bequeathed his political will and testament to his successor. In it he condemned conscription. The original of this document is in the hands of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) who, in accepting the legacy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, agreed to abide by the tenets of his last will. For a quarter of a century, a copy of the political will of this great Canadian citizen has been in the hands of every member of the Liberal party and has been quoted in numberless speeches in every election campaign.

In 1940, as every other Liberal, I was given a copy of this document and I visited the most remote corners of my constituency. Knowing the pledges taken by my leaders, I told every one of my constituents, men and women alike, that the Liberal party would never pass conscription for overseas service, adding that, if it ever did, I would oppose with all my strength any government which would endeavour to apply such a measure.

In June, 1940, in view of the fact that the events which had occurred since the outbreak of the present war had given rise to an extraordinary crisis and that the national security of Canada was in jeopardy, the government introduced Bill 43 entitled "An Act conferring certain powers upon the governor in council for mobilization of national resources in the present war," in other words, the Mobilization Act. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that at the time, I supported the enactment of that measure, which was also unanimously supported by all the political parties of the loyal opposition.

On January 22, 1942, at the opening of the third session of the 19th parliament, one of the features of the speech from the throne was the announcement that a plebiscite would be held in regard to the utilization of man-power. I understood that the government were asking the people to release them from their former pledges in regard to overseas service. It would have been preferable to my mind if the government had asked directly to the people: "Are you for or against conscription for overseas service?" But inasmuch as the government was asking the electors whether they agreed to release it from its pledges in this connection, I was under the impression that both questions were synonymous, even though the one selected appeared ambiguous. I voted for the holding of the plebiscite, inasmuch as it was merely a public expression of opinion which gave me an opportunity to ascertain the views of my constituents when they were being asked by the government whether or not they were willing to release it from its former pledges in regard to overseas military service.

Fully conscious of my duty and responsibility, I addressed myself to my electorate during the plebiscite campaign, in spite of the fact that I was then in very poor health, endeavoured to explain to them that they were free to vote as they saw fit, to think as they liked in this matter, but that, as far as I was concerned, I could not accept the responsibility of an affirmative vote to the plebiscite question and would vote against it. My personal opinion was supported by 98 per cent of the electorate in my riding. The province of Quebec refused, by an overwhelming majority, to release the government from its pledge.

On the day following the plebiscite, a bill to authorize conscription for overseas service was introduced in the house. It was claimed that, in view of the result of the plebiscite, such was the decision of the electorate. How can this lame explanation be reconciled with the interpretation which, at that time, the Right Hon. Prime Minister himself gave to the plebiscite question in asserting that conscription was not the issue at stake? Had it been so, could the government feel released from a solemn pledge when the only electors to whom the guarantee had been given formally refused to cancel it? Such was Quebec's decision.

Bill 80 advocated the repeal of section 3 and, once this had been struck out, the Canadian mobilization act would have authorized compulsory service in any theatre of war, that is to say, conscription.

I voted against Bill 80 in the house, in other words against conscription, and I am proud of it, for in so doing, I honoured the mandate which I had received from my supporters.

On November 23, 1944, a date which, to my mind, marks a "national tragedy", the present government passed order in council No. 8891, providing for the dispatch overseas of 16,000 draftees. I have said, Mr. Speaker, that it was a surrender to the blackmail of the conscriptionist gang and to the collective frenzy of the eight English-speaking provinces, thoroughly aroused against the French-speaking province.

Fully aware of my responsibility, I say that I shall never be a party to this breach of the plighted word by the imperialists within the government and the opposition. The latter showed no regard for the memory of Laurier, who, during his whole life opposed that banfeul measure, and in this I shall meet the wishes of my constituents who elected me on the principle of no conscription for overseas service.

I shall therefore vote against the main motion, which requests us to support the whole war policy of the government, including order in council No. 8891 which provides for the dispatch overseas of 16,000 draftees, just as I voted against Bill No. 80, that is against conscription for overseas service.

I realize, of course, that the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada was the victim of a foul conspiracy hatched by a majority blinded by old prejudices and by new political-military and financial schemes.

My convictions are those of a liberal, and I shall remain a liberal. From now on, I reserve the right to pass judgment on the war policy as time and circumstances may warrant. I know that the right hon. the Prime Minister and his cabinet have done great things. I heartily approve of the general administration of the country in war time, such as the exemption granted to farmers' sons, industrial workers, war plants employees, commercial employees, and heads of families. I also support the social measures, such as family allowances, and post-war plans. Finally, I do not hesitate to say that the present head of the Government is still, to my mind, the only one who can lead our great country to a prosperous destiny.

Mr. Speaker, on every occasion when a national issue or a difficult situation arose, even if detrimental to some of their legitimate and acknowledged rights, French Canadians have yielded ground; they have set an example of generosity and patriotism in order to maintain and strengthen perfect unity between the two great races of this country. However, whatever our interest in a principle so important and so vital as that of national unity, there comes a time, tragic, indeed, when one can no longer afford to yield without accepting complete surrender. Self-denial, in the case of the individual, may assume the form of an almost supreme unselfishness but, in the case of a nation, it must not become cowardice or treason. Much has been asked of French Canadians since Confederation and much has been received from them. But, let it be noted that their survival as a race is more important than anything else, that their hearts are filled with national pride, that in their veins flows a blood inherited from heroes who sacrificed all but their honour.

Mr. Speaker, my ancestors came from France in 1616, that is more than three centuries ago. I am a citizen of the province of Quebec; I speak the French language which I have learned with respect and devotion on my mother's knees. I have the right and the duty to love my mother tongue and I would be despicable if I failed to fulfill that obligation. I have the same respect for those who speak another language, which they love so dearly and have learned in the same way.

Must we be divided simply because the accident of birth has made us to pray to God with a different accent and in a different language? When we speak of our mother, it is with equal love, equal devotion and the same feeling of gratitude. We use the same words even if we choose them from different languages. In both cases, the tongue is but the interpreter of the heart. National unity is in the heart, not in the language or the customs. Our forefathers brought Christian civilization to this land. They built villages in spite of the red man's bow, hatchet and scalping-knife. Without any mechanical instruments, they made the earth produce food and disgorge part of its treasures; they set up business enterprises and industries. They built the country in which we live happily to-day.

Our political background is no less replete with glorious pages. As to our part in world affairs, it has been getting more and more important for a number of years until to-day Canada ranks among the first nations of the world.

At this very hour, thousands of our gallant men are giving their all to free the nations crushed by the enemy and to make possible for us a new order in which we shall know liberty, peace and happiness.

Nothing can deprive us of our tongue, our faith and our traditions. We must not forget that Canada stretches from Halifax to Vancouver, from the Arctic to the forty-fifth parallel. It is all this Canada, so great, so rich, so beautiful, so full of promises that we must love. Our patriotism should not be confined to a small part of the country where life is good, where we are rich in historical associations, but which is not the only part of Canada where our forefathers have written glorious pages.

Canada for Canadians. Let us, Mr. Speaker, set this sane example of enlightened and intelligent patriotism whenever, as in this instance, we see a group foolishly attempt, through blind imperialism, to pass such a baneful bill of conscription, a bill which is anti-Canadian and a cause of national disunity.

Fellow-Canadians, we have reached the turning point. As a representative of Quebec, I appeal to you in these grave hours. Let us not be disunited, but rather let us stand side by side; let us not pass a law that would disrupt our national unity; let us consider our country's future, and have faith in our ability to achieve national unity in this country of ours. If we are able to perform a national miracle of this sort, we shall be all the more justified in proclaiming ourselves the builders of our country.

On March 22, 1943, in a speech which I made in this house, I said:

> I feel bound to make the following statement: as long as my leader, the right hon. Prime Minister refrains from putting conscription into force for overseas service, I shall remain among his most faithful followers; however, I must say to him that if he ever gives way to the imperialists, even though they be members of the present government, or to the opposition, and puts conscription into force for overseas service, it shall be my painful duty to fight him, for I am opposed to conscription for overseas service and as a gentleman, and a man of honour, I shall keep my pledge; in other words, I shall discharge the trust reposed in me by my constituents in this respect.

I will therefore vote against the main motion, by which we are asked to approve the government's entire war policy, including order in council 8891, with regard to the sending of 16,000 recruits overseas; I shall vote against it for the same reason I voted against Bill No. 80, namely because I oppose conscription for service overseas.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): In rising to take part in this debate I should like the government to take my remarks as constructive criticism, because I know perfectly well that every hon. member must do everything in his power to bring this war to a successful conclusion. In speaking of reinforcements which are necessary, from the information we have had in public and private sessions of this house, I think it is really more a matter of man-power than reinforcements. Have we bitten off more than we can chew? I think we have. We have built a navy which is a great credit to Canada; we have built an air force second to none, and we have built an army that is one of the finest in the world to-day. Our navy and air force have ample reserves. They have perhaps more than they need to-day. But the army, and the infantry particularly, need reinforcements in the worst way. We have other commitments as well. We have increased our merchant marine by nearly one hundred percent. We are supplying our armed forces and the allied nations with tanks, guns, shells, ships, et cetera, which need a huge industrial army to carry on. Then there are the armed forces to feed, the food arrangements with Britain and other allied nations which need a land army to maintain. Can we take any more men from industry or from agriculture without cutting down our supplies? I am quite sure that we cannot do it.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said in the house yesterday that further agreements had been made with Britain to supply more beef in 1946. I asked General McNaughton about the policy of the Department of National Defence with regard to men essential to agriculture. Hon. members will find that at page 6576 of Hansard. He assured me that the department was establishing a reserve list of N.R.M.A. men who could be posted to agriculture. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has also assured me that that will be taken care of. I do not question the word of General McNaughton, nor do I question the word of the Minister of Labour, but the men are still going into the army every day. If the men who are called for a medical examination are found to be fit they are put into the army, men who should be producing food for Britain and the armed forces. You can imagine the position a man is in. He goes for his medical and he is in the army. They say, "Well, ask for a postponement." I know there are a lot of commanding officers among the membership of this house and I have been four years in the army myself. A commanding officer is not the best person to whom to go to ask for anything, especially when you are only a recruit sent from the mobilization board to take your basic training. During his basic training that man cannot do anything about a postponement. At the end of his eight weeks of basic training he is told, "Well, you are in the army now; we have trained you; forget about the farm." That is the position to-day. I am quite sure that hon. members on both sides of the house will agree with me in that.

I have a letter from one of my constituents who is a young farmer, married and the operator of a farm. He has had agricultural leave which expired on November 1. He reapplied for an extension to carry on his farming operations and they have granted him leave to January 2. If he is essential on the farm from November to January 2, he is just as essential after January. When that case was before the mobilization board the judge thought he should be sent back to agriculture to carry on his agricultural occupation, but the military representative said, "Oh, no, that man will have to get an old man or a younger man under military age to carry on the work on that farm."

We then come to the N.R.M.A. men who have been getting spring and fall leave to help to sow and harvest their crops. If this supply of man-power is taken farm production will drop and it is dropping to-day. It is down now from last year.

I should like to read a letter covering the point I am trying to explain:

> My son is the only able-bodied man on a 1,900 acre farm—900 under cultivation and 100 in cultivated grass. We have 150 odd cattle, about 40 hogs and 13 horses. The cattle are mostly beef cattle, but we winter them under farm conditions, that is, we feed, water and shelter them, instead of letting them get down to hide and bones during the winter. I have one son in the active army, I believe now overseas. I am crippled myself, so that I can only do light work, and I have a crippled son also unfit for manual labour. The cultivated acreage of this farm has already been reduced by 400 acres since the start of the war. You can see what I am up against if they hold my son for further military service, and I know there are many more up against the same conditions.

To rob the land army of these men who are essential to the success of our food programme will be nothing less than disastrous. Yesterday in the house the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was asked questions in regard to the congestion at the various stock yards. This situation is due largely to the scarcity of men on the farms. If more men are taken we shall have still greater congestion at the stockyards, because more unfinished cattle will be coming on the market. The minister said there was a good outlet for finished cattle, but the unfinished cattle are coming on to the market in great numbers. Why? Because no help is available to feed them on the farm. Visit any of our abattoirs across Canada any day and you will find them slaughtering milch cows that should be kept on the farms and milked next summer to aid in the production of cream or butter or cheese. You will also find young sows coming on the market which should be kept on the farms and bred in order that we might have more bacon for Britain. But when the help is not there they cannot feed themselves, because in this country we cannot run our stock outside. They have to be cared for in the winter and we have to put up the feed in the summer. Trace that unfinished stock to which the Minister of Agriculture referred yesterday back to where it came from. Go to the farmer who sent it in; ask him why he did so. You will find that he had a son who joined up in 1939, and that the next son was called up. You may find that the farmer was sixty-five years of age in 1939 and now is seventy years old, and that it is impossible for him to carry on any longer. If you read the papers to-day you saw that not eighteen miles from here a man seventy-five years of age, bringing in his wood, was trampled to death by his horse last night. That is what we have all over this dominion to-day, with the farms being stripped of the man-power that should be there.

On March 24, 1942, according to Hansard at page 1567, the Prime Minister declared that men essential to or employed in agriculture on March 23, 1942, would be left on the farms. That regulation has not been complied with as it should have been. I wonder if the new regulations which are promised this parliament will be lived up to. The government has been asked repeatedly to establish some standard of production on the farms throughout Canada, for which there should be a guaranteed minimum man-power. There appears to be a lack of co-ordination between the Department of Labour, which operates selective service, the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of National Defence which established six divisions in the field and now finds itself short of reinforcements. I want it understood by the members of this house that I am in favour of sending all the reinforcements needed for our men overseas. Anything less would be a betrayal of the gallant men of this country who have offered their lives and are now in desperate need of reinforcement.

Coming back to the farm situation and the production of food, in my own province I had something to do with this as agricultural representative on the mobilization board. When a man applied for postponement he was given a questionnaire as to his farming operations, which questionnaire he was asked to fill in. By going over that questionnaire you could immediately understand that man's farming operations. If the board considered his production insufficient they advised him to increase his production or go into the army. This policy increased production, and could now be used as a yardstick in connection with the production of food on the farm. The greatest failure of this government has been its failure properly to estimate its man-power needs at home and in the armed forces, and then take a firm stand to meet those needs from its man-power resources.

Mr. J. A. CRETE (St. Maurice-Leflèche) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at a time when millions of soldiers are fighting on the various battlefronts, when the government in London cites the Canadian war effort as an example to all other Allied nations, we wonder what can be the meaning of the agitation stirred up around this matter of conscription or, to be more accurate, around the dispatch by compulsion of 16,000 Canadian draftees.

The explanation is as simple as the young men who are to be sacrificed: the enforcement of conscription for service overseas indicates that Toronto's imperialistic Tories have triumphed, they who, since the outbreak of the war, in collusion with certain interests known to us, never stopped sabotaging our voluntary system. Toronto's Two Hundred whose hateful propaganda is aimed at the Province of Quebec, have scored.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRETE: Some will note with surprise that the people of Quebec, though inexorably opposed to conscription for overseas service, are and will remain quiet. Soon, however—for the end of the war is at hand—those same capitalists will beg the province of Quebec to save them from socialism which never fails to sweep a divided nation. Will the province of Quebec respond this time? I wonder.

To-day, regardless of the way in which we choose to look at the problem, the house is asked to endorse the conscription policy for the present and for the future. Personally, I have always been, and I am still, opposed to conscription for several reasons. I cannot accept conscription because, as the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself has admitted, there is no assurance that our war effort has not been out of proportion to our resources, and, if so, instead of increasing our forces we should revise them in keeping with our available manpower.

I cannot accept conscription because, to my mind, if the senior minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) had shown as much foresight as his colleagues in charge of the Department of National Defence for Air and the Department of National Defence for Naval Services, the present critical situation would not have occurred, and I say that it is not up to the youth of this country to make good the mistakes of a minister who looked to the other side of the house for guidance.

I cannot accept conscription because it is a measure utterly inconsistent with the liberalism of Laurier which I have upheld for over thirty years.

I could not close my brief remarks without comparing certain thoughts expressed at twenty-seven years' interval. In 1917, I happened to be in Grand'Mère, on Chamberland street, in front of the office of the English-speaking soldiers sent from Toronto to apprehend our conscripts. Three old Liberal leaders, who happened to pass by, pointing to those soldiers who were carrying revolvers in their belts, told me in their simple but always forceful language: "Young man, this conscription measure is not of our doing."

Tuesday, November 21, 1944, again at Grand'Mère, where I was about to entrain for Ottawa, I ran across another old French-Canadian Liberal leader who was immensely proud of the fact that three of his sons are now serving in the active army and who said to me: "You are going to Ottawa, Mr. Member of Parliament. The news from there is good." It was still good at the time. He added: "Conscription is not of our doing."

Mr. Speaker, from my seat as Liberal member from the constituency of St. Maurice-Lafleche, I repeat: "Conscription is not of my doing", and I shall vote against the motion.

Mr. MAURICE BOURGET (Levis): Mr. Speaker, before continuing my remarks in French I should like to say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), who said to-night that we were the isolationist lads in this corner of the house, that if the members now sitting in this corner of the house were to be called isolationists, then it was also true that the Liberal party for the past five years should have sat in this corner because we were sharing the same views, except some members, on matters similar to the one that we are now discussing.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, on no occasion during the last twenty-seven years have the people's representatives been faced with a responsibility as heavy as the one which devolves upon us at this time. It is therefore the duty of each one among us to face the situation calmly, following the dictates of his conscience, judgment and intelligence. I shall express my thoughts very briefly, because I do not think it is necessary, in upholding our cause, to repeat all the arguments which have already been expounded in this debate. I merely wish to state the reasons which lead me to believe that I can no longer give my support to the present government.

After passing the order in council whereby the draftees called under the Mobilization Act are to be dispatched overseas, the government requests us to endorse its policy by a vote of confidence. To my mind the issue now being discussed has a military and a political side. An endeavour has been made, in this house, to advance the argument that the morale of our troops overseas was greatly affected by the lack of reinforcements. I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that I am not sufficiently well informed to pass judgment on military matters, but I cannot understand how the dispatch, during the next six months, of 16,000 unwilling draftees will improve the morale of our troops. I believe the right hon. the Prime Minister himself (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated, as has been repeated over and over again, that they would not be enthusiastically welcomed by the volunteers they were to join. In addition, it was claimed that their presence might cause disunity if not dissension among our fighting units.

Moreover, the problem with which we are faced to-day means that the government lacked foresight in pursuing a war effort out of proportion with our means and blundered in the assignment of the troops available.

The crux of the argument, however, is the political aspect of the matter, since it is evident, as we are well aware and as several well-informed people have pointed out, that conscription, in short, is but a shield which has screened those who, for the past four years, under the cloak of patriotism, advocated its enforcement in the hope of coming into power.

In the speech which I delivered in this house on Bill No. 80, I said that if the government yielded on one point of its program, it would find it hard in the future not to yield all along the line. Unfortunately, my predictions have materialized and to-day we are faced with this hard fact: we have conscription.

I need not recall all the solemn pledges of the leader of the government and of his chief associates, to the effect that conscription would never be resorted to. These statements are still too fresh in the minds of each one of us, and I still remember the radio speeches of our leaders, during which they repeated their unshakable opposition to conscription.

It would be inconsistent to claim that after having broken so many pledges and solemn promises, the present government could expect from us a vote of confidence, especially since it has not been shown that conscription was necessary to an allied victory. I still think that the voluntary system would have proved adequate if its application had been entrusted to people who believed in it and if means in keeping with the circumstances had been used.

We are called upon to-day to support a "vigorous effort" in the prosecution of the war. I am wondering what is implied by the word "vigorous". Are we to gather from that expression that we have not, so far, done our utmost to help our troops and our allies? One has only to peruse the statistics prepared by the various departments to realize that Canada, in every field, has neglected nothing to encourage a war effort which, in proportion to her population, has surpassed that of all other allied nations. This is the reason for statements published in the press from well-informed and authoritative people, such as Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Churchill and others who said, in effect, that our war effort was not only most commendable but that it bordered on the miraculous.

Mr. PARENT: Hear, hear!

Mr. BOURGET: Then why should we abandon our policy, why not keep on following the methods which have given such wonderful results? Once again, I cannot see that the government's new policy is likely to lead to better results.

All honest and sincere people now know that since the war's outbreak a sly and dishonest campaign has been waged in this country in order to make it appear to the other provinces that Quebec has refused to do its share in the present conflict. Mr. Speaker, from my seat in this house, I want to protest with all the power at my command against this slanderous campaign aimed at my province. I think, on the contrary, that Quebec is entitled to feel proud of its contribution to the Canadian war effort. People in all walks of life have generously responded to the appeal which the government has seen fit to make on various occasions, and they have done so in all fields of endeavour. In passing, I wish to point out, to the credit of the constituency which I represent, that in the sixth Victory Loan Campaign, the towns of Lévis and Lauzon have been first among the cities of the whole country, securing the highest percentage in that campaign.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURGET: I do not think it is necessary to emphasize the part played by our farmers and workers during the last five years; the results clearly show that they have left nothing undone in order to help our war effort.

As regards our contribution of men for the armed forces, I believe we have done well, and nobody can criticize us, in the light of the facts stated in this house by the honourable member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin).

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister had, quite recently, words of high praise to speak about the province of Quebec, and he very aptly stated, in connection with minorities, that "our country being composed of minorities, its administration would be impossible if the rights of those minorities were not respected."

After all these commendations, in view of all the sufferings we have endured so far, the Prime Minister should not have yielded; he should have held his own against the agitation, for the safeguard of the principles he had always upheld. One fights for his principles, one falls for them, but one never surrenders.

Personally, I trusted him. Apart from his statesmanship, this confidence was based on the historical fact that, in 1917, under circumstances identical to those of the present time, he was among those who, with Laurier, had struggled for the very cause that we are struggling for to-day. Be well assured, Mr. Speaker, that we do not light-heartedly forsake a leader which commanded both our admiration and our respect. However, as in the present situation, everyone must follow the dictates of his conscience and judgment, I cannot put my trust in the leader of the government for the carrying out of the new policy he has just adopted. For my part I have also made promises and given pledges which I intend to keep.

I understood from the speech of the former minister of national defence, that there still are in the cabinet, ministers who had led their leader to alter his policy and that, therefore, he would no more be free to uphold, among his colleagues, the principles which have heretofore been admitted and advocated by all true Liberals.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear! Hear!

Mr. BOURGET: This new policy will have many disastrous consequences and as the former minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) so aptly stated, the most tragic of all is the weakening of the trust and confidence placed in our public men. How can we in future ask the younger generation to have faith in our leaders; how can we expect their support in building up our nation if they realize that they have been deceived?

I do not wish to conclude my remarks on such a pessimistic note, as I have faith in the future of my country and I hope that before long we may still find men inspired by great ideals who will get together in order to put a timely stop to the collapse of our social structure built at the price of so much sacrifice on the part of each one of our citizens.

I shall therefore vote against the Conservative amendment and against the main motion. However, I shall support the sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean) not because it fully meets my views but because it opposes the enforcement of conscription for overseas service and it gives me a further opportunity of expressing my opposition to conscription.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, we were called here to this special session for the purpose, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) puts it, of discussing the controversy which had arisen out of the resignation of the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston). We have since heard from the Prime Minister and the former minister of national defence; and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, and I think the country feels that the forced resignation of the former minister of national defence was unjust. The position which he took within the cabinet has been wholly vindicated and the policy which he advocated has now been adopted in half-measure.

The question we now have to decide is whether we have confidence in the Prime Minister and his government, confidence that they will carry through even this half-measure, whether they will carry out their present policy with respect to reinforcements and whether that policy is fair and adequate. There has been much serious and thoughtful debate; some excellent speeches have been made, and soon hon. members will have an opportunity of recording their votes.

Some members of the house have protested against the holding of a secret session. I myself was not in favour of a secret session because I felt that we had already sufficient facts to enable us to make a decision, but I also felt that it could do little harm. The further information I gathered at the secret session only served to strengthen my opinion that reinforcements are desperately needed for our troops overseas. I do not think anyone who attended that secret session or heard the discussions that took place in the house could have failed to be so impressed. The former minister of national defence, the hon. member for Prince, further confirmed my views on the reinforcement question. I do not think any political or other consideration could alter the fact that replacements and reinforcements for our troops overseas are needed, and needed now, not some time in the future. Valuable time has been lost.

One of the matters I wish to discuss is the statement of the Prime Minister in which he said, in effect, that a measure of unrest was being organized the like of which had not been seen in the history of Canada, and that a new condition of affairs had arisen as a result of organized propaganda. I resent that, because it was not organized by propaganda and the measure of unrest was not organized. I know of no such effort. The situation is not the result of organization; it is a general building up of public opinion based on facts which came to the people at home. It started before the plebiscite. It began through the foresight of many men and women in this country who knew what happened during the last war, who saw how the voluntary system had fallen down at the most critical stage of that war, who had watched the subsequent developments, and were far-sighted enough to desire that such a situation should be provided against, before we reached a critical stage in the present war. There was no organized propaganda about it.

In 1942 when the plebiscite was taken the same situation obtained, except that the government was not forced to take action. The taking of the plebiscite appeased the people by leaving the impression—despite the Prime Minister's speeches and denials—that the government were given a mandate from the people to enact conscription for any theatre of war. That was the belief of the people when they voted on the plebiscite. At that time I remarked that if we had leadership I believed that we would have in embryo a united nation, and that unity could be obtained by the government taking full responsibility and enacting all necessary measures for the safety of the state. I pointed out that if those measures were not taken we would have all kinds of turmoil as time went on. What I pointed out in my speech against a plebiscite has been justified by the events. We should have faced the issue at that time rather than be compelled to face it at a time like this.

I repeat that there has been no organized propaganda. What the Prime Minister hears to-day is simply the voice of the people as echoed by the press of the country. Ever since 1942 there has been an uneasy feeling among the people, who knew that the voluntary system might break down and that when our troops overseas were actually engaged in combat they might be short of reinforcements. This uneasiness spread to those whose sons and husbands and wives and sweethearts and friends and relations in general were over in Great Britain. It was not an organized propaganda. After our troops started to fight in Italy letters came back complaining of shortage of reinforcements. Many of the men who served in Italy had been overseas since 1939. They had been through hard fighting and were due for leave. Then came D-day, and more statements and letters were received by those at home. Some of these communications were extremely alarming. Statements were made to the press by prominent people; among them, Conn Smythe made a very serious charge, and I think it resulted in action. But the unrest was not organized. I could read letters which I have had from time to time pointing out the seriousness of the situation, but there is no opportunity to do so now.

The whole course of events culminated in the present crisis. I do not need to go through the whole chronology of what happened since the former minister of national defence came home. That has been talked about here and we know just what happened. I will give the former minister credit for having made arrangements for the dispatch of N.R.M.A. reinforcements on November 27. He informed the cabinet of the serious situation, but it was only on November 23 that action was taken, and much valuable time has been lost. Now we have a rationed conscription. It has been said that had conscription been imposed some time ago—and it should have been put in effect long ago—there might have been civil disturbances in Canada. It has been said that even under this hybrid order in council which has now been passed such incidents may occur. It has been suggested that trouble might arise between men of the N.R.M.A. who would be sent over and the troops who are now overseas. I do not think so, but if I know the temper of our forces overseas, and I have some information from letters I receive and directly from men who are returning to this country, the trouble we might have here now will amount to nothing compared with what will happen when the fighting men come home if reinforcements are denied them. The government and the Prime Minister will be held strictly responsible.

Another point to which I wish to direct attention is the tortuous methods used by the Prime Minister in his speech with respect to the voting of members of the House of Commons; the propaganda about what will happen if any hon. member votes against the government. What did the Prime Minister say in the course of his address? He said, as reported in Hansard, at page 6613:

> I am happy beyond all words for one thing: it is that the responsibility from now on is largely off the shoulders of the ministry and is in an even greater degree upon the shoulders of hon. members of the House of Commons. They will be the ones who will have to determine whether or not this ministry is to continue to carry on the war effort of this country for a further period of time, and administer this order in council, or whether some other ministry is to take its place.

The Prime Minister here throws the responsibility on the house membership as a whole. But he is leaving the door open, as he always does, so that the blame will attach to the members of the opposition or any other hon. member who votes against him, if he has an adverse vote. See what he says in the very next breath:

If I cannot get enough support out of my own party to feel sure that the men of my own party are behind me—

Mark those words.

—without depending on those who are politically opposed, then my resignation will go in to the Governor General. . . .

Just what does this mean? In effect these words exonerate every other member but the members of his own party. So that we shall have no blame, I want that known throughout the country, in order that if anything happens and the Prime Minister is defeated in the House of Commons it will not be our fault, because he would not take our support anyway. He is so used to an overwhelming Liberal majority that he has no need for opposition support. It has always been a Liberal war and he intends to keep it so. He does not care if he gets our support, and yet he is always complaining because we do not give him that support. That propaganda has gone out to the people, and I hope they understand that it will not be our fault if he is defeated, but only the fault of his own members in the house.

He makes it clear that unless he gets the support of his own party he will resign. Why does he try to cajole us into voting not to send replacements overseas, not to implement bill No. 80, in an endeavour to make it appear in the eyes of the country that we are lacking in patriotism and are callous about the gallant men fighting our battles overseas if we do not vote "yes", if we do not vote against our conscience for a Prime Minister and a cabinet in whom we and the country have lost faith and confidence?

That brings me to another point. To say the least, I was shocked, and I am sure the house and the country must have been shocked, when the Prime Minister told us that there is no one to succeed him in the event of his resigning. He says he has canvassed the situation and finds that none of his colleagues will succeed him. What of his cabinet? Have they given their consideration to this situation? What is their thought in the matter? The Prime Minister cannot do anything about it. What will they do? Suppose the Prime Minister became incapacitated, or suppose he died? What then would be the course they would follow? They are the executive of parliament charged with the administration of the affairs of the country. Whom will they select to succeed the Prime Minister in any of these events? Up to the present time have they and the Prime Minister ever discussed the situation as to who is to be his successor, or have they nothing to say in the matter? Has the axe been held over their heads so long that they dare not open their mouths on this situation, or have great big juicy carrots of office been dangled before their eyes to keep them in line?

Is there any one among the 170 members of the Liberal party in the house who is capable of discharging that office? What kind of business administration can be expected from such a cabinet? Who is the understudy? Is there a business head or board of directors in any institution in Canada who would not be facing disaster if they were so neglectful of their duty as not to provide for a similar situation in the event of the resignation, death or incapacitation of their chief executive, seeing to it that there should be a successor?

The responsibility is on the cabinet, not on us, to see to it that there is someone who can succeed the Prime Minister in any of these eventualities.

There is another question. Conscription for overseas has always been the law of the land, limited only by the government, and the order in council just passed by the government giving a measure of conscription for overseas service would seem to relieve the anxiety which has been felt by many people, in that it will in the meantime guarantee the necessary reinforcements, although the delay which has taken place is serious. It may provide needed reinforcements at the early part of the year.

The order in council has now reinforced the law, and what happens politically will have nothing to do with the enforcement of that law. It would not matter if this house were dissolved. The personnel is there in the department to administer the law as it is. The deputy minister and the staff of the various forces are there and the business of the country will not stop. If any such thing should happen, or could happen, then it is about time that we changed our constitution.

The people of Canada gave an overwhelming mandate through the plebiscite. Perhaps it was a good thing the plebiscite was taken, because the mandate is there, and the wishes of the majority of the people must be carried out, namely, that adequate reinforcements shall be made available, not here in Canada but overseas. Whether the method is right, fair, just or discriminating will not matter in the meantime; and, in the words of the hon. member for Prince, the people of the country and I will hold the government and especially the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence personally responsible to see to that. As a matter of fact, it has been expressed in the press that if the house were dissolved our troops would not go overseas. I think the law of the land must be carried out.

One has only to study the order in council and it must be plain that it is a further example of the government's man-power muddle. This policy has resulted in inequality of sacrifice and it is also threatening to weaken the moral fibre of future generations. It is lowering the character and manhood of the N.R.M.A. men. No democracy can effectively and successfully wage war unless it can and does command every citizen in any capacity in any theatre of combat to which he may be directed by the government. I would bring to the attention of the house the point of view that was taken on June 5, 1941, by the board of education of the city of Toronto when it received a letter from the then minister of national defence with regard to recruiting activities in the schools of the city. This was their considered reply: The board of education respectfully suggested that the most satisfactory solution to the recruiting problem, for parents and students alike, would be found in the application by the government of the principle of universal selective national service.

The question before the house has nothing to do with this. We are asked to vote confidence in the leader of a government and in his cabinet when he has lost the confidence of the majority of the people of Canada—a cabinet divided against itself, a cabinet, I venture to say, that has not even confidence in itself. We are asked to vote confidence in a leader who has been forced to bring in a measure which he does not believe in, and he has no heart in the thing he is doing.

It is a measure which he is forced to bring in as a means of appeasement in such a way as to appease different sections of the country in the hope of retaining power, a measure of such a discriminatory character as to be scandalous. And when I say this I am not pointing my finger at any province. Never in the history of Canada nor, I suppose, in the history of any other British parliament has a Prime Minister been given such a castigation in a polite way. Never has a Prime Minister been shown up as having misrepresented the truth to the people of Canada in a radio address, 87,000 copies of which have been distributed to the public, and in the speech which he gave to parliament, as has been done by the dismissed minister of national defence. How can I vote confidence under these circumstances? How can I vote confidence that the reinforcements and replacements necessary will be continued to be sent overseas to our hard-pressed forces?

I will say this, however, if the Prime Minister will bring in an order in council making universal selective service anywhere effective, end the farce of the two-army system, put into effect equality of service and sacrifice, for there is none up to the present time, end this discrimination, ensure that reinforcements and replacements in adequate numbers are made available I will give my cooperation.

With regard to the order in council itself, it makes available for overseas 16,000 N.R.M.A. troops. Just what does that mean? It simply means a continuation of the compulsory volunteer method that has been used. Previously it was coercion of the worst kind. Now it is bribery, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in his speech the other day.

Never have I heard such a shocking expose of a state of affairs as was given by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Just imagine, in order to get these men to volunteer, the date of enlistment is dated back six months if the N.R.M.A. men will enlist now! The result is that instead of receiving $7.50 a month beginning now, the allowance is dated back six months. The military service medal is given in one year instead of eighteen months and the non-commissioned officer ranks are confirmed.

This order in council P.C. 8891 by its very scope is an affront to parliament and an undeserved reflection on the people of this country of whatever race or creed. It will not get rid of the controversy and has the uncertainty as to future action. Our troops are still abandoned to the uncertainty of voluntary enlistment at the most critical stage of the war. The country is humiliated and disgraced.

Mr. CHARLES PARENT (Quebec West and South): It was my privilege in 1917 to follow the debates in the old Victoria museum, and I am glad to say to-day that the present debate is on a much higher level than the old conscription debate of 1917. I can still recall the heated charges of the late Michael Clark of Red Deer against Laurier as well as the brilliant defence by the late Frank Oliver of the old Liberal chieftain. Unfortunately in 1917 there was a slogan against the province of Quebec. It was, "Send the slackers of Quebec overseas." In 1944 we have come back with a new slogan, "Send the Zombies of Quebec overseas." I saw the Quebec riots in 1917. I saw very respectable citizens being shot down at night, coming peacefully through the streets of Quebec with their arms upraised, unarmed, and men were using the famous Vickers machine guns on the population of Quebec. These things, Mr. Speaker, happened in the constituency of Quebec West, which is a part of the old constituency of Quebec East, which was divided in the redistribution of 1911 and which was represented in this House of Commons for over forty years by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

I recall when I was following the debates of 1917 that it was the old chieftain who would lead me to the chief doorman so that I would obtain a seat in the front row. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier saw how I used to follow the debates of the House of Commons in those days with such attention he said to me, "My boy, some day you will come to parliament to sit in the house instead of in the gallery," and he added, "Remember that conscription is a measure contrary to Liberal principles." I have never forgotten that schooling, or the schooling that I had from the Liberal party. Is it strange that, coming into the House of Commons with such a background, I had the firm resolution that never would I make a step which would lead me eventually to vote for a law of conscription? I still recall the first speech that I made in 1937, when I said to the Liberal party, following the return of our minister from the unveiling of the Vimy monument when we greatly increased military expenditures: "We are tailoring the first sleeve of a military uniform that will some day lead us to conscription." I was told at that time that I had no knowledge of international affairs; that we were not to go into a war; that not a single one of those armaments would leave the country; that it was for the defence of Canada and for the shores of Canada. I can still recall the words of the man who was at that time the inspiration, if not the guiding star of our province. I can still recall the declaration of the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe when we were discussing this matter of armaments. When we were pointing repeatedly to him and the danger ahead, he said, "The French Canadians will never agree that any government has the right to force them to military service on the other side of the ocean." I believe he was right. Mr. Lapointe said:

> I think I am true to my concept of Canadian unity when I say that I shall always fight against this policy; I would not be a member of a government that would enact it; and not only that, but I say with all my responsibility to the people of Canada that I would oppose any government that would enforce it.

That is what we are doing to-day. In order that my English friends may understand our state of mind, listen to the schooling we have had. Mr. Lapointe went further and said:

> I agree with what was said yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and what was said by Mr. Bruce of Australia, that the time for expeditionary forces overseas is certainly past. . . .

This is not a declaration dating back twenty-five or forty years. It was made in this House of Commons, with the approval of the Conservative party as well as that of the Liberal party, in 1939. Can my friends who speak the English language not understand that with the schooling which was given for more than thirty years in the province of Quebec, and which was repeated here in this national forum, you cannot go to the people with a law like this and just state that you can send them overseas against their will. That is the explanation of all these increases in armaments which have been so ably exposed from time to time, and which I voted against. With every step we went further and further. Finally when we came here on the declaration of war we found that all this schooling had been wrong. Those who came here without any knowledge of national or international affairs, back-benchers who had not been to imperial or international peace conferences, saw their humble judgment justified by events. That is why, true to my commitments, true to what I have said in my constituency and what I would have said in any other part of Canada, from the schooling we have had, I voted against sending troops overseas. Also in accordance with that schooling I voted that the way to help the British empire was not by sending soldiers but by producing arms, munitions of all kinds, ships, aeroplanes and all the different things an army needs. In that philosophy we were supported not only by our leaders in Canada but by the then Prime Minister of Australia.

Following the sending of the first contingent we found ourselves caught in a current so strong that we could not row against it. We were carried by a stream so powerful that eventually we had to go on to an expeditionary force much greater, and to spend millions and millions of dollars. I still recall that at the time we thought by spending $1,000,000 a day on the war we were making the maximum effort our country could make. To-day we are spending $14,000,000 a day, and to some people it is still just a reasonable effort.

I did not want to take a chance in these matters. I stood on the principles on which I was elected, which were the Liberal principles of Laurier, and which were maintained at the time by King and Lapointe. That is why I have never, in any circumstances, indulged in a vote that would lead me to what we are called upon to deal with to-day. At the time of the plebiscite I voted three times in one day against the Liberal party. I seconded the motion of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that the bill be given the six months' hoist. I campaigned in the province of Quebec for a "no" vote and told my electors that I did not want to be relieved of the commitments I had made. I said to them, "If you believe that King is right and you give me a 'yes' vote I will accept it as a mandate to vote for conscription. But if, as I ask, you give me a 'no' vote I will go back to parliament and if ever the Liberal party introduces a measure or an order in council to send a single soldier from Canada overseas against his will I will cross the floor of the house and leave the Liberal party."

I was the first member, Mr. Speaker, to leave the Liberal party on the day the Prime Minister tabled the order in council, and I was followed by the hon. members for Temiscouata, Levis and Quebec-Montmorency. I recall that my gesture was interpreted in different ways in certain quarters. Lately Prime Minister Churchill, in discussing the plans for the House of Commons to be built in England, said that he wanted a square chamber with a broad aisle, with the opposition on one side and the government on the other, so that when a member crossed the floor of the house it would be very noticeable; and he added, "I have crossed the floor of the house twice in my career." So that I say my crossing of the floor means that in accordance with the instructions and the schooling I have received I will fight the Liberal party on this conscription issue. I will fight it without any appeal to prejudice. I will fight it honestly without indulging in personalities against any members of the government or any members of the House of Commons who do not share my views. It is the privilege of each to judge this question as he sees fit, and I am not going to try to raise in my province any prejudice against any one of English, Irish, Scotch, or any other nationality in this house because he does not think as I do. On the other hand, I want it to be known that when I crossed the floor of the house I knew I would be far away from the smiles of the ministers. If I was not making a move that led to honours, I was at least making a move that kept me a man of honour.

In closing, may I commend the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Lapointe) for the marvellous speech he made yesterday. Belonging to no party, I am ready to welcome the expression of honest attitudes in the house, and I think the hon. member is deserving of acclamation at the next election because of the stand he has taken. His father rose in his place in this house on a debate similar to this when he was about the same age as his son now is. The other day the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) was referring to the guiding star that may come out of this debate in parliament. I would say to the younger generation of my province as well as of Canada that in the hon. member for Lotbinière they have a star that should lead the younger generation. He was in France on D-day; he has fought with his soldiers and he knows the reactions of those men. He has seen what war is and yet, when he comes back here, even though he is still a soldier, he makes the claim that we should not have conscription.

I wish also to commend the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay), who are both veterans of the last war and of this war. I realize how difficult their situation is compared with that of a civilian, but they have been broad-minded enough to judge the situation according to their conscience. I believe these men are entitled to the highest consideration for the position they have taken, and I highly commend them.

I intend to vote for the subamendment of the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean). While I do not concur in all its trimmings, it does contain a point which I cannot overlook—it condemns conscription for overseas service. As far as the amendment and the main motion are concerned, I will vote against them without any malice, ill feeling or otherwise. I will vote against them in accordance with my conscience. By that I shall be simply following the whole philosophy of my political life; I shall be following the whole philosophy of my party. When I crossed the floor of the house I asked myself if, along with my other friends, we did not really compose the Liberal party since my other hon. friends on the other side had completely changed their political philosophy on conscription.

On motion of Mr. Macdonald (Halifax) the debate was adjourned.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, December 7, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—S. R. BRITTAIN

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Is Mr. S. R. Brittain in the employ of the wartime prices and trade board?

2. If so, in what capacity, and what remuneration is he receiving?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

PENICILLIN

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What contract or contracts, if any, have been made by the government for the manufacture of penicillin in Canada?

2. Are these contracts exclusive?

3. What price is provided for such manufacture?

4. What persons, firms or corporations have so contracted with the government?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Two plants for producing penicillin have been established in Canada by this department. These plants are located at Connaught Laboratories, University of Toronto, Toronto, and Ayerst, McKenna & Harrison Limited, Montreal. Contracts were given by the department to each of the foregoing firms for thirteen billion Oxford units—a total of 26 billion units (26,000,000,000) and for continuing quantities as may be specified by the department.

2. If the question means: "Is the government excluded from buying penicillin elsewhere," the answer is: No.

If the question means: "Has any directive been given excluding other companies from producing penicillin," the answer is: No.

3. The price to be paid for penicillin from the plants mentioned in question No. 1 is to be the proper cost of production, as determined by cost audit by the treasury cost accountants plus a fair and reasonable profit to be determined by the department.

4. Answered by No. 1.

DOMINION STEEL COMPANY—MAGNETIC IRON ORE

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Is the Dominion Steel Company importing any magnetic iron ore from the United States at the present time?

2. If so, what tonnage was imported for the year 1944?

3. What state was it shipped from?

4. What price per ton was paid for this ore?

5. Was it shipped by rail or water transportation?

6. Did the government pay any subsidy to the Dominion Steel Company for this ore?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No.

2, 3, 4, 5, and 6—Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN FORCES

RESIGNATION OF DIRECTOR OF ARMY RECRUITING—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services if he would consult with the Minister of National Defence in connection with the tabling of the correspondence which has passed between the department or the minister and the government with regard to the resignation of Brigadier Mess as director of recruiting. Has the minister an answer for me this morning?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): I have not the correspondence at the moment, but I hope it will be ready during the day.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NAVY, ARMY AND AIR—DEPARTMENTAL ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Can the Prime Minister give us any indication as to whether it is his intention to amalgamate the departments of national defence, or does he intend to appoint another minister of national defence for air? This matter has been raised from time to time by way of speculation, and perhaps the Prime Minister would wish to make some comment.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): During the last few weeks I have had very little time to give thought to some of these matters to which my hon. friend has just referred. Very shortly after the business of the present sittings is concluded I shall, if the government is sustained, be taking the matter under review and I hope to be able to reach a decision one way or the other at that time. I am unable to say at the moment what the decision will be.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SURVEY OF STAFF BY CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Your Honour will recall that shortly before the house adjourned in August a question was raised as to adjustments in the pay of the staff of the House of Commons, particularly the protective staff. Knowing that Your Honour and the Clerk of the House are interested in this matter I was wondering if the expected survey had been undertaken by the civil service commission and a report made.

Mr. SPEAKER: Immediately after the house adjourned in August I made a request to the civil service commission that they have a survey made of all the staff of the house, having in view what had been said by the leader of the opposition with regard to the salaries of the protective staff as compared with those paid to the staff in the senate. An investigation was made by officials of the civil service commission, and I came down here at the end of October to go over that survey. I have made representations on behalf of the House of Commons staff and I expect that the report of the civil service commission will be in my hands very shortly. I may say to the leader of the opposition that the representations I made seemed to be acceptable to the commission.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO RELEASE OF EX-SERVICE MEN FROM INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yesterday I asked a question of the Minister of Labour with regard to the release of certain ex-service men of this war from industries in Toronto, and I do not think I got a real answer from the minister at that time. It is most important that some statement should be made by the minister as to priority rights of ex-service men for employment in this country. There is a great deal of unrest and disturbance in connection with this matter. Would the minister care to make a statement?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): My hon. friend has said that he did not get an answer yesterday, but you cannot give an answer to a question when you do not know what the hon. member is speaking about.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I take exception to that remark and rise to a question of privilege. This is a matter of principle; it is not a question affecting any particular firm. I purposely refrained from mentioning the firms from which these men are being discharged. The minister says that he cannot give an answer because he does not know what I am talking about, but that is not right.

Mr. MITCHELL: When I get the names of the firms from my hon. friend I shall be glad to look into it.

OTTAWA CIVIC ELECTIONS

USE OF GOVERNMENT FRANK ON CIRCULAR LETTER FROM OFFICE OF UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Yesterday the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) raised a question—I am sorry he did not find it convenient to give me a little advance notice, because if he had it could have been answered at once. But I think it should now be answered. The suggestion was made that certain material was sent by the department over which I have the honour to preside, in connection with the mayoralty election in Ottawa. I am glad to assure the house that that is not true and that there is no basis for the suggestion.

May I add this: as has been done for many years in dominion, provincial and municipal elections, the Under-Secretary of State, under the authority of the Secretary of State, issued a circular letter, and in this case he issued it on the 29th November, to the deputy ministers of the departments and heads of commissions and agencies of the government in Ottawa—I think, approximately to the number of seventy-five—directing that authority should be given at their discretion for employees in their departments who are qualified to vote in Ottawa to absent themselves from office attendance during that period for the time required to give them a reasonable opportunity to vote. With this letter there was no enclosure suggesting how any elector should vote. No authorization was given by the Under-Secretary of State to anyone to use his name or postal frank for any purpose in this connection other than mailing the letter to which I have referred.

I thought, Mr. Speaker, in all fairness I should make this statement in view of the widespread local publicity which has been given to the matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this procedure and this policy followed in municipal elections all over Canada where the departments are involved, or just in this city?

Mr. McLARTY: As my hon. friend knows, we have an order in council directing holidays, and that general order in council provides that in any municipal election throughout Canada a suitable opportunity to vote in the municipal election be given to those in the public service who are qualified to vote. This matter immediately relates itself to the capital city of this country, and that is why I dealt with Ottawa, because it was the only matter to which the hon. member for Temiscouata referred.

POST-WAR CIVIL AVIATION

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE AT CHICAGO—PARLIAMENTARY RATIFICATION OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply with regard to a press item dated at Chicago yesterday. In reference to an international organization it points out that Canada is assured of a seat on that council—as to which all of us will be in complete agreement. It also sets out that:

> Agreements designed to form the basis of an orderly development of international civil aviation were being typed to-day on treaty forms for signature by delegations from fifty-four united and neutral nations.

Will this agreement, being in the nature of a treaty and so referred to in the press article from which I have quoted, be submitted to parliament before it will be binding on Canada? I remember very well, sir, when this matter was discussed in March and the minister made his speech, he stated—

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is nothing controversial about it. He stated, as I understood him, that any agreement or covenant which would bind Canada with other foreign nations in an international set-up would be subject to parliamentary approval. That is the reason for the question, having regard to the momentous importance of this agreement which is to be signed to-day.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): As I said a few days ago, I am not familiar with the details of what has occurred in Chicago. I hope to have the report on the situation by the end of the week. So far as any agreement is concerned I assume that the government will follow the practice of all British governments, in that the government will take responsibility for entering into the agreement and subsequently will ask parliament to ratify the action.

RUBBER

SHORTAGE OF TIRES FOR MILITARY PURPOSES—PRODUCTION OF CANADIAN INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. O. BREITHAUPT (Waterloo North): In view of the serious tire shortage for military purposes indicated by General Eisenhower in a recent press release, will the Minister of Munitions and Supply be good enough to advise this house what general assistance in tire production has been given by the Canadian rubber industry and what further aid is possible in this important connection?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Canada has been able to furnish tires for military vehicles that have been produced in this country, and I may add that our production is a very considerable part of the allied requirements. In addition to that, we have been able to furnish some military tires for United States vehicles. Our industry is working at full capacity. Fortunately we have our own supplies of synthetic rubber; and I think we have made a very material contribution in the circumstances.

BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARIES

FELICITATIONS TO LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION AND CHIEF GOVERNMENT WHIP

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have just learned that to-day is the anniversary of the birthday of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), also that it is the birthday anniversary of my friend the chief whip of the Liberal party, the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Taylor). It may be the anniversary of the birthday of some other hon. members as well. If so, I should like on behalf of all hon. members to extend to these gentlemen who were fortunate enough to have been born on the 7th of December best wishes for many happy returns of the day.

THE WAR

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN MAINTAINING VIGOROUS WAR EFFORT—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION OF THE PRIME MINISTER

The house resumed from Wednesday, December 6, consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this house will aid the government in the policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Jean.

Mr. W. C. MACDONALD (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the votes on the motion and the amendments before us, but I think it advisable to make my stand on them perfectly clear.

The motion is:

That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

The Prime Minister has announced that he regards the motion as one of confidence.

This meeting of the house has been brought about by the recommendation of the former minister of national defence that N.R.M.A. personnel be made available for overseas service. It may be useful to consider the situation that existed early in 1942. It was a grave hour in the fortunes of the allied nations. A rapid expansion of our armed forces was then taking place, and furnished the background for the crisis that has developed.

In the speech from the throne at the opening of the third session of this parliament, in January, 1942, it was stated that we would be asked to approve a programme for further increases in the armed forces involving an expansion of the establishment of the Canadian army overseas; and that the government would seek from the people, by means of a plebiscite, release from any obligations arising out of past commitments respecting the methods of raising men for military service. It must have been in contemplation then that when the Canadian army was created there would be the possibility of the need for conscription in order to provide for its maintenance.

In the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announced that it was proposed to create overseas a Canadian army of two army corps—one army corps to comprise three infantry divisions and two army tank brigades and the other corps to consist of two armoured divisions—together with all necessary auxiliary units to serve the two corps.

Shortly thereafter, the Canadian Army was established and, on its establishment, the government and the country became committed to its maintenance. From this commitment and from the great increase in infantry casualties in northwestern Europe over those forecast by army authorities have directly resulted our present difficulties with respect to infantry reinforcements.

I think it important for the government to keep this in mind when determining the nature and extent of our participation in the war in the Pacific.

I took part in the debate on the address to which I have referred, and dealt particularly with the plebiscite. I supported the action the government proposed to take, and expressed the view that, having sought the confidence of the people on the faith of its pledge not to impose conscription, the government would not be justified in bringing conscription into effect without first obtaining a release from such pledge.

I also spoke of conscription. Let me read two sentences from my remarks which I believe are pertinent. I am reported on page 584 of Hansard of February 13, 1942, as having said:

It may be necessary for us to have conscription for overseas service. It will become necessary, if sufficient numbers do not continue to come forward voluntarily to provide necessary reinforcements or to permit us to put forth our most effective war effort.

Mr. GRAYDON: Some of our members are having difficulty in hearing my hon. friend. Would it be possible to have first of all a little more order in the chamber? And he might attempt to speak a little louder, or come to the front seats, because we are very anxious to hear him.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): It may be more convenient to speak from a different seat.

We had the plebiscite. The voting took place in April, 1942. This was not a long time ago. However, many people seem to have forgotten what the electors were asked to pass upon. They say it was a vote on conscription. It has been clearly proved in this debate that it was not. Certainly, it was made plain to my constituents that it was not. My colleague (Mr. Isnor) and I addressed an open letter to the electors of the county of Halifax. It was published in the Halifax newspapers. In our letter, while urging an affirmative vote, we said: "Such a vote does not mean a vote for any political party, and you are not asked to say whether you believe in conscription for overseas service."

The government got the release it sought. The result of the vote was to give the government the moral right to impose conscription. It already had the legal right under the War Measures Act. The government decided, and I think rightly, that before any steps would be taken to bring conscription for overseas into effect, the implied restrictions on the government's freedom of action in the National Resources Mobilization Act should first be removed. Bill No. 80 to amend the act by removing these restrictions was introduced in this house and received the assent of parliament.

A lengthy debate took place on bill 80. On page 3234 of Hansard, June 10, 1942, the Prime Minister is reported to have spoken as follows:

> The government, however, wished to be free, without any breach of faith, to resort to conscription for overseas service should that become necesary to our national security and to the effectiveness of our war effort.
> If the bill is amended as proposed, it is not the intention of the government to resort to conscription for service overseas unless circumstances should arise which would render the use of compulsion imperative, such, for example, as the maintenance of the necessary reinforcements for Canada's army overseas.

I am not going to refer to other parts of the Prime Minister's speech. I think that the sentences which I have read make it clear that the policy of the government was to impose conscription if such a course were necessary to maintain reinforcements for our army overseas.

Declarations of this policy by members of the government constituted a pledge that the army would be maintained. I realize that a great deal of emotion is mixed with the question of reinforcements. No member in his senses would want to say anything that might stir up more feeling. I shall content myself by saying this—our fighting men who went overseas freely and voluntarily to protect our liberty and ensure our freedom are entitled to our fullest support. They were assured that we would not fail them.

The need has arisen for the dispatch of additional infantry reinforcements overseas to meet requirements early in the new year. Casualties in that arm of the service have exceeded estimates. The action taken by the government in passing P.C. 8891 will, I believe, ensure adequate reinforcements for our infantry overseas up to the month of May. The order in council approves of the dispatch to the United Kingdom, European and Mediterranean theatres of 16,000 N.R.M.A. personnel. Provision can be made by order in council without reference to this house for the dispatch of additional personnel should the need arise.

The issue before us is whether the government should be allowed to carry out its policy, and particularly whether the passing of P.C. 8891 in pursuance of that policy should be approved. I have no difficulty in reaching a conclusion. I accept without any reservation the assurance given to us by General McNaughton that our army overseas will be maintained. I accept likewise without any reservation the assurance of the Prime Minister that further orders in council for the dispatch of men overseas will not have to be referred to this house for approval. I approve fully P.C. 8891 and the action to be taken thereunder.

May I digress here to say how fortunate it was that N.R.M.A. personnel were available in Canada to meet the emergency that developed overseas. It is fortunate that the former minister of national defence and the government resisted the efforts made in this house earlier this year to have the N.R.M.A. draftees demobilized and sent back to civilian employment. The draftees have performed important and essential work in Canada and elsewhere. They provided 42,000 enlistments for general service in the army and 6,000 for other services—48,000 men in all. They provided most of the Kiska task force. They have served in operational units in the defence of our coasts and in Newfoundland and elsewhere. They have served in large numbers in our home war establishment doing work of the highest importance. Most of all they have been and are to-day the potential reserve of reinforcements for our army overseas.

I shall vote against the subamendment. I shall also vote against the vague amendment of the official opposition. When we met here on November 22, their leader made the following motion:

> That this house is of the opinion that the full provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act should be put into effect forthwith;
> And that all trained troops in the Canadian home defence army should immediately be dispatched for reinforcements overseas.

He was, however, by the rules of the house precluded from going ahead with the motion at that time.

When the government announced in this house the passing of P.C. 8891, the amendment now before us was moved. The leader of the opposition did not elaborate, but if his amendment means what it says, it means that N.R.M.A. personnel should be conscripted to serve in any part of the world. The amendment contemplates the extension of their scope of service to any theatre of war. The member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), acting leader of the opposition, stated that he did not include Japan as one of the theatres of war. He was not prepared to say, in answer to questions from the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), whether China and India were included. I think his hesitation supports the charge that has been made that the present amendment is a purely political one.

We have had no clear explanation of the purpose of the amendment. P.C. 8891 has been passed and the moment this house votes confidence in the government, reinforcements for our overseas forces are assured.

I have said that provision has been made for the dispatch overseas of 16,000 N.R.M.A. men. The remaining 26,000 of suitable age and medical category will complete their training and be available for service if required. There can be no doubt as to that. If the opposition members are concerned only with the reinforcement of our army overseas and not the capitalization for political purposes of the situation that has developed, they should, it seems to me, drop their amendment and vote in favour of the motion. For myself I can see no—

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend what he means by "political"?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Surely you understand that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): A matter of winning votes and individual seats at the forthcoming election.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is my hon. friend imputing motives that are unworthy with respect to that?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I say this—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The natural prerogative.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is hard enough to hear my hon. friend without interruptions. I could not hear what my hon. friend said.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): If the opposition are concerned with reinforcements for overseas then I suggest they should drop their amendment and vote for the motion. If they are concerned with—

Mr. GRAYDON: I know my hon. friend wants to be correct in his statements. If he is interpreting any statement with respect to our amendment which he says was made by someone in the house while I was away, may I say that so far as this party is concerned any theatre of war means exactly what it says, "any theatre of war," and it cannot be limited.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) was wrong.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am speaking for the official opposition now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He spoke for his party, he said.

[Mr. W. C. Macdonald.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I am speaking for the party, and that is what I say.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre) Two speeches on different days.

Mr. GRAYDON: If you listen over there you will find an example of that right in the cabinet itself.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You are in an awful hole.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Halifax has the floor.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I take it, then, the leader of the opposition states that the policy of his party is to conscript N.R.M.A. men for service in the Pacific, Manchuria, China—

Mr. GRAYDON: Any theatre of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Including Japan?

Mr. GRAYDON: Japan, of course, anywhere.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What has happened to York-Sunbury?

Mr. GRAYDON: What has happened to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who made one speech yesterday and another before the session opened?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): For myself, I can see no possible alternative to-day to the present government. I shall vote in support of the motion. I announced my intention to do so a fortnight ago in a statement I gave to the press for publication and wherein I announced my resignation as parliamentary assistant to the minister of national defence. I should like to conclude by reading the statement. It was published in the Montreal Star in its issue of November 24, 1944, and in other newspapers. It reads as follows:

> Ottawa, November 24.—On the resignation of Colonel Ralston as Minister of National Defence, I expressed to the Prime Minister my desire to resign my office. I felt that the relations that existed between a cabinet minister and his parliamentary assistant were so close and personal that on the resignation of Colonel Ralston, regardless of the circumstances leading up to it, I should resign my own office.
> After it was announced that the speaker had called a sitting of the house, I asked the Prime Minister to kindly arrange to have the necessary action taken to give effect to my wishes which he has done.
> I have complete confidence in my leader, the Prime Minister, and in his administration and shall vote in support of his motion next week.

Mr. POULIOT: A good man like you should not have resigned. You are a much better man than your minister.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): I take this opportunity of congratulating the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) upon getting older. At the opening of this session he requested that this debate be conducted on a high plane. I congratulate him on that. We both came into this house in 1935 and I have learned to esteem him. However, listening to his plea for calmness in the house at the opening of the session where the greatest calmness existed I thought he must have been speaking in anticipation of something he knew in addressing himself to his followers, some of whom need constant admonition. I thought further that it was singularly ironic that the leader of the opposition should ask for calmness when his party had just succeeded after five years of noisy agitation and strenuous political effort in and out of this house to create unrest and divisions in the country by making conscription a political issue.

An hon. MEMBER: That is nonsense.

Mr. BRUNELLE: It is not nonsense; it is the truth.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You would not recognize the truth.

Mr. BRUNELLE: War naturally engenders tension and nervousness, and in that atmosphere thereby created there is an active and pernicious element that thrives well and enjoys as at present its traditional feast in a mass of division, hatred and race antagonism. The Conservative party has had several loud speakers for the element which stands for total war, but to use the words of Mr. Roberts, total war means "total war for our youth only." This government has waged total war, but in the eyes of that element of which I just spoke total war, again to use the words of Mr. Roberts, "begins and ends with the lives of our young men."

The present situation has been discussed in every aspect and I do not wish to repeat what has been said. Suffice it to say that I make my declaration the declaration of the ex-minister of national defence for air (Mr. Power). I believe that our country has undertaken too much, at least in the infantry field. In the first place there was overzeal. Then there was deceit or carelessness, and then finally there was this mass conspiracy to make the voluntary system fail. I cannot help expressing the few thoughts I have in mind. Addressing myself to the ex-minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) I wish to say this: Before he left for Italy and France there had been admittedly a prolonged remustering for reinforcing our infantry. That prolonged remustering should have been sufficient warning to him that something was going wrong. It lasted, from what we have been told, from the month of June on. In addition, I say this: If we had not such an army as our recruit army I am certain that the ex-minister of national defence with his ability, his intelligence, and his knowledge of military affairs, would have found a way of settling this difficulty and avoided any kind of catastrophe. In the third place, looking at the Conservative opposition, I wish to say that the effort which was made to spoil the voluntary system was an act bordering on crime. I have thought and spoken a great deal about this conscription matter since I came to this house. It is only the lack of hair that saved my head from turning grey. I think what struck me the most was something my own son said. It was a simple thought. He said that while a government has the duty of imposing conscription for the defence of its home front, it has no right to impose conscription to send its citizens to fight outside the country's boundaries. By the way, England has always been in favour of the voluntary system and it seems to me that England never imposed conscription unless she was attacked on her own soil.

In order to bring the present crisis to a climax a group of people have succeeded in putting my own province of Quebec and her inhabitants more or less on trial—her inhabitants who are the sons and descendants of the pioneers of North America. Yet we have committed no offence; we have hurt nobody; we have lived as usual, letting others alone and just asking to be left alone. On certain questions we have views different from those of other people, for instance on conscription, but that is our privilege. But in spite of all that has been said the province of Quebec has done well in this war, indeed very much better than might have been expected bearing in mind what took place in 1917. After all, we do not ask much. We just wish to live peaceably. We are not wealthy but we are rich enough to be independent. We have never enriched ourselves and we do not want to enrich ourselves by war contracts. But the lack of war contracts does not enrage us as it has enraged some other sections of the Canadian people. The fact is that whenever there was trouble in our country between the different races it never came from us but because somebody always wanted to interfere with our way of living and our way of thinking.

Mr. BROOKS: It was Hitler who did that.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Maybe, but somebody else in this country helped him.

Mr. BROOKS: Well, you do not help much in your part of the country.

Mr. BRUNELLE: If anyone has any doubts about what I have just said I wish he would ask those who know, those of a different race and a different religion, and then he will verify the truth of what I say. Ask those who know, instead of listening to slanderers of the type of Doctor Shields, who has turned his pulpit into a forum where hatred is preached to those who come there to hear the word of God. The province of Quebec is not on trial. I take objection to its being put in that position. Were it on trial, not only would I plead not guilty but I would charge those who accuse us, led by the Conservative party, with the heavy responsibility of having prepared and formed that opinion in the province of Quebec of which they complain now. I make this point, that if the attitude of the people of the province of Quebec does not suit these people of the Conservative party it is due to the work that their friends in the province of Quebec did in that province some years ago. In the first place let me say that I have many friends among the Conservatives in my constituency. They are my friends because I have treated them right and have never deceived them. But lest some may think my views of the Conservative party are dictated by partisanship I am going to quote the words of some friends of my hon. friend who has just interrupted me. Then probably he may believe me. I am going to quote the words of the only Conservative who was elected to this house from the province of Quebec in 1940. Here is what he said. He decided to leave the ranks of that party because he did not think he could make friends with the Conservative members of this house.

Mr. BOUCHER: He was not even a Conservative when he was elected.

Mr. BRUNELLE: You were very glad to receive him when he came into the house. Here are his exact words, as found at page 4058 of Hansard of November 4, 1941:

> Any French-Canadian member of this house who has mixed with the Conservative party as it now exists must realize that he is not a member of their political family. He is at best a tolerated stranger, accepted from necessity and looked at with a certain degree of curiosity. . . . They are firm in the opinion that we French Canadians are a source of trouble in their endeavours to make Canada an American England. There is no friendship or sympathy between them and us. . . .
> Warm sympathy, the main element, is lacking. You all remember the story of the man who called upon an acquaintance. He was first told that the man was not at home; he then forced the door but he was received with a heap of abuse. He went a third time, when he was taken by the scruff of the neck and kicked down the verandah. He then said, "Well, I don't think that man wants to see me." Take out the violence and I think you will see there is something like that in the attitude of the Conservative organizers toward Quebec Conservatives.

I would name also the former chief organizer of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, Mr. Arsenault, who left the ranks of the Conservative party some few months ago because, he said, he could not stay with these people who tried to set race against race.

Looking back to what happened some years ago and facing what is happening now, which is just a repetition of history, I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am bound to respect my pledges respecting conscription in order to show my good faith as contrasted with the bad faith of some of my predecessors of the Conservative party. I repeat, the point I wish to make is that the attitude which is prevalent in the province of Quebec at the present time is due to the work of the Conservatives of the province of Quebec during the past years, and that work was helped by Conservatives in other parts of this country.

Because of what has been said both in this house and outside, the statement the other day by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) that the attitude of Quebec was due to the Liberals, and because of what was written in the order in council which was sent to us recently by the government of the province of Quebec, which was to the same effect, I wish to say it is time that some of us protested against this false impression that the Liberal party is responsible for the attitude of French Canadians concerning the prosecution of the war and conscription.

Let me say something that concerns me particularly. My preelection pledges are the more serious and the more imperative because under similar circumstances about twenty-seven years ago the good and honest electors of the constituency of Champlain were let down, shamefully deceived and abandoned by their Tory representative, Mr. Blondin. Like the Tories of to-day he stopped at nothing to get power; he called himself a Nationalist and worked hand in hand with Mr. Bourassa, and mind you he was a Tory. He became notorious for talking about shooting holes through the union jack and denouncing any kind of participation by Canada in European wars. He convinced his electors, now my electors, and many other electors in the province of Quebec that they should never be asked, still less conscripted, to serve overseas. He worked as a Conservative, disguised as a nationalist, and assisted by money from the Conservatives—

An hon. MEMBER: What became of him afterwards?

Mr. BRUNELLE: And when he was elected he was received into the broad arms of Mr. Borden. He was made a minister of the crown—minister of inland revenue, postmaster general, secretary of state—and the Tories did not mind. They did not mind that, because he helped them into power. They did not mind holes in the British flag, because they could still wave what was left of the balance of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Who is dragging it in the mud now?

Mr. BRUNELLE: I do not wish to be interrupted by the political puffers of the opposition. I am making my speech. They have made theirs. They made enough noise, and we should be permitted at least to say something about what they said, and what they are. Mr. Blondin was not sent away at that time by the Tories, who played a trick on the people of the province of Quebec. Let me finish the case respecting Mr. Blondin. Mr. Bennett appointed him to—

Mr. GRAYDON: On a question of privilege, what has this to do with the question of reinforcements for overseas?

Mr. BRUNELLE: It has to do with the situation in Quebec at the present time. It has to do with the situation that was created some years ago, and which you have tried to create again in the last few days.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The great Liberal war effort!

Mr. BRUNELLE: Never mind; don't ha! ha!

Mr. SPEAKER: The leader of the opposition has raised a point of order as to the relevancy of the remarks of the hon. member. In view of the discussion which has taken place in this debate I think the hon. member is in order.

Mr. BRUNELLE: In 1930 Mr. Bennett appointed Mr. Blondin, speaker of the senate, as a further reward for services rendered the flag, and to the flag wavers, whoever and wherever they are—and we know where most of them are.

I say these things took place some years ago, when I was young. But I well remember the influence of these Conservatives, disguised as nationalists, upon opinion in the province of Quebec. And my constituency was not alone in this.

Let me refer to a few others who were leading the nationalist party at that time. There were Mr. Monk, Mr. Pelletier, Mr. Lavergne, Mr. Rainville, and others. When they came here, after having worked as nationalists in Quebec, and having formed that opinion—which the Progressive-Conservative party deplores, to-day—most of them were appointed either as ministers or as senators, as a reward for the good services they had rendered their party.

I denounce in this house those who have been guilty, and I denounce them outside the house—and particularly that phantom leader, John Bracken, who every now and then, but always from a distance, has been throwing political robots against the government. I accuse a group of Canadians, well guided by the Conservative party, of having been unkind and unfair to Quebec. I accuse them of setting English Canadians against French Canadians. I say it is shameful, and that it has been the base work of the Conservative party to make Quebec an object of hatred on account of an attitude for which that party is responsible. It is time the other side of the picture were shown, and that the truth be stated about these super-loyalists who, in these last few years, have succeeded in making conscription a political issue.

As confirmation of what I said I shall quote David Maclellan of the Halifax Chronicle, a major in the Canadian Army:

> As a Canadian with as much British blood as the most energetic flag-waver in the land—

I am not the only one who has used that expression—

> —it strikes me that English speaking Canadians may well hang their heads in shame for the stupid, nasty smear campaign against Quebec. Tolerance that has somehow taken root in the Canadian army overseas is, and has been, sadly lacking here. It is a tragedy that many Canadians cannot capture the spirit and resolution which animates their sons and brothers overseas.
> Quebec's attitude toward conscription has been no secret for many years, yet, completely ignoring the fact that almost two-thirds of the home defence troops come from other provinces, some Canadians have been vicious enough to pour abuse, all the abuse, on the steadfast, warm-hearted people of Quebec.
> For a minority speaking another tongue and subscribing to another faith the record of cooperation of Quebec residents has been splendid. The record of relations between English and French-speaking Canadians has been blotted repeatedly by the pin pricks, the rude remarks and the stinging insults that have been hurled at Quebec. Regardless of right or wrong, Quebec has every right to be resentful; and the amazing circumstance is that she had not permitted herself to give more forceful evidence of her resentment.

The Canadian voluntary system has worked throughout this war. It can continue to work if given a real chance. One thing is more important than the controversy agitating Canada to-day, and that is the Canadian nation.

There is one thing I forgot to say while I was discussing the campaign waged by the Tories in Quebec in 1911, who were disguised as nationalists. May I give further proof. Mr. Lavergne, who was one of the leaders of the nationalist party, long after the election wrote this in his memoirs respecting the 1911 campaign:

In 1911 when the Tories of the other provinces began to feel that Laurier in Quebec was losing ground to the nationalists, they redoubled their help to us and money flew in abundance into the nationalist electoral treasury.

We have now come to a difficult pass. We are asked to vote in respect of a motion of confidence, and also in respect of some amendments. The government's motion is:

That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort

A vigorous war effort since Wednesday, November 22, has comprised a partial, mitigated or restricted system of conscription for overseas service. The order in council passed on that date reads in part as follows:

And whereas it has now become necessary, in order to ensure provision of adequate reserves to meet requirements for the reinforcement of the Canadian forces fighting in Europe and in the Mediterranean, to extend the locality of service of certain personnel who have been called out for training, service or duty, pursuant to the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

Now therefore His Excellency the Governor General in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of National Defence . . . is pleased to order and doth hereby order as follows:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any other statute, law, regulation or order, the Minister of National Defence is hereby authorized and directed to dispatch to the following localities of service, namely: the United Kingdom and/or to European and/or Mediterranean operational theatres, such personnel, in such numbers as may be approved by the governor in council (the number hereby approved being sixteen thousand).

It will be noted that the number is limited to 16,000 and that there is a further restriction as to the theatres of war. This does not satisfy the opposition, because they wish to send all recruits overseas. They claim that the order in council or the decision of the government is not sufficient. They want to conscript the whole army of recruits and send them anywhere in the world, to India, to China, to Burma or to any other theatre of war. The Conservative amendment reads:

This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice.

Equality of service and sacrifice has been discussed before, but as far as the province of Quebec is concerned we say that before talking about equality of service and sacrifice there should be equality of advantage and privilege. I know that some people, particularly those to my left, will say that we have all the privileges and advantages that we ought to have, but we say we have not. In order to stop for all time the talk that is going on inside and outside the house, a commission of outstanding citizens should be appointed to study the grievances of the citizens of the province of Quebec. Of course I will not vote for the amendment of the Conservative party, and I do not think they expect me to vote for it. I am ready to vote for amendments against conscription as long as they are definite and clear, but I shall not vote for an amendment which states that it is against conscription and then mixes up that question with other matters. In such case I shall not hesitate to vote against the amendment.

I come now to the main motion, which is much more serious. It was Burke who wrote and spoke on the duties and responsibilities of members of the House of Commons. In spite of what Burke said, and in opposition to what he said, I have decided to look upon my constituency as the source of my authority, at least on certain vital questions in connection with which I have been given a definite mandate by my constituency. I promised my constituents, I gave them my word of honour—if a word of honour is not to mean anything, I wonder where this world is going to—that I would vote against any move or measure connected with conscription. Up to this time I have not deceived my electors in any way. I have fulfilled my preelection pledges, and on this vital question of conscription it is not my intention to attempt to split hairs and find an excuse or justification for violating that principle.

I am sorry, but I find it impossible to vote confidence in some of the ministers who have been for conscription and who are yet ready to keep up the fight for total conscription.

Mr. CARDIFF: Change them; put in some from Quebec.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I am glad you have not anything to do with the present government. I wish to say that I still have confidence in the Prime Minister. He is an honest and respectable man; he is an outstanding and illustrious statesman who would have reached top honours wherever he might be. The larger the field of effort, the more his superiority would have manifested itself. Above all he is a real and true Canadian. He has devoted the best part of his life to the cause of unity. For years and years the people of Canada will be grateful to him for the social legislation which he has placed on the statute books. Labourers, the toilers of the soil, the masses of the people, the poorer classes, all these will enjoy the advantages of the social legislation introduced by the Prime Minister and will forever bless his name. I hope everyone in the house will understand me when I say that it is painful for me to vote against the Prime Minister. I am faced with having to sacrifice one of two things, fidelity to my party or fidelity to my word of honour, and I choose to keep my word.

This conscription issue which has been systematically kept alive by the Conservative party has created political and racial strife in Canada, yet I take comfort in knowing that there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians, yes, millions, who are still determined to keep steady and to maintain harmony between the two large racial groups in Canada.

I have no apology to make for my stand on conscription, although I realize that the opinions on conscription unfortunately follow differences in race. The two large racial groups have conflicting views on the subject. As a Canadian proud of my origin I shall forever be thankful to my electors for having given me this happy opportunity of paying tribute to those magnificent and sympathetic and broadminded Liberals in this house who have been considerate, particularly in connection with this delicate question of conscription, who have at all times shown themselves ready and willing and anxious to extend to French Canada the warm handshake of good will and understanding.

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of this short ssesion I intended not to take part in the debate, which has become nothing but the utmost uselessness. But since an amendment and subamendments had been moved to the main motion, and after listening to the speeches of hon. members of this chamber, I cannot refrain from saying a few words on the whole situation.

I have said that the debate is useless; the question involved in this debate having been decided definitively on the second day of this session. In support of my contention, Mr. Speaker, I will read what was said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on November 27, reported at page 6617 of Hansard. The Prime Minister read his motion, which is as follows:

> That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

And he said:

> Let me say of this motion, it does not ask for approval of order in council P.C. 8891. That order was enacted in strict conformity with Bill 80, and the government's authority to take such action was specifically approved by the vote on Bill 80 in 1942. The issue of conscription is not being decided by this vote; it was settled two years ago.

So that the Prime Minister has definitely established that this vote of confidence on the main motion does not mean disapproval or approval of conscription, which was adopted in 1942 and was put into force two weeks ago. Therefore it is too late to debate the question, and in my humble opinion all the speeches we can make against or for it are nothing but fiction and trickery.

I have been listening very carefully to most of the speeches which have been made in this house by hon. members from Quebec and from other parts of Canada. I shall come later on to the speeches and the attitude of the Tory party; but I want to begin with the speeches made by the members from Quebec. I have never seen such lack of logic. I will give examples. Listen to the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle). He accused the Tory party of being responsible for conscription being enforced in Canada to-day. Other hon. members have made similar contentions every day since the debate began. Well, if we look at the figures of how the parties stand in this house we must admit this, that in the general election of 1940 the Liberal party was returned to power with some one hundred and eighty members while the Conservative party returned about forty members. If these forty members have been strong enough to impose upon the Prime Minister and the whole country that law of conscription which we have to-day, it means that the one hundred and eighty Liberal members, if they are not just as much Tories as the Conservative members, were very weak, so weak that it is shameful to have to avow it. I cannot understand how forty members can be stronger than one hundred and eighty members with such so-called great leadership as that of the Prime Minister. There is something wrong, something illogical in these statements.

That is not all. Hon. members from Quebec who still remain with the Liberal party have, in most of the speeches they have made, praised the Prime Minister for his great achievements in the past five years, yet they say that they are opposed to conscription to-day, which conscription has been prepared step by step from 1937 until now. It is too late, fifteen days after conscription was put into force, to say that we are against it when we have voted for the government on most of the war measures which have led to conscription. Those who supported the government in 1939 when it introduced the declaration of war opened the door to conscription. Those who voted for the mobilization act in 1940 welcomed conscription. Those who voted for the speech from the throne in 1942, which pertained to the holding of a plebiscite, confirmed conscription, and, in so doing, permitted it to become the master of the place. Those who, after bill 80 was adopted, voted for the annual budget, gave at the same time their entire support to that measure of conscription, since the Prime Minister in having that bill adopted had given notice, "I am passing this bill, not to enforce it now but to give the government the right to enforce it if ever it becomes necessary." So that the measure could be put into force at any time, and it was bound to come, because the moment that bill 80 was passed no one could vote subsidies to the government without taking responsibility for conscription if ever it was imposed. So that it is of no use, two weeks after it has been put into force, to say "I am against it." It is of no use for the Liberal party with its one hundred and eighty members to accuse others of being responsible for it, because they have supported every war measure. The declaration of war was adopted unanimously except by two—or, to be fair, by three—hon. members, the late Mr. Woodsworth, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), and the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe). These latter two Liberal members alone voted against the general mobilization of our human and material resources; all the other Liberal members took the responsibility from which they are trying to get away to-day; and it is of no use for them to try to escape that responsibility. They helped to launch the boat, they helped to head it into the stream, and now that it strikes the reef of conscription they are trying to escape, and say, "I did not want to betray and I will not betray my electors." It is a little too late, I am afraid.

As to the word "betray," I should like to add something, Mr. Speaker. On November 23, when the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) spoke to a question of privilege, he said that the Prime Minister had betrayed Quebec. Later on in the day the Prime Minister had those words expunged from Hansard. Here is what I read in the Liberal newspaper of Montreal, Le Canada, on November 6, reporting a speech that was delivered by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) in Quebec on the Saturday before, that is to say, the 4th. The Minister of Justice is reported as having said:

Je suis convaincu, dit le ministre, que si le gouvernement avait accepté cette manière de voir, l'immense majorité de la province de Quebec se serait crue trahie.

That is to say: "I am convinced, said the minister, that if the government had accepted this way of proceeding, the immense majority of the province of Quebec would have considered itself as betrayed." Well, if it was right for the Minister of Justice to make that judgment, had conscription been passed on the advice of the former minister of national defence, I am right in saying, and I dare to say to-day, that the province of Quebec has been betrayed, and I challenge the Prime Minister to expunge those words from Hansard.

The Liberal members of Quebec are praising the Prime Minister, saying that he is the greatest Canadian, that he has made a great achievement in the past five years—which great achievement includes the passage of conscription; this must not be forgotten, and they are trying to make out in this house, as did the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, that the Prime Minister is a martyr to national unity. What a fine national unity we have at present in this country! So they are trying to make people believe that the present Prime Minister is not the one responsible for conscription, that he is a martyr of Canadianism. Those are things I cannot understand. If the people of Quebec had an opportunity to be present in this house and to look, as I have done so often, at the one bench which has been occupied since the death of the late Mr. Lapointe, by the Prime Minister and his bosom friend, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), they would not believe that the Prime Minister is such a martyr to Canadianism and that conscription has been imposed upon him by only thirty-nine Tories in this house. I recall that the very Minister of Mines and Resources is one of the Liberal members who joined with the Conservative party to form the union government in 1917 which passed conscription at that time. In Quebec the union government of 1917 has become such a scarecrow to the people of the province that they would approach only in fear the former member of the union government of that time who sits to-day with the Prime Minister as his bosom friend. That is the state of mind created in the people of Quebec by the Liberals with regard to the union government of 1917. But the Prime Minister is perfectly at ease with that hon. gentleman, because they are both conscriptionists in this war as they were in the war of 1914-1918. I say both of them, because this is what I have just read in the memoirs of Robert Laird Borden, published in 1938, at page 995:

During those days the Liberals were in convention to select a leader and on August 7 I learned that Mr. Mackenzie King had been elected by 476 votes, defeating Mr. Fielding, who received 438 votes. I extract the following from my diary for August 7: "Quebec and Mr. Mackenzie have killed Mr. Fielding."

By Mr. Mackenzie he means the Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King.

—"whom the Quebec members regard as having betrayed Laurier; but possibly Fielding may have been truer to Laurier—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That was not the present Prime Minister. He was mistaken in the reference he made.

Mr. ROY: I beg your pardon.

An hon. MEMBER: That was D. D. McKenzie.

Mr. ROY: Let me continue; you will see in a moment that the present Prime Minister is well identified.

—"but possibly Fielding may have been truer to Laurier than was King—

That is not McKenzie.

I was told in the summer of 1917 by an intimate friend of King that he (King)—

He, King, is mentioned.

—was ready to join the proposed union government.

This citation from the Memoirs of Robert Laird Borden have never been denied by the present Prime Minister. That is why he feels so much at ease with a former member of the union government, the Minister of Mines and Resources.

Mr. BRUNELLE: It has been denied by the whole conduct of the Prime Minister.

Mr. ROY: We know what his conduct has been and that of the Liberal party for the last twenty-five years. We know further what has been his war policy since 1937. He has betrayed, to use the word used by the Minister of Justice in Quebec on November 4.

Coming to the subamendment which we are called upon to vote on, I should like to put myself on record and submit to the house my understanding of it. I should be glad to be corrected if I am wrong because I should like to be fair and just to the hon. member for Mercier who proposed it. The subamendment reads:

This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain—

And I emphasize these words, "has not made certain".

—of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by using to the best advantage the general service personnel in Canada and the volunteers overseas without resorting to conscription for service overseas.

That is clear, "has not made certain without resorting to conscription for service overseas". This subamendment is confusing; it seems to blame the government for not imposing conscription in time; therefore I will vote against it.

I now come to the amendment moved by the Progressive Conservative party. That amendment seems to concentrate on one point only. I shall read it all, Mr. Speaker:

This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice.

The government is blamed for not having assured equality of sacrifice. Everybody understands that this is addressed to the province of Quebec. I am not surprised, of course. I know the Progressive Conservative party. I was with it for a while after I was elected to the house, believing in the promises of the Hon. Mr. Manion, who was against conscription. I had to leave the party in 1941 because it had gone back to conscriptionist policy. I know the mentality of the party. I respect the opinion of anyone as to the kind or form of patriotism he likes, although I do not believe in the form of patriotism that has been preached in some parts of Canada for a long time—that is imperialism. We do not live in England or in France, or, I should like to say to the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose), in Russia. We have been for too long in this country, which was settled by we French Canadians to accept as professors of patriotism newcomers of ten, fifteen or twenty years, who at the outset of the war were against participation in it but who have now joined in that war because Russia is at war. We are not ready to accept direction from these people or to have them tell us what to do. The true Canadians know who we are; we know that our patriotism is truly Canadian, that is all.

As to this request for equality of service and sacrifice, I am amazed to find it appearing in the amendment. Must I recall to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all the Progressive Conservatives that we have made sacrifices in the past. We have shared in the service of our country. We have rendered all kinds of service, but whatever we have done has never been recognized in the way it should. We are never given credit for it. And yet, what we are doing at the present time is just as much as the rest of Canada is doing. In 1792, 1812 and 1814 as has been recalled time and time again by prime ministers and others; it was referred to by Sir Robert Borden and by the present Prime Minister a few days ago—French Canadians were faithful to the oath given to the British crown because we were not republican, because we were royalists and wanted to maintain in this country a royalist regime, because we intended to preserve our country we fought against some English people who had revolted against the British crown. We even fought against some French people who wanted us to fight against the English regime. We stood for the British crown and ever since from time to time, we have been given credit by high personalities, such as the prime ministers of the country. Yes, that is well known; but, does it help us to-day in the mind of the imperialists? What do we see to-day, and what did we see in 1914? In spite of the fact that French Canadian regiments brought the most sparkling glory to Canada in the last war the same clique in Toronto and elsewhere are criticizing the French Canadians for not doing their share. It is only a clique; it is not all the English speaking population. We have had proof of that right in this house. We have heard two English speaking hon. members praise the French Canadians and give them credit for what they did in the past. We have read articles in many newspapers, articles written by English writers giving us credit for what we have done and talking to us with respect and politeness. One I should like to mention is Mr. Maclellan of the Halifax Chronicle.

The clique to which I refer waged a campaign against Quebec in the last war and is still waging a campaign against Quebec to-day. They are helped in that campaign by the communist party in Canada which offered its services and its help to the Liberal party as it did to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party last summer. The C.C.F. party rebuked them, but the Liberal party has not done so. When I see that kind of campaign being waged against Quebec, I say what is the use of the French Canadian doing as much as he has been doing to try to bring peace and harmony in this country, asking his English speaking brothers to join with him to build up a country that should be ours? That should be our ultimate ambition, but it seems to be of no use with those who do not understand our patriotism. They refuse to recognize what we have done in the past, how faithful we have been to the British crown, though we never embraced imperialism, and we never shall. We think we are right and we believe this will be shown in the future, and earlier than we may think. We should always fight for Canadianism; it ought to be the supreme ambition of any nation to be something by itself. Who can find his pride in the title of colonial? That is one thing we do not understand. Being truly Canadian, as we are, as we always have been, we have never listened to any imperialistic propaganda, whether it came from France or from England. We are called fascists or nazis by newcomers, or by the little clique of fanatics, but it does not matter. We are none of them. Truly Canadians we are, and true to our country we will remain. We have proved time and time again that we are ready to fight for it at any time with anyone. My contention is that the dignity of each group deserves respect and should be respected. That is all we ask. This very question that divides Canada so bitterly is nothing but a hatred campaign. All we hear is equality of service and sacrifice. All we hear in the newspapers, in the house and on the street is Quebec—Quebec—Quebec. Coming up on the train from Montreal on Monday morning, and I have two witnesses, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) and the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), I was told "Whether Quebec likes it or not, you are going to get conscription." Well, we know we are going to get it, but my appeal to the house at this critical juncture in our history is this: As there are no reasons for sending a few conscripts against their will abroad to fight overseas for a cause in which they do not understand what interests they have, and at the very time when Great Britain is demobilizing two million of her men, I say that it is a most dangerous disservice to do to our country. If we are Canadians, even if we like England, for God's sake do not let us bring this bitter division into Canada which may do more harm than any good we can ever hope to do by sending a few men overseas.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean) because it calls for conscription, or rather blames the government for not having imposed conscription sooner. I shall also vote against the Progressive-Conservative amendment, and I shall vote against the main motion too because in my opinion whoever applies conscription in this country against our will, against the true interests of Canada, and thereby brings about disunity in this country is doing the greatest harm which this country has suffered for years. I do not care which party enforces conscription. I am against it. The Liberal party has changed its policy on this question. That party with its 180 members is responsible for this conscription measure and I am going to blame that party and that government for it by voting against it.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, last evening just before the adjournment the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested that speeches to-day should be few in number, short and to the point in order that we may conclude to-day. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that I have so many agreeing with me when I say that. I accept the Prime Minister's challenge and I throw the challenge to those who are now applauding me, for I am one of those who believe that this session should have concluded a week ago. We could have done our job and been back home by now. I shall take only a minute and a half.

This morning we have listened to two speeches which did not help one iota in getting a single man to reinforce our men overseas. I think that the speech of the hon. mmeber for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle) who indulged in a tirade against the Conservative party, was disgraceful. It was the kind of speech that does not tend to bring unity to Canada. It was the kind of speech that will make this parliament, if that sort of talk goes on, a laughing stock in the eyes of the people of Canada, and let me say that I was surprised to see the Prime Minister and one or two other ministers around him applauding the speech of the hon. member for Champlain.

This is an unprecedented session, at a critical period. The Prime Minister has termed it "the present crisis". We were called here to learn what the exact situation was with respect to reinforcements. We heard the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston), the former minister of national defence, review the situation as he found it on his trip overseas. He reported to the house what he saw, and I think we all came to the conclusion that the all-important need was adequate reinforcements immediately—not after some further period of delay. He asked for 15,000 reinforcements from the N.R.M.A.

Then we heard from the Prime Minister, and after he had concluded we learned that he has not had the confidence of his own cabinet since the first day of October last. There have been two resignations from the cabinet for opposite reasons, which shows conclusively that there is no confidence in the cabinet itself in the government.

Even now we have received no definite assurance from the Prime Minister or the members of his cabinet that further orders in council will be passed if necessary to see that the required reinforcements go to our fighting men.

The Progressive-Conservative amendment sets forth distinctly what is required at the present time to meet the emergency. We must not fail our fighting men, and I, Mr. Speaker, intend to do all within my power to see that the reinforcements are sent overseas as speedily as possible. I could if I had time read many letters that I have received from relatives of men who have been overseas for four-and-a-half to five years—and I wonder how many of them got past the censorship. These mothers and fathers and wives know the situation. They know that the situation is as the former minister of national defence explained it to the house. I therefore conclude by saying that I am going to support the Progressive-Conservative amendment which I think meets the situation. It reads:

> This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice.

I believe, sir, that that is the all-important thing at the present time, and I am therefore going to vote for that amendment.

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, to understand fully the motives which have inspired the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean), I feel it my duty to read a statement of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as reported in Hansard of Friday, December 1, 1944, on page 6749. Here is what he said about the resignation of the hon. member for Mercier as Parliamentary Secretary:

> When I read his letter I replied to him that I would have a word with the Minister of Justice about it; that, seeing that he wished to have perfect freedom and not to be misunderstood or his actions misinterpreted in any way, if the Minister of Justice were agreeable I would be agreeable to releasing him from his duties. But I very much hope that this crisis is not going to last indefinitely, and I am also hoping that circumstances may be such that the government may be in a position to ask the hon. member to reconsider his position later on.

I want to emphasize the following words of the right hon. the Prime Minister, which I quote again:

I hope that the circumstances may be such that the government may be in a position to ask the hon. member to reconsider his position later on.

The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier, the first part of which is already included in the amendment proposed by the conservative party, reads as follows:

That this house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by using to the best advantage the general service personnel in Canada and the volunteers overseas without resorting to conscription for service overseas.

In my opinion, this subamendment means that we are not satisfied with the Canadian war effort, because the government has not made certain of adequate reinforcements, and that we recommend a more vigorous war effort.

We are asked more and more reinforcements at a time when two million Frenchmen remain idle witnesses to the liberation of their country while they are beseeching us, through their president General DeGaulle, for weapons and ammunition to fight against Germany.

Why should we keep on sacrificing more Canadian lives when Frenchmen, Belgians, and Dutchmen are more than willing to take their revenge?

Why not gradually withdraw our troops from the front and give to the people of formerly occupied countries the opportunity of squaring accounts with the Germans, thereby affording our men a rest which they have well deserved?

Therefore, the hon. members of the house who vote for the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier wish to tell the government that the administration should pursue the war effort with even more energy and they thereby create for themselves a reason for supporting, by a subamendment, the very policy advocated by the government's motion which reads as follows:

That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

[Mr. W. LaCroix.]

It is as though the right hon. the Prime Minister had secretly told his supporters: "the crisis has subsided, I no longer need your votes, speak, act and vote without paying any attention to me, but so as to lull and mislead the opinion of the people in your Quebec constituencies."

I shall therefore vote against all amendments and subamendments, as well as against the main motion, because I have always opposed and still oppose every form of participation.

I must also stress the reasons which the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) has put forward for supporting the government. Those are words which the electors from the province of Quebec will surely remember when the time comes for the Liberal party to give an account of its administration. Here is what the former minister of national defence said to justify the fact that he will support the King government, as can be seen in Hansard for November 29, 1944, page 6677:

I believe that these men will be dispatched more quickly and more certainly if this house completes the action which the government has at last taken, by approving the motion, than by any other course which the house can take at the present time.

I also wish to draw attention to the talks of the former minister of national defence with the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada, as recorded on the same page. I quote the statement of the former minister of national defence:

And one other point I am assuming, unless the Prime Minister states otherwise, that if the government motion carries, the future orders in council specifying additional numbers of men will be passed and put into effect without any reference back again to this house for a vote of confidence or other approval.

The Prime Minister replied:

That is correct.

The former minister of national defence further stated:

I take that to be clear from the minister's statements to the house.

I have mentioned these points specially, but what I want to emphasize is this, that this house and the people of this counrty, and I myself, will hold the government—and particularly the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence—to strict account for carrying out vigorously and without wavering their declared intention to reinforce the army with well-trained men from the N.R.M.A. to the fullest and fastest extent possible.

After that, Mr. Speaker, there is no comment that we could make; we can only await the next election.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I have just seen the statement made by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) in which he referred to the Memoirs of Sir Robert Borden, and then said:

> This citation from the memoirs of Robert Laird Borden has never been denied by the present Prime Minister.

The citation he gave from the Memoirs of Sir Robert Borden was this:

> I was told in the summer of 1917 by an intimate friend of King that he (King) was ready to join the proposed union government.

The hon. member (Mr. Roy) then went on to say that that statement in the Memoirs of Sir Robert Borden had never been denied by me. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a scintilla of truth in it. There is no mention made of who the intimate friend was who is mentioned by Sir Robert Borden, but I have no doubt that someone must have made some such statement to Sir Robert Borden or he would not have included it in his memoirs. May I say that there was never a man in this country who was more constantly, steadily and unequivocally with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and more opposed as he was to union government than myself.

While I am speaking may I say that I was one of those who were approached to enter the union government. When spoken to, I gave a most emphatic reply that I would not consider any suggestion of the kind.

Mr. RAYMOND EUDES (Hochelaga): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this house has been called to vote on the government's motion requesting the support of its members for the prosecution of a vigorous war effort.

Since the outbreak of war, our nation's war effort has been vigorous enough to deserve the gratitude and admiration of our allies and their leaders. In a proportion which it would be useless to estimate, this contribution concurred in putting an end to the conquest and subjection of millions of human beings. It helped to ward off a seemingly inevitable catastrophe. To-day, the conquered people recover their freedom and the time is at hand when an heretofore invincible foe will be faced with defeat.

Could the situation ever have become so favourably to the nations united against the nazi menace without the gigantic effort of our country? If the strength of Canada is taken into account, its war effort has truly been gigantic.

Our varied and abundant materials have been used on every battlefield. In addition to the heavy burden of military production, our country has fed millions of people deprived of the necessities of life by the enemy's wanton destruction. Our population of about twelve million contributed nearly a million Canadians to the armed forces. Through our air training plan, we supplied the allied air forces with trained airmen who have been successful in mastering the formidable German luftwaffe. Countless convoys have reached harbour under the protection of our navy and due to the gallant deeds of our merchant marine.

In the air, on land and on the sea, our airmen our soldiers and sailors have accomplished heroic feats of arms. All the greater their legitimate pride in these achievements, and all the greater our admiration for those heroes, whether famed or obscure, when each chose freely, and uncoerced by any law, to serve in his country's armed forces and to defend the cause of justice and liberty.

Canadians from all provinces have shared in this magnificent war effort. Like her sister provinces, Quebec has assumed her just share of the common sacrifice. An imposing number of her sons have enlisted in the armed forces. On the battlefields they have shed their blood alongside other Canadians. They have added heroic pages to the glorious history written by their elders who fought in 1914-1918.

The workers and industrialists of Quebec have done an efficient job as regards war production. In spite of labour shortage, our farmers have redoubled their efforts in order to help feed the peoples of Europe. The people of Quebec have readily accepted heavy taxation and they have subscribed to the victory loans.

French Canadians have ungrudgingly done their fair share. And yet they have not the same reasons as their English-speaking fellow-citizens to be interested in the present war. They did not demand Canada's participation in this war, they have merely accepted it, knowing that such was the wish of the majority and realizing also that their liberty, their civilization, and their national, political and economic interests were at stake.

Their effort is none the less effective and their share in the common sacrifice that much more admirable. Let those who advocate equality of sacrifice for Quebec and the other provinces open their eyes and shed the prejudices in which they are steeped; they will then be forced to recognize that the achievement of Quebec and of French Canadians throughout the country in the present war is truly remarkable. They have fulfilled the agreements which devolved upon them as parties to the Confederation pact.

In pursuing the war, however, French Canadians have not altered their feeling of antipathy against conscription for overseas service. The people of Quebec clearly expressed their ideas on the matter during the plebiscite campaign of April, 1942, and such an attitude can be justified and understood. French Canadians make it a point of honour, for they know that they constitute a minority. If some advocates of conscription are convinced that compulsion is the most effective and fairest method of waging war, how many, on the other hand, urge its enforcement only to assert their supremacy over the minority.

Moreover, French Canadians know, from the experience of 1917, that conscription brought them unfair and iniquitous treatment. Their objection to such a system has only been strengthened. On the other hand, political leaders of both racial groups and of all parties have fostered the development of this feeling among French Canadians. Are we to interpret Quebec's attitude towards conscription as one of cowardice or as a refusal to fulfil a national duty? Such a statement would be unfair and mistaken since French Canadians have enlisted for active service in large numbers and are still doing so.

Now, on November 23 last, the government through an order in council, enacted conscription for overseas service, under the pretext that in the near future our infantry troops might need to be reinforced with 16,000 men.

Therefore, the vote on the government's motion implies approval or disapproval of that conscription principle. In March, 1940, I was elected on the clear-cut understanding that I would oppose conscription. My electors did not release me from that pledge at the time of the plebiscite. I respected their will in voting against Bill No. 80. I shall abide by it in voting against the government's motion.

During the present debate I have been unable to acquire the conviction that conscription was indispensable to victory. Besides, is it not being demanded by people of whom an overwhelming majority have not the least knowledge of the data connected with the military problem involved? This debate and the campaign waged throughout the country on the conscription issue have confirmed me in the following conviction: conscription has been used by certain groups as a pretext for rousing public opinion in the secret hope that, as a result of the solemn promises made by members of the government that conscription would not be resorted to, the Prime Minister would be faced with a crisis that would bring about the downfall of his government. In some quarters, what is desired is the downfall of the Prime Minister rather than the dispatch of reinforcements for our troops.

Consequently, in voting against the main motion, I intend to voice my opposition to the enforcement of conscription, without however wishing to condemn the government's policy as a whole.

Considered as a whole and without taking into account that issue of conscription, the policy of the present government is worthy of the gratitude and admiration of the Canadian nation, if one bears in mind the intricacies of international policy and the complexity of our national and economic life. As a matter of fact, the government has directed our war effort without upsetting our economic system; it has fought inflation successfully and has consistently sought to plan for a better post-war world.

Nor do I intend, through my vote, to take a stand which might contribute to the isolation of my province. Isolationism can only bring trouble, worry and misfortune to my fellow-citizens.

In conclusion, I express the hope that this momentary crisis which has stirred the country may afford all Canadians an opportunity of realizing that the development of our national life is primarily dependent on unity which, in turn, requires a mutual understanding based on good faith and the respect of the rights of all.

Mr. G. T. FULFORD (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, so much has already been said in the current debate, and a great deal that should not have been said, that I am rather hesitant about adding any further remarks at this late date.

I do, however, wish clearly to record my stand regarding conscription for overseas service. During the 1940 election campaign I took no definite stand, but immediately after the evacuation at Dunkirk and the capitulation of France, I realized that this war was something more terrible than any of us could possibly have conceived at the outset.

I have felt, above all, that we as Canadians must not fail those gallant men who have volunteered for service overseas, and that when reinforcements are needed we should not hesitate to see that they are sent. Therefore, when bill 80 was being debated, I spoke unequivocally in favour of conscription of men for overseas service, as can be found in Hansard of June 15, 1942, page 3365, when I said:

> Personally I am in favour of conscription in spite of the fact that it proved to be a failure in the last war. I consider it to be by far the fairest, most equitable and surest way of raising an army or obtaining reinforcements.

Again, when debating the soldier gratuity bill on August 11, 1944, page 6286 of Hansard, I am reported as follows:

> At the same time I wish to state that there is no one in this chamber who regrets more than I that the government has not seen fit to implement the terms of the National Resources Mobilization Act and draft all who are enrolled in the army for overseas service.

Before the member for Prince (Mr. Ralston), the former minister of national defence, a man for whom I have the highest regard, resigned, I sent a telegram to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on October 30, 1944, advising him of my position on the matter of sending draftees overseas, and I came to Ottawa fully prepared to break with my party if necessary. At this point I wish to emphasize the fact that my opinion was formed long ago and that I was not browbeaten into making the public statement I did on November 7, 1944, either by pressure groups or by any campaign carried on by a certain section of the Ontario press.

Since this house adjourned on August 14, I have had the privilege of sailing on a Canadian naval frigate from the Pacific coast of Canada to the Atlantic coast. For three and one-half weeks I lived with the men on board and talked to all and sundry, from the captain to the lowliest stoker. Before going aboard, I was particular that no one should know, apart from the officers, of my political affiliation, as I was most anxious that the men would feel free to talk with me. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians can feel proud of the new ships being added to the Canadian navy, but especially of the men who are serving on these ships.

The vast majority of the crew had seen active service on the north Atlantic convoy run, and many had been on the most hazardous and disagreeable route of all, namely, convoying ships around the coast of Norway to Murmansk, Russia.

Some have gone through the harrowing experience of being torpedoed, and there were very few who had not been in active combat. I was told of one trip on a minesweeper where, out of forty-eight days in mid-winter, forty-five were spent at sea. To me the spirit of these men is magnificent. They do not expect any great concessions to be made them upon their return to civil life and seem quite satisfied with the rehabilitation schemes offered them. There was one thing, however, that eclipsed all other matters in their minds, and that was that while every hour in the day they were being asked to risk their lives, there were others in uniform who were living comfortably and drawing army pay without having to make sacrifices of any kind. Although they were resentful of this inequality of service, nevertheless their reactions could not be termed spiteful in any sense of the word because they all feel that this is a matter of simple justice; and with them, Mr. Speaker, I must agree.

At this point I should like to pay high tribute to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald). He has built up the Canadian navy from a handful of old obsolete ships to a force that now ranks third among the united nations. I cannot praise too highly the esprit de corps existing in the navy, brought about to a very large degree by methods used in recruiting and training for this branch of our service under the guidance of a most capable minister. In passing, it is worthy of note, that during this readjustment of personnel in the other two branches of service, the navy has recruited neither too many nor too few men and women. Of the 92,000 enlisted in the navy, 38,000 are afloat and 54,000 ashore; the latter figure of course includes Wrens. Actually excluding those under training from consideration, 47·5 per cent of the personnel of the navy is afloat, which shows a phenomenally large percentage in actual combat service.

The frigate I was aboard landed at an Atlantic port on September 22, the very day that the following interesting item appeared in the newspapers of Canada, which I shall quote from the Halifax Chronicle of September 22, 1944:

> Canadian Affairs Interest Germans
> Hon. Angus L. Macdonald Gets Much Publicity in Nazi Press
> A general interest in Canadian affairs, with particular emphasis on the northwest, and in personalities on Hon. Angus L. Macdonald, Minister of Naval Affairs, is currently being shown by the German press, according to a letter received yesterday from Flt. Lt. Kingsley E. Brown, R.C.A.F., a former staff member of the Halifax Chronicle, now a prisoner of war in Germany.
> "Angus L. Macdonald receives more publicity in the German press than any other Canadian," said Flt. Lt. Brown. "His work in building up the Canadian navy, is described in almost flattering terms, and one newspaper, the Berliner Boersen Zeitung, describes Angus L. as working with quiet self-confidence and determination toward his goal. The same article declares that Canada is 'fated by nature to become a great sea power'."

Further to my personal contacts with the men in the Canadian navy, regarding their attitude towards the men enrolled under the N.R.M.A., can be added the observations I have received by letter from men in the R.C.A.F. and those serving overseas in the army.

Unfortunately, however, there are all too many civilians in Canada clamouring for an all-out conscription of man-power for overseas service who themselves are giving very little or no thought to their contribution to Canada's all-out war effort. I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Brockville Recorder and Times of November 6, 1944, and which logically sets forth that all zombies are not to be found in the army:

> The term "zombie" is one of contempt now widely applied to young men of military age and the proper physical qualifications who decline to bear their share of national responsibilities in time of war by volunteering for general military service.
> How many of the older people of both sexes who ridicule and censure these "zombies" can themselves say that they are doing all they possibly can to fight and win the war? How many of them refrain from presenting themselves at blood clinics to save the lives of the men overseas when it is quite within their power to do so? How many of them are by no means above cheating on their food or gasoline rations when both are short because of the pressing needs overseas? How many of them do not object to chiselling a bit on prices in disregard of the ceilings which have been established and held so far that Canada may be properly mobilized for the winning of the war?
> How many of these civilians are ready to perjure themselves in order to secure tires to which they are not entitled and which remain in short supply because of overseas demands? How many of them decline to cooperate in salvage campaigns for the benefit of the overseas operations, or refuse to assist in Red Cross workrooms, grumble and cheat about their wartime taxes and offer the flimsiest excuses for their failure to buy victory bonds when they are well able to lend their country this vital assistance?
> All of Canada's "zombies" are not in the home defence army by any means. There are thousands more of them all over the map in practically every community, people who, although well able to do so, decline to bear their full share of responsibility when their country is at war or who chisel and cheat at the expense of their country and its fighting men. They should be very careful about the criticism they direct towards the young Canadians who decline to volunteer for general service when they themselves are by no means free of stigma.

And now I would like to call to the attention of this house still another type of zombie, the political leader who directs his party by remote control and during this critical period fulfils his war service by holding party organization meetings from one end of Canada to the other. Surely his place should be right here in this chamber where he would be made to retract irresponsible remarks such as were made last night over the C.B.C.

In conclusion, I need hardly mention that I have no intention whatsoever of voting for the subamendment now before this house, nor do I intend to be duped by the political trickery of the reactionary Tory party in voting for its amendment in that party's futile attempt to gain the reins of power.

I am supporting the main motion because I am positive in my own mind that the government intends to see that adequate reinforcements reach our gallant fighting men on the western front in Europe. We can already see the effect that P.C. 8891 has had on the personnel of the N.R.M.A. and civilian population alike, by the tremendous recent increase in enlistments for active service. This is a very gratifying aspect, but the government is bound to send 16,000 N.R.M.A. men in excess of the original estimate for reinforcements and, should more be required, more will be sent—even should further orders in council have to be passed.

Conscription for overseas service is an accomplished fact and a vote of confidence in the government will allow the Prime Minister to continue to lead Canada in a war effort that has been a source of amazement and an inspiration to the rest of the civilized world.

Mr. SARTO FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): It is not very often that in this house we have witnessed a debate of such great importance. As one of the generation mainly concerned with the object of the discussion, I feel it my duty to participate in this debate. I intend to try to do so in English, but that compels me, Mr. Speaker, to appeal to your sympathy and to the best of your good will, and if in the course of my remarks it happens unfortunately that I say something that may hurt the feelings of any hon. members with whom I have the honour to sit in this house, or of any of our Canadian citizens outside this parliament, please do not impute it to any ill will on my part but to a lack of ability to speak the beautiful language that you, sir, speak so magnificently.

It is my definite intention to try to follow the example that was given by most hon. members who have already spoken since we were called to meet in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is so much conversation in the chamber that I cannot hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I have listened with pleasure to most of the speeches that have been delivered and I have been pleased to observe that most hon. members who have spoken so far did so as good Canadians and in the way that speeches ought to be made. This is an example which I feel bound to follow and I shall try to deserve the same compliment.

I appreciate the fact that it has always been rather difficult in our country to be a good Canadian. If we consider the difficulties of our national life we shall realize that the conditions under which we are living in Canada are exceptional. I imagine that it must be very easy in Great Britain to be a good Britisher. It must be very easy in the United States to be a good American, and very probably it must be rather an easy thing even in Germany to be a good German and in France to be a good Frenchman. In Canada, however, it is different by reason of the fact that we are two races, that we speak two languages, and that we have not all the same religious creed. I understand that in our country it is rather difficult to suggest the real formula of the best Canadianism and I am perfectly well open to understand the point of view of anyone. In times such as these through which we are now passing I do not think that any of us can be anything but real Canadians. This is the very spirit that has inspired the humble remarks that I shall make to you this afternoon.

The proposition that is put to us can be summarized in this way. The government has decided to call the members of parliament, the representatives of the Canadian people, to determine this question, to find out whether we are ready to support the government in maintaining its present policy in connection with the war, which is nothing but conscription. I intend to oppose that proposition, and if you will kindly permit me, Mr. Speaker, I will give some of the reasons I have for doing what I intend to do.

I do not find that policy useful for the army; on the contrary I find it useless for the army and most unfair to the Canadian people. So far as the army is concerned, I must admit that I am far from being an expert qualified to talk about it, but I have heard since the beginning of this session so many people who were in the same position that I think I am entitled to discuss the question just the same. But we have heard experts, the best we have in Canada, the present Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, for whom I have the greatest respect, and the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) for whom I have a great deal of admiration, because I have always admired men who have opinions and who have the courage to stand or fall for them. What did we learn from these two experts whose competence cannot be denied? They did not agree, Mr. Speaker. They were divided in their opinions. Before November 22 we were told by the builder of the Canadian army, by the first man responsible for the victories of the Canadian Army on the different fronts, that conscription was not necessary; that there was no question yet that we should apply that form of policy for reinforcements overseas. The views of the other individual were just the opposite, and now we are placed in the position where we have to face the responsibility and to make up our own minds and act according to our own conscience.

We were told, Mr. Speaker, with a bit of exaggeration, that the Canadian Army fighting overseas at the present moment was in a desperate condition. We were told that if we did not send a few thousand more Canadians to help them that this will be the last and that our soldiers would be practically wiped out from the battlefields. I can hardly admit or conceive such a thing. If we take what was told to us prior to November 22 and what is told to us now, and if we consider the news that is coming to us through the newspapers about the way things are going on the battle front, I am inclined to think that what has changed is not the war condition but rather the political condition in our country, and I do not feel that that is sufficient for me to take the step of voting in favour of the government on a measure such as the one now before us.

Let us assume that the condition in which the Canadian Army is fighting overseas is absolutely desperate; let us assume that we have to send reinforcements as we are proposing to do now, we have 900,000 soldiers who have enlisted voluntarily.

Mr. HATFIELD: Not in the front line.

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): We have the American army with millions of soldiers, we have the British army with millions of soldiers and we have to think of the other armies of Russia fighting on the other front. If these soldiers, millions and millions of them, do not succeed in achieving the work they have begun, I cannot admit that this handful of Canadians will be successful. The real reason why our armies overseas are placed in the position in which they are to-day is not that they lack reinforcements. I am rather of the opinion that since the beginning of the war Canadian soldiers have been given too much to do. We have to consider that the Canadian front covers a lot of territory. It goes from Hong Kong to Dieppe, passing by Africa, fighting in the Mediterranean sea, fighting the battle of Sicily, and still fighting to-day in Italy. We were at Dieppe; we were in Normandy; we were in Belgium; we were in Holland, and to-day we are in Germany. I am not surprised to see that we are beginning to be short of men, because we have undertaken too much, as was so ably and eloquently presented by my best friend, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). We have undertaken too much, Mr. Speaker, and the proposition that the government puts before us is not a remedy for the situation. I cannot believe that the situation is what we are told it is.

We learned about the situation of our armies at the front from the newspapers before we learned it from the headquarters of the army. If it is true that our armies are in a desperate situation, I have enough confidence in the Americans and the British to come to our help. After all, there would be nothing to be ashamed of in the Canadians being helped over there when we consider what we have achieved since the beginning of the war. There is not, I believe, a single allied nation we have not helped in some way, since the beginning of this war in 1939. Among the united nations we Canadians have done the most for the war. We were in it at the very beginning, two years before the United States. We have given our money, we have sent our men. We were asked to give the tools. We gave the tools. I do not wish to be sarcastic, because I hate that kind of argument. However, it seems to me as if after giving the tools we will have to finish the job.

I come now to the second part of what I intend to say, Mr. Speaker. I said at the beginning of my remarks that I am going to vote against the main motion, firstly, because I find it useless for the army, and secondly, because I find it most unfair to the Canadian people. We are now reaching the beginning of the policy of the last man. Probably in a few months from now it will be the policy of the last cent. I do admit the responsibility of our country in connection with this conflict. I admit that as Canadians we have some duties to perform in order to help the civilized and Christian nations. But those duties do not go beyond our responsibility. Where are our responsibilities in the war? Those responsibilities were really created by the treaty of Versailles which was not cooked up on this side of the Atlantic. We were not responsible for the mistakes made in that treaty. As a French author has said, the surgeons of Versailles forgot the abscess in the belly of the European continent. That abscess consisted of the 65,000,000 Germans who faced 45,000,000 Frenchmen.

The Germans had not felt the effects of the war. There had been no fighting on their home soil. Every opportunity was given to them to rebuild their army. It is not the fault of the Canadian people that the French were prevented from recovering from Germany that to which they were entitled by the treaty of Versailles. We are not to blame because Germany failed to carry out the provisions of the treaty of Versailles. We were not among those who forced the French to retire from the Ruhr. As a former premier of Ontario said, we were not responsible for the financiers of Great Britain, at a time when 6,000,000 good Britishers were almost starving, lending money to Hitler in order to permit him to build up his army and train it for the work he has been doing these last few years.

It is most unfair to put upon the shoulders of the Canadian people this heavy burden which should be placed only on the shoulders of those responsible for this war. When I voted for the declaration of war on Germany I believed that it was to prevent this country from becoming a German and nazi province. I realized at that time that there were certain dangers facing us, that we had a duty to help Great Britain to force the enemy to stay on the continent. We have done that job, and more. We have contributed magnificently in the liberating of half a dozen nations on the European continent. They could not do the job themselves and it was up to us to help them, but the job is done. Those nations are free, but where are their soldiers?

I believe that they should enlist voluntarily. But if they have become soldiers to continue the fight, to finish the job, where have they gone? The Canadian Army is now in a bad position, we are told that it is in desperate straits, but where are those people whom we have helped so generously? After all we have done I do not think there is any reason to be ashamed of in expecting some help from them at this time.

I realize that human beings are liable to make mistakes, but I want it understood that I am not fighting for the province of Quebec alone. I am not fighting for the city of Montreal or my constituency, only I am fighting for the Canadian people. If I speak like this I do so because I want you to believe that I have no other feeling but that of honest Canadianism. I speak for all of Canada when I ask the members of this house to vote against the measure proposed by the government. I do not pretend that I speak in the name of Quebec or any other province. I am not going to make a small provincial problem into a national problem, and I certainly am not going to make it into an imperial problem. It is not an imperial problem; it is not a world problem; it is not a provincial problem, it is a Canadian problem and as a Canadian member of the Canadian parliament, considering what our nation has done since the beginning of the war, I must refuse to support this measure. I repeat the words of the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe. I will vote against conscription; I will never admit conscription to send Canadians overseas. More than that I will fight any government that would force Canadians to go overseas. Our soldiers are there and no doubt more will enlist. But we have no right to force those who want to stay here to go overseas. They are free men and the most solemn commitments were made by all political parties, with the exception of one, by the Tories, the Liberals and all political parties that they would not have to go. They accepted that pledge.

Some hon. members will say that the situation has changed, but I do not think it has. Because of propaganda in the newspapers some of the mothers, sisters, fathers and sweethearts of boys overseas have been led to believe that if this step is not taken their boys overseas will suffer. But that is not the case. To-day the Canadian people have been poisoned with propaganda, as they were in 1921, in 1925, in 1940, and again in 1942 where, right in the very heart of the province of Ontario, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was defeated. At that time we were at war. We were fighting against Germany, and the situation did not look as good as it does to-day. The Canadian people rejected all those who were advocating conscription for overseas. I admit that in certain parts of our country the minds of the people have changed, not because of the situation at the battlefronts, not because Canada is not doing its utmost to win the war, not because we have refused to do our share, but because of propaganda.

After the war they will realize the position in which they are placed to-day by some of their fellow-citizens whom I do not consider worthy of being classed as good Canadians. After this war, exactly as they did after 1917, they will realize the mistake they have made. We know that in 1917 in certain parts of Canada public opinion was poisoned as it is to-day. Those who can recall the debates which took place in the House of Commons at that time will remember that exactly the same arguments were used, exactly the same reasoning, exactly the same propositions. But within a few months after the war public opinion realized it had been misled by propaganda, and since 1917, by all Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific conscription has been considered a shameful disaster, despite the fact that, as to-day, it was sought by many Canadians. They were misled at that time; they were misinformed. When they realized that they had been made the victims of propaganda they voted against those who put conscription into effect. The same is happening to-day; history is repeating itself, because conditions are the same to-day as they were then.

I admit, of course, that many among the people living in this land are in favour of conscription, just as they were in 1917. But to-day if they favour conscription they do so for exactly the same reasons as were offered in that earlier year, namely because they are badly led and because they have been poisoned by propaganda. I say that a few months after the war is over we will see exactly the same reaction—take my word for it—because the situation to-day is exactly the same as it was then. The government will appear shameful in the eyes of all real Canadians, because it will be seen that it has fallen into the ditch, into the hole, because it has been afraid of some Canadians who have tried to put it in a bad position—Canadians who have been playing the cheapest kind of political game, and that is all.

While there is still time, I urge the government to change its mind. It is not sufficient to put a drop of water into the ocean—a handful of Canadians. What is that in war as we see it to-day? What does conscription mean to the Canadian people? After the war we will know what it means, as we knew after the war of 1914-18. We have not forgotten the first conscription measure, and we are going to remember the second one.

I feel I must apologize, Mr. Speaker, for having spoken too long and perhaps too loudly. I ask you, sir, to believe that what I said has come from the bottom of my heart. I shall take the action I have indicated because deep in my heart I hold the honest belief that it is by so doing I best serve my country at the present time.

Mr. JOSEPH LAFONTAINE (Mégantic-Frontenac) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate at this time, my object is not to delay the proceedings of the house, but to state the reasons for the vote I shall be called upon to cast, either on the main motion, on the amendment introduced by the Progressive-Conservative party, or, on the sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for Montreal-Mercier (Mr. Jean).

The Progressive-Conservative party's amendment reads as follows:

> This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice.

Mr. Speaker, if that amendment were carried, it would mean that all draftees now on strength or to be called in future under the N.R.M. Act, would have to serve on any theatre of war, be it in India, China or the Philippines, apart from the European theatre where Canadian troops are now fighting. It is unfortunate that such an amendment should have been moved. I believe that, under the present circumstances, far from promoting national unity, that amendment will tend to disrupt it and, should this happen, it will inevitably conduce to a lessening rather than to the maintenance or the increase of our war effort.

It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that this whole campaign for conscription is the doing of a group with a thirst for power and who, in such a campaign, would use the Province of Quebec as a means of splitting the country, at least for some years to come.

In that campaign, the Conservative party, under the guise of patriotism, is expecting to come into office and implement anew its reactionary policies which have always consisted and still consist in the protection of a privileged group at the expense of the general public.

Therefore, I shall have no hesitation in voting against the amendment of the Progressive Conservative party.

Then there is the subamendment introduced by the hon. member for Mercier. I regret that the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) should have attempted to give this amendment a meaning other than the one it contains. In order, therefore to enlighten you on the matter, and to prove that it really has the meaning which the mover intended to give it, I shall refer to an editorial taken from the issue of Tuesday, December 5, of the Ottawa newspaper Le Droit. It bears the signature of Mr. L'Heureux. Here is what it says, with reference to the subamendment of Mr. Jean:

> There can be no misunderstanding. That amendment is obviously a motion of want of confidence in the government who is charged with having wrecked the voluntary system and with having been brought, by a wrong distribution of our man-power resources, to resort to conscription for overseas.

Such is Le Droit's editorial opinion on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier. I will therefore vote for the subamendment.

The main motion reads as follows:

> That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

I would have voted for it had order in council 8891 not been passed. This order authorizes the Minister of National Defence (Mr. McNaughton) to conscript up to 16,000 draftees if volunteer enlistments are insufficient to provide adequate reinforcements for our infantry fighting in northwestern Europe and in Italy. As I said during the debate on Bill No. 80, against which I voted, I agreed at the time of the 1940 election to oppose any proposal advocating conscription for overseas service; I shall remain faithful to my pledge and I intend to keep the promise made to my constituents who honoured me by choosing me as their representative and by placing their trust in me.

True, the number of men needed is not great, and according to the information supplied by General McNaughton, reinforcements are doubtlessly required in order to keep the various Canadian units in action. But would it not have been possible to withdraw our men temporarily from the front lines to enable them to reequip themselves, rest, recuperate and bring their units up to strength? Such a respite would have allowed the new Minister of National Defence to make necessary arrangements and to resort to the voluntary system in which he has confidence, and undoubtedly he would have made a success of it.

If the voluntary system has not been as successful as was expected it is probably because the former minister of national defence lacked faith in the system, and success is seldom attained where confidence is lacking. The former minister may have known that a large number of the senior officers in the various camps of the country did not favour the voluntary system; on the contrary, they took advantage of every opportunity to discourage voluntary enlistments. In support of my contention, I may say that some time ago two French-Canadian recruiting officers went to a camp in British Columbia to secure the voluntary enlistment of French Canadians, but without avail. Why were they unsuccessful? Because the officers of the camp barred them from entering the premises and interviewing their fellow citizens. In view of this, it becomes evident that voluntary enlistment has been systematically discouraged for political reasons alone and surely not from patriotic motives.

Speaking of patriotism, I wish to state that the province of Quebec is just as patriotic as any other, a fact that it has proven over and over again and especially on two memorable occasions which I do not intend to recall at the moment. In the present conflict, its citizens have done their duty. However, how often are insults hurled at them by certain sections of the press and a number of ignorant fanatics?

I said I would be brief for I do not wish to delay the work of the house. I repeat in closing that I have always opposed and will continue to oppose conscription for overseas service. It is not through personal interest that I take that stand, in the hope that my sons may be exempted from military service, for, Mr. Speaker, three of them have enlisted voluntarily; one was in Holland the last time I heard from him, last Friday.

In opposing conscription I am upholding a principle which has inspired all my life: for the French Canadians and for myself what counts above all else is national pride.

(Text)

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have followed with close attention the drama that has been enacted on the floor of this house since parliament reassembled, and while it is not my intention to speak at any length in this debate I have come to certain conclusions that I propose to place upon the record. But before I do so I wish to extend my congratulations to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) on the speech he made in this house yesterday afternoon. I do not care to deal in superlatives but in my opinion his speech will do more to promote national unity in this country than any other speech or any article that has been written in this country for many years past. I know and he knows that the speech he made will be severely criticized and unfairly criticized in some cases, but I believe that it is only by stating facts and by appealing to reason—not by relying on worn-out political doctrines and appealing to prejudices—that unity can be achieved in this country. There are occasions when events make former promises and former policies uncouth. This I believe is such an occasion.

I have never criticized or blamed, either in this house or outside of it, the majority of the people in the province of Quebec for the stand they have taken on this issue. I have not agreed with the stand they have taken; I have been very much opposed to it. But I realize that you cannot preach one policy to one part of the country year in and year out, that you cannot make solemn promises to the people in one part of this country year in and year out, and then expect them in the twinkling of an eye or in a very short time to change their opinions. I do not blame or criticize them but I do blame and I do criticize the leaders and the public men in their province who preached those doctrines to them and made those promises to them.

In this country, as in many countries, there are bound to be great differences of opinion arising from differences in racial origin, religious and other prejudices, differences over political issues and differences over systems of government. These differences of opinion are bound to arise and at times lead to great bitterness; but in any free and democratic country I fail to understand why they should lead to national disunity, no matter how great these differences may be. I believe that in a free and democratic country, and Canada is a free and democratic country, there is one foundation, and one foundation only, upon which national unity can be based, and that is that when the representatives of the people in parliament declare war, all Canadians must be prepared to fight and, if necessary, die for their country. Unless all Canadians are prepared to go forth and fight when Canada declares war, unless they are prepared to subscribe to the doctrine of equality of sacrifice, there can be no unity in this country. The basis of unity in this country can be found only in the principle that in a time of war there must be equality of sacrifice and that all able-bodied men must be prepared to meet the enemy wherever he is to be found and to fight him until peace is declared. Until we are in agreement on this principle I believe that the words "national unity" can have very little meaning in this country.

To state briefly the conclusions I have come to as a result of what I have heard on the floor of the house during this debate: The first is that the need for trained men overseas is imperative and that the voluntary system has failed to supply the number required. The second is that there has been a dangerous and an unjustifiable delay in providing the needed reinforcements. The third is that the stand taken by the former minister of national defence, the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston), to obtain those reinforcements has been vindicated. He has rendered, I believe, a great service to his country. He has proved himself again to be a loyal and patriotic Canadian, who has placed the needs of our army and the honour of our country ahead of personal ambition or party consideration.

The fourth conclusion I have come to is this, and I do not think much emphasis has been laid upon it here: I am of the opinion from what I have heard that in one respect at least our army organization should be improved. We have learned during the course of this debate that we do not keep records in Canada of our reinforcement pools overseas. I believe it is important that such records be kept in order that the government know the true position of affairs. It should not be necessary for the Minister of National Defence or any other minister to go overseas to learn what our reinforcement position is and the strength of our army in the field. The former minister of national defence told us that what he learned when he went to the battle areas came as a shock to him, and when he went over the figures at Canadian military headquarters in England he found that the situation required radical measures. I think and believe that those figures and this information should have been available here, and that steps should be taken to have it made available, and that when it is obtained, the Minister of National Defence and the war committee should keep it before them so they will know how our reinforcement position overseas stands and the number of men we have in the reinforcement pools.

The order in council which has been tabled by the government gives approval for the sending of 16,000 men overseas. In my opinion it is not a satisfactory solution of this problem. It is a compromise. It can be regarded only as a temporary adjustment. It is only a partial policy of overseas conscription. It may allay for a time the force of the spontaneous upsurge of public opinion that took place throughout this country when the people were led to believe that the Prime Minister and his government did not intend to send any of our home defence army overseas, but I do not think it will be satisfactory to the people of this country when it is fully understood. The order in council does not make certain of adequate and continuous reinforcements or require men called up to serve in any theatre of war. It has been described, and correctly described I think, by the former minister of national defence as "a half-hearted, piecemeal method." He said he was far from satisfied with the halting attitude it indicates. I agree fully with the objection he has taken to it and with the objections which have been taken to it by the leader of the opposition and other hon. members on this side and in other quarters of the house. I do not think, however, that any useful purpose could be served by taking up the time of the house in repeating those objections.

It is plain that it was an aroused public opinion that forced the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his cabinet to introduce this order in council. The Prime Minister preferred it either to resigning his office or to calling an election. The Minister of National Defence, who has the duty of carrying out this order, said the day it was tabled in this house, as reported in Hansard of November 23, page 6529:

> I am a confirmed believer in a system of voluntary service for the Canadian army.

In all seriousness I fail to understand how a man who is a confirmed believer in the voluntary system can in conscience and in honour carry out this order in council which makes provision for conscription for overseas service.

I have heard the views of the Minister of Agriculture and I have read in the press the speeches which were made by the Minister of Fisheries, the Minister of Munitions and Supply and other members of the government. I do not propose to review them this afternoon, because they have been placed on the records of this house, but I will say this, that I do not see how, when you have in the cabinet some members who are opposed to this order in council, some members who support it because they were forced to do so, and only some members who believe in it, that we can have confidence that the government will carry it out or see that it is properly carried out. If members of the cabinet hold these and similar views, how can we have confidence that the government will send trained reinforcements overseas in sufficient numbers and thereby maintain a vigorous war effort?

I propose to vote against the motion and support the amendment; and may I point out in conclusion that any person who votes against the amendment of the opposition votes against conscription for overseas service.

Mr. T. V. GRANT (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I anticipate a little applause from some hon. gentlemen opposite when I say that my remarks are going to be very brief. I am not going to follow the remarks of the last speaker, the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen), except to say that his speech was the most tolerant and the least bitter of any speech that has been made so far by members opposite.

I was elected by a very large majority for the constituency of Kings in 1940 to come to Ottawa to support the Liberal party, under the leadership of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and in 1942 that government was released from its commitments in regard to conscription. A few weeks ago I was again given the nomination for my own riding and I pledged myself that when I came to Ottawa I would support the Liberal party. If I had not done that I would not have been given the nomination for the next election.

On Tuesday night last we were privileged to listen to an able speech delivered by the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Lapointe), who is himself an officer fresh from the battlefront opposing the Germans. He told us that conscription was unnecessary, undesirable and uncalled for at the present time, and I do not believe that the soldiers at the front are asking to be reinforced by conscripts at this stage of the war.

Opposition members have been telling us about numerous letters they have been receiving from soldiers overseas asking for reinforcements to come quickly. I think there are in the fighting lines as many soldiers per capita of population from my constituency as there are from any other constituency in Canada, and I have received no such letters. I have received letters from wives and mothers asking that their husbands or their sons who are overseas be sent home for a rest if they have been over for four or five years, and I am glad to note that that is the policy of the new Minister of National Defence.

I am sorry that I cannot support the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean), although personally I favour the voluntary system, and I want to see a united Canada, but this is not a free-for-all system of government. We are told by those who should know that the voluntary system has fallen down. That should not have happened after five years of wise planning. That is, of course, my own opinion, but regardless of the comparative merits or demerits of voluntary enlistment and the conscription system I do not believe that compulsion would have been necessary at this late stage of the war if someone had not blundered. I do not think the Prime Minister of Canada was the one who blundered, although it might have meant disaster to him and to Canada. However, in accepting the resignation of the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) and appointing in his place a man of General McNaughton's well known anti-conscription views, the Prime Minister has proven his sincerity in the belief that the voluntary system had not so suddenly fallen down, and it is hard to believe that it did.

If the motion before the house carries we shall continue to have a voluntary system as well as power in the hands of the Minister of National Defence to send reinforcements overseas from the home defence army if necessary. If the amendment carries we shall have total conscription and nothing else for anywhere in the world in the hands of Tory exploiters and profiteers as we had it after 1917, with its abuses and scandals, which will never be forgotten.

If compulsion is inevitable, of the two evils I intend to choose the lesser and to vote for the motion of the Prime Minister, thereby permitting our unsurpassed war effort to be pursued without interruption until final victory is achieved over Germany, which I believe could have been done under the voluntary system properly managed.

In other words, I intend to stand by the Prime Minister of Canada, and that is what the vast majority of my constituents want me to do. I am glad to see the Prime Minister in such good form and that he knows when he should relax, for on Monday night when the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher) was reading to him a merciless lecture, prepared no doubt at Bracken House, the Prime Minister, who had heard the same type of speech recited on several occasions recently, fell sound asleep and continued to sleep for ten minutes until precisely eleven o'clock, when he awoke, apparently much refreshed, which reminds me that repetition is one of the best treatments for insomnia. Try it. If you go to bed tonight and cannot sleep, repeat over and over again one of those little prayers that you learned at your mother's knees and you will soon be in dreamland.

Hon. P. J. ARTHUR CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères): I do not intend to prolong the debate. My only reason for rising at this time is to clarify the position I am going to take when called upon to vote on the amendment to the amendment now before the house. I propose to vote for the subamendment of the hon. member for Mercier, not that I so much like the wording of it or the manner in which he has expressed his views; but in the main I claim that the subamendment contains an expression of opinion in favour of the continuance of the voluntary system and, second, an expression against compulsion, against conscription. Therefore while admitting that the wording of the subamendment has not been very happy—in fact, it is poor—I approve its substance and will favour it because it includes the two main points upon which my own conviction remains.

Messrs:

Hanson (York-Sunbury)

O'Brien
Macdonald (Kingston City)

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I was paired with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. CLARK (Essex South): I was paired with the hon. member for Kent, Ontario (Mr. Desmond). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to move an amendment to the main motion which will call for the addition of certain words to that motion. The words which I suggest to be added were moved in the form of a subamendment by the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on November 27. Although that subamendment was ruled out of order by Your Honour at that stage of the proceedings, the content and the significance of our proposal will already be familiar to hon. members.

I should like to state briefly our reasons for introducing this amendment at this time. We feel on the one hand that the Prime Minister's motion which is now before the house is ambiguous in its wording, and that it presents the house with no real issue upon which hon. members must make a decision. On the other hand we feel that there are certain very real issues before the Canadian people at this time, and that this House of Commons should come to a decision on those real issues. As we see it, the real issues are two. First of all, now that partial conscription for overseas service has been made the law of the land there are a number of matters relating to the application of conscription which need to be cleared up. We feel that a straight-forward statement of the position should be made and that all distinctions and discrimination between drafted and volunteer personnel should be removed. Further, now that Canada has taken the step of conscripting manpower for overseas service, we are convinced that the people of this country look for this parliament and this government to take the step which should have been taken beforehand, and certainly should not be delayed, namely conscription of wealth and industry, in order that we may be assured of a total war effort, adequate reestablishment of the members of our fighting forces, and full employment after the war.

I made the statement a moment ago that we do not see in the motion now before the house, as moved by the Prime Minister, a real issue, and I should like to document that statement by a few references to statements made by the Prime Minister in his speech on November 27 when he moved the main motion. First of all, the vote on the motion before us is not a vote on the principle of conscription. That has been affirmed by many hon. members. The Prime Minister stated it clearly, at page 6617 of Hansard:

> The issue of conscription is not being decided by this vote; it was settled two years ago.

In the second place the vote on the motion now before us is not a vote for or against order in council P.C. 8891. Again I quote what the Prime Minister said, at page 6617 of Hansard of November 27:

> Let me say of this motion, it does not ask for approval of order in council P.C. 8891.

In the third place, the vote on the motion which is now before us does not call for confidence in the government with respect to all of its policies. The Prime Minister, as reported at page 6608 of Hansard, said:

> What the government is seeking to-day is not an expression of confidence in all of its policies.

Further, at page 6617 he said:

> The motion does not ask for an unlimited vote of confidence in the government.

Later on, on the same page, he said:

> The motion is not to be construed as an endorsation of government policies generally.

If the vote on the motion of the Prime Minister is not a vote on conscription, not a vote of approval or disapproval of order in council 8891, and not a vote of confidence in the government generally, what is the vote which is asked of this house in the motion now before us? The Prime Minister made it quite clear. He pointed out that it is not a vote of confidence in the government by means of which the house is asked to approve or disapprove of the government for having brought in P.C. 8891; it is simply a vote of confidence in the government as the administration to be entrusted with giving effect to a law that is already part of the law of this country. Frankly I do not quite understand why so many of the Liberal members find it difficult to vote confidence in their leader, entirely apart from what the rest of us may think of him, when he put it in that way for them. He made it clear in a number of places in his speech on November 27 that the issue before the house was simply whether the present government should continue to conduct Canada's war effort, and without quoting him verbatim, he used such words as "to give effect to the decision that has already been made". So that what this house is asked for is not a vote of confidence in the government generally, not a vote of confidence in the government because it passed P.C. 8891, but simply a vote of confidence in the government as a tool to administer a law which is now in effect, as if they were not even responsible for it.

These times are serious, and we do not feel that is an important enough measure to be the main vote of this special sitting of parliament. We feel that parliament should be called upon to decide on the more burning questions which are before the country. I may say, in passing, that this issue as to whether or not confidence is to be voted in the administration as a means of carrying out this order in council might have been worthy of our consideration but for the fact that the Prime Minister himself as much as told those of us who are not in the Liberal fold that it is none of our business anyway, for on page 6613 of Hansard he said:

> If I cannot get enough support out of my own party to feel sure that the men of my own party are behind me without depending on those who are politically opposed, then my resignation will go in to the Governor General. . . .

This means that even if the government were to be sustained by this House of Commons, but if that vote in order to be a majority, required some who were not on the government side of the house, the Prime Minister would offer his resignation. In other words, the decision as to whether or not this administration is the one to carry out the terms of this order in council, according to the way the Prime Minister has put it, rests solely with the Liberal party. We feel that this is turning a serious crisis such as we have had in this country into a melodrama when one realizes that this house contains an overwhelming majority of members who are prepared to vote confidence in the present administration and in the present Prime Minister.

Some members have suggested from this side of the house that the words of the Prime Minister exonerate opposition members from any blame if the government is defeated. We do not feel that way about it. In fact, we do not feel that his statement absolves us in this group from our duty and responsibility as representatives of a large section of the Canadian people. We feel, notwithstanding the way in which this has been treated as a Liberal family affair, that it is our duty to present to parliament and to the government what we regard as the issues before the people at the present time, and so it is because of that belief that at this stage of the proceedings we present to the house again the amendment which was moved on November 27.

May I emphasize that we do this in no perfunctory sense. The people of Canada will be interested to know how the members of other groups vote on this amendment. For example, I hold in my hand a telegram which I received a few days ago, among the many communications that hon. members have been receiving during this sitting. It happens to come from the Orange Lodge of Greater Winnipeg, but I ask my hon. friends from the province of Quebec to listen closely as I read this telegram and to note the absence of any prejudice of any kind from it. I also ask my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party to listen closely to what these members of the Loyal Orange Lodge in the city from which I come are asking at this time. The telegram is dated at Winnipeg, December 2, and addressed to me at Ottawa. It reads as follows:

> Whereas the Canadian government over its man-power policy seems to have lost the confidence of practically the entire personnel of the fighting services and whereas the Canadian public appears to be in a state of revolt against the government and whereas the government seems to be in a liquid state of mind, therefore this county Orange Lodge of Greater Winnipeg and district in annual sessions this thirtieth day of November, 1944, unanimously urge the government that the only solution to their problem of equality in waging total war is the application of conscription of wealth, industry and man-power. We further urge the government that to regain the confidence and respect of the nation it should adopt such a policy immediately.
> County of Winnipeg Loyal Orange Lodge C 64
> C. G. Perry, Secretary.

It is in the spirit of that telegram that we move our amendment at this time. It is not a motion of confidence or non-confidence in the government. It proposes that certain words be added to the main motion. We feel that these words should be added, and if they are we will vote for the motion as amended by the addition of these words. We are doing this in part to make our position clear and also because we feel that the people of Canada would like all the hon. members of this house to make their position clear on this twofold question of a clean breast of the policy of conscription and total conscription of wealth and industry as well as man-power to ensure a total war effort, adequate reestablishment and full employment in the post war period. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), that the following words be added to the motion:

> which in the opinion of this house requires the immediate removal of all distinctions between drafted and volunteer personnel, thus making the entire home defence army available for reinforcements overseas, and requires further the total mobilization of all the resources of Canada, material and financial as well as human, to ensure a total war effort, adequate reestablishment of the members of our fighting forces, and full employment after the war.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the moment when I have been considering this amendment, I should like the hon. gentleman who has moved it to give me his comments thereon in the light of the subamendment which has already been decided and disposed of by the house. It dealt with using to the best advantage the general service personnel in Canada and the volunteers overseas without resorting to conscription for overseas service. The hon. member's amendment deals with drafted and volunteer personnel, thus making the entire home defence army available for reinforcements overseas, and requires further the total mobilization of all the resources of Canada, material and financial as well as human. The issue of volunteers has been raised by the subamendment and the issue of conscription was raised in the amendment. The amendment which the hon. member has submitted to the house, as I see it, requires both human resources and material resources to be used. One portion of it has already been decided by the house. I have already ruled that one cannot approve and disapprove the same proposition, but that the document which deals with it must be considered in its entirety. If one portion of the amendment is out of order it renders the whole of it out of order, and the house has decided the question in the subamendment. Unless the hon. member can show me some reason other than those I have already stated I shall have to rule this amendment out of order, but I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that the house has made only a partial decision on the conscription question by the two votes taken thus far to-day. If the position that Your Honour is now taking is valid it seems to me that the issue was decided by the vote on the subamendment and that there should not have been a vote on the amendment. I would point out further that the amendment which I have moved accepts what is implied in the main motion, namely, an endorsation of conscription as far as it has gone. The issue of the main motion, whatever that issue is, has not yet been decided by the house. I would suggest that the ruling that you are making on the basis of the votes already taken on the subamendment and on the amendment would have a bearing on the vote to be taken on the main motion if you are to be consistent.

In this amendment we are asking for an extension of what is implied by the main motion still before the house. It does not rule on the basic question of conscription of man-power; it accepts what we have and asks for a clearing up of its provisions and an extension of the principle of conscription to cover wealth and industry as well. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that it should be declared in order. If Your Honour will recall when the amendment made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was ruled out of order you said that the amendment was not in order at that time but that it could be offered after the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) had been disposed of. We have reached that stage. I realize that in the meantime a subamendment was moved by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean), but in Your Honour's comments just now you referred also to the bearing of the vote on the amendment on this question. If the terms of the amendment did not stand in the way at the time Your Honour made your ruling on November 29 it seems to me it should not be made to apply now. I suggest Your Honour should consider that my amendment adds relevant words to the main motion and should be declared in order.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before Your Honour makes this ruling may I add a word? It seems to me that during this debate Your Honour has interpreted the rules so strictly that hon. members who disagree with the motions or amendments made thus far are prohibited from their inherent right in this parliament of expressing their points of view and of giving support to them by means of their votes.

I wish to add this word to the contentions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The motion is:

> That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

By that motion we are asked to endorse the policy of the government. We indicate clearly that we consider a vigorous war effort as one involving something other than what the government has undertaken. We are of the opinion that a vigorous war effort not only requires the sending of drafted men overseas but requires further that industry and wealth shall be placed on the altar of our national sacrifice as well as the lives of the young men of this country. Since we believe that the policy needs extension in those respects we have moved an amendment to that effect.

I suggest that under the traditions of this parliament and according to those rules of procedure in debate which I have been able to read and study—I have given some thought to the rules of procedure—we are being denied by your ruling the right to express what we think is involved in a policy of vigorous prosecution of the war. I contend, with all due respect to the Chair, that our amendment is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the amendment was moved previously by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) I stated that the first portion of that amendment might conceivably be within the rules of the house and be accepted as an amendment to the main motion, but I was clearly of the opinion that the amendment as then constituted was not in order. Since the production of that amendment by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar the house has had under consideration a subamendment. That subamendment has been voted upon and it is now a decision of the house. It referred to part of the contents of the amendment now before us. The thirteenth edition of May, page 292, has this to say:

> It is a rule, in both houses, which is essential to the due performance of their duties, that no question or bill shall be offered that is substantially the same as one on which their judgment has already been expressed in the current session.

That is a salutary ruling to prevent duplication of debate. Reference was made to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean). I did not give a ruling on that amendment because I was satisfied that it was in order. It referred to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), and proposed to insert an alternative proposition to that contained in the amendment. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre reads in part:

> . . . and requires further the total mobilization of all the resources of Canada, material and financial as well as human, to ensure a total war effort, adequate reestablishment of the members of our fighting forces, and full employment after the war.

It has embodied within its terms the terms of the subamendment which has already been voted upon and which is now a decision of the house. May I say that in my rulings with regard to amendments being brought before the house I have not been concerned with the merits of any of them. I have been concerned solely with and have directed my thoughts toward the procedure that was necessary to bring the amendments within the rules of the house. In this case I am clearly of the opinion that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I must respectfully and regretfully appeal your ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. MCLARTY ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I have read a statement made by the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) this afternoon with regard to the sending of dodgers by mail. There is a gentleman by the name of Mr. Robert Rumilly, translator and well-known author, who would appreciate being heard under oath to establish that the dodger was in a franked letter containing also a letter from Mr. Coleman, Under-Secretary of State.

THE WAR

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN MAINTAINING A VIGOROUS WAR EFFORT—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION OF THE PRIME MINISTER.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, a little while ago our newspapers in this country carried a Canadian Press news item dated July 29, and headed "With the Canadians in France," which read:

In a neat bit of team play that began six days before the British-Canadian drive south of Caen July 25, French-speaking troops of a Quebec battalion paved the way for the capture of Verrieres by Ontario troops by attacking and holding two hillside farms about 1,000 yards north and northwest of the town.

A company commanded by Maj. J. P. C. Gauthier of Montreal was consolidating south of the Beauvoir farm when the Germans loosed a terrific concentration of mortar and gunfire along the whole of this front. Other men under Major J. A. Dextrase of Montreal had pushed on ahead but enemy fire pinned them down on the south side of the crest of the ridge. . . . The farm was held despite attacks by five tanks which remained dug in on the south side of the farm for 48 hours and in the face of heavy mortar and artillery fire. The tanks were finally forced to withdraw due to the aggressiveness of White's (Ontario) company. Troteval was attacked and captured by Major Dextrase's company July 24 and later Ontario troops passed through the position to go and capture Verrieres.

To my mind, in that short excerpt was the very spirit of Canadian unity. It is in my opinion the duty of all of us not only to maintain the Canadian army but in the doing of it to maintain the same spirit of unity among those of us who work together on the home front as animates our men who fight abroad. That to me is a most important thing.

We have in this country a very well-known Canadian journalist by the name of Mr. Leslie Roberts. He has written a book on the famous Canadian flying ace of Malta, "Buzz" Beurling, and has just returned from five months with the armed forces overseas to find Canada in the middle of this crisis. In an article which appears in the Canadian Mining Reporter, Mr. Leslie Roberts has this to say about the crisis—I quote just a short portion:

What first impresses the returning traveller, setting foot in the home country after five months' absence and stepping across a troop-ship gangway into the middle of the conscription crisis, is that Canada has suddenly gone stark, screaming mad.

What currently goes on in parliament and press is no patriotic filibuster but sheer political gangsterism, led by men ready to divide and destroy Canada if in the process they can also kill King.

Give them their heads and they will destroy Canada, ruin our hope of nationhood, at the hour when we stand not merely at the portal of peace, but at the gateway of our country's greatness

If to hold us together he has compromised, attempting to hold the scales in balance between us, let us thank whatever gods we profess (and most of the leaders of the anti-King claque have no god but Mammon) that we have a leader who cherishes the unity of Canada, for without unity we perish, even in the hour of victory.

I agree very much with what he says.

At the beginning of this debate the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) placed on record the position taken by the Labour Progressive party on this issue. As a member of that party I wish to endorse all that he has said, and in calling attention to the contributions made to the war by the people of the province of Quebec I also wish to associate myself with his remarks.

What I am going to say now I naturally say as a westerner and as a member from Saskatchewan, but the more I think about these things the more I realize the similarity between the people all over this country, never mind which province they happen to live in.

Western Canada is very proud of its contribution to this war in food for victory. Besides the thousands of volunteers who have gone from the prairies we had until quite recently about 13,800 draftees. Let me give the house one or two reasons why we had this number. In one part of my country where we have no railways and where the roads are so bad that you cannot travel after a rainy spell, there was in a little town a young blacksmith and an acetylene welder. He had not volunteered because he was needed so desperately in that part of the country for repairing farm implements. Finally he was drafted, and after he was drafted the people of the district sent a petition to me asking if I could get him exempted for a while, because the only other place they could get their implements mended by an acetylene welder was twenty-five or thirty miles away. Therefore I wrote to the board in Saskatchewan and got him an exemption for a while. He went back, and soon afterwards I received a letter from a woman who lived in that district. She was very bitter. She said, "My three sons have already gone, and now this boy is allowed to come back." What hurt her so badly was this: she said, "that boy got the priest of his village to telephone to Ottawa to get all the French-Canadian members to have him exempted." It was I who got his exemption, and I am neither a priest nor French-speaking. But her anxiety and concern over her three boys, and the injustice which she felt because three of hers had gone away, while some also were kept on the farms, were canalized into race hatred and religious prejudice. I regretted it terribly.

I know of a couple of Ukrainian lads who had been the sole workers on their farms ever since they left school, because their fathers were old and unable to work. They did not volunteer. Their families could not live without them. Finally they received notices to be drafted and attend for their medical examinations. They went to the reeve of the village and said, "If we leave home our families will starve; what can we do?" The reeve of that particular area was an English-speaking man. This was after March 22, 1942. Those boys should have been frozen on the farms; they were eligible for such treatment; but the reeve is one of those English-speaking people who used to say, "Let those darned foreigners go; why should our boys fight, while they hide on the farms?"

These things are very bad. I am sorry that among a certain section of our English-speaking people there is a tendency to consider they are a little superior if they think as Britishers, when they should realize that their greatest duty, no, not their duty, their greatest privilege should be to think first and always as Canadians. Only a small percentage of them are involved in this kind of thing, but they have stirred up antagonism and prevented many a good boy from volunteering.

Of course these things are the result of mistakes in government policy for which the cabinet must take full responsibility. I am not trying to absolve the government from blame. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has made mistakes, so has Mr. Roosevelt, so has Mr. Churchill. Churchill is making an awful mistake right now in interfering in Greece and in Belgium. But I say with confidence that if the democratic forces in any country are sufficiently strong and vigilant and courageous, they can and will correct the mistakes of leaders. That can be done. We must blame ourselves to some extent if in our war effort there have been inequalities and injustices which have provided fertile ground for those who now seek to stir up disunity in this country for their own political ends.

I regret as much as any French-speaking person in this country the slanderous attacks which have been made upon the people of the province of Quebec during this crisis, and I want the French-speaking people of Canada to know there are many English-speaking people in this country whose greatest desire is to persist in trying to keep alive and build the unity of our two great nations into a greater and a finer Canadianism. It is quite possible that with wiser policies earlier in the war our whole country might have accepted conscription. If we had had or if we had created a basis of real economic and social equality in the province of Quebec and the rest of Canada we might all of us have accepted conscription, on the basis of each man's fitness to become either a fighter, a food producer or a producer of war materials. In this way we would have had an army whose size was regulated by our ability to have behind that army the food producers and the producers of war materials, and too great commitments by way of an army would have been avoided. But the government did not do that. Perhaps they could not do it; at the time it was not possible to estimate these things. But I still maintain that we could have done better than we did.

Now the situation is different. We are nearing the end of this war, and I am one of those who, after sitting through these public sittings and the secret sitting, feel that the man who built the Canadian Army, and who is now our new Minister of National Defence (Mr. McNaughton), is the man who will not let that army down. I have great confidence in him. But I will say this: I hope sincerely that if there remain, among the high command within the ranks of the army, any officers who think more of their allegiance to the Tory party than they do of Canada, General McNaughton will see to it that they never have another opportunity of disturbing the confidence of our boys and of this nation. As to those who resigned from their positions of trust, which they should have held during this crisis, I think we are well rid of them, and if there are any others like them I hope they will be relieved of their duties.

Why did the Progressive-Conservative party create a political crisis when the problem of reinforcements arose? In my opinion it was because they have seen that the people of Canada are on the march, because they have seen the beginning of reforms during the early part of this present session; and how they have hated them! You will remember the crusade which has been waged by the Tory premier of Ontario against family allowances. That should indicate the stand of the Tories toward reform. What a blow to the great Canadian Pacific interests in this country that we should have decided that Trans-Canada Air Lines, a government-owned company, should control Canadian airways after this war! These Tories see in the new industrial bank and in our farm credit arrangements a threat to the chartered banks and to the trusts whose mouthpiece they are. Those were the real issues over which the Tory party was concerned The reinforcement issue was but a patriotic cloak in which they wrapped themselves to strut before the Canadian people. If there is one thing more than any other calculated to upset the magnificent efforts of our war workers, our farmers, and all our people, including the boys overseas, it is to plunge and precipitate this country into an orgy of hysterical campaigning on the question of conscription, at this date, so near the winning of the war.

There are some westerners, I believe, who, because the Tory party is discredited in the west, say, "Oh, well, the Tories, if they go before the people with an honest presentation of their programme, could not possibly win an election." I think this recent Tory manoeuvre should teach them that it is quite possible for the Progressive-Conservatives to try to force an election on a dishonest issue, and in that way to win thousands of honest people to their support who fail to see what is behind this cloak of patriotism. Such in my opinion is their present manoeuvre, and I am happy to know that at least for the time being it is foiled.

It has been said in the past, and truly said, that patriotism sometimes becomes the last refuge of scoundrels. In my opinion nothing so closely approaching fascist tactics has ever been witnessed in Canada, and I hope very much that I never again have to sit in this chamber and witness another exhibition of mob rowdyism and speaking to the galleries such as we had to listen to when the spokesmen of the Tory party were questioning General McNaughton. It was a disgraceful exhibition.

The industrial workers of Canada have already seen the truth behind this crisis; and on my desk, and I know on the desk of the Prime Minister because I have received copies of them, are a good many resolutions from the organized trades unions of Canada—from both the province of Quebec and the rest of Canada—supporting the government's action at this time. From both the province of Quebec and the rest of Canada, among broad sections of our people, among the industrial workers, farmers, business and professional men and white-collar workers, there is seen the great necessity for maintaining unity in Canada.

It is true that order in council 8891 is a compromise. It is more than some French-speaking people feel they should be called upon to support; it is a little less than some English-speaking people feel is necessary. But do the French and English battalions on the fighting fronts squabble as to which of them should bear most of the brunt of battle? No. Together they do the job that has to be done. It is an example that we might well follow here on the home front.

This order in council does ensure, first of all, reinforcements to the men. Second, it does leave room for what I hope will be a great voluntary movement of young men in this country toward the army. Third, a thing I am more happy about than anything else, it destroys utterly and defeats for the time being the Tory manoeuvre.

When victory is assured, this country will welcome an election. It will be good to have one, to go again to the people with the real issues that face them—yes, not conscription, but the real issues that face the people. The programme discussed then will be what kind of government will direct our foreign and domestic policies in the years to come after the war to bring the kind of peace for which we have fought.

At the next election, from wide sections of our people representatives will be elected from the ranks of organized labour, from farmers, from people's parties like the C.C.F., the Labour Progressive party, the Social Credit party, and they must work together with that section of progressive forces within the Liberal party who will work for international collaboration for the maintenance of peace and for the continuance of our markets and our trade as well as for reforms on the home front, to bring social security to our people. Together such forces can isolate and destroy and send down to oblivion this Tory gang. If those forces in this country who want progress, who feel that it is time to leave the status quo and go forward, work together they can help to keep peace, to extend our markets, to increase farm income, to continue jobs and employment and to give us a national health scheme, better pensions for old age and for the blind as well as for our mothers, and they can rebuild our city and rural slums and provide better education.

If we do these things we shall have achieved something great and Canada will have taken a great step forward. It will not be socialism. No; but it will be a step forward, and that is what eighty or ninety per cent of our people in Canada are willing and ready to do; it is what they want. Such forces working together can lead our nation forward with the rest of the world to progress and security. It is in the best interests of Canada's fighting people here and abroad; it is in the best interests of unity; it is in the best interests of our people, which are so far above political considerations, that, I say, Mr. Speaker, every honest person in this house to-night should support the motion of the Prime Minister.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (MacLeod): Following the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) as I do, with the type of speech which I shall make, I do not expect to receive the same applause from the Liberal government or the Liberal benches as she has been given, and in making the type of speech I am going to make I want no reflection to be cast upon my patriotism. I will say to my hon. friend that the Labour Progressive party in this country has no corner on patriotism. Furthermore, I would simply make this statement in all kindness, that if patriotism is the refuge of scoundrels I should like to know where the communists were when Great Britain had her back against the wall. The term "fascist" is used very often by so-called patriotic speakers. I wish to know where the Labour Progressive party were, the communists, when fascism was riding roughshod over France and over the lowlands, and when the battle of Britain was on.

In this debate I realize that the issue before us is one of the most serious that perhaps this parliament has ever had before it. We are living in serious times and dealing with tremendous problems. The problems and the times, being what they are, do not permit of anyone, much less the government which is facing those problems, playing the game of politics, toying with the feelings of the people, the lives of the men and the destiny of the nation.

It is with this in mind that I have to decide whether or not I am to vote confidence in the present administration. The present situation with which this parliament is faced is, I believe, the result of a series of political moves which the leader of the present administration has made over the past year. I am not going to take a lot of time to go into all the details of the past, but perhaps I have only to go back to 1940 when parliament was called in the regular way and sat for half a day, whereupon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) sent us all back home on the flimsy pretence that a resolution had been passed in the Ontario legislature, and when asked why he had called us here anyway the the answer was: Oh, well, of course, he had made a great promise that he would not go to the country without first calling parliament. At that time we were fighting a war, but the election was called. May I say that that election was fought on the basis of a "no conscription" issue, and when the Prime Minister was returned to power with the biggest majority that this country has ever seen it was because he promised the country that he would not tolerate conscription.

It is all very well to talk about the way the war has gone; it is all very well to talk about these things now, but I ask the simple question: Did the Prime Minister not know at that time that we were face to face with one of the most powerful war machines the world has ever seen? He should have known it, because he was Secretary of State for External Affairs at the time. He had gone over to Germany himself, although if he went on a Cooks' tour they would not show him all that. The group with whom I have the honour to be associated recognized the danger. We went to the country too; to the best of our ability we portrayed the truth as we saw it, and that was that since we had declared war on the greatest war machine the world has ever seen we would need every available dollar, every available part of our national resources as well as every man in his proper place. However, the Prime Minister's party was returned. Some of us got back; some of us did not. Then in 1942 when the battle of Britain was on—the nazis had walked roughshod through France and the Netherlands—the war was going seriously against us and something had to be done. Public opinion had undergone a change and so the bright idea was thought up to put over a plebiscite in this country. However, it was not until Britain had been driven from continental Europe that public opinion turned that way. The plebiscite was put on, and may I say it was a plebiscite which nobody seemed to understand. When we were discussing what should be on the ballot, the question on which the people of Canada would have to vote, it was an open secret that the cabinet had burned the midnight oil in an attempt to put a proper question on the ballot paper. Eventually they put that question to which I am inclined to think the right hon. the Prime Minister is accustomed, a question that can be read and interpreted in any way he wishes it to be interpreted.

I would suggest that there are not a half dozen people in Canada to-day who can tell you what was on the ballot paper during the plebiscite. It was not intended that anyone should understand it. As a matter of fact, when some hon. members of this group moved an amendment to the question on the ballot paper in order to clarify the thing we received the answer: Oh, no, no, that could not be done; and the government side of the house voted against any clarification of it.

Speaking of plebiscites, may I digress for a moment to tell the house that I put over a plebiscite of my own.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Did it cost a million and a half?

Mr. HANSELL: No, it did not; it cost a few dollars. When I recognized that we would have to come to this session of parliament and that the question to be decided was whether or not we should conscript the draftees, I immediately circularized my constituency. I should say that I did not write to everybody; I have a mailing list of nearly one thousand names, not all of them my supporters, although, of course, most of them are. I sent out a little card. I will send it over to the Prime Minister so that he can see it. One side of the card reads:

Dear sir or madam:

Parliament has been hurriedly called in special session to discuss and vote on the manpower problem. In order to know the feeling of my constituency in this matter I would appreciate having you mark the back of this card with either "yes" or "no" to the question asked. This will help me to vote according to the majority wishes of my riding. You may sign your name if you wish, although this is not necessary. . . .

The question on the reverse side was not the type of question that was put on the plebiscite of 1942. This was one that the people could understand:

Are you in favour of conscripting draftees for military services overseas? Mark yes or no.

There you have it, no bones about it, no quibbling, no getting around it, under it or over it, "yes" or "no." Quite a number of these have been returned, and I find that between ninety and ninety-one per cent told me to vote "yes," while between nine and ten per cent said, "no." I must be fair to those who indicate "no" votes. Many of them, besides sending in their card, wrote to me to explain their position, and I will say that most of the letters I received explaining the "no" vote were sensible letters. The people who wanted to tell me why they did not want the draftees conscripted were people, some of whom I knew, whose judgment I could trust. Some of the arguments in the letters I regarded as sound. I am not going to say that there are not two sides to this question. I believe those who said, "no" did have some argument, and I am not wholly out of accord with my Quebec friends on this. I think they have an argument too. And may I say when we are talking about this national unity, I am just as concerned about the national unity of this country as anyone else is, and I am just as concerned about the future of this country as anyone else is.

Let me get back to the main thread of my speech. When the plebiscite of 1942 was put over on this country what did the Liberal party do? Did they simply leave it with the people to vote "yes" or "no"? They did not. They went throughout the country urging everyone to vote "yes." They went throughout the country urging everyone to place upon them the responsibility of conscription for overseas when that time became necessary. They did that. They invited responsibility. The question is, why were they so anxious to get a "yes" vote in 1942 when they were not prepared to implement the "yes" vote as long after as November 22, 1944? Another question: the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country cries out, "Anarchy, anarchy, anarchy!" Did he not know that there might be a possibility of such a thing when he was calling on the people of 1942 to vote "yes" for the conscription of men for overseas service? Why cry "anarchy" now? A couple of years or so too late, I fancy.

Parliament was summoned in consequence thereof and the government brought down their national resources mobilization bill. That was supposed to implement the plebiscite vote. I refer to bill No. 80. That was simply another attempt to lead the people to believe that the Liberal party were about to do something.

I want the house to note a most significant thing. When bill No. 80 was brought down in 1942 the Prime Minister said, "I am not going to put this bill into effect until I get a vote of confidence from this parliament." I maintain that that promise has been broken, and I will tell hon. members how. When parliament was summoned a week or two ago it was summoned for the purpose of voting confidence in the Prime Minister's voluntary system. He was calling parliament to seek endorsation of his position as against the position taken by the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston). That was what it was all about.

The funny thing about it is that the right hon. gentleman recognized that he would have difficulty in getting the confidence of his own party in his voluntary system. Before asking parliament for a vote of confidence to give effect to bill No. 80 as he said he would, he passes an order in council while parliament is sitting right under his nose. I ask: why this strange procedure? The only answer I can find is that it was a political expedient to keep his party and cabinet together.

Now a word with respect to the resignation of the former minister of national defence. When the Minister of National Defence reported conditions overseas to the government why did not the Prime Minister tell the country the truth about the situation? Why did he not go on the air, for instance? Spot announcements could have been made that the Prime Minister of Canada wanted to talk to the nation on a particular night, or something of that kind. I would not have objected to a little build-up for the Prime Minister on an occasion of that kind. Why did he not say to the country, now, fellow Canadians, my minister has brought back a report from the fighting fronts that the situation there is so-and-so and so-and-so; he informs me this and that; now, fellow Canadians, on the basis of what my minister has told me I am afraid I shall have to call parliament together in order to get their confidence, for the time has now come to put bill No. 80 into effect.

If the Prime Minister had done that, not only would he have been able to gather unto himself not only the confidence of the people of Canada, he would have had their admiration as well. What did he do instead? When the thing began to boil, when the former minister of national defence was out of office, the people began to weigh the situation and ask, What is all this about? The Prime Minister then went on the air, taking the attitude that he must play safe with his party. He went on the air and attempted to justify his position as against that of the former minister of national defence.

The Prime Minister may argue against that if he wishes, and as I think he tried to do the other day when the question of the circularizing of his speech by the war information board was before the house. We were told that this was an attempt to get Canada to stand behind him when he was calling for volunteers. I should like to read one or two statements the Prime Minister made when talking over the air. The first was:

> I now come to the question: Is there an adequate reserve of reinforcements for the army? In the opinion of the military authorities, no difficulty is likely to arise except in relation to reinforcements for the infantry. Infantry reinforcements have been adequate to meet requirements to date. But, during his recent visit to the army overseas, Colonel Ralston learned that to provide replacements for future casualties at present rate, the flow of infantry reinforcements from Canada should be accelerated. One fact needs to be emphasized. There is not an overall shortage of potential reinforcements. Many thousands of men are in training now and enlistments are continuing at an encouraging rate. Because we cannot tell how long the war may last, we must, as long as a possible need may arise, continue to recruit men for the army to keep up the supply of reinforcements. But recent recruits and those who enlist from now on will not be available until they are trained.

Colonel Ralston's report to the government disclosed an immediate problem which had to be faced. That problem is to find the means of speeding up the flow of fully trained infantry reinforcements to meet, not an actual shortage of reinforcements now, but a possible shortage in the next few months.

Is that not designed to support the Prime Minister's position against the position of his former minister of national defence?

The question many of you will ask at once, is: why not send overseas some of the draftees who are fully trained in Canada under the National Resources Mobilization Act?

That will seem to many of you the easiest way of meeting the problem. It is not, however, in accord with the policy of keeping our army overseas a 100 per cent voluntary army if we possibly can. The voluntary system of raising our overseas forces has produced splendid results during five years of war. We have always believed that Canada's forces, having begun as voluntary forces, would be more effective, and that the country would be more united in their support, if we continued to rely upon the voluntary system for reinforcements as long as the voluntary system continued to be effective.

Is that paragraph not designed to state the government's position over against that of the former minister? How much more do I have to read?

Colonel Ralston had grave doubts of our ability to keep up the flow of reinforcements in the next few months by voluntary means. He considered, therefore, that he had no alternative but to recommend that draftees should be sent overseas as reinforcements.

Is that not designed to argue his position over against that of the former minister of national defence?

When I realized that unless Colonel Ralston's recommendation were accepted by the cabinet, his resignation would follow, I felt it to be my duty as Prime Minister to seek the most expert advice I believed to be available.

Is that not designed to substantiate the Prime Minister's position over against that of his former minister? And again:

It is important to remember that the former minister of national defence and the present minister have precisely the same objective in view; they differ only as to the means of reaching that goal.

Is that not designed to substantiate the government's position over against that of his former minister? To be fair I must say this, too, that before the Prime Minister concluded he did bring forward a passionate appeal for the country to support him in his call for volunteers. I shall read the last part of his speech:

It is the government's responsibility to make the decision as to the best methods of supporting Canada's army overseas. No decision could possibly please everyone. We have made the decision which we believe will best support the army and contribute most effectively to an utmost national effort in the winning of the war. But to achieve these ends, we shall need the help and cooperation of the people as a whole.

It is true that that appeal was put out to the people. If the Prime Minister states that this essentially was an appeal for the support of his voluntary system and not an argument pitting his judgment against that of his colleague, then all I say is this, that if he now has to admit that his appeal failed that is an admission that the country did not have confidence in him.

We were called here on November 22. The correspondence between the Prime Minister and his former minister of national defence was read. It took the greater part of an afternoon to read it. That night the crisis came, and that crisis was a party crisis. On the basis of that party crisis an order in council was passed reversing the policy the government had held just a few hours before. When next day I questioned the Prime Minister as to whether, if he had passed this order in council when the former minister had reported to him on his return from overseas, his resignation would have been necessary, I could not get an answer for a few minutes. I did not get one until I insisted, and then just what was the answer? The answer was —well, I was going to use a term which I shall not use, because I must be polite. I shall use a term the former minister of national defence used, and say that the Prime Minister's answer was simply nonsense. He said that you cannot tell now what you might have been able to do a month or two months previously. As a matter of fact, it was only three weeks prior to that that the minister had resigned, and only two weeks prior to that that the Prime Minister had gone on the air.

Had the situation changed in those three weeks? Had the ranks overseas been depleted in those three weeks, or in the two weeks between the broadcast and the order in council? Were the men overseas finding it less difficult or more difficult? Had anything changed in respect of the reinforcements situation? I think no. There was only one change, and that was a change in the attitude of the people of Canada, and the attitude of certain ranks within the Liberal party.

Then, must I conclude that this order in council was passed because the reinforcement situation demanded it, or because there was a split in his party, and because his cabinet demanded it? Am I now to vote confidence in a government of that kind?

Just another word concerning the resignation. Subsequent events have proved that the resignation of the former minister of national defence would not have been necessary if the Prime Minister had been honest with the people of Canada—well, I should not say "honest"; I will say that it would not have been necessary if he had been fair with the people of this country, when the report was given to him by his minister.

Therefore I say this, that my view of this whole debate from the beginning is that the fate of the government very largely hinged on which way the former minister of national defence was going to put his support. What did he do? Well, he did, I believe, the gentlemanly thing. He proved his case, and then said, "I am not going to break with the Prime Minister and my party. I am voting confidence in him." The strange thing about it is that the former minister of national defence is the one man who has very largely saved the Prime Minister and the Liberal party from disgrace. And another strange thing about it is that he is the man who was fired. Am I now going to turn around and be asked to vote confidence in that government?

Now a word about the motion of the Prime Minister. It was placed on the Votes and Proceedings before the order in council was passed. I maintain that when the motion was placed there the Prime Minister was seeking the confidence of this house on his voluntary system. The order in council was then passed, but the motion has not been changed, and now the Prime Minister seeks the confidence of the house for his partial conscription policy. Personally, I fail to see how a motion which was designed to seek the confidence of the House of Commons in the government's voluntary system, can now be used for a vote of confidence from the house on the government's conscription policy. I fail to see that; it is not logical.

I am not going to vote for what I call a double-barreled motion. Read it for yourselves. We have read it several times, but let us read it again:

> That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

What does that mean? It means he has got you both going and coming. It is going to be heck if you do and heck if you don't. If you vote against the motion, because you have not confidence in the government, what will some go out and say? They will say, "See those men? Well, they voted against the policy the Prime Minister wanted to bring in so as to reinforce the troops overseas." And if you vote in favour of the motion the people in my constituency and in yours, and all the rest of them, will say, "See those men there? Well, they voted confidence in the government." So it is heck if you do, and heck if you don't. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is a double-barreled motion and, so far as I am concerned, I am not going to be forced to have to choose which barrel to look down, and especially when I do not know which trigger he is going to pull.

May I now say a word about voting confidence in the government? Since when, under our party system, did the present Prime Minister ever want to plead with anyone in the opposition to vote confidence in him? It is a different matter when his own ranks are beginning to be depleted. Is he now coming to the opposition and saying, Please come over and help me; vote confidence in me, and fill up my depleted ranks? Well, hon. gentlemen, you may vote confidence if you wish—but please excuse me.

Now the Prime Minister cries "anarchy"; he cries "election", and the danger of being without a government. Well, since when did the Prime Minister become so concerned about when he should hold an election? If he comes to the opposition now and says, "Do not hold an election now; I do not want to hold an election now, because it would be suicide in Canada to do so." If he puts up the big bogey man, I say, What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. When he does want to hold an election why does he not come to us and say: Gentlemen, I want to know if it is right for me to hold an election now? It must work both ways. I do not want to be mean with the Prime Minister; I know that he has a tremendous burden and I sympathize with him in his position. Upon his shoulders is the responsibility of running Canada's part in the war. All I am going to say is that it is my firm conviction that when it comes to an election—

Mr. GRANT: He will win.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know. Perhaps the Prime Minister will win. I was not careful enough about my little pauses that time. I was going to say that when it comes to an election the Prime Minister will not think twice about the day of holding it so long as he thinks it is a good day for him. He would hold it on Christmas day or to-morrow or any day next month if he thought that was a good day for him. I would not be surprised if there was an election before we are supposed to resume here on January 31. If it suits the Liberal party the election will be called; do not worry about that.

Another cry is: Reinforcements are needed and we cannot hold them up. Who is holding up reinforcements? Did it hold up reinforcements in the United States when they held an election there last month? Did it hold up reinforcements when Australia, New Zealand and South Africa went to the polls?

Another thing I noticed was that one of the great orators of the Liberal party and, I am told, one of Canada's leading criminal lawyers was asked yesterday: Why would reinforcements be held up if there was an election? Personally, I do not want an election; it makes no difference to me when the election comes. But what answer did that gentleman give to the question? He said, "Of course reinforcements will be held up. How do you suppose the country can be run with the leader sitting behind the clock?" What sort of answer is that? Would this gentleman, one of Canada's leading criminal lawyers, take that kind of answer from a prisoner in the dock to a question from him? As a matter of fact, I think the Prime Minister has been behind the clock for a good many years. One of my colleagues told me that actually the Prime Minister is behind the calendar. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister has given birth to a monstrosity, and what he now wants to do is to put it upon the doorstep of the opposition.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: Apparently there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. HANSELL: I shall require only a minute, Mr. Speaker, but if I have not unanimous consent my hon. friend the member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) will move the amendment I had intended to move, and then I shall ask the privilege to speak upon it.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman is proceeding to move an amendment he might be allowed to move it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was speaking of a monstrosity. I think he should be allowed to dispose of it, Mr. Speaker. I hope the house will agree to allow the hon. member to put his motion.

Mr. HANSELL: I shall take only a minute.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not now.

Mr. SPEAKER: I called attention to the fact that the hon. member's time had expired and I asked the house if it gave unanimous consent to his proceeding, but there was violent dissent to his continuing his remarks. Therefore the hon. gentleman cannot proceed.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, and I hope I shall not run over my forty minutes because, as you know, I usually do not take that long. But we feel that it is necessary under the circumstances to move an amendment, so that I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) that the motion be amended, as follows:

1. By inserting after the word "house", where it appears in the first line, the following words: "while not being requested to support all the policies of the government".

2. By deleting all the words following the word "government" and substituting therefor the following

"in sending immediately adequate reinforcements to our men overseas, and will also aid the government at all such times as it wages a vigorous war effort against the totalitarian powers; an effort consistent with Canada's ability and position in the world."

The motion will then read:

That this house, while not being requested to support all the policies of the government, will aid the government in sending immediately adequate reinforcements to our men overseas, and will also aid the government at all such times as it wages a vigorous war effort against the totalitarian powers; an effort consistent with Canada's ability and position in the world.

The reasons why we desire to move this amendment to the main motion have been stated clearly by the hon. member for Macleod. As the main motion now reads, it is impossible to know what is required of the house. It reminds us very much of the motion that was put at the time of the plebiscite. We did not consider at that time that the question which was put to the public was intelligible. We did not think it was fair. Certainly there was confusion all over the country over it. At the time the plebiscite was held, nobody in the country understood what it was about, not even the members of this house. I recall that even in this house the members of the government did not know what it was about. It was definitely stated by the former minister of national defence that the government itself did not know; at least some of them were not clear on the issue. Now, surely our English language is not so lacking in words to make things clear and explicit to the public.

Had I been prepared to speak here this evening I could have quoted contradictions in the Prime Minister's speech which would be clear evidence of the fact that one cannot put too great trust in the wording of that motion. Accordingly it is our intention that the amendment which we have offered shall clarify the whole problem. It will permit hon. members who desire to support the government in a clear and unmistakable position to know exactly what they are voting for. Certainly there is not a member of the group to which I have the honour to belong that is not fully in favour of sending all the reinforcements necessary to our troops overseas, and I doubt if there are many hon. members who are of a different opinion on that matter. But we are not in favour of supporting the government in all its policies; I would hate to be associated with some of those which the government has undertaken. I would hate to be associated with the attitude which this government and other parties represented in this house took at the time war broke out, in 1939. I recall only too vividly our stand here when we asked for an all-out war effort. We stood alone at that time, and when the plebiscite came on we were criticized here because of our action, but we were the only party in Canada which went out and explained the facts as we understood them to the people. We were the only party, I repeat, which, when the plebiscite was taken, explained the facts to the people and, in conformity with the practices of a democratic country, said to them, "You tell us how you want us to vote," and abided by that decision. The rest of the membership of this house went out and told the people to vote "yes", and when they did vote "yes", some of them came back to the house and voted against the passing of bill 80, contrary to the decision democratically registered by the people. It may be that there was an excuse for them: they could justly say, nobody knew what it was about. The purpose of this amendment to the main motion is to put the question fairly and squarely not only before the members of this house but before all the people of Canada. We are only too anxious to send all the needed reinforcements, but we do not think we should be compelled, as the hon. member for Macleod said, to vote for a two-barreled resolution, when you do not know which trigger the Prime Minister is going to pull, although you can depend upon it that he will pull the one which suits him.

The amendment which we have made does not in any way deflect from the policy of sending reinforcements, but it does make the issue clear. The Prime Minister said in the course of his speech that to vote for his motion did not imply support of all the government policies, but the motion does not so state, and our amendment is intended to clarify that position and make it clear to hon. members that by voting to send the required reinforcements they will not be obligated to vote confidence in the other policies of the government.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have only a word to say with respect to the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). I shall not inflict another forty-minute speech on the house. As I said before, I do not like the wording of the motion standing in the name of the Prime Minister and yet, realizing the tremendous problem he has, I wish to give him all the support I can. I am speaking now for myself and not for my group; my group can vote the way they want to; but I am not going to vote confidence in the government on the basis of the present motion standing in the name of the Prime Minister. He may not want my little vote; it may not make a particle of difference—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Not very much.

Mr. HANSELL: —nevertheless my vote is going to be determined on the basis of what the Prime Minister wants to do with the amendment. All I am asking the Prime Minister to do is to take one tiny step, a step which will readjust this motion, whereby he will put into the motion what he promised in his speech, namely, that he was not demanding the house to vote confidence in all the administration did. The next is a slight addition which says that we will also support his government in waging "a vigorous war effort against the totalitarian powers"; and it adds this, too, "at all such times" as it wages a vigorous war effort, because I do not think we should be forced to vote confidence in the government in carrying on its war effort and let it carry on just as it wants to; it is to be "at all such times as it wages a vigorous war effort" that we will support them. Then there is this little addition. You know there is an opinion in Canada that we embarked upon too ambitious a war programme. I do not know whether we did or not, but I do not think we should be called upon to do more than our share in a world war. Other nations are at war on our side. So that we are merely adding, "an effort consistent with Canada's ability and position in the world." It is a slight change. Personally I will give the government every possible weight of support I can in my own small way if they will reword their motion, and this amendment is exactly what that will do. If they vote against this amendment I cannot vote confidence in the government.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, to-night we are called upon to pass judgment on a motion of confidence moved by the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in support of the direct enforcement of the conscription act for overseas service. After all, it is purely and simply a vote for or against conscription.

Many amendments and subamendments have been moved. This afternoon, we have voted on the progressive-conservative party's amendment which involved conscription for overseas service and, together, with the members of our group, I voted against that amendment because we are opposed to conscription.

We have also had to vote on a subamendment moved by the hon. member for Montreal-Mercier (Mr. Jean). I voted for that subamendment although I did not like its wording and I did not agree with its full purport; I supported it only because it expressed some blame against the government for having resorted to conscription for overseas service. That is the sole meaning of the vote cast by myself and the members of our group on that subamendment; it was a vote against conscription. But it seems to me that, at this stage of the proceedings, it would be advisable to put an end to the moving of amendments and subamendments, because the house has had several opportunities to vote for or against conscription on an amendment and a subamendment and it should now have an opportunity to vote on the motion of confidence moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister, which also implies a vote for or against conscription. Further amendments can but create confusion in the mind of the public and, for my part, I would agree to all amendments and subamendments which will be introduced from now on being set aside by the Speaker.

I wish to reply to a statement made by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) in his speech of last Monday. He declared that the only two members who had voted against participation in the war—he said voted mind you—were Mr. Liguori Lacombe, member for Laval-Two-Mountains, and Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix, member for Quebec-Montmorency. Not only is this statement at variance with the facts, but it may unfairly lead the public to believe that only the member for Laval-Two-Mountains and the member for Quebec-Montmorency have opposed Canada's participation in the war. I do not intend to deal at length with that matter, but I shall merely report the facts as published in Hansard, the official record of the debates of the house.

In September, 1939, after England had declared war, a special session of Parliament was called. On September 7, the speech from the throne was read to the house and the debate was adjourned until the next day. On that very next day, as soon as the house had met, I took the first formal step against Canada's participation in military operations abroad by tabling a petition signed by thousands of people opposed to Canadian participation in any extra-territorial war; I refer to page 6 of Hansard where the following petition is recorded:

Petition

Opposition to participation by Canada in any extraterritorial war

Mr. Maxime Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I desire to lay on the table a petition signed by thousands of citizens against participation by Canada in any extraterritorial war.

The public can judge whether the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie opposed Canada's participation in the war.

The following day, September 9, when the discussion was resumed, I continued to protest against Canada's participation in a European war, and the text of my speech can be found on page 58 of Hansard. I was the first member from the province of Quebec to speak in the house against Canada's participation in the present war.

The debate on the speech from the throne ended the evening of September 9. Shortly before ten o'clock, after having ascertained the number of members who wished to take part in the debate and having made sure that the discussion was to last until midnight, I went to the editor of Hansard to check up the English translation of a speech I had made in the afternoon.

At about 10.15, or rather, between 10.15 and 10.30, I heard the bell ring and bolted for the house. On my way there, I met members who were coming out and who told me that the debate had abruptly come to an end. Certain hon. members who were listed to speak had decided not to and the debate had suddenly ended without the vote being registered. Now every member of this house is aware that, when a vote is called, the bell rings to summon the members who want to register their vote.

Let us refer to Hansard. We find the following on page 88:

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the main motion. Those in favour of the main motion will please say "aye".

Some hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will say "nay".

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Woodsworth: There were some of us opposed to the main motion.

Mr. Casselman: Only one member rose.

Then the main motion of Mr. Hamilton is read.

Main motion (Mr. Hamilton) agreed to.

The public will judge whether a vote was taken or not.

When the impression is being spread about that only one or two members opposed participation, I point out that Mr. Woodsworth, who was present at that moment, was himself opposed to the main motion, and I wish to remind the house of part of the speech made by Mr. Woodsworth, on September 8, against participation in the war.

I quote the words he used in concluding his speech:

> Yes, I have boys of my own, and I hope they are not cowards, but if any of those boys, not from cowardice but really through belief, is willing to take his stand on this matter and, if necessary, to face a concentration camp or a firing squad, I shall be more proud of that boy than if he enlisted for the war.

I cannot see how it could be inferred that Mr. Woodsworth, the member for Winnipeg North Centre, who had delivered one of the most courageous and energetic speeches heard in this house on that occasion, was not opposed to our participation in the war.

Mr. DUPUIS: (Translation): Germany had not yet invaded Russia at the time.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): On September 11, the acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) brought down estimates amounting to $100,000,000 for war expenditures and requested that the said amount be applied, among other things, to the conduct of naval, military and air operations, in or beyond Canada. This is to be found on page 91 of Hansard, special session of 1939.

On the same day, as reported on page 100 of Hansard, I rose in this house to move an amendment. Here is what I said:

> Mr. Maxime Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Chairman, as I have already stated my attitude against participation of Canada in the present war I shall not at this time make any additional observations. May I therefore propose an amendment to the resolution before the committee. I move to amend the resolution by striking out in subparagraph (b) the words "or beyond".

This means that I did not want the appropriation to be used outside Canada, in a war waged outside Canada.

The amendment was ruled out of order and, a short time after, on the same day, the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McNeil) moved an amendment drawn in approximately the same terms and having the same effect. That amendment can be found on page 103 of Hansard. As can be seen at page 110, there was a vote which was the only one taken during that session; it was recorded while we were sitting in committee on the amendment of Mr. McNeil and the said amendment was negatived by a vote of 151 against and 16 for. Sixteen hon. members thus voted against Canada's participation in the war, ten from the province of Quebec and six from other provinces. My hon. friend the member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent) was included among those from the province of Quebec.

I have no intention of commenting on the facts which I have just mentioned, but I was anxious to state in this house, so that the public may know, from the official record of the house, what happened at the time and in order that should some one claim that the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, whom I do not want to deprive of the credit they deserve, were the only ones who opposed participation in the war, the public may judge whether or not I have from the very beginning been against our participation in the war.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two-Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I did not approve the subamendment presented by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean) and did not approve either the Progressive Conservative amendment. Nor do I approve the main motion. I believe Canada has undertaken a war effort that imperils all our resources. We have no right to sacrifice thus the economy of our nation and the live forces of our manpower. I remain consistent with my principles. I opposed participation and mobilization, and my opinion has not changed in the meantime.

Close to a million Canadians are enlisted in the armed services. Our young men are falling by the thousands on the battlefields of Europe. We are being bled white both by taxation and by demands on our manpower, and this subamendment was asking us to do even more. Those who approved participation and mobilization—they were within their rights—as did the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), could easily feel they were supporting the principle involved when they voted for the subamendment presented by the hon. member for Mercier.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that we have assumed too heavy a burden in this unfortunate adventure which I denounced in this house on September 9, 1939. I knew that our participation in the war would inevitably drag us into conscription. I did all in my power to save our youth from the application of this measure by opposing participation which was to give rise to conscription. In this critical hour, fraught with fearful consequences for Canada, I repeat—with all due deference to the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie—that alone the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) supported me. Always frank, always loyal, always logical, he was again my sole support against conscription on June 19, 1940. If only the members who will vote against the confidence motion of the government now under discussion had supported my amendments against participation and against mobilization, we would have been spared this tragedy and my hon. friends would not now be compelled to express their lack of confidence in their own leader. I shall act as I always did. If I acted otherwise I would not be true to myself and I would belie my whole past.

Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie recalled the hectic debate of September 9, 1939. It's an ill wind that blows nobody good and, unfortunately for the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, there are Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of Canada. Therefore, I quote from page 10 of the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of Saturday, September 9, the following:

> Mr. Lacombe, seconded by Mr. LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency) moved in amendment:
> That the following words be added to the address:
> "That this house regrets that the government did not deem it fitting to advise His Excellency the Governor General that Canada should refrain from participating in war outside of Canada."
>
> And after a debate on that proposed amendment the house divided and the amendment was negatived.
> And the main motion being put to the house was agreed to on division.

Why on division? Because the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, despite his contention to the contrary, refused to rise with the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency and your humble servant to demand a vote on that occasion. And the proof is found in an excerpt from the debates of September 11, 1939, which I shall read. The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie did not protest then. He waited five years to do so.

Mr. Chairman, I assert that, contrary to this newspaper's report—

That was the Montreal Gazette.

—my colleague the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) and myself rose in our places, thereby clearly indicating our desire to have the hon. members of the house record their vote. But, being alone with the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency to have a recorded vote, Mr. Speaker declared the amendment defeated, inasmuch as according to the rules of the house a vote must be demanded by at least five members.

I make this statement, Mr. Chairman, in order to set out the actual facts.

It is again in order to set out the actual facts that I make this correction. When the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie states that he opposed participation in the war, on September 19, 1939, with all due respect, I wonder whether he is in earnest. On that date, war had been declared. With the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, I was among the sixteen members who supported the amendment of the former member, Mr. MacNeil.

A few more words in conclusion. Not only did the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, who provoked this debate—and I must put an end to the legend which has been spreading in the province in the last four years—not only did the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie not support the amendment which I presented September 9, 1939, against participation in the war, but he also refused to support the amendment I moved June 19, 1940, against conscription—for let us not forget that conscription, whether it is labelled mobilization or not, is in effect in Canada since 1940.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): I deny that statement.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): If the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie says he denies this fact, I will once more open his eyes to the truth.

June 19, 1940, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency—

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): We are discussing 1939.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie who always resents interruptions keeps on interrupting me, but I am not complaining because I always like a fight.

June 19, 1940, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, I moved:

> That all the words after "whereas" in the preamble of the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "the government's war policy must be free and voluntary".

Protests were heard to the effect that there was an appeal from the Speaker's ruling. I could not demand the registering of the vote, under the rules of the house, because, once again, only myself and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency stood up. The right hon. the Prime Minister came to our rescue and proposed that the vote be recorded. This was done and you may search in vain, Mr. Speaker, for the name of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie among those who voted against the decision of the Speaker.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): There was no vote on the amendment.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): There was not? There was a vote registered as follows: 202 for; 2 against. Among those two names, I search in vain for that of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie.

A little later, on the same day, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said a few words in this house and the right hon. the Prime Minister rose to say: I did not want to prolong the debate. For a long time, I had been anxious to know the views of certain people. I was convinced that not more than one or two members of the house would vote for the amendment.

It was the right hon. the Prime Minister who made it a matter of principle. Mr. Speaker, I would not, to-night, have raised this point had not the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie started the discussion.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): You had been ready for two days.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): I do say, once again, that such a myth which the "delayed-action, patriots", if I may borrow an apt expression, try to use as a mantle, should be destroyed at all cost. Those are the "pure" and "untouchable" people. Do not ever enter their ranks.

Finally, if the honourable member for Beauharnois-Laprairie has seen fit to assume the responsibility of supporting the amendment moved by the honourable member for Mercier, I shall not begrudge him the liberty to do so. I respect his opinion. He has, in taking such action, followed and maintained the course he has always taken in this house, he has supported participation and mobilization.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): You voted for conscription.

Mr. SPEAKER (Text): I have been considering carefully the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), and seconded by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), but since its terms are so peculiar I thought I should like a little time for its consideration. During the course of this debate I have already had to enunciate the principle that one cannot approve or disapprove the same document, and that it must be considered in its entirety. I have enunciated that doctrine twice, in respect of two amendments. The amendment now before the house says:

> While not being requested to support all the policies of the government.

The form in which that is drawn is rather vague; but vagueness in itself does not make an amendment irrelevant. However, I take it that what is intended by the words is that they do not approve all other policies of the government, and to that extent they express disapproval of the main motion now before the house.

Then the amendment deals with the main motion and states that this house will aid the government—> in sending immediately adequate reinforcements to our men overseas, and will also aid the government at all such times as it wages a vigorous war effort against the totalitarian powers.

That, in effect, is an approval of the main motion. Then, part of the last sentence reads:

> an effort consistent with Canada's ability and position in the world.

In other words it is imposing, or submitting to the house what is a general principle, and is not dealing with the matter in the main motion.

In 1932 the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black), who was then Speaker of the house, was dealing with an amendment then made by the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston), and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). He ruled as follows:

> Amendments to the motion for the approval of a trade agreement ruled out because it partly approved the main motion, was an expanded negative of certain stipulations of the agreement and was declaratory of general principles which can only be approved on certain specified motions.

In the light of that decision, and also because of the phraseology employed in the amendment now before the house, I find that the amendment disapproves the government's policy in the words:

> while not being requested to support all the policies of the government—

And later in the amendment approve the government's policy in the words:

> And will also aid the government at all such times as it wages a vigorous war effort against the totalitarian powers.

And then it imports the general principle:

> An effort consistent with Canada's ability and position in the world.

For these reasons I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, every care was taken to draft this amendment in accordance with the rules. It looks to me as though surely this government resolution should be open to amendment, and that in making your ruling you have rendered it almost impossible to amend the government's resolution. I believe that Your Honour is thereby laying down a principle in parliament which is unsound, and I therefore most respectfully challenge your decision.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. In dealing with this amendment I have considered it only as I view the rules, and not in connection with its merits, as I already said to-day when dealing with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I have carefully considered the amendment, and have come to my conclusion. I cannot allow any discussion of my ruling, except by challenge.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then I most respectfully appeal from Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have ruled the amendment moved by Mr. Johnston, seconded by Mr. Hansell, out of order on the ground that there was imported into it a negative disapproval of the main motion, while in the midst of it there was an approval of the main motion, and in the third place in the last line of the amendment there was enunciated a general principle. I ruled that these were inconsistent and irrelevant, and therefore ruled the amendment out of order.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I made my position clear on this issue when I spoke on November 30, and I do not need to explain it to-night. Nor do I intend to answer the criticism of the stand which some of us have taken that was made by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), because I am willing to let the matter stand and have the people judge on the record of my votes and speeches in this house.

At another stage of these proceedings, however, I moved a subamendment, which was declared out of order. Later on, one was moved by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean), and in the discussion which followed arguments were made by certain hon. members that the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Mercier might not be as clear as they wanted it. Other statements were made to the effect that the wording of the amendment might becloud the issue. Therefore, to clarify the position of those who have supported all the war effort excepting bill 80 and order in council 8891 I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker).

That all the words of the motion after the word "in" in the first line thereof be struck out and the following words substituted therefor:

"a policy of maintaining an efficient war effort but does not approve of compulsory service overseas."

Mr. SPEAKER: This amendment is like those I have already ruled out.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Speaker, may I speak before you give your decision?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. TUCKER: I suggest to Your Honour that the official opposition have been permitted to place their views in the form of an amendment before the house and the country and to vote on it, on a stand of total conscription. The government's policy, as I understand it, is one of limited conscription. If to the main motion of the government, possibly a policy of limited conscription, an amendment advocating total conscription is in order, surely an amendment which opposes conscription altogether should be equally in order; because, once all amendments have been disposed of, surely we have as many rights in this house as the official opposition or Progressive Conservative party. I submit to Your Honour that all we are advocating here is so to modify the declared policy of the government in this resolution as to say that we are not favourable to approving compulsory service overseas.

With regard to Your Honour's suggestion that you cannot approbate and reprobate at the same time; as I have always understood amendments, if they were a complete negative they would not be good amendments. To be a good amendment, an amendment must accept part of the motion and modify it by adding to it or subtracting from it in some way. That, I submit, is in a sense approbating and reprobating at the same time. I submit, as regards this amendment, that this is the first time anyone in this house has had a chance to commit himself definitely on the question whether he is against conscription or for conscription for overseas service. It might be said that the amendment of the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean) gave that opportunity. That subamendment was based upon the premise of the Progressive Conservatives that the voluntary system had broken down, because it reads like this: "That this house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous reinforcements" by doing so-and-so and so-and-so. That subamendment, therefore, was based upon the thesis that the voluntary system had not provided adequate and continuous trained reinforcements. Now, not believing that the voluntary system as handled by this government has failed to provide adequate and continuous trained reinforcements, I could not vote for that subamendment because, had I done so, I would have been voting for something which I did not believe.

I do not believe that the voluntary system did break down, and that is why this amendment to the main motion has been moved. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to this house. It was definitely laid before the people of the country that before this policy of conscription for overseas service should be imposed there would be a chance for this parliament to pronounce upon it, and I say that if this amendment is ruled out of order no opportunity will have been given for the house to pronounce unequivocally whether it is in favour of compulsory service for overseas or not, because the only time that compulsory service for overseas was mentioned it was introduced as an addition to something which the official opposition moved and which stated a position which I did not believe in and which I do not think the majority of the house believed in, namely, that this government had failed to provide adequate and continuous trained reinforcements. I suggest, therefore, that in order to provide an opportunity for parliament and the country to say whether they approve or disapprove conscription the amendment should be ruled in order. It merely modifies the resolution of the government. It does not negative it entirely; it merely states that we support the government in an efficient war effort but do not approve compulsory service overseas.

If we are deprived of the chance of voting for that amendment, I submit that I for one have had no opportunity to give a clean-cut vote on the question whether or not I am in favour of compulsory service overseas. The only chance I had was provided I was willing to condemn at the same time the voluntary system and say that it had broken down.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before the ruling is given, Mr. Speaker, while I do not agree with the subject matter of the amendment, I submit that the argument put forward by the member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) ought to be taken into consideration. I do not believe that any opportunity has been given in this house for members who hold views which are not those of the government to express them in the manner in which we are usually able to express such views, namely by way of motion. I think the argument which the hon. member made in support of the amendment, although I am not in favour of the amendment, is one that is in accordance with the rules of procedure which have been followed in this and in other parliaments for many years, and I submit that, before you give your decision, very careful consideration ought to be given to the representations made by the hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have listened very carefully to the remarks made by the hon. member for Rosthern, to which I have given due consideration, but I am faced with this fact, that this amendment, substantially if not in exact terms, embodies what was contained in the subamendment moved by Mr. Jean and seconded by Mr. Fauteux and which were as follows:

> That all the words of the amendment, after the word reinforcements, be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "by using to the best advantage the general service personnel in Canada and the volunteers overseas without resorting to conscription for service overseas."

The gravamen of that amendment is contained in the last seven words: "without resorting to conscription for service overseas."

I have now an amendment which also contains, as I have said, the gravamen of the amendment moved by Mr. Jean, which states "a policy of maintaining an efficient war effort, but does not approve of compulsory service overseas." That amendment was before the house and was discussed by many members including the hon. member for Rosthern. The house decided against the amendment and it did not carry.

I must state to the hon. member for Rosthern that I cannot approve the amendment now moved. I am bound by and must conform to the will of the house as expressed in the vote which it gave on the subamendment of Mr. Jean, a subamendment which embodied almost in exact terms the amendment now moved. For that reason I must rule the amendment out of order, the house having already decided the question.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish in a very few words to place before the house an amendment which in my opinion is in order. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has placed on the order paper, and we are discussing to-night, a motion which, as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) says, involves the approval by this house of the policies of the government. Now, the Prime Minister in his address to this house on November 27, as reported at page 6608 of Hansard, said:

> What the government is seeking to-day is not an expression of confidence in all of its policies, but we are asking the house to support the administration in giving effect to what has been decided.

The Prime Minister, however, worded the motion in such a way as to give approval to the policies of the government, and while many of us in this house are in complete accord that we should give all the support we can to any government in power for the successful and vigorous prosecution of this war, we are not in support of all the policies of the government involved in this particular resolution.

The Prime Minister made it very clear that, as far as he was concerned, he was thinking only of this particular matter. But, Mr. Speaker, while members of this house may understand that, and the people of Canada even may understand it at the present time, people in the future will take the wording of the resolution; and, as we have been so frequently told in this house, and quite properly, the written word prevails. So that we shall find that in no far-distant future, as I believe, those of us who might vote for this motion because we believe that we should support a vigorous war effort, making available immediately reinforcements from N.R.M.A. men for overseas, will be told that we have voted confidence not only in the government but in the policies of the government; and personally, having criticized those policies from time to time over the past few years, I do not propose to be put in the position of giving my vote to the government on that basis.

In 1940 we passed the National Resources Mobilization Act. In 1942 we amended it. Before the vote was taken on that occasion I urged in this house that what should be done under that amendment, bill No. 80, ought to be done then so that no further delay would lead us in the future to a bitter discussion and division across the country in time of war. To-day we are faced with that bitterness and we have had a long discussion. The National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940 gave the government a great deal of power. It gave the governor in council in these words power that was all inclusive:

> The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of His Majesty in the right of Canada as may be deemed necessary, or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

When to-day we endeavoured to move an amendment which would embody that instruction to carry out the National Resources Mobilization Act as amended we were ruled out of order, and therefore cannot get it before the house and the country in the manner in which we ought to be able to do. Therefore we are in the position to-night of having to choose between supporting the government and all its policies, and voting against this resolution which may be considered to be a resolution endorsing the vigorous prosecution of the war. We voted against the official opposition amendment to-night—

Mr. CASSELMAN: That is where your trouble came in.

Mr. COLDWELL: That amendment was not in the terms we expected because when this house assembled the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) told us that he was going to move an all-inclusive amendment. He said on November 22 that he intended to move:

> That this house is of the opinion that the full provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act should be put into effect forthwith. . . .

Mr. GRAYDON: And that is what this amendment calls for.

Mr. COLDWELL: And that all persons should place their property and every other service they had at the disposal of the government. He went on to say:

> . . . and that all trained troops in the Canadian home defence army should immediately be dispatched for reinforcements overseas.

I presume that the alteration was made afterwards because of the implications of his first motion; for the second amendment which we voted upon to-night was in terms entirely different from that which we expected from what he said on November 22. His amendment of November 27, which we voted on to-night, was as follows:

> This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice.

They are altogether different. This motion is a different thing altogether from that which we expected. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am going to move an amendment, a very simple one, which I believe is in order. We always have the right to add to a motion, although under the rulings that have been made we have been limited in that right. We have the right, however, to delete from a motion, and I am going to move that certain words be deleted in order that this house may express itself as being in favour of the prosecution of the war and a vigorous war effort. My amendment will not place the house in the position of having to endorse the policies of the government. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that the motion be amended by deleting the words "its policy of", so that as a consequence the motion would read:

> That this house will aid the government in maintaining a vigorous war effort.

We can not support its policies, but we are prepared to support the government in maintaining a vigorous war effort or, indeed, any other government that may be in power during the course of this great war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to accept the amendment of my hon. friend. It is entirely what I mean.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Many arguments have been placed before this house since the discussion began. I may say now that anything I do before the conclusion of this part of the session will be for one specific purpose, namely, to see that reinforcements are sent to the men overseas just as soon as it is possible to get them there. The amendment that has just been moved places an entirely different construction on the motion moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I am going to read a few quotations from the Prime Minister's speech of November 27 last. They will show that there are certain contradictions in it, and that it placed us in an unenviable position when it came to a vote on this particular motion. At page 6610 of Hansard I find this:

I hope this House of Commons will keep in mind what it is they are here being asked to do. Let me follow my notes closely in this: It is to support the men overseas, and nothing more than that. . . .

Then, on page 6611 of Hansard we find this:

That is the issue before the house. It is not the question of conscription; it is the question as to whether the present government should continue to conduct Canada's war effort, or whether the direction of that effort should be handed over at this stage of the war to another administration.

Then further along, at page 6613, we find the following:

That motion, as I have already said, does not, as I have been careful to state, mean that the government is asking for confidence in all its policies; it does mean very clearly that we are asking for the support of the House of Commons, which we shall need to secure the needed reinforcements to support the men overseas at this time of war as well as our other war-time policies. That is all that it calls for.

Then further along, at page 6617 he had this to say:

Let me say of this motion, it does not ask for approval of order in council P.C. 8891. That order was enacted in strict conformity with Bill 80 and the government's authority to take such action was specifically approved by the vote on Bill 80 in 1942. The issue of conscription is not being decided by this vote; it was settled two years ago.

The motion does not ask for an unlimited vote of confidence in the government. To do so would be unfair to political opponents of the government who nevertheless are willing to aid the government in the vigorous prosecution of the war.

Then further on, the Prime Minister had this to say:

The motion does ask, and asks only, whether members are prepared to support the government in continuing to carry on Canada's war effort at this time.

Any member who votes against this motion is asking to have the present administration resign, and another administration immediately take its place.

That statement by the Prime Minister placed the members in a most peculiar position, one in which I did not wish to be placed. As stated by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) earlier this evening, if you do you get heck, and if you do not you get heck anyway.

[Mr. Fair.]

There are a number of reasons why more of our men have not gone active. Canada has made a wonderful contribution up to the present, but a better contribution would have been made had some of the wrongs that have been done been corrected. Even though we have on the statute books quite a lot of good legislation, since receiving letters from men who have been released from service in the armed forces I am wondering whether the administration of this legislation will be in the interests of the men being discharged or whether the treasury or the government of the country will be taken into consideration in the administration of this particular legislation.

I believe that if the returned men of world war 1 who have enlisted in this war for the second time, as well as a number of their comrades, had been properly treated, there would have been a better response to the request made to N.R.M.A. men to go active. I have particular reference to a number of men who enlisted for the second time in this war. They placed everything they had on the altar of sacrifice and then because some of them owed money on land obtained under the soldier settlement scheme an order in council was passed providing that up to $20 a month of their dependent's allowances, allowances which rightly belonged to their wives and families, would be stopped and turned over to the soldier settlement board in payment of those debts. I do not think that is proper treatment for those men. As I say, there are a number of men who enlisted in great war 1 who have to be considered in connection with the government's war policy.

I am referring to 6,153 old veterans, men who went through the mud, slime and suffering of the first great war and came back and settled on land under the government scheme. Those men went into debt to an average amount of $4,358 twenty-five years ago. Those men and their wives and families have worked continually since that time, but only a little over 4,000 of them have been able to obtain clear title to their land. That would leave almost 6,153 who still hold contracts, or approximately twenty-five per cent of the original number. After those men, along with their wives and families, had worked during all those years, we find that at the end of last March their average indebtedness to the soldier settlement board was $1,254, or twenty-nine per cent of their original indebtedness.

We found—and when I say "we" I mean officials of soldier settler organizations as well as a number of other Canadians who are vitally interested in this question—that condition existing and we made representations to the government. Only last May a delegation of nine placed their case fairly and squarely before the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) and five other members of the cabinet. I think it is not necessary for me to recite the action that was taken at that time. Nothing was done, and when I say nothing I mean just that, except to appoint a committee of the cabinet which I understand has never met. After the house adjourned on August 14, the Minister of Mines and Resources made a statement that the government did not see fit to grant clear titles.

I believe those men had a just case. There are several reasons for that belief but I am not going to enumerate them to-night. They were asked to pay five per cent interest on their current debts and seven per cent on arrears, as compared with three and a half per cent being charged under the present scheme. Under the present set-up provision is made to grant thirty-nine per cent of the original amount advanced for the purchase of land, live stock and implements. As I have said, the average amount still owing of $1,254 by these old settlers is equal to only twenty-nine per cent of their original indebtedness.

At the end of last March $7,715,000 would have provided clear titles for all these old veterans. That amount is equivalent to about sixty-five cents for every one of our Canadian population. Sixty-five cents is the price of one meal and a small meal at that, and yet that amount paid by each person in Canada would clear up the indebtedness of the old soldier settlers and give them a breathing space for the rest of their days.

A number of us who sit in this House of Commons are much younger than many of these old veterans, and I can fancy some of us going out and trying to make a living and pay the debt on a quarter or half-section of land. For instance, I can imagine the Minister of Mines and Resources, under whose direction this scheme has been operated for a number of years, having to go out without a dollar in his pocket, as many of these old veterans did, and try to pay off his debt.

I can imagine how that gentleman would feel when he took his grain to the elevator and found that the grade he received was one or two grades below what it should be. I can imagine how he would feel when he found that he was not getting the weight to which he was entitled. I can imagine how he would feel if the amount he finally received was far below the cost of production. I take the Minister of Mines and Resources as an example, but my remarks would apply to all hon. members. Whether we sit on the government or the opposition benches, we all have a responsibility to these victims of great war 1. I say victims because these men have been persecuted by reason of the action of former governments. I am not blaming the Conservatives any more than I blame the Liberals; they all must share the responsibility.

I am making this claim again to-night in the honest belief and firm conviction that the government would save money by granting clear titles to this land right away. Any one who takes the time to figure out this matter will see that the government would be ahead. In the past it has cost $1,100,000 a year to administer the scheme, so that within seven or eight years the amount would be cleared up.

We have at stake the welfare of the veterans who will come under the new Veterans Land Act. There is considerable unrest at the present time among old soldier settlers, many of whom have sons and daughters on active service to-day. Therefore I think you can look for trouble in connection with the new act and that is why I repeat to-night the request which I have made on other occasions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion before the house hardly covers the machinery of the Veterans Land Act, and I would like the hon. member to confine his remarks to the motion before the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 7 WITH REFERENCE TO ADJOURNMENT AT ELEVEN O'CLOCK

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have known throughout the day that hon. members were hoping and expecting that it might be possible to conclude the debate this evening. I believe it would be possible if hon. members are prepared to sit after eleven o'clock. If they are prepared, it would be necessary for me to make a motion, and if the house will give its approval I shall do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That the house shall not be adjourned at eleven o'clock to-day.

Motion agreed to.

THE WAR

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN MAINTAINING VIGOROUS WAR EFFORT—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION OF THE PRIME MINISTER

The house resumed consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaing a vigorous war effort, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Speaker, before the Prime Minister made his motion I was setting out some reason why more N.R.M.A. men are not joining up. I have only a few minutes left in which to speak, and I hope the house will be patient in listening to me, so that this matter may be given serious consideration. It is long overdue.

My argument has been that the government would actually save money and at the same time ensure the success of the Veterans Land Act. I have given those as two reasons why clear title should be given, and I am going to make a further request this evening, one which I have made on other occasions. It is that the present administrator or director of the Veterans Land Act be removed from office, and that some man sympathetic to the old veterans be placed in charge.

I am very glad that this matter has been taken from the control of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) and placed under the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) . I believe that for the past number of years the Minister of Mines and Resources has lain down on the job, so far as the administration of the soldier settlement board is concerned. He has allowed the present director to have full sway, and in having that full sway he has persecuted, or caused to be persecuted men who must come under the Veterans Land Act.

I am also glad to see that the Minister of Mines and Resources is retiring. If he gets to that old men's home I hope before going there he will bring about a change in the treasury board, so that clear titles may be granted in these cases. I ask that these titles be granted immediately. While this whole matter was placed before the Prime Minister for the first time about a month ago, I would suggest that he take up with his ministers the question of seeing to it that these titles are granted, and that they be given as Christmas presents to the veterans of the first great war.

Hon. P. J. ARTHUR CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I desire to repeat what I stated at the beginning of my speech the other day, when I spoke against the main motion and the amendment.

We have now before us in a practical manner, one which nobody can dispute, an example of the futility of all the amendments that have been proposed to the main motion.

We were called here to approve the policy of the government in maintaining a vigorous war effort. We have all been witnessing the changes of heart and disposition and policies on the part of the government, since the session has been called together. The amendments which have been proposed up to the present time to a large extent had only for their object, or, at least, as their result, the beclouding the issue, confusing the people of Canada as to what is really under consideration. We are witnessing an attempt to obtain a verdict in a circuitous way—a crooked way—instead of coming frankly and openly before the representatives of the people of Canada.

That game has been played on all sides of the house in order to avoid the issue, to prevent the Canadian public from understanding exactly what the position is, and to keep them blind as to what is going on in this House of Commons, and as to what has been going on for a certain time in connection with the policies of the government.

The leader of the C.C.F. party has been useful to the government at the present time by coming up at the last moment with a relief motion, in order to help the government to shelter itself under a resolution which has been modified, but which in reality means exactly the same thing. There is not a single particle of difference between the motion as it was before the amendment proposed by the hon. member who leads the C.C.F. party, and the one we have now.

Look at it. He wants to do away with the words "in its policy", and wants to have the resolution now read: "that this house will aid the government in maintaining a vigorous war effort." How is the government going to maintain a vigorous war effort if it has no policy to direct a war effort? The word "policy" is implied in the motion by the leader of the C.C.F. party, who has been so generous in his move to help the government out of the difficult situation in which it finds itself at the present time.

The main motion as amended means the same thing, because nobody can conceive of a vigorous war effort without a policy upon which that vigorous war effort is based. And, Mr. Speaker, while wishing to insult no one, and respecting the views of all, I say it is mere camouflage, and a movement made with a view to protecting one's party's interests.

But, Mr. Speaker, that is not all. Let us suppose that the motion made so conveniently by the leader of the C.C.F. party, so as to help the government, is adopted. I cannot accept it, and I cannot vote for it. Why? Because the main motion so amended calls for a vigorous war effort and the word "vigorous" was qualified on the 23rd day of this month by an order in council which was placed on the table of the House of Commons. We know now just what is the vigorous policy that the government is asked to put into effect. It is a policy which provides for the conscription of all N.R.M.A. men. There is an immediate call for 16,000, but later on, without coming before the House of Commons, the total number of N.R.M.A. men can be sent overseas without, as the Prime Minister said in the House of Commons, in very clear terms, again coming before parliament, and without informing the members, but by cabinet action, or the privy council, purely and simply, without informing the people. That is the position in which we are to be placed at the present time. That is the position in which we are placed to-day by the main motion, and the amendment does not change anything in it.

Do not forget, Mr. Speaker, that the vigorous war effort called for by the order in council means conscription for overseas, whatever any one may say in an effort to escape his responsibility or to shelter from the anger, of the electors of his constituency. That is the position. I cannot become a party to it.

We have been told by the Prime Minister in part of his speech, that the house would not be voting on the order in council passed on November 23, that the house would not be voting on the question of conscription. Why, Mr. Speaker, the house has been discussing nothing but conscription for the last eight or ten days, the Prime Minister included, and my learned friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) included when he addressed the house only yesterday. Now at the last moment we see the splitting of hairs over procedure; and because the leader of a group has seen his own amendment ruled out of order, he offers another one facilitating, in appearance at least, the task of the government. Declarations are being made against the government policy, but, nevertheless the same government is being helped in putting into effect that same policy. I cannot be a party to that move. I am not going to vote for the amendment of the hon. gentleman. If it is the only thing we have to vote against I am going to vote against it. If the main motion is so amended with the consent and approval of the Prime Minister, thus preventing that amendment from being ruled out of order by the Speaker as the other amendments have been ruled out, I shall vote against it. I see no justification for that amendment being accepted by the government. The other amendments which have been ruled out of order might just as well have been accepted.

So far as I am concerned I am not going to go back on those who have placed their confidence in me. I am capable of speaking for them and of expressing their will, without fear or favour, real, present or expected. I am going to be true to myself and true to the policy I have espoused in this house since the beginning of this debate. I am going to vote against the motion of confidence now adorned with a few flowers that have been strewn over it by the leader of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had originally intended to expand my remarks on this amendment, but the hour is late and I shall make only a few skeleton remarks in reply to my hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F. party in this house.

First of all may I say, in reply to the assertion he made a few moments ago, that the amendment which was moved by myself and seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and which was voted on earlier to-day, is an amendment which is on all fours with the terms in which I outlined it to the house when it was proposed. On November 23 last, after the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had read the order in council to the house I made these remarks which will be found at page 6517 of Hansard, to which my hon. friend referred a moment ago. I said:

> We intend to move a motion along the general line . . .

The hon. member did not mention that in his remarks a moment ago.

> We intend to move a motion along the general line that this house no longer has confidence in the present Prime Minister, and that the interests of our troops in Europe and the honour of Canada call for the immediate application of the full provisions of the mobilization act, and that another government should be formed without delay under leadership known to favour and pledged to take that course.

The amendment which I subsequently moved, without departing from that general line—and it will readily be seen that this is an important point—read, in order to bring it within the rules of the house:

> this house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war—

In other words, total conscription of manpower in Canada, for that is what it was.

—and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice.

Note those words, "and has failed to assure equality of sacrifice", because they cover the total mobilization which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar himself mentioned; and if I may say so, the gravest mistake of his career until a few moments ago was his failure to vote for that policy which he has so often said he would adopt.

Then again on November 22 of this session, as appears on page 6511 of Hansard, we tried to move a motion but received no encouragement from the C.C.F. party. That motion read:

That this house is of the opinion that the full provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act should be put into effect forthwith;

And that all trained troops in the Canadian home defence army should immediately be dispatched for reinforcements overseas.

That motion was ruled out of order. I asked for unanimous consent of the house to move it, and there was silence from my friends of the C.C.F. to my left, although they have professed from time to time that they believed in the total mobilization of everything, including manpower, industry and wealth.

Let me say that I am trying to restrain myself in my remarks because I realize this is a difficult time, but I say in all kindliness and friendliness to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that he has been pretty bitter toward us all this session. His words have, I think, been altogether too bitter under the circumstances. I do not think we can afford to indulge in that kind of thing at this time and I want my words to-night to convey nothing more than a straightforward statement of our position. I would have answered the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar before, but I feared that if I replied in the same vein in which he had spoken there might be a repetition in this house of the kind of thing we have seen before but do not want to have happen again.

I believe that this amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar goes far to show the relative positions in this house of the government party and the party known as the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I have seen and you, Mr. Speaker, have seen for some considerable time a mutual erasing of the demarcations and delineations between the government and the C.C.F. in their policies and in their movements.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What about British Columbia and Saskatchewan?

Mr. GRAYDON: Before I proceed with this subject, perhaps I might revert to a matter which I mentioned earlier. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar speaks about his professed sponsorship and endorsation of total mobilization of man-power, industry and wealth. Let me point out that in 1942 our party moved an amendment to the speech from the throne with respect to this particular matter. It was in part as follows:

That this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have not seen fit to recommend to parliament without delay additional measures designed to (a) completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and on a selective basis the full man-power and woman-power of the nation to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war.

That amendment of ours was voted against by the C.C.F. party which now complains from time to time that we do not always support that particular policy.

I think we may also properly recall the position which the C.C.F. party from time to time has taken with respect to the war. I am not going back over the record, although I would have done so had time been available.

It may seem strange to some that I should make the charge that the government party and the C.C.F. party have finally got under the same pair of sheets in the same bed at the same time. It seems to me there is considerable justification for that contention. When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and his party returned from overseas, although the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston), who had also been over there, had come back and reported a very serious situation with respect to reinforcements, we were not helped very much by the report brought back by the leader of the C.C.F. party. He said, I think, that he had consulted some generals, or one general, and that the reinforcements were all right, and so far as the public were concerned they got the definite idea from the hon. member that he himself thought everything was all right over there. A great many people came to the conclusion that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was trying to put his shoulder behind the government wheel again. I think that should be brought to the attention of the house.

As regards the amendment itself, I think we have here the crowning demonstration of the government's relationship with the C.C.F. Think of it. Consider exactly what has happened. Here is this party to my left trying to oppose the government by moving an amendment, and the Prime Minister holds out his arms and catches the ball and says, "It is mine too." That is the situation. No wonder we find it more and more difficult to see the difference between these two parties. Throughout this session, on the matter of secret sessions and other questions as well, the C.C.F. party may be justifiably suspected as regards their relationship with the government and the party in power.

I should have liked to go farther and say more, but I will make only one further observation before I sit down. In so far as the government accepting the amendment and adopting it as their policy, that this house will aid the government in maintaining a vigorous war effort, I believe the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar stands indicted before the public to-day by virtue of this fact, if for nothing else, he is admitting that the government has had a vigorous war effort and that we should maintain it from now on. We do not subscribe to the statement that it is sufficiently or all-out. More than that, we have not confidence in the government to carry it out, nor have the people of Canada. I say to the Prime Minister in no vindictive or bitter spirit, for after all these are not days for that sort of thing—

An hon. MEMBER: Do not forget that this is your birthday.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is true; and perhaps it may change things a little. But I say to the Prime Minister, calmly and with all the sincerity I can command, that while he may be able to command a vote of confidence from the mechanical majority of the House of Commons—

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely there is nothing wrong with that; I am using the exact words the Prime Minister used when the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was in power, so that I do not think I can be criticized for that expression. May I proceed?

Even with a mechanical majority behind him, the Prime Minister has had to call this parliament together, not to get our party to vote confidence in him, not to get a vote of confidence from the C.C.F. or the Social Credit or any other party on this side of the house, for the Prime Minister made it very clear in his speech that, as he said in effect, "unless I can get a substantial support from my own people in this parliament I do not feel as though I want to carry on." There, I think, is the kernel of the truth. This parliament was actually brought together for the purpose of getting the Liberal party together in order that there should be a prosecution of the war effort on this basis.

I shall not say anything further on that subject at the present time. I only desire to add this, to make clear our position as a party, that we have not confidence in the Prime Minister nor have the people of Canada confidence in him. Having regard to that, we cannot support an amendment such as this, because it is tantamount to a government amendment moved by the Prime Minister through the lips of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not suggest that it was intentionally so.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad of that.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not suggesting that, but I ask not to be interrupted until I get through. I say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that it was not in my mind that I should accuse him of having conspired with the Prime Minister to move that amendment. As a matter of fact, he has gotten now so close to the government that he does not have to conspire; they just work together. The position in which we find ourselves now is that we must vote against this amendment because it has now been adopted by the government and in effect it is the same as the Prime Minister's motion. We cannot vote confidence in a government which, if I may say so, has lost the confidence of the people—perhaps not of this house, with its mechanical majority which does not reflect the opinions of the people of Canada. But we cannot vote confidence in a government or a Prime Minister who has lost the confidence of the Canadian people.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I desire to make a few remarks in reply to the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). First of all, may I remind the house of what we of this group have endeavoured to do since the main motion was made by the Prime Minister on November 27. We took the view then, and still hold the view, that the motion as placed on the order paper by the Prime Minister was—to be polite—meaningless. We think it was perhaps something else, and what we have in mind was pretty well characterized earlier this evening by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell).

Feeling that the motion was not a fair one to ask this house to vote upon after having been called together from all over the country, we endeavoured to place before the house what we felt were the real issues confronting the country at the present time. We did so first of all through a subamendment moved by the leader of this group on November 27, and then to-day by an amendment to the main motion which I moved a few hours ago.

I would remind the house that we stated quite clearly in that subamendment and in that amendment our feeling that a vigorous war effort requires the elimination of all distinctions between drafted and volunteer personnel and the total mobilization of all resources of Canada, material and financial as well as human. The house is well aware of the difficulty that we had, as well as the difficulty that other members had, in drafting amendments in such a form that they would be satisfactory to Your Honour so that the house might be able to vote on these real issues. It appears that all efforts along that line are fruitless as matters stand. Therefore, when it comes down to the final question of being asked to vote on what we regard as a meaningless motion, we feel that we have the right to endeavour to amend that motion so as to take out of it the double-barreled aspect that was there in its previous wording.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères suggests that the motion in the amended form, leaving out the words "its policy of", is without meaning. In a sense the hon. member is right. It is not now a vote of confidence in the government. It becomes rather a pious resolution of the house to the effect that we will agree to aid the government in maintaining a vigorous war effort, and then close this session and go home. But I point out that if the motion now may be in that sense only a pious resolution, it is considerably different from the motion in its previous form. The Prime Minister placed it on the order paper and cannot get away from the fact that it asked for a vote of confidence in the government on its terms, and it was worded in such a way that a vote against it could be misconstrued as a vote against the maintaining of a vigorous war effort.

Now that the words "its policy of" have been deleted, if that is the case, the government has bowed to the arguments presented all over the house against the form of the motion and is prepared now not to ask for an unlimited vote of confidence but to accept the passing of the motion in its amended form as an end to the proceedings we have had here these last two or three weeks. If this resolution passes in its amended form it will mean that the house is saying to the country: We were not prepared to vote confidence in the policies of the government; we were against those policies for certain reasons which we made clear on the floor of parliament, but we accept the fact that P.C. 8891 has been passed; we accept the fact that at least something is being done about meeting the need for reinforcements, and we also accept the fact that our attempts to present our amendments on the floor of the house have been in vain.

I wish to say, with due respect for my good friend the leader of the opposition, first of all that I should like to offer a comment on his criticism of our leaving in the motion the word "maintaining" with reference to a vigorous war effort. He tries to bring down his part of the house with the suggestion that it is incorrect to speak of a vigorous war effort having been in effect thus far. I suggest that in his supreme effort to criticize the government for all he is worth he is casting a reflection on our soldiers, sailors, airmen, on our farmers and industrial workers. They are the ones, together with the people of this country, who through their taxes and savings have made it possible to build up a vigorous war effort. We feel that no reflection should be cast on them.

Again, it seems to me—and I will put it in the simplest language I know—that the Progressive Conservative party in this house is just plain sore. They had the supreme hope that in this issue of reinforcements, for which the government is to blame—there is no doubt about that—they had been provided with something that would give them a talking point which up to that time they did not have anywhere in this dominion. On the basis of this issue they counted heavily on their ability to inflame prejudice in this country, and it seems to bother them to think that the result of this two or three weeks' sitting of parliament may be a lessening of some of those divisions that have grown up, or at least a partial settlement of the problem, with the result that the kind of thing they were counting on has been taken away from them. The Progressive Conservatives seem to want the privilege of going on inflaming sectional interests and prejudices as a basis for trying to gain some political capital; but we much prefer to respond to the kind of appeals that have been made in this house by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Lapointe) and others, together with the sort of appeal that was made by the leader of this group when he spoke of his visit to Dieppe, in endeavouring to get the people of Canada to work together with some of that spirit of unity for a common purpose that our fighting men are showing on the other side.

I take second place to no one, not even the leader of the opposition, in my thorough distaste of the policies of the Liberal government. I take second place to no one in my determination to do everything I can to defeat them at the next election. I am sick and tired of the myth that there is only one man in this country who can be the prime minister of Canada. I wish to say, despite the fact that it may embarrass my leader who is sitting in front of me, that there is one other man in this country who really can lead us as prime minister—the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Well, well, well.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: The country is fully aware of the fact that unless this party provides an alternative to the present Prime Minister, certainly no other party is going to provide one. I do not see the Progressive Conservatives offering an alternative for that position in whom the people of Canada can place any confidence whatsoever.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There are a lot of things you have not seen yet.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to say that the leader of the opposition need not worry as to our attitude toward the present government, or toward the Liberal party; but that does not deflect us from realizing that at the present time everything possible should be done to bring to an end the arousing of the country and the inflaming of sectional interests and prejudices. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say quite frankly we feel that in the government's readiness to accept the amendment we have moved at this last moment we have won, not just for this group but for this parliament and for the people of Canada, a victory over the crisis through which we have passed. We feel that the amendment should be adopted and the motion in the amended form should be carried by this house.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): The proceedings of this house during the last three weeks would remind one of a game of hockey or a game of hide-and-seek. People have been trying to find the puck and are wondering where it has gone. We have been trying to find the issue and to-night we are wondering where it has gone. The government has accepted the C.C.F. amendment. Why? When the government summoned parliament to Ottawa it had for its purpose the approval of its policy. To-night at the last moment we see the government changing and accepting the suggestion of the C.C.F. party to take all the sense out of its motion. If we leave these three words out of this motion it becomes exactly similar to the subamendment I proposed earlier in the debate, according to the words of Mr. Speaker. At that time Mr. Speaker said:

> The amendment is not complete in its form. It is the expression of a general opinion which may be moved in any public body but has no connection with the business of the house.
> The object of the house is to suggest, approve or disapprove of the government's policy.

If we leave these three words out where are we? Where is the government's policy? In 1942, when bill 80 was passed, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) told the house that if at any time he implemented the provisions of that bill he would come to the house and ask for a vote of confidence. What we have before the house to-night is or is not a motion of confidence. If it is a motion of confidence these three words have to stay in it. If the government accepts the amendment of the C.C.F. party, it is not a motion of confidence; it is just a literary effort and it does not concern at all the approving or disapproving of the government's policy. Withdrawing of the three words at the last moment will not change the feelings of the people at the present time. I am not to speak for those who feel that the government in its programme has not done everything it should have done, but I am to speak for myself, believing that the policy of the government as it stood on the day its motion was presented included the approval of the principle of bill 80 and the approval of order in council 8891. The deleting of three words to-night have not changed the sense of the government's policy. The withdrawing of three words will not withdraw one of the men who are on their way overseas by reason of order in council 8891. I cannot understand how the government at a moment like this, of such seriousness in the history of the country, can accept the taking of all sense from the motion, because, as it stands now, the motion simply reads that we are approving or aiding the government in maintaining a vigorous war effort. I support the stand taken by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) when he said: "Can the government maintain a war effort without a policy?" The policy that the government called us to Ottawa to approve included those three words. What is it now?

Has it changed suddenly overnight? Does the government mean to convince us that one thing has been changed in a few moments? The policy is the same. The government cannot take it out and ask us to approve or disapprove and play on the feelings of the hon. members in this house.

I have said and I repeat that I have confidence in the present Prime Minister, and I cannot express my sentiments in any better way than when I spoke previously. I respect the Prime Minister; I am sure his mind is a thousand times superior to mine; but I have to judge the issue with my own mind and, as things stand now, I cannot approve the motion. The Prime Minister definitely said in 1942 that if at any time he applied bill 80 he would come before the house and by means of a vote of confidence ask for approval. Are we to be given another chance, Mr. Speaker? If this is just a literary effort, are we to be given another chance at another moment in this session to approve or disapprove the government's action on bill 80. or is this the motion of confidence that the Prime Minister meant? Has anything changed in the policy of the government? The government had one policy at six o'clock to-night. Has it changed since? I know that things change quickly. On Wednesday, the opening day of this part of the session, we had one policy. The second afternoon the government had another policy. To-night is it the third policy? The house should not be played with. The feelings and the intelligence of the hon. members should not be mocked in such a way. We are here as citizens of a free country to use our minds in a free way. Mine is vastly inferior to that of the Prime Minister, but I have to judge the issue with the powers that have been given to me, and I cannot find any sense in the motion as it is, deprived of the intention it contained when it was first put before the house, and, Mr. Speaker, I contend that the application of the ruling you gave on my subamendment, namely, that: applies to the motion as it is now. Therefore I say that it should be ruled out of order.

> The object of the house is to suggest, approve or disapprove of the government's policy . . .

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): After the quick about-turn of November 22, we had the quick about-turn of December 7. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should teach quick about-turn to the people; he would be a past master at such a performance. We have the leader of the government putting on the order paper a motion of confidence after consultation with all his ministers, but to-night we have witnessed a spectacle that could not have been foreseen by any of us; we have seen the Prime Minister mediating to the point of accepting the suggestion of the leader of the C.C.F. group without consulting with his colleagues in the cabinet, unless there was an understanding between the leader of the C.C.F. group and the Prime Minister before the amendment was moved.

Mr. COLDWELL: I can assure you that there was not.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman. It is even worse than I thought. I remember a time in another parliament when I was asked by the Chair to withdraw a statement I made that Lord Bennett was acting without consulting his colleagues of the cabinet. What happened to-night? In the sight of all of us there has happened what I blamed Bennett for doing and what I had to withdraw to my great humiliation. But to-night I did not have to do that. The Prime Minister did not pass any paper around the treasury benches and I am sure no minister thought he would accept a suggestion or an amendment made by the leader of the C.C.F. group.

Is the leader of the C.C.F. group the new spiritual adviser of the Prime Minister after the Tory party was declared dead yesterday? What a performance! We are told about the supremacy of parliament. We are told about the great principles of the Prime Minister who wants to consult parliament. It is all a farce. He does not consult his own colleagues in the cabinet before subjecting himself to the dictates of the leader of an opposite group.

Would Sir Wilfrid Laurier have done that? Would Sir Robert Borden, with whom the Prime Minister, according to Sir Robert, thought to join in a union cabinet, have done that? That has never been denied by the Prime Minister himself. Would either Sir Wilfrid Laurier or Sir Robert Borden have done that?

When I went to my constituency after the quick about-turn of the Prime Minister on November 22 I found my people in consternation and humiliation. To-night I do not belong to the party led by the Prime Minister, and I am proud of that. However, as a member of the House of Commons I feel greatly humiliated that on a motion of confidence which presumably has been put on the order paper by the Prime Minister after consultation with his colleagues, he should then choose to appease the leader of the C.C.F. group, appease in the Munich sense. What humiliation! What consternation! What an abomination! The Prime Minister is not alone in the valley of humiliation to-night; we are all in it.

This is responsible government! We have been summoned here but what is the policy of the government? As the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) has so aptly said, there is none. I can understand our being called on April 1 as April fools, but we are now in December; we are on the eve of Christmas.

There are fourteen vacant seats in the senate. I checked the names at the door of the senate, and I noticed that out of thirty-three appointments which had been made by this government, only fourteen were former members of this house. According to that well-established precedent, hon. gentlemen opposite who may have legitimate claims to promotion for services rendered in this chamber will be very lucky if they get a place, because out of the fourteen candidates there will be only four chosen.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have not been able to follow very closely the remarks of the hon. member for Temiscouata, but I do not think the matter of replacements in the senate would be relevant to the present motion before the house. I would ask him to keep within the motion.

Mr. POULIOT: I presume it is part of the policy of the government to fill senate vacancies until they get what they want from the members. That is my point and I condemn them very strongly. We are discussing a policy which has not been enunciated. We do not know what it is about; it may be about the man in the moon or anything else. I am not the man in the moon, but perhaps the Prime Minister is. It is vague; it is incoherent, and from the Liberal point of view it contains the grease spot of the C.C.F.

I do not say that in any offensive way, but I speak as a true and straight Liberal. I referred to something yesterday which I will elaborate to-day. I decided some time ago to leave the party led by the Prime Minister, and on August 19 I told him personally that if I ran again I would not run as one of his candidates. To be sure to be elected I will run as Jean-Francois Pouliot; and until then the hon. member for Richelieu-Vèrcheres (Mr. Cardin), the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Lapointe), the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), the hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent), the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget), my humble self, and all other hon. members who have voted against him here this afternoon—each one of us will be a living remorse to the Prime Minister. We will remind him of promises broken; and we may tell him that we may go back to our constituencies and enjoy the respect of our people. We wonder if he will be able to get the same respect when he goes back to Prince Albert, at the time of his next defeat, when he will lose his deposit in the province of Saskatchewan?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, during the last hour or two I believe we have had added to our deliberations much more heat than light. Perhaps it would be well to try to orientate ourselves correctly by reflecting upon one or two serious matters.

In the first place, every vote cast to-night either for or against this resolution will be carefully noted overseas. It will be noted in the office of Hitler; it will be noted by the soldiers on the battle line; it will be noted in Washington and London; it will be noted in the camps of our N.R.M.A. men. I believe it would be well for hon. members to ask themselves this question: How will every vote against this resolution be interpreted by each and every one of the agencies I have mentioned? That is the question I have been endeavouring to answer for myself, ever since we came together.

We are living in a time of great confusion. It is very difficult for men to keep their feet on the ground and their heads cool. To most people there appear to be two issues before the house: first, shall the House of Commons do all in its power to supply reinforcements for Canada's hard-pressed soldiers overseas and, second, shall the present government in Canada be defeated, or shall it be supported so as to carry on across the stream of war time?

Having two issues before him, any person might find it hard to avoid confusion of thought. He might find it difficult to determine which is the main issue. It should be remembered, I think, that the present crisis developed over conscription, or the sending of reinforcements overseas. It did not develop over the question of whether or not the Liberal government was satisfactorily administering the affairs of the country, or whether that government was leading Canada in an acceptable war effort.

Consequently the matter of confidence hardly entered into the cause of calling the house together, if we are to believe the reports we have heard, and to take at face value the evidence which I think has been adduced rather plentifully since we came to attend this session.

Any member of parliament in this present critical session must keep his eye on the ball. The ball, in this instance, is reinforcements for the infantry section of the Canadian Army overseas. This is definitely a war session, and has been called together to deal with a specific war problem. That problem is the one of determining how to obtain trained infantrymen urgently needed by the sons of Canada who are now desperately fighting on the battle front. We want men who are physically qualified and properly trained to fight as infantrymen. We want them now, as soon as possible. There is no time to think about political considerations. That which might be politically expedient must be disregarded in the interests of what is nationally expedient.

Where can be found the kind of men we need? The only men really accessible are the N.R.M.A. men. Of these, some 16,000 acceptably qualified are in Canada, and 8,000 are ready to move at once. However, up to the present time these 16,000 N.R.M.A. men in large measure have failed to volunteer. Canada has had to find an effective means of rendering immediately available 16,000 N.R.M.A. men.

In Colonel Ralston's opinion the only means was conscription. Many of the cabinet ministers agreed with him. Other cabinet ministers were determined that conscription should not be used. However, Colonel Ralston was so confident that he was right that he left the cabinet over the question: Shall conscription be used to render available for service overseas Canadian soldiers known as N.R.M.A. men?

That, Mr. Speaker, is the situation as I interpret it up to the present time. General McNaughton was called to the cabinet because he declared he believed that the voluntary method would succeed. The high court of parliament was called to hear the evidence on the question of conscription for overseas service. Members of parliament were divided on the question. Most of them have exceedingly stern attitudes either for or against. During my nine years in the House of Commons I have never known a time when I have seen men so stern either for or against a question as are the men I meet in the corridors to-day.

This is the point which must be borne in mind. There is a violent clash of opinion as to the advisability or otherwise of using conscription to send N.R.M.A. men overseas.

Likewise, Canadian voters are sternly divided. Very soon after parliament assembled the new Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, confessed, apparently, that under circumstances prevailing at the present time the voluntary system simply would not get the required number of men in time. Therefore he presumably recommended to the government that conscription be used until 16,000 suitable men were obtained. The government passed an order in council empowering General McNaughton to raise 16,000 men, by conscription if necessary.

The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King), has introduced a resolution stating that this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort. As I see it, what the individual member of parliament must decide is this: Shall I vote to support the application of conscription at the present time, so as to enable Canada to send overseas the 16,000 N.R.M.A. men so sorely needed as infantrymen in the battle zone—yes or no? I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the question is just as simple as that, shorn of all the confusion engendered.

Here is a Canadian government that has passed an order in council to conscript, if needs be, 16,000 N.R.M.A. men. I may or may not like the government. I may or may not have confidence in it. I may say that I have not confidence in it. I may or may not favour its general policies on various things that it has done while in office in war time or in pre-war time—and in a general way I may say that I personally do not approve the policies which it has followed either before the war or during the war. I may or may not agree with its future proposals during the remaining war years, or with its proposals for the post-war years. But the question to-night is: Do I agree with its decision on conscription now, to send 16,000 suitable men overseas to reinforce in time the sons of Canada whose lives and whose cause are at stake in the heat of action right now. The answer which I as one member give to my country, to the anguished loved ones of my country, to the noble boys who have already suffered and some of whom have died, and to their sorrowing bereaved ones is: Yes, I will. I think, Mr. Speaker, that my answer must be just that if I am to prove myself worthy of the responsibility which I bear as one member of this house in this critical year of 1944. Disregarding all other considerations I will vote "yes" in support of the resolution to apply conscription to certain N.R.M.A. men.

Whether the Mackenzie King government merits or does not merit my confidence as a war government is not in my judgment the issue in this vote. Early in 1945 parliament is to reassemble and then hon. members will have an opportunity to vote non-confidence or confidence in the government as may at that time appear to be in the interests of our country. Let this government carry on for the time being until we can have another opportunity to appraise their efforts and to sit in judgment upon them. We have only six weeks to wait. That will give us time enough to grow cool and calm and collected and to make a decision when our minds are not fired with the passions which have been engendered by means which have been clearly indicated during this debate.

But there are other considerations worthy of mention as I come to my decision. Do well-informed and thoughtful Canadians, Canadians of good will, desire an election at the present time? As I came through my province on my way to Ottawa I got in touch with several hundreds of people and not a single one was in favour of an election at this time. Is it in the public interest of Canada as a nation or in the interest of Canadians as a people; is it in the interest of the British commonwealth as a whole; is it in the best interests of the united nations and the cause of freedom to which they have dedicated themselves; is it in the best interests of Canada itself that we should have an election at this time? The opinions of many people might be quoted. Being a Social Crediter I shall refer to only one, that of the Hon. Solon Low, national leader of the Social Credit Association. Mr. Low has recently issued a statement, a portion of which reads as follows:

> To plunge the nation into an election at this time would be criminal folly.

And, Mr. Speaker, for reasons which the ordinary member of this house and the ordinary citizen of this country appreciate full well I agree with Mr. Solon Low in this matter one hundred per cent. This statement clearly shows that Social Crediters, however much they may disagree with the policies of the present administration, are not urging or advising an election at the present time—this for many reasons. A vote against the government's resolution is a vote for an election at once.

Social Crediters endeavour to be consistent. Years ago they foresaw that under the present economic system involving avid, ruthless, reckless scrambling for foreign markets, a calamitous conflict would be inevitable. Major C. H. Douglas earnestly warned of the danger and feared the complete destruction of civilization if that danger were not averted. He pleaded with the nations to consider with him suitable changes in their economic system to avert the impending catastrophe. The nations chose rather to plunge into the catastrophe. Seeing that such would be the case, Social Credit leaders, years ago, began to call for adequate preparation for the defence of our people. In February, 1936, I, as leader of this group, issued to the press in Edmonton, Alberta, a statement worded in terms as strong as I could devise, calling for immediate preparation for national defence. This statement will be found in both the Edmonton Journal and the Edmonton Bulletin of February, 1936, the 11th or 12th of February, if my memory serves me aright. On arriving in Ottawa for the 1937 session, I said in an interview that I would support the Prime Minister's proposals for increased expenditure upon national defence. This I did throughout the session of 1937. From that time forward in public meetings I constantly sought to impress Canadians with the need of prompt and effective measures for defence.

In the special session of 1939, I delivered a speech as recorded in Hansard of September 8, pages 47 to 50. In that speech I went on record in language as follows:

> Therefore, the New Democracy declares that justice, equality, effectiveness, depend upon the conscription of finance, industry and man-power.

And again on page 49:

> We must do all we can and go where we are asked to go, in order to meet the enemy of religion, of freedom and of race. It is stupid and insincere to draw a distinction between home and foreign service. There can be no distinction.

From this strong position, Mr. Speaker, this group has never receded.

The present occasion and the government resolution now before the house afford Social Crediters the first opportunity of proving their sincerity and steadfastness by voting for a measure of conscription. A vote against the government's resolution would be a vote which, in effect, would be a vote against conscription of 16,000 men, well-trained and in good physical condition, to go in support of their brother Canadians in a time of great stress and peril. I must vote for sending, by compulsion if necessary, 16,000 N.R.M.A. men to the theatres of war at the earliest possible date.

Social Crediters deplore the fact that on the outbreak of war, the government failed to conscript finance, industry and man-power.

In my speech of September 8, 1939, as recorded on page 48 of Hansard, I warned the government that to conscript man-power without first conscripting finance and industry, or to conscript any one of the three without conscripting the other two, would bring about injustices, discrimination and class distinction which would result in "inequality, disaster and chaos." I had the impression that cabinet ministers and members of parliament generally disregarded my warning; treated it lightly.

Well, now the troubles are here and the end is not yet. Not yet has the full impact of Canada's colossal war debt been realized by Canadians. Not yet has it been borne in upon them how onerous will be the taxation structure once war expenditures cease. Not yet have many realized how destructive of Canadian freedom will be found the degree of centralization and bureaucratic control which have resulted from the government's financial and industrial policies. Not yet have Canadians even dimly visualized the intensity of the bitterness of disillusionment which our boys will experience when, after their return from the war zones, they will find how helpless the government, using the present system, will be to give them fitting rewards for their services rendered. When these dreadful things, looming in the future, become realities, then will be discovered the ominous portent of the words I used in my speech of September 8, 1939.

By conscription of finance I did not mean taking over the banks of the country by the government, or the seizing of the savings of the people. I meant that the dominion government should conscript or take away from the banking fraternity the power and function of creating the money, rendered possible by Canada's capacity to produce and to deliver goods and services to the extent of which she is capable. Exercising this power the government could have dealt with our debt problem without injury to Canada's economy, and could have mobilized industry far more effectively than it has now been mobilized, could have left that industry in the hands of private enterprise, and could have had that industry strong to sustain the shocks of the aftermath of war. Wielding the power of finance, the government could have guaranteed our boys, in return for their services, such rewards as would have impelled every eligible man or woman to seek enrolment in the armed services of Canada. Thus could conscription of man-power have been arrived at by an indirect method—the method of inducement by rewards—far more effectively and happily than it has been accomplished by the government's indirect method, the method of coercion through the use of law, restriction, and economic pressure.

This picture, of which I have endeavoured to give a faint glimpse, could have been realized if wisdom had prevailed in high places in Canada in 1939. When I reflect upon the happiness, the unity, the hope, which could have filled the hearts of Canadians, even through these days of universal mourning, I find it exceedingly difficult to be calm. I find it exceedingly difficult to vote confidence in an administration consisting of men who callously and stubbornly refused even to consider the possibilities of a better way of life for our Canadian people. In fact, I cannot and will not at the present time vote confidence in this government. Nevertheless, for reasons which I have already indicated, I must vote for the government's resolution to support the use of compulsion, if necessary, in sending overseas 16,000 men of the N.R.M.A.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I think we have had enough speeches to-day to last us for a long time. I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should be allowed to close this debate. It is not our business to have to sit here and listen to men read at least part of their speeches. We have not had very much that is new to-night, and I think it would be in order at this sweet hour of the morning for the Prime Minister now to close the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Mackenzie King moves, seconded by Mr. Crerar:

That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

To which Mr. Coldwell moves, seconded by Mr. Gillis:

That the motion be amended by deleting the words "its policy of".

So that the motion as amended will read:

That this house will aid the government in maintaining a vigorous war effort.

The house is voting on the amendment. If the amendment carries it will then be added to the motion and then the debate will follow on the motion as amended, upon which a vote may be recorded. The question therefore is on the amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried. Carried.

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): No, no. Mr. Speaker, we should follow the regular procedure, and you should continue on, saying, "Those opposed will say "nay", and then we will see what is to happen.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Coldwell) which was agreed to on the following division:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): At the present time the fate of nations is being decided on the battlefields of Europe. How soon the decision will come God only knows. One thing we know is that anything that supports our fighting men will hasten that decision. Anything that withholds support that they need, and that is at all within our power to give, may have consequences for them and for us of which I hesitate to speak.

I have been amazed at some of the speeches that have been made in this house during the course of the debate not only to-night, but particularly to-day and yesterday, when one considers what the motion is that is before the house, and when it is apparent that it relates wholly and exclusively to the support that can be given to our fighting men overseas in this sixth year of war.

This evening the leader of the official opposition spoke in the debate. I leave it to the hon. members to say for themselves whether I am right or whether I am wrong when I state that his remarks had almost exclusively to do with matters of petty politics between the different political parties in this country. He sought to have this house believe that there was some sort of agreement or understanding between the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party and the Liberal party whereby we were going to work together to defeat the Tory party. Mr. Speaker, the Tory party is defeated beyond all shadow of doubt. We are not concerning ourselves about the Tory party, nor are the people of this country. But we are concerned about the winning of the war and having this war won as speedily as possible, and having as much glory come to our men in the victory that is to come as it is possible for them to gain.

My hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) has moved an amendment to clarify the situation. It is natural that in this parliament, where all of us for years have attached great significance to every word in a resolution, hon. members should sometimes read into a particular resolution a meaning that was never intended or ever thought of at the time that the resolution was drafted. My hon. friend has seen something in the words "its policy of". May I say to him now, as I said when he moved his amendment, that to me the resolution as I read it now as amended carries with it all the meaning that it had in the original motion as I proposed it.

I have nothing to add and nothing to subtract from what I said in opening the present debate as to the meaning, significance and importance of the vote to be taken on the resolution which is now before the house.

I must thank my hon. friend for his obvious desire, one which I myself believed would be shared by every hon. member of this house, to make it perfectly clear to our men overseas, to other nations, yes, and to the enemy, that this house was united and determined upon having a vigorous war effort in support of our men overseas; a policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort. The entire world knows we have had it in the past. During these past five years, there is no nation in the world that has had a finer war effort than Canada has had. It is that effort which we wish to maintain and it is to that effort alone that the resolution before the house at this moment relates.

I thought I made it very clear in my remarks in opening this debate that I was not asking for any vote of confidence on the government's policies generally. I shall not take the time to-night to run over what I said before; the words will be found in Hansard.

However, I should like to reassure my hon. friends who have raised the question that neither this motion as amended nor the original motion as it was before it was amended in any way sought to gain from this house an expression of confidence in all the policies of the government. The leader of the C.C.F. has said that he wants to have it clearly understood that I am not asking for a vote of confidence in all the policies of the government, and another member of his party said that he wished to be sure that we were not asking for an unlimited vote of confidence. May I tell them both that we are not.

What we are asking for is that a vigorous war effort shall be maintained. May I say, in passing, that it cannot be maintained without support, and strong support from this House of Commons. Anyone who has had the responsibilities that I have had over the past five years knows something about the difficulties of maintaining a war effort on the scale on which this government has been maintaining it right along. Anyone who has the knowledge that I have at the present time, knowledge that every hon. member has to a greater or less degree, about the seriousness of the situation at this moment, a seriousness so grave that it can scarcely be imagined, would if he were in my position want to have in no uncertain way the support of this House of Commons in continuing that war effort.

I doubt very much if hon. members of this house can begin to imagine what this war is like at this moment, what it may lead to or what the position of our country may be in future years, years not too far distant, if we show much of division in this House of Commons on any matter that relates to sustaining the war effort of Canada. It is for that reason that I ask that the motion as amended be carried in no uncertain way.

My hon. friend, the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore) has touched upon the real note. He said to all intents and purposes that not alone the people of Canada, but the people of Great Britain, the people of those countries in Europe that have been overrun, and are only just being liberated, the peoples of other allied countries, yes, the peoples of enemy countries as well are watching keenly to see what the result of the vote in the Canadian House of Commons on Canada's war effort is going to be. Germany wishes for nothing more than evidence that in any part of the British commonwealth of nations there is beginning to be a break-up in the determination of the people to keep up their war effort. No succour could come to the enemy equal to that he will receive from anything that goes to show that a parliament in any part of the British commonwealth of nations is not united in support of its fighting men, and in its determination to do the utmost that can be done in helping to make a great war effort a complete success.

My hon. friend has said that men who have been standing by comrades and seen them fall, who themselves are standing not knowing whether they may not be the next to fall, will look to-morrow with anxious eyes to see what this Canadian House of Commons has done to-night. They will scan carefully the figures which will disclose what has been the division in this house. They will be either uplifted in spirit and strengthened in might by a strong vote in support of their need in this House of Commons to-night, or they will be weakened in their power; they will become dispirited if they find, as my young friend and gallant soldier, the son of the truest friend I have ever had in this House of Commons, told this house the other night, that while they are united and can stand side by side, French and English, Catholic and Protestant, of whatever kin or race they may be, that while they are fighting to preserve our liberties we cannot be equally united here in their support in this terrible war.

I ask all hon. members of this house to think of the men who are fighting for them. Think of them as fighting for your homes. Think of them as fighting for our country and its future. Then ask yourselves if at this time you are going to encourage them by giving them all the aid that it is possible for this parliament of Canada to give. You may find it difficult to explain some situations. Some of you may and no doubt will find it difficult by yourselves or others going into the past—I am going to have a word to say on that in a moment—and recalling things that have been said, promises that have been made, to explain the present situation to the electors in your constituencies, as I hear different members saying they will have. I have more faith than some who have spoken in the intelligence of your electors and in their hearts. Is there any man in this house who will say, if the situation is properly explained, that they will not be the first to recognize what it means to them, and will mean through years to come, that at this time of war their member stood up in the House of Commons of Canada and supported the men who are fighting to defend them and their homes? Will they say that he is not doing the noblest thing for his own constituents and for our country that could possibly be done?

Take this larger vision. May I say to hon. members of this house that we have passed the day, and it is long past, when questions of purely local concern can mean anything relatively in the future of our country. The world has moved far during the past five years, five years of war against the most powerful enemy that has ever sought to oppress other nations, against a group of powerful enemies who have sought to dominate the world. These five years of war have brought into being possibilities for future destruction beyond the imagination of any of us here in this parliament. I say to my fellow members in this house and to my fellow Canadians, beware, beware of doing anything or letting anything be done that may give those enemies or the people of any land cause to believe that the democracies are weakening, that within and between themselves they are becoming divided with the consequence that in their own eyes the power our enemies, present or future, may possess or come to possess may come to loom much greater than anything they behold elsewhere. We, as I say, have passed the day when local issues or provincial issues—I might almost say the issues in any one country itself—can be separated from the larger question of how this world is going to hold together in the next few years in a way which will enable men to enjoy liberty, and to preserve their lives and their homes.

All of that is at stake at this present time. And so, Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) for helping to join in making as nearly possible as can be a unanimous vote in this house on the resolution before us. I thank, too, my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore) for what he has done in the same direction. I thank hon. members around me, here, for the support that I know they are going to give to this resolution.

In my heart, I am profoundly sorry that I cannot thank the leader of the opposition, or the followers who are behind him.

At this late hour I do not wish to detain the house many minutes longer. I do, however, before concluding, desire to add a word or two respecting what has been said in the course of this debate about broken promises, and faith in public men. Much has been said about those two things in the course of this debate, and they should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. Perhaps in referring to them I may be able the better to make my own position clear, and to make clear to the house what is before it in respect of the resolution on which we are now about to vote.

First of all, as to pledges. It is true that before the present war, recalling the results of the introduction of conscription in the last war, and more particularly the methods employed to secure its introduction and its enforcement, I, like others of my party, and many of all parties in Canada, took the position that, if Canada were to participate in another European war I would not support but would oppose conscription for service overseas.

After the outbreak of war, in the general elections of 1940, I, along with the leaders, and most of the members, of all parties, with the possible exception of the Social Credit party, took the position that conscription for service overseas should not be resorted to. That was at a time when it was generally believed that the war would be primarily a European war.

I wish to emphasize the point that when I gave the undertaking I did, it was given to the country as a whole, and not to any province or section of the country.

Time went by, and one country after another in Europe was invaded and overrun by the armed forces of nazi Germany. Italy, on June 10, 1940, and Japan on December 7, 1941, just three years ago today, joined the nazi aggressors in an all-out effort to dominate the world. It became increasingly apparent that the pledges given not to resort to conscription for service overseas might, at some time, prevent the government of our country from taking a step which might become necessary to maintain our fighting forces in the field, and which would be necessary to enable them to do their part in the preservation of our freedom, bound up as it is with the freedom of all the allied nations.

In anticipation of such a possibility, a plebiscite was held on April 27, 1942. As a result of the plebiscite the Canadian people as a whole, to whom the pledges had been made, released the government and all parties in this house from all pledges respecting conscription, and gave to all complete freedom, from that time forward, to take in this war whatever course in their judgment was necessary and advisable in support of the cause for which our armies are fighting.

Bill 80 was subsequently introduced and the National Resources Mobilization Act amended in 1942 so as to permit, if necessary, the use of conscription for service overseas. The issue of conscription for overseas service was settled, once Bill 80 became law.

As head of the administration, I undertook, at that time, that the power conferred by Bill 80 would not be used unless it became necessary. I also undertook that it would be used if that became necessary and advisable. That pledge I gave to this House of Commons. It was no less a pledge to the people of Canada as a whole. Above all, it was a pledge to our army overseas that it would not lack support in its fight, in association with the forces of the allied nations, to preserve Christian civilization and human freedom.

That was two and a half years ago. Canada is fortunate indeed that the need has not arisen until this late date in the war. The need having arisen, by ensuring against any possible lack of reinforcements, I feel that to-day I am keeping faith with this House of Commons, with the people of Canada, and with the fighting men in Canada's army overseas.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) as amended, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I thank the house for undertaking to aid the government in maintaining a vigorous war effort. I now move that the house adjourn.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON: I understand that the house adjourns until the 31st of January. Is it the intention, if the house then is convened, to commence a new session the day afterwards, as is usually the custom?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot answer that question. May I say to my hon. friend that it will all depend upon circumstances as they exist at the time. My hon. friend may rely on the government doing what it believes to be in the best interests of the country.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 1.20 a.m. until Wednesday, January 31, 1945, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Wednesday, January 31, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Ottawa, January 29, 1945.

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, the Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Wednesday the 31st of January at 3 p.m. for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

VACANCY

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF GREY NORTH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that during the adjournment I have received the resignation of William Pattison Telford, Esquire, as member for the electoral district of Grey North. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

The Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the fifth session of the nineteenth parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The war is now in its sixth year. To-day, decisive battles are being fought on German soil. Under sustained pressure the defeat of Germany is but a matter of time. Present operations involve bitter fighting and heavy losses. The last phase of the struggle in Europe may well be the most costly of all. To effect the utmost saving of human life, every effort must be put forth to end the war as swiftly as possible. This clearly remains the supreme objective.

In the year that has passed since the opening of the present session, German forces everywhere have been compelled to yield ground. The whole territory of the Soviet Union has been liberated. The long awaited offensive in the west was successfully launched on June 6th. One by one, great European capitals have been taken back from their conquerors. The enemy has been almost completely swept out of France, Belgium, Luxemburg, Greece, Yugoslavia, and Poland. The liberation of Holland, Norway and Czechoslovakia has begun. Germany's satellite states have all been driven from her side. Her frontiers have been breached. Her war industries are being systematically demolished. On the east and the west and from the south, the allied forces are pressing on to the very heart of Germany.

In the struggle against Japan, the long Chinese resistance has been maintained. Allied forces have successfully invaded the Philippines. Significant gains have been made on the Asiatic mainland. Bombing raids have brought the war home to the Japanese islands and their industrial strongholds. On both sides of the world, the united nations have gained supremacy at sea and in the air. It is but a matter of time until the combined power of the allies will be concentrated against Japan.

Throughout the year, Canada's navy and air force continued their vital work in the north Atlantic. In the landings in Normandy, and in all the campaigns since D-day, the navy and the air force have supported Canada's army. Our soldiers have won a foremost place by their magnificent conduct in battle in Italy, in France, in Belgium, in Holland, and on the borders of Germany. Canada's fighting men of all the services, wherever they have fought around the globe, have brought imperishable honour to our country.

In the campaign in northwest Europe, infantry casualties in all allied armies were much heavier than had been anticipated. In order to guard against a possible shortage of fully trained infantry reinforcements, it became necessary and advisable to adopt the procedure outlined in 1942. Reinforcements have been regularly forthcoming on the extended scale thereby provided for. To our armed forces, Canada has given, and will continue to give, the fullest support in men, munitions and supplies.

As an integral part of a total national effort, Canada has continued to provide mutual aid to our allies. For the joint and effective prosecution of the war, Britain, Russia, France, Australia, New Zealand, China and India have been furnished with Canadian war supplies and foodstuffs.

With your approval, the principle of mutual aid was extended to include contributions by Canada to relief and rehabilitation in liberated countries. In the period of transition from war to peace, the provision of international relief will help to maintain full employment of Canadian man-power and resources.

As in the previous sessions, your attention has been directed to the winning of the war as the first of all objectives. Next to the winning of the war, the winning of the peace is the supreme end to be achieved. My ministers hold strongly to the view that peace can only be made lasting through cooperative action on the part of peace-loving nations. They believe that the nations now united in the common purpose of winning the war should seek unitedly to ensure an enduring peace. To this end, Canada has sought to make a positive contribution.

During his visit to Britain in May, my Prime Minister exchanged views on the subject of a world security organization with the prime ministers of other nations of the British commonwealth. Since that time, preliminary conferences of the greater powers, on the establishment of an international security organization, have been held at Dumbarton Oaks. In anticipation of a general conference, Canada's views respecting some aspects of the proposals of the preliminary conferences have since been communicated to these powers.

World security is the basis of lasting prosperity and of social security. Prosperity, like security, cannot be the possession of any nation in isolation. Prosperity, likewise, demands international cooperation. Canada's prosperity and the well-being of our people are bound up with the restoration and expansion of world trade. To the efficient employment of vast numbers of Canadians, export markets are essential. Similarly, to raise the standard of living, larger imports are needed. In this belief the government has continued, in accordance with the principles of the Atlantic charter, to explore with other countries the means by which, after the war, international trade may be revived and developed.

The vital importance of exports in maintaining employment was recognized in legislation, which has since been brought into effect, to provide for the insurance and guarantee of export credits. Provision was also made for the expansion abroad of the trade commissioner service of Canada.

During the session, all customs duties on farm implements were removed, thereby helping to keep down farm costs, with benefit alike to the producers and consumers of agricultural products. By this important measure, my ministers have also given concrete evidence of Canada's readiness, in association with other nations, to further international trade by the reduction of tariff barriers.

The assurance of opportunity of employment for all who are willing and able to work is the corner-stone of the government's programme to achieve prosperity and social security. There is a special responsibility to establish the men and women of our armed forces in useful and remunerative activities. The maintenance of a high level of employment and production after the war is the first essential of a policy which also aims at a rising level of human well-being. The many important measures enacted at the session now closing mark substantial progress towards the attainment of these goals. Practically all these measures are already in force. Viewed collectively, they form an impressive legislative achievement. In their comprehensiveness and interrelation, they constitute a major instalment of a programme to prevent the possible recurrence of unemployment and insecurity in post-war years.

To further the government's policies of full employment, social security and human welfare, three new departments of government have been established, all of which are now under the direction of responsible ministers of the crown:

1. The Department of Veterans Affairs;
2. The Department of Reconstruction; and
3. The Department of National Health and Welfare.

The Department of Veterans Affairs has charge of the rehabilitation and reestablishment of members of the armed forces, and of the administration of veterans' pensions and allowances.

The new department is already administering measures directly related to the reestablishment of veterans in civil life, the care of disabled veterans, and the provision for the dependents of those who have given their lives. The administrative machinery for this vast undertaking is being steadily developed and improved. Nearly 200,000 veterans of this war have already been reestablished in civil life.

The War Service Grants Act and the Veterans Insurance Act, passed at the present session, round out the most comprehensive programme yet adopted by any nation for the welfare of its war veterans and their return to active civilian pursuits.

The Department of Reconstruction is engaged in making preparations for the speedy conversion of war industries to meet peace-time needs and to maintain industrial employment. It is also promoting and coordinating programmes of national and regional development, housing and community planning, and other projects which may be required to maintain employment in the post-war period. It is responsible for the orderly disposal of surplus war assets in the national interest. Representative agencies are already engaged in this large and important task.

To assist in the conversion of war plants, and in the development of small and medium-scale enterprises, an Industrial Development Bank has been established. It is now in operation.

In keeping up the level of employment after the war, housing should play a large part. To provide for the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of urban and rural housing and living conditions, the National Housing Act was greatly expanded in scope.

In the decennial revision of the Bank Act, made at the present session, special recognition was given to the importance of credit in stimulating employment. The new act has greatly improved the credit facilities and the banking services available to the people of Canada. By supplementary legislation, special provision was made for intermediate and short term credit to farmers for the improvement and development of farms and farm homes.

The Department of National Health and Welfare is engaged in organizing and administering important activities of the federal government in the field of health and social welfare.

In opening the present session, I said that, in the opinion of my ministers, plans for the establishment of a national minimum of social security and human welfare should be advanced as rapidly as possible. In the establishment of this national minimum, the new department has the responsibility for federal measures to promote health and welfare, and for the planning of comprehensive insurance against social hazards.

A considerable measure of social security is already provided under federal and provincial social legislation. But the working out of a comprehensive national scheme in which federal and provincial activities will be integrated will require further consultation and close cooperation with the provinces.

I announced, at the opening, that the government was prepared to recommend a measure to provide for federal assistance in a nation-wide system of health insurance. Such a measure would include assistance to the provinces for preventive medicine. I also stated that the government was prepared to support a national scheme of contributory old age pensions on a basis more generous than that of existing pensions. The introduction of these measures is conditional upon suitable agreements with the provinces. My ministers reaffirm their readiness, as soon as such agreements are reached, to proceed wth these great social reforms.

Recognizing the importance, to the maintenance of post-war employment and to the achievement of social security, of close cooperation with the provinces, the government undertook and is carrying forward preparations for the holding, at the earliest appropriate date, of a dominion-provincial conference.

In the belief that the family and the home are the foundation of national life, provision has been made for family allowances to aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation, and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life. Family allowances are being administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare. The registration of children begins to-morrow. The payment of allowances is to begin from July 1st.

In the opinion of my ministers, the Family Allowances Act and other social security measures designed to ensure a national minimum of human welfare will aid materially in maintaining production and employment.

The basic standard of living of the Canadian people and the purchasing power of the dollar have continued to be successfully protected by the price ceiling and other policies of the government designed to prevent inflation. The value of these policies will be more apparent than ever in meeting post-war problems.

As a further safeguard of a basic standard of living, provision was made at the present session for floors under the prices of farm and fish products. These measures insure two great primary industries against the hazard of a collapse of markets or prices after the war.

To advise and assist the government in the regulation and development of civil aviation, an Air Transport Board has been established. Under the government's policy regarding post-war civil aviation of which you have been informed, international and transcontinental services are reserved for public development; local services may be developed by private enterprise.

In April and May, a meeting of prime ministers of the British commonwealth was held in London. My Prime Minister participated in its proceedings and, while in London, addressed a meeting of the members of both houses of the parliament of the United Kingdom.

In September, for the second time during the present war, the government was host to the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States and their advisers, at a conference held at Quebec.

In the same month a meeting of the council of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration was held at Montreal. During the year, Canada was also represented at the international monetary conference at Bretton Woods and at the international conference on civil aviation at Chicago. There were continuous conferences on a variety of subjects between my ministers and the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States.

The sixth and seventh victory loans, held during the year, substantially exceeded their objectives. In each loan, the number of individual subscribers established a new record. You will be gratified by this unparalleled response, and will desire me to record your appreciation of the splendid services of the National War Finance Committee and its provincial and local organizations.

During the past year, relations between employers and employees have been increasingly harmonious. A larger number of workers have been employed throughout the year than ever before. The production of foodstuffs and of the raw materials and finished munitions of war exceeded production in any previous year.

Too high a tribute cannot be paid to the unselfish devotion to war-time duties of the vast majority of our people in all walks of life. In addition to their daily tasks, hundreds of thousands have given freely of their time and energies to indispensable voluntary activities. By their efforts at home, the men and women of Canada have demonstrated their eagerness to support to the utmost the fighting forces overseas.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the financial appropriations for the prosecution of the war.

The provision you have made for the exercise of the franchise in a general election by the men and women in the armed forces will afford them the widest opportunity to exercise this fundamental right of citizenship.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

Canada's war effort over the past five years speaks for itself.

As I bring to a close this fifth session of our war parliament, I join with you in a prayer for a speedy end to the horrors and sacrifices of war. In God's keeping, we leave our heroic dead. We shall ever honour their memory. For the bereaved, we ask comfort and consolation. For the prisoners of war, the missing and the wounded, we pray for an early release from their privations, anxieties and sufferings. More than ever our thoughts are of the hundreds of thousands of our young Canadians, who, with their comrades-in-arms from other lands, have offered their lives to save from conquest and servitude the free nations of the world. We humbly pray that Divine Providence may grant to all who survive the ordeal of battle an early and triumphant return to their homeland.

This concluded the fifth session of the nineteenth parliament.
