The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that the regulations shall be published. Section 11 does not make provision for that. It provides only for the making of such regulations as may be necessary. But there will be no facility for the public to learn what has been passed.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I am ready to accept the amendment.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 167, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Definition.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does this bill conform exactly to the resolutions respecting the customs tariff which were passed before?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, it does.

Mr. KNOWLES: Are any of the additional suggestions made during that debate incorporated in the bill?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: For example, our plea for the inclusion of gasoline engines has not been heard?

Mr. ABBOTT: It has been heard, but it has not been acceded to.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words it is not correct for the government to say that they are admitting all farm machinery free of duty?

Mr. ABBOTT: If you accept gasoline engines as included in farm machinery, perhaps that is correct. But in any case they are not included in the bill.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Date of coming into force.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have there been any representations with regard to the duties on agricultural implements from agriculture or from industry since the resolution was first introduced?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that there has been nothing since notice was given that item 442 would be amended. I say that I am so advised. The minister is in the banking and commerce committee but will be here in a moment, and perhaps my hon. friend would like to have his question stand until the minister is here.

Mr. GRAYDON: My purpose in making the inquiry was that I was anxious to know whether agriculture and industry, both being affected, had made representations to the government since the provisions of the legislation became known.

Mr. ILSLEY: There have been no representations from agriculture.

Mr. GRAYDON: Or from industry?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. There were immediate representations from industry, that some tariff concessions must be made on materials entering into the manufacture of parts. I think that covers the field.

Mr. CHURCH: This section provides that the act shall be deemed to have come into force on June 27 last and its provisions are retroactive—a wrong principle—to that date. The bill also gives the officers of the department power to interpret all the items in the schedules attached, which gives them the force of statutes. That is too much power to put into the hands of the executive. Revenue statutes should be construed strictly, and they are so construed by courts of law. But we are leaving it to departmental officials to interpret these various items in the schedules. As a parliament we are delegating our authority to the executive, just as we have been doing all this session in connection with almost every statute passed by this house. This house just passes on the general principle and then we leave it to departmental officers to say what the regulations shall be and what the interpretation shall be in all these matters affecting trade and commerce. That is one of the objections that business and trade and commerce are having to contend with to-day. They have great difficulty in getting an interpretation of the custom tariff. It is a most elaborate affair to make application to the department for an interpretation. There are delays, and artificial burdens and barriers are placed in the way of large and small business. I have protested against this before, and I intend to continue to protest against it because we are building up in this country a bureaucracy that makes it impossible for any business man to conduct his business.

These regulations and restrictions are becoming intolerable, and more than that, penalties are provided for violation of the regulations. The Habeas Corpus Act has been suspended and the Bill of Rights and the legal clauses of magna charta. These regulations and restrictions not only interfere with the liberty of the subject but make things an offence which never have been considered an offence in peace time. In Great Britain twenty thousand people have been fined for infractions of their regulations, and three thousand people have been imprisoned. Such a thing never happened in time of peace and if I am the only member to rise in his place and protest against this I am going to do it, although I realize that both the minister and his parliamentary assistant, who is doing very good work, have a very difficult task. I can say that as a private member of the house. I wish to give the department every support but I do hope that when the budget is brought down next year parliament will not delegate its authority in this way. In the British house the same objections were made when Sir John Anderson, the chancellor of the exchequer, presented his budget with similar schedules to what we have here. Several members took part in that debate and forced the government to make changes to make the schedules more specific so that parliament would not be a mere rubber stamp, and by these schedules and rules that is all we are here. I hope that I have not offended any member's dignity. I do not want to ask the leader of my party here to have to rise in his place and defend me. I have made this suggestion, Mr. Chairman, in all sincerity to the ministry and the department, and I hope that before another year goes by we may see an end to this intolerable situation and say in exact words what each item is and means. Our friends in the far east corner have been talking about a new and a better world to come. I say, let us get back to the days of 1939 and try to restore the freedom and liberty we had then. In those days the business man, large and small, had a chance to do business.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has the minister given further consideration to the representations that were made on the resolution stage as to the date on which these items will become effective? The date fixed here is September 30, but representations were made that the date should be moved forward. Has further consideration been given to that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Intensive and prolonged attention has been given to that question with the result that we are all of the opinion that the date, September 30, cannot possibly be changed, and I will give the reasons.

In the debate which took place on the evening of July 20 some hon. members expressed dissatisfaction with order No. 421 of the wartime prices and trade board in which directions were given respecting the lowering of ceiling prices on repair parts for agricultural implements to become effective after September 30, 1944. Some fears were expressed that certain importers could import large quantities of these repair parts between June 26 and September 30 free of duty and exchange tax and by continuing their sale at ceiling prices up to the effective date of the order thereby defeat the purpose of the budget amendments, which were designed to lower the prices of these repair parts to the farmer. I have looked into the question carefully and have reached the conclusion that the board has taken not only the most practical course in all the circumstances, but as well, the one which will most effectively give the farmer the benefit of this policy at the earliest possible date. In the first place hon. members should understand that upwards of 80,000 pricing items are involved in this change.

I have just sent up to my office for a few of the lists to show them to the house. They are appalling in their magnitude, and if members could look at them they would see the principle on which these prices are made up and how impossible it would be for any government body to go over them quickly, take out of the prices there the amount which is represented by war exchange tax and duty, and create a new price list; or, for that matter, for the companies themselves to do it. Certainly it would be impossible for the companies to do it and get out new price lists.

Let me repeat. In the first place, hon. members should understand that upwards of eighty thousand pricing items are involved in this case. There are well over ten thousand dealers throughout the country who handle the sale of these repair parts, and all of them work from price lists issued by the implement companies setting out in detail the price of each item. These price lists do not indicate which items are imported and which are of domestic manufacture. There is considerable variation in this respect between different companies, as some manufacture domestically items which may be imported by other companies, and vice versa. The percentage of the price which represents exchange tax and duty also varies between each company and between the individual items; that is to say, there is no uniform percentage applicable to the extraordinarily lengthy list of repair parts, so that each and every item has to be adjusted in accordance with whatever pricing formula may have been adopted when the duty was applied and when the war exchange tax was levied. Consequently, it is not possible effectively to pass on desired price reductions without a complete revision of these price lists, and as I have indicated this is a task of considerable magnitude. I am informed that in normal times the preparation, printing and distribution of these price lists would take from four to six months and under present day conditions the difficulties are appreciably greater. Notwithstanding this, however, the board has set the effective date at September 30, which would appear to be the minimum period possible. I want to say that the strongest representations were made that that date would have to be later than September 30 because of the great difficulties involved, but that the board insisted on getting it back to September.

Mr. BURTON: May I interrupt the minister? From whom did he receive these representations?

Mr. ILSLEY: From, I think, the implement companies. I do not think it was the dealers; I think it was the implement companies.

Mr. BURTON: It was not from the agents; it was from the implement companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so. The implement companies are the ones who have to get out the new lists.

Here are some of the lists. There are thousands and thousands of different items with very small amounts charged for each. I have opened this just at random. Here are some items:

No.	Price	Description	Code
GK 1508.....	.18	adj. washer.....	RT
GK 1503.....	.68	connection	RT
GK 1519.....	.08	stud	RT
GK 1524.....	.15	collar	RT

There are thousands and thousands of these which would have to be adjusted, perhaps by a cent or half a cent or something of that kind; and the task of a government body to do that, and pass on this, and do a job which would be at all respectable or would stand up, is impossible to perform.

Mr. BURTON: I should like to know how it is that it is so easy for them to make any increase. That applies to what has happened in years gone by.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not easy. I shall come to that.

The second point of interest is that potential imports during the three months period are strictly limited because of quota restrictions and the physical difficulty of obtaining supplies under present day conditions. The production of these parts in the United States is under a rigid production schedule which cannot be altered without government approval. For these and other reasons having to do with production under wartime conditions I can assure the members that no increase in imports can possibly take place over this three months period beyond what had been already scheduled.

The real point at issue, it seems to me, is whether or not the procedure followed by the board has carried out the wishes of government. On that point I am completely satisfied, namely, that having in mind the practicalities of the situation the price reduction is being made effective as quickly as possible and in a way to secure the best benefit to the farmer consumer. It is difficult to forecast precisely the actual results because it is impossible to obtain the actual inventory position of the larger number of dealers involved in this trade. In one test case made, however, which is regarded as representative, the following results were apparent:

Imports allocated July to Sept. 30	178,000
Total available for sale	672,604
Estimate of sales during period	325,000
Estimated inventory on Oct. 1	$347,604

In this typical example it will be observed that farmer consumers will receive a price reduction on purchases after October 1 on inventory totalling $347,000 and have paid the old price on only $178,000 additional. One further point is that as at June 30 the great bulk of inventory is in the hands of these 10,000 dealers and not in the hands of implement companies. It would be manifestly unfair to reduce maximum prices in such a way that these dealers should take the loss involved and I understand from statements made by some hon. members during the former debate that no such desire is in their minds.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. BURTON: Could the minister tell me how many dealers in the country there would be who would have to take the loss?

Mr. ILSLEY: Ten thousand.

Mr. BURTON: The dealer would not take that loss; it would be the companies, and if they would divide that up like they do when they slap it on for us, I do not think there would be very much difficulty.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the price were brought down as of June 26 it would have to be a reduction of the price which the dealer would charge, would it not?

Mr. WRIGHT: The point is that a large number of these dealers carry on consignment; they do not pay for the parts until they are sold.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would want to look into that affirmation. There are not ten thousand agents, or anything like it, of implement companies selling parts. As I understand it, hardware stores and even blacksmith shops and dealers all over the country are in this business. To put a compulsory price reduction in effect on June 26 so that they sell at a loss is something which we cannot contemplate. Whatever hon. gentlemen want to do with the implement companies you could not do it with these dealers.

One other possibility, however, was examined by the board, namely to investigate the possibility of making the price reductions effective immediately and refunding the dealers for the tax and duty already paid. This course was found to be quite impracticable. As already pointed out, the inventory could not be identified in any event, and further, the administrative task of trying to deal with claims from ten thousand dealers involving some eighty thousand items seemed quite impossible.

One final point is the assumption made by some members that the implement companies and dealers were permitted to add the tax immediately when it was imposed in 1940 and thereby profiteered at the expense of the farmer. I am unable to find that such a criticism is warranted. The same difficulty about getting out amended price lists existed at that time. The question the hon. gentleman asked was a perfectly intelligent one. He said, how could they amend their price lists so fast in 1940 if it takes them so much time in 1944? That is an intelligent question; the answer is that in most cases they did not. I will go on.

Moreover, section 6 of the War Exchange Conservation Act specifically prohibited the adding of the tax to any items on which tax had not been paid. But as I have pointed out, it was impossible to identify the parts in the hands of dealers between those on which tax had been paid and those on which it had not. Consequently, there may have been cases in which individual dealers took improper advantage of the situation in respect of specific items. There was considerable diversity of method in regard to the practice followed by the implement companies. In one case, for example, prices were increased immediately by a flat percentage and this increase continued for a couple of months, after which it was cancelled and refunds made to purchasers in that period. Ultimately the revised prices went into effect at the beginning of 1941. In other cases the time lag varied from six to ten weeks and as previously stated the price and procedures followed between the companies were by no means uniform.

I hope hon. members will agree that in a problem of this complexity the board, in passing order No. 421, has followed the best course for all concerned, and that it has the additional great advantage of achieving a uniform price reduction on a specific date.

This question was raised the other night and it has given me a great deal of trouble. I wanted to see if we could institute a two-price system, and was satisfied, before I had gone into it very far, that it was absolutely impossible to do so. We could bring the date back from September 30 to August 30, in which event there would be a larger proportion of goods on which the implement companies and dealers would take a loss and a smaller proportion on which they would obtain a profit. I took that up with the board and Mr. Gordon gave it his personal attention. He went over the question thoroughly because he was most anxious not to leave his board open to the accusation that they had done something in the interests of the implement companies and against the interests of the farmers. He was anxious to see that the directions which I gave to the board in the budget speech, to ensure that the advantage of this reduction was passed on to the farmers, should be carried out. It was impossible, for the reasons I have stated, to take precisely the items that came in on June 26 and make a lower price on these items. It was impossible to institute that two-price system on these 80,000 items. It was utterly impossible to examine the inventories and find out what they were and how many were brought in before and how many afterwards, even if it were desirable to have a two-price system. Therefore the only thing to do was to set a date and to say, "Whenever you brought it in, whether you paid tax on it or not, if you sell it after that date the new price has to go down, and whatever you sell before that date you can sell on your existing price list." That was the only practical way of doing it. I discussed the matter with a member of this house, a member on this side who is very much interested, and I think I can say that if he were here he would say that he concluded it was the only practical method to adopt. Then it comes to a question of the date, and we cannot administratively do it before September 30. Even if we could, however, taking the instance I have given, it would be unjust to the dealers—forget about the implement companies—to move the date back too far because they take a loss on too large a proportion of the inventory and have too small a profit to offset against it. I have done the best I can in the circumstances. I know what will be said about it and I shall not be there to answer as I have done to-day. But that is the best that I can do.

Mr. BURTON: I agree with the minister that he has done all he can; I am prepared to say that. He did what he could, knowing the circumstances as he does. At the same time, I would point out to him that his advisers in all probability have paid too much attention to one side of the picture and have ignored the other. They have given him some sort of idea as to how many repair parts would be brought in from June 26 to August 30, I suppose. Have they?

Mr. ILSLEY: I could get that, but they have not given it to me. I do not know.

Mr. BURTON: They could bring them in without duty and have them with the other stock piles and make a profit on them.

Mr. ILSLEY: They took what they regarded as a typical case and I gave the figures just now. Certainly the farmers as a whole do not lose and the dealers do not profit on the selection of the date of September 30. I could get figures such as the hon. member has asked for but they would be estimates. We know how much can come in before September 30; it is the balance of the United States allocation and it is strictly limited. They cannot speed up imports. There was a fear that they would profiteer by getting parts from the United States and selling them before September 30 but they cannot do that because we know exactly how much the country can get from the United States and the quantity is limited. However, I can find out roughly, though there would be a large element of estimate in it, how much their floor stock was on June 26. I am assured that there will be a large volume of parts on hand on September 30 on which they must take a lower price. In this case, the estimated inventory on October 1 is 347,604. Some of these parts do not sell for years.

Mr. RICKARD: Has there been a greater quantity of these imported parts brought in since this came into force than last year? How much difference is there between importations under the new regulations and those previously?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the information but I am positively assured that the amount is limited. It is not at the option of the importer or of Canada. It is allocated by some combined board in Washington. We can get so much, and we can get the remainder of our allocation for a certain period, and that is all that can come in.

Mr. RICKARD: The impression seems to be abroad that the companies have taken advantage of the situation and brought in more repair parts than they did previously. Whether that is right, I am not prepared to say. The minister should know. So far as the implement dealers are concerned, we should not leave it to them to assume responsibility for the loss; they must be protected where implements are in their hands. But it is the companies bringing implements in now that we should get after.

Mr. BURTON: What action is the government taking to check the new list that will be used on September 30 to see that they too reflect the necessary reductions? Are they taking action?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That is the responsibility of the wartime prices and trade board. They must assume their full responsibility and see that the directions I gave in the budget speech are carried out. To the extent that the laid-down cost to the importer is reduced, that reduction must be passed on to those who purchase from the importer.

Mr. BRYCE: When I discussed this matter before, I was satisfied, from experience I have had with dealers, that the implement companies of this country are a very up-to-date outfit. Every week they receive a return and they know exactly how many parts there are in every warehouse. These warehouses are supplied so that the farmer gets service. There is keen competition. In every little hamlet in the western provinces the companies know exactly how many spare parts there are available and where. I complained to the minister because they had the figures. They are up-to-date figures. They could put their finger on any repair part. The implement companies are up-to-date going concerns. If I go to Winnipeg and ask for some repair part they might say they have not got it, but they ask me to wait a minute and then they tell me that there is a dealer in Saskatoon that has it and that they will get it down for me. They know their business thoroughly. They are in a position to be just a little cleverer than the minister in finding out the figures. I agree with the minister and I appreciate what he has done for us. I am sorry that he did not put gasoline engines on the list. I had a special interview with him and told him about it. If a mower or binder is essential on a farm, so is a small gasoline engine. I am awfully disappointed that the minister was not able to put gasoline engines on the list. If I call up any of those companies in Ontario or western Canada and ask them if one of those little gasoline engines is on the agricultural list they will say "yes." I would like the minister to give further consideration to it.

Mr. BURTON: I should like to remind the minister that while it is quite true that a hardware store here or a private dealer there may have some parts and may continue to sell some of them, yet by and large the bulk of the repair parts are handled by the machine companies. As the hon. member for Selkirk has pointed out they are handled by their agents, but the stock belongs to the company. All that the agent has to do is to give an accounting of what he has sold. The articles that remain belong to the company. The company knows where they are and how much the agents have on hand.

Mr. RICKARD: I do not think that is quite a correct statement. When the parts come in to the implement dealers they buy them. They are responsible for the sale. It may be that what is left over after a certain period is taken back by the implement companies.

Mr. BOUCHER: There is something in what the last speaker has just said. I think there are a number of service men who are required by their respective companies to carry a stock of repair parts. I believe that most of those parts are paid for by the individual dealers. They are not on consignment. But the point is not really a pressing one at this time, because I do not think that we as a parliament should attempt to put a loss on the manufacturer any more than on the dealer by virtue of a change in the customs tariff. The hon. member for Selkirk hit the nail on the head and spoke with some knowledge of the business when he said that an inventory is kept by the dealer and by the company whom he represents of all stock on hand from day to day, and that they are well informed at all times. That being the case I do not think the difficulty or the impracticability that the minister has mentioned of ascertaining the stocks on hand at different dates would be as great as the minister seems to suggest. I believe it could be ascertained very easily. Regardless of the date on which the price is changed and the tariff is dropped, if a dealer or manufacturer has stock on hand on which he has paid duty I believe he should be refunded that amount by the government.

During the last war a great deal of difficulty was caused when the tax on motor cars was dropped. Many dealers had motor cars on hand on which they had paid the tax, and it was not refunded. It took some years before it was actually adjusted and the tax rebated to the dealer. I do not think the minister's difficulties are anything like what he thinks they are in respect to refunding any customs duty that was paid and in ascertaining what stocks are on hand either in the manufacturer's plant or in the dealer's hands. These people would be very efficient in finding out just how much they have on hand on which the various customs duties have been paid. The minister would be well advised to explore the possibility. He will find that exact and reliable information can be given at any date as to what stock is on hand.

Mr. WRIGHT: With respect to the list that the minister has in front of him, there is no doubt that it is large and detailed, but the greatest reduction that will come about in repair parts will come from the removal of the war exchange tax. It would be a very simple matter for them to use the old books that they had before the war exchange tax was put into effect. Is the ten per cent war exchange tax on gasoline engines being removed?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. WRIGHT: I cannot understand why not. It is a protective measure as far as manufacture in this country is concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. member talking about imported engines or domestic engines?

Mr. WRIGHT: Imported engines. I am talking about the small gasoline engines used on the farm. They are imported. They are engines made for the John Deere company, the International Harvester and Massey Harris in the United States. I really cannot see why the war exchange tax should not be removed, even though you might have to change the tariff. The war exchange tax is a temporary war measure placed into effect for the conservation of exchange. If I understand the situation aright, the measure was not introduced in order to protect industry; therefore I cannot see any reason why it should not be removed so far as it applies to gasoline engines.

Mr. ILSLEY: The war exchange tax yields us $128,000,000 altogether. We cannot give that up as a whole. There are all kinds of people who ask us to pick out this item or that item and take the war exchange tax off it, because it would reduce their costs so much. We just have to turn them down. Up until the time we took it off agricultural implements, as that term has always been understood, and as they are grouped in the tariff, we did not remove the war exchange tax at all except as a means of keeping the price level down, enabling the price ceiling to be observed. We made an exception in our tariff treatment of agricultural implements. I must repeat that I cannot be pushed inch by inch into a general revision of the tariff. I am sticking to agricultural implements; that applies to duty and war exchange tax. There are people all over this house who would make a remarkable speech so far as their constituents are concerned by saying: I should like to have the war exchange tax off this, I should like to have the duty off that. But we cannot go on that way. The hon. member is not the only one who wants the war exchange tax off; farmers are not the only ones who would like to have the war exchange tax off. There are all kinds of people who would like to have it off, but that cuts into a revenue item which yielded us nearly $130,000,000. I am not prepared to let that go.

Mr. BOUCHER: Probably the minister might look upon the gasoline engine as being a little different from any other machine, because it is an essential agricultural machine. It is a great labour-saving device to the farmer. If he will look at the peculiar position in which we find ourselves so far as labour is concerned I think he will realize that it is of great interest to the agricultural industry, and on that basis alone he would be well advised to give serious consideration to a reduction in the tax on gasoline engines.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, I presume it would create some popularity with some people; but hon. members must remember that this house is simply demanding that we pour out money for many purposes—

Mr. BOUCHER: And we are suffering because you are doing so voluntarily.

Mr. ILSLEY: —and they must have a little regard for our desire to preserve some revenue items.

Mr. KNOWLES: We are just pushing you on your own free trade principles.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do think the government should reconsider their position with respect to what are classed as agricultural implements, if gasoline engines are not included. While they may not have been agricultural implements thirty years ago, certainly they are to-day. The list of agricultural implements must be changed to meet changing conditions in agriculture, and anyone who operates a farm of any size at all knows these engines are a necessity; they are used for a dozen different purposes. I believe any farmer will agree that if they are not classified as agricultural implements, certainly there should be a revision of the list as it applies to our tariff. I will ask the minister to give serious consideration to going over the present list of agricultural implements and bringing them up to date to comply with modern conditions in agriculture.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RADIO BROADCASTING

CHAIRMAN OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—PROVISION FOR FULL-TIME SERVICE AND ANNUAL SALARY

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services) moved the second reading of bill No. 179, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936.

Mr. CHURCH: Before the bill is read a second time I want to ask just one question about it. I believe this proposal which comes to us from one of the committees—I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker; I thought we were in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is for second reading. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. GRAYDON: I understood that the hon. member for Broadview was speaking to the motion for second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: My understanding was that the hon. gentleman wanted to speak in committee.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. GRAYDON: Our party are not prepared to give second reading to this bill, because we want to register our objection to it and vote against it, if the opportunity arises. I should like to say just a word before we go any further.

Mr. SPEAKER: Very well; the motion is for second reading.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): A number of matters no doubt will come up for discussion when this bill goes to committee, but before that is done I should like to again register my objection to this method of improving the set-up of the Canadian broadcasting corporation. During the debate on the resolution I tried to make it clear that the appointment of a full-time chairman will not remedy our broadcasting difficulties. I think I made it clear, too, that instead of this being a step in the right direction I believe it to be a retrograde step. We have been placing the cart before the horse in connection with the C.B.C. for a good many years, and as a result the real meat of the problem has not been really tackled since the beginning of the war.

In 1940 and 1941 appeals were made for the setting up of a committee on radio broadcasting. The government in its wisdom—though I regret to say they did not display wisdom in that connection—time and again refused to accede to the request of the opposition for such a committee. During that period while the searchlight of public inquiry was kept from this corporation it drifted into a position which in 1942, when the committee met for the first time, clearly showed that the affairs of the corporation should have been properly inquired into and investigated before. The report of the committee on that occasion was not in my opinion a true representation of the conditions that existed. Many of us at that time found it impossible to make that report unanimous, because we felt that it did not go far enough in castigation, first of all of the government itself which in the final analysis had the real responsibility for radio having come to such a position. There was scarcely a word in the report in censure of the government. Why, you would think the government had practically no responsibility, and that it had carried out perfectly what little responsibility it might have had. As a matter of fact, however, the government failed in its primary duty of keeping the board of governors complete, let alone seeing to it that the right men were appointed. The ranks of the board of governors were almost continually decimated, because the government did not fill them as vacancies occurred.

The committee of 1942 did not bring in the sort of report I would have brought in, or the sort of report that would have been brought in by several others who were on the committee. That report made it as easy as possible for the government. This is not intended as a reflection upon those who served on the committee. It is a statement of fact, as I saw it; the committee did not criticize the government as much as it should have been criticized. Now we find that while that report should have been enough to compel every member of the board of governors to resign, they all stayed where they were. It is true that some changes have occurred through the efflux of time, but the fact is that the government has only temporized with the real root of the problem, and I say we are still temporizing with it.

The present position in my opinion is a disgrace and a scandal to Canada. I cannot find words strong enough to indicate my feelings with respect to it. I do not know of a single reason why this great corporation, charged with heavy responsibilities in both peace and war, should be left without a general manager ever since last September. This means that we will have been without a general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for a period of almost twelve months. Time after time in this house during the present session we have called—I have done it myself—for the appointment of a general manager. If a general manager is of any use to the corporation, he should be appointed. And if there is no use for a general manager, there should not be one. It should be either one thing or the other. But there is no excuse for one of the major corporations controlled by this government, one of the major corporations under the aegis or control of this government, being left in that condition.

There is, of course, a grave difficulty, from the legal point of view, as to just where this corporation does fit in as a government enterprise. I have dealt with that matter before, and I shall not discuss it again now. But I do say this: Here we are now being asked to appoint a paid chairman for this corporation, after having allowed the general managership to remain vacant for almost twelve months. Is there any wonder that some of us would like to speak with some feeling in this matter?—because I do not think what is being done is fair to public ownership broadcasting in Canada.

From time to time I have expressed my views clearly with respect to public ownership of radio broadcasting. I think the set-up which exists with respect to private enterprise having its share and its fair opportunity alongside a public ownership corporation will perhaps not meet with criticism if regard is had for the interests of Canadian listeners and the Canadian people generally. But while we believe that—and I say this as emphatically as I can—we also believe that the whole texture, the whole fabric, the whole structure of public ownership radio broadcasting is imperilled and endangered by the fact that we have allowed this managerial condition to exist. How long would a private broadcasting corporation, a private station, or any private enterprise be able to get along if they allowed their general managership to remain vacant for a year? It would not be tolerated at all.

I was hoping some plan would be laid before the house long before this under which the position with respect to the managerial or executive staff of the corporation would be such that the public would at least have confidence in the way in which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is being operated. We have had no intimation from the minister or the government or from the board of governors as to when a general manager for this corporation will be appointed. We do hear rumours through the newspapers to the effect that the assistant general manager is likely to be moved up. We hear the rumour, too that a new assistant general manager is to be appointed. We are now asked by way of legislation, to add to the corporation a $15,000-a-year job. I must say however that this is only rumour, and I do not wish the minister to take it that I suggest that will be the amount. But people are wondering why we need another $15,000-a-year job on top of the jobs which never have been filled in the corporation. It seems to me that that is a ridiculous proposal, until there is some plan and some scheme whereby radio can again be put on its proper footing.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation ought to have a great future in this country. I have been fearful and I have been anxious with respect to that future. On many occasions I have been criticized; but no one has ever heard me criticize, except for the purpose of trying to make our radio system a better system for the people of Canada. Because I believe if we were ever to reach the position where this public ownership broadcasting enterprise were denied its proper place, we would be taking a retrograde step for the whole of the dominion.

All this temporizing and all this delay and all this drift is not good for our radio system. I do appeal to the minister, I do urge upon him with all the emphasis I can command, and with every conviction, to make sure that we do have a set-up of broadcasting in Canada which will be a credit to the country, to the government, to parliament and to the corporation itself.

There will be some who will say that my criticisms in respect of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are pretty severe. But my criticisms of that corporation are not half as severe as the criticism of the corporation which has been emanating right from the corporation itself. Up until recently one could not help hearing the criticism which came from those who were within the corporation. I do not like to hear that. We in parliament have a responsibility to see that this broadcasting set-up works; I do not think we can make it work by making effective the foolish policy and the principles set out in a bill such as this. We are loading up the corporation with more jobs. We are loading up the corporation with more paid men. I would like to see the paid men who are already in there placed in a position where they can carry out the job, instead of allowing jobs to remain vacant, not merely from day to day, from week to week, but from month to month, stretching almost into a year. It is not fair to the country; it is not fair to the public, and it is not fair to the corporation. And if my castigations of the corporation's policies in the past and at the present time are severe and strongly worded, they arise from convictions which I hold sincerely. Because if there is one single thing I should like to see come from heavy criticism of the Canadian Broadcasting System it is that we should finally emerge with a better publicly controlled enterprise, one giving the kind of service originally envisaged by the act, a service which the fathers of the broadcasting system in this country actually intended it should be. That should be the object of every one of us so far as broadcasting in general is concerned.

I leave this message with the minister. We need a change with respect to the whole set-up of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. This bill does not suggest the way in which that can best be done. For that reason I cannot support the measure, nor is my party able at this time to do so, although we would like to have some plan or some scheme set forth which would really solve all the problems which so badly need solution.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to express to the minister my appreciation of some of the changes which have already been made by the corporation. Radio is a public utility of very great magnitude and of great importance to the people of this country. It is one of the means of communication between the families of soldiers at home and the boys overseas, but like every other great invention, use is one thing and abuse is another.

I have been a friend and admirer of the minister for many years for the part he played in the last war and for what he did for the soldiers in our district, but I must say to the minister that before he took charge of his department there was widespread dissatisfaction with the conduct of this great public utility. On the other hand, it has been a revelation to the people of Canada what this great public utility could do if properly administered.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, there should be no board at all. I remember when the act was passed in 1936. At that time the former leader of my party objected to what had been said at the first meeting of the board. Some of the officers had set out to do something which was illegal under the constitution. They announced with a great flourish of trumpets that instead of making the corporation serve all the provinces they were going to use it for the benefit of one province and were out to make Canada a bilingual country. I have never believed that was to be the peculiar function of radio. I believe in equal rights for all the provinces.

The vast possibilities of the radio and of this organization are perhaps not realized yet throughout the country. It is spending about five and a half million dollars a year. It controls about seventy-five per cent of the stations, has two short-wave stations and one more is being built. The organization comprises 749 to 810 employees. So that it is a large corporation.

Radio affects the lives of people of every class morning, afternoon and evening, in peace time and in war, in matters of trade, industry and commerce, amusements, music and education. On Sundays particularly a splendid service could be given if rightly used, free of advertising.

I would point out that we are not getting the return we should get from the licence fee of $2.50. I think it would be interesting to have figures as to prosecutions for non-payment of the licence fee. I am told that a large number of owners of radio sets in the city of Ottawa do not pay the licence fee, also a large number in Quebec and many other places throughout Canada. Perhaps the minister would give us figures on the number of prosecutions in the different provinces for non-payment of the licence fee.

The corporation was set up in 1936. Previously the head of our party had appointed a royal commission which travelled all over the world and investigated radio in different countries, visiting Japan among others, and then the commission made its report. The corporation was set up but it was never intended to be like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unchangeable. The set-up of the corporation from 1936 until now has been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

Talk about appointing a chairman! It was announced over the radio that the chairman was to get a salary of $15,000 but according to the bill the governor in council is to fix the salary. The trouble with all these boards is that there are too many figureheads. Yesterday I was listening to a debate in this house on controls and advisory boards. We are appointing boards and committees all over Canada whose members serve without salary. My hon. friend the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) who is not in the house to-day —I think he is away at the election—and the admiral of the fleet of the bay of Quinte, the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario (Mr. Fraser), have criticized the appointment of dollar-a-year men to these boards and have told how they occupy needed hotel rooms and crowd the trains travelling to and fro. It would be better to pay some of these men five or ten or fifteen thousand dollars a year salary than pay some of their expenses. There are lots of people who would serve on the corporation without salary. The corporation should be abolished. There should be no board and no chairman. There should be just one chief executive officer. A departmental store runs a bigger business than is run by the corporation and does it without all these boards and executive officers.

I believe that the committee has done a splendid work. One good thing it has done is that it has brought this corporation's affairs and every dollar of its expenditure under the control of parliament, and that has had a salutary effect, although up until two years ago the fact remains that if we asked questions in parliament about any official of the board we could not get an answer because we were told in those years that the corporation was independent of parliament.

Some of the radio programmes give one a headache. Some people turn the radio off because it reminds them, our soldiers' families particularly, too much of the war. I appreciate that the minister has made in some ways a very fine contribution in improving the system, and I hope that he will be able to eliminate some of the abuses. I believe a recommendation was made to the minister three or four months ago that applications for licences to run four new broadcasting stations should be approved by the board of governors, but no action has been taken.

Many of the employees of the corporation are appointed under the patronage system. It is hard to get technical men for some radio work because radio is still in its infancy. We cannot measure in the future its ultimate possibilities, if rightly used and applied, for the happiness of our people. Nothing has contributed more than radio to the education of our people except the motor car, which has also contributed to their education. But as I said, use is one thing and abuse is another. I wish the minister and his department every success, but I fail to see the necessity for appointing a chairman. It will be a duplicate system, not needed. He will be nothing but a figurehead. He will come and look around the offices all day long and worry everybody who is connected with the system. But nowadays we are appointing boards for this and boards for that, and chief executive officers of all kinds who are unnecessary and only add to the cost of governing the country and lessen efficiency of a concern that should be administered from the commercial aspect.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take very long in discussing this bill. First of all, the good things that have been said to-day about the work of the C.B.C. are well deserved. In the past two years the employees of the corporation have given a good service to the Canadian people and are doing worth-while work. We can all be proud of the work that the C.B.C. has done. Looking back over the years one realizes how the taste in good music and in drama has improved, the interest that has been awakened in discussion groups and so on, because we have this great broadcasting service. It is not a profit-making organization in the sense that broadcasting systems in some other parts of the world are. This is a great national service, and I am glad to note that the corporation is constantly improving its facilities. The establishment of a second dominion broadcasting radio network is, I think, a step in the right direction. I hope that a friendly rivalry will develop between these two networks and that between them they may improve the service that is given to the Canadian people. Knowing as I do the tremendous benefit this is to people who are shut in, I feel that the establishment of a corporation free from large advertising and interested in raising the standards of radio in this country is something for which the parliament that established the present broadcasting system will deserve praise.

I have never been convinced, although of course I have heard discussions before the radio committee, that what is now proposed in this bill is the the best thing for the corporation. I have no doubt the bill will be passed by this parliament, and that if it is passed—speaking as a member of this house and, perhaps, as the leader of the party associated with me—there will be no sniping; we will do all we can to see to it that the chairman of the board and the new method are given a fair trial; we shall give them all the support we possibly can. But as I have said before, I am fearful of a divided authority in the corporation. We had a long discussion of that two years ago, and I do not intend to repeat the arguments then advanced against that divided authority. It is necessary to-day only to say that divided authority in the past was bad for the corporation, and I feel that this step to-day is in the wrong direction. It may be argued, of course, that the chairman of the board will be a full-time employee of the corporation. But the chairman of the board can scarcely be an employee; he is at the head of the board of governors, and as such he must lay down the policy, as the mouthpiece of the board of governors, to the responsible official of the corporation. It seems to me that he cannot act in a dual capacity, that of a paid employee of the corporation and that of the policy-making head of the corporation; and I would ask, in the appointment of another official—because as I understand it the broadcasting act is not to be changed in any other particular; we shall still have a general manager and an assistant general manager, and under this bill we shall have a chairman—where is the authority going to lie? It is said, of course, that the authority will lie largely in the chairman, who will decide policy on behalf of the governors. But if we do that we rather minimize the importance of the board, because the new chairman will be virtually the board of governors.

Mr. GRAYDON: They will be just rubber stamps.

Mr. COLDWELL: As the leader of the opposition suggests, they may become merely rubber stamps. I would much prefer to see the government review the board of governors and see to it that a really strong board is appointed. I am not implying that the present board is lacking in strength, though I think it could be improved in some respects. A few years ago we had a board of governors which was not particularly strong, and which, for one reason or another—one member because of ill-health, and some for other reasons—could not give the attention to the corporation it deserved. As I said at the outset, when this measure is adopted we shall endeavour to give the new chairman all the support we can in the carrying out of his duties; yet I feel that this divided authority is not in the interests of the corporation or of the general public. If the new chairman is to be regarded as a public relations man, that again is a different thing. Perhaps the corporation has not gone in for public relations to the extent it might have done, and has suffered on that account. I believe people are not aware of the splendid work which has been done by the corporation. I suggest that members of the board of governors and the present chairman might do a great deal more than they are doing to improve public relations and make known to the people of Canada what the corporation is doing for the country at the present time, both in giving information and excellent radio programmes to the general public and, in connection with the broadcasting overseas, increasing the knowledge of what our boys are doing over there.

I do not want to prolong the discussion. I merely rose to say—I have been a member of the committee for three years, have attended pretty faithfully its meetings, and have made it, if I may so put it, something of a hobby or an interest—that I am doubtful of the wisdom of this proposal; nevertheless if the house adopts it we will do all we can to make the new chairman feel that he has the support of everybody in this house.

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Renfrew South): The bill at present before the house has to do with one objective and one only, that of having a full-time chairman of the board of governors of the radio broadcasting corporation. As most hon. members know, there is a chairman of the board on a part-time basis who receives a small honorarium for the services which he renders to the corporation and to this country. I am glad to hear the words of commendation of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) with reference to the progress which broadcasting as a public utility has made in this country. It is generally recognized that radio broadcasting in Canada has made strides comparable to its progress in any other country whose size can be compared with ours.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) in his remarks this morning went back as far as the 1942 report and regretted that the report did not castigate the government of that time for what he says was its neglect in not asking for the resignation of the entire board of governors. It is evident to me that he would have, at one shot, torpedoed the whole system of radio broadcasting in this country.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would have torpedoed the board of governors.

Mr. McCANN: The hon. member has had his turn. He would have dropped the whole system. At that time the recommendation was made with reference to the general manager because, to speak plainly and fairly, his services had not been entirely satisfactory, and while it was not proposed that he be let out entirely from the corporation it was suggested that he be given employment as head of the programme division. That was done, and in due course the then general manager handed in his resignation.

What would the position have been if the idea of the leader of the opposition had been carried out and the resignation of the board of governors of the corporation had been demanded, or even accepted had it been tendered voluntarily? It would have meant that the general manager was gone and on the whole board of governors the only man in the country conversant with radio broadcasting would have been thrown out. You would have had an entirely new set-up in a realm in which there are very few people who know anything, and they know very little.

Mr. BOUCHER: No one would have missed the board.

Mr. McCANN: That is a debatable question. I know however that not in debate, and less in any minority report, was there a suggestion by the opposition at that time in the way of action.

Mr. GRAYDON: Your memory is pretty faulty if you say that.

Mr. McCANN: It appears to me that the party of which the hon. gentleman is the leader have repudiated the policies laid down by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett in 1932 in connection with radio broadcasting in Canada. They have taken a different course entirely and would now seek to put the blame on the government with respect to the conduct of this institution. I submit that the government has discharged its duty entirely and absolutely in setting up an independent, publicly owned corporation and providing it with a good workable statutory foundation, leaving it to the chief executive of the board of governors to run things. They should not be blamed for any mistakes which the board of governors might make, when you have a board deliberately designed to be free from political interference. I think that at the bottom of this is a subtle method to put in a spoke for the private broadcasters of the country. They appear to lose sight of the fact that the private broadcasters in Canada have no vested interest in the airways of the country, or in radio frequencies, which are the property of all the people and if any utility should be publicly owned and managed, that utility is the one that is concerned with radio broadcasting. The growth of the corporation has necessitated that there should be more than one man, a general manager, to carry out its operations. The functions of the corporation have increased, and you have the matter of laying down policies, the matter of executing those policies and carrying on the business of the corporation. All that is meant by this measure is that instead of there being a part-time chairman of the board that man should give his full time to the duties which are assigned to him. That is only a matter of policy with respect to the allocation of the work that the general manager shall do and the allocation of the work to be done by the chairman of the board of governors, and it will not be a one-man corporation. The people of the country do not want it to be such. The board of governors will be advisers to the chairman and the chairman of the board, along with his advisers, will make policies under the broadcasting act. To me nothing could be simpler than that set-up. It does not make much difference what you call them, whether you have a chairman of the board and a general manager with the position of assistant general manager, or whether you have a chairman of the board who shall have his particular functions, and a general manager.

The criticism from the leader of the opposition has been that that particular position has not been filled. That is quite true. But under the act the assistant general manager, in the absence of the general manager, steps up to that position in the conduct of the functions of general manager. It so happens that the assistant general manager is the technician of the corporation. In addition to that, he has charge of broadcasting in the French language. As a matter of fact, in this country, by virtue of our racial differences, it is necessary to have two almost complete and entirely different systems, and if radio is to carry out the function for which it was created in Canada, that of developing something truly Canadian along educational and cultural lines, then the people of the French language must be given equal rank with those who speak English, so far as radio is concerned. That is only fair. That is the only policy which, if carried out, will tend to promote unity and goodwill in this country; and any deviation from that policy is bound to have exactly opposite results. Dear knows there are enough differences in this country without making more at the present time. The policy of the government and of people in public life should be as far as possible to placate differences, to see that they do not exist, and to see particularly that there is no reason why new differences should arise.

I think that the set-up proposed in this bill is one that will work out in the interests of greater efficiency and will make for better broadcasting programmes so that the use of radio broadcasting will fill a better office than at present and make for the general welfare. I am therefore prepared to give the matter a trial and to support the bill in its present set-up. I do not for a moment condone the action of the board of governors in not having made a recommendation with reference to the filling of the position of general manager. Since the resignation of Doctor Thomson, that particular position has been vacant. It is the duty not of the government but of the board of governors to see that the recommendation is made to the government to fill the position, and I join with the leader of the opposition and those who are critical of the board in that regard, and go so far as to say that the board has been neglectful of its duty in not having submitted a recommendation so far. But that is water under the bridge. We have the present position before us. What are we to do now to improve the position of the corporation? I submit that the greatest benefit would be for the board to submit a recommendation as soon as possible, and that is what we recommend in the report of 1944—that they submit a recommendation as soon as possible that the position of general manager be filled and that there should be a full-time man at the head of the board of governors who would be a public relations man and who would determine policy. In my judgment, only by creating that position or one similar to it can radio broadcasting make progress and help to attain the position which we all so much desire to see achieved.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): As a member of the radio committee which was presided over by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McCann), I may possibly be allowed to pay him a tribute for the manner in which he discharged his responsibilities as chairman in giving an opportunity to all to express themselves, and in displaying throughout the period of the present session, to which my experience is confined, a fairness which I think should be referred to in the house.

[Mr. McCann.]

So far as this bill is concerned I am not at all impressed by the arguments that have been advanced by the minister as to why another highly-paid official should be appointed to the hierarchy of the national radio system, because I believe it will result in bifurcation of authority that will lead to uncertainty rather than to a strong unified administration of this great instrument of public education. The reason I say that is this. On August 1 the minister made a short review of the reasons why this official should be appointed. At page 5712 of Hansard he said:

> The general manager has not the power to make or decide policy; only the board of governors may do so. It has been found time after time in the administration of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that questions have come up which required very quick replies and decisions. It was asking too much of the general manager to require that he should, without authority, take it upon himself to make decisions on these points as they came up.

When the minister concludes this debate I should like him to explain whether under the new set-up there will be any greater convenience in securing the opinion of the board of governors than there is to-day. Then the next sentence is surprising to me:

> In addition to that, the business of the corporation has increased very much.

Does this not signify that not only the general manager but also the chairman, who from now on will be a full-time official will be looking after administration? I find it difficult to understand why it is necessary to have two highly paid officials, each discharging practically the same responsibilities, if what the minister stated the other day is correct, except that the chairman will have something to do as well with the question of policy.

It is in connection with the extension of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the work it is doing that I wish to make a few references this afternoon. My remarks have to do with the question of advertising, and that certainly is a matter of policy and will be one of the matters that will have to be considered by the broadcasting corporation in the years to come.

I think that the corporation has done a good job in the dissemination of cultural and educative programmes for the benefit of the people of Canada; but I do not understand why it should continue to be expanding its advertising programmes; for if it continues to make the inroads in the next year or so that it has in the past, and at the same rate of increase, the press will not be able to remain as independent as they are to-day. Freedom of speech cannot exist without freedom of the press, and the press cannot exist unless given the opportunity to enjoy to a greater degree the field of advertising.

I should like the minister to explain why there has been such a change in the attitude of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with respect to advertising. On January 8, 1938, the then general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in a memorandum given to the publishers said:

> The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in attempting to exercise a public conscience, hopes to carry out its duties in intimate alliance with the publishing industry of Canada. Once the extensive construction and development stages have been passed, the financial burden should tend to ease and it might be possible to do away entirely with commercial programmes.

That was the point of view in 1938. A little later, on February 3, 1938, the then chairman of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Mr. Leonard W. Brockington, K.C., made this statement:

> The total commercial revenue from all local stations controlled by us and from our networks for the current fiscal year will be less than $400,000. Beyond the figure of $500,000 of commercial revenue from network and local stations it is not the desire, nor the intention of the corporation to go, and that only until we are self-supporting from other sources.

Therefore in 1938 the general conception was that advertising should not be utilized beyond the half million dollar mark.

On February 8, 1938, the then minister in charge of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation said, as reported at page 245 of Hansard:

> It is not the desire or intention of the corporation at any time to obtain a revenue of over $500,000 from commercial sources, for reasons that are obvious.

What do we find? In the last few years, particularly since 1941, there has been a rapidly mounting increase in the volume and certainly in the amount being expended for advertising on the national network. In 1940 the gross was $700,867; in 1941 the gross was $895,066. I have not the exact figures for 1942, but I think the gross would be around $2,000,000, having regard to the net figures for that year. In 1943 the gross amounted to $2,489,224. In other words, in a matter of three years there has been an increase in the advertising revenue of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of over $1,700,000. There is no reason, sir, why this trend should continue, and there is good reason why it should be diminished.

I have no licence to speak for the press but I do not believe that the press asks for preferential treatment. Representing as it does thousands of newspapers and periodicals it has the right to demand equality of opportunity which it does not and cannot receive having regard to the greater benefits that must follow from a national advertising radio campaign on an intensive basis compared with that in any particular newspaper. There are in this country ninety-one daily newspapers and 884 weekly newspapers, magazines and periodicals. I feel that there should be an assurance on the part of this government-owned corporation that it will not unfairly impinge upon the field of advertising, for without advertising revenues the press of this country, in the main, could not continue to exist. Yet the trend during the last three years, as far as this corporation is concerned, if not retarded, will lead to a virtual monopoly in national advertising.

This is a most important matter, on which as yet I have not heard a declaration of policy from the governing body of the broadcasting corporation. Some evidence was given on the matter, but regardless of that evidence the figures tell their own story. Not very many months ago wide publicity was given to a statement by one hon. gentleman that the press should publish only what is good for the welfare of the people of Canada. With that statement I am not in agreement. A free press, publishing what it believes to be necessary, is the foundation upon which democracy is built. A free press cannot exist in this country as it should if a government body monopolizes the field on which the press must depend in the main for the revenue with which to carry on its business. I should like the minister to deal with this matter and indicate the attitude of those in authority as far as the C.B.C. is concerned, as well as his own attitude in regard to this very important question.

I am not going to repeat what was said some months ago as to the necessity of establishing in this country a semi-judicial body similar to the board of transport commissioners, to the end that the rights of private broadcasting companies in this country shall not be dealt with unfairly. I am not saying that they have been so dealt with; no evidence to that effect came before the committee. The fact remains, however, that while we have a national system of radio, private companies have been granted licences to operate. A licence to operate conveys certain responsibilities. It must also survey the right to equal treatment, and the assurance of fairness and justice to private broadcasting in its relations with the national body. The establishment of this board would do much to reassure those who to-day have private licences. It would not be, as the hon. member for Renfrew south (Mr. McCann) said, in any way contrary to the stand taken by Mr.

Bennett, a former prime minister of this country. As long as our system permits private companies to operate, those private companies have the right under the law to have their point of view heard and considered even though that point of view is contrary to the point of view of the national board, and that consideration should be given by an independent body.

As far as a full-time chairman is concerned, it is not that $15,000 matters very much. After all, during the last five or six days and the next two or three days parliament will have voted expenditures amounting to $2,300,000,000 for the post-war period. The matter of the $15,000 may be unimportant, but there is a principle at stake here. It is this: why the divided authority? Why appoint two men, who will have to be strong men in order to occupy positions such as these, one directing executive administration and the other directing matters of policy? A third appointment will be required to act as an umpire, if the views of these two men are to be finally resolved one way or the other.

Mr. McCANN: That is exactly the function of the board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then if that is the function of the board there is no necessity for having a full-time chairman; the present system would be sufficient. The management still would be able to obtain the views of the board of governors as a whole, and I am sure very few problems would come up from day to day of such great importance that their decision could not be delayed until the board of governors was called together. There have been difficulty and uncertainty in the past due to the fact that the membership of the board has not been kept complete, but my fear is that in future we will have the difficulties that always arise under a divided authority such as we have here, in that neither official will be circumscribed as to the jurisdiction he may exercise.

It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, to vote against this bill. If it becomes law, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has said, we all hope it will work out, though fearful of the dangers that may be ahead in a bifurcated, divided authority, with no clear indication as to the limits of the work to be undertaken by each of these officials.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the parliamentary committee which investigated the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation I should like to say a few words, and I can make my remarks very brief. I agree entirely with the criticism expressed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I have been unable to discover the necessity for the appointment of a full-time chairman of the board of governors. For a number of years past we have had a so-called board of governors. I do not believe any hon. member of this house, or any considerable number of the Canadian people could, with any assurance whatever, point to any contribution the board of governors has made in regard to the policies of the C.B.C. I believe that, administratively, advances have been made by the corporation. The hon. member for Lake Centre has pointed out that in addition to the fees the C.B.C. has collected from the people of Canada, during the past year its revenues from advertising alone amounted to $2,500,000. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a government-supported institution, and was financed originally by government grant. This corporation has made great progress in Canada. I cannot altogether agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he says that as a government institution it is not a profit-making organization, because I am informed that last year it was one of the greatest profit-making institutions in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: But that is not its motive.

Mr. BOUCHER: It may not have been its motive. But the point I am coming to is that the board of governors have failed to give any guidance or control to the colossal expansion of revenue made by the corporation in a time of war. Most of that revenue was put back into the expansion of the corporation, a procedure which I approve. But if the board of governors are to decide as to policy, and if they are to have any functions whatsoever, they should have a definite policy in respect of revenues and expansion of the corporation, always taking into consideration private enterprise, newspapers, private radio stations and the public generally.

When one looks at the operations of the board of governors for the last three or four years he is struck at once by the confusion and the turmoil which has prevailed. I should not like to pass any comment upon the present board, because on it are new members who may bring new life to that body. If they do, they will be carrying out a much needed reform.

The government having got into a most unhappy tangle only two or three years ago with the general manager and the assistant general manager, and having permitted a year to go by without appointing a new full-time general manager, and having permitted long periods of time to elapse without filling vacancies on the board, we do not take kindly words such as were uttered this morning by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) when he said, "There are things, such as motors for farm implements, which we would like to exempt from the customs tariff, but we cannot give away all our revenue." In the light of these words, the board of governors, inefficient as it has been, cannot now come forward and say that it will appoint another man at a big salary. The day has come in parliament when we should consider with great care any possible economies. We should give that matter more thought and attention than we do at the present time. We should see thoroughly justified before us and thoroughly proven to us the necessity for appointing any more chairmen with divided authority to a body which has not sufficiently justified the purpose behind its creation. I say the board of governors is in that position.

While serving on the committee I felt, and I still feel, that the strongest possible case should be made out for the appointment of a high-salaried full-time chairman of the board of governors, before hon. members give their approval.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, speaking for the Yukon and for the whole north country may I tell the minister that the Canadian radio broadcasting system, so far as we are concerned, simply does not exist. This condition may be due to a lack of managing ability or poor equipment but the fact remains that up there we cannot receive any Canadian broadcasts at all. We get the programmes from the United States stations. We listen to Seattle Chicago, New York and San Francisco, but we cannot get programmes from Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa or Vancouver. In short, so far as we are concerned there is no radio at all in Canada. We hear nothing Canadian over the air. Programmes do reach us from London, England each night—but not from Canada. If the board of governors or the chairman cannot make a better job of radio broadcasting than they have up to date, then I do not see why there should be an additional appointment at greater cost to the country. Surely this is a disgraceful state of affairs. So far as we are concerned the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation might as well not exist, it would not be missed by us because we never hear it.

With the magnificent revenues we heard mentioned to-day the corporation should have better management and better equipment. Certainly it should have equipment capable of transmitting messages over long distances, messages which at the present time are confined to exchanges between Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces. Radio broadcasting in Canada should serve the whole country.

I hope the minister will give this matter his attention, and see to it that either a change is made in personnel, or an improvement is made in equipment.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, the day before yesterday when the principle of the bill was under consideration it was most encouraging both to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and, to an extent, to myself, to hear some of the eulogistic comments of hon. members, some of whom have reversed their positions to-day.

At the outset may I express my appreciation of the work done by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the past year. It is true that a number of persons have criticized the corporation in one respect or another. They have been heard. I am not certain that in all cases their true position as critics has been understood by those who have heard the criticisms.

As was pointed out this afternoon, there is in this matter a question of legitimate interest. I quarrel not with those who have vested interests. I quarrel not with those who have the ambition to launch into private enterprise and to succeed. But, Mr. Speaker, I say clearly that to-day I have the duty of protecting the interests of the people of Canada against those who criticize the policies of the corporation, and I intend to continue defending that which belongs to the nation. In saying that I hope no hon. member will disapprove of my readiness to defend that which is Canada's.

There is such a thing as giving a dog a bad name. That is a popular way of saying something which to an extent—not a very wide extent—I think has happened in Canada within the last year in regard to the corporation. I do not think it is good to criticize without realizing just what the situation may be or the effect of one's criticism, particularly of a matter that is in the Canadian national interest.

It is with the greatest pleasure, Mr. Speaker, that I express on this occasion my very deep gratitude to those who have acted as governors on the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Knowing much more of the individuals who now compose the board of governors than of their predecessors, I wish to extend to them not only my thanks but my gratitude for their diligence, their care and their rectitude in handling a piece of property that belongs to the taxpayers of Canada. I was not well acquainted with those who comprised previous boards of governors of the corporation, but as a citizen of this country, as one who many years ago was very much in favour of an attempt to bring into being a state-owned radio system in Canada, I have taken a particular interest in radio matters since radio has become such an everyday part of our life, and I have therefore been able to appreciate the difficulties of the problems confronting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and therefore in a position to admire the manner in which those concerned have tackled their problems and found solutions for them.

I suggest that perhaps too much mention has been made of the situation in the corporation for some time before I had the honour of becoming Minister of National War Services and therefore the minister to whom the corporation reports. I hope I shall be pardoned for pointing out that things could not very well have been otherwise when there was this anomalous situation of having a part-time chairman and a full-time general manager whose duty was and is—although it is a different person doing the work—that of chief executive of the corporation, an executive officer but not a governor, and therefore having nothing to do with deciding what should be the policy or policies governing the corporation. I say that it is surprising to have noted how well the corporation did get along when there was such a fault, in my opinion, in the set-up of the corporation. I cannot conceive of how any other corporation proceeding day and night with something of interest to all Canadians could have got along as well as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation did under a set-up where the head of the body, empowered to make policies, was not present at all times, and therefore not available either to the public or to the officers of the corporation.

I heard with great interest the day before yesterday and to-day the fears that were expressed on the point of divided authority. But the very purpose of this amending bill is to do away with any possibility of divided authority. I suggest that in the past there has been ineffectiveness due to this faulty set-up making possible divided authority in the organization of the corporation. Now I am seeking to rectify that situation. I do not like the idea of such an important body being headed by an officer, whom we will call the chairman, who is not at all times available for the conduct of the business of the corporation. But divided authority comes when the set-up is not defined, and divided authority comes when the set-up is faulty. I think that there has been a fault here, and I am surprised to note that it was not corrected a long time ago.

I would like to see a full-time chairman of this board. I definitely believe it is essential that there should be such an officer, and I am in good company in so believing. It may not be proper to cite the deliberations of the committee of the House of Commons this year on radio broadcasting, yet I think I am entitled to say that all who gave evidence on this point were very much in favour of the appointment of a full-time chairman of the corporation. The board of governors passed a resolution, and passed it unanimously, I am assured, to the effect that it would be well that there be a full-time chairman of the corporation. Surely the members of the board of governors must know what is necessary. They must have realized, although they do not say so in their resolution, that there might be this danger of divided authority, but they passed the resolution nevertheless. I was very glad indeed that the board made that recommendation, because I want to see during the time I am the minister to whom the corporation reports that there is a sound advance in the affairs and well-being of the corporation, as well as a sound advance in all matters pertaining to radio in Canada.

It is regrettable that certain hon. members have deemed it wise or necessary to make clear their stand on this point before I was given an opportunity of bringing these further facts to their attention. The day before yesterday I spoke very briefly, and there was a good reason for that, one of lack of time. I stated then that I would make further observations at this time.

I have thanked the members of the board of governors, and now I should like to say something about the House of Commons special committee on radio, of which I have had the honour of being a member both this year and last, under the distinguished chairmanship of the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann). Something has already been said about his excellent work and I readily and heartily endorse what has been said in that respect this afternoon. I should also like to say that the members of these two committees were most diligent and most careful in their work, and there was a great deal of evidence to sift. I have only one point on which to be surprised and that is that after hearing all these things there were some members this year who could not see their way clear to supporting this bill. I suggest to the hon. members of this house that it is hardly possible to have been a member of the committee this year and not have come to the conclusion embodied in the principle of the bill now under consideration.

An hon. member who spoke earlier this afternoon mentioned, either directly or indirectly, privately-owned broadcasting stations, also the press. I think it may be repeated—because it has already been stated—that the views of the owners of the privately-owned broadcasting stations have never as much as this year been so carefully heard and considered. It was my pleasure and privilege to be present at the annual convention of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters last February. It was there that these statements were made that never before had they been so much encouraged. It may be beside the point, but it is my conviction that all engaged in broadcasting in Canada deserve and have the right to be heard, and above all have a right to believe that decisions made on matters concerning them are made with the full knowledge of the facts. With a full-time chairman it will be easier for the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to make much further progress in that regard.

Coming back to this question of divided authority, one which has been mentioned so often during this discussion, I should like to place the position before the house by using a very simple comparison. In any well organized body there must be a head; he must be the effective head, and he must be ready at all times to conduct the business of the corporation. As this question of divided authority has been based upon the two positions of full-time chairman and general manager, may I say, with due deference to the gentlemen who have occupied the position of general manager, that it is not correct and it is not good business that a servant—the general manager—be the master of the corporation. I would want to put the general manager beyond the possibility of believing even for a moment that it would be his duty to assume the functions of the real head of the corporation.

There were other questions raised. I am sorry the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) is not here. I should have liked to thank him for his kind remarks. I point out to this house that oftentimes the hon. member from Broadview acts and speaks in the true meaning of the name of the constituency he has represented so long in this house. I could wish nothing better for the hon. member for Broadview or for any other human being than that he and we should continue to strive to our utmost always to have a broad view.

It might be well to acquaint this committee that all these questions and many more than have been touched upon to-day were gone over most carefully by the House of Commons special committee on radio broadcasting again this year. There were twenty-five meetings; in the proceedings of that committee a great deal of valuable information is to be found; and I suggest to those who do not seem at the moment to favour this particular bill that they would, upon reading the reports, come to believe that the conclusion that some such measure as is now provided for in this bill is necessary.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) the day before yesterday in his kind way took me somewhat to task for not giving him a fuller reply to the questions he had put a few days before. I assure the hon. member that in the circumstances I went as far as I possibly could to give him as good and complete a reply as could be given. Circumstances since that time have not changed. I must therefore in all frankness say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member that the situation remains the same. When there is a change I shall be very glad to acquaint him with the facts. The answers I gave are the best, I think, anyone could give under the present circumstances.

I hope that those who have been kind enough to promise their support of the full-time chairman when appointed will carry out their promise to the best possible effect. I know they will. I know also that the full-time chairman and the corporation require the good will and the active support of all Canadians who are ready to help out in something of very material value to this country.

Motion agreed to, on division, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Salary.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Has the minister anything to suggest towards improving the service of his radio broadcasting corporation? Is there any valid reason why we in the north should not get some advantage from it, why we should be shut off altogether, and why the range should be so limited?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I listened with much attention to my hon. friend's remarks on this point before we reached the committee stage of this bill. Radio broadcasting in British Columbia practically everywhere is attended with many difficulties, and I understand that it is due to the topography of that beautiful province and of the country north of it. I may assure the hon. gentleman that I shall see that the matter is brought directly to the attention of the experts of the broadcasting corporation and with his permission I shall send him a copy of the report I receive on the point. The C.B.C. has done a great deal and has a definite policy with regard to coverage and it has achieved, if not complete success, at any rate more than 95 per cent of coverage. So long as any worth-while part of the country can be practically reached it shall receive careful attention and I shall do my best to see that this is done.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Chicago is situated in the United States pretty much where Winnipeg is in Canada, and stations there can be heard in the Yukon while Winnipeg cannot. It cannot be because of local conditions. We can get Chicago, New York and San Francisco, and we should be able to get Canada.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not wish to disagree with the hon. member, but one cannot possibly guess, with any degree of assurance of being correct, anything having to do with radio broadcasting coverage. The question is replete with difficulties and only with scientific knowledge and as a result of tests can those difficulties be discovered and solved.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to make just a few remarks in reference to the minister's reply to the questions I placed on the order paper and repeated in the house when the resolution was before us. I assure the minister it is not as a matter of curiosity that I am prompted to press these questions. I have read carefully the radio committee's reports because I am interested in the matter, and in going through those reports from time to time I was led to believe that a network station was to be established in Halifax and that the matter was in the hands of the minister for decision. That was in June of this year. Within the last week or so I have received from Halifax letters and telegrams from people who are interested in promoting Canadian broadcasting services. As the minister knows, in that province we have not one network station in the true sense of the term—or C.B.C. station—and we are interested in establishing one. I am informed that a transmitter for the purpose was installed but what was holding the matter up was the passing of an order in council. I made inquiries and found that the necessary order in council had not been passed. Perhaps the minister has answered the questions as best he can in the light of the information he has, but I am informed—if I am wrong, or if the people who are advising me are wrong, I want to be given that assurance—that the reason that C.B.C. station has been held up is that certain people in Halifax who have an old franchise dating back seven years which they have never made use of are resurrecting that franchise and installing a station privately owned.

These people have not the equipment. I understand they are arranging to purchase a second-hand transmitter from Edmonton or somewhere in the west. Now that is not the kind of service I visualize for Nova Scotia. I want to see that service installed by the government of Canada through the medium of a network already established so that we may look forward to the same kind of service in that province as the rest of Canada enjoys where there are publicly owned stations. I am perhaps biased to this extent, that the group with which I sit believe that service can be best performed by the government of Canada under proper supervision and fully responsible to the Canadian people, whereas small groups who are promoting this matter for the purpose of making a profit are not interested in public service but in furthering their own ends.

It cannot be said that I am interested in this matter from any personal consideration, because the people who are writing to me are not concerned about the organization to which I belong but about the service that is to be rendered, and they have asked me to try to get some information. I will not pursue the matter further. I will simply ask the minister if through his department he will continue to investigate the question and when he has any further information as to the possibilities of going ahead with what the acting general manager intimated would be done in Halifax he will inform the house, or someone who is interested in the question in Halifax.

Mr. ISNOR: Perhaps I may add a word to what the hon. member has said and the minister can reply to both of us at the same time. I am as much interested in complete coverage of Nova Scotia as the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I have sat as a member of the radio committee for the past six or seven years and have endeavoured to follow its proceedings as carefully as possible and to give my best judgment on all matters pertaining to the carrying out of the duties of the committee, and have passed on suggestions respecting administration so far as the board of governors is concerned.

We in the maritime provinces have not had the coverage which I felt we should have had. Representations were made to the board of governors, and on various occasions the question was brought up in committee. I was happy to have the support of all members, and finally we had a 50,000 watt station, CBA, established at Sackville which was to have given us as complete coverage as was given the rest of Canada. We were pleased to get that, and it has given us fairly good coverage, but the people were not entirely satisfied in certain sections of Nova Scotia and I made suggestions on more than one occasion, particularly when the second network was proposed, that in addition to the sustaining programmes carried by CHNS at Halifax and other stations in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, a second network should be given to such stations as Sydney, represented by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I am surprised that the hon. member did not support me in my request for better coverage for that section of Nova Scotia. I also suggested that we might possibly have the dominion network extended to include a station in Charlottetown or in some other section of Prince Edward Island. I understood there was an application before the board of governors in 1938 which was granted but not immediately put into effect. It had to be revised and it was revised. The application was again put before the board of governors and the Department of Transport with a view to giving, as I suggested, greater coverage to the city of Halifax and the surrounding districts. I believe if that suggestion is carried out—and I hope it will be—we shall have greater coverage and better service in sections of Nova Scotia which are not being served as efficiently as they might be without a second station.

I am not sure that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation itself should spend the money to open up a new station at Halifax if a second privately-owned station could function and give the service which is needed. That is a matter for the board of governors to decide. I do feel that we should have another outlet in Halifax. I have supported it; I am supporting it to-day. I am strongly in favour of increased facilities at Halifax to give a more complete service.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South has stated his position in regard to public ownership. His leader has gone on record as stating that he believes in both public ownership and private ownership of radio. I take the same stand. I have been a strong supporter of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I believe that on the whole we are getting good programmes when one considers that radio has to broadcast for sixteen hours a day. I think we are getting as good programmes as we could get from any other system on the North American continent. It is true that we have not the expensive and high class programmes, but by arrangement with the United States networks, and through the medium of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's channels, we have been able to take full advantage of these very fine programmes. We are not in a position to pay for these programmes ourselves. Certain hon. members have criticized the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation this afternoon for extending their commercial activities, for carrying a large amount of advertising. It is impossible for Canada to enjoy that excellent type of programme unless we have the added revenue to produce them. If we are to use the medium of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as it was intended, to educate our people, to give them the finer type of musical programmes, then we must of necessity have a greater revenue to provide the people of Canada with those programmes.

We have in Halifax at the present time a fine station, CHNS. It carries the No. 1 network programmes, the Trans-Canada sustaining programmes. In addition they initiate splendid programmes by using local talent to good advantage. But we should have a second outlet carrying the dominion network, or the No. 2 network, which would give us still greater service. There is an opening there that could be used to good advantage if we had an outlet for the second network in Halifax. If the hon. member for Cape Breton South has in mind, as I have, a second station or outlet in Halifax, then I am anxious to cooperate with him and support him. But if he wants to block the granting of the licence which has been on file since 1938 and which I understand was recently renewed, then of course, he and I differ. I am all for greater coverage, whether it is through the recognized Canadian broadcasting channels or through a proposed privately-owned station, in competition with CHNS, but which because of that competition would bring about better programmes and better coverage in our province, particularly in Halifax.

Mr. GILLIS: May I just say one word to the senior member for Halifax? It is not my intention to block anyone. What I am endeavouring to do is to stop someone from blocking what has already been recommended by the acting general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Evidently that is what is going on. I have exactly the same thing in mind with respect to the establishment of the second outlet as has the senior member for Halifax. I did not mention Sydney for the simple reason that I have no authority to speak for the management of the Sydney station. I do not know whether or not they want to become part of the second network. I do know that they are doing an excellent job. CJCB, Sydney, can I think be received anywhere on this North American continent, because they use both long and short waves.

Mr. ISNOR: I should have mentioned Yarmouth as well.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not suggest that they might be included because I have no authority to do it. They made no representation to me with regard to this matter, but several other people have made representations. I am glad that the senior member for Halifax appears to see eye to eye with me on this question.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let me say just a word, since the senior member for Halifax referred to my views on this matter. I have always said that I believed in both freedom of the press and freedom of the local community station; but I believe we must have a national broadcasting system complete from coast to coast under public ownership and control, and the broadcasting corporation must complete as rapidly as possible its own chain of stations to give service to the people of Canada and to pick up the channels allotted to Canada in the Havana agreement. I have said many times that I believed the high power channels ought to be in the hands of the corporation. The hon. member suggested, although perhaps a little more widely than I would be prepared to accept it, that the local community station ought to be maintained because it can give a local community service. The matter to which the hon. member for Cape Breton South referred was dealt with by the acting general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on June 28 of this year in reply to a question of the senior member for Halifax. The question was:

Because of the bringing into being of this second network will it add more outlets of your own at C.B.C. stations?

[Mr. Gillis.]

Doctor Frigon's answer was:

Well, it means that CJBC, Toronto, is now on the dominion network and we are providing now for a provincial outlet in Nova Scotia, Halifax. The report has gone to the minister.

Q. That is, you are making capital expenditure so as to carry out services of the second network?

A. Right.

Q. Are there any others besides the one in Nova Scotia?

A. There is only one station, CJBC, which was not on the network before and which is being placed on the dominion network, and the one which we are building to provide an outlet in Halifax for the dominion network.

From that I took it that this was to be a C.B.C. owned station, when Doctor Frigon made the statement that this station would complete the outlets in Nova Scotia, as it were. My hon. friend suggests that since that time an old charter has been revived and an attempt made to block the building of a station for which arrangements had been made and a transmitter secured. I think that is the point my hon. friend wants the minister to look into and report upon.

Mr. ISNOR: There is no difference between the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and myself in regard to coast to coast control by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That was set out in a report brought in in 1932, and finally carried into effect by the establishment of stations in the maritimes. It will be recalled that the report stated that five 50,000-watt stations were to be erected throughout Canada to serve from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to give complete coverage, and we are getting that complete coverage to-day. The only difference of opinion is in regard to the coverage as far as Nova Scotia is concerned. For years I have advocated better coverage in certain sections of my province which did not appear to be receiving the C.B.C. news and other items of interest to which I thought they were entitled. When I spoke a moment ago I mentioned Sydney, Halifax and Charlottetown, because I thought that would give us complete coverage, but I neglected to refer to Yarmouth, the extreme western point of Nova Scotia. I still hope another outlet will be set up in Halifax. To be quite frank, if there is a private company willing to undertake the cost of constructing a station and able to give the service we want, by all means let them go ahead and give us what we have been asking for so many years.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

359. Departmental administration, $425,590.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understand that some little latitude is allowed under this item to discuss railway matters generally, and I do not see any other item in the estimates under which I might properly bring up a matter which should have been mentioned much earlier in the session, when the weather was cooler than it is to-day. I should like to draw to the minister's attention what may seem like a small matter but something that means a great deal to those involved. During the frigid weather those employees of the railways whose duty it is to look after sleeping-car and other tickets have to carry on their work under most difficult circumstances. After watching their work for a year or two, I finally made some inquiries on my own initiative; the matter was not brought to my attention by any of the employees themselves. I found that these men were working under conditions which I do not think should be permitted by the railway companies, and I believe it would be only necessary for the minister to bring the matter to the attention of the companies in order to have the situation dealt with before cold weather comes again. They work in that part of the station just at the entrance to the tracks, where it is very cold and draughty in the winter time. These men have to perform clerical duties and do some writing in addition to their ordinary work as conductors. I believe the minister should give consideration to having some sort of heated booth or office erected for their use. These men should be able to work under conditions as favourable as those that exist at the union station in Toronto, or the station in Montreal. I mention the matter because this seemed to be the only item under which I could bring it up. Last February I was told that some negotiations were under way in order to have the situation remedied, but later on I noticed that it had not been corrected. Therefore I would ask the minister to bring the matter to the attention of the railways so that the conditions under which these men work may be remedied. The stress and strain under which these men work, due to the tremendous traffic, is something which members of parliament who have to travel a good deal may understand somewhat better than some others who do not have occasion to travel as much.

These railway workers deserve high commendation in this period of war. I have said before, and I repeat—and I do this as an old railway man, because in my early days I was employed by a railway company—that there is no group of workers whose tradition is better or who work with better spirit than do the railway workers.

I think the point I have raised need only be brought by the minister to the attention of the company to see to it that this branch of railway workers may operate under more favourable conditions in this time of war. It is bad enough for them to have to handle so much traffic, without having any added burden. Frankly, I do not know how they have done so much. We always considered that even before the war railway workers had plenty to do. But now, in wartime, they are handling at least three times the traffic they had before the war, and they are handling it efficiently and without complaint. In most cases the service seems to be just as good as it was in peace time. Surely these points ought to be sufficient to ensure that this comparatively small improvement be made. Let us have them operate under the best conditions we can give them.

Mr. BOUCHER: I believe what I should like to say at this time might properly be said under this item. The minister will have noticed that yesterday a report was tabled in which the situation in Ottawa, the capital city, was discussed. In that report special attention was drawn to railway crossings in Ottawa. I believe, too, that the condition found in this city is also found in other communities.

When we are considering matters connected with reconstruction and rehabilitation I suggest that it would be wise at this time if the minister were to give special thought to the relocation of tracks, and particularly the providing of overhead rather than level crossings, as they now exist. He might consider particularly the situation in Ottawa, and the detrimental effect these level crossings have on the whole economy of the city.

I believe it is contemplated that large sums will be spent in the post-war period on reconstruction and rehabilitation. I can think of no better way of spending that money than to spend it in making improvements in our transportation systems, and eliminating the dangerous conditions which develop from level crossings in heavily travelled areas. I would urge that the minister give this matter his immediate attention, and that it be drawn to the attention of the railway officials. This is a bad condition, and particularly in Ottawa.

Mr. MICHAUD: May I first of all thank the leader of the opposition for what he has said in respect of the railway employees across Canada. I am sure no one will disagree with him, or with anyone who says that particularly during this time of war the railway employees of Canada have done a marvellous job. In fact, in view of the handicaps under which they have had to labour—shortage of rolling stock, shortage of material and shortage of man-power—it is difficult to understand how it has been possible for them to accomplish this huge task of transportation of not only people but war materials. However, that task has been accomplished, and stands to the credit of the management, as an instance of cooperation between the management and the employees of the railways.

Then, the leader of the opposition has recommended a certain measure of comfort which should be given to some of the railway employees who are detailed to look after passengers at the gates in the Ottawa station. I understand that this matter has been brought to the attention of the operators of the station at Ottawa, and there has been consideration as to the best means of remedying the condition. I hope some means will be found of giving more comfort to these men who have to stand hour after hour, sometimes well into the night, in all kinds of weather.

Then, the hon. member for Carleton has mentioned an interesting subject, involving the cooperation the railways should give the city of Ottawa in elaborating upon the programme to beautify the city. This matter has received considerable attention from both the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway company. There has been consultation between the officials of these two railways which enter Ottawa, and some progress has been made in connection with reaching an understanding as to how trackage should be relayed.

Another matter which has received attention from the board of transport commissioners is that of level crossings. The condition in and around Ottawa is bad. I am not disclosing any government secret, or any secret of the board when I say that this situation is being taken into account in connection with post-war reconstruction. I know that the citizens of Ottawa, and the managements of the two railway companies are keenly interested in correcting the very bad situation which has developed from level crossings in and about Ottawa.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to take only a few minutes to refer to the work of the minister's department, and to the general satisfactory war effort of the two railway systems. When war broke out it was predicted by the critics of our railway systems that the last war had been a terrible load for the railways of Canada, and that in this one, which would involve possibly five times the freight and passenger traffic of the last war, the railways would not be able to handle the job. They pointed out that there was a scarcity of rolling stock; difficulty in connection with labour conditions, difficulties in getting war materials, shortages of cars, adverse climatic conditions, and several other factors which would cripple the war effort of our railways. That prediction has proved groundless. So far I have not seen any historical sketch of the part our railways have played in the war effort, but I know it has been a glorious part—and that includes both the large railway systems of Canada. The record has not been written yet, but when it is written it will be one of the most glorious chapters in the history of railroading in Canada, if not on the American continent. Our railway transportation systems, with their subsidiaries, are closely interlocked with those of the United States, and labour conditions and conditions with respect to getting equipment are similar on the railways of both countries. I was glad to see a statement in the National City Bank railway review of the two wars for October, 1943, dealing with the magnificent work that is being done by the railways of the United States and Canada during this war. The review says:

> In world war 1 the railroads buckled under the strain of a traffic burden which, at its peak in 1918, totalled 405 billion ton-miles of freight and 43 billion passenger-miles. In 1942, with 35 per cent fewer locomotives and 26 per cent fewer freight cars, they handled 638 billion ton-miles of freight, an increase of 58 per cent over the 1918 movement, without anything remotely resembling a major car shortage. In the same year they moved 54 billion miles of passenger traffic, exceeding the 1918 volume by 26 per cent.

The splendid survey of north American railways goes on to refer to the impossibility of using the Atlantic because of the U-boats and says that the railroads of the United States and Canada have had to replace the shipping services on the Atlantic and those that formerly used the Panama canal. It gives a fine summary of the organization of the freight and passenger traffic movement and the volume of war traffic in Canada and the United States. I have not seen any similar statement regarding the two railway systems in this country except what is conveyed in the annual budget of the Canadian National Railways and its subsidiaries, which is referred to a select committee of the house. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has also done magnificently in moving freight and passenger traffic and in handling ocean and hotel services during the war, and it is a great pity that civil aviation is being divorced from the railways. The great mistake that Britain made between the two wars was in separating civil aviation from railway and water-borne traffic and in giving a monopoly. British railways and ocean shipping have a magnificent record in this war.

I have a suggestion to make to the minister. I have been over in the United States during this war only once or so for an occasional week-end, and I notice that on the New York Central lines running between Buffalo and Cleveland the empire state and others have overcome the shortage of sleeping berths on their trains at night by setting aside two or three coaches in which passengers can reserve chairs for a small increase in the railway fare. We have some very fine railway cars on the Canadian National, not as efficient or as good in rolling stock perhaps as the cars on American railways; we seem to give on the Canadian National American subsidiaries all the good cars and none to Ottawa, but I think we might well reserve a few cars in which chairs could be rented for the night by those who could not obtain a berth. There are many members of parliament who want to leave Ottawa and go home on Friday or Saturday night and who find they cannot get a berth. In the United States you pay a new fare as a railway ticket of about fifty cents for the privilege of getting a seat reserved, where as good a sleep can be had. We could do the same thing on our trains running between Montreal and Ottawa and Ottawa and Toronto, and all over Canada. The trains running, some in the daytime, from Montreal and Ottawa to Toronto and western Ontario pull from twelve to fifteen cars. I do not suggest that we adopt the system they have in the United States here in the daytime, although we could do it in part, but it would be a great convenience at night. There is a great deal of difficulty in getting accommodation at the union station in Ottawa, as well as at the offices on Sparks street, where the railways have such courteous officials. I hope that the minister will see if they can adopt my suggestion.

The conditions at the union station in Ottawa with close tracks and trains running in and out, invite disaster. There should be some better way found of handling the traffic at the station. I referred to this matter in connection with the Ottawa bill. The difficulties are largely due to the war and to heavy traffic, but there should be some way of regulating the passenger traffic so that there will be less danger of accidents. A barrier might be placed in some part of the station where people could say good-bye to those going off on the trains. The station officials are overworked and underpaid and working long hours and doing their best to handle a difficult situation, just as they are at the Toronto union and other stations, but it is a wonder that people have not been injured before now. There is a fine lot of officials at the union station in Ottawa, and I sympathize with them and with the trainmen on the trains. Only a small number of the public are hard to handle and in war the public are apt to be at times critical, and some of their criticism is not fair, as the minister knows. Unless something is done we may have an accident at the Ottawa union station, and it is the duty of the government to prevent accidents. That is all I have to say about the railway system.

I saw a very nice sketch of the minister in a navigation paper the other day and the tributes it paid to the minister were well deserved.

There has been a tremendous loss of life on the highways. Yesterday the announcement was made that there had been five or six hundred level crossing accident deaths, and the announcement was made in Ontario yesterday that in Ontario alone 7,595 people had been killed on the highways in the past few years. I referred to this the other day in connection with the minister's estimates for marine services.

On July 27 I asked the minister a question as to what steps had been taken to prohibit the sale of gasoline for motor launches and other marine craft which carry passengers for hire and which have not been licensed and have not been inspected by any federal authority as to navigation safety. I also asked if the Minister of Munitions and Supply had any control over small craft and what had been done to regulate such craft by refusing gasoline. I have a letter here which refers to the danger to passengers being carried on small boats and motor launches. I am not going to give the name of the writer because he might lose his job. The letter is written from Sturgeon Point and says that over thirty people sometimes crowd into one of these boats and a captain who has been on the lake for a great many years says that he has never seen anything on the lakes so fraught with possibilities of tragedy. He quotes the manager of a very large branch of a bank in Toronto as saying that he had seen over thirty people in this small boat and he wondered why they were allowed gasoline. There was a disaster at Port Stanley and an accident from this cause at Midland the other day. I do not like to bother the Minister of Munitions and Supply, but he has some control over the gasoline situation and I would ask him to take steps to safeguard the public from this menace.

In conclusion, having travelled on the two railway systems of this country, I wish to pay my tribute to all officers and employees on our two great railways who work so well and have rendered such a magnificent effort in this war at the risk of their lives. An intolerable traffic situation has been brought about by the war and these men have borne the burden and heat of the day. They work long hours at only fair wages, and they handle the public and the very heavy traffic in a magnificent way.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to inquire what headway is being made in regard to the construction of the causeway or bridge over the strait of Canso. I understand that the department and the Canadian National Railways had engineers making a special survey with respect to the construction of this work. Premier MacMillan when he was in Ottawa a few weeks ago advocating the construction of this causeway, gave it as his conclusion that the causeway itself could be constructed for $3,000,000, the drawbridge for $1,000,000 and the diversion of the railway and the building of the track across the bridge and causeway for another $500,000, or a total cost of $4,500,000. What headway is being made in the construction of this causeway? Have plans been prepared so that this work can be proceeded with without delay, at least after the cessation of hostilities?

Mr. MICHAUD: Regarding the remarks made by the hon. member for Broadview with respect to the steamer which was plying on Sturgeon bay without complying with the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act and the regulations made thereunder, for his information I may state that as soon as I received his letter I brought it to the attention of the steamships inspector of the district, and I am informed that either yesterday or to-day the boat is to be inspected under the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act. Also for his information, in view of the number of accidents which have happened lately on inland waters—the waters of the great lakes or the St. Lawrence—I refer to section 387 of the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, part VII, and there I find that it is the duty of each owner of any craft which has to be inspected under the act to apply for inspection and apply for a licence. He can well understand, I have no doubt, that with the long coastline we have it is impossible to retain an army of officers to prevent any person from using a boat for carrying passengers unless the boat is inspected and licensed before passengers are taken. But recently we have tried to use the services of the local authorities, the local police and the mounted police, in order to check on those who violate the regulations and carry passengers in craft which are not safe, or are not inspected, or are overloaded, or otherwise are operating in defiance of the regulations.

With regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Cumberland as to the Canso causeway, for his information I may state that we have received representations from the premier on behalf of the province of Nova Scotia and also from public bodies in the Cape Breton area, and the matter is under consideration. No definite plans have been made. In the past there were some surveys, and attention has been given to the general principle of the proposition, but there having been no detailed surveys, no detailed plans have yet been made. This is a project of such magnitude that it could not be undertaken under present-day conditions, and it will have to await the end of the war before receiving consideration from either the province of Nova Scotia or the dominion government.

Mr. GILLIS: Is not the project of constructing that causeway one which would come within the jurisdiction of the ministry of reconstruction? The reconstruction committee definitely recommended the carrying out of that project as a post-war measure.

Mr. MICHAUD: I believe that when that ministry is organized and is formed, to it will be transferred all projects of this kind for coordination and execution, but I still believe that the duty of surveying and planning, all the technical work required to bring the project to the point of execution, will have to be carried out by those government servants who are particularly qualified to do that work, and I believe that the engineers of the Department of Transport are those who will be entrusted with the duty of making those final surveys, tests and plans.

Mr. GILLIS: It was surveyed back in 1906.

Mr. MICHAUD: Before that.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): There is another project of great interest to the people of the maritime provinces, especially Prince Edward Island. The only reason I mention it is that publicity is given by the minister and his department, or anyway through the press, that engineers have been sent to the maritime provinces to make a survey with respect to a causeway or a tunnel connecting New Brunswick with Prince Edward Island. Has the minister any statement to make as to what progress has been made? Have these engineers actually undertaken this work, in accordance with the publicity; if so, have they reported; if not, when is the report expected?

Mr. MICHAUD: Some attention has been given by the department to the matter of establishing between the mainland—that is New Brunswick—and Prince Edward Island either a causeway or a tunnel, and engineers of the department who in the past have been familiar with the conditions and have carried on surveys have been instructed to renew their investigations. There has been associated with them an eminent Prince Edward Islander, Mr. Lea, who is well known, I am sure, to the hon. member for Cumberland; he has an office in Montreal. Mr. Lea was retained by the department early in the summer and has been doing some work in cooperation with departmental engineers on this project.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Would the minister state the names of the departmental engineers, and also advise the committee whether this Mr. Lea and his associates are actually on the job at the site making surveys, and if they have made any interim report?

Mr. MICHAUD: The engineer from the department who has been entrusted with that work is Mr. D. W. McLachlan. I know that late in the winter or early in the spring, in cooperation with Mr. Lea, he carried on an investigation into ice conditions. I am sorry I cannot say to what extent their work has progressed, because I have not seen any report of the work following the spring investigation.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Another project of very great importance to that part of Canada and to all Canada is the building of the Chignecto canal. This was projected by the early settlers in a small canal hundreds of years ago, and it was followed up from time to time, in the days of Sir Charles Tupper and of H. J. Logan as well as of my predecessor who ably represented Cumberland for ten years, Mr. R. K. Smith. It is recognized that it would have been a great commercial project, and during war years it would have been of great military advantage if we had had such a canal. It would have been partly paid for in avoiding the loss of the steamship Charlottetown, the ferry boat that operated between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Had it not been necessary for that ferry boat to proceed all round Nova Scotia, if it could have crossed on this canal, that misfortune would have been avoided. Has the minister a statement to make as to whether the department has taken steps to get information regarding the construction of this very important work?

Mr. MICHAUD: I am just as much interested in the construction of the Chignecto canal as the hon. member for Cumberland, although it happens that I am more remote from the locus than he is. In my opinion it would be quite an improvement to navigation and transportation by water in the east. The project has been receiving the attention of the country for years, ever since confederation, and has been studied by engineers who have made conflicting reports as to the advantage of the canal and the cost. A year or so ago public opinion woke up again and demanded that this construction should be proceeded with as a valuable post-war undertaking. I heartily endorsed that and suggested that the old surveys should be looked up and that a modern plan and detailed estimate of the cost should be prepared. Unfortunately, the engineers of the department who could be assigned to that study have been busy in war work and the little time they have had has been given to the Prince Edward Island project.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I appreciate very much the interest of the minister in this matter. I regard it as very essential from the point of view of the adequate defence of Canada and of the United States in time of war. When this last survey was made at the instance of my predecessor, Mr. R. K. Smith, the cost was larger than expected, and it was felt by many at that time who had investigated the cost that it had been purposely swollen by some in order that there might be greater justification for not proceeding with the construction of the canal. If that was the case in those days, that reason can no longer exist because it has been my experience, especially this session, that if a project costs a few million dollars the public are not interested in it, whereas if it costs fifty million or a hundred million or a billion dollars expenditure or taxation is not a factor at all so far as the reflection of public opinion among the members of the house is concerned and, I am sorry to say, to a considerable extent also, so far as the people are concerned. In the old days the question of cost was a very important and controlling factor, but in the atmosphere in which we live now it is not a factor at all. I am very glad that the minister approves the policy of constructing this project and will have it looked into, and I hope that before long he can proceed with it. It is certainly one of the major public works in Canada and has been side-tracked for years. Had it been located in central Canada it would have been constructed many years ago; but being a very important work of great significance to the people of the maritimes it has been brushed to one side, so that it remains for us at the present day or for others in the future to have it proceeded with.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise at this time to seek the support of the Minister of Transport in connection with a matter that I intend to stick with until it is properly settled. In my persistence, I suggest that I am only following the example set twenty years ago by the Prime Minister in a similar situation, and I am sure that no member on the government side can criticize me for doing that. I refer to the case of the Canadian Pacific railway employees whose pension rights have been curtailed or denied because of the time they were out on strike in various parts of Canada in 1918 or 1919. As the minister probably knows, I have already spoken on this matter in the house on two occasions this year, so that it will not be necessary for me to repeat the details I placed on the record on May 1 and on July 24. I hope I can enlist his interest in this cause to the point where he will study the material I placed on Hansard on those occasions and the other material he can get in connection with the subject. He may recall that I first wrote to him about one case, which I selected out of many hundreds, on February 8. He was good enough to get in touch with the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway company about that case and he wrote to me a couple of times about it. His second letter was dated March 4, 1944. However, he simply reported to me that the president of the company had explained that technicalities stood in the way of doing anything about the case to which I had drawn his attention. A little later I wrote to the minister again seeking confirmation from him of something I knew to be a fact, namely, that the Canadian National system did the right thing in connection with its employees who were out on strike at Winnipeg at the same time. I refer to 1919. In the minister's letter to me, dated March 28, 1944, the concluding paragraph reads:

> With reference to your second question, Canadian National railway officials inform me that, "participation of Canadian National railway employees in the Winnipeg strike of 1919, does not affect the eligibility for pension, under the rules, of those employees who were involved, and who returned, at the termination of the strike, to their former positions."

That letter was signed by the Minister of Transport. Nevertheless when it seemed that I was not making much headway on this matter by taking it up with the Department of Transport I decided I would see what could be done by treating it as a matter of labour relations, which is what it is. Accordingly the detailed material that I placed on Hansard was given during the discussion of the labour estimates, and again I would refer the minister to the debates on the two days which I have already indicated. My reason for rising now is that in addition to the interest that I hope the Minister of Labour will show in this matter, plus the interest that I hope the Prime Minister will display, I should like also to have the interest of the Minister of Transport. I am so thoroughly convinced as to the justice of this case that, as I said when I first rose in my place this afternoon, I intend to stick with it until these men, at least those who are still alive, win their rights.

I have before me the most recent letter that I have received in connection with one of these cases, one that came to my desk this morning. As a matter of fact I receive letters dealing with this matter in almost every day's mail. This is one paragraph from the letter I received this morning:

> Since writing you last one of our machinists here has been retired. He started working in the dining-car service as a boy in 1891. He was apprenticed in 1893 to the machinist trade in Medicine Hat, coming here—

That was to Kenora, Ontario.

> —in 1907. Fifty-three years of service and no pension, and in bad shape with high blood pressure.

I am of the opinion that we must take situations such as that seriously. Here is a man who has given fifty-three years of service to a company. Because of a technicality that the company is able to use, because of participation in a very short strike in 1918—in this case the strike lasted only eighteen hours—this man is denied a pension. My notion is that the minister is sympathetic with the position that I take and that the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister are likewise sympathetic. They all agree with me that something ought to be done. My hope is that I can persuade these three members of the government not just to display sympathy but to try to do something about it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will my hon. friend explain the technicality so that we may understand what it is all about?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, I shall be glad to do that. The technicality is that there is a rule, known as clause 8 in the pension rules of the Canadian Pacific Railway company, which says that no one is entitled to a pension unless his last entry into the service of the company occurred before he reached the age of forty years. There is nothing in the rule about strikes. On its own the company made a decision that those who were out on strike in 1918 or 1919 broke their service with the company and that, therefore, when they came back after that they were denied their pension rights if they were over forty years of age. Not only did those who were over forty years of age lose all their pension rights, but those still under forty lost such rights as they might have acquired in the years prior to 1919.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Including seniority?

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not sure at the moment about seniority, but I believe they lost that too. The point under discussion is their pension rights. As an example, we have men who had worked ten years prior to 1919 and who were under forty when they returned to work. They are able to qualify for a pension, but when they retire their pension is computed only on the basis of the years they have worked since 1919. They lose such rights as they had acquired by their work in previous years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Did the company make the rule?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, the company made the rule. As a matter of fact they made it first in 1903 and it was rewritten in the new by-laws that were drawn up in 1936 and came into effect on January 1, 1937.

When I was referring a moment ago to the men who had about ten years' service prior to 1919 I wanted to add that in that group there are a great many returned men of the last war. Those men feel particularly keen about the injustice done to them. I know of several men who had just come back from the front a few days before the strike broke out. Some of them did not want to go back right away; they wanted to wait a few days for a bit of a rest. The company implored them to come in and start work because they were busy. The strike took place in two or three days. As a matter of fact some of the men hardly knew what it was all about. They found themselves out, and in due course they lost the rights that they had built up in the ten years prior to 1919. Those men are in this position: if they had not responded to the company's plea to come back to work, if they had stayed at home for two or three days' rest they would not have been involved in the strike, and they would have retained their pension rights. I might as well be frank and say that these men make comments of this kind: "Is that what we went and fought for? For a private company's right to do this kind of thing to us?" I am told that the ex-servicemen in the employ of the company still resent very keenly the particular injustice that they feel was done to them. They spent three or four years away fighting; they came back ready to take up their jobs with the company and the company wanted them back, but the company takes advantage of rule 8 which is in the pension by-laws and asserts that participation in the 1919 strike is a break in service.

I could take the time to go into the details of the strike, but I do not think it would be desirable. It seems to me that the unanswerable argument as to the justice of ignoring the strike for pension purposes is the action taken by the other major employers who were involved, the Canadian National Railways, the dominion government, particularly the Post Office Department, the Manitoba provincial government and the Winnipeg municipal government whose policemen were out. All these other major employers have completely disregarded participation in that strike so far as pension rights are concerned. I know that some of the C.P.R. men have given up hope long ago of justice being given. But despite that loss of hope they still hang on, still discuss it in their union meetings, still discuss it amongst the servicemen around the Weston shops, and they dare to hope that the government will yet be able to persuade the company that they ought to do the fair and proper thing with them. In the discussions that were had with the union representatives in 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939 the company used an argument that I do not think was justified, and certainly is no longer valid, namely, that they could not afford it. It was suggested that if the fortunes of the company were better something might be done. Well, the fortunes of the company are a great deal better to-day. The minister will realize that from the figures I placed on Hansard on a former occasion. To be fair to these men and to the country I suggest that the company should reconsider its position in this matter.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What does my hon. friend suggest the government could do?

Mr. KNOWLES: I suggest that the very least the government could do would be to get in touch with the company, present the case to them from the point of view that I have presented it in the house, point out what has been done by the other major employers who were involved, and try to persuade the company to do the fair and proper thing. In a moment I am going to point out that once upon a time the present Prime Minister moved an amendment to a bill that was before this house—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I do not think the discussion the hon. member is carrying on now has anything to do with this item covering departmental administration.

Mr. KNOWLES: I realize that one is not permitted to argue with the Chair, but if the item for the administration of the Department of Transport, which has to do with the transportation systems of the country, does not permit me to ask the minister to intercede with the company on behalf of these employees, I do not know what happens to the rights of members of parliament.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I do not see that what happened in 1919 has anything to do with the present Minister of Transport.

Mr. KNOWLES: If you have followed me, Mr. Chairman, I have endeavoured to point out that this matter has to do with men who are living to-day, who are in retirement without pension or who are being retired and are losing their pension rights because of the attitude taken by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, with which I believe the Minister of Transport should have some connection. On the point of order, since it has been raised, let me quote from Hansard of April 16, 1920, at page 1330. The speaker on that occasion was the then leader of the opposition, who is now the Prime Minister of Canada. He said:

> Now, sir, there is one court above all others in the land, and that is this court of parliament, and I say that we at this time have it within our power to do justice to men who have had a great injustice done them for a period of ten years. A great wrong has been done a large working class in this country, and I for one purpose to exert every bit of my power as a member of parliament to see that the wrong is righted.

That was the then leader of the opposition speaking in 1920 with reference to a strike that had occurred in 1910.

Mr. MICHAUD: The Grand Trunk strike.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, of 1910.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. MICHAUD: And in 1920 the Canadian National Railways had taken over the Grand Trunk, so that this matter came under the jurisdiction of the government.

Mr. KNOWLES: So the then leader of the opposition thought, but the government of that day did not agree with him.

Mr. MICHAUD: The leader of the opposition at that time was right.

Mr. KNOWLES: And some people in the opposition are right now. At that time, speaking on this matter, again, at page 1330 of Hansard for April 16, 1920, the leader of the opposition of that time said:

> When this matter came up the other day it was pointed out that some legal technicality—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I do not think we should review what went on in 1920. If the hon. gentleman wishes to make a point in connection with his argument, let him get it over with. I still do not think it has anything to do with this item, but whatever point the hon. member wishes to make should be made now.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am amazed at the lack of any desire on the part of government supporters to hear what the present Prime Minister had to say back in 1920. If I had time I could read from this volume I hold in my hand at least sixty pages of argument advanced by the present Prime Minister on this very point.

Mr. MICHAUD: No, not on this very point, although on a point perhaps similar.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister is right; a similar point, and very similar. The present Prime Minister was then arguing about what had taken place in 1910. I am arguing about what occurred in 1919.

Mr. MICHAUD: The present Prime Minister was arguing in 1920 in regard to what had occurred in 1910, but dealing with a subject matter over which the government had jurisdiction, through the Minister of Railways and Canals. Apparently he exercised his jurisdiction, because the cause of the complaint was removed.

Mr. KNOWLES: But that jurisdiction was not exercised until the present Prime Minister came into power.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. If the hon. member wishes to present his point he might do so now, as briefly as possible.

Mr. KNOWLES: Have I not the right, in arguing a point, to quote from documents which in my opinion support my contention?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I do not think the hon. member has that right under this item. I honestly do not believe the Minister of Transport has anything to do with the strike on the Canadian Pacific railway in 1919, and it has nothing to do with this item.

Mr. KNOWLES: The situation goes back to 1919, but the situation at the present time affects these men to-day and as long as they live; unfortunately some of them will not live very long because of the treatment they have received. I suggest that the government—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I suggest that if the hon. member has a point to make, he should make it, as briefly as possible.

Mr. KNOWLES: Let us get the point settled. Am I in order—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): No.

Mr. KNOWLES: —in discussing under the departmental administration of the Department of Transport the fact that employees of a transportation company are, in my view, not getting a square deal to-day?

Mr. MICHAUD: I think the hon. member is out of order because the matter he is trying to bring before the committee does not come under the jurisdiction of this department or of the government. Because it has to do with the relations between a transportation company and its employees it does not follow that it is a matter over which this government or this department has any jurisdiction. That is where the difficulty lies; that is why this grievance has not been adjusted up to the present. Neither parliament nor the government nor the board of transport commissioners has any jurisdiction over relations between the Canadian Pacific Railway company and its employees.

Mr. KNOWLES: I still am not convinced of that. The company operates under the Railway Act, and if we wished—and if as private members we had the power to do so—we could move an amendment to that act concerning this very matter. In 1920, when the bill to which the minister has referred was before the house, the present Prime Minister moved an amendment in these words:

> Any right or interest of any employee of the Grand Trunk Railway Company existing in either the pension system or the insurance or provident society prior to the strike of the company's employees which occurred in July, 1910, is hereby declared not to have been affected by the said strike or any circumstance or condition arising out of or in connection therewith.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I believe the hon. member would be more nearly right if he brought up this matter under the estimates of the Department of Labour. I still say he is out of order in discussing it in connection with the Department of Transport.

Mr. KNOWLES: If that is your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and you insist on it, I have no option but to abide by it, but perhaps you will give me a minute to conclude what I have been trying to say. I agree with your suggestion that this is primarily a matter of labour relations, and should be dealt with by the Minister of Labour. As a matter of fact I have drawn it to his attention on two occasions in the house and on several occasions outside the house, and I shall continue to press for his intervention. But I suggest it is so important a matter that if the Minister of Labour, in his endeavour to persuade the company to do the right and proper thing, can have the assistance and support of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport, the case will be made just that much stronger. I was endeavouring to refer the Minister of Transport not only to the material I have placed on the record this year, but to the Prime Minister's speeches which ran all through volume 2 of Hansard for 1920, dealing with a parallel situation. I hope, despite the trouble we have had in deciding whether this matter is in order under this item, that out of the sympathy I am sure the minister has with these men, he will interest himself in the matter, and that he will do his best along with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour in making an appeal—let me put it upon that basis—to the company to do the right and proper thing for these men without further delay.

Mr. DECHENE: Mr. Chairman, I crave a few minutes of the time of the committee to place before the Minister of Transport a situation which obtains in part of the constituency I represent, and which also extends into Saskatchewan. Since this is possibly the last opportunity I may have to address this august assembly at this session, and in deference to the large number of French Canadians residing in Athabaska, may I ask permission of the committee to address the chamber in French. I assure hon. members who do not understand that language that there is no political aspect whatsoever to the question I am about to discuss.

(Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to support a request submitted four or five years by a large number of people from northeast Alberta for an improved service on a branch line running from the town where I live, Bonnyville, to Beaver river, a distance of about thirty miles. This is an extension of the Canadian National line which is to be built later—immediately after the war, I hope—to connect up with another section of the same system coming from Saskatchewan.

The section I am referring to was built in 1930 and 1931. Grading has been done on a further distance of about forty-five to fifty miles but has never been used. On this branch line only one train a week is run. At every session, for the last four years, during which I have had the honour of representing that part of the country, I have urgently requested the directors of the Canadian National Railways for an improved service. Again, very recently, with the support of one of the ministers, we paid a visit to the directors and the manager of the Canadian National Railways in Winnipeg and Edmonton, but, so far, our request has been turned down because it is claimed that the traffic is not heavy enough to warrant a two-train-a-week service; and I was asking three trains weekly. The reason given by the directors is not acceptable. It is easy to understand that if there is no train there will be no traffic. One train a week is so inadequate that the greater part of what is produced in that district is hauled by truck, and the committee knows that new trucks are very hard to obtain. Trucks that have been used for four or five years are becoming more and more defective.

That is a live stock area. Take, for instance, hogs which are raised in large numbers from Bonnyville to a point in Saskatchewan that lies 35 or 40 miles away. Those among us who raise cattle will readily understand that our people cannot keep those animals longer than one or two days after they are ready for the market. If a hog is over a certain weight the quality begins to decrease. Those breeders are compelled to deliver their hogs at once if they want them to qualify for grade 1, which represents $3 for each animal, and ensures a better classification.

I ask the minister to help us in our representations to the company. Nobody knows better than I the tremendous task performed by the railways and the efficiency with which they are doing it. A great many experienced employees have left the company to fight the great battle and they have had to be replaced by men who had been superannuated. I realize that with the large increase in the number of passenger and freight trains, the railways' task has more than doubled, and I commend them for the work they have accomplished. However, there is such a ground for complaint in that district. That is a matter which affects not only farmers in the Bonnyville area, but also a large number of people as far away as Saskatchewan. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this committee as well as the minister and his department will support my request that pressure be brought to bear upon the Canadian National so that the people who took up land in such a remote district in the expectation of a railroad that had been promised for ten or fifteen years, may get such a service at least over that distance of thirty miles.

Mr. MICHAUD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I have a great deal of sympathy for my hon. friend from Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) and for the plan he has just submitted. As I told him, I shall be glad to make a point of pressing this scheme with the railway management. I might be held back by what he just said, namely, that the railway section would connect Bonnyville with the beaver kingdom. I would hesitate to introduce my hon. friend to the beaver kingdom!

Mr. DECHENE (Translation): Oh, no! I don't belong to that family.

Mr. MICHAUD (Translation): Nonetheless, this matter has not failed to attract the attention of my department or of Canadian National Railways officials. There and elsewhere, we cannot satisfy everyone and give them the service they want, and that for two reasons: the first is that there is a shortage of equipment and the second, a shortage of manpower. I have no doubt, however, that when conditions get back to normal, we will be able to comply with the request of the citizens of Bonnyville and of all the good folk represented by the hon. member.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, just before the committee rose at six o'clock I was pleased to hear the minister express sympathy with the project of building a canal across the Chignecto isthmus, the matter having been brought up a little earlier by the hon. member for Cumberland, who gave, I thought, an interesting and capable review in arguing why the canal should be built. Since I have made a very careful survey, so far as a layman can do, across the isthmus from Baie Verte to the bay of Fundy side, a distance of about seventeen to nineteen miles, I think I ought to say a word in support of the proposal. It is five years since I made my own personal inquiries into the matter. I have always been in favour of the canal being built. It has been a subject which has been before this house since 1870. It was one of the first canal projects proposed in the parliament of Canada, a matter of seventy-five years ago. So that I think it is about time, after seventy-five years of argument, that this job should be got on with.

From my own personal investigations there is—I am speaking from memory—a small chain of lakes, some more or less lengthy, in that region, and when Mr. R. K. Smith was a member of parliament in this house my memory was that I had heard him make a speech on this project, but on looking up Hansard I do not think it was during my term here, between 1930 and 1935, but earlier that he gave an exhaustive and well delivered address in favour of the building of the Chignecto canal. He also spoke of these lakes which I saw myself. Mr. Smith argued in favour of building the canal. He stated that it was not a difficult engineering problem from the Baie Verte end until you come to the bay of Fundy, but that there, where the high tides come in, the engineers might find some difficutly. I would say from my own observations that the argument put forward by the hon. member for Cumberland here to-day is a good one. If the canal were built it would save at least five hundred miles in going from the nearest New Brunswick port, which I believe is Shediac, to Saint John, as compared with the present route from Shediac around Nova Scotia to Saint John. That is a big saving in distance and time.

When I referred to this matter on a previous occasion I put on the record the distance that would be saved in going from Saint John to Montreal, and if the canal were built it would provide a much safer route for shipping. I also pointed out what it would mean in going from Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, to Boston. I think this house should do everything it can to increase the prosperity of the maritime provinces, and here is one way of doing it because a canal across the Chignecto isthmus would shorten the distance between Charlottetown and Boston by hundreds of miles and be a much safer course for ships to follow than going around by the ocean.

Not to prolong the matter I just wish to say, after hearing the hon. member for Cumberland and the sympathetic reply of the minister, that I hope that between now and the next session of parliament—if the minister is minister in the next parliament—he will avail himself of whatever opportunity he has to study the reports of the different commissions, and there have been many from 1871 down to the present time, and study also the plans that have been submitted for the building of this canal. I have examined those plans carefully. Indeed, I took them with me on my journey to New Brunswick to survey the area between Baie Verte and the bay of Fundy. I shall be much pleased, if I am here at the next session of parliament, if the minister is able to submit to the house, if he is then Minister of Transport—

Mr. GRAYDON: It will be handy when he is in the opposition anyway.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall be glad if he will prepare himself between now and the next session to further this project for building the Chignecto canal in favour of which he has spoken so sympathetically. I am convinced that the country owes it to the maritime provinces. I am convinced that it will bring a larger measure of prosperity to the maritimes than they have to-day. It will provide a much safer and much shorter route and would provide for the producers on the bay of Fundy, such as the plaster rock miners and the coal mining people in my hon. friend's riding of Cumberland, a much shorter, safer and faster route from the coal mines and plaster rock mines to the main markets of central Canada. We should do everything we can to encourage greater trade, faster trade and more trade between all of the maritimes and upper Canada.

Mr. MICHAUD: I am glad that the Chignecto canal project has become a national project rather than a maritime or local one through the support—and the enlightened support—of the hon. member for Davenport. I am sure that he has full knowledge of the possibilities of this canal as a national project to improve communications between the maritimes and from the great lakes around the coast to New England and other United States ports. It would provide a shorter and a safer route, would be of great benefit to trade and would improve relations between different parts of Canada and the United States.

The hon. gentleman is right in saying that the building of the canal has been mooted for many, many years, definitely since confederation, since 1870. I find on looking at the report that was made by a commission in 1933 that the project has been studied by several different commissions ever since 1822. At that time the cost of the project was estimated at $208,000. In 1933 there was a report on three different projected routes and the cost of these routes varied from forty to sixty million dollars. Even if the cost of building such a project to meet the requirements of the twentieth century and the requirements of navigation in these modern days should be higher, I think the investment would be a good one, and if the expectations of the hon. member for Davenport materialize I hope to be able to lay before this house a proposal with a view to implementing the different requests that have been made for the building of this canal, which I am convinced would be a great asset to the transportation system of Canada.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Now that we are on this item, could the minister give me some information regarding the employees on some of these canals? I have particular reference to the Welland ship canal, Williamsburg, Cornwall, Chambly, and Lachine canals. I understand that there are three shifts kept in charge of the canals, with one man in charge of each of them. I have found in different parts of the country that the wages and salaries paid these men vary from one canal to another.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not want to interfere, but there will be items dealing with the canals which the hon. member has mentioned. We are having a fairly general discussion, and we are on administration now. I should like to keep within the item which we are on at the moment, because we can have this discussion when we come to the appropriate items.

360. Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada—administration, maintenance and operation, $285,105.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is the function of this board of transport commissioners, and what have they done for the Dominion of Canada in the last two years to justify what we have spent on them? The minister might tell us who they are.

Mr. MICHAUD: The duty of the board of transport commissioners for Canada is to perform the functions vested in the board by the Transport Act and by the Railway Act, with the object of coordinating and harmonizing the operations of all carriers engaged in transport by railways, ships, and up to this date, aircraft. It will be noted that there is no duty assigned to the board in respect of transportation by motor trucks or motor vehicles, or by other methods of transportation except railways and ships.

The personnel of the board consists of one chief commissioner, one assistant chief, one deputy, and three commissioners. The main functions of the board and the personnel of the board are to administer the several sections and provisions of the Transport Act and the Railway Act which have regard to coordination of traffic, rates of transportation both of persons and goods, safety appliances and devices, and generally coordinating the functions of the respective railways and ships engaged in transportation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Could the minister tell us anything which this board has done within the last two years that is worth while?

Mr. MICHAUD: I would respectfully refer the hon. member to the reports of the board, which have been tabled in this house and are available, and which enumerate in detail the different applications made to the board, giving a report of the hearings and the decisions. They are quite numerous. The report contains sixty-three pages, and I cannot be expected to read it all. It was filed and it must have come to the notice or the attention of the hon. member.

Let me give some examples of the matters which come under the attention of the board:

General order 635, an order made on January 12, 1943, with regard to the transportation by express of acids, inflammables, oxidizing substances, samples of explosives, et cetera;

Another ruling made in January, 1943, in the matter of the Express Traffic Association of Canada for permission to make shipments of trench mortar bombs, methods of boxing, packaging, weight, and methods of loading on cars;

Another order made on October 30, 1942, respecting the matter of transportation of explosives;

An application made by the Railway Association of Canada for an order amending the uniform rules governing the determination of visual acuity, colour perception, and hearing of railway employees;

Order amending regulations for the transportation of explosives and other dangerous articles by freight;

Applications made by the Great Northern and Northern Pacific railway companies and their subsidiary companies for an order approving the conditions limiting liability to be printed on their free annual and trip transportation over their lines;

Regarding emergency shipments by railway express of ammunition;

Application by the Express Traffic Association of Canada re handling of samples of explosive;

Again, rules regarding the transportation of explosives, and the use of black powder kegs for transportation of black powder;

Application to permit the transportation of explosives in paper bags;

Again, transportation of explosives and other dangerous articles;

Regarding rates to be charged for transporting individuals over the railroads.

There are a large number of orders which were made by the board on application of several interests, parties, railway associations, manufacturers, and railway employees.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How long has it been since the board of transport commissioners reviewed the freight rate schedules which obtain in western Canada?

Mr. MICHAUD: I cannot give the exact date. I have not that information before me.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister suppose that it has been attended to within the last ten years?

Mr. MICHAUD: Oh, yes. I believe there have been applications within the last few years. I am not so sure that there was a general revision of the rate structure within the last ten years. The board acts generally on applications by interested parties.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to draw to the minister's attention a case in point. To illustrate the highly discriminatory freight rates that exist with respect to western provinces like Alberta and Saskatchewan, one can ship 100 pounds of barbed wire by rail from Montreal to Vancouver for 75 cents but if one wishes to send the same barbed wire from Montreal to Edmonton it costs $1.98. The whole freight rate structure affecting Alberta and Saskatchewan is shot through with absurdities like that. The time is overdue when something should be done about this matter, and I believe this board ought to go to work on it and make sure that certain provinces are given a better chance to live.

Mr. MICHAUD: The board is constituted for the purpose mentioned by my hon. friend and any public body or person having any complaint or grievance regarding freight rates can submit that grievance to the board. They will hear the complaint and pass upon it and adjust the situation to the general freight rate principles that prevail in the country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can the experts in the department tell the minister of one or two cases that have been referred to the board within the last five years in which there has been an adjustment in favour of Alberta or Saskatchewan?

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not know of any, but if there were any applications or representations and a hearing has been held and a ruling given it will appear in the annual report of the board of transport commissioners, which is tabled in this house each year.

Mr. BLACKMORE: As a member of parliament I appreciate being referred by the minister to certain reports, but being himself a member he knows that if the members of this house undertook to read one-half of the reports that are put into their hands there would not be very many members; there would be so many corpses. We have to depend upon ministers to give us an idea of the essential features of the reports that are submitted by them. I appreciate the answers that the minister has given, but I repeat, the time is overdue for a revision of the freight rates in western Canada so that they will have a less injurious bearing upon Alberta and Saskatchewan. I do not know about the other provinces but I speak for those two.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is up to the hon. member to present his grievances to the board and they will be given every consideration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I give notice now to the board of transport commissioners that grievances will be laid before them before long.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will the minister give a short explanation of the reason why freight rates from Montreal to Vancouver should be so much less than from Montreal to Calgary?

Mr. MICHAUD: Does the hon. member want the freight rates for export or for home consumption?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Home consumption.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And export.

Mr. MICHAUD: As between freight rates for export and freight rates for inland carriage there is a difference that has been recognized by transportation and shipping companies and all public bodies. There is a differential between commodities that are moved for export and those that are moved for home consumption. The matter has been argued many times within the last twenty-five or thirty years, but the principle has never been changed, namely, that there should be a differential. As to the differential in rates on goods transported for home consumption as between Montreal and Vancouver on one hand and between Montreal and Calgary, on the other, I cannot give any explanation why there should be a differential, if there is any. Of course, in considering the freight rate structure of Canada competition between rail transportation and water transportation must be considered. There are competitive rates and there are rates that are not competitive. As regards the rates between two points which are served by both rail and water, since water rates are always lower than rail rates the railways have to make their rates between such competitive points the same as water rates in order to get business.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The view is generally held by people who are well informed that the freight rate structure in Canada in many respects establishes a tariff wall around Alberta, both importing and exporting, and there is no joke at all about it. The situation in Saskatchewan is just as serious. Anyone who imagines that a sound Canadian economy can be erected on a situation like that is capable of imagining pretty extreme things. I repeat, the time has come for a thorough overhauling of these rates.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member for Lethbridge asked for the names of the board of railway commissioners. On page 195 of the estimates giving particulars of items, there appear the names of a number of officials and employees, but I cannot tell from reading the list which of these persons are members of the board. Would the minister give us the names and under what items on page 195 their salaries appear.

Mr. MICHAUD: The employees of the board mentioned on page 195 of the estimates are properly employees of the board and come under item 360. The salaries of the personnel of the board of transport commissioners are statutory and for that reason the names do not appear in the estimates. The chief commissioner is Colonel J. A. Cross, K.C.; the assistant commissioner, Mr. W. H. M. Wardrope; the deputy chief commissioner's position is vacant.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will the minister give the salaries?

Mr. MICHAUD: The chief commissioner's salary is $12,500, the assistant chief $9,000, the deputy chief $8,000. The three commissioners each receive $8,000, and they are Mr. J. A. Stoneman, Mr. G. A. Stone and Mr. Frank M. MacPherson.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Where in the estimates does that expenditure appear?

Mr. MICHAUD: The salaries of the board of transport commissioners for Canada are found at page 45 of the estimates. The letter (S) means statutory.

Item agreed to.

Canals service—

361. Canals service administration, $39,460.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: What are the classification, duties and remuneration of the men on the ship canals, the Welland canal, the Williamsburg canal, Cornwall canal, Soulange canal and the Lachine canal?

Mr. MICHAUD: Does the hon. member mean the ship canals or the ships operated by the department?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I am asking for the classification, duties and wages of the men in charge of these ship canals?

Mr. MICHAUD: I have not before me the list of the employees of each canal. I have here a list of the employees as classified by the civil service commission as to their employment or position. We have six superintending canal engineers; one at $5,220; three at $4,620; one at $3,960; one at $2,790. We have one assistant superintending engineer at $4,500; three senior assistant engineers, two at $3,300, one at $3,180; three assistant engineers on the Welland canal, three at $3,420; four assistant engineers, three at $2,700, one at $2,640; one junior engineer at $2,160; one canal superintendent, Lachine, at $3,300; one canal superintendent, grade 1, Welland ship canal, $3,780; one assistant canal superintendent, grade 2, Welland ship canal, $3,420; one assistant canal superintendent, grade 1, Welland ship canal, $3,060; one canal superintendent, grade 4, $2,640; three canal superintendents, grade 3, three at $2,280; five canal superintendents, grade 2, four at $1,800, one at $1,755; two canal superintendents, grade 1, one at $1,615, one at $1,440; one senior electrical draftsman at $2,160; one senior draftsman at $1,800. It is all printed at page 196 of the estimates. The reason for the differentials is first of all the difference in the length of service; second, the difference in classification. The reason for the difference in classification is that it has been considered that on some canals the duties are much more responsible than on others, for example, the Welland canal as compared with the Grenville canal. There is a difference between the amount of the work and the extent of the responsibility and the classifications required for the position.

Mr. LOCKHART: What was the amount of the movement of freight through the Welland ship canal in the last three years?

Mr. MICHAUD: I shall give the freight tonnage. In 1938 it was 12,629,054 tons; in 1939, 11,729,553 tons; in 1940, 12,906,474 tons; in 1941, 13,230,175 tons; in 1942, 11,108,121 tons, and in 1943, 10,018,990 tons.

Mr. LOCKHART: Does that mean the movement both east and west?

Mr. MICHAUD: That is the total movement.

Mr. HAZEN: What did it cost to operate and maintain the Rideau canal last year and what was the tonnage of freight that passed through it?

Mr. MICHAUD: The tonnage of freight was 1,551 tons and the cost $183,980.

Mr. HAZEN: Is that the cost of operating?

Mr. MICHAUD: And maintaining.

Mr. HAZEN: That includes the repairs and so on?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Can the minister break down these figures into operation and maintenance?

Mr. MICHAUD: I am sorry I have not here a detailed statement of the cost of operation as distinct from the cost of maintenance, but last year we spent about $8,000 on repairs and we estimate that the expenditure for the current year will be about the same. The balance is for operation.

Mr. LOCKHART: Does the Trent canal come under the minister too? Has he the total expenditure there, and the tonnage?

Mr. MICHAUD: Last year the tonnage was 34,564, and it cost us $214,336 to operate.

Mr. HAZEN: What is the nature of the tonnage that goes through the Rideau canal?

Mr. MICHAUD: Sand, coal, wood—

Mr. HAZEN: Through the Rideau?

Mr. MICHAUD: I am told so. I believe the majority of the boats are pleasure yachts.

Item agreed to.

Canals service—

364. To provide for expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations, $5,000.

Mr. FULFORD: This is a very small sum, and I should like to know what it is for. I presume all the necessary surveys have been made, and perhaps some of this is for office expense. I feel very keenly that we must keep abreast of the times with regard to improvements in the St. Lawrence ship canal, for I know of nothing that would be of more benefit to the Dominion of Canada in the rehabilitation and reconstruction period after the war than the construction of the St. Lawrence ship canal.

Mr. MICHAUD: This appropriation is for the purpose of investigations by the Canadian temporary great lakes and St. Lawrence basin committee; second, to cover the expense of metering the flow of the St. Lawrence river when flow conditions are such as to make this work necessary. The Canadian temporary great lakes-St. Lawrence basin committee was appointed by the government of Canada on October 24, 1940, to cooperate with a similar committee appointed by the government of the United States in preliminary and other investigations for that part of the great lakes-St. Lawrence basin project located in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river. The estimate is considered sufficient to keep up to date the mass of data that has been accumulated during past years on the St. Lawrence waterways project.

Mr. FULFORD: The joint committee is still in existence?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has any report of the findings of that committee been published recently?

Mr. MICHAUD: I believe the reports are issued from time to time in the form of government papers, through external affairs, and either tabled or made public. They are the reports of an international joint committee and have to be issued through the state departments of the respective countries.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There has been a statement published within the last year?

Mr. MICHAUD: I think so. If the hon. gentleman requires it, if he will apply to the department they will secure copies for him.

Mr. LOCKHART: What is the total amount that has been expended on surveys and investigations up to the present in connection with the St. Lawrence scheme?

Mr. MICHAUD: The total expenditures amount to $956,766.71.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister name for us all the canals involved in this item, the number of canals in Canada which are affected by this item?

Mr. MICHAUD: There are no canals here.

The CHAIRMAN: This has to do with the St. Lawrence ship canal.

Mr. MICHAUD: I want to understand what my hon. friend requires. We are considering item 364, to provide for expenses in connection with St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wanted the canals involved in the items we have just passed; I am afraid I did not hear them.

Mr. MICHAUD: The canals are as follows:

Murray canal
Ontario St. Lawrence canals, H.Q.
Cornwall canal
Williamsburg canals
St. Peters canal
Quebec canals, H.Q.
Carillon and Grenville canals
Chambly canal
Quebec canals, dredges
Hungry Bay dyke
Lachine canal
St. Anne's lock
St. Ours lock
Soulanges canal
Rideau canal
Sault Ste. Marie canal
Trent canal
Welland canal.

365. To provide for the carrying out of flow measurements and other expenses connected with the department's supervision and control over the hydro electric power development of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, $2,500.

Mr. MAYHEW: I should like to ask a question on this item and to make a statement to the minister, arising out of a speech I understand he made early in the year, in which he said that Canada was not going to have a merchant marine service of her own. In other words, he indicated that the ships Canada has built during the war will be sold and probably operated outside Canada.

Mr. MICHAUD: To what item is the hon. gentleman referring?

Mr. MAYHEW: Item 365.

Mr. MICHAUD: This item has to do with flow measurements and so on in connection with the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power company. I think my hon. friend intends to refer to item 366.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Marine services—
366. Marine service administration, $15,542.

Mr. MAYHEW: I wish to ask the minister a question on this item. In doing so, I am being consistent with the stand I took in 1940 and 1941, when I maintained that Canada should have a merchant marine service of her own. I was quite satisfied with what was going on, until I read the statement by the minister about the first of the year that the service would not be continued. I am not asking that the government operate these boats, but I maintain that Canada should have a merchant marine service of her own, sufficient at least to carry some of her merchandise from Canada to overseas ports.

As I understand it, we now have seventy-five boats built in Canada, totalling about 542,000 tons. These are administered by the Park Steamship company. Fifteen of those boats are oil tankers; fifty-one are 10,000-ton boats and nine are 4,700-ton boats. That is the total capacity of Canada's merchant marine at the present time, and I maintain that it is not sufficient for our requirements.

I do not wish to delay the committee too long, but I shall take time to give some indication of what tonnage will be required in Canada in the very near future—in fact, as soon as we can get to it. Prime Minister Churchill said some time ago that in Great Britain they were going to build 3,000,000 houses, and more recently he has announced that they will be building 5,000,000. We have noticed reports as to damage in England at the present time, and it is possible that the amount mentioned by Mr. Churchill would not be any more than sufficient.

I wonder how many of us realize just what 5,000,000 houses in Great Britain mean in the way of construction, and the supplying of lumber, most of which will have to come from Canada. It means that if the housing plan upon which Great Britain is embarking is to be carried out they will have to build a house in Great Britain every twenty seconds for ten years. That will mean that an enormous amount of lumber from Canada will have to be secured. Quite recently they placed an order for two billion feet, one billion of which is to be supplied in each of the next two years. More than 300 boats will be required to carry that item alone from Canada to Great Britain. Then, to name only a few of the other larger items, 7,500,000 tons of wheat will have to be moved from Canada, and that will require another 250 boats. So that, all told, I claim that Canada should have at least 5,000,000 tons of shipping operating out of Canada, and at the very minimum we should have 500 of those 10,000-ton boats. Up to the present time we have only seventy-five operating, and fifteen of those are tankers.

In my opinion our position has changed entirely since the last war. During that war the Scandinavian countries were neutral, and as a result they built up a large merchant fleet. The consequence was that their flags were seen flying in every port of the world. Many of their ships were coming to Canadian ports. To-day the situation is entirely reversed. In this war their merchant boats have pretty well disappeared, and ours have come in. We have built a fleet—possibly a small one—of our own. In addition to that we have now in Canada a large personnel trained in sea-going occupations, men who will wish to follow the sea when the war is over.

So that, as I say, the situation is now entirely changed. As nearly as I can estimate it, it will require about 40,000 men to transport Canadian goods to foreign countries. How many of those 40,000 men are going to be Canadians? Canadian boats flying the Canadian flag and operated by Canadians should be in every port of the world. I am not saying that our Canadian boats should carry every bit of lumber or every bushel of grain shipped from Canada. Certainly we might have to get some outside service. But we should be carrying at least a fair proportion in our own boats, and bringing back a fair proportion of materials from abroad.

In my view Canada can no longer stand idly by and see this service go to ships outside Canada. Now is the time for us to take advantage of the situation, and now is the time for the government to declare a policy. I say this, despite the fact that we entered the merchant marine service some time ago and, I understand, lost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $100,000,000. But that was a puny effort, an effort which in my opinion was destined to nothing but failure, because there was no strength in the organization and no vigour behind it, and the class of boats put into the service were not the boats which could perform the services required.

Only yesterday we debated a bill setting up export credits, to help in connection with the export of our goods. But there is no export credit that is as important to a Canadian exporter or producer as the fact that there will be a regular service from Canada to every port in the world. In our own small way in British Columbia we export to Australia and New Zealand, and before the war we exported to Japan, China and, to some extent, to South Africa. That trade, however, was only intermittent. The South African service was very poor, and we had to depend almost entirely on foreign boats.

That is all I wish to say on the matter to-night, but as long as I am in the house I am going to advocate giving a chance to our sailors who have learned to sail the seas, and to love it. These men will want to stay at that work, and they should have an opportunity of operating our boats, carrying our goods, and carrying our flag and our good will to all parts of the world.

Mr. STOKES: I should like to describe to the minister a condition I have found at our public dock in Belleville, Ontario. Practically all the facilities at that dock are appropriated by one firm. As I recall it, the dock was erected in 1935 by an expenditure of public money, and I would understand that it was erected for the use of the general public. I contend that it should be made available to the public. I have noticed that at the present time there are upwards of 3,000 tons of soft coal covering practically the entire surface of the dock. This pile is replenished as quantities are taken out of it, with the result that the content remains practically constant. The entire length of the dock is covered with the coal, right out to the water's edge, leaving only a bare catwalk along the front.

This situation renders it impossible for other coal dealers in our city successfully to tender on contracts with our large purchasers of coal for public buildings. It is an indisputable fact that only those having the advantage of water-borne freight can compete successfully on orders of that kind. This is a condition which has stood for some considerable time, and one which merits supervision better than it has had up to date.

Mr. MICHAUD: With regard to the Belleville dock I understand that it is operated under a local board. We have received no complaint through the board as to the facilities of that dock being monopolized by one firm, but I can assure the hon. member that we will look into the complaint, and if it is possible to remedy the situation we will see that it is remedied.

M.. STOKES: The minister has no record of the dock being leased to anybody?

Mr. MICHAUD: No; we would not have that information here.

Mr. STOKES: I know there is a harbour board in the city, but they are subject to the control of the department.

Mr. MICHAUD: They do not file any reports as to who leases the facilities. They manage their own affairs locally. But we will look into the nature of the complaint and bring it to the attention of the board.

Mr. HATFIELD: Are any of the Lady boats in service?

Mr. MICHAUD: There are two, but they are not in the merchant service. They are in war service.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) has raised a very important question as to the maintenance and expansion of our merchant marine service after the war. Several times I have heard questions asked in the house of different ministers as to the policy of the government with respect to the merchant marine service after the war, but as yet we have received no definite answer as to the government's intentions. I think this would be a good time to hear from the government just what it proposes to do in the matter. I heartily endorse everything that the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) has just said, and there is no need of my repeating it. Would the minister mind taking five minutes to inform the committee as to the policy of the department with respect to the maintenance and expansion of the merchant marine service after the war? Are the government doing any thinking about it? Have they any policy on it?

Mr. MICHAUD: There is quite a divergence of opinion as to what will become, after the war, of the merchant ships built and owned by Canada. It is impossible to state at the present time. But there is no difference of opinion as to whether Canada should retain as many of these ships as can be used for the trade of Canada. Whether our Canadian merchant marine should be operated by the government or by individuals or by private companies is another matter.

The opinion I expressed last January was my opinion as between operation of the Canadian merchant navy by private control and operation under government control. At the end of this year we are going to have close to three hundred merchant ships owned by Canada. Some are leased and operated by our allies. Some are operated by a crown corporation, Park Steamships, and some by the Canadian National Steamships. After the war Canada will have a large merchant marine, close to three hundred ships, we hope. Before the war we had thirty-seven. So that the number of Canadian merchant ships registered in Canada has increased almost ten times since the war began. I agree that most of these ships will be required for carrying out of this country the goods which will have to be exported, and some of them will no doubt be bringing back return cargoes, but no one who has had any experience or has any knowledge of shipping can expect that our imports and exports will all be carried exclusively by Canadian ships. That is an impossibility.

Mr. MAYHEW: I did not advocate that.

Mr. MICHAUD: No, I know, and I have never advocated doing away altogether with the Canadian merchant marine. The opinion I expressed was based on our experience after the last war, when the government operated the ships. I still believe that all our merchant ships will be needed and will be operated after the war. But as to a definite policy governing the future, that has not yet been determined by the government. It is under consideration and has been for some time by a committee of civil servants, experts, and we have not yet received the final report of the committee to enable us to determine what policy should be followed after the war.

Mr. MAYHEW: I am sure that the statement just made by the minister will be appreciated by the people of Canada, because this is the first time that Canada has been given any idea that we shall have three hundred merchant ships in the Canadian service by the end of the year. I would refer the minister to a return tabled in the house on May 3, which speaks about the Canadian National steamship company. That company has six 4,700-ton boats out of the sixty altogether that are being operated. The Canadian National Steamships have six of the smaller boats.

Mr. GILLIS: We certainly do not want to repeat the mistakes of the last war. There is no doubt in my mind that after the last war the Canadian merchant navy was sabotaged in the interests of private shipping companies. We certainly should guard against anything of that sort this time.

I, too, am glad that the minister has at least said something definite on the matter. What we are now discussing is a very important part of our post-war plans, and definite plans should be being made now as to what we are going to do in the matter of maintaining and expanding the Canadian merchant marine. Study should be given now as to how we can best utilize the ships which we have built with the taxpayers' money with a view to providing, among other things, opportunities for those who have taken to the sea since the war began, and who may desire to follow that calling after the war. I have heard it stated several times in the house, and I think rightly so, that Canada is going to play a great part in the first four or five years after the war in helping to feed and rehabilitate European countries, and perhaps the British isles to some extent, and I think these three hundred ships, with the crews now employed on them, if they want to follow that vocation, might very well be utilized in that service. Now is the time that someone should be studying the matter and laying plans so that we may be able to go into that phase of rehabilitation, ready to carry out our plans immediately after the war is over.

I have no intention of pursuing the matter further. I have read a good deal and have files about what happened to the Canadian merchant marine after the last war, and it is not a nice story. I believe it is very well known. We need to guard against a repetition of this experience. As I say, it is not a matter of deciding whether operations are to be carried on under a system of private enterprise or under government ownership. If the Canadian government now own these ships, they have spent the money which has trained the personnel that are operating them; if the government is going to make millions of dollars available to UNRRA for the purpose of rehabilitating the European continent, it should be the responsibility of the Canadian government to see to it that every bit of machinery they now have should be utilized. If private shipping companies want to go into the business for commercial purposes, that is entirely up to themselves. We now have an organization which should be fully utilized, and whether we intend to continue it for years after the war is over is something which can be determined as we go along. In the post-war period the whole organization should be used to its fullest extent, and now is the time to plan and be ready.

Mr. MICHAUD: As I have already said, this problem is being examined by what we consider the best talent that can be got together, to give it consideration and make a report upon which the policy of the government will be based. There is no intention on the part of the government to sabotage any ships of our merchant marine. There is, however, one point I would bring to the attention of the hon. member. He spoke of forty or forty-five thousand men being employed or finding employment in our merchant marine after the war. When one remembers what number of men is required to man one of these ships, I cannot see the possibility of utilizing forty-five thousand men. Admitting that after the war we shall still have our complete quota of ships built during the war, the number will be not more than three hundred, and it takes only fifty men to man one of these ships, so that at the most fifteen thousand men will find employment. That is the utmost number we can expect to employ even if we keep our merchant marine intact and all our ships are returned to us after the war.

Mr. MAYHEW: I should like to correct a statement. I said that forty thousand men would be required to move the goods produced. That does not mean to say, forty thousand Canadians. I followed that up by asking how many of these will be Canadians?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am interested in the statement that the minister is going to maintain a merchant fleet of three hundred ships after the war. I should like to have a statement from him as to whether in operating this fleet he will maintain the wages of the crews who will operate them at a scale that is appropriate to Canadians. If, in so doing, he comes in competition with low scales of wages of competing ships, how is he going to deal with that situation. How is he going to compete with the ships of Great Britain—not that that will be so very difficult, although heretofore they have operated with a much lower wage scale than is acceptable to Canadians—and with the Norwegians, the Swedes, the Finlanders, the Greeks? Last of all I would ask the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) how he would propose to operate these ships in competition with the Japanese or other orientals whose scale of living is very much lower than is acceptable to Canadians.

It is all very well to say that we want to operate these ships—I am in agreement with that sentiment—to carry our own products. But we have the financial problem of how we are to get paid for our goods and how we are to be paid for the carrying of these goods. I assume also that Canada will insure these goods along the lines of the bill which was recently before this committee, so that we shall furnish our own insurance and it will no longer be business for other countries. Is it that all we shall ask the motherland and other countries to do is to pay for Canadian goods shipped by us in our own bottoms, manned by Canadian crews and insured by ourselves? I should like the minister to explain how we shall be able to maintain a proper scale of wages in the operating of these ships and enable importing countries pay for our products.

Mr. MICHAUD: The hon. gentleman has just touched upon a very important angle of the whole problem, and one of several items which have to be taken into consideration, and indeed are being considered, by the board which is now studying our post-war merchant shipping problem. I know it will be difficult to adjust all these factors which enter into the whole problem, and it is impossible to state what will be done until the committee has studied the subject from its various angles and has presented to the government a suggestion which may have to be integrated in the general policy to be adopted by the government.

Mr. POTTIER: Just a word on that. I quite agree that there are two principal difficulties which will be encountered. The first was referred to by the hon. member for Cumberland, and is connected with the varying rates of wages and standards of accommodation which the crews of other countries have. It is true that a number of countries before the war started were running ships at one-third of the cost at which Canadians could operate. There are countries which have a lot of shipping tonnage, members of whose crews would bring their food and their own dishes and the like in a trunk across the Atlantic, looking after themselves, at an expense of a few cents a day for maintenance, while we were trying to set up standards for our ships which are wholly out of proportion with the standards of these competitors, so much so that, as I said, our ships were costing from the point of view of personnel about three times as much as the ships of other countries which I need not name and which have a large tonnage.

There is another problem. You cannot expect to have your ships go into a country to take your goods and bring back their goods with your shipping on every occasion. They want to have a shipping fleet and to transport their goods in their own ships. The problem is full of difficulties. I can quite understand that it will need a lot of study, and I hope the committee will find a solution.

Marine service—

369. Marine service steamers, including icebreakers—maintenance, operation and repairs, $1,585,400.

Mr. HATFIELD: How much is spent under this item on icebreaking in the St. Lawrence river?

Mr. MICHAUD: We do not estimate the cost of breaking the ice in the season; we simply have the cost of operating the ships. Last year through the Quebec agency we spent $420,450 in the gulf of St. Lawrence, and the estimate for this year is $509,100. The boats are operated through the Quebec agency.

Mr. HAZEN: The amount expended last year under this item was $1,376,000. How much of that amount was spent in opening up the St. Lawrence river for navigation last spring? When did the actual icebreaking operations commence last spring in the St. Lawrence river?

Mr. MICHAUD: For many years it has been necessary to keep the channel open around the Quebec bridge throughout the season. In the middle of January the N. B. McLean which is the largest icebreaker in the service, starts its journey toward Montreal to open the channel, and a few weeks afterwards two other icebreakers, the Ernest Lapointe, and the Lady Grey are used in opening up the channel from the Quebec bridge to Montreal, reaching Montreal around April 29 for the opening of navigation. Three icebreakers are assigned to that job every winter.

Mr. HAZEN: Out of the $1,376,000 spent last year, how much went for that particular purpose? I am asking not only the actual cost during the time the icebreakers were working in the river but the total cost.

Mr. MICHAUD: The cost of operating the N. B. McLean last year was $170,620; the Lady Grey, $30,000, and the Ernest Lapointe, $55,250. That is for the whole year. Icebreaking takes about one-third of the season. The ships were operated one-third of the year breaking ice in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. HAZEN: In addition to the actual cost of operating these three icebreakers, I suppose there would be some other expenses.

Mr. MICHAUD: The total estimated cost of icebreaking in the St. Lawrence last year was $103,778.24.

Mr. HAZEN: I notice that $120,000 is to be spent for war risk insurance on canals this year. Last year none appears to have been spent. Why is that large expenditure being made for war risk insurance on canals in this country this year?

Mr. MICHAUD: Last year the total war risk insurance for all government services appeared in one item, passed by the house in the supplementary estimates. This year each department has been assessed by the Department of Finance and we had to allocate the assessment to the several services of the department.

Mr. HAZEN: To whom was it paid?

Mr. MICHAUD: The Department of Finance.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

370. Construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $2,065,176.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a complaint with respect to the failure to appoint a lighthousekeeper in my constituency on the Ile au Haute, at the head of the bay of Fundy. Mr. John T. McCormick is the person to whom I refer, and from information I have, the greatest discrimination has been practised against him by the department or by someone in the government service. This position of lighthouse-keeper became vacant in the ordinary course. The previous occupant had given good service, had reached the retiring age and retired, and the civil service commission advertised for applicants. A number of applications were received and examinations were held. Mr. McCormick headed the list of applicants. He was recommended for appointment by the civil service commission and notified of his appointment subject to confirmation by the department. He was notified at that time that he must vacate within seven days the position he held. That position was captain or mate with the merchant marine in the north Atlantic service. I believe he was drawing about $240 a month in this position. The remuneration attached to this position of lighthouse-keeper is much less, but it had the attractive feature of permanency. He agreed to accept it. He was a man of good character and had splendid service in the last war. I believe he had and still has the support of every returned man in the county of Cumberland. He gave up his position and to this day has not been confirmed in the appointment.

After leaving his position with the merchant marine service, he waited around for some months expecting to be notified to report for duty. He obtained temporary employment on the provincial police force of Quebec. That shows his standing and his capabilities. My complaint is that there has been gross discrimination against him as a returned man of the last war. This man is entitled to the position and to compensation by the department because he had been notified that he must vacate the previous position he held. I bring this complaint to the attention of the minister and the committee. If the minister is not able to reply to-night I ask him to look into the case and see that justice is done to Mr. MacCormack.

Mr. MICHAUD: I have no recollection whatever of this case. There are 1,139 lightkeepers in the service. Most of them were appointed by the civil service commission. I have no recollection of having seen any correspondence or of ever having the matter brought to my attention. However, I shall look into the case.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I think the minister's department is responsible. His appointment had been recommended by the civil service commission or the Department of Transport. He was told that he must vacate, within seven days, the position he was holding, which he did. He waited for weeks and months and now two years for confirmation by the minister's department of his appointment to this position.

Mr. MICHAUD: I shall look into the matter and let my hon. friend know the reason why the man has not been appointed.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

381. River St. Lawrence ship channel—contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, including cost of administration—capital, $989,500.

Mr. HAZEN: Of this amount how much was paid for contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour and to whom was it paid?

Mr. MICHAUD: The contract for dredging amounted to $838,831.34 last year. It was paid to Marine Industries Limited.

Mr. HAZEN: In the public works estimates there are a number of items under the heading of "dredging" in different parts of the dominion. Why does this item appear under transport and not under public works?

Mr. MICHAUD: The St. Lawrence ship channel has always been administered by the Department of Transport. Some years ago the policy of deepening the channel to thirty-five feet and a width of five hundred feet was adopted. The contract will be finished this current year.

Mr. HAZEN: It includes not only the St. Lawrence river but the Montreal harbour as well?

Mr. MICHAUD: That is the designation of the work. I doubt that there was any dredging done in the Montreal harbour last year. There was dredging of the channel within the limits of the harbour of Montreal.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister explain why "cost of administration" comes in this item and the following one, which is also for the river St. Lawrence ship channel? It seems to be a considerable amount of administration.

Mr. MICHAUD: Item 381 is capital expenditure and item 382 is the annual cost of administering and maintaining the ship channel after the contract work has been done.

Mr. LOCKHART: Item 379 was passed while I was out of the committee. Would the committee revert to it for a moment? In the course of a statement made in the house either to-day or yesterday in connection with an accident in which a Canadian boat was involved, I believe the minister promised that an inspection would be made and a full report given. There are many boats of various kinds carrying passengers, some of which are similar to the boat involved in this accident, and I should like to be assured that a rigid inspection is made to ascertain what boats are perhaps not fully equipped. Or is the matter allowed to drift during this period of war? I have in mind some boats that should be carefully checked in order to prevent further accidents on our chain of waterways. It is no use locking the stable door after the horse has been stolen; these inspections should be made before the boats are permitted to carry passengers. I am wondering if a careful inspection is made in each case.

Mr. MICHAUD: This afternoon I partly explained the situation to the hon. member for Broadview. Under the Canada Shipping Act there is an obligation upon any person who wishes to operate a boat in which passengers are to be carried to have that boat inspected, and to obtain a certificate of seaworthiness which also will determine whether or not the boat carries proper life-saving equipment. However, it is impossible to prevent some people from operating craft which are unseaworthy. We have a staff of forty inspectors in the department at present, and we are eleven short. We cannot get people to take these jobs. Some of our inspectors left to undertake war work. We have advertised for competent people to take these positions, but have received no replies.

Mr. LOCKHART: Did I understand the minister to say that he was eleven inspectors short?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Probably that accounts for the fact that in some cases inspections have not been made for quite some time.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. MICHAUD: That may be so. We have advertised through the civil service commission in an attempt to fill these jobs, but have received no applications.

Mr. HAZEN: For how long is a licence granted?

Mr. MICHAUD: One year.

Mr. HAZEN: Is any penalty provided if the equipment is found deficient?

Mr. MICHAUD: There is no penalty provided for deficient equipment, but there is a penalty for using a boat that has deficient equipment. Lately we have tried to enforce the law by employing the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and we have found many unseaworthy craft which have been condemned. We are trying to keep them tied to the docks, and to advise people not to use them.

Mr. HAZEN: Have charges been laid against any of these ship owners?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes. An accident occurred not long ago; an investigation was held, and on the report of the commissioner I found the matter sufficiently serious to bring it to the attention of the attorney general of Ontario. In that case I know a charge has been laid and an arrest made.

Mr. SENN: Does this steamship inspection apply to pleasure craft as well as to commercial craft of all kinds? It seems to me that from time to time there has been a great deal of confusion on the great lakes in regard to small boats, some of which are used as pleasure craft and some partly for pleasure and partly for fishing. I wondered if they were all subject to the same inspection and the same regulations.

Mr. MICHAUD: Any craft that charges a fee for carrying passengers has to be inspected and licensed, and must have the proper life-saving equipment.

Mr. SENN: But a great many boats used as pleasure craft do not carry passengers for hire. I was wondering if they are also required to obey these regulations, to be inspected regularly and to obtain licences, the same as the other boats. I should imagine the boat concerned in the serious accident on lake Erie not long ago would be in the same class.

Mr. MICHAUD: They must be certified as to the sufficiency of their life-saving equipment.

Mr. SENN: I have had some experience with this matter, and I know that some of the fishermen on the great lakes are not fully aware of just what equipment is required, because to some extent it varies with the size of the boat. I suppose it is the responsibility of the fishermen themselves to ascertain what is required by the regulations?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. SENN: What measures are taken to acquaint the fishermen generally with what is required?

Mr. MICHAUD: I have here a copy of the public notice that is posted on every dock and in customs offices where licences are issued.

Mr. STIRLING: How many licences have been cancelled during the past year because the equipment was found to be faulty?

Mr. MICHAUD: I know of no cases in which boats, having been licensed, later on during the term of the licences were found to be short of equipment. Licences have been refused to a number of boat owners because of deficient equipment, but I know of no licence that has been cancelled because the owner did not have the proper equipment.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has said that the licence is for the period of one year. Is it automatically renewed at the end of the year?

Mr. MICHAUD: No. The boat has to be inspected every year before the licence is issued or renewed.

Mr. SENN: Sometimes the inspection is delayed. The matter of the pulling of tail shafts has been a live question in my district from time to time, because it is an expensive operation to put a boat in dry dock and have the tail shaft removed and put back. Does the department still insist on the regulations that were in force a short time ago, under which tail shafts have to be pulled and inspected every so often?

Mr. MICHAUD: Within the last few years the inspection branch has been allowed quite a degree of latitude in regard to inspections and the enforcement of regulations. But I think it is left to the discretion of the inspector of the district to keep watch on the ships licensed in that district.

Item agreed to.

382. River St. Lawrence ship channel—administration and operation, $186,880.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Before this item is carried I should like to discuss an item called earlier, namely 374, having to do with the administration of pilotage. I would bring to the attention of the minister complaints with respect to pilotage officers at Pugwash in my constituency. I understand that recently a serious complaint was passed on to the department officials with respect to pilotage service at that port. Steamers using that port, because of incapacity or carelessness on the part of some of the pilots, have been allowed to ground. Other ships have been notified that the port of Pugwash cannot accommodate them.

This has been protested by the citizens of Pugwash, the board of trade. Other pilots of experience have declared that there is no difficulty whatsoever in these ships utilizing that port. It appears that the port commissioners have authority to designate the pilot officers, and they have dismissed experienced officers for personal or other reasons, with the result that the pilot work has been restricted to men who have not given the service the ships require. Has the department had any complaints respecting the services rendered by the commissioners or pilot officers at Pugwash, in recent years? If the minister is not in a position to give the information to-night I would ask that he have the matter investigated in order that shipping may be able to utilize Pugwash, which is one of the best natural ports in the maritime provinces. A smaller amount has been spent at that port to assist nature than has been spent at any other point of comparable size in the maritime provinces, and it should not be discriminated against or injured because of the incapacity of pilots or port commissioners.

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not recollect having received any complaint, nor do I remember the matter having been brought to my attention. All I know is that at the port of Pugwash there are three pilots who last year took in $529.38 in dues.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—
383. Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $39,825.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is this for the operation of private cars for railway officials, or private cars for government officials?

Mr. MICHAUD: These are railway cars.

Mr. HATFIELD: How many private cars are there in operation for railway officials?

Mr. MICHAUD: There are three government cars, and two for the governor general.

Mr. HATFIELD: Why should there be an increase in this item in war time?

Mr. MICHAUD: War risk insurance of $450 is taxed by the Department of Finance.

Mr. HATFIELD: I thought there was an effort made to eliminate private cars for the duration of the war? Why should officials have private cars during wartime?.

Mr. MICHAUD: I believe there is an act of parliament authorizing private cars. They have been in the service for some years past.

Mr. HATFIELD: That is not any reason why they should be used in war time. They would require more fuel, and more men would be required to operate them.

Mr. BENCE: Are these private cars being used by members of the government? For example, if a member of the government, such as the Minister of Fisheries, wishes to make a trip to western Canada, does he use one of these cars for that purpose? Or would some other member of the administration use a private car, in the same manner as was done in peace time? If that is so, I suggest that the use should be considerably curtailed, in view of the fact that the trains are now greatly overloaded, and the further fact that we are having enough difficulty in connection with passenger and freight service at the present time.

Mr. MICHAUD: They are not used to the same extent as they were prior to the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are there any portions of the rights of way of either the Canadian Pacific Railway company or the Canadian National Railways where coaches in which there are chair cars are still being used? I know they have been taken off from Toronto to Ottawa and from Toronto to Montreal, and I am asking if on any other portions of railway these chair cars are still in use.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are used from Toronto to Chicago.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand they are used on a few pool trains between Quebec and Montreal.

Mr. MacNICOL: And right through to Chicago.

Mr. GRAYDON: I ask the question because travellers between Toronto and Montreal and Toronto and Ottawa have lodged the complaint that while the chair cars have been taken off on those runs—and they have no objection to that in war time—those chair cars are still in use between Montreal and Quebec. That is causing some difficulty, and one can readily understand how quickly the public would suspect discrimination in a situation of that kind. I suggest that an explanation ought to be made, because I was not sure of the situation. I have not been on a chair car for so long I scarcely remember what one looks like. This is a situation which would seem to require an explanation.

Mr. MICHAUD: This is a matter between the transport controller and the railway passengers association, which operates those cars.

Mr. MacNICOL: But those chair cars are used between Toronto and Windsor and Detroit, and I presume they go right through to Chicago, because I have ridden on them lately. I know they are on in the mornings from Toronto, as far as Smiths Falls.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to pursue the question I was asking a moment ago with respect to the use of private cars by ministers of the crown. I suggest that in view of the difficulties I referred to with respect to transportation generally, surely during war time the ministers of the crown can travel in compartments or lower berths just as easily as anybody else. In peace time no doubt it was a very pleasant custom to use these private cars and one that did not inconvenience the railways or the country. In the particulars of this item I notice that four stewards and three porters are retained continually to look after these cars. That is a small number, comparatively speaking, but there is a tremendous shortage of this very type of man. I believe that the administration would be well advised to discontinue their private cars in war time. Would the minister give us some indication of the number of times the private cars have been used by ministers of the crown during the year, say, which has just passed?

Mr. MICHAUD: I have not that information.

Mr. JACKMAN: Has the minister the mileage which these cars covered during the year?

Mr. MICHAUD: No.

Mr. GARDINER: I might state for the benefit of the hon. member for Saskatoon City that so far as I am concerned I do not use a private car.

Mr. HAZEN: Are these private cars hauled free of charge by the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes, and on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. HAZEN: On both railways they are hauled free of charge?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. LaFLAMME: Are they not official cars for the use of officials?

Mr. MICHAUD: No, they are for use of the members of the government and the governor general.

Mr. BURTON: The hon. member for Saskatoon City has said pretty much what I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, when I was trying to catch your eye. I have no objection to the two private cars for the governor general, although I do not think they should come under this particular item. But so far as the four private cars for cabinet ministers are concerned, with stewards and porters and all this and that, keeping the cars ready for instant service, I agree with what the hon. member for Saskatoon City has said, that it is not necessary in war time. I would like to press this matter a little further. The Minister of Agriculture has said that he does not use these private cars. Which ministers do use them and to what extent?

Mr. MICHAUD: The Prime Minister has one car allotted to him, and there are two general official cars. Then there is one that has been owned by the Department of National Defence since the last war.

Mr. BURTON: Who has used these cars?

Mr. MICHAUD: Some of the ministers when they feel that they need them on government business.

Item agreed to.

384. Hudson Bay railway—Construction and improvements—capital, $19,000.

Mr. BENCE: Mr. Chairman, I think we might follow the practice we followed last year and discuss this item in conjunction with item 385, as both have to do with the Hudson Bay railway. This is a matter of considerable importance to the province of Saskatchewan and the city of Saskatoon from which I come. I should like the minister to make a statement as to the present position with respect to making good the deficit—I think that is what it is called—on the road. Each year there is an appropriation in the estimates to take care of contingencies during the succeeding year. Last year the item for that purpose was only $200,000, whereas the year before it was $490,000. I presume the railway must have been operating at a much greater profit during last year. I am a little disappointed to see that we have to provide $300,000 to make up the difference between the expenditures and the revenue during the year ending March 31, 1945. The minister should make it perfectly clear that this does not give a true picture of the situation. It may have been that when the item was reduced from $490,000 to $200,000, the amount of the deficit was underestimated. I wish the minister would give us a picture, if he can, of the position of the Hudson Bay railway at the present time, showing the operating profit or loss, if any, last year and generally indicating the position from this particular angle so that we who come from western Canada may know exactly what the picture is in that respect.

Mr. MICHAUD: Last year we voted $200,000 to take care of the deficit. In 1942-43 we had a surplus of $112,120.75. We did not have to expend the appropriation for that year. In 1943-44 we had a deficit of $347,872.90.

Mr. BENCE: I am very happy to see that there was an operating profit in 1942-43.

Mr. JACKMAN: No. What he said was that he did not use the whole appropriation. Is that not right?

Mr. BENCE: What I should like to know is why we had a surplus in 1942-43. Was that a real surplus?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. BENCE: That is what I understood the minister to say.

Mr. MICHAUD: I will give the gross revenue and expenditures for the last three years. In 1941-42 the revenue was $117,881.15, and the expenditures $577,740.43, making a deficit of $459,859.28. In 1942-43 the revenue was $1,113,914.14, and the expenditures $1,001,793.39, or a surplus of $112,120.25. In 1943-44 the revenue was $660,152.21, and the expenditures $1,008,025.11, making a deficit of $347,872.90.

Mr. MacNICOL: The reason for the surplus in 1942-43 was that our American cousins in that year were building their new airport at Churchill and there was a tremendous traffic through the Pas to Churchill, all up and down that road. In 1943-44 the airport had been completed and the traffic was proportionately reduced, also the revenue.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is there any report issued by the Hudson Bay Railway company so that members of the house can see it? Just in that connection I should like to suggest that inasmuch as this railway is operated, as I understand it, by the Canadian National Railways, under their supervision, for the Hudson Bay Railway company, and indirectly for the government, the report of this railway should be submitted, along with the reports of the Canadian National Railways, the T.C.A., and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, to the regularly constituted parliamentary committee on wholly-owned government railways. I hope that the minister will give some consideration to that suggestion, and perhaps he would make an answer to it now. For instance, I think this committee, and the railway committee, if it had it within its purview, would be interested to know why it was that in 1942-43 this railway, with an income of $1,113,000 and expenses of just $1,000,000, was able to show $112,000 profit, and yet in 1943-44, with an income of $660,000—$400,000 less—the expenses were actually, if I gathered the minister's figures correctly, a few thousand dollars higher. How could it be that with $400,000 less revenue the expenses actually went up, so that in 1943-44 there was an operating deficit of $347,000? How could that happen?

Mr. MICHAUD: A large amount went into maintenance for that year.

Mr. JACKMAN: For 1943-44?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: And how much was the maintenance in 1943-44 over 1942-43, when the volume of traffic was considerably higher in the earlier year?

Mr. BURTON: It appears to me that our American cousins have sense enough to use a road which we ourselves do not use as much as we should. We have that road there and it has not in the past been made use of to the extent that it should have. I contend that it was a good thing for the united nations' cause that we had that road there, and Americans have made good use of it and have shown its value. I suggest to the minister that we seriously consider more adequately utilizing that road in the future.

Mr. BENCE: I endorse the suggestion which was just made by the hon. member for Humboldt, and at least part of what was suggested by the hon. member for Rosedale, with respect to furnishing the railway committee with all the information which is available concerning this railway. This is a very important project as far as western Canada is concerned. The government has invested a lot of money in it, and I think it should be continually searching for ways to make this endeavour a paying proposition. I believe that in the interests of the country generally and in western Canada in particular it is very important that the administration continually have their eyes on this venture for the purpose of seeing in what way more use of it can be made in order that we shall not have these continual deficits year after year. Like many who come from western Canada I believe that good use can be made of the railway and that it can be converted into a profitable venture.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How much wheat was shipped over the Hudson Bay railway last year?

Mr. MacNICOL: Nothing in the last five years.

Mr. MICHAUD: None for the last three years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why is that?

Mr. HOWE: No convoys.

Mr. MICHAUD: If I lived in Alberta or Saskatchewan I might know it, but I suspect that there are no convoys to take the wheat out of Churchill. I understand that there is no consumption of wheat at Churchill, that the wheat which is being shipped over the railway is for export from the port of Churchill, and for the last three years, for obvious reasons, no convoys have gone to Churchill to take the wheat to Europe.

Mr. MacNICOL: What my hon. friends on this side of the chamber have been saying about the use of the road is important, but at the present time it cannot be used as an export route, for the reason which the minister has just announced. I made a very careful survey of the whole area from the Pas to Churchill. At Churchill, I might say, there is a wonderful elevator which was built by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. It is one of the finest elevators in the world, but it cannot be used now, for the reason outlined, that no convoys are available to ship wheat from the port to the old country. The explanation of the increased freight revenue during 1942-43 is quite simple. The Americans were building a great airfield there. It was mentioned here the other day in a report that these airfields are to be taken over. A tremendous traffic was going on; it was almost impossible to get from the Pas to Churchill, but of course when the airfield was completed that traffic slowed up, and for that reason in the following year the freight was much less.

I endorse what some of my hon. friends have said regarding this route. It is to be hoped that after the war the magnificent elevator will be put to good use in handling western wheat.

Someone said that Canada put a lot of money into the road. Well, Canada did, but the three western provinces alone put nearly fifty million dollars into it. The Dominion of Canada put in a lot of money, but the major portion was contributed by the three western provinces. I sincerely hope that after the war things will so develop that the road can be used commercially for the exportation of wheat.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Who owns this railway at the present time?

Mr. MICHAUD: The people of Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Are all the shares in the hands of the dominion government?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is not an incorporated company; it is a public work built by the country and owned by the country, and it is operated for the country by the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How much wheat was shipped out of that port in 1939 and in 1938?

Mr. MICHAUD: In 1939, to the value of $154,142.16.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It sounds like an appallingly small amount for a national railway, does it not? Could the minister give an explanation why more was not shipped out in 1939? Was more shipped out in 1938?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes; $236,000.51.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How much wheat was shipped out of Canada in the meanwhile by other railway routes?

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not know.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This seems on the face of it altogether too small an amount of wheat to be shipped out of that port. Western Canadians have the idea that this railway is being damned with faint praise; in other words, that it has been sabotaged. We should like to have some information from the minister to reassure us that such is not the case.

Mr. MICHAUD: If my hon. friend will guarantee that the wheat when delivered at Churchill will be taken care of, I will guarantee that more wheat will be shipped over that road.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Could the minister give us any reason why the wheat when it gets to Churchill could not be taken care of?

Mr. MICHAUD: Because the shipping companies will not take it out of Churchill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why not? We want to find out the reason for that. That is what we are here for.

Mr. MICHAUD: They prefer to ship over other routes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There must be some other reason why the company prefers to ship over other routes. There seems to be plenty of evidence that the railway is a good one and that there is a good route through Churchill. Why should we find so little grain carried over that route? Why should shipping companies be averse to using it?

Mr. MICHAUD: Surely the hon. member is aware that the government does not route grain or other goods. The owners or shippers or buyers ship their own goods by whatever way they see fit and over such routes as are cheapest to them and whereby they can get their goods to the point of destination quickest and cheapest.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The Department of Transport exercises no influence in that regard. Is that right?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I may be allowed to speak for a moment with reference to a route that I know fairly well. A transportation route is an avenue that is open to the shipping public. There are several avenues for wheat from the west. There is the avenue to Fort William and Port Arthur and down the great lakes and the St. Lawrence to Montreal and then to the ocean. The Hudson bay route is an alternative. The use of the route depends on the cost of shipping grain from point of origin to point of consumption, which may be in the United Kingdom or on the continent. Grain will follow the cheapest route, and an eighth of a cent a bushel is sufficient to transport grain by one route or another. The Hudson bay route is there, and it depends on its effect on prices whether grain is shipped by that route or the other. If the cost of shipping by the head of the lakes and through the great lakes gets out of line, the least bit above the cost of shipping by Churchill, shippers will use Churchill. I think that since the west has the protection of the route it is not very serious whether large volumes go by that route every year. If rates on the great lakes are high, a very large volume moves through Churchill; if rates on the lakes are low, a small volume moves through Churchill. It is an alternative route, and the western producer has a choice of routes and therefore can take advantage of whichever route is cheapest.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The railway is merely an instrument in the hands of the Canadian west for preventing exploitation by any companies that might be transporting Canadian wheat.

Mr. HOWE: It has that effect, yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If that is the light in which we are to look on the route, then it is well that we should know that. We know the amount of money we are spending for the maintenance of that route as an insurance against exploitation.

Mr. PERLEY: I am glad to see that there is an increase in the expenditure on this railway and the terminal at Churchill. Some of it may be to make up the difference between earnings and the cost, but I think the minister would be well advised to see that the route is kept in order so that when the war is over it will be ready to serve the public. I think it will prove to be one of the great outlets for western Canada, one of the very best and cheapest. We had before the committee on agriculture this year a statement with respect to grain shipped from there. Last year the elevators were full of Canadian wheat board grain, and a great deal of it was shipped out and the capacity filled again. But, as has been pointed out, owing to convoy service now, they cannot use it for shipping grain. I heard the head of one of the largest steamship companies in Britain say a year or so before the war broke out, speaking in Regina to the board of trade with reference to this route, that there was no question in the world that, with the improvements in radio equipment and direction for shipping, that port could be kept open for three months longer than it has been up to the present time and that it would serve as a great route so far as shipping grain to Britain is concerned. The cost would be nearly three to four cents a bushel cheaper and that would be in its favour. But at the present time the chief shipping interests are centred at Fort William and Port Arthur and they would naturally direct a great deal of their shipping there. As an outlet for western Canada it is one of the coming routes. One of the largest shipping concerns in Britain declares that after the war, with the improvements that have been made in radio equipment for directing ships, that port will be available for shipping for three or four months longer in the year. I am glad to see the minister increasing the estimates, and I hope the route will be kept in proper repair so that when the war is over it will be available.

Mr. BURTON: What the Minister of Munitions and Supply said a moment ago with regard to grain moving according to where the shippers and exporters desire it to move holds water to a certain extent, because we know that certain departments of government do from time to time encourage trade in one way or another. We have different departments of government that encourage the flow of trade one way or another, and there are many of us in the west who agreed in years gone by that not enough encouragement was given in that respect. I might mention insurance rates. It has been the opinion of many of us for many years that this is a property that belongs to all the people of Canada and we are prepared so to continue it; but we should make proper use of it. The hon. member for Davenport expressed the view that the people of western Canada paid for the road long before it was built, and I say to the members of the committee that when the war is over, if the government does not make any more serious effort to see that full use is made of it than has been made in the past, then consideration should be given to the idea of turning the road over to the three prairie provinces in some way so that they can see that proper use is made of it.

Mr. MICHAUD: I accept the offer.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister did not ascertain from his assistants the amount of maintenance and repairs for the two operating years 1942-1943 and 1943-1944. I will not press him for it if he will undertake to have the report of the railway along with the report of the Canadian National Railways and the other wholly-owned government corporation, tabled at the meeting of the railway committee when it convenes each parliamentary year.

Mr. MICHAUD: I have data here for the years from 1938 to 1943.

Mr. JACKMAN: I want just the last two years. I do not understand how it is that the operating expenses remain the same but the gross revenue increases substantially.

Mr. MICHAUD: Operating expenses, salaries and wages, 1942-43, $219,069.11; 1943-44, $229,227.75.

Mr. JACKMAN: They are substantially the same.

Mr. MICHAUD: Does the hon. member wish the figures for equipment and rentals?

Mr. JACKMAN: If the minister will undertake to have the report of the Hudson Bay Railway company submitted to the railway committee each year I will not question him any farther at the present time.

Mr. HOWE: It is included in the railway report.

Mr. JACKMAN: Of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: A break-down of operations?

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not recall seeing it. It may be in the report of the Department of Transport.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is mentioned in the annual report of the Department of Transport, but not in detail.

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe that this committee should have the detailed report, more particularly that the railway committee should have a complete break-down of the operating expenses and revenues of the Hudson Bay Railway, the same as in connection with the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships and the Trans-Canada Air Lines. I do not see any reason why the Department of Transport should not agree to the figures being presented to the railway committee each year so that we may understand the nature of this company.

Mr. MICHAUD: I shall ask the railway to try to comply with the request.

Mr. JACKMAN: You are the railway; ask yourself and agree to it.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—

386. To provide for the construction of an icebreaker—railway car—highway vehicle— passenger ferry vessel for the Prince Edward Island car ferry service estimated to cost $4,500,000. Amount required for 1944-45—capital, $2,400,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS: What progress has been made in the construction of the new car ferry and what is the approximate date on which it will be ready for service? Since the icebreaker Charlottetown was lost in 1941 our people have been very patient in not pressing the department unduly for a new boat because they knew that all the shipyards were busily engaged in building ships of war. The present car ferry had a bad accident in March of last year at a time when a great many cars of certified seed potatoes were waiting to be transported to western Ontario and the United States where the seed was required for early planting. Every hon. member of the committee realizes that our transportation problem dates back seventy-five years. While we have made a good deal of progress in that time, I am sure the department will agree with me that we are now entitled to the best boat that money and material can build.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to follow the statement of the hon. member for Queens with respect to the construction of this new boat. We had a considerable discussion on it earlier in the session and in previous sessions. Is the minister prepared to reassure the committee that the boat will be completed and ready for service for the winter season of 1945-46? We in the maritime provinces recognize that Prince Edward Island has not had adequate transportation services since it came into confederation. Improvements have been made at different times, but an unnecessary calamity overtook that province in the loss of the steamship Charlottetown. Many people believe that there has been undue delay in securing a new boat. We are pleased to learn that a contract has been let for a new boat. Most of the people in the maritime provinces regretted to learn that this boat was being built to burn oil, which is in decreasing world supply. We shall need a market for the output of the coal mines of the maritime provinces in the years following the war and there was great disappointment that this boat was built to burn oil instead of coal. Is any recompense being provided for producers of potatoes and other farm products in Prince Edward Island who were unable to ship their products last winter because of the lack of shipping facilities and who had for that reason to take a reduced price? I understand that a claim has been entered for recompense for the loss they have sustained because they were unable to ship their potatoes at that time. I should like a confirmation from the minister as to whether this new ferry is a two-way boat, that is, with propellers in both ends so that it will not have to turn at the Borden port and at the Cape Tormentine port. That is the class of boats that were built to operate as ferries in Nova Scotia when I was minister and was able to authorize the construction of such boats for that purpose in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MICHAUD: In reply to the hon. member for Queens and the hon. member for Cumberland I am pleased to state that the contract for the building of a most up-to-date modern car ferry to run between Cape Tormentine in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island was signed on the last day of March, 1944. The contractor proceeded immediately to get together the material which would enter into the construction of the ferry. I was informed by the contractor a couple of weeks ago that the work was proceeding according to schedule; that he has been successful in getting the steel plates in sufficient quantity and at the proper time to get the hull together in schedule time. I am pleased to say that the engines which will go into this complicated construction will be manufactured in Canada. The subcontractors for the engines have reported that their manufacture is progressing on schedule. So far nothing has been brought to our attention that would delay the completion of the ship by the end of October, 1945, according to the contract.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Did the minister reconsider the type of power plant to be used in this ferry? I understood that some assurance was given by him or by his department that this matter would be reconsidered, with a view to utilizing coal, our native fuel.

Mr. MICHAUD: Great attention was given this question, but the marine architects who were engaged to design that boat have not recommended the installation of coal-burning engines. Therefore the boat will be equipped with diesel engines.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Were any other architects consulted as to utilizing coal and the ordinary steam power plant that is used in other boats of this type?

Mr. HOWE: Is my hon. friend aware that Prince Edward Island is quite likely to become a great producer of oil?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I hope that may be so, and I am told there are possibilities that my county of Cumberland may become a great oil producer also. But it is recognized that there is a world shortage of oil at the present time. We had evidence before the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment that the supply of oil in sight will be sufficient for only fourteen years at the present rate of consumption. Therefore, with coal supplies sufficient for hundreds of years right at hand, it seems only an ordinary business precaution to give the preference to coal rather than oil, even if the hope of the Minister of Munitions and Supply should be realized, as I hope it will be, and a great oil reservoir should be found on Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am going to say something about this item, although I would not have done so if I had thought the minister could get through his estimates in toto to-night. I have made several trips to study this matter of transportation between the mainland and the island, and I should like to satisfy myself that this new ship is of the proper design. I must admit that from its picture it is a fine looking ship. I would remind the minister that between St. Ignace and Mackinaw, the strait between lake Michigan and lake Huron, a strait a little over nine miles wide, in the winter time gets badly clogged with very heavy ice. I believe that strait is approximately the same width as Northumberland strait. I should like to know if the department saw to it that the designers of this new ship of ours consulted those who were conversant with similar conditions, and with the designers of the six boats that cross from St. Ignace to Mackinaw. One of these boats, I believe it is the Sainte Marie, appears to load and unload at both ends. The ship is so designed that the main deck front end can be lifted up to allow the railway cars to roll off. I do not know whether this new ship is of the same design. Perhaps in the opinion of the architect or engineers who designed the new ship, their design is the only type that can safely navigate this strait. If that is the case, their judgment should be accepted. But if a ship could be designed to load and unload at both ends it seems to me it would be able to take on and discharge its cargo much more rapidly than the new ship may be able to do. I am not going to criticize the new boat in any way, for it seems to be very smart. It is a big ship, with tremendous power; it has nearly three times the power of any of the fine ships that cross from St. Ignace to Mackinaw, but its internal design must be totally different from that of those ships which cross the difficult nine-mile Mackinaw strait in the winter time, where ice piles up so high that two or three ships have propellers fore and aft to cut through ice.

Every ship in service on Mackinac strait, even the smallest one, will carry more automobiles than this new ship will carry. According to the figures submitted by the department, the new ship will carry only sixty motorcars. I hope the time will come when motor traffic to and from the island will amount to many more than sixty automobiles per trip. In contrast, the smallest ship crossing the strait of Mackinac carries seventy-two automobiles, while one of the largest carries one hundred and eleven almost twice as many as this new ship is designed to carry. Then this new ferry is designed to carry only nineteen railway cars. That may be sufficient; I do not know whether a train going to Prince Edward Island would consist of more than nineteen cars, but I hope the time will come when trains going to and from that island will have twice that many cars. These ships crossing from St. Ignace to Mackinaw carry as many as twenty-four railway cars.

All I am going to say is that the island is entitled to the best this country can give it, and I know we have a sympathetic minister. We have not always had ministers who were as sympathetic to the island, but the present minister is, and I hope he will look into the particular matters I have drawn to his attention. There is no reason why the capacity of a brand new ship should be so much smaller than the capacity of the smallest ship on the Mackinac strait route. This new ferry is to be 372 feet 6 inches over all, while the smallest ship crossing the strait of Mackinac is about 250 feet long, but has greater automobile and car capacity. Why is that? Does the strait of Northumberland require a ship so strongly built, or with a much greater capacity for passengers? I note that the passenger capacity is larger, and I am glad of that because this is a glorious island.

Mr. MICHAUD: What is the draught of the Mackinac ships?

Mr. MacNICOL: The smallest one is twelve feet aft, and the largest one is twenty feet aft. I have looked into the matter very carefully because, like other hon. members, I have long felt that the island has not had what the fathers of confederation promised it. I realize that the minister is sympathetic, and as long as he is in power he will, I hope, see that they get more than they have been getting.

As I said a moment ago, the largest boat, Chief Wawatam, is 4,500 horse-power, and the horse-power of the new Canadian ship is 12,000. That is a very heavy horse-power, and the speed of sixteen and a half knots is good. That is a smart speed at which to cross the strait. May I congratulate whoever is responsible for that speed, because the old Prince Edward Island had a knotage of only 12½. The islanders—they like to be called the islanders —are entitled to the fastest and most up-to-date transportation which can be secured between the island and the mainland.

I know if the minister examines the docks at Borden and Tormentine he will say, the same as I did, after careful examination, "These docks are not what this great country of Canada should provide for this magnificent and beautiful island, for its traffic to and from the mainland." If I were designing a dock—and of course I am not a dock architect, although I have seen many docks in Europe and on the North American continent—I would certainly see to it that boats could go into and out of the dock much more rapidly than they can to-day. If conditions would permit it—and I do not say they will permit it—I would have ships that would load at one end and drive straight off the other end if desirable. I should like inquiries to be made about that. This might not be suitable at that point, but if it is we should certainly have it that way.

The minister, being sympathetic to the island and its rights, should not hesitate to pay the cost to have adequate and proper docks built at Tormentine and Borden, so as to increase speed in loading and unloading. He ought not to hesitate during his term of office to see to it that the islanders get what they have been asking for for such a long time, and that is fast traffic, fast loading and fast unloading. All this will help commerce. At the present time it is almost too much for the ordinary tourist to take a big car over there. I have been over several times with my car, and I have never crossed on boats crossing that strait without becoming furious before I got off at either end of the crossing. I do considerable travelling, and a lot of driving; I have driven several hundred thousand miles, and I become furious when I have to go along on an upper deck and drive my motorcar around a narrow passage.

While there is still time—and I believe there is time—we should see to it that this fine new ship, with its beautiful design, is built with regard for speed of loading and unloading at each side of the strait. This should be considered, even if it will cost more money, because it would give the islanders a fair deal. Let us not worry about a few extra dollars, because this is not an investment for only one year. It is for many years. The docks can be vastly improved for greater speed in loading and unloading. I suggest that the designer, or whoever is responsible, should visit many other places to see how quickly loading and unloading can be carried out. For instance, he could go to Toledo, to discuss the matter with the Toledo Shipbuilding company, which perhaps has had much experience in building such ships for such purposes.

I am glad that a Canadian company is building this ship, and that Canadian workmen are doing the work. There is no reason why we cannot build as good ships here as are built anywhere else, and there is no reason why our workmen cannot do as good work as other workmen are doing—and I know they can do it. Therefore I am very happy indeed that the ship has been built in Canada by Canadian workmen, and designed by a Canadian designer.

If it is at all possible the minister should look into this matter to have some alterations in design if practicable, so that the number of cars crossing that channel may be greater than called for in the design. Sixty is not enough. I am referring, of course, to motorcars. The number of freight cars to go aboard the ship when crossing the channel should be more than nineteen. That is not enough, either.

A large amount of money is being spent—not too much, but certainly a large amount. But I would say that even more should be spent, if required, to give the island people a square deal.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, before the minister answers I have a question to ask. It is represented to me that a ferry boat was put into service on lake Ontario, since the beginning of the war, and that it is a boat of dimensions perhaps larger than those of the new ferry serving Prince Edward Island. That boat is powered with coal—not Canadian coal, but coal brought in from the United States.

The ferry boat now under discussion is being designed to use oil which, in all probability, will also be imported, despite the fact that in the post-war years the coal mines of Nova Scotia will be more anxious than ever to secure a market for their product. Has the minister any information with respect to that new ferry boat? If not, will he make inquiries and advise the committee at a later sitting?

Mr. MICHAUD: I have no information regarding that new ferry boat, the name of which has not been given to me. But I know that the most modern icebreaker that is being built in the United States is built on exactly the same principle as the one which has been designed for Prince Edward Island.

I can assure the hon. member for Davenport that all the considerations he has set forth have been taken into account by the department, the architects and the engineers, and we are trying to give the island the best boat Canada can produce, and a boat which will give service under the conditions under which it will have to operate. The boat could not stand a draught of more than nineteen feet.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): How many feet?

Mr. MICHAUD: Nineteen feet. So that the boat has to carry its load and its own machinery, and has to develop enough power to break the ice.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the docks require alterations?

Mr. MICHAUD: The docks required will be taken care of.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is this boat designed to go both ways, back and forth?

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MICHAUD: It will go back and forth, but it will turn around.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): It has not propellers at both ends?

Mr. MICHAUD: It has an icebreaker bow.

Mr. MacNICOL: It will have propellers at both ends.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, August 4, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 181, for the relief of Ruby Violet Gainsford Moorhead.—Mr. Boucher.

MONETARY CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION OF REPORT ON BRETTON WOODS MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to know from the Minister of Finance when we may expect that a report will be given to the house with respect to the international monetary conference recently held at Bretton Woods.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I have not given that subject consideration. I will look into it over the week-end and see whether the situation is such that some report can be made to the House of Commons next week. I do not know how the matter stands. I have voluminous reports of the proceedings and of the proposals and recommendations, which I have not yet had an opportunity to read.

SEVENTH VICTORY LOAN

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF OPENING OF CAMPAIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance as to the date of the commencement of the seventh victory loan campaign. I will tell the minister frankly why I am asking the question. First, we are nearing the end of our parliamentary session, and the opportunity will not be given to ask the question later on. Also, a number of people have mentioned the possibility of a general election this fall, and a victory loan drive coming in October or November, as the case may be, so that there might be a concurrent loan campaign and a general election campaign. I should be glad to know the government's position in this matter.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I do not think we can escape, whatever happens, a victory loan campaign in October. The date is not set, no terms of the loan or anything of that kind are decided upon, but our scheme of financing is a victory loan campaign each six months, and it is certainly our intention to appeal to the people for funds again in October some time. Whether these plans will be changed I cannot say at the moment, but our present intention is as I have stated.

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

CHARGE OF MONOPOLISTIC ACTION BY CANADIAN-UNITED STATES DISTILLERS—PROCEDURE IN QUESTIONS ON ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to draw the attention of the government to a front page story appearing in the Toronto Globe and Mail which states that it has been charged before the United States Senate liquor shortage investigating committee that there is a combine of powerful liquor interests in this country cooperating with the same interests in the United States to secure a monopoly of the entire liquor business of this country and of the United States. Will the government consider investigating this under the Combines Investigation Act and, it may be, later on by a royal commission?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It will be necessary to see the article first and ascertain what authority there may be for these representations. After that step has been taken the government will consider the matter further.

I should like to say, about questions which are asked in the house in the morning, that I notice a good many hon. members who have the opportunity which some others have not of reading the Globe and Mail or the Gazette or some other paper just before the house meets, then come forward with questions to the administration based on what appears in the morning papers. I submit that questions of that kind should be placed on the order paper. The government has something to do besides reading the Globe and Mail and the Gazette and other papers before meeting the house at a morning sitting. Our attention must not be diverted from the business of government by newspaper reading in the early hours of the day.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe that this is the first time I have ever referred to an article in the Globe and Mail,—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not referring particularly to my hon. friend.

Mr. COLDWELL: —but the session is drawing to a close, and to place a question on the order paper means that it might not be dealt with before the house rises. That is my reason for asking this question on the orders of the day.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I follow up what the Prime Minister said to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. There are, I think, some other considerations which the Prime Minister omitted to mention. One is that this house has not had during the sessions of the war a private members' day. Many important matters arise which news services such as the two papers mentioned and others, bring to the attention of hon. members from time to time, and which have to be brought up in the house. I do not think that at any time during this session there has been any abuse of privileges of this kind, although the government, I realize, are naturally anxious not to have a barrage of questions. We are trying to keep within the bounds of propriety, but at the same time it is necessary to make inquiries of the government from time to time with respect to these matters. The Prime Minister speaks about having something else to do than read the Globe and Mail and the Gazette. It would do him no harm if he read both more often.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I should say to my hon. friend that I was not in any way trying to indicate to the house what it should or should not do, much less to take away any rights from private members. What I have just said would apply if we had had private members' day regularly this session as we have had in other sessions. My point was that it is impossible for the government, between the time its members rise in the morning and the meeting of the house at eleven o'clock, to read, nor should they be expected to read, through whatever may appear in the newspapers published in Toronto or Montreal or elsewhere so as to be in a position to answer questions based upon representations made therein. Apart from that, I think that these questions, if they are important enough, should under the rules of the house, be placed on the order paper. That is all I wish to say.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

HELP FOR WESTERN WHEAT CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Labour with respect to a serious situation in western Canada in connection with harvest help, but owing to the confusion he did not answer me. I would call his attention again to the matter. There is a very serious situation in Saskatchewan where they need 8,000 or 10,000 extra men to assist in taking in the harvest. Can the minister give any information on the subject to-day?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Last year we were faced with the same problem. As I recall, the then member for Weyburn moved the adjournment of the house in connection with what he considered a matter of urgent public importance. We got the crop off in western Canada last year and we got if off in Ontario and the maritimes with some difficulty in view of the man-power situation which confronts every nation that is doing its duty in the present war. I am confident myself that we shall get the crop off in western Canada as we did last year. Last year we had a movement from Ontario to the western country. It was a movement of such a character that we reached the stage where the western people said, "We don't want any more help." We intend to follow the same policy this year. In addition to that, the crop condition in the Dakotas is not as good as it was in years past. We anticipate a movement from the Dakotas into western Canada to swell the tide of harvesters engaged in the work of getting the crop off this year. In connection with that movement we are paying return transportation costs both from Ontario and from the Dakotas, and of course there is the policy that has been in operation for the last two years, of leave where possible from the armed forces. I am convinced that the cooperation that has been displayed in the past and is being manifested at the present time will satisfy my hon. friend and the result will be that the crop will be got off in western Canada.

CANADIAN FORCES

HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION FOR RETURNED WOUNDED PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. Owing to the alarming reports in regard to the lack of accommodation for our wounded who are returning from Normandy and Italy, and the fact that he announced two or three days ago that he has taken over hostels in Peterborough and Kingston for the purpose, I wonder if he would tell the house why it should be necessary in the fifth year of the war to scurry about to get accommodation in any old building for our wounded.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The hon. gentleman, typically, did not pay me the courtesy of giving me any notice of the question. I may say to him that we have been giving sustained and careful attention for very many months, indeed, years, to the whole question of adequate hospital accommodation for all our casualties in the dominion, not only through the Department of Pensions and National Health but in conjunction with the three ministers of national defence and in conjunction with all experts of all the departments. I regard the article that appeared to-day in a certain journal as thoroughly vicious, malicious and indefensible. Our preparations in regard to hospital accommodation are considered to be amply adequate and we are taking every possible precaution, according to the advice of gentlemen who are as well qualified medically as the hon. member for Parkdale.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend used the word "malicious". If I remember correctly, that was one of the words he asked the hon. member for Parkdale to withdraw the other day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I applied it to an article in a paper outside. It is not applied to any member.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Put on the steam roller; it doesn't matter.

Mr. BRUCE: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the word "malicious."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have no intention in the world of following the example of the member for Parkdale.

Mr. BRUCE: You would not be following my example by using that word, because I have not used it

WESTERN BEEF PRODUCERS

CONDITIONS RESULTING FROM DRY WEATHER IN SOUTHERN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): May I direct two questions to the Minister of Agriculture. First, will the minister tell the house what measures he is taking to meet the feed situation facing beef producers of southern Alberta because of the drought conditions prevailing in that area? Secondly, has the minister considered the advisability of buying from southern Alberta producers the beef and lambs and of shipping them to the east where feed is ample?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I received yesterday afternoon the communication which was referred to by the hon. member for Lethbridge, from the Cardston Cooperative Association, and I have written to them this morning stating what the usual practice is in connection with matters of that kind. We are making and have been making since the beginning of the summer full investigations in connection with prairie farm assistance as to what the nature of the crop is, and I intend to check that immediately when I go to the west in a few days' time. In addition to that, the practice in the past has been, and so far as I know it still is the policy, both provincially and federally, that when there is a shortage of feed grain in any particular locality application is made to the provincial government for any assistance that is required to move grain from one part of the province to another. If the job becomes one that is so considerable that the provincial government cannot undertake it, then means of access to the federal government is always open to the provincial government, and I would suggest therefore that if there are any conditions such as have been spoken of by the hon. member for Lethbridge so far as the southern part of Alberta proper is concerned, the procedure is for those who are interested to make representations to the provincial government and they in turn no doubt, in due course, will make whatever representations to us they see fit. So far as the matter of cattle is concerned, there is a much higher floor price established now under the present arrangement in connection with all kinds of beef than has ever been established in any preceding year and a provision is made under which, even if it is not necessary for the government to enter the field itself, stock can be handled to better advantage this year than in any previous year. I suggest that any live stock organization in the west ought to take advantage of that fact and proceed to market their live stock in the best possible way and if there is any necessity for government consideration of any difficulties that may arise I am sure that consideration will be given.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS AS TO APPLICATION OF MILITARY REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. What decision has been reached with regard to the requests from the Indian convention at Ottawa on June 7 last with reference to the enforcing of compulsory military regulations on the treaty Indians of this country?

An hon. MEMBER: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The Indians are being called up at the present time.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): The matter is still under consideration.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE IN DISCUSSION OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The business for this morning is the discussion of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. On Fridays His Honour the Speaker leaves the chair for the house to go into committee without any question being put; but I believe it would suit the convenience of hon. members, and also enable the debate to proceed in a more orderly fashion, if I were to introduce a motion that His Honour the Speaker do not leave the chair until there has been a general discussion on the question of external affairs. If that meets with the approval of the house, I would move that the provision of standing order 28 in relation to Mr. Speaker leaving the chair on Fridays without putting any question, be now suspended in order to allow general discussion on external affairs. This would mean that after hon. members have had a chance of speaking on external affairs and delivering such addresses as they may have in mind, His Honour the Speaker could then leave the chair and the house go into committee and take up the various items in detail.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Mackenzie King moves:

That the provision of standing order 28 in relation to Mr. Speaker leaving the chair on Fridays without putting any question be now suspended in order to allow general discussion on external affairs.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is the first intimation that I have had of this motion. It had not occurred to me that the discussion on external affairs would be in the nature of a full dress debate. That was not my intention, in any event. After the Prime Minister had made his report I intended to ask him a number of questions on the commonwealth prime ministers' meeting. I fancy that the situation which has now developed would throw the whole matter into a full dress debate, thus preventing the asking of such questions as I had in mind. If the Prime Minister and the government can see their way clear to agree to it, I see no objection to Mr. Speaker leaving the chair and the house going into committee; those who desire to make speeches could do so, and those who wish to ask questions would feel free to get in the usual way the information required. I would hope the Prime Minister will see his way clear to do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all, may I apologize to my hon. friend for not having mentioned to him my intention to introduce this motion. As a matter of fact it only occurred to me as I was on my way in to the house that a request of the kind would likely be made, if I did not anticipate it by such a motion. It has been customary on previous occasions to have a general discussion carried on in this way, and I wished to accommodate hon. members in that regard. I am perfectly willing not to press the motion but to go into committee at once if that is the wish of hon. members opposite. However, I think it is advisable—

Mr. GRAYDON: I think we did that last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When we are in committee I should like, first of all, to make a statement that will review to some extent the progress of the war, and the steps that have been taken to plan machinery for peace settlement. I desire to anticipate as much as I can the questions that are likely to be asked. I think I know the subjects that hon. members are most interested in being informed upon, and I shall try to anticipate them in the statement that I make before the discussion continues.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. COLDWELL: I think this is a very good suggestion. It will make the debate more orderly after the Prime Minister's statement. I believe the house would support it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is entirely for the house to say.

Mr. STIRLING: It does not seem to me that this is a desirable change to make in what we have been accustomed to in the past. I know of no reason for departing from the procedure we have adopted in past sessions. As the Prime Minister has said, he did not give any intimation to the opposition of the suggestion that he has now made, nor does he exhibit any desire to use the force of his majority to put it through. I take it that he is ready to withdraw this motion if it does not met with the approbation of the house. I can see more in favour of having the discussion in the way in which we have had it in previous years than I can see in favour of the method now introduced. The Prime Minister has not advanced any arguments in favour of this method other than that the idea recently occurred to him and possibly it would put the debate on a better plane. I rather doubt that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that my motion does exactly what has been done in previous years.

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will look over what has been customary in the debate on external affairs—and that has been the chief reason why I made this motion to-day—he will see that before the estimates were considered in detail there was a general discussion with the Speaker in the chair. It was because I expected, unless I made a motion of this kind, my attention would immediately be drawn to the fact that I was departing from the custom of previous years that I anticipated a possibility of this kind. But the house itself regulates its own business, and possibly it might be understood that, after I have made my statement, hon. members will have an opportunity to make statements of their own if they so desire before we go too much into detailed discussion. In that way we can carry out the objective even though we have no formal motion. In those circumstances I am quite prepared to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

36. Departmental administration, $410,189.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): May I say first of all that I regret that the discussion on external affairs matters should have been delayed until this particular stage of the session. No one regrets that more than I do, but it has been due to circumstances over which I personally and the government have had little or no control. Possibly the circumstance that accounts most for the fact that external affairs matters are being discussed now rather than earlier in the session is that I was obliged, as hon. members know, to leave Canada for a month to be present at a meeting of prime ministers in London. That absence was responsible for some matters of legislation being held up for final decision until after my return. The government naturally felt it important to bring forward this legislation as rapidly as possible. The important debates that took place on other subjects also consumed a great deal of time—the debate on the address, later the debate on the war appropriation, which was a very lengthy one, the debate on the budget; all these matters had to be disposed of in the sequence to which I have referred. Then, as hon. members are aware there was a good deal of social legislation, legislation in which it was necessary for me to give my time almost exclusively to the house in the course of the discussions. There were the matters related to the creation of the Department of Veterans' Affairs, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Reconstruction, and later the legislation with respect to family allowances. These matters have occupied the time continuously up to the present, together with some other matters of importance.

However, I think any inconvenience that may have been caused is more than offset by the extent to which matters of external relations have been discussed throughout the session, not all at once but at different periods. In time of war questions relating to foreign affairs will come up almost every day, in one way or another, and this session has been no exception in that regard. For example, a large portion of the debate on the address was devoted almost exclusively to matters pertaining to foreign affairs. I believe hon. members will recall that during that debate some very important questions with respect to cooperation within the empire, and the like, were discussed at great length. Again on the war appropriation measure matters pertaining to foreign affairs were discussed at length, and to a lesser extent on some other measures. The fact that the meeting of the prime ministers in London was concerned largely with foreign affairs had the result that members of this house were fully informed of the position taken by Canada at that conference, as far as it was possible to have the discussions made public by the reports that came from the conference itself, and which were released here. Then we have received here the prime ministers of New Zealand and Australia, who discussed very freely and openly matters relating to the conference, Canada's position as compared with that of the other countries, and so on. On all these matters I think hon. members are as fully informed as they would have been if this discussion had taken place at an earlier time.

Then I should remind hon. members that from time to time I have been asked to make a statement on some particular aspect of foreign affairs, and in most cases I have been able to give the statement so desired. In addition many returns have been asked for, and a very large number of questions have appeared on the order paper. These returns have been brought down; the questions have been answered, and in that way I believe hon. members have been kept fully informed as to the outstanding aspects of policy and matters of which they would wish to have knowledge in relation thereto. However, this morning I should like to follow the custom that has prevailed in previous years, and very briefly review the progress of the war since I last made a statement, anticipating as well as I can the subjects on which I think hon. members will wish to have further information.

It is now almost two years since the first major offensive by forces of the united nations began a new phase of operations. This phase carried the allied war effort across the great divide from uncertainty of victory on the one side to certainty of victory on the other. The initiative then seized, in the Solomons, in the western desert, then in North Africa, has never been relaxed. Rather has it been maintained and greatly extended.

Two months ago the war of liberation was carried to one of the many parts of Europe which had been under Hitler's control for nearly four years. While the northwestern wall of the nazi-controlled fortress was being breached, and the breach held, the gigantic summer offensive of the armies of the Soviet Union has hurled back the enemy on a scale never dreamed of in modern warfare. With the exception of a limited area in the Baltic republics, the Soviet forces have recovered nearly all the territory which was occupied by nazi forces following the treacherous invasion launched on June 22, 1941. This tremendous drive is now being carried across Polish soil into Germany itself. In Normandy the great struggle for liberation is being fought out by combined United States, British and Canadian forces. The next few weeks, if not days, may witness battles which will go far to decide the fate of the German stronghold now beset from east and west and south.

When I reviewed the progress of the war last July it was on the very eve of Canadian landings at Pachino, in Sicily, at the beginning of the battle for the liberation of Italy. Following a campaign of thirty-eight days, which saw the complete defeat of German forces on that island, Canadian forces were in the van of allied landings on the mainland. The unconditional surrender of Italy shortly after removed this unhappy partner from the axis alignment. In the heavy fighting which pushed the nazi forces steadily northward, Canadian troops have had an important part. At the beginning of 1944 the 1st Canadian division was supplemented by other units, and by the establishment of headquarters of a Canadian corps in the field. In May this Canadian corps reached its full fighting strength, and up until the liberation of Rome it took part in many important actions.

The Canadian corps was and is a part of the British 8th army. It was moved secretly from the Adriatic front to engage the enemy. The move had decisive results. In the landings both in Sicily and Italy, and in many subsequent operations, concentrations of the Royal Canadian Air Force and ships and men of the Royal Canadian Navy have cooperated fully and effectively. In like manner the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Royal Canadian Navy have cooperated fully and effectively in the invasion of Europe from the north. Wherever they serve, from now until the day of final victory, we may be sure that all the armed forces of Canada, rigorously trained and superbly equipped, will continue to strike telling and relentless blows in the cause of the world's freedom. I might also mention the heroic and far-reaching service on the part of Canada's merchant navy, which throughout the war has played a vital role.

The spectacular progress of the Red armies in pushing back the German enemy, and the initial successes of the allied armies in Normandy and Italy, should not obscure the importance of allied offensives elsewhere. In the battle of the Atlantic increased air coverage over vital routes and new methods of combat have made possible a greater concentration of weapons against the U-boat menace than ever before. The bridge of ships upon which victory depends has been kept intact. The menace of the U-boat may never entirely disappear during war-time. Since the beginning of the year, however, in the north Atlantic, the number of U-boats sunk by the combined resources of escort vessels, carrier-based aircraft and land-based aircraft has been at least five times the number of merchant ships lost by enemy action.

In the western Pacific, Japanese forces are being steadily hemmed in and driven back from the fringes of a vast area of sea and islands. It is of interest that in an area where what at first was a war of survival, and for many months a war of attrition, has now become in part a war of liberation. In a part of Netherlands New Guinea, for example, Netherlands civil affairs officers are already at work in the first sizeable area of Dutch soil to be wrested back from the Japanese. United States task forces have been reducing Japanese outposts by the occupation of strategic islands, of which Saipan, Guam and Tinian are recent examples. The air war against Japan has been pursued actively from land as well as from sea. From lately-constructed bases in China new super fortresses of the United States 20th air force have rained destruction on some of the most important industrial areas under Japanese control. On land also, on the Indo-Burmese front, dogged efforts are being made to whittle down the Japanese lines and keep open the supply routes to China upon which her own military effort against Japan now so largely depends.

As might be expected, the weight of Allied bombing over Europe, the relentless patrolling of European seaways, and now the actual fighting on land, have aroused the resistance movements. These movements have been kept alive through underground channels in many European nations whose governments are in exile. It is known, for example, that full-scale fighting by underground warriors in some parts of France has engaged large numbers of nazi troops who might otherwise be serving elsewhere. In Yugoslavia the "partisan" forces serving under Marshal Tito have taken control of extensive areas, and at least one constituent assembly has met in the midst of a country still outwardly under nazi domination. In still other countries, always at great personal risks, organized sabotage of transportation and communication facilities has slowed down the enemy's plans. These underground forces have played a vital part throughout the war in hampering the enemy, and in the war of liberation now entered upon in earnest, they will continue their efforts ever more strongly for victory.

Recent events in Finland and Turkey are significant of the crumbling of the German positions at both ends of the eastern front.

Behind this bare recital of offensive successes and operational gains lies a meritorious story of realistic planning for the strategic needs of total war. A year ago I spoke of the then public achievements of the latest meetings at Casablanca and at Washington between Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt. Last August there was the historic conference at Quebec, and between August and the end of the year there followed meetings at Moscow, Cairo and Teheran. Of the outcome of these meetings I should now like to speak briefly.

It has been said that Casablanca and Quebec were primarily "councils of war", where strategic decisions of the highest importance were taken involving the war in Europe and the war in the far east. It was the war still at the planning stage, but all of the combined declarations of 1943 were calculated to impress the neutral nations of Europe, and even more the German satellite states, with the determination of the allied powers to stop at nothing short of victory over the axis.

The organization of total war for victory always has had some contemplation of the period following the end of hostilities. This necessity is reflected in the communiques issued following the Cairo and Teheran meetings, where for the first time in this war the Generalissimo of China and the Premier of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics were brought into direct conference with Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt.

The Cairo meeting made it clear that Japan would be fought and defeated, and that those possessions which were added by force of arms to the empire of Japan over the past half-century would be taken from her. The meeting at Teheran envisaged the early prospect of frontal attacks upon the nazi stronghold in Germany—attacks from the east and south and west. The United States, Great Britain and the U.S.S.R. did not go so far as to specify what losses a defeated Germany was to suffer. But some guidance on this point had been given by the meeting at Moscow, at the end of October, of the foreign ministers of the Soviet Union, the United States, and Great Britain. Dealing with the case of fascist Italy, then already but a glimmering remnant of Mussolini's once-pompous empire, Mr. Molotov, Mr. Hull and Mr. Eden stated that:

> Allied policy towards Italy must be based upon the fundamental principle that fascism and all its evil influences and emanations shall be utterly destroyed, and that the Italian people shall be given every opportunity to establish governmental and other institutions based upon democratic principles.

The Moscow conference gave many leads for the future organization of a peaceful world order. In particular, in a four-power declaration to which China also was a party, these nations pledged their joint efforts to bring about the unconditional surrender and disarmament of their common enemy, and to take all necessary measures to provide against the violation of terms imposed upon that enemy.

They likewise agreed not to use their military forces after the war in other states except after joint consultation, and to confer with each other and other united nations on the regulation of post-war armaments.

To carry on cooperation in war time as collaboration in peace time, Great Britain, the United States and the U.S.S.R. further expressed their "unanimous recognition . . . that it was essential in their own national interests and in the interest of all peace-loving nations to continue the present close collaboration and cooperation in the conduct of the war into the period following the end of hostilities, and that only in this way could peace be maintained and the political, economic and social welfare of their peoples fully promoted." With this objective in mind they set up two continuing bodies, representing the three powers to which have been given important functions. The European advisory commission has been established in London to make joint recommendations to the three governments regarding armistice terms and the nature of the post-war supervision to apply to Germany. The advisory council for Italy with headquarters in the liberated zone has already been set up. Provision was made for representation on the council of the French committee of national liberation and the governments of Yugoslavia and Greece.

Perhaps of greatest continuing interest was the so-called Moscow declaration on general security. In outlining a part of the pattern of post-war international society, the three nations envisaged the necessity of establishing a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintaining of peace and security.

On the strength of these several conferences, there is hope that the united nations will carry into the post-hostilities period the machinery of military, political and economic collaboration which has been so extensively developed under stress of war.

The first object of our external policy must continue to be to win the war, and to win it at the earliest possible day. It is more true than ever, more urgent than ever, that we in Canada should bend all our efforts to the supreme task of winning victory at the earliest possible moment. We have now been fighting, on a scale of increasing magnitude and intensity, for more than four years. Of the people of Canada as a whole, I think it can be said that we have never mistaken or doubted the real issue in the world-wide struggle. For this reason the planning which has shaped the war effort of Canada since 1939 has been constantly aligned with the changing needs of war. This planning has been directed towards victory for the united nations. It has also been concerned with the responsibilities which will fall to Canada on the morrow of victory, and with the tasks of Canada as an emerging world power in the society of free nations.

I shall now speak more particularly of post-war world organization.

We are rapidly approaching, if we have not already reached, the military climax of the war against Germany. We are at or near the peak of our effort, when the courage and resolution of every service man and every civilian is being put to the severest test. The Canadian Navy and the R.C.A.F. have long been heavily engaged against the enemy, but never before in such numbers at the same time. Most formations of the Canadian Army are now in action in Italy and in France in the midst of the ordeal for which they have prepared themselves so patiently and so well.

At times like these it is hard to look beyond the immediate fortunes of the fields of battle and consider with a detached mind the problems which we must solve after military victory is won. The price paid for victory has indeed been high during the five long years of war. It will be still higher before fighting stops. We must see that what we get for that terrific price is not the bitter fruit of disillusionment. We must spare no effort to secure a result which will bring peace and prosperity in our time, and in the time of those who succeed us. We must turn our minds, even in these days of military climax, to the organization of peace with the same sort of vigour and determination that has been devoted so successfully to the organization of war.

The organization of peace was one of the chief subjects which was discussed at the meeting of commonwealth prime ministers in May. Mr. Churchill on May 24 gave to the British House of Commons an outline of the views which had been considered at that meeting. President Roosevelt in a statement of June 15 indicated that he had a similar conception of the means which should be adopted to give effect to the fourth paragraph of the Moscow declaration of last autumn. A lot of hard thinking is being given to these problems in Moscow, in London, in Washington, in Ottawa and in the other capitals of the united nations. Mr. Cordell Hull has announced that they will be discussed in Washington this month by representatives of the four largest powers.

I said in the House of Commons last January that it was indeed true beyond question "that the peace of the world depends on preserving on the side of peace a large superiority of power so that those who wish to disturb the peace can have no chance of success." In recent weeks the Germans have added to their armoury of weapons a new instrument of blind destruction, the use of which may serve to underline the thought which I then expressed. The "flying bomb" of to-day is a weapon in its infancy. If it is developed with all the resources and ingenuity of modern science, we may find in a few years that it has become an engine of war which without warning and in no time at all could be used to destroy peaceful countries from afar. The weapon which the Germans are using so indiscriminately against southern England may be as crude in performance in comparison with its successors as was the tank first used in battle on the Somme in September, 1916, in comparison with the latest tanks now in production.

We must indeed preserve a large superiority of power on the side of peace. We shall have that power among the united nations from the hour of victory. We must keep it in the first place to disarm our enemies and prevent a revival of barbaric militarism in their countries. We must keep it also not only to meet dangers from other quarters which might arise, but to further constructive solutions of the problems which give rise to such dangers.

Canadians should, I think, approach these great questions of the organization of security with two main objects in mind: first, that the methods adopted should be as effective as can be contrived; and, second, that they should safeguard the interests of Canada and commend themselves to the Canadian people so that they can secure steady public support.

There is no constitutional cure for the diseases of international society. Indeed, perhaps one of the errors into which many people fell between the two wars was to feel that the establishment of the league of nations had somehow itself removed the danger of war.

The league was an institution which provided a method and occasion for international co-operation. Without the will to cooperate through the league machinery on the part of countries possessing a large superiority of power, the league could not succeed. It used to be said, in the language current at Geneva, that what was the matter with the league was its lack of universality. This did not mean that a league to which some states did not belong was ineffective; it did mean, however, that unless all or nearly all the most powerful states belonged to the league and accepted its basic principles the league machinery was inadequate to prevent the possibility of war.

We should be able to make a better start now. The four greatest states among the united nations have joined in the Moscow declaration and there can be no doubt that the rest of the united nations fully endorse its terms. In the organization of power it is for the most powerful states to take the lead. This is a correct application of the functional idea of international organization. The outlines of the plan which are now emerging involve a constitution generally similar to that of the league of nations, including an assembly in which all member states would be equally represented and a council consisting of representatives of the greatest powers, together with a few other members. Great emphasis is being placed on the authority of the council as the central agency for watching over the peace of the world and initiating action to remove threats of war and other causes of serious disagreement or dissension.

If the council is given these large powers—and I do not question the need for making it an effective centre for initiating action—its composition becomes a question of great importance. The suggestions made by President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill, which are indeed implicit in the Moscow declaration, are that China, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and the United States should always be represented on the council. In function of maintaining world security the part of these countries is so vital that one must unhesitatingly agree. It is also suggested that there should be added, by a process of election or selection yet to be worked out, a number of representatives of other states who would have temporary membership on the council and it is to this question that I wish to direct attention.

The cooperation of the greatest powers is necessary to maintain peace. They must co-operate not only with each other but also with other states of lesser power. Especially among our European allies the memory of the Munich agreement of the autumn of 1938 is still vivid. In the circumstances which prevailed then, the Munich agreement may have been the best means of postponing war with Germany. In it, however, two great powers bought from Hitler and his Italian partner, at the expense of a small country, time to prepare themselves for war. Unless the smaller countries can play their due part in the new international system, there will be ever present the fear that great powers may settle their differences at the expense of the smaller countries. The mere existence of such a fear would in time greatly prejudice the whole scheme.

What then should the due part of the lesser countries be, especially in connection with this question of the composition of the new world council? The simple division of the world between great powers and the rest is unreal and even dangerous. The great powers are called by that name simply because they possess great power. The other states of the world possess power—and, therefore, the capacity to use it for the maintenance of peace—in varying degrees ranging from almost zero in the case of the smallest and weakest states up to a military potential not very far behind that of the great powers.

In determining what states should be represented on the council with the great powers, it is, I believe, necessary to apply the functional idea. Those countries which have most to contribute to the maintenance of the peace of the world should be most frequently selected. The military contribution actually made during this war by the members of the united nations provides one good working basis for a selective principle of choice.

I have emphasized the necessity of basing world security on the maintenance of a large superiority of power. Between the two wars too many people in too many countries placed too much faith in general promises like those in the Kellogg pact, in expressions of good will, in constitutional mechanisms. The world has been disillusioned, but the reaction in the other direction can go too far. If the new world system is conceived in terms of power alone, peace may be kept for a time, but not for long. If it is to last and broaden out from precedent to precedent it must embody a dynamic idea and ideal. The concentration on security, and on the need to marshal overwhelming force to meet threats to security, is not enough. Security from war is indeed essential, but real security requires international action and organization in many other fields—in social welfare, in trade, in technical progress, in transportation, and in economic development. The general aim must be to lower the temperature of nationalism, while preserving its good features, and thus to diminish national rivalries and reduce the importance of frontiers. This requires that there should be a wide and fruitful area of collaboration, including the continuance of part of the elaborate system of war-time cooperation which we have built up among the allies under stress of danger.

It is perhaps natural that after so many weary years of war some people, looking back perhaps to the high hopes of twenty-five years ago and recalling their disenchantment, should take a gloomy view of what can be accomplished. We must not fear the future. Canadians have every right to be proud not only of what their country has achieved but of what it can achieve. We must not on the other hand think that everything will be simple, that in facing the issues both at home and abroad we can slip into easy ways, and postpone decisions or leave the decisions to other and more powerful states. The opportunity is great, perhaps the greatest that has ever faced mankind. So too will the effort be great which is required to take advantage of the opportunity. Men in all countries will need to make that effort if success is to be attained.

We and the other nations of the commonwealth already have with the United States what Mr. Churchill has called a "fraternal association." Inside the commonwealth we already have between its members the type of international relations which we hope to see in wider fields. Many times in recent months, though not too often, there has been described and praised the intimate system of collaboration which prevails within the commonwealth. There is little that I should add to-day, although I think it would be desirable for me to place on record, as I did in an address before the two houses of parliament in London, the methods of cooperation between different parts of the commonwealth which we believe will best serve to bring about the unity of policy which is desirable for us to have in all matters of imperial concern, and also best serve to keep as largely together as may be possible the points of view of all nations in regard to policies that may make for future peace.

On one point, however, I have noticed since my return from the meeting of prime ministers in London a tendency in certain quarters in Canada to revive controversy over an issue which has been settled. This is the issue whether the British commonwealth should seek always to speak with a single voice and should be permanently represented as such on the new world council.

Right Hon. Peter Fraser, the Prime Minister of New Zealand, was questioned on this by the press when he was recently in Ottawa. He answered:

> There is no question about any of our prime ministers or countries delegating to the United Kingdom or any other dominion the right to speak for our respective countries. That is fundamental. . . . Cooperation, solidarity, help in peace and war, yes, but not subordinating any opinions that our respective governments arrive at.

In response to a further question about the possibility that the commonwealth should act as a unit in the world security organization, Mr. Fraser said:

> I think that would destroy the whole idea of world organization. I may say this, that there is no British leader I have ever heard who has put that point.

I should like to add to what Mr. Fraser said a few observations of my own. Inside the commonwealth we can and do manage as a rule to reach agreement on the general lines of policy which our governments should pursue in dealing with major issues. We find it possible to agree because we have the will to agree and cherish similar international ideals and purposes. If, however, the countries of the commonwealth had to reach agreement by some political process yet to be devised, so that all were bound to carry out a single policy, there would be a very different story. The world council is to be an executive body. It must be capable of prompt and single-minded action. The United Kingdom, which is indisputably a great power, will sit on the council in its own right, and its influence there will be enhanced by its special relationship with the countries of the commonwealth. The United Kingdom representative will, however, be responsible to London and will take his instructions from London alone.

Supposing we were to change this so that he would become a representative of the British commonwealth, should he have to withhold action until he has received instructions from half a dozen governments? What should he do if these instructions were in conflict? Should he follow the majority opinion even if it is violently opposed by the government, parliament and people in one or more commonwealth countries? At the very best, action would be delayed and decisions blurred. At the worst we would run the risk of rendering the commonwealth impotent in international affairs and perhaps of disrupting it.

I say to the few in Canada who have advocated such a change that the prestige abroad of the British commonwealth was never higher than it is to-day. The prestige is based upon a belief that in the British commonwealth there has been evolved a unique alliance of a peculiarly tough and enduring kind whose members act together not because they are under any strict obligation to do so but because they have the will to act together. Our friends abroad, furthermore, have discovered that the primary objects for which the members of the commonwealth act together are objects which can be shared by other countries of good will. They realize that the commonwealth is not a power bloc exploiting its own interests but a group of like-minded nations whose close association has in the past formed, and should form in the future, a most reliable element within the framework of the world order.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I think I had better repeat what I said in London on May 11 last in addressing both houses of parliament. It bears on the important question of commonwealth and world cooperation; and the statement carries with it in this House of Commons the greater authority in that it was made before the entire world, and also because since that statement was made the common sense of it has been generally admitted and proclaimed, and that not in this country only, but in Britain, in the United States and in other countries as well.

I said at that time, and repeat to-day:

It is of the utmost importance to the commonwealth that there should continue to be the greatest possible cooperation among its members. In like manner, it is, I believe, of the utmost importance to the future of mankind that, after the war, there should be the greatest possible cooperation among the nations of the world.

Our wartime cooperation is not the product of any formal institutional unity; it is the result of agreement upon policies of benefit to all. Moreover, they are policies that make an appeal "to all sorts of men in all sorts of countries", provided only they are men of goodwill.

If, at the close of hostilities, the strength and unity of the commonwealth are to be maintained, those ends will be achieved not by policies which are exclusive, but by policies which can be shared with other nations. I am firmly convinced that the way to maintain our unity is to base that unity upon principles which can be extended to all nations. I am equally sure that the only way to maintain world unity is to base it upon principles that can be universally applied. The war has surely convinced all nations, from the smallest to the greatest, that there is no national security to be found in the isolation of any nation or group of nations. The future security of peace-loving nations will depend upon the extent and effectiveness of international cooperation.

It is no less true that it is not the great powers only that are needed to defend, to preserve, and to extend freedom. We should be false to the freedom for which we are fighting if, at any time, we failed to remember that no nation liveth unto itself; and that nations, great and small, are members one of another.

It is not merely the security of nations that is indivisible. Their prosperity also is indivisible. Few would wish to return to the years before the war, when almost every nation sought economic security in economic isolation from its neighbours. What happened was that the economic security of all nations was destroyed. Now is surely the time for the world to realize that, just as no nation of itself can ensure its own safety so no nation or group of nations can in isolation ensure its own prosperity.

For my part, I profoundly believe that both the security and the welfare of the nations of the British commonwealth and, in large measure, the security and welfare of all peace-loving nations will depend on the capacity of the nations of the commonwealth to give leadership in the pursuit of policies which, in character, are not exclusive but inclusive. How far such policies can be successfully pursued will, of course, depend on the extent to which other nations are prepared to pursue similar policies. But let us, at least, wherever that is possible, give the lead that is in the interests of the world as a whole. . . .

Over many years, Canada's relations with the United States have been especially friendly. Throughout the war, we have followed the path of cooperation. We like to think that our country has had some part in bringing about a harmony of sentiment between the United States and the whole British commonwealth. That harmony is the foundation of the close military collaboration which is proving so fruitful in this war.

It will ever be a prime object of Canadian policy to work for the maintenance of the fraternal association of the British and American peoples. When peace comes, it is our highest hope that the peoples of the British commonwealth and the United States will continue to march at each other's side, united more closely than ever. But we equally hope that they will march in a larger company in which all the nations united to-day in defence of freedom will remain united in the service of mankind.

The leader of the opposition intimated that he might wish to ask me some questions in regard to the meeting of prime ministers in London. As the house is well aware, the meetings were of a highly secret and confidential character. They were concerned with matters pertaining immediately to the war and also with questions relating to world organization in the post-war era. At the time of the conference the press was very anxious to obtain detailed information of what was taking place at the different sessions, but it was not possible to have that information given except to a very limited extent, and at the meetings of the prime ministers themselves it was thought advisable that a statement upon which all could agree be given out at the end of the meeting and that this would be the best way in which to inform the world of those matters which had taken place at the meetings and which it was believed should be made public. I think therefore it would be advisable for me at this time to read to the house—it is not very long—the text of the declaration which was signed by the five prime ministers who were present at the conference. That declaration is dated May 16, 1944, and it will give the house in a broad way what I think will answer any questions that may be in the minds of some hon. members:

We, the King's prime ministers of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, have now for the first time since the outbreak of the war been able to meet together to discuss common problems and future plans. The representative of India at the war cabinet, and the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, have joined in our deliberations and are united with us.

At this memorable meeting in the fifth year of the war, we give thanks for deliverance from the worst perils which have menaced us in the course of this long and terrible struggle against tyranny. Though hard and bitter battles lie ahead, we now see before us, in the ever-growing might of the forces of the united nations, and in the defeats already inflicted upon the foe by land, by sea and in the air, the sure presage of our future victory.

To all our armed forces who in many lands are preserving our liberty with their lives, and to peoples of all our countries whose efforts, fortitude and conviction have sustained the struggle, we express our admiration and gratitude. We honour the famous deeds of the forces of the United States and of Soviet Russia and pay our tribute to the fighting tenacity of the many states and nations joined with us. We remember indeed the prolonged, stubborn resistance of China, the first to be attacked by the author of world-aggression and we rejoice in the unquenchable spirit of our comrades in every country still in the grip of the enemy. We shall not turn from the conflict until they are restored to freedom. Not one who marches with us shall be abandoned.

We have examined the part which the British empire and commonwealth of nations should bear against Germany and Japan, in harmony with our allies. We are in cordial agreement with the general plans which have been laid before us. As in the days when we stood all alone against Germany, we affirm our inflexible and unwavering resolve to continue in the general war with the utmost of our strength until the defeat and downfall of our cruel and barbarous foe has been accomplished. We shall hold back nothing to reach the goal and bring to the speediest end the agony of mankind.

We have also examined together the principles which determine our foreign policies, and their application to current problems. Here, too, we are in complete agreement. We are unitedly resolved to continue, shoulder to shoulder with our allies, all needful exertion which will aid our fleets, armies and air forces during the war, and therefore to make sure of an enduring peace. We trust and pray that victory, which will certainly be won, will carry with it a sense of hope and freedom for all the world. It is our aim that, when the storm and passion of war have passed away, all countries now overrun by the enemy shall be free to decide for themselves their future form of democratic government.

Mutual respect and honest conduct between nations is our chief desire. We are determined to work with all peace-loving peoples in order that tyranny and aggression shall be removed or, if need be, struck down whenever it raises its head. The people of the British empire and commonwealth of nations willingly make their sacrifices to any cause. We seek no advantages for ourselves at the cost of others. We desire the welfare and social advancement of all nations and that they may help each other to better and broader days.

We affirm that after the war a world organization to maintain peace and security should be set up and endowed with the necessary power and authority to prevent aggression and violence.

In a world torn by strife we have met here in unity. That unity finds its strength, not in any formal bond but in the hidden spring from which human action flows. We rejoice in our inheritances, loyalties and ideals, and proclaim our sense of kinship to one another. Our system of free association has enabled us, each and all, to claim a full share of the common burden. Although spread across the globe, we have stood together through the stress of two world wars, and have been welded the stronger thereby. We believe that when the war is won and peace returns, this same free association, this inherent unity of purpose, will make us able to do further service to mankind.

Winston S. Churchill, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada.

Peter Fraser, Prime Minister of New Zealand.

J. C. Smuts, Prime Minister of the Union of South Africa.

Now I turn from a consideration of European affairs to speak for a moment of Canada and the pan-American union. That is a subject that has been brought up at different times in this house. During the debate last year on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, and since then from time to time in public discussion, reference has been made to the pan-American union and in some cases the opinion has been expressed in favour of Canadian membership in that union. The constitution of the pan-American union confines membership to the twenty-one American republics. Some alteration would therefore be necessary in the present terms of membership before Canada could be admitted. A prerequisite to any action by Canada would of course be the reception of an invitation from the present members for Canada to join the union. Quite apart from these technical and formal aspects of the situation, I am convinced that Canadian participation in such an organization could be based only upon a wide general appreciation in this country of the purposes and responsibilities of the pan-American union. I am not convinced that such appreciation now exists. A recent sampling of public opinion on the subject of Canadian membership revealed that very many of those questioned do not know what the pan-American union is. It might perhaps be suggested that those who favour our participation might best serve their cause by helping to create a wider understanding of the various aspects of this subject among the people of Canada. In the meantime, the matter is not being overlooked by the government. In this connection it may be recalled that no formal meeting of the pan-American union has been held since 1938, the ninth conference, which was to have assembled in 1943, having been postponed because of the war. If our hemispheric neighbours find it advisable to postpone such conferences in war time it is not unreasonable to suggest that Canada should delay active consideration of this topic until the world conflict is ended. At that time, moreover, we can take whatever action may seem appropriate in the light of post-war developments in the realm of international organization.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it from what the Prime Minister has said that there has been no formal or informal invitation to Canada with respect to membership or sitting in on the pan-American union.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know just what may be included as an informal invitation, but a good many kindly-disposed friends have intimated how helpful it might be if Canada were a member of the pan-American union; but I would say that no invitation has been extended by the union. It should not be thought, however, that we are unaware of the value of increasing cooperation and friendship with the other governments of the western hemisphere. On the contrary, we are steadily developing our contacts with them on every appropriate occasion and in a variety of ways. Last autumn, for example, we had the pleasure of entertaining such distinguished political leaders of Latin American states as the Foreign Minister of Chile and the President of Haiti. At various times in recent months members of the Brazilian section of the United States-Brazil joint defence board, scientists, members of parliament and business men have also visited Canada. Members of the Mexican, Chilean and Brazilian delegations to the Bretton Woods conference have recently visited Ottawa. Such visits are most helpful in furthering friendly relations. I regret that war-time conditions make it impossible for members of this government to accept many of the invitations for return visits which have been so cordially extended to them. The fact that we have elevated our missions in Brazil and Chile to the rank of embassies, that we have established this year an embassy in Mexico and arranged for the exchange of ambassadors between Canada and Peru, is further proof of our appreciation of the importance of progressively increasing and strengthening our political relationships in the western hemisphere. Our trade commissioner service is being maintained at a high state of efficiency in the Latin-American countries. The government also looks with favour upon the presence of Canadian officials and experts at technical and scientific conferences of a pan-American character. Canada has been represented in Mexico City at a conference on demography, in New York at a conference on cartography, and in Santiago at a conference on criminal jurisprudence. It will likewise be represented at the fifth pan-American highway conference to be held at Lima, Peru, in the near future. In May last, at the invitation of the United States, Canada sent an observer to the first conference of commissions of inter-American development. These contacts, modest and limited though they necessarily must be, have all helped to bring about a better knowledge of Canada in the countries of Latin-America and of those countries among our own people. The new and closer relation with the American countries which have been stimulated and encouraged by our association in the war against the axis powers will, I believe, continue to develop to our mutual advantage in many fruitful ways.

May I refer to the question of Canadian nationals in enemy hands, on which questions have been raised once or twice during the present session? During the debate on the immigration estimates on June 5, a number of questions were asked by hon. members about the arrangements for the protection and relief of distressed Canadian nationals in enemy hands. The fact that the item for reimbursing the Swiss government for these relief payments appeared in the estimates of the immigration branch, rather than in the estimates of external affairs, may have been the cause of some misunderstanding. The Department of External Affairs, through the protecting power, endeavours to keep in touch with Canadian nationals in enemy hands and authorizes, where necessary, the payment of relief by the representatives of the protecting power. Such relief is made in the form of a loan and is subject to repayment from assets or income which the individual beneficiary may have in Canada. Frequently, when they are able to do so, the family in Canada of a person receiving relief are ready to reimburse the government. The vote for relief of the distressed nationals abroad has been for many years in the estimates of the immigration branch. This procedure goes back to the days when our immigration representation abroad was much more extended than that of the Department of External Affairs. It has been convenient to leave it there, as the immigration branch have an organization in Canada which has proved useful for keeping the individual accounts and making collections.

It appeared in the discussion on the immigration estimates that some members thought that the payment of relief to distressed nationals was handled by the International Red Cross. This is not so. It is the protecting power alone which represents us in enemy territories and which acts on our behalf for the relief of our nationals. The International Red Cross is essentially a neutral body concerned mainly with the welfare of prisoners of war and internees, collectively rather than individually, and regardless of nationality.

I should also like to answer a little more fully questions which were then asked as to the number of Canadian nationals in enemy hands. The first is Europe. The Minister of Mines and Resources gave the figure of eight hundred persons receiving assistance in Europe. This is the number of separate accounts received from the Swiss up to August, 1943, for relief paid to persons or families in Europe. Many of these accounts are for the relief of two or more persons. In addition there are many Canadians who are not receiving relief and others who are, but for whom accounts have not been received. It is not always clear on our records how many married couples or families are listed under one entry, and of course we cannot say how many Canadians have managed to carry on without appealing to the protecting power for assistance.

It is impossible to give any close estimate of the actual number of Canadian nationals in enemy hands, even in Europe. If members of families of Canadian nationals are counted singly, the figure for France, Germany and the Low Countries may approach three thousand—this figure does not, of course, include prisoners of war or merchant seamen. These are the countries on which we receive a good deal of information from the protecting power. Our information about Canadians in Norway, Denmark, the countries between Germany and Russia, and the Balkans, is more uncertain.

Altogether there may be some three to four thousand Canadians in enemy occupied Europe, the figure depending to a great extent on how we define "Canadian". A figure of four thousand would probably include all British subjects whose connection with Canada is closer than with any other part of the commonwealth.

Some three hundred Canadians were reported by the Swiss as interned in August 1943. They were then, and still are, at two or three well-known camps. This figure does not take account of a good number of persons previously at liberty on the coastal areas of France who have been evacuated to the interior. It is understood that many of these are now living in small towns and that their movements are restricted, but very little information about this evacuation is available and no lists of persons moved have so far been received.

The rates of relief paid by the protecting power to Canadian nationals at liberty in Europe are based on the standard considered necessary for a reasonable subsistence. Special payments are authorized in case of emergency, for sickness, for provisions for winter clothing, et cetera, in accordance with needs. The rates are established in consultation with the other governments of the commonwealth and are the same for all British subjects. In Europe they work out at approximately $66 per month for an unmarried person, $100 per month for husband and wife living together, plus $13.20 additional for each child up to a family maximum of $132.00. Payments above these rates are authorized in certain districts where the protecting power has informed us that they are inadequate.

An allowance of $6 to $10 each per month, depending on the camp in which they are interned, is also paid to Canadian civilian internees.

Now as to the far east. If the information about Canadians in Europe appears scanty, the information about Canadian civilians in Japanese hands is even less adequate. Some 1,200 Canadians have been reported by the protecting power in Japan and Japanese occupied areas of China and the Philippines. There are hardly any reports on Canadians in Malaya.

We have received reports on the internment of some two hundred Canadians by the Japanese, but from information received from other sources it is believed that very few persons of European descent remain at liberty in Japan or in territories under Japanese control. The restrictions on their movement appear to vary from place to place but, in general, their situation differs little from that of internment, although in some places it is believed they are allowed a certain amount of freedom of movement within restricted areas.

As to the total number of Canadians in Japanese hands, estimated on the same basis as for Europe, we can regard a figure of between 2,000 to 2,500 as a probability. Again this does not include prisoners of war.

One of the difficulties of affording assistance and protection to our nationals in Japanese hands is that the Japanese government has so far not permitted the protecting power to place representatives in charge of our interests except in Japan proper and in the Shanghai area. In Japan and Shanghai the representatives of the protecting power have been authorized to make relief payments on a scale approximately the same as in Europe. The Swiss have not so far been able to present any accounts for these payments. It is known that the Japanese have made some difficulties from time to time but it is believed, or perhaps I should say hoped, that relief has again reached these Canadians. In areas where the Swiss have not been permitted by the Japanese to exercise the functions of a protecting power, some relief is understood to have reached our civilians through the International Red Cross, through representatives of the Vatican and through an arrangement made by the Swiss with the Japanese government. No information is available as to the amount or regularity of the payments.

In conclusion I should like again to remind the house of the debt of gratitude we owe to the Swiss. They have taken seriously their responsibility as protecting power for our interests, and their representatives of all ranks in enemy territories have worked untiringly, sometimes amid great difficulties, to protect our interests and to care for our nationals.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may ask my right hon. friend one question, I believe some Canadian nationals have been repatriated from Japan. Is the Prime Minister in a position to indicate how many have been returned to this country since the beginning of the war?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As hon. members are aware, there have been two exchanges in which some of our nationals have been returned to this country. I am informed that something like 220 would be the number who have been repatriated.

Mr. GREEN: Are any further exchanges in contemplation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no announcement I can make at the present time on that matter, I am afraid.

Now may I speak of persons of Japanese origin in Canada. On several occasions the view has been expressed by residents of British Columbia that the rest of Canada does not appreciate the Japanese problem, and that it has been left as virtually the sole responsibility of their province. The fact that in 1941 of the 23,149 persons of Japanese race in Canada, 22,096 lived in British Columbia, undoubtedly made the people of that province particularly aware of the problem, and I can equally say it made the people of other parts of Canada less aware of how great the problem was. It cannot be said that during the war the government of Canada has left the question on the doorstep of British Columbia. It has taken primary responsibility. I should like now to say, and to emphasize the statement, that the government recognizes that the problem is one to be faced and dealt with not merely by British Columbia but by the whole country. The provinces have their particular sphere of responsibility. I wish to make clear, however, that the government does recognize that the problem is one to be faced by the whole of Canada as a Canadian problem. It is on this basis that the matter has been approached.

The government has had certain basic principles before it in formulating the policy which I wish to present to-day. In the first place, it recognizes the concern felt by British Columbia at the possibility of once again having within its borders virtually the entire Japanese population of Canada. In the past that situation has led to acrimony and bitterness. That the feeling is general in British Columbia has been made evident not only by the remarks of hon. members from that province but also through representations received from many west coast organizations and individuals. In view of that concern, it is felt that it must be accepted as a basic factor that it would be unwise and undesirable, not only from the point of view of the people of British Columbia but also from that of persons of Japanese origin themselves, to allow the Japanese population to be concentrated in that province after the war.

Secondly, account should be taken of the fact that for the most part the people of Japanese race in the country have remained loyal and have refrained from acts of sabotage and obstruction during the war. It is a fact that no person of Japanese race born in Canada has been charged with any act of sabotage or disloyalty during the years of war. For the future protection of those who have remained loyal, as well as to eliminate those who have shown that their true allegiance is not to Canada but to Japan, the government is of the view that persons of the Japanese race, whether Japanese nationals or British subjects by naturalization or birth, who have shown disloyalty to Canada during the war, should not have the privilege of remaining in Canada after the struggle is terminated. That is a second principle that is considered to be fundamental.

Thirdly, the government is of the view that, having regard to the strong feeling that has been aroused against the Japanese during the war and to the extreme difficulty of assimilating Japanese persons in Canada, immigration of Japanese into this country should not be allowed after the war. It is realized, of course, that no declaration of this type can or should be attempted which would be binding indefinitely into the future. Nevertheless, as a guiding principle in the years after the war, it is felt that the migration of Japanese should not be permitted.

Finally, the government considers that while there are disloyal persons to be removed, and while immigration in future is undesirable, and while problems of assimilation undoubtedly do present themselves with respect even to the loyal Japanese in Canada, nevertheless they are persons who have been admitted here to settle and become citizens, or who have been born into this free country of ours, and that we cannot do less than treat such persons fairly and justly. The interests of Canada must be paramount, and its interests will be protected as the first duty of the government. It has not, however, at any stage of the war been shown that the presence of a few thousand persons of Japanese race who have been guilty of no act of sabotage and who have manifested no disloyalty, even during periods of utmost trial, constitutes a menace to a nation of almost twelve million people. Those who are disloyal must be removed. That is clear. Surely, however, it is not to be expected that the government will do other than deal justly with those who are guilty of no crime, or even of any ill intention. For the government to act otherwise would be an acceptance of the standards of our enemies and the negation of the purposes for which we are fighting.

These are the principles that have seemed to the government worthy of acceptance as the basis for a reasonable and equitable policy in disposing of this vexatious problem. The exigencies of the future may dictate modifications or alterations.

I should add that in handling the Japanese problem we shall attempt, in so far as it seems desirable, to maintain a policy that in a sense can be considered as part of a continental policy. The situation in the United States in a great many essentials is the same as our own, and to the extent that it seems desirable we shall endeavour to ensure that our policy takes account of the policies which are being applied south of the border. There is no need for an identity of policy, but I believe there is merit in maintaining a substantial consistency of treatment in the two countries.

I might now mention the tentative measures which it is proposed to put into effect in order to carry out a policy based upon the principles I have indicated. The first and, in a sense, the fundamental task is to determine the loyal and the disloyal persons of Japanese race in Canada. The entire policy depends upon this being done. To some extent, of course, the task has been carried out through the examination and internment of suspicious or dangerous persons. It cannot be assumed, however, that all those who have been interned are disloyal. Some may have merely misunderstood their dispossession from their property in the protected zones and, as peaceful and honest Canadian citizens, may have striven to protect and retain what they considered to be rightfully theirs. Undoubtedly some of these cases exist. Misunderstanding is not the same as traitorous intent, and a stubborn defence of one's own property is not necessarily disloyalty. On the other hand there may be persons who have committed no act to justify their internment but who are in fact disloyal. What is clearly needed is the establishment of a quasi-judicial commission to examine the background, loyalties and attitudes of all persons of Japanese race in Canada to ascertain those who are not fit persons to be allowed to remain here. The commission I have referred to should, I think, be established in the fairly near future, in order that it may begin what will be a large and important task. The result of the work of the commission would be to establish a list of disloyal Japanese persons, some of whom will be Japanese nationals, some British subjects by naturalization, and some British subjects by birth. The government's intention would be to have these disloyal persons deported to Japan as soon as that is physically possible. Prior to deportation British subjects falling within this class would be deprived of their status as such. By the terms of the peace, Japan can be compelled, whether she wishes it or not, to accept these persons. There may also be some persons who will voluntarily indicate a desire to proceed to Japan. For these no further examination would be necessary. Whatever their national status, they would be allowed and encouraged to go as soon as they can.

Once the examination has been carried out, there will be established a list of Japanese persons who are loyal to Canada. Those persons, if they have been properly admitted to this country, and wish to remain here, should be allowed to do so. However, as I have said, they should not be allowed once more to concentrate in British Columbia. To prevent such concentration, measures of two types can be taken—a maximum can be set on the number of persons of Japanese race to be allowed to return to British Columbia, and persons of Japanese race can be given encouragement to move and remain elsewhere. It would be most undesirable, I believe, to establish a permanent barrier to the movement within Canada of persons who have been lawfully admitted to Canada or who are nationals of Canada. That would raise the possibility of discrimination and restrictions on movement to and from provinces which might have most unfortunate consequences in the future. Even the establishment of a temporary limitation would be undesirable in principle, but as a practical question of policy it may well be inescapable.

There is little doubt that with cooperation on the part of the provinces it can be made possible to settle the Japanese more or less evenly throughout Canada. They will have to settle in such a way that they must be able to pursue the settled lives to which they are entitled, and that they do not present themselves as an unassimilable bloc or colony which might again give rise to distrust, fear and dislike. It is the fact of concentration that has given rise to the problem.

The sound policy and the best policy for the Japanese Canadians themselves is to distribute their numbers as widely as possible throughout the country where they will not create feelings of racial hostility.

It is not my intention at this time to enlarge further on this matter. There are questions of detail still to be considered. There may also be modifications of policy which further investigation will show to be necessary. However, the lines of development to which the government will endeavour to adhere will be in general those which I have outlined. We must not permit in Canada the hateful doctrine of racialism which is the basis of the nazi system everywhere. Our aim is to resolve a difficult problem in a manner which will protect the people of British Columbia and the interests of the country as a whole, and at the same time preserve in whatever we do, principles of fairness and justice.

In respect to this particular matter may I add that I have just given hon. members figures showing the numbers of Canadian nationals who are under the control of the Japanese in Japan at the present time. Having in mind that fact, the fact that a number of our Canadain soldiers are interned in Japan, it has seemed the part of wisdom to me to be very guarded in what I would say on this subject of Japanese nationals in this country. I am sure hon. members will see the necessity of keeping that essential feature very much in mind. Until the war is over there are possibilities of all kinds of cruel recriminations as a result, if not of actions, possibly of statements or suggestions. I think therefore it would be in the interests of all that in discussing this matter further—if indeed it is necessary to do so—that particular fact be kept very much in mind.

Hon. members have expressed the desire to have some information with regard to embassies which have been created, and a word about our diplomatic relations.

From time to time announcements have been made in the house as to the opening of new diplomatic posts, the elevation of legations to embassies, and the accrediting of new heads of missions. Perhaps it would be helpful to give a brief summary of the past year's developments.

Since my statement of last July, diplomatic missions have been established in Ottawa by four countries: Sweden, Turkey, Mexico and Peru. We have exchanged ambassadors with Mexico. Sweden and Turkey have established legations, with the understanding that Canada is not likely to be able to reciprocate until after the war; Peru is represented by a chargé d'affaires pending the arrival of an ambassador. We are about to open an embassy in Lima. An ambassador has already been designated, in the person of Doctor Henry Laureys, who was our high commissioner to South Africa for some years.

Another development has been the elevation of several Canadian posts abroad, and of corresponding foreign posts in Ottawa, from the rank of legation to that of embassy. Our first exchange of embassies was, appropriately, with the United States. That change in status occurred last November. Since then we have raised to the same rank our posts in China, Brazil, the Soviet Union and Chile. In return, there are now in Ottawa ambassadors from those countries and also one from Belgium. Our representative in Algiers carries the personal rank of ambassador.

While this development toward the accrediting of ambassadors rather than ministers has importance, I do not think it should be overemphasized. The functions of ambassadors and ministers are the same, and any real differences in their position that may have existed historically have now practically disappeared. The secondary rank hitherto held by our representatives has, however, I think, sometimes led to misunderstanding in foreign countries. Canadian representatives abroad will now hold a rank which is in accord with the international position of Canada.

The change is in line with the policy in other diplomatic services. There has been an international trend toward removing the distinction between embassies and legations by doing away with the latter. In 1938 the United Kingdom had 31 legations and 13 embassies; to-day they have only 19 legations but 25 embassies. The United States in 1938 had 32 legations and only 13 embassies; to-day those figures are almost reversed—16 legations and 33 embassies. Canada will soon have 7 embassies and 9 legations, instead of the 14 legations we had a year ago. It is apparent that the development of our diplomatic corps is in keeping with a general tendency.

I might add that, in my own view, the trend toward the elimination of differences in formal rank and ancient gradations is a desirable one. Just as government in general has to deal more and more with detailed and intricate problems that did not present themselves a few decades ago, so diplomatic representatives have increasingly to handle matters that are complex and often technical.

In conclusion may I say that the growing status of Canada among the united nations has been reflected in many ways: through the extension of our diplomatic representation among the united nations; through the elevation to embassies of several of our missions: through our share in the joint and combined planning agencies for war and for the post-hostilities period; through the operation of Canadian mutual aid; but, above all, it has been reflected by the skill and valour of Canada's fighting men on many fighting fronts.

In addition to our concern to bring about victory at the earliest possible day, we must do everything we can to see that a just and enduring peace is created and maintained. In no way can this be more effectively achieved than by the furtherance of social justice in our domestic and foreign relations, and in fostering to the utmost international understanding, cooperation and good will.

To help in bringing into being a new world order, whole nations will have to be liberated, entire civilian populations given food and clothing and the means of reestablishing themselves in useful occupations. Behind these great tasks of liberation and reconstruction and all that is involved in the new world order lies the realization that it is to those valiant men and women who have carried the battle into the enemy's camp and to all who have accorded to them the needed support that we owe the preservation of those freedoms which it is the genius of our nation to cherish and enhance. It is because of their courage, their privations and their sacrifices that our nation has been sustained and the very lives of our people protected. It is for them above all others that we must endeavour so to shape our policies for the future that all who have served and incurred sacrifice in this war may hereafter have abundant opportunity, security in mind and body and, with both, the fullest measure of well-being and worthy achievement that our concept of a new order can afford.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Chairman, it has always seemed to me that one of the main sources of the great strength of those countries which are truly democratic is the ability to discuss problems as they arise, to discuss them with patience and without acrimony and in many cases to reach common ground. In Canada at this time that strength means a great deal to us. I believe that by a process of discussion, by means of articles in the press and by study by various groups, the Canadian people are working out a foreign policy with which the great majority can agree and fully support. I am of the opinion that even the Prime Minister has improved a great deal in his outlook on foreign policy because of the discussions that have taken place in the house within the last year or two and also by reason of articles that have appeared in the press and the general interest on these questions that has been shown throughout the country. The position taken by him at the recent conference in London was a little better than I might have expected by reason of these discussions, although I certainly do not say that I agree with all the statements he made in London or that I think the stand he took there was the proper one for a Canadian prime minister to take.

In approaching the subject of foreign policy for Canada we must realize that it is hard for the Canadian people to be realistic about foreign affairs. It is hard for the members of the Canadian House of Commons to be realistic. There are many reasons for this, one being our comparatively sheltered position. We are a neighbour of the most powerful nation in the world, a nation which is friendly to us and a nation for which we have not only respect but considerable affection. Then we have been sheltered also by Great Britain, by the British fleet. That has been true also of the United States; they have been partly sheltered by the British navy. Because of our geographical position, because of the ties we have with our brother and cousin nations, Canadians have lived a sheltered life in so far as foreign affairs are concerned. Then we have never been under attack, and that makes it difficult for us to be realistic. It is true there was some shelling on the west coast by a Japanese submarine and some sinkings on the east coast by German submarines, but fortunately Canada has not known what it is to be attacked by the enemy as has been the case with Australia. Australia and New Zealand, and of course Great Britain, have known what it means to be attacked by the enemy.

To-day I approach this subject from the point of view of present conditions. We are well on the way to victory over brutal enemies who have threatened not only our lives but our whole civilization. We have been through some very dark days in the last few years. This is particularly true of the family of British nations which at one time stood alone. We have been thrown closer together as a family of nations than ever before, and in turn that family has been drawn closer to the United States. Then we have hundreds of thousands of young Canadians abroad fighting and dying every day beside young men from the other empire nations, from the United States and from the other united nations, young men of Canada who are bringing great honour to their homeland.

Another fact which we must consider is Canada's great growth in strength during the war years. This has been due to our geographical position and to many other reasons, but in any event we have grown a great deal stronger than we were before the war. We have produced tremendous quantities not only of manufactured goods but also of foodstuffs. We are on excellent terms with all the other united nations. We have always been on good terms with other nations, but the fact that we have aided our allies with our mutual aid measure, and that we have taken our share in the establishment and operation of the united nations relief agency, has increased goodwill for Canada among the other nations of the world. With its increase in strength our nation has grown in influence, and I agree with the Prime Minister when he says that we can be a world power.

Now we have first of all to win the war, as he has mentioned. To that job of winning the war let me add a further job, seeing that justice is meted out to criminals for the crimes they have committed during the past few years. I am afraid that once the war is over there will be a lot of noisy persons in Canada who represent only a fringe of our people—the noisy fringe, shall I say—who will at once begin to advocate that we forget everything and show mercy and all that sort of thing. I do not believe that you can establish a world peace on the basis of mercy without justice. Justice must be meted out to certain people in the world, and I hope that Canada will not forget that fact.

In addition to winning the war we have the problem of maintaining peace in the world. The world has grown very small, largely because of the development of aircraft. While the world has grown smaller, the methods of destruction have grown larger. Therefore we face a frightfully difficult problem in the ensuing years. Finally we face the problem of setting up an international organization which will maintain order in the world for many generations to come. Approaching the question of a foreign policy for Canada with those different facts in mind, I propose to give to the committee a few thoughts on Canadian foreign policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It might be of interest to hon. members to note that to-day happens to be the anniversary of the first great war. It is of interest that we should be at this moment discussing matters of external affairs.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, before the committee adjourned at one o'clock I had made a few introductory remarks dealing with the broad facts which one should bear in mind in approaching this question of Canada's foreign policy at this particular time; and this afternoon I propose to give expression to a few thoughts with regard to that foreign policy.

The first thought is really in the shape of a question, and it is this: What is the destiny of Canada? Or it might be put in another way: What should be the objective of Canada's people for the future? There are some people in this country who think that Canada's destiny is to be a leader of the small nations. That I assume would mean that we would have perhaps fifteen or twenty million people. Many of the public men who seem to have that thought in mind stress the words "autonomy", "independence" and "sovereignty". I have here a press dispatch from the Vancouver News Herald dated January 19 of this year containing a report of a speech made by the president of the National Liberal Federation, Senator Wishart Robertson. It is a report of a speech made in Saskatoon, and the heading of the article is this:

"Canada to Lead Small Nations."

The opening paragraph of the dispatch reads as follows:

Senator Wishart Robertson, president of the National Liberal Federation, last night asserted that Canada will go to the peace conference "virtually the leader of the smaller countries among the united nations."

Even this morning the Prime Minister referred to certain great powers, and then to lesser countries, in which apparently he included Canada. I do not know whether it is intentional or not, but the fact is that the foreign policy of the present government is leading in the direction of making Canada a small nation, perhaps the leader of the small nations—whatever that may mean; I imagine it will not mean much more than being one of the leaders in kicking the shins of the bigger nations. Such a destiny for Canada, such an objective for the Canadian people, is entirely wrong, and I would urge upon hon. members to give it very careful consideration, because there is still time to change and to choose a finer objective for this nation. It is wrong, for one reason, because of our great area and our great resources and the type of our people—bold, forward-looking, industrious people. It is wrong because of our strength, particularly because of the great increase in our strength during the war years. It is wrong, too, because it is not facing up to our mission in the world. Yet if the Canadian people as a whole, or even any large portion of the people, aim no higher than for Canada to be a small nation, she will never be anything more, and the result will be that she will end up under the thumb of the United States.

I believe that the destiny of Canada is to be a great world power standing beside Great Britain in the British empire. That would mean a population of perhaps forty, fifty, even seventy-five million; in any event it would mean a great increase in our population. The words which should be stressed in our dealings with the rest of the empire are not "autonomy" and "sovereignty", but rather "partnership" and "cooperation". I hope the Canadian people will catch that vision of Canada as a great nation standing beside Great Britain in the British empire and that they will make this their objective. As a matter of fact we are a British nation, and I believe that the great majority of the Canadian people intend that we shall remain so.

The Prime Minister in speaking this morning read from his speech in London on May 11 of this year. He began by reading that portion in which he stated that our wartime cooperation—that is, the wartime cooperation between the different nations in the empire—is not a product of formal institutional unity but is the result of agreement upon policies of benefit to all. There is of course a great deal in what he said, but he omitted entirely, to-day and in his speech before the houses of parliament in Great Britain, any reference to the great effect which the sentiment of the people of this country has had, and to the ties of loyalty to the crown. Those, I believe, go far deeper than this question of policies which are of benefit to all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did my hon. friend read the earlier part of my speech? I said a great deal about the ties we had with Britain, and the common loyalty to the crown.

Mr. GREEN: The Prime Minister means, in his speech in London?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do, yes.

Mr. GREEN: I may be wrong in what I said about that, but certainly he did not say anything about that to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My goodness—

Mr. GREEN: And in my opinion it is very seldom that he does place the proper amount of emphasis upon that sentiment and upon that loyalty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that there are some things so obvious that one does not feel it necessary to be everlastingly protesting one's loyalty. I take it that every citizen in this country is in his heart loyal to the crown and no citizen more so than myself, but I do not go about announcing that fact every half hour. May I say further that to-day I should like to express that loyalty by extending the warmest greetings to Her Majesty the Queen whose birthday it is.

Mr. GREEN: I think that everyone in the house will agree with the Prime Minister in that and endorse the sending of congratulations to Her Majesty.

My first thought is that we must keep in mind the destiny of this nation, and the second thought, with regard to Canada's foreign policy, has to do with the maintenance of peace in the post-war years. In other words it may really be described as the question of security. It is absolutely necessary that someone maintain the peace if any international organization is to be built up. With that statement there can be no quarrel. We are faced with the problem of the manner in which peace is to be preserved and of the part that Canada is to play in preserving that peace. The Prime Minister this morning did not say. He was away off in the future dealing with what will happen in the years to come, talking of world organization and not even giving any very clear ideas about what Canada's part would be in that world organization. As soon as this war is over, from the time it ends, someone somewhere must be prepared to stop fights among nations. The suggestion has been made that that should be the responsibility of the four great powers. I have here a significant statement by Carl J. Hambro, who was formerly president of the League of Nations Assembly and is now president-in-exile of Norway's parliament. Mr. Hambro has always been one of the champions of small nations, and yet this is what he says:

Every small nation will have to give up the cherished idea that her influence in world affairs should be just as great as that of any other nation, and accept as a fact that there can be no law of unanimity in a regulated international life. It will no longer be admitted that the tiniest little state should have the right of absolute veto and be given the privilege of dictating to great nations if only in a negative way what their course of action should be. In any universal organization . . . a few great countries will have to bear the burden of carrying out the ultimate decisions.

Prime Minister Churchill made the first great announcement with regard to this plan for preserving peace when in his speech on May 24 of this year he said:

For this purpose of preventing wars there must be a world-controlled council. I am not talking about other purposes, but for the purpose of preventing war there must be a world council comprising the greatest states which emerge victorious from this war, who will be obligated to keep within certain minimum standards armaments for the purpose of preserving peace. There must be also a world assembly of powers whose relations to the world executive or controlling power for the purpose of maintaining peace I am in no position to define.

Then we had another statement, this time by our ambassador at Washington, Mr. McCarthy. Speaking before the Canadian clubs in Ottawa on June 5, he said:

Because of Canada's geographical position and commonwealth membership she must oppose the suggestion that the preservation of world peace should be left to a few great powers with the danger that their inevitable rivalry might lead to another world war.

The Prime Minister also, as I understood him in his speech in January, was against this proposal of having the great powers preserve the peace of the world; but to-day he has announced that he thinks it is the proper idea.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In my speech in the early part of this year I said exactly what I said in London. As a matter of fact the speech in London reechoed what I had said in this house, and what I said in London was reechoed and restated in this house this morning. There is no difference.

Mr. GREEN: In my opinion the Prime Minister's statement to-day was a good deal different from his statement in January. However, the main point is that he now believes that the peace of the world should be maintained in the immediate post-war years by the four great powers working apparently in the shape of a world council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite wrong. I have made it clear that there can be no monopoly on the part of the great powers for any purpose. The great powers will play their part, but certainly the lesser powers will of necessity share with them their responsibilities and their efforts.

Mr. GREEN: Well, in this proposed world council there are to be four great powers—the United States, Russia, China and a fourth, which will be either Great Britain or the British commonwealth. There has been some difference of opinion as to which should be the fourth power. Right Hon. Anthony Eden, speaking in the British house on May 25, described this set-up in the following words:

The world organization must be designed to prevent a recurrence of aggression by Germany and Japan and must be fully equipped with force to meet this purpose. To ensure this, there must be close political and military collaboration between the United States, the Soviet Union, the British commonwealth—

Note, he did not say Great Britain; he said the British commonwealth.

—and China. Responsibility in any future world organization must be related to power. Consequently, the world organization should be constructed on and around the four great powers mentioned, but all other peace-loving states should come and play their part in the struggle.

Prime Minister Curtin dealt with the same subject. Speaking to the members of the house and senate in this chamber on June 1, as reported at page 3460 of Hansard, he said:

We see man's history interrupted repeatedly by wars, by bitter strife, by this ghastly loss to civilization. Upon the great nations, then, surely there falls the responsibility of making it clear that that association which war has meant for us—for Russia, for the United States, for the British commonwealth—

He also mentioned British commonwealth, not Great Britain.

—these three great powers, together with China, that great land mass and teeming population in the far east—these four who have subscribed themselves to the Charter—means that their great resources involve also high responsibilities.

What is their major responsibility? Just as they could agree and find ways and means to pool their strength to resist a brutal foe who threatened their homes, their liberties and the sovereignty of their peoples in their own affairs, so surely this strength, so prodigious in the present service of freedom, is a strength which can be maintained and made use of in order to prevent a recurrence of calamities such as Hitler and his axis collaborators have forced upon an unwilling, indeed a victimized world.

Both these statesmen used the words "British commonwealth". Obviously their thought was that the fourth great power should be the British commonwealth. The other day, on July 20, we had a statement from our own Prime Minister giving his view of the matter very clearly. It appears at page 5116 of Hansard in the form of a reply to the leader of the opposition, who asked him about the conference which is now being held in Washington between the representatives of the four powers, Great Britain, United States, Russia and China. The Prime Minister's answer was as follows:

> There is no meeting of united nations scheduled to take place. What the hon. leader of the opposition evidently refers to is a meeting of the four great powers, to take place at Washington in accordance with what was forecast in the Moscow declaration. The purpose of the meeting is that these four powers may consider the development of a general plan of world security. There will be only the four powers at the meeting.
> Mr. Graydon: When the Prime Minister refers to the four powers, do I understand that the British commonwealth is included in those powers, or is it just the United Kingdom?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: The four powers are the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and China.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Is Canada backing out of participation in this world council? Certainly she is not—

Mr. LaFLECHE: Oh!

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of National War Services need not grunt and groan.

Mr. LaFLECHE: What the hon. member is saying is enough to make any good Canadian grunt and groan.

Mr. GREEN: I am asking the question in all sincerity. I do not relish the interruption of the minister. The question I ask is this: Is Canada backing out of participation in the world council? Certainly she is not represented at Washington. There is a distinct difference between those two situations. In the first place we have the British commonwealth one of the four powers, and in the second place Great Britain one of the four powers. Which is right? Which is the proper policy? It is not yet too late to decide. Is the fourth power on the council to be Great Britain or is it to be the British commonwealth? The Canadian people are entitled to know. They are entitled to have the record kept straight. Is Canada to have a voice in this world council?

You see, Mr. Chairman, we have taken part in three wars within the last fifty years beside the other British nations. To-day we have nearly a million men under arms; and in this present war, as in the others, members of the commonwealth have fought as one. I suggest that they should take their part in maintaining the security of the world in the same way, again as one. In my opinion the British commonwealth should be the fourth power, just as Mr. Eden and Mr. Curtin have suggested. I presume the Canadian forces will be helping to maintain security in the post-war years—and on that point the Prime Minister made no declaration to-day, by the way—yet Canada will be put in a subsidiary position. The British government will be making the decisions—they will have to because Canada does not want to be a party—and Canada will be informed of what is happening and will follow along just as we did before this war. Canada will be what the Prime Minister described this morning as "one of the rest" of the united nations. That situation, Mr. Chairman, is not sound.

The Prime Minister suggested to-day that the problem be met by providing what he calls functional representation. In other words, where Canada is primarily interested she should be called into the council, or where Norway is interested she should be called in. Well, this functional representation is the old hobby-horse that the Prime Minister trots out whenever he is faced with this problem of whether we are to work together as a commonwealth or whether Great Britain is to carry the responsibility. I submit that his proposal of functional representation is ineffective. My suggestion would be that some method must be devised for representation of Canada on this world council, or at any rate for empire consultation beforehand on the questions that are to come up. Because whether we like it or not in effect the representative on that council, even though he is only supposed to be representing Great Britain, will speak for all the British nations. We will find that we are more or less bound by what he says, whether we have a representative there or not. I believe that the secretariat proposed by Mr. Curtin would have been a great help in paving the way for agreement between the British nations as to what stand should be taken. I know that proposal was rejected by our own Prime Minister in London, and I think improperly so.

Prime Minister Curtin explained to a press conference in Ottawa the implications of setting up an empire secretariat. A report of his statement says:

He thought there would be favourable results from a continuing conference of empire representatives at a central point, where background information, communications and files could be kept for a moment's notice. He likened his idea to a newspaper morgue where background was compiled and was ready for use. He spoke of the need for definite decisions being reached at empire conferences and not just preliminary work done.

His proposed consultative body would do the preliminary work and the more frequent prime ministers' conference would be ready to take definite decisions and not merely start study of any question which arose.

The attitude of the Prime Minister to-day on this question of the set-up of a world council is entirely negative. He emphasizes all the difficulties surrounding the making of such arrangements. It is defeatist. It looks like a return to the old isolationist and no-commitment policies which were indulged in by this government up to the very day of the outbreak of the war. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister's policy in this regard is unsound and unfair to the Canadian people.

My third thought concerning Canadian foreign policy has to do with the setting up of a world organization. We all agree on the need of some such organization. I do not suppose there are very many hon. members of the committee who would not support the setting up of an organization, and Canada must take her fair share. There is mention in the speech from the throne of Canada's participation in a world organization. I shall read it to the committee, because it seems to have been forgotten by the government. It is as follows:

My ministers believe that the time has come when all the nations now united in the common purpose of winning the war should seek unitedly to ensure an enduring peace. The dangers of future aggression can be removed, and world security attained, only by a general international organization of peace-loving nations. You will accordingly be invited to approve of Canadian participation in the establishment of an international organization to further national security through international cooperation.

No steps have been taken to get the approval of this House of Commons to Canadian participation in the establishment of an international organization. I do suggest that the committee was entitled to the details of the way in which Canada would cooperate in setting up such an organization. I ask the Prime Minister to make during this debate a declaration of the position that Canada will take with regard to a world organization. I hope it is not going to be a case of Canada's making no commitments except to a complete world league of nations after everyone else has thrown in his hat.

The Prime Minister also should explain whether or not the Canadian government favours some type of regional organization. When we were given the government's air policy, that was part of it. It was said there should be regional councils for the control of international flying; but there has been nothing said by the government about regional councils in connection with this world organization. If they are in favour of regional councils, in which regions will Canada participate? We are not only an American nation; we face the Atlantic, the Pacific and the Arctic, and it will not be easy to decide just what should be our relationships with any regional councils that may be set up.

In connection with this question of a world organization one approach has been made by this government which in my opinion is dead wrong. That is when the government says in effect that to strengthen the British empire would prevent any world organization. The Prime Minister used words to that effect in his speech in this house on January 31 of this year, when he said that making any further concentration in regard to the British empire would run counter to the establishment of effective world security. In his speech before the British houses of parliament he used words to the same effect. I have here a reprint of that speech; the Prime Minister said that in considering new methods of organization, and he was referring to new methods of organizing the commonwealth, we cannot be too careful—and I really think those words "we cannot be too careful" sum up the government's foreign policy——we cannot be too careful to see that, to our own peoples, the new methods will not appear as an attempt to limit their freedom of decision or, to peoples outside the commonwealth, as an attempt to establish a separate bloc.

As a result of that speech we had such newspaper articles as the one in the Vancouver Sun which I hold in my hand, the headline of which is, "King Calls for World Unity Plan, Not Empire Bloc." The Prime Minister seems afraid that the nations of the empire might work too closely together, as though that were possible. No one at that conference, and no one elsewhere in the empire, is attempting to form a bloc in the accepted meaning of that word, which is the forming of some organization as against everybody else. As a matter of fact we have in the empire the model for a world organization. Here we have nations actually working together, as we hope all nations will be able to work together in a league of nations. I think the better attitude was that taken by Prime Minister Curtin, who when he went back to Australia told his people:

Our readiness to associate in a world organization does not lessen the realism of our membership of the British commonwealth.

As Progressive Conservatives we believe in strengthening the empire. We believe that working more closely with the other empire nations will not in any way hamper our working with the other nations of the world to build a new world order, and will not prevent us from working closely with the United States of America. Other nations expect us to work together in the empire. Why should Canada, under her present leadership, always be so frightened lest we may upset the other nations? It all reminds me of the government's attitude before the war, when the Prime Minister was always threatening us about Japan; when he said if we did this or that we would have Japan making war on us and we would upset world peace. Actually all the time Japan was just going ahead making her plans to attack us when she saw fit to do so. Our position, as the Progressive Conservative party, is set out in this portion of our creed, which reads:

The British Partnership.

We affirm our loyalty to the king and our faith in the British partnership. We accept the responsibilities together with the benefits of this partnership. The guarantee of freedom, security and opportunity for Canadians will be found in the strengthening of the British commonwealth, its closer association with the United States of America and our other fighting allies and in the application of the principles of the Atlantic charter.

My fourth and final thought on foreign policy has to do with the Pacific. Practically nothing was said by the Prime Minister this morning about Canada's foreign policy in the Pacific. You would almost wonder whether there was a war on with Japan, when as a matter of fact Canada was the first nation to declare war. For example, what about the Pacific council which was set up some years ago, and which met in Washington? After a good deal of prodding and coaxing Canada asked for membership on that council. What has been done? Has it been meeting? What has been going on? We are entitled to know. Then in January of this year Australia and New Zealand entered into an agreement to collaborate on Pacific affairs, and in that agreement appears this paragraph:

The two governments declare their desire to have the adherence to the objectives set out in the last preceding clause of any other government having or controlling territories in the Pacific.

[Mr. Green.]

Canada is a nation on the Pacific. Is Canada to collaborate with Australia and New Zealand under the terms of this agreement? Then what about an air line to Australia and New Zealand? We in the Pacific coast province of Canada are vitally interested in having air connection with those dominions. Is Canada to be represented at the very important conference to be held in Australia in the near future dealing with the war in the Pacific? What part are we to play in the war against Japan? What preparations have been made? One hears rumours to the effect that Canada is very backward in making adequate preparations for her part in the war in the Pacific. These are questions which should have been dealt with by the Prime Minister this morning, and I hope they will be dealt with by him before this debate ends.

The right hon. gentleman mentioned the pan-American union and said he thought that before Canada became a member of that union the people should have a more complete understanding of what membership would mean. Last year I advocated that Canada should join the union, subject to the one proviso that thereby we were not to be taken as weakening our connection with the British commonwealth of nations.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member has now spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are in committee, so that I will interrupt the proceedings long enough to allow the hon. gentleman to make a fresh start.

Mr. GREEN: I thank the Prime Minister. I think perhaps he made a wise suggestion to-day when he said this was a matter on which the Canadian people should acquire further knowledge before a stand is taken. But he went on to say that this was the responsibility of other people, not the responsibility of the government. Surely if the government believes that we should eventually join the pan-American union the government itself should accept responsibility for telling the Canadian people just what that membership will entail.

This morning the right hon. gentleman also dealt with the problem of the Japanese in Canada. That subject hardly comes under the Department of External Affairs at the moment, but he made a detailed statement in regard to it. I was pleased to learn that at last the government is treating this as a Canadian problem. It has been a Canadian problem from the start, because it was the federal government that allowed the Japanese people to come to Canada years ago, but ever since then hon. members from British Columbia have found it impossible to persuade their fellow members of the house that this was really a Canadian problem. Now, however, it is recognized as a problem for the whole of the Canadian people. And the Prime Minister's statement this morning was hardly in accordance with the statement he made during the debate in connection with giving votes to Japanese. On July 17, as reported at page 4937 of Hansard, he made a statement which worried me a great deal. This is what he said:

> The persons of whom my hon. friend is speaking are still citizens of British Columbia. They have moved or been moved from British Columbia temporarily for reasons connected with the war. They have been moved through arrangements effected by the government as a war measure which was deemed necessary for reasons of security and in part for the protection of these very Japanese themselves. In most cases they are not persons who have voluntarily left British Columbia to reside in some other province. They are still citizens of British Columbia.

That was going very far, and judging from that statement I took it that the Prime Minister might be thinking of returning them all to British Columbia at the end of the war. Of course we would violently object if such action were taken. However, the Prime Minister to-day made himself clear on that point. During the course of the debate on the Japanese question, when the Prime Minister was in Great Britain, I placed certain questions before the ministry, questions which have never been answered until to-day—and indeed they are not all answered now. These were the questions:

> Is it the plan to remove all the Japanese from British Columbia, or are some to be left there, and, if so, how many?
> Are they to be kept out of the province of British Columbia for good? Can the minister give us assurance that they will not be sent back to British Columbia?
> Are any plans under way for returning any of these Japanese to Japan? If so, what group or groups?
> What does the government propose to do with those Japanese in other provinces if the government of any province requests their removal after the war?

One of the questions which was not dealt with this morning particularly was the one as to what the government proposes to do if other provinces request the removal of Japanese after the war. It is all very interesting to have people from other provinces say that this and that should have been done for the Japanese, and that British Columbia was wrong in asking this or that. But at the same time, this very city of Ottawa has refused to allow Japanese to come here. And the same was true recently with respect to Toronto. Different centres in eastern Canada have refused to have anything to do with the Japanese, which is not a very helpful attitude so far as settlement of the problem in the future is concerned.

The Prime Minister said this morning that the policy is to spread the Japanese across Canada. He mentioned that perhaps there should be a numerical limit placed upon those who could remain in British Columbia. I suggest to him that the only way in which the question of keeping the Japanese out of British Columbia can be handled is to maintain the protected zone into the post-war years, and to extend it to cover the whole province.

I do not believe a scheme can be worked out under which a certain limited number can go into the province. There will always be the question of checking that number. A sounder and much more effective way would be to make the whole province a protected zone. That could very well be done on the basis of national defence. Keep Japanese Canadians away from the Pacific ocean where they can come in contact with Japanese ships and Japanese merchants coming to our ports.

The Prime Minister said the government proposed to encourage the movement of Japanese to other parts of Canada. I suggest that that should be started at once. Under the present law Japanese in eastern Canada cannot acquire land. They cannot buy a business. They cannot set themselves up in business and yet many of them are merchants. Unless some provision is made to allow them to resettle on a permanent basis, the Prime Minister will be disappointed in his attempt to spread them across Canada.

The Japanese should be resettled on a family basis. They are a great people for family life; families of Japanese like to stick together. So far there has been very little attempt made to bring whole families away from British Columbia. As of June 30—only about five weeks ago—there were still two-thirds of the Japanese in British Columbia. Only about one-third had been moved out, and the exodus from our province had practically stopped. I hold in my hand a newspaper clipping dated July 5, setting out a statement by George E. Collins, general superintendent of the British Columbia security commission. Mr. Collins points out the following:

> Whether voluntary movement of Japanese to self-supporting jobs outside of British Columbia will continue depends on the future attitude of the Japanese themselves.
> Substantial exodus of Japanese during the past several months has now come to a virtual stop. Advice from the camps indicates this has been caused by lack of a definite statement of federal government policy on the Japanese question.

It may be that with the announcement made to-day by the Prime Minister it will be easier to persuade the Japanese to move away. But in any event I suggest that the resettlement policy be commenced at once.

I have no further facts to place before the committee to-day. In conclusion may I go back to what I consider the most important thought and suggestion, and that is the one respecting the objective of the Canadian people and the destiny of Canada. Is it to be to play only a secondary role among the small nations of the world, or is it to become a great world power, standing beside Great Britain in the British commonwealth of nations? I hope and I believe that the decision will be in favour of the latter.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Chairman, this afternoon for the first time this session we meet to discuss in any extended way the Department of External Affairs. I am not blaming the Prime Minister or the government, because I think all hon. members realize that this debate has come on at the end of the session because of pressure of business and also to meet the wishes of many hon. members. Therefore I am not making any criticism of the government because the debate has not been called until this stage in the session.

In spite of what the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has just said, we are meeting in the parliament of one of the lesser powers, one of the smaller nations. I look forward to the day when Canada may become a great nation; but in the light of the present world situation we are one of the smaller nations. In this war we have played a remarkable role, a role of which I think this nation may well be proud. Others of the lesser powers look to Canada at this time as the leading member of that group of powers. I think that in spite of what the hon. member has just said, because we are not at this time a nation of 30,000,000 or 50,000,000 people, we ought to assume the role we can play so well at this time, as at least one of the spokesmen for that group of nations which within the united nations can be described as the lesser powers.

I offer no apology for speaking of Canada, in her relationship to the world, as one of the lesser or smaller nations. That does not mean that I do not believe that one day Canada may assume the role of a great power. I hope when that day comes that instead of being a rival of other great powers we may be able to cooperate with great powers of the world for the general good, the preservation of world order and universal peace.

It is impossible in the short space of time at one's disposal this afternoon to do more than refer briefly to some of the international developments which at the moment are of great concern to our country. It is unfortunate that we cannot go into these matters a little more fully, because the developments we are witnessing now are of interest not only to Canadians of the present but to future generations. The decisions we make now, the manner in which we handle questions and problems that arise, are bound to have tremendous repercussions upon the future of this country and I believe of the world.

It is a matter of satisfaction that because of the fighting qualities of our soldiers, our sailors, our airmen and those of the united nations, we can confidently look forward in the not too distant future to the collapse, at least of the German nazi regime and the German military power. Then let us hope that there will follow the fall of Japan and the making of peace. The part that Canadian service men have played in this and the efforts of our civilians and farmers deserve the gratitude of all the people of our country.

I think we are all in agreement that the German war machine must be crushed and dismantled; so thoroughly must the job be done this time that never again can German militarism plunge the world into war. When we come to treat with Germans, as ultimately we must, we shall have to treat with somebody. My hope is that we may yet find in Germany reborn peoples' organizations like trade unions, cooperative societies, farmers' groups and the Christian church whose leaders have resisted, even in the underground, the threat not only to their own freedom but to the freedom of the world. I think it would indeed be folly to attempt to negotiate any sort of peace with the great landowners, the great industrialists or the junker class, with those people who have been responsible for the promotion of German militarism in the past, with their trusts, their cartels and so on. They were indeed the economic army which enabled Hitler to rise to power. We may find that there are many German people who if given free rein will assist in dealing effectively with these anti-social forces. The difficulty is that the war has now lasted for five years and such forces in Germany at the moment are probably quite small. We cannot place them all in the same category. Let us not forget however that many of their peoples' leaders were first to fall victims to nazi and fascist aggression. In fact the first organizations in Germany that were destroyed by nazism were trade unions and the cooperative societies. The leading thinkers of the Christian churches also found themselves behind the barbed wire of the internment camp.

Whatever foreign policy we pursue, either now or in the future, ought to be unyieldingly democratic. When we have to deal with the people in the enemy countries we should deal only with those forces which have struggled unswervingly against fascism and nazism. I think many people have been alarmed at what appeared to some of us to be the monumental errors that were made in North Africa, and more recently in Italy, the attempts that appeared to be made to pin Europe down in all directions to, if I may use a Latin phrase, the status quo ante. That is the kind of policy I think Canada should endeavour to end. It seems to me that the greatest mistake we can make is to underestimate the patent desire of all the enslaved peoples of Europe to bring about basic social and economic changes and to rebuild their countries on the basis of true economic and social democracy. The misery that these people have undergone under the nazi heel and their consciouness of the bankruptcy of their old leaderships and of the old order leave them determined to embark upon entirely new social concepts in the place of the dictatorships and the fascist movements which destroyed them.

Unless basic social and economic changes are brought about and democracy is allowed to flower in full in all fields, we are headed once again for world war No. 3. If we return to the old ways of mass unemployment—when I say "we" I mean the world generally, not this country alone—of trade strangled by all kinds of barriers, of industry regulated through selfish cartels, and of economic tensions which mankind cannot endure, we shall find ourselves faced with the threat of war and ultimately war itself.

As one reads the newspapers to-day he realizes the unquenchable spirit of the underground movement in Europe, especially in France. These people have fought consistently against the nazi and fascist aggressors. They have risked their lives every day and the lives of their families. They have done this not only in guerrilla warfare, but, as we have reason to know in this country, by giving shelter to some of our boys who have been brought down in their midst. There is an outspoken demand for a better world to follow this war. Any plans that we make should be for their social betterment as well as our own. At the moment we are giving this idea recognition to a greater extent than ever before, because we read constantly of supplies of arms and food that are being given to the underground movement in France. The successful prosecution of the war should mean for the people of the liberated areas the fullest participation in their own affairs at the earliest possible date. We in Canada should look for our natural allies among those people—yes and among those Germans in exile or who have worked underground, in order to combat in the future the threat of any revival of the nazi and fascist menace.

The hon. member for Vancouver South mentioned the absence of references to the orient and the Pacific area. We cannot neglect the orient and the Asiatic peoples. Indeed all dependent peoples cannot be sidestepped by Canada, as a responsible member of the united nations and as a responsible member of that association to which we are all proud to belong, the British commonwealth of nations. I do not think it was done deliberately this morning.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend will find that my general reference made it perfectly clear that Canada intends to do her full part in the war against Japan. I dealt with that particular aspect of affairs when we were discussing the war appropriation, and I did not think it necessary to repeat.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to deal with another phase altogether, the phase referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South. Exploitation, which we often refer to as imperialism, in all its forms will have to be rooted out, will have to go. The exploitation of one people, whether it be in China, India or anywhere else, by another group of people or by another nation creates friction which will inevitably lead to war. In the new world into which we are moving we have to see to it that we do not return to that kind of exploitation. In my opinion the basic cause of imperialism, whether it is to be found in Malaya, in Bolivia, in China or anywhere else, is the chronic inability of our present economic system to distribute the goods which science enables it to produce at the present time. It is part of the motion—the perpetual motion if you will—of our capitalist economy that we thrust fatally towards this kind of imperialism. I am of course using the word "imperialism" in the economic sense. We not only stretch out abroad but we also do it at home, and strife is the consequence.

I should like to remind the committee that in the immediate future we shall have to reckon with a large portion of the world's population which for a long time has been depressed and exploited. What are there?—450 million people in China, 370 million people in India and millions elsewhere. I suggest that for the post-war period we should be making such plans as will lead all these people to assume as rapidly as possible the full responsibility of nationhood. Where we have backward peoples—and let us recognize the fact that there are backward peoples who are not immediately capable of governing themselves—my opinion has been, and is, and I think Canada should work for this, that we should give them a helping hand; that no group of people should be returned to a position of being subject to any one power, but that there should be some form of international organization, or, as it is sometimes called, third-party intervention or supervision to see that the responsibile nations are doing the kind of job which democratic peoples would have them do. As a matter of fact the recent proposals of the British colonial office for regional international commissions to supervise the affairs of all dependent peoples are a move in the right direction. They seem to me to show a new spirit, and I think they are worthy of consideration. But it must not be like the old mandate system of the league of nations which gave Japan, for example, the opportunity of acquiring mandates over islands and territories which she was able to use as fortified bases and is to-day using very effectively to conduct a war against ourselves, the united nations and the world.

For better, as I believe, or for worse the world is headed towards more internationalism and more international supervision of many of the economic and social activities of mankind.

Before turning from the problems of the dependent peoples I may refer briefly to one of the nations which is associated with us in our own commonwealth, and that is India. We have, it seems to me from my reading and what I have been able to learn, failed to mobilize the masses of that great country for the prosecution of the war as we might otherwise have done. Perhaps that is not surprising, after the manner in which we have neglected Indian opinion in the past. I have said before, and I repeat this afternoon, that another attempt should be made to reopen negotiations under the supervision, not of any one power, but of the united nations, for the immediate settlement of this problem, so that we can mobilize public opinion there not only at the moment but for the good of the world in the years to come.

Turning from the problems of the dependent peoples to those of what I will call again the smaller nations, we must, I think, as one of these nations endeavour to avoid at all costs anything like a big power world. It ought to be obvious to all of us that the great powers of themselves cannot maintain peace, for by themselves they must necessarily engage in delicate manoeuvres to balance each other. In other words, to turn the world over to the big powers would simply mean to go in again for a balance of power policy, and along the road of balance of power—and history supports me in this—lies war. The four-power Moscow conference in 1943 foreshadowed, and I quote the declaration—> the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization based upon the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states—

> All peace-loving states.
> —and open to membership to all such states, for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Later on, at Teheran, much the same sort of view was expressed by the great powers—the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving nations; and that, I take it, is the desire of all democratic people. Even that organization however is foredoomed to failure unless it fulfils two basic conditions. First, it must rest upon the foundation of social and economic justice everywhere in the world. We cannot have peace by force and maintain it indefinitely. The only kind of peace that the world can have is peace which is based upon social and economic justice everywhere, and this entiails not only economic collaboration among nations in trade, exchange, investments, shipping and so on, but also democratic and economic planning within the nations for the full utilization of all our human and economic resources for the satisfaction of human need.

I think the second foundation upon which peace must rest is that any world organization must be democratically representative of all peoples great and small. Domination by the great powers, Mr. Speaker, inevitably awakens the distrust of the smaller powers—it is bound to do so ultimately—while big-power dominance inevitably leads the dominant powers to seek security in what? In their own might—and to jockey among themselves for selfish advantage. Now, true collective security on the other hand looks to collective action of all the peace-loving nations for the stamping out of aggression within the world community. It embodies the conception of nations standing in defence not just of their own immediate interests but of an orderly world in which all people are free to flourish and to live.

Canada is at war to-day, not because Great Britain is at war, not because of any specific aggression against Poland—no doubt these two factors influenced this parliament—but because, in spite of the grave doubts that many people had of the intention of the governments that were then in power in England and France, the governments of Chamberlain and Daladier, our people believed that the common people of Britain and France recognized that this could be made a war to end recurrent dangers of nazi and fascist aggression and assist in the destruction ultimately of militarism. Thus Canada's obligations to the ideal of a lasting peace are very definite. What are they? First, allegiance to the idea of a democratic and international organization in which some phases of national sovereignty, particularly those involving the use of force, are merged in a collective system of security. And then the abolition of national armaments and their pooling in an international police force, that of course by progressive steps. No one anticipates that there can be complete disarmament of the nations for a considerable period after this war, but that should be something at which we should aim; and, what I think is perhaps most important of all, the planned use of economic resources everywhere to raise standards of living throughout the world and for the elimination of insecurity, poverty and exploitation and the attainment of self-government by all peoples.

These, I think, are our general obligations. What are the specific problems of Canadian foreign policy? First of all I say this, that clearly in regard to the British commonwealth—and we all want to maintain the closest association with the peoples of the British commonwealth—public opinion in Canada, I am sure is overwhelmingly against the idea of forming a commonwealth power bloc against which undoubtedly counter power blocs would ultimately be pitted. But that does not mean, of course, the rejection of the idea of constructive cooperation within the commonwealth, nor does it mean that there are not fruitful avenues open to a British commonwealth nation in ways of cooperative endeavour. There are many such avenues. For instance, we might have some common investment policies coordinated within the commonwealth along the lines proposed not so long ago by the international labour organization, and provision might well be made for the mutual exchange of social security benefits for persons moving from one part of the commonwealth to another. That would make people realize that we were one in a manner in which perhaps nothing else could make us realize our unity.

It is along these lines, of which many more examples could be cited, of progressive co-operation in its best forms that commonwealth relationships will thrive in the future. If they do not thrive along these lines I do not think they will thrive at all; and to complete the circle of friendly understandings that exist between Canada and the British commonwealth and Canada and the United States, we might well conclude a treaty of cooperation and non-aggression with the U.S.S.R.—our northern neighbour—a significant fact we sometimes overlook. We always look to the south and talk about our great neighbour stretching all across the southern boundary of Canada, but these days we should remember that we have another great neighbour touching us very closely, and the aeroplane has made that neighbour very close indeed. That neighbour is Russia. I would suggest to the Prime Minister, if it is possible that a treaty be negotiated along the lines of the British twenty-year pact, a treaty which more than anything else probably has helped to allay material distrusts and paved the way which we hope will lead to a more durable international understanding and international organization.

Then of course we must not forget that we are within the western hemisphere. The Prime Minister this morning referred to the pan-American union. I agree with him that our people know very little about it. Indeed, our people have taken too little interest in foreign policy. Even members of this house have taken too little interest in foreign policy and external affairs. But in spite of what the Prime Minister said this morning I think we should, when the opportunity occurs, enter the pan-American union. It would not weaken our ties with the British commonwealth or anyone else. On the contrary it would strengthen our position in this hemisphere and bring us into closer relationship with peoples whose cultures resemble more closely the culture of one great element in our own population. It is true that the pan-American union is a union of republics and we are not at least formally a republic. Great Britain is often referred to as a crowned republic. I think that in her governmental methods she is a crowned republic.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend what he meant by the interjection "formally" —we are not formally a republic.

Mr. COLDWELL: Exactly what I am saying; we are not formally a republic. Great Britain herself is frequently referred to as a crowned republic, and she has what is sometimes said to be an hereditary president. She is more like a republic than she is a monarchy in the sense of monarchies which were absolute in their power. We have a king, the king of Canada, and we resemble more completely in our set-up in this country an independent republic than we resemble any of the older types of monarchy of which history has knowledge.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend will pardon my interruption. It was so foreign to my way of thinking that I was surprised at the statement he made.

Mr. COLDWELL: It may be foreign to the hon. gentleman's way of thinking, but historically I think it is a sound assumption that that is exactly what Great Britain is and exactly what this country is; and I say that while technically we are not a republic, that should be no barrier against our entering the pan-American union. I think that probably if Canada expressed a desire to enter the union she would receive an invitation to do so very soon.

May I say to the Prime Minister that we very heartily approve of the steps that have been taken this year to raise the status of our ministers—our legations into embassies and our ministers into ambassadors. That is a step in the right direction. Quite as important however as all the relationships to which I have referred is the problem of integrating Canada's own economic life into the developing world economy. Questions of trade arise, of the domination of cartels, investment, currency stabilization, labour legislation, immigration and all the rest of it, and it seems to me that all these problems are part of external relations and require definite integrated economic planning. Canada should be doing everything in her power to promote public organizations that will assist her in these fields. She should give every support, and I think she will, to such agencies as the I.L.O., UNRRA, and other war-created planning boards in foodstuffs, raw materials and investment control. She should finally bend every effort towards the creation and support of effective international agencies to supervise such functions as post-war aviation, shipping and communications. All such measures are directed to the end that habits of international cooperation, in place of national competition, may gradually develop, and that wider loyalties than we have to-day toward the international community may be built in the minds of men. May I say that when I speak of that wider loyalty it does not mean that there is any diminution of one's loyalty to one's own country, or any lessening in the patriotism that one has to one's own land. Indeed in my opinion the widening of patriotism into fields beyond our own borders makes one even more patriotic to what the people in the south sometimes call "all God's children." Therefore I say that such policies are directed, too, toward the kind of settlements that are envisaged in the Atlantic charter, a world—and these are the words of the charter—in which there will be "the fullest cooperation between nations in the economic field with the object of securing for all, improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security." The following article of the charter forecasts conditions "which will afford assurance that all men in all the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want."

Of course there are reactionary minds here and there in the world—they so express themselves in newspapers and magazines—that are talking in terms of a retreat from the Atlantic charter. For our part we ought to continue to strive for the goals the Atlantic charter holds before us, believing, as I do at least, that they can be achieved—it is not impossible—through economic planning among nations as the counterpart of economic planning within nations.

We have had a discussion this session on air transport, civil and military, which is of urgent concern to Canada; for this country lies across the cross-roads of the world, the airways between the new world and the old, between Europe and Asia. In addition, as we have seen from the statements that have been made from time to time by the Minister of Munitions and Supply and lately by the Prime Minister in the house, Canada has a huge capital investment in air facilities of all kinds, and, what is more important, a precious investment in many thousands of skilled young men. I am going to express an opinion which is shared to the full by one of the great parties in Great Britain, the Labour party—for I have the official outline of their policy here—that an international air force should be created, supreme in the air, financed and controlled by a body under a new international organization representative of world authority. It should operate from international bases under the control of that authority. For if we are in earnest about stamping out aggression, some such measure is essential. The aeroplane to-day is a blessing or a menace, as we make it. It can virtually destroy civilization. By the same token we need an international authority to control civil aviation, because it is so easy for civil aeroplanes to be turned very rapidly into military transport planes or bombers.

Canada's interest in maintaining world peace is a compelling one. We are bounded on the southern and northern boundaries by two powers whose resources predestine them to major roles in the post-war world. The friendliest of relations between those two powers ought to be the urgent concern of Canada's foreign policy. The geographical position of Canada has conferred upon Canadians in this twentieth century the advantages of occupying a pivotal position in the unfolding of the future and in world affairs; but we must recognize that it has conferred upon us also the gravest of responsibilities. Therefore, I say, Mr. Chairman, that we should spare no efforts to promote an expanding world economy grounded on social justice and dedicated to lasting peace.

Now may I come to the domestic problem that was raised, the problem of the citizens of the Japanese race who are in our midst. I do not know why this problem is always called "the Japanese problem". We do not speak of the second, third or fourth generations of Germans as creating a German problem, but we speak of the Japanese problem. I am in the fullest accord with the Prime Minister when he says that any person of Japanese origin who has been disloyal to this country should be denied the right to live here when the war is over. They should be interned now and deported to their country when this war is over like any other alien of similar attributes. But in my opinion it is copying the policies of Hitler to discriminate against any people because of their race, colour or creed. I have attended enough international conferences where able men from the orient have been present to have learned that the discriminatory treatment of Canadians by birth of Japanese origin has placed in the hands of the Japanese war lords a weapon of propaganda which may cause us to lose many thousands of lives. I know too that the treatment of East Indians, British subjects, in this country, who are denied the rights of British citizenship because they are coloured, has been one of the most potent weapons used by the congress party in India against the British authorities. I know too that the discrimination against our Chinese citizens is felt keenly by those of the same race who are in other parts of the world as well as in our own.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Factor): The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I conclude with this sentence?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are in committee; any interruption in committee gives an hon. member the right to start again.

Mr. COLDWELL: I never like to overstep my time. May I conclude by saying then that in dealing with problems of this kind, prejudice which seems to have only some local effect may have world-wide implications. I am proud of my association with the British commonwealth in this respect as well as in others, for only in the past few weeks we have seen how the courts of law in Great Britain have stood firm against any discrimination against people of colour. I say let us punish the guilty; let us punish them to the full, but let us not persecute any man merely because his colour is not that of the majority of the people in this country.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has given expression to what every hon. member of this house feels to be a condition precedent to bringing about satisfactory relations between the nations of the world; that is, that unless it is possible to arrive at a measure of social and economic justice, as a result of collaboration between the nations of the world, any projected world organization is likely to experience the frustration which attended attempts to build and guarantee peace during the last two decades. At the end of the last war our country took the position that economic and social matters were not properly within the terms of reference of the conference which was then convened to design the structure which it was hoped would preserve the peace of the world during the years following. The view was held that while political matters were properly within the terms of reference, matters involving the economic phases of the problem were not to be considered in the same light. I think we are all agreed that the experience of the last twenty-five years has shown that unemployment in the devastated and dependent territories of the world, as well as in the more fortunate countries, is a problem of world interest which must be solved first if the political problem is to be dealt with satisfactorily.

This government, headed by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenize King), has not waited till the end of the war to lay before the nations of the world its views with respect to recurring phases of international organization. Canada's representation at the food conference held in Virginia was notable. Harold Laski, writing recently on the projection of a world organization, referred specifically to the contribution made by Canada at the conference in Virginia, and later at the Atlantic City conference in connection with UNRRA. So that long before the end of hostilities we have appreciated our obligations to the other nations of the world. I could mention, and I do want to mention, apart altogether from my own contribution, the work of Canada at the very important twenty-sixth meeting of the International Labour Organization, recently held in Philadelphia. Perhaps here I may be permitted to pay tribute to the Canadian delegates to that conference, those who were advisers, those who represented the workers and the employers, and those who represented both provincial and federal governments. I believe Canada did make a contribution at that conference and, as I want to show later, something developed there to illustrate the fallacy of the kind of argument advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver South. More recently we had Canada's contribution at the international monetary conference, which brought great distinction to this country. Since that time I have met in this city a number of delegates to that conference from other countries, who have spoken in the highest terms of the work of the Canadian delegates. If one did not know some of the personalities involved these tributes might be considered almost extravagant. One distinguished gentleman of the United Kingdom delegation said in my presence, speaking of two of our people at that conference, that no delegates from any other country stood higher in the esteem of the conference generally or in the measure of the contribution they made. These are practical contributions.

At this point we are discussing the theoretical basis of the future world order, of the future political organization of the world; but during the past two and a half years representatives of our government, civil servants and others who have been coopted to serve along with these two groups have been applying Canadian foreign policy in a practical and definite manner. It is regrettable that we, along with the other constituents of the commonwealth and the empire, should sometimes have it suggested that because a certain viewpoint is taken it can only mean disloyalty to the crown and to the institutions fashioned and given to the civilized world by British genius. The suggestion is that because you may have a certain conception of the development of the commonwealth, thereby you are trying to contribute to its liquidation and break-up.

Mr. GREEN: I hope the hon. member is not referring to me, for I made no such suggestion.

Mr. MARTIN: I just made the general observation; let it rest wherever it happens to fit.

Mr. GREEN: In all fairness the hon. gentleman should withdraw that remark, because I did not suggest anything of the kind. I did not suggest that anyone was disloyal.

Mr. MARTIN: Perhaps I misunderstood the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GREEN: You certainly did.

Mr. MARTIN: I accept at once my hon. friend's observation, but I must say that some of his words did lend themselves to the interpretation I placed upon them. I am glad now to have his correction.

Mr. GREEN: I said that there was no stress laid on sentiment and loyalty.

Mr. MARTIN: I hope the Prime Minister will not consider that I do not fully appreciate the value of the contribution he made recently when speaking to both houses of parliament in London, but I believe the unique contribution he made then came about not so much because he said anything that was really new but because of the way in which he said it, the circumstances under which it was said, and the time at which he made his statement. After all, his statement was a continuation of the foreign policy that has been in existence throughout the development of this country. It was a development of the foreign policy of Laurier, and particularly of the foreign policy of Sir Robert Borden. One has only to read the Marfleet lectures given by Sir Robert Borden at the conclusion of the last war to see that the course followed by the present Prime Minister in London was in line with the foreign policy of this country under successive governments and successive prime ministers with various political affiliations. There is no attempt to bring about a diminution in the strength of the empire or of the commonwealth. At this stage I think it is well to make a distinction, as Mr. Churchill himself makes it, between the empire and the commonwealth. He defines the empire as being the United Kingdom and the colonial empire, and the British commonwealth as being the United Kingdom and the self-governing dominions. No attempt is made in any way to destroy the strength of those two combinations or of either of them if they are interchangeable, as the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has suggested. Rather the idea is to strengthen them, to bring the British commonwealth in line to work with the nations of the world, instead of standing aside as a strong power bloc pitted against the whole world.

This policy is not based upon a failure to appreciate what the British commonwealth may mean to the world. Anyone who suggests the breaking up of that commonwealth is speaking in unrealistic language. No one is suggesting that; rather the suggestion is that we should maintain it. The way to maintain it is through a policy of inclusion rather than one of exclusion, and that was the policy enunciated by the Prime Minister in London. And that that is a sound view seems to me, in the light of the appraisal made of that speech, to be generally accepted. I have gone carefully over the periodicals, and have had press clippings from newspapers reviewed, and the unanimous view—well, I should not say the unanimous view—but the extent of the view throughout the whole commonwealth in support of the Prime Minister's statement at Westminster recently is so overwhelming that one wonders whether it is necessary at all to spend much time on the point.

It is generally admitted that the only hope for the world, particularly having in mind Moscow and Teheran, is by the pursuit of that kind of policy. It is not an attempt to refuse to speak with one voice, but rather to be able effectively to demonstrate that if it is possible to speak with one voice, that one voice has arisen as the result of consideration in each individual country within the commonwealth. In that way, if you can say to the nations of the world that these problems have been thought out at Ottawa, at Canberra and at Cape Town, just as well as at London, and you have coincidentally the same kind of view, then that kind of one-voice has been and is a voice of strength, and a voice with persuading influence in the councils of the world.

We had an example of that recently at the International Labour Organization. Canada took a certain view with regard to the projected future of the International Labour Organization. Great Britain had not yet expressed her view, nor had Australia, nor had New Zealand. Canada's view was much criticized in many quarters, although, later, without any consultation, except by way of informal discussion, Great Britain took the same stand, Australia took the same stand and New Zealand took the same stand.

I suggest that if at one time we had said, "Here is the view of all of us at once", it would not have had the same effect that it did have, coming as it did as the result of individual deliberation on the part of the various self-governing dominions. It had more effect than it would have had if it had been given as a common expression of opinion, or the expression of view of the whole bloc. If you can impress other nations of the world—and that is what we must do—that we are simply trying to bring about a healthy contribution among the nations of the world, looking at these matters from our own particular point of view, and always bearing in mind that our own point of view in the big things is not necessarily different from the point of view of the United Kingdom government, we are more apt to have the kind of influence we desire than we would have under the policy suggested, as I gathered, in the observations of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green).

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member did not follow my suggestions very closely, then.

Mr. MARTIN: I read very carefully the speech delivered by the hon. member last year, and I must say that I did not see much difference between that speech and the one delivered this afternoon.

Surely our strength is this: surely the strength of the British commonwealth of nations is that there has been allowed to grow in the various self-governing dominions a measure of autonomy which has affected the personalities and mature developments of those dominions, as a result of the extension of the principle of autonomy. In freedom we have grown—not grown apart, but we have grown to march still within the same grouping, that grouping which is called either the British empire or the British commonwealth of nations.

For instance, when this parliament declared war in 1939, as a result of its own free decision, that was a more effective answer to our enemy than if we had been called into it automatically through the exclusive act of the United Kingdom government. That demonstrated that the liquidation of this commonwealth is not at hand, but that it is stronger, as a result of the extension of the principle of freedom, which freedom has tended to develop each of the units known as self-governing dominions.

I think surely the time has come when we should be able to demonstrate to the world that, apart from a few extremists here and there, in this country there is no desire to break away from that grouping, when the whole trend in the world is toward grouping—toward larger groupings, as well as toward maintaining the same commonwealth grouping. Surely nothing is to be gained from the suggestion that the Prime Minister of this country, or that any individual serving in the government of this country, is motivated by instincts less sincere than those of persons who take the opposite view. In the view taken by the Prime Minister it should not be considered that he was expressing simply his own view. He spoke, I think, for Canada, and for the great majority of Canadians. But he also spoke the language which was uttered by another distinguished prime minister of a self-governing dominion. Mr. Fraser cannot be said to be less interested—always having in mind the geographic position of New Zealand—in the continuity of the solidarity of the British commonwealth of nations than is the hon. member who took a view which, I suggest, is opposite to the one I am trying to set forth.

So that I think we ought to realize that in the disturbed conditions of our world, we will be called upon to deal with matters affecting the future of civilization. We should not allow some of our differences on commonwealth direction to cause us to lose our perspective. These differences have been shown in the past to be less real than at first glance would seem to be the case.

To suggest that the policy of the present Prime Minister or the government is an isolationist policy, as was suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South, is, I find, very difficult to reconcile with the criticism the hon. member makes it the first instance, and the action he proposes in the second. If the Prime Minister had followed the line which the hon. member for Vancouver South has suggested the result would have been out of line with the present trend among the united nations.

Of course, no one can seriously contend that at this time in the history of the world any government can afford to have an isolationist policy—and least of all any government in Canada. We cannot afford that in Canada, dependent as we are, almost to the extent of forty per cent of our national income, upon trading with other nations in the world. This country least of all can afford to be isolationist, and this government certainly has not given any indication that it has any desire to be isolationist.

I think it will be seen, and the records will show that the first statement made by any prime minister within the British commonwealth with regard to the desirability of setting up a future world organization based upon the recognition of the interdependence of states was the statement made by the present Prime Minister of Canada. It was a statement fully in harmony with the action taken at Moscow, at Teheran and recently in London. No one can suggest seriously in this chamber—and I am sure that upon reflection the hon. member for Vancouver South would agree that he was not really serious in his suggestion—that this government is isolationist.

Mr. GREEN: I meant exactly what I said.

Mr. MARTIN: No one in this country can suggest that we could be isolationist in a world in which, as Mr. Willkie has said, no point is more than sixty hours distant from the farthest point. This is a world in which, because of the developments of science, we have been brought together to such an extent that unemployment has ceased to be a national problem and has forced us to be as much concerned with the fortunes of the dependent areas of the world as we must be with our own. I think one can dismiss summarily the suggestion that we are committed to a policy of isolation. On the contrary I think we recognize the realism of the moment. We recognize that on the shoulders of certain great powers rests, because of their power, the opportunity of shaping things to come. We say, as the Prime Minister said this morning, and as he has said on other occasions, that the peace of the world cannot be maintained simply by a supremacy of power. On the other hand, the peace of the world cannot be maintained by overlooking the realities of the situation. These realities were dealt with, for instance, by Walter Lippmann, in the book to which the hon. member for Vancouver South referred last year and likewise in Mr. Lippmann's book published a few weeks ago. We must take into account the realities if we are going to avoid mischief and the kind of mistakes made at the end of the last war. Our ideal must be a world organization.

The peace of the world can be maintained through the agency of conference and law on the same analogies and principles by which the peace of the community is maintained. But in the building up of this peace mechanism we must not overlook the strength and the bargaining position of the great powers. To do so would be to step into a situation which would defeat the very purpose we all have in mind in maintaining world peace through organization on a world basis.

Canada will have a great role to play. Canada did play a role during the last two decades by being one of the leaders among the small powers, by interpreting to the great powers, either in the council of the league when it was in existence or by other approaches, the wishes as well as the aspirations of the smaller powers. That we shall do in our ascent from the status of a small nation to what must be the ambition of every Canadian, that of a great power, as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South. In building this world organization we should note the experience of the older world political organizations. We have the experience of the League of Nations. While it is fashionable to criticize the league and say that it failed, that it did not avoid war, the fact is, as Prime Minister Churchill has said, it was not the league that failed, it was so many of its members who failed its ideals. However, that does not mean to say that the covenant of the league was perfect, that the structure of the league was satisfactory. There were weaknesses.

This government in line with the declarations of the governments of the United Kingdom, of the U.S.S.R., of the United States, has gone on record in favour of a world political organization. There is to be a world assembly which will fulfil the legislative function of government. There is to be a council which will fulfil the executive arm of government. With regard to the assembly I trust that the Canadian government in making proposals, either vicariously or directly, in respect of the discussions to be pursued in Washington in the near future or later, will not feel bound to the letter of the law as we were in connection with the covenant.

Perhaps such things as the rule of unanimity, perhaps such things as the rule of the two-thirds vote on certain occasions, both in the council and in the assembly, will be found not to be necessary. Perhaps we shall not find it necessary to have a written constitution, and, if we do have one, I trust it will be more elastic and less rigid than the covenant. There you have the conflict between the civil law lawyer and the common law lawyer. Whatever we do in framing the theoretical base of the organization, let us do it in such a manner as not to find ourselves faced with constitutional obstacles from which there are no remedies at the time.

With regard to the council one must take into account the actual situation. The great powers must find their places, but it is hoped that in the extension of the principle of functionalism Canada will be able to play her part along with the smaller nations. This principle of functionalism is not as anaemic as the hon. member for Vancouver South has suggested. The principle which was enunciated by this government has been carried forward in other international conferences during the last two and a half years. It was recognized at the food conference at Virginia, it was recognized at UNRRA, it was recognized at the I.L.O. and it was recognized recently at the international monetary conference as the correct approach to international matters in our day.

Then there is the third phase of the world organization, the judiciary. The permanent court of international justice still continues to be a reality, and it is inconceivable that the principle of the judiciary in terms of a future world organization should not have its proper place. Undoubtedly there will have to be some modifications in the present constitution of the court, but the principles underlying it are principles which need as ready acceptance as the other components of the world organization.

In recapitulation, may I say that I think the Prime Minister expressed the view of every member of this committee when he said this morning that the first job is to win the battle, the winning of a war which was not of our making or of our desire. After that, we must make sure, in so far as man can make sure, that we set up those agencies by which it may be possible to maintain the peace of the world or to minimize the occasion of war. I suggest that these ideals should ever be foremost. But alongside of these ideals should be the ready acknowledgment of the realities of the moment and of the inherent intricacies which attend foreign affairs generally.

We cannot retreat now. We might be said by some to be building up a supranational government, a super-state, but the latter is not the intention. There is not any desire or any intention of interfering with the normal course of national development but rather it is to see that extravagances in national aspiration are curbed and disciplined in the common interest which in this time and age becomes the interest of men and women all over the world.

I think this government has made an excellent start in this new phase of its foreign policy. It is in line with the aspirations of our people and with those of thinking men and women throughout the world. It now becomes its task to make sure that its policy is detailed and directed in the light of the developments which will soon come upon us. Much work has been done in this country by private agencies and by government officials who have been studying these matters for months and several years. The time is now running when we shall have to place these proposals of ours alongside the proposals of other nations. We must make sure that we develop toward a healthy phase of internationalism without which there can be no peace for any of us.

In conclusion, may I say that the recent conference of workers, employers and governments at the international labour meeting in Philadelphia in May and April of this year laid down on the part of forty-two countries—as good a cross-section of united nations and associated powers opinion as one could find—the indication of a desire in each country that the respective governments should be enabled by their own action to arrive at satisfactory social security measures, that they should set into being, following collaboration among themselves, those forces as a result of which the trade of the world might be restored to its former momentum with proper regulation and encouragement, thereby providing work for their people.

That is a great challenge. In the light of the conditions of the world as we see it, it will be a difficult challenge to meet. That the challenge must be met goes without saying, but it will not be met unless we fully appreciate the dangers involved and the realities—the terrible realities—of the situation. It can be met. We can have social security here at home. We can have a high level of employment such as the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) and we on this side envisage. We can have economic comfort and security for our people. Let us not make the mistake of assuming that these things can be done by our own effort alone. Unless there is international collaboration on the highest level these things will not be. For that reason we in this house owe a duty to those we represent of seeing to it that our foreign policy is made along lines which will encourage not a policy of exclusion but a policy of inclusion, whereby we shall not drift apart, but whereby all nations, the British commonwealth itself, its self-governing dominions, and the other units of its empire will march in unison with all the nations of the world, making sure thereby, and only thereby, the world peace which all of us desire.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): There has never been a programme before this house which has evoked wider differences of opinion than that which affects this great question of external affairs. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who has had a long and colourful career in relation to this subject, may remember that we who sit on this side of the house have always pursued a consistent policy in foreign affairs. This is an appropriate and historic day upon which to discuss the question. On the 4th of August, thirty years ago, the first great war, with all the destruction it caused, broke out. May I point out that the period between the two wars, when we threw away our defences and friends, was also most destructive, and nearly destroyed civilization.

I should like to see Canada give some recognition to the achievements of the great generals who in this war have done so much to save civilization. If we followed the example of the United States, which has on two or three occasions elected as president one of its distinguished soldiers, we might well appoint General Montgomery as Governor General of Canada.

In examining the history of Canadian policy in foreign affairs it is important to make sure that we understand what the term means. Since the last war "external affairs" has been invested with a number of new meanings and has included many new activities in the way of appointment of ambassadors to many countries. So far as our party is concerned, one hundred years ago, in 1844, the founder of our party, Sir John A. Macdonald, laid down the principle of Canada's connection with the mother country as our policy, and we intend to continue to support the British connection and all it means and has meant down the ages for freedom and civilization. That policy remains in force, I believe, to-day.

Foreign affairs has been referred to by the writer of a text-book on the subject as largely a matter of what one might call a chartered accountant's policy, by which you strike a balance sheet of assets and liabilities, and decide as a country what commitments you have to meet and what you will be able to do with them in the event of war. That is a very good definition. As I see it, the foreign policy of this country should be based on two principles.

The first is, to give the people all the information you can. On March 21, 1939, a few months after Munich, I took the position in this house that as far as possible the people should be told everything about the real facts of the coming war situation. That has been a good policy in the past. When a grave situation lies before us in external and foreign affairs, commitments are made, as Britain did two years before the war, to Poland, Greece, Czechoslovakia, and other countries, and this bound the dominions, because when Britain is at war Canada is also at war. I believe that the people should be told the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and that any foreign affairs policy should also be based on the preservation of human liberty the world over.

After all, Britain is not fighting this war for any selfish motive. While the government of our great ally and supporter to the south is not responsible for statements made in the United States senate and house of representatives, one remembers that statements have been made there during the debates on lease-lend that this was not their war, that it was Britain's war. Neither Britain nor the United States went to war for personal reasons. Britain went to war in honouring her pledge to Poland. The United States, our great ally, and Russia went to war because the one was attacked at Pearl Harbor and the other was invaded. Britain seeks no gain from this war in territory and no special privileges; nothing but honour and justice and the preservation of liberty and freedom for the whole civilized world.

I believe that two or three years ago I suggested to the Prime Minister that we should give the other branch of parliament, meeting in another place, some more work to do. It would be well, I think, to follow the practice in Washington and London and have that other branch go into this matter of foreign and external affairs. After all, they have over there some former premiers and members of parliament of both parties; they include men of wide experience; and we might strengthen our position somewhat and stimulate better discussion if such an arrangement were adopted. The Prime Minister gave two or three times the very reasonable reply that he would take the matter up with the leader of the senate.

Much was hoped from the great conference of premiers held last May in London. At that time a vast armada had been assembled in Great Britain. Thanks to our control of some bases in Northern Ireland the battle of the Atlantic against the U-boat had been won. Nobody knows what the world owes to those brave men of the dominions who on land, on sea and in the air saved civilization at Dunkirk. At the time these magnificent preparations were all but completed there occurred the conference in London at which our Prime Minister represented Canada and addressed both houses of parliament, where he got a great reception, approved by the people of Canada. Everybody thought that something would be done to lay down a constitution and a programme for the empire and to provide some policy for after the war.

The visit of the prime ministers to London came at a time when the invasion of Normandy was about to be launched, with such grave consequences to Europe and to the world at large, and no doubt the prime ministers were told about it and all about foreign affairs. But when you talk about foreign affairs to-day you must remember that everything you plan depends upon one eventuality, namely, victory in this war. Without victory in this war everything that is being said on this whole subject here is beside the point. In my opinion, on this whole question of foreign affairs and a common foreign policy for the future, so far as coordination and cooperation are concerned, the results attained at the conference of prime ministers were not what the people of Canada had expected. It is true that our Prime Minister addressed the conference and so did Prime Minister Churchill. I have not at my command at this moment all the information with regard to the conference, but in my opinion the results achieved on that occasion did not meet with the approval of all the Canadian people—certainly not with the approval of a great many people in this country.

It is true that Mr. Churchill made the statement that it was not necessary to write down in black and white all the sentiments which were shared in common by the prime ministers who met in conference in London, since the provisions of the statute of Westminster had been written down in black and white. He pointed out that fraternal relations had emerged from the common association of the different parts of the empire as well as of the United States and Russia in the waging of this war. Speaking in the British House of Commons on April 21 last, Mr. Churchill said that he had never conceived that fraternal association with the United States would militate in any way against the unity of the British commonwealth and empire, and he referred to the twenty-year treaty that had been made with Russia. Let me quote what he said:

> I have never conceived that a fraternal association with the United States would militate in any way against the unity of the British commonwealth and empire, or breed ill-feeling with our great Russian ally, to whom, we are bound by the 20 years treaty. I do not think we need choose this or that. With wisdom, and patience, and vigour, and courage, we may get the best of both. We have often said of our own British empire: "In my Father's house there are many mansions."

The results of the conference of prime ministers were, in my opinion, disappointing to a great many of the citizens of this country, because, after all, when we are discussing foreign affairs we must remember that everything depends upon common action as between the mother country and the dominions. Without such unity there can be no empire policy. Indeed, a great many people are of the opinion that as a result of that conference reliance will no longer be placed on united action within the commonwealth for the defence of the British empire, but that instead we are postponing appropriate action now and what is vital for consideration by some new international order, some new league of nations.

I suggest that unless the dominions are united to the mother country now, in this time of war, we shall have little to do at the peace table, because the dominions and the mother country must hang together. If they do not they will hang separately. No one part of the commonwealth can act alone, for the simple reason that it does not possess the armaments necessary to support its position. That is what we have to consider in connection with any fundamental principle of foreign policy.

Look at the commitments which the mother country has made at different times and you must realize that if you are to make commitments you must have the force to support them. That will mean in the future, after the war, that not only Britain and the dominions but the United States and Russia will find it necessary to have a large navy, air force and army in keeping with the commitments which have been made.

I do not believe in any new league of nations, nor do I think that you need look for one. If that is your idea, then you may expect another war twenty-five or thirty years hence. The old league was a sham and failed absolutely. At the conference, I suggest, Canada should have supported the stand taken by Premier Curtin and Premier Fraser, with certain limitations, of course, because I believe there is something in what the Prime Minister said about fraternal relations. But it would have been better, in my opinion, if we had had some form of empire secretariat for collaboration. We are spending $5 million on the League of Nations, with all the offices they have. If we had had a combined secretariat, taking in the mother country and all the dominions, it would have served a very useful purpose, particularly in the post-war period, because it would ensure close collaboration, especially with civil aviation what it is. Civil aviation to-day is one of the great agencies for binding different countries together. I believe that some such plan was given to the conference but they were not unanimous on it.

As regards what has been said by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and others, I believe that on this question Mr. Curtin and Mr. Fraser were absolutely right. In my opinion we would be on the wrong track altogether if we adopted the suggestion that has been made for participation in a pan-American plan, which is a new sort of league. The hon. member for Essex East is running true to form because he has always been a believer in ideas of that sort based on leagues, and separatism and isolation. Well, he is entitled to his opinion, but I suggest that the British empire will be on the wrong track again, as in 1919, if it follows that line. Internationalism should start within the family of British nations. If we are to have internationalism let us start within the British empire. How is it that more of the dominions are not willing to make an agreement of that sort? We are not real internationalists if we are not ready to join with other branches of the empire, the other dominions, as one family in a united empire policy of cooperation and collaboration with the mother country. Why should we not have a league of nations of our own? As has been well said to-day, the only league of nations that has ever achieved any success is the British empire. The United States knows that; the world knows it; and out of this war there should emerge a great league of nations, namely, the British empire. If we have something of this sort there is hope for us in international affairs, but if each separate dominion undertakes to deal with foreign countries along its own lines we shall not succeed. That is a policy to which I am absolutely opposed.

As Lord Milner said in 1919, speaking at Oxford, it was a most strange anomaly to hear that the self-governing parts of the British empire should be joining a league, binding themselves by a formal tie to a number of foreign nations, when they had theretofore been unwilling to enter into similar obligations with one another. There is a great deal in that. At the conference of prime ministers there are many matters which should have been dealt with and which I should like to have seen discussed, such as defence, security, reconstruction, trade and commerce, migration within the empire, civil aviation, empire preference tariffs, and so on.

The Prime Minister to-day gave the committee an elaborate address with a great deal of valuable information, but I suggest that in our foreign policy the main object should be to work with the people of the United States and Russia. Only by so doing can the peace of the world be maintained.

At the same time the coming British empire and Great Britain cannot throw overboard the several countries in Europe that have been overrun by the axis, and look to the mother country to defend them. Britain cannot throw these countries over. They have been loyal to us in two wars. They are looking to Britain for a post-war lead. I believe we should continue to merit the confidence of these people which Britain and the dominions enjoy. We can make a great contribution as an empire by this unity which Mr. Curtin and Mr. Fraser propose. In that way we shall have a larger voice in the world to come. We have had long traditions of friendship with many countries in Europe, Norway, Belgium, Denmark, Sweden, France and Greece and those other countries. We cannot ignore them in the world to come. In particular we should be on the most intimate terms with France, that glorious country, where so many of our own men of the last war sleep their last sleep till the resurrection morning. France is a great nation. It will always be a great nation as was said by the late King Edward VII of Great Britain. He said that Divine Providence had designed that France should be our near neighbour and always our friend and our ally by geography.

I do not believe that the great general who is the prime minister of South Africa, Jan Christian Smuts, did the empire any good when he gave an interview at the guild hall, in which he said that France will only be a second-class power after this war, because France will always be a great nation. It will rise again. Events that have taken place in Italy have proved that. We saw the military genius of the French soldiers in Italy, and General de Gaulle has given us a demonstration of the integrity of France in this war. I believe that the time is coming when General de Gaulle will be looked on as one of the greatest Frenchmen. I was glad to see the reception that General de Gaulle received here a while ago. He represents the real spirit of France. Look at the reception he got in Normandy. He and his officers deserve all the credit for the uprisings which have been taking place there.

When this war started and after France was invaded, not a single colony of the splendid colonial system of France failed to come to her assistance. The French have a wonderful colonial system. We have a little bit of it in this country. France went all over the world and developed a great many fine French colonies. When the war started not one French colony of the great French empire failed to respond to the call of the mother country, France. They had the utmost loyalty and devotion to her. I hope that General de Gaulle will get the renewed support of the government of Canada, because we have in the past been depending too much on Mr. Ristelhueber and Vichy and Petain. Washington has even now been acting in the same way. As Mr. Churchill said in this house, ninety-five per cent of the people of France supported General de Gaulle. We saw what he did in the St. Lawrence when he went in at the request of the inhabitants and seized the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon and protected Canada and her shores.

I am sorry to see that in Normandy and in France our ally, the United States, are doing something that I had never heard of before, issuing American currency for use in France to pay for their troops in Normandy. That is against international law and will not be a good thing for the allies. It will not conduce to the allies working together unitedly in this war because it will do harm to our French allies and should not be gone on with.

There has been altogether too much hush policy about the brutal murders on the part of the axis powers. We had the same in the last war. We all know the way in which they have been carrying on and murdering all these people. I believe, as the members of the British House of Commons and the press of Britain have said, that the gestapo police force and everyone else of these murderers should be rounded up and put to death immediately. Russia is acting. They will not wait for any trial by an international court such as has been proposed by some people. They punish them the minute they arrive and catch them. That is what should happen. I hope Canada will support such action.

There are many other problems to which reference might be made. So far as these treaties are concerned, we had them between the two wars and they were disastrous. We saw many democracies go under. We saw democracy crushed in Germany, Austria, Jugoslavia, Greece, Italy, Spain and Portugal. They all went out. None of them had democratic constitutions.

We may rejoice that in 1939 before the war started we had a visit from our gracious King and Queen. The great reception which was given to them showed the popularity of the monarchy in Canada. There is one thing to be said about the British monarchy, it has won a glorious record in this war in the way it has kept the different countries together. The loyalty of the dominions and of public men has been most commendable.

I believe that the dominions should continue to play a much larger share in foreign affairs than we have ever done in the past. If we had a united policy and approached the peace table with that policy we would play a much larger part in world affairs. We have no need to apologize for what this empire has done. Next to the Christian church to-day it has been God's greatest single gift to humanity. The British people and the British empire down through the ages have been the greatest force for justice and freedom for civilians that the world has ever seen. Had it not been for the mother country, for the British empire and the dominions, humanity would have been crushed out after Dunkirk. This empire will continue to flourish in the future as it has in the past if we are united along with the colonies and the dependencies. I do hope it will flourish. We gradually see the solution of our empire problems, because our empire is the only real league of nations. It has a great mission in the world to come as it has had in the past. We believe in that mission. It would be a great mistake to think that the empire is kept together only by statutes and laws and these things. It is held together by ties that are invisible and by self-interest. I believe we should support British preferences. Are we going to treat Germany, Italy and all those other countries that built up great armies against us; are we going to deal with them in the same way as we deal with Australia and New Zealand? Those dominions came to our support. I say, no. What we should have within our own family is a real empire policy of inter-imperial trade. I have always supported the principles of the Ottawa agreements and preferential trade within the empire. I believe that is one of the things that will bind and cement the empire together. I hope that we shall have some announcement before the session concludes.

We have had three or four wars, Mr. Chairman. Down to the South African war the mother country paid the cost of our participation. New Zealand, Australia and Canada sent troops to it. Every one of them went voluntarily. Many of them fell in the fight. Down to the end of 1900 Britain paid the cost. In 1914 one million men came from the dominions voluntarily on their own sovereignty and status of autonomy. They went over there and fought. Altogether 130,000 fell in the fight. They did it voluntarily. In this war the same thing happened. They rushed from the four corners of the earth, from cape and island and continent. Some of these men had to come 14,000 miles to reach the scene of combat; many of them had to go 2,000 miles by land, sea and air to reach the camp where they enlisted. It has been said that this was a miracle. They did it in two wars to save civilization and rewrite the whole history of the civilized world. I may say that the party on this side of the house has always been a strong supporter of close relations with the mother country. I believe also that the doctrine of laissez-faire, as practised by the Liberal party in the mother country and in this country, has been proved by two wars to be a mistake. In my opinion our hon. friends to the left have made a mistake also, because, as I see it, we shall have to depend upon something a great deal more substantial than leagues and pacifism and the throwing away of our army, navy and air force. As I have said, the basic principle in connection with foreign policy is that if you make a commitment you must have the force with which to support it if war comes. If you have not, you will fail.

I am absolutely opposed to Canada joining the pan-American union; I believe that if we go into that business we shall have another war in no time. We should not link ourselves with any other group of nations without first consulting the other dominions. As the senior self-governing dominion we have no right to make commitments to a number of other countries in South America, some of which were established by our enemies of to-day, over the heads of the other dominions. I rejoice at our cordial relations with the United States, but there is still a great deal to be done. We spend a million dollars in connection with a publicity bureau there, but I do not see that the result is worth a cent to the people of Canada. For centuries history has shown that no power can set itself up to dictate to the motherland, or can attempt to threaten the liberties of the civilized world. We know what happened in days gone by to Philip of Spain, Louis XIV, Napoleon, the kaiser; and we know what will happen to Hitler. Twice in one generation the mother country has saved the freedom of the world.

In connection with the pan-American union I should like to point out that while the United States has been a member of that organization for over fifty years, there has been a reservation in that membership. Washington has said that the United States is not bound to carry out by force what may be proposed by some of the small nations of this union; that she does not surrender any sovereignty, and makes no commitments through her membership whatsoever. That reminds me of this little vest-pocket edition of a league of nations at Lake Couchiching, Ontario, which is to meet next week, attended by all these celebrated isolationists, professors from all over America and others, who will do a lot of pacifist talking, telling us how to run the British empire and how to carry on our foreign affairs and fight Hitler. Dunkirk was the miracle that saved civilization. The young men flying their machines day in and day out rewrote the history of courage and of civilization, and to them we owe our very existence as a people.

Following the last war we decided that we could depend upon peace notes, Locarno, the Kellogg treaty and things like that; we threw away our defences, and by pursuing that policy lost two of our great allies. If that policy is to be followed by support of a new league after this war we shall have another war within twenty-five or thirty years. We need to maintain after this war an army, a navy and an air force to cooperate with Britain, Russia and United States in protecting the peace of the world. We must do something right away to guide the world in the days that are to come, and what we do must be based upon three great principles: the right foreign policy, the right empire policy and the right domestic policy. Those three matters are correlated and complementary one to the other and are interlocked. They are all of the utmost importance. We must return to the conditions of liberty and freedom that we enjoyed in 1939, for that is what the troops will expect to find when they come home. They do not want to return to a Canada in which there is no freedom, where habeas corpus and also the bill of rights have been suspended, where the provisions of magna charta have been also suspended. They do not want to come back to that sort of thing. It may take us a long time to recover our freedom and liberty of the days of 1939, but it must be done, and we must be free of all these controls and bureaucracy.

It was announced the other day that we had entered into an agreement with the United States under which we are to pay $120,000,000 for certain bases built under the direction of the defence board of the two countries. Well, a large part of that money spent was not needed and will be wasted in the northeastern and northwestern parts of Canada. Why did we have to go over the head of the mother country in regard to these bases? This price is far too much to pay for them. Let us decide on a policy of coordination and cooperation with the mother country in connection with all these war bases. Where would we be to-day if before the war we had adopted an international policy with all these other countries in regard to our bases at Gibraltar, Suez, the Cape, the far east, and the West Indies? Russia did not come into the war for two and a half years, and neither did the United States. What if we had allowed all these foreign countries to use these bases for years before the war; what would have happened? I do not mean to refer to our two great allies as foreign countries, because they are fraternal brothers, but it would have been a pretty state of affairs if that had been allowed to happen. Britain, without any objection on the part of Canada, has given away bases reaching from Newfoundland right down to Guiana, for a period of ninety-nine years. It is too bad that between the two wars Canada did not follow a more definite policy of trying to influence British public opinion with regard to these matters, but Canada never had a foreign policy, nor did the United States until Pearl Harbor. The foreign policy of that country was drawn up by George Washington and Andrew Jackson, it was not to have any foreign entanglements or commitments, nor to go to war unless their own country was invaded. Well, it was invaded at Pearl Harbor.

Prior to that, in 1939, what happened? The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) made a very fine speech to-day in regard to the Pacific. It was known that the only enemy the United States had in the Pacific was Japan. I do not intend to criticize our brave ally, because the same policy was followed by the dominion, but what did the United States do? In the summer of 1939 they abrogated their commercial treaty with Japan, by joint action of the house of representatives and senate, for it must be remembered that the United States speaks with two voices in regard to these matters. That action gave definite notice that Japan was coming into the war. Then, after the war started, they went to work and made another commitment, under which they treated Germany and the other members of the axis in exactly the same way that Britain and France were treated, although Britain had protected American shores for many years. The United States sold war goods and munitions to Germany and to anyone else on a cash and carry basis.

These bases, to which I have referred, should be held for all time by the mother country; and our brave allies, to whom I have referred, should be allowed to use these bases. We should allow no sovereignty over them but only uses. It was King Edward VII who said in a speech delivered in Paris in May, 1903:

> A Divine Providence has designed that France should be our near neighbour, and, I hope, always a dear friend. There are no two countries in the world whose mutual prosperity is more dependent on each other.

Lease-lend has been discussed at considerable length to-day, and it is my hope that lease-lend with the United States in this war will not turn out as the war debt situation developed after the last war between Britain and the United States. That war debt situation was the chief cause of ill-feeling between Great Britain and her dominions, and the United States. That ill-feeling was the result of a misconstruction of the war debt situation, because, after all is said and done, after the last war, like the United States, England was a creditor nation when the war ended. In less than twenty years after the war she had lost great sums through unpaid war debts, and she left German reparation payments out of the picture entirely. The United States by that time had manoeuvred herself into the position of receiving most of those payments.

Great Britain was not a defaulter; her debts were paid. My point is that these isolationist representations in respect of war debts have never been adequately answered or challenged. Britain does not even guard herself against those representations. But my prediction as to lease-lend settlement is that unless we are very careful, we shall have the same trouble after this war in bringing about a settlement. I believe that the British empire exists, in spite of geography.

As I said last session:

> While Canada, as Mr. Churchill said, has made a glorious contribution in this war in material things, food and munitions and supply, it is in its man-power overseas on land, sea and in the air, that the sons of Canada in battle have so gloriously rewritten the whole history of courage in this war as to win the admiration of the whole civilized world. We as a people have not had in this war real national selective service, nor any real equality of service nor of sacrifice. Our policy in relation to this was everything by fits and starts and nothing long. We were three years too late in starting a real selective service policy, and have now one that is not national, not selective, nor is there in it any equality of service or of sacrifice.
> Further, what Canada has done since before the close of the last century, she has done voluntarily, of her free will and under her own status, sovereignty and autonomy, namely gone to the aid of Britain in her hour of peril.
> In the South African war a few thousand went from Canada, but Britain paid the total cost of it.

I do hope that in days to come, instead of discussing foreign affairs for the first time on the 115th day of the session, we may have it at some earlier time, or that a committee of the other chamber might deal with it. I hope that we may have a real discussion. I realize, of course, the heavy work the Prime Minister and his brilliant young assistant from Vancouver have done since the war started.

I wish to say in conclusion that the world does not know yet nor does civilization realize the great service given by Northern Ireland when they permitted the use of their bases. This matter was referred to at the time of the last war. As Mr. Lloyd George said, we would have lost the last war if we had not had those bases. Had not our ships been able to use the southern channel, and so get to Queenstown, where would we have been in our campaign in Normandy only for the Ulster bases and the victory over the U-boats in the Atlantic? Where would we have been if we could not have used these ports? The Eire bases belong to the empire. We should have protested years ago about not having the use of them.

And after almost four years in this war the commander of the United States forces, General Eisenhower, and President Roosevelt have notified Eire that they want them to check the axis raids on Atlantic shipping. The axis aid in Eire gave them a light across the channel to destroy Coventry and Cardiff, as Eire aided Germany. I should like to see the day not far distant when we would close up our useless embassy in Dublin altogether. I fail to see why we need one there, particularly in this time of war. Australia and New Zealand have none and join the United States in a protest against the way Eire aided Germany.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Chairman, to save time—and sweat—I shall try to shorten my remarks. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this morning used an expression which caught my ear. I wrote it down. He said, "We should seek to lower the tempo of nationalism." More power to him, if he does it. But before he starts on that great enterprise, he would gain the gratitude of all of us if he would lower the temperature of this chamber.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. NEILL: It is disgraceful to see that 245 members have no more sense than to sit here in a temperature of 95 degrees, with our coats on—because our dignity, forsooth, does not allow us to take them off. We had a cooling system put in here some years ago. It never did work, and it has not worked since.

When I first came here members sitting on the back benches could not see to read, because of the arrangement of the lighting. It took me—I happened to be one of the victims—two years to have that fixed. And it was almost a whirlwind job to have it done in two years. It is not good for us and it is not good for the country that we should have to legislate, and conduct our debates in a temperature like this. But it will go on, I suppose, as long as the house sits.

With much of what the Prime Minister said in the earlier part of his speech this morning, I agree. Particularly do I agree with that portion of his speech in which he endorsed the statements made by the five prime ministers of the different nations, and also with his remarks on the pan-American situation. I will not go further into that, however, because I wish to discuss in greater detail the policy announced with regard to the Japanese, which is so important to us in British Columbia.

The other night when he announced his intention of having this matter discussed, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked for a delay which, with his usual courtesy, the Prime Minister granted. But I think they were wrong. What the leader of the opposition should have asked for was a day's delay after the Prime Minister had spoken. Then we would have been in a position to see in print exactly what his remarks were. To-day, however, having heard them verbally only once, we are not in a position to give his address the genuine or careful consideration to which it is entitled. Several days are always left between the speech from the throne and the debate, and on many occasions the matters contained in the speech from the throne are not as important as the policy the Prime Minister announced this morning.

Also, I should like to study it, and understand all its implications—because I just caught certain phrases which, perhaps years hence, might prove qualifications or modifications of what I thought the policy was. Some of the statement I think had qualifying clauses which might considerably change the meaning when it comes to be interpreted in days ahead.

However, as I gathered it, the Prime Minister laid down three basic lines of policy in regard to the Japanese situation. One was that it would be unwise to let all the Japanese return to British Columbia. If I am not strictly accurate in my understanding, the Prime Minister can correct me. I am stating only what I gathered. The second point was that all those of Japanese origin proved guilty of disloyalty should be deported, and the third one was that there should be no further immigration.

I shall comment on these three, what the Prime Minister called basic policies. As regards the first, my conviction is—and I believe this is the conviction of ninety per cent of the people of British Columbia—that every one of those of Japanese origin should be repatriated at the end of the war. The argument against doing that to them all does not seem to be any stronger than the argument for doing it only to those suspected of disloyalty, because, to amount to anything, it would have to cover those who are only suspected. If a man has been proved guilty of disloyalty or treason, of course he is in gaol and he does not need to be deported. Therefore, if the provision amounts to anything it will have to apply to those who are suspected of disloyalty. In one case it covers as much as the other. If you are going to deport 200 people, you might as well deport 2,000 or 22,000. If you are going to repatriate only those who are convicted of disloyalty you will have to get a conviction of treason against them. Then, if you did that, they would be in gaol and the need for their repatriation would not arise.

There would be objection to the suggestion that they be spread out among the provinces. I have in my hand a copy of an agreement made by the British Columbia security commission. This is just the same as the government because the government gave them power which they never should have been given. They were turned loose with every kind of power but that of sending people to the gallows. They were given the power to run this particular business. This particular agreement bears the signature of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), giving his approval to it. One section of the agreement, outlining what the commission will do, reads:

> The commission agrees to remove or to have removed from the province, upon the termination of the state of war now existing between Canada and Japan, the Japanese temporarily placed or maintained within the province pursuant to the terms of this agreement, as requested so to do by the province.

That is the agreement with Alberta, and I understand that there are similar agreements with other provinces. They may not be couched in exactly those terms, but they mean the same. The arrangement with Manitoba was not in the form of a signed agreement; it was arrived at by an exchange of letters, but they agreed to do exactly the same thing.

If you take these people away from Alberta, where are you going to send them? Are you going to break faith with the people who let them into Alberta on that understanding? Are you going to send them back to British Columbia where you have said already that they must not be allowed to creep in again. There is only one thing to do with them, deport them. You cannot coerce Quebec or Nova Scotia or any other province to take a certain number of these Japs. Those provinces would not like it and you would not expect them to do it. I understand from the grapevine that some of the provinces that took them in in good faith because they were in need of labour are beginning to realize that their philosophy and system of life, their ambitions and the goal toward which they are working, are not in harmony with those of the province. They are looking forward to the day when those Japanese will be taken away.

I suggest that this policy will be unworkable. They should all be repatriated. If you are going to do it in a partial way, then you can do it in a complete way. The Prime Minister has suggested setting up a commission to find out those who are disloyal. I presume this will mean that each man will be asked to take an oath of allegiance to the king. I predict that that will be taken by ninety-nine and a half per cent of them just as glibly and as unconcernedly as we would take an extra cup of tea if our host pressed us to have one. The occidental oath means nothing to the oriental. He has his own ideas about what is binding. I believe they tried a similar thing in the United States, and a surprising number of those who had been born in the United States refused to take a false oath. Some of them said that they were neutral and others said that they stood by their emperor whose country they had never seen. I should like to quote what Kipling said:

> The stranger within my gate,
> He may be true or kind
> But he does not talk my talk—
> I cannot feel his mind.
> I see the face and the eyes and the mouth,
> But not the soul behind.

Another verse reads:

> The stranger within my gate,
> He may be evil or good,
> But I cannot tell what powers control—
> What reasons sway his mood;
> Nor when the gods of his far-off land
> Shall repossess his blood.

That was said by an able man who knew what he was talking about. The Prime Minister and everyone who has studied this question knows that the oriental is not capable of being assimilated with the white race. That is the answer to those who say, "Why do you treat the Japs differently from the Germans or Italians?" They do not assimilate. They simply look forward to the day when all countries and races from Hawaii to Alaska will be governed by their emperor. I have seen that in translations of some of their propaganda. Intermarriage is the only way you can assimilate, and the records show how very few cases there have been of intermarriage, and how unsuccessful they have been. There is some difference between oriental and occidental blood which will not permit them to mix. At any rate they do not want to mix with us.

Once the Prime Minister has admitted, as he has to-day, the salient fact that British Columbia will have none of them after sixty years experience and after sixty years has proved that they cannot and do not want to marry with our race, then I submit that there is no other logical course open to him than to go the whole length—the opportunity will never happen again—and get rid of them. History records cases where such repatriation has been highly successful. When the Turks defeated the Greeks in 1921 all the Greeks in Asia Minor were sent into Greece, and Turks were moved into Asia Minor. Something like 400,000 people were moved, and we are talking of repatriating only 22,000. That repatriation of 400,000 worked very well. The families of some of those Greeks had lived in Asia Minor for a thousand years, but they were sent away.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NEILL: At six o'clock I was referring to the precedent of removing people in large bodies. I cited the incidents of the Turks and the Greeks, totalling something like four hundred thousand, who were exchanged over a wide area. For some of them the district had been their ancestral home for a thousand years; yet circumstances justified the policy of removal, and it worked. I suggest that it might also be worked out in the case of removing Japanese in Canada. If four hundred thousand people can be successfully transferred in another part of the world we do not need to make a fuss about removing twenty-five thousand, especially as most of them are not beyond the second generation or, in a very few instances, the third generation.

An attempt has been made to play up the fact that the Japanese have not been convicted of sabotage. No, they have not, to any extent; but if the Japanese army had landed in British Columbia, what would the story have been then? I notice that advocates of the Japanese in dealing with this subject always talk about them as "Japs". But they are not Japs; they are British subjects; that is the argument, at any rate. These advocates never talk about "British subjects" not getting a square deal; they always talk about "the Japs" as not getting a square deal, thus recognizing that they are not British subjects. It may have been noticed that when a deputation of them came here to ask for the vote, as they did before a parliamentary committee some years ago, they did not ask that it be extended also to Chinese and other orientals; they only wanted the privilege for themselves. As I say, they regard themselves as Japanese and are so described by their advocates. If they are British subjects, in that case they come under the ordinary law, or should do so at any rate.

The Japs who lived around Pearl Harbor had nothing but love for their white brothers until the war struck them. How are you going to prove that they are loyal? Ask them to get up and sing "God Save the King" and take an oath of loyalty? Of course they will do that. An oath means nothing to them. They would just as readily sing "God Save the King" as "Heil Hitler", and with just as much sincerity and intention of being loyal to one authority as the other.

I have mentioned this incident before, but I want to do it from a different angle. A man who held quite a good position as a doctor in Pearl Harbor had a summer home close to where I lived, and he employed a Japanese couple whom the family regarded as thoroughly reliable people. I am perfectly certain that if they had been asked six months before the war whether these Japs were loyal, these white people would have said, "Certainly. We have known them for twenty years. They could not be anything but loyal; they have been so faithful to us." But came the day of Pearl Harbor, and a United States detachment came along and took the Jap man out and shot him. There was ample proof that he had been a traitor all the time. He had obtained plans of Pearl Harbor, and also in his portmanteau they found charts of the ports and waterways in the district of British Columbia where they lived. The Jap woman expressed regret to the family; she said, "You have been just like a father and mother to us, but we had to do it because we serve the emperor." Yes; they had been loyal to United States institutions, but when they came within the orbit of a greater loyalty, that to their country of origin, why, then it was quite a different story.

It reminds me of a story, or rather of a tradition. In Scotland it was the habit of the kings to go around and listen to the grievances of their subjects. Any criminal had the right to claim a hearing from his king. The monarch visited what we would now call a penitentiary, and all the prisoners wanted to be interviewed. They all said that they had been treated horribly. They had been "railroaded" to prison; yet all of them were as innocent as a yoke of oxen, and if the king would only let them go it would be lovely. But one man remained silent. The king asked, "What is the trouble with you? What injustice do you complain of?" The man answered, "My lord, I have not had any injustice; I stole a horse and I am punished for it." The king said, "What! you stole a horse! You are a regular villain;" and he turned to the gaoler and said, "I will deal with the cases of these innocent people the next time I come around, which will be about five years from now, but I direct you to throw out this wretched criminal, who stole a horse and who admits he stole a horse. I will not have these innocent men polluted by a blackguard like that. Throw out the man who says he stole a horse".

So it is with the Japanese. Put them in court and ask them if they will be loyal; why, they will be loyal to anything you could mention—for the time being.

The Prime Minister says that we must in some respects follow the policies of the United States. I would accept that counsel with a great deal of caution. Their problems, though in some sense analogous, are not identical. For one thing, the proportion of Japanese in Canada is far greater than in the United States, although in numbers there are many thousands more in the United States. At any rate we are running our own affairs and we are not obliged to follow anybody else's policy.

I believe the Prime Minister's second basic policy, to report only those convicted of disloyalty, is untenable, because ever since they have seen that the white man is holding his own they have been careful to avoid sabotage. It will not do to issue certificates to people as being loyal because they will sing "God Save the King." Oh, but, we are told, this is absurd; you will have to get some evidence; you cannot indict a whole nation. You cannot ask a man to prove his loyalty. A Jap can get some person who has dealt with him for twenty years, to say, "I know Homatka; he is all right; he has bought groceries from me," and unless you can get convincing evidence that he ought to be in the penitentiary, he is turned loose with a certificate that he is, so to speak, a white man.

A few weeks ago I saw in a Vancouver paper that one of the officials, an inspector who was connected with the job of taking care of the removal of the Japanese—I have not the cutting here, but I can speak from memory —gave testimony that the third generation of the Japs were the worst to handle, because they were better educated and knew what their so-called rights were, but they were just as firmly embedded in the traditions of their forbears as were the first generation. This man rather favoured the Japs; he said that they had not done any sabotage; but he did say that the third generation was worse than the previous ones.

The Prime Minister also suggested that, even if it were found that a Jap was guilty of certain things, it would be very natural for anyone to be stubborn in defence of his own property, which is an easy way of explaining, perhaps, subversive action. I am rather afraid of a commission or a man to whom these duties are committed going out with that point of view. The Prime Minister himself does not handle these things; he is more or less in the hands of his officials.

There was an official appointed, of course, by the government, to handle the situation out there in the matter of removing the Japs. His name was Trueman. Before he left Toronto on his way out he said that he was familiar with the situation and that the whole trouble was caused by mob hysteria on the part of the white man. There is a nice, competent commissioner to decide whether these men are loyal or not. Can he look into a Jap's soul? But he knows before he starts that this is all due to the mob hysteria of the white man. That official ought to be fired.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Or shot.

Mr. NEILL: Well, no, but he ought to be sent to live with his "friends."

There is one thing the Prime Minister said with which I entirely disagree. He warned us of what repercussions might occur affecting our Canadian soldiers or sailors in Japanese hands if the Japs did not like the way we treated the Japanese here. That might well be so, if the proposal was to perpetrate brutalities or injustices or anything of that kind upon these men. But this is a totally different thing. I have had considerable experience in dealing with native races, both with them and where they live, in all parts of the world, and I know from experience that the best way to treat them is with strict justice. If you give the native more than justice, the native mind is such that he thinks you are afraid of him; he fancies he can take liberties with you. But if you deal out to him even-handed justice; if he knows that when he does wrong he will be punished, then he will be a much better man, and he will not only respect you but realize that it pays him to play the game. I am very sure, on this point, that our men in Japan will not suffer because we treat the Japanese here justly. If we were to treat them unjustly, the consequences would certainly be different. In any event, what we propose is part of the peace terms, and it will then be too late to do anything very much. People who know the situation will endorse what I say, that the way to deal with a native is not to pamper him and show that you are afraid of him, but be just, by all means. What keeps the population of India, with its teeming millions, under the control of a handful of men, some of them no more than lads just out of Eton? The answer is, the "face" of the white man. They have great regard for "face" in the orient. You must keep face with them and live up to your traditions, and you must be fair. But once you begin to weaken or give any hint of being afraid, that moment you have lost your power.

The Prime Minister's third line of policy was to stop immigration from Japan. I welcome that most sincerely. He knows how urgent I have been on that point during the last twenty-three years. There seemed, however, to be some qualifying phrase in what he said in this regard; he said something to the effect that it was for a time at least, that it was subject to revision, or something of that sort. He also used a phrase which I did not like when he said something to the effect that the whole policy, of course, would always be subject to circumstances which might arise. Well, that rather undermines the entire force of what he said in this connection; it undermines the full force that we might otherwise attach to the declaration of policy which he gave to the committee this morning. However, when we see Hansard to-morrow morning we shall know then exactly what the Prime Minister said and we shall then be in a position to see the full force of his statement. I appreciate fully the attitude he takes against further oriental immigration, but I am afraid he is leaving too many loopholes in the other branches of his policy to have it very effective.

He says that he will spread them all over Canada. I suggest that if you have cancer in your little finger you are not going to do your body any good if you do anything that will result in spreading that disease throughout your system. Similarly, if you start little centres of shintoism with its evils, such as the Japanese devotion to their emperor, all over Canada, where will you end? And where are these people to be sent? We in British Columbia do not want them and we may take the perfectly selfish attitude and say, "It is all right so far as we are concerned if you send them to other provinces; they will not bother us any longer." But that is not fair, because we know these people and others do not. I do not see how it can be done because every province into which they have penetrated has received a pledge that they will be removed whenever the province so asks. They hold a pledge from the dominion government that these people will be taken away whenever those provinces ask that this be done. Where then will they go? I read this afternoon that there will be a request that they be taken away from Alberta. Well, they cannot be taken back to British Columbia. As I say, we do not want them, and we have the Prime Minister's promise that they will not be sent there. Will they be sent to Ontario? Oh, no; Ontario does not want them. Well, where are they to go? We shall certainly hold him to his pledge to keep them out of British Columbia, but at the same time we do not wish them on others. That would be like the mayor of the small town, when it was reported that a case of smallpox had come to town, meaning expenses of isolating those who were affected and cost of nurses and guards and all the rest of it; he had them put on a train going out of town just to keep things quiet and to shift them to some other place. That was all right for him and for the people of his town, but we do not want to play a trick like that on our neighbours so far as these Japanese are concerned.

Some philosopher or statesman, or whatever he was, once said that under a democracy the people eventually get the kind of legislation they want. I hope that is indeed true. I assure the government that we in British Columbia certainly want the elimination of the Japanese population, and now is the time to get rid of them. The chance will never come again. The Prime Minister told us that they will not come back to British Columbia and we stand by that; his word has been given. But, I repeat, we do not want to be selfish. On one occasion the Doukhobors were annoyed by those little animals known as gophers; and since they did not believe in taking life they caught the gophers on their place, put them in a box or something of that sort, took them a few miles down the road to the property of someone who was not a Doukhobor and turned them loose. Well, if we are beset by pests of any sort we do not want to turn them loose on other people. We may say, "God help you, but it is all right for us; we have nothing to worry about now." But that, I repeat, is not the proper attitude to take.

After all, many of us came from the east where we have friends and relations and we do not want the people in this part of the country to go through the experience we went through. I do not think it will be possible to settle the Japanese elsewhere for the reasons I have given. That is the first point I wish to make. Secondly, I do not think it will be possible to test their loyalty individually, because that is something you cannot prove. You can judge them as a nation on their record. You cannot prove what is in a man's mind or soul or what he will do under any given circumstances.

The third point is with reference to the stopping of immigration, and that is one thing for which we can hold up both hands. I heartily congratulate the Prime Minister on that. But that is not enough. When our soldiers come back, with the recollection of the atrocities which their comrades have suffered, it will cause a very great deal of hard feeling in British Columbia at least, and for the sake of the Japanese themselves it would be better for them if they went back to their own country. With the knowledge and education which they have acquired here they could do well and elevate their own people and be prosperous in their own way.

I foresee trouble. I am not one of those who say, "Wait until the soldiers come back and they will use their bayonets." Not at all; I shall support law then as now. But it will be a very unpleasant situation and nothing but trouble will arise, so that for the Jap's own sake they should be taken away. I am speaking for those whom I know and whose welfare I have at heart; I have no axe to grind or votes to get. But it would be a great thing for Canada in the future if the government took this opportunity, which will never come again.

By the way, I did not mention one item when the Prime Minister said we would have to guide ourselves in some respects by the policy of the United States. I hold in my hand a copy of a bill which has been introduced into the house of representatives, being an act for the deportation of Japanese aliens. It will be seen that they are paying some attention to this matter in that country. The bill was introduced on May 9, 1944, and referred to the committee on immigration and naturalization, and the man who introduced it writes to tell me that he has good hopes of its passing. He ought to know; I do not know. However, it shows that there is feeling there too, and I suggest that it might be well for us to give them the lead instead of waiting for them to show us the way. At any rate, let us manage our own affairs. British Columbia is solidly against the presence of the Japanese now or in the future. A great many have been moved away, but there is no way of keeping them out unless you deport them. Does Nova Scotia want them? I do not think so. Does Prince Edward Island want them forced on that province, or can they be forced on the people there? I do not know the answer to that, but I hope the Prime Minister's actions will be more decisive than the manner in which he pronounced his policy, because there was rather too much qualification in what he said. However, we shall see to-morrow what he actually said, and in the meantime I want to make it clear beyond the shadow of a doubt that what British Columbia wishes is to get rid of the Japs, dead or alive.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now that my hon. friend is speaking on this question, I think this is an opportune moment to clear up exactly what I meant by stating that there should be consideration, in any policies we may have, of the policies of the United States. These are the exact words I used:

> Moreover, we shall attempt in so far as it seems desirable to maintain a policy that can in a sense be considered as part of a continental policy in handling the Japanese problem. The situation in the United States is in all essentials the same as our own—

I believe I interrupted there and said, in most essentials.

> —and to the extent which seems desirable we shall endeavour to ensure that our policy takes account of the policies which are being applied south of the border. There is no need for an identity of policy, but I believe there is merit in maintaining a substantial consistency of treatment in the two countries.

I stand by every word of that, because I feel that in relations with the orient this country cannot afford to do anything other than carefully to study the implications of policies in the United States towards the orient. Sooner or later their policies in relation to ours are going to affect, for better and for worse, the relations between our part of this continent and the orient, and the United States and the orient. What I have in mind is this: We have all in international affairs to take a long range view. I, for one, will say that I believe it will not be long after the war is over before the business community of this country, the manufacturers of this country and the producers of this country, will be anxious to secure all the markets that they can possibly get, and the markets in the orient will be among the markets that they will be seeking. I think that very few of them will hesitate to make sales in some parts of the Japanese empire, or what may be left of it, if there is possibility of securing a market. One thing I am perfectly sure of is that the Americans are not going to hesitate to seek to get into all the markets of the orient and to establish themselves firmly there. I believe a government that did not recognize that it was most important to see that we are, at least, as fair and reasonable in our treatment of the nationals of an enemy country as the very powerful country to the south may be, would not be taking the view that was in the national interest of Canada.

That is what I mean by saying that I feel that when the day comes that another effort will be made to bind up the wounds of the nations of the world, in establishing a new world order, we should be careful to see that meanwhile we have not taken positions which will not be forgotten even by our enemies.

Mr. NEILL: I might just say one word to that. I think the time for that logic is past. It is exactly twenty years this month, I think, since the United States passed a law prohibiting entirely the immigration of Japanese into that country. We did have and still have a limited immigration law allowing so many to come in. The same argument was used twenty years ago as is being used to-night that we could not afford to antagonize and lose the chance of getting the trade of the orient because, if we did, the United States would reap at our expense. The United States did take their courage in their hands and cut immigration right off. They said, "No more immigration". I remember using that argument to the Prime Minister in urging that we should do the same thing, that that was our opportunity and that it would make no difference. Time proved the truth of it. We did not get any more business because we allowed a certain amount of immigration. They did not cut off and boycott the United States on account of their action. Trade will go where it is most profitable. You may not like the kind of boots or the colour of the hair of the man in the grocery store at the corner, but you will go down there and buy rather than walk ten blocks farther down the street, particularly if the price is right. Trade will always follow that policy. Have we not been relying too much on that trade idea and thereby sacrificing our traditions of the white man and so forth, all for the fear of losing some trade? As I say, trade will go where it is profitable to go. Are we going to win a bloody war and then sit down and lose the peace by fighting for markets here or there? I am grieved indeed to hear the Prime Minister take the attitude he has to-night. I think the time has gone past for that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I remind my hon. friend, if I wished to follow him in the matter of logic, that when their time for war came the Japanese declared war against the United States; they did not declare war against Canada until after this country was at war with them.

Mr. STIRLING: It did not suit them to.

Mr. NEILL: They declared war the moment it favoured them.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): I hope that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) will not expect those who follow him in this debate to take part with him in his discussion of the Japanese question, and certainly not to follow him in some of his logic or attitude. It seems to me that the hon. member loses a little of the influence he might otherwise possess in this house and in the country by too evident a dislike for the subject of his remarks. What he fails to appreciate in the policy of the Prime Minister is that it is guided not by likes and dislikes. We all have a right to like whom we please; kissing goes by favour, but statesmanship is based not upon favour but upon justice. I caught the words from the hon. gentleman himself that the way to treat the oriental is with strict justice. Of course that is right. It is not whether we like the Japanese or dislike them; they are human beings and have certain rights, and those rights must be respected, not for their sakes but for our own sakes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why will not Toronto take some of them?

Mr. ROEBUCK: I think Toronto has a number of Japanese-Canadian citizens. They are not Japanese; they are Canadian citizens of Japanese origin.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Your province will not take them.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Our province has not the power to do otherwise than to take them, and there are a fair number of Japanese Canadians, and some who are not Canadians, in the province of Ontario at the present time. I am not going to defend the Japs, but I find it difficult to imagine that anyone can be so bad as the bête noire of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. It may be so, but it does not make any difference whether they are good, bad or indifferent; our job as legislators, the Prime Minister's job as a statesman guiding the affairs of this country, is to deal out even-handed justice to everybody. When it comes to immigration into this country we have a right to say that this one shall come in and that that one shall not. The Prime Minister is within his rights when he says that there shall be no more Japanese immigration to this country, but when it comes to dealing with Canadian citizens born in this country or nationalized by us in a solemn way by legal process, that is another matter. These people are Canadian citizens and have a right to be treated as Canadian citizens.

Mr. O'NEILL: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. ROEBUCK: Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL: Would the hon. member consider that a person born in this country and holding dual citizenship is a good Canadian citizen?

Mr. ROEBUCK: All you have to do is to show that and you can cancel the Canadian nationality of the individual; but you must not punish the innocent because of the guilty. There may be some who have dual nationality, who owe a loyalty to the emperor of Japan and who attempt to show the same attitude toward the king of England. It cannot be done. If you can show that, there is no difficulty at all in cancelling the British citizenship, and I rather think you could cancel the nationality of even a person born here, although I am not so sure about that. My point is that you must not do these things by rumour and assumptions. Even-handed justice requires that we prove such charges against the guilty individual and not in a broad way assume that all must be guilty because of some national characteristics. I have found even in my short experience that usually characteristics attributed to large sections of a community, to groups, to nationalities, to races and so on, have very little foundation in fact. They are usually fictions. For instance, there is a fiction that the French are excitable, the English phlegmatic, and so on; I could mention many more. Usually these are not based upon facts but upon assumptions. The French are often phlegmatic and the English excitable. So that perhaps it may be with those of Japanese origin who have had the benefit of long years of association with Canadians and of Canadian training. It may be that they are not quite so bad as, say, the military clique who guide the destinies of Japan. It is not my intention to-night to argue the question of the Japanese or to constitute myself their champion.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You sound like it.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I am the champion of democracy, of justice and of right, applied to anybody; and I am not going to imbibe here the violent prejudices of the hon. gentlemen from British Columbia.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I have listened with a great deal of pleasure, Mr. Chairman, to the discussion carried on to-day on the broad questions of foreign policy. There was a time when we Canadians found it very difficult to discuss our own national problems, because in the minds of some people, whenever we asserted Canadianism we were in some way anti-British. Nothing of the kind. As Canada gradually emerges to nationhood; as the complex of the little man disappears and we become powerful and influential in world affairs; as our position becomes more clearly recognized abroad, we are approaching our national questions with a little more sanity and reason. The only vast difference that I see between the Canadianism I have heard expressed from across the floor, particularly by hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party, and that held so firmly on this side of the house is this. While we are all for Canada, there seems to be some doubt across the way as to whether or not we have grown up. They are still in the Kipling age: "Daughter am I in my mother's house, but mistress in my own." That was a very catchy and descriptive phrase when it was written by Mr. Kipling, but that was a good many years ago. The day has gone by when Canada is daughter in anyone's house, though undoubtedly she is mistress in her own. Those were the days when Canada's right to guide her own foreign affairs was still in doubt. Then we were daughter in our mother's house. To-day, however, we are peers in the British commonwealth of nations, in which none is in any way inferior to the other in any aspect of our domestic or foreign affairs. In that attitude I beleive we are far stronger than in that advocated from across the aisle; that is to say, an adult nationhood but in some way subservient to some other nation.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who over here advocated that?

Mr. ROEBUCK: My hon. friend came very close to it.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not the same thing.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Well, there is no question that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) advocated it. If I understand the English language aright he desires some sort of centralization of power across the ocean. He is not satisfied that Canada should stand on her own feet, make her own decisions and, working in cooperation with Great Britain and the other members of the empire, go forward in unity, in concord and in cooperation. I heard the hon. member say that the strength of the empire is in unity, and of course with that statement I thoroughly agree. The strength of the empire is in unity; but if that unity is to be brought about by subservience on the part of Canada to any other people, any other government or any other power, then that unity is bought at too great a price. The unity which makes for progress and influence and power is that which is manifest among free peoples, voluntarily associating in their own ways for the accomplishment of some common object.

It is obvious that we cannot have one voice for the whole empire. Each must have its own say in its own way. One is not a realist if he does not see that some of the questions which are important to Australia and New Zealand are not so important to us, while some aspects of our foreign affairs are of little interest to either Australia or New Zealand. We have a coast on the Atlantic as well as on the Pacific. So with South Africa; in her foreign affairs she would not be much interested in our relationship, for instance, with the great country of Russia. It is necessary that each portion of our great commonwealth live its own life in its own way, making its own decisions and expressing itself through its own representatives. In that way we shall develop a powerful empire.

The subject uppermost in my mind at the moment, however, is not the broad question of empire solidarity. On February 1 last I brought to the attention of the house an interesting and, I think, important subject; that is to say, the Palestine situation. A considerable section of our community is looking to me at the present time to say something about that subject, and to bring it up in the course of this debate. It is hoped that a policy will be announced by Great Britain and the United States, perhaps in the near future. I trust that it may be soon. One reason for thinking something of that kind may be in immediate prospect is the fact that Viscount Gort was recently appointed high commissioner of Palestine. Viscount Gort is known to have a sympathetic attitude not only to individual Jewish people but to the Jewish problem in general, and it is hoped that in consequence of his influence something beneficial may evolve. Unfortunately, however, there is also a rumour—perhaps it is nothing more than a rumour—that the policy to be announced will involve the partitioning of Palestine. Be it remembered that when the Balfour declaration was published it was understood to refer to Palestine as it exists to-day together with Trans-Jordania, making an area of some thirty-five thousand square miles. Somehow in the course of the years Trans-

Jordania has been dropped from the argument that centres about the Balfour declaration. And so to-day there is involved an area of about 10,000 square miles, taking in the Jordan river and the Dead sea, right up to the north. The proposal made in 1922 for the partition of Palestine involved the creation of two states, one Jewish and the other Arab. There was to be given to the Jewish state territory comprising some 2,500 or 3,000 square miles. Excepted out of that territory was the great port of Haifa, the valley of Jezreel, which runs across the north of Palestine, and the river and valley of the Jordan and the Dead sea. So that the agricultural territory which remained was without any flow of water, other than what would be obtained from wells. Quite obviously, the area was so small and the resources so limited, particularly the resources of water, that the portion which remained was an economic impossibility. That is the proposal which is again rumoured as a possible announcement from the two governments.

I place myself, and the very large Jewish community of this country, in direct opposition to any such proposal. I hold in my hand excerpts from a brochure presented by the Zionist Emergency Council to the state department of the United States on the 7th day of this month. With the consent of the house I shall read some excerpts from this somewhat remarkable document. The committee says:

> Partition is no new proposal, as far as Palestine is concerned. The Balfour declaration, with its promise of a national home for the Jewish people, was originally intended to apply to the whole of historic Palestine, including Palestine east of the Jordan, or Trans-Jordan as it is known to-day.
> In September, 1922, however, the League of Nations, at the instance of the British government, excluded Trans-Jordan from this area. More than two-thirds of the territory originally designated as the Jewish national home was thus closed to Jewish settlement.
> Further partition of Palestine proposed in 1937 by the Palestine royal commission recommended the establishment of a Jewish state on an area of about one-fifth of Palestine west of the Jordan. The remainder, apart from a small British enclave, together with Trans-Jordan was to become an Arab state. In parliament this proposal was severely criticized, among others, by Winston Churchill. No proposal for the future of Palestine can be acceptable to the Jewish people which precludes the possibility of large-scale Jewish settlement and colonization. But partition would be a severe blow to the economic welfare of the Jewish state. It would be detrimental to industrial expansion and would greatly limit the possibility of absorbing a large Jewish population.
> So far as agricultural colonization is concerned, partition would be fatal to any important project for close settlement and intensive development. For any conceivable partition of Palestine would necessarily separate the important water resources in the north from the irrigable land in the south which offers the greatest prospect of development.
> Such a political separation of water and land would of course entirely preclude the development of Palestine in regional terms along these lines.
> To-day Zionists are unanimous in their opposition to any partition. While some of those Jews who will survive the war will no doubt desire to return to their countries of origin, for very many emigration and in particular emigration to Palestine where alone they can claim to go as of right and will be welcomed by their own people, offers the best, if not the only prospect of a new and more hopeful future. In order to meet the needs of such a large-scale immigration it will be necessary to make use of the possibilities as a whole, and any reduction in the area of settlement would be regarded as introducing a corresponding limitation on the numbers who may thus be rehabilitated.

The matter becomes of very great national and international importance at the present time because of the situation in Hungary. Before the war, Hungary had a very considerable population of Jews who had lived there for many centuries. The educational institutions of Hungary were known world-wide. Many of the leading Jewish people in communities all over the world have found their origin in Hungary, and their education in the institutions of that country.

When the war broke out there were about a half million Jewish people in Hungary. As the war progressed, the population of Jews increased, because of refugees. The Jewish population increased to nearly a million. I believe the figure was 900,000. To-day the Jewish population of Hungary is about 400,000. Five hundred thousand Jewish people have disappeared. Where they have gone we do not know. But we do know that 100,000 of them were deported at one time to be murdered by the nazis in Poland. We know that through Catholic sources, and also from the Polish government in exile. We know it, too, because the Pope sent a message to Admiral Horthy, Hungarian regent and head of the Hungarian state, protesting and pleading that deportations cease.

Mr. Hull, Secretary of State for the United States, as late as July 14, 1944, stated that the entire Jewish community in Hungary faced extermination. He threatened punishment to the state of Hungary if it persisted in violation of the most elementary of human rights. Partly as a result of what was said by Mr. Hull, partly because of what was said by His Holiness the Pope, and to no small degree because of the menacing Russian army near the borders of Hungary, a message has been received by the International Red Cross from Admiral Horthy that he is prepared to give an exit permit to any Jew who can show a visa to Palestine, and to any Jewish child under ten years of age for whom entry can be secured to any of the allied countries.

We can all express abhorrence of the barbarity of the nazis. We can repeat over and over that the whole world is outraged at what has gone on in Central Europe with regard to this unfortunate population. But I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that more outrageous is to express sentiments of abhorrence while, by our actions, showing ourselves willing to do nothing. The time has arrived when the united nations—which includes Canada—must take action in this matter, and it is easily taken. We must either be rescuers or accomplices. I note that at the Burma conference on May 19, 1943, Mr. Eden made this statement:

> We shall do everything in our power to help these people.

The time has come to do the helping. Trains still run from Budapest to Istanbul, from Hungary to Turkey. With Turkey now breaking with Germany it should not be difficult to secure cooperation in the Turkish capital. There are trains running to-day from the Turkish capital to Haifa in Palestine.

We have not done so very badly during the last year. Some 9,000 refugees have entered Palestine. That is a trickle, it is true, but still it is 9,000; it might be worse. But there remain only 20,000 visas, according to the white paper against which I spoke in February last, and these are being reserved for refugees from the occupied countries. It is time that Christian nations express in a practical way what they intend to do with regard to the plight of the Jews in Hungary and elsewhere.

There is no difficulty in absorbing large numbers of these people in Palestine. I understand that discussion are now going on between the authorities of Palestine and those of Egypt to bring in 15,000 Egyptian labourers in order to meet the man-power shortage in Palestine. Large numbers of these refugees could be accommodated in Palestine to-day if the British empire governments and the United States would insist that the door be opened, as it was intended to be opened at the close of the last war, and give these poor people the haven of refuge for which they have worked and struggled and which they now need so tragically.

I once had a remarkable Jewish friend, who used to say that the mission of the Jews was to bring Christianity to the Christians. It occurs to me that if there ever was a time in world history when Christians might bring a little Christianity to the Jews, that time is now. I know our Prime Minister is sympathetic in this matter. He has never turned a deaf ear to any one in distress, and from his door no lame dog has ever limped unhelped. I appeal to him to give this matter the most effective handling of which his department is capable.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I consider this debate probably the most important that we could have in this House of Commons at this time, because the future that we shall play in the world depends upon our external policy. I listened this morning to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with a great deal of attention; I listened for some statement which would show the awareness of our changed position in the shrunken world of to-day, but I did not hear it. In fact the Prime Minister said that his policy remained the same, and with that I must earnestly disagree.

During a short time in the lifetime of most of us we have been by the side of England in three wars being fought outside the north American continent. The first was the South African war, and the second and third were the great wars against Germany and now against Japan. Those wars were fought to preserve the freedom of the world. It was said by Sir Wilfrid Laurier that when England is at war Canada is also at war. This has been proved true. No matter what may be the clauses in the statute of Westminster the de facto condition is that if England is at war, Canada will also be at war.

Recent developments have complicated our position with regard to the United States, and I believe it is now also a fact that if the United States is at war with a major power, Canada will be also at war whether we like it or not. In any Pacific struggle where the United States is a major belligerent we must, from the very fact of geography, become involved. This applies with equal force to Japan, to China and to Russia. There is no use in trying to avoid the consideration of these unpleasant facts; they must be faced.

Geography which has given Canada a false sense of security in the past is now, owing to the air routes of the world, putting a definite end to our isolation. It has forced us right into the centre of world affairs. We are now at the cross-roads of Europe and Asia, and no longer are we merely the stately mistress of the north, as we were called in Kipling's poem.

If our domestic future holds anything, we can look forward to a population of 20,000,000 within our own lifetime. With a forceful development of our natural resources and with a population such as this our weight in empire affairs will progressively increase. It is not beyond possibility that in the near future we shall find ourselves with a population and an industrial output approximately fifty per cent of that of the United Kingdom. With that population together with our great agricultural resources we can no longer escape our destiny as an international force.

The day of little Canadianism is over for all time. Let us review what the isolationism of the past has meant to Canada. In the empire conference held prior to the war criticism was levelled at us because we would have no commitments whatsoever with regard to a unified imperial policy. Unfortunately, apparently, that still is the policy of the Prime Minister. He has said that we will not commit ourselves to a forward policy for joint defence, that he will not commit us to a joint agreement with the empire on security. He still adheres to the policy he announced on January 26, 1937, when he said:

> I ought to make it quite clear that we will not necessarily become involved in any war into which other parts of the British empire may enter simply because we are a part of the British empire.

He stated that his government adhered to the moderate central point of view, neither imperialist nor isolationist, and that they would take account of the interests of all those with whom they might be associated, but that the interests would primarily be based on the interests of Canada in every situation as it presented itself.

That, from what was said this morning, is still the fundamental position to-day. In other words, we are still fooling ourselves that in a world of extreme practical reality, and because we have the statute of Westminster, which satisfies our own national pride, we believe that a predatory nation will take cognizance of this statute and because of it will not consider us as a belligerent.

I believe this is living in a fools' paradise. History again and again has shown that this is so. It amounts to this: we will make no commitments; we will not have a foreign policy with regard to the empire, we will participate in no permanent imperial council, we will have nothing to say until war actually breaks out, and then we will say it on the battlefield. It is on this point that I disagree with the Prime Minister's policy. It is unreal; it is impractical; it may be of political advantage, but it will certainly lead to another war which we as Canadians will have had no power to prevent. Because of our unique position—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend just a moment? I hope he will not feel that because I am not interrupting him I am agreeing that his representation of my position is what my position is. I want to make it quite clear that I stand by anything I myself have said, but I do not accept my hon. friend's interpretation of my words as at all representing my position.

Mr. ADAMSON: This, Mr. Chairman, was my interpretation. I listened very carefully this morning, and I have taken a lot of trouble to read what the Prime Minister has said regarding external and foreign policy.

The point I want to bring out, and I shall try to do so as I continue, is that the policy which he has in the past followed has not prevented us from being dragged into two major world wars. I am suggesting that the policy which he still follows will not prevent a third major world war if it should unfortunately develop. I am trying to present my argument along those lines, and I believe that the Prime Minister, if he will follow me, will see what I am trying to develop.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, as long as it is understood between us that the policy is as I have stated it in my own words and not as my hon. friend interprets it, he is free to say anything he likes, and further, if it is understood that I am listening to him and my only reason for not interrupting is not that I agree, but simply that I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend.

Mr. ADAMSON: I thank the Prime Minister for not wishing to interrupt me and I am glad to have him listen to what I have to say. To continue, I repeat that the Prime Minister's policy amounts to this: we will have no commitments; we will have no joint foreign policy with the empire, we will participate in no permanent imperial council, and we will have nothing to say until war actually breaks out; then we will say it on the battlefield. That has happened. It is at this point that I disagree with the Prime Minister's policy, or rather lack of policy. It is unreal and impractical. It may be of political advantage, but it will certainly lead to another war, which we as Canadians will have had no opportunity to prevent. Because of our unique position, we must insist that our point of view be considered by the United Kingdom government, and furthermore this must be a continuous operation. The impersonal cipher telegram and the long distance telephone are no substitute for continuous consultation. While the function of the high commissioner is useful, it must be remembered that conversations carried on by him are on the ambassadorial level and are subject to other limitations. Consultation to be effective must take place at all levels and be of far more constant nature than it is at the present time.

To emphasize this, I should like to point out that the hereditary policy of England in foreign affairs has been based on the balance of power. Generations of foreign officials have been steeped in this idea. I hope I shall not be considered as criticizing the United Kingdom government when I say that this policy has inevitably led to war. It first of all leads to appeasement, then to sacrificing your friends to placate your enemies and subsequently to war. With the shrinkage of the world owing to transportation and industrial developments, wars are becoming more frequent and infinitely more destructive. There is a saying that we will lose the third war. We very nearly lost the first great war. When the history of this war is written it will appear that our nearness to defeat was so much closer than in 1914-18 that it will send chills down the backs of those who read it. We must see that there is no third time, and now is the time to start.

For a moment I should like to discuss the policy of the United Kingdom government and the issues of the last general election, which election was responsible for the present parliament at Westminster. Through the depression years the government of the United Kingdom was, like governments all over the world, faced with an almost impossible task. World discontent was rife and the tragedy of unemployment was universal in the civilized world. Therefore it was unlikely that the government would be reelected, particularly if they appealed on domestic issues. Leaders of political parties endeavour to choose issues on which their parties may be reelected. There is nothing surprising about that, and certainly there is nothing surprising that this should be the case in the United Kingdom. There was the Baldwin government, with an unpopular record on domestic affairs, looking for an issue. The proof of its unpopularity was that in the by-elections between the years 1931 and 1935 the government fought forty-nine by-elections and won only six.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I said that I would not interrupt my hon. friend, but I think I ought to draw his attention to the fact that this House of Common is not the place to discuss the affairs of another parliament. I believe the rules of the house are quite clear on that point. The Baldwin government has not a representative here to defend it unless some hon. gentlemen take that task in hand.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am not attacking the Baldwin government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend said that he was going to discuss a British election and the parliament which resulted from it, and so forth. That has not anything to do with the external affairs of Canada.

Mr. ADAMSON: Well, unfortunately I believe it has.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Again I say that I do not want to have any controversy with my hon. friend, but I should like it to be quite clear that the rule is, that the internal affairs of the government of another country should not be discussed on the floor of this House of Commons; also there is the rule of relevancy. If my hon. friend wishes to proceed to discuss these matters further, of course I will not say anything further.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The point made by the Prime Minister is correct.

Mr. CASSELMAN: What is the rule?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I trust the hon. member will not carry on.

Mr. CASSELMAN: What is the rule?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have stated the rule in general terms.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Just as the Prime Minister has stated—it has nothing to do with this item which is before the committee.

Mr. ADAMSON: I hope the Prime Minister will allow me to discuss the League of Nations because that was discussed definitely this afternoon, but the point I wish to make in this debate is merely this. Because we did not raise our voice at that time, we lost the opportunity to make ourselves an effective instrument for the preservation of peace. The evidence I wish to put on the record does not concern the United Kingdom government. I am going to deal with the League of Nations and the abrogation of the Locarno pact. That was the last opportunity the world had for the preservation of peace, and I think it is very important that we should discuss it here and now because it was the last and inevitable step to war. In a debate on external affairs that is of vital importance. The British government at that time was a party to the abrogation—not a party, but it allowed the Germans to have their way without in my opinion sufficient protest, and, I believe, in the opinion of the subsequent governments of the United Kingdom. I feel it is no critcism whatever to bring out these few statements which I wish to put on the record with regard to those days. I think it is very important that we should remember what happened.

As I have said, in the election which returned the present British House of Commons the appeal was made to the electors on an external issue, and one of the appeals was made on the so-called peace ballot. I think this is important. It is well to remember the things which went on in those days and how easy it was for great populations to become lulled into a sense of the possibility of legislating themselves, by wishful thinking, out of danger. The peace ballot which was put out by the league of nations society was held in 1935. It is interesting to note the questions on the ballot:

1. Should Great Britain remain a member of the League of Nations?
2. Are you in favour of an all-round reduction of armaments by international agreement?
3. Are you in favour of the all-round abolition of international military and naval aircraft by international agreement?
4. Should the manufacture and sale of armaments for private profit be prohibited by international agreement?
5. Do you consider that if a nation insists on attacking another, the other nations should combine to compel it to stop by (a) economic and non-military measures and (b) if necessary, military measures?

The results, which surprised public opinion and certainly the government in England were these. The answers to the questions in the order in which I have given them were:

1. Yes: 11,090,000; No: 355,000.
2. Yes: 10,470,000; No: 862,000.
3. Yes: 9,533,000; No: 1,689,000.
4. Yes: 10,417,000; No: 775,000.
5. (a) Yes: 10,027,000; No: 635,000.
   (b) Yes: 6,784,000; No: 2,352,000.

The 5 (b) question was a significant one because it concerned the "attack" clause. Clause (b) was the one that asked whether they would stop it, if necessary, by military measures.

The final results were tabulated on June 29, 1935. The government went to the country on this manifesto which is a public document. The first three points of the manifesto were these:

1. The League of Nations will remain the keystone of British foreign policy. Everything will be done to uphold the covenant and maintain and increase the efficiency of the league. Collective action alone can save us from a return to the system which resulted in war.

The Italo-Abyssinian dispute was the next item. It was dealt with as follows:

2. There will be no wavering in the present policy. Action will be collective not isolated. Any discussions offering hope of a just settlement will be furthered, providing they are within the framework of the league and acceptable to Italy, Abyssinia and the league itself.

Surely an amazing statement to make over an act of unprovoked aggression. Next, defence:

3. We must repair the gaps in our defences. The defence programme will be strictly confined to making the country and empire safe and to fulfil our obligations to the league.

Next, disarmament:

4. Efforts to attain a general limitation of armaments by international agreement will be unrelaxed.

The government was returned on that manifesto. There were more points to it, but these were the important aspects with regard to foreign matters, and the parts that affected us. Shortly after that, as history has shown, Ribbentrop was able to go back to Germany and tell Hitler that England would not fight. These were the facts.

Now let us see what happened with regard to the League of Nations. The election in 1936, I believe, was the turning point at which war became inevitable. It is possible that war might have been prevented by stern action in 1935, but from then on, war became as sure as night follows day. However, the policy of appeasement continued to an amazing degree. During 1936 the Italians overran Abyssinia and resorted on unimpeachable evidence, to the use of poison gas and the aerial bombardment of primitive tribes. In the Spanish war, where the overthrow of a properly elected government was brought about by the outrageous and brazen participation of the armed forces of both Germany and Italy, report after report showed that Germany was using in an experimental war her most modern equipment, thus gaining priceless experience. Democracies, particularly the United States and Great Britain, adhered to the fantastic policy of non-intervention, and actually, in the later stages of the war, prohibited their nationals from taking part in the struggle. Thus by stopping the slight help which was given to the legitimate government of the international brigade, we actually and directly aided the axis. The story of the proposed oil sanctions against Italy is too well known to need repetition. In 1935 the United Kingdom government negotiated the naval treaty with Germany allowing her to build up her naval strength to thirty-five per cent of that of the British navy. It is a sad phantasy now to recall that the government of the day considered this a peace gesture. The final and irrevocable move of Hitler came on March 7, 1936, when he denounced the Locarno pact and reoccupied the Rhineland. In this connection it is interesting to note what Hitler said and the reply thereto in the British house. On March 7, at the Kroll opera house in Berlin, which was used as the meeting place of the reichstag following the now proven nazi burning of the original structure, Hitler said this:

In addition I have made up my mind to enforce German sovereignty and to labour for European understanding. It is rather a tragic misfortune that Versailles treaty should have created a situation which the French themselves believed themselves to be specially interested in maintaining. It is regrettable that, after all our efforts to come to terms with France, France should conclude the Russian pact of which we know the beginning but not the end. Whatever could be proposed for lessening the tension between Germany and France I have proposed. I proposed 200,000 men and 300,000 men, but everything was rejected. Only one of my proposals was met. The realistic sense of the British government led to the conclusion of the naval pact, and that is the first real success for the restriction of armaments.

He closed with the following exhortation:

Men, deputies of the German reichstag, at this historic hour at which, in the western provinces of the reich, German troops are now entering their garrisons, we join with them in the solemn oath.

(1) Not to yield before any power and force in the effort to restore the honour of the nation and rather to succumb than to capitulate;

(2) To work for an understanding among the nations of Europe, and especially for an understanding with our western neighbours.

Goering then dissolved the reichstag with these words:

Germany is free. The future lies clearly before us—one nation, one leader, one will.

The proceedings then terminated with the usual sieg heils. This was the sixth meeting of the reichstag since Hitler came to power in 1933.

The reply in the British House of Commons took place on March 9. Mr. Eden in a long statement used these words:

The abrogation of the Locarno treaty and the occupation of the demilitarized zone have profoundly shaken confidence in any engagement into which the government of Germany may in future enter. There can be no one in this house or this country who would wish to condone or excuse such a step. It strikes a severe blow at that principle of international relations. There is, I am thankful to say, no reason to suppose that the present German action implies a threat of hostilities.

I do not wish by quoting such a small portion of Mr. Eden's speech to distort the actual sense of the entire statement. However, if hon. members will read it I think they will agree that it was conciliatory in tone, and particularly where he describes his conversation with the German ambassador.

On March 19, 1936, the League of Nations met to hear Herr von Ribbentrop explain and endeavour to justify Germany's action over the Locarno treaty. The speech was a long one, and as usual filled with the phobia of fear of Russia, German honour and German desire for peace. Mr. Flandin moved a resolution which was the outcome of a secret session of the league council on March 16, condemning the German action in what seemed to me to be rather conciliatory terms. I will not take up the time of the committee by going into it in detail. In the open session of the league on March 19, 1936—both of these meetings incidentally were held in London—the one significant speech which was recorded in which he stands firmly against the German action was made by Mr. Bruce on behalf of Australia. I will quote the last paragraph, in which he says:

It is now the duty of the council to pronounce. On behalf of the government of Australia I declare that I propose to vote in favour of the resolution. The duties of the council are not completed by such a pronouncement and the notification of the decision of the council to the signatories of the Locarno treaty. A further duty is imposed on the council, because the treaty of Locarno was made part of the general system of maintenance of security of world peace, which is the basis of the covenant of the league. The issue which confronts us to-day is fundamental to the whole system which it has been the endeavour of the league to create since the end of the world war. That system is based on the scrupulous observance of treaties and on the fact that no power can free itself from obligations by unilateral action. It is now for the powers primarily concerned to take action with a view to resolving the situation which now confronts us.

I will not go on discussing the appeasement policy as practised by the League of Nations and by the governments of the United Kingdom and France. Hindsight is always easier than foresight, and I am bringing up this history not in order to condemn any one individual or any government but because I feel it is of great importance for us to-day to examine this period in detail and with an unbiased mind.

One strong statement coming out of the welter of appeasement was from Australia. Had there been at any time an empire council sitting in London, is it not possible that other strong statements might have come from other members of the British commonwealth, and is it not possible that such statements might have in their aggregate altered the course of the United Kingdom government and possibly of the league and the whole world? I do not say that this would have happened, but I do say that by such an organization opinions such as expressed by Mr. Bruce might have crystallized and saved the world from the present holocaust. My fundamental disagreement with the Prime Minister is that he rejects the possibility of the usefulness of such an assembly.

Let us now go one step farther and see what Russia, the supreme realist, was doing at this time. On November 25, 1936, the German-Japanese agreement against communist international was signed in Berlin. On November 29, 1936, at the all-union congress of the Soviets, Mr. Litvinov said this in part:

> As a state we are not concerned with the internal fascist regime in one country or another. But fascism is ceasing to be an internal affair with the countries professing it.

At that time, during the all congress meeting in Moscow, Russia took very strong and definite steps to rearm and said so. Admiral Orloff, commander in chief of the Soviet navy, declared that Soviet submarines had increased sevenfold since 1933. In the same period the surface warcraft for coastal defence had increased threefold, seaplanes fivefold and distant range artillery and naval anti-aircraft batteries had approximately doubled.

Mr. Khripin, the assistant commander in chief of the Red air force, stated that the number of fighting planes possessed by Russia had quadrupled since 1932 and was considerably in excess of the two thousand aircraft stated to be possessed by Germany. Germany's effort to train seventy thousand pilots, said Khripin, would be met by Soviet measures to secure one hundred thousand men. This was the only sort of talk Germany understood.

I have made this brief historical resumé in order that we may profit from the experiences of the past. I believe it has a direct parallel in the situation that faces us to-day. Canada has floated along on the waves of European policy, not knowing exactly where the ship was headed but confident that the London pilot would steer it well. However, we became involved in two world wars. We do not have to take a back seat to any country in the world on the extent of our participation when considered on a per capita basis. Both of these wars originated in the ambitions of Germany. Events leading up to these two catastrophes, which have swept away many of the young men of two generations whom we sorely needed to build our country, and which have added to our national debt a load it will be hard for us to carry, were not of our making as I have tried to show. We have had little voice or influence in any attempt to prevent them. We have made our sacrifices willingly, even gladly, but now for the sake of the future of our land we must make every possible effort to see that world war No. 3 does not materialize.

Not only has Germany become a world problem and an empire problem; it has become a Canadian problem. We must realize this, and we dare not stand aside merely watching events which may be of vital concern to us later on. We have thrown our weight into the making of the peace and into international relations just as thoroughly and effectively as we have thrown it into the prosecution of these two world wars. At the peace conference after the last war we secured recognition by all nations of the earth. Sir Robert Borden raised the voice of Canada; it was heard and understood. We may still be a small nation, but no country commands the respect and admiration of the nations of the world, be they great or small, more thoroughly than does Canada. In the House of Commons last January the Prime Minister himself referred to Canada's unique position between the United States of America and the Soviet Union, and at the same time being a member of the British commonwealth. This very position gives Canada a great opportunity to become a definite influence in international affairs in the near future. It is up to the Canadian government to decide if it will allow Canada to face these responsibilities or if it will adopt some laissez-faire policy of neglecting to take her part and assume her obligations in the decisions that are being and will be made in the next twelve months. The future of this country depends upon these decisions and we in this house will be side-stepping our responsibilities if we leave the fate of our people and our children in the hands of others.

What are the issues calling for settlement? I believe they are four. In the first place the government has refused to enter an imperial council. We have been informed by the Prime Minister that we will make no commitments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. Did my hon. friend say that the government had refused to enter an imperial conference?

Mr. ADAMSON: An imperial council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know that we have been invited.

Mr. ADAMSON: Well, you refused to give any help or encouragement to the suggestion advanced by Prime Minister Curtin, and certainly there was the greatest criticism of the speech delivered by Lord Halifax.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Prime Minister Curtin and Lord Halifax have not the authority to issue invitations to join an imperial council.

Mr. ADAMSON: The Prime Minister and government of this country definitely turned down those proposals. They were merely suggestions advanced as possibilities, and the Prime Minister went out of his way to say that they would not work, to damn them not with faint praise but with very loud condemnation, and he continues to do so to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not argue with my hon. friend, but I should say that the whole business of exactly what was intended is very nebulous in some particulars.

Mr. ADAMSON: It may be very nebulous in the mind of the Prime Minister, but I believe it would serve a very practical and useful purpose in the future of the world. If we continue the policy of the past we are going to find ourselves exactly where we were in 1936. That is the danger I see, and it is a definite danger. It is high time that Canada took a wider and more comprehensive view of the problem facing the united nations.

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is reading his speech, which I believe is contrary to the rules.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The point of order having been raised, I should like to read citation 314 of Beauchesne:

> It is a rule in both houses of parliament that a member must address the house orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech, for the reason that "if the practice of reading speeches should prevail, members might read speeches that were written by other people, and the time of the house be taken up in considering the arguments of persons who were not deserving of their attention."

I hope the hon. gentleman will not continue to read his speech.

Mr. ADAMSON: Mr. Chairman, I had to read a great many quotations, and that is why I was following my notes rather carefully.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are only following the example of the government, anyway.

Mr. DUPUIS: And even the example of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then I am in good company.

Mr. ADAMSON: I shall endeavour to follow your injunction, Mr. Chairman, but in conclusion—

Mr. DUPUIS: Perhaps he will go faster if you let him read it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Leave the hon. member alone. I think he has as much right to make a speech as anyone else.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member should not be interrupted.

Mr. ADAMSON: Thank you, very much, Mr. Chairman.

In conclusion, I want to discuss the question of Germany which, as I have said, has definitely become a Canadian problem. Twice during our life time we have been wantonly and ruthlessly attacked. Certain things are happening to-day on the continent of North America, and particularly in Canada, of which I think the public are unaware. Many suggestions are being put forward as to what to do with Germany after the united nations are victorious, and the book market is being flooded with literature advocating various measures which should be taken. A large proportion of this literature is from the pens of Germans. They may be anti-Hitler and anti-nazi, but they are still Germans who cannot forget, no matter how much they may try to profess having done so, what one of their writers has said:

> Folkdom is much greater than citizenship in a country. Even if one gives up or is compelled to give up one's citizenship, one does not have to give up one's folkdom.

That was written by Franz Fahnemann in a recent book.

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria): Mr. Chairman, we are getting tired of listening to essays read in this house.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am reading a quotation from this book, Mr. Chairman, and I suggest I am perfectly in order in doing so.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to see a little fairness on the part of hon. members here, Mr. Chairman. I know you are doing the best you can, but hon. gentlemen opposite are interrupting all the time. The hon. member is making a good speech and should be allowed to continue.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. gentleman was reading a quotation, which was quite in order. The hon. gentleman's time has expired, but he has been interrupted a good deal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Give the hon. member a fresh start.

Mr. ADAMSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman; I have been interrupted a good deal.

Some of the writers of these books have tried to persuade the people of America that there should be no occupation of Germany. This is the theme of Paul Hagen in "Germany After Hitler," and to a degree of even Walter Lippmann in the New York Times. Others, like Louis Nizer, in "What to do with Germany," argue against the breaking up of the German empire, and still others argue for the restoration of the republic. The book by Seger and Marck called "Germany, to be or not to be" takes this stand, and Emil Ludwig rather vaguely says, "The Germans will be grateful for any sign of friendliness, as they have suffered suppression." I wonder what the people in Poland and in occupied Norway would think of that suggestion by Mr. Ludwig. I have quoted these five cases because to-day there is across this continent a concentrated effort by certain Germans to form our public opinion as to what we should do with Germany. That is one of the most dangerous things we are facing to-day.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member has exhausted the time at his disposal.

Mr. ADAMSON: Mr. Chairman, may I just read one paragraph from what was left in prisoner-of-war camps after the last war, just to show what I think we must guard against. This was given to our men when they left German prisoner-of-war camps after the last war:

> It took four years for the German people, the people themselves who have never hated you, to come into their own. It took four years of endless privations and sufferings to make our people realize that they had been ill-guided and misled.
> The four years spent in this camp have left their mark on you. Do not hold the German people responsible for it; it has suffered more than you. The people were the slaves of a barbaric system without parallel in history which enforced its dictates with brutal severity.
> Therefore leave without any ill-feeling or hatred and do not hold the German people responsible for the deeds committed by its former autocratic leaders.

That was the story in 1918. I say to the Prime Minister that we will receive the same sloppy sob-story again, and that we are beginning to receive it. It is of the most vital importance that this government, in its foreign policy and in its dealings with Germany should have experts, trained people, who know exactly what is going on, people trained in European politics, so that we may not again fall into the mistakes we made after the last war.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Chairman, any one would realize that the atmosphere of this chamber to-night is most congenial for the making of speeches, because one does not need to waste time in getting warmed up to his subject.

I rise this evening to speak for only a few moments in support of what was said by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) and to show a little gratitude to the people who have done more for civilization of the world than any other people. Before proceeding to prove that, however, I should like to say that I think the clergy of British Columbia and throughout Canada should stick to their jobs in raising the character and calibre of citizenship so that it may shine above the character of citizenship coming from Japan. The churches in Canada have a job on their hands. If they get busy—and I think they are busy in certain quarters—in raising the character and calibre of the men and women in Canada they will be doing a far bigger job than they will do by finding fault with the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his statesmanship.

I have said that the Jews have done more for civilization than any other nation on earth, and these are my reasons. They have led in the law. What nation is there to-day which has not built its jurisprudence on the laws of Moses? They have led in music and poetry. I can remember as a boy hearing Doctor Davidson of the city of London saying that the hundredth Psalm, sung to the tune "Old Hundred", has more majesty in it than all the sweet melodies of Europe.

They led in literature and, if you wish to prove that, when you go home to-night—as I expect the Prime Minister will do—read the 42nd chapter of Isaiah, and note the beauty of that literature. It is literature par excellence.

The Jews have led the world in science. We would do well to-day to practice some of their scientific findings in respect of food and sanitation. We know, too, that the shipbuilders of the world have to go back to old Noah. When he built his ark the people of that time said that he was most foolish. But the men who to-day are building ships are building them along the same lines and plans as that old foolish ark of Noah.

The Jews lead the world in knowledge of finance. This seems not to have been their first heritage, because they were shepherds at first. They had to make things go, and they had to finance with very little money. I would pay further tribute to the Jews I have known during the depression because I never saw a Hebrew on relief.

As a boy I read the story of Gideon, and I still pride myself in thinking that the strategy of that great general, Gideon, who outflanked all the multitude of the Midianites, was of a high order. So that the Hebrews even of that day led the world in military strategy.

Only the other day I read again the story of Esther. And when I think of Haman, and his prejudice against the Jews, I think how like Hitler he was blinded, so that he made a scaffold on which to hang Mordecai. Mordecai was able to show that their cause was just, and on that gallows Haman was hanged. I am sure there is no Jew in Germany to-day who would change places with Hitler, because Hitler started out to execute the Jews, and he will have to pay the penalty.

When I think of the Hebrew people and of what they have suffered—and God only knows what those people have suffered, when one remembers that they would rather throw themselves into the river than go through the persecution they were made to suffer at the hands of Hitler, even before the war—I would appeal to the Prime Minister, with his Scottish background and his Scottish birth—and a sympathy so great that he can show his affection even for an Irish terrier, sufficient to make it his bosom friend—that he go-all-out to help the Jew; because, after all, being a Jew is only an accident of birth. If my mother and father had been Hebrew my name would have been Daniel Ivanstein instead of plain Dan.

I can tell you, Mr. Chairman, that, as the hon. member for Trinity has said, what the Prime Minister has done is just plain justice. I was just a little disappointed when I read the recent brief biography by Mr. Ludwig that he attributed the Prime Minister and President Roosevelt's strength to the fact that they were able to sleep well. I know the Prime Minister sleeps well, and for no other reason than when he closes his eyes in sleep and lets God watch over him in the night, he does not waste his time in being a second watchman. Then that biographer redeemed himself in the last chapter of that little book by stating in what the Prime Minister believed. If he worships and believes in Jehovah he will help to pull the Jews out of their trouble.

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, when external affairs are discussed in this house I think of war and the possibilities of war. The war in which we are now engaged is not a war to end war. I have heard no person make such an exaggerated claim. In the distant or near future, no one can say when, this country will be engaged again in a struggle for its existence.

There is no one who hates war more than I do, no one who has less heart for fighting, but I say with all the earnestness I can command that we must be realists and face the fact squarely, that the history of mankind is the history of war; that except for brief and precarious interludes there has been no peace in the world; that only a few countries in the world have a truly democratic form of government and understand what democracy means; that the millennium is a long way off; that some countries still regard war as a legitimate instrument of policy for the promotion of prestige, influence, territorial aggrandisement and commercial expansion; that in Germany to-day, and for a considerable number of years past, the youth of the country have been educated in nazi doctrines and have had indelible impressions made upon their minds before they could think or reason; and that in days to come, ambitious men at the head of government will attempt once more to dominate the world by force and take from us our free institutions and rob us of our possessions.

Facing these facts, it behooves us to ask ourselves who we can count on to stand with us when we have to fight for our existence again.

I think lessons can be learned from some of the events that followed the last war. The purpose of the allies after the armistice of 1918 was to establish a lasting peace among disarmed nations. Let us give them all credit for their intentions. The treaty of Versailles was signed on June 30, 1919. The covenant of the League of Nations was put into the forefront of that treaty. The league provided its members with an assembly for the discussion of matters of common interest, including, I believe, economic matters and matters of social justice. It provided its members also with a council that had the power to act if the members of the league were unanimous. Unanimity was a necessary consequence of the principle of national sovereignty, a principle which, I think, is sometimes overemphasized.

The members of the league were obliged to submit all disputes between themselves to arbitration or conciliation and in no event to go to war until three months after an award had been made by the arbitrators or a report made to the council. If any member of the league went to war in contravention of this agreement it would be deemed to have committeed an act of war against all the other members of the league and put the other members under an obligation to prevent all financial, commercial and personal intercourse with the aggressor. The members of the league obligated themselves also not to engage in unlimited competition in armaments and the council was to formulate plans for the reduction of arms.

The league was regarded as the high symbol of a new order in the world. It was to heal the wounds that had been inflicted, not only by the war but by the treaty itself. It had active and sincere supporters throughout the world. And the League of Nations failed to maintain the peace.

In 1923 a committee of the league proposed a treaty of mutual assistance to support the league. This treaty which branded "aggressive war" as "an international crime" and contained complicated provisions for general assistance to the victims of aggressors, fortified by regional pacts to provide them with regional assistance, was not accepted by Great Britain, Russia or the United States.

It was followed in 1924 by the protocol of Geneva which was the perfect model of collective security on paper. It outlawed war, defined an aggressor as one who refused arbitration, and provided economic, military and naval sanctions against him. The British government, after Ramsay MacDonald fell, refused to proceed with it, for the British people objected to taking risks all over Europe, and the dominions refused to have matters in which they were particularly interested, such as the immigration of coloured races, referred by compulsion to a court of international justice sitting in Europe.

The rejection of the protocol ended the dream of a universal organization for peace. But if there could not be a universal organization for peace, was it not possible for the great nations of the world, or some of them, to get together to prevent war? This was attempted. On December 1, 1925, the Locarno treaties were entered into. By those treaties Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Belgium undertook never to resort to war one with the other, and all undertook to come immediately to the assistance of any one of them that was attacked. It was announced that Germany would join the league on a common footing with the other members and that the last of the allied troops would be withdrawn from her territory.

The signing of these treaties was regarded as a great achievement. There was much rejoicing in Great Britain. A new era was said to have dawned. The Locarno spirit was to banish all the suspicion and recrimination that had hung over a great part of the world since the armistice. And the Locarno treaties failed to maintain the peace.

In 1928 we had the Kellogg pact whereby the nations adhering to it "solemnly declare in the name of their respective peoples that they now condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their dealings with one another." From thence forth the contracting nations agreed that "the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatsoever nature or of whatever origin they may be which may arise among them was never to be sought except by pacific means."

There was great rejoicing at this "outlawry of war," as it was called. War had been regarded as an instrument of policy, but if this contrary doctrine was accepted and disputes were to be settled by pacific means, the greatest and most beneficial change in human history was to be brought about. And the Kellogg pact failed to maintain the peace.

If war was to be outlawed, the nations should have been disarmed, but the Kellogg pact and disarmament were kept in separate compartments. The question of disarmament, however, had occupied the attention of the allies since the armistice. Numerous conferences were held. A little progress was made. There was, however, great difference of opinion as to how it was to be brought about. Some held the view that security must precede disarmament; others, that there could be no security without disarmament. Those who were most anxious about their future were those who were most cautious about reducing arms. The professed friends of disarmament turned out in some cases to be the most dangerous aggressors. Throughout these long negotiations we see the figures of Ramsay MacDonald, Arthur Henderson, Sir John Simon and Anthony Eden earnestly endeavouring to arrive at understandings with the other nations concerned. The efforts to disarm failed, and in 1936 the nations of the world or a good many of them started to rearm in earnest.

Is this very brief recital of disappointed hopes and frustrated efforts of no importance? Is it merely a story of events which are over and done with and to be forgotten? Are there no lessons to be learned from the unsuccessful attempts which were made to secure a peace that would last for generations?

I ask myself this question, will a treaty or agreement entered into by nations with different languages, laws, characteristics, interests, ambitions and ideologies to establish a world council to prevent wars or their planning in advance be lived up to? Can it be counted on as a practical means to maintain the peace?

Well, unless the people of this world are much wiser than they were after the last war, we cannot be too hopeful.

Peoples, the history of the league has proved, will not make any sacrifice for ideals and will act only for motives of national importance. They are absolutely short-sighted in their outlook. . . .

Says Arthur B. Keith in his book, "The Causes of the War," published in 1940.

Why did the efforts of many well-intentioned and intelligent men fail? I do not profess to have a complete answer, but the answer, or part of it, can be found in the fact that all the nations were not actuated by good will; that there was a lack of true international community; that war was still regarded by some as a legitimate instrument of policy; that national ambitions remained; that the bitterness engendered by over four years of war remained; that fears and suspicions remained; that a spirit of revenge remained; and that in defeat the dominating class in Germany resolved to bide its time and "bite on granite."

Is anyone prepared to say that a similar state of mind will not exist when this war ends? I agree fully with what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in this chamber on May 22 last, soon after his return from London, that "forces of evil have been let loose in the world which it is going to be difficult indeed to bring to bay. These forces of evil," he went on to say, "are going to continue to destroy"—I thought he might have added, "or attempt to destroy"—"all that is best in mankind."

Now, sir, there is no lack of good will; there are no fears or suspicions; there is no bitterness or misunderstanding; there are no international rivalries between the members of the British commonwealth of nations. On the contrary, there are strong ties of understanding, good will, cooperation and kinship, and there are strong ties of great sacrifices made in achieving great ends. We know that any agreement made between the members of the British commonwealth of nations will be kept. We know their word can be relied on. In view of the fact that this country will be at war fighting for its existence sometime in the future—when, we cannot say; in view of the fact that the dragon of evil has been scotched but has not been killed, I believe and urge that an agreement be entered into between the members of the British commonwealth and announced to all the world, that if Canada or any other member of the British commonwealth is attacked, or if Canada or any other member of the British commonwealth is obliged to go to war, all the other members of the commonwealth will come to its assistance.

The great maxim should be proclaimed in no uncertain terms to all the world that when the king declares war the commonwealth and empire are at war.

When the last war broke out—it has been referred to before this evening—Sir Wilfrid Laurier in this house gave expression, I believe, to that opinion or that idea when he said, "When Great Britain is at war we are at war."

A policy of that kind would not be a blow at the peace of the world. It would make for peace. One of the reasons Germany went to war in 1914 and again in 1939 was that she believed the members of the commonwealth would not stand together. "Our enemies looked to this war as they looked to the last great war to sound the death-knell of this great association", said the Right Hon. Anthony Eden, in the course of his speech to the General Session of the Joint Assembly of Maryland in March of last year.

A policy of this kind would not interfere with our carrying out or assisting to carry out the policies laid down in the Atlantic charter. Nor would it be an obstacle to Canada joining a world council of the great states which emerge victorious from this war. A policy of this kind would bring greater security to Canada and the British commonwealth, and it would put an end to the disquieting feelings of uncertainty and insecurity that existed in this country from 1920 to 1939. A policy of this kind should be our first line of defence and security.

And let me say that in my opinion the British empire and commonwealth is worth maintaining. It covers about one-quarter of the earth's surface and contains approximately one-fourth of the world's population—people of all races and colours in various stages of development. It stands for liberty, freedom, justice and the rights of minorities within the law. A large part of it has acquired political freedom and is struggling along the road to economic freedom, freedom from fear and want, social security. It stands for peace. It is opposed to war. It has great responsibilities for the less advanced people who live within its boundaries. Its greatest work lies ahead. In a hundred years from now we may have ten or twelve free dominions within its boundaries if we are wise and work together in the interests of humanity and our own security.

I said it stood for liberty and the rights of minorities. I recall with pride the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier spoken many years ago now in the city of Quebec at the unveiling of a statue to Wolfe and Montcalm. He said:

The British flag floats over our heads, and there is not in the province a single English soldier to defend it. Its only defence is the gratitude we owe it for the liberty and the security we enjoy under its shadow. Is there a Canadian who, comparing his country with any other country, no matter how great the freedom enjoyed there, does not feel proud of the constitution that protects him.

He went on to say that although the French had been defeated in the battle of the plains of Abraham they had made a conquest, "the conquest of liberty. We are a free people; we are in the minority; but all our rights, privileges and customs have been preserved. These rights are part of the country's constitution."

I recall also certain words of Jan Christian Smuts, a Boer, who fought the British at the turn of the century, inflicted many grievous reverses on them, but in the end was obliged to surrender and experience the bitterness of defeat. And let me say that defeat in war is a very bitter thing. In an article he wrote on the British empire a short time ago, in which he was not uncritical of some events of the past, he said:

> But to-day the British empire is the widest system of organized human freedom that has ever existed in history.

I have mentioned the work that lies ahead. I recall the words of Herbert Morrison, one of the leaders of the Labour party in Great Britain, a socialist who has done outstanding work in this war. In an interview with him that appeared not long ago, he said, speaking of the administration of the colonies:

> Critics of the empire, of whom I am often one, are quick to point out the regrettable exceptions to our standard of good government. The mistakes of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries are better not forgotten, but remembered, so that we may not repeat them in this enlightened age. We have established a good system of law and public administration throughout the one quarter of the earth's surface, which is our empire. We have brought order and sown the seeds of citizenship in hundreds of uncivilized communities. We have spread education, public health, social services and increased incomes in many lands. This has been no easy task, and in most cases we have carried on government while leaving nations' cultures intact. The British people have a right to be proud of this contribution to the advancement of human society.... The future of this empire will not be decided by argument, bitter or otherwise. It can rise to new greatness only by the determined efforts of its people. We have unlimited and inspiring tasks ahead of us. We have vast unsettled lands, great treasures of undeveloped wealth, and the combined talents of millions of people. In the last fifty years, as the growth of our commonwealth has proved, the British empire has come to stand for free political fellowship. Perhaps a hundred years from now there will be ten or twelve or more free dominions.

In view of the policy I have advocated, that an agreement or understanding be entered into between members of the British commonwealth of nations, and announced to all the world, that if any one of them is attacked or obliged to go to war all the other members of the commonwealth will come to its assistance, it is hardly necessary for me to say that I was disappointed at the joint statement issued by the prime ministers at the conclusion of their conference in London on May 17 last. I have no complaint to make of the policy which that statement contained to the effect that a joint all-out effort would be continued to bring the war to a victorious conclusion, but I was disappointed to find that it contained no post-war statement of policy that would bring the members of the British Commonwealth of nations closer together. True, it said that:

> After the war a world organization to maintain peace and security should be set up and endowed with the necessary power and authority to prevent aggression and violence.

I realize that the word "should" had to be used and not the word "will", because the other great nations that are engaged in the war were not present at that conference. But there was no statement in that document of what was to be the policy, or any policy, of the members of the commonwealth as between themselves. I expected that something would have been said on this important subject, something of a reassuring nature, which would make for closer cooperation, collaboration and understanding both in peace and in war.

It failed even to support the proposal of the Right Hon. John Curtin, Prime Minister of Australia, that a permanent secretariat be established. I favour that proposal. I believe it is practical. It does not affect our national sovereignty. Many of us would like to know why it was not adopted, who opposed it, and for what reasons. I realize of course that the meetings of the prime ministers were held in strict secrecy, but I think we might have some explanation of why Mr. Curtin's suggestion was not approved. May I pause here to say that in my opinion the words "national sovereignty" should be given a wide interpretation when used between nations that bear allegiance to the same king. Mr. Curtin still supports the idea of a permanent secretariat. In an interview he gave to the press when he was here in Ottawa he is reported as saying:

> I have asked for more frequent consultation and I have also asked that we shall have a constant study of common problems. I feel that having regard to the changing character and personnel of these conferences it is desirable to have some permanent element associated with the department of state in which particular problems will have continuous examination. I used the word "secretariat" in Australia in the same sense that I want some system to regulate the data so that when a problem blows out of the sky there will be some background on which to base its study.

I place these words on the record because I believe the matter is worthy of further consideration.

It is too much to expect that we can all be of one mind on matters of external affairs and foreign policy in this country at the present time. But I think the subject is one that is too vital to be made a matter of party politics. I do not think it is a subject about which we should endeavour to put the government or the Prime Minister "on the spot". In my opinion the manner in which the subject should be considered was well expressed by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill in the British House of Commons on the third reading of the military training bill on May 18, 1939, when he said:

I submit to you that matters of national defence and foreign policy ought to be considered upon a plane above party and apart from the natural antagonism which separates government and opposition. They affect the life of the nation. They influence the future of the world.

I was disappointed this morning when I heard the Prime Minister say that there was to be no common voice or no one voice to speak for the commonwealth. That is the way I understood him. I have not his speech before me and I may not have understood him correctly. I thought he said that there was not to be one voice to speak on behalf of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is quite wrong.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to get it correctly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "No one voice ever to speak." I never uttered a word of the kind.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to get it right from the Prime Minister if I can. There would not be a single—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not that there was never to be a single voice. That was not the point at all. There are those who are urging that the one voice to represent the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa shall be the voice that emanates from London.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have the right to make my statement. I say that each part of the British commonwealth of nations has an equal right to its voice on matters of foreign policy, and that the great genius of the British commonwealth as respects the different self-governing nations is that while each is able to express its voice they usually succeed in so converging their views that the voice of the commonwealth is expressed as one.

Mr. HAZEN: I thank the Prime Minister for exlaining it to me, and I am very glad that I misunderstood him this morning, because if he had not explained it I would have had a wrong impression I am very glad I had a false impression of what he said. I thank him for clearing up the point this evening. There were one or two things I had intended to say, but I will stop here.

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): I shall not attempt to follow the hon. member (Mr. Hazen) who has just sat down nor the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) in the setting out of the policy of the years after the last war and leading up to this war. Volumes have been written about that and volumes will still be written. I think they oversimplified the case in a good many instances. But they made this clear, that it is not an easy task to organize peace; that there are in the way difficulties that seem almost insurmountable as you come toward them. I have no doubt where Canada stands. Canada stands as a member of the British commonwealth of her own free will. There is no coercion on the part of any country, the United Kingdom or anyone else to cause her to take that stand; but because we find that our ideals are similar, our objectives much the same, our whole outlook on life finds common ground with the dominions and Great Britain. We may arrive at our decisions by somewhat different paths, but those decisions are founded on the same love of freedom, of democracy and of progress, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has just stated in his answer to what the last speaker said. Beyond the commonwealth we have expressed our determination to participate fully in international organizations. Actions speak louder than words. All through this war period we have shown by our policy, by the use made of our armed forces, by furnishing large quantities of food supplies and other aid to our partners in the war on terms designed to leave no aftermath of uncertain post-war obligations, that we are participating in the prevention of another third world war and that we shall continue to participate in endeavours in that direction.

When the director of the International Labour Organization presented his report at the conference in Philadelphia, which I had the honour to attend last April and May, he emphasized the new developments in the economic field and he presented that to the representatives of forty-two nations of the world. I think he left no doubt in the minds of those representatives of forty-two nations as to where Canada stood in the several references in his report to Canada and Canadian policy. Take, for instance, this one sentence. I do not wish to spend too much time in going into long quotations, but I should like to give this one:

It is therefore noteworthy that the principles of repayment laid down in the master agreements are designed to improve these relations—

He was referring to lend-lease and mutual aid.

—and to prevent the emergence after this war of the problems of inter-allied indebtedness which caused so many difficulties in the decade following the last war.

That is, the policy itself was going to help to prevent a third war. Up-to-date history, not history of what has passed under the bridge is what we need. There is no doubt we made some mistakes, but we are looking forward to correcting them now.

At several places in the report the director referred to what Canada was doing in co-ordinating the powers of the united nations. The international wheat agreement of June, 1942; the mutual aid agreement between Canada on the one hand and Great Britain, the Soviet union, Australia, China, and the French committee of national liberation on the other, are instances. Canada has shown that she is carrying forward these policies into the post-war world by the setting up of such bodies as the Export Credits Insurance Corporation. I should like to give another quotation from the report of the international labour conference which will be found on page 25, as follows:

The contribution of the lend-lease and mutual aid arrangements to the war effort of the united nations needs no emphasis; but as the day of victory approaches it will be well to bear in mind the possible peace-time applications of the concepts underlying these arrangements. Article VII of the master lease-lend agreements and article X of the mutual aid agreements register the determination of the governments concerned to pursue policies directed to the attainment of all the economic objectives set forth in the Atlantic charter. This charter, as Mr. E. R. Stettinius, former lend-lease administrator, has emphasized in discussing the post-war implications of lend-lease, "is a charter of unlimited opportunity". "Lend-lease operations, as we know them now," he observes, "will some day draw to a close, but we know already that the principle of mutual aid in mutual self-interest that is embodied in the lend-lease act must live on. To-day there is more unity of purpose and of action among freedom-loving peoples than ever before. In that unity we can find the strength to build a peaceful world in which freedom and opportunity will be secure for all."

By her participation in that meeting of the International Labour Organization Canada showed her desire to take her place with the other nations in working out these policies. The same might be said of her participation in the agricultural conferences, in UNRRA and in the monetary conference; that we are ready to recognize our responsibilities and to meet them. At this Philadelphia conference we spoke of measures of social security in all the forty-two countries represented. Surely that is a contribution to world peace. By the interchange of views and free discussion we showed what each country plans for the workers along that line. There is some similarity in all these problems in the different countries, although there are also wide differences. But surely it is helping to work out the principles of the Atlantic charter when at a meeting of forty-two nations these matters can be discussed, opinions compared and solutions suggested and recommended.

Canada has advanced along that line during the war years. We have unemployment insurance, and last week we adopted family allowances. By our policy within the country, maintaining the good from the old that has served us fairly well in previous times, and reaching out for the new as the new emerges, we shall go a long way toward preventing wars in future. Canada is putting her own house in order in these measures, with her floor under farm and fisheries prices. As these countries improve their economic conditions and help each other they will also be laying a foundation upon which peace can rest.

I do not intend to go back over what was said so ably this morning by the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I only wanted to put these matters on record as the up-to-date history of one phase, of which I have personal knowledge, of what Canada is doing toward building up peace. It seems to me the most fitting memorial we could erect to those brave men who are fighting our battles is the building of international organizations which will prevent the recurrence of a catastrophe such as the one we are facing at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: During the course of the discussion to-day, Mr. Chairman, hon. gentlemen opposite, two or three of them in particular, directed a number of questions to me and made a number of references to my remarks of this morning, relating to the matter of an imperial council, to an empire secretariat, and to the "one voice" which should represent all parts of the British commonwealth. This house I think would be interested in knowing whether the criticisms of my statements expressed by these hon. gentlemen are their own views, whether they are speaking for themselves or speaking for the party to which they belong. It so happens that the leader of the Progressive Conservative party has made rather definite statements on all these matters, and I think it is important that these statements should be presented to the house in order that hon. members will realize, if the debate continues along the line it has taken to-day, that, in their criticism directed towards me, hon. gentlemen, as a matter of fact, have been criticizing their own leader. I think we are entitled to know what is the policy of the Progressive Conservative party on these all-important matters. In Maclean's Magazine of May 1, 1944, there is a statement of policy published in the name of Mr. John Bracken. I propose to read the questions that were put to Mr. Bracken, and the answers he gave. I assume that this article was published by the magazine in order to place the position of the different parties before the country. Question No. 13, as it appears in Maclean's, reads:

What should Canada's relationship be to Britain and the British commonwealth?

Answer: It should be that of an adult member of the commonwealth family. She should cooperate generously but she should retain the right to make her own decisions. She is bound, however, to the other members of the family by the ties which hold together any household that is loyal to worthy traditions and which looks back with pride to a good heritage. Canada's attitude should be one of willing and cheerful cooperation with other parts of the British commonwealth, freely associating with them and seeking every possible means to further the trade and peace and progress of the world, but wholly autonomous in her relations with them.

(14) Question: Should the commonwealth set up an imperial council, as suggested by Australian Prime Minister John Curtin? If so, should this council have executive or merely advisory functions? Should its decisions be binding on commonwealth members?

Answer: I am in favour of strengthening the ties which bind the nations of the commonwealth together and I believe that a technique of continuous consultation in matters of common interest should be developed. The present arrangements I regard as inadequate; we fight wars but we don't help prevent them. I believe in frequent commonwealth conferences and closer cooperation toward common objectives of a constructive character but I do not favour the establishment of any permanent agency which would unduly centralize the influence or increase the rigidity of the commonwealth structure. Such conferences as are held should be advisory and consultative and their findings should not be binding unless approved by parliament.

(15) Question: Should Canada be committed to fight in defence of the interests of any part of the commonwealth?

That was the point dealt with by the hon. member for St. John-Albert in the latter part of his remarks.

Answer: Does this mean a prior commitment? I do not think the Canadian people would agree to a commitment which might precipitate them into a war, the causes or consequences of which they could not foresee.

In the commonwealth councils our efforts should be directed toward preventing war. In the contingency you raise, that of war affecting the interests of any part of the commonwealth, our position would inevitably incline us to aid in preventing unjust aggression; but the decision should rest with the Canadian parliament. It would then know the existing circumstances. It would then know, for example, whether the structure of the commonwealth was in danger, any international convenant to which we might have subscribed broken, and the degree to which our interests were affected. In the light of such circumstances it should make its decision.

(16) Question: At last year's session of parliament two opposing views on foreign policy became apparent—one, that commonwealth nations should speak with "one voice" in world affairs; the other, that Canada should develop her own foreign policy, which might not necessarily agree with the foreign policy of other commonwealth nations. What is your own view on this issue?

Answer: This question suggests there are only two alternatives. This is not necessarily so. In my opinion the best means for Canada to influence world affairs at the moment is in two directions; through her influence in the commonwealth family and through her individual relationships with all other nations, particularly the United States. These commonwealth nations should endeavour to reach common agreement with respect to peace, trade and other matters and I would hope they would generally succeed; but they should not be required to accept majority decisions except on the approval of their parliaments and they should not be denied consultation with other nations. In my opinion that is the most sane and practical mode of cooperation within the commonwealth and the most acceptable form or relationship with other nations. But our parliament must continue to be free to determine its own course.

There is a pronouncement on each of the three main issues which have been raised by hon. gentlemen opposite in attempted criticism of my position; and, in attacking me, in reality they have been attacking their own leader. It is about time we had someone from the opposite side tell us whether the hon. gentlemen who have spoken from the official opposition to-day were speaking as members of the Progressive Conservative party and in doing so were enunciating its policy; and, if so, on what grounds they justify their complete opposition to the position taken by their leader.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, may I just say one word—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the floor.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to interrupt the discussion between the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), but I have been rather anxious to speak for a few moments to-night with respect to one matter which has been brought to the attention of the committee.

Before doing so, however, I should like to associate myself with the views expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of this group. We of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are firmly of the opinion that, just as a nation is strong when its people are free, so does the strength of the British commonwealth of nations lie in the freedom and autonomy of the nations which make up its membership. I hope that this principle will be extended into the world at large in the years which lie ahead, and that more and more we shall have free and autonomous peoples associated together in the building of an ever wider community of nations, so that we may build a world of permanent peace, and freedom from fear and want for all mankind.

Another matter was raised to-day about which I should like to make passing comment, and that is the discussion we have had about Canadian citizens of Japanese origin. All I wish to say about that is this: I was encouraged a few weeks ago by the evidence we had that the heart of the Canadian people is essentially sound on this matter of racial discrimination. It is clear that the great majority of our people want none of it. I shall not again go into the argument with respect to a section of bill No. 135 to which some of us objected. But it was a source of encouragement for some of us to discover that when the fact that that section had been inserted in bill No. 135 became public property there was a great deal of opposition to it from one end of Canada to the other. This shows, in reply to some of the comments we have heard in the chamber to-day, that on this question of racial discrimination the heart of the Canadian people—even in war-time—is essentially sound, and I am glad that that is so.

The matter to which I wish to direct particular attention for a few minutes is the one raised this evening by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck). I congratulate him upon the speech he made and upon the manner in which he presented his case. A little over a year ago when I drew the attention of the house to the terrible plight of the Jewish people, I was greeted with a caustic comment from the other side. That comment is to be found in the pages of Hansard. I am glad to notice that there is a slightly different attitude in the chamber to-night toward the suffering of these oppressed people. We have heard several references to their situation, and I hope the Prime Minister will give heed to the appeal made by the hon. member for Trinity.

I refer in particular to that phase of this subject concerning which there is some immediacy, namely the fact that Admiral Horthy has made it clear that some 400,000 Jewish refugees in Hungary will be permitted to leave that country if provision can be made for their entry into Palestine, or their protection somewhere else. As I understand it, there are about 20,000—there might be a few more than that, but not many—visas in blank form left over from the period prior to March 31 of this year, when the British white paper of 1939 came into full effect and resulted in the closing of the doors of Palestine to Jewish immgiration. But those 20,000 blank visas will not go very far toward helping to find a place of refuge for 400,000 who could now be placed somewhere else than in occupied Europe. I urge upon the Prime Minister to recall the language of the Balfour declaration which referred to the establishment of a home for Jewish people in Palestine. These people feel it is hardly consistent with the term "home" to have it declared now that the doors of that place called "home" are closed to the children of that land.

I hope the Prime Minister will realize that when we are speaking about this matter we are fully conscious of the fact that the mandatory power is in the United Kingdom. That does not mean we are suggesting that as an outside nation we should try to bring pressure upon another power in connection with a matter which is not our business. I emphasize, as I have said before, that this matter is our business. The mandate of the United Kingdom over Palestine was incorporated into the covenant of the League of Nations to which Canada was a signatory. In the years both prior to and following the announcement of the Balfour declaration, Canada, the United States and other allied nations in the last war were consulted. The Balfour declaration is in reality a joint proposition, and I feel, not as a matter of exerting pressure but rather as a matter of stating our position as one of those countries concerned, that the Prime Minister should do all he can to try to secure reconsideration of the white paper of 1939, and that an effort should be made along those lines right away, owing to the immediacy of the situation created by the announcement made recently by Admiral Horthy.

In this connection there is a question I should like to ask the Prime Minister. It is possible he might be able to answer it in brief form to-night. On March 30 of this year, just before the doors of Palestine were closed to immigration under the white paper of 1939, I asked the Prime Minister certain questions about this matter. That was just before he was going to the London conference of prime ministers, and it was also at a time when he was meeting delegations representing the Jewish community in Canada. I asked him if he would endeavour to have the matter considered at the conference in London. He replied, as reported at page 2003 of Hansard for March 30, 1944, that he understood that this matter would be considered at the conference. I went farther and asked him if he would indicate that if he found the matter was not on the agenda he would see to it that it was raised. The Prime Minister's reply, in part, was in these affirmative words:

> To those who have waited upon me I have said that it was a matter I intended to see would be considered at the meeting of prime ministers.

I should be very glad if the Prime Minister would indicate, either now or when he has an opportunity to answer, whether the question was discussed at that conference, and, if so, if there is any report he can give as to the discussions. Can he tell the committee whether on the basis of those discussions, and on the basis on the study he has given to this matter since that time, there is in his view any opportunity that advantage may be taken of the announcement made by Admiral Horthy?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can answer my hon. friend at once about the conference. I would say to him that, during the meetings of prime ministers, the matters pertaining to Palestine did come up. They were not on the agenda, but I took care to mention that, immediately before leaving the House of Commons in Ottawa, I had been asked if I would bring forward certain representations that had been made by hon. members on the floor, and I did so. The conference had many matters to consider. This was a large question that required consideration from many points of view and it was not possible to have it fully discussed. However, I did carry out the undertaking that I gave the house before I left. That is all I can say about it, because such parts of the proceedings of the conference as it has been thought advisable to have made public have been made public, and I am not in a position to say anything about matters that have not been made public.

Mr. KNOWLES: Nevertheless, I trust that the Prime Minister and the Department of External Affairs are giving active consideration to this matter. I know that strong representations have been made to the under-secretary of state for external affairs. I have before me a copy of the memoranda from which the hon. member for Trinity read earlier this evening and which was presented to the under-secretary by the Canadian Palestine committee. I may say that that committee is made up primarily of non-Jewish people. I am very happy to notice from the letterhead that not only are the leader of this group and I, as well as certain other members of the C.C.F. included in the membership of that committee, but there are several other members of this house. I think I should mention them and congratulate them upon their interest in these oppressed people. The ones whose names appear on the letterhead are the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand), the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) and the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Ross).

The fact that people of this calibre, if I may use that phrase, are associated with this organization is an indication of the feeling that many of us have for the plight of these people. We are in the midst of a war against Hitlerism. The terrors of Hitlerism first fell upon these people, and I think it is safe to say that no human beings in the world have suffered to the extent they have. I suggest that the least we can do is to exert all our efforts to relieve any part of their sufferings it is possible to relieve. There is this immediate situation which has been drawn to the attention of the Prime Minister, and I hope he will give it his further active consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: I had intended directing some inquiries to the Prime Minister, as indicated earlier in the discussion to-day, and I have one or two observations to make with respect to the general item under discussion. But the hour is late and perhaps I can go on when the committee resumes its discussion of this item.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Saturday, August 5, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

GRAIN

DELIVERY QUOTAS—PROGRESS OF PARTICIPATION PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): In view of the fact that a number of hon. members will soon be going back home, I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make a statement with regard to the marketing programme that will be in force this year respecting wheat and other grains.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It has been suggested by the hon. member and by others that I make a statement on the grain delivery quotas that have just been put into effect in western Canada, and also upon the progress of the participation payments.

Initial quotas have been established on wheat for 1944-45 of five bushels per authorized acre, and on oats and barley of five bushels per seeded acre. No quotas have been placed on rye and flaxseed.

By the time the new crop deliveries commence in volume, the quotas at individual points will be adapted to the available space as in previous years, with due regard to acreage, yield and various market factors.

As was provided last year, producers who have barley suitable for malting purposes, and whose sample is accepted by the buyer, will be given a special permit to ship and deliver one car lot of malting barley over and above their present established quota.

By the close of the crop year on July 31, producers at nearly 90 per cent of the country points in the prairie provinces had been able to deliver the whole of the marketable quantities of their 1943 crops. At some 260 stations, however, the available space did not permit delivery of the balance of the 1943 crops, and at these stations open deliveries of wheat and oats from the old crop have been extended until August 15. Producers who were unable to deliver their barley on past open quotas, owing to lack of space at their delivery point, may apply to the Canadian wheat board for special permission to deliver.

With respect to the 1940-41 crop participation payments, up to the present approximately 225,000 requisitions have been received from producers, and approximately 170,000 cheques have been issued. The remainder of the 1940 cheques, based on requisitions already received, should be sent out within the next two or three weeks, with the exception, of course, of those requisitions which, for one reason or another, require adjustment. Immediately thereafter it is planned to start writing cheques for the 1941 and 1942 crops, which will go out in one cheque. At the same time, the Canadian wheat board will make arrangements for replacing lost certificates, of which there is a tremendous number.

The magnitude of the whole task will be apparent when it is realized that between duplicate and original certificates, approximately 10,000,000 certificates will have been handled.

Mr. PERLEY: What will be the number of bushels in the first quota?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Five bushels of wheat and oats.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to impress upon the minister the necessity of raising the quota as soon as possible to ten bushels, because I think the space is available. If he will look up and see what happened to the pool elevators after the restriction was taken off he will see that deliveries to their elevators increased from thirty-five to fifty per cent of all deliveries in just two or three months; therefore I think it is important to have as large a quota as possible in order not to discriminate against that organization.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The quota has to be set with the whole situation in the three western provinces in mind and not any one particular district. I am quite sure the representations of the hon. member will be considered.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROGRESS IN SETTLEMENT OF MONTREAL TRAMWAYS STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. According to an item in the Ottawa Journal this morning some progress has been made toward settling the Montreal tramways strike. I notice the article contains a suggestion that the minister might get some legal interpretation of the point at issue which precipitated the strike both in Halifax and Montreal, namely, the objection of the employers to accepting the union's proposal for the maintenance of membership clause in their agreement. Is the minister in a position to inform the house whether he has had some legal interpretation of section 20, paragraph 1, of order in council 1003, in order to clarify in the minds of the public the point that caused the strikes, so that we may have some reasonable understanding that there will not be a repetition of this in the future?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The points at issue in Halifax and Montreal are entirely different. In Halifax the point at issue is the check-off and maintenance of membership clause. Whoever gave my hon. friend the information, it is incorrect. The company and the organization in Montreal have agreed to the maintenance of membership clause and the check-off. That has been agreed to with certain reservations.

Mr. GILLIS: It is a matter of interpretation.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, it is not. Now that the hon. member has raised the point may I say that it has gone abroad that the Department of Labour has the power to call strikes or stop them. The only people who have the power to call strikes are the organizations themselves; and by the very nature of things that responsibility must rest on the organization involved or the employer as the case may be. But to try to get from under and to blame the Minister of Labour, whether it is the provincial minister or the federal minister is unfair. I have been in this game long enough to know that that is the old technique that has been carried out ever since I have been a trade unionist. Let us be frank and honest about that. I think I know something about leadership. I am convinced of this, that there are good men, able to give the right kind of leadership, and the rank and file will go down the line—that is the trade union language. I have had some connection with the tramways organization in Montreal over the last thirty years. I knew personally the man who organized that union, Magnus Sinclair, the vice-president of the Amalgamated Street Railway Employees of America. At that time he was assisted by "Bill" Mahon, who has been president for over forty years. Until recently they enjoyed what one might describe as reasonably satisfactory relations such as one expects when negotiations are going on between the employer and the employees. I think that should be made clear. I sat in convention with these men. I did not call the strike in Montreal, neither did the Department of Labour. We did everything humanly possible to prevent the third walkout in the last seventeen months. We used all the machinery that had been agreed upon by employers and employees in this country to settle industrial disputes. I think I said this before in the house, that when we drafted the labour relations code, neither the employer nor the employee approved the principle of compulsory arbitration up to the negotiations for the first contract. It was all based on the principle of conciliation.

As I said before, I know it has been hinted that I, as minister of the crown, should have said to this company: "You have to recognize the closed shop." Well, I am not going to do that.

Mr. GILLIS: They are not asking for that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know what they are asking for. I have sat through the negotiations, and when I say that I am moving in a goodly company. To begin with, under the legislation I have not the power to say to the employees or to the employers that they should recognize the closed shop. I remember a speech delivered by President Roosevelt in 1941 when he was addressing a conference of union and steel officials in Washington, I think. I got in touch with Washington yesterday and obtained a short transcript of his remarks, in which he made this observation:

> I tell you frankly that the government of the United States will not order, nor will Congress pass legislation ordering, a so-called closed shop.

My hon. friend knows that no government, even if his party should be fortunate enough to form a government and he should be the minister of labour, is going to pass legislation saying to a man that he has to go to a particular church or to belong to a particular fraternal society or to a particular trade union. Once a government takes that position, in my judgment democracy no longer functions.

So far as the labour relations code is concerned I take this position: provided that the employers and the employees mutually agree on the terms of a contract, my own view is they can do it. It so happens in this case that the company stepped in and said: we believe it is illegal; we believe it is in contradiction of the legislation that was passed recently by the province of Quebec to stop strikes in public utilities. There is nothing new about the position taken by either the lowest or the highest in the land in this regard. There is nothing new in an appeal to the courts in connection with what they think is their just rights. I think that is elementary and fundamental.

The president of the union has notified my department—and I think this will cover the point raised by the hon. member in regard to legal interpretation—that the men have told him that they will not return to work until an agreement has been made that all men employed and all men who are employed in the future shall be required to become members of the union. On the other hand, the company has stated that in its opinion the resentment which would be stirred up amongst the public in Montreal if the company agreed even to the modified agreement which was previously under consideration, would be so great that the management would have to retire. Certainly the company would not be prepared to grant the terms now being asked by the men. I have explained the legal position. I hope I have made myself clear to my hon. friend.

Mr. GILLIS: You had a legal opinion on it?

Mr. MITCHELL: No, I am giving my own opinion; I am not speaking for the courts.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not a legal opinion?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. GILLIS: I have no intention of pursuing this matter, Mr. Speaker, but we are at a great disadvantage; the minister can debate the issue while we cannot. What I wanted to clarify in my own mind, and for the sake of the people concerned, was the legal position within the meaning of the labour code. It seems to me that if the position of the strikers is legal, then the employers are in an illegal position and should be handled accordingly. Somebody is in an illegal position.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is my hon. friend in favour of the closed shop?

Mr. GILLIS: As you understand it, no; as I understand it, yes.

Mr. DUPUIS: Then how do you understand it?

Mr. GILLIS: I do understand it, and you do not; that is the trouble.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not as simple as my hon. friend states; I want to be clear on that point. He is going a long way when he says one party is in an illegal position. At the moment I am not discussing the merits of the matter.

Mr. GILLIS: They cannot both be right within the meaning of the code.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then let us get it clear in this way. In Halifax they had a board of conciliation, and the employers turned down the report of that board. In Montreal they had a board of conciliation and the employees turned down the report of the board, which was quite within their rights under the code.

RELEASE OF MEN FROM EQUIPMENT AND PERSONNEL SECTIONS, R.C.A.F.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ascertain from the Minister of Labour whether there has been any change recently in the regulations in regard to securing man-power for industry and agriculture. I ask the question because at the various airports in Manitoba within the last few days the equipment and personnel sections of the Royal Canadian Air Force have been ordered to assemble to hear an official letter from headquarters which indicates that any man in equipment and personnel in the air force may now receive his discharge, if he applies for it, in order to return to essential industry or to the farm. Does this represent a new move on the part of the government to secure necessary man-power for industry or agriculture? Was this order issued in collaboration with the Department of Labour? What changes have necessitated the making of this order, which seems to be quite a departure from the demand for man-power for the armed forces heretofore believed necessary?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I think my hon. friend had better direct that query to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). I have a big enough show to run myself, without taking on anything else.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But it has to do with man-power, which comes under the Department of Labour.

VETERANS' INSURANCE

PROVISION OF LIFE INSURANCE FOR VETERANS OF THE PRESENT WAR—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 170, to provide for the insurance of veterans by the Dominion of Canada.

He said: In case any hon. member wants to know the significance of these amendments, they are purely by way of clarification, and involve an alteration in the draftsmanship. They involve the addition of the word "or" after the word "veteran" in line 25, page 2, and subsection (c) is redrafted, with the concurrence of the department.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

HOUSING

PROVISION FOR LOANS FOR CONSTRUCTION, REPAIR, ALTERATION, ETC.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That in order to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, the improvement of housing and living conditions and the expansion of employment in the post-war period, it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Finance:

1. to join with approved lending institutions in the making of loans under certain conditions for the construction of homes for prospective home-owners, and the sharing of losses, if any, in respect of such loans, the aggregate amount of the advances to be made not to exceed one hundred million dollars;

2. to join with approved lending institutions in the making of loans under certain conditions for the construction of houses to be rented to tenants and the sharing of losses, if any, in respect of such loans, and to make loans to limited dividend housing corporations under certain conditions to assist in the financing of low rental housing projects, the aggregate amount of the advances to be made by the minister for the construction of houses for rental purposes not to exceed fifty million dollars; to authorize life insurance companies under the jurisdiction of parliament to purchase land and construct thereon and manage low cost or moderate cost rental housing projects subject to certain conditions and to authorize certain guarantees in respect of such investments, and to authorize the Minister of Finance under certain conditions to make grants to municipalities, up to an aggregate amount not exceeding twenty million dollars, for the purpose of assisting in the clearance of slums or blighted areas;

3. to provide special assistance in the contracts with approved lending institutions to encourage the making of loans in rural areas, and to enter into contracts with manufacturers of building equipment to assure the production of components for rural homes on an economical cost basis, provided that the gross liability of the dominion in respect of such contracts with manufacturers of components for rural homes outstanding at any one time shall not exceed five million dollars;

4. to guarantee under certain conditions loans for the repair, alteration and extension of existing homes to an aggregate amount of one hundred million dollars;

5. to carry on and promote technical research and investigations designed to lower housing costs and promote better housing conditions and the more efficient planning of communities; and further to provide that the moneys required for the making of the said loans and grants and the payment of losses incurred under any guarantee or other contract authorized by the act shall be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund and that all other moneys payable under the act, including the salaries of technical and clerical staffs and all other expenses of administration, shall be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the purposes of the act.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this measure upon which a bill will be based with respect to housing in Canada—

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. gentleman asking me a question? I am moving the resolution, and I was going to make a speech on it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was just going to ask the minister to make a speech, if he had not intended to do so. Perhaps for once we think alike.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Then let the minister go ahead.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the great mind over there would allow the debate to continue. May I ask the minister—

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps you would allow it to continue.

Mr. GRAYDON: If my hon. friend wants to get in with the great minds also he might submit his qualifications and see if he can pass muster. I thought this was the appropriate time for the minister to make a statement in connection with the matter, instead of waiting until later.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is perfectly correct.

The bill which this resolution seeks authority to introduce is a long and complicated one. It therefore seems desirable for me to explain at some length the provisions of its various parts at this time. Consequently, I propose to make a speech on the resolution which perhaps ordinarily I would make on moving second reading of the bill. I think this procedure will make it possible for hon. members to get a clearer understanding of the various provisions of the bill and to be in a better position to discuss these provisions when we go on with the second reading. I can assure hon. members I shall limit myself to exposition of the provisions of the bill and the principles underlying it rather than attempt any extended argument.

I also do not think it necessary to weary the house by giving any historical or analytical background or any elaborate statistical information in regard to the housing problem, what we have done in this field in the past and what is being done in other countries. If there is one thing upon which all parties in this house agree it is on the importance of placing a house building programme and the improvement of housing conditions well up in the forefront of the general programme of reconstruction which we are preparing for the post-war period. Furthermore, hon. members now have at their disposal the very elaborate report on housing and community planning prepared by a subcommittee of the advisory committee on reconstruction. While all hon. members may not agree with all of the recommendations contained in this report, nevertheless they will find it a very convenient compendium of information in regard to housing experience and legislation in Canada, Britain and the United States, the dimensions of the post-war housing problem in its various aspects, the need for and principles underlying community planning, and other pertinent aspects of the housing situation. I shall therefore assume that hon. members have this report as a necessary background for the purposes of this debate and will confine myself to a rather simple outline of the proposals which we are making in the bill which will be brought down when this resolution has been passed.

The housing programme to be outlined is a programme of general application. It was not thought feasible in this legislation to make special provision for any particular classes in the community, such as members of the forces or their dependents, ex-members of the forces, or those belonging to any occupational group. As the house knows, Wartime Housing Limited is also carrying on an emergency programme for the provision of houses on a rental basis to dependents of members of the forces in so far as the availability of materials permits and needs in particular localities develop.

I am not in a position to state what specific provision will be made otherwise than under this bill for those now in the forces as and when they are demobilized. This, however, is a separate question, which will, to the extent that it is not covered by this legislation, be dealt with separately. In saying this, I wish to make it clear that apart from the wartime housing programme I have mentioned, I am not intimating that there will be a separate and additional housing programme. I am merely indicating that if and when a statement is made in reference to the special problems of demobilized members of the forces, it will be made by another minister.

The present bill will contain six parts. Part I will deal with the construction of houses to be owned by prospective home-owners; part II with the construction of houses for rental purposes, and also with slum clearance; part III with rural housing or houses on farms and in small and remote communities; part IV with loans for the repair, alteration, modernization or extension of existing homes; part V with housing research and community planning; and part VI with a number of general provisions.

Let me deal first with the provisions of the bill regarding the construction of houses for home ownership. In this part of the bill we follow in general the pattern established by part I of the National Housing Act, 1938, but with some important additions and modifications. The way in which this part works is as follows: The prospective home-owner who has a lot on which he wishes to build a house or a builder who wishes to build a house for sale to a prospective home-owner goes to an approved lending institution with the plans and specifications for the house, details of the location of the lot and other pertinent information. The lending institution ascertains the cost and appraises the value of the land, checks the plans and specifications of the building in order to see that they conform with the minimum standards laid down by the government, checks the estimated cost of production, the credit-worthiness of the borrower, et cetera; and after all this work has been done, if it is willing to participate in a loan to facilitate the construction of the house, submits the application with the supporting material to the national housing administration for its examination and approval. We may then approve the plans and the application as they stand or require certain necessary modifications. If we approve the application, a loan is made jointly by the lending institution and the Minister of Finance with the first mortgage or hypothec running jointly to the two of us. The proceeds of the loan are then paid out in instalments and provision is made for inspection of the house at various stages during its construction in order to assure that the builder or contractor completes the construction of the house in accordance with the plans and specifications which have been approved. The loan is repaid by monthly instalments which cover not only payment of interest and amortization of principal but also the annual taxes on the property and in case of any loss incurred in respect of the loan, the loss is shared in agreed proportions between the minister and the lending institution.

Hon. members will note that this procedure requires that the minister enter into contracts with approved lending institutions and that these contracts must contain the various provisions governing the making of loans, supervision of construction, the terms of the mortgage and the repayment of the loan, the steps to be taken in case of default, the sharing of losses, and other matters specified in the bill. In the new bill we are extending the definition of a lending institution that may be approved by the governor in council for the purpose of making loans under the legislation, to include not only insurance, loan and trust companies but also trustees of trust funds, building societies, credit unions and other cooperative credit societies authorized to lend money on the security of real or immovable property. We are also defining "cost of construction" in a somewhat broader sense than previously in order to take into account a fair and reasonable value for work done by the owner of the house himself, and also to provide for a fair appraisal of land, where the land has been acquired by gift or demise, and to include development cost and carrying charges where the land has been held by a builder for a considerable time.

The house will also be interested in the terms upon which loans may be made. The new contracts will provide that a joint loan shall not be less than 50 per cent of the lending value of a house—incidentally, lending value is either the estimated cost or the appraised value of a property, whichever is the lesser—and it shall not be more than 95 per cent of the first $2,000 of lending value, plus 85 per cent of the amount by which the lending value exceeds $2,000 but does not exceed $4,000, plus 70 per cent of the amount, if any, by which the lending value exceeds $4,000. Let me give some illustrations of the way in which this works out: If we are considering a house with a lending value of $2,500, the minimum loan under this formula would be $1,250 and the maximum loan would be 95 per cent of the $2,000 plus 85 per cent of $500, or a total of 93 per cent. On a house with a lending value of $3,000, we could make a loan of $2,750 or 91⅔ per cent; on one with a lending value of $4,000 we could make a maximum loan of 90 per cent; on one with a lending value of $5,000 we could make a maximum loan of 86 per cent; and on houses with a lending value in excess of $5,000 the maximum percentage of loan would gradually scale down. I think this formula is as sound a one as can be devised. It is true that representations have been made by the building industry and others that we should increase the value of a house on which we could make 90 per cent loans to $5,000 or $6,000 or even a higher amount, and the subcommittee on housing recommended 90 per cent loans for houses with a lending value up to $6,000. The adoption of that recommendation would mean that a prospective home-owner would only require an equity of $600 to obtain a $6,000 house, whereas under our formula he would require an equity of $1,000. It does not seem to me sound that an individual who has only been able to save $600 should be encouraged to buy a $6,000 house and assume the obligations of a $5,400 mortgage. Nor do I think that at least in the vast majority of cases would that represent sound lending.

Other essential points relate to the rate of interest and to the period for which the loans will run. As I have already announced to the house, the new contracts will provide for an interest rate to be charged to the borrower of not in excess of 4½ per cent. This low rate is made possible by the government advancing its 25 per cent share of the joint loan on a 3 per cent interest basis, the lending institution obtaining a return of 5 per cent on its share of the loan and for the work which it is required to do. Under the Federal Housing Act in the United States, the maximum interest rate allowed on home mortgages is set at 4½ per cent but there is also a mortgage insurance premium charge determined by the risk involved and limited to not less than one-half of one per cent or not more than one per cent of the original face value of the mortgage. Under that act also provision is made for the instalment payment of such initial service charges and appraisal and other fees as the federal housing administrator may approve.

Under our new contracts the maximum term of loan will be twenty years in the ordinary case, but if there is sound community planning and adequate zoning restrictions in respect of the area in which the house is to be located, the loan may be made for a term not exceeding thirty years.

Let me illustrate what these new terms mean for a person wishing to build a house with a lending value of $4,000. The down payment would be $400, leaving $3,600 to be financed by a joint loan. In the ordinary case this is payable in twenty years, the monthly carrying charges, including principal and interest, being $22.61. If the house is to be built in an area which has been adequately zoned and planned, the loan might be extended for thirty years, in which case the monthly carrying charges would be $18.04.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that include taxes?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

In addition, of course, there would be taxes, one-twelfth of which are payable each month along with the instalments of interest and principal.

As to sharing of losses on joint loans made under the provisions of part I of the act, there is a provision that regulations to be made by the governor in council may establish classes or categories of loans based on the ratio of the joint loan to the lending value and on the location of the houses, but the maximum amount of the loss to be borne by His Majesty in respect of any class or category of loan is not to exceed 15 per cent of the aggregate amount of the share of the said lending institution in all joint loans within the class. Hon. members will note that this provision will enable us to establish a number of guarantee pools in order to encourage the making of the type of loan which from our point of view is most desirable. In other words, we can provide a higher pool guarantee for loans on small homes where the percentage of loan to lending value would be very high, and also a higher guarantee for loans made in smaller or more remote communities or in what the lending institutions might regard as less desirable residential sections of our larger towns and cities.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is the same guarantee, as I recall it, as was given in connection with the home improvement loans. It is the same percentage, is it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was fifteen per cent. We are proposing under this legislation to make it five per cent for home improvement loans. But the two are not exactly comparable.

Conversely, we could provide for low pool guarantees in the case of the larger loans and loans made in the best residential areas. Our desire will be to make regulations and adapt these regulations from time to time in such a way as to get loans made which are in the public interest but which might not otherwise be made.

Cooperative housing projects may also be financed under part I of the bill. In such projects the cooperating tenant-owners normally own the project collectively by the device of either a corporation or a trustee holding title to the project. The loans to be made to such corporation or trustee representing the tenant-owners will be based on the same general provisions as apply in the case of an ordinary loan to a home-owner except that the shareholder of the corporation or the beneficiary of the trust will have to assume responsibility not only for the monthly instalments of interest, principal and taxes payable in respect of his cooperative apartment but also his pro rata share of additional payments required for operating costs and instalments of interest, principal and taxes where one of the cooperators fails to pay his share.

Perhaps the only other provision of part I of the bill to which I need to call attention at the present time is the section which appropriates the necessary funds for the making of these loans. The bill asks for an appropriation of $100 million in order to make loans under this part and to pay losses in respect of such loans or in respect of loans made under the Dominion Housing Act or the National Housing Act. This, it will be noted, will enable joint loans to be made in the total amount of about $400 million and for a total construction programme exceeding this amount by the amount of the borrowers' equities in respect of the loans less the cost of land. I need not say that this will give a very substantial impetus to employment and business activity in the post-war years.

It may be of interest to hon. members to know that under the dominion and national housing acts up to July 31, 1944, we had made 21,839 joint loans amounting to $87,388,517 in total. These loans provided accommodation for 26,443 families. And so far the net loss incurred by the government under the operation of both these acts has amounted to only $970.

I now come to part II of the bill, which deals with housing for rental purposes. Under this part there are four types of project or activity provided for: first, the financing of ordinary or commercial rental housing projects; secondly, the financing of low-cost rental housing through limited-dividend housing corporations; thirdly, the authorization of certain life insurance and other designated lending institutions to invest a limited proportion of their funds in low-cost or moderate-cost rental housing projects and to hold and manage such projects; and fourthly, the assistance we are proposing to give to promote the clearance of slum or blighted or substandard areas.

In the first type of case loans will be made jointly with approved lending institutions, in somewhat the same way as under part I of the bill, to persons who desire to construct either single family dwellings or a group of single family dwellings or a multiple family housing project to be rented to tenants on a commercial or economic basis. The ordinary apartment house would come within this category. As in the case of part I loans, the government will advance 25 per cent of the amount of the loan and the interest charged to the borrower will be 4½ per cent. But the maximum amount of loan is not to exceed 80 per cent of the lending value of the house or project and we may take a chattel mortgage or assignment of rents or other form of additional security in order to protect adequately the interest of the crown in the loan. Such loan will in the ordinary case not exceed twenty years but may run up to twenty-five years where there are sound community planning and adequate zoning restrictions. The usual provisions for assuring sound plans and specifications, for adequate supervision during the construction process, and the sharing of losses will also apply.

The second type of project provided for is the low-rental housing project intended to be rented to persons of low income, perhaps at rates less than economic rentals for the housing accommodation provided. These are to be developed, constructed and managed by limited dividend housing corporations. Such projects would be similar in nature to the so-called Montreal housing project which I described to the house some weeks ago. The limited dividend housing corporation must provide equity capital equal to at least 10 per cent of the cost of the project, limit its dividends to not more than 5 per cent, agree to provide competent and independent management, keep books and accounts in a form to be prescribed by regulation, permit inspection of the project at any time and comply with other appropriate conditions laid down in the act or in the regulations made thereunder. The loan made by the dominion will not exceed 90 per cent of the cost of the project and will bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum. It may run for a period not exceeding the useful life of the project to be fixed by the minister and in any case not exceeding 50 years. It must be secured by a first mortgage and hypothec upon the project given in favour of the crown. Such supervision of the rentals to be charged by the corporation may be provided for as will assure the maintenance of the low-rental character of the project. In addition, any province, municipality, social agency, trust or person may make contributions to a rent-reduction fund to be held by the limited dividend housing corporation and to be used only for the purpose of reducing the rentals that would otherwise have to be charged. Need for the project by reason of shortage, overcrowding, congestion or the sub-standard character of existing housing accommodation in the municipality or the metropolitan area in which the project is to be located must be established and the area must be adequately planned and zoned. Finally, the contract between the minister and the corporation will provide for the disposition of surplus earnings and will require that the project shall not be sold or otherwise disposed of without the approval of the minister. If the project is sold with the minister's approval, any surplus from the proceeds of sale over and above the limited dividends and the return of the original investment shall be paid to such person or expended in such manner as is provided in the contract or as the minister may direct. In other words the intention is that no capital profits shall accrue to the shareholders of any limited dividend housing project.

The third type of project under the new bill involves one of the most interesting and most radical departures from previous practice in this field. It provides that notwithstanding any restriction on its power to lend or invest money contained in any other statute or law, any life insurance company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament, may subject to certain specified conditions invest its funds to an aggregate amount not exceeding 5 per cent of its total admitted assets in Canada in the purchase of land and the construction thereon of a low-cost or moderate-cost rental housing project, including such buildings or such accommodation for retail stores, shops, offices and other community services, but not including hotels, as the company may deem proper and suitable for the convenience of the tenants of such rental housing project, and thereafter may hold, maintain, repair, alter, demolish, reconstruct, manage, collect or receive income from, sell or convey, in whole or in part, land so acquired and the improvements thereon.

Certain conditions must be complied with before the minister gives his approval to the investment. The project must be in accordance with or in harmony with an official community plan satisfactory to the minister. It must be designed to provide housing accommodation for families of low or moderate income. Before any project is proceeded with the company must submit an application to the minister for his approval accompanied by maps, plans and specifications, estimates of cost, estimates of probable income and such other information as may be required. These safeguards are for the protection of policy holders as well as to promote desirable housing developments. In order to give a reasonable degree of security to the investment, which is something new for Canadian insurance companies, the bill will also provide for a limited guarantee by the government. If the company agrees with the minister to keep satisfactory records open to his inspection at any time, to establish a reserve consisting of all net earnings in any year in excess of 6 per cent, and to repay out of this reserve any advances made by the minister under a guarantee, the minister may guarantee to the company, for as long as it retains ownership of the whole of the project, a net return in any year after the completion of the project of 2½ per cent per year of the cost of the project for a period not exceeding the estimated useful life of the project and in any case not exceeding 50 years.

Two or more life insurance companies will be allowed to join in the development, ownership and management of a rental housing project of this type and the governor in council also may designate other approved lending institutions, such as trust and loan corporations under the jurisdiction of parliament as eligible to invest not more than 5 per cent of their assets in Canada in projects of this type.

I think it will be quite obvious to honourable members why we are making provision for this type of project in our new housing legislation. One of the great weaknesses in the house-building industry in Canada is the absence of a substantial number of companies with competent management and with sufficiently large resources to acquire large blocks of land, particularly in our larger cities where land values are high, and to develop such areas in a comprehensive way providing all necessary community and incidental services. As some hon. members will be aware, several of the states of the United States have allowed life insurance companies to embark upon this type of project and a number of such companies have developed several very large and very attractive projects. I trust that we will see similar developments undertaken by a number of our Canadian companies.

The fourth feature of part II of the new bill is intended to assist municipalities in clearing slums. This will be done by empowering the government to make direct grants for that purpose. We believe this is the most direct and effective way of getting the job done. Conditions will be attached to the grant, but these will be of a character which are obviously necessary in order to assure the development of the area along sound lines. First, the land acquired and cleared must be developed under a master plan approved by the local municipality. Second, the land must be sold either to a limited dividend housing corporation or life insurance company, which has agreed to build a low-cost or moderate-cost rental housing project thereon. Third, the acquisition and clearing of the land must be approved by the provincial government concerned. It will be apparent that in most cases, particularly in the larger urban municipalities where slum areas are acquired and the buildings presently upon them demolished, the cost of the land so acquired and cleared will usually be too high to provide the site for a low rental or moderate rental housing project. Our problem therefore was to find some way of dealing with this excess acquisition cost, of getting the cost of the land down to the level where it would make feasible a low cost or moderate cost rental housing project. The bill will therefore give authority to the minister with the approval of the governor in council to make a grant to the municipality concerned of 50 per cent of the amount of what I have called the excess acquisition cost, the remainder of this excess acquisition cost to be borne by the municipality or jointly by the municipality and the government of the province concerned.

I have described rather briefly the essential provisions of part II of the act. The appropriation section of this part will authorize loans up to $50 million; that is to say, advances of the government's share of joint loans made through approved lending institutions for the construction of commercial renting projects and the government's 90 per cent loans to limited dividend housing corporations. It will also provide for grants for slum clearance purposes under the conditions I have described not in excess of $20 million. It is rather difficult to estimate the total amount of house construction which will thereby be made possible; it depends on the extent to which the $50 million is divided between loans to limited dividend housing corporations and loans made through lending institutions for commercial renting projects because in the latter case the total loan, including the lending institution's share, will be four times the amount of the government's advance. It is also difficult to estimate to what extent low cost or moderate cost rental housing projects will be proceeded with by life insurance companies and other designated approved lending institutions under the special provisions I have described. If the life insurance companies were to take full advantage of the full limit of the investing powers now made possible for them, they could embark upon projects costing something in excess of $150 million.

Part III of the bill deals with rural housing. This is one of the most difficult phases of the housing problem in Canada and we have made special efforts to deal with it in a practical manner. One hindrance in the past has been the extra expense involved in making loans to farmers and to other persons in small and remote communities, including fishing and lumbering villages. This we propose to meet by authorizing the minister to make payments to the lending institutions of up to $20 in respect of each loan, together with other reasonable allowances for necessary travelling expenses incurred by the employees or agents of the lending company.

As I have already said, loans to urban house builders will be repayable in monthly instalments. Quite clearly such terms are not suitable to all farmers. It will therefore be provided that farmers may repay housing loans in such a way that the periodic instalments of interest and taxes will accord as nearly as may be practicable with the probable receipts of income by them from their farming operations.

Another very practical difficulty in the field of rural housing arises from the fact that a substantial percentage of Canadian farms are already mortgaged. To meet this situation the bill will provide for consolidation with an existing mortgage loan of a new loan made for the construction of a house upon a farm. Such consolidation, of course, assumes that the lending institution which is to make the loan for the construction of the house will also be the same institution that holds the existing mortgage on the farm. If this is not the case, presumably the only way in which the problem can be met is for the lending institution to acquire the existing mortgage. The government's advance in respect of such consolidated loan will, of course, be limited to 25 per cent of the amount of the loan necessary to build the house and the share of loss assumed by the government will also be the appropriate portion of the new loan made for the construction of the house.

The funds required for making housing loans to farmers and persons in small or remote communities will come out of the $100 million appropriation under part I of the act. In this connection, however, I should point out that in the farm improvement loans bill there is provision for loans to be made by the chartered banks to finance the construction of houses by farmers, including the construction of cottages for farm labourers. Such loans are limited in amount to $3,000 and no mortgage will be taken except in the case where the loan exceeds $2,000 and runs for a period longer than five years. Hon. members will remember that the farm improvement loans bill provides an appropriation of $250 million for all kinds of purposes for which loans are authorized under that legislation. I suspect that because of the greater convenience of the local bank, a great many of the small loans made for farm housing, particularly for farm cottages, will be provided under the provisions of the farm improvement loans bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the loans to farmers for construction purposes include loans for building barns, stables and buildings of that kind?

Mr. ILSLEY: The banks can make loans within certain limitations, for that purpose under the farm improvement loans legislation. We shall have to wait for the bill founded on this resolution to see what its provisions are, but I think it covers houses only. Under the other legislation the banks can make loans for any farm improvements.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the farmer wants a loan to build a barn he will come under one system of assistance, and if he wants a loan to build a house he will come under a different system?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but the interest rate is moderate in both cases.

I have dealt so far with financing the construction of rural houses. This is an essential part of a sound rural housing programme but it is by no means all that is required. Already, under the farm improvement loans bill, provision has been made to facilitate the extension of rural electrification and for the purchase on favourable terms of the electric stoves, refrigerators, washing machines and other equipment that contribute so much to the amenities of life on the farm. In part III of the housing legislation, which I am now discussing, we are taking another step forward by authorizing the minister to enter into contracts with manufacturers for the experimental production of plumbing and heating equipment and other component parts of houses. Actually we have already encouraged building equipment manufacturers to devote extensive study to the development of standardized units of equipment which would have high efficiency and low cost. This clause will enable us to push this type of encouragement to a much greater extent. More important still, the bill will authorize the minister, with the approval of the governor in council, to guarantee or underwrite the sale of a specified number of standardized units of equipment or component parts manufactured for installation or use in farm or rural houses. The significance of this provision will, I think, be immediately apparent to hon. members. Let us say that as a result of extensive research an equipment manufacturer designed a bathroom unit or a heating unit specially suitable for rural homes. The manufacturer would not know whether he could sell a dozen, or a hundred, or a thousand, or ten thousand of these units to farmers, and the natural tendency would undoubtedly be to produce them on a small scale which would mean a high cost per unit. Under this new provision we could guarantee that the manufacturer would sell, say five thousand or even a larger number of the units in question and thus assure that the particular equipment would be made available to farmers at the lowest possible cost. I believe that this provision should make an important contribution to improved rural housing and we are asking parliament for authority to enter into contracts of the character I have mentioned, subject to the limitation that the aggregate amount of the contract or contingent liabilities assumed by the crown in respect of such contracts does not at any time exceed $5 million.

Part IV of the act deals with home improvement and home extension loans and represents a reenactment with some improvements and extensions of the old Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act which was passed in 1937, and which proved so successful. Under that act 125,720 loans were made for the repair and modernization of existing urban and rural homes and the total amount of such loans was $49,959,055. Certain losses were incurred in respect of 1,231 loans, and claims have been paid to the lending institutions in the amount of $447,511, of which amount $44,763 has been recovered by the Department. The net loss represents a percentage of ·806 per cent. Up to March 31, 1944, 98·4 per cent of the principal amount of the loans made had been repaid, leaving $811,652 outstanding, or 1·6 per cent. This represented the government's contingent liability in respect of the loans as at that date. If not another dollar were repaid in respect of these loans, our total losses, it will be noted, would be less than 2½ per cent.

Loans under this part are made chiefly through the chartered banks which have offices all over the country, but certain instalment credit agencies may also be approved as lending institutions for this purpose. In the case of what we call a home improvement loan, the principal amount of the loan must not exceed $2,000 in the case of a single family dwelling, or $2,000 for the first family housing unit and an additional $1,000 for every other family housing unit in the case of a multiple family dwelling. In the case of what we call a home extension loan, the principal amount of the loan must not exceed $3,000 for the first family housing unit which is to be added to the existing house and $1,000 for each further addition. Loans under this part are for either three or five years.

Under the old home improvement loans bill the rate of interest to be charged was expressed as a discount of 3½ per cent for a one-year loan repayable in equal monthly instalments, which worked out at an effective rate of 6·02 per cent. In the new bill we are providing for a rate of interest not to exceed 5 per cent per year simple interest, and no fee, service charge, insurance premium, or other charge of any kind can be levied as long as the borrower is not in default.

The total amount of loans which may be guaranteed is not to exceed $100 million but the operation of this part of the act may be terminated at any time by the minister with the approval of the governor in council. In view of the highly successful experience under the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act, the guarantee is for an amount not in excess of 5 per cent of the aggregate principal amount of the guaranteed loans made by any bank or approved instalment credit agency. Under the old act this pool guarantee was 15 per cent.

In this connection it must be remembered that the old act covered repairs, alterations and additions to both urban and rural homes. Such repairs, alterations and additions to rural homes will in future be financed by loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act where the pool guarantee amounts to ten per cent of the total loans made by any bank, and the total amount of the loans to be guaranteed, as I have already indicated, is $250 million.

I come now to the two concluding parts of this long and comprehensive piece of legislation. Part VI contains the usual provisions relating to staff, regulations, reports and proclamation. The only provision to which I would draw your attention is that relating to insurance. The intention under this clause is to enable a borrower to take out reducing term insurance to pay the outstanding amount of his loan in the event of his death before the loan is fully repaid. In certain cases the purchase of this type of insurance may be made mandatory.

To return to part V, this relates to housing research and community planning. If I had time I would like to deal at length with these provisions as they may prove to be of the very greatest importance during the years that lie ahead. Broadly speaking, this part of the legislation places special responsibilities on the minister with regard to housing conditons throughout Canada and authorizes him to undertake a comprehensive programme designed to promote sound construction and to encourage the development of better housing and community planning.

Authority is given the minister to investigate housing conditions in Canada and abroad, to study how to build houses more economically and efficiently, to prepare plans for low cost houses and to distribute them to advantage, to promote a better understanding of the need for community planning and to cooperate with local authorities in investigating local problems of land utilization and community planning.

Furthermore, the minister with the approval of the governor in council will be authorized to prepare and undertake directly or in cooperation with other departments or agencies of the government of Canada or the government of any province or with any municipality, university, or person, programmes of technical research and investigation into the improvement and development of methods of construction standards, materials, equipment, fabrication, planning, designing, and other factors involved in the construction of improved housing accommodation; to enter into contracts for the production or development of materials, equipment, or component parts for houses through the pilot plant stage of production or development, and for the testing of such materials, equipment or component parts; to publish and distribute the results of such technical research and investigations; conduct competitions to secure plans, designs and specifications for low cost housing; and to make provision either directly or in cooperation with any other department or agency of the government of Canada or with the government of any province or with any university, educational institution or person for promoting training in the construction or designing of houses, in land planning or community planning, or in the management or operation of housing projects.

I think that in this simple outline I have covered all the essential provisions of the bill. I would like to have been able to argue the case for certain of these provisions in some detail but in most cases they speak for themselves, and if differences of opinion should arise about some of them there will be ample opportunity for argument during the debate on second reading of the bill.

There is, however, one important point which I think I cannot pass over without a brief reference. Hon. members will have noted that while this bill involves many-sided and comprehensive legislation dealing with all phases of the housing problem, nevertheless it does not adopt the views of those who believe that our municipalities should engage directly or through local housing authorities in a vast programme of state housing financed largely by dominion government funds. We have given the most careful consideration to the representations made looking to this type of programme, but under Canadian conditions we cannot believe that such a programme would be sound or necessary. Several at least of the provincial governments would, I am sure, not wish their municipalities to embark upon municipal housing projects and we as a dominion could not contemplate with equanimity the pouring out of vast sums of dominion funds to municipal authorities to be expended in the construction of municipal housing which would involve grave problems of administration, not only in the development and construction of the projects but particularly in the management of the projects and the control of tenancy which would be necessary. If the dominion were to make substantial funds available to assist in the construction of low rental housing projects and to provide substantial subsidies for such projects either in the form of abnormally low interest rates or contributions to a rent reduction fund, it would be under obligation to see that these subsidies accrued solely to the advantage of the families of low income for whom they were intended. That would mean that the municipal management of the projects would be required to check the family income of each tenant accommodated and fix a rental rate for each such tenant not in excess of one-fifth of the family income. I do not think it would be possible in a municipal housing project to assure that such control of tenants and rentals would be administered on an efficient and independent basis. That is one of the main reasons why we have avoided that kind of arrangement in the new bill which we are recommending to the house.

On the other hand, we have provided for substantial assistance to municipalities for slum clearance and we have provided methods and procedures whereby low cost or moderate cost rental housing projects may be developed under efficient and independent management. We have provided for very substantial dominion assistance to limited-dividend companies for the construction of low rental projects and we have also made it possible for provincial or municipal governments or social agencies or other persons to contribute to a rent reduction fund for the purpose of reducing rents payable in such projects still further if this appears necessary in certain areas.

I commend this bill to the favourable attention of the house. It is a measure of major importance not only from the point of view of improving housing and living conditions but also as part of the government's programme to provide employment in the post-war period.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I congratulate the minister on his decision to speak at this stage of the proceedings with respect to this measure. I may say at the outset that there were a number of matters that were of deep concern to me from reading the terms of the resolution which he has cleared up. It is also true however that there are some points concerning which he has raised additional questions in my mind. We in this group thoroughly agree with the position taken by the minister that this is a very important piece of legislation. It is also true that all parties in the house are concerned about housing and place it very high among the matters to which the people of Canada should give attention, certainly in the post-war period, preferably just as soon as we possibly can.

We of this group welcome the introduction of the measure, and it will have our support even though on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread at all. We are not satisfied that the government has gone as far as it should in heeding the recommendations of the report to which the minister referred, published by the advisory committee on reconstruction, known as report number 4, dealing with housing and community planning. It is sometimes referred to as the Curtis report, because the committee was under the chairmanship of Professor C. A. Curtis of Queens university.

I was glad to note, in the outline that the minister gave of the bill itself, that there is in it a section—section 5, I believe—which calls for research into the whole question of housing in Canada. I am sorry that that has not been done already, and that the government has not given attention to the sections of the report which indicate the necessity of planning in advance.

I should like to read a portion of the Curtis report touching on this phase of the matter, appearing at pages 9 and 10:

> The committee places in the forefront of all housing projects the matter of town and community planning. Town planning is essentially the matter of using land in its most efficient and socially desirable way. Many people regard town planning as a matter of parkways, arterial roads, and similar measures. But town planning should mean the utilization of all land in terms of long-range and carefully considered objectives. . . . The institution of at least the essentials of town planning is both preliminary and basic to housing developments. The committee, therefore, regards it as a step which must be taken at the earliest possible moment in preparation for post-war housing projects; and it must be added that on account of the constitutional division of powers in Canada, town planning requires the cooperation of all levels of government in the federal system. It is equally true of modern town planning that it requires innovatory legislation and a spirit of initiative on the part of both citizens and government. Only a wider appreciation of the nature and techniques of town planning will produce the cooperative action necessary from federal, provincial and municipal governments.

The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), who has spoken for this group on several occasions on the matter of housing, has appealed a number of times to the government along the very lines set out in the quotation which I have just read. He has urged the government to call conferences of federal, provincial and municipal authorities so that they might get down to brass tacks in this matter of town and community planning well in advance of any housing project upon which we might launch.

There is tremendous urgency for the construction of houses. One does not want to delay for a moment the going ahead with such a measure as the government has announced, but it is a matter of regret to me that we have not had in advance a recognition of the very first recommendation contained in the Curtis report.

Another matter about which we are concerned is the relatively small amount of money that is to be made available. We recognize that compared with pre-war federal budgets $275,000,000 is a great deal of money, but compared with some of the sums that we have found and have been able to pay during the period of the war this amount is small and it is not sufficient to meet the housing needs of Canada. On a number of occasions hon. members have had occasion to refer to the report on the government financed expansion of industrial capacity in Canada, as at December 31, 1943, which was tabled by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). I am looking at the page that gives the summary of the investment made by the government in fixed assets. For example, we have put out in facilities for the production of general munitions a sum of more than $535,000,000. Without giving other details our total commitments for fixed assets for war purposes run to over $850,000,000. When we come to housing surely we are dealing with a fixed asset of great importance to the life of Canada, and I would hope that we might be able, in connection with this most socially important fixed asset, the homes of our Canadian people, to match the amount of money that we have been able to put into fixed assets for the very necessary task of prosecuting the war. I hope that the minister will indicate at some stage of this debate, perhaps when we go into committee of the whole on the resolution a little later, whether this amount of money is one appropriation of $275,000,000 or whether we might expect it to be regarded by the government as the first of several annual appropriations. If it were the latter over a period of, say, ten years, it could be used to make a real contribution to the solution of Canada's housing problem; but if this is the total amount of money which the government feels should be appropriated out of public funds for solving Canada's post-war housing problem, I fear we shall fall far short of meeting our basic needs in this field.

If I took down correctly the figures which the minister gave when he was speaking just now I believe he said that up until the end of July of this year the total amount of loans advanced by the government under the Dominion Housing Act of 1935 and the National Housing Act of 1938 was $87,388,578, and that these loans provided housing accommodation for 26,443 families. I take it he meant that that many housing units were built, whether they were individual houses, suites or other types of accommodation. If the lending by the government of a little over $87,000,000 during the lifetime of these acts has made available only 26,000 dwelling units, it is to be assumed that the lending of $100,000,000 for the building of houses for prospective owners will not provide much more than 30,000 housing units. Further, even if one were to take the entire amount of money set out in this resolution, which is less than $300,000,000, and to treat it generously on the proportion of the figures already given, the highest total number of housing units that one could foresee would be about 90,000. That is too generous an estimate, because not all of this money is availabale for new homes. It is a rough calculation, obviously made on short notice, because I simply took the figures the minister gave a short while ago. But I should like to set that calculation of 90,000 or even 100,000 prospective housing units which may be realized under this legislation against the housing needs of Canada as set out in the Curtis report, published by the advisory committee on reconstruction.

On page 151 of this report, following a discussion of the matter in considerable detail, the committee gives a table showing the needs of a Canadian housing programme for the first ten years of such an effort. It is given in detail, but I shall refer only to the totals. The committee states that in the first ten years of an effective housing programme we should provide for 606,000 urban, non-farm homes and in addition should provide for 94,000 homes in farm areas, or a total of 700,000. I suggest that the house take note of the wide gap between the ninety to one hundred thousand homes that may be built under the legislation to which the minister has referred, according to the calculation I have made, and the seven hundred thousand indicated in the Curtis report as Canada's need for new homes. The table on page 151 goes a bit further and gives the unofficial British programme for housing for the same ten-year period as well as the official New Zealand programme. I need not give the figures set out for those countries, because the important feature is in the next two columns, where the committee has apportioned the British and New Zealand figures to our Canadian situation. The committee says that on the basis of that apportionment, to equal the British programme we in Canada should be producing 921,000 homes, or to equal the New Zealand programme we should be producing 756,000 homes in the ten-year period to which I have referred. It may be that when we are in committee, or on second reading, the minister will be able to indicate other measures that will supplement what is before us at the present time. I hope he will; but I am pointing out that what is before us now—

Mr. McNEVIN: Does not the hon. member think in regard to the comparison with Great Britain that as a result of the devastation in that country the need for housing will be much greater than in this country?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is quite possible. I was not giving an opinion of my own in that instance; I was giving the opinion of the Curtis committee, the subcommittee of the James committee on reconstruction, which went into the matter of housing. As a matter of fact the difference between the recommendation of the committee itself on the basis of our own Canadian needs and these weighted figures for New Zealand and Britain is not very great. The alarming difference appears as between the figure of 700,000 recommended by the Curtis committee and the 100,000 provided in the legislation now before us.

The whole question of the interest rates on houses built under these acts is to us a matter of concern. I still have the hope that the government may find it possible to arrange for a lower rate of interest, even if they consider it necessary to retain some of the other protective measures to which the minister referred, so that the legislation might better meet the needs of our people. I have here some figures which were obtained from the statisticians of the housing administration as to the monthly payments and the total amounts paid under various rates of interest. These figures deal with the retirement of a $3,000 loan, including interest and principle, under various conditions, over a twenty-year period or over a thirty-year period, at different rates of interest. Perhaps if it is put in tabular form hon. members will understand it better. The figures are as follows:

Monthly Rates and Total Amounts Required to Retire a $3,000 Housing Loan, Including Interest and Principal

	20 years		30 years
Rate	Monthly	Total	Monthly	Total
2 %.....	$15 15	$3,636	(not available)
3 %.....	(not available)		$12 57	$4,525 20
4½%.....	$18 25	$4,380	$15 03	$5,410 80

I would point out that over a twenty-year period the home earner would pay $744 in additional interest as between the rates of 2 per cent and 4½ per cent, while over a thirty-year period the difference would be $885.60 as between the rates of 4½ per cent and 3 per cent. I feel very keenly that further consideration should be given this whole question of interest rates. In that connection, and apropos of the other reference made by the minister, I should like to give a quotation from the ministry of housing in New Zealand. The minister referred to the desire on the part of the government to keep to a minimum the loss to the treasury as far as this whole project is concerned. Our minds run in different channels on that point. I cannot feel that the country as a whole is losing if we build homes. Despite the fact that it was done for war purposes we like to think that there is increased wealth in the country because of the fixed assets we have created as a result of our war expenditures. I feel in the same way that when we spend money on the building of homes for the Canadian people we are gaining, not losing. In this connection, after the labour government of New Zealand opened its housing account with the reserve bank of New Zealand on July 1, 1936, just after it was first elected, the housing ministry of that country issued a statement in which it said, in part:

> We are out to create assets against this reserve bank credit, and to the extent that we succeed in giving the nation sound assets, so we will have demonstrated the sanity of socialist finance.

I commend our line of thought to the minister and suggest that he consider that the proposition upon which he is embarking now, namely the investing of public funds in the building of homes for the Canadian people, will not in the real sense involve any loss at all but will mean an increase in real wealth which in turn will contribute to a better life for our people.

Another point to which I should like to refer is the necessity of any housing programme being directed primarily to the needs of people in the lower income brackets. The Curtis committee dealt with this to some considerable extent, pointing out that there are altogether too many people in Canada in these lower income brackets, and the result is that far too many people at the present time are called upon to spend disproportionate amounts of their incomes for rent. We feel, as part of a programme of economic planning, that public funds should be used to relieve that situation. The theory behind that is not strange to the present government. It is very similar to the principle behind family allowances. As a matter of fact that principle is found in part in this housing measure, but it does not begin to go far enough.

Let me quote from page 110 of the Curtis housing report:

> The most striking fact is that average family income (from wages) among one-third of all metropolitan tenants is only a little over $700.

Then there is a reference to table 25. The paragraph continues:

> In three cities it is substantially higher than this average, but in six cities actually lower.

And then reading further down:

> Desirable minimum income levels have been examined in general terms in the report on social security. For a more or less representative family of five persons the assistance or subsistence minimum for the bare essentials of healthy living requires an annual income of $1,135, assuming urban conditions comparable to those in Toronto.

And later, dealing with tenants in urban communities, the report has this to say:

> About 50 per cent of the families living in metropolitan areas throughout the dominion pay a disproportionate rent, and in six cities more than half of the families strain their budgets in some degree by paying an excessive proportion for their housing needs.

What I am driving at in these quotations is that a proportion of the money the government appropriates for housing larger than is given by this measure should be for those in the lower income brackets who are doing what this report says, namely straining their budgets and paying disproportionate amounts for rent. The measure before us provides $100,- 000,000 to assist in the building of homes for prospective home owners. Although providing some help to that group, the measure will not meet the problems of those referred to in the quotations I have read from pages 110 and 120 of the Curtis report.

Of course I realize that behind all this is the government's theory that if houses are built, in some way or another the increase in the number of houses, even if they are expensive houses for those who can afford to own them, will result in those who are down at the bottom, in the slum areas, or without housing accommodation at all, benefiting from the increase. It does not work out that way. We should approach the problem more directly, in fact through a public housing authority. A larger proportion of the money should be appropriated by the government directly for slum clearance, and should follow along the lines which, as indicated in the closing portion of his speech, have been turned down by the minister and the government.

I was glad to hear some of the things the minister had to say this morning, but I was very sorry to hear others. For example I was glad to hear that credit unions and cooperative societies are to be included in the list of approved lending institutions. But I was sadly disappointed to learn from the minister's statement that the government had decided not to consider, beyond the one provision he announced, assisting municipalities in connection with housing. I was glad he made that one provision clear, because it certainly was not clear to me from a reading of the resolution that the $20,000,000 mentioned therein for the aid of municipalities is only for the purpose of enabling municipalities to buy land which is now slum area, but which is valued high.

I cannot agree with the minister when he takes the position that it is possible to lend money to limited dividend housing corporations to build low-rent housing projects, confident that arrangements can be made to supervise and take care of them, and yet that on the other hand administrative difficulties are too great to consider doing the same for municipalities. Particularly in western Canada, from where I come, there has been a tremendous growth in the belief and conviction that municipalities and cities should be going directly into the matter of slum clearance and housing projects. In my city there is a keen social conscience in respect of this matter. The same is true of many cities throughout the west, and I am sorry the government has not yet seen fit to provide ways and means of cooperating directly with cities and municipalities in connection with slum clearance and the building of houses. I hope that matter may yet be considered, either by this government or by whatever government succeeds this one.

Another feature of the resolution which gave me considerable annoyance but which I shall not discuss in detail now—because of some of the comments made by the minister which to some extent allayed my fears—is the very small amount provided for rural housing. I shall have to study more closely what the minister said, to see whether my fears are really set aside. It is my understanding he stated that under other legislation housing might be carried out in rural areas. But certainly so far as this measure is concerned, only $5,000,000 for the farming areas of Canada, out of a total of $275,000,000 was about the unkindest cut of all. The Curtis report's recommendation is that the proportion of money spent on farm housing as compared with urban housing should be in about the ratio of one to six. I would point out that $5,000,000 out of $275,000,000 is a proportion of one to fifty-six. That, by itself, is pretty bad.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is under some misapprehension. The $5,000,000 is in respect of the production of equipment. That is the $5,000,000 which is found in paragraph 3 of the resolution which reads:

> To provide special assistance in the contract with approved lending institutions to encourage the making of loans in rural areas.

That is one thing. And then—

> And to enter into contracts with manufacturers of building equipment to assure the production of components for rural homes on an economical cost basis, provided that the gross liability of the dominion in respect of such contracts with manufacturers of components for rural homes outstanding at any one time shall not exceed five million dollars.

That is our liability with respect to contracts for the production of components.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where in the resolution is there any other provision for assistance to rural housing?

Mr. ILSLEY: The rural housing provisions are part of the general housing provisions of part I. That is, under part I of the measure lending institutions jointly with the government, may lend to rural areas, as well as to urban areas. Therefore the large appropriation of $100,000,000 covers rural as well as urban lending.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to hear the situation is not as bald as it appears from a reading of the resolution. It seems to me that in Canada we are only at the beginning of the realization that housing is a rural problem as much as it is an urban one. Thus far we have thought of housing in terms of slum clearance in congested areas, but it is equally important that the people on our farms should have better homes to live in. I was a little annoyed to find a reference in this Curtis report from which I have been quoting thus far to-day with approval, at page 215 to the effect that the average cost of a farm home would be about $1,500. I represent an urban riding, but it is in western Canada and I have had some experience with conditions in the farming areas of the west. I do not like the idea to get abroad that a $1,500 home on the average is good enough for our farm population. I hope that what we have here is only the beginning of a housing scheme that will go into the rural field as well as the urban, and that from this beginning we will make real progress until we are able to provide for the people on our farms proper homes with the amenities and conveniences that farm people think the city people have, but which many of them are still denied.

I shall not detain the house further at this point except to say that while we welcome this measure even in the dying days of the session and will give it our support, we certainly think that it does not even approach a solution of the pressing problems of those in the lower income brackets who are most in need of housing. We are sorry that it is not a move more in the direction of a public housing authority. We are not satisfied with the method the government is employing, namely, to assist private lending institutions to do the job. I do not say that because we have any particular grievance against private lending institutions—we can discuss that on another occasion—I say that because we feel that the method adopted will not get the job done. One of the vital necessities in Canada is a broad, imaginative, far-reaching housing programme on the basis of which we will really launch out to rebuild our cities and the rural areas of this country so that our people will have an asset of real worth in homes worthy of the sacrifices that have been borne during these war years. This measure is welcome, but it leaves much to be desired.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to commend the minister for the great improvement he has indicated in the present housing act over what was provided in the former one. He certainly has made a great step in advance. I would like to have had an opportunity to study more in detail what he said because he covered a lot of ground in a very short space of time. It is a little difficult to know exactly what the arrangements are in respect to a few matters, but these will be clarified in committee. I am glad to know that provision is being made to get rid of the slums which are such a blight on our cities and towns. Nor are our rural districts exempt from similar conditions. Whether the amount provided for this purpose will be sufficient I am not in position to say, but I would think that if this matter is to be dealt with adequately something more than $20,000,000 will be necessary.

The other part of his speech which interested me most was that dealing with the provision for low-cost housing projects. This is one of the greatest needs in this country, and if such projects are undertaken they will do more than anything else to relieve the poor people in our cities particularly those with large families. Not only do we have people living in substandard houses in our slum areas, but we have overcrowding of those slum houses. On a number of occasions I have seen families of four and five living in one room, and I have also seen two families of ten people living in a single room. It was necessary for these people to go out into the yard for their conveniences. Their water was drawn from a tap outside which was frequently frozen up during the winter.

I cannot see how conditions such as these can do other than increase delinquency and crime with its added cost on all municipalities for the upkeep of police forces and penal institutions. I am not sure whether the minister is sufficiently generous in regard to the interest rates to be charged to those who will borrow money to provide this type of accommodation for our lowest income group. That class of individual is unable to pay an economic rent, and the difference between what he can pay and the economic rent will have to be made up by somebody. I think it would be economical for this government to subsidize either the housing authority or the individual so that these people may live in decent houses at rentals they can afford to pay.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would not family allowances help?

Mr. BRUCE: It depends upon whether the family allowances reach the children and are used for the purpose for which they are intended. If this housing bill was in operation and we had large housing projects in our towns and cities and country communities it would go a long way toward relieving the lot of those people for whom family allowances were intended, the humble poor. The outlay by those with large families for rent is perhaps the largest item and they are finding it increasingly difficult to obtain houses to accommodate their families. We know that even in the rental of very poor houses in our large cities, when a tenant with a large family appears he always has difficulty in getting accommodation. The landlords do not want children in many of these buildings where there are flats, duplexes and so on, and that is particularly noticeable when the family is a very large one. Therefore in providing assistance for low-cost housing projects the government would be wise in being very generous in the amount that they make available for this particular type of housing because thereby they would relieve to a large extent the heavy outlay which all parents have with large families to support. Rent is a major item in the budget of a large family. Perhaps next comes the provision of medical and nursing care, and if we had been able to put through at this session the national health bill we would have gone a long way towards providing relief for those families for whom a bill was passed the other evening.

There is one remark I should like to make with regard to this money which is allocated by the government for housing. When the government tell us that they are giving $100 million or $50 million for the purpose of housing one is apt to draw a wrong conclusion from such a statement, because actually what the government is doing is guaranteeing a certain amount of money against loss. They are allowing the lending companies to lend $100 million, and then the government guarantee the lending institutions up to 15 per cent of their loss. In other words, if the amount lent is $100 million, the government are risking only $15 million. Is not that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: We risk our own contribution, which is twenty-five per cent of the loan, and we also risk the amount of our guarantee which we give to the lending institutions.

Mr. BRUCE: The government's risk then is twenty-five per cent plus 15?

Mr. ILSLEY: The general scheme of the housing act is that moneys are advanced on joint mortgages taken by the government and by lending institutions, the government putting up twenty-five per cent of the amount of the mortgage and the lending institution seventy-five per cent. We risk losing our twenty-five per cent, and we also guarantee the financial institution against loss up to fifteen per cent of its total losses in a certain category of loans. The hon. gentleman was nearly right, but he did not take into account the possible loss of what we advance ourselves.

Mr. BRUCE: But considering the safeguards which the act provides, there must be very little risk of loss to the government on the twenty-five per cent which it advances.

The minister also told us this morning that out of approximately 23,000 loans the government had a loss of only $970. So that one would feel that the risk which the government is taking in supplying the money is a very small one. I was not quite clear from the statement which the minister read this morning whether the $50 million provided for low rental housing was under the same conditions or not.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BRUCE: The government is not advancing twenty-five per cent of that cost?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I had better answer these questions in committee rather than here.

Mr. BRUCE: It is a little difficult to discuss the measure when all we have before us is the statement which the minister read rather hurriedly this morning with respect to the provisions.

Dwellings for the lowest income groups, a class of renters, will never be undertaken as a commercial venture by private initiative. Over half of the entire wage-earning population earns $1,000 a year or less, and a very large proportion $600 a year or even less, which means that housing must be available for this section of the Canadian people at rents from $10 to $17 a month.

Overcrowding is a statutory offence in England and Wales, made so by the housing act of 1933. In 27 cities in Canada of over 30,000 population, crowded householders comprise from seven to twenty-eight per cent of all households. The total was approximately 150,000 households, including about one million people. This total comprised eighteen per cent of the households and twenty-nine per cent of the people. Those figures are according to the Canadian census, 1941 statistics.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. BRUCE: Speaking on this subject in the house last week or a couple of weeks ago I suggested to the government that the interest rate to be charged on loans under this act should be reduced to two per cent or less, and I did so because I knew that the rent to be charged is largely determined by the rate of interest paid for the money. It has been shown that if the wages paid to labour employed on the site in the construction of a housing project were cut in half, the annual cost of the housing produced would be reduced only about ten per cent. If the cost of materials entering into the production of housing were cut in half the annual cost would be reduced by only fifteen per cent, but the reduction in financial charges, interest and amortization by half would effect a greater reduction in annual cost than cutting in half the costs of both materials and labour.

The United States housing act embodies a plan for producing new housing at rents equivalent to those charged in the slums. It accomplishes this by authorizing the federal government to perform two separate financial functions, that of banker and that of donor of annual rent subsidies. As banker the United States housing authorities lend to the local housing authority for the purchase of its bonds up to ninety per cent of the capital cost of a project. After the project is completed the United States housing authority assumes its second financial function; it grants annual subsidies in an amount sufficient to cover the difference between the annual economic rent and the rent which low income families can afford to pay.

The local housing authorities in the United States have been able to market bonds running up to the year 1985, which they sell at interest costs that average less than two per cent. The way has thus been paved for establishing a public housing programme in the post-war era on a basis of financing which will ultimately relieve the federal government almost wholly of responsibility for providing capital funds. I see no reason why this plan now in operation in the United States of America should not be made available for this unfortunate group of our citizens in the low income brackets.

The minister spoke about the loan to the Montreal housing authority which was arranged through the good offices of Mr. George W. Spinney, and I hope his example will be followed in Toronto and in other cities. Am I right in assuming that the rate charged for the money to that authority was three per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. BRUCE: If that were the rate charged other authorities it would encourage many people in various parts of the country to take advantage of the government's offer. Yesterday the mayor of Toronto with a delegation from that city came to see the Prime Minister and some members of the cabinet in regard to assistance for additional housing which they were hoping to acquire for the families of men fighting overseas. The newspapers state that their representations met with a favourable response. I hope that report is correct and that the department over which the Minister of Munitions and Supply presides will undertake the building at once of another 350 houses for the city of Toronto.

We were much interested to hear yesterday of the plans put forward by Mr. Williamson of the Canadian corps with regard to prefabricated houses which could be built at a lower cost, which had a life of about ten years, and which would not likely run the risk that some other houses run of being permanently occupied as homes, so that after their usefulness is over and other more suitable accommodation can be built, these temporary habitations can and will be removed.

We hope that the fighting men, many of whom were drawn from homes in the slums, when they return home will not have to go back to such surroundings, and I think that the provision made under this present act will go a long way towards preventing such an occurrence.

Reference was made this morning by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the report on national employment by Mr. Arthur B. Purvis when he undertook an inquiry into the relief of unemployment. In that report he dealt with the type of housing we are now considering for those in the low income group. His report was handed to the government in 1937, a little over seven years ago. I am sorry that the government did not take advantage of his suggestions and undertake a low rental housing plan then. I am going to read one paragraph from what he says in appendix E at page 101. He feels that the dominion government's action is justified at this time and he offers suggestions for low rental housing for the following among other reasons:

> As a measure of public health and social advancement, low rental housing projects will have a direct influence in improving conditions of life for the low wage-earner in urban areas and will be a factor in increasing the employability of our workers in a period in which their employability has been greatly reduced.

I think that is all I need read.

In closing I should like to refer to the report of my committee on housing which was made in 1934, and I shall read one paragraph from page 50. Speaking of the result of poor housing on the people who were condemned to live in houses in the slums, we used these words:

> Shattered nerves and frayed tempers are the unenviable accompaniments of the constant friction and quarrelling inherent in bad housing conditions. Desertion by the husband or wife and the break-up of family life are often directly traceable to intolerable housing conditions.

I wish to say that I most heartily support the measure which was brought down by the minister.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Any remarks that I make on this resolution will refer in the main to what I believe is the inadequacy of the provisions for rural housing and in my opinion when this resolution was drawn up, insufficient consideration was given to the housing situation in rural Canada. I think most hon. members will be in agreement with the general plan. I think too that had it not been for the orders in council that were passed at the beginning of this war which prevented the National Housing Act operating as it should have, subject of course to the exigencies of the war and the necessity of materials and the like being devoted to war purposes, the housing situation in Canada would not be in the position it is in to-day. However, on the whole I welcome the bill which will follow this resolution. It is a measure that has been asked for by hon. members on all sides of the house to put an end to one of the cankers of social injustice that in large measure has been responsible for the difficulties faced by those in poor circumstances during the years. It represents an endeavour on the part of the country as a whole to translate the activities and the cooperation of war into the pattern of the aftermath of the war. It gives an opportunity to improve living conditions generally throughout the country, and in addition it will ensure, in the implementation of the plan, a measure to take up the slack of unemployment to a considerable degree after the war.

The problem is a large one. I am not going to deal with it on this resolution, but there are some matters that I shall bring to the attention of the minister after the bill receives second reading. I would point out, however, the necessity of securing the cooperation of the municipal authorities and those more directly connected with the problem than the federal authorities. With that in mind I should like to read a statement made by Mr. Ray Atherton, then United States minister, now ambassador to Canada, in a speech which he delivered to the Quebec union of municipalities in October last, in which he dealt with the necessity of securing the cooperation of the municipal authorities. He said:

> Housing is one post-war problem which no democratic nation can afford to neglect.

[Mr. Bruce.]

In 1916 I was stationed in southern England. In 1936 I returned to the same towns and I could not recognize them because of the changes that had taken place in housing in the intervening years. I believe that some three million houses were built in England during the period of 1919 to 1936. In Canada we have lagged behind Britain in providing adequate and sufficient housing for our people. I continue with the remarks of Mr. Atherton:

> The four freedoms become mockeries in areas of bad housing, because the four freedoms must be built upon the rock foundation of healthy and happy family life. No family can achieve its true function when it is miserably housed.

All hon. members must be in agreement with these general statements. Then he went on to give to the people of Canada the benefit of the experience that the United States have had with its housing problem. He said:

> The final solution of housing problems seemed to lie in a successful cooperation between federal, state or provincial, and municipal administrations. Before the war the United States had embarked on a large scale housing programme to provide dwellings at reasonable rentals for low income families. One thing we did learn was that no matter what type of financing was employed the local housing programme succeeded or failed depending upon the quality of municipal administration. Both planning and designing of homes and management of the projects must always remain local concern and no amount of federal remote control can either remedy bad local decisions or improve good local judgment.

I was not able to follow the minister as carefully as I should have liked in his speech this morning in introducing the measure. Having regard to the conditions which exist to-day in all parts of Canada, some of them emergent in urban centres, and others being of a continuing nature, I think every endeavour should be made to secure the cooperation of the municipal authorities all over Canada to make the scheme successful. To that end I suggest that an advisory committee be set up in each province, composed of representatives chosen by the councils in the urban centres. This body of local opinion could advise those in authority when the scheme is being implemented as to the needs and problems in this regard in each province.

We know that emergent conditions exist in all parts of Canada, but more particularly in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Ottawa and Halifax. May I digress for a moment to say that housing conditions will be serious in those places in the coming winter and the government must now do something for the families who between now and winter have to leave the houses they now occupy. The government should see to it that no soldiers' dependents in this country should be evicted from their homes. I realize the difficulty of passing an order in council so to provide, but something should be done now to obtain the cooperation of the families of soldiers to the end that, if they are willing to do so, they may be moved from these larger cities to the smaller neighbouring towns. The government took some action recently in that connection in the city of Toronto, when it made provision through the wartime prices and trade board for an amendment to the regulations providing that tenants should be entitled to six months' notice. That at best is merely a palliative, however, and will not meet the immediate situation that will face the families of soldiers and other families with the approach of winter. This is a matter that cannot be left to the municipal authorities. It is primarily a federal responsibility, for the reason that these conditions have arisen not because of volunteer migration to the cities but more particularly because of the concentration incidental to the production of munitions, and the fact that the families of soldiers have moved into the cities while the husbands are away. It is a matter for federal action, I repeat, and not primarily a municipal responsibility and it must be faced now.

Now I return to the resolution. The section providing for rural housing reads:

3. to provide special assistance in the contracts with approved lending institutions to encourage the making of loans in rural areas, and to enter into contracts with manufacturers of building equipment to assure the production of components for rural homes on an economical cost basis, provided that the gross liability of the dominion in respect of such contracts with manufacturers of components for rural homes outstanding at any one time shall not exceed five million dollars;

I submit that this amount is totally inadequate to meet the responsibilities of the government and the country to our rural areas.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the hon. gentleman is making the mistake that was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The $5,000,000 is only in respect of the contracts with manufacturers to make components. It is not the measure of the amount available for rural loans at all; and that is very clear from the section. I am surprised that anyone should make any mistake about it. However, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made the same mistake this morning.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre make that mistake, but I am reading the section as it stands. Apparently we both came to the same conclusion, however, which would indicate that the section is not worded as carefully as it might have been.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it does not mean that. It means something else which I should not express.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Apparently it does not mean what it says; it means something else. The sections reads:

To provide special assistance in the contracts with approved lending institutions to encourage the making of loans in rural areas—

Reading it up to that point conveys the meaning at which both the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I arrived. Then it says "and," which is a conjunctive:

—and to enter into contracts with manufacturers of building equipment to assure the production of components for rural homes on an economical cost basis—

It actually provides for two things; first, for special assistance in the contracts with approved lending institutions, and second, for entering into contracts with manufacturers. What it really means, then—

Mr. FACTOR: Read the last three lines.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have read them, but I am dealing with the first part. If it is a misunderstanding, well and good; but if it is to convey the meaning attributed to it by the minister I think it should read in this way: "to provide special assistance in contracts with approved lending institutions to encourage the making of loans in rural areas, and to that end to enter into contracts."

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not what it means.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Speaker, the interpretation I placed upon it apparently was also placed upon it by another hon. member, and now we are told that this is not the interpretation that should be placed upon it or the interpretation of those who drafted the resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only difference between my hon. friend and the other hon. gentleman is that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre saw the point at once and did not press the matter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Perhaps the minister gave a better explanation than he gave me. It may be that my inability to follow him is no tribute to his explanation or, on the other hand, to my ability to appreciate it. It must be one or the other.

Mr. SENN: The clause is ambiguous.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no ambiguity about it. It is as plain as the nose on your face.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The fact remains, Mr. Speaker, that we require 125,000 houses to be built in the rural areas of this country within ten years after the end of the war, of which 100,000 will be replacements of homes already existing. I saw the statement made recently that if an endeavour was to be made to raise the standard of living of the rural residents of Canada, at least fifty thousand homes should be built in this country during the first full year after the war. We all realize the difficulties in the way of carrying out such a programme, but I do feel that they should share at least on an almost equal basis with the urban centres, to the end that conditions now existing in the country areas of Canada may be remedied as soon as possible.

In that connection I might mention that a complete survey of the situation was made by Mr. Forsey, director of research for the Canadian Congress of Labour, and was published in the Canadian Unionist in the latter part of 1943. He pointed out that in twenty-seven Canadian cities of thirty thousand population and over there were 150,000 overcrowded households containing one million people; that in fourteen of the twenty-seven cities at least twenty per cent of the houses needed external repairs, and that farm housing was in a much worse condition. When this programme is brought in, when we have an opportunity of seeing the bill in its entirety and the plan of operation, I hope we shall have a plan which will hold out a new hope for Canadian people in the lower income brackets, and that the rural people will be given an opportunity to have a greater share in those better things of life which in the past have been denied them.

We are all in agreement with the principle of the resolution. I have risen for only one purpose, and that is to ask that in carrying this measure into effect the farm population of Canada shall receive a fair share of the moneys to be appropriated for housing and thereby be given an opportunity to raise its standard of living to a point approximating that enjoyed by the vast majority of people living in the urban centres of Canada.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this resolution as a means of bringing relief to that large section of our people who have no decent homes. And when I use the expression "decent homes" I believe I am using a very mild one, because many of those people live in places which could scarcely be called homes.

In Montreal the situation is particularly serious. Last year Jacqueline Sirois of the Montreal Standard made a special investigation into the housing situation of that city. She made her report in four newspaper articles, in which she pointed out that about 6,000 familes in Montreal at that time lived in stores, shacks, public halls, warehouses, and summer cottages unfit for winter habitation; some even lived in boats. She reported that sheds were rented for as much as $15 a month, and that some people living in stores paid rents as high as $48 a month.

Out of these 6,000 families, 1,200 lived in stores, 400 in garages, warehouses and public halls, 4,000 families doubled up and 200 tripled—that is, there were three families in each small home. Since Jacqueline Sirois made that report the situation in Montreal has by no means improved. That condition came to a head in May, 1944, when many people had to leave their homes and had nowhere to go. Many of them of course had no alternative but to take summer homes. We are again going to have a very serious situation when the summer homes have to be closed down, owing to their unfitness for winter habitation.

No doubt the housing crisis in Montreal was aggravated by the fact that tens of thousands of workers came to our city to work in the war factories. But that is not the whole story. To complete it let me say that between the years 1925 and 1942 there were 140,000 marriages. Those people went looking for homes. During that time only 54,000 housing units were built—and this was before those tens of thousands of people flocked to Montreal.

In that city we have always had crowding. The figures show that 24·4 per cent of all homes in Montreal were overcrowded—and when I say overcrowded I mean more than one person to a room. Let us compare that figure with 12 per cent overcrowding in Toronto. That is, we in Montreal have a condition twice as bad as the one in Toronto. Outside Montreal the overcrowding is even worse. In Quebec City 31·8 per cent live in overcrowded homes, and in Hull 34·5 per cent.

Let me show how closely this condition of overcrowding is linked with the health of those communities. The number of children in Montreal who die in their early years is double the number in Toronto. There we have the answer—double the overcrowding: double the number of deaths among children. And where overcrowding is even worse—in Three Rivers —with a percentage of 34·7, the number of deaths among children stands at 118 per thousand live births. The figure in Montreal is 71 per thousand. Again these figures are in proportion to the extent of overcrowding. I am not a medical doctor, but these facts are simple and clear. Anyone who studies social problems will understand what this has meant to us in the province of Quebec.

I should like also to stress the small percentage of homes in Montreal which have central heating. I have lived in houses with no central heating units. I have lived in houses where we had a stove in the kitchen and perhaps another one, a heater, in the hallway. In the mornings we would get up in cold bedrooms. We would go to the kitchen, finding it warm. This passing from one place to another, from one temperature to another, brought about colds. I have no doubt this condition exists in many homes across Canada. Colds are often followed by complications. In Montreal only 36 per cent of homes have central heating, or are heated by furnaces, whereas in Toronto the percentage is 94. In Hull only 16 per cent of the homes are heated by furnaces. Again we can see how these conditions affect health.

I have placed these figures on the record because I believe it has been announced in Montreal that a building scheme, for the erection of modern homes, is to be undertaken. According to reports, however, these homes are not to have central heating. I would say that at this time for any government to advance loans to any group of people to engage in a housing project for the building of homes without central heating is criminal.

Mr. ILSLEY: The last I heard of that project, central heating was contemplated.

Mr. ROSE: Then that was changed.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was the last I heard of it.

Mr. ROSE: The first report was that there was to be no central heating.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know it was planned that way at first.

Mr. ROSE: I saw the plans as they were set out in one of the Montreal papers, and it was indicated that there was to be no central heating. The argument was that it would be cheaper that way. The lack of central heating increases the possibility of fire. Any scheme which is undertaken should include provision for central heating and other facilities, swimming pools, playgrounds, and so on. All these things should be taken into consideration. The government has the power to stipulate that these comforts shall be provided for the people.

The resolution mentions a sum of $50,000,000 for the construction of houses for rental purposes and $100,000,000 for the construction of homes for prospective home-owners. It would be ideal if every family in Canada could own their own home, but under present circumstances that is something hard to achieve. The construction of a house is an expensive project, even allowing for any advances that may be made. A working man is not always too sure where he is going to be next. He may be forced to move in order to obtain work, and under these circumstances he may not feel able to build a home for himself. This is demonstrated by the fact that eighty-nine per cent of the people in Montreal are tenants.

Many people live in poor homes or have no homes at all, and I welcome the fact that $100,000,000 is to be available to help them build their own homes. That is very fine, but I feel that the amount to be advanced for low rental housing should be double this amount.

I shall defer any further observations until the bill is before the house.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I confess that the resolution stage of this measure is a disappointment to me because I had expected something far more generous in the way of a housing scheme at this stage of progress in our country. On the face of it, and not having had an opportunity of examining the bill, I would say that it is just a scheme to give the bankers a lot more business. That is one thing that has impressed me ever since I have been in this house, that every government move seems to have the bankers in mind. The whole object of the government seems to be to turn business their way and to guarantee that business so that they will not lose anything on it. I do not know that there is any particular objection to giving business to the banks provided that the people are given consideration. But here the people seem to be the second or third consideration. I hope I am wrong.

Another objection I find to the scheme is that there is not sufficient provision for using the provinces. I do not know how long it is going to take the idea to percolate into the heads of the men in the government of Canada that there are first-class administrative bodies in this dominion called provincial governments, and that those provincial governments stand ready to take the lead if the dominion government will get out of their way, and that they are prepared to cooperate with the dominion if the dominion government will give them leadership. I may be prejudging the whole scheme, but the indication would seem to be that it will be worked directly between the dominion and the people in the country. Is that right, or is the scheme to be worked through the provinces? If it is to be worked through the provinces, my objection on that score is removed, but if it is not to be worked through the provinces, I say the scheme is faultily drafted.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under part I we shall not work through the provinces, but how are we in the way of the provinces? How are we standing in their way?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would not say that with this particular measure the dominion government is standing in the way of the provinces, but I would not have to go very far to find plenty of instances in which the dominion government has put itself in the way of the provinces in their efforts to develop in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: So long as my hon. friend does not name anything I shall not worry.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It does not take very long to name Alberta, and it does not take very long to find plenty of evidence. As history is written, if the men who write the history are fairminded, we shall see what has happened in the last eight years with the government in power in Ottawa.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will wait for the history to get my information.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You will not have to wait for the history; you can get it by taking this simple fact: the dominion government has not shown the way; it has not recognized the provinces in any of these larger schemes. I would say that there is not a body of men in the Dominion of Canada who are in a better position to tell the needs of the people in Quebec than the government of the province of Quebec. The dominion government might have passed something like an enabling scheme similar to the old age pension scheme, under which they would have said to the provinces: Turn in an account of your housing needs; tell us what you would like to do about your needs with respect to housing; tell us how much money you require to produce the necessary housing in your province; tell us what you think the rates ought to be on that money and we will see what we can do to cooperate with you to get that money and turn it over to you so that you can administer it. Then the logical thing for the province of Quebec to do would be to call in the representatives of the municipalities such as the city of Montreal who would know about this deplorable situation which the hon. member who has just spoken has pictured. They would say to them, "Tell us how bad this deplorable situation is with respect to housing; tell us what you would like to do; tell us how much money it will cost and what rate you will have to take the money on and we will go to work with you along with the dominion government and see what we can do about obtaining the money and turning it over to you so that you can proceed with the work of developing housing in your city."

I submit that that would be the common sense way to work out this problem. The minister asked, "In what respect are we standing in the way of the provinces?" I happen to have in my hand a little booklet which I brought down accidentally and which will indicate just how some of the provinces are going to work on this whole problem of reconstruction. It is called, "Prepare Now." It is a suggested policy for post-war reconstruction embodying features essential to British democracy, issued by the province of Alberta in 1943. A perusal of the pages of this booklet will serve to show that Alberta is at least two laps ahead of the dominion government in every matter pertaining to reconstruction. All that is necessary to establish the point I was contending with the minister a minute ago is to indicate to him that the one body that stands in the way of the province of Alberta achieving the objectives set forth in this little booklet is the government of the Dominion of Canada. The province of Alberta has resources within the province to accomplish all the objectives set forth in this little booklet; the only thing they lack is permission to use the power to create money, the power which has been given to the dominion government by the British North America Act. There is a serious objection to the scheme; it does not give sufficient consideration to the provincial governments and the municipalities.

There is another serious objection. The scheme seems to try to force the people into the mould set by the scheme, whereas the scheme should come down to meet the needs of the people. Immediately the minister will say: If you have a scheme that comes down to meet the needs of the people, the administrative difficulties will be so great that no administrative body could put it into operation. That is true if the administrative body is in Ottawa and is endeavouring to provide regulations that will meet all the needs of the people in all communities from the far end of British Columbia to the other end of Canada in the extreme east. But if the administration is put into the hands of the municipality and the provinces, schemes can be made to meet the needs of the people.

Let me illustrate what I mean by meeting the needs of the people. Let us suppose that there is a family, thoroughly deserving, in Saint John, New Brunswick. This family is able to pay, in accordance with its income, twelve dollars a month rent and no more. We will suppose that there are three or four children in the family. I suppose there would be no chance for a family like that qualifying for a loan under this scheme unless they were receiving $1,200 a year, whereas we will suppose that they are receiving only six or seven hundred dollars a year. What chance have they of obtaining a loan under this scheme to enable them to build and own a home, pay for it in monthly instalments and be in possession of the home at the end of twenty years? Perhaps the minister can show me how that can be done, but I doubt very much that it can be done under the present scheme. But if the administration were in the hands of the city of Saint John, New Brunswick, the city officials, who could find out all about this family, could probably make arangements under which the family could have a chance to establish themselves in a home of their own. There exists so much poverty and hardship throughout this country, or did before the war and likely will again just as soon as industries incidental to the war are no longer operating, that the greatest possible attention should be given to providing for the people the means of subsistence and of getting homes.

This scheme is open to the objection I have indicated, that it lays down a set of regulations, and if a family can comply with those regulations, well and good; if it cannot, then it does not matter how good the family is, no matter how many soldiers it is raising for the next war nor how many soldiers it has supplied for this war—it does not matter whether the family is unable to get a place to live, it does not matter how many children it has, or that it is denied the privilege of going into a home of its own—the only thing that will be in the minds of those administering this scheme will be this: Can they qualify? If they cannot, they do not count. Or, as a member behind me suggests, can they pay back the loan with interest as laid down in the regulations? That is the only thing in the minds of the men planning and administering this scheme, whereas the thing that really matters is the Canadian people, how many men and women are being raised for Canada, how many can this family raise, how many will it not raise if provision is not made for its having a home. These are the considerations that should have been in the minds of the men drafting a housing scheme which would be worthy of the consideration of this house to-day. But this scheme apparently is not designed to meet the qualifications I have indicated.

I shall not say any more at the present stage because I do not know enough about what is contained in the bill. But I want to find out several things, about the cost of the money, for instance, the availability of the money for housing, the cost of the housing and all that sort of thing. I hope to find that out when we get into committee.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two things as to which I should like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to assure the house before this bill is given a second reading. I am quite sure that all the members here are anxious that proper housing at proper cost should be provided for those people whose need is greatest, and if we have the assurance from the minister that that will be done under this scheme, I am confident that it will receive the enthusiastic support of every member here.

Housing is one of the great costs of living, and there must be some assurance given that the people whose income is such that they cannot pay for this housing will be given the opportunity to get a home of their own. Basically and fundamentally our problem is an economic one. The people of Canada can afford only that type of housing which they can pay for out of their income, and only a certain portion of their income can be allotted to housing. If we are to have a repetition of Wartime Housing, with its costs, I am afraid that Canada will live to regret the day she proceeded along those lines. There is little assurance that the people are going to be able to meet the obligations of rental, or the obligations of purchase.

There is also this important thing to be said in regard to the whole scheme, and that is that the costs of building these houses may be much too high. The costs of production, the cost of materials, of lumber and cement are much higher than they should be in Canada. Are these excessive costs to be borne by the people of Canada when they are out of line with what they should be in a land which can provide itself with all the lumber and cement and building materials that the people need? We can provide all these things out of the natural resources of this country merely by applying to them the labour that is so abundant in this country; but as it is now we have to pay toll to those who have control of these natural resources and the power to extract from the purchaser whatever they wish to charge.

Another thing that bothers me in reading over the bill is that it in no way suggests that adequate housing will be provided in those places where housing is needed most. The Minister of Finance has the power to join with approved lending institutions in making loans under certain conditions for the construction of houses, but apparently it is the lending institutions who are going to decide where they will provide these homes.

I am dubious about where the farmer in Canada is going to come in under this scheme. Housing conditions in most of our cities and in certain rural areas are disgraceful. We have had placed on the record to-day what is happening in one of our largest cities in the matter of housing. If one takes the trouble to go into the city of St. John, New Brunswick, or into almost any rural area in that province, or into any rural area in any other province, one will find housing conditions which are disgraceful. The problem of providing rural housing is not met by this legislation, so far as I can see, and that is where there is a great need for housing. The people in the rural areas, who are performing the work that they do for Canada, require better housing if they are going to maintain agriculture on the standards which it should reach. Many of these people are living in isolated areas and require special attention in the matter of housing.

The trouble in Canada has been that the economic condition of the farmer has not received proper attention in the past, and there is no assurance that it will in the future. I am quite sure that under this bill the lending institutions will not lend money, even with government assurance, in areas where they are not absolutely sure that the farmers will return it. I do not see any solution for better housing conditions where they are vitally needed, namely, in the rural areas of Canada. I will not bother to put the records on Hansard again; this has already been done on several occasions. What assurance can the minister give us that the distribution of any benefits which may accrue from this bill will be equitable across Canada, and that the loans will not all be made possibly in one particular area where for the time being economic conditions are good, even in rural areas? Adjacent to cities that dairy farming, for instance, may be a profitable business in these days, and the farmer makes a little more money; but that does not mean that the other agricultural producers in more distant places are not in great need of housing. Is there going to be special consideration for the larger income groups? The people I am thinking about, on the other hand, are in the northern parts of Saskatchewan, in the backwoods of New Brunswick, in the more isolated districts of British Columbia. That is where housing is required in the rural parts of the country. There is provision here for slum clearance where the government lends to limited dividend corporations to assist in the financing of low rental housing projects. Is there similar provision for the agricultural needs in the matter of housing?

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will the minister make a statement in reply to some of the questions that have been brought to his attention?

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. member put the questions again? They were all answered in my opening statement, every one of them. However, if he will put them one at a time I will answer them again.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With regard to agriculture, I do not think that the minister's statement gave us sufficient assurance that the distribution of the benefits of the scheme will extend to the farmers.

Mr. ILSLEY: Very extensive provision is made for loans for the purpose of building and improving farm buildings. In the first place, provision is made under the bank act and under the farm loan improvements bill. That was all explained to the house at the time that legislation was under consideration. Under this legislation the farmers are eligible to the same extent as anyone else for loans under the housing act. Moreover, we recognize that many farms have mortgages on them, the mortgage covering a good deal more than the house; they cover the farm as well. And so provision is made in the bill for the consolidation of the mortgages if more money has to be lent by way of mortgage. Moreover, special provisions will be found in the bill to encourage lending institutions to lend in remote areas and places of that kind. I mentioned that in the speech I made this morning in introducing the resolution. They consist of special fees and payment of travelling expenses, because there will be extra expenses of investigation in certain cases. Those are provisions that will be found in the legislation. But if we were to undertake to make sure that there is a distribution of money equally province by province or something of that kind we could never satisfy anyone that the distribution was equitable—never. We have to make money available to persons who comply with certain conditions, and if they comply they will get the money.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there provision here for groups of people who go together to build houses in a cooperative way similar to what we find in Nova Scotia?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, there is provision for that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: For loans from a loan company, or directly from the government?

Mr. ILSLEY: To begin with, there are provisions for loans by cooperative lending institutions, and then there are provisions for loans to cooperative groups who are undertaking special schemes. The hon. gentleman had better wait and see the bill, or read what I said this morning.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What about the other point I brought up? Is the minister in a position to answer the question about the actual efficient operation of the plan so as to make sure that our people will really get dollar for dollar value for what they buy in housing, taking into consideration the excessive cost of cement, lumber and building material?

Mr. ILSLEY: The whole struggle we have made ever since the beginning of the war has been to keep prices down. That does not apply only to building materials, however; it applies to everything.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would you say you were very successful in war-time housing costs?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no reason to think that War-time Housing incurred excessive costs in the building of houses. I do not think we have been particularly successful in keeping prices down in building materials. In fact, we have been less successful in regard to lumber than anything else. I would say that. I know that is the opinion of the price control authorities, but that does not mean that we have not tried and tried desperately. There has been a great increase in wages, of course, in the logging and lumbering industries, and that has reflected itself inevitably in prices.

Mr. WRIGHT: There was little money spent in western Canada in comparison with other parts of the dominion having regard to the economic conditions that existed out there in the years before the war, and I do not see where in this measure provision is made for supplying houses in areas where they should be supplied, in depressed areas. You have to meet the same conditions in every part of Canada, no matter what the local conditions are. You have to give the same consideration to special conditions which may exist in different areas in Canada. After all, the person who lives in one of those areas needs housing just as much as if he lived in an area where economic conditions are better. There is difficulty in meeting these conditions, but some consideration should be given the matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: This does not provide for subsidizing housing in selected depressed rural areas. It does not do that, and I do not know that any scheme does. I have not seen any.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does not the minister think there should be something to take care of such conditions? The conditions are there. The people are living under those conditions and raising families. The health of the people in those areas is certainly not equal to the average for the Dominion of Canada. So long as we allow people to live there, we should make some effort to see that conditions are better in those areas.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know the situation in my hon. friend's province, but in my province you cannot prevent people from living in submarginal or marginal locations. Just what the government should do in respect to housing in those circumstances I do not know. We certainly are doing something very substantial for large families. I think the important thing is to give those people a chance on their income rather than to subsidize the houses. The administrative difficulties would be terrific. If you start selecting places here and there and subsidize housing in the depressed areas in the country there will be charges of inequality. The important thing is to get the income levels and the incomes of the people up and let them avail themselves of reasonable and general schemes such as this.

Mr. COLDWELL: I agree to some extent with what the minister has just said; but what some others have in mind is this: Some plan should be worked out in cooperation with the provincial governments under which instead of people picking out a piece of land and putting a shack on it they will be given the opportunity to build a house; and by means of cooperation something might be done to enable them to support a family and to undertake some obligation. I am very familiar with my own province. We have had people move up in the north country where there is a lot of bush and trees. As the minister suggests, these people are not making an economic living. They are living in little shacks and log houses. The land is good. More has to be done, probably by the provincial government, to make use of the high powered machinery we have to make that land economically usable—in other words to help them to clear land so that they can put in a crop and get a return that will enable them to assume some obligations. But the condition is there. Health and other social conditions are exceedingly poor in those areas. I have seen housing conditions in my own province that are indescribable. I remarked to the Prime Minister the other day that in his own constituency in the northern part of the province there are indescribable housing conditions. A bill like this, of course, does not help the situation very much. What we need is cooperative undertakings so that people can make a living on land that is good and assume some obligation to build decent houses; in other words, cooperative effort.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: A person of low income in the city cannot afford to build or buy a house, but he can obtain one at low rental. The farmer's income is sometimes the lowest in the whole of Canada. The same opportunities to rent housing accommodation does not exist for him, and there is no possibility of providing for it under this measure.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member asked a question, but it is an indefinite one. It is something like this: Is there any opportunity for a man who does not have any money to buy a house? Is that it?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No. The low income farmer has not sufficient money to own a house. In the city the low income man has the opportunity to get one at low rental.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under this plan?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, we intend to encourage low rentals. There are many houses rented in the country, are there not?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not in the rural communities. They may be renting a farm.

Mr. ILSLEY: It depends upon what you mean by very many.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think what my hon. friend is saying is that in the farming sections where you have a scattered population there are very few houses to rent. A few farms are rented—I am afraid the number of rented farms is increasing, but they are relatively few. What my hon. friend means is that in the city the low income man has a chance to rent a house, but when he is out in the country he has no opportunity either to build or to rent a house.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not wish to indulge in an argument on this measure, but the minister will be well advised to give further consideration to rural houses. Another recommendation I would make to the minister is that consideration be given to reducing by fifty per cent the interest rate charged to soldiers. That is a reasonable request to make in behalf of the soldiers. I am not going into details. Some argument has been put forward by other hon. members in favour of more rural houses. I am in agreement with the principles but probably not with the details of some of the suggestions. The minister would be justified, and I believe the country would back him up, in making a reduction of at least fifty per cent on interest charged the soldiers.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me ask the hon. gentleman a question. In one city in Canada, as has been said this afternoon, eighty-nine per cent of the people are tenants. If we were to make a cut of fifty per cent in the interest on loans to soldiers would he consider that we had any obligation to pay part of the rent of soldiers who could not buy a house and who have to live in a rented house?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I would answer that by asking the minister a question. Is it not the principle of this government—I hope it is—to encourage every Canadian to become a house-owner?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think encouragement should be given to that end, but it is utterly impossible to attain. There are going to be a tremendous number of tenants no matter what you do or how far you go, for many years to come. I am opposed to the suggestion that the hon. member makes. Consideration to returned soldiers should be given in other ways than that. They should be on the same footing as others in regard to the consideration that they get under a scheme of this kind. It is deliberately based on the principle of no exception for any particular class in the community.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not going to enter into an argument with the minister on this, but I cannot altogether agree with him. I do not believe the people of Canada agree with him. I believe the soldier should be in a preferred class and that the people of Canada will back the minister and this government or any other government in placing them in a preferred class to become house-owners. I do not know the average age of the soldiers, but I presume it would be from twenty-five to twenty-seven years. We presume and hope that they all want to get married when they come back and become house-owners. With regard to the landlords—and I suppose I am in that class since I have rented my farm and my house—I suppose they are the ones to whom preference will be given. Maybe I should be given preference since I have no house in Ottawa and I have rented the one I own in the country. I should not be considered in the preferred class rather than the man who at nineteen or twenty-one years of age went overseas to fight. He has sacrificed everything, every possibility of earning the necessary capital to make a down payment to acquire a house, in order that I might live in safety here. I believe it is the duty of Canada to give him at least a fifty per cent preference, because he has done all he could to ensure our safety at home.

I shall not be here when some of these measures are discussed further and I have not the knowledge to speak on monetary reforms, but I wish to assure the minister that the province of British Columbia has been fairly well represented in the banking committee at least so far as volume is concerned. We might be further represented in this house when this bill is considered, if we thought money could not be found in some way to cut the cost in half as far as these soldiers are concerned. I do not need to go into details or work it out mathematically, but I want to tell the minister that, leaving out the soldiers for a moment, I do not think the people who have remained at home will be satisfied with anything less than this concession to the soldiers.

Mr. ILSLEY: Before this session is over I believe the hon. gentleman will find that the provision we are making for the soldiers will be considered adequate by this house and by the people of Canada. But if my advice is accepted that provision will take other forms than his proposal, which would present altogether too many difficulties. The hon. gentleman cannot pass upon the desirability of his proposal until he sees the whole war programme in connection with gratuities, reestablishment and rehabilitation. When he does see the whole programme I believe he will be satisfied.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I quite agree with the minister, and I regret that he did not see fit to bring this legislation before the house much earlier in the session in order that I might pass upon it. At the moment I am not speaking as a Liberal member or as the member for Fraser Valley; I am speaking as a returned soldier member of this house. I do not believe family allowances or anything else can be as important as the steps we take to endeavour to meet our obligations to the men serving overseas in our behalf. The government may bring in legislation that will provide what I suggest is lacking in this measure. Legislation may be brought in to provide what is lacking in other measures that have been or may be passed before the session is over. I have no way of judging as to that, but as a returned soldier member of this house I consider it my duty to bear in mind at all times that the first interest of the Canadian people is their obligation to the men who are overseas.

This is probably the first time I ever got ahead of my friends to the left, at least that is what they will claim, who always say, "We brought this in." I am glad the minister has stated publicly to-day, in his responsible position as Minister of Finance, that the government is bringing down legislation along the lines advocated in 1940 by the returned soldier member for Fraser Valley. so that the soldiers may be adequately protected.

Mr. KNOWLES: I regret to say that this morning the minister took the punch out of what was to me the most encouraging phrase in this resolution. I refer to these words:

—and to authorize the Minister of Finance under certain conditions to make grants to municipalities, up to an aggregate amount not exceeding twenty million dollars—

I had dared to hope, despite the fact that the total amount allowable under this item was very small, that the principle of helping to set up public housing authorities had been recognized. If I understood the minister correctly he said that this idea had been definitely turned down, as far as the municipalities are concerned. He will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand that this $20,000,000 is only for the purpose of enabling municipalities to buy inflated land in slum areas and turn it over to private organizations for housing projects.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not exactly land with inflated values; it is land with old buildings on it. When that land is put into a housing project naturally what is called excess acquisition cost has to be considered. That is, the value of what is on the land cannot be taken into consideration in setting up your scheme, but that cost has to be borne by somebody. The value of the land can be considered in setting up a scheme because that value remains; it is not to be removed. All these old buildings have to be swept off, and somebody has to pay for them. This provides for a grant by the dominion of fifty per cent of that excess acquisition cost, provided the municipality or the province, or the province and the municipality, put up the other fifty per cent.

Mr. KNOWLES: But the grant is only for the purpose of helping to meet that excess acquisition cost?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words the minister made it very clear that the federal government was not prepared to assist municipalities in municipal housing projects.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: If it is possible to provide money to limited dividend corporations to go in for housing projects, under proper supervision, why should the minister feel that this cannot be done with the municipalities? Can he not trust the municipalities as well as he can trust the limited corporations?

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe the management will be infinitely better by a limited dividend corporation than by the ordinary municipality.

Mr. COLDWELL: That has not been the experience in other countries. In the city of Sheffield, for instance, there is a large municipal housing plan, and I believe it is very well managed. Of course we have not gone in very much for that sort of thing in this country, but it does seem to me that this legislation is weighted in favour of the lending institutions when we should have some public development. Pursuing the thought expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre a few moments ago, in connection with the government paying fifty per cent of the cost of the old buildings to be removed, would this apply in a municipality where, for example, they were cleaning up a slum area and leaving the land as an open space?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: It would not?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Or partly an open space?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. This is only for the purpose of enabling a housing project to go forward.

Mr. COLDWELL: But a housing project, to be healthy, may involve the removal of old property and the erection of new buildings that would not cover nearly as much ground. Would they be permitted to undertake a project of that description? I am dealing with slum clearance.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is slum clearance for the purpose of substituting a housing project. That is the slum clearance contemplated by this legislation, and I am not sure whether the hon. gentleman is thinking of that. It is not slum clearance for the creation of parks, for example.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. COLDWELL: I am thinking that it may be found beneficial to a community to tear down five or six blocks of slum dwellings, we will say, and to erect new dwellings on three of those blocks, leaving the other two vacant. Would a municipality be permitted to do that, and charge up the cost of the old buildings on the two blocks that were not to be rebuilt?

Mr. ILSLEY: You might have too much land then in proportion to buildings to make the scheme practicable from the economic standpoint, but if you did not there would be no reason why that could not be done.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think it should be made perfectly clear, and the public ought to know, that whatever may be said in favour of this resolution it does not meet the acute housing situation at present facing many parts of Canada. I read in the newspapers last week, and brought the matter to the attention of the minister when I inquired as to the introduction of the housing legislation, that in the city of Toronto there were no less than 800 families who would face acute housing problems before the end of the year. The newspaper report showed that a large number of those families were families in which the breadwinners were either overseas or in the armed forces.

The minister was good enough to indicate some time ago when the legislation was going to be introduced, and gave a skeleton outline of it, so that those who might utilize the facilities afforded by the legislation would have an opportunity of doing so ahead of the actual introduction of the resolution. On that occasion I raised what I thought was a pertinent question, one which should not be overlooked. I pointed out that it is all very well to provide the necessary financial arrangements for a housing programme, but that we must also have the materials with which to build the houses. Priorities is one of the real difficulties now facing those who would build houses. Materials in short supply are a powerful impediment to meeting the housing situation.

Not long ago the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply made a statement in which he warned the people in Canada not to become too optimistic about a building programme for the coming autumn. On June 30 the parliamentary assistant said that in 1944 the housing programme must be limited, and went on to give the reasons. He indicated clearly—at least it was clear to me—that any programme of housing would be considerably impeded by virtue of the fact that materials were not available. I am quite ready to believe that there may be a shortage of many materials required in any housing programme. I have in mind such things as furnaces and construction materials in general. My point in rising at this time is to indicate that I should not like to have the public feel that this housing legislation—in the long-term view, excellent in many respects—would before the end of the year provide any real help to relieve housing. When I say that I have in mind the situation as to materials.

May I endorse the statements and arguments respecting our armed forces personnel which have been made in this debate. It is important that, no matter what civilians may be entitled to, we keep in mind the fact that those who have done the fighting in this war are the ones who have first claim upon the generosity of the government and parliament. In my opinion, and I believe in the opinion of everyone in the house—because this is not a matter in which there is any division politically—those who have done the fighting must have the first consideration and must be the first concern of those who have power to do something for them. That must be so in this as in other matters. As a nation we cannot afford to do anything less than the best for those who are giving their best for us.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like the minister help me think through this matter, as it affects my constituency. Suppose in the city of Lethbridge there is a truck driver, the father of three children, who, by means of all manner of effort with his truck, is able to make $900 a year.

Mr. ILSLEY: And how much is he able to save? Tell me that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How much will he be able to save?—One cannot tell. It depends on how many accidents he has with his truck, and on a lot of other things. Let us suppose that this man is making $900 a year—and with his three children he possibly cannot save anything.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I want to know. I would not think he could.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What we are trying to find out is whether this building provision is interested in people or in money. If it is interested in people, it will build homes for people; if it is interested in money, it will build homes for bankers' dividends. That is the fact. In my opinion it is designed to pay bankers' dividends, and not to build homes for people at all. The amount a man can save surely does not enter into it. With his three children and a wife—and his family might grow to seven children, children Canada needs badly—the question is: Are you going to make provision to give him a home in which to rear those children? He has been prepared to make sacrifices to rear them. I want to see how it will work out. This man gets $900 a year. Can he qualify for one of these loans, by any means of which the minister can conceive?

Mr. ILSLEY: He cannot get a loan unless he can make a down payment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, you see, that immediately rules out a huge percentage of the people of Canada. If I remember correctly, the figures given this morning by the hon. member for Parkdale indicated that fifty per cent of the wage-earners of Canada were getting less than $1,000 a year. It is the wage-earners of Canada who are the men who are rearing Canadians of to-morrow. They are the men who are rearing the soldiers for the next war.

Mr. ILSLEY: Better not go too far. Would the hon. member suggest that we provide loans to the extent of one hundred per cent of the value of the property?

Mr. COLDWELL: Is not that the way the housing scheme I had in mind would work out?

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me deal first with the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let me have the minister's question again.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. member suggest that in certain conditions or circumstances we should advance loans to one hundred per cent of the value of the property, so that a person applying for a loan would not be under the necessity of putting up anything for himself? He could get title to the property, and the government, or a lending institution—or somebody—could take a loan for the full hundred per cent of the value of the property. And if so, to what persons would we extend that concession? First of all, should we extend it at all? The most I have heard suggested has been ninety per cent. Does the hon. member suggest one hundred per cent?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the minister mean one hundred per cent of the value of the home he is going to build?

Mr. ILSLEY: The value of the house and lot.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not see any way in which we are going to help substantially the vast percentage of wage-earners in Canada unless some such scheme is devised.

Mr. ILSLEY: And the hon. member is in favour of it, is he?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am in favour of it, yes. That is the only way in which you can help the people who need it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be interesting to find out how many members in the house are in favour of it. I should like to know that, as a matter of practical interest. Members get up and make very fine speeches, mentioning individual cases, and they say: What is the government going to do for this man? How much money are they going to give him? They say: If you do not do something for him, there will be a lot of people you will not be doing anything for. I ask hon. members to put themselves in a practical position once in a while. I know the hon. member for Lethbridge would make a one hundred per cent loan, and I am glad to get that from him.

Mr. COLDWELL: For these low wage and salaried people a scheme in cooperation with the municipalities should be undertaken whereby—

Mr. BLACKMORE: And the provinces.

Mr. COLDWELL: And the provinces, if you will. I am thinking of the organization which is closest to the people at the moment, the municipal organization. A scheme should be worked out whereby houses are erected and rented, or I would prefer to have them sold to purchasers on a rental basis.

Mr. ILSLEY: Without any down payment?

Mr. COLDWELL: Without any down payment. I think there are many families to whom homes must be sold or rented and who are not able to make a down payment. We must face the fact sooner or later that this scheme does not help that type of person.

Mr. ILSLEY: Renting is a different thing.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think it would be better to sell on a rental basis. The people should feel it is their home.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that not the way it is done in many city schemes? Are the homes not sold on a rental basis? Do they not pay $25 per month, a portion of which goes to pay for the cost of building?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not ashamed to say that the first home I owned I purchased with a very small down payment. I paid for that home on a rental basis and it took me a number of years to do so. Schemes have been worked out in many countries, especially in Great Britain, where the amount of rental purchase is no more than the ordinary rental for the same class of property. I think this is the right time to do this. I do not see how we can meet the situation the hon. member for Lethbridge was talking about, the truck driver with a wife and three children and earning less than $1,000 a year, by any other means. That man could not pay his expenses and obtain a home on any other basis. I think we should encourage the ownership of homes rather than rent them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think the minister realizes the reason why I say that the money should be advanced to the extent of one hundred per cent. I am not saying that the dominion government should advance all that money; it might be advanced through the cooperation of the provinces and the municipalities. The minister knows quite well that every dollar of that money could be created by the Bank of Canada without any cost at all, and it could be advanced to the provinces and the municipalities without any cost to Canada. Under this scheme you are simply putting into use money which has been made already by people and put into savings. No endeavour is being made to use the financial power of the country to help individuals to get homes. The government's interest is not in human beings, it is in the savings which have been accumulated by men who have been fortunate enough to save money.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This is simply to enable people to put savings to profitable use.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no, not at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If that were not the case the government would have provided a scheme under which the ordinary individual like the truck driver I mentioned could obtain a home, but it has not done that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is there a housing shortage in Lethbridge?

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is a housing shortage in every area in this country.

Mr. ILSLEY: All of them?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am speaking about the constituency I represent, and I would say that there is hardly an area in my constituency in which there is not a housing shortage. My constituency is not an industrial constituency where war work is being carried on. The housing shortage must be simply tremendous in areas like Toronto, Montreal, Halifax and other centres. We must bear in mind that new Canadians are growing up all the time; they are getting married and must have homes. The figures given by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) concerning Montreal are impressive enough. If I remember aright, he said that in Montreal 140,000 couples had been married while only 54,000 homes had been built. It does not take a very astute intellect to work out the situation that will develop in Montreal, and a similar situation has developed in various parts of Canada.

What are we doing to meet the needs of these young folk who are getting married? This scheme should be such that they can take advantage of it. A sound arrangement would be one where young people who are ready to assume the responsibilities of married life could go to the proper agency in their community and say, "We want to build a home and this is what we are able to do." The agency would send out a representative to make sure that they were as they represented themselves and then would say, "If you had to rent a home in this community you would pay $25 a month; you cannot get a home for less; we will endeavour to make arrangements to have a home built for you; you will pay $25 a month and at the end of twenty-five years you will own your home." Perhaps that period could be twenty years. If they had to leave within ten years to go somewhere else that agency should be ready to take over the home, discharge their obligations and give them whatever equity they might have.

That would be a common sense arrangement; that would be a workable arrangement. It would give hope to young people who wished to marry. I do not want to go into another matter while we are on this subject, but it must be borne in mind that it must be made easy for young people of Canada to marry and raise children. There are tens of thousands of young people who do not dare marry because they cannot see how they can make it go; they cannot see any hope of getting a home. Why should not this housing scheme be drafted to meet the needs of the hundreds of thousands of young people who are our greatest possession. There is nothing at all in this scheme to meet the needs of those young Canadians. Practically every one of our returned soldiers will be in that position when he returns. What are we doing for them?

Mr. ILSLEY: The overwhelming majority of those people will have $300 or $400 saved, and $400 is all you need to build a $4,000 home under this scheme.

Mr McNEVIN: I wish to make one observation with respect to the housing shortage. I should like to refer particularly to a condition which is due to the centralization of our war industry in large cities like Toronto, Winnipeg and Montreal. I can go out through the country and find many villages and hamlets where there are vacant houses. I know of one hamlet of ten houses of which three are vacant. One house is equipped with electricity and running water, and the whole three are good dwelling houses. The same condition prevails throughout Canada. I think we should bear that in mind. If there is a great shortage of housing in Montreal, Toronto and other large cities, a survey should be made of the small villages and hamlets to find the accommodation that can be used this winter if there are people without homes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I quite realize that a survey could be made to find vacant houses, but could these people find something to do in order to make a living in those small communities? As a matter of fact this condition is not due to the war. It was present before the war. You have only to read the census figures of 1931 to realize that. I remember a report being made to this parliament; I have a copy of it in my office at the present time. It showed the housing conditions in Canada as revealed by the census figures of 1931, and I was particularly interested in the figures for the city in which I lived at that time, the city of Regina. Even at that time, when there was no war, the congestion in Regina was such that there was an average of two persons to every room in that city. That condition may have improved since or got worse; I do not know, but what I am pointing out to the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, is that this condition is not due to the war. We had a shortage of several hundred thousand houses in this country before the war broke out.

Mr. McNEVIN: I was not speaking from that angle at all. The suggestion had been made that there might be eight hundred families in Toronto without shelter this winter. You cannot get enough houses built under any scheme between now and Christmas to take care of people in those circumstances, and I was saying that we had in Ontario, in the small municipalities, hamlets and villages, a substantial number of good, habitable houses now vacant which would enable us to take care of an emergent situation. I am in full accord with what has been said of the necessity of a large housing scheme for the Dominion of Canada as one of our post-war objectives.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How much money would this truck driver have to have to qualify for the loan?

Mr. ILSLEY: If he could build a house for $2,500, he would require five per cent. We advance ninety-five per cent if it is over $2,000, and I think it is ninety per cent if it is over $3,000. I gave the figures this morning. He puts up very little if the cost of the property is only $2,500. At $3,000 we advance a little over ninety-one per cent, and at $4,000, ninety per cent.

Mr. BLACKMORE: At what rate?

Mr. ILSLEY: At 4½ per cent.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And how long would he have to repay the loan?

Mr. ILSLEY: Twenty years, by instalments, and it may be thirty years if there is a zoning plan.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to continue the discussion I was having with the minister about twenty minutes ago when the committee got off on another tack. I think the minister has received wrong advice about the municipalities. I am speaking from my experience in western Canada, where, as I said this morning, there is a keen social conscience on this matter of housing. I feel that there will be general disappointment that the government has taken the obstinate view that it will not consider assisting in the setting up of municipal public housing authorities.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why does the hon. member use the word "obstinate"?

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister said this morning that the matter had been considered and that the government had made the definite decision that it did not propose to assist municipalities in that regard.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is there anything more obstinate about that than in the hon. gentleman's own position?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is a fair question. Probably not. I am just as obstinate in my determination that my view will eventually prevail as the minister is in his view.

Mr. ILSLEY: So long as we are both obstinate I do not mind.

Mr. KNOWLES: With the good humour now prevailing we may get somewhere. I was going to ask the minister whether consideration had been given to any other level of public authority, for example, provincial or federal. I take it that representations have been made to the government for assistance to the municipalities, and that that has been considered and turned down. Has the government any alternative to this indirect method of working through private lending companies? Has it considered setting up federal or provincial housing authorities?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the setting up of provincial authorities was considered. It must be remembered that we have had a pretty sad experience in dealing with certain of the provinces so far as recovery is concerned. There are four provinces all of which owe us large sums which apparently they have no intention of paying. When it comes to relations between the dominion government and other public authorities we naturally are getting a little bit careful. But I am not putting it entirely on that ground. There are disadvantages in advancing money and putting other public authorities in this country in debt to the dominion government. It can lead to a very serious situation.

Mr. COLDWELL: For what purpose were these moneys advanced?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is always a reason why they cannot repay after they have signed their names.

Mr. COLDWELL: It was a national calamity.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, I know. All the fertility of the human intellect comes right into play in finding reasons why solemn obligations signed by inferior jurisdictions in this country will not under certain conditions be honoured, and we are absolutely powerless to do anything about the matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: These were national calamities.

Mr. ILSLEY: And the hon. gentleman will argue that they should not pay back the advances, just as they argue. But the fact remains that the advances are not repaid.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister uses the word "recovery", and then speaking in another vein he talks about the amount of money that a person must have before he can be assisted in building a house. He has a different approach to this matter from that which some of us take. I feel that we should come at this matter directly, and that should not seem entirely strange to the government, in view of the family allowance legislation which the government brought down. The government in bringing down that measure has taken the position that children need assistance and that the thing to do is to put cash directly into the hands of the families concerned so that they will be able to feed and clothe their children better. Again, the minister in reply to the hon. member for Fraser Valley said that we should not be critical of the government's programme with respect to service personnel until everything had been brought down, and he referred to the war service gratuity legislation that is yet to come before the house. There again we are to have an attempt on the part of the government to meet an economic problem directly.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I did not say "attempt".

Mr. KNOWLES: At least we are agreed in this that we shall be glad to see the legislation brought down. I feel that in the matter of housing we should not think in terms of financial losses in connection with any programme as a result of which houses are built. If we build houses in Canada we increase the wealth of this country; we increase the goods and services available to provide a good life for our people, and I feel that what we should be doing is to be working through public authorities to build houses and make them available either on a rental basis or at prices at which they can be purchased at practically rental rates, so that our people can enjoy life in their own homes while they are living, instead of spending all their lives in trying to save up the necessary dollars so as to be able to buy a home in which to die.

I should like to say this to the minister. When a soldier enlists we do not ask him if he has enough money to buy a gun or a tank. We do not ask a young man who enlists in the air force if he has enough money to make the down payment on a Lancaster bomber. We directly provide him with this necessary equipment, as essential to the job in which he is engaged. The minister has discussed the financial nature of these things a number of times in the house and has objected rightly to the criticism of the opposition when they tried to argue that we are going bankrupt by doing these things.

The minister said that when we increase our production and devote a large part of it to a great cause we are not going bankrupt, and if we are not going bankrupt in doing that, when we are producing war goods, there is no reason why we should go bankrupt in the production of an essential peace-time undertaking such as homes for our people. I am convinced that the day will come when the principle of governments going indirectly into the providing of homes for the people through the medium of public housing authorities will prevail. I am sorry that what I thought was a first step in that direction in this resolution has been exploded by the minister's speech this morning. I think he got the wrong advice so far as the municipalities in the west are concerned.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to ask just two questions. First, will the machinery provided in this resolution, in other words the funds, which will be made available to the lending institutions, be administered through the present National Housing Act? Secondly, will the machinery that is being set up take in the credit unions, for example, as an approved lending institution? That institution has gone into housing, in Nova Scotia particularly, to some extent. In discussing the matter the minister definitely indicated that this machinery would not be available to the municipalities.

Mr. GILLIS: Nova Scotia has a very good provincial housing act, and the authorities there have done considerable excellent work in the field of cooperative housing. Would the machinery now being set up be available to the provincial government to expand the existing legislation they have in that cooperative housing field? They operate to some extent with the credit union movement in the province, and I should like to know whether the funds now being made available can be used provincially, in that province at any rate, to augment and expand their present legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not understand the latter part of the question. No money will go to the province; none of it will go to the province. The hon. member asks whether credit unions will be approved as lending institutions. If they have the power to lend on real estate, yes; we propose to make them eligible as lending institutions. I do not want to make my statement so sweeping that it will be used against me in case some cannot qualify, because there are some private lending institutions that cannot qualify for one reason or another. Nevertheless, the cooperative lending institutions are to be put on the same basis as the private institutions as far as eligibility is concerned.

Mr. GILLIS: The whole credit union movement in Nova Scotia will qualify because they are tied into a central organization.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There are one or two comments I wish to make on what the minister said a moment ago. He said that the interest on this money which would be advanced to the prospective home builder would be 4½ per cent. I do not hesitate to say that this is a little over twice too much. No home builder in the country should have to pay more than two per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why two per cent?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not say that it would not be well to make it less.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would make it one or nothing if I were in the hon. gentleman's place. The money will not cost anything; it will be debt-free money issued by the Bank of Canada. Why charge anything? That is, looking at it from my hon. friend's point of view.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I did not want to alarm the minister by going too far. The simple fact of the matter is that this question must be understood definitely by the rank and file in Canada, because it is not understood at the present time: The Bank of Canada does print this money without any cost and the money could be advanced.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. Let us confine our remarks to the resolution.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If what I am saying is not relevant to the resolution, then nothing is. You could not get anything that would be relevant to the resolution if what I am saying now is not to the point. It would be impossible to get anything that would be more pertinent. The hon. member for Parkdale, if I recall rightly, pointed out that in the United States the rate was 2 or 2½ per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to wait and see what was said.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am depending on my memory, but he read an excerpt from the report, I believe, of the Purvis commission in which it was pointed out that in the United States the rate was as I have stated.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He is generally wrong.

Mr. BLACKMORE: He may be right. Certain it is, however, that 2½ per cent is enough; it is as high as anyone should pay. The money can be created absolutely debt-free by the Bank of Canada and the minister will not deny it. The only argument he has ever given against the use of the Bank of Canada for the creation of money is that it will cause inflation. Well, seeing that we have created an abundance of goods for war purposes, and that we shall be able to produce enormously after this war, I suggest that it would be nonsense to talk about inflation after the war. The goods and services will be there.

I wish to make another comment on what the minister said about the provinces owing money and not paying it back. I do not know what the situation generally will be in this regard, but I would point out that the Bank of Canada was established for the purpose of creating money in the Dominion of Canada and it has been given the absolute power of issue. It can therefore create money without any gold behind it. If it cannot create money and advance it to the provinces without loss to the dominion, then I suggest that it is impossible to reason at all. Why we should worry about the provinces failing to pay back certain moneys it is difficult to understand. There must be a completely changed attitude towards this whole aspect of finance. The sooner members come to realize that, the sooner they will be in a position to save the country from communism. We cannot go on with the antiquated notions about finance that have filled the minds of members of this house and of the administration. We must acquire a modern realistic attitude toward money, and then we shall see that this proposal with respect to providing money to home owners at 2½ per cent is quite feasible.

Mr. McNEVIN: I do not know what foundation there is for the statement which the hon. member has made with reference to Soviet Russia, because the fact is that Soviet Russia uses approximately the same monetary system as we employ.

Mr. McGEER: I wish to say a few words on the provision made for slum clearance, which has been substantially qualified by the minister in his remarks this morning. Slum clearance is something everyone talks about but nobody does anything about, and the reason is that unless the municipalities are able to develop a programme of slum clearance and prosecute it, the situation remains without anybody being in a position to move on it with any effectiveness. Slum clearance is probably one of the finest examples of the danger of obsolescence fastening itself on to a community through the practice of always thinking of everything in terms of the investment of money. In slum clearance and in the futures of cities there is probably something more important than the individual dwelling houses. I think the more important thing is the environment and the surroundings of the dwelling houses themselves. We have moved along to a time when the number of hours that people work is comparatively small compared with the number of hours that they have in the way of leisure time. You will hardly find in a Canadian city anything like adequate accommodation for the healthy cultural occupation of leisure time.

I do not know how the figure of $20,000,000 was arrived at, but certainly that amount would not go very far in slum clearance throughout Canada. I should think that you would be able to spend much more than that in the city of Montreal alone. You could spend a good deal of it even in a young city like Vancouver which has not the obsolescence that the older cities have. There are whole areas in that young city that are outmoded to-day. As a matter of fact they were not properly built and they should be cleared away. In my opinion one effective method of slum clearance is to establish in the school areas not merely a school and playground, but a school with all the requirements of the social life of that school centre. Each school should be equipped not with one mediocre bit of ground for the children to play on, but with several divisions of playgrounds. It should have its gymnasium; it should have its stadium; it should have its swimming-pool; it should have its skating-rink, of course; it should have its theatre and its music centre; it should have its accommodation for music and for art, not merely for the children but each school centre in that section of the city should become as well as a centre of education, a centre for cultural entertainment for the whole community. What would it cost? How could it be paid for? It could be paid for in the same way that we pay for our highways, our parks, or those things that we must have in war time and in peace time that never reproduce a dollar of money dividends, but could produce enormously in the dividends of culture, better citizenship and better community life in a sounder, national economy. I know it is easy to say that we cannot afford these things. When the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, suggests that the Soviet Union are adopting the same kind of monetary system that we are—

Mr. McNEVIN: I did not say that they were adopting the same system, I said that they were using a somewhat similar system.

Mr. McGEER: That is a very different matter. They are using it in an entirely different way. They are putting and will continue to put the emphasis on public expenditure, not on investment to make money, but on investment to provide better accommodation for the people. It is one of the great fallacies of our whole public economy that we insist on putting everything out in the hope that it is going to be paid back either by some profit-making enterprise or by some levy of taxation. I happen to know some of the needs of our Canadian cities. I happened to be one of the mayors who formed the first mayors' conference in the west which became the mayors' conference of the Dominion of Canada. That conference has been actively organized and represents the municipalities of Canada in close cooperation with a similar organization in the United States. They have told us in this parliament through our reconstruction committee that they have not the money either in taxable reserves or in resources to carry on any programme of substantial expansion that would improve either the cities or provide post-war employment.

When you come to split this $20,000,000 how are you going to allocate it? How much is to go to Vancouver, how much to Halifax? Charlottetown is also included, I take it, as well as Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not the rural areas?

Mr. McGEER: I would not say that because it included municipalities and that probably takes in a great many rural areas. How are we to divide it? How far will it go round and what impression will it make on the slum condition of our cities? If some programme could be worked out whereby the dominion government would finance municipal schemes not merely of slum clearance but of community betterment, then I think we should be moving along the line where the days of slums in Canada would be done away with.

I fear that I see in this $20,000,000 and in the remarks of the minister this morning the same old attitude that prevailed in 1930 to 1935 and from 1936 to the outbreak of the war when the dominion government under two great parties stood with their backs to the wall flatly refusing to recognize as their responsibility those things which had been imposed upon provincial and municipal authority and which neither provincial nor municipal authority had the means or the powers under the constitution to finance. In my opinion, of all the violations of the true spirit of our Canadian constitution we find the greatest one in the selfish attitude of the federal parliament to the junior departments of government. I find no better expression of that same weakness, shall I say, in our national administration than in the attitude expressed in this bill in connection with slum clearance, and in the utter indifference on the part of the federal authorities to any desire to become associated with provincial and municipal governments in making conditions in the cities better for the masses of the people. What do slum conditions and the pitiable living conditions that exist in our cities cost us as a nation? What do they cost in health; what do they cost for the maintenance of machinery to prevent the crime that is bred there; what do they cost in the general deterioration of the productive capacity of the whole community? It is not something you can measure accurately, but the actual losses sustained from those conditions are infinitely greater than would be the amount of money required to remove them.

I want now to plead with the government and the minister that this excellent programme, as far as it goes, be strengthened and made much better by carrying it along to the point of taking power to cooperate with the province of Quebec, for example, and the group of municipalities making up the great city of Montreal, in order to do a real job in improving conditions in that great Canadian city—which will become greater as the years go by—to make it a model, and to carry that programme clear across the whole of Canada, from Montreal to the Pacific and from Montreal to the Atlantic. The federal government should embark upon a programme of that kind, for the federal government is the only authority that has power to create the money that can and must be employed if that sort of undertaking is to be pursued. You see, no municipality has a Bank of Canada. No provincial government has any power to raise money other than by taxation. We in Ottawa, in the federal parliament, can raise money by borrowing; we can raise money by taxing; we can raise money by issuing Bank of Canada notes, or we can raise money by borrowing bank deposits. Here we have power to create and issue the money of the people of Canada; and for some parts of the programme, such as the one I am discussing at the moment, we must find some way of financing other than by borrowing, which is merely deferring taxation, or by direct taxation because throughout Canada to-day we have in our municipalities a level of taxation that has converted a large part of our investments in municipal real estate from investments to liabilities. I do not know of a city in this country, unless there be one or two of the very small ones, that has any reserve of taxing power; in fact they have all levied taxes far in excess of the actual value of the property itself. So that if all we are going to have in the way of slum clearance is this $20,000,000, then as far as slum clearance is concerned, as far as any improvement in the poor conditions that exist throughout our Canadian cities is concerned, one of the hopes for the post-war period can now be abandoned.

I went into the idea of establishing community centres of the kind I have described. Of course they would vary in cost. Take a community such as Ottawa; probably you would have to build a dozen or more such centres. In Vancouver we would have to build a much larger number, but the lowest cost at which I could arrive, using the most ordinary equipment, was in the vicinity of $150,000 per unit. To do it as it should be done would cost probably $500,000 per unit. Then, to bring all these various centres under one common centre, where you could have playgrounds, theatres, general stadia affording facilities for competitions, and that sort of thing, would cost a very large sum. I should say that in my own city of Vancouver it would cost a good many million dollars to do that job right, at least somewhere in the vicinity of $10,000,000. Why, we have no more chance of raising that $10,000,000 from real estate taxes, or from any reserve of taxation that may be left to that community, than we would have of flying to the moon. The taxable resources are not there, but the unfortunate living conditions that should be remedied may be found everywhere in that young Canadian city.

It is a remarkable thing that men can think in terms of putting up $60,000,000 for a battleship which can be sunk in ten minutes; but when you come along and say that you would like to have $10,000,000 invested in the city of Vancouver to improve the living conditions of the children particularly and the people generally, men will shudder at the idea of giving a community that kind of protection, which is better than the protection given by a battleship in time of peace and even better than the protection given by a battleship where it may mean the winning of a war. Why should it be that only under pressure of war do men move to find the means for protecting the life of the state? What is more important in the life of the state than the standard of living of the people? In raising and protecting that standard the government performs its full function. But oh, no; we must have some financial complex about these things. We have to be smart business men when we are in the Department of Finance; we have to stand up and say, "We are careful and cautious; we do not put money out here unless we are sure it is going to come back. We have made some investments in the provinces, and now we find them reluctant to pay them back, even though the bond has been signed." Well, we appointed the Sirois commission to look into this housing situation, and to look into provincial and municipal powers to finance obligations which the dominion government had imposed upon them. The Sirois commission's report made a definite recommendation that the time had come when the whole programme of financing provinces should be revised, because provincial and municipal governments did not have the means to carry out programmes of slum clearance, and a great many other things.

I regret that this housing bill had to come before the house at this late date in the session, because it involves one of the most important phases of our post-war programme, not merely because we should take advantage of the opportunity afforded to improve life in our cities, but because it is in that field that probably the largest measure of unemployment relief is to be found.

Would it not be possible for the government to provide under this measure at least the power to work out those schemes of improving our cities? Let me plead on this basis: Will not the federal government assume and recognize that life in the cities is the very root of Canadian democracy? If it deteriorates and goes down, it cannot help having a serious effect upon the life of the nation. Would not the government recognize, with its superior financial power and strength, that there is a great, growing, national need in which it can serve, in full cooperation? If it is prepared to go as far as it has gone, to the length of saying that children should be given $9 a month to guarantee that they receive the right kind of food, surely it will follow along the same principle and say that in the "east ends" and in slum areas not only should those children have clean milk, and enough of it, but should have the right kinds of playgrounds and environment, the right kind of air in their schools and in their homes.

Does anyone believe for one moment that to do that kind of thing is beyond the capacity of the people of Canada? Will anyone say that there is a member in this chamber, or a citizen in the dominion, who would suggest that we shall not have the men available in the coming post-war period to build those playgrounds, swimming tanks and gymnasia? Does anyone believe for one moment that we shall not have enough instructors to administer those playgrounds? Out of the army alone we shall have back, this time, between 600 and 800 of the most highly-trained physical instructors the Dominion of Canada has ever had.

What are you going to do with them? Does anyone think for one moment that we shall not have the materials? Are we to revert, as we are reverting under this $20,000,000 programme, to where we were in 1936, with idle men, idle materials and jobs crying to be done, because somebody in the Department of Finance has said, "Oh, if you issued $50,000,000 to the Bank of Canada that would be inflation," or, "If you issue $200,000,000 to the Bank of Canada that would be inflation." Are we to go back to that kind of nonsense again, or are we to shudder under a load of debt we have piled up, and say that we have won the war from the aggressor and lost the nation to the debt dealer?

That kind of thing is not going to go on when this war is over. And if this government thinks for one moment that it will be allowed to fail to accept its responsibility for slum clearance, and its responsibility for the betterment of conditions throughout Canadian cities, it is making a very serious mistake. It is making a mistake in the light of a magnificent programme where cost seems not to have been of the least concern. And I would judge from the remarks of the minister this afternoon that we have not heard the best of it yet. That is still to come. Shades of the Hon. Charles Dunning! We have $200,000,000 for this; $300,000,000 for that—and we total it up and find that hardly a day goes by that we do not appropriate at least $100,000,000, or more! Why, they scared the living daylights out of the editorial department of the Ottawa Morning Journal by bringing in an appropriation in one week that totalled $1,200,000,000—and all for the betterment of the people of Canada!

What a pity it is that there are just a few little things we cannot seem to digest! Two hundred million dollars for family allowances—and $20,000,000 for slum clearances! If we can give $200,000,000 for family allowances, then we ought to be able to give $200,000,000 for family homes, and for the environment around family homes that will make that $9 a month we are giving the children a real national investment.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is $8.

Mr. McGEER: Oh, I did not know that. Somebody must have got in and knocked that dollar off. I thought it might have been $10, even.

I plead with the minister to rise above this impish nature of the Department of Finance and the treasury board, which does so much, and does so well in some places—and then backs into the old psychology of, "Oh, well, we had better not go too far, because we cannot afford it, and there are so many other important things."

I know one of the greatest jobs this government could do in Canada would be to cooperate with our cities, through the provincial governments, in the development of living conditions that can and should be greatly improved over what they are. I should like to know from the minister just how that $20,000,000 was arrived at.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has made his usual attack upon the Department of Finance. He has been doing so throughout the whole session in the banking and commerce committee, and out of it; and I have got to the place where I must say publicly that I resent it. I am not speaking now in defence of myself. Rather, I am offering a few words in defence of departmental officials of the Department of Finance.

This afternoon the hon. member said that we spend $200,000,000 for this and $300,000,000 for that, and a billion for this and a billion for that—and that is admirable! Apparently the Department of Finance is functioning well when it spends or consents to the expenditure of these very, very large sums of money. He says, "If you can do that for one thing, you can do it for everything. There is no reason why you cannot do it for everything, because you have the Bank of Canada to turn on the printing presses and turn out the money."

That is his argument. Then, with regard to the $20,000,000 for slum clearance he asks, "How is this figure arrived at?" I can say it was not arrived at on any basis of compilation or calculation. We thought that if the plan under this measure worked out, if the municipalities and the provinces were interested in it, we could very well increase the amount by further appropriations, just as further appropriations have been made in the past for purposes of the old housing act. If it does not work, then we shall have to resort to something else or adopt some other scheme. I do not know; there is not much reason why it should not be $50,000,000 instead of $20,000,000, if that would make it look any better, but I do not believe that between now and next spring we shall have any opportunity to spend more than $20,000,000. This summer, this fall and this winter there will be very little slum clearance take place because of the tremendous shortage of materials and labour in the country, as is known to every one. I am not going into this question of the unlimited, indefinite availability of what is called debt-free money.

Mr. McGEER: Or debts either.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am prepared to deal with that. I heard the hon. gentleman state in the banking and commerce committee what he would have done during the war and what he would do in the peace to come. It is surprisingly little different from what we have done or what we are prepared to do. When the hon. gentleman comes down from the heights of oratory to the valleys of practicability he has to admit that we have done about what any intelligent group of persons would do. Other countries have financed the war much as we have. They have financed it by taxation to the extent of the capacity of their peoples to pay, as we have done in this country. They have even borrowed to the extent of their ability to borrow from the public, as we have done with great success. Then, for a comparatively small and insignificant margin they have borrowed either from the central bank or from the chartered banks, depending upon which they thought was the best way to borrow. I am prepared to argue that the manner in which we have borrowed has been to the advantage of this country as compared with the alternative method of borrowing from the Bank of Canada.

I do not want the people of this country to get the impression that it does not make any difference the amount you borrow from the Bank of Canada, that it does not make any difference how much money you turn out on the printing presses of the government. That is the oldest of all fallacies; that is the oldest of all exploded nostrums, the idea that you can turn out money indefinitely. Let people read the history of the French revolution. Let them read the speeches of those eloquent gentlemen like Mirabeau himself, who advocated the issue of assignats. Each issue was argued for as being—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What date was that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Between 1790 and 1795.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: This is 1944.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the difficulty with people; they think it is a new thing, but it has been tried time after time.

Mr. MacNICOL: The same in the United States civil war.

Mr. SENN: The same in Germany.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not arguing and I do not say that a moderate expansion of the credit base is not feasible. That is what we have done during the war and before the war. There was a steady improvement in conditions between 1934 when the Bank of Canada came into existence and 1939. The steady improvement in employment figures and farm and wage incomes and so on was parallel to the expansion of the credit base during those years. I do not say that that should not be done after the war; but this idea that it can be done to an unlimited extent and that because we spend $200,000,000 here and $200,000,000 there we should spend $200,000,000 on everything, and that we are nibbling down and displaying a finance department complex and all that kind of thing simply because we do have some caution at times,—that I say is an idea which is most dangerous for this country.

As I say, I think $20,000,000 is all right for the time being, but so far as I am concerned the $20,000,000 may be increased for this purpose later on. It is the one place in the legislation where perhaps the amount might have been larger, but the bill provides and contemplates a large expenditure of money and I think we had better continue with that as it is now. As I say, if we cannot get along with the $20,000,000, we can supplement it at another session of parliament.

Mr. McGEER: There is one comment I should like to make in reply to the minister. I have never suggested that there is no limit to the amount of money that you can use simply because you have the power to print money. I am not unfamiliar with the history of John Law and the assignats. As a matter of fact I am not unfamiliar with the history of money as it has been written from the dawn of civilization.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder if we cannot try to stick to the resolution?

Mr. McGEER: Yes, we will stick to this. When a nation has the power to create money and the creation of money stands between the removal of slums and the continuance of slums, then there must be something wrong with a nation that will refuse to create money to be used to improve a condition that should be improved and would make for the betterment of the community at large. I resent the suggestion that I have no understanding of the problem of maintaining balanced finance in the community. I have listened to men talk about the security of money under the gold standard, and that has gone by the board. That was the only thing that was fought for two hundred years ago in France and during the civil war. We have abandoned that kind of thing and to-day we are operating on a straight managed paper standard. We have proved in this war that we can carry on an enormous programme of inflation and still maintain a balanced economy; we have proved that prices can be held comparatively easily.

I am glad the minister admits that this is one place where the figure might be larger. Let me draw the attention of hon. members to one important thing that he said. He said that this figure was arrived at because it was thought it would be enough, without any survey or computation being made; it was just picked out of the sky.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How do you know that?

Mr. McGEER: The minister said so. I think I am right.

Mr. ILSLEY: We did not make a survey, we did not circularize the municipalities to consult them on the policy and find out how much they would take.

Mr. McGEER: As a matter of fact the municipalities had already been before the reconstruction committee and had laid a great deal of information before that committee of this parliament. If you had appointed a committee of competent architects and engineers who could have been secured in the areas affected you could have had a complete story of what should be done and what was needed to be done. You could have laid out, not a one year or a next spring programme, but a five or ten year programme.

That has been done in the United States and it is one of their great reconstruction programmes. Every city in the United States has been surveyed and a report made of the total cost. Planning has been made over a long period of time. I think it is important for this committee to know just what it is hoped may be started on that phase of the housing scheme. But it certainly is no indication that there is any real policy or plan. How can these things be financed if they are not to be financed with Canada's national currency? We cannot go on much longer piling up debts for war, or for war on slums. We have come to about the limit of that kind of financing which says that it is fine to use a printing press to issue national debt but unsound to use a printing press to issue national legal tender currency. If we insist on sustaining this debt-claim system, we are putting our feet in the path that led Europe to disaster; make no mistake about that. If you think there is any soundness in piling up debts at the rate of two and three billion dollars a year, which comes down to nothing more or less than this, that you are making promises you cannot keep by issuing promises that you do not intend to keep; if that is sound, all I will say is that it has not been found sound in any other country that has been forced in due course to come to flat repudiation and all the disasters that have afflicted those countries which have gone on blindly believing that they can accumulate over the nation a burden of debt that no individual will accept.

Where is the man in Canada who will say that it is healthy for him individually to be under a load of individual debt? No one will agree with that. Yet we are now called upon to believe that the thing that is bad for us individually, is going to be good for us collectively, and because we are a little afraid now that we are getting our debts too high, we cannot clear slum conditions within the cities of Canada. I think we can do that, and I think we can do it without increasing debts. I think we can do it through a wise policy of national cooperation with our provinces and municipalities and by a wise administration of our managed paper currency, which is now the only basis of money that we have in the Dominion of Canada. What we went through from 1930 to 1939—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. This is a resolution respecting housing. Let us try to keep to the resolution.

Mr. McGEER: Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, since probably you are not aware of it, that the housing conditions we are trying to improve are those housing conditions which existed from 1930 to 1939.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I do not think it is in order to go back to the period from 1930 to 1939, and I hope that the hon. member will confine his remarks to the resolution, which is to improve housing conditions.

Mr. McGEER: I think it has to do with slum clearance, Mr. Chairman, and these slums are the slums which we had from 1930 to 1939, and which are still with us. I do not think it has to do with any other slums.

Mr. COLDWELL: Wartime Housing potential slums.

Mr. McGEER: Of course they have been added to the picture and they will be a serious problem in the post-war picture. One would not need to emphasize the slum conditions as they existed between 1930 and 1939 were it not for the fact that it has a direct bearing on the problem with which we are faced to-day, namely whether we are going to have full employment.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Take the place where the members have to live now.

Mr. McGEER: I would think that this phase of the resolution and this phase of the legislation is really much more important than the phase of helping the lending companies in financing homes at a profit. That seems to be where we have rather lost our balance in the housing legislation. We seem to think that if we bolster up the lending companies and associate with them by way of guarantees making it possible for them to lend more, even though the rate of interest is reduced, that is the major part of the government's participation in housing. Here is one particular issue on which I disagree with the Department of Finance. I think it is far more important for the Department of Finance to cooperate with the municipal and provincial governments in doing a public job, in building better schools, better houses and better community surroundings. If the government goes ahead and does that part of the job and maintains the national income, and does it without too great a burden of taxation, it will be found that people are able to build their own homes without having to pay any interest at all. I know a great many young fellows in my own part of the country who saved up their money—school-teachers or mechanics—and built their own homes in the evenings and on their holidays and never paid a dime of interest to anybody. That does not apply to everybody, but I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that that is the type of people who make the very best kind of citizens. This thing of piling up a load of interest-bearing debt where a man pays out in interest more than he pays for the land and materials and the labour that goes into his house is just the kind of thing that has carried whole communities to disaster. Why should the Department of Finance become, as it is rapidly becoming, the mainstay, the main support, the helping hand, the guiding light and the guardian angel of all the debt-piling bodies in Canada? That is where we are going to on this housing legislation. All the way through it is helping the financial organizations.

Mr. CLEAVER: Would the hon. member permit a question?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McGEER: I should like to ascertain from the minister whether the government would be willing, in the light of the recommendations made by the reconstruction committee and the reports that have been adopted by the house, to lay the foundation at least for cooperation not only on slum clearance but on municipal improvements throughout Canada. Is there any other provision apart from this whereby the government could engage in improving slum areas? Is there any other provision coming down or already down?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so. I think slum clearance and allied subjects are on the list of questions to be taken up at the dominion-provincial conference, where agreement will have to be reached on some phases of the matter with the provinces and municipalities. This particular provision in this bill is not a slum clearance proposal nearly so much as it is a housing proposal. Slum clearance here is merely incidental to the other provisions of the bill which provide that a low dividend housing corporation or a life insurance company may undertake a project and, if it does, it may do so under the terms set out in the bill. If it is a low dividend corporation the dominion government will lend ninety per cent of the cost of the project at three per cent on certain conditions, the conditions being that the low dividend corporation can make no capital gain out of the venture, that the rates of return will be limited to five per cent. In the case of the Montreal project, it voluntarily limited its own returns to three per cent, and so on. With regard to the life insurance companies, if a life insurance company undertakes a project, there will be a guaranteed return of 2½ per cent per annum on certain conditions, one of them being that the company set up a reserve and pay everything into that reserve which it earns over six per cent, and otherwise conduct itself in compliance with the provisions of the bill. If a low dividend corporation or a life insurance company wishes to develop a project in a part of a city in which there are slums, this provision of the bill relating to slum clearance supplements the other provisions by setting out a procedure under which, if a municipality or a province wishes to pay half of the cost of removing slums, the dominion government will pay the other half. It is not in any way an attempt to deal with the slum situation in the dominion. That is something which would have to be worked out in cooperation with the provinces and municipalities and the division of jurisdiction decided upon. And that is a matter which will have to be considered at the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. McGEER: If I might call the attention of the minister to the manner in which slum clearance was dealt with by the reconstruction committee in report No. 4 on housing and community planning, dated March 24, and adopted by the house, I would refer him to page 45. I do not know that there is anything wider than this, which authorizes the Minister of Finance under certain conditions to make grants to municipalities up to an aggregate amount not exceeding $20 million for the purpose of assisting in the clearance of slums or blighted areas. That is not incidental to anything; it is a completely distinct programme apart from lending to housebuilding corporations or individuals building houses. This is a declaration of policy on what has been recognized for a great many years as an urgent need throughout the dominion.

Mr. ILSLEY: I explained the limitations this morning; if the hon. gentleman had been here he would have heard me. I explained that this was incidental to the development of a housing project. It is slum clearance for a specific housing purpose. The resolution cannot say everything. I am telling the hon. gentleman what will be in the bill.

Mr. McGEER: I presume, of course, that this is the proper place to try to extend the terms of the bill or to have things included which apparently are not. It seems to me that if we are consistent at all with the programme already adopted by parliament, and there being no other provision for slum clearance, some provision should be made in this bill to take care of it. At any rate, I wish to put this section of the report on the record. I quote from the report at page 45:

> The housing act of 1919 included assistance to local authorities in carrying out schemes undertaken for the clearance of unhealthy areas, in assumption of losses by the government for expenditures in excess of the limited liability of the local authorities. This assistance ended in 1921. A new application of subsidies was developed in the housing act of 1923 in which authorization was given the minister of health to make grants to local authorities towards loss incurred, the amount of the grant in the form of annual contributions being settled in each case through consultation with the local authority. The grant was not to exceed 50 per cent of the estimated average annual loss. Approximately fourteen thousand houses were built under assistance from this act.
> Yet another innovation in handling subsidies for slum clearance was brought forward under the housing act of 1930 (Greenwood scheme). Annual payments were made on the basis of the number of persons displaced who would later be provided with new accommodations at low rents. These subsidies were 45 shillings per person rehoused in town, 50 shillings in rural districts in England and Wales, and 50 to 55 shillings in rural and urban areas in Scotland, annually for forty years. Additional payments could be applied if part of the building condemned was not insanitary and had to be purchased at market value, such supplementary subsidies not to exceed 15 shillings per person. When the land cost was more than £3,000 per acre in central city areas and tenants had to be rehoused in tenements of over three storeys, the subsidy per person was raised to 70 shillings per annum for forty years. In four years following the enactment, some 27,000 houses were provided under this scheme. In April, 1933, in order to speed up the slum clearance activities, the government, through the minister of health, arranged to survey the country for slum clearance areas and those which required reconditioning.
> In August, 1935, a further housing law was enacted which was designed principally to make better provision for the abatement and prevention of overcrowding, the redevelopment of urban areas in connection with the provision of housing accommodations and the reconditioning of buildings. This act also provided for the establishment of a housing advisory committee and of commissions for the management of local authorities' houses. Provision was further made to enable a local authority, with approval of the minister of health, to arrange with public utility societies, building societies, and so forth, to provide housing for persons displaced by the furtherance of clearance schemes. Consolidation of housing contributions and accounts under the several housing acts now operative was provided, looking to the simplification of this part of the work. This act modified the subsidies allotted for dwellings to relieve overcrowding as follows: on sites costing £1,500 per acre, 100 shillings per year per dwelling for twenty years; on sites ranging from £1,500 to £6,000 per acre, 120 to 160 shillings per year per dwelling for forty years. For buildings on land of higher price, the subsidy is increased 20 shillings for each additional £2,000 per acre paid for land.

Has any survey been made of slum clearances? Has there been any attempt to implement that report in any part of the government's programme?

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. member reading from an English report?

Mr. McGEER: No; the report of the reconstruction committee on housing filed with our own parliament and citing what has been done there, pointing out that we have had three different attempts at it without accomplishing very much. Then they referred to the English system where surveys had been made and bonuses paid. Is there anything suggested along that line for the improvement of housing conditions in Canadian cities, because, if nothing is to be done, how are we to be able to implement the report of any provincial conference without having made some appropriation to carry out some programme to assist the municipalities? Has anything been done to implement that, or can anything be done? If not, why not?

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to look at that report. I have not had time to do so.

Mr. McGEER: Surely now is the time to look at it before this legislation is dealt with, because the evidence before the reconstruction committee upon which the report was based was definite so far as the cities were concerned. They did not make any bones about placing their position definitely before the committee. I read from the evidence taken before that committee on November 27. It is found at page 871 in minutes of proceedings and evidence, No. 31, and is as follows:

> The financial resources of municipalities are wholly inadequate for any large-scale post-war public works programme such as probably will be required.
> A post-war public works programme on the municipal level—where the vast majority of the unemployed are likely to be centred—will require special financing, including an undetermined amount of federal aid.

This, even presuming that the fiscal and tax reforms urged in the earlier section of this memorandum, have been implemented. For, taking a realistic view of the situation, it is apparent that the volume of financing required for the kind of a post-war public works programme likely to be needed is completely beyond the limited revenue or credit resources of local and/or provincial governments.

Moreover, the scope of the problem—urban reconstruction—has gone far beyond the proportions of a mere local responsibility. It is a matter affecting virtually all the urban communities, and involves more than half the population of the country. Only the fiscal capacity of the federal government will be adequate for the task in hand. The question as we see it is not whether the federal government will assume the responsibility, but rather, on what terms, and what conditions, and for what kind of local public works.

It is not our responsibility to put forward or recommend a specific proposal concerning federal financing of local public works. The federal government in due course will announce its own policy in this regard.

In general however, we believe:

1. The federal government should stand ready to extend loans to local governments at the lowest possible interest rates, and for extended periods, consistent with the nature of the specific project for which the money is required.

2. In some instances it will be in the national as well as the local interest for the federal government to make an outright grant to cover in whole or in part the cost of certain kinds of local public works.

3. The proposal, referred to earlier in this memorandum, for the matching with federal dollars of post-war municipal reserve funds earmarked for "approved public works" has much to commend it.

4. The principles incorporated in the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, 1938, whereby the federal government financed, at low interest rates, self-liquidating local improvements, are sound, and might well form the basis for an extended national improvement act for post-war reconstruction.

5. We agree with the proposition that federal government financing of local public works or housing should be restricted to those municipalities having a master town plan.

6. We believe there is point to the suggestion that the federal government should encourage the preparation of local public works plans by agreeing to underwrite the cost of preparing the detailed plans for public works projects which have been mutually agreed upon as being potentially possible and desirable, whether or not the project is eventually proceeded with.

Such a procedure would permit the accumulation of a shelf of possible local post-war construction reserves, adequate for any eventuality, without unduly burdening the limited financial resources of local communities with the cost of preparing expensive detailed plans. The cost of preparing the plans would of course be a charge against any project eventually proceeded with.

Whatever the federal policy may be with respect to the financing of local public works, it is important—indeed, it is imperative—that a statement be made at an early date regarding the government's intention.

This is the position faced by all the cities of Canada as placed before the reconstruction committee. Is there nothing that we can do about it in Ottawa? Are we to leave that in the air? Are we to leave slum clearances, better housing and general community work, as outlined here, unconsidered, or are we to turn a deaf ear to the plea of the municipalities of Canada for assistance? Does the minister say that we cannot do anything about it at the present time?

Mr. ILSLEY: I say this, that with regard, first, to what programme of public works is to be instituted in the post-war period, whether by municipalities or by the dominion, and second, how that is to be financed, those are subjects which cannot be dealt with at this session. I say that those two subjects must await a dominion-provincial conference which we shall hold as soon as we can. In my judgment that will be in ample time to make provision for a post-war public works programme. We are dealing here not with a post-war public works programme in the municipalities or elsewhere; we are dealing with a specific subject, the subject of housing, which is more urgent than a general public works programme. We are dealing with slum clearance only in so far as it is incidental to the successful institution and carrying through of projects which are provided for in this housing legislation.

Mr. McGEER: You see the difficulty about that is, if the war comes to an end soon, as has been indicated by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons, then it would take a great deal of time to get that programme planned out. There is no way by which you can move into a programme of slum clearance or general housing as a part of the civic life of Canada without having it well organized and planned. Not only would it take time to get that done—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The minister has stated that he is not in a position to tell the committee what the government's policy will be in the future. We are dealing now with a specific resolution and I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the resolution. The matter of government policy is something for the government itself to announce.

Mr. McGEER: I understood, Mr. Chairman, that we were dealing with the question of slum clearance.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member is now discussing what the government's policy will be, relative to certain measures which are suggested in the report of the reconstruction committee. The minister has made it perfectly clear that he is not in a position to state what that policy will be. As I said before, we are dealing with a specific resolution before the committee. We should confine our remarks to this resolution.

Mr. McGEER: In answer to that, Mr. Chairman, a discussion as to whether or not the programme of housing and slum clearance is adequate and sufficient to meet the needs of to-day is certainly in order. Those of us who think it should be expanded or extended surely have a right to plead with the minister and the government to extend it to include something that is not covered.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member has pleaded. He has asked the minister what is to be the policy, and the minister has replied that he is not in a position to state what the policy will be. We are dealing with this specific resolution. The hon. member has asked the minister these questions repeatedly, and he has his answer.

Mr. McGEER: Very well, Mr. Chairman, if you rule me out of order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the resolution carry? Carried.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. CLEAVER: Oh, all right.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 183, to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, the improvement of housing and living conditions, and the expansion of employment in the post-war period.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN-YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on bill No. 91, respecting banks and banking.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not able to find the reprinted copy of this bill as amended and reported by the banking and commerce committee. I wonder if copies are available?

Mr. CLEAVER: In Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was the bill itself not reprinted?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Yes, the bill has been reprinted; it so states on the title page.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wonder if it would be possible for the officials of the house to distribute copies of the reprinted bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: It follows bill No. 171 in my file of bills.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the minister is not going to make a statement at this stage—

Mr. ILSLEY: We are in committee of the whole, and I think we had better just go on with the sections one by one.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Before we take up these sections one by one I should like to make a few comments. I have seen the reprinted copy of the bill, with the amendments made in committee. While I suppose very seldom in our parliamentary history has a bill been given the lengthy consideration this bill was given in committee; while I personally found it impossible, because of duties here and elsewhere, to attend the meetings of that committee with any great regularity, I have tried to read most of the transcripts of the proceedings there. I find those proceedings so lengthy that it is indeed rather difficult to sift through them, but certain matters of fundamental and outstanding importance were brought before the committee during this lengthy inquiry.

In my opinion this inquiry has been most important because of the implications of our banking system in relation to our post-war problems. Most of the time was spent in going into the report of the Bank of Canada and hearing evidence from the governor of the bank, the minister, the deputy minister and other officials, as well as representatives of the banks, largely based on the material brought before the committee or perhaps I should say brought out in evidence by the committee from the governor of the Bank of Canada and other witnesses. Two or three things struck me forcibly. Hon. members will recall that in his report as governor of the Bank of Canada Mr. Towers said that a million more persons than in 1939 will have to find employment in the immediate post-war period. Later on in his evidence before the committee he said, as will be found at page 84 of the proceedings, that one and a half million more persons will be available for civilian employment than are employed in the sector of civilian employment at the present time. He meant when we come to the period of demobilization following the war. This entails, of course, a tremendous financial and economic problem; and if we are to solve that problem it means that we must engage in vastly increased production or that we must spread the production out over a vastly greater number of people, which means new social and economic problems. At the same time, as that is spread out over more people by shortening hours or in some other way, if we reach the stage where we are producing greater quantities of goods, it involves the distribution also of increased purchasing power and, as Mr. Towers pointed out, a very high level of new capital investment. It is that about which I wish to say something this evening. At page 85 of the transcript of evidence Mr. Towers suggested that we shall require the enormous sum of one and a half billions of dollars of new investment a year, indefinitely, if we are to maintain a national income of the present high level, or approaching the present high level of about seven and a half billions of dollars annually. That is the annual investment he said would be required in order to maintain full employment. This is found at page 85 of the transcript of evidence taken before the committee on banking and commerce.

What has struck me throughout, when we were dealing with these enormous figures and were faced with the enormous problems these figures involve, in terms of goods, services and distribution, was simply this: Is it possible for our present system of private enterprise to accomplish all this?

Another point which was brought out clearly in the committee was this: Surveys show that it is unlikely that private enterprise itself will be able to carry this tremendous load. I wonder too if it might not be unwilling to carry that obligation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Towers did not give his approval of the one and a half billion figure.

Mr. COLDWELL: What did he do, then?

Mr. ILSLEY: He said:

It has been estimated that the maintenance of full employment after the war would require capital investment of one and a half billions per annum. There are inevitable qualifications to such estimates; but they are intended to and do serve the purpose of giving us a general idea of the magnitude of the problem.

I think that was taken to be an estimate.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, it was. But I think Mr. Towers, in placing that before the committee, did so with his personal approval. That is perhaps a minor detail in the discussion. However, I am glad the minister mentioned it, because I do not wish to quote Mr. Towers as having said anything he did not actually say. But at least the James committee gave that impression.

In the last couple of months some interesting surveys have been made which have a bearing on this problem. One survey deals directly with the banking problem. On May 29 of this year the Financial Post published a survey of 2,400 of the largest manufacturing concerns across Canada. In those 2,400 manufacturing concerns were included eight of our major industries. The Financial Post listed them as follows: Animal products, including packing, and so on; vegetable products, including canning, dehydration and the like; textiles; wood; paper; iron and steel; non-ferrous metals, and non-metallic minerals. Those are eight of our major industries in Canada.

The Financial Post showed that the 2,400 industries combined created one-seventh of the entire national income in 1939. They were asked what they thought they could invest in capital outlay immediately following the war, and the figure they gave for the three years after the war was an average of $106,000,000 a year. That is, they estimate that they will spend approximately one-fifteenth of the one and a half billion dollars that the James committee suggested is required after the war to maintain full employment.

Let us bear in mind, too, that the survey indicates clearly that they feel they can invest this $106,000,000 annually, only provided that there is an attempt made to maintain both full employment, and a high level of export trade. Hon. members will recall that the other day when discussing the family allowances I made the statement that the social security measures were to be welcomed. I pointed out, however, that we were erecting a superstructure of expenditures on social security measures without laying, first of all, an economic foundation. I am not suggesting that those social security measures should wait until we lay that economic foundation; but I am suggesting when we are considering social security measures we ought at the same time to be considering also the economic foundations upon which they must depend.

My criticism of this bill, as it comes from the committee, is that it fails to take into account these problems, and to lay the financial foundations which in my opinion are necessary to meet the grave problems which will arise shortly. I say, "shortly", because I hope that we are nearing the end of this great war.

If the Financial Post survey in in any measure correct, it means that somebody, somehow, has to fill the tremendous gap between $106,000,000 and the one and a half billions we require for capital investment annually. Of course there are many other industries, many other manufacturing concerns in the country which will invest in capital expenditures after the war. But when we consider that the big industries which were surveyed were able to see expenditures only to the amount I have indicated to the committee, then it becomes obvious at once that at very best there will be, in any event, a tremendous gap which the government itself will have to fill.

This nation, then, has to look forward to the making of very large expenditures in order to maintain anything approaching full employment. Sometimes I am asked, and quite properly, "What is your definition of full employment?" There are a great many definitions. Sir William Beveridge gave one which was quoted in the house the other day. But the simplest definition I know is that full employment means that every able and willing worker has an opportunity to do productive work at a reasonable level of income. That being so, the government has two functions in this respect. First, it must finance useful projects to create necessary employment and second, it must distribute adequate purchasing power in order that the products of industry may be distributed among the people.

As I have read the evidence given before the committee on banking and commerce, the thought that has struck me is that under the present financial system, under the system this bill maintains, mounting indebtedness to the private banks must be involved. The government must sell bonds or other securities, treasury certificates and the like, to private banks, in exchange for bank credits which create a deposit against which the government writes cheques in order to meet many of its obligations and expenses. No matter what our views are regarding banks and banking, I think that looking back over the last few years we have been struck by the growth of the government's indebtedness to the private banks. This has increased sharply in the last fifteen years, or since 1930. It seems that whether it is during a peace-time depression or a war-time prosperity the trend has been the same. Not only has it been the same, but what I think is equally important, it has been continuous, whether in the pre-war depression or in the present unhealthy war prosperity. I think the statistics prove this assertion.

Let us look for a moment at the statistics, and again I refer to the evidence before the banking and commerce committee. The Bank of Canada statement shows that the bank holdings of dominion and provincial securities rose from $316 million in 1930 to $1,234 million in 1939. That was a sharp increase. But by the end of 1943 they had risen to $2,627 million. What is equally significant is that they comprised almost one-half of the total assets of all our chartered banks. This creation of debt on the part of the public to the private financial institutions also creates an exceedingly dangerous situation in which there may be, in the post-war period particularly, the thing which we call inflation.

We were told before the banking and commerce committee that loans and securities created bank deposits, and that bank deposits constitute from ninety to ninety-five per cent of our medium of exchange, namely the available cheque money. An attempt, and a very successful one, has been made during this war by means of victory loans to draw off a good deal of purchasing power which might otherwise have punched the price ceiling. But in spite of our victory loans drawing off a considerable amount of purchasing power from our people, bank deposits have risen—I will use round figures—from over $2,000 million before the war to something like $4,500 million at the present time. Apparently full employment under the present financial system cannot be achieved without an increasing accumulation of debt to the private financial interests and at the same time a grave threat of inflation to the country.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the figures before me, but I think the hon. member's figure for the deposits is considerably low. I think it was $2,500 million.

Mr. COLDWELL: Was it not $2,400 million.

Mr. ILSLEY: Something like that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not take the time to look up that figure. It was not in the record as I saw it and I wanted to be conservative so that I said $2,000 million. But in any event there was a considerable increase to $4,500 million. The facts conveyed by that statement constituted the paradox which faced the committee and which occupied practically all its time. May I suggest that this bill offers no solution at all. Some amendments seeking to deal with the problem were offered, but they were rejected by the committee on the ground that they would hamstring the banks. No amendment or suggestion was adopted that, in my opinion, will meet the situation with which we are now faced.

I should like to mention the principal amendments that were rejected. The first was to prohibit the banks from dealing in government bonds and securities. The second was to maintain cash reserves of one hundred per cent against demand deposits. The third was to prohibit the banks from issuing demand deposits as a substitute for the lawful currency of Canada. Those were the three suggestions made, I think by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Parry Sound. The fact that must have struck the committee—I know it struck me forcibly—was that apparently on the present basis the chartered banks could not operate without government business. That was the evidence given before the committee. I should like to quote the deputy minister's statement on July 18, as it appears on pages 1242 and 1243 of the evidence, when he said that the banks, if forced to give up their government securities, would go into the red several million dollars each year; that they would lose about $35 million in interest, which would more than wipe out their net earnings of $31,600,000 which they made last year, before taking care of losses or paying any shareholders' dividends.

That illustrates the degree to which the banks are dependent upon government business, public business, instead of private business, and I think it warranted the observation made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard who is reported on page 1244 of the record as follows:

> . . . if the banking business could not function as a private enterprise servicing private enterprise it must depend upon the earnings from public finance and public enterprise . . . then is it not pretty nearly time that they become recognized as an institution that had evolved into a state public utility that should be operated as such.

The evidence before the committee confirmed my opinion that this bill to extend the charters of the private banks should not be proceeded with, but that the banks should be made public utilities or, as we suggested on second reading of the bill, that they be nationalized. How they should be operated under a nationalized or socialized plan is a matter which the committee could have gone into exhaustively had it been empowered to do so on the second reading. But we could not inquire into that particular suggestion, because the house had already rejected it, and therefore very little discussion of it occurred in committee.

Those are some of the few observations I wish to make on this particular bill at this time, but I wish to refer now to some of the amendments made and to say also that there are in the bill some new sections with which we are in hearty agreement. The amendment that would require the banks to disclose their inner reserves every ten years occupied several weeks of the time of the bank and commerce committee and was finally rejected on the advice of the minister. But the testimony before that committee brought out the fact that the banks can currently escape—I say currently escape—some of the excess profits taxes. The minister himself brought out the fact that two or three banks had set aside higher inner reserves than he thought were warranted, and he suggested an amendment which would meet that situation in the future. I want to say to the minister that his contention that publication of the inner reserves would shake public confidence in our banks and banking system was not a good reason.

Mr. McNEVIN: Was not the minister's action endorsed by several others, including Mr. Clarkson and Professor Jackson?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, but the minister is here and the other gentlemen are not, and I am addressing my remarks to the minister. I know he was supported in this by his advisers, but after all it is the minister who has the responsibility and must take it, and the minister's stand carried weight too.

Mr. McNEVIN: I do not think that Mr. Clarkson, the chartered accountant, could be classified as an adviser of the minister, nor could Professor Jackson who represented the retail federation. They both upheld the minister's view.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was thinking of the advisers to the minister. The gentlemen just mentioned may not be advisers to the minister, but they are the people who advised the committee, and they did support the point of view expressed by the minister.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: What stand did the committee as a whole take on the matter?

Mr. COLDWELL: The majority of the committee supported the minister.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Quite automatically.

Mr. COLDWELL. I would not say that.

Mr. GRAHAM: The members of the committee supported the facts as they appeared in the evidence.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not disputing that. I do not think I have introduced anything objectionable and I do not intend to do so. I am convinced that the men who voted that way were convinced that they were voting quite properly, just as when I would have voted against it as I think quite properly. I am not suggesting anything else.

What I was going to suggest to the minister was this. The discussion which occurred over the inner reserves, which was given wide publicity in the newspapers, without information as to the inner reserves being given, has awakened in the public mind a suspicion both of the banks and of the government itself. I think it would have been far better in the public interest if the information had been given and there had been no question about it at all. The very purpose which the minister says he had in view, that of retaining confidence in the banking institutions, was ill-served by that motion. I believe that more suspicion has thereby been aroused than there was in the country before, and I strongly urge the minister, when we reach the appropriate clause, to give that information to this committee. It may be that the banks have piled up appalling large inner reserves; it may be that they are very, very small; I do not know, but since the question has been raised there is a widespread suspicion in the public mind regarding the inner reserves of the chartered banks and a suspicion, too, of the motives of the government, more particularly perhaps of those of the minister.

One notable thing that the bill as introduced contained was the original subsection 2 of section 91, legalizing small personal loans; that is, loans under $500 which may be made by the banks without collateral to people who cannot produce the collateral but who desire to get a small loan, and the discount rate was five per cent as it appeared in the original bill, the loan being repayable by monthly instalments, which is often the only way in which small borrowers can repay. But testimony from the assistant general manager of one of the great banks, Mr. Stewart, of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, brought out the fact that his bank had been making personal loans at what was the nominal rate of discount of seven per cent, but that that rate of discount of seven per cent was an effective rate of interest of nearly twelve per cent, to be exact 11·781 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: The discount at seven per cent did not result in an effective rate of eleven or twelve per cent. It was the discount at seven per cent, plus an arrangement, which is described in the evidence, for the deposit of money in a savings account and leaving it there. The combined effect of the discount plus this arrangement was a rate of eleven or twelve per cent. I think it is important to keep that in mind.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the total effect was that a rate, as he gave it, of 11·781 per cent was charged. That is given at page 381 of the evidence. I found it difficult to follow the minister's reasoning when he urged the committee to drop subsection 2 of section 91 on the ground that it could not be defined in language sufficiently clear to leave no loopholes for the banks. It did not seem to me that it was beyond the powers of the legal advisers of the government and the clever draftsmen who frame so much of our legislation to find language that would block the loopholes and also prevent small loans from being charged an effective rate of interest that was considered too high. That there is a necessity for these small loans from the chartered banks I think no one will dispute. I think they have served, so far as they have gone, a very useful purpose in spite of the charges—I will not use the term "interest rate"—that have been made. People without collateral often need a small loan of two or three or four or five hundred dollars for an operation or something of that sort or because of sickness, and the banks have been making these loans, but what I think is serious is that they have been making them at an effective rate of interest higher than the rate of interest allowed by the act and in that sense have been practically doing something that is not legal under our legislation. Unfortunately the bill as now before the committee does not meet this need of the borrower for a small loan or legalize the methods used by the banks.

In my opinion the necessities of the post-war situation to which I referred at the outset of my remarks do not warrant the renewal of the bank charters for ten years. This bill ought not to be adopted with that clause in it at the present time. Why? Because many new economic developments will have to be faced in the near future. As I remarked earlier, we have just adopted in this house a necessary but expensive social security programme. We have accumulated during this war an exceedingly heavy debt, and while interest rates are much lower than they were on the war debt at the end of the last war, nevertheless those debt charges constitute a tremendous burden upon this country of 11,500,000 people. As I suggested earlier, because of the gaps that may be found through the inability or unwillingness of private enterprise to assume certain risks and do certain jobs, we shall have to make very large governmental expenditures for projects which we must undertake as a nation in order to meet the needs of our people.

All this, Mr. Chairman, will certainly require significant changes in our fiscal policy, and this means that we have to face significant changes in our banking policy. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle to limit the life of the charters to the next two years was before the committee and voted down. I supported that motion and will do so again, although I felt we would have been much wiser to have extended the charters just now, pending further parliamentary investigation or even investigation, suggested by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, by royal commission, for just one year instead of two years; because a royal commission could go into more phases of banking policy and the proposals regarding banking than our narrower terms of reference and the vote in the house would allow us to do.

But this proposal for a two-year extension was rejected by the committee who, I think, were probably persuaded, many of them, to vote against it because they believed that the parliament of Canada had at all times the power to review the charters whenever it so wished. This bill, however, is regarded by a good many people as a contract between this parliament and the banks. It requires the consent of gentlemen in another place—gentlemen who are not elected to parliament but who are appointed for life—and before it could be reopened their consent would be necessary; and it is not impossible that they might object, indeed they might withhold their consent, to the reopening of the question of bank charters at any time within the next ten years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They probably would.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will not say what I was going to say, because once or twice when I have expressed myself with regard to the other place I have been accused of making threats and I do not like to be accused of making threats. I think, however, it is altogether likely that we would have some difficulty in that direction.

Some members of the banking and commerce committee were frankly of the opinion, an honest opinion, that the banks had done a good job and should be left alone to continue that job for another ten years. I do not agree with that. One hon. member, however, gave what I thought was an interesting reason for binding the country to a ten-year contract with the banks. He felt that there were dangerous trends in the country that threatened the existing banking system, and he said:

> Let us renew these charters for ten years and fortify to the limit of our capabilities against the disruption of the banking system of Canada.

That will be found at page 1496 of the evidence. When I heard that—and I did happen to hear it—I thought this was a clear demand upon this parliament that we tie the hands now not only of this parliament, which is in its dying days, which, according to the Prime Minister, will not go beyond, we will say, next April or May, but also the hands of the parliament which the people of Canada may elect to succeed this one. I say that an attempt to do that kind of thing is wrong because it tends to thwart the will of the people, and such an attitude is not in conformity with the democracy we are at the present time fighting to preserve.

Those are the principal comments I wish to make on the bill at this time. It will be readily seen, from what I have said already, that we oppose this bill because we do not believe it to be in the best interests of the people of Canada. It is binding the country to the same kind of financial economic system which we had before the war and which has been found wanting, and thus we cannot support this bill to extend the charters of the banks for another ten years.

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): I think it might be well to review the history of the bill which is before the committee. It is, of course, the bill that renews the charters of the commercial banks for the traditional period of ten years. The resolution preceding the reference of the bill and the proposed amendments to the committee on banking and commerce was discussed in the house and the general principles embodied in the bill were approved by this house. When the bill reached the committee on banking and commerce the task assigned to the committee was, of course, within the principle which the house had approved, to give the consideration, with care and deliberation, to the proposed amendments. The task was further to consider any other amendments or suggestions that came before the committee, generally with the purpose of improving the bill itself and the operations of the chartered banks.

I come from western Canada, and it is common knowledge that we in the west have believed for many years that financial wealth and therefore financial control and direction have been centralized too much in eastern Canada. We remember the happenings in western Canada during the period of the great depression that had such a terrible impact on the economy of the three western provinces. In addition it has been my lot in life to champion without exception the cause of the consumer and the producer class in this country; therefore I do not appear before this committee as the champion of any large corporate enterprise as such. In all the research work that I have had an opportunity of doing and in all the committees that I have taken part in I have attempted to maintain at least a balanced mind with regard to the matters under deliberation and not to adopt the attitude of wholesale condemnation in order to correct some of the things that should be corrected in the banking or other systems of this country.

In the course of the committee's many sittings dealing with this particular bill I took the opportunity of bringing to the committee and to the representatives of the chartered banks some of the criticism that I thought should be levelled at the past record of the chartered banks, particularly in western Canada. For instance, I pointed out that I found that, when the depression period emerged, the banks pursued too restrictive a policy particularly toward the small borrower and producer in this country. That was partly brought about by the necessity of the banks putting themselves in a liquid position to meet possible demands and their inability to realize on larger loans made in eastern Canada for the development of more or less large corporate concerns. I felt that in pursuing that policy to the extent that they did the banks had failed to discharge their primary function, namely, lending to take care of the current business of this nation, and that had they not been involved in large loans to large corporations they might have pursued a less restrictive policy toward the farmers of western Canada and, I presume, elsewhere when the depression came upon us.

Then I suggested that the banks in periods not necessarily of inflation but in boom times are inclined to follow the crowd and to make unwise expansions in lending policy. I hope the banks have learned a lesson and will apply the lesson and see to it that their policy in the future is a more temperate one in order to check boom conditions and in order to do what they should do to check the effects of depressions when they come about. In addition to that I pressed the banks to realize that they are national institutions, and that wherever they do business they should realize the conditions under which the producer in that particular area has to carry on his business. I was speaking particularly of the western farmer. The western farmer has long ago discovered, as we all have who have resided in that section for any length of time, that the words "annual business" is not a proper term to apply to the type of business the western farmer has to carry on because of climatic conditions. It therefore seems to me that any banking system must in its banking policy take into consideration the conditions under which its borrowers must carry on their business, and that the period of the loan and the time of repayment should not necessarily be one year, but should be that period in which a reasonably good farmer attempting to discharge his obligations can reasonably be expected to repay the loan he has obtained from the banks. In other words, I believe that the chartered banks must reach a decision. Either they must decide that they are not national in their lending policy, that they do not believe that western Canada offers a fair field for their banking activities, and that therefore they are withdrawing, or they must recognize the conditions under which the farmers of western Canada are operating and fit their banking policy to discharge that national duty toward that particular class of borrower.

As I listened in the committee to the statements of the senior officials of the chartered banks, it did appear to me that they are attempting to fit their banking policy into the actual conditions which we know in a given period of time obtain in western Canada. These were the criticisms that I thought were fair and proper to bring to the attention of the committee and of the officials of the banks when they appeared before us. But may I say, Mr. Chairman, that these criticisms did not blind me to the fundamentals of the Canadian picture with regard to the necessity of commercial banking institutions. The record of the Canadian banks when compared with that of any other banking system in the world is a record that by and large we can take the greatest pride in. I hold in my hand a statement of the chairman of the reserve bank of the United States which draws attention to the fact that in the period of the depression in the United States, the same period that I have referred to as the thirties—some 9,700 United States banks failed. There is not one hon. member who has lived as long as members of the House of Commons have lived who cannot imagine the terrific disaster that came to so many communities in that great country to the south as a result of those failures. In addition to that a great many other banks had to be saved by the action of the President of the United States in declaring a bank holiday. In other words, when we compare the record of our Canadian banks and the practices under which that banking system is operated with the record of the banks in the friendly country to the south of us which is economically very much like our own, we realize that the Canadian banks have a record that merits a great deal of approval so far as the safety of those banking institutions is concerned.

What are the primary purposes of a commercial banking system in a country such as ours? I think it is obvious that it is wise and proper to have safe depositories for the savings of the people. It is wise and proper, and in my opinion necessary, to have commercial banks to carry the current accounts or the checking accounts of the business men and the people of this nation, and to act as a clearing-house for the vast multitude of business operations that are settled between individuals every day in this country. The banks, of course, have performed that function for this nation. Then there are other services that the banks perform in the ordinary course of their banking business. One is a safe depository for valuable papers. We all know it is a very wise precaution for anyone who fears fire or other disaster to see to it that important documents are kept in a safe depository, and the banks give us that service at a very reasonable charge.

Until quite recently the banks discharged another important function. They were given the right, subject to taxation and certain limitations, to issue our cash in the form of bills in denominations of $5 and upwards. For many years that was a valuable part of the business allotted to the banks under the act. As hon. members know, however, it has been considered wise gradually to diminish the power of the banks to issue currency; that right is now being taken over by the Bank of Canada, and by 1950 the chartered banks will have lost that function and will no longer have the right to issue any part of the currency used in this country.

Then, as I have said, it is the function of the chartered banks to collect the savings of the people and, having collected them, to make those savings available by way of loan or by way of investment to individual or corporate enterprises in this country, of course subject to the limitations of the Bank Act as to the things in which the bank can invest and the security on which it can make loans. That, of course, is a very important function, and a very difficult one to discharge properly. Henry Mencken in his book, "The History of Religions", makes the point that the acceptance of the biblical ban upon usury, otherwise known as interest, held back the progress of the world for three or four hundred years, as he puts it. One can easily see that making available to productive enterprise the collective savings of the people has been a great agency in bringing about the great expansion of business that has taken place during the last two or three hundred years. The average individual would never think of making a loan, because the amount of money at his disposal would not be of very much use in any particular development. Through the agency of the chartered banks, however, on the one hand we provide a safe depository for the savings of the people and on the other we collect the results of their thrift and make it available at rates determined by parliament to the nation in order to develop and expand our commerce, add to the national income, increase the nation's wealth, and improve the welfare of the people as a whole.

There is one factor which I think is often overlooked but which I feel is of vital importance. The banks can exist and continue in business and discharge the duties we have imposed upon them by the Bank Act only as long as they are able to retain the confidence of the people. Confidence is the greatest asset any banking institution can have. That is why it seems to me that the founders of this nation were wise when they decided not to grant a monopoly to any bankers, but to see to it that the institutions which were given the right to collect the savings of the people and guarantee their safety, and to lend these collective savings to productive enterprise, were such as would protect those savings as far as might be humanly possible. While the record of the Canadian banks has been good, it is unfortunately a fact that there have been failures. Quite a number of men have considered, as some do to-day, that the banking business is a bonanza; that by some formula one can easily grow wealthy if he merely succeeds in getting a charter under the terms of the Bank Act. The records, of course, show that those banks which departed from policies of reasonable safety in discharging the duties for which they were created and which were unable to retain the confidence of the people in their integrity, finally ended by being merged with or taken over by some other bank or went into bankruptcy, sometimes with the shareholders losing all the money they had invested.

Then, when one considers the widespread use our people make of the services offered by the Canadian banks I think we would be blind if we did not realize the necessity of maintaining some such institutions as the commercial banks of this country. More than four million of our people have deposits in the chartered banks amounting to less than $1,000 each. This shows the widespread use of the banks by those who have not great wealth. If we consider the deposits up to $5,000 each we find that the aggregate of such deposits is almost as great as that of deposits of under $1,000. And that figure of four million people does not represent all those who are interested directly or indirectly in these deposits. I recall that an hon. member who sat beside me in the committee said that in his family of four, consisting of himself, his wife and two young children, there was only one bank account, but that his wife and two children had as much interest in his account as he had. So that the number of those interested in the safety and well-being of these banking institutions could be multiplied considerably.

Our approach to the consideration of the renewal of the charters, I suggest, should be this. What functions are the banks supposed to perform? They are a quasi-public utility, as we all admit and as the banks agree. Having decided what those functions are—and I have tried to give them to the committee—then it seems to me our task is to decide whether or not those functions have been performed with reasonable efficiency and at reasonable cost to the nation. The hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia, is not here at the moment, but he put the matter before the committee very plainly, and I agreed with him. In my opinion, after having followed very carefully indeed all the evidence presented by the officials of the banks, the governor of the Bank of Canada, the deputy minister and others, on the whole, subject to the criticisms I have indicated, the banks have discharged the duties imposed upon them in a very efficient manner indeed. It was brought to our attention that in the year 1943, a comparatively good year for the banks and much above the average for the preceding fifteen years, the banks made a net return of only 6·03 per cent on the shareholders' equity. I submit to the hon. members of this committee that this is not an unreasonable return on that equity, and that quite obviously the banks are not charging the people of Canada too much for the services that we think are necessary properly to conduct the country's commercial and financial business.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned some of the amendments which were dealt with by the committee, and which were approved and recommended to this committee of the whole house. One was a reduction of the rate of interest from seven per cent to six per cent. That is a very real advance toward reducing the cost of money to those requiring to use bank services when borrowing money. It is only one per cent, but let us remember that one per cent is a very considerable reduction when one applies it to the total of the sums lent throughout this country by the chartered banks.

In addition, from the point of view of one who represents an agricultural constituency I was delighted, of course, to see the provision for encouraging loans to farmers at a rate of five per cent, for the purpose of making specified farm improvements.

I do not intend to go into detail in respect of this particular provision, but it, too, is an amendment to the Bank Act which should be of great value to the farming community. This type of loan has been encouraged by the government's undertaking to guarantee against loss in loans made to farmers for those specific purposes, and to the extent of ten per cent of the aggregate amount so lent, and limited by a total over-all amount.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred to another amendment suggested by the minister, and that was the matter of small loans. While I do not think the hon. member meant to be unfair, yet I thought he did not deal quite correctly with the history of that amendment. As hon. members know, under the Small Loans Act, that type of loan is repayable on monthly instalments without security, and the rate is roughly two per cent a month. In order to make available a cheaper source of money the minister suggested that we include in the Bank Act a special section enabling the banks, if they saw fit to do so, to make loans on the same terms to the same type of borrower at a final cost of approximately 9¾ per cent. The committee discussed that particular amendment at great length. The objection to it, expressed by a number of members, was that while everyone in the committee felt that we would be performing a very real service to the smaller income group needing loans of that kind, it would be difficult indeed to remove from the minds of the public the suggestion that the banks might include in that particular category farmers and others who would be entitled by other provisions of the bill to a lower rate of interest.

The minister reluctantly—he did not urge it—suggested that in view of the criticism it might be wise for the committee to consider withdrawing that particular amendment. I say to this committee that, in common with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I was very reluctant to agree to the withdrawal of that particular amendment. I must confess, however, I did agree with the minister that, in the light of the discussion, it was wise to do as he suggested. The basic thing we wished to accomplish was to assist in providing a source of loans to persons who must borrow under those conditions, at a lower rate of interest than is available to them from any other source. My opinion is that while the amendment was withdrawn, inevitably common sense will cause it some day to be put into the Bank Act, so as to encourage the banks to carry on that type of business.

There was another reason. We were advised that the Canadian Bank of Commerce and one other bank—I believe it was the bank of Montreal—were already carrying on this type of business, and within the terms of the Bank Act as at present framed. The committee noted that while we were withdrawing the amendment, the banks were undertaking voluntarily to attempt, under the terms of the Bank Act as amended, to carry on the very type of business we wished to encourage. So that was another important reason why we adopted somewhat reluctantly the suggestion that the amendment should be withdrawn. That is, the banks are experimenting in the field of small loans, and will accomplish the desired purpose of giving that class of borrower a cheaper source of money if, in an emergency, he needs it.

Then, we provided for a better system of returns to the inspector general. And in the matter of inner reserves, which was discussed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, an amendment was made to the effect that the Minister of Finance is now charged with a statutory duty to make a report to the Minister of National Revenue if he considers that the inner reserves are higher than necessary for the purposes for which they are kept.

This amendment is, of course, to make it clear that the chartered banks are not escaping the taxation from time to time imposed upon them by parliament.

I shall for the moment deal with the so-called inner reserves. They are sometimes called "inside reserves," and some who wish to criticize use the term "hidden reserves". As I listened to the evidence regarding these reserves I was convinced that the banks pursued the same policy as any large corporation pursues in the matter of its reserves. The only difference is that they are dealing with the value of loans rather than the value of inventory in the shape of stock or merchandise. These inner reserves are created, outside of that portion which is put into reserve through surplus realized from sale of its stock, by a proper evaluation of the assets each year. If some of the loans have an element of risk which would appear to lower their value, then the value of those loans is depreciated, and the difference between the total amount of the loans and the depreciated value constitutes these so-called inner reserves.

This is a perfectly proper system, guarding against risks which are inevitable in banking. Despite all the rumours and the discussion which has taken place on that particular item, in my opinion no one need fear in the least the setting up of inner reserves. It is a perfectly proper safeguard, and particularly on the part of an institution which must in our interests—not its own—maintain the confidence of the people in the integrity and safety of that institution in which the people's money is deposited.

In addition, I think it is not generally known that these banks do not operate without strict supervision. As we know, they have their own auditors and, in addition, they have shareholders' auditors. Those auditors are appointed to go over all the books of the banks. They have access to every bit of information, including that connected with inner reserves. The decision in respect of the choice of the shareholders' auditors is that of the Minister of Finance.

In addition to that, we have the inspector general, whose duty it is to keep fully informed as to the position of each of the banks, and as to all matters connected with the business of those institutions. Therefore we have a government official responsible to this parliament to see to it that there is a continuous check kept on the banking institutions of the country, so that the position of the depositors, the borrowers, the shareholders and the public may be protected. And, mark you, the public have a very real interest in the safety and welfare of these banking institutions.

As the work of the committee developed we left, I think unwisely, the task assigned to the committee by the house, that is, the consideration of bill No. 91 and the suggested amendments thereto, and we ranged far and wide into matters that had nothing to do with the Bank Act, matters that had to do with government financing and the general financial policy of this country. I should like to summarize briefly some of the suggestions that were made.

As every one knows, the C.C.F. stand for the socialization of the commercial banks of this country. I must commend the members of that particular group who were on the committee for recognizing that prior to the bill being sent to the committee the house had decided against them on the principle and therefore the committee was not the proper place again to press their theories that the banks should be nationalized. Yet we know that that is the declared policy of the C.C.F.

But I want to point out that the recognized policy of the C.C.F. is to nationalize the banks, not for the reason given to-night by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, but in order to secure the control over money and credit that will permit them to nationalize everything else that they may wish to nationalize. It is a means to an end, and that is the manner in which we must pass judgment upon the advocacy of nationalization by the C.C.F.

I am not going to deal at length with the Social Credit standing because with due deference to the members of that party I must admit that throughout the whole course of the committee I remained a little puzzled as to exactly what the Social Credit members wished to do with regard to the banking system of this country. Like us, they uphold the advisability of leaving the commercial banking business of the nation, particularly the lending part, in the hands of the present privately owned institutions. They feel, as we do, that under the Bank Act and under proper supervision the banks can perform much better and more efficiently the duties of a banking system than could a government-owned system.

In addition we had presented to us by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Parry Sound certain theories that they held with regard to the financial policy that should be pursued by this country. I have not the time to go into the wide range of thought that was brought before the committee by those two members. The hon. member for Parry Sound suggested that we should take over the $2,700 million of dominion securities now held by the banks and give the banks in lieu thereof Bank of Canada currency and provide for a one hundred per cent reserve to guard against inflation. He contended that that would be a great thing for this country.

As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar pointed out, it was made quite clear to us that if we followed the suggestion of the hon. member for Parry Sound, the interest that the banks would have lost by the taking away of the investment of the savings of their depositors in that type of security—it is the safest in the world and we want the banks to be safe in the matter of their investments—would have more than wiped out the total net earnings of the banks in 1943. In other words, we would have had to face the necessity of destroying our commercial banking system or force the banks into some other means of obtaining revenue. I think that would be unfair, unwise and inadvisable, and for this reason.

While all the people of this country through the medium of taxation, contribute to paying the interest on government securities, this would not be the case if we adopted the suggestion. Our taxes are raised on the principle that those who earn more should pay more than those who earn less. They are based on the measure of the income of the individual. If we attempted to take away this source of revenue from the banks and allowed the banks to add to their service charges, to the rates of interest on their loans and to other charges they might concoct in order to replace the revenues lost, this load would fall upon the little people, the people with small savings who use the banks in the way I have mentioned and on those who otherwise use the services provided by the banks. It would be quite inequitable. It would be transferring from the total population to a few—part of the load of carrying on the banking system of the country.

When I turn to the suggestions of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard I hesitate to attempt to give to this committee exactly the plan that he thinks necessary for the proper carrying out of the banking system of this dominion. I think, of course, that he is fearful of the debt load which has mounted steadily and to a considerable extent during the war years. However, I think all of us realize that this war has to be paid for in one way or another. It is the annual cost of carrying that debt and to whom the interest is payable that is important.

The record of the financial and banking practices of Canada during the war is something that we should be extremely proud of. What other country in the world can face the financial obligation of carrying on this war to victory with greater assurance? The financial policy pursued by this government, the integrity of our banking system has permitted us to carry on this unprecedented effort with the least strain of any country I know of. I consider, too, that we shall be able to face with confidence the post-war period and the problems which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has properly raised. We shall be able to meet those problems and finance them with more courage and optimism than any other country. Credit for this is due to the elasticity of the financial policy and banking practices of this country and their ability to expand for any purpose. I believe that if there is any country in the world that can be reasonably proud of the financial policy that has been pursued and the banking system that is in vogue, it is Canada.

It emerged during the evidence before the committee that Australia tried the experiment of financing its war effort by the issue of national currency. They realized in fairness that when that national currency came to a bank in the shape of deposits, those deposits were not an asset of the bank. They became a liability and it cost the bank money to service them. They ran the risk of making the investments and loans that we speak about, and, believe me, they are not without risk. That is one of the major mistakes it seems to me that is made by most people who consider this problem. Deposits are a liability of the bank, and it costs the bank considerable to service them.

When we consider the number of branch buildings, the rentals paid, the cost of maintenance, the staff, the risks of robbery and other risks incidental to the banking business it is obvious that the banks which in 1943, a good year, earned only 6·03 per cent, are not agencies for the creation of vast profits, as they are somtimes pictured to the people of this country. We do injury to ourselves when we do not make sure not to distort the facts.

I find myself in hearty agreement with the committee in reporting this bill as amended to the house. There was the question of the appointment of a royal commission to examine the questions raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and others. I do not believe anything emerged in the committee that would disturb my conviction that we have learned a great deal in the last two decades and we are applying what we learned to the banking system of this country.

There is prevalent, however, a widespread misunderstanding and a lack of appreciation of what is involved in such matters as the government borrowing from the banks in order to carry on its business. I have mentioned Australia. After Australia made that experiment they found that in fairness they had to give to the Australian banks three-quarters of one per cent as a service charge for the service which the banks performed in connection with government policy, and by a coincidence that is exactly the rate which the Canadian government in the early part of this war arranged to pay to the Canadian chartered banks for the money which it borrowed. Because of this widespread misapprehension and misunderstanding of what is involved, while I would not say that I recommend the appointment of a royal commission I think it would be fair for me to say that I would recommend to the government the careful consideration of the appointment of a royal commission, if they can secure the proper personnel, to bring up to date the investigations made by the Macmillan commission in 1933 and to review the whole question of our banking and financial policy, and thus help to clear the minds of our people with regard to these matters.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Chairman, I wish to make several observations before this measure carries. I do not believe that the committee should have recommended that the banks' charters be renewed for ten years. As the hon. member who has just taken his seat has indicated, I think there is great need for a careful and thorough investigation into the whole matter of the financial and economic system which is being pursued by Canada. In a country so bountifully endowed with natural resources as is the Dominion of Canada we ought not to have witnessed the spectacle of upwards of one million unemployed during the depression. It is argued by advocates of our existing financial system that what occurred in the depression years was a phenomenon which was in Canada largely the result of certain actions which had taken place outside Canada and that, therefore, Canada should not be held responsible entirely for the great depression. I listened with a great deal of interest to the evidence given in the committee and I failed to find any thoroughly satisfying reason why we should altogether accept that explanation. I cannot escape the conviction that if Canada had been entirely an island separated completely from the rest of the world it would have been possible to have devised and erected a financial and economic system in Canada which could at least have enabled the people of Canada to enjoy the results of the potential economic activities of the people of this country. For example, if the people of Canada could produce all the milk that the people of Canada could possibly use, it ought to have been possible for us to enable all the people of Canada to have all the milk that they could use; and if that was not possible we ought to know the reason why. If the financial system of the country is not responsible for our inability to give the people of this country the means to use the goods we can produce, then we ought to know what is responsible.

Here was a country, Canada, in the depression, capable of producing all the enormous output which we have shown we were capable of producing, vast amounts of grains and foodstuffs of many different kinds, together with tremendous quantities of manufactured goods of one sort and another—a war effort which has commended the admiration if not the astonishment of practically the whole world, including ourselves—and the only reason for all this seems to be that we have been able somehow or another during this war to liberate into our body economic money and that we have been able to dispose of our products at reasonable prices, even if we had to give some of them away to the Germans. I submit that to any individual of ordinary intelligence that poses a problem which should challenge him to the greatest possible effort to explain why it was that whereas we could do the wonderful things we have done during this war, we could do nothing to put our people to work or keep them at work during the depression or at least supply them with the necessities of life.

I believe that the flaw lay in our economic system or in our financial system. I am not prepared to say that it was entirely the fault of the banks or of the banking system. But if it was not the fault of our banking system it was certainly the fault of some other aspect of our financial system. My feeling in the banking and commerce committee was that it would be an excellent thing for the committee to go into that whole matter and find out what was the trouble. The majority of the committee thought I was wrong in that respect, but I still believe that the committee should devote a great deal of time to determine why it was that our banking system signally failed during the depression and why it was that we were unable to distribute the goods and services which we unquestionably were able to produce if we could have disposed of them at fair prices all during those dreadful years of the 1930s.

I raised the question several times in the committee, but somehow or another I always seemed to be out of order, that our main problem in this generation is a problem of distribution. We have solved the problem of production. Once or twice I endeavoured to point out to the committee that the United States, for example, in 1935, with its industrial equipment as of that time, was capable of producing enough goods and services to supply every family in the United States with $4,400 worth of goods and services a year, but for some reason or another the United States did not produce those goods and services and did not supply the people with them. The result was that whereas the United States could have been the richest, the most prosperous and happiest nation in the world, actually it was one of the most wretched countries in the world, following the same financial system under which we suffer. It had 23,500,000 people on relief and between eleven and fifteen million unemployed. If the tragic failure of the United States in 1935 to produce the goods and services which it could have produced, and to enable its people to gain access to those goods and services, was not the result of a faulty banking system, then I suggest that it is the problem of this generation to find out what it was the result of.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I believe we are on section 2, not 1.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are on section 1.

Mr. ILSLEY: What section are we on, Mr. Chairman?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Section 2.

Mr. McGEER: No; section 1.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I rose when you called section 1, Mr. Speaker, because I knew that if there was the ghost of a chance there would be the same old story that we have had all summer—out of order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Section 1 was called and carried and I called section 2. It was when I called section 2 that the hon. member rose to speak. Section 1 is carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, I said no, when you called section 1. I said no.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. Section 1 was carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I said no when you called section 1.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Section 1 was carried.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: I was not quite on my feet but I said no.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Section 2 was called.

Mr. McGEER: We are still on section 1.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): No. Section 1 was carried and then I called section 2, which deals with definitions.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister is not doing anything, if that is what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard means when he says in an undertone that he would ask the minister not to do that. I thought we were on section 1, but I was told that we were on section 2, and that was why I asked you, Mr. Chairman, what section we were on. So that there shall be no accusations of sharp practice, which are entirely out of order, I move that we revert to section 1.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Is it the wish of the committee that we revert to section 1?

An hon. MEMBER: Agreed.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Section 1, if there is no objection.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It is a great relief to be in a committee that is disposed to be entirely fair, and it is a great relief to see the minister prepared to lead in this matter, because if there is anything that does need discussion at this time it is this subject.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member must not make a remark like that. As far as the Chair is concerned, I called section 1 carried and I then called section 2. I am trying to be absolutely fair to everyone and it is not in order for the hon. member to make a remark like that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Whatsoever there was in the remark that the Chairman finds objectionable I withdraw without qualification.

I was going on to say that if there is any one subject that we ought to discuss at this stage in our history it is this question: what is the matter with our financial and economic system, which has made it so that we were unable during the 1930s to use our natural resources, both material and human, to produce a high standard of living for our people, whereas, from 1939 to 1945, we have been able to use those resources, material and human, to produce one of the most magnificent war efforts which it would be possible for a Canadian to conceive of? That question needs to be explained. It is my judgment that it should be explained in the committee, and the question whether or not this bill passes for ten years or for one year is one that ought to be determined by considerations of the deficiency, on the one hand, or the success, on the other, of our financial system as it has been established since the last time we granted the banks a renewal of their charter.

In addition to our failure to distribute our goods, I think a good deal of attention should be paid to the matter of debt. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has spoken with great eloquence and effectiveness regarding this serious aspect of our economy at the present time. Consequently I do not propose to go into any great detail with regard to our debt.

I think the hon. member who spoke just before me rejoiced over the magnificent war effort of Canada and said that it ought to be paid for and had to be paid for, and the only way in which we could pay for it, I gathered he implied, was through the accumulation of an enormous debt. I do not believe that we should have an enormous debt financially as a result of a war like this. The war is paid for with blood and tears and material. And when that payment is made there certainly should be no financial debt. Why, in the days before Canada was, the savages fought wars; all they used was the resources at their disposal, material and human; and when they finished their wars they had no national debts hanging over them. Now, it seems a most strange situation if we, with civilization to help us, using our materials and men as freely as they did, and losing just as heavily as they did, have a debt accumulated for all generations to carry and to endeavour to pay off. I say, therefore, that the fourteen billions of public debt which this country is likely to owe by the end of 1944 constitutes a challenge to this generation. I do not believe that the members of this house can lightly neglect that challenge, nor do I believe that the members of the committee can afford lightly to disregard it. There should be some means or other whereby we could liquidate that debt and make our war effort a real pay-as-you-go effort. I am still of that opinion and still believe that the committee neglected its duty in failing to study the question of debt and to make recommendations to the government with respect to a policy which might possibly enable the government to conduct a war like this without the accumulation of public debt.

Another matter which I believe must give all thoughtful members grave concern is the prospect of unemployment. A responsible committee in the United States, appointed some time in the early days of 1942, if I remember correctly, to examine into the whole question of possibilities after the war, reported early in 1943 that shortly after the war closed there would be twenty million unemployed in that country. I expect a similar condition to exist in Canada. I think the president of the Bank of Canada in his report this year to the minister indicated that in his opinion there was grave concern on this score. When we come to unemployment we come to a problem of failure to use our human resources. It ought to be possible for a country like Canada to use its human resources to produce goods and services to be distributed among the people so that the people of Canada may enjoy a high standard of living.

If the Dominion of Canada is unable to use its human resources and its material resources to produce goods and services to distribute among the people to give them a high standard of living, that fact must be conclusive evidence that something radically wrong exists. Whether the thing that is wrong lies in the banking system or whether it lies in the general financial and economic system that is used is a matter which, of course, will require a great deal of study to determine. But I think it certainly is a matter of finance because distribution is a matter of finance. We cannot employ men unless we can use resources, and we cannot use resources unless we can get money. We cannot get money unless we use our financial system. If the banking system is the major element in our financial system, and it appears to be so, then unquestionably there must be something wrong with the banking system, or there must be something deficient in our financial system independent of the banking system. What that is I believe we ought to study with the greatest thoroughness.

My remarks to-night merely indicate the reasons why I believe that we should not now pass this bill giving the banks a charter for ten years more until we have some of those vexatious questions cleared up. If we grant the banks charters for only one year, for example, then every year they will come to this parliament for a renewal of their charters, and every year we can conduct an examination into their business and into the way in which they conduct it, into the financial system of this country in an endeavour to determine its deficiencies and consequently keep ourselves in a growing condition. But if we pass the Bank Act for ten years, then we shall not have all that study every year. Everybody will tend to rest on his oars. The banks will go back to their business of banking, and what will happen to the country I tremble to contemplate.

I had the privilege of sitting in this house from 1935 to 1939, and I must say that one thing that struck me almost with despair in contemplating the government was the way in which they seemed to shrug helpless shoulders and wave hopeless hands whenever they were urged to do anything about the unemployment that we had in this country. They seemed to think that nothing could be done. If we pass this bank bill, giving the banks a renewal of charter for ten years, we shall be preparing the stage for a repetition of just that very thing. It may be argued, and it will be argued, by some government advocates that the government is now bringing down a great many social services, and that consequently conditions will not be as they were before. We are to have family allowances now. We are to have floors under agricultural prices. We are to have an industrial development bank. We are to have farm credit arrangements. Presumably all these things are to improve conditions, but I ask, Mr. Chairman, what will happen if it is discovered that this country is unable to dispose of its products and consequently a serious unemployment situation develops shortly after the war and revenues begin to fall off and the government finds itself unable to collect enough revenue to pay the interest on the accumulated debt and at the same time to service all these new social services which we now have the stage set to give to the people? Where is the money to come from? Surely every hon. member of our committee must be realistic enough to recognize that this question needs very careful consideration. Suppose it should be discovered that there was not enough money in the consolidated revenue fund to pay the family allowances and to pay the interest on the accumulated debt; which way would the members of this committee vote? To pay the interest on the debt or to pay family allowances? That is a question which cannot be answered by just lightly waving the hand. I found all during the committee stern opposition to the idea that it would be in any way safe for us to create money debt-free.

I confess that I can see no other way in the world in which the revenues of this country can be supplemented sufficiently to enable the government to discharge its responsibilities to the holders of our debt and its responsibilities to the people in the matter of social services. I can see no other way in the world in which the revenues can be supplemented except by the creation of debt-free money, and no one has taken the trouble to show me any way of supplementing it. No one did in the committee.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Somehow or another everybody seemed to take it for granted that as soon as the war is over all is going to be well. As the father of boys returning from that war, I do not find these assurances of optimism at all satisfying to me. My greatest anxiety at the present time is whether or not my children are to be able to find employment after this war. I enabled them, as far as I could, to qualify themselves to fit into the economic life of the country, but I remember 1934 and 1935. I was elected to this parliament in 1935, and I resigned my position, just a little high school position with a salary of $1,300 attached to it. Just three days after there were 735 applications for my position and among the applicants were a good many Ph.D.'s. Nothing that has been said in this house or in the committee has been sufficient to reassure me that there will not be a return after the war to conditions similar to that. There has been no change whatsoever in the financial system, either advocated or hinted at by the government. The Bank Act is not seriously changed. I will challenge anyone to show any change in the present Bank Act which would make the banks operate materially differently from the way in which they have operated in the last term. As a father in this country I find these considerations very serious.

Without desiring to delay this committee any farther, I just wish to say that I believe this committee ought to exercise the greatest care before it decides to renew the charter of the banks for ten years, and clamp down upon this country a financial system which may not by any means be the kind of thing we shall want in this country to meet the changed conditions in which we may find ourselves within probably just two years.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to propose two slight amendments to section 2. The first is that paragraph (b) be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

(b) "agricultural implements" means tools, implements, apparatus, appliances and machines, of any kind not usually affixed to real or immovable property, for use on or in connection with a farm, and vehicles for use in the business of farming and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, includes ploughs, harrows, drills, seeders, cultivators, mowing machines, reapers, binders, threshing machines, combines, tractors, movable granaries, trucks for carrying products of agriculture, cream separators, churns, washing machines, spraying apparatus, incubators, milking machines, refrigerators, and heating and cooking appliances for farming operations or use in the farm home of a kind not usually affixed to real or immovable property.

The only change from the printed bill before the committee is that the words "or in connection with" are inserted after the word "on" in the fourth line of the paragraph; the word "and" is taken out at the end of line 19, and the word "and" is taken out in line 20. Some amendments were made in the committee, but those are printed. This makes very slight changes, the principal one being the insertion of the words "or in connection with".

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then there is an amendment to paragraph (h) of section 2; that it be amended by inserting the words "in Canada" after the word "land" in line 14. This amendment follows upon an amendment made to the farm improvements loan bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 3 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On section 12—Opening of stock books.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder if this section might be allowed to stand until a later time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Very well.

Section stands.

Sections 13 to 28 inclusive agreed to.

On section 29—Appointment of officers.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not privileged to be a member of the banking and commerce committee. Would the minister indicate whether or not the question came up of the occupations of the directors of these banks and their relationship generally to the community which the banks are supposed to serve. I have no doubt that this matter was discussed, and if so, I have no desire to introduce it at the moment, except to ask the minister the question.

Mr. ILSLEY: The question that came up was whether the banks could not and should not make a greater attempt than they have made in the past to introduce into their directorates representatives of agriculture, labour, small business and so on. When we looked into the matter we found that the share qualification necessary for a director was fairly high, to enable persons of moderate and certainly those of small means to obtain the necessary shares to qualify as directors. Therefore we introduced an amendment to section 20, which has been passed, which would permit one-fourth of the number of directors to qualify, as far as share ownership is concerned, without such a large expenditure of money as has been required in the past. For not more than one-quarter of the number of directors the minimum requirement of subscriptions to stock was reduced to $1,500, $2,000 and $2,500 of par value of stock, respectively. The banks gave some evidence about the influence that directors have upon lending policy in various parts of the country, and the territorial distribution of directors. Nothing very much was said about the occupations of directors, apart from the discussion I have mentioned. But that amendment was introduced so as to make it easier for persons of small means to obtain the necessary share qualifications.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was the question of a maximum age limit for directors of banks discussed in the committee?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it was not, but it is an interesting subject.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no suggestion to make with respect to it, except that it is a matter which perhaps in due course should have the consideration of the house and the government. However, I realize that there are a number of ramifications in the subject which do not appear on the surface. Very often injustices might be done to good Canadian citizens who are making great contributions—contributions which younger people might or might not be able to make. The matter has been brought to my attention from time to time, and it might be considered in due course.

Mr. ILSLEY: When we were preparing the amendments to the Bank Act I gave consideration to placing in it the same age restriction as applies in the Bank of Canada Act. That is a pretty high age restriction. I think it is seventy-five years. I did not feel qualified to select a particular age, and say that nobody above that age would be qualified or should be permitted to act as a bank director.

Mr. GRAYDON: I realize the difficulty. I think there is not a member in the house who would not realize that some of the most advanced and most progressive people in Canada are found among the older people. In some instances some of those older people are extremely reactionary. Those characteristics are not always limited to certain age groups. A gentleman well over the age limit set out in the Bank of Canada Act came to see me the other day, and he is, I believe, one of the most advanced thinkers of his time. Perhaps it is not fair to suggest that an age limit will cure some of the difficulties, because all these things cannot be measured by the yardstick of years.

Section agreed to.

Sections 30 and 31 agreed to.

On section 32—Increase of capital.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is the first section in which I see the words "treasury board". Does that mean the government's treasury board?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 33 to 58 inclusive, agreed to.

On section 59—Cash reserves in Bank of Canada notes and deposits.

Mr. McGEER: I ask that this section stand.

Section stands.

Sections 60 to 74 inclusive agreed to.

On section 75—Business and powers of bank.

Mr. McGEER: I would ask that this section stand.

Section stands.

Sections 76 to 165 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L, M, N, O, P, and Q agreed to.

THE PRIME MINISTER

FELICITATIONS AND GOOD WISHES ON TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF ACCESSION TO LEADERSHIP OF LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): It is refreshing for public men to pause during these days of heavy war-time burdens, anxieties and responsibilities and to observe fittingly occasions of importance in the lives of others. To-day I rise to recognize the twenty-fifth anniversary of the elevation of the present Prime Minister to the leadership of the Liberal party, because I feel that it is singularly appropriate that some of us outside that political family circle should join with those Canadians of a different political complexion to pay a tribute and to do honour to one whose length of service in the public arena as a chieftain exceeds that of any national leader in the world to-day.

In lighter vein as befits a happy occasion such as this, may I go so far as to say that to-day is actually the silver wedding anniversary of the marriage of the Prime Minister and the Liberal party. While the happy couple were joined in holy wedlock exactly a quarter of a century ago, it could in all fairness be said, I think, that the courtship was a somewhat long and at times a spectacular affair, and that his success in that earlier race was the result of a technique overwhelming in its consequences and surprisingly successful for a bachelor. In short, the Prime Minister wooed and won, and what is more, during the intervening period since it may well be noted that the well-known and comparatively industrious committee of another place has been provided by virtue of this union with no grist for its matrimonial mill to date. The admonition "till death us do part" so far has been strictly observed.

Akin to the experience of many families, prior to this new era of family allowances, floor prices and high levels of national income, the matrimonial pathway of these political honeymooners was not always strewn with roses, although flowers there were in abundance at times. There were those troublous periods in the uncertain twenties when the political home had to be shared by other political families to make ends meet. The early thirties saw the mortgage foreclosed, the sheriff in possession and the title almost lost; but the breadwinner kept his chin up and his courage undaunted until in the middle thirties the political stock market went soaring once more and reached new highs never known before by these humble speculators. The happy couple, visibly much happier now, repossessed themselves of their political belongings, got back their home, and rejoiced in being able once more to have the spare room of the house free from the political tenants of an earlier time, although it should be pointed out that meanwhile some of those tenants had changed their names and had themselves become legally adopted and full-fledged members of the household. Success after success met the family endeavours until in the early forties the family had grown to unheard-of proportions, almost to the point, one imagines, of parental embarrassment. The normal flow of succeeding events has, however, somewhat lessened the housing congestion, and the neighbours, who think they know, are saying that there are signs of new factors in the offing which are apt further to remedy the crowding difficulties. Upon that aspect, of course, I could not on such a happy occasion as this be expected to comment.

Meanwhile some of the family have started little homes for themselves—at this point one cannot help recalling those who have left to live down in the southeast corner of the political garden. Then again it might not be amiss to point out that in the old party home itself there are said to be some of the bigger and older boys who should really be setting up separate homes for themselves as well right now. With their somewhat playful vigour they are said to create problems in the home which tax to the limit even the gentle, forgiving and patient disposition of the parents, to say nothing of the other members of the family as well. But these are not affairs for us who are only neighbours to discuss. Therefore I pass on to more serious things.

In the days that are to come, as in the past, the Prime Minister will have in full measure our good will and our genuine wishes; but with respect to wishing him good luck I should perhaps make one reservation, and one only. It is the reservation which was aptly inserted by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe when he congratulated me in 1941 upon my elevation to the national chairmanship of our party. As between political adversaries but who were close personal friends his word had a depth and breadth of meaning not readily measured by ordinary yardsticks.

On this occasion, so close to a general election, perhaps the Prime Minister will not mind if my native political caution prompts me, without diminishing the warmth of my personal sentiments, to repeat Mr. Lapointe's observation and say to him as Mr. Lapointe said to me, "I wish you luck, but not too much." As house leader of our party I convey on this occasion warm and cordial felicitations to the Prime Minister. This day will be a prized and treasured one for him and his friends; but we as political neighbours in the great Canadian community perhaps may be excused for taking the liberty of looking over the fence to have a little share in the enjoyment of to-day as well.

In conclusion may I say that regardless of the issues which sometimes appear to divide us, in the field of politics or otherwise, let us ever keep in mind that we are all Canadians, striving to do and to give our best in the interests of a greater Canada, of a strengthened British commonwealth and empire, moving toward the goal of a better world of peace and plenty in the days ahead. With that thought in mind, this nation and this parliament, with a keen appreciation of the serious war-time responsibilities resting upon his shoulders, salute the Prime Minister on this, his day of days.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think one of the glories of the British democratic system is that men may differ and yet feel the warmest personal regard for those with whom they differ. To-day I rise on behalf of those associated with me to endorse what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has said in regard to this anniversary of the right hon. the Prime Minister's accession to the leadership of the Liberal party. We wish him long life. We know that the contribution he has made to this country throughout a very long public career will be remembered in future histories of our land. We wish him, therefore, many happy returns of this day, and we do so sincerely. We hope he may be spared to give counsel and advice no matter what the political circumstances of the future may be. We join therefore in the tendering of best wishes to the Prime Minister.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Once in a while, Mr. Speaker, a man lives long enough to be rewarded for his efforts. To-day I believe the Prime Minister is privileged to enjoy the reward of long and earnest effort. So many fine things already have been said that for me to try to add anything I believe would be something like gilding the lily. I will just conclude by saying that we wish to join with those who have congratulated the Prime Minister on this very happy day; we wish him long life and great success—but not too much.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker and hon. members of the House of Commons, in the twenty-five years I have had the honour of being leader of the Liberal party in Canada there have been many events and many occasions to which I look back with gratitude and pride. I think I can say quite honestly that no occasion, no event in that long period of time, has meant more to me than the welcome I have received this morning from my fellow members of the House of Commons, and the pleasure I have derived from the eloquent and extremely generous words which have been uttered by the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the other parties opposite.

I need scarcely say to Mr. Graydon, Mr. Coldwell and Mr. Blackmore—and I use their names because these gentlemen are intimate personal friends—that I have been deeply touched by their expressions of good will, the more so in that they have been shared in such a generous way by all associated with them in the parties which they represent. I thank you, gentlemen, with all my heart for what you have expressed this morning.

Looking back over the whole of the past twenty-five years there is nothing for which I have reason to be so grateful as the unfailing loyalty and constant support I have received from the members of my own party. I doubt whether in the history of politics there has been an instance in which the leader of a party has been more fortunate in the continuous and unfailing support he has received over such a long period. May I say also that I appreciate equally the good will that has been extended to me during that time by hon. members of this House of Commons who have belonged to other parties. In that again I think I have been perhaps far more fortunate than most men in public life. While I can recall occasions on which situations have developed that have been trying and difficult for all of us, I must confess that looking over the past twenty-five years what comes most to my mind next to the fidelity of my supporters is the magnanimity of most of my opponents in this House of Commons, and the friendships which I have been privileged to share with them. If twenty-five years ago to-day, when I was chosen leader of my party, I had known that my course would run over so long a period, during times such as we have since experienced; if I could have had a vision of the responsibilities which would come upon one's shoulders over that period of time, I doubt if I could have seen my way to accept so great a responsibility. But—

> Heaven from all creatures hides the book of fate,
> All but the page prescribed, their present state.

Fortunately I have been able to take a day at a time, a month at a time, a year at a time, and it has stretched out now to twenty-five years.

For these years of public service in the parliament of Canada I can only feel a sense of the deepest gratitude. Apart from all else, public life offers two great rewards, perhaps I should say two great opportunities as well as great rewards. The greatest opportunity is that of public service. From long experience I know that no motive lies closer to the hearts of men who enter public life than the desire to serve their fellow men. That I think has been true of all or mostly all men who have entered public life in our country. They may have differed as to the methods, but the motive was the same. I sometimes think we do not realize how great this opportunity is. I sometimes think that a member of parliament who does not happen to be a member of the ministry, or who is in the opposition, does not begin to comprehend the great part he is privileged to play in shaping the future and the destiny of his country. After all, it is ideas that count for most, and it matters little the source from whence they come; if the idea be right and sound it will tell for all time. That opportunity and that reward one has in public life. Having had the privilege to serve as leader of my party for twenty-five years and enjoyed the great opportunities which have come with that position, I am profoundly thankful to Providence for all that this has meant and for having been able to reach this day with that full measure of health and strength which, happily, I still possess.

The other great opportunity and reward of public life are the friendships which one forms with members of both houses, with members of this House of Commons and of the Senate, and with others associated in the work of parliament. In the very nature of things we are here brought more closely together than are corresponding groups anywhere else. We are drawn together in the realm of ideas and ideals, and it is upon ideas and ideals that the great community of friendship itself is based.

I can think of nothing richer in a man's life than to have been privileged to share over a quarter of a century the close friendships which come through membership in the House of Commons. I do not forget that I have been longer in parliament than I have been leader of my party. To-day I believe there is only one member in the house, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), who has been in the House of Commons a longer time than I have been. And, looking at the list of privy councillors in the Parliamentary Guide, I find that there are only two who precede me, one of them Sir William Mulock, who is in his hundred and first year, and the other Sir Allen Aylesworth, who is in his ninetieth year. I do not know whether that signifies that greater age is to be attained by those who remain, but it does bring the thought that whether remaining time be long or short, one has reached a place of very high honour in the company of those who have served in public office in this country.

I agree with the leader of the opposition that there are occasions on which the real spirit of the House of Commons asserts itself in a very noble way. This morning is one of those occasions, and I am sure it is one which will be remembered by future parliaments, and which will no doubt help to exert its influence upon our public life. I do hope that in our public life we will keep, above everything else, that note of chivalry which I believe to be more necessary in our day and age than it has been at any time previously.

Hon. members will I think agree that in the years I have led my party I have had my fair share of criticism. But I would also say that perhaps no other man in Canadian history over that period of time has been more kindly treated than I have been by the press of this country. Sometimes when very cruel things are said there comes to my mind the observation made by that great leader of the Conservative party, Sir John A. Macdonald, who told his audiences many times that the sticks and stones were to be found in greatest number under the trees which bore the most fruit. There is a lot of truth in that. I should like on this occasion also to recall something which Sir Wilfrid Laurier said on more than one occasion—something of which I have thought very often—that it does not do to cherish resentments in public life. I should like to go a bit further and say that I feel it does not do to create resentments in public life. In fact I can think of nothing so destructive of what is best in the spirit of a nation than any attempt to create prejudice or resentment, whether it be toward individuals, toward classes, toward races, toward religious denominations or toward other countries or other people. In politics, as in other walks of life, it is, I think, a cardinal sin to do aught in the way of detraction that can be avoided, and to lend oneself to perversion of the truth. As we help to maintain high standards in public life, so we help to secure the future of our nation.

May I say at once I am conscious that in the play of politics, back and forth; at moments of earnest pleading for particular causes, one from time to time often says things that he regrets. One never regrets the charitable or kind or generous thing one has said, but inevitably I believe one does come to regret any word which may have caused pain to another. If words of mine in the course of this past twenty-five years have inflicted a wound in the breast of any man, I would ask him to forgive me. May I assure all hon. members that in the years I have been in parliament I have tried to avoid that kind of thing, and have sought as best I could to interpret aright the views of others. I know I have slipped on occasions, and I should not like those particular slips to be remembered. However, I do feel that the joys of friendships which have been so much more a part of public life will endure long after these other things are forgotten.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has referred to my state of bachelorhood. A law which I believe to be one of the greatest, is the law of compensation. As my hon. friend has said, it is quite true that this is a sort of silver wedding without a bride. On the other hand, what I have lost in the way of a personal family, I have more than gained in the political family I have had around me all these years.

Sometimes I hear it said that I am a lonely man, that I have few friends, that I see few people. I just wish some of those who hold this mistaken view could get a truer glimpse of my inner nature. I imagine there is no man in Canada who for these twenty-five years has been less lonely than I have, or who has enjoyed greater or more numerous friendships. True, one becomes isolated more or less in affairs; but I do not see how any man holding a position of responsibility at a time like this—if that man takes his responsibilities seriously—can for one moment do other than take every opportunity he possibly can get to prepare in respect of those questions which have to be discussed in parliament, to study the great issues of the day, and to make sure that as few mistakes as possible are made. That, of necessity, deprives one of very much in the way of personal associations. May I say this to hon. members that there has been no privation of which, owing to pressure of work as it has been from day to day, month to month, and year to year, I have been more conscious in recent years than the inability to keep in personal touch with members of all parties in parliament. This has been to me a deep privation. I have lost much of the richness of life through being unable to see, in a personal and intimate fashion, members of this parliament coming from all parts of Canada, members of the press and others. And what is true of parliament is also true, in even larger measure, of the people of Canada, so far as getting about to different parts of the country is concerned. This has been due to a realization of the great trust which has been imposed upon me; the responsibility of seeing that in every way the things of greatest importance at the moment, and at all times are given first attention. I should like to thank hon. members for their understanding of this situation.

May I say one or two words in conclusion. First, a word about this House of Commons. I believe that there has been no parliament in the history of Canada which as a whole has been worthier of great responsibilities, and has measured up to great issues in a finer way than the present parliament. Everything considered, having relation to the times in which we are living and our responsibility to them, I do not believe that the membership of any parliament in Canada's history has measured up in better fashion than have the members of this war parliament, nor has the average of ability and earnestness of purpose been higher than has been the case with those who occupy seats on both sides of the house.

I do pray that for the sake of our country, for the sake of the great empire of which it is a part, for the sake of the world of to-day, every effort will be made from every quarter to bring into this parliament the best men we can have to occupy the seats here. I can see nothing so serious for the nation than that by any chance the standard of ability and integrity and high purpose should be lowered in any way or from any cause. I believe it is the highest form of patriotism that we should put forward every effort to bring into future parliaments the best men and the best women that can be obtained as representatives of several communities.

Looking to the future, I hope that our parliaments will become more and more representative, that we shall have more and more of those who represent rural parts of Canada as well as the working classes, that we shall have in addition to the professional and business representation a good representation of those brave men and women who have been serving their country with their lives during this great war. I hope that we will see more women in the House of Commons as the days go by. They know the problems of the home perhaps more intimately than men, and it is the problems of the home that are the problems of the nation, and a solution of the problems of the home will prove, I believe, a solution of the problems of the nation.

Then this last word, if I may express it this morning. I have great faith in the future of Canada. I think we are the most fortunate country in the world. I believe that Canada increasingly will become a great world power and. what is even more important, I believe she will become a great beneficent power in the world. I have no fears about the future. Having been spared to live through these past twenty-five years and having witnessed what Canada has done at times of the greatest stress in the history of the world, one would be a pessimist indeed who did not believe that this country will rise and prove equal to any occasion.

I hope that in times to come the association which we enjoy in that great association of nations which comprises the British commonwealth may continue, may endure, as it is one of the greatest blessings to this world. I hope that the friendship which we have for the great country to the south will continue to grow strong and remain firm through time. I hope above all that the good will which this country has helped to create with other nations in other parts of the world will strengthen and develop so that, as the years go on, mankind may witness throughout this globe more often the way of true brotherhood among nations as well as among men.

CANADIAN FORCES

PARTICIPATION OF FIRST CANADIAN ARMY IN OPERATIONS IN NORMANDY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am glad to be able to inform the house that the First Canadian Army under command of Lieutenant-General H. D. G. Crerar, C.B., D.S.O., has now taken its place in the order of battle and is participating in the operations in Normandy.

HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION FOR RETURNING WOUNDED—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I regret the imperative necessity of introducing anything which might interfere with the full enjoyment by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of the tributes and encomiums of his friends, but the welfare of our returning wounded transcends in importance all other considerations.

I therefore ask for leave to move the adjournment of the house to consider a matter of urgent public importance, namely: the grave emergency which the premier of Ontario in a statement to the press and a letter to the Prime Minister declares has arisen because of the lack of proper hospital accommodation for our returning wounded;

That as a consequence of this critical situation, even men who have lost arms or legs and still need hospital treatment, are being given leave to their homes to provide beds for stretcher cases immediately expected;

That because of the lack of adequate accommodation and organization, many serious cases have failed to receive the prompt and adequate treatment which they need;

And that the situation is extremely serious.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is there a seconder for the motion?

Mr. BRUCE: Seconded by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe).

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member gave me a copy of his motion about ten minutes before I came into the house, and since then I have also received a copy of another motion intended to be moved by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). As a consequence, I have had to consider first the motion of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce).

Leave is asked as stated by the hon. member to discuss a grave emergency which the premier of Ontario in a statement to the press and a letter to the Prime Minister declares has arisen because of the lack of proper hospital accommodation for our returning wounded; that as a consequence of this critical situation, even men who have lost arms or legs and still need hospital treatment, are being given leave to their homes to provide beds for stretcher cases immediately expected; that because of the lack of adequate accommodation and organization, many serious cases have failed to receive the prompt and adequate treatment which they need, and that the situation is extremely serious.

The motion for leave moved by the hon. member for Parkdale is based upon a statement made by the premier of Ontario. I would ask him if he on his responsibility as a member and speaking of his own knowledge of the facts will take that responsibility as to the truth or otherwise of the statements that are made; because I point out to the hon. member that a motion for this house to adjourn to discuss a matter raised by a gentleman, however eminent, who is not a member of this house, could hardly be entertained. Any motion of this kind must be based on knowledge of the hon. member who proposes it; he must be prepared to vouch for the truth of the statements and accept responsibility therefor. If the hon. member will give me the assurance that he on his own responsibility as a member and with knowledge of the facts accepts the terms of the motion I will consider it further.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, may I say a word on that?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) should speak.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, from investigations which I have made and from the information I have received from others in a position to know, I am quite willing to accept the responsibility of making that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: So far as the degree of urgency is concerned I am clearly of the opinion that there is an urgency which would justify the request of the hon. member for leave to move the adjournment to discuss the matter. It may be, however, that the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) would wish to speak on this before I arrive at a conclusion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that under the rules and orders I am entitled to debate the merits of the motion at this stage, but I can state on my responsibility as a minister of the crown that there is no emergency existing such as is mentioned in the motion to adjourn. I may also inform the members of the house that my estimates on pensions are immediately available for discussion at any moment, when the whole matter can be fully and adequately discussed. I was not able to give to the house complete details in the announcement I made when this matter came up in the press as the result of an interview given by the premier of Ontario, but I did issue a full and comprehensive statement to the press, and I am prepared at the proper time and under proper conditions to give complete details to the house. I will only say at the moment that most strict and careful preparations have been made to meet the situation, that there is no emergency at this time, and that our complete cooperation with the three defence services will ensure that there will never be any such emergency.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am of the opinion that if the matters referred to by the hon. member for Parkdale are as he has stated, there is a degree of urgency. But under the circumstances here, with the statement made previously by the Minister of Pensions and National Health and the statement that he has just now made, I would prefer that the decision should rest with the house. I do not care to take the responsibility of giving leave to the hon. member. Therefore I would ask that those in favour of the motion of the hon. member for leave to move the adjournment of the house to discuss this matter will please rise.

The Clerk Assistant having stated that twenty-one members had risen:

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Parkdale may proceed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a matter of procedure surely—

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 31 reads:

Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place—

As has been done.

—asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter.

As has been done. Then:

If objection is taken, Mr. Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and, if more than twenty members rise accordingly, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

I have no option but to call upon the hon. member for Parkdale to proceed.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, the situation in respect to the hospitalization of our wounded as provided by the Department of Pensions and National Health has been a matter of controversy over a period of the last couple of years. I know that the statement has been made that the wounded until discharge are the responsibility of the defence services and that upon discharge the wounded become the responsibility of the Department of Pensions and National Health. As a matter of fact we know that the wounded arriving from overseas are sent to the hospitals of the Department of Pensions and National Health for treatment.

It is a well-known fact that one of the chief hospitals in Ontario, and perhaps in Canada, is the old Christie street hospital in Toronto. That hospital before being taken over was a factory, and was taken over towards the end of the last war only as an emergency to meet an emergent situation.

Mr. SLAGHT: Who took it over?

Mr. BRUCE: It was taken over by the union government, and therefore both sides will have to share in that responsibility. It was never intended to remain as a permanent hospital to take care of the wounded. As I said before, it was taken over only to meet an emergent situation. But surely in the intervening years since then, there has been ample time for the minister and his department to find other and proper accommodation for our wounded, both of the last war and for those who will be returning from this war. What has been done?

We are now in the fifth year of this war. The situation at Christie street hospital was so bad and so serious that last year representations were made to the Department of Pensions and National Health to have them acquire some other property and build a suitable hospital in which to take care of our wounded. It was only after a great deal of public pressure and much effort on the part of the Canadian corps and veterans' organizations, by groups of citizens, the board of trade, the city council and other bodies, and the holding of meetings and the making of public protests, that ultimately the department agreed to accept free from the city of Toronto a considerable acreage of land just outside the city for the purpose of building a suitable hospital upon it for the care of our wounded. That land was acquired last November, and the first sod was turned by the Minister of Pensions and National Health on Armistice day, 1943. It is now over nine months since that ceremony took place, and yet no building has been started on that property.

It was pointed out many months ago that the United States had built many large military hospitals and that the plans for those hospitals could be easily secured by an application to Washington. No such application was made. If these plans had been secured, a local architect could very easily have adapted them to our purposes here and, by letting contracts on a cost plus basis, the work of building the hospital could have been begun as soon as the frost was out of the ground last spring. I do not believe anyone can dispute that. I know that as soon as a firm of architects in Toronto were engaged to make plans for these buildings they worked very hard, day and night, with a staff at their disposal to get these plans ready. Therefore I attach no blame whatever to the architects, engineers or other technicians who have been engaged for all these months on this particular undertaking.

Within the last week or so we have seen a notice in the press that at last—at long last—a unit is to be built at Sunnybrook park, and that unit is to accommodate nurses —it is a nurses' home—together with a building for up-patients, and some engineering works. It seems to me an extraordinary thing, since we have had so much delay, that those responsible for this undertaking did not decide that the first building to be put up at Sunnybrook park should be an active treatment unit. That is what is most urgently needed, and I have no doubt that, if energetically undertaken by a competent man of affairs who has a practical knowledge of building, these buildings could be completed by the end of this year. But we have still the spectacle of Christie street; and if anyone doubts the situation there, as has been described to this house on more than one occasion by myself, and other hon. members, I ask him to look at the illustrations in the Toronto morning paper; although some members of the government do not regularly read it, perhaps they look at the pictures. These photographs, appearing in this morning's issue, illustrate very clearly what the situation at Christie street is. If they have not seen this newspaper this morning I will send a copy over to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). In one room in that building are 82 patients. The beds are so close together that a nurse can scarcely get between them to carry out her duties. If the windows are opened, dust, dirt, steam and smoke from passing trains enter and cover the sheets and patients with smut. Not only the noise of the trains but the noise from surrounding manufacturing plants make it impossible for anyone to sleep during the daytime, and only after great exhaustion can they sleep at night. Yet on that property the department is willing to allow a neurological building to continue to house our nervous patients.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I interrupt the hon. member for a moment? When the hon. member made his motion he was dealing with what, in its terms, is a general condition regarding returning wounded, and which I assumed he had in mind as existent all over the dominion. But the argument which he is now making relates to a localized condition, and had I understood that the hon. member by his motion was making a complaint with regard to a particular hospital I would certainly not have considered it a matter of urgency. If however the hon. member proposes later to show that this is a matter affecting all the dominion as regards the wounded who are coming here for treatment, of course I could see its relevance; but at the moment I cannot.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, may I speak to a point of order, if it is a point of order which you have raised?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) is on his feet, and I prefer that the hon. member himself should take responsibility for his motion. He clearly stated at the beginning that he was taking the responsibility for it, and I assume he will do so.

Mr. BRUCE: Perhaps it should not be necessary to refer any more and any longer to the situation at Christie street, which is so well known to members of this government. But I could not deal properly with this subject if I had not alluded to conditions there; and if I may continue for a moment I should like to answer something which has arisen, namely that it has been announced that many thousands of beds are available for our wounded. I am informed that beds are now vacant in Christie street hospital for the first time in months, because wounded who need treatment have been moved out of those beds and sent to their homes so as to allow others to use them. The fact that within recent weeks the minister has announced the acquisition of a building in Peterborough, formerly used as a hostel by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, which will accommodate some three hundred and fifty patients, and has also taken over a hostel in Kingston which he states will accommodate two hundred and fifty more, making a total of six hundred, would indicate that the serious situation about which I complain is more widespread than simply the city of Toronto.

Now we come to the city of Montreal. Some months ago it was revealed by Doctor Wilder Penfield of that city, an eminent neurological surgeon—possibly the greatest neuro-surgeon on this continent—that although he had offered this government the opportunity of building an addition to his hospital to accommodate the neurological patients who were returning from overseas and who required the services of an expert neuro-surgeon, that offer was turned down. Had it been accepted, it is only fair to assume that that building, of one hundred-bed addition to the present neurological institute, would have been completed and ready for this serious type of cases arriving from overseas. In my opinion that showed a total disregard by the head of this department of what might happen to these cases and a neglect to take advantage of a golden opportunity to give our wounded, suffering from head injuries or spinal injuries, the privilege of profiting by the skill of a great surgeon in this specialized department of surgery.

I am not familiar with the situation in other places, but I am informed that it is not very much better. From what we read we know what is going on overseas. We know that our forces have suffered heavy casualties in Normandy and Italy. Although the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has not given out the total number of casualties to date suffered in Normandy, we know that the colonel of the Black Watch was killed, and we know that the Royal Regiment of Canada suffered severe casualties. I do not think it will be long before we shall learn that the Queen's Own of Toronto will also have suffered heavy casualties in that theatre of war. I cannot imagine anything more callous than to sit idly by and refuse to provide the very best type of accommodation for those who are willing to offer their lives to protect our freedom and to save our civilization. That has been the situation in regard to this department. Surely the minister of this department, a veteran of the last war, should have known years ago that we would have casualties. We always have casualties in a war. He should have commenced years ago to build hospitals of a modern type suitably equipped and ready when the time came to be occupied by our wounded men. This he has not done. Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker, that he has failed in the discharge of his great and onerous responsibility to our wounded.

I do not think that the people of this country will accept the bald statement that he made on Saturday and again to-day that we have thousands of beds available. I should like to ask if in that number are included the two thousand beds stored in the Rawlinson warehouse in Toronto, which were placed there some years ago for air raid precaution purposes, or the other similar beds in storehouses in other parts of Canada. What we want is a sufficient number of modern hospitals with adequate equipment and every facility to treat our wounded men when they come home. Anything less than that will not satisfy the Canadian people.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I say that we supported the hon. member in his move to adjourn the house to discuss this matter of public importance, because, while we have no definite knowledge of the situation which has been outlined, we felt that if there were any suspicion in the country that the very best that ought to be done was not being done, it should be aired at once.

We too feel that perhaps the preparations that have been made in the past to take care of the wounded of the present war and the veterans of the former wars have not reflected credit on this country. From information I have been able to obtain in former years I agree that the situation as to Christie Street hospital has not been very creditable. I had hoped that we might do better for the men who need the best of care in our hospitals. May I add that I think the policy of the immediate past with regard to providing military hospital accommodation has been mistaken. We should have viewed the necessity of military hospitals from a broader angle than this house was prepared to view it. Instead of building temporary accommodation for men who were in training, we should have seen to it that we were preparing for the present and the post-war period.

The minister said he was prepared to make a statement on these matters. While that statement could have been made when the estimates were under discussion, it is just as well, since the matter has arisen this morning, that the opportunity has been afforded to the minister to reply.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): I had no idea that this question was coming up this morning. However, I wish to strongly support the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). As the minister knows, I have been to see him personally on many occasions concerning this matter. I do not propose to go into that again at this time. I have been fortunate enough to see what the United States is doing on this continent and at the bases she has obtained under lend-lease in the West Indies and elsewhere, with regard to this problem. I have seen the magnificent hospitals she has built. I feel that we have not been properly apprised of the necessity of continuing these old and temporary hospitals. We see that the United States, Australia and other countries have built magnificent hospitals during the war. The question I cannot help asking myself is, why have not we, who were in the war two years before the United States, built hospitals? I know the condition in my own district; I know the conditions in the hospitals; I have been in them on many occasions. That is the inescapable question. Why have not we been able to do what the United States is doing? Surely care of the wounded is our first obligation, our No. 1 priority in social security.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): This question which has been discussed by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) perhaps needs little more than an endorsement from me as the leader of the opposition. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that you saw fit to allow it to be discussed, because the urgency of it has been impressed upon us by the fact that the premier of one of the major provinces, Ontario, has interested himself in the circumstances and the conditions which he has found and upon which he has seen fit to make representations to the department and to the minister.

In his reply I think the minister should deal with one of the proposals advanced by the Premier of Ontario, in reference to the accommodation available at the air force centre at St. Thomas. Acording to a press dispatch which I read on Saturday, which I have not at hand and as to which I simply draw upon my memory at the moment, the premier of Ontario says there is accommodation at that point consisting of some 1,700 beds. Having that fact in mind; having in mind also that apparently men are being moved out of military hospitals before they are completely recovered, while still in a convalescent state, I think perhaps this motion is fully justified as to urgency.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the minister, that one of the important factors which must enter into government policy with respect to the war is the caring for our wounded soldiers in an adequate and proper manner. That is part and parcel of our war effort, and is something which appeals to the humanity of us all. I am hopeful that to-day the minister will be in a position to indicate that adequate and proper hospitalization is and will be available for every soldier wounded in this battle for democracy. I think that is important; I believe it is something the people of Canada will expect the government to come to grips with and solve with the very minimum of delay. I shall anxiously await the reply of the minister, and rose simply to indicate my support of the motion which was dealt with so ably by the hon. member for Parkdale.

Hon. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It is not my intention to delay the house for very long, Mr. Speaker, in seconding the motion moved by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). I merely wish to support what the hon. member has said, and to emphasize the urgency of the situation. I am not particularly condemning the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), because after all this is a matter of government responsibility. I do not believe anyone on the government side is more sympathetic to the returned men than is the minister. But for a long time there has appeared to be a strange and unfortunate contrast between the speed with which we can clear airfields and build barracks for soldiers; the speed, indeed, with which we can manufacture guns we did not think we could build, and the hesitancy with which we make provision for those gallant wounded men who are certainly the most important citizens of this dominion. In the same general way it rather irks me to think of the speed with which we talk about provision for the post-war period; the speed with which we put through family allowances, if you will. Some hon. member says "speed," so perhaps I should modify that statement by saying the speed with which the suggestion of waiting a year was agreed to. Unfortunately I was not in the house at the time to vote against the measure; however there is certainly a great difference between the speed with which we go about our post-war planning for those who are well and the lack of speed with which we build hospitals for those who have been wounded. In one instance the first sod for the construction of Sunnybrook hospital was turned nine months ago. I do not blame the Minister of Pensions and National Health for this situation; I blame it on the government of the day, and indeed as a member of this parliament I must assume part of the responsibility myself if I do not press for its early construction.

I do not want to say very much about Christie street hospital, Mr. Speaker, since you have suggested that perhaps enough has been said in that regard, but I believe it is just as important to look after the gallant men who are undergoing treatment in that hospital as it is to look after people in any other part of this dominion. It almost makes one hang his head in shame to think of that hospital being maintained in that location, whether by this government or the previous government. Personally I do not think it ever should have been located there. However, I understand in the first place it was undertaken as an emergency measure. Anyone who has driven through that district as often as I have; anyone familiar with it, as I am sure seventy-five per cent of the members of this house are, knows the clatter, the dust and the din that are to be found in that district at all times. It is not a fit locality for the hospitalization of any class of our citizens, let alone our returned soldiers. These men should not be cared for in a hospital as wards of the state; they should be given every consideration as the leading champions of our national cause in this, the greatest and most important moment of our history.

I do feel that we should demonstrate in the building of hospitals the same speed that has been shown in the construction of war plants; and I believe our hospitals should be located in the most appropriate places. I believe the Sunnybrook hospital is in a very satisfactory location. Why should not our returned men be given accommodation equal to that provided for our ordinary citizens at the Toronto General hospital, or at the hospitals in Montreal, Halifax, and other places? I am told that more than one-third of the patients in Christie street hospital have been there since the last war, some of them unable to move. Many have grown so accustomed to the noise, the dust, the trains passing by and the grinding, rasping din of the metal manufacturing plant right next door that they have become reconciled to the situation, comforting themselves with the thought that they went through worse conditions when they were wounded overseas. But they should not be expected to endure that sort of thing indefinitely. I believe it is a national obligation on those who have remained at home to provide for our wounded soldiers, not merely adequately but generously. It is not enough to say that we have eighteen hundred beds available; in a short time we may have twenty-eight hundred men come back wounded. I doubt if anyone can say that there will be no emergency we cannot meet, in view of the hesitation with which we have gone about making our preparations.

The leader of the opposition has mentioned the proposal advanced by the premier of Ontario, who has said that the province is willing to forgo the use of the hospital at St. Thomas, which I understand will provide some 1,700 beds. I suggest that this accommodation could be used in an emergency, and that suitable accommodation elsewhere might be found for members of the R.C.A.F. who are there at the present time, because it does seem that we can make preparations for war a great deal faster than we can take measures for the protection of our returned men. I submit that this is a national emergency, because it affects the morale of our people at this most critical hour. It is bound to affect the enlistment of volunteers, who after all are the only members of our forces who are fighting. We should regard this as an acute national emergency in this hour of greatest crisis. This war may be over soon, as far as Europe is concerned, but in any event we may anticipate the early return of many men who have had their lives blighted by critical wounds. I repeat that before we go on making preparations for peace-time luxury of those who have not been overseas, we should make sure that we are well prepared to meet any emergency that may arise in connection with our returned men. We should have not merely sufficient but ample accommodation, so that these men may be looked after properly, not eighty in one room but one in each room. If this country can vote half a billion dollars for the post-war paternalism which has been suggested in this house, then we cannot afford as a nation to allow these boys to suffer when they return, and not have for them something better than placing eighty of them in one room, with all the dust, din and noise that is involved in the Christie street hospital situation.

I shall not detain the house longer. I should like to hear from the Minister of Pensions and National Health. Again I say I believe he is sympathetic to the returned men. But the responsibility is upon this whole government; therefore it is their first duty and our first duty to see to it that these men have not only a doubtful sufficiency, but adequate and surplus space. Everyone knows that if there are more beds than are required, there are many places in Canada where they can be used, because hospitalization in Canada has been short for the last several years.

Let us therefore have a surplus so that we may be sure that if five thousand more return than we expect, we may have ample provision for them. When we have done that, we can look after those to whom we seem to give so much paternalism in the post-war period.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, there is one thing on which every member of this House of Commons will be in complete agreement, and that is that a nation can never pay too much for the complete, tender attention and care of those who are wounded in the nation's service. The chief differences which arise, in my view, are in connection with the sincerity of some allegations made. During the last two or three years when the estimates of my department have been before the committee allegations have been made with respect to hospitalization at Christie Street hospital. I see to-day in a certain journal of Toronto a sensation-mongering series of pictures with reference to the surrounding conditions purported to be there.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On a point of order, is the minister permitted to cast aspersions on the sincerity of the motives of hon. members of this house?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not members of the house. I was not referring to members of the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There was no limitation made by the minister a moment ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My remarks were about those outside the house, and who indeed may be responsible for this debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the minister to refer to sources outside the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. With regard to Christie street hospital, it was purchased, it may be recalled, by a union government. And while I have been in this House of Commons—and I have been here fourteen years, and during a Conservative administration—I have never heard one single word of criticism in regard to the conditions at that hospital, until recently. I did not hear any criticism during those five years when hon. gentlemen opposite were in the government.

But now, of course, the criticism has been vociferous and frequent. I have been many times in that hospital, and I must say I have never seen the slightest justification for the attacks which have been made. We need Christie street hospital at this time, and we require it until we have the new hospital at Toronto. We commenced last November arrangements for the construction of Sunnybrook hospital, which will be one of the biggest—if not the biggest—in Canada, when it is completed. And I can assure the house that not one hour has been lost in connection with all the preparations made for Sunnybrook. The first contract was let for $2,800,000, and the contract has been let for the first stage of construction. We will proceed as fast as it is humanly possible, the same as has happened in other parts of Canada.

A new hospital is being built in Montreal—the Currie hospital. Then there is the hospital at Deer Lodge, and the new hospital at Calgary, also a new hospital in Edmonton. We have a new hospital in Regina, and in Vancouver we have a new hospital, with extensions. In Ottawa we have a new wing on the civic hospital.

The hon. member for Parkdale has spoken about the neurological centre at Montreal, about which I spoke earlier in this session. We have had consultations with the defence ministers. The defence services also have their own hospitals. The Department of Pensions and National Health has gone into the whole matter. In the last two years at least we have had a central committee on war hospitalization. This committee is composed of some of the most brilliant medical men to be found in Canada. They are able to consider and appraise every suggestion, and they review all suggestions in connection with the building and construction of hospital accommodation. This is not entirely a government committee. Rather it is a committee composed of the most expert and brilliant medical men in Canada. They pass upon every single new wing or new building erected in the country. The government does not authorize alterations or new construction until they have been recommended by those on the committee. I think some hon. members will know the personnel of that committee, and they will realize that it is composed of the most eminent men in medicine, in surgery and hospital administration to be found anywhere in the country. They are eminently able, and have been in charge of the work of passing upon the recommendations of departments.

In regard to neurological centres, may I say that we have accepted their advice, and these centres have been formed in four or five different places in Canada. The hon. member for Parkdale has said that we have not used the services of an eminent surgeon in Montreal, whom I have had the honour of complimenting in this house. We have been using his services for years in the Department of Pensions and National Health; we are using them to-day, and we hope we shall have the privilege of using them as long as they are required.

In no instance have we neglected to carry the advice of the best medical opinion in Canada. I still say we are meeting the situation properly, although that situation has changed recently because of two events. First, there was the new attack upon the old country, by new methods, and second, there was the matter of increased hospital ship accommodation. There may have to be a revision in the estimate made by the experts of the three defence departments in regard to casualties returned to Canada. That has been foreseen, and the condition is being carefully considered.

The Minister of National Defence, along with the other two defence ministers and myself, engaged an expert some time ago to review the whole situation in Canada in the light of the new conditions which now prevail. But if it comes to a desire of rendering every humane service and every other possible service for those boys, this house may rest assured that as long as I am in charge of the portfolio I now hold, that will be done.

May I add that my colleagues in the three defence services—all three—are gallant comrades who know what casualties mean. They learned about casualties in the last war, and I have had the most complete and marvellous cooperation. We have been meeting day after day for some months, especially in the light of the new developments in Europe. Those developments impelled us to review the whole situation.

I must say that a committee of the cabinet deals from time to time with these problems. The cooperation of every member of the government has been missing at no time. Any suggestion the committee has made to the government has been immediately endorsed by every single minister of the crown. I have had the fullest possible cooperation. Looking over the numbers of casualties—which I cannot reveal at the present time—and the construction programme now under way, and the bed accommodation we already have—taking account of the average stay in hospital we can care for about 20,000 new patients between now and Christmas. I must say on my responsibility that I am assured and I am confident that there will be proper accommodation for the boys requiring it. That is the first responsibility of any government, and certainly it is a responsibility which has been met by this government.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I regret some of the expressions used in the resolution. I wish it had been couched in a more generally constructive fashion, so as to bring attention to the problem generally. I regret the terms of criticism and inaccuracy in which the resolution is couched. I wish to give this definite assurance to the house. Everything is being done that can be done to deal with the situation, and that has been the case since this government assumed office and ever since the outbreak of the war.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to compliment Your Honour upon the fairness with which you received the motion of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). Second, I want to thank the minister for the calmness of his remarks just now. Third, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Parkdale upon bringing forward this matter. The city I represent has sent a large number of soldiers overseas, both in this war and in the last, and naturally I am anxious to do anything I can to bring about proper hospitalization.

I am afraid we are all to blame if there is any shortage of hospital beds. We have concentrated, first on enlistments; second on the making of munitions, and third on post-war preparations for employment. If there has been any neglect it has been perhaps in making preparations to take care of our wounded, of which there will likely be large numbers. I have observed that in the United States, with their usual thoroughness—they are so thorough over there in everything they do, in military preparations and in all other matters in connection with the war—they have shown the way to all the rest of us in preparing to receive the large numbers of wounded who are coming back from armies overseas. I hope that as a result of what the hon. member for Parkdale has brought up the department will, and I believe it will, do everything under heaven to make speedy preparations to receive those who come back wounded from overseas.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should say a word in connection with this matter from the point of view of the army, the navy and air force which are responsible for their own casualties up to a certain point. So far as the army is concerned, that point is when men in army hospitals are found not to be reparable within a reasonable length of time—that is, when it is found that men will not be back for service within a reasonable length of time. When that point is reached the thing to do is to have them make the change-over to civilian life and go to the care of Pensions and National Health. That is the general division of responsibility.

The army in connection with its responsibility of taking care of casualties when they first come home, unless they have injuries which can immediately be designated as of the irreparable nature I have spoken of, has its own hospitals all over Canada to which these men are sent. I want to say with regard to the army hospitals that we have felt, having regard to the word which we get from overseas—not so much as to the number of casualties, because I think we have anticipated the number of casualties all right—on account of the possible speed with which there will be an increase of evacuations from the United Kingdom as a result of conditions there, and on account of possible increased shipping accommodation, that we should increase our facilities. Plans have been made in a number of cases to increase facilities. Perhaps I could put it in another way by saying that we should speed up the provision of those facilities in case there should be any increase in evacuations from the United Kingdom. The army is doing this and I may say that we have regarded it as being so important that we have brought in a man from the outside to deal solely with the matter particularly from the engineering and construction angle, to see that the plans which are being made are dealt with promptly and to see that every possible pressure is put on the situation so that there will be no possible lack of accommodation so far as the army is concerned for any number of casualties which can reasonably be expected to come.

While the army is doing that I want to say something else. We have never taken the position, neither Pensions and National Health, nor the army, the navy, or the air, that we are all separate departments each working within its own watertight jurisdiction and paying no attention to the necessities for coordination and integration of these hospital services. We realize that, if it is possible to avoid it this country does not want to be unduly expansive in connection with hospital accommodation. That is to say, we could take the position that the army, navy and air should have sufficient hospital accommodation of all types, and then have Pensions and National Health duplicate the facilities for their purposes. We have not done that. Sooner or later, and probably sooner, the service hospitals will be evacuated to Pensions and National Health.

We have felt rather that we should put at each other's disposal the facilities both of accommodation and personnel that are available. In other words, we have felt that we should pool those facilities. In that connection Pensions and National Health have repeatedly provided accommodation for certain service personnel even though they were still on the strength of the services, and we appreciate their having done so. On the other hand—I am speaking for the army but I think the same can be said for the other services—we have provided professional personnel and nursing personnel in certain Pensions and National Health establishments in order that patients might be cared for and that the strain on the personnel might be relieved.

That has gone on and it is going on. I could recite the accommodation which the army has in different cities in this dominion. This will be available sooner or later for Pensions and National Health, or for Veterans' Affairs as no doubt the department will be called. Not only have the officials of the services and Pensions and National Health met together constantly and repeatedly but the ministers themselves have met together to see to it that every possible facility was provided and every possible endeavour made to unite our efforts in order to afford not only the best service possible but the most extensive and commodious service which can be provided for these men of ours.

I do not think any of us need protest unduly that we are desirous of seeing this done. It is only natural that we should instinctively wish to see our wounded men properly looked after. I think that is just as natural as it is for a man to be grateful for something some one has done for him, it is just as natural as any instinct in humanity. We are all just as anxious as we can be to see to it that these facilities are the best that can be provided, that they are provided on time, that they are provided where most needed and that they are adequately staffed.

That is the work of the service department. That applies to the Department of Pensions and National Health just as it applies to the service departments. I want to put myself on record as saying that I am not looking to Pensions and National Health to do the impossible. What I am looking to is to see to it that we provide them with accommodation if at some time they have not the accommodation they need, just as they have provided us with accommodation in connection with service personnel at places where it was convenient and possible for them to do so. Our officials have an understanding with regard to medical personnel. As the hon. member for Parkdale knows, medical personnel are none too plentiful in this country having regard to the services which have to be staffed and the community needs as well. We are endeavouring to see that there is no duplication of medical personnel but that if we have medical personnel available they be provided for the patients of the Department of Pensions and National Health where needed.

With regard to St. Thomas, which has been mentioned, may I say one word. The Minister of Pensions and National Health was good enough to take me with him when he went to interview the Minister of National Defence for Air with regard to getting a portion of the facilities at St. Thomas for the purpose of a hospital and it was as a result of that meeting between the ministers that an air force officer went to St. Thomas to see what the possibilities were of the air force making certain provision there which would give the Department of Pensions and National Health the use of a certain part of that institution. That officer returned and made a report, which I presume was in due course reported to the premier of Ontario and led to the letter which he sent to the Prime Minister of Canada. The St. Thomas hospital, I am informed, will be a very useful, convenient and suitable institution for this purpose. It is ready-made, and the army are also taking steps in connection with the air force camp at London to provide additional hospital facilities there.

I remember a complaint which was made to me—I am not going to say by whom but it was by a very distinguished gentleman, who complained bitterly that the air force were closing down in London in order to make it into a hospital for army purposes when St. Thomas was right there beside them and they could just as well use that. He did not understand the situation, that St. Thomas was being provided for Pensions and National Health because it is a very much more permanent structure.

My remarks have been somewhat rambling but if I have done nothing more than this I hope I have impressed on the house the fact that there is the fullest cooperation and coordination between the departments, that there is the fullest desire to see to it that this country does not duplicate hospital facilities unless that is necessary, and that there is certainly not only an undertaking but an absolute decision and the full expectation and the full confidence so far as the army is concerned that its hospital requirements will be fully looked after and that the sort of treatment which should be provided for them is provided.

Before I sit down, there is one thing I want to mention because the hon. member for Parkdale mentioned it; it struck me as being important, and the Minister of Pensions and National Health tells me that the hon. member for Parkdale was wrong in his statement. He made a statement which was peculiar. I wonder if he has any case in mind of men being removed from hospital who required hospital treatment in order to make room for others. Has my hon. friend any case of that kind in mind?

Mr. BRUCE: I am informed that a very large number of patients have been removed from Christie street by giving them four weeks' leave at home while they still required hospital treatment and that they would not have been removed had it not been for the emergency which had arisen.

Mr. RALSTON: I can quite understand that men may still require hospital treatment who are given four weeks' leave at home and are entitled to have four weeks' leave at home and to whom four weeks' leave at home would not do any harm. I can think of many amputation cases, I have one in mind now, a case of very serious amputation, who goes home and from time to time comes back to the hospital for treatment and who would very much prefer being home. Is my hon. friend referring to any other case?

Mr. BRUCE: I am not speaking of that class of individual at all. I am speaking of those who have recently arrived from overseas and who still require a certain amount of hospital treatment. I was not speaking of men who have been in hospital for months and who certainly ought to be sent home.

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend speaking of any case in which the medical officer advised that the man should remain in hospital, but he had to be sent home to provide accommodation for a more serious case?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, I am still speaking. I sat down to give my hon. friend an opportunity to answer.

Mr. BRUCE: I did not quite get the question.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend know of any case in which the medical officer at the hospital advised that the man should stay in hospital for his own benefit in order to get proper treatment, but in which the man was sent home in order to provide room for a more serious case?

Mr. BRUCE: I am not able to specify any particular case. I have no doubt that the medical officers would cooperate with the administration to relieve as many beds as they could to look after the emergency.

Mr. RALSTON: But that was the very statement on which my hon. friend's motion was founded, and now my hon. friend tells me that he does not know of a single case.

Mr. BRUCE: Excuse me, I said nothing of the kind. I said that I was not able to give a specific case, but I am able to say that a large number of cases running into hundreds have been removed from hospital for the purpose indicated in my motion.

Mr. RALSTON: And of whom the medical officer said that they should remain in hospital for treatment?

Mr. BRUCE: Cases still requiring hospital treatment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. We are not in committee. The question is that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no reply, under the rules.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, I doubt if this discussion is really in order, because a reference to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms indicates that urgency within the meaning of the rules involved here does not apply to the matter itself but to the urgency of debate. I quote:

> "Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate", when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

My hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health has already indicated, and it is already known I think to members of the house, that his estimates will come up this week when the fullest opportunity—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not challenging the ruling I have already given?

Mr. STIRLING: That is exactly what he is doing.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am not challenging your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

I have another observation to make to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) and it is this. Speaking in the house on August 4 the hon. member for Parkdale put a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health in these words, at page 5902 of Hansard:

> Owing to the alarming reports in regard to the lack of accommodation for our wounded who are returning from Normandy and Italy, and the fact that he announced two or three days ago that he has taken over hostels in Peterborough and Kingston for the purpose, I wonder if he would tell the house why it should be necessary in the fifth year of the war to scurry about to get accommodation in any old building for our wounded.

I ask the house to pay particular attention to these words that the hon. member used: "to scurry about to get accommodation in any old building for our wounded." On that point, which is related to the motion the hon. member has made this morning, I want to say to him that so far as the hostel at Kingston is concerned which the Department of Pensions and National Health has taken over, the description "any old building" is entirely inappropriate and inapplicable. My hon. friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health will recall the time when I approached him with regard to the use of that building for our wounded returned soldiers.

I had watched that building from its earliest days, when it was erected by the Department of Munitions and Supply as a hostel for women workers in the city of Kingston. I had seen conditions change there so that the need for that hostel was not nearly so great as before. I had observed how splendidly it would adapt itself to the purposes of a Pensions and National Health hospital. My hon. friend sent down his officials and doctors; they looked at the building and agreed completely with the representations I had made, and they took it over for use as a hospital. I am prepared to say that it will make a magnificent hospital—well equipped, well furnished, and well situated—and it is entirely incorrect and unjust to refer to it as "any old building which is to be used as a building for Canadian soldiers".

Another point I wish to clear up, and which is related somewhat to this matter, is a statement in a newspaper last week that the three ministers of defence had lost confidence in the Minister of Pensions and National Health and therefore had set up demobilization committees of their own. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this house that in no degree have we lost confidence in the Minister of Pensions and National Health. On the contrary he shares completely, I think, the confidence of the ministers of national defence. Why did we set up these committees in our various departments? The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) speaking to this house some weeks ago, gave the reason. He said that there are two phases or stages in the lives of men in the services, two different stages in their histories. The first is while they are under our control, while they are in the services, and during that stage we in the services must do everything we can to look after them, including their repatriation to Canada, the preparation of the various service documents, arrangements about pay and discharge and the like. When they are discharged they become the care of the Minister of Pensions and National Health. The setting up of committees by the three defence services was done solely with regard to the first stage: it was done so that we might attend more carefully to the great mass of detail which must be attended to before you can get men out of the service, including transportation to Canada, proper documentation, and finally, discharge. Then the Minister of Pensions and National Health takes over; and so far as I am concerned I am happy to be able to say here, that, instead of the minister's losing our confidence, our confidence in him has grown as we have observed in recent months, and indeed ever since he assumed office, the great thoughtfulness, the generosity and the sympathy he cherishes for all men who are in the armed services.

Mr. BRUCE: In rising to—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has no right to reply.

Mr. BRUCE: I was going to ask permission to withdraw the motion. I thought that was the regular procedure according to the rules, and I thought I might just add a word.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BRUCE: We have had evidence this morning that the government's work has been too little and too late.

Motion withdrawn.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*COAL SUBVENTIONS AND OTHER ASSISTANCE—NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

> What are the names of the companies engaged in coal mining in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick receiving assistance by way of subventions, capital assistance, developing work, operating expenses and royalties or profits, stating the tonnage produced and amounts payable to each mine and company under above headings for the years 1942, 1943 and 1944 to date?

Mr. ABBOTT: This raises a question which has been up a number of times before. The Minister of Finance has stated on several occasions that it is not considered in the public interest to disclose the names of individual recipients of subsidies and the amounts paid to them. The last occasion on which he stated that policy and gave his reasons was on April 24, 1944, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Peterborough West; it will be found on page 2280 of Hansard. I would therefore ask that the question be dropped.

Question dropped.

PRIORITY FOR GOLD AND SILVER MINES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. In what priority category respecting manpower have gold and silver mines been placed by the Department of Labour?

2. Have any exceptions been made? If so, in respect to which mines, and why?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Gold mines have been given a "D" labour priority rating for both men and women. There is no labour priority rating applying specifically to silver mines, but any mines which may be engaged primarily in the production of silver would be classified under "other metal mining not elsewhere classified", for which the labour priority rating is "A" for both men and women.

2. No exceptions have been made in the case of silver mines.

In the case of gold mines the 34 mines listed below were given a "B" priority for men and women in order to permit them to fill the net labour requirements necessary for minimum operation. These mines were selected for special treatment after a survey had been made of the industry to determine labour requirements: Bidgood Kirkland Gold Mines Ltd.; Cariboo Gold Quartz Mining Co.; Central Patricia Gold Mines Ltd.; Chesterville Larder Lake Gold Mining Co., Ltd.; East Malartic Mines Limited; Hard Rock Gold Mines Ltd.; Hasaga Gold Mines Limited; Island Mountain Mines Co., Ltd.; Kerr-Addison Gold Mines Ltd.; Kirkland Lake Gold Mining Co. Ltd.; Lake Shore Mines Limited; Lamaque Mining Co., Limited; Leitch Gold Mines Limited; Little Long Lac Gold Mines Ltd.; Macassa Mines Limited; Madsen Red Lake Gold Mines Ltd.; Matachewan Consolidated Mines; McKenzie Red Lake Gold Mines Ltd.; McLeod Cockshutt Gold Mines Ltd.; Omega Gold Mines Limited; Pamour Porcupine Mines Limited; Paymaster Consolidated Mines Ltd.; Perron Gold Mines Limited; Pickle Crow Gold Mines Limited; Pioneer Gold Mines Ltd.; Ross Gold Mines Limited; San Antonio Gold Mines Limited; Sheep Creek Gold Mines Limited; Sladen Malartic Mines Limited; Teck-Hughes Gold Mines Limited; Toburn Gold Mines Limited; Upper Canada Mines Limited; Wright-Hargreaves Mines Ltd.; Young Davidson Gold Mines Ltd.

Similar treatment was given to six other mines, but the "B" rating for these mines has now been cancelled since their net labour requirements have been met.

In addition:

(a) Beattie Gold Mines (Quebec) Ltd., Duparquet, P.Q., have been given a "B" priority rating because they are substantially engaged in the production of arsenic;

(b) Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines Ltd., Timmins, Ont., and O'Brien Gold Mines Ltd., Kewagama, P.Q., have been given a "C" priority because a certain proportion of their output is tungsten and arsenic respectively;

(c) Powell-Rouyn Gold Mines, Quebec, P.Q., have been given an "A" priority because they are mainly engaged in the production of silica flux.

HEINSBERG, ALBERTA AND FRENCHMAN BUTTE, SASK., RAILWAY SERVICE

Mr. DECHENE:

1. Is anything being done at the present time to expedite the construction over the short gap in the Edmonton, St. Paul, Turtleford line between Heinsberg, Alberta, and Frenchman Butte, Saskatchewan?

2. If not, will consideration be given to this project at an early date?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. No.

2. As a possible post-war development, consideration will be given to branch line construction wherever justified by present and prospective settlement.

CEMETERIES FOR BURIAL OF SOLDIERS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government any plan for a system of national cemeteries in Canada in cities and towns for burial of soldiers of this and other wars?

2. Has a study or survey been made of this problem?

3. Has the government received any recommendations or complaints as to this?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A survey of burial accommodation has been made by an interdepartmental committee, set up following the outbreak of the present war, for the purpose of dealing with matters associated with the death and burial of persons who had served with the armed forces and that committee gave consideration to the matter of a system of national cemeteries. By reason of the development, during and subsequent to the great war by municipalities, cemetery companies, veterans' and other organizations, of sections within cemeteries in cities and towns in Canada which sections are reserved for the burial of those who have served with the armed forces, it appears that the establishment of a system of government-owned national cemeteries throughout Canada is not indicated. In the few centres where there are no such reserved sections, the government has acquired plots in existing cemeteries in which may be buried, if the relatives so desire, the remains of a member or former member of the forces for whose burial the government is responsible.

ADDISON INDUSTRIES LIMITED—"WALKIE TALKIE" RADIO DEVICE

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has the Addison Industries Limited at any time within the last year offered a return, rebate or discount of any part of the purchase price of the radio device known as Walkie Talkie?
2. If so, when, and with what result?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No refund was offered by Addison Industries Limited beyond the terms of the contract. The contract provided for the downward revision of price per unit under certain circumstances. The company was, of course, aware of this and in the case of spares anticipated the adjustment by making a refund of $210,000 before the final costs were determined by audit.

2. (a) July 9, 1943.

(b) See answer to 1. The first contract was placed at a ceiling price of $555.00 per set, tooling extra, the profit not to exceed 5 per cent on costs. Following the audit, the price was adjusted downward to $521.97 per unit in accordance with the terms of the contract.

RADIO BROADCASTING—PRINCE RUPERT PRIVATE STATION

Mr. BOUCHER:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation connected up by ground wire with the private broadcasting station at Prince Rupert, British Columbia?
2. If so, on what date was it connected?
3. By whom was the authority given for this connection?
4. On whose representation was it done?

Mr. LaFLECHE:—

1. Yes.
2. July 25, 1944.
3. Authority granted by the acting general manager pursuant to the board's stated desire of improving service to the Prince Rupert area as circumstances permitted.
4. In response to urgent requests on behalf of the listening public and also from the armed forces.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

TAXI, REPAIR AND OTHER SERVICES AND SUPPLIES, GUYSBOROUGH COUNTY, N.S.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

What have been the total payments made for the account of the three departments of national defence and the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of Labour (national selective service) to the Sherbrooke Taxi Service and Mr. J. E. Fraser of Nova Scotia by the federal government for taxi, repair and other services and supplies each year since September, 1939?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MOBILIZATION ACT—APPLICATIONS FOR LEAVE

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all instructions given to the national selective service mobilization boards concerning applications for leave made by draftees who have already undergone military training, or by members of the active army.

Mr. MARTIN: Return tabled.

ELDORADO MINING AND REFINING COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

For a copy of the agreement forming the basis of the taking over by the government by order in council P.C. 535, 1944, of the property of the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company Limited. Also a copy of the balance sheet of the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company Limited, for the year 1943.

EXEMPTIONS FROM PROVISIONS OF CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a return showing the exemptions to the Civil Service Act of May 4, 1918, enacted in the following periods: May 24, 1918 to 1921; 1921 to 1930; 1930 to 1935; 1935 to the present time, (1) by statute; (2) by order in council; (3) by appropriation acts; (4) otherwise?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

COMPLIMENTARY DINNER TO THE PRIME MINISTER —SUGGESTION AS TO ADJOURNMENT THIS DAY AT SIX O'CLOCK

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I understand that there is a dinner to-night to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I suggest that since this is a most unusual occasion, and no doubt the Prime Minister's friends will wish to attend that dinner, we should not sit to-night.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I was about to rise to speak on this matter, which I had already mentioned privately to the Prime Minister, and make a similar suggestion in connection with it. My information is the same as that of my hon. friend; it is that a great many hon. members desire to attend, and if the government's business is sufficiently advanced I should think there would be no objection to allowing an adjournment at six o'clock to-night until to-morrow morning; perhaps in any event we can pick up in the succeeding days any time which is missed. I think we are all in the mood to-day of desiring to be just as generous as we can to the Prime Minister, to whom on this occasion we attempt to do some honour and pay some tribute, and I feel that the house will be in entire agreement with the suggestion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I express my appreciation to my hon. friend the Leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) and to my hon. friend the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Graydon) for their courtesy in suggesting that the house do not continue with business this evening. If there are any hon. members who feel that they would be inconvenienced by the house not sitting, I would personally much prefer that somehow or another we would keep a quorum on this side to continue with the business. However, I do know that all hon. members on this side have been looking forward to being present with myself and colleagues this evening, and the courtesy of the house in causing us to feel that we may have the evening free is something which all of us would deeply appreciate.

I might say that had I assumed for a moment that the business of the house would not have been over by this time I would have been the first to ask that no engagement of any kind be arranged for this evening. When, some months ago, some hon. members kindly suggested that a dinner might be held on August 7, the time looked so far distant that I thought it was safe to say that I felt we might count on being together that evening. However, I do appreciate the suggestion of adjournment at six o'clock this afternoon, and would thank hon. gentlemen opposite on behalf of members of my party for making it possible for all of us to have this evening together.

As to the business, I would say that if we were not sitting in the mornings as well as the afternoons I would hesitate to accept the kind proposal which has been made, but as we are sitting morning, afternoon and night it will I believe be possible for us to conclude the business of the session without losing much time in virtue of not sitting this evening. Again I thank hon. members.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RELEASE OF MEN FROM EQUIPMENT AND PERSONNEL SECTIONS R.C.A.F.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a further question to the Minister of Labour in connection with a matter that I raised on Saturday in respect to which he suggested that I take it up with the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). This matter has to do with a letter sent throughout the country indicating that men in the ground crew of the air force have been advised that opportunity will be given to them to secure discharge from the air force provided that they are needed in industry or on farms. These men want to know the situation with respect to this order. Once they get their discharge from the air force and apply to go into essential industry will they be subject to call-up under the N.R.M.A.? The rumour is about that they will be subject to that call, and so far no information has been given thereon. It is a matter that falls strictly within the Department of Labour.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have made inquiries and find that there has been no change in the policy which has been followed in the Royal Canadian Air Force in matters of this kind. It has always been the practice so far as the Royal Canadian Air Force is concerned to consider an application from a man to be given his discharge in order that he may return to essential industry, provided that he can be released without interfering with the training programme, and provided that the recommendation was received from national selective service confirming the applicant's statement that he was needed for some essential work. The order which the hon. member has heard about is simply an order standardizing the practice throughout Canada as to what routine would be followed. With respect to the question as to whether a man receiving his discharge would be called for service in the army, it is a fact that under such circumstances a man might be called for service in the army, but if such were the case he would probably be given his postponement by the mobilization board on presentation of the same set of facts which prompted a national selective service officer to recommend his discharge from the air force in the first instance.

We have a satisfactory interdepartmental arrangement, and I do not know of any case in recent months where a man who has been given his discharge from the Royal Canadian Air Force to return to essential service has been called for the army.

Regarding farm leave, Royal Canadian Air Force this year has adopted the same practice as has been followed by the army, namely, men who apply for farm leave may be granted it to enable them to work on any farm, whereas in previous years the man had to specify what farm he was going to, and unless the farm was owned by a member of his family, leave was not extended. I think that answers my hon. friend's question.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 180, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Just before second reading is given to this bill I should like to offer a word of commendation to the government in connection with the provisions of this legislation, but at the same time I will offer a word of complaint.

The word of commendation has to do with the fact that the government appears to have given recognition to at least three points which I can identify as having been brought up in the discussion that took place in this house on the budget resolutions. This is as it should be. Nevertheless it happens so seldom that when it does take place I think attention should be called to it. Let me be specific. When we were discussing the budget resolutions one point that I raised was in connection with income tax exemption for unusual medical expenses. I pointed out that the provisions of the Income War Tax Act did not permit the allowing of all the kinds of medical expenses that taxpayers have to incur. I suggested that one way to provide desirable relief to the taxpayer would be to lower the five per cent figure to three per cent or to two per cent. The figure I refer to is the percentage of taxable income beyond which medical expenses are regarded as unusual. When we were discussing the matter in the house the parliamentary assistant indicated that our representations at least would be given consideration. I am very happy to notice that in subsection 4 of section 4 of this bill the government has reduced the floor from five per cent to four per cent. It does not go as far as I asked—I suggested three per cent or two per cent—but it is a move in the direction requested, and I think that attention should be called to it.

Another point which was discussed by a number of hon. members during the debate on the budget resolutions was the discrimination against parents whose daughters between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one were students at nursing schools as compared with those whose children of the same ages are at other educational institutions. Hon. members will recall that a number of us put up a pretty strong fight on that point. Those speaking for the government felt that nothing could be done for these taxpayers, but again I am glad to note that our discussion in the house was not in vain; for in section 27 of the bill we have an attempt on the part of the government to meet us half way. The government has not done exactly what we suggested, but it has gone a good distance along the road, and I congratulate it on paying attention to the representations made on the floor of the house.

The third point in connection with which the government has paid heed to discussion during the debate is with respect to budget resolution No. 27. That was a sweeping resolution in its original form, providing that dividends paid by a wholly owned subsidiary non-resident company to a Canadian parent company should be exempt from all taxation when received by such parent company. I presented some strong objections to the sweeping nature of that resolution. I did not receive very much support; in fact I was pretty roundly condemned by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) for the position I took, but I could not have been totally wrong because even the government has met me part way in section 6, subsection 2 of the bill now before us, which places certain limitations—

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will recall that the resolution was amended in the course of the discussion.

Mr. KNOWLES: The resolution was amended after I made representations in the committee.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: And if I am not mistaken the terms of the bill go a little farther than even the amended resolution.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is along the same line.

Mr. KNOWLES: At any rate I am commending the government for having done in this instance what it seems to me the procedure of parliament calls for, namely that when we have a discussion at the resolution stage consideration should be given to the representations made on the floor of the committee. Usually we have to wait a year or longer. This year we have had these admissions made within a short space of time as to the validity of some of the claims we were advancing.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, a number of claims were made by some of us which we feel were equally valid but which the government have not seen fit to admit. I shall refer to only one of them at the moment, because the others to which I should like to refer can be dealt with under the various sections of the bill. I see no ready opportunity of discussing this one, however, under any particular section, so I should like to mention it now. I am deeply disappointed that the government has not recognized our representations in behalf of sleeping car conductors and sleeping car porters. I know the technicalities on the basis of which the government discriminates between them and other running trades employees of the railways; yet in plain, ordinary fact there is no difference in the situation as between railway conductors and sleeping car conductors, or as between trainmen and porters. These men feel, and rightly, that it is unfair not to allow them, as a deduction from their taxable income, an amount representing their away from home expenses. The other railway employees to whom I referred get that exemption; the sleeping car conductors and porters do not get it. When I started to look through this bill over the week-end and found that some of our claims had been recognized, as I have pointed out already, I went back and looked through it two or three times hoping to find that point recognized, because it did seem to me a very just claim. I hope that even yet the government may give consideration to that case, so that there will not be this unfairness and discrimination against sleeping car conductors and sleeping car porters. I shall reserve any further remarks until we are in committee.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have already taken up with the department the grievances of the sleeping-car conductors, the porters and others who wait on the public. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the application of this tax is most unfair and unjust to this class of people. In some cases and in certain localities, arbitrary amounts have been added to the incomes of porters back to the year 1942, after they had paid their taxes, this arbitrary levy being for the tips or gratuities they were supposed to have received from the public. If this is a proper tax on this class of people, of whom there are thousands all over Canada including not only sleeping-car porters but waiters, people in hotels and others who serve the public, why are they not advised in advance that this is income which is subject to taxation? In some cases it has been represented to me that these people have advised that they did not receive such earnings; that they were not regular porters but were on casual trips in connection with the transportation of service personnel, who as a rule do not give tips. I was able to get an adjustment in one case by having the man concerned add to his income for 1942 the maximum amount he had received in the form of tips, which was far less than the amount charged.

This taxation is not fair from another point of view. The small gratuities that are given these servants of the public are from the residue of the earnings of people who already have paid taxes. It is not untaxed earning or income, but comes from what is left. Therefore it should not be again subject to income tax. This is a real grievance on the part of this class of people, who are not allowed to deduct expenses when away from home.

I wish to bring another matter to the attention of the department; that is, the unfairness of the present tax on electrical energy. I discussed this during the budget debate, when I quoted a statement by Hon. Mr. Godbout, Premier of Quebec, in which he took credit for having reduced the charges for electrical services in that province by the sum of $6,000,000, because he had expropriated certain companies which no longer had to pay this taxation to the federal government. He said that in this way he had given the province relief to the extent of $6,000,000, which previously had been paid to the federal government. The same situation has applied in the province of Ontario for many years. When I was dealing with this matter during the budget debate I said that in Nova Scotia it was represented that this tax amounted to $1,000,000 yearly. In my own constituency of Cumberland we have private companies generating and distributing electricity, and it is estimated that they pay yearly $150,000 in taxation. The very basis of taxation is that its application shall be fair to people in all parts of the country. This tax on electrical services has reached the point where there is no taxation imposed that is more unfair. I feel strongly that the government should bring in legislation to repeal this taxation, so that private enterprise may not have to pay taxation from which government-owned services are relieved.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is my hon. friend referring to sales tax or excise tax on electrical services? Or is he referring to income tax?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): All taxation on government-operated plants, such as in the province of Quebec, which Hon. Mr. Godbout has represented himself as relieving the users of the payment of $6,000,000 because he has taken over such industry.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): But the privately operated companies or their patrons in the county of Cumberland pay $150,000 a year, and if the plants were government-owned, those amounts would not have to be paid. It is estimated that Nova Scotia is paying a million dollars in such taxes, although there are in Nova Scotia some government-owned plants. The basis of taxation in Nova Scotia, and throughout Canada, is most unfair. I appeal to the minister and the government to bring in legislation at once in order that the unfairness in dealing with these industries may be eliminated, so that users of electricity shall all be exempted or all be treated alike. Not only is it unfair as between provinces and as between generating plants, but it is also unfair in respect of the smaller generating plants, where in the ordinary course of events the cost of generating power is high. These taxes are on a percentage basis and thus there is higher taxation on each unit of electricity. Before this bill passes I should like to have a statement as to what the government proposes to do in the matter.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that on two previous occasions I tried to bring to the attention of the minister a matter which concerns a number of my constituents, and others who reside not only in my constituency but as well throughout the city of Windsor. In this matter the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), who is attending a very important meeting outside the chamber, has joined with me on several occasions in discussing this matter with the responsible minister and with the officials of the Department of Finance, to see if there might not be some remedy for the grievance of which I am about to speak.

This matter concerns some 2,500 to 3,000 citizens in the city of Windsor, who for the most part earn their incomes by working in the city of Detroit. I have no doubt that this border situation is not peculiar alone to that city, but is a condition which may be found at other border points. These people feel, and I join with them, that they suffer a grievance in respect of the administration of the income tax in so far as earned income in the United States is concerned. Perhaps the minister would appreciate if I were to state the three grounds upon which the application for redress is made. They ask:

1. That substantial tax-free allowances be made for expenses incurred in the United States which come out of income earned in the United States, the said money never entering Canada, and that these allowances should be comparable to those employees of the British Supply Council in North America.

2. That the ten per cent premium on gross salary be removed, but if charged at all, be on net salary, after all deductions have been made and,

3. That the tax should be levied on net salary or earnings, not gross, plus ten per cent as at present.

That is the way in which these people have stated their case. I prefer to state it perhaps in another way, one which for my purpose would be clearer. The general problem is that most of these men and women, who are earning salaries well within the range of $2,000 or $3,000—there may be exceptions, but for the most part they are relatively small wage-earners—find that they are forced, in the normal carrying out of their occupations, to spend a considerable portion of their money each year upon food and travel in the United States. True, if they brought all of that money back into Canada in American currency it would be valued at a rate ten per cent higher than the Canadian dollar, due to the discount rate. The fact is, however, that a good portion of that money is necessarily spent in the United States. Yet for income tax purposes, they are charged on it. Let us say, for instance, that a man's salary is $3,000. If he were to bring that $3,000 into Canada it would amount to $3,300. Actually he does not get that $3,300, because, as I say, he has spent some of it in the United States. And yet he is charged on the total amount but which in fact he never brings into Canada, and which in fact he never gets.

While I recognize the administrative difficulties, I do submit strongly to the minister that there can be no justification for charging income tax, no matter how small or how large the amount may be, on a sum of money which is actually never received. That is the situation. They get the money and bring it into Canada, but if they spend it on meals and other necessities in Detroit, they spend American money which, having in mind the locale of the expenditure, is still one dollar and not $1.10.

These people are known as commuters. They are valuable citizens, many of whom not only since the war but for a considerable number of years have worked for the most part in the neighbouring city in the United States, and are an asset to the community and to this country. All they are asking is that having in mind the nature of their work and the circumstances under which it is undertaken, they shall not be placed in a discriminatory position. They are not asking for any special privileges.

They feel, first, that they should be allowed as a deduction from gross income the expenses necessarily incurred in the United States in the earning of this income. They have to pay travelling expenses to and from Canada, provide themselves with food while there, and they are subject to other incidental expenses from which there is no escape. The minister might say: You are asking for something that is unreasonable, something that is not accorded to any other class of the Canadian community. One recognizes that answer. The fact is however that these people are in a special class, and I suggest they might very well be dealt with in the same manner as certain persons employed by the United Kingdom Treasury Delegation, and also another group covered by an order of the treasury board dated April 27, 1944, section 3 of which order reads as follows:

> That the appropriate United States expenses allowances may be deducted for income tax purposes under common services notice No. 78, paragraph 5.

This privilege has been granted to all persons employed in the United Kingdom treasury delegation, and I think it is also applied to people in the British supply council in the United States, who are chargeable with Canadian income tax. If there is one group for which such allowance should be made, I think it is these commuters who have a special set of circumstances attending their occupations. They feel, and this is a strong argument and one which I think is unanswerable, that it is unfair to be charged the exchange addition upon that portion of their income which they have to pay out in the United States in connection with commuting to the United States. That is money which in fact they have not brought into Canada and cannot bring into Canada. It seems to me that we are imposing there a tax that just simply cannot stand in equity.

Their third request is in conformity with the principle applied by the department to persons in the British Supply Council and the United Kingdom Treasury Delegation. My constituents consider themselves comparable to these people and feel that they should have a tax-free allowance granted to them in view of their special situation.

I can only add in this connection that these people are working alongside United States citizens. Many of them have bought Canadian victory bonds but because of their continuous contact with United States citizens they are obliged to invest some of their earnings in United States liberty bonds, and in a corresponding way in United States war certificates and the like. They have to make contributions to charitable organizations and patriotic organizations in the United States within their means. They are taxed on the total amount of their earnings as though the total amount plus the ten per cent premium which the United States dollar commands was really in their hands. To the extent of these necessary expenses, they never have that income.

I urge the minister to reconsider the submissions that have been made to him by the Secretary of State, by this organization and by myself, and review the matter in the light of the representations which I am taking the time of the house to make to-day only because this is a small but very important section of the community which I represent, made up of ordinary men and women earning no great income but who find themselves discriminated against. I do not think this discrimination is justified, and I ask the minister to reconsider the whole matter in the light of these further representations.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I hope my hon. friend was not trying to be exclusive in his argument with respect to the class of citizen he mentioned a few moments ago. He referred to the various advocates that this group had, but he overlooked the leader of the opposition who was the first to raise this matter in the house. Perhaps I ought to make myself heard.

Mr. MARTIN: I overlooked that; I am very sorry.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wish to say only a word in addition to the argument put forward by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). It was a very comprehensive one, one in which I concur entirely. Before I sit down I should like to suggest that perhaps on matters like these the procedure could be altered in another session. When I rose first to introduce this matter in the house, to be followed by the hon. member for Essex East, when the resolution was before us, the chairman said that that was not the appropriate place to bring up the matter. If that is the rule, then I think it ought to be amended because these suggestions ought to be brought up at the resolution stage so that before the bill is finally introduced the government will have at its disposal the arguments which have been advanced.

Mr. ABBOTT: It should be on the same resolution.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take issue with my hon. friend on that. If the government brings in no resolution, then there could be no representations made. If the government brings in a very restricted number of resolutions, then there would be no possibility of raising the question.

Mr. ABBOTT: Bring it up on the motion to go into committee to consider the resolution.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend is attempting to split hairs on that, because in my opinion the time to bring up these matters is at the end of the resolution stage when matters of a similar character have been dealt with. If the parliamentary assistant is taking umbrage at what I say—

Mr. ABBOTT: Not at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not directing my argument against him. I want to point out that the resolution stage ought to be utilized in this way so that the government may have at their disposal the arguments that may be raised on matters which, while not touched by the resolution, perhaps should have been included.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has brought up the question of commuters. I have had a great deal of correspondence on this subject with the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the matter has been given very careful consideration. The hon. member for Essex East says that he has a grievance in respect to "the administration" of income tax, but I should like to read from section 3 of the act which defines income. It reads:

> For the purposes of this act, "income" means the annual net profit or gain or gratuity, whether ascertained and capable of computation as being wages, salary, or other fixed amount, or unascertained as being fees and emoluments . . . whether derived from sources within Canada or elsewhere; and shall include the interest . . . and also the annual profit or gain from any other source, including
> (e) personal and living expenses when such form part of the profit, gain or remuneration of the taxpayer or the payment of such constitutes part of the gain, benefit or advantage accruing to the taxpayer under any estate—

Section 6 of the Income War Tax Act sets out the deductions that may not be allowed from income. It says:

> In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be assessed, a deduction shall not be allowed in respect of
> (a) disbursements or expenses not wholly, exclusively and necessarily laid out or expended for the purpose of earning the income;
> (f) personal and living expenses.

Commuters are much in the same position as other workers in Canada. While the persons referred to cross the international boundary, there are many other people in Canada employed in places other than where they reside. Those Canadian citizens who have to pay train fare, perhaps street car and automobile expenses, are not allowed to deduct those expenses from the salaries they receive. Commuters are in the same position. They go to the United States but they are no more entitled to receive their travelling expenses for going to and from their work than are other Canadian citizens who have similar expenses.

Another complaint is that the salary received is taxed with the exchange of ten per cent added. The first section I read provides that income is taxable when received from sources within Canada or elsewhere. In all cases where wages or dividends are received by a Canadian taxpayer, the Canadian value of the amount received is estimated for tax purposes. Consequently when wages are received in United States funds, ten per cent is added to find out what the Canadian equivalent is for taxation purposes.

I quite agree that the commuters feel that they have a considerable grievance in that if they are working in the United States all day they have to buy some of their food in the United States with United States currency, and they say: We cannot bring back this United States money on which we could receive the ten per cent. But the difficulty is that under the act they are not allowed to make any deduction from income for personal or living expenses, and consequently the amount which they spend on their lunches in the United States is not allowed as a deduction under the act as it now stands. Their income is the gross amount that they receive. It is a matter that can be given further consideration. I know that it is causing a great deal of hard feeling among those who work across the border, and I can assure my hon. friend that we will explore any means that can be adopted to grant any relief that is possible. But I do not think that anybody will expect that the whole principle of the act dealing with the question should be changed in order to accommodate a small group. If we created a precedent in a case such as this it would have very far-reaching effects indeed, and affect not only commuters crossing the international border, but workers in all parts of Canada who have to travel any distance in going to and from their work.

Another point that was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was the taxation of railway porters. That raises very much the same point, as to whether they should be allowed a deduction for personal or living expenses incurred while away from home. The act definitely states that that shall not be allowed as a deduction. There is a difference in the treatment of some of the railway workers. The members of the running trades are not paid a salary but are paid on a mileage basis. Many years ago—I do not remember how many but I would say ten or fifteen years ago—representations were made by the railway workers and the income tax division agreed to treat the members of the running trades, who were on a mileage basis, as though they were paid on a commission basis, which would allow them to deduct their expenses. That was accepted at that time by the railway workers organizations, and that ruling has been continued to date. It is to my mind questionable whether that ruling would stand up under fire, and whether we are not wrong in allowing the running trades to have that exemption which they have been receiving. Certainly rather than broadening it out to permit the deduction of living expenses from salary, which is not allowed in any industry in this country, I think we would be well advised to review the original ruling in regard to the running trades and perhaps we might find that they were not entitled to the exemption which they have been receiving. But to hold their case up as an example that should be followed in the case of other employees is not sound, because it is not allowed in any other industry in this country.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Why are conductors and porters who are away from home part of the time and have to keep a room and pay their living expenses at the other end of their run not allowed to deduct these essential expenses from their earnings for taxation purposes?

Mr. GIBSON: They are if they are on a mileage basis, but where they are drawing salary, that expense is not allowed as a deduction from their earnings for taxation purposes. If in addition to their salary they were given an additional allowance to cover their necessary expenses while away from home, that would be included as income and be taxable. One of the deductions that is not allowed is any allowance for personal or living expenses.

The hon. member for Cumberland brought up another point, and that was the inclusion of tips as income. That is a matter that has recently come to light. I think that possibly in the days of lower taxation and higher tax exemptions careful scrutiny was not given to items of that kind, but to-day with the tax exemption standing at $660 and with war taxation higher the income tax division has found itself forced to scrutinize more carefully the returns that are filed and the sources of income from which taxpayers receive their remuneration. Under the definition of income in the act, income means the annual net profit or gain or gratuity, and so forth. I quite agree that if a taxpayer has not kept an adequate record of the tips he has received it is very difficult for him or for the income tax division to know what his income is. I agree that there may be many men who are engaged on troop trains who may receive little or nothing in the way of tips. I would like to have these cases brought to the attention of the department because we do not want to inflict hardship on individuals. While we want to collect all the taxation that is owing, nobody wants to have a man forced to pay more than he is legally bound to pay.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am advised that there are certain jurisdictions in Canada —I refer to Montreal—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. We are on the second reading and questions cannot be allowed.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): If I might finish this one question, Mr. Speaker, in some taxation jurisdictions tips have never been charged as income, while in my province tips are being charged as income. There has been no uniformity. The porters never understood that their tips would be subject to income tax, and I do not think they should be.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The minister did not reply to my question with respect to taxation on electrical services.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity to put his question later.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. MARTIN: I take some relief in what the minister said about exploring the matter I raised, and in which I was supported by the leader of the opposition, but may I point out by way of emphasis that while it is true that living expenses are not as a rule allowed as a deduction from salaries, that very thing was done in the case of employees of the British Supply Council and the United Kingdom Treasury Delegation. In sections 3 and 6 of the act, particularly section 3, on the very reading which the hon. gentleman cited to this house that is not income at all. My argument is that ten per cent of a considerable portion of the moneys earned in the United States by these people never in fact comes to them. We are charging them with a portion of the premium of which in fact they never get the benefit, because that particular portion of the money is never brought back to Canada, and the only way they can get the benefit of it is by bringing it to Canada. I ask the minister in his further examination of the matter to bear in mind these representations which I have made with as much vigour as I can.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish the committee to get off on the wrong foot, and—

The CHAIRMAN: This is out of order.

Mr. ABBOTT: —I hope you will try, Mr. Chairman, to keep members of the committee within the scope of the sections.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to say a few words regarding paragraphs (u) and (v), section 1 of the bill, providing for the right to deduct, in determining the amount of the income tax, expenditures which are made by any company or other body in respect of scientific research. The sections as they stand are as follows:

(u) "scientific research" means any activity in the field of natural or applied science for the extension of knowledge;

(v) references to expenditures on scientific research include all expenditures incurred for the prosecution of, or the provision of facilities for the prosecution of, scientific research and reference to scientific research relating to a business or a class of business include any scientific research that may lead to or facilitate an extension of that business or, as the case may be, business of that class.

It is generally recognized that the productivity of many industries in this country might be increased by the application of scientific research. In this connection Canada during the years has lagged behind other countries which could be named. No doubt the purpose of defining the term "scientific research" and also of making provision that amounts expended in connection therewith should be deductible, is to improve the productivity of industry in this country by permitting of research taking place. But the section as now worded applies only to natural and applied science, and as it now stands, I submit, does not go as far as it should to make effective the intentions of those who have drawn it. The purpose, as I say, is to increase productivity by means of research. Productivity and its increase depend on two matters. The one is technological, the standards of plant and equipment and the utilization thereof; that is now covered by the amendments suggested in this bill. But the second factor is as important, if not more important, namely the investigation into the efficiency of the worker with a view to increasing his enterprise and his success. It is a psychological matter; it is a matter which is not comprised within the terminology of this section. This definition of scientific research takes into consideration the technological side but not the matter of the human element; and my submission is that if it is the intention, as it must be, of the department to permit of scientific investigation in order to increase production, it should also make provision for an investigation into causes—psychological causes, if you will—which explain such matters as absenteeism, elements of behaviourism, and the like. It has been said that as far as accidents in industry are concerned, all that this will permit will be an investigation into the causes of accidents, without permitting scientific investigation of the reasons why workmen act in certain ways which result in accidents, and it is in the spheres of psychology and behaviourism that science believes there can be a substantial reduction in the number of accidents.

Dalhousie university has done a great work in this connection, in investigating not the technological end of it, but the scientific end in so far as the mind is concerned. I submit that if we recognize that much can be done to increase production by scientific investigation, we should also recognize that the whole field should be available to industrial research and give it the right to make deductions from its income in furthering that very necessary work.

It might be said that the definition is the same as it is in the United Kingdom. That is often given as an explanation in this house for not making changes. But the situation in the United Kingdom is very different from the situation in Canada, for over there, numbers of outstanding leaders in industry and in business have set aside large sums of money for investigations such as this. We all know of the investigations in this connection which have been carried out by endowments created by Lord Leverhulme, also the work which has been done through grants made by Lord Nuffield, the motor car manufacturer. No such endowments have been made in Canada. I therefore suggest that consideration be given to amplifying the definition of "scientific research". To that end, and to make the provision effective, because as it now stands "scientific research" is narrowly defined and non-inclusive, and I submit will be almost non-effective in the carrying out of the purposes which the bill has in mind unless the definition is widened sufficiently to encourage investigation into these psychological matters, I wish to move an amendment to the definition of "scientific research" in section 1, paragraph (u), by adding thereto the following words:

and includes research in problems related to the working conditions of the employee in the taxpayer's industry.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to commend the hon. member for Lake Centre for raising this question—

Mr. MARTIN: I raised it too.

Mr. GILLIS: It is taken for granted that in progressive measures of this kind the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour would naturally be in the forefront. However, I am following the hon. member for Lake Centre. He made an excellent presentation with respect to this paragraph and I think it should be changed in accordance with the amendment. After reading over the bill I had exactly the same reaction to this particular paragraph as the hon. member for Lake Centre. For years we have had an arrangement whereby many concessions were made by the government for the purpose of expanding industry. I suggest that the time has come for us to interest ourselves in this field. Many universities in Canada have been carrying on research into industrial relations with the view of improving conditions in industry itself, particularly for the employees. They have done this at a great disadvantage because of lack of funds. The Carnegie institute and other benevolent organizations make sums of money available. It should not be placed on the basis of charity. If we are prepared to enhance the future of industry from the technological standpoint we should consider the human element. Dalhousie university has done great work in that direction, and so has St. Francis Xavier, largely at their own expense. If the provision contained in the amendment were included in the bill to encourage the industries of Canada to contribute to the universities that are carrying on this work, and if it were permitted as a deduction for taxation purposes, there is a chance that we might be able to get the funds from industry itself to meet this very necessary need. I am convinced that if this had been done ten years ago in Canada we would not have the Montreal strike on our hands to-day, or the shipyard strike, or the unrest that we have across the country. I believe that educational research into relieving conditions, promoting the health of the workers, clarifying in the minds of the employers and in many instances the employees what should be proper bargaining arrangements, would pay dividends. I am pleased to be able to support the hon. member for Lake Centre and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour in this matter. I do not think this should be a matter of politics. It is a step forward and a step in the right direction. Without labouring the point I suggest that it should receive the unanimous approval of this committee.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should like to put forward the reasons why it is felt that this suggestion could not be accepted. As hon. members of the committee probably know, the suggestion has been made to the minister and has been very carefully considered. The first point that I wish to make is that the proposed addition to the definition of research within the meaning of the section includes research in problems related to the working conditions of the employees in the taxpayer's industry. That and the definition as it stands are not mutually exclusive. In other words, if research into working conditions can be brought within the meaning of science, either natural or applied, then I take it it would come within the terms of the definition as it stands. The difficulty, of course, is where to draw the line. I would not be particularly afraid of employers making contributions, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South has indicated, to genuine research to improve working conditions if I were absolutely sure that that privilege would not be abused. But, after all, research of that kind, if you include it in the category of scientific research, might well be extended to pseudo-research into marketing activities to improve the sale of products, advertising, promoting, any form of activity of that kind which might lead to expanding or increasing the employers' business.

As the hon. member for Lake Centre has pointed out, the section is similar to that in the English act. The definition of scientific research which we have taken is, I think, very similar to the definition contained in the English act. It is a new departure for us, and I think it was a new departure for them. We are allowing a deduction from taxable income; in other words, we are saying the taxpayer's money or the money which would otherwise be paid in taxes may be used for these particular purposes. In taking a new step of that kind I think we should be pretty careful to see that it does not lead to abuse, particularly when the tax rates are as high as they are at the present time, which of necessity creates a pretty strong incentive to include as an expense anything which can possibly be included. The provisions of the section do not exclude any expenditure which can qualify as necessarily incurred for the purpose of earning the income. Of course it has no effect on donations which an employer may make for charitable or educational purposes. It may well be—I do not know—that an association or a group may be formed for the purpose of conducting research into labour relations or something of the kind, and that a donation to that type of organization might qualify as a charitable donation.

I merely wish to emphasize the point that the proposed amendment is an addition to a privilege which now exists, whereby the employer may deduct an outlay necessarily incurred for the purpose of earning income, and is an addition to a privilege which he now has of making donations for charitable or educational purposes. I feel and I believe that the minister feels that when we are introducing this provision into the law for the first time it would be dangerous to extend the definition beyond the scope "natural or applied science," which, after all, is a pretty clear, well-defined and easily understood field If we extend it, as suggested in the proposed amendment, to research in problems relating to working conditions, which I grant is very desirable, it seems to me that in logic we should extend it to a good many other problems which may and do arise in connection with industry and which are of equal importance to labour relations.

Mr. CORMAN: What about farming?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, we are considering scientific research in connection with industry generally. As far as I recall, that covers the reasons for which it was felt that in introducing this new section for the first time the government could not go beyond the definition of scientific research as including only natural or applied science We felt, too, that we were following a pretty good guide. Of course we do not have to follow it slavishly, but we thought we were following a good example in following the definition contained in the English act, where they were experimenting with the same thing.

Just to conclude the point in regard to the English act, my hon. friend mentioned that a number of public-spirited citizens in Great Britain have made large donations or created large foundations for investigating these problems. I believe that is true; I have heard of it. I do not know, but I do not imagine those donations were deductible for income tax purposes; I would be rather inclined to doubt it. But of course it is open to any individual or any corporation in this country to follow a similar course. The government felt, however, that in adopting this special provision, making this special concession in the act for the first time, it should restrict its application along the lines I have indicated; and the purpose, as I have suggested, is to make sure that it would not be abused.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then would the parliamentary assistant be prepared to agree that it should be deductible provided it is made to a university, in order to overcome the difficulty he suggested a few moments ago that moneys might be turned over to a group which might be set up for that particular purpose, and thereby permit of evasion of taxes? Would he be prepared to accept an amendment to cover the situation as I placed it before the committee, provided the moneys were paid to recognized Canadian universities?

Mr. ABBOTT: Subject to correction from my legal friends, my understanding is that a payment made to a recognized university in Canada by a corporation, for whatever purpose, would be classified as a deductible amount under the section of the income tax act relating to payments or donations to charitable or educational institutions. Of course there would be the limitation of five per cent in the case of a corporation or ten per cent in the case of an individual; but subject to such limitations it would be perfectly open to any individual or any corporation to make a donation to a recognized university, to which strings could be attached or not, as the donor saw fit, as to what the university should do with the money. I think it is clear that under the provisions of the act such an amount could be deducted from the gross income for the purposes of taxation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That would be subject to a limitation which does not prevail under this section.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: In supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We must discuss the amendment, which is the only thing now before the committee.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. gentleman is discussing the amendment.

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe some of the items of expense mentioned by the parliamentary assistant, such as marketing research, already are properly chargeable, even though the research be done by an outside organization. That is a form of expenditure which is not only warranted but is highly desirable in view of the fact that in order to provide employment we will want to open up markets for many new products, and new markets for old products. I should like to point out to the parliamentary assistant that the work—and I presume it was a highly desirable work—carried on by the present Prime Minister of this country during the last war, in the matter of research into industrial relations, was a contribution to the earning power of the corporation for which he was doing the work, as well as a contribution to the greater production of goods. That work, I suspect, provided much of the basis for the Prime Minister's book "Industry and Humanity". Certainly I think it would be his judgment that research of that type should be properly chargeable as an expense, and that this definition should be amended to permit work such as was carried on by the present Prime Minister during the last war to be properly chargeable as an expense of conducting business.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree with my hon. friend that a great many of the items to which I referred would be properly deductible as expenses. I prefaced what I had to say by pointing out that the proposed amendment adding to the definition of scientific research did not exclude the possibility of work of this kind coming within the definition if it were scientific in character; and I also pointed out that it did not exclude any expenditures which could come within the definition of an expense of the business, wholly and necessarily incurred for the purpose of earning the income. What I am reluctant to do is extend the definition of scientific research, which is now restricted to natural and applied science, to the rather more indefinite field of labour relations, employer-employee relations, marketing, efficiency and so on. Frankly, as I have said before, in introducing new legislation of this kind, really for the purpose of stimulating and encouraging scientific development in the generally accepted meaning of that term, the minister is not willing to extend that to what could be a very much wider field. Certainly I feel that we should try this for a year at any rate and see how it works out, see what is involved, before we attempt to broaden this definition of scientific research in the way I feel the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre would broaden it.

At this point, unless someone else wishes to speak on the amendment, I feel that strictly speaking it is out of order, for the reasons I put forward the other evening in connection with another amendment. I believe it is out of order in the sense that it would affect the revenue if the number of items which could be deducted from gross revenue before calculating tax were increased.

Mr. GILLIS: I am disappointed at the attitude of the parliamentary assistant. As I said a moment ago, the finance department of this government has been very generous during the last four years in making it possible for industry throughout Canada to promote its own interests. There is never any quibbling about that. It is said that we are following the lead of Britain in this connection, but there is absolutely no comparison between the two countries. Labour relations in Britain are pretty well defined. It is a much easier country to organize; labour has its own universities there. Several very prominent lords and dukes contribute a large portion of their income to research into labour relations; I have their names here, though I am not going into that point. We have no people of that type in Canada, and we have great difficulties in organizing the workers from coast to coast in this country. It seems to me that in every matter of this kind that comes up the point uppermost in the mind of the finance department, at least, in making its decisions is to teach industry how to wring more out of the hides of the workers without giving those workers an opportunity to protect themselves.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, that is not fair at all; there is no such thing.

Mr. GILLIS: We are not asking much in this instance. Very little is being asked in this amendment; it applies only to universities such as Dalhousie and British Columbia which have been carrying on this work without assistance. The amendment asks that where an employer is sufficiently interested to make a contribution to one of those universities for the purpose of carrying on research into health conditions of workers, and many other problems, the public-spirited employer who is willing to do this for a university should be given an allowance for taxation purposes.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that can be done now. It is already in the law.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not think so.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will allow me: If it is an investigation into health conditions, I am certain that such investigation would come clearly within the definition of scientific research, pure or applied. For instance, an investigation into conditions relating to silicosis in a particular industry would be included. Science as contained in the expression "scientific research" means any activity in the field of natural or applied science for the extension of knowledge. That is pretty clear. Perhaps we could have the views of the hon. member for York West, who has had scientific training.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, I had not quite finished. It is covered to some extent. The Department of Pensions and National Health make small appropriations each year to carry on research in respect of the matters mentioned by the parliamentary assistant. But this amendment is aimed at giving industry the necessary incentive to go into the matter for themselves. It is for the support of public-spirited organizations which are in a position to carry out the necessary research, but have not the required funds. There are small government departments fooling around with such things as silicosis, but their investigations are not complete. No one can do the job better, and no one knows the job better than the industrialist himself provided he can have this small concession which would help him to make the proper examinations.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): That does not include C.C.F. propaganda.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Oh, that is funny.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not funny at all; it is ignorant.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): What does the hon. member think I said?

Mr. GILLIS: We are discussing a very serious question.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Then I am sorry I mixed it up for the hon. member.

Mr. GILLIS: The amendment was moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour, who has some knowledge of problems of this kind, agrees that something should be done toward extending the provisions of this paragraph. In fact common sense would dictate that this provision be made. I know myself that for the last twenty years there have been people across Canada just sitting around in little corners, without anything to work with, but trying to carry on this work. We merely wish to extend the same privileges in the field of research to the working people of this country who produced the wealth. This paragraph makes provision for industry to carry on technical research and development. I think the development of the people who work in industry is just as necessary as the development of speedy methods—because that is all we have got out of it in the past. It is time we began to consider the human element in industry. As the hon. member for Rosedale pointed out, twenty-five years ago the Prime Minister wrote a book entitled Industry and Humanity—and he did a good job of it. But I am reasonably sure he did not do it on his own; a good deal of research was necessary. I am reasonably sure he was assisted in that. The thing we are asking for in the amendment is the very thing the Prime Minister emphasizes all through that book—consideration for the human element in industry.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish for one moment to minimize the importance of study and research into the questions referred to by the hon. members for Cape Breton South and Lake Centre. I say however that that is foreign to the proposal put forward here. Here we are suggesting that in order to encourage scientific research the taxpayer should be allowed to deduct from his income the amount so expended. Now, if work of the kind referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre and by other hon. members comes within that definition, then of course it can be deducted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, does it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would say in certain aspects it does not. And I say it does not because I do not think it is in the realm of science, pure or applied. If we wish to extend our taxation provision to include contributions or payments for the study of employer-employee relations, well and good. I should think myself that a considerable amount of expenditure made by individual employers for that purpose could very well come within the description of expenses necessarily incurred for the purpose of earning the income. I should think it would not need any very elaborate provision in the Income War Tax Act to spell out that type of work. But in any case I suggest to the committee that it does not come within the same field of scientific research. It is research, investigation and study, if you wish, in the field of employer-employee relations. But that is not a division of scientific research, at any rate, which was contemplated in this proposal. I should think a very large amount of expenditures along lines urged here to-day might very well form part of the expenditures of an employer which could be charged by him as expenses wholly or necessarily incurred for the purpose of earning the income. I feel it is not desirable to tack on to the definition set out in the bill, which deals with scientific research as any activity in the field of natural or applied science for the extension of knowledge, the one addition of research into problems relating to employer-employee relations. If it comes within the definition of scientific research, well and good; but if it does not, it seems to me it is a different subject altogether.

Mr. MARTIN: I wish to say only a few words in this matter, because my name has been mentioned several times. It will be recalled that about two weeks ago I brought this matter up, when the resolution was being considered, and asked whether the particular project which Professor Richter of Dalhousie university had in mind would come within the resolution then before the house. While I did not ask for an answer, my observation was worded so as clearly to imply that in the administration of the matter covered by the resolution it might be extended to the particular work which Professor Richter hopes to have undertaken.

In any event the discussion we have had to-day will do a great deal of good, because it has brought to the attention of the committee at long last the necessity of doing something in the field of employer-employee relations. I believe the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, no mean lawyer himself, has indicated that there is the opportunity of considering this matter as an expense wholly necessary for purposes of earning the income. Knowing the progressive nature of the deputy minister, I have no doubt that he will look sympathetically upon the work being done at Dalhousie. This matter is important. I have had considerable discussion with Professor Richter on this matter and I think the problem which confronts him will commend itself to the committee.

We are in the pioneering stage of labour organization in comparison with the United Kingdom and other places. We want to put labour-management relations upon a satisfactory basis whereby the worker will be sure of beng guaranteed his rights as well as of having an opportunity to shoulder his obligations. We are away behind some other countries. In the United States there are schools of industrial relations that are of tremendous help to the workers' movement and to that country, and we must have that kind of encouragement in Canada. Here is an academic man who has had considerable experience in the maritime provinces and who wants to do something very special, not only for the workers but for an orderly relationship between workers and management, something which in turn is related to government. I think this matter should be encouraged to the full.

How did he go about it? He said, "I have no money to do this work, which is important," and he addressed himself to particular industries and asked for assistance. They have taken the attitude that they will help him, provided they get a deduction for income tax purposes. I do not commend that particular attitude which makes it a condition that they get an income tax deduction. I would much rather that they saw this as a matter over and above the realm of income tax deduction, as something that will enhance their own particular business as well as improve the problem generally.

In my part of Ontario at Western university, through its affiliated college of Assumption, there is a school where labour-management relations are being taught. I know what they have been doing. At the university of Toronto, my own university, they would like to extend their work in this very important field. I suggest that the loophole suggested by the parliamentary assistant, namely, the consideration of this as an expense wholly necessary for the earning of the income, be used. When we think of the amount of money spent by industry in pure research, perhaps not too much, in advertising and in all that sort of thing as compared with the small amount spent by industrial plants in trying to improve labour-management relations, I felt that I must add my voice in support of this matter. That is why I have risen.

I feel that labour-management relations in this country should be on the most satisfactory basis possible, one where the workers will be given every opportunity of organization as a means of protecting themselves and at the same time an opportunity of sharing in the responsibility of the management of the industry in which they are employed. I think nothing but good could come out of a very generous interpretation of this section by the deputy minister. I strongly urge that in making his decisions in the future he continue to earn the generous reputation he has won for himself.

Mr. GILLIS: Does the hon. member think this would enable the deputy minister to make a decision to include the provision we are talking about?

Mr. MARTIN: I understood at the outset that there was no answer given to my question because of its wording, but I then understand there would be no question that under

"scientific research" this matter could be brought in. If there has been a definite ruling against that view, I would say that it was stretching or altering the meaning of the phrase "scientific research." I would think that "scientific research" is sufficiently broad to include this kind of proposal. However, if a decision has not yet been made I think if I were sitting down with the deputy minister and able to argue with him for a few minutes I could win him over. But assuming that I could not, I would then resort to the argument that this should be considered as expenses wholly necessary for the earning of the income. If he did not concur in that argument, I would proceed under the provision for grants to educational and charitable institutions. In that instance you would be limited to five per cent. There is the difficulty. I would prefer to see the matter dealt with unambiguously here. However, if that cannot be done I do hope that there will be an interpretation along the lines I have indicated to permit this important work being carried on.

Mr. ADAMSON: The matter of silicosis was brought up by the parliamentary assistant—

The CHAIRMAN: We are dealing with the amendment having to do with labour-management relations.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is exactly what I am talking about, Mr. Chairman, if you will bear with me. Coming as you do from a mining district, you will know that silicosis is an industrial disease. Doctor Robson and Mr. Denny carried on experiments in silicosis at the McIntyre mine, as a result of which experiments aluminum therapy was developed. It is thought that with the use of aluminum therapy silicosis will become almost an extinct disease. I would think that is paramount as a scientific development. If we can destroy or eradicate a serious industrial disease, then every encouragement should be given to the work.

Mr. ABBOTT: That would clearly be considered in connection with this section.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am glad to know that because I think it is vitally important.

I should like to refer to another piece of scientific research which also had to do with mining and industrial conditions. I refer to the rock bursts which have occurred at certain of our deeper mines. A committee was appointed and some experimental work was carried on. Experts were brought in from the deep copper mines in Michigan and from the mines in India, in Mysore and other localities, to try to solve this problem of rock bursts in our Ontario mines. A definite and scientific study was made with the idea of improving working conditions. I would say that this work of a scientific nature carried on in an endeavour to eradicate rock bursts should come under this legislation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think there would be any question about that.

Mr. ADAMSON: You think it would come under it?

Mr. ABBOTT: From your description I think it would be clearly within the provisions.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am very glad. If these rock bursts are eliminated there will be an improvement in working conditions because they have been killing men. Every encouragement should be given by the government to this work in order that everything humanly possible can be done to eliminate this hazard. I must say that conditions have improved considerably, but there is still some danger. These are conditions that have faced the mining industry. Silicosis is the forerunner of tuberculosis and the patient seldom recovers. It is one of the worst of the mining diseases. Rock bursts are also very serious. These are two aspects of scientific research to improve conditions underground and conditions under which the miners work which are included in the bill, and, I think rightly so. But let us say that you have in some industry bad lighting caused by vibration or something of that sort, and you get a group of engineers in to improve the lighting conditions in your plant. That helps the plant by improving the conditions under which the men work. Surely if one is allowed the other is just as scientific and should be allowed as well.

The Workers' Educational Institution is doing excellent work to bring about better housing and better health conditions. It is working in conjunction with the trades unions, the university of Toronto and the Ontario government and, in my opinion, is doing excellent work. Surely we should allow the scientific work that is being done by the Workers' Educational Institution and by the universities to be included. I understand that the work done by the Nuffield foundation is allowed as a deduction from income tax in Great Britain, and that the work done by Lord Leverhulme is also allowed as a deduction. If they find that advisable in Great Britain I think it would be well for us to do it here, because it leads to greater efficiency to have these private organizations doing research work of this kind instead of having it done by a national organization which would have to set up its own office staff and equipment. They find it cheaper and much more efficient in Britain to have these things done by people like Lord Nuffield and Lord Leverhulme.

Mr. KINLEY: The other day I had a call from Doctor Richter, a professor at Dalhousie university, who is interested in the provisions of this bill for research, and he left with me a little memorandum which I should like to read in order to present the matter intelligently. He says:

It is generally recognized that the productivity of many industries could be greatly increased by the application of scientific research.

We are all agreed on that. The memorandum goes on:

Canada lags in that respect behind other countries. The government bill, therefore, aims at encouraging research by declaring as deductible the expenses for scientific research provided the research is directly or indirectly related to the taxpayers' business. Another restriction is implied by the term "scientific research" as used in the bill: only expenditure for research in the field of natural and applied science is deductible while all types of social research are excluded.

The distinction is arbitrary and unfair and may seriously impair the effect of the clause as a whole. The purpose of the measure is to increase industrial productivity by means of research. Productivity is determined by two factors: one is technological, the standard of plant and equipment and their utilization. The second factor is just as important: the human element in industry, the efficiency of the worker and the contribution which they make to the success of the enterprise.

The bill as it stands is only concerned with the technological elements of production and disregards the human factor. This is not in keeping with the repeated statements of the Prime Minister about the aims of the government's labour policy.

The distinction made by the bill will often prove unworkable and may cause some great injustices. The clause applies, for instance, to research on problems of speeding up production. It denies the tax privilege to research concerned with the effects of the speed-up on the worker.

Research on the technological causes of industrial accidents is covered by the clause, research on the causes of accidents brought about by the behaviour of the worker is excluded. This is all the more regrettable as it is mainly the second group of accidents which, according to expert opinion, is capable of further reduction.

The whole field of industrial morbidity which is concerned with health conditions in a particular industry will have to do without the tax privilege and will probably remain as neglected as it is at present.

The clause as it stands militates against the smaller firms. Large industrial concerns have for a long time through their personnel departments conducted research on the working conditions of the employees and have always regarded the expenses involved as deductible. If, however, smaller businesses join together for that purpose or commission a university to do the research for them, they will be hampered by the present bill.

The proposed amendment attempts to remedy these defects by extending the tax privilege to research on working conditions of employees in the taxpayers industry. The technological and human factors of production are thus treated alike. An unwarranted use of the clause is made difficult by the concise definition of the purposes of research.

The terms used in the government bill are taken from recent British legislation. But conditions in Canada require a different approach. In Britain Lord Nuffield, Lord Leverhulme and other benefactors have made ample provisions for research on the conditions of industrial workers. No such sources for the financing of that type of research exist in Canada and as a result the country lags sadly behind Britain. It is the purpose of the amendment to facilitate the provision of the necessary funds in this country.

[Mr. Adamson.]

I have an amendment here which I understood was to have been submitted by somebody, but I was not in the house at the time and I do not know just what has happened in regard to it.

The memorandum I have read is from this teacher at Dalhousie university, and while I cannot speak with a knowledge of all the facts I should like to see encouraged the research activities of these smaller universities which coordinate the practical and the theoretical, bringing the activities of the worker and the teacher together. That is a splendid thing and they have been doing that at Dalhousie university for the last two years with beneficial results. It seems to me that anything that can be done to forward the search for knowledge, especially on the practical and humane side, should be done, and I hope that the minister will see his way clear to considering this appeal and, after consultations with his officers, that he may be able to bring in something to meet the conditions outlined in the memorandum.

Mr. LITTLE: The hon. member for Cape Breton South has brought up the subject of silicosis. A great deal of money has been spent by the mining industries in my riding and in your riding, Mr. Chairman, on research into silicosis. I forget the exact figures but they run into the millions. I think the mines do not always get credit for what they are doing along this line. A year or so ago the statement was made in the house that nothing was done in the way of research by the mines, and it would surprise hon. gentlemen to know just how much has been and is being spent on research by the mines to improve the health conditions of their workers.

I do not think rock bursts can be eradicated altogether, but the mining companies in my district and in your district, Mr. Chairman, where the rock bursts are not quite so bad have spent thousands and thousands of dollars to prevent them. They have the finest machinery to try to indicate where rock bursts are coming and with such success that for the last two or three years no man has been killed from this cause, thanks to these very delicate instruments which scientific workers have produced. I do not think rock bursts can be eliminated; they arise from pressure; the deeper one goes, the more pressure there is from the sides, and this cannot be stopped. But if you can find out when they are coming and get the men out of harm's way you have accomplished a wonderful thing, and I know that no pains are being spared by our mine operators in this direction.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to make this correction: it was not I who raised the question of silicosis.

Mr. ABBOTT: Right. I raised it myself, Mr. Chairman, much to my sorrow I may say.

Mr. GILLIS: What I am concerned about, and what I said was, that we make an appropriation federally for the department of industrial hygiene. Not enough money is appropriated in that field by the dominion to achieve anything. What the provinces are doing is all to the good. I agree with the parliamentary assistant to this extent, that I am reasonably certain that most of the matters raised by the hon. member for York West, and also the question of silicosis, are covered. But that is not the angle from which I was arguing.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe that the parliamentary assistant brought in a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before you rule on the amendment, Mr. Chairman, will you give someone else a chance to speak on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN: Well, nobody so far has spoken on the point of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the point of order—

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Davenport has the floor.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the point of order, the only reason why I did not speak—

Mr. MacNICOL: The Chairman gave me the floor.

Mr. KNOWLES: Speaking to the point of order, if I may, the reason why I did not rise before was that I thought the Chair was ignoring the point raised by the parliamentary assistant.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not ignoring the point of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to a rule which I have cited before, citation 502 of Beauchesne, third edition:

> A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged.

I called attention to that rule in connection with an amendment made in committee of the whole on a resolution on July 19, and, as reported in Hansard, page 5092, you replied to me in these words, immediately after you quoted citation 502:

> That principle applies to the committee on the bill only and not to ways and means.

My point on this amendment is that you did not allow citation 502 as applicable when we were in committee on a resolution; you said at that time that it applied only to committee on the bill, and that is exactly where we are now. We are in committee on the bill, and I submit, upon your own ruling, citation 502 applies to the present situation and that this amendment is in order.

Mr MacNICOL: I gather from what has been said that some objection has been taken to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lake Centre. If it were accepted, paragraph (u) would read, that "'scientific research' means any activity in the field of natural or applied science for the extension of knowledge, and includes", the hon. member adds, "research in problems related to the working conditions of the employee in the taxpayer's industry". I would say that the parliamentary assistant, if he has the authority to do so, would be well advised to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre. It entirely fits in with what I interpret to be the purpose and value of this clause.

When I was home two weeks ago or more, I had occasion to see a man who was long employed at a foundry. Those who know anything about foundry life know that employees too often have been sadly affected as a result of the conditions under which they have to work, particularly in the moulding shop. I know there are those who will say that the moulding shop is conducive to health. That is so in respect of the ordinary small moulding shop, but in the big plants where large machines are used to do moulding work, in spite of every effort of the manufacturers of these large machines to eliminate the effects of rapidly revolving wheels and sand throwers, men have been and are being affected therewith. A man who died recently was found, upon post mortem examination, to have his lungs largely congested with material which had accumulated year after year until it finally caused his death. But the man to whom I started to refer, whom I visited a short time ago, also worked in a foundry, and in spite of every effort of the operators of the plant and the inspectors of the Ontario government to eliminate the effects of internal injuries in foundries of this kind, he contracted a disease which caused him to break out every so often with red spots and compelled him to lay off work. He is now off permanently. After a while his body used to heal up, but the trouble recurred until finally his body was so badly affected in this and other ways, through whatever it was took place in the plant, that he could not carry on any longer. I went to see the workmen's compensation board in Toronto. They are a fine board and are doing wonderful work in the direction of eliminating causes of disease in industrial plants. Away back in the early nineteen-hundreds I was a strong advocate of workmen's compensation and, as I said some days ago, I was very glad to see it finally enacted, I believe in the year 1914. The workmen's compensation board have developed quite a technique of ascertaining causes of disease of men in industry, and I hope their activities will be greatly extended.

Mr. ABBOTT: If I may interrupt my hon. friend, I have been listening very closely to his description, and I believe that work of the kind he is referring to would come within the definition of "scientific research" as contained in the bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: It seems to me that the hon. member for Lake Centre is clarifying the section by having it include research into problems relating to the working conditions of employees.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know the hon. member for Davenport was not able to be in his seat at the time, but I discussed this matter at some length after the hon. member for Lake Centre and others had spoken. I pointed out that I felt the government could not accept the amendment as drafted, but that I thought a great many cases which had been cited by various speakers would come within the definition as it now stands; that is to say, if it were within the language of natural or applied science, and certainly investigations into the health conditions in a specific plant, what was causing disease and so on, when conducted by a properly qualified scientist, would, I think, clearly come within the language of the section, but it is to prevent its being extended to outside associations to conduct general inquiries, let us say, into working conditions as such. I pointed out that it would be impossible to draw the line there; that you would need to extend it into investigations into marketing conditions and that sort of thing. I discussed the question at some considerable length, and I am sorry my hon. friend was not here at the time.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not wish to prolong the discussion—

Mr. ABBOTT: To be specific, I think the things my hon. friend has been describing would come within the definition in the bill as it stands.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am talking from practical experience. I am not talking about something I do not know a good deal about, because I have been connected with the business and know a lot about it. I may have forgotten a lot since I left it. It was a big business, and I saw a lot happen to men that should never have happened to them. I cannot understand why the parliamentary assistant will not include the hon. member's amendment, because it is inclusive and covers what I have in mind. I cannot see that it is being covered by simply saying "scientific research", because it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to protect the working men on that basis.

Mr. ABBOTT: My short answer was that if the research into problems relating to working conditions was scientific research, natural or applied, then, of course, it comes within the provision of the section as it stands. The real effect of the amendment is to extend the definition of scientific research.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that not all to the good?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sorry; I argued this before. Where are we to stop in this thing? It may be important to encourage, let us say, research into marketing conditions or sale problems or efficiency or a dozen other things that arise, how to operate a plant more efficiently, and so on. I am repeating what I said before; a good deal of this work I am sure comes under the heading of expenses necessarily incurred to earn income. If so, the taxpayer does not need to rely on this section at all. He can rely on the ordinary law. The same thing applies to charitable donations; but this is expanding the existing law to encourage research of a scientific character, scientific research, either natural or applied. That is the purpose of this section, and it was never intended to go any farther than science as the term is generally accepted. As I say, it does not extend to things like marketing problems or efficiency engineers, or what have you.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not thinking of marketing problems. I am thinking only of the working men. The difference between my hon. friend and myself is that I have been associated with working men in the plants for many years, and have had a keen knowledge of many other plants manufacturing subsidiary lines of brass, copper, steel and iron. In my experience I have seen men's health being ruined, and they have been unable to obtain any redress because the people from whom they sought to obtain redress have always been able to engage a brigade of lawyers to combat the men and take their hides off, if necessary. The poor man never had a chance until—

Mr. ABBOTT: I return to what I said. If it is investigation into the health of the working men it may come under the head of scientific research.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sure the hon. member will admit that I ought to know something about plants.

Mr. ABBOTT: I not only admit it; I freely concede it.

Mr. MacNICOL: If this section includes allowances to companies or firms they should know about it. They would then develop means of protecting the lives and health of the workingman in their plants, and they ought to be able to deduct the cost of investigations looking toward the protection of the lives of the working men. If this section goes that far that is far enough for me. I agree with the argument of the hon. member for Lake Centre, but if the parliamentary assistant will not accept it he has the power to reject it. I am thinking only of the men in the manufacturing institutions. I am not talking about mines; I am not competent to talk about them, but I am competent to talk about the effect on the health of men in industry. I have seen so much distress amongst working men brought about by the conditions under which they work in large plants that anything I can do to make it easier for them I am always glad to do.

The CHAIRMAN: Citation 551 standing order 60, of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, reads as follows:

It is fundamental principle that no resolution or amendment to increase a charge upon the people can be moved with the speaker in the chair; it must be initiated in committee by a minister acting on behalf of the crown.

That ruling applies also to committee of the whole.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned citation 502 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which is as follows:

A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged.

That, of course, applies to public bills. When I gave my ruling the other day I do not know whether I qualified my statement by saying that it applied equally to private bills in committee of the whole. Citation 500 states:

Though it is the function of the committee of ways and means to impose rather than to repeal taxes, examples of the repeal of taxation effected in this committee are to be found upon the journals. Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee; but these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year.

Citation 501 is as follows:

No augmentation of a tax or duty asked by the crown can be proposed to the committee, nor tax imposed, save upon the motion of a minister of the crown; nor would an amendment to extend the imposition of a tax to persons enjoying an exemption therefrom be now permitted.

There are dozens of decisions that have been rendered by Speakers to the effect that no private member has the right to amend a public bill to increase public expenditure. The amendment we are discussing uses these words: "'scientific research' means any activity"—these are the words on which we must concentrate our attention—"in the field of natural or applied science for the extension of knowledge." I listened attentively to the statements made by the parliamentary assistant in which he said that this phraseology might be almost wide enough to include what is contained in the amendment. At the same time I believe he objected to the fact that he thought the language of the amendment might result in an increase in the expenditure of public money. If it is in order I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant on what he based his argument that it might result in an increase of public funds?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall do it very readily. If the amendment has any meaning at all, in my opinion it is extending the exemption or the deduction. It is extending the class of cases in which the taxpayer may deduct from his income, which would otherwise be subject to tax, certain expenditure which he makes, and thereby in effect it would reduce the amount of taxes which he would pay. That, very briefly, is my submission as to the manner in which it affects the revenue.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May I now speak to the point of order. If what the hon. member says is correct—and I accept his statement that it will extend the scope of tax exemptions—then my submission is that the amendment which I moved is in order under citation 502.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not an expert in parliamentary procedure, as I have said on numerous occasions, I do not know whether or not citation 502 is a precedent which has to be followed. The Minister of National Revenue points out that the language there is, "that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemption be enlarged," whatever that may mean.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre brought up a similar point which I decided a few weeks ago, but perhaps my statement at that time was not sufficiently clear. After listening to the argument of the hon. member for Lake Centre and the statement of the parliamentary assistant, I am sincerely of the opinion that the adoption of this amendment would mean an increased expenditure of public money, and consequently I rule it out of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to say a further word in connection with section 1 of the bill. This section amends section 2 of the act, which is the section setting out the various definitions and terms used throughout the income tax legislation. As a matter of fact, before I finish I should like to offer an amendment that will add a definition to section 2 of of the Income War Tax Act.

I do so because of the discussion we have had already in regard to sleeping-car conductors and sleeping-car porters. The Minister of National Revenue spoke on this matter on second reading, and indicated that the difficulty arises from the wording of the relevant section in the act. That relevant section is section 5, paragraph (f), found on page 13 of the most recent office consolidation. It reads:

> 5. "Income" as hereinbefore defined shall for the purposes of this act be subject to the following exemptions and deductions:
> (f) Travelling expenses, including the entire amount expended for meals and lodging, while away from home in the pursuit of a trade or business.

It is in defining "trade or business" that the income tax division has drawn the line between railway conductors, for example, and sleeping-car conductors. The Minister of Finance admitted that this was a very fine line when he referred to the matter on July 12 of this year. At page 4788 of Hansard he said:

> It may be argued that "trade or business" includes profession or salaried occupation; but here again the income tax division have been thoroughly consistent and uniform throughout in ruling that "trade or business" does not include salaried positions; they regard that as meaning trade or business in a different sense. The line is very fine, but they have tried to draw it between what they called trade or business on the one hand, and salary which is not a trade or business on the other.

Then the minister uttered these further words, which I suggest were an admission that we have a case:

> Most unfortunately it seems to run through the railway employees, and that is the reason for the difficulty which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned this evening. . . .

I still cannot see why the income tax division should not regard the work of a railway sleeping-car conductor as very similar to the work of a railway conductor, as a trade or business; and as such the expenses incurred by the one while away from home should be treated in the same way as the expenses incurred by the other. But if the income tax division has that difficulty it seems to me the only thing to do is take care of it by an amendment to the act. I should like to suggest an amendment defining "trade or business" in such a way as definitely to include all railway running trade employees, whether they are on a mileage, wage or salary basis. It strikes me that the best place to have that definition is in section 2 of the act, and in order to get it there I am moving an amendment to section 1 of bill No. 180, which is now before us. My amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, is as follows:

> That section 1 of bill No. 180 be amended by inserting after subsection (1) (w) thereof the following additional subsection:
> (x) "trade or business" includes employment in any of the railway running trades, whether on a mileage, wage or salary basis.

In the light of what the chairman did with the last amendment I suppose I may as well anticipate that he might not accept this one as in order. If that should happen, I suggest that the Minister of National Revenue give consideration to accepting this amendment and moving it on his authority as minister. When he spoke a short time ago, if I understood him correctly he based his whole case upon the difficulty of interpreting section 5(f) of the Income War Tax Act in any other way than is now being done by the income tax division. If that is the problem this parliament can clear up the difficulty for the income tax division by adopting this amendment. I have said already that if this amendment were adopted it would add another subsection to section 2 of the act, which would define "trade or business" in the manner indicated, which would then have its effect upon the words "trade or business" where they appear in section 5(f).

The CHAIRMAN: I believe the hon. member realizes that this amendment is out of order because of the changes it would bring about in the Income War Tax Act. He qualified his remarks by asking the Minister of National Revenue to adopt the amendment, but as far as that is concerned the amendment is certainly out of order on the grounds I have mentioned.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would you permit either the parliamentary assistant or the Minister of National Revenue to comment on my suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN: Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON: The hon. member suggested that I should move the amendment, but I am not prepared to do so. It would mean granting an exemption on account of travelling and living expenses while away from home to one class or group of salaried workers in this country, and I am not prepared to recommend that one group should receive a benefit under the taxation laws which is not given to other groups paid on the same basis.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thought I protected my amendment against that argument by using the word "includes" rather than the word "means"; in looking through section 2 of the Income War Tax Act I find those words used alternatively, depending on what is desired. By using the word "includes" I did not cut out any other group, but made it definite that in addition to such railway running trades employees as are already included these others, namely sleeping-car conductors and porters, would be covered as well.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course the effect of the amendment would be to override section 6(f) and, by implication, to override the provisions of section 3, which defines "income." As the Minister of National Revenue has pointed out it would, in effect, be providing that a certain class of salaried employees, namely the railway running trades, who are paid on a salary basis, would be allowed to deduct certain expenses which other salaried employees of the country are not allowed to deduct.

The remedy, I should think, if a remedy is necessary, lies with the method of payment. The reason why certain railway employees are allowed to deduct these expenses is that they are paid on a mileage basis, and they are allowed to deduct certain expenses incurred in earning that income. But they do not come within the definition of salaried employee.

As the Minister of Finance has pointed out time and again, since the Income War Tax Act was first adopted in 1917, persons in receipt of salary or ascertained income have never been permitted to deduct expenses incurred in earning the salary. My hon. friend's suggestion is adverse to the rule which has been followed, and I think properly followed since the act was first introduced.

Mr. KNOWLES: The parliamentary assistant suggests that the proposed amendment overrides the effect of section 6, paragraph (f) which states that no deduction can be allowed for personal and living expenses. I should like to point out that section 5, paragraph (f) of the same act states that all travelling expenses, including the amount spent for meals and lodging while away from home, in pursuit of a trade or business, may be allowed.

A further point is that there is nothing in the act about salaried employees not being engaged in a trade or business. Thus the decision that "trade or business" covers people on a mileage or wage rate, but does not cover people doing similar work, who are on a salary rate, has been made by the income tax division, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance himself. My proposal is that since a difficulty has arisen because of a line drawn by the income tax division—

Mr. ABBOTT: That is not quite so. This is a matter of legal interpretation, the legal meaning and use of section 3, which has been interpreted by the courts in England, at any rate, along the lines I have indicated. Section 3 is one of the fundamental sections in the Income War Tax Act, and is the defining section as to what shall constitute income.

Mr. KNOWLES: The distinction is still unfair.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Are we dealing with the whole section, or only part of it?

The CHAIRMAN: I read it all.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Before it carries, it is understood that the discussion on the first section of the bill shall be fairly wide, and that general matters may be brought up.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not too general, I am afraid.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have already discussed to-day the unfairness of taxation on electrical energy in different parts of Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot allow a discussion of that kind to proceed under this section. I am sorry to say that, but my hon. friend placed his views on record in the debate on second reading.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to have a statement from the minister or the parliamentary assistant as to whether they are going to allow the condition to be perpetuated, under which Ontario and Quebec are relieved of taxation, and Nova Scotia is taxed to the extent of a million dollars a year. The city of Montreal and the surrounding territory are relieved of about $6,000,000. Surely there is nothing fair or just in that. I want a statement from the minister in regard to it.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not in order to discuss that matter on this section and, as my hon. friend knows, he is not entitled to demand a statement from me on that now. I can tell the committee this, that this question of the taxation of privately owned utilities companies is not a new one. It has been brought up in the house before. However, the question as to whether privately owned utilities companies will or will not be subject to income tax is a matter of government policy, which will be announced in due course. It is not relevant at the present time.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): It is a condition which is becoming more aggravated all the time. Hon. members are entitled to a declaration from the minister or from the government with respect to it. The question as to the basis of taxation of electricity has been left altogether too long.

Mr. ABBOTT: I rise to a point of order again. If we are to make any headway with this bill I suggest we must stick as closely as we can to the section under consideration. If not, we shall be here forever.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On the point of order, the hon. member for Cumberland is quite right in his view that under section 1 a general discussion can take place. And yet, when the parliamentary assistant starts reading lectures as to taxation—

Mr. ABBOTT: Not at all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I say that this matter could have been brought in long ago. We are placed in the position, as members of the House of Commons, of being asked in the dying days of the session to deal with hundreds of millions of dollars worth of expenditures, and with most important legislation brought down in a rush, so that full consideration cannot be given to it. And yet the parliamentary assistant is endeavouring to read a lecture to hon. members on this side of the house.

The point I am making is this: Here we are in the last few days of the session, being asked to deal with expenditures and with bills with which we have not had time to become fully conversant. There is no necessity for hon. members to become annoyed.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no, I was not annoyed, at all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not an offence that is so uncommon.

Mr. ABBOTT: Appearances were misleading.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We have a very heavy responsibility, so far as these discussions are concerned. They are almost restricted to members of the opposition, hon. members to the left of the chair, who endeavour to assist the government and to see to it that the interests of individuals are protected. The parliamentary assistant should not endeavour to brush hon. members aside simply by suggesting that we are endeavouring to—

Mr. ABBOTT: If I gave that impression I wish to remove it at once. I did not wish to read a lecture to anybody, and I did not intend to indicate any desire to rush anything. But I must point out to the committee that the resolutions on which this bill is founded were laid before the house on June 26. Hon. members have had an opportunity to study them since that date. They have known what the government's proposals in the budget have been since that time.

I am free to confess that the bill was available to hon. members only two or three days ago; but on the other hand lawyer members in the committee will realize that the drafting of a bill of this kind is a task of considerable difficulty, and it cannot be carried out until the resolutions are brought to a final stage.

The resolutions were passed only about ten days ago. I certainly do not wish to leave the impression that I am attempting to restrict discussion. After all, however, we are in committee on the bill and we are discussing the section which deals with exemptions. It may be that I was wrong in saying that the question of complete exemption from income tax for certain types of companies should not be discussed under the bill, although it certainly does not come under any of the specific provisions. It might come under another section.

In any event I cannot allow to pass unchallenged the statement that we are rushing things through. I believe we are trying to expedite business as much as possible. I do not think it is fair to say that this legislation was brought in at the last minute, because the provisions have been known to hon. members for at least six weeks.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Do I understand that it is the wish of the minister, his parliamentary assistant, and the government, that this basis of unfair taxation of electrical power generated by private enterprise and by government plants shall be perpetuated; is that the policy? Users must pay heavy taxation running as high as twenty-five per cent, or fifty per cent when they are served by private companies. That is imposed on industries, agriculture and households served by these companies.

Mr. ABBOTT: I must rise to a point of order. I do not wish to appear rude, but I must ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman, whether it is relevant to discuss under this section of the question of the taxation of privately-owned power plants?

The CHAIRMAN: I must say that I cannot find that it is relevant. I think hon. members will agree that I would be the last person to try to curtail the discussion, but we are dealing with section 1 of bill No. 180. I believe the hon. member for Cumberland made a very strong statement this morning on the case he has mentioned, and I know hon. members of the committee will want to avoid repetition as much as possible. I hope it will be found possible to keep to the section.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I subscribe to your ruling and I appreciate what you say about my position being clear and strong. I ask for a statement from the government or from the minister, representing his own views if he cannot speak for the government, as to the policy of perpetuating this unfair basis of taxation that exacts $1,000,000 from the province of Nova Scotia and $150,000 from my own constituency which is not charged other places in Canada. The small industries in my part of the country have in any event to pay higher costs than those in areas served by great power developments. This is unfair, and I think we should have a declaration from the government as to whether it is their purpose to perpetuate and aggravate this unfairness.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Payment upon retirement.

Mr. KNOWLES: Subsection 7 that is to be added implements resolution 10, the purpose of which was to try to take care of the situation of a married woman having an income just over $660. Under the previous wording of the legislation she and her husband might have to pay more in taxation than was intended.

Mr. ABBOTT: If the income of the wife was $670, the extra $10 would be very much less than the combined tax on herself and her husband.

Mr. KNOWLES: This gives her the right to pay in that $10 and for her husband to retain his married status.

Mr. ABBOTT: Correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: All right; under this heading at the resolution stage I raised the case of the married lady doctor and the married nurse who are also discriminated against and I had hoped that the matter might be covered by a section such as this. I take it that that has not been done. Before the minister or the parliamentary assistant makes a reply on that angle, I should like to call their attention to rule 2 on page 70 of the office consolidation of the act, which states toward the end:

> . . . that a husband shall not lose his right to be taxed under rule one of this section by reason of his wife being employed and receiving any earned income.

As I understood it, it was desired to draw a line between earned income and investment income.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think substantially that is correct. Section 22 of the bill amends rule 2 to which the hon. member referred.

Mr. KNOWLES: But it does not change the part to which I was referring. When we were at the resolution stage I drew the attention of the parliamentary assistant to the case of the married lady doctor receiving fees. She is not regarded as coming under this rule 2, whereas a married lady doctor working for a clinic and receiving a salary is considered to come under rule 2. I have been contending for a change in the legislation to take care of that case, and yet it seems to me that the difficulty is in the interpretation made by the income tax division. If the parliamentary assistant will turn to page 4 of the office consolidation he will find that clause (m) states that "earned income" means salary, wages, fees, and many other things as well. I emphasize the word "fees". I want to know why it is that a married lady doctor receiving fees directly from patients is treated differently under rule 2 from a married lady doctor who works for a clinic and receives a salary. Under the definition on page 4, "earned income" means salary, wages and fees. The same argument applies to married nurses, as between the nurse who works for a hospital on salary and the nurse who takes private cases and receives fees.

Mr. ABBOTT: The part of the rule to which my hon. friend referred which states, "by reason of his wife being employed and receiving any earned income" has been interpreted to mean a wife employed by an employer and paid wages or salary. The nurse or doctor who was operating independently would deduct expenses from the gross earnings, and that is the reason for the distinction. As my hon. friend said, he raised this point on the resolution stage and I answered him at some length as well as I could. I am afraid there is not much I can add to what I said at that tme.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was the matter considered?

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Apart from the technical argument the parliamentary assistant has used in reply to me, has he any moral argument to offer in connection with the case I put to him?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish to repeat what I said before. At that time I said that perhaps this was an unsound provision put in there, but it was inserted because we wanted to encourage the employment of women in war industry.

Mr. JACKMAN: All industry.

Mr. ABBOTT: All industry, if you will, but particularly in war industry. It was found that some of them were not prepared to work if their husbands lost the benefit of the special taxation provision.

Mr. KNOWLES: I suggest that doctors and nurses are particularly necessary.

Mr. JACKMAN: In replying to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the parliamentary assistant said that the original intention was to distinguish between earned income and investment income on the part of the wife. This is clearly a case where that original idea or intention is not carried out, and I submit it is nothing less than faulty draftmanship on the part of the department. It should be changed to include income received by the woman as long as it is earned.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the parliamentary assistant if some arrangement could not be made to take care of the case of a wife who receives income less than $660 from Great Britain after paying income tax there? I brought to his attention the case of a wife getting an income of about $800 from Great Britain upon which she had to pay a tax there of $300. She was really getting less than $660 in Canada, yet here she had to pay tax on the basis of the full income payable to her in Great Britain. That means that under this provision she would still have to pay approximately $200, although she was receiving in Canada only about $300 or $400.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend spoke to me about that the other day, and I had hoped to have looked into the particular case to which he referred, but I must apologize to him because I have not yet done so. I have his representations, and I will discuss the matter with the officials and see what administrative action can be taken in a case of that kind.

Mr. GREEN: It does seem to me very unfair that she should be taxed in that way.

Mr. ABBOTT: I'll have it looked into.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the parliamentary assistant a question with respect to subsection 6 of section 2? Am I right in understanding the subsection to mean that where a man has served a company for a long time and then retires and is given a gratuity of, let us say, $750, for taxation purposes he will be taxed to the extent of one-fifth of that amount, or $150 in five instalments?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is spread over five years. As the law now stands, it is all taxable in the year in which it is received, but it was felt that this worked an undue hardship in a great many cases. This was discussed at some length on the resolution stage. An amendment put forward at that time proposed that it should be based on the expectancy of life. The provision now is this. Let us say the amount is $1,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Take my figure of $750.

Mr. ABBOTT: We will take $1,000 because it is a little easier to divide by five. It would be taxable to the extent of $200 in the year in which it was paid and in each of the four years thereafter if the recipient lived. It would be spread over the five years. It would be considered as taxable income only to the extent of one-fifth of it in each year.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just one further word to the discussion we have had on subsection 7 of section 2. Since we are not going to get through this bill to-day, will the minister give further consideration to amending section 22 when we come to it by deleting the words "being employed and" in the last two lines. That would cover the case of the married lady doctor and the married nurse. I do not ask the parliamentary assistant to reply now. I would rather he would think it over.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will bring my hon. friend's representations to the attention of the minister.

Mr. JACKMAN: Since the department has not seen fit to change that subsection whereby any lump sum given to an employee on retirement is to be spread over five years instead of ten years or on life expectancy, I just want to say that as it stands it is nothing but a rank injustice to a small class of Canadian taxpayers.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Service pay and allowances.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the parliamentary assistant let me know on what resolution the rectification of the present injustice was based?

Mr. ABBOTT: There was no resolution covering the provisions of subsection 1 of this section relating to the armed services. The effect is to put male and female members of the services on the same basis.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is it necessary to introduce a resolution preceding a provision of this kind? What is the procedure in that regard? This is a rank injustice.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not an expert on procedure, but I understand that the general resolution is sufficient in law to justify any amendments which the government may see fit to make. In practice, however, the custom has grown up of outlining in some detail the major amendments which it is proposed to make in the form of separate resolutions. Subsection 1 does not impose any new tax but just provides relief, so that for that additional reason I think the amendment could be made in the bill itself without the necessity of preceding it by a resolution. That applies only to subsection 1.

Mr. GREEN: This question of taxation of service pay and allowances brings up the question of taxing the members of the auxiliary services overseas such as the Y.M.C.A., the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army and the Canadian Legion. I think the present situation is very unfair to these men. As I understand it, they are taxed on four-fifths of the money they receive, although in Normandy and in Italy they are actually with the invading troops in the Canadian army who, of course, pay no income tax at all. I know that some consideration was given to this question, and I do not wish to take up time to-day in discussing it further, but I do think the present situation should be remedied, and it could be done by order in council. I cannot for the life of me see why these men should be taxed at all, especially those who are with the invading forces. Can the parliamentary assistant tell us what the present position is?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I touched on this when we were discussing the resolution. The matter has received extensive consideration. I have also considereed it personally. I took part in conferences with representatives of the auxiliary services on this question. Briefly, why complete exemption is not granted to the auxiliary services is that in no case is complete exemption granted under the Income War Tax Act to a person with the status of a civilian. We do not grant exemption to the merchant seamen or to the ferry pilots, although they are engaged in a very hazardous occupation, because they have the status of civilians. If the auxiliary service people were service personnel, as I understand they are in the United States, they would automatically benefit from the exemption which is given to service personnel, but after the fullest consideration it was decided that in order to maintain the line of distinction between service men and civilians they should not be completely exempted. There are only about 200-odd involved, and they are treated on substantially the same basis as the officers of the merchant navy and the ferry pilots. It was done by order in council with respect to the merchant navy and the ferry pilots, because it was felt that this provision need not be included in what is a permanent taxing structure.

Mr. GREEN: In effect these men are in the forces. The men in Normandy or Italy cannot be treated as civilians.

Mr. ABBOTT: The army can cure that very easily by taking them into the army and making them members of the forces, but I am advised that the auxiliary services do not wish to be included officially as a part of the armed forces. I was told that at the conferences of which I spoke. The men of these auxiliary services are given pension privileges and other benefits. However, their legal status is that of civilians, and the income tax act has never granted complete tax exemption to any class of civilians.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that civil servants who go overseas are protected against the tax by getting an additional allowance.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no information on that.

Mr. GREEN: That is what I am told, and I think they should be protected too, but surely these men of the auxiliary services who are actually with the fighting troops should get the same consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: They have received special consideration, and the consideration which has been given was decided upon after, I can assure my hon. friend, the fullest discussion.

Mr. GREEN: I know, but the auxiliary services are not satisfied and the men serving with them are not satisfied. What is the situation with regard to dominion civil servants overseas?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I have not any information as to that. I would have to make inquiries and see if I can find out. I am not quite clear; did my hon. friend say that they were receiving some special non-taxable allowance or something of that sort?

Mr. GREEN: The living allowances they get are not taxable, or the expense allowances.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course my hon. friend knows the law is quite clear on the point. The section was amended last year or the year before.

Mr. GREEN: I believe the effect is that they get compensation for the tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know of any special treatment given to any special class of civil servants. The officials point out to me that the officers of the auxiliary service forces do not take into account as taxable income their living allowances. There is a provision, subsection 4 of section 3 of the act, which reads:

> Provided however that the living allowance paid to persons who are serving outside of Canada but are maintaining a self-contained domestic establishment in Canada and who are either employees of the government of Canada or members of the Canadian naval, military or air force in Canadian active service forces shall not be deemed to be taxable income up to such an amount as may be determined by the minister in his discretion.

The auxiliary service forces benefit from the same sort of provision in that the proportion of their pay which represents living allowance is not included in the amount subject to tax, and I think that either one-third or twenty per cent of their actual pay is treated as a war risk element and is not subject to tax.

Mr. GREEN: Their allowance, I believe, is lower than the allowance payable to the civil servants?

Mr. ABBOTT: It may be, but I do not know.

Section agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 1—Deductions for superannuation or pension fund.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the parliamentary assistant explain paragraph (g), subparagraph (ii)? Does that mean that the employee can contribute $300 in respect of previous years before he came under the plan?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. That is to take care of the cost of the plan, which, let us say, is found to need additional moneys. The employer can make contributions to the plan in order to make it actuarially sound; those are allowed. This section allows a similar contribution to be made by the employee up to the amount of $300 a year.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is in addition to the current $300?

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, quite; it is in addition to the current $300, and if they came in late or something of that sort, and wanted to make up previous contributions, they could do so to the extent of $300 a year.

Mr. JACKMAN: Do I understand that the employer for the current year can contribute $300 in respect of the employee which the employee does not know about? As far as taxation is concerned the employee can contribute $300 which is also deductible. This provision allows him to put in a further $300, over a series of years, if he wishes, in order to make up any deficiency on his part in respect of the fund; in other words, $300 from the employer which the employee gets the benefit of although he does not know anything about it; and now the employee is allowed to contribute $600 from his received income and pay no tax whatever on that in order to make up the back portion of the fund and keep it running? I must say it is quite generous, although I am not objecting to it.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend's summing up is quite correct.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4 subsection 4—Unusual medical expenses.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has already spoken about this. This is a clause where, in spite of charges to the contrary, the government has not only listened to representations which have been made by all sides of the house but acceded to them in some respects. If the committee will bear with me for a moment—it is one minute to six o'clock—I should like to conclude this section. The government has done this in three ways.

First, it has lowered the floor from five to four per cent, largely to take care of matters which were raised, such as drugs, some travelling expenses and the like.

Then, the upper limit, which was not touched on by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, has been increased fifty per cent. In other words, the ceilings have been increased from $400 to $600 in the case of a single man and from $600 to $900 in the case of a married man, with a corresponding increase of $150 for each child; and certain items such as artificial limbs, spinal braces, braces for limbs, and aids to hearing, have been included, the reason being, as suggested by a number of hon. members, that these were felt to be a type of special aid which was particularly expensive and which could be looked on as being an unusual expense and coming within the general theory of the benefit which is conferred therein. I hope that the section as it now stands will provide a further measure of relief in these difficult cases.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKES AT HALIFAX AND MONTREAL—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the serious situation created by the strikes now in progress at the Halifax shipyards and on the tramway system in Montreal.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been considering the proposed motion of the hon. member and in view of the fact that the business of the house, as indicated last evening, is to be that I leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply, when this matter might be discussed, I think there is sufficient urgency for the hon. gentleman to proceed.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, I hesitated to hold up the house at this stage of the session, realizing that the government desires to get through this week if possible, and I think members of this group join with him in that wish. However, I felt that the situation in Halifax and Montreal, because of the serious interruption of two very necessary war organizations, warranted a discussion at this time of the factors involved in the two strikes mentioned. The Halifax shipyards, a very necessary industry, have been tied up for the past two weeks, affecting some three thousand personnel. In the tramway situation in Montreal, I feel that the tying up of this transportation system affects indirectly every war organization in that city, in that it makes it extremely difficult for a large percentage of the employees in the war plants to get to and from their work. I appreciate the fact that the government has taken some emergency measures in that connection by making army vehicles available to transport as many as possible. Nevertheless there is still a serious interference with the operation of war industries in the city of Montreal.

The point with which I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, is that these two matters have dragged on for the past couple of weeks. There is a possibility that the house will adjourn this week, and I think it is necessary that the government should make some definite pronouncement on their present labour relations regulations as affecting the two situations mentioned. I do not think there is any other agency in Canada which can at the present time decide one way or the other as to the legality or otherwise of the issues involved in the two strikes. I would say particularly for the benefit of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that all during the process of fighting, war labour relations in Canada have constituted one of our most contentious problems. On several occasions the government has passed orders in council which did not solve the problem satisfactorily.

Most of us who are primarily interested in labour problems were pleased when the Prime Minister announced the setting up of a body to take evidence, in order to compile into one labour code the wishes, hopes and desires of those interested in labour relations. Our understanding was that it was to be a labour jurisprudence in Canada. Accepting it in that light we felt that labour laws were being laid down by the national government, and that to some extent we were going to have control of labour relations across Canada, in cooperation with the provincial governments. That was our hope. That was the way we felt order in council P.C. 1003 was to be applied. I did not think there was going to be any room for quibbling on the part of anybody, once the machinery set up by the code was followed out. The natural or common-sense thing to expect was that those concerned would legislate and adjudicate within the terms of that order in council.

In my opinion the situation at Halifax is very clear. On the part of the employers in Halifax there has been a flagrant violation of public authority. For four years the employees in the shipyards have been endeavouring, with every means at their disposal, to lay down a collective bargaining agreement. In the last analysis they followed the terms of order in council P.C. 1003. A government-appointed conciliation board was set up, and within the terms of the labour code decided that the maintenance of union clause and check-off, requested by the employees of Halifax shipyards, was legitimate and desirable. Their decision was rendered accordingly. That, may I say, was a unanimous decision. But the employers at Halifax refused absolutely to accept that unanimous decision of a government-appointed board, with consequent disruption in a very necessary industry.

I know of no agency which can settle that problem in Nova Scotia unless it be the federal Department of Labour. All the legal machinery which can be provided has been set up; a government-appointed commission has made its decision, and the employers have refused to accept that decision. Someone in authority has to make a declaration in the Halifax shipyards case.

The situation in Montreal is somewhat different. To the best of my knowledge, for the past two years all the machinery provided by government legislation has been followed in determining a bargaining agency in Montreal. The point at issue in my opinion is this. Under order in council P.C. 1003 a vote was taken. The bargaining agency in Montreal was determined legally by majority rule, by the employees of the Montreal Tramways union. The Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees was selected. If we stick to majority rule in managing the affairs of this country, then as I understand this code no small groups within the country or within an industry should be permitted the prerogative of carrying on an agitation on the side so as to disrupt and interfere with that which in my opinion is the principle of democracy. This is what happened in Montreal. As I understand it, for the past year the bargaining agency has been interfered with. Disruptive tactics have been carried on within the industry for the purpose of defeating the decision of a majority of the employees of the Montreal Tramways company. I am told further that some of the difficulties and some of the stoppages of work which have taken place were not strikes called by the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees, but rather were promoted on the side. This is done very easily, because I have seen it done on many occasions. It may be carried out at the behest of a company in order to discredit a legitimate bargaining agency forced upon the company by a majority of employees.

In the agreement for which they ask at the present time the union demand a union shop, in order to give them union security, and to place in the hands of the executive board of the union, when it signs an agreement, sufficient authority to enable them to guarantee to the operating company a continued observance of the agreement. If the union officials are going to give that guarantee—and any trade union official who signs the agreement has to guarantee it, and work to that end; otherwise the agreement would be no good—then those union officials must be in a position to exercise some supervision over their membership, along lines of discipline, so as to guarantee the observance of the agreement.

The tramways operators in Montreal take the position that there is compulsion, in that they are demanding a closed shop, and that it is foreign to their set-up. In a statement issued to the press a few days ago, Mr. A. R. Mosher, President of the Canadian Congress of Labour, stated definitely and clearly that what they are now asking for by way of union agreement is already in effect in the tramways organization. For example, they have a benevolent association. Every employee, when employed by the Montreal Tramways Company, is obliged—and remember that this is a company-controlled benevolent association—to sign a card to the effect that he is willing to pay $3 a month to that company-controlled organization. He must do that whether he likes it or not. One of the terms of his employment is that he must be prepared to sign his willingness to a check-off for that purpose. If the Montreal Tramways can set a precedent of making membership within an organization they control obligatory upon anyone receiving employment, surely there is no reason why, in the present situation in Montreal, in which there has been friction and disruption, union officials representing the designated bargaining agency—the agency certified by the government, decided by a majority vote of employee and familiar with the difficulties of administration—should not ask for union security. I say there is no reason in the world why they should not, and that is the point at issue.

I do not wish to labour this matter at great length. The position of the government is this. When it issued order in council P.C. 1003 it definitely decided as to the machinery with respect to union certification, how contracts may be arrived at, and what is and what is not permissible. In the tramways case the employers take the position that the agreement asked for by the employees is illegal under the terms of order in council 1003. The union take the position—some of them sat in on the preparation of this code—that under section 20, subsection 1, the matter is clearly defined. I understand that during the discussion of this clause they were assured by those who drafted it that there was nothing in it that prohibited or prevented the employers and employees from writing agreements that were suitable to themselves.

I think in order to settle this matter, and settle it before the house closes, in order to start these two necessary war organizations in operation again, either the Minister of Labour or the Prime Minister should make a definite declaration in this house that neither the Montreal nor the Halifax situation are beyond the scope of order in council 1003. If the government would make that statement, then the union or the employers concerned would be in a position, if they wanted to take the reverse attitude to test the legality of the situation in the courts. We would at least be moving somewhere.

I know the situation very well in Nova Scotia. In Halifax the question of the check-off is at issue. The employer there is the Dominion Iron and Steel company. They have had check-offs in the whole coal and steel set-up in that province during the last thirty years. If the attitude of that small section of the company in Halifax is sustained, the chances are that the labour relations which have existed for thirty years will be interrupted. I know the steel workers and miners are watching it closely and I do not want to see the industrial set-up of that province disturbed.

My request is that some declaration should be made by either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour in order to give the warring factions a chance to have the legality of this matter decided by the courts.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, having the honour of being one of the representatives of Halifax city I feel that I should say at least a word in connection with this matter. I am going to be quite frank and say that I am not in the same position as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in my knowledge of labour affairs. I have not gone across the country taking part in strikes in various sections, nor have I been actively associated with any trade union. But I do business in the city of Halifax, and I am happy to say that so far as labour is concerned my relations have been very pleasant. I believe I have had and still retain the confidence of labour to a very considerable degree. I want to retain, if not their support, at least their confidence, because I believe it is a good thing for our country to have sound leadership in so far as labour is concerned. This is nothing new that I am saying, because I have always believed it.

I am anxious to see this strike settled as quickly as possible. My approach to this question is a little different from that of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I am not going to deal with the question as it affects the Dominion Iron and Steel company's interests throughout Canada; I am not going to deal with the Montreal situation, but I do want to say that the Halifax shipyards industry has been important to the war effort. It has been an asset to us for many years. I remember during the last great war the splendid work done by the Halifax shipyards and its employees. I remember also the strike that took place, I believe in 1919, following the last war.

Wonderful progress has been made by the Halifax shipyards in the construction of two destroyers for the Canadian government, and they have also done splendid work in connection with repairs. Like many other citizens of Halifax, I am hopeful that that work will continue throughout the entire war period and into the peace.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South has stated that a board was set up and I understood him to say that it made an unanimous finding. My understanding is that that was not so; that there was one dissenting voice, and that the whole question rested on the matter of interpretation. I am not in position to give a legal interpretation, nor would I dare to do so. I have confidence in the ability and knowledge of the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Notwithstanding the fact that there may be some criticism from certain labour circles, I feel that on the whole our present Minister of Labour stands high in the regard of the large majority of trade unions throughout Canada.

We should appreciate the fact that this department has at its head a former labour man, one who for many years has been associated with trade unions and who still holds his trade union card. We are fortunate to have a man of that type, and I think labour should recognize the fact that there is a man of that type at the head of labour affairs at such a critical time in Canada's history.

I should like to say a word with regard to the conduct of the men at Halifax. They have conducted themselves in a splendid manner, and I hope they will continue to do so. It is unfortunate that a strike should take place at Halifax. I am not thinking of the present effect alone; I am thinking of the future. We want to keep all these trained shipwrights and other kindred trades in Halifax. I hope that the port of Halifax will play a great part in the post-war period. I know there will be a large number of ships turning at Halifax and for that reason I want to see these shipyards and other ship repair plants kept at a high state of efficiency in order that we may carry on the trade between Canada and other countries which is so essential to the welfare and future of Canada.

I discussed this matter with my colleague from Halifax and we have both been following the matter closely. I wrote the head of the union at Halifax stating I was anxious to see a settlement made as soon as possible, and I gave the same reasons as I am giving to-day. I would not attempt to take it on myself to place the responsibility on any one particular party. I do not believe that the people who have followed the dispute will agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South that the blame should be put directly on the Minister of Labour or on this government. The machinery which is necessary to look after matters of this kind has been set up. I am sure that the minister and his officials are following closely what is taking place, and it is my sincere hope that the strike will be brought to an end at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, before the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) replies I would like to point out that I have had this matter before the house on two occasions, once at the instance of the United Mine Workers local in Springhill, who have by resolution supported the position taken by the labour organizations in Halifax. They submitted that resolution to me and I placed it before the minister and the house. I also had a communication from Mr. O'Connell, the president of the union in Halifax, protesting against the treatment of their members by the company and against inadequate action on the part of the department and government which I called to the attention of the house. I pointed out that this labour difficulty not only affected the employees in Halifax but was a matter of very great concern to labour organizations in other parts of the province. In the town of Springhill we have a labour organization that has been functioning for many years in a community that is as stable as any mining community in all Canada, with as high a standard of citizenship as you will find anywhere in this country. They have enlisted in this war, as they did in the first great war, in as high percentages as anywhere else in Canada for service in any theatre. But these labour men in Springhill are very jealous of their rights and the principles for which they stand. They are in sympathy and in accord with the action that has been taken by their brother organizations in Halifax. They have asked me as their member to make representations on their behalf, and I have done so.

I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) that nothing could be more unfortunate than to have a stoppage of work on naval ships at this time. It is doubly unfortunate that it should come as we approach the climax of the war, with victory for ourselves and our allies in sight. We all realize how essential it is that there should be a united effort on the part of all that victory should be achieved in the very shortest possible time. There is also the question of setting a standard for all our people in Canada and for our allies everywhere and that our fighting men should know that we are back of them to the full. I am very anxious, Mr. Speaker, that the government make every possible effort and concession in order that these unfortunate labour difficulties may be adjusted without any further delay.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the constructive approach of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), who has been in constant touch with me with reference to the labour dispute in that city, and also of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black). I do not think that I can add much to what has already been said.

For over a generation the American Federation of Labor held a contract with the Montreal street railway company. Then there was a jurisdictional dispute which some say caused a strike or a couple of strikes there. Eventually the present organization, the C.B.R.E. was designated as the bargaining agency, and it is only human that this organization should want to consolidate its position.

Let me say frankly to the house that I am a trade unionist by heritage and conviction. My father was a trade unionist, and my views on compulsion I got with my mother's milk when I was a boy in the old country. I do not believe in compulsion. I do not believe in compulsory cooperation. That is fundamental and I cannot change my ground on that.

So far as the company and the men's organizations are concerned, I have already pointed out clearly that there is nothing than can compel them to come to a mutual understanding and agreement. But what they want me to do as Minister of Labour is to say that the men shall belong to one organization or to another. Frankly I cannot go that far.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South has said that we have had difficulties in the labour field in this dominion. But looking at it in a big and broad way I think it will be agreed by hon. gentlemen that we have had less labour difficulties in this country than there have been in any other of the united nations. Labour difficulties are continually occurring in every country, in the country to the south of us, for example, in Australia, and even in Great Britain, notwithstanding the fact that they are being bombed all the time. But I think it should be said for the trade unions of this country that they have measured up to their responsibilities.

I was in the last war and I do not know what happened on the industrial front in Canada during that war, but I must confess that when I was landing at the Dardanelles I would not have liked to think that people were going on strike back home for what I considered conditions that did not warrant a strike such as is taking place in the city of Montreal to-day. I say that frankly. I think that there is an obligation on both the company and the employees there to settle their differences so that this great metropolitan centre can move ahead and play its part in the war effort.

With reference to the code, it was drafted in cooperation with employers and employees throughout this dominion. The very principle which the hon. member for Cape Breton South has just enunciated was opposed by these two great partners, employers and employees, in the industrial life of this country. They laid down the principle of conciliation, and in conciliation there must be give and take. I know something about conciliation. I was chairman of a grievance committee for fifteen years when I was working in a plant whose president was the father of the present Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson). Relations between employers and employees must be based upon character, not upon the gun, not upon compulsion. I know that Sir John was a pretty tough individual to deal with; he was an old Scottish character. But eventually we got an agreement with the company which exists to this day. It is not a closed shop agreement. The men employed in that industry are probably as well paid and enjoy just as good conditions as any workmen in that calling in this country. I feel that with that spirit of tolerance and good will both the labour disputes which have been mentioned this morning can be satisfactorily settled, but it cannot be done by the state dictating to one side or the other or dictating to the men the organization to which they shall belong. It would be the beginning of despotism in this country if the government should start to dictate to one side or the other. I am trying to be absolutely fair. I hold no brief for the Montreal Tramways company, except that I know people who have been associated with them for over a generation in the negotiation of their contracts.

We suggested arbitration. It was agreed to by the company and turned down by the men. Then we suggested setting up a commission with a high court judge. That was agreed to by the company but turned down by the men. Then I suggested the reference to the supreme court, but the organization insisted on the closed shop aspect of the agreement going into force before a reference to the courts. I think we did everything which was humanly possible to bring these difficulties to a conclusion so that there might be harmony in that particular community.

I have nothing further to say on the dispute except this, that anything which can be done will be done to bring this dispute to a conclusion, affecting as it does an industry so necessary in connection with the successful prosecution of the war.

Let us now review the Halifax situation. There you had a board of conciliation. In that case employer and employed agreed to all the terms of the contract except what is known as the check-off and the maintenance of membership clause. In that case the majority signed a report with these conditions. The employer of course did not want to go along with the check-off and the maintenance of membership. In the city of Montreal the reverse is the case: the employees turned down the report and the recommendations of the conciliation board. There you have the perfect example of conciliation and give and take. I believe in give and take; I have always believed in it; I have always preached it. It is part of my creed that in industrial life you must have that degree of conciliation which made the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act a pattern in industrial relations in this country. A degree of conciliation is necessary. I do not think you can shake an employer by the throat and call him a scoundrel, and expect to make an agreement with him. Neither do I believe that an employer can try to destroy the men's organization and yet maintain industrial harmony. That is elementary and fundamental; and I hope I shall never live to see the day in this country when the government says to either employer or employee, "This is what you have got to do, or else—".

Mr. GRAYDON: I wish to ask the Minister of Labour a question which, I think, everyone across Canada will be asking. It is not enough to have a resumé of what has happened and a suggestion that everything which can be done will be done. What we should like to know is what the Minister of Labour is actually going to do in both these cases. Will the minister tell us?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have done everything I can do.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean that the government feels itself powerless and helpless to do anything in respect to these matters?

Mr. HOWE: Government action can be taken and made known in due course. You are not entitled to ask that question.

Mr. GRAYDON: I just want to tell my hon. friend the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who interrupted to indicate that government policy would be announced in due course, that the question I raised is not only one which I can raise, but one which is most proper and appropriate at this time, and if I did not raise it I would not be doing my duty as leader of the opposition.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Would my hon. friend suggest what the government should do?

Mr. GRAYDON: I tell you this, that this is a new position for the minister to take, because we have here a government charged with the responsibility in respect of this matter, and we have the right to know what its policy is. When we know its policy, we shall have the right to discuss and criticize if we see fit.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): My hon. friend is offering criticism. I ask him, what constructive criticism has he to offer?

Mr. ROWE: You are asking us now?

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean that the government acknowledges its failure and now wants to call in someone else? Surely that cannot be so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): You have no suggestion to make, and you know it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): If this goes on much longer I shall not be able to use the opening sentence I had in mind when I first rose. My opening sentence was going to be that I appreciated the dispassionate manner in which the Minister of Labour, and also those who preceded him, discussed this matter. However it does seem to me there is something which the government could do in connection with each of these disputes. I accept the question of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services as a fair one, and I intend to give my answer to it.

First, may I say that in the Montreal dispute I do not appreciate the minister trying to say, almost every time he deals with it, that it is a jurisdictional dispute. I know the background, which he has given several times, but it seems—

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that it is. I said it was a jurisdictional dispute originally. I did not say that it is now.

Mr. KNOWLES: But the minister by bringing that in is trying to shelve the responsibility of taking a decision with respect to the matter as it now stands.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend does not need to worry about responsibility so far as I am concerned.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister will take the responsibility? That is fine. As I see it, the issue in the Montreal strike is this: is a closed shop legal under P.C. 1003?

Mr. MARTIN: The minister has answered that very clearly.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is just the point we are trying to get at, for that is what the strike is all about. In fact, the reply I am going to make to the question of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services is that if the Minister of Labour will answer that clearly—

Mr. MARTIN: He did.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry, but I did not get it that way. I will ask him now: is a closed shop agreement under P.C. 1003 legal or illegal?

Mr. MITCHELL: If I might say this to my hon. friend, I know it is rather difficult for him to follow trade union procedure—

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. COLDWELL: He is a trade unionist himself.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know that too. But what I said was this, that where there was a mutual agreement, in my judgment the code provides for it where it is mutually agreed upon. In this case the company say, "No, we do not want a closed shop"; and of course they claim that it is illegal.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is not just that the company does not want a closed shop; the company hides behind the position that it is illegal. The union has said time and again that if the government would make a clear declaration as to whether the closed shop is legal or illegal under P.C. 1003 the strike would be settled at once. As a matter of fact there is a dispatch to that effect in this morning's Ottawa Citizen under a Montreal dateline from the Canadian Press. That, I suggest, is the thing which the Department of Labour should do so far as the Montreal strike is concerned; it should declare in very clear terms whether it is legal or illegal under P.C. 1003 to enter into a collective agreement which provides for a closed shop.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit an interruption? So that the discussion may be relevant, may I read for his benefit section 20, subsection 1, of order in council P.C. 1003?

Mr. KNOWLES: I was just going to read it myself.

Mr. MARTIN: Perhaps my voice will carry better if I am allowed to read it:

> No person shall, with a view to compelling or influencing a person to join a trade union or employees' organization, use coercion or intimidation of any kind—

Mr. KNOWLES: "But"—

Mr. MARTIN:

> —but this subsection shall not be construed to prohibit the inclusion of any provision in a collective agreement.

Mr. KNOWLES: We interpret that to mean that it would be legal to include a closed shop provision in a collective agreement.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is a left-wing radical. I think he will agree with this, that the right to disagree in opinion is the basis of human freedom. My hon. friend does not give that to other people, but it is fundamental. Let it sink in.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, I do not know whether my hon. friend is trying to put himself in a right-wing position, or just what the significance of that interjection is. All I am asking is that the government make clear the significance of its own legislation, its own order in council. That is all that the union asks for in Montreal; that is all that President Mosher is asking for: that the question of the legality of closed shop agreements be settled so far as P.C. 1003 is concerned. The minister knows as well as I do, and in fact he has known it longer than I have because he has lived longer—

Mr. MITCHELL: No. You are taking too much credit to yourself.

Mr. KNOWLES: —that there are hundreds of closed shop agreements in this country; and the Winnipeg Free Press, which is one employer I might mention, does not maintain that there is anything undemocratic about the closed shop agreement it holds with the typographical union to which I belong. There is nothing undemocratic about the principle of majority rule. We have it in this house. We who are in this minority do not feel that our rights are undermined because the majority rules.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are not suggesting that the Liberal party should have a closed shop in this house?

Mr. KNOWLES: Majority rule is recognized as basic to democracy and the rights of minorities as well as majorities are protected by that principle. Furthermore, a closed shop agreement is simply a means of guaranteeing to the union which has made a contract with an employer that that contract shall not be undermined by the employing of persons who are not members of the union. That is the reason unions ask for closed shop agreements; that is the reason this union is asking for it in the tramway situation in Montreal. I suggest to the minister that not only is this union interested in the question, but unions of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, as well as others, are also interested in the principle that is at stake here. My contention is that, so far as the Montreal situation is concerned, the step that should be taken by the government is to issue a clear statement that a collective agreement is either legal or illegal under P.C. 1003.

As regards the situation in Halifax—

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask the hon. member a question which may throw a little light, from his point of view, on the Montreal problem? Is he arguing that the government should exercise its authority to compel a closed shop in the Montreal tramways difficulty?

Mr. KNOWLES: Not at all. If the minister would like a little lecture on our position—

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my hon. friend, then, another question. Does he favour the government exercising authority, if it has authority, to compel a closed shop?

Mr. KNOWLES: We favour compulsory collective bargaining, but we do not suggest that the results of an arbitration should be made compulsory, for that cuts both ways.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friends laugh; it shows how little they know about these matters.

Mr. GILLIS: We are trying to find out what you meant when you wrote this, and that is what the public wants to find out.

Mr. MITCHELL: We are trying to find out your principles—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has the floor and must not be interrupted. I must admit that he invites questions but I would ask hon. members to refrain from interrupting him.

Mr. KNOWLES: The position we are trying to point out is that the government has laid down a labour code, P.C. 1003, dated February 17, 1944. A dispute has arisen and workers are on strike in Montreal because a provision of this order in council, found in section 20(1), is not clear. We are asking the government to make the position clear.

I was going to say a word about the situation in Halifax. I wish to correct one statement made by the senior member for Halifax when he accused the member for Cape Breton South of placing the blame on the government for both these strikes. As a matter of fact, in the Halifax situation I think the public generally recognizes, and it is the position we take, that the blame rests upon the employers. We feel on the other hand that in the Montreal situation the blame rests on the government for failing to make clear that provision two weeks before the strike occurred, at which time they were asked to clarify it. In the Halifax situation there has been arbitration and a decision has been made in favour of the employees. The employers have refused to abide by that decision. The minister knows our position. We feel that the pressure of public opinion should compel them to abide by that decision, but otherwise we do not maintain that the government should step in and enforce the decision, because the minister would reply quite properly that that would cut both ways. But if the production of the Halifax shipyards is essential to the war effort and there is a stoppage because of a strike which has occurred as a result of the employers' refusal to accept the decision of the government's board, we suggest that the thing for the government to do is to step in and take over the plant, at least for the time being, so that production can be restored.

And so, in spite of all the interruptions, I hope I have answered the questions put to me by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. My answers are definite. In Halifax, if the company refuses to abide by the board's decision the government should take over the plant. In Montreal, the government should make absolutely clear whether a collective agreement is legal or illegal under P.C. 1003.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): The hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Knowles) obviously did not clearly follow the minister as he spoke. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) made a constructive suggestion in dealing with the matter. He recognized that this was an important matter at the present time and he hoped that the minister would be able to clarify it. The minister made that clarification and I can only repeat what he said. My purpose in rising is to observe that I cannot follow what the hon. gentleman who has just spoken really meant by insisting that the minister should state whether or not, within the terms of this code, it was possible for the fullest contractual powers to subsist on the part of parties who sat down to negotiate a collective agreement. P.C. 1003, recognized by the leaders of labour throughout Canada to be a real step in setting out, in regulatory form, the kind of order one wishes to see obtain between labour and management in this country, is admittedly not a perfect document. It is a document which, when it was announced by the Minister of Labour, was said to be capable of improvement in the light of experience and practice.

When this particular section was drawn, as the minister said, it was drawn not in some corner hole of the Department of Labour. The history of this code is an interesting one, about which enough has not been said in this house. Following the inquiry launched by the then chairman of the national war labour board, at the instance of the Minister of Labour, a full investigation was made into the whole field of labour-management relations. Labour organizations from all over the country were heard, including representations made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and his colleague from Vancouver, over a period of three months, and after that inquiry took place a report was made by the board. That report was carefully considered by officials of the Department of Labour and by gentlemen representing employers and others representing employees. There was the fullest consultation with labour and with employers, as evidenced by the statements of Mr. Mosher, president of the Canadian Congress of Labour, Mr. Bengough, president of the Trades and Labour Congress, Mr. Charpentier, of the Catholic Syndicates, and others. Here was a document setting out the relations between labour and management, a document arrived at after the fullest possible consultation with Labour, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) said when he tabled order in council 1003, and when he thanked labour and mentioned specifically the presidents of the great national organizations and the help they had given the administration in trying to establish at long last, on a national basis, a labour code which would recognize and protect the rights of labour and at the same time extend to labour the opportunity to exercise its obligations. I remember very well when section 20 was discussed with the representatives of labour, and it means exactly what it says. That is why I cannot understand the insistence of the hon. member who has just spoken. Section 20 provides:

> No person shall, with a view to compelling or influencing a person to join a trade union or employees' organization, use coercion or intimidation of any kind—

Labour is the first to recognize the merit of that provision. You cannot use coercion or intimidation, either as an employer or as an employee; but if two parties, sitting down around a conference table, management on the one hand and the workers on the other, carrying out the processes of contract, wish to agree on anything, within the language of this section they may do so.

> —but this subsection shall not be construed to prohibit the inclusion of any provision in a collective agreement.

So that on analysis of what the Minister of Labour said I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will find that he and the minister are in full accord. He would not compel anyone to join a union, nor would the minister. However, he would allow the parties to a dispute or the parties to a collective agreement, workers and management, to sit down and agree upon anything; and the minister has said in regard to the particular dispute at hand that if the management and the workers in the plant at Montreal, or any other plant, wish to have a closed shop, there is nothing illegal about it under P.C. 1003. Can anything be clearer than that?

Mr. KNOWLES: The parliamentary assistant says that if employer and employee wish to agree on a closed shop there is nothing illegal about it, but the question is this: can the employer under P.C. 1003, apart from what he may or may not want to do, refuse to agree to a closed shop agreement on the ground that it is illegal?

Mr. MARTIN: On reflection I believe my hon. friend will see that this question is—I was going to use the word "absurd", but I will say instead that it is not very carefully considered.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is what the strike is all about.

Mr. MARTIN: The Minister of Labour said that under P.C. 1003 a closed shop agreement can be concluded. If the company does not interpret the code as the minister does, or as the workers do, and says it is going to test it in the courts, we have no power to prevent anybody from testing any law in the courts of this land. Speaking for myself I would say the company's position would not be justified by a thorough, careful perusal of this section, but no one in this country can stop any party from saying to the courts, "We do not agree; we dispute that this is an illegal act." That is the right of every free citizen in every free country, and if this company chooses to follow that course the hon. gentleman would be the last to deny them the right to settle the matter in the courts. But the issue is clear. The Minister of Labour has stated what has been the policy of the government through the years in regard to the sanctity of contracts. If people wish to negotiate an agreement covering a closed shop they may do so; under the code there is nothing illegal in such an agreement. I do not think the matter could be clearer.

Motion withdrawn.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC CITY TAXI STRIKE—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF ACTING PROVINCIAL MINISTER OF LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I sent notice of the question I desire to direct to the Minister of Finance. He has stepped out for a moment, but perhaps I may be allowed to ask the question anyway because the matter is urgent and I should like to have an answer in regard to it at the earliest moment possible. Press reports from Quebec city indicate that Hon. Wilfrid Hamel, acting minister of labour of the Quebec government, has taken the law into his own hands and overruled a decision of the wartime prices and trade board, in advising Quebec taxi drivers to commence charging a 35-cent starting rate, and further has advised them to return to work at once. The acting minister is reported also to have bared his fist against federal regulations by saying that in labour questions the province of Quebec is master within its own boundaries, and further stating that he will see that some people in Ottawa understand this. Another pertinent portion of his reported statement—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is another of those questions which have been before the house many times, in connection with the reading of newspaper reports. The leader of the opposition might ask his question without reading the report.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am sorry I transgressed, if I did, but this matter seemed to me such a defiance of the laws of the land that I felt it my duty to bring before parliament the exact words. I feel pretty keenly about it, and I do not mind saying so. Therefore I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, in view of the fact that the provincial minister is reported to have said that he would see that his position was approved by the wartime prices and trade board, what steps are proposed to be taken with respect to this gentleman.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Minister of Finance is, I understand, in the banking and commerce committee. However, as my hon. friend knows only too well, an election is now taking place in Quebec, and if we wait until six o'clock to-night this question might be settled and would not need to be answered to-morrow.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope the Prime Minister is not taking as optimistic a view as that with respect to his party's chances of success.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Too late; you have no party, and no success.

Mr. GRAYDON: And you are fast getting into that position.

FARM MACHINERY

DISTRIBUTION OF PARTS TO WESTERN PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply with respect to a serious situation in the prairie provinces which arises out of a shortage of repair parts for harvesting machinery on farms. I realize I cannot read telegrams I have received, but a fair summary of them would indicate that unless something is done immediately to make repairs available, very large quantities of machinery will be useless for harvesting purposes. It is indicated that the farmers are driving to nearby western towns to get repair parts, but are unable to get them. Will the minister consider sending the controller to western Canada immediately, or in his place some senior executive, to look into the matter? Will he also tell the house what is being done to ensure a reasonable division of whatever parts are available for the repairing of machinery in western communities?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The distribution of farm machinery and spare parts, being a civilian supply, is in the hands of the wartime prices and trade board. The administrator of farm machinery is in charge. Our responsibility in Munitions and Supply ends in supplying of manufacturing facilities sufficient to meet the requirements, on the evidence furnished to us by wartime prices and trade board. The proportion of spare parts to finished vehicles has been increased each year since the war began. This year the proportion has been very liberal. However, I shall be glad to call my colleague's attention to the inquiry made, and pass on to him the suggestion that the administrator be sent to western Canada to look into the situation in person. It is my feeling that this is a situation that can be remedied. Probably it is a matter of maldistribution rather than an actual shortage of parts.

CANADIAN FORCES

SUPPLY OF REINFORCEMENTS TO CANADIAN ARMY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. In view of the announcement that the Canadian Army is now in action in Normandy, will the minister inform the house whether reinforcements for our army will be supplied entirely by Canada, or if the United Kingdom will be called upon to supply some of these reinforcements?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I do not expect the United Kingdom to be called upon to supply reinforcements for Canadian formations or units.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Government employees' compensation—
389. Administration of the Government Employees' Compensation Act, $25,338.

Mr. GRAYDON: I fancy this is the item concerning which there was considerable discussion last session. This matter was mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre and other hon. members. Answers given to the house through orders for returns and questions, as well as information received in the course of debate indicated that a very large sum of money was spent in one direction for the payment of a certain medical doctor in Montreal. Has there been any investigation into the matter; if so, what steps has the government taken to see to it that the amount spent may be kept as low as possible? What were the results of the investigation?

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): The investigations carried out supported the explanations given in committee last year. They showed that all cases treated in the clinic by Doctor Chartier were cases which might properly be treated there, under the Quebec law, and indicated that the payments made for such treatment were made in accordance with the schedule provided under the compensation act. These amounts were checked by treasury officers in the department and by officers of the comptroller-general. There was no reason to conclude that there had been any overpayment, that there was anything wrong with the payments made, that there had been overcharges or malingering either on the part of the employees or the doctor who attended the cases in the clinic.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have the public accounts before me, and I cannot find this item concerning Doctor Chartier. Under what heading does it appear? Is it included in the item for $550,000, for payment of compensation in connection with government employees?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How much was paid to Doctor Chartier?

Mr. MICHAUD: For the employees of government departments, $7,224.50; on behalf of the employees of defence projects, administered by the federal government, $24,080.40, making a total of $31,304.90.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That figure cannot be correct, because it is not in accordance with the figure that was given in a return recently tabled. I have sent out for the return, but if I remember correctly the amount paid to Doctor Chartier during last year was some $41,000.

Mr. MICHAUD: I have not before me the question asked or the answer given, but the total payments for 1942-43 were $38,671.70.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What about 1941-42?

Mr. MICHAUD: The total for that year was $35,307.50, and for 1940-41, $20,147.70.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister has suggested that while these large amounts were paid to one individual there has been no investigation into the matter since last year.

Mr. MICHAUD: I did not say that; I said that investigation revealed that the amounts paid to Doctor Chartier were properly paid. They were checked by the treasury officer of the Department of Transport and were found to have been paid in accordance with the schedule of rates contained in the workmen's compensation act of the province of Quebec which governs in the matter. They were found to be proper charges for the services rendered.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: For the three years the average amount paid to Doctor Chartier was about $38,000.

Mr. MICHAUD: It averaged about $35,000 for the last three years. These payments cover services rendered to employees of defence projects in and around Montreal.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The amount paid to Doctor Chartier would average about $35,000 a year?

Mr. MICHAUD: I would make the further correction—to the clinic of Doctor Chartier.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Doctor Chartier still carries on his private practice?

Mr. MICHAUD: I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister say that he has no record as to whether or not Doctor Chartier carries on his private practice?

Mr. MICHAUD: No, I have no record of that. It is not my business to look into Doctor Chartier's private business.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister consider it proper that any doctor should receive $35,000 a year for only part time services?

Mr. MICHAUD: Doctor Chartier is not paid on a yearly basis; he is paid the fees provided by the workmen's compensation act of Quebec. Similar fees are provided by workmen's compensation acts of the other provinces. When Doctor Chartier or any other doctor treats an employee who comes under the provisions of the workmen's compensation act the account rendered must be approved by the treasury branch. If the fees charged are found to be due they have to be paid; that is all there is to it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What other doctors were there in Montreal who received fees for this work?

Mr. MICHAUD: Last year there were 530 who received fees.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The highest fee received by any other doctor in Montreal was $2,400; is that not correct?

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not know, but it is possible that may be so. I have not the amounts paid to the 530 doctors.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): There was an item called hurriedly before I had my papers—

The CHAIRMAN: I did not call it hurriedly; I called it in the usual manner. I know the hon. member does not intend to cast any reflection upon the Chair.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to make a statement in connection with item 387, which provides $3,500,000 as a payment under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I want to point out that such votes have been made since the report of the Duncan commission was implemented. It varies from year to year and it is greatly appreciated by the maritime provinces. However, we feel it is our right. I would point out that it is not a one-sided affair. Last year the Canadian National Railways showed a profit of $85,302,000. From this operating profit was paid interest charges of $30,998,000 on debt held by the public and interest charges of $18,665,000 due to the government in respect of temporary loans for capital and refunding purposes. There was a net cash surplus of $35,639,000. While we get the benefit of this vote, the Atlantic division of the Canadian National Railways has been showing substantial operating profits which go to make up the total profits I have mentioned. I want the situation understood, that this is not entirely disbursement to assist the maritime provinces, because the Atlantic division has contributed large earnings to the operating profit of the Canadian National Railways. This is in striking contrast to the situation that prevailed years ago.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. MICHAUD: Perhaps there should be the qualification that whether or not there are profits made by the Atlantic division, the amount is paid.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That is quite so.

Item agreed to.

Air service—

394. (Control and supervision vested in the Minister of Munitions and Supply by order in council P.C. 3076 of 8th July, 1940.) Air service administration, $11,250.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the purpose of this item?

Mr. HOWE: It is to cover the salaries of the controller of civil aviation and two or three stenographers.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it possible for the minister to make any statement yet as to the airports in the northern part of the country that are being purchased from the United States? Will they be worked into our national airway system?

Mr. HOWE: It is intended that all airports built for war purposes will be utilized for post-war purposes to the extent that they can be useful. There is a line of bases extending from Winnipeg to the Pas, Churchill, Southampton island, two bases in Greenland, a base in Iceland and a base in the United Kingdom. That is a route where the airports are not more than nine hundred miles apart. That will be a useful route in my opinion for post-war aviation. I visualize that aviation across the Atlantic after the war will divide itself into two classes, the high-speed luxury crossing, of the type we have now so far as speed is concerned from Montreal to Scotland, and a slower and less expensive crossing, with a number of stops, such as can be had on the route I have just mentioned. A study is being made of the bases and their possibilities. There are one or two bases which no Canadian to my knowledge has yet seen. If the route can be used for post-war aviation it will be made available for that purpose.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand from a press report that a group of officials are leaving by air to-morrow for Churchill and the other bases which the minister mentioned. I am sorry that the minister found it impossible to accede to the request that he received from the mayor of Winnipeg that a representative of that city or of the province of Manitoba be included in this party. When the minister replied to Mayor Coulter and also to me in the house he said that the party would include only military and technical personnel and that there would be no place in it for a representative of the city of Winnipeg or the province of Manitoba. I imagine that the request was made by Mayor Coulter because the press dispatches regarding the trip said that a study was to be made of possible post-war uses of these bases. Mayor Coulter is a mild sort of person and has accepted the minister's explanation as to why no representative of the city or of the province can be taken along, but I am not so easily satisfied. The city of Winnipeg occupies a very important position on the world air map, both of the present and of the future, and I feel that Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba should be represented right at the start in the study that is to be made of these northern and north-eastern bases with a view to their possible post-war use. I shall have something further to say about the airport at Stevenson's field, Winnipeg, when we get to the appropriate item, but I still hope that the minister will agree that a representative of the city of Winnipeg or of the province of Manitoba be taken along on the trip that is to start to-morrow.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with the taking over of these airports at Churchill, Greenland and other places which the minister mentioned, I should like to secure a statement from the minister in regard to the disposal of the surplus goods or equipment that the United States government may have at these various airports. While there has been a denial by members of the government that on the northwest staging route there was destruction of equipment, scarcely a day passes but letters are received by members of this house from people living in Dawson Creek and on up there testifying that there was destruction of very valuable equipment and placing the responsibility upon the dominion authorities on the ground that the dominion authorities had refused to the United States government the right to dispose of its surplus equipment because it was brought into Canada without payment of duty. Personally I have no knowledge of the matter but I have read about it in the Edmonton press and have also had numbers of letters on the subject, which has become a very vexed question. I would like to ascertain from the minister what the plans of the government are with regard to the disposal of surplus or excess property, equipment and the like when these airports are officially taken over by the Canadian government.

There is another matter, a smaller one. Recently Prairie Airways Limited at Moose Jaw was taken over by the Department of Munitions and Supply to be operated by them so far as the repair depot is concerned. I have received reports that certain lumber and other materials are being destroyed instead of being sold, even though this material has value. The informants state that certain quantities of material, lumber and the like, were removed from the premises, and representations have been made to the effect that it could have been made available for civilian uses and ought not to be destroyed. I also point out that six of the employees who were acting as guards, all of them returned soldiers of the last war, received notice that their services were no longer required and were replaced by men of military age who combined the duties of guard with looking after the storing of the planes and the like. I would like to know what is going to be done to assure these returned men who were discharged of placement elsewhere. They have not the mechanical qualifications that would enable them to work in armament factories, but they were able to do the work they were doing as guards. Their removal from their positions has aroused no little resentment.

Mr. HOWE: As to the disposal of United States material on the northwest staging route, negotiations are proceeding between the Canadian and United States governments to the end that War Assets Corporation will act for the United States government in disposing of movable assets. A representative of War Assets Corporation is now in that territory, cooperating with Major General Foster, who is the administrator of the area for the Canadian government. It is hoped that War Assets Corporation will be in a position to dispose of United States assets, for the account of the United States government. My hon. friend will appreciate that the Canadian government has bought only the immovables from the United States government; that the movables are the property of the United States government, and are for disposal by the owner.

My hon. friend said that the Canadian government has prevented local officers from selling materials locally. United States army regulations probably prevent army officers from selling government material, just as is the case in Canada. My hon. friend will appreciate that the sale of materials owned by a government is a matter which cannot be handled carelessly. The United States has followed the same practice as has the government of Canada in setting up a disposal agency for the sale of government war material. However, reports from Major General Foster indicate that the destruction of materials by the United States government was a comparatively minor matter; no very important stores were disposed of. I may say that ours is an official report, not something received by way of gossip.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did he give the minister the value of the material which was disposed of?

Mr. HOWE: He has given us a detailed report on it, and I can assure my hon. friend that the value is trivial. My hon. friend asked so many questions that I have forgotten—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I asked about Moose Jaw.

Mr. HOWE: Moose Jaw has an overhaul plant operated by Prairie Airways Limited. It was expanded with government assistance, and probably the ownership of the government in the plant is larger than the ownership of Prairie Airways. Incidentally, Prairie Airways was acquired by Canadian Pacific Air Lines subsequent to the original negotiations. There has been a reduction in the volume of overhaul work. This plant is wholly a private operation. The government has not operated and is not now operating the plant, which is operated by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. The plant is still in use, and has not been declared surplus to government requirements. If there has been disposal of government material, such disposal has been wholly illegal; if there has been disposal of privately-owned material, the situation is quite in order. A private firm can dispose of its material as it likes. The department has received no report that government material has been disposed of, but if it has, that will undoubtedly come to light in due course.

When the plant is no longer required for the purpose for which it was built—and my hon. friend will appreciate that air training has been reduced substantially and that therefore overhaul work has been reduced substantially—and when the plant is reported as surplus to requirements, it will be turned over to War Assets Corporation for disposal in the usual way.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I thank the minister for his explanation. Can he state the figures which Major General Foster gave with reference to the value of the equipment which was disposed of along the staging route? We should know the value of these goods as reported by General Foster. The mere statement that it is trivial in amount is indefinite; it might be a very large amount and yet be trivial compared to the total value of the airports up there. What does the minister mean?

Mr. HOWE: The report covered the operations of another government. Had the property disposed of been that of the Canadian government my hon. friend would have been entitled to the figures. But since the reference is to a Canadian report with regard to disposal by another government, the government of the United States, the figures are regarded as confidential.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Will the minister make a statement with respect to air service operations at Amherst in the post-war period? The board of trade and others are interested in it, and I believe they are having a meeting this week to discuss the matter. As the minister knows, this airfield is within the town boundaries, and the location is as favourable as that of any airfield in Canada. It was built after substantial contributions were made by the town of Amherst. It had the good will and cooperation from the beginning of the minister himself and of Mr. R. P. Bell, director general of aircraft construction. The town of Amherst has a large investment and a great interest in it and they are now anxious to know what their position is, having regard to the Aeronautics Act and the policy of the government and the minister, in the post-war period, in securing and maintaining an air service to utilize this field and serve the town of Amherst and the surrounding community.

Mr. HOWE: The field at Amherst is an airport which will be suitable for post-war commercial operation. At the moment it is busy with operational work connected with the war. When the airport is no longer required for the overhaul of aeroplanes, and for flight-testing of new aeroplanes, it will be declared surplus to the requirements of the war and turned over to the Department of Transport. I feel sure that at that time it will be converted without difficulty into a unit of a system of commercial aviation. Amherst is an enterprising city with considerable mail and passenger potentials, and I feel sure that one of the air lines in that area will desire to give service to the town. Certainly the government will be wholly favourable to civilian service when the time comes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I appreciate the minister's statement, but what the members of the Amherst board of trade and the business people are concerned about is whether they should not now be taking steps to make arrangements for an air service instead of its being left until after the termination of the war. They are anxious to know what steps to take so that they may be assured of the utilization of this airfield after the war which I believe the minister and all concerned are anxious they should obtain.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are two or three other questions I should like to ask the minister. They have to do with the establishment of a route between Winnipeg and Edmonton. Something was said about that a few months ago, that an air line was to be established there, but lately we have heard nothing about it. When is it expected that this air line will be put into operation, and has consideration been given to the inclusion of Prince Albert in the route? It would not mean the addition of many miles, but it would be very helpful in connecting with the private air line which operates into the north from Prince Albert and giving people from the north an opportunity to travel on the route from Saskatoon and Winnipeg. To-day the situation is that there is only one passenger plane each way each day, which does not provide the service that Prince Albert, I submit, should be entitled to by reason of its strategic position.

In that connection I would ask the minister whether it is intended to hardsurface and improve the runways in Prince Albert and Saskatoon. Recently there was a suggestion that this would be done. The situation to-day, so far as Prince Albert particularly is concerned, is that for at least a month in the spring and also to a lesser extent in the fall it is very difficult to use the air field because nothing has been done to render it available at all seasons of the year. Prince Albert is the jumping-off place into northern Saskatchewan, and if it had had anything like the facilities that are available in one or two other cities in adjoining provinces the amount of air transportation would have been multiplied very considerably. Before the war what held back its development was the fact that it did not have the necessary all-weather air facilities.

As far as Alberta is concerned, it has those facilities with the result that people who desire to go into northern Saskatchewan, in connection with mining development and the like, find to-day that it is almost a necessity to go to Yellowknife, which is immediately north of the northern boundary of Saskatchewan. I do not raise any objection to the facilities in Edmonton because it has a great air future; and as regards Winnipeg, Stevenson field as it stands to-day is a monument to lack of vision on the part of our authorities with regard to post-war development of aviation in Canada but I ask that in the post-war development Saskatchewan be given an opportunity to expand in that direction. Representations have been made from time to time to the government by the Prince Albert board of trade. An implied promise of action was given last year. What is the attitude toward this matter, and may it be expected that some development along the lines suggested will shortly take place?

Mr. HOWE: The constituency of Prince Albert is very ably represented in this house—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am one of the Prime Minister's constituents.

Mr. HOWE: —and I do not think that the hon. gentleman need assume the responsibility of speaking for it. I may say that we have plans for Prince Albert but those plans are in the same position as other post-war plans; they are not being proceeded with while the war is being actively prosecuted. We cannot divert labour, at a time of acute labour scarcity, to make improvements that are designed wholly for civilian aviation. During the course of the war, Prince Albert has been served by an excellent transport service, one of the few successful smaller operations in Canada. It has had regular service, every day in the month and every month of the year, since the war began. The airport is adequate for the present service. It would be inadequate for larger planes, but my hon. friend knows that aviation into the north from Prince Albert must be on floats, and extending airports or improving the air field at Prince Albert would hardly improve the facilities for operations into the north. The curtailment of operations in the north resulted from the curtailment of gold mining operations in northern Saskatchewan as the hon. gentleman knows. We hope and expect that the revival of gold mining following the end of the war will result in operations into the north from Prince Albert on a greatly increasing scale.

So far as Saskatoon is concerned, the present airport is hard-surfaced. Extensions of runways in length are required, and will be undertaken as soon as any programme of improved civilian fields can be undertaken. As regards the service between Winnipeg and Edmonton, the radio beams are nearing completion. Some improvement in fields is proceeding, but I cannot give the date for the commencement of the service. As a matter of fact, Trans-Canada Air Lines is very short of equipment, but when that equipment is available, we hope to be ready to put on a first-class direct service between Winnipeg and Edmonton. That route will involve a decided improvement for air traffic in and out of Prince Albert.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not realize that a member of parliament was not permitted to speak for any constituency other than that represented by himself.

Mr. HOWE: He is permitted, but it is not necessary in this case.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On the contrary, I mentioned it because I feel that the people of Prince Albert consider it necessary to have brought to the minister's attention the failure to provide air facilities in Prince Albert even approximating those to be found elsewhere. That is why I brought up the matter. I did not do so in any partisan spirit, but the minister immediately took umbrage.

Mr. HOWE: I did not take umbrage; I simply pointed out that the member for Prince Albert is not in his seat, and that my hon. friend is trying to steal a little glory.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is always the minister's attitude. I asked why it was that Prince Albert did not receive some consideration in connection with the improvement of air facilities. For six years there had been promises. Prior to the war it was one excuse; since the war it has been the reason given by the minister a moment ago.

Mr. HOWE: Who promised what? What was the promise?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The promise of an all-weather runway. Does the minister say it was not promised before the war?

Mr. HOWE: I would like to see the promise.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then the minister had better look up some of the correspondence sent from his department to the board of trade in the city of Prince Albert. I am advocating that this should be done. The minister generalizes but he does not even now give the assurance that all-weather runways will be made available in Prince Albert on the conclusion of the war.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN-YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS

The house resumed from Friday, August 5, consideration in committee of bill No. 91, respecting banks and banking—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 12—Opening of stock books.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I desire to move an amendment to this section, to provide that any provincial government, upon the authorization of the legislature, shall be empowered to ask the dominion government for a charter to establish a provincial bank. The amendment is as follows:

That section 12 of bill 91 be amended by inserting immediately after section 12 thereof the following new sections:

12a. The government of any province which has been duly authorized by its legislature so to do, may apply under this act for an act of incorporation of a bank in the form set forth in schedule B(1) to this act, and the act of incorporation shall be construed to confer upon the bank thereby incorporated all the powers, privileges and immunities, and subject it to all the liabilities and provisions set forth in this act except those specifically excepted in the act of incorporation.

12b. The following sections of this act shall not apply to any bank incorporated under the provisions of section 12a of this act, that is to say, sections 11, 12, 20, 33, 35, 37, 39, 40, 41, 42, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49 and 50.

Before offering reasons why this amendment should be incorporated in the act may I point out that as the amendment is drafted it will be noted that the provincial legislature will pass legislation authorizing the provincial government to make application to the dominion parliament for an act to incorporate a bank. The dominion government will then be requested to incorporate a bank in the same form as that in which the commercial chartered banks have been incorporated. In view of the fact that both the dominion and provincial legislatures will have concurred in the incorporation prior to the charter being granted, the question of jurisdiction does not arise.

It will be remembered by those who were called upon to become familiar with the whole situation that when Alberta applied for a charter in 1940 and the matter came before the banking and commerce committee the request was denied upon the advice of Mr. Varcoe, who maintained in brief that the act would be ultra vires of the Dominion of Canada because it would impose certain liabilities upon the provincial government.

What I have just said indicates that if the matter is proceeded with in an orderly fashion, and with wisdom, there need be no infringement whatsoever upon the British North America Act; there need be no reason why the act should not be allowed, certainly not upon the grounds which the committee found substantial in the last instance.

May I point out that the sections referred to in the suggested clause 12 (b) relate to formalities which would not be applicable to a provincial bank. Those sections relate to the following subject matters, and I would review them briefly. Section 11 has to do with the qualification for provisional director; section 12 has to do with stock books for subscriptions; section 20 has to do with the qualification of directors; section 33 has to do with the allotment of shares; section 35 has to do with share personality; section 37 with calls on shares; section 39 with the recovery of calls; section 40 with a fine for failure to pay a call; section 41 with actions to recover calls; section 42 with conditions for the transfer of shares; section 45 with the sale of shares under execution; section 46 with the transmission of shares; section 47 with the transmission by marriage of female shareholders; section 48 relates to sections 46 and 47, by reference to the documents required; section 49 has to do with transmission by will, and section 50 with transmission by decease. Therefore it will be seen by hon. members that while a considerable number of sections of the act are proposed to be made non-applicable in the case of the provincial bank charter, nevertheless no impairment whatever is proposed of the general purpose and effectiveness and formality of the Bank Act. Now may I point out to hon. members why the province of Alberta is so insistent in requesting that it be granted the right to have a bank. Be it noted that this amendment is not a request for the granting of a charter; it is merely to provide enabling legislation. Several times since coming to this house I have contended that there need be no conflict between the dominon and provincial governments with respect to the constitutional competence of either, if the dominion passes enabling legislation and allows the provinces to cooperate by passing similar legislation, or legislation which becomes in order in cooperation with the dominion under the enabling legislation. This legislation is to provide authorization to a legislature to incorporate. There is no imposition of liability on the province by the dominion.

May I deal briefly with the question why Alberta wants to have a bank, and why I say the house should pass an amendment to the act under which any province in Canada may have a chance of having a bank of its own. In 1940, when the banking and commerce committee was examining Mr. Low of Alberta, in connection with the proposed granting of a charter to Alberta in that year, questions were asked as to why Alberta wanted a bank. I should like to read Mr. Low's remarks in that connection. I turn to the evidence taken before the banking and commerce committee on Tuesday, July 16, 1940 where, at page 5, I find this:

Mr. Casselman: What need?

The Witness: That covers, Mr. Chairman, very much ground; but we are of the opinion and we think our opinions are sound in this respect, that there should be an institution in the province of Alberta sponsored by the people of the province in a cooperative way which will endeavour to increase the industrial possibilities of the province, which will make it possible to stabilize prices of certain commodities whose main market is in the province of Alberta, and which will eventually prove to the whole of the Dominion of Canada, if not to the world, that the control of credits should be vested in the government of the country and not in private institutions.

And farther down on the same page, the following questions by Mr. Thorson:

Q. How will it accomplish the purpose you have in mind?

A. Well, in the first place this bank certainly would operate on a more extended policy of credit issue. That is, if a man or an institution or a community or a corporation cannot put up adequate security they should be entitled to their credit, and there will be no such thing as premature withdrawals of credit to render men and corporations helpless as we see to-day all around us.

May I comment just there that one of the most serious disadvantages from which Alberta suffered during the depression was the disastrous fall in prices from what they had been, when Alberta incurred most of her public debt, to what they were in 1931 and 1932. This fall in prices rendered it impossible for people who were in debt to discharge the responsibilities they had assumed when they contracted their debt. This brought about undesirable conditions of various kinds.

I shall now proceed with Mr. Low's evidence, at page 7 of the report:

By Mr. Cleaver:

Q. I understood you to say quite distinctly a moment ago when you were stating the objects and the need for your bank that the need was that the present banking institutions were not extending credit where it was required by credit-worthy individuals?

A. True.

Q. I take it from that statement you intend to extend greater credits than the existing banks are now extending?

A. Not necessarily, but more honourable ones. Would you mind if I qualified your statement?
Q. Yes.
A. In time.
Q. I also understood you to say that you are not going to withdraw these credits abruptly after loans were granted—they would not be abruptly recalled?
A. Unless there is a mighty good reason for so doing.
Q. If having made generous loans you undertake, or your policy will be not to require payment of them, if your depositors want their money which they have deposited in the bank, how do you propose to obtain it for them?
A. We propose to keep adequate reserves to meet the demands for repayment by increasing the capital structure.

Hon. Mr. Hanson: Mr. Chairman, Mr. Low has in part answered one point, one question I raised concerning the necessity for the bank. He says in effect, if I understand him correctly, that one of the reasons why this bank is required is because the present chartered banks do not extend sufficient credit to the people of Alberta; is that not a correct statement of your position, Mr. Low?
A. Partly, yes, Mr. Hanson.

I do not propose to read at greater length from the hearings of the committee. Hon. members who find themselves interested may read the proceedings and gather information for themselves.

I believe what the dominion government has done at this session of parliament indicates just how sound was the position taken by Alberta in 1940. It will be recalled that there has been before the house at this session a bill to enable the freer granting of loans to farmers. The government of the day takes a good deal of credit to itself for having introduced that measure. At the same time there is to-day before the banking and commerce committee bill No. 7, for the establishment of an industrial development bank, the object of which is to enable the Dominion of Canada to extend loans to industries for fixed capital, where those industries would not be able to obtain loans from the chartered banks or from other lending institutions in the country. I feel safe in saying that those two measures alone indicate that Mr. Low was on absolutely unchallengeable ground when he made the statements he did make; and the Alberta government was completely justified in asking for a bank to enable it to grant credit more freely, more discreetly and on better terms than were being granted to the citizens of Alberta throughout the depression, and than they have been granted even up to the present time—perhaps even notwithstanding the war.

Other provinces have suffered seriously by reason of a faulty or unsatisfactory financial system, or a faulty administration of that system by the banks. To show that Alberta is not unreasonable and is not alone in making her request that she be given greater control over credit in that province, may I turn first to the submission by the government of the province of Nova Scotia to the Rowell-Sirois commission, as published in February, 1938. At page 82 of that submission hon. members will find the following words:

The Jones commission appointed distinctly to consider the relations of Nova Scotia with the dominion and the general effect of federal policies on provincial economic development, emphasized throughout the whole of its report that, as was expressed by Premier Taschereau of Quebec at the dominion-provincial conference in 1927,—

"To have a happy and prosperous Canada, there must be happy and prosperous provinces, and the latter could do more for Canada than could the federal authorities."

I should like to emphasize those last words of Mr. Taschereau. He said that the provincial governments could do more for Canada than could the federal authorities. I have maintained that steadily and consistently ever since coming here. I proceed with Mr. Taschereau's remarks:

The provinces were more in contact with the people, educating them, building their roads and looking after their health. The provinces enacted compensation laws in favour of workmen and had control of the judicial machinery.

I continue quoting from the submission:

Doctor Innis likewise stated in his complementary report:

"We are convinced from a wide variety of evidence that the trend towards centralization in railways, banking, finance and industry tends to become less efficient in relation to the outlying areas and must be offset by a definite reversal in terms of development policy. Increasing centralization must be offset by increasing devolution, if the more distant regions are to guard effectively their interests. No province has been exposed more directly to the effects of the national policy and no province deserves more careful consideration as to a policy of development. . . .

The federal government could not ask a greater sacrifice of a province and it cannot refuse sympathetic consideration to measures which will involve a restoration of unity.

I contend that at this time in the history of Canada the dominion government could hardly do anything more calculated to restore the confidence of the provinces than to grant to the provinces the right to have provincial banks under their own control. These banks would be under the control of the dominion financial system; they would obey all laws and submit to inspection by the dominion authorities, but they would be under control of the provincial governments. I continue:

It may be urged that centralization of policy in the dominion is in the best interests of the province rather than devolution and lest we should be misinterpreted it should be said that we are favourable to centralization as to matters of coordination and we regard the federal government as becoming, to an increasing extent, a clearing house as to matters of general policy —a clearing house which can effectively be used with control over funds. On the other hand, we have been forcibly struck with the callousness, lack of sympathy, and general disregard of broad policy, which has characterized federal supervision.

I do not know how the dominion officials could be more roundly or emphatically condemned for their past policies than they are in the closing words of that paragraph which I have just read. That was the submission of the sober, staid province of Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia has not yet asked for a bank, but the main reason is that she has not come to see that it would be in her best interests to vote Social Credit.

May I turn from the submission to the Sirois commission to the words of two prominent members of this house which were uttered as late as yesterday in the banking and commerce committee. First I should like to refer to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenberg (Mr. Kinley), who said: "Centralization has been—"

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point or order, I understand the rule is that one cannot quote from the proceedings of a committee unless the matter has been reported on to the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very well. I will refer hon. members to the remarks of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg and the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham). Both hon. gentlemen pointed out emphatically that there has been far too much centralization in this dominion and that that constitutes one of the serious disabilities under which the provinces suffer. I ask hon. members how in the world this decentralization of industry, which I believe most people think should be effected, is to be brought about? There is before the banking and commerce committee a bill for an industrial development bank, but many people are afraid that if that bill is passed and the industrial development bank is to be under the control of the Bank of Canada, under the control of the dominion government, it will be used to help to advance money to assist industry in Ontario and Quebec and will not be used to help industry in Alberta, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Nova Scotia and other outlying provinces. If we are to judge by the past record of the dominion government we must grant that the people who have those fears are justified in entertaining them. I myself am not disposed to feel quite so suspicious of the central government, despite the way in which they have dealt with us in the past. One of the main arguments advanced by the supporters of the bill for an industrial development bank is—

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Finance raised a point of order which was well taken. We are now discussing bill No. 91, while the hon. member is discussing a bill which at the moment is before the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My understanding of the point raised by the minister is that he was objecting to my quoting the exact words which were uttered in the committee by an hon. member. I am not going to discuss the industrial development bank any further, so that I shall not be out of order in the future. I have no desire to be out of order; I do not need to be out of order to establish my case, because it is too strong for that. The fact is that the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) pointed out that Saskatchewan had suffered from centralization. That indicates that Saskatchewan has been suffering from the disability about which Alberta complains.

I turn now to the submission of the province of New Brunswick to the Sirois commission, which was published in April, 1938. I quote from page 49 as follows:

> In this connection it is well that the commission should bear in mind that the Canadian banks have been centralized in Ontario and Quebec. Prior to confederation and for some years afterwards we had our own banking institutions in this province and our people were able to obtain money for the encouragement of industry here.
> The head offices of these banking institutions were removed, after confederation, to Montreal and Toronto where they were situated more immediately in touch with the financial interests by which they were controlled.
> The result has been that industries in New Brunswick have not been able to obtain financial assistance in cases where such assistance would enable our local industries to compete with those in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.
> Pertinent cases may be cited where local industries in this province have been destroyed because of the difficulty of financing and we submit that finances have been withheld as local industries might come into competition with similar industries in the last mentioned provinces.

There is the advice of New Brunswick given in 1938. May I read a passage from the submission of Alberta to the Rowell-Sirois commission. At page 37 of Part II I find the following words, commencing with the second paragraph:

> When it is borne in mind that this overriding control by the central bank is exercised in conjunction with a debt-creating system which progressively places everything under the control of finance because of its prior debt claims against the community, something of the enormous and extraordinary control of the highly centralized banking system can be appreciated.

This has been very clearly demonstrated to a started world by recent events in this province. Even governments are expected to submit to the domination of these financial rulers. And as unsatisfactory as it is that this centralized control of all human activity should be exercised by a group of institutions in the dominion, the situation becomes fantastic when it is fully realized that the centralization of control is continued through central banks to a coterie of alien financiers exercising supreme domination of the system on an international scale.

May I read again from page 53, where those who prepared the brief are making suggestions:

In order to implement the policy of electors, the following specific proposals should be adopted to rectify the faults in the financial system which have been examined in previous chapters:

(a) A provincial credit authority under government control to be established in each province to supervise the administration of policy as decided by the people.

I omit paragraphs (b) and (c) as not being particularly pertinent to the matter under discussion and continue with (d):

(d) The note issue to be regulated by the volume of financial credit released, instead of the present procedure of an arbitrarily limited note issue unnecessarily restricting the issue of financial credit by the banks.

(e) Banks to continue the administration of the financial system under the jurisdiction of the dominion government and subject to the control of policy by the people of each province through a provincial credit authority.

(f) Banks to discontinue the practice of charging arbitrary interest rates and to be compensated adequately for their services to the community on an equitable basis.

(g) The careful preparation of an interim scheme to be undertaken so that the application of the general proposals outlined above can be introduced smoothly and without dislocation to the social life of the province.

I think that is sufficient to indicate quite clearly that the need, if not the actual demand, for more provincial control over the credit administration of the provinces is evident throughout the dominion. Here are four provinces at least which have expressed a sense of disability, directly or indirectly, and one of them has asked specifically for the right to have a provincial bank.

May I draw attention to one other aspect of this question before I resume my seat. Hon. members are familiar with the fact that in the province of Quebec there is a Quebec Savings bank. This bank applied to the dominion government for the renewal of its charter, and on Friday, July 28, 1944, the application for the charter was under consideration by the banking and commerce committee. Among other things we learned that this Quebec Savings bank had first been granted a charter in 1846 by Lower Canada, that it had another charter granted in 1871 by the dominion government. The nature of the bank was such that it very closely but not entirely resembles the sort of bank that Alberta has in mind. I should have liked to quote from the proceedings of the committee, but I presume I would be out of order in doing that; I would refer hon. members to pages 1534 and 1536 of the committee's proceedings, where, in reply to questions which I asked, the witness gave evidence which would justify one in assuming that the Quebec Savings bank is akin to an ordinary bank in its operations and in its powers. Now if an ordinary bank in a province can be granted a charter by this dominion it seems to me a most astonishing thing that a whole province is to be denied a charter to conduct a provincial bank. In Ontario there is a provincial financial institution which is called the Province of Ontario Savings Office, which was incorporated in 1921.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): By the dominion government?

Mr. BLACKMORE: By the Ontario government. The Ontario government did not come to the dominion for the power; it just did it, and judging from the way Quebec is behaving I imagine that pretty soon Quebec will do it and let the dominion government go merrily on its way. That is what will happen unless the dominion government takes this matter into consideration and allows the just request of the provinces, which must have some control over their own affairs. Members will find the act incorporating the Province of Ontario Savings Office in the revised statutes of Ontario, 1937, chapter 77.

I have no desire, Mr. Chairman, to hold up the proceedings of this committee. I merely wanted to state the case simply and straightforwardly and give the reasons why I believe the dominion government would be wise to grant Alberta a bank, and to ask the minister if he will not give favourable consideration to the inclusion in the bank act of an amendment, 12a and 12b, to the present section 12 of bill No. 91.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word in support of the amendment. For the last several years we have had one province of Canada requesting permission to establish a provincially owned bank in order that the bank may fulfil some of the needs of that province. While I do not entirely agree with the reasons advanced by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Blackmore), that is a matter of detail. The broad principle is that a province has asked for a provincially owned bank and the request has not been favourably received. It may be argued that there has not been time to go into the matter very thoroughly and so on and so forth, but in my opinion the attitude of the house generally has not been favourable towards the incorporation of a provincially owned bank under this bank act, and the request has always been met, as the hon. member for Lethbridge has said, with the objection that there are certain provisions of the Bank Act which would have to be changed as they make it virtually impossible to organize such a bank. In the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Lethbridge he meets those objections; as far as I know he meets them completely. While he was speaking I have looked through the sections which he proposes to delete from the act, all of them having to do with the transfer of shares, the directorates, the records and so on of the chartered banks; and if those sections are deleted—I do not know if there are any more which should be removed, but no doubt he has gone through the act very carefully—it would seem that the sections which stood in the way will be pretty well eliminated from the act if this amendment is passed.

I believe that with the expansion of public enterprise and cooperative enterprise in the provinces, the need of developing their resources to a greater extent than some of those resources have been developed in the past, and the decentralization of industry or the establishment of industries in parts of the country where they have not yet been established and where great resources exist, as in the province from which my hon. friend comes, which is perhaps the most richly endowed province in Canada in this respect, these suggestions would enable a province to do for itself that which the chartered banks have been unable or unwilling to do for it.

I am not going to enter into a long discussion of this matter; I do not think that at this stage it is necessary. All I want to say is that we of this group have supported the hon. gentleman in the past when he has brought before us the request for consideration of the establishment of a provincially-owned bank in Alberta, and we intend to support that request to-day by supporting this amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think I should let the amendment go without saying a few words. Apparently this amendment is to carry out the same intention as was expressed by the movers of the motion for the second reading of the Alberta Bank bill. That bill was not passed by this house, but the substance of it was referred to the banking and commerce committee and has not yet been reached on the agenda of that committee. The hon. gentleman who is moving this amendment to the Bank Act did not move it in the banking and commerce committee, nor did he bring it up at all, but if he had brought it up in the banking and commerce committee it could have been examined first from the point of view of its constitutionality, which is fundamental. I have not the opinion of the Department of Justice; I expected to have it by the time that consideration of the Alberta Bank bill was reached in the banking and commerce committee; but there are undoubtedly very strong arguments for the unconstitutionality of this amendment. The amendment is that the Bank Act be amended by inserting immediately after section 12 thereof the following new section:

> 12a. The government of any province which has been duly authorized by its legislature so to do, may apply under this act for an act of incorporation of a bank in the form set forth in schedule B(1) to this act, and the act of incorporation shall be construed to confer upon the bank thereby incorporated, all the powers, privileges and immunities, and subject it to all the liabilities and provisions set forth in this act except those specifically excepted in the act of incorporation.

I do not understand the amendment very well. The government of the province apparently does not apply for a charter.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I tell the minister—it is unfair that he should try to interpret it on so short a notice—that all that is being asked for in this amendment is that the dominion government shall pass enabling legislation so that if the legislation of any province passes a resolution requesting its executive or government to apply for a bank charter, the government may apply for the charter with some hope that the dominion government will at least listen to it sympathetically and will grant permission to have such a bank. It is merely enabling legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but it does not mean much to put in legislation that the government of a province may apply to this parliament for an act. Of course they may apply to this parliament for an act, and they have done so several times already. It does not impose upon this parliament any obligation to pass an act, nor can it. No such language is found in the Bank Act with regard to applications by groups of individuals.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perhaps the minister could suggest stronger language. I have tried to make it as mild as possible.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well. I think myself that the amendment has no effect. That does not mean that I am agreeing to its passage. I believe that if it were to pass, it would be a sort of indication that this parliament was favourable to provincial governments setting up provincial banks. Well, can they?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If they cannot, I suppose they could easily ask the British parliament for the right. They asked it in a hurry for unemployment insurance changes. Why not ask for this?

Mr. ILSLEY: Under the Alberta Bank scheme, ministers of the crown, as provincial ministers of the crown, not as individuals, were to become directors of a provincial bank, and the directorship was to pass from one set of ministers to another set of ministers as they became ministers of the crown. These ministers of the crown were responsible to this parliament under an act which makes them a bank, and at the same time they were responsible to the legislature of the province of Alberta, to whom of course they are, and to whom alone they should be, responsible. The constitutional position, I think, is an unsound one.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then—if the minister will allow me—he has pictured the exact condition which obtains at the present time. If the provincial treasurer of Ontario incurs a debt with the finance department of the dominion government, that contract binds his successor. His successor will be responsible to the dominion authorities and will be responsible at the same time to the provincial legislature. So that there is certainly no point to the minister's objection on that score.

Mr. ILSLEY: The crown, not the provincial treasurer, is the debtor there in the right of Ontario.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly. Well, the crown has authority in this case too. When Alberta applies for a bank act, Alberta applies for the bank act in the name of His Majesty the King for the province of Alberta.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I had no notice that any such amendment was being moved. If the hon. gentleman is serious about this amendment he should have moved it in the banking and commerce committee, where it could be examined in all its implications. I gave the reasons why I could not agree to the passing of the Alberta bank bill by way of second reading in this house, and the same reasons apply to this. I cannot accept it.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: The reason I did not move this in the banking and commerce committee was that I was unavoidably away at the time the section was passed. It was no use asking that it be reconsidered; it would not have been done. I had to take the next measure, which is to move this amendment here. It looks to me as if there is nothing which this house cannot deal with.

Mr. COLDWELL: The discussion which has just occurred does not, it seems to me, relate to this amendment. The minister was discussing the Alberta Bank Act, and suggested that the ministers would be the directors and that the directorships would pass from one set of ministers to their successors. This amendment does not, in my opinion, involve that. The hon. gentleman has moved it "subject to all the liabilities and provisions set forth in this act except those specifically excepted in the act of incorporation," so that he leaves it open, either when the charter is granted or under the special act which he may have in mind, that the conditions shall be laid down; and it seems to me that at that time conditions should be laid down which would be satisfactory both to the province and to parliament. It may be, and I think I myself would agree with the point of view, that the ministers responsible to the legislature ought not to be directors of a bank and thereby responsible to another legislative body, this parliament. I think I would agree with that. When the charter was granted some other way could be found. I should think that the government of Alberta or of some other province might appoint directors of a bank for certain periods of time, almost, if so desired, coterminus with the life of the ministers as such. But it seems to me that the constitutional angle does not come into this particular amendment at the present time. That is something for subsequent consideration when we have the application definitely before us. The application was here in the form of a bill and it was referred to a committee. It is not here for discussion this afternoon. All we have before us is an amendment that seeks to remove some of the objections that have been raised in the past to the incorporation of a provincial bank under this particular act.

Mr. GRAYDON: So far the question of an application for incorporation of a provincial bank has been largely centred, in the minds of the committee, in one particular province. Have other provincial governments made application for the setting up of this type of bank? In certain provinces there are provincial savings offices which are entirely different in their functions from the bank which is suggested here. Have there been applications of that kind from other provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not to my knowledge, and I think I would know.

Mr. GRAYDON: If in the opinion of the provinces the matter is one of national concern, is there any suggestion from the provinces that it might be made a subject of discussion at the coming dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that is on the proposed agenda, because I do not believe it is a live enough subject in any province except one. Clearly, this amendment is meaningless. The government of any province which has been duly authorized by its legislature so to do may apply under this act for an act of incorporation. Well, the government of any province may apply for an act of incorporation now—not an act of incorporation of the province or of the ministers of the province but of a group of individuals who apply under the Bank Act. All that would mean would be this, that a group of individuals would apply for incorporation under the Bank Act and their application would be sponsored by the province or would be accompanied by a request from the province or an application from the province that an act be passed. That is all that means. Suppose for instance a group of individuals in Nova Scotia wished to incorporate a bank and the government of Nova Scotia wrote a letter to the dominion government, saying "We would like to see an act passed and this bank incorporated." If the act were passed, then section 9 would apply; that is, the act of incorporation of a bank would be construed to confer upon the the bank all the powers, privileges and immunities, and subject to all the liabilities and provisions set forth in this act. This amendment would change that and declare that if the province applied under the circumstances I have indicated, the group applying would not be subject to all the liabilities and provisions set forth in this act, and would not have all the powers, privileges and immunities, but only some of them. And in any event there is a long list they would not have.

Mr. GRAYDON: In other words the province would be a preferred applicant.

Mr. ILSLEY: The group would be a preferred group if it got the backing of the province for the application, and that is all the amendment in its terms means.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it not clear by this that the government of any province may apply under this act for an act of incorporation, and so on, as set forth in schedule B—

Mr. ILSLEY: That is important. Look at the schedule and you will see it means individuals.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, well—

Mr. ILSLEY: It does, doesn't it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The government is an individual?

Mr. COLDWELL: In many of the bills we discuss here "person" includes a corporation. Cannot an individual include a government in this case? If it requires clarification of the schedule, why cannot the schedule be clarified? I think it is quite clear that the government of any province may apply under this act for an act of incorporation—

Mr. ILSLEY: Incorporating whom?

Mr. COLDWELL: —of a bank in the form set forth—

Mr. ILSLEY: But incorporating whom?

Mr. COLDWELL: Incorporating a provincial bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: When you incorporate, you incorporate individuals into an entity. You make them a corporate body. But you have to have individuals to start with; the province of Alberta knows that, and in its bill it picked out ministers of the crown and decided to make them a corporate entity and thereby gave them dual responsibility, one to the dominion authorities and one to their legislature.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no more dual responsibility there than in the cases I have cited; absolutely none. Every relation which a province has with this dominion government involves just as much dual responsibility as the minister apprehends in this instance. Schedule B, as far as I have been able to determine, permits a bank to apply for a charter. The act does not say the bank will be given a charter; it says it may apply, and the implication is that the dominion government will grant it, as it has condescendingly and graciously granted it up to the present time. Why can it not grant it to a province as to a group of private individuals?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. BLACKMORE: On division.

Amendment negatived on division.

Section agreed to.

On section 59—Cash reserves in Bank of Canada notes and deposits.

Mr. McGEER: I regret very much that this matter comes so late in the session and I almost feel like apologizing to my colleagues in the house for participating in a discussion of this kind at this stage in the proceedings; but it should be remembered that we were here for months before the Bank Act was introduced. While it did go before the banking and commerce committee; while it can be said that it has been under lengthy review there, in the light of all the circumstances surrounding the Bank Act in 1944 there were a great many things I felt should have been most exhaustively investigated which were not investigated at all.

I should like to mention just one other point. If this Bank Act passes, it passes for a period of ten years; and unless the government of the day sees fit to reopen it there will be no opportunity for parliament to discuss this act again for another ten years. So far as I am concerned personally, having definitely made up my mind not to contest another election, this will be possibly the last time I will have an opportunity to speak on the Bank Act in the parliament of Canada. Believing that men come and go like bubbles on a stream but that a sound idea once established in the minds of people will go on forever, I do want to take the opportunity to-day of placing some facts upon the record.

To understand section 59 of this bill you must read along with it section 75; and if I am right in my interpretation of those two sections read together then it is section 59, coupled with section 75, that vetoes and nullifies and makes impossible the execution of the declared policy of the government. That policy, enunciated from time to time in this house, is that the parliament of Canada, through the Bank of Canada, shall control the issue of currency and credit in terms of public need, not private gain. If you will look at section 75, subsection (e), you will find that there the banks are empowered to—

(e) engage in and carry on such business generally as appertains to the business of banking.

It is under and by virtue of that clause that the banks are empowered to issue bank deposits as a substitute for national currency in the form of Bank of Canada bills and in the form of coin. It is under the bankers' interpretation of this section of the act that we find them able to create and issue a bankers' form of money. In section 59 you find that the banks are required to hold five per cent of their deposits in Bank of Canada cash, and that must be held either in the bankers' tills or on deposit with the Bank of Canada. On the face of it section 59 seems to provide security for depositors, and it is assumed that it also imposes a restriction upon the power of the banks to issue bank deposits as an effective medium of exchange in Canada. But upon examination of the practice established and in vogue, the five per cent reserve is really an authorization for the piling up of $100 of bank deposits for every $5 of Bank of Canada cash which the banks hold. If that section is allowed to remain as it is to-day the bankers, with the cash reserves they have on hand, can increase and inflate the bank deposit buying power in Canada by double the extent of the bank deposits that are now in issue.

According to the statistical summary of the Bank of Canada for April and May, 1944, the chartered banks have in their tills and on deposit with the Bank of Canada $501,000,000 of Bank of Canada cash. That supports total deposits of $5,297,000,000. But the evidence before the banking and commerce committee was that this is a maximum or a minimum reserve. That is, in their practice the bankers have decided that what parliament has fixed as a minimum is not a safe reserve basis, so they say, "We have fixed as our right and privilege, as bankers, a reserve not on the basis of five per cent but on the basis of ten per cent." Therefore, on the evidence given before the banking and commerce committee, and on the facts which are not disputed, the banks are free to inflate the bank deposit buying power of Canada to the extent of $5,000 million on the reserves as they stand to-day. That cannot and will not be disputed as a fact.

In the face of these facts I submit that any man who will say this parliament has any control, either through the Bank of Canada or otherwise, over the power of our chartered banks to inflate bank deposits to promote a stock boom or any other form of inflationary activity, is uttering what is obviously an utter absurdity. Is it good enough for parliament to say, "We can trust to the wisdom of our bankers"? In the light of the experience of the past is it safe to say that for the coming period of ten years we can give the control of the issue of currency and credit to men who are interested primarily in private gain, and then ask the people throughout this Dominion of Canada to believe us when we say that parliament is in control?

Of course there has been controversy and disagreement; probably there is no subject upon which men will disagree more definitely or so divergently as in the matter of monetary theory and monetary policy. There is always great danger in the use of power; and the power to issue money as the medium of exchange of a nation and its people is the greatest power the government possesses.

What have we done with that power? We have given that power away to a group of men whose business is that of lending money at interest. Human nature being what it is, what would one naturally expect as the outcome and result of that kind of monopoly? Well, one would expect money to be organized in its flow so that it would always be in demand. The people will have to borrow it, because its supply is not adequate either for the needs of government or for the needs of trade. Will anybody suggest we have had enough money to finance this war? Will anybody suggest we had enough money to finance during the last depression? And, looking out on the to-morrows, is there anybody under this present system who does not view with grave concern the danger of the ever-mounting pyramid of debt, and the danger which has swept other countries into the disaster of repudiation, and internal as well as international strife?

To give that power away to a private monopoly, without having absolute control over what that monopoly might do, is an evidence of bad government. And it is because we have maintained a monetary system in the hands of private entrepreneurs that we had a series of booms and depressions, scarcity of money in peace time and abundance of money in war time, and always the very thing one would expect from the monopoly we have created and the power we have given them—an ever-amounting pyramid of unpayable debt.

Of course if the debt dealers are going to control the issue of currency and credit it will be issued in terms of private gain, the debt dealers dealing in debts. And if they have power to create debts they go on creating them until disaster overwhelms them—because that kind of monopoly has invariably the seed that breeds its own destruction.

What is the answer to the debt situation to-day? "Oh," we are told, "we can go on." "How long?" "We do not know". "Well, if you do go on indefinitely, what will happen?" According to your bank governor you will impose an intolerable strain upon the economy of the nation. When is that intolerable strain to come, and when it does come, what is the consequence and what is the remedy? The answer is "We do not know." That is all we can get in the committee on banking and commerce.

Sections 59 and 75, as interpreted, establish a monetary system beyond the control of the Bank of Canada and beyond the control of parliament. They establish a monetary system which vests in private monopoly the right to control the issue of the medium of exchange of both the government and the people, in terms of private gain.

Like all men. I was interested in how money is created. One of the most common questions one hears is this: Where does money go to? How does it come about that at certain times we have an abundance of money, and at other times it disappears? Why is it that money, in its circulation, rises and falls? Well, in 1939, I examined the governor of the bank, and elicited this interesting information from him, as it appears at page 76 of the evidence of the committee on banking and commerce:

> Mr. McGeer: Am I right in saying that a bank deposit can be created in this way? A banker can purchase a dominion government bond by accepting from the government, we will say a bond for $1,000, and giving to the government a deposit in the bank of $1,000?
> Mr. Towers: Yes.
> Mr. McGeer: And in law all that the bank has to hold in the way of cash to issue that deposit liability is 5 per cent?
> Mr. Towers: Yes.

Do hon. members realize what that simple transaction means? It means that the Bank of Canada hands over to the bank of Montreal $5 in Bank of Canada cash. The Bank of Canada with that $5 can buy $5 worth of bonds; but when the bank of Montreal gets it it can buy, on its own practice, $50 worth bonds. And the answer is not complete when it is said that we are borrowing some money from the banks at three-quarters of one per cent. That is only a partial answer. It has nothing to do with the actual operation. Can we conceive of a sane man owning a bank and then giving that bank's money over to another institution, and that institution's being able to use that same money to buy the bonds of the original bank to the extent of ten times—or, as by law, twenty times—the value of that money? We are the Bank of Canada. We own every dollar of that stock. It is the people's bank, and we are the people. Yet with a bank capable of issuing real money, we use that bank to bonus a private banking monopoly to carry out the practice of purchasing government bonds by exchanging the non-interest-bearing debts of the chartered banks for the interest-bearing debts of the government of Canada. And you call that a sane monetary system—a sound monetary system? It is a monetary system which has neither sense nor reason or logic to sustain it.

Let me give you an illustration of what that means in the cold terms of factual reality as they exist to-day. Our government now has sold to the Bank of Canada approximately one billion dollars' worth of securities. It is somewhat more than that, but I will use the round figure. The Bank of Canada in turn has issued a billion dollars' worth of Bank of Canada cash into circulation. The fact is that there is no debt with regard to that billion dollars. Those bonds are owned by the Bank of Canada and the Bank of Canada is owned by the government of Canada. That is an instance where internal debt is owed by all of the people, through the government, to all of the people. That is a debt that can be cancelled out as a mere bookkeeping entry. But there is another $3,000 million which this and former governments have issued to the chartered banks of Canada. There is an instance of a debt owed by all the people of Canada, through the government, to some of the people of Canada. Once we became the owners of the Bank of Canada why did we ever continue the practice of borrowing through the chartered banks? I think I summarize correctly the answer when I say that if we did not do that we would suffer the consequences of inflation.

I agree that there is always the danger of inflation, but it is not confined to currency alone. You can have inflation of debt, you can have inflation of prices, you can have inflation of commodities. You have had all those things. When you get a superabundance of wheat that you cannot sell, you have inflation of wheat. You can have an inflation of capacity to produce. Inflation can never be summed up in one term alone, that of inflation of currency. When you want to deal with rising prices you do not depend any more upon the manipulation of international or internal monetary systems; you move directly, as the MacMillan committee pointed out you could and should back in 1931, and which we have demonstrated in this country can be done, to the direct control of prices. If you want to prevent over-production, you move to the direct regulation of production. If you want to maintain your international trade in balance you no longer depend upon the uncontrollable movements of gold; you set up your international trade organization and you carry on your international trade in exactly the same way that a sound merchant carries on his business. You examine what you can consume at home and what can be sold abroad and then you move to regulate and control your international trade. In that way and in that way alone can you control the international buying power of your own medium of exchange.

You get an inflation of debt because you have had the converse to the issue of currency.

I am amazed at men who say that they fear the use of the printing press to create national currency as the buying power and medium of exchange of the people. The same men have no fear at all of the danger of using the printing press to secure a medium of exchange to carry on the affairs of government by issuing interest bearing bonds. No one seems to worry about that. The simplest of all principles of economics that we can understand as individuals is to keep out of debt. We have to do that in our homes and we have to do that in our businesses. We try to keep out of debt by thrift and by denying ourselves. If that is sound for the individual, how can it be unsound for the nation which can be nothing more than a group of individuals? See where that has taken us.

I am going to put on the record again the statement made by the Hon. Charles Dunning in 1939 in his budget speech. It is to be found on page 3150 of Hansard of April 25, 1939. He said:

> Let no one think that I have changed my mind in regard to the necessity of a balanced budget. Doubtless I will remain the target equally of two extreme schools of thought; on the one hand, those who believe that budget balancing is an outworn fetish, that a nation can continue to do what would soon bring an individual to disaster, and on the other hand, those who believe that governmental expenditures should be ruthlessly slashed regardless of the social distress and the cumulative deflation which would thereby be caused.

And later on:

> In times of depression, as I have already shown, increased expenditures on the part of governments are a sheer social necessity. Nevertheless, no nation can go on indefinitely with a budget heavily unbalanced without sooner or later providing a real, not an imagined, basis for fear as to the soundness of the country's financial position. If that fear should take root, nothing which a government could do short of taking over gradually the whole field of private enterprise, could offset the slowing up of private enterprise and the reduction in employment and incomes to which fear and uncertainty would give rise. Canada has had ten years of unbalanced budgets.

That was the warning from one who was held in this house and throughout the country as being one of the greatest ministers of finance we have ever had. He made that statement with a budget I think of $580 million of expenditure and $520 million of revenue, or a deficit of $60 million. Was there neither truth nor wisdom or common sense in that statement? Our Minister of Finance gives us a budget to-day of $6,000 million with a deficit of approximately $3,000 million. Where is the end? That is because this parliament under section 59 and section 75 of the Bank Act has given away the power of this nation to create its own money to a monopoly of debt dealers who think in terms of issuing bank deposits as a substitute for money, only in terms of private gain and not in terms of public need.

Let me put on the record a summary of the evidence taken in 1939 and agreed to by the governor of the bank. I read from page 90 of the evidence of the standing committee of this year, where I am examining Mr. Towers:

Q. Then if I just give a short summary of what I think we agreed on in 1939, it might cover the situation. We agreed first that our medium of exchange was created under the laws of parliament and consisted of the following: (1) metal coins minted by the mint; (2) Bank of Canada bills issued by the Bank of Canada, and I think that we agreed that that was our national currency and represented about 12 per cent of the total amount of medium of exchange in use; (3) chartered bank bills issued by the chartered banks; and (4) credit entries constituting debt obligations of the chartered banks to customers of the chartered banks and called bank deposits. Those I think we agreed were the four types of media of exchange that constituted the money of Canada. I think you agreed to that.—A. Yes.

Q. I think we also agreed that the government were able to finance public enterprise by using (1) national currency; (2) by taxation; (3) by borrowing from the people; and (4) by borrowing from the chartered banks. Those four methods are, I think, the only four available to government as a means of financing. We agreed on that, I think. Is that right?—A. Yes.

Q. I think we also agreed that our paper money issued by the Bank of Canada for domestic purposes was just as good as gold.—A. Certainly.

Q. Yes.—A. Provided reasonable restraint was exercised.

Q. Oh, yes. Of course, gold has a bad habit of bouncing around. Somebody has suggested that it might go to $65 an ounce. It has already bounced from $20 to $35. I think we also agreed that, as the law is to-day, a chartered bank with $50,000 in Bank of Canada cash was able to purchase interest-bearing bonds from the government to the value of $1,000,000 by giving the government a credit of a million dollars in the bank's books. We agreed on that. We also agreed that under bank practice, the bankers hold 10 per cent of all cash reserves, so that under banking practice a banker with $100,000 in Bank of Canada bills can purchase $1,000,000 in interest-bearing bonds by writing into the books of the chartered banks a credit to the government of $1,000,000. We agreed on that, did we not?—A. Yes.

Q. And we also agreed that the chartered banks do not lend their depositors' savings. That is right?—A. They do not lend their liabilities.

Q. They do not lend their liabilities, and they do not lend their depositors' credits or savings?—A. That is right.

Then, a little further on:

Mr. Slaght: Mr. Chairman, the reporter cannot get a nod of the head. If Mr. Towers does not mind saying yes, the record will be kept straight.

The Chairman: Mr. Towers, I wonder if you would sit over here. I think the reporter could hear you better.

The Witness: Very well, Mr. Chairman.

By Mr. McGeer:

Q. We also agreed that because they do not lend deposits the chartered banks finance their loans by the same practice as I mentioned with reference to the purchase of a bond, namely increasing their deposit liabilities ten times over their cash reserves?—A. Yes.

Q. That is right. When the banks make loans in that way, they increase the volume of medium of exchange in circulation?—A. Yes.

Q. And when they call their loans they decrease the volume of medium of exchange in circulation?—A. That is right.

Q. We have agreed on those general principles, and I think that that was the general result, among other things, of my own inquiry in 1939.—A. Yes.

That evidence gave beyond a shadow of a doubt the answer to the question of the people who are mystified by this sudden appearance and disappearance of money. Under section 59 and section 75 this parliament has given to this monopoly the power to lend money into circulation and to create inflationary conditions, and then to withdraw it from circulation and precipitate deflationary conditions. With that power, as Mr. Towers has outlined it, in their possession, and having in their possession sufficient reserves under section 59 as it now stands to increase their issue of currency by $5,000 million, we have no control over the inflation of currency through the Bank of Canada or through any other medium of government. If you are afraid of currency inflation, if what we have heard in support of the taxation policies of the government is sound, if it must be necessary to take the people's money away from them to reduce circulation, then it cannot be reasonable and logical to leave a power of this kind in a private monopoly which, under section 59, has unbridled authority to control the economic bloodstream not only of the nation but of the people in every part of this dominion.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have been listening intently to my hon. friend and I should like to ask him as to the unbridled authority of which he speaks which is left in the hands, as he says, of the private institutions. Was not that one of the reasons underlying the setting up of the Bank of Canada in the first instance, namely, to control these economic movements from time to time of inflation and deflation?

Mr. McGEER: Quite true. You will find it fully discussed in the English Macmillan report. They reported that these controls were ineffective, that the controls consisted of, first, the bank rate. Assume you are starting off to set up a banking system. You set up your merchant banks around the national central bank. The merchant banks must borrow from the central bank the cash reserves which they use to issue their bank deposit medium of exchange. If the chartered banks are borrowing from the central bank, then, if you raise the rate of interest, their inclination is to pay off their loans. If you lower the rate of interest their inclination is to borrow more, and so by the rise and fall of the so-called bank rate, which is referred to in Mr. Towers' Bank of Canada report this year, but is admitted by Mr. Towers never to have been in operation as an effective factor of control since the Bank of Canada commenced operations—there is no dispute about that. So the bank rate is out.

The first of the two other controls which incidentally are also incorporated in bank rate policy is the buying of securities. When the Bank of Canada goes into the market and buys a bond from an individual or from a government it sends its money into circulation. Sooner or later that money will be deposited in a chartered bank, and it then becomes the chartered bank's money. The chartered bank banks the money and gives to the depositor a deposit liability in its books. That is what is called an easy money policy, because it gives to the chartered banks cash reserves free of any interest rate at all and subject only to whatever liability there is to the depositor, the liability for servicing the depositor through the cheque system. But the money goes from the Bank of Canada free. Now, selling securities is the opposite of that. When the Bank of Canada sells securities it calls for payment in Bank of Canada cash. But there is no power in the Bank of Canada Act by which it can compel the chartered banks either to buy or sell securities. If a bank says, or the public says, "We do not want to buy," or if a bank says or the public says, "We do not want to sell," there is no power to compel it to do either. But we have carried on an easy-money policy to this extent: In addition to the $500 million which the banks have on deposit, another $860 million of Bank of Canada cash is circulating nobody knows where, perhaps in the pockets of the people, perhaps in their possession, but every dollar of it is a potential chartered bank reserve over which this government through the Bank of Canada has no control at all.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I should like to answer some of the allegations of the hon. gentleman as far as he has gone, and then, if he would like to continue after I get through and give me some more to answer, I will answer him then.

We have had this afternoon what we had in the banking and commerce committee for many months—a succession of propositions, very persuasively and dogmatically stated, which in my judgment are fallacious and dangerous in the extreme, many of them half-truths in the economic sense. I do not hope this afternoon to convince the hon. gentleman who represents Vancouver-Burrard, or the hon. gentleman who represents Parry Sound, or the hon. gentleman who represents Lethbridge. I do not hope, I say, to convince those three hon. gentlemen; but I notice that the leader of the opposition has been paying attention to the discussion, and, lest he may think there is more in some of these arguments than there really is, I should like to get his ear and the ears of some of the other hon. gentlemen who are present.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is no harm in listening.

Mr. SLAGHT: Explain, not denounce.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member for Parry Sound will just be patient! He gets extremely excited when this matter comes up, and no one has done more denouncing in the last few months than the hon. member for Parry Sound. He knows that very well. He should be the last man in this house to advise other people to avoid denunciation.

Mr. SLAGHT: That is not true.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the situation? What is the real issue here, as to how this country should be financed in time of war and in time of peace? The issue is a narrow one. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard talks very glibly—

Mr. McGEER: Surely, Mr. Chairman, we can get along with the discussion without that kind of reference. I have not indulged in anything like that with the hon. gentleman, and there is nothing "glib" about what I am saying. It comes after profound study.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard talks very fluently about the mounting pyramid of debts, and coupled with that he mentions the danger of repudiation. He has used phrases about "drifting over the Niagara of debt into the whirlpool of bankruptcy", or something like that. Now if these statements are not true, if there is no foundation for them, they certainly should not be made at a time—of all times—when the country is at war.

What is the issue between the hon. gentleman and ourselves with regard to this "mounting pyramid of debt"? It became apparent in the banking and commerce committee—I can give the citations from the evidence if it is desired that I should do so—that the hon. members for Vancouver-Burrard, Lethbridge, and Parry Sound and myself were agreed that in time of war it was necessary for any country to tax its people heavily, so as to withdraw from them purchasing power which, not withdrawn from them, would lead to inflation. It was agreed by these hon. gentleman and myself that in addition to heavily taxing the people we should conduct great borrowing campaigns and persuade people to save and buy bonds, carry on the kind of campaign we have carried on for the sale of victory bonds and war savings certificates, for the same reason, the reason being that if we did not in some way channel back to the treasury the excess purchasing power created by war conditions, we would lose control of our price level, as so many other countries unfortunately have done.

With regard to the balance, the very small balance proportionately, which cannot be raised by taxation or by borrowing, there is a difference of opinion. The increase in the holdings of the chartered banks of this country of dominion government securities between August 1939 and December 1943 was $1,440 million. The difference between the attackers of this system and the upholders of this system is this, that instead of increasing the holdings of the chartered banks by $1,440 million between August 1939 and December 1943, the banks should not have been permitted to increase their holdings of government securities at all, that the securities should have been held by the Bank of Canada and sold to the Bank of Canada instead of to the chartered banks; so that under the system which we have adopted we are or were at the end of December, 1943, if bonds held by the Bank of Canada are not regarded as debt, more heavily in debt to the extent of $1,440 million than we would have been under the system advocated by those who are attacking us. That is the issue: instead of our direct debt being something like $11 billion as it was at the end of 1943, had the other system been adopted our direct debt would have been slightly less than $10 billion. Under one system we are drifting over the Niagara of debt into the whirlpool of bankruptcy, with possible repudiation; under the other system we are living in a heaven of debt-free money and not creating debt claims.

I hope hon. gentlemen have followed these figures, because it must be clearly understood that the attackers of the system of financing this war would themselves have created an enormous internal debt, would have been obliged to create an enormous internal debt, only slightly smaller than that which we have created.

But, they say, why create that balance? Why buy bonds from the chartered banks instead of from the Bank of Canada? Now, we could have sold our bonds, to cover that proportionately small balance, to the Bank of Canada instead of to the chartered banks, but had we done so, leaving section 59 as it is, I think it is generally admitted that we would have had grave danger of a most serious inflation, because of the multiplication of deposits which would come, based on the increased cash deposits in the chartered banks. In order to avoid that we have what is known as the 100 per cent cash ratio suggestion, which is that after a certain date or with regard to certain deposits the banks should not be allowed to lend money or undertake deposit liabilities to the extent of five or ten per cent of their cash reserves, should not be able to lend any money at all or lend any deposits based on these cash reserves, but that those cash reserves should be put back in the Bank of Canada. That is what is suggested. But what happens? The government borrows its money from the Bank of Canada and spends that money into circulation. The persons who receive that money put it in the chartered banks and the chartered banks incur deposit liabilities, which liabilities cast upon them very substantial expenses, and they are denied any opportunity of recouping themselves for any of those expenses at all.

Mr. McGEER: That is not borne out by the evidence.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is. I do not wish to be deflected. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will seize upon this, I am sure; nevertheless I want to put it fairly before the committee. If one borrows from the government system and permits the private system to carry on commercial banking you have an impossible situation on a 100 per cent reserve ratio system. If the government system were undertaking all the expense of the deposit banking system there would be no reason why we should not borrow from the government system. So far as the point I am discussing at the moment is concerned there would not be, because they would take the bitter with the sweet. But certainly one cannot consider that simply by borrowing from the government system, which has no obligations with respect to deposits and does not have to pay a cent of savings bank interest on any money taken in, which does not have to cash cheques or maintain branches right across the country with large staffs, but casts that expense on a privately owned system, the government is saving money except at the expense of somebody. Now, at whose expense is it? In the last analysis, it certainly would be at the expense of those using the commercial or private banking system.

One of the worst things about the banking committee this year was the fact that, for one reason or another, we did not have an opportunity of examining the systems of other countries and finding out what happened there, how wholesome it was to finance the war to a large extent by the issue of what is called debt-free money, and to find out what the conditions were in the countries that tried that. An hon. member says, take China. But that is an extreme case. However, there is a long list of countries where the amount of central bank borrowing is away up, and the cost-of-living index is anywhere from 200 to 700 per cent.

Mr. McGEER: Well, take the Soviet Union.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not talking about the Soviet Union.

Mr. McGEER: If you are going to take in China, take in the Soviet Union too.

Mr. ILSLEY: What I am saying is that the committee did not examine conditions in those countries. But in one country in particular, a sister dominion, I can tell this committee what happened. I refer to Australia. That subject was not pursued very far. In Australia they did borrow from the central bank after a certain date instead of going to the chartered banks for their borrowings. Mind you, they tax very heavily in Australia, and everyone admits that we must do that. And they borrow very heavily in Australia, and everyone admits that we must do that. But as to the residuum, the margin, the balance, they borrowed from the central bank instead of from the commercial banks, and the result was that this money went out and into the commercial banks, into the banks doing commercial business—because the central bank does some commercial business too in Australia. They found that in order to prevent the evils of a great multiplication in deposits and prevent a rise in the price level, they had to provide for the deposit of all cash increases in those banks after a certain date back into the central bank, which is the 100 per cent reserve ratio system. They adopted that plan in Australia, although they did not give it that name. That was what they did about the end of 1941. But what did they do next? They saw it was so unfair to the depositors in the commercial banks and to the commercial banks themselves, casting upon them burdens of servicing the public without giving them any revenue out of which to do it, that they decided to give them some revenue, and so they paid them three-quarters of one per cent per annum on this amount which they compelled the banks to deposit back in the central bank. Independently of experience in Australia, we in the Dominion of Canada, in the summer of 1942, found that we had to borrow from the chartered banks. We had tried desperately to avoid any bank borrowing, but in the summer of 1942 we had to borrow from the chartered banks.

Mr. McGEER: Australia did not abandon the 100 per cent cash reserve.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but they came to exactly the same result as we did.

Mr. McGEER: Nonsense.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let the hon. gentleman show the contrary if he will.

Mr. McGEER: We will.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The money that Australia borrowed from the central bank, on which she is paying three-quarters of one per cent—does she owe that money? Has that been added to the national debt?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has not been added to the debt of the government of Australia, but there is a deposit liability of the central bank of Australia to the chartered banks of an equivalent amount.

Mr. McGEER: Of cash they deposited.

Mr. ILSLEY: Exactly. My hon. friend gets so excited in these things. If I make a personal remark he does not like it. I will not refer to his being excited, or glib, or fluent, but I would ask him to keep his seat. Instead of going through that circuitous process of borrowing from the central bank, and then making the chartered banks deposit it all back in the central bank, with the central bank paying the chartered banks three-quarters of one per cent on it, we went to the chartered banks and paid three-quarters of one per cent direct. That was what we did and we arrived at the same result. That is covered by evidence in the banking committee, not thoroughly or completely, but by evidence given by the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And you still owe the money.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us deal with that. I have established the case that the carrying charges, the interest rates, are no different under one system from those under the other.

Mr. McGEER: We do not agree with that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know my hon. friend does not agree, but let us assume for the sake of argument that I have established it. I can come back to the point just as well as my hon. friend can if he wishes to argue it further. However, let us assume that the matter has been, at least prima facie, satisfactorily cleared up, that it costs the government as much as if they treated the banks and the depositors fairly. If they want to close up the banks, to wreck them, or to impose large service charges on depositors—and all this will be urged later on, I am sure—if that is what is sought, that is a different matter. But if you want to treat the banks and depositors fairly the interest situation will be the same. Oh, yes, it will be said; but look at the situation with regard to principal. In the one case, all the people of the country, through their government, owe the debt to all the people of the country and there is no debt at all, whereas in the other case all the people of the country, through their government, owe a debt to the chartered banks of the country. But in the case of the 100 per cent reserve ratio, the amount that is deposited by the chartered banks in the central bank becomes a deposit liability of the central bank to the chartered banks, and a very great one, because of the volume of the amounts involved. So that if you regard your central bank as an agency of your government —and you have to regard it as an agency of your government if you are to avoid the position that a debt is created when you sell bonds to the central bank—then you have a big principal obligation, namely, a deposit liability of the central bank to the chartered banks. Now this matter can be argued and argued, but unless—

Mr. McGEER: But the debts roll on.

Mr. ILSLEY: And the debts would roll on under my hon. friend's system. Let me take some of the things the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said in the banking and commerce committee. Part of the time one would think we should not have incurred any debt at all during this war. This is what he said at page 585 of the committee's proceedings:

> . . . we could have issued, under the controls that we had and without going into debt, enough of national capital through Bank of Canada money to finance the government, without incurring any obligation of debt at all. . . .

I am sure that is what many hon. members of this house and perhaps people throughout the country think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has been standing for.

Mr. McGEER: Of course he has.

Mr. ILSLEY: All right What did he say about what he would have done during this war, at page 1280 of the committee's proceedings:

> I would use the power to tax, and in war time I would use it to the very limit that it could be employed to prevent war profits of an excessive character and to utilize it to the greatest extent to divert everything towards the production of war goods.

Then on page 1281:

> I would exhaust the means of taxation. Then I would have resorted to borrowing from the public and I would have made the same appeal that has been made but I would have gone further.

Then I think he branched into his plan of compulsorily taking a lot of the savings deposits. Then on page 1282:

> All right, I will go this far with you. We will go to the point of saying that we will tax and we will borrow to the limit of the public's capacity to lend and then we will use our national currency for the balance.

How does that stack up with the other statement? Let me read the first statement again:

> . . . we could have issued, under the controls that we had, and without going into debt . . .

Here is the hon. gentleman who would have borrowed to the limit, who would have borrowed more than we did. In another place he says:

> . . . we could have issued, under the controls that we had without going into debt, enough of national capital through Bank of Canada money to finance the government, without incurring any obligation of debt at all. . . .

Mr. McGEER: Let me get in just one word.

Mr. ILSLEY: No—

Mr. McGEER: Well, if you do not want to let me explain it.

Mr. ILSLEY: —my hon. friend can reply when I get through. This is his policy, and the policy of the hon. member for Lethbridge. I will say that the hon. member for Parry Sound has never given two impressions. He has attempted—

Mr. McGEER: There are no two impressions in what I said; it is only the kind of glasses through which the minister is looking that makes him think so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think my hon. friend will be pretty good if he can say that he is in favour of borrowing to the limit and yet not going into debt.

Mr. McGEER: Give me a chance and I will do so immediately.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, go ahead, then.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Finance has the floor. When the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was speaking certainly he was not interrupted by the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I should complete my forty minutes first, then, because when the hon. gentleman takes the figures of debt; when he paints this appalling picture of the debt this country is incurring, he does not take the debt to the banks only. He takes figures like eleven billion dollars, fourteen billion dollars, sixteen billion dollars and twenty billion dollars. He counts all this valuable, wholesome borrowing from the public, which he himself advocates, in piling up this debt which he condemns. When we reached this point in the banking and commerce committee; when the hon. gentleman was pinned down after the lengthy speeches he made and asked. "What would you have done"? he said he would have taxed, in the severe way that I have mentioned; he would have borrowed, only he would have borrowed more than we did. But then for the balance—and there might not have been any balance if he had borrowed so much more, and the debt would have been greater than it is at the present time—he would have issued national currency. That is, he would have borrowed from the Bank of Canada instead of from the chartered banks; and he thinks that by some magic, for that is all it would be, he would gain something for the country by borrowing from a government institution instead of from privately owned institutions. My contention is that the interest obligations of the public, if they do the fair thing, will be the same under both systems; and that the principal obligation, certainly if one comes to the deposit liability of the central bank to the chartered banks, would be the same under both systems.

The hon. gentleman in his speech used a phrase which is so attractive and so hard to answer in a sentence or two. He used these words: "If we can issue bonds; if we can use the printing presses to print bonds, why can we not do that to issue currency?" The difference between the two is just this, that when you issue bonds you borrow money from people, reduce their bank deposits and transfer them to the government account; you do not increase the total amount of money or circulating medium in the country. But when you talk of printing money to the amount of a million dollars and paying your contractors, your civil servants and so on, you have increased the circulating medium of the country by a million dollars; and if that goes into the chartered banks as reserves it may be multiplied quite a bit beyond that. Yet I know that very question is troubling hon. members of this house. They say, "If you can turn on the printing presses for bonds, why can you not do it for dollars?" The reason is that in one case you are borrowing; you are taking back the purchasing power of the people, getting it away from them so that they will not exert that irresistible upward pressure which otherwise their spending would exert, while in the other case you are not lowering their purchasing power at all.

Mr. ROWE: You are increasing it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, you are increasing it. That is the reason for doing it under one system rather than the other. In his speech the hon. gentleman said that we must not have deficit financing. I want to say that in due course, after we pass through the war and the immediate post-war period, I hope to get into a position where there will not be any deficits in Canada. We can do that if we can get private investment up to the level at which it ought to be, and if we can keep a healthy, well-balanced condition of prosperity in this country. The hon. member quotes Mr. Dunning back in 1939 as saying that if the fear should become rooted that there are always going to be deficits and that the economic fabric is being destroyed, it will be destroyed. That is why I do not like these speeches, which, if they were taken seriously, might result in that fear becoming rooted.

There is no ground whatever for alarm with regard to the debt we have accumulated so far. I should like hon. members to read the figures I put on the record on July 11, 1944, which appear at page 4718 of Hansard, showing that on March 31, 1944, the net annual carrying charge on Canada's direct and indirect funded debt was only $183,509,355 if the surplus of the Canadian National Railways is regarded as a factor in arriving at the net annual carrying charge of the debt. If it is not so regarded, the charge is $219,149,355. On March 31, 1939, the net carrying charge was $149,651,990 and on March 31, 1920, it was $164,349,572. What is there in figures like that to justify these alarmist utterances, this talk about a Niagara of bankruptcy, the fear of repudiation, and so on? This country will not repudiate. It is nowhere near the place where there is any cause for alarm. A year or two ago I used to be afraid for the success of our victory loans when I heard speeches of this kind, but I am glad to say that the people of the country did not take them very seriously. They have faith in the future of the country and they know that the annual carrying charges are well within our capacity to look after. The hon. member talks here at times about the spending of money in huge sums on the building of public works in every part of Canada—the trans-Canada highway, works to block the strait of Belle Isle, a causeway across the strait of Canso, and so on, and so on, having no fear at all about the expenditure of money. But the moment he comes to an actual expenditure of $183,000,000 he goes back to these gloomy and despairing predictions about the future of the country, and the inability of the country to carry the burden.

This country can carry a burden of very much greater debt. He says that we do not know, that we will not say how big a debt it can carry. He says that we will not say what the point is when the intolerable strain will be too heavy. No, we do not say that. I believe they have had in the United States great arguments about the amount of debt the United States can carry. I do not think that government ever said, and I do not think any government in Canada can say dogmatically. We have to see how conditions develop in this country.

I would be foolish to stand up here and say that if in 1950 we have a debt of twenty billions of dollars we cannot carry it, or say that if in 1955 we have a debt of twenty-five billions of dollars we cannot carry it—or we can carry it. I would be foolish to say that, because I cannot predict the conditions which will exist. But we do know that we have to do everything within our power for the promotion of private investment and, if that is not sufficient, public investment, and by other means—by sound, social security measures, and otherwise—to see that the people of our country attain full employment or at least attain high employment in the post-war period. I feel that we shall be buoyant under the same national economy and financial system which has been adopted in other countries. I am thinking of countries like Great Britain, like the United States, like New Zealand. I am not quite sure about the situation in South Africa, but I imagine it is the same there. Those are countries which have adopted substantially the same system which we have in Canada. That is to say, in time of war they tax heavily and they borrow heavily.

The hon. members who have attacked this system in the banking and commerce committee concede that if we are going to prevent inflation in Canada we have to tax heavily and borrow heavily. I do not complain about that situation, but I do complain about the sweeping statements about the creating of debt, the iniquity behind our banking system, and the necessity of having debt-free money, when the very ones who suggest these ideas admit themselves that we will not have it in time of war, and probably cannot have it after the war, either.

Next the hon. member made some statements about his policy after the war, which was practically the same as his statement with regard to banking during the war. The hon. member said something about deposits being out of control. He said that the Bank of Canada's controls are entirely ineffective. He pointed out that we have $501,000,000 deposited in the chartered banks in cash reserves, and that they can issue or create deposits on this up to $5 billion. That is correct. Then he says that they have unbridled authority to do what they like.

A reserve in cash which must be about ten per cent is a pretty effective control, I can tell this committee.

Mr. McGEER: Who controls it?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Bank of Canada controls it. The Bank of Canada absolutely controls the amount of cash reserve. I have tried to make that clear, time after time. If those cash reserves now in the hands of the banks were to turn into an expansion of deposits, the Bank of Canada could take that out of the banks by the sale of securities. And when the hon. member says that no one can make anyone buy securities, and no one can make anyone sell securities, he is missing the fact that there is always a sale for securities, at a price.

The Bank of Canada can sell securities and buy securities, and by that method they can control the amount of cash reserves in the bank. If the cash reserves in the bank are reduced the amount of cash deposited has to be reduced, or the bank cannot continue in business. And if the cash reserves in the bank are increased, the bank will indisputably increase its loans and increase its deposits, because otherwise it could not profitably continue in business.

I have just touched on a few of the points introduced in the discussion. I have not said much about what has happened in the banking and commerce committee, because I wished to have these proceedings completed. However, I have taken this opportunity again to place on record the views which we hold, and which I have repeatedly expressed and justified in the house and outside the house, views which I think are fairly generally accepted the world over, and views which are sound.

Mr. McNEVIN: Mr. Chairman, in the discussion this afternoon something has been said about the time the bill was introduced into the house. If my memory serves me correctly, the Minister of Finance introduced the bill on May 2. It was referred to the banking and commerce committee on May 16, and on May 17 that committee gave Bill No. 91 precedence over all other business. The bill was finally passed in the banking and commerce committee on July 27. Therefore that committee spent two months and ten days in the discussion of this very important bill. I do not think any member of that committee or any member of the house can say that there was not ample time for a full review, investigation and discussion of the provisions of the bill which renews bank charters for another ten years.

I should like to make only one or two observations with respect to the provisions of this bill. I am very much in favour of those provisions which extend longer term credits to the great agricultural industry in Canada. I regard the banking business as a commission business. The banks have their capital; they have their reserves, and they have a deposit business.

This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said that in answer to questions asked the governor of the Bank of Canada the governor had said that the banks did not lend their deposits. That is true; he did say that. But the governor further explained that the banks lend the proceeds of their deposits which, I suggest, places an entirely different construction upon this situation.

The Minister of Finance has effectively reviewed the situation as far as the issue of Bank of Canada money is concerned, through the chartered banks. However, after two months and ten days of discussion the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard had some suggestions, which I regarded as his final suggestions. I find that on Thursday, July 20, seven days before the bill passed the committee, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said this:

> Mr. Chairman, yesterday the matter arose in connection with a liability that would be created or that some seemed to think would be created by the Bank of Canada taking over the savings deposits.

Meaning the savings deposits of the Canadian people.

Mr. SLAGHT: From what page are you quoting.

Mr. McNEVIN: From page 1295 of the evidence of July 20, 1944. Then on page 1296 the hon. member referred to the method the government should adopt to take over bank deposits. I quote:

> We have all the machinery; the Bank of Canada can take over the post office savings banks or use the post office savings banks and expand them; and there are the bank facilities to service the savings accounts in every village, in every hamlet and in every city and community where there is a post office.

In 1868, if my memory serves me correctly, the Dominion of Canada set up through the Post Office Department facilities to take care of bank deposits of the people of Canada. After seventy-six years of operation the savings branch of the Post Office Department has on deposit approximately $28,000,000 of the savings of the Canadian people on which they are paying a higher rate of interest than is paid by the chartered banks. During that period of years the chartered banks have been accepting deposits, and coming down to about the close of 1943 I find that in round figures the ten chartered banks of the Dominion of Canada had about $4,000,000,000 in deposits. I think that illustrates quite definitely the choice on the part of the Canadian people with regard to whether they consider the services of the post office savings banks as suitable as those of the chartered banks to meet their general banking requirements.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will the hon. member permit me? He is wrong in suggesting that there is $4,000,000,000 in savings deposits.

Mr. McNEVIN: I spoke of deposits; I did not specify savings deposits. I was making a comparison between the total moneys deposited in the post office savings banks and in the chartered banks, and in giving the total deposits I included both savings and demand deposits.

Mr. McGEER: What about the—

Mr. McNEVIN: If the hon. gentleman will kindly bear with me I will get back to another reference I want to make. I am thoroughly convinced that when the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard made the suggestion that we had facilities in every hamlet and every village in this Dominion of Canada to take care of the savings of the people he was on a very unsound foundation. First, may I say that there is no fire protection in those hamlets and villages, and that would be very important if we are going to have the savings of the Canadian people placed in these institutions.

I will go a step farther. Quite often the general store or the small frame building which houses the post office in our villages and hamlets is not strongly constructed. In addition, and perhaps more important, there is no police protection. If this government were unwise enough to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member we would be creating a happy hunting ground for every bank bandit and bank robber from the Mexican border clear up to Algonquin park. I notice he smiles, but he does not deny the suggestion he made which is contained on page 1296 of the evidence of the banking and commerce committee.

Something was said this afternoon about the Russian monetary system. I do not know whether it was referred to as a monetary system or a banking system, but reference was made to the method of financing the war in Russia. Some few weeks ago Russia, where as we all know they have a state banking system, floated a large loan issue.

Mr. McGEER: Who told you that?

Mr. McNEVIN: The governor of the Bank of Canada, and I consider information from that source as being sound. I do not think any member of this committee will for one moment question my authority. A portion of that loan was issued to non-individuals at a rate of two per cent, and this issue absorbed slightly less than thirty per cent of the total loan. There was an interesting method or system used in the flotation of the seventy per cent. It was on a lottery basis. The person who drew the lucky ticket collected the interest on a block of the bonds, and the other people received no interest. My point is that the seventy per cent of that loan cost the Russian government an average of four per cent in interest. Will any one suggest that that is a cheaper or sounder or more satisfactory system of financing the war than the one we are using in this country?

Mr. McGEER: What percentage of the cost of the year's war in Russia was financed in that way, and what percentage was financed by the use of soviet national currency?

Mr. McNEVIN: I have not discussed that situation for some time—

Mr. McGEER: Your answer is that you do not know.

Mr. McNEVIN: No, it is not. It may be just slightly larger than the percentage we have financed on a similar basis. I do not agree with the hon. member's contention that when you finance through the Bank of Canada you finance without interest. When you issue Bank of Canada money it goes out in cheques to working men, to soldiers, for the payment of dependents' allowances and so on; it goes into the chartered banks in the form of deposits and becomes a liability of the banks to the Canadian people. If you take the savings deposits at one per cent, that is not debt-free money.

During the discussion in the banking and commerce committee something was said about the great emancipator of the United States, Abraham Lincoln. It was said that Lincoln had financed the civil war by the issue of greenbacks. According to my recollection Lincoln did issue about $450 million in greenbacks, but later on about $103 million were withdrawn and the remaining part of the issue was absorbed by the rapidly developing, young and new country. But do not forget this, that in that same civil war the Confederates of the southern states issued very large amounts of fountain-pen money or paper currency that we hear so much about to-day, and I do not think more than one or two per cent of that money was ever redeemed. They papered their back kitchens with it and put it on their gate-posts, et cetera. That should not be forgotten.

But the most important point that I have in mind in connection with the financing of the war by our great and strong neighbour to the south is this. Lincoln was a great emancipator, one of the great presidents of the United States, just as our great neighbour to the south has a great president to-day in Franklin D. Roosevelt; but I am convinced of this, that had Lincoln discovered some method whereby you could finance a war without cost the people not only of the United States but of Canada and of Britain and of Russia would be using that system to-day. But what do we find? From June 12 to July 5 of this year the United States government authorized a loan issue of $16 billion. That was their fifth victory loan. Of that $16 billion, $6 billion was allotted to private subscribers and $10 billion to what we would call our special list. The result of the loan was that approximately $6 billion was subscribed by individuals and the $10 billion was oversubscribed by about $3 billion. So that our neighbours to the south, even in the light of the experiences which they had had under President Lincoln, found it necessary to borrow from June 12 to July 5 of this year a victory loan, not of one billion dollars or of two billion dollars but a loan of nineteen billion dollars. There is perhaps some difference between the rates of interest paid in the United States, in this country, in Soviet Russia, and in Great Britain but the fact remains that the major countries, not including China, who are fighting on our side in this war are all following a somewhat similar system of financing. That is why I have not been convinced by what I am sure were the lucid arguments of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Parry Sound.

Something was said in the discussions in the banking and commerce committee about bank deposits and I wish to touch upon that. According to the census of 1941 we had in the Dominion of Canada heads of families numbering 2,516,762. That represents the number of families in Canada at that time. We had employed at that date 2,115,299 males and 699,492 females, a total of 2,814,791 employed persons. The number of people employed and on the payrolls right now is higher than that, but I could not get the exact figures for a more recent date, so that I am taking the figures of the 1941 census. At the close of 1943 we had in the Canadian chartered banks demand deposit accounts numbering 738,300 and savings deposit accounts numbering 4,662,100. There was a total of 5,400,400 deposit accounts. Of course, there may be considerable duplication because some people would have one or two or perhaps more accounts, but I think I am perfectly safe in saying that, on the average, we have in the Dominion of Canada a bank account for every family, and I think that is a very good showing.

I have no particular interest in bankers, particularly big bankers, but what I kept firmly in my mind during the entire discussions in the banking and commerce committee was this, that these ten chartered banks have within their coffers somewhere between four and five billion dollars of deposits of the Canadian people's money, and it is in order to protect those deposits of such a large number of our people that I have been prepared, after lengthy and full discussions, to support the motion to renew the bank charters for a further period of ten years. I do not think this is a time when we should do anything to increase a feeling of uneasiness. We have inserted in the Bank Act wide and new provisions to enable the banks to lend money to farmers, fishermen and many others. The lending powers of the banks have been extended, and now in the closing months of the war we should do what we can to maintain stability because we are faced with great problems of financing reconstruction and rehabilitation in the peace-time period.

I wish to make a reference to a suggestion which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard made in the banking and commerce committee, to take over the savings of our people now in the chartered banks amounting to two billion dollars, if I remember correctly, and said that there is an interest rate of one per cent on that.

[Mr. McNevin.]

Mr. McGEER: No.

Mr. McNEVIN: Perhaps it was three billion dollars, but it does not affect my argument. An interest charge of one per cent on one billion dollars would amount to ten million dollars, and an interest charge of one per cent on two billion dollars would amount to twenty million dollars. The hon. member then said that a charge of one-half of one per cent should be allowed for servicing deposits. Then he went on to say that if the government took over that amount of two billion dollars at that rate of interest they would save a great deal of money, because the government were paying three per cent on the bonds which had been subscribed by the Canadian public. I want to dissipate that fallacy. At the present time the dominion government has borrowed from our chartered banks a total of not $2,000,000,000 but $2,700,000,000.

Mr. McGEER: It is $3,000,000,000 now.

Mr. McNEVIN: Take the figure of $2,700,000,000 which was given in the banking and commerce committee as the amount which the dominion government has borrowed from the chartered banks. Mr. Tompkins, the inspector general of banks, said that that was costing the Government an average interest rate of 1·59 per cent. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard suggested that by this means we could save a great deal of money, but when you are comparing the taking over of savings banks deposits, the comparison should not be with the bonds borrowed from the Canadian people, but with money borrowed by the government from the chartered banks; and what is the result? According to his computation, he admitted an interest rate of one per cent and one-half per cent service charge, or one and one-half per cent; in the other case the amount is 1·59 per cent; so that all we are discussing is the possibility of saving the difference between one and one-half and 1·59 per cent.

It is possible that if the discussion is prolonged I shall have something further to say later in this debate. I commend the Minister of Finance for the way in which he is carrying a tremendous burden in the successful financing of the war effort of Canada, an effort which compares very favourably with that of any other country, through a financial system which, while I do not say it is superior, is second to no other financial system in the world.

In conclusion, I would sound a note of warning with regard to inflation. Not many weeks ago a friend of mine returned from war-torn, war-ridden China, a country where inflation is eating the very heart out of the people and seriously hampering the war effort of the valiant Chinese, as well as causing some concern to the Americans who are endeavouring to assist them with their finances. Let me give this illustration. A missionary friend, when he was working in the mission field of China back in 1941, was finding it difficult to get milk for his two or three children. A friend said, "Why do you not buy a cow?" He said, "I think I will." Even at that time this cow cost up in the thousands of dollars in the currency of that country. Several months ago, when about to leave China, and not wanting to keep the cow, because he had no one to look after it while he was away, a friend said to him, "If you do not want to keep your cow I will buy it." What do you think he got for the cow? Fifty thousand dollars in Chinese money. That illustrates the heights to which inflation can reach. Of course, before returning to Canada he transferred the fifty thousand dollars of Chinese money into Canadian money and he did not have any more, nor indeed quite as much, as one would get for a cow in this country.

I believe that the Minister of Finance through price control and sound financing has protected the interests of the vast majority of the people.

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard in his opening remarks left the impression that the Bank Act as approved by this committee will be the banking law of this country for the next ten years. He qualified that by saying that he did not intend to run again and that this would be the last chance he would have to change the banking laws. I do not think an impression of that kind should be left with the committee or with the country, because so far as I can see, any government, at any time when parliament is in session, could change the banking laws as it saw fit, if supported by parliament.

Mr. McGEER: Well, why the ten-year provision?

Mr. KINLEY: I will come to that. I think the provision does one thing: if a government changes the law inside of ten years the responsibility would be put where it belongs and that government would have to take the responsibility of the changes.

My hon. friend asks me, why make it ten years? That has been the custom in this country and it has proved a good custom. I believe that, in the interests of planning and service, we should afford a degree of stability to our monetary institutions. I believe also that if we change this plan at the moment, at this critical time in our history, we should be showing lack of resolution.

Mr. McGEER: Will the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. KINLEY: Yes.

Mr. McGEER: When, in any ten-year period, did we ever change the chartered Bank Act of Canada?

Mr. KINLEY: I think, Mr. Chairman, that supports exactly what I say. We did not change it because we did not want to change it, but we could have changed it had we considered it necessary to do so. That, it seems to me, is an additional argument for adhering to the ten-year rule. I believe that any wavering in this regard is a sign of weakness, indecision and distrust. If it is a good thing to continue, why cast doubts about it and say, "We will give you a lease of life for two years. We are not brave enough to destroy you, but we may get courage enough and facts enough in the future to do you some damage when you come back to this house."

In the difficult days ahead the banks should be enabled to function without the insecurity of impending destruction. If anything is wrong, now is the time to change it. Recurring revisions of the Bank Act have always brought changes, and this revision is no exception. The banks must accept these changes. My general opinion is that the banks have done a fairly good job. They are restricted by law. There are some things they cannot do. But we restrict them to make them safe; we limit their services to a certain sphere so that they shall serve the public in the way we intend them to do.

Are the banks efficient? Let us compare them with others. This is a competitive world. Other nations have banks and similar financial institutions. Is there any place in the world which can give us fuller knowledge or teach us more of the mechanics of the operations of banks? In the great republic to the south, a few years ago, the banks were closed. They were unable to perform the functions for which they were intended. They did not have the stability nor did they enjoy the general advantages which are possessed by the Canadian banking system, which is based on the Scottish system. For that reason the banks in that rich country, the United States, failed to function. They could take a lesson from the Canadian banking system.

Another reason why I think our banks are efficient is that they do business in other countries. When you make a product which you use yourself it must be fairly good, but when you can export it to other countries and they are willing to use it you know it must be efficient because it meets the competition of the world. Our banks have gone to other countries; they have branches in London, in New York, in Paris, in a number of the South American states and other countries, and are doing business there, and they are missionaries of Canadian trade. To disturb a situation of that kind would be a very foolish act on our part at the present time.

Not every business in Canada is restricted to ten years, because we give charters to other corporations. Moreover, limited liability is a privilege to any institution because it absolves the members from certain obligations with regard to personal liability so that they can carry on. Their charters continue indefinitely. One of the reasons for incorporating a company is that when a man dies his business carries on and there is not the same confusion as ensues upon the death of a man who has been carrying on a personal business. Why then, seeing that the banks are subject to greater control than any other business, should we be so particular; why should we be afraid to extend their charters at this time after they have shown a good record, and have continued to do business successfully, and have given us evidence that they will render as good service both within and outside Canada in the immediate days to come as they have done in the past.

In this revision some changes have been made. The banks had a maximum interest rate of seven per cent and we have reduced it to six per cent. Do you know what was said in that regard? It was said that the banks are doing most of their business at six per cent now so that the reduction will not hurt them. In other words, as a result of their efficiency, they were reaching the point which we would compel them to assume by legislation, and when they get the legislation it will not hurt them a bit.

Furthermore, we have extended their powers and increased their responsibility in lending money to fishermen and farmers, so that they can lend money on floating property, which has always been regarded as too hazardous for the banking system. It was difficult to get money on floating property. This is something I regard as advantageous to my constituency because we make our living on the sea, and anything in the Bank Act which will stimulate the marine business of the country will receive my support, because I believe it is in the interests of the people I represent.

As regards farmers, we have an amendment which will allow greater liberty in the making of loans to this class. That is in the interests of the country; it is a step forward. That is something else we have incorporated in the Bank Act this year to bring it into line with the progress that is being made generally.

There has been a change with regard to the qualification of directors, and that I think is a good idea because there might be some misunderstanding in the country. It might be felt that the banks are the citadel of wealth in Canada and that men with big bank accounts, men who are dealing in financial matters, are the only ones who should run the banks. The banks themselves agree that they should draw upon labour and the producing and farming community and lower the qualifications for directors so as to enable the banks to take advantage of that added strength which would come from below. I am sure that will be of assistance and will prove of great value. I think parliament did the banks a good turn in this regard and the banks have so accepted it.

There was some discussion about small loans. There are small loan companies charging two per cent for money under certain conditions.

Mr. SLAGHT: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member but I understand that we are on section 59 and section 79 and in discussing these collateral banks I am afraid the hon. gentleman is far afield. There is one of them in connection with which I should like to reply to him if he continues. Frankly, I do not wish to confine the discussion in the slightest degree, but I want to have it understood that if he is going to discuss these collateral banks I shall not be out of order myself when I discuss them from my point of view.

Mr. KINLEY: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, you will remember that we went through the Bank Act very hurriedly and reserved three sections for the purpose of discussion. I do not believe that I have touched upon anything which was not brought up by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and I was replying to him. I agree that if the hon. gentleman wishes to restrict this discussion to the section immediately before us—

Mr. SLAGHT: No; I do not want to do that. I simply wish to make that reservation.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order has been well taken. The hon. member for Parry Sound knows, however, that I cannot allow any reservation. We are not discussing two sections. We are discussing section 59, the marginal note of which is "Cash Reserves in Bank of Canada notes and deposits." I have allowed some latitude to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard because it is almost impossible for hon. members to remain absolutely within the ambit of the clause, but it should be possible for hon. members to confine their remarks reasonably to the section under consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think we can agree on that.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN-YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS

The house resumed consideration in committee of bill No. 91, respecting banks and banking—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is considering section 59.

Mr. SLAGHT: When the committee rose, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member speaking had not concluded, as I understood. I do not desire to infringe upon his time if he has something further to say, but if you so direct I will proceed.

Mr. GRAYDON: We are in committee, in any event.

Mr. SLAGHT: In presenting my views on what to me are the two most important features of this bill to be dealt with by this committee, I desire to make my personal position very clear, as I have endeavoured to do on previous occasions. I have no quarrel with the bankers of this country as men and citizens. They are a worthy, patriotic, hard-working group of men. My quarrel is entirely with two features of the system under which the private banks are operated. And let me say that there can be no reflection upon any member of this committee, any member of this house, any member of this government or of any previous government within the lifetime of any member of this house in regard to the creation of the system which I believe is outmoded and must be discarded. This system was brought into existence by our forefathers. No living member of the House of Commons had anything whatever to do with its creation; nor is it necessary in this discussion to place any blame on our forefathers for having created this monopoly. Conditions then were entirely different from conditions of to-day. Trading was on a small and crude basis. There were no railways. It could scarcely be called the horse-and-buggy days; it was largely the day of the oxcart when the present system came into the hands of the bankers. Highways as we have them to-day were practically unknown, and from Ottawa to Toronto was a two weeks' journey. There was no electricity, gas, telephone or telegraph. There were no motorcars and no branch banks. The currency of the country was in pounds, shillings and pence. The industrial life of Canada as we know it to-day had not developed at all.

I comment on this because we are all more or less inclined to be averse to changing existing conditions. Let no man tell me, however, that the change in our whole economic structure and way of life since the time this system was inaugurated has not been progressive, radical and so great as to be almost unrecognizable. I think it was Mr. Morris Wilson who, ten years ago, when asked why this system should not be changed, smiled and offered to the committee of that day, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, the reason, "It has just always been this way." In modern times that, I submit, is not good enough.

I present two main objectives which I believe must be given effect to, if we are to protect the people in the next ten years. Both of these come under the reform set out in sections 59 and 75. The first is to retake from the banks, for the Canadian people, through the government, the right to create and control currency and credit, and the issue of money. The second is that, hereafter, when new money has to be created, it shall be issued into existence through the Bank of Canada, instead of being borrowed into existence through the private banks, by the use of debt borrowing securities.

My submission is that we should do no borrowing whatsoever from the private banks for public financing or for government needs. We shall thereby destroy what is at present a toll-gate privilege now enjoyed by the banks, of collecting from the government interest on new money issued with the backing of our national credit, by pretending to lend us money which they do not possess but which, in reality, is our own money, our own credit or our own medium of exchange.

Let me put it in another way, as it was put by the present Prime Minister in parliament in 1933, and repeated in 1935 on the public platform. This is a policy which I used in my campaign when seeking election. This is the first time since 1935, in a period of ten years, that there has been a chance to amend the Bank Act. I appeal to the committee, to all political parties, to accept this—not because it is the language of the present Prime Minister, but because it is the very best and soundest economic doctrine which could be presented for the benefit of our people. He said:

> Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit shall be restored to government—

That was in 1935. Who had that control? He said that until it shall be—> —restored to government, and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile. To regain for the nation what has thus been lost will continue to be the first objective of Liberal effort.

Again I quote the Prime Minister, as recently as June 20 of this year—1944—when he spoke upon introducing into the house bill No. 82, to establish a department of reconstruction. He referred to it in this language:

> . . . restoring and increasing the capital equipment of the nation . . .

And then added:

> It is in connection with this economic reconstruction that the new department of reconstruction of the federal government will be primarily concerned.

I do not believe there is a member in the house who does not recognize the need for post-war reforms, as against the old order of things. I think every hon. member would agree that we are not going to allow our men to come back to the conditions they left. Who will gainsay that, among all these reforms, the question of economic reform does not stand at the very threshold and, in the language of the Prime Minister, must be our primary concern? Are we to go back to the days where we are to be asked by the treasury department as we were in peace time, when we desired to increase old age pensions—a small item, but an important one—"Where will the money come from?" If we are to go back to those days, then the picture we are all seeking to bring into being must disappear.

I quote further the language of Mr. Graham Towers, the governor of the Bank of Canada, contained in his annual report issued in February, when he warned us that there lie ahead, to be solved by the government, problems of unprecedented magnitude. Before I conclude I shall ask the Minister of Finance, and I shall also ask my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party, who may oppose the reform I suggest, what their remedy would be. What have they to suggest?

We at least have a remedy. I recognize that some may not agree with it. Some may find hidden within it dangers which outweigh the virtues. But we must all agree in the face of language like that from the governor of the Bank of Canada that our problems of government in the economic field are of unprecedented magnitude. If there is any member who will quarrel with those solemn statements by our Prime Minister and the governor of the Bank of Canada, so far as I am concerned he must give me an alternative remedy capable of operation.

Please do not misunderstand my position. I would preserve for private banks—and there, for the moment, I would disagree with my distinguished friend, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party—the right to carry on the commercial banking business of this country, and the right to lend up to the amount of their own capital, and in addition an amount equivalent to the time deposits—that is, the savings deposits—of their customers. But beyond such limits the banks ought not to be allowed to lend money, except to the extent that they have a full cash reserve, either in currency or in credit.

This policy I suggest will save the country from going farther down the path of an ever-increasing public debt, one which has already reached an appalling total. Mr. Graham Towers admitted to me, at page 159 of the evidence, that by the end of this year, 1944, it would reach the sum of $16 billions. This amount includes dominion, provincial and municipal borrowings, on all of which, let us not forget, the taxpayer must pay interest. I suggest that we must call a halt, or run into national disaster, the disaster of repudiation.

It is all very well for the Minister of Finance to say that we can go on in this way, that we have only just started, and that Canada is a virile nation. He is not going to put me into the position of belittling Canada's great reserves, or her capacity to finance, by using an argument of that kind. I suggest, however, that the amount is staggering and appalling. The figure for interest this year, as given by Mr. Towers—and it will increase by $40,000,000 next year—is $280,000,000. That is what we have to pay to carry the dominion's load alone.

But do not take my word for it. Only a few days ago, on July 4, in the committee, Doctor Clark, the distinguished deputy minister, who is here to-night, made this admission to my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. This is what appears in the evidence:

> Q. —I think you will agree with me we cannot go on pyramiding debt, interest-bearing debt of the people of Canada indefinitely?
> A. Not indefinitely.

Then what is the remedy my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party offer? I have heard none in the banking and commerce committee. What remedy do our hon. friends in the group of Liberals in that committee or in this house, headed by certain of my hon. friends who are so solicitous for their Progressive Conservative friends offer? I must except the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. Is it to keep tax-free the inner reserves which the banks refuse to disclose?

I will touch on that in a moment because the Minister of Finance spent a little time this afternoon in trying to imply that if we took this monopoly away from the banks and gave it back to the people of Canada it would be disastrous to the banks. He contended that that is what would happen if we did not keep on borrowing nationally from them in the future. Mark you, I am not suggesting that we take anything away from them by paying in cash the debt of $2,700,000,000 which we owe them now and on which they are collecting $40,000,000 a year and will continue to collect that, as far as I can see, during the life of all the hon. members of this committee. In my judgment it will be a long, long year before Canada can ever hope to repay any principal money of the vast obligations we have undertaken.

I asked for remedies from those two groups. It is true that the C.C.F. suggested a remedy to parliament, but parliament rejected it. That aspect is not under discussion in this debate because my hon. friends of that party bowed to the decision of parliament when this bill was referred. I am not going to spend any time in discussing whether they are right or wrong, but they had a remedy. I want to say to those members who may have deep apprehension about that remedy and the incidents that will flow from it as to industry as a whole, that it is a dangerous thing—

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): It is a proposal, not a remedy.

Mr. SLAGHT: It is a proposed remedy. I hold no brief for them, but they believe it is a remedy that will cure. No doubt it would in part cure some of the evils of the present bill, but it would bring with it matters which in my judgment would be detrimental to our future economic possibilities, so much so that it may be that we dare not accept the good in their proposal because it would bring down around the country a whole house of cards containing much more evil. As I said, I am not going to argue that or express myself on it to-night because we shall hear a good deal about it between now and the next election.

I suggest that if you agree with the Prime Minister, if you agree with Mr. Graham Towers, you will believe with them that it is a problem of such terrific magnitude that someone must produce a remedy. I should like to hear from the Minister of Finance and his friends as to what their remedy is. I think I have heard it in the banking and commerce committee and you have had a smattering of it this afternoon. He has no cure or remedy; it is hopeless! Seventy-five years ago we gave away this monopolistic right to create money. We are now going to go on borrowing from the banks debt-laden money to fill Canada's needs, when we can step to the Bank of Canada and borrow it without interest. I must comment upon what the minister said when he exhorted the committee not to "wreck the banks." That was his expression. Why, he says, if you carry on what these monetary reformers are suggesting you are going to wreck the banks! He was commenting upon what he called the extravagant language of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

He said, "Why, the chartered banks, the private banks would have to impose service charges upon our people in order to permit them to service the money the Bank of Canada would issue for the public need." I agree with him that these funds would flow very promptly into the coffers of the chartered banks. I had not intended to deal with that here, but let me do so. Why in the world should not the people who receive service from the banks pay for it? Is it bad economic policy to see to it in your national set-up that those who receive benefits which are not conferred upon all the people should pay for them? Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, what the evidence in the committee disclosed. I do not want to spend too much time on this because I do not think it is worth an argument.

The CHAIRMAN: A point of order was raised before six o'clock. We had a general discussion on section 1 of this bill, and the bill has been in a committee for several months. I know the hon. member will be the last person to go too far away from the section now before the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Section 59 is a broad section.

Mr. SLAGHT: With great respect, Mr. Chairman, let me submit this to you. Section 59 is under discussion. We suggest that that is an evil section in its present form and contemplate a remedy. There will be an amendment moved to remedy it.

Mr. HOWDEN: There is, I understand, an amendment before the committee.

Mr. SLAGHT: There is no amendment to section 59. It is the problem for this committee to determine the reasons why section 59 should stand as it is. I am speaking now only to section 59, and perhaps to section 75, not to the amendment. Surely I am entitled, in answer to the argument put forward by the Minister of Finance, that if you amend section 59 in the way in which the minister is aware of and which he dragged into this debate this afternoon, in the way in which my colleague and myself propose, you will wreck the banks, you will be unfair to the banks and you will have to let the banks impose a service charge. Surely when the minister put that forward I am entitled to show that he is wrong, and that is what I propose to do.

In the matter of service charges the evidence shows that the small depositors who have $50, $75 and $100 on deposit are now charged by the banks, a service charge of five cents per cheque. But when you consider the large firms —without being invidious, I mention the T. Eaton company—who issue perhaps three, four or five thousand cheques a month, no service charge is made. It is suggested that because they carry a balance there should be no service charge.

Under the present system that service charge is being paid by the taxpayers in the $40,000,000 interest on these government loans. It is put forward that we must not take away the right of the bankers to go on lending money to the government and getting interest because the banks service that money after it comes back. The hon. member for Victoria, Ontario stated there were some 5,000,000 bank depositors in this country. In that figure he included both demand and savings depositors, but he could not separate them for me.

Mr. McNEVIN: I could separate them if I wanted to take the time. There were 700,000 and some odd demand, and 4,000,000 and a few thousand savings.

Mr. SLAGHT: There are 11,000,000 people in Canada, so that there are 6,500,000 who have no bank accounts. Somebody will say at once: Oh, the children are in that. Of course they are in that, but a very large number of people in Canada are paying taxes who have not and never had a bank account of any kind in their lives. When you say to me that such and such a man would be too poor to have an income upon which to pay taxes, let me reply that the poor people in this country are paying enormous taxes through the sales tax which they pay on everything they wear, and on everything that their children wear, boots and shoes and suits and so on. In this country, because of our climatic conditions, children require practically three outfits a year, and it may interest hon. gentlemen to know that last year this government collected $304,000,000 in sales tax. So do not tell me that the little fellows, because they are not paying income tax, are not paying taxes at all. Under the present system these little fellows are paying the taxes for the services which the big firms are getting for nothing. Let anyone rise in his place in this house and support that state of affairs. I only bring it to your attention, Mr. Chairman, to wipe out what the Minister of Finance thinks is an answer when he is asked to take back from the bankers what the British North America Act gave to the people of Canada. I do not agree with him and I do not think this committee should agree with him.

I had intended to give one or two extracts because, strange to say, when you suggest that we have given away to the private banks the right to create money some people do not believe you. I am going to give two or three pretty effective quotations. I give you a few sentences from what Governor Eccles, president of the federal reserve bank of the United States, had to say:

> The banks can create and destroy money. Bank credit is money. It is the money we do most of our business with, not with that currency which we usually think of as money.

Then Mr. J. M. Keynes, now Lord Keynes, who has been representing Britain on the Bank of England's delegation at Bretton Woods, had this to say:

> There can be no doubt that all deposits are created by the banks.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica says:

> Banks create credit. It is a mistake to suppose that bank credit is created to any important extent by the payment of money into the banks. A loan made by a bank is a clear addition to the amount of money in the community.

I am not going to give further references, because I understand that the Minister of Finance and I are agreed on that broad general economic statement. But I want these facts reported to parliament, and to my mind they do not leave the slightest shadow of doubt as to what the situation is.

The figures on the ten chartered banks made it clear that their original paid-up capital was $145½ million. Their rest or reserve fund—that is, the disclosed rest or reserve fund—is $136¾ million, or a total of $282¼ million. They have private bank notes in circulation, a privilege which we gave them to create money at the mere cost of printing and paper, to the amount of $40 million. That privilege is going out of existence. The banks have been notified gradually to reduce the amount until it will be wiped out altogether. Then the banks have hidden reserves about which the minister said nothing at all when he was painting the pitiful plight of the bankers, and these hidden reserves have been accumulating year after year out of earnings, and they are tax free in the current year in which the earnings are collected. We do not know, and parliament does not know to-day, how much that accumulated fund of hidden reserves taken out of earnings amounts to. It may be thirty million dollars or it may be three hundred million dollars.

In passing, let me say this. To my mind the attitude of the bankers and the attitude of the advisers of our Department of Finance in supporting them in refusing to disclose their hidden reserves to the committee on banking and commerce when the banks came there after ten years for a renewal of their charters was most unwise. I asked the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, "How much have you tucked away in your vaults out of current earnings each year as hidden reserves? What is the total amount now of that hidden reserve fund?" He said to me, much more politely than this—this is not his language but it was this in effect—"It is none of your business." He would not tell me. Accordingly I turned to the Minister of Finance, who does know—and it was said by Mr. Tompkins that he does know what these aggregate total hidden reserves are—and I asked him to tell that to the committee on banking and commerce. The minister said in effect: This is a very serious matter, and I should like to ponder it; I think I need a little time to decide whether I should disclose it or not. He took from the 25th of May to the 6th of June, twelve days, and then he came back to the committee with a nine-page statement and refused to tell the committee or parliament the aggregate amount of those hidden reserves of the ten chartered banks on December 31. What do you make of that?

I thought the banking and commerce committee—and I have the terms of reference here—was a fact-finding committee, given full power to bring witnesses and to secure evidence on the subject on which we had to report back to the House of Commons, and so it is. The advisers of the Minister of Finance were brought in—and I will tell you in a minute how I know they were brought in to assist him in preparing a statement which he doubtless believed in with the utmost good faith, and I want no misunderstanding on that score—and they would not tell the committee what the hidden reserves of the ten chartered banks are which have been accumulating for fifty years. I asked why? And what do you suppose was the reason? Parliament ought not to know; the people of Canada ought not to know. The shareholders of the individual banks do not know because their directors and auditors conceal it from them each year. None of these three bodies ought to know, they said. Why? Because they might misunderstand it.

The first smoke-screen that was set up in support of concealing the hidden reserves was that if the banks disclosed last year, and the year before, their hidden reserves and then two years hence they admitted any serious loss it might check the confidence of the public in the bank, if you please. So I bowed to that, which was vehemently put forward by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, not by any Liberal I might say, and then I said: "Mr. Minister and Mr. Banker, tell this committee of parliament what is the aggregate total amount of the hidden reserves of all the ten banks on December 31. Is it thirty million dollars or three hundred million dollars?" And I framed a resolution which was put to the banking and commerce committee, that this committee require the bankers to disclose to parliament the gross amount of the hidden reserves of all the ten chartered banks—that and nothing more. Now what excuse they will give this time I do not know.

I invite the Minister of Finance to disclose the aggregate amount to this parliament to-night. But no more hush-hush. How can a parliament deal with applications to renew charters for ten years and consent to be told by the bankers who seek this monopolistic privilege, "Parliament is not going to know from us—and we have got the minister converted to our view-point—and members of parliament are not going to know how much more earnings the banks take in every year and put away as hidden reserves, and escape payment of taxes on them in the current year." Has the minister any God-given right to know what my hon. friend the chairman of the banking committee does not know? I venture to say he knows a good deal about the economics of banking. I venture to say that in bringing his good judgment to bear on whether we should renew the charters, it was important to know how much over fifty years has been tucked away as hidden reserves. There may be $300 million of Bank of Canada cash in there in that respect. What blessed reason is there that they should in 1944, coming for renewal of charters, hide the truth from parliament? To my mind it is the blackest thing acquiesced in by any body of men, as destroying the supremacy of parliament, that has happened in the last hundred years. Who is there who will tell me why he should know and you should not know? Are your constituents less entitled to weigh your conduct in renewing the bank charters than the constituents of the hon. member for a maritime constituency? I thought that this was the place where the people's representatives were to learn the truth, and that any black pall of secrecy was done away with long ago in British parliaments conducted on British lines. Therefore I say to this committee, when we are told, "Do not bow to this reform and take back this monopolistic privilege to create money, because you will wreck the banks," and in the same breath we are told, "You are not old enough or wise enough or you cannot bring good enough judgment to bear if we disclose to you the lump sum of money which is tucked away tax-free in ten years"—tax-free, I should say, in the year in which it was earned—the people of Canada are not going to be content with that attitude.

I beseech the members of this parliament in this matter to remove the stain which will rest upon us if we pass these bank charters for ten more years, dissolve this house and then, going home to our constituents, have to tell them from the public platform or wherever we meet them, "We signed on the dotted line and we did not ask the bankers to tell us what in each year were their earnings which they tucked away as hidden reserves."

To my mind—and I put the point in all friendliness—we made a mistake in the banking and commerce committee. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has said that he may not sit in this house again. I say the same thing, under present conditions. I have not made up my mind. But I am going to find it difficult to come back here and support a policy of renewing bank charters, when bankers have told us, "It is none of your business what we have tucked away in hidden reserves and escape taxation on." I love my party, perhaps as well as any man on this side of the house. Let us see where we are going in this thing. Let us stop while there is yet time; and if the committee do not agree with me and my colleague in the matter of having the public exercise their right under our constitution to do government borrowing from our own bank, let us reach that decision after our Minister of Finance, whom I invite and beg to do so, has disclosed the real financial situation of the ten chartered banks.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. SLAGHT: I have something more, but I can say it later.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. KINLEY: At six o'clock the hon. member for Parry Sound brought up a point of order, which was that he thought we ought to stick to section 59, which deals with cash reserves of the bank, and while I shall perhaps go farther afield than this section indicates, I think he has done the same. I want to read this section so that there will be no mistake about it:

Cash reserves

59. The bank shall maintain a reserve which shall, as provided in the Bank of Canada Act, be not less than five per centum of such of its deposit liabilities as are payable in Canadian dollars and such reserve shall consist of a deposit with the Bank of Canada and of Bank of Canada notes held by the bank; and the bank shall also maintain with the Bank of Canada or elsewhere adequate reserves against liabilities elsewhere than in Canada and furnish such information as may be required by the minister from time to time to satisfy him that such reserves against liabilities elsewhere than in Canada are so maintained.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, in quoting this section, said that the law required that a reserve of five per cent should be maintained against this sort of banking business, and he said that the bankers, with a disdain born of greater knowledge, decided that they would not conform with the law but they would use ten per cent. In my business, where we deal with materials and have to take into account stresses and strains, we always allow for what we call a margin of safety to provide against disaster. For instance, if engineers tested the elevators in this building for 2,000 pounds, do you imagine they would allow you to put 2,000 pounds in these elevators? They would test those elevators for 3,000 pounds—

Mr. ADAMSON: More likely, six.

Mr. KINLEY: —and then they would probably allow you to put in a weight of 2,000 pounds. If I build an engine of 150 horsepower, I always have a margin which I can use in an emergency; probably it would develop 165 or 170 horse-power. So with a boiler; if you are going to test a boiler for 200 pounds, do you think any engineer would allow you to put steam into that boiler up to 200 pounds? The boiler would first be tested for, perhaps, 300 pounds, and then he might let you use it with a safety valve up to 200 pounds. Much the same principle applies here. My hon. friend misquoted the act. The section does not state that the reserve shall be five per cent; it says that it shall not be less than five per cent. The bankers in their wisdom think they should have a margin of safety, and put it at ten per cent, and the hon. member uses that fact as a reason for arguing that the bankers are disdainful of the laws we create to control them.

There is a distorted opinion in the country of what banks can do. Some people have the idea that banks can create money ad libitum. According to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, they can create money with a fountain-pen. If that were true, I do not see why bankers would have to stay in business very long, why they do not get rich and be done with their vocation altogether.

I do not intend to explore this realm of banking on a plane which almost comes into the region of mystery; I am going to get back to the old country store. You know a great deal can be said for the old country store; in the old days it was a place where a good deal of sound philosophy and many wholesome truths were learned. They are the people who must be convinced about the banking situation and therefore we had better talk in language that they will understand. The old country store was a good institution and performed many duties that usually belong to the bank, and until the days when the chain stores took away their cash business and compelled them to deal only in credit the country stores were found throughout the country almost at every corner.

Suppose a man were helping in the building of a railroad in some country district. The farmer wanted to use his team on the job and he would call up the storekeeper and ask for a double harness. The storekeeper would say, "All right; it is worth $100 and I will send it over. I will charge it on the books." He then instructs his bookkeeper to charge John Jones with $100 for that harness. A few days afterwards the contractor calls up the merchant and says that he would like to get some potatoes. The merchant calls up John Jones and tells him that he would like to have 100 bushels of potatoes for this man who is engaged on the road. The price, let us say, is $1.25 a bushel. And so he credits John Jones on his books with $125 for his potatoes. Now there are two transactions. He calls up the contractor and tells him that he is going to deliver 100 bushels of potatoes and asks him if he will give him a cheque. The contractor sends the storekeeper a cheque which he puts in the bank and the bank gives him credit for $125. The contractor in turn wants some money and he calls up his debtor, who sends him a cheque which the contractor takes to the bank and deposits it and is given credit for the money he places there. Now all these transactions have been completed and there is no cash, no Bank of Canada money involved. Who says that is getting something for nothing? Who says that is not a splendid way of doing business?

The bank is a place where you exchange obligations; it is a credit exchange, and when it performs that function and collects a service charge therefor, it seems to me it is carrying on in a way which is beneficial to the business of the country. Take a manufacturer. I want to buy a certain quantity of raw material and I send him an order and get thirty days credit on that raw material. The man I bought it for makes a draft through the bank and I accept it at thirty days. When the draft is due the banker charges that to my account on the debit side and sends a credit along for the manufacturer, and the goods are dispatched. Is there anything wrong about that? There is no money used. A week afterwards I have to pay my men and I send a cheque to the bank and get $1,000 in bank notes. That is where you need real money, for pay envelopes. I go to the bank and they charge that to me. And so the transaction goes on.

Every transaction involves a debtor and a creditor; one brings and another takes. You can read that in any of the books on economics. The hon. member for Vancouver-

Burrard said that a bank could buy a $50 Dominion of Canada bond and all they had to do was to make an entry in their books; they did not need to put up any more than $5 as a reserve against it, in other words, 10 per cent. So far so good, but the hon. gentleman did not follow that transaction through. Suppose the government owes my hon. friend $50 and issues him a cheque on that bank and he takes it to the bank. He can demand for that cheque fifty Bank of Canada bills, or he can give it to the banker with instructions to have it placed to his credit, thus transferring the credit from the bank to himself, or he can take the cheque to another bank and cash it. If he takes the cheque to another bank the first bank must meet the clearing-house the next day and give Bank of Canada bills for the cheque. It will be seen, therefore, that the hon. member went only half way in telling about such a transaction; he did not follow it all the way through. If he followed it through he would find that the bank must meet their obligations or be in peril at the clearing-house when they get there.

As I said before, the bank is the medium for the exchange of the country's business. It is true it creates deposits and credits and there is an enormous amount of business done without money at all, but a distorted idea is conveyed that the banks create money, that in their function as an exchange for the business of the country they create money, which is only credit and confidence. We must not break down credit as an institution for carrying on the business of the country. This five per cent reserve is a reserve against break-down. It is what one might call a degree of safety in the exchange of confidence and credit. Nor must we forget the power of association. The Creator Himself when he made the world had regard for the power of association. To make life it takes two people; one man cannot make life. Two people have to be properly equipped to make life; every living creature is of the same kind, and so is most agricultural production. Money is the economic bloodstream of the nation, and to control the economic bloodstream you need association; because there is power and there is virtue in association. I might do something that was criminal if I did it alone, but if I did it in association with others, and if it were done in a manner agreed upon, that would be all right. I say, therefore, that we had better be careful above a government-monopolized bank working all by itself instead of having a bank working in association with the people of Canada for the purpose of carrying on the business and commerce of the country.

My hon. friends say that there should be a 100 per cent reserve. What would you think of the country storekeeper who, when he charged the harness on the books, told his bookkeeper instead to go and get $100 in cash and put it in the safe so that he might have a reserve against the harness, or who, when he sold the potatoes, ordered his bookkeeper to go and get $125 in cash and put it in the safe so that he might have a 100 per cent reserve in that transaction? To hear our friends talk, to hear what some people said before the banking committee, one would think that banking was the only function in this country. There is a feeling that if you could fool with money, and have an easy time with it, you would be happy and the business of the country would be all right. Banking is only the handmaiden of business in this country; it is only the instrument that business uses for its convenience. As a rule, any troubles from which the country suffers do not come from banking; industry and business support the country. Banking in itself, in my opinion, will have very little to do with the prosperity or advancement of the nation.

Then the hon. member for Parry Sound, with considerable heat and fervour, almost in the style of a stump speech at election time, referred to these inner reserves. He pretty well rang the changes in regard to them, and his words could create a good deal of alarm in this country in this connection. He calls them secret reserves.

Mr. SLAGHT: Are they not secret?

Mr. KINLEY: Well, the banks must disclose their reserves to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. SLAGHT: But not to the minister in charge of taxation.

Mr. KINLEY: They must disclose their reserves to their auditors, and to the auditor appointed by the shareholders. They must satisfy Mr. Elliott, the commissioner of taxation. Then, by virtue of an amendment adopted this year they must also disclose their reserves to the Minister of National Revenue. These inner reserves are something like the stand-pipe that you see at the point where the water-main comes into a town, to control the flow so that it will be even, regardless of any rise or fall in the level. These controls all have their purpose; every machine must have some control. In any machine there is motive power and there is a means of control. Your automobile has an engine and a steering-wheel, but it also has a brake and other methods of control. All these things are for good and intelligent control. The banks are in competition. Do you think one bank should know what the other has in its inner reserve?

Mr. SLAGHT: I never suggested that.

Mr. KINLEY: Would that not destroy the competition between the banks?

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member will recall that I never suggested anything which would mean that one bank might discover the reserves of the others.

Mr. KINLEY: Well, if you make the information public in the banking and commerce committee the other banks will get it.

Mr. SLAGHT: No. I suggested that the aggregate for ten years be disclosed, after it had been added up by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then you are still going to have some things hidden.

Mr. SLAGHT: All right. Apparently you are for hiding everything.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have not said anything as yet.

Mr. SLAGHT: Then do not get on that band wagon.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thought you were for opening up everything.

Mr. SLAGHT: So I am, but one thing at a time. I had a hard fight in that committee; so let us have one thing at a time.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am amazed at the position you are taking now. I thought you were for having everything wide open.

Mr. SLAGHT: You will be further amazed when you hear the position your party took, when I speak again.

Mr. KINLEY: Might I say a word now, Mr. Chairman?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I would ask hon. members to keep order. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has the floor. If he permits a question it is quite in order, but not otherwise.

Mr. KINLEY: I will permit any intelligent question, for I believe we should search for the truth; truth will make men free. The hon. gentleman says that he wants only the aggregate. Well, that is the entering wedge. Supposing, for instance, I owed the bank $50,000. The bank might say to its auditor, "This man Kinley owes us $50,000. We do not think we will ever get it, so that we had better set up a reserve against it," to which the auditor would reply, "Yes, I think you should." Well, if you are going to pursue this thing to the bitter end you have to get down to names. The directors have a meeting; they tell the shareholders the news. It comes back to my home town that I owe the bank $50,000 and they do not think they are going to get it. In the first place that will destroy my credit. In the second place, if I find that they do not expect to get their money, I may never pay them. So that you see it is a bad thing in more than one way.

What is our interest in these inner reserves, anyway; what is the public interest in them? We can have only one possible interest; that is in connection with taxation. We are told that ordinary businesses have inner reserves, and I know they have reserves of inventories. I know most industries to-day will make a conservative inventory because of uncertainty as to the future. You may say that is evading taxation, but is it? These inventories are bound to get into the money stream of the business in a short time, and if you make them too large this year you lose out next year. The thing will balance in a few years because eventually it gets into the money stream of your business, and it will not do you any good unless you go into a field of lower taxation in the immediate future. I do not have to disclose the reserves of my business to this parliament. First I have to satisfy my own auditor, who is very careful not to do anything he should not do, because his reputation depends upon how well he carries out his duties and how well he obeys the law. Then I must satisfy the income tax officials who go over my books, and who are experts. Finally I must satisfy the minister. An ordinary business does not have to disclose its inner reserves, and it is a feature of our income tax laws that you may not divulge what people pay in income tax. It is not fair to do so in a competitive system.

Therefore I say that as regards these inner reserves of the banks having any effect on the taxation of this country, that is a matter conjured up for the purpose of frightening somebody, and I do not think those who want to be fair about the matter will consider it for a moment. Why, the shareholders' auditor, one of the most eminent members of his profession in the city of Toronto, was most positive in stating that the interests of the shareholders and of business and industry generally were protected by keeping these reserves secret except from those who should know. The Minister of Finance is a public servant who is expected to protect the people of this country, and it seems to me sufficient if he and his officials have this information.

On the other hand we have in this country one branch of business which has large reserves and which does not pay any taxes. I recall that we have in western Canada large organizations doing business running into millions of dollars. At first they were mutual companies that were allowed to divide their profits among their shareholders and those who were cooperating. Then they decided that they should have reserves, and obtained that privilege under the law. They went ahead and built up reserves amounting to millions, and they are exempt from taxation while the banks pay millions of dollars of taxes to the government of Canada. Then take the Canadian National Railways, since we talk so much about government ownership. What taxes did the Canadian National ever pay to the government? Do you not think the Canadian National is a better railway because we also have the Canadian Pacific? Our ventures into public ownership in this country have been a sorry story of deficits. It took a war to bring the Canadian National out of the red, and we are not very sure of what may happen when the war is over. It seems to me that when we get into the realm of government ownership we get into the realm of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. They want to nationalize the banks of Canada, and make them government-owned banks, government monopolies. I think a government monopoly is about the worst kind of monopoly one can have.

We are told that monopolies in this country are terrible. I am not so much afraid of monopolies. They are defenceless when parliament wishes to deal with them. It did not take the Minister of Munitions and Supply long to tell the Canadian Pacific what they were to do with their air lines. He told them that the air lines were to be preserved for the young men coming back.

What I am afraid of is that we might lose our free parliament. As long as we have a free parliament to deal with monopolies, we can deal with them; but if we have a government that owns monopolies, and a government that runs monopolies for the service of the country, we lose our free parliament, and we have a monopoly which is supported by the government. The people would get very little from it.

Something has been said about debt-free money. Some persons would abolish interest. The wages of money might be high in this country, but in my opinion the wages of money are fair. Let us suppose I have a house. I want to rent that house, and you come along and give me $50 a month for the rent of it. That would be a fair rental. However, after a couple of months you come to me and say, "Look here, I think I can build a house. I think I could live cheaper and save some money if I built a house." I say, "All right, I will lend you the money to build the house." You get the money and you build the house. You live in the house and you save money—and that, of course, is a splendid thing to do. You take some responsibility when you do that. You have paid the rent for my other house, but now you do not want to pay me interest on my money that I gave you to build the house in which you are living. Somebody, possibly, made you believe in debt-free money.

This matter of debt-free money is only a matter of dilution. A farmer may bring 100 quarts of milk to town. When he milks his cows, one day he gets only seventy-five quarts, and he says, "Well, we will put it under the pump, fill it up, and we will have 100 quarts." But that is not more milk, and he cannot be paid for 100 quarts. If they catch him they will put him in gaol. That is what is meant, and I am getting it down to the place where people can understand it. We have had this thing up in the air so long that we had better get it down to the place where people can understand this kind of talk.

You talk about inflation! My dear friend in the corner, the hon. member for Lethbridge, tells us about debt-free money. I have some of his debt-free money, right here—or I had some. I do not think I can spend it. This was debt-free money that was issued—prosperity certificates.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is that from?

Mr. KINLEY: It is a province of Alberta certificate. This is a prosperity certificate, and it states that the provincial treasurer will pay to the bearer the sum of one dollar on the expiration of two years from date of issue thereof, upon presentation; provided that there are attached to the back thereof 104 one-cent certificate stamps.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the date of that?

Mr. KINLEY: If they gave that money to the people, and at the end of that year they got $1.04 back, it might be different; but they made them work for it. They paid schoolteachers with it, and it is fifty-two per cent money. If I got one dollar from the bank and then put it into the bank I would get one and a half per cent interest. If I get this certificate I have to put fifty-two cents on it. It is hot money; the longer you keep it, the less it is worth. If I wish to cash it to-day it would cost me $1.04 to cash it.

I am a practical business man. This whole talk about debt-free money in this country gets us nowhere. This is what we judge them by, because they issued this money and told the people that they might use it, but the people would not use it, and they had to withdraw it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the date of it?

Mr. KINLEY: August 5, 1936. Then they promised $25 a month.

Mr. SLAGHT: I rise to a point of order. We are on sections 59 and 75.

Mr. KINLEY: I understand that, and I apologize.

Mr. SLAGHT: This scrip which the hon. member has in his hand is, as I understand it, scrip which was issued by a province—not by the dominion government. And it is an insult to the credit of the Dominion of Canada to suggest that that is comparable with national currency issued by our people.

Mr. KINLEY: I never suggested anything of the kind. I just suggested that that is what the Social Credit party is doing. That is all I said.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell us why the schoolteachers from 1930 to 1936 in many instances went without their salaries?

Mr. KINLEY: That is unfortunate, but this is no good to them.

This inflation business never succeeded anywhere it has ever been tried—and it has been tried. They tried it in Mexico. The people got hold of United States cheques, and they would not do business except with United States cheques. They passed them, one to the other, and it became their money, and was the only money that was any good.

Germany had to resort to inflation; defeated countries all do it. It is a sign of weakness. They had to do it in China. Poor China is in travail to-day because of it. An hon. member passes me one of these German reichmarks. It took a barrel of them to buy a cup of tea.

We have before us a revision of the Bank Act. We sit in judgment on the banks in Canada, which have done a good job. They have been the pride of Canada in days of adversity. The banks are not perfect. The human element enters into them. They are in competition, but they have a record of which we may be proud.

It seems to me that in the future, and that in facing days of peril and adversity we should be careful of what we do at this time, and we should hold fast to that which is good.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Mr. Chairman, this afternoon and this evening we have heard a great deal about two sections which have been held over, namely sections 59 and 75, in connection with this renewal of the Bank Act. There were about forty-five sessions of the banking and commerce committee. The pros and cons of arguments, back and forth, have been set out by different members of that committee, by representatives of the banks, by the retail merchants' association and by other organizations which appeared before the banking and commerce committee.

This afternoon and this evening we have heard two speeches by two eminent Canadian lawyers. I want at this juncture to say a word about the eloquence of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and to refer to several statements by the hon. member for Parry Sound as being simply unadulterated shadow-boxing. I can vouch that the hon. member for Parry Sound could with his eloquence and his experience argue the case for the renewal of these bank charters with just as much merit as he has the ideas which he has accepted and which in my opinion are absolutely unsound.

I should like to deal with this matter from two or three matter of fact points of view, but I will adhere as strictly as possible to the two sections under discussion. Before proceeding, may I say that this matter should be analysed in a cool, businesslike way without using words like "dark secrets" and "hush, hush" or applying to the business of banking inferences that are absolutely unfounded and without reason.

In the first place the banking business of this country is a highly scientific business. It is no different from many other businesses because all the corporations in this country are the children of government. Companies operate under charters issued either by the provinces or by the dominion. They are permitted to conduct certain types of business, not only for ten years but perpetually as long as they comply with the taxing laws of the country and the articles of their incorporation. I submit that no business is subjected to such close scrutiny year in and year out, particularly every ten years, as the business of commercial banking. The business of banking is scrutinized not only by government officials and by the inspector general; it is subjected to the closest scrutiny by the Minister of Finance and his officials.

The question of inner reserves has been mentioned; and I submit that an endeavour has been made to create a bogey, to arouse suspicion in the minds of the Canadian people that there is something hidden, something uncanny, something the people of this country should know in connection with hidden reserves. In analyzing this matter of the renewal of these bank charters we must consider whether the banking business of Canada is being properly conducted or whether it is not; whether the banking business of Canada is making undue profits or whether it is not; whether the banking business of Canada is serving the purpose that commercial banks should serve in the interests of the people of this country, both depositors and borrowers, or whether it is not. I submit that the banking system of this country is being conducted in a highly efficient manner, consistent with the best banking experience and brains not only in Canada, but in the great republic to the south, or even, as some hon. members have said, in the Scotch banking system.

Let me deal for a minute or two with the matter of incorporation and also with the question of whether the chartered banks are making excess profits. As was set out in the evidence submitted to the banking and commerce committee, the profits of the Canadian banks average only 6·2 per cent. Not only do they not compare favourably with many other financial, industrial and commercial enterprises, but they represent an extremely modest profit. It happened to be my good fortune to sit in the banking and commerce committee of 1934 when the bank charters were renewed, and I have endeavoured as much as possible to absorb the discussions that took place in the many meetings of the committee during the last three months.

Let us look for a minute at the position of Canada's chartered banks. The word "monopoly" has been used time and time again in the committee and in this house. It is said that we are being asked to renew the charters of what has been termed a monopoly. I submit that the position of the Canadian chartered banks is not an enviable one in comparison with that of other industries. I have in my hand the statement of Lake Shore mines. With a capital of $2,000,000, this company showed a profit of 134·8 per cent in 1936. They do not have to have their charter renewed every ten years or to make reports to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue and the inspector general. Not only is this corporation a child of the government, but under its incorporation it can develop the natural resources of Canada. Therefore let us not call the banks a monopoly. Let us not point to the banks as making immeasurable profits. If we are going to discuss the profit motive, let us take the picture as a whole and stop pointing just at the Canadian chartered banks.

I wish to say a few words in connection with the hidden reserves of the banks. It was in reference to the hidden reserves that the hon. members who preceded me used the language I quoted a moment ago. As I say, that language has been used not only in this house but repeatedly in the banking and commerce committee. It has been broadcast throughout the length and breadth of Canada that there is something sinister, something we should be suspicious about in connection with these hidden reserves. There is nothing mysterious about the hidden reserves.

It is not a question of hidden reserves; it is a question of the method of accounting that is used not only in the banking business but in industrial and commercial businesses throughout Canada. We had as a witness before the banking and commerce committee Mr. Clarkson, one of the leading accountants in Canada. His evidence corroborated what I say, that this method of accounting is quite common. I am going to read from one bank statement and compare it with the statements of some commercial companies. The banks carry on exactly as do the commercial companies. They take in their inventories which are composed of loans, portfolios, assets and the like, with reserves to protect themselves against loss in any one year. That is all they do. There is nothing secret about it. There is nothing funny about it. It is a system followed by every company in the Dominion of Canada. Let me compare for a moment the financial statement of Canada Steamships Limited and its subsidiary companies with a bank statement. I am reading from the 1943 consolidated balance sheet of the Canada Steamships company, and this is what it says:

Accounts receivable, less reserve.

That is exactly what the banks do. There is nothing funny about it. They simply take in their accounts receivable and their other assets, less reserves.

Mr. McGEER: But they are not hidden.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): They are hidden to exactly the same extent.

Mr. SLAGHT: They have to be disclosed to the minister of taxation, while the banks reserves have not.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Under the amendment which the Minister of Finance brought in the banks will be in exactly the same position.

Mr. SLAGHT: They will not.

Mr. McGEER: No.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Or I might take the statement of an industrial company to show how it deals with reserves, and I will deal with the other question my hon. friend raises in a moment. Here is a statement of an industrial company and it says:

Reserves for contingencies, $300,000.

I could go on citing case after case. Every company that uses sound financial methods sets up reserves against depreciation of inventories, depreciation of investment portfolio, accounts receivable and other assets which they carry at the end of the year.

Let me say this to the hon. member for Parry Sound, that the reserves of the banks are scrutinized by the banks' auditors in exactly the same way as reserves of industrial companies are scrutinized by their auditors. There is no difference. That evidence was given before the banking and commerce committee.

Let me go one step farther. An hon. member said this evening that the shareholders had not the right to know what the hidden reserves of the bank are, but evidence was given before the committee that upon request the shareholder had the right to ascertain through the directors or the auditors what the reserve of the bank was at a given time. It is also provided in the act that the banks are required once a year to submit to the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Finance and, I believe, to the deputy minister of finance, or at all events to a third person, what amount has been set aside as hidden reserves.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend is in error in saying the Minister of National Revenue. Under the amending bill the banks have to submit that figure to the Minister of Finance, who in turn may advise the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Then I stand corrected on that point.

Mr. ILSLEY: Do not stand corrected when you are correct. It says that the Minister of Finance "shall" notify the Minister of National Revenue, and so on.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): That is what I thought. As has been stated, these reserves are to protect the banks against losses on loans and declining prices and are submitted to the careful scrutiny of the three gentlemen I have mentioned. On that point, Mr. Chairman, have we in this country reached the stage where the people of Canada cannot trust the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue, a deputy minister, and probably the governor of the Bank of Canada, no matter what government happens to be in power? If we have, certainly there must be a weakness in our democratic system somewhere. So far as I am concerned, as a customer of the banks I am perfectly happy to have the reserves of the banks scrutinized in that way.

Reference has been made to the cash reserves of the banks and it has been proposed that 100 per cent cash reserves be held by the banks. I do not think the hon. member for Parry Sound is really serious in what he suggested because he knows perfectly well, for it has been repeatedly stated, what an impossible situation it would be if the banks had to carry 100 per cent Bank of Canada cash against their deposits. Let us analyse for a few moments what the banks really are.

To me and, I believe, to most hon. members there is nothing funny about this banking business. The banks are simply the bookkeepers of the nation. They are the retailers of credit. There is nothing funny about money. I can take this blank cheque that I have on my desk, fill it out for five or ten dollars, write my signature and hand it to the Postmaster General and he will give me a ten dollar Bank of Canada bill for it. Why? Because he is satisfied that behind that cheque I have in the bank of Montreal a credit, created through selling lumber, apples or something else and depositing the proceeds in the bank. The banks are a repository of the stored-up energy and production of the people of Canada. That is another reason why confidence in our banks should not be jeopardized by anything that is said here by any hon. member. Previous speakers, notably the Minister of Finance, have pointed out all the ramifications that would be involved in insisting upon the banks carrying 100 per cent cash reserves. As the minister said, it would be an impossible situation.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard stated that the government of Canada had no control over the chartered banks. I remember well the submissions that were made to the banking and commerce committee in 1934; I am quite willing to give credit to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard who, along with many others of us at that time, advocated the establishment of a national bank, and in consequence the Bank of Canada was set up. The banking system in no other country in the world has made as much progress, so far as government control is concerned, as has the Canadian banking system since 1934 and on through the years to 1937, when we took over the whole stock of the Bank of Canada. I submit that under the set-up of the Bank of Canada the government of Canada has ample control, practically total control, over the flow of money and credit in the Dominion of Canada. Anyone who has studied the financial system knows perfectly well that the Bank of Canada controls the flow of money and credit throughout this dominion.

I listened attentively to the statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Parry Sound. But it is a bad thing to put people to doing things to which they are not accustomed. With all due respect to my hon. friends, I must say that they are first-class lawyers who can argue on either side of a case with equal dexterity and facility. There is no question in my mind as to that. I prefer to take the opinion of gentlemen who have spent their lives in the banking business of this country—managers of banks, the Minister of Finance, the governor of the Bank of Canada, the deputy minister of finance, the gentlemen who make it their lifelong business to handle the banking requirements of the people, who understand not only those requirements as respects our banking system but also the ramifications of the foreign connections of the banking of the dominion. It is a bad thing at this time to create any suspicion in the minds of the people of our banking system. It is also unjustifiable. We have the most flexible banking system in the world, one which stood up during the years of depression; a system which, unlike the banks of the United States, did not go by the wayside. Our banking system is flexible in the set-up of its branches across the country. The branch banks not only serve the people in the communities in which they are established, but are repositories of the savings of the people of those communities, and can transfer credits to different parts of Canada where those credits are required. Our banking system provides the flexibility required by a country such as ours. It can serve the fisherman on the east coast, the grain grower of the prairie provinces, the lumberman of British Columbia, because the collection and flow of funds are made possible through the branch bank set-up. I repeat that it is a bad thing to try to shake confidence in this system, because I do not believe any of the allied nations possess banking systems which have been as successful as our own in handling the demands of the present war.

At this time I wish not only to make reference to the splendid way in which the chartered banks are handling the demands of industry, agriculture and the services of the dominion, but to pay tribute to the foresight, the tenacity, the judgment, and the never-ceasing application of thought and untiring effort which the present Minister of Finance has given, not only to the banking system through the Bank of Canada, but to the whole financial set-up of this country in the prosecution of the war. As somebody said the other day, and as is acknowledged beyond the dominion, the pattern of finance, the success in controlling inflation, the application of our price ceiling, the application of wage and salary controls, have not only been a matter of pride in Canada but recognized in the United States and Great Britain as models of efficiency. I do not believe any other banking system in the world has served, under the direction of the officials I have mentioned, the purposes of the prosecution of this war as effectively as that of the Canadian banks.

After all that has been said in connection with this bill, not only in this chamber this afternoon and evening, but in the long sessions of the banking committee, I do not think it is necessary for me to go into further details in connection with our banking system, except to say that unless somebody can submit evidence such as, I claim, has not so far been presented, there is no reason why these bank charters should not be renewed for the next ten years. Personally, as a member of this house, I would consider it extremely disastrous should anything occur to hold up the renewal of the charters of these banks for any less period than the banks have been granted in the past. Do not forget that we shall be shortly entering the great post-war period. The last thing we want is any uncertainty in connection with our financial set-up. The last thing we want to do is to inject into the management of our financial system anything except experience and capable management, under the assurance that there will be no interruption with the operations of the banks for the next ten years.

As I said a minute ago, there are ample safeguards. There is no question of the scrutiny of the banks, no question of their solidity, no question as to their ability, in all of the ramifications of the country's business, to handle it efficiently. I submit that neither in this committee nor in the banking and commerce committee has any reason been advanced why these charters should not be renewed. All along the greatest emphasis and stress have been applied to the matter of these hidden reserves. Some of my hon. friends have dwelt on these things. The Minister of Finance this afternoon refuted the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard in the banking and commerce committee. The hon. member for Parry Sound followed with this hidden reserve stuff. I say not only to you, Mr. Chairman, but to the hon. member himself, let us get away from this talk of hidden reserves. Let us acknowledge what it is. Let us accept the statements we have received and admit that there is nothing sinister about the thing.

Mr. SLAGHT: Two of the banks were caught a few weeks ago by the minister and are refunding amounts which they had taken excessively under the hidden reserve scheme.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I am glad I have been able to get my hon. friend on his feet on that one. I have been drifting along in the doldrums hoping somebody would say something.

Mr. McGEER: You know all about that. You said there was nothing to it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): My hon. friend says that two banks were "caught". "Caught"—caught in the dead of night! They are porch-climbers! They were caught, mind you, in this dark and deadly secret of hidden reserves! Somebody gum-shoed on them, and they were caught in the darkness and dead of the night!

Mr. McGEER: Caught by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Oh, no.

Mr. McGEER: Oh, yes.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Oh no. They were not "caught" by the Minister of Finance. Not at all.

Mr. McGEER: He was not gum-shoeing, was he?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): They were not "caught" by the Minister of Finance. If my hon. friend would do a little more gum-shoeing he would be more quiet. They were not "caught" by the Minister of Finance. That is not the word to use. As my hon. friend knows, these statements are submitted every year to the Minister of Finance, to the banks' auditors and to the inspector general of banks, and they decide, after they have checked the inventories and the portfolios of the banks, whether or not, they have taken too much depreciation on their stock in trade.

As regards the two banks referred to by the hon. member for Parry Sound, when the investments in the portfolios, when the lending accounts were checked by the competent auditors and submitted to the Minister of Finance, he did not gum-shoe; he did not catch them. He scrutinized the accounts as any business man would scrutinize a statement, as I would scrutinize a statement submitted by my own bookkeeper. Anyone would say to a business man, "You have too high an inventory reserve of merchandise," or "your inventory is not high enough, and you must go and change it for this reason or that." And the reasons are given. It is not a matter of catching anybody. As I say, that is not the word to use in business. You might use that word in a police court, but this is not a police court; this is a matter of analysing the business statements of financial institutions doing business in the interests of the people of Canada, acting as their trustees, the repositories of their savings, institutions trusted by the people of this dominion. No one was caught. The Minister of Finance decided, on the advice, I suppose, of his deputy minister or of the governor of the Bank of Canada, or probably of the Minister of National Revenue, that these inventories were taken at too low a figure. The market had moved up over a period, or some loans may have been paid over that period. And so they said to the banks—not with a ·38 calibre revolver in each hand, but as businessmen dealing with other businessmen: Call in your auditors and let us discuss the matter; in our opinion these inventories are too low; your reserve for depreciation or for bad debts is too high, perhaps, or whatever it might be, and we suggest to you as businessmen that they should be reduced. And they were reduced. There is nothing funny about that. It is not all a dark mystery. It is all clear.

Mr. SLAGHT: Solely as the result of disclosures in the banking and commerce committee, after the investigation had taken place.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I am glad my hon. friend has brought that up. It was not solely as a result of disclosures in the banking and commerce committee, not by any means.

Mr. SLAGHT: Ask the minister.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I will tell you what took place. I submit to the hon. member for Parry Sound that the minister explained that through the stress and burden of victory loans in connection with war finance and the handling of the domestic business of Canada he was two or three months behind in seizing an opportunity to scrutinize these statements. Naturally, with the stress of work and lack of time, he was three months, or two months, or whatever it was, behind. It was not because of anything that was said in the banking and commerce committee, because the statements would have been checked, as there is an obligation under the act to check them every year. It was because of overwork on the part of the Minister of Finance. I say to my hon. friends in this house: Why try to permeate and saturate this whole question and to cover it with suspicion. This is not a matter of porch-climbing; it is a matter of discussing an important function, obligation and responsibility of certain institutions, and it is the duty of the intelligent representatives of the people of Canada to come to a judgment in this matter.

There were over forty sittings of the banking and commerce committee where the whole question was considered, and I suggest that we should decide now whether the charters should be renewed or not. If we have not discussed the matter sufficiently to be in a position to reach a conclusion, it is for one of two reasons: either lack of mentality to absorb on the part of certain hon. gentlemen, or straight obstruction on the part of some other hon. gentlemen. It can be for only one of those two reasons, because you cannot carry this thing on forever. Every question has been asked that could be asked; every witness has been called who was requested; the zenith of courtesy has been extended to members of the committee; there has not been a general manager of one bank who objected to any question; there has not been a question directed at the deputy minister or the minister himself to which they have refused to reply. They were as open-minded as they could be, and I suggest that no effort should be made to tar this queston, to tar the whole subject with suspicion and to try to spread suspicion across the dominion. We as businessmen and as members of parliament can unquestionably make our decision, and I for one have come to my decision, namely, to vote for the renewal of these bank charters for another ten years. In my opinion that is what should be done in the interests of the banking institutions, in the interest of the depositors and in the interests of the borrowers and of the people of Canada who are receiving from the chartered banks the best banking service given to any population in any country in the world.

Let me say in that connection that, notwithstanding what has been said in this committee and in the banking and commerce committee, the dominion to-day is paying only a service charge on over one billion dollars which it is receiving through the Bank of Canada and the Canadian chartered banks. I have not tried to remember the exact figure, but the service charge is 1·2 or 1·3 per cent. Surely the labourer is worthy of his hire. The banks are retailers of credit. They have a function to perform; they have thousands of employees across the dominion, and the government as borrower has to pay a service charge for the service it receives. There is no mystery about that. You cannot do funny tricks with money. You cannot make money out of paper unless you have something behind the paper. No one has ever done that successfully and no one ever will.

I repeat, in conclusion, that there is every reason why hon. members should renew these charters. Let us get away from the uncertain position in which the banks have found themselves for the last three or four months. Let us renew these charters so that the banks can get on with their business and so that the people of Canada may enjoy full confidence in them, in a banking system which has rendered excellent service and over which there is, in my opinion, ample control through the Bank of Canada.

Mr. ADAMSON: With the greater part of what the hon. member has said I agree, but he and other members as well have compared the profits of the banks with the profits of the mines, and he said that the Lake Shore mine in 1926 made a profit of 164 per cent; I think that is what he said. There is a very important point that we should realize with regard to the difference in financing as between banks and mines. First of all, your bank stock is $100 par stock, whereas your mining stock is, generally speaking, $1 par; and your mining companies, generally speaking, have an issued capital of from two to five million shares.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I must ask the hon. member to stick to the section.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am speaking about the matter of bank profits, which is the subject we are on at the present time. For a mine like Lake Shore, which has an issued capital of two million shares, to make a profit of 164 per cent it is only necessary for them to make a profit of $1.64 per year per share, and I submit that it is totally unfair to make a comparison of that kind. I am entirely in agreement with what the hon. member has just said, but do not let us compare the profits of mines with the profits of banks, because the financing is totally different.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I agree with that.

Mr. ADAMSON: Mining capital is generally risk capital. You buy a stock for a few cents to-day, hoping they will find an ore body; or you buy stock for a dollar or so, hoping it will increase in value. On the other hand, you buy the stock of a bank, which is an established institution, and pay $100, $150 or $200 per share. One year Lake Shore actually paid 600 per cent profit, but that dollar stock was then selling at $60 per share. Mind you, Lake Shore was perhaps the most successful of all the mines in Canada, and to mention this mine apart from all others is a great mistake, and just as misleading as to talk about the hidden reserves of the banks.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I should like to tell my hon. friend that my only purpose in bringing it up was because it was an incorporation, the child of a government, and that in its incorporation it received certain concessions from the government. No reflection was intended upon either the mining industry or Lake Shore mine. I simply wanted to show that it was established under a charter granted by a federal or provincial government, just as the banks are. I quite appreciate everything my hon. friend is saying.

Mr. ADAMSON: I realize that my hon. friend understands these matters, but I did not want to let the impression get out that these mining companies were making terrific profits. That is not the case. It was the case with Lake Shore, which was probably the richest and most phenomenal mine on the continent of North America.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): The minister will take all the profits, anyway.

Mr. ADAMSON: He is certainly doing so now. It must be remembered that with a bank the capitalization remains static, which is not the case with a commercial organization if it is a profitable operation. In the majority of the corporations of Canada, in order to make the shareholders' equity a better equity you will have a stock split, so that instead of one share of $100 par value, you will have four shares of $25 par value, to make it more easily salable on the stock exchanges. I think the proposal that the banks do the same thing is excellent. I merely wanted to clear up this matter, because several hon. members have mentioned the Lake Shore mine in particular and said, "Look at the terrific profits of that mine; 600 per cent in one year." I believe the bank of Nova Scotia paid sixteen per cent during a certain number of years, but we must remember that while the stock of the bank of Nova Scotia had a par value of $100, it had been selling for more than $200 for some years. To compare the sixteen per cent profit paid by the bank of Nova Scotia with the two or three hundred per cent paid by the Lake Shore mine is unfair, and I do not think is a proper comparison to make as to the payment of profits.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Chairman, it is a popular thing with the masses to attack the banks. We are approaching a general election. I do not think any hon. member will make any speeches in defence of our banking practices and banking system unless he is actuated by the most sincere motives, and feels compelled to do so.

As we look at the picture, the allied nations are fighting a war of survival, fighting the costliest of all wars. It is no exaggeration to say that during the first three years of this war we were fighting with our backs to the wall. The best financial brains in Great Britain, the United States and Canada have been directing this war from a monetary point of view, and I think I am safe in saying that these men have devised what they believe to be the best method of financing it. Recently in the banking and commerce committee Canada's financing of the war effort has been under what might be called a two-pronged attack. I will deal with the lesser attack first. That was in regard to inner reserves. Under these circumstances, I think at least we should be careful of our facts. As I listened to the hon. member for Parry Sound talking about hidden reserves this evening I was positively shocked to hear him state that the banks might have tucked away in their vaults $300,000,000 of Bank of Canada cash as these hidden reserves, as he calls them. I well remember the hon. member in the banking and commerce committee referring to hidden reserves as loot, and in another place he said that sums of money were tucked away.

I am going to make a statement which I think will shock the hon. member for Parry Sound, but I know it is positively true. I say that not a bank in this country has not disclosed in its financial statement, for everyone to read, every security that it holds, every dollar of its cash, and the value of all its bank property. I picked out at random from my banking and commerce folder the statement of the bank of Montreal, on which I should like to make some comments. The assets of any Canadian chartered bank in the main are these. First there is the bank property, their real estate, furniture, office fittings and the like. Next comes their Bank of Canada cash, in the form of deposits with the Bank of Canada or actual cash. Their third asset is securities.

Mr. McGEER: What has the bank of Montreal in its hidden reserves, and of what do they consist?

Mr. CLEAVER: I shall be glad to follow through, but I have thought this thing over, and I believe we should approach this matter in a studious, careful, quiet and sane manner, that we should not get in any passion about it.

Mr. McGEER: Not at all, but that is a very simple question, and you can give me an answer.

Mr. CLEAVER: I shall be glad to.

Mr. McGEER: Then why hide it?

Mr. CLEAVER: I will give it to you when I am ready. I do not intend to be led astray from my train of thought. I would ask the committee to be good enough to follow it with me, for I am quite prepared to prove the statement I made a moment ago, that there is not a bank in this country with a dollar of loot, or a dollar's worth of securities, or of cash in any of its vaults in the form of inner or hidden reserves.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Tompkins, the inspector, says that there is.

Mr. CLEAVER: I will prove that there is not, and I say to the hon. member for Parry Sound that Mr. Tompkins did not say that.

Mr. McGEER: I do not think the minister would agree with that.

Mr. CLEAVER: As I said a moment ago, when I was interrupted, I had come to the third form of assets which a bank holds, namely securities and bonds, Dominion of Canada bonds. The fourth form of security is promissory notes, as well as any collateral, which they hold with them, for the repayment of loans which they have made to customers.

Let hon. members look at any bank statement—and I say this without fear of contradiction, although I know it will be a shock to the hon. member for Parry Sound. I know the hon. member did not intend to mislead the committee, but I say that he did mislead the committee when he said that any bank had a dollar's worth of security or a dollar's worth of cash in any of its vaults in the form of inner reserves.

I come now to the fourth item of bank assets. The fourth item is securities in the form of promissory notes which a bank holds, in order to secure repayment of loans which it makes. Now we come to the place where inner reserves arise. In this instance I am reading from the financial statement for 1943 of the bank of Montreal, and I find this item: "Current loans and discounts, less estimated loss provided for"—and then the item extended is $215,000,000 odd.

That statement simply means this, that the bank of Montreal holds promissory notes for loans which it has made to customers in excess of $215,000,000. But it just shows $215,000,000 in the statement, because bankers know they are in a hazardous business. Every year they take losses. They know they may not be able to collect the par value of the notes which they hold for loans they have made; therefore they must make a compensatory adjustment, and if they are to have a true financial report they must make a compensatory adjustment to bring down the total par value of loans to the actual amount which they will finally recover. That is the inner reserve item; it is simply a bookkeeping item. There is not a dollar of security behind it. There is not a dollar of cash there. There is no hidden loot.

Why, to hear some hon. members talk one would think that the banks of this country have hidden away in some corner of their vaults, piles of stocks, currency and securities for hidden or inner reserves. Nothing of the kind happens. They do not hold a dollar of cash, and they do not hold a dollar's worth of securities under this item of hidden reserves. It is simply a bookkeeping entry, simply a writing down of the amount of their loans from par value to the amount which the experience in banking tells them they will finally collect. You can pick up any bank statement and you will find that item, or a similar one—"less estimated loss provided for."

When I approached this problem in the committee on banking and commerce and I found that the banks were not required to report to the Minister of National Revenue, the taxing minister, the amount set aside as an item to protect them against loss they would eventually have in the collection of their loans, I did not think that was proper. I thought banks should be placed in exactly the same position as all other industries in this country. I thought banks should have to report to the Minister of National Revenue the amount they had set aside in the reduction of the par value of their loans, in order to reach the true value of their loans. I moved an amendment, but when the minister indicated that he was bringing in an amendment to provide for what I had in mind, I of course withdrew my motion.

We have to-day in the Bank Act the fullest possible protection in that regard. The Minister of Finance has no option. The act says that the Minister of Finance shall report the amount of the inner reserves to the taxing minister, so that the taxing minister will at all times have full information.

With that amendment in the Bank Act the banks of this country, so far as inner reserves are concerned, are in exactly the same position as every other industry. One can pick up the financial reports of canning companies, steel companies or other industries in Canada, and he will find that they all make a similar compensatory deduction for anticipated loss, and that they do not disclose the amount to the general public.

Mr. SLAGHT: I did not catch what the hon. member said a moment ago, as to whom, under the amendment, the banks are required to report.

Mr. CLEAVER: I said that they were required to report to the Minister of Finance, and that the statute goes on to say that he shall pass on the information to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. SLAGHT: No; that is done only under certain circumstances, according to subsection 9. It is only if he, in his judgment, regards the hidden reserves to be in excess of what they ought to be. If he decides it is all right, the Minister of National Revenue never knows about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Minister of National Revenue has the same power in respect of banks, under the National Revenue Act, that he has in respect of every other taxpayer in Canada.

Mr. SLAGHT: I understand that.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is apart altogether from this provision. This is an additional superimposed protection. It leaves alone, untouched and unmodified, the power of the Minister of National Revenue over the banks, and that power was the same as it is for any other taxpayer.

Mr. SLAGHT: Quite right, but the only reason I interrupted was—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am prepared to accept the hon. member's interruption.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member inadvertently, I think, gave the committee the impression that under the amendment the banks are now required to report to the Minister of National Revenue. That is not the amendment. I draw the hon. member's attention to section 56(9). Under the amendment the banks, as heretofore, report to the Minister of Finance, not to the Minister of National Revenue. But if in his opinion the Minister of Finance believes that the banks have set aside in excess of the amount they ought to have set aside, then the amendment requires him to notify the Minister of National Revenue. And at that point the section stops. The Minister of National Revenue is not obliged to take any steps. My hon. friend will recall that the evidence showed that right down to this investigation the banks had never notified or advised either the Minister of National Revenue or his deputy, of the amount they set aside for hidden reserves. That is the record.

Mr. CLEAVER: I thank my hon. friend for his interruption and, in fairness, I propose right now to read into the record the gist of subsection 9, leaving out the superfluous wording.

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes.

Mr. CLEAVER: It states:

> Where in the opinion of the minister an amount set aside or reserved by any bank . . . for the purpose of meeting losses on loans, bad or doubtful debts, depreciation in the value of assets . . . the minister—

That is the Minister of Finance.

> —shall notify the Minister of National Revenue and the deputy minister of national revenue (taxation) of the amount so set aside and of the amount of such excess.

Mr. SLAGHT: That is exactly as I stated it.

Mr. CLEAVER: Yes. I have concluded what I intended to say about inner reserves. I wonder if at this stage in the debate the hon. member for Parry Sound would be good enough to withdraw the statement he made that the banks might have millions of dollars worth of Bank of Canada notes set aside in their vaults as inner reserves.

Mr. SLAGHT: I do not withdraw it because it is literally and actually true. I have just found a reference in Mr. Clarkson's evidence, and I will refer to the evidence of Mr. Tompkins who also makes the same declaration. I asked Mr. Clarkson what form these inner reserves took which were in the custody of the banks, and he said they were partly in cash and partly in securities.

Mr. CLEAVER: We cannot both be right, but I say positively that every bank in this country reports in its financial statement every dollar of cash, every dollar of Bank of Canada deposits and every dollar of securities in the possession of the bank, and that the so-called hidden reserves item is simply a bookkeeping entry.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What would the bookkeeping entry represent?

Mr. CLEAVER: I am sorry if I have not made that clear. The bank may show a net value of loans of $215,000,000. They have reduced that by the amount of their estimated losses with respect to the loans. Those loans are secured by promissory notes, but actually the amount would be in excess of $215,000,000. They set up a reserve or a cushion between the par value of their loans and the amount which they show as the actual value of the loans. It is simply and purely a bookkeeping entry.

The major part of the attack in the banking and commerce committee was that we were all wrong in the way in which we are financing this war, that we have created an unbearable load of debt, that we are on the way over Niagara falls into the whirlpool of bankruptcy. The complaint has been not only with respect to the interest of the debt but equally with respect to the capital. In the light of present-day conditions when hon. members make a statement of that kind they know there are many gullible people who think the wealthy are holding out on them and all that sort of thing; they know there are many gullible people in Canada who will believe these statements even though they are wholly untrue. I think the least these hon. gentlemen can do when they make statements of that kind is to give us their proposal.

Time after time in the banking and commerce committee I asked the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard to tell us, please, what his proposal was. Was his proposal that for every dollar of the cost of the war we could issue Bank of Canada cash, debt-free money as he calls it? Was his proposal that we can finance this costliest of wars without any cost? I think he should tell us. Is it his proposal that a limited amount of Bank of Canada cash in addition to the amount that has been printed should be and can be issued? If it is a limited amount, I think he should tell us how much.

Our Minister of Finance demonstrated clearly this afternoon that while from a physical point of view we could issue as much Bank of Canada cash as we have paper and printing ink, it would not be debt free; it would not be costless; it would cost just as much in the long run to finance in that way as in any other way. I do not intend to go into that phase of the matter at all because it has been ably answered already, but there is one point which has not been covered and to which I should like to call attention. If we started the printing presses of this country to print Dominion of Canada notes, not for the purpose that they were intended to be printed but to pay our debts, I think the people of Canada would have something to say, I think the people of Canada would have a reaction as to the value they would place on those notes.

Keeping in mind the fact that there is not a dollar of gold behind our Bank of Canada notes; keeping in mind the fact that the value of those notes can be retained only as long as the public retains confidence in them, I suggest to the hon. members for Vancouver-Burrard and Parry Sound that the issue of those Bank of Canada notes is in the nature of a trust. The Dominion of Canada through its parliament has entrusted the Bank of Canada with the creation of a medium of exchange. The power to issue Bank of Canada cash was not given in order that the Dominion of Canada could pay its debts with that cash. The reason why the Bank of Canada is empowered to issue Bank of Canada notes is to supply to the people of this country a medium of exchange so that they will not have to carry on their trade by barter and the exchange of goods.

I suggest that just the minute any government departed from that fundamental principle and started to issue Bank of Canada cash for the purpose of paying government debts instead of for the purpose of supplying the people of this country and the business life of this country with sound money as a medium of exchange, just as soon as that happened the people of this country would have something to say as to whether they would put any value on that kind of money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member tell us what sound money is?

Mr. CLEAVER: I do not pose as an expert, but I will do my best. I would say that the Bank of Canada cash which has been issued to date is sound money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why?

Mr. CLEAVER: It is sound money because it does not exceed in quantity the amount of money that was intended to be created when the authority was given. It is a medium of exchange to permit the farmer who has a beef cattle to sell, to obtain a medium of exchange, which can be used anywhere in Canada instead of having to drive in the beast to the grocery store and obtaining credit there for it or bringing back goods to the value of the beast.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member is on the all-important question right there.

Does the soundness of the money depend upon its scarcity and, if it does, scarcity with respect to what?

Mr. CLEAVER: No, I would not say that it depends upon its scarcity. I would say that it depends upon its proper quantity and the purpose for which it was issued. If we tried to raise ourselves by our own bootstraps, if we tried to pay our debts with this paper money, the people of Canada would soon sense it. So long as the Bank of Canada confines the issue of Bank of Canada cash to the amount necessary for the carrying on of the business life of this country, then you have sound money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How can you tell how much is necessary?

Mr. CLEAVER: I would say, only by experience. It was brought out this afternoon that the people of this country are carrying around in their pockets something like six or seven hundred million dollars more cash than they were before the war. If that has happened it is obvious that we have between six and seven hundred million dollars more money than we had before to meet our normal requirements.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the money as sound now as it was in 1939?

Mr. CLEAVER: Yes. And I would say that it is the duty of the Bank of Canada if, because of a depression or for any other reason, that money is drawn out of the pockets of our people, to call in that surplus Bank of Canada cash, and I am sure that the bank will do it.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would the hon. member permit me to refer him to page 991 of the proceedings before the banking and commerce committee to settle the controversy we had about what Mr. Clarkson said. I was mistaken when I said that I was asking him the question. It was the hon. member for Peterborough West, seven lines from the top of the page. I quote:

By Mr. Fraser (Peterborough West):
Q. What I am getting at is this. I was wondering if they produced any revenue or not.

He was speaking of inner reserves, and went on:

They might and they might not. They might be profitable.
A. Oh, well, they would not be that; because you can see in your statement—
Mr. Fraser (Northumberland, Ont.): There is nothing there.
The Witness: Part of it might be in cash. Part of it would be in loans and part in securities.

That is the evidence of Mr. Clarkson.

Then as to the other point on which we differed, that the statements which the banks issued to their shareholders disclosed their hidden reserves, I refer my hon. friend to page 996 at the foot, where I find this:

By Mr. Slaght:
Q. Perhaps I can ask you this, Mr. Clarkson. This is the point I have in mind. If I were a shareholder of the Bank of Commerce, let us say, and read your report to the shareholders would I be able to ascertain from that the amount that the directors had set aside last year as a hidden reserve?
A. No.
Q. Why do you not tell your shareholders what the directors are setting aside for possible losses?
A. Why should you?
Q. Is there any other answer than that? If not, I will pass on.
A. No.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the first citation quoted by the hon. gentleman, if the hon. member for Halton will permit me, just before the passage read by the hon. member for Parry Sound I should like to direct the committee's attention to this question and answer:

Q. Having regard to these inner reserves, are they always revenue-producing or might they be non-revenue producing?
A. I can only answer you in this way. They are the difference between the aggregate fair realizable value of the bank's assets and the aggregate value of the composite lot as they appear in its statement. They are not earmarked at all. They are just so much in the pot.

Then comes the question and answer that the hon. member for Parry Sound read. If there is any attempt, which I am not sure there is, to indicate that the inner reserves themselves consist of cash and securities instead of being part of cash and securities as representing a write-down from the book value, then clearly the answer of Mr. Clarkson in the part which I have just read shows that that is not the case. They are simply a write-down of the book value.

Mr. SLAGHT: Part of it might be in cash, part in loans and securities.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They are just a write-down of the value of the assets, and among those assets will be securities and perhaps cash?

Mr. ILSLEY: There will be no write-down of cash.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There would be a write-down of securities?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If I may be allowed one more question, because this is very important and it is going on the record for all time, are they not a write-down of the value of all the assets as they are shown on the books of the bank at a given time as compared with the value of the same assets at a former time?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not all of them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Of certain specified assets?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to deal with that later. I am taking up the time of the hon. member for Halton.

Mr. CLEAVER: I repeat again that I think Mr. Clarkson was misled by the question and that the proposition was not fairly put up to him. I repeat again that I hold in my hand the bank statement of the bank of Montreal for 1943, and I say that that statement shows every dollar of cash and every dollar of securities of any nature that the bank holds.

Mr. McGEER: This afternoon the Minister of Finance referred to the fact that to-day we are carrying a much heavier load of debt with a very much greater amount of interest. The fact is that in 1920 we were financing dominion government bonds, issued to pay 5½ per cent tax free. The rate of interest at that time ranged from 5½ per cent to not lower than 2½ per cent. Obviously the endeavour to balance the budget that took place between 1920 and 1930 resulted in the collapse of the whole economic structure of the Dominion of Canada as elsewhere. When that collapse came, refunding took place all the way down the line until the general interest rate was reduced from 5½ per cent to 3 per cent, and in some instances the rate was lowered to three-quarters of one per cent.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I would ask the hon. member to keep to the section under discussion, section 59, which has to do with cash reserves.

Mr. McGEER: Of course, Mr. Chairman, section 59 as I read it is the section which gives the banks power to issue money, and the question is whether or not that power should remain in the chartered banks or should be recaptured and vested in the Bank of Canada. What we are dealing with is whether we can go on carrying the burden of debt that is piling up. The minister overlooks the fact that we have now reduced our interest rate in some instances to a level where it is just about equal to the operating costs of servicing money. But do not forget this. According to the governor of the Bank of Canada, at page 10 of his 1943 report, issued this year, the total annual interest payable in Canada by the dominion government as of August 1, 1939, was $169 million, and as at December 31, 1943, it had risen to $304 million. That means that this government, even on these figures, in a period of ten years must levy in taxation under this system for a total of $3,004 million. These credits are not offset properly against the interest.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why not?

Mr. McGEER: Why not? Let us look at some of the items he offsets. He says:

> In calculating a net interest burden adjustments must be made for C.N.R. interest which the railway is able to pay out of its own net earnings—

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. McGEER:

> —and cash revenue received by the federal government on its investments or advances to other organizations such as the Bank of Canada, the foreign exchange control board and the national harbour board.

Mr. SLAGHT: We get these just the same.

Mr. McGEER: We get these just the same, whether we pay interest or not. They have nothing to do with the interest item itself; they are independent revenues of the government, and if we were issuing our own money we would get these revenues in exactly the same way as we are doing now.

Mr. ILSLEY: We would not have had the properties if we had not increased our debt to acquire them.

Mr. McGEER: If we had used our own money we would not have incurred any debt. Of course the assumption is that there is no way by which a government can finance public enterprises unless it borrows its own credit, its own money. Let me give the committee one example of its fallacy which is based on indisputable facts. We were always told in Canada that this was a young country, that we had not the accumulations of savings which were required for our capital investments, that we therefore had to go into the realm of international finance, to London, Paris or Berlin.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Or New York.

Mr. McGEER: Or any place where large sums of money had accumulated over the centuries from large numbers of people. What happened when this war came? Did we go to London to borrow capital to build up the war organization? No, we did not, and we certainly did not go to Berlin or Paris, and we did not go to New York. The first thing we did was to lend England $700 million. Then we assumed the responsibility of our own army, our own navy, our own air force, and a new munitions industrial organization. How did we finance that? Did we go to London? Not at all. Instead of London being the rich uncle as we had assumed in the past, London was the poor relative. Not only did we lend $700 million, but we gave $1,000 million of goods and services. How did we finance that, because that required an enormous capital investment in plant and equipment and organization? Then the next year, because some people objected to a gift to Britain, we made it a billion dollar gift of mutual aid for the various nations.

Will anyone say again that, in the light of our experience in financing our enormous war programme between 1939 and 1944, we shall ever have to go abroad again to raise money to build railways or municipal buildings or provincial highways or harbour facilities? We have proven that Canada, as far as financing the development of her own resources with her own intelligence and her own labour is concerned, is independent of the world.

This notion that you cannot do these things comes back to the old story that money without gold behind it would not have the confidence of the people.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Another bit of nonsense.

Mr. McGEER: That kind of shibboleth has gone forever. Our Bank of Canada bills go forth and are handled and accepted by anybody, and there is not a penny's worth of gold behind them. And when we argued, as we did in 1934, as the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, knows very well, that we should divorce our internal currency from gold, that was the same kind of "heresy" they are talking about now when we say that we should finance our undertakings with our national currency and not with our national debts.

Mr. CLEAVER: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McGEER: Yes.

Mr. CLEAVER: If I may just state it first, so that you will understand what I mean.

Mr. McGEER: Yes, I am sure you will make it very plain.

Mr. CLEAVER: Well, I do not pose as an expert.

Mr. McGEER: No, I would not suggest that you would, very successfully.

Mr. CLEAVER: We are all agreed that Bank of Canada cash under the present system needs no gold backing. Would the hon. member please indicate whether in his opinion unlimited quantities of Bank of Canada cash could be issued and the cash still have its value?

Mr. McGEER: I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by "unlimited quantities".

Mr. CLEAVER: I will put it in this way. Will the hon. member tell me how much Bank of Canada cash he thinks could be issued, say within a given period?

Mr. McGEER: Yes, I am prepared to do that, very plainly. Enough to maintain the Dominion of Canada, upon a sound, going-concern basis, with a rising standard of living and with a reasonable measure of continuous employment of all those in Canada who are able and willing to work.

Mr. CLEAVER: Yes. Now my hon. friend does pose as an expert, which I do not, and he admits I am not.

Mr. McGEER: My hon. friend has asked a question, and that is all.

Mr. CLEAVER: How many millions of dollars—

Mr. McGEER: I ask the hon. gentleman to defer his question until I have completed my statement.

Mr. CLEAVER: I understood you were willing to answer.

Mr. McGEER: I answered one question—

Mr. CLEAVER: Perhaps you don't know.

Mr. McGEER: —and, with your usual spirit of generosity, you want two.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. McGEER: I am not prepared to go that far to-night.

I want to put on the record before the house adjourns an amendment which I propose to section 59. It is a very harmless sort of amendment, but it does vest control, as far as new issues of bank deposit money are concerned, in representatives of the parliament of Canada and the Bank of Canada. The amendment reads as follows:

That section 59 be amended by adding thereto a new subsection, to read as follows:

"The bank shall not hereafter create or issue bank deposit credit in place of or as a substitute for the lawful currency and coinage of the Dominion of Canada unless the amount so to be created or issued has been authorized by a board consisting of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and the governor of the Bank of Canada.

That does not mean that every time the banks create a new loan they will have to get that authorization. They can budget for three months or six months or a year. They can be stopped from doing what they did in the stock boom period of 1929. I examined the manager of the bank of Montreal on what happened in that particular period. The banks were behind the stock boom and the banks were definitely responsible for the collapse that came in 1929. In Canada it required several hundred million dollars of inflation of bank deposits to support that boom, and that boom was supported by the creation and issue of several hundred million dollars of bank deposit money. Here it is. The witness is Mr. Gardner, manager of the bank of Montreal. Let us take the situation that obtained in 1929.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I do not think the hon. member is in order in referring to these matters under section 59.

Mr. McGEER: Well, I am in order on my amendment, because the very thing that I am referring to which has been done is the thing I desire to prevent being done again, and my amendment will cure this very condition that existed then and that can happen again. If you read my amendment you will see that the power to create and issue bank deposit money, which created the boom in the past, will be prevented unless authorized by this committee that I propose to set up. At page 1326 of the evidence I quote:

> Mr. McGeer: Well, take the situation that obtained in 1929. As I recall it, in 1926 the total of bank deposits was $1,958,000,000. The stock boom came along and collapsed in 1929, when there was an increase in bank deposits of $335,000,000.
> The Witness: Right.
> Mr. McGeer: Then in 1932, when the stock boom had collapsed and wrecked the whole economy of Canada, there was withdrawn from circulation, by a decrease in bank deposits, $338,000,000.
> The Witness: Yes.

The manager of the bank of Montreal could not deny these figures. It was that inflation of bank deposits withdrawn from circulation which caused in the first instance the stock boom and the collapse that swept all over the country, which the bankers and the Bank of Canada were powerless to stop—because we must not forget that the depression continued into 1939.

There is another feature of this situation to which the Minister of Finance has referred. He says: Mr. McGeer says that he would tax and he would borrow. Well, that is a matter of degree. But what is happening to-day? We are told that we were going to pay our way in this war. Pay as you go was the slogan; pay out of taxation. What has happened since the war began? Instead of paying as we have gone, we have put an obligation on future generations already to the tune of something between ten and eleven thousand million dollars of new debt. If that is paying as you go, then I have a strange conception—

Mr. ILSLEY: The figure is high.

Mr. McGEER: My figure is not high. On your borrowings this year you have already made that commitment; you cannot escape it. I venture to suggest that if you include your commitments up to March 31, 1945, my figure is low and not high.

Mr. ILSLEY: You said "already".

Mr. McGEER: We will not quibble about that. Ten billion dollars in four years of war, on a debt load of four billions in 1939. That is something we need not be concerned about?

Let me point out another thing. We were told that this would be a war without profits. We have increased bank deposits since 1939 by two thousand million dollars. In 1938 we had $2,892 million and in April, 1944, our bank deposits totalled $5,297 million or an increase in bank deposits of $2,405 million. Where did the money come from?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not necessarily from profits.

Mr. McGEER: Certainly from profits or accumulated savings. Nobody but the Bank of Canada and the banks had the power to issue that money. But that is not all. Take your bonded indebtedness. If a man has money in the bank in what is called bank deposit he has what is called cash; but if he has a dominion government bond he has the next thing to cash; for, as the minister said this afternoon, there is always a market for a security at a price. So that when a man owns a bond—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does the amendment contemplate that this board shall control the amount of loans made by banks or control the amount of deposits to be accepted by banks, or both?

Mr. McGEER: No; to control only the amount of new deposits created by issuing loans and not by accepting deposits. This board will have nothing to do with anybody who comes along and makes a deposit of money already possessed, but when it comes to the power of the bank to issue new money then it will be free to this board to say, "You can issue that money, or we will issue it through the Bank of Canada."

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a very obscure answer.

Mr. McGEER: Maybe, but—

Mr. SLAGHT: What is obscure about it?

Mr. ILSLEY: The obscurity is that the hon. gentleman has not stated clearly whether the board is to control the amount of loans or the amount of deposits. He says the amount of deposits resulting from loans, which is perfectly unworkable. If he means this is a board to pass upon the amount of loans the banks can make, I understand what he is talking about; or if he says that they shall control the amount of deposits the banks are to receive, I can understand that. But I cannot understand a double-barrelled responsibility there.

Mr. McGEER: I will tell you one thing that will happen if it goes through. The interest on bank loans of your own credit will be obscured.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Ninth report of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Moore.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house resumed from Monday, August 7, consideration in committee of bill No. 180, to amend the Income War Tax Act—Mr. Gibson—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 4, subsections 5, 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 8—Alimony or other similar allowance.

Mr. KNOWLES: The parliamentary assistant will note that in subparagraph (u) (ii) the expression "if he deems it advisable" is used. The same expression is used in subparagraph (iii). The minister, if he deems it advisable, may obtain the advice of the national research council before consenting to certain deductions. It will be noted that in subparagraph (ix) the expression "if he deems it advisable" does not appear. In other words, in that instance it is mandatory for the minister to consult with the national research council. If under subparagraph (ix) it is mandatory for the minister to consult with the national research council before making these exemptions, why should it not be mandatory in subparagraphs (ii) and (iii)? My contention is that the expression "if he deems it advisable" should be deleted from the two last-mentioned subparagraphs.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The answer is that it is not felt that it should be made mandatory to consult the national research council in respect of every payment made for scientific research to a university, college or research institute. In some cases it may be so obvious that the payment is appropriate that it would not be necessary to refer the matter to the national research council. It would only be in cases of doubt that the minister might feel he should have the benefit of the advice of the national research council. I am advised that is the reason the permissive form was used when drafting the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: Why is it used in two subparagraphs and not in the third?

Mr. ABBOTT: Where it is over five per cent it is felt it should be mandatory to obtain the advice of the national research council.

Subsection 8 agreed to.

Subsection 9 agreed to.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Allowable deductions for taxes paid certain other countries.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is a phrase in this clause similar to the one to which I just called attention. In line 18 appear the words, "provided that the minister may in his discretion allow a taxpayer to deduct." It strikes me that in a case of that sort there should be a definite rule. Why is it left to the discretion of the minister?

Mr. ABBOTT: That language is similar to the language contained in the existing section. It may not be known exactly what the character of the foreign tax may be. For instance, it may be a capital gains tax, in which case we would not allow it as a deduction. In other words, there must be an administrative decision as to whether the tax in the foreign country is imposed on a comparable basis with ours. That is the reason for giving discretion to the administration to determine that question.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On section 18—False statement in any returns, etc.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have a technical amendment to suggest here:

That subsection 4 of section 80 of the Income War Tax Act as set out in section 19 of the bill be amended by adding the words "or section 46A" after the words "under this section" in line 33 on page 15.

Mr. GIBSON: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 19 agreed to.

On section 20—Refund by minister for taxes upon income for 1944.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is another technical amendment here:

That subsection 1 of section 20 of Bill No. 180 be amended by inserting between the word "taxpayer" and the words "the amount by which" in line 12 the following:

"in lieu of the amount refundable under subsection 1 of section 93 of the said act."

Mr. GIBSON: I move accordingly.

Mr. CHURCH: Some of these amendments have never seen the light of day before in this committee, and you are passing them and giving them the force of statutes over the head of this committee, something to which I objected last Friday.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that this year the amount that is allowed as a deduction from compulsory savings is split in half. Is that done on the basis of the amounts that are paid, say on an insurance policy during the first six months of the year, or do you take the whole year and then deduct half of the payments made?

Mr. ABBOTT: We take the whole year. When we were in the resolution stage I explained that where for instance a payment had been made in the last six months of an insurance premium the taxpayer would be entitled to take credit for half the voluntary savings during the whole period, whether made in the first or last six months.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 21—Married persons and persons given equivalent status.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I have a communication from a single young man not residing in my constituency, upon which I should like some information. He writes as follows:

While I do not object to carrying my share of the income tax it has seemed rather unfair to me that single men supporting a parent in a "self-contained domestic establishment" should receive less consideration than a man supporting a wife under similar circumstances.

Here is my example: I support my mother who is no longer able to work. She receives a British imperial pension of approximately $450 per year. Because this pension exceeds $400 per year I am taxed as a single person.

If I was a married man without dependent parents, in other words carrying similar responsibilities, I could claim married status provided my wife did not receive more than $660 from investments. She could earn any amount of salary without changing my status.

He goes on to say that it seems to be unfair and he would like to know if any consideration could be given to his case. I should be pleased to have some statement about this matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: The case referred to by the hon. member for Wellington South concerns a man who is supporting his mother or supporting a son or daughter in a self-contained domestic establishment. I gather from what he says that the mother has an income in the form of a pension of some $450, so that she would not be wholly dependent upon the taxpayer. I think it is by reason of that fact that the son is not able to get the tax credit which he would get were he supporting in that self-contained domestic establishment a son or daughter who did not have any income and who was wholly dependent upon him. I understand that the line drawn administratively as to what constitutes total dependency is that the dependent shall have an income of $400 or less. If the income is over $400 the dependent is considered as not being wholly dependent upon the taxpayer.

Under an amendment to the act this year a person in receipt of income in excess of a certain amount may make a donation to the crown and thereby reduce his liability to tax or the liability to tax of some other person who is supporting him. In the case my hon. friend has stated I think the mother would be entitled to avail herself of this amendment and make a donation to the crown of $50. The son would then be entitled to claim the tax credit or exemption to which he would be entitled if the mother were wholly dependent upon him. My hon. friend will find that the proposed legislation gives some relief in the case he has cited.

Mr. LOCKHART: In the event that the $450 was received and there were other circumstances meriting relief, extra help, for instance—I happen to know of one such case—would this allowance be permitted, or does the $450 rule it out?

Mr. ABBOTT: It would depend upon the total amount of the income.

Mr. LOCKHART: And extenuating circumstances would not count?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Section agreed to.

On section 22—Income of married person, and spouse.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, this clause was under discussion the other evening when I referred to the case of a doctor whose wife is also a doctor. There are others in the same situation—married lady doctors and married nurses who under a strict interpretation of rule 2 are discriminated against because they are receiving their earned income in the form of fees which are paid to them directly by their patients. I shall not go into the details again, because the basis of this discrimination was made quite clear the other day, and I think that hon. members generally have recognized that it is unfair. The desire of the government was to draw the line between earned income and investment income. It seems to me that it is quite proper to do that, but it is unfair that the classes of people to whom I have referred, whose income is earned income, should not come under the benefit of rule 2 simply because their earned income is in the form of fees. The point is that a married lady doctor working for a clinic and being paid a salary by the clinic comes under the last sentence of rule 2, but a married lady doctor who is receiving her income in the form of fees directly from her patients does not come under it, and the same distinction applies in the case of married nurses. Accordingly I move, Mr. Chairman, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the following amendment:

That section 22 be amended by deleting the words "being employed and" in lines 44 and 45 of page 17 of the bill.

If that amendment were to carry the last sentence of rule 2 would then read:

Provided that a husband does not lose his right to be taxed under rule one of this section by reason of his wife receiving any earned income.

The parliamentary assistant told us the other day that the words "being employed" militated against the cases to which I have referred because a married lady doctor who is receiving her income in the form of fees is not regarded as employed. I trust the government will see fit to accept this amendment.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that I shall have to raise my favourite point of order here; in fact I think it is the only one I have raised. I submit that the amendment which has just been moved by the member for Winnipeg North Centre is out of order because if adopted it would substantially affect the revenue. What he is asking is that the provisions of this section, which as now interpreted extends only to those in receipt of salary or wages, should be extended to all classes of earners, and that would include women lawyers, women doctors and women in business of all sorts. As I said the other day, the policy of the income tax act from the very beginning has been to allow a person who is in receipt of fees or profits to deduct his expenses in earning those fees or profits, but where he is in receipt of a fixed salary—he or she, and he includes she for the purposes of interpretation—no deductions are allowed for expenses. The effect of the amendment would be to extend the provisions of rule 2 to all classes of women who are earning money, whether it be in the form of salary or wages or whether they are in business for themselves and operating on a basis of gross profits and deducting their expenses from the gross.

Mr. KNOWLES: My amendment would still deny the benefit of the rule to those in receipt of investment income.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is true, but it would include all women who were in business for themselves or were engaged as lady doctors or insurance agents or anything else, who are receiving their income in the form of fees. The section as it stands is restricted to those who are in receipt of a salary or wages.

The CHAIRMAN: I think that the point of order raised by the parliamentary assistant is well taken. There is no doubt that the amendment if carried would affect the revenue and for that reason I declare it out of order.

Section agreed to.

On section 23—Tax credit for dependents.

Mr. CHURCH: Who is to know what the law is with respect to this section? The explanatory note says: "This implements in part budget resolution No. 8." That is not the effect of it in my opinion. Budget resolution No. 8 regarding dependency allowance and tax credits is most unfair, unjust and inequitable and it bears most hardly on the small man, and on those with a fixed income. They are taxed all along the line. Wait until you see the income tax next year with all these millions of relief resolutions and social security provisions which are being put over this parliament in the dying hours of the session. Nobody in this committee understands what section 23 means. I doubt whether the financial critic of the opposition knows what it means. I doubt whether some members have even read this section. I want to protest against the way in which these things are clipped through the committee. I did so the other day in connection with a related bill. So far as the dependents are concerned, the tax credits allowed are not what they should be. Take housekeepers, for instance, referred to in section 23. The Minister of Labour brought down a return the other day, which was never mentioned in the newspapers, indicating the great lack of domestic help in the homes of this country and the great dearth of nurses who are badly needed in our hospitals. That situation is becoming intolerable, and the dependents' meagre deduction allowances are partly to blame for it. It is time we called a halt. We should know what these clauses mean.

The budget speech should be fixed by statute within sixty days after parliament opens. Here is the one hundred and nineteenth day of the session, and these resolutions are brought down. Nobody knows what they are. What is going to be the result? When are we to file income tax for 1944 under the statute, including the schedule about dependency and that kind of thing? The allowance under section 23 for dependents is not large enough, considering what it costs to keep a house to-day. I urge there should be more liberal allowances all along the line for those who are keeping a household. In the city I come from there are a hundred thousand people with no houses who have moved into apartments, and it is the main taxpaying city in the main taxpaying province of the country. Some of the provinces pay little or no income taxes. This is a tax which for the most part involves the two industrial provinces. It is absolutely unfair that this kind of taxation should be imposed, applying to some and not to others. There is no attempt at equality of service or sacrifice.

Further, the lawyers cannot tell you what the law is, nor can the doctors or the physicians. Take section 23, rule 5: you have to look at "Rule 5 of section one of paragraph A of the first schedule." Who here this morning has ever seen the schedule; they are amending a schedule you have never seen; and section one of paragraph A of the schedule is amended "by replacing the period at the end thereof with a semicolon," if you please! We are learning grammar here from the department; a semicolon makes all the difference in the world. Then "the following words are added", and we are told that it follows resolution 8, and on page 18 we find "provision for housekeeper." Such a provision is unfair and unjust to those who keep a house. Why should there be any limitation in this connection? Does it not cost one person as much as another to keep a house of the same kind? I agree as to the proviso in the third paragraph, regarding the self-contained domestic establishment, for the reasons given in rule one of the section. But the whole thing, Mr. Chairman, should be simplified. I do not see why it is necessary to have these rules and provisoes and explanations referring to schedules in the statute. It would be more fair and just and more would be obtained in the long run if this government adopted the old income tax method of the municipalities and had the tax imposed on the aggregate net income received by the taxpayer. By setting a percentage of the man's income for tax purposes, be it 10 per cent or 12½ per cent or otherwise, he would know what he had to pay. To-day one does not know anything about it.

Only yesterday we had an election, and there seems to be a demand that income tax shall be restored to its proper place, where it was prior to 1917, namely to the municipalities. If this system of income tax goes on much longer I do not see where the taxpayer is going to be, because he has had to pay almost two and a half years' income taxes in a year. I wish to protest again against this proceeding;—against the method and manner of passing the amendments; the limited allowance made for tax credit for dependents; the construction put on domestic establishment; and, fourth, the system and method of taxation, the rules and regulations which are read into these amendments after we pass the principle of the Income War Tax Act, and all those things. If, as we hope, this bill will pass this morning, I doubt whether this afternoon any member of parliament will be able to tell you what the law is. The departmental officials all over Canada will need a volume the size of the revised statutes to tell them what the law is. We are going too far. Section 23 is fittingly numbered, it is a "skidoo" section, that is what it is; it allows some relief and others no relief; it treats one class of domestic householders one way and another class another way. I should like the parliamentary assistant to give us some explanation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think my hon. friend has misunderstood what this section really does. This is the section which, in conjunction with the comparable rule affecting graduated tax, extends to widows and widowers who are supporting their children in a self-contained domestic establishment with a housekeeper or servant the additional tax credit which up to the present they have not received. I explained on the resolution stage that widows and widowers receive the $150 tax credit by reason of the fact that they supported someone dependent on them in a self-contained domestic establishment, and in order to obtain the credit for the first child of $28 in the case of the normal tax and of $80 in the case of the graduated tax they had to "use up" that child to establish the status to entitle them to $150. This section gives relief to the extent of not requiring them to, so to speak, "use up" the first child in order to get the $150 taxation credit, and that is all this section does.

Sections 24 to 26 inclusive agreed to.

On section 27—Tax credit for dependents.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think it might not be amiss for a member of the opposition to rise and commend the government for having introduced this new provision, even if it did take a good deal of argument from this side of the house to persuade them to do it.

Mr. ABBOTT: We had it from other sides of the house, too.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, you got it from behind and before.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member must not take all the credit for himself.

Mr. KNOWLES: The request made, apparently by hon. members on all sides, was that daughters between the ages of 18 and 21 attending schools of nursing be treated as children attending educational institutions. The government did not see fit to grant our request in exactly that form, but I note under this clause, which is a new one, that if a parent actually spends the amount of $400 on a daughter training to be a nurse, he will receive a deduction of 20 per cent of that amount, in other words $80. Am I correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: Briefly, this is intended to recognize the fact that young people in this category who are training as nurses are not wholly dependent on the taxpayer but are partly dependent on him. That is, we have not gone the full length.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, it goes as high as $80 but not as high as $108, which is the maximum deduction allowed for a dependent child?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

On section 28—Incomes of married person and spouse.

Mr. ABBOTT: I desire to move an amendment to insert a rule which was overlooked in the second printing of the bill. It corresponds to rule 7 in clause 24 which has already been passed.

Mr. GIBSON: I move that section 28 be amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

(2) The said section two is further amended by adding the following rule after rule 8 thereof:

Rule 9—Where a taxpayer is entitled to make a deduction from his income for the taxation year under paragraph (t) of subsection 1 of section 5 of this act in respect of a payment for the maintenance of a spouse or a child, the spouse or child shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed not to be the spouse or child of the taxpayer.

Mr. SENN: I think the parliamentary assistant said that this related to rule 7 of section 24. Would he give us a brief statement of what that rule implies?

Mr. ABBOTT: Substantially it is this. A person who is separated from his wife and who is paying alimony or a separation allowance under a judgment or separation agreement is treated as an unmarried person, and he gets the amount which he pays as alimony as a deduction from his income. Up to this year his position was that he was entitled to take credit on his own tax for the tax which the spouse to whom he was paying the money would pay on that income. We have granted a further relief this year by allowing the payer to deduct from his income the amount paid to the spouse from whom he is separated.

Mr. SENN: The spouse from whom he is separated on her own account. Does he get tax credit for the payment he makes to the spouse to look after the children?

Mr. ABBOTT: He deducts from his income the total amount paid to the consort for her own support or for the support of the children.

On section 29—Basic income.

Mr. CHURCH: Does this apply only to men and women overseas or does it apply to those who are in Canada? Many of the cases are not covered by rule 2 under section 29 or by the amendment. I submit that there is a large body of men who should be included, the men in the merchant marine. They are at sea doing very hazardous work. No more valuable work has been done in this war than that which constitutes the battle of the Atlantic. Are those men included? In my opinion the rule is not clear enough and it should be amended accordingly. The last clause gives women members of the forces exactly the same tax credit as the men of the forces. To what class does that apply? Does it apply to those at home or to those overseas? In the old country, where similar provisions are in effect, objection was raised to certain of these provisions. There is a shortage of domestic help and of nurses, as discovered by a survey made. Everyone will pay the highest tribute to the work done by the women in this war, whose record has been a glorious one, but a return over there showed that some of the women in the armed forces were physically unfit, ill and absent after one or two years' service, while there was a shortage in the hospitals, to take one instance. I believe the same situation has been found in other allied countries. I suggest that some of these persons should be returned to industry, as the chancellor said in the old country, to help things along at home. At any rate, I hope that some provision will be made to include the men of the merchant marine. I do not think that is covered by rule 2 of section 3, paragraph (a) of the first schedule, which is not covered by the new amendment. What is the meaning of the provision?

Mr. ABBOTT: The necessity for amending this rule arises from the removal of one half of the savings requirements this year. In the case of the armed forces there is a fixed tax credit for those in receipt of an income of $1,600 or more, depending upon their status, whether married, and with dependents. This amended rule is this, in effect. We are not going to reduce the tax credit because the savings are cut in half, and while the matter is a rather technical one, and I am not sure that I would be able to explain it quite clearly offhand, I may say that this gives effect to the change in the law whereby the savings requirements are cut down one half for the current year. Since the armed forces operate on the basis of a tax credit, depending upon whether they have married status, and the number of the dependents, this rule makes the necessary changes to enable that tax credit to be established without taking into account the fact that the savings portion has been cut in half.

Mr. ROWE: That is relative only to the active service within Canada.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. ABBOTT: The active service within Canada. There is no tax applicable to overseas, so that the act does not apply there.

On section 30—Application to rule 2.

Mr. KNOWLES: Under this clause, which has to do with military service outside Canada, would the Minister of National Revenue indicate the status at the present time of income tax rebates that are to be made to men of the Kiska force? This is a matter that has been under consideration for some time. I should like to know whether rebates have been made or will be made at an early day.

Mr. GIBSON: The matter is under active consideration at the present time. The names of all those that were taxable—just the officers, of course—have been secured. Refunds are being made of over-deductions on income of 1943. They were entitled to six months' exemption from tax on their return to Canada; consequently arrangements are being made to deal with the amount deducted this year. If any of these officers have proceeded overseas they would be entitled to a refund. If they are in Canada, the deductions would apply against the tax that they might owe this year; but I understand that the Department of National Defence is not making further deductions from these officers for the rest of the year, so that the amount already deducted will likely be sufficient to take care of their tax indebtedness for the present year.

On section 31—Deductions in respect of 1944.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a slight technical amendment in drafting. I move that subsection 1 be amended by striking out the words "ninety-three" in line 36 and substituting the word "twenty". The "ninety-three" refers to the income tax act, and it is more appropriate to refer to section 20 of this amending act.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 32—Application.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a slight amendment to this section also. I move that the word "eight" at the beginning of line three be struck out. It should not be in the bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH: When will this act come into effect in 1944? Will it be as soon as it becomes law? When will the returns for 1944 have to be made?

Mr. ABBOTT: With reference to the first question, it will come into force as soon as it becomes law. There is a section which relates to various provisions of the bill as to when they become effective. The returns for 1944 will be filed on or before April 30 for individuals and, in the case of corporations, six months after the close of the fiscal year.

Mr. CHURCH: How long will it be before the schedules are ready, and the rules and regulations which are based thereon will be in the hands of the income tax divisions across the country, and when will the business men be notified?

Mr. GIBSON: As soon as the bill passes the house they will be printed and distributed as quickly as possible.

Mr. CHURCH: Is there not some way in which the minister can eliminate some of what I call the abuses of the system by which, after deductions have been made at the base all year, parliament meets and passes a whole lot of rules and regulations and clauses we have never seen? Will the practice of assessing somebody with a bill for about one-third of the total tax after the tax has been paid and after the deductions have been made according to the tables be adopted in 1944? Will the minister make any amendment to that for 1944? I should like to have an answer, Mr. Chairman. After business men have made deductions at the source in 1944, according to the tables, they are sent a notice saying that the deductions have not been large enough. I object to that. They are sent a bill for nearly one-third of the total tax.

Mr. GIBSON: From what the hon. member says I assume he is referring to the balance that is payable over and above the amount that has been deducted at the source. May I point out that the tax deductions tables are based on estimates of ninety-five per cent of the tax payable, and that the additional five per cent is not collected at the source. It is left to take care of such allowances as charitable contributions or unusual medical expenses. If the balance is not expended in that way, then there will be a balance of tax payable.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Mr. Chairman, you ran over the earlier sections so quickly I was unable to follow you. I should like to revert to section 8, subsection 10. This subsection grants tax concessions to companies drilling unproductive deep test oil wells if they are spudded in between June 26, 1944 and March 31, 1945. Undoubtedly the object of this subsection is to encourage drilling for oil. I suggest to the minister that the concession should be granted to all wells spudded in between March 31 of this year and March 31 of next year. When any company starts in to drill for oil it usually begins its work about March 31. Usually they begin to drill in new and unsettled territories. The wells will be deep test wells. If they start in at the late date suggested in the subsection they will be carrying on their work during the winter months. In order to avoid doing their work in the winter months they start early, about March 31. If the date could be changed it would be helpful to the industry. As it stands it will be of little or no help to the industry. Would the parliamentary assistant agree to having the date switched back to March 31, 1944, so as to include wells spudded in before that date?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want to go back and review the section. I explained this section fully when it was in the resolution stage. It is incentive legislation. That particular type of drilling has to be approved by the Minister of Mines and Resources. What my hon. friend is asking in effect is that it be made retroactive. While I have listened to the representations of the hon. member, may I say that that question was considered, and I am afraid it cannot be acceded to in respect to this particular type of well.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Wheat has been accumulating on farms in the prairie provinces for some years. This accumulation has taken place not at the wish of the farmers themselves but because the elevators were filled and it was impossible to have that wheat sold and shipped out of the country. This year the farmers will be able to dispose of that wheat. If they dispose of it this year and it is all taxed this year, the result will be the imposition upon the farmers of excess profits taxes that will be most unjust. Is there any provision to take care of that situation?

Mr. GIBSON: No provision has been made to take care of the situation to which reference has been made, although we have made a provision to deal with the taxation of moneys received from wheat participation certificates. Where those certificates were received over a period of years and are being paid in one year, the farmers are being permitted to include the receipts from participation certificates in the income of the year in which the wheat was delivered; but the situation where wheat or grain has accumulated for more than one year and is disposed of in one year is the same problem that industry has, where it has a heavy inventory and disposes of it all in one year. I agree that it is a problem, but there is no measure to provide a different means of taxation for the farmer in that situation from that which exists in other businesses.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): To adjust the tax on participation certificates of wheat or grain actually delivered to the elevator would not be helpful. In this case, the grain has been accumulating in the farmers' bins for three years. It has accumulated because they could not dispose of it. They wanted to dispose of it but could not. It seems to me that they should have the right to spread it over the three years in which it has been accumulating. It is most unfair and unjust to take all that accumulated grain and bring it under the excess profits tax; that is what would happen under the minister's explanation.

Mr. ABBOTT: Which clause are we on, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: When a privilege is granted it is sometimes difficult not to prevent abuse. I ask the committee at this stage of the session to keep within the section under discussion.

Mr. RICKARD: In some parts of Ontario farmers have been hit this year by hail storms. Some of them have nothing left. I have in mind a farmer in my county who has a big farm. He has seventy or eighty milch cows. He has no feed for these cows. If he has to sell the herd, then the income from them is taxable. In another year he may have enough feed to feed them, and may wish to replace them. Some provision should be made whereby this man will not be taxed in one year on the amount he receives for the sale of the cows. May I have some information on that?

Mr. GIBSON: I would say that where a farmer is forced to buy additional feed as a result of some calamity that he has suffered on his farm, that additional expense is allowed as a deduction from his income. Allowances have also been made to permit farmers to apply their losses in one year, both backward and forward.

Mr. RICKARD: He has no money to buy the feed. He wishes to sell part of his herd because he cannot feed it, and he has not enough money to buy the feed for them. He wishes to sell forty of these cows. If he does, he is taxable in the year in which he sells. For the next year if he wishes to continue the same business he would have to buy the cows back.

[Mr. Gibson.]

Mr. SENN: That is a very live subject among farmers. A great many will sell their herds and still have their farms. They realize on those herds in one year, and they are taxed on the whole amount. I do not wish to labour the question, but it is a live one and something should be done about it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do wish to keep within the rules. I believe there will be another place where this discussion might be had. Could we revert to a discussion of the bill? Perhaps it was my fault that the discussion has gone somewhat far afield. It is my understanding that all sections of the bill have passed.

Mr. RICKARD: I realize that, but surely at this stage of the session we can ask a question and get a reasonable answer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sure there will be opportunity for the hon. member to ask his question when the estimates for the Department of National Revenue are before the committee.

Mr. RICKARD: But it comes under this bill.

Mr. ESLING: Will the parliamentary assistant clarify section 4, where the deduction is allowed for hearing aids? What is the position with respect to allowances for batteries to maintain those hearing aids? If a person uses his equipment only casually, the supply of batteries is not so great. But if one depends upon those aids in his employment, it is a different situation altogether.

Mr. GIBSON: If I might interrupt the hon. member, the allowance for hearing aid apparatus includes batteries required for their maintenance.

Mr. ESLING: Is it a fixed sum? In other words, on the hearing apparatus there is a fixed sum, but that sum does not cover the cost of maintenance for batteries during the year.

Mr. GIBSON: That is included as an unusual medical expense. The usual medical expense is considered to be up to four per cent of a taxpayer's income. The unusual part is above four per cent, up to the limitation prescribed by the act.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 182, to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Adjustment to standard profits.

Mr. LOCKHART: What does this adjustment mean?

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I gave a detailed explanation when we were on the resolution stage. But capital employed, as the committee knows, is defined in the act. Additions to capital employed were permitted only in respect of accumulated surplus, if that surplus had been capitalized by the issue of stock dividends. These profits of accumulated earnings left in the business since the end of the standard period—the end of 1939—may be included in "capital employed" up to the end of 1943, or the beginning of 1944. Standard profits may be increased by five per cent of the amount of that additional capital. In other words it is a recognition of the fact that in a number of cases accumulated profits have been left in a business and are forming part of the capital employed. It is felt that recognition should be given to that fact, even though this may not have been capitalized by a stock dividend.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Deduction of excess profits taxes paid abroad.

Mr. KNOWLES: Section 6 of this bill is similar to the first part of section 6 in bill 180, to amend the Income War Tax Act, which we discussed a moment ago. I would appreciate it if the parliamentary assistant would refer to the section in the other bill. In the comparable section in bill 180 we find the expression, "in respect of the income of the taxpayer derived from sources therein." The section now before us is similar to this in all respects, except that it does not include those last words. Whether I understand that expression may be open to question, but I take it to be a section which would limit these tax deductions to taxes paid by the taxpayer in other countries on income which actually comes to him in Canada. To illustrate what I am getting at, I would refer the committee to section 6 of bill No. 180, at the bottom of page 9, where there is a provision under which the tax exemption allotted on dividends that a wholly-owned subsidiary sends home to Canada has now been limited by the government to the taxes paid on that portion of the income which actually comes home to Canada. Under the resolution as at first introduced the provision was quite sweeping, but the government has now limited the deduction from income tax paid in Canada on account of income tax paid in a foreign country to such taxes paid in the foreign countries as were paid on the portion of income actually reaching this country. Paragraph (b) takes care of that.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right. Instead of treating dividends from foreign subsidiaries as tax-exempt income, we have put it on a tax credit basis with respect to dividends paid to a Canadian parent by a foreign subsidiary.

Mr. KNOWLES: You give that tax credit, not for all the taxes the subsidiary may have paid in the foreign country but only for the taxes paid in connection with the earning of dividends brought home to Canada during the year?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am wondering if there should not be an additional phrase in the section before us to make sure that the same principle applies here. I feel that the taxpayer if he gets a deduction at all should get the deduction from his excess profits tax only on the taxes that he has paid in another country on income that actually comes to him in Canada. I am wondering if it is not an oversight that the phrase, "in respect of the income of the taxpayer derived from sources therein" has not been added to this paragraph?

Mr. ABBOTT: The misunderstanding may have arisen because of the fact that under the Income War Tax Act the Canadian taxpayer is taxed on his world income, whether he earns it in Canada or abroad and whether he brings it home or does not bring it home. He is entitled to certain tax credits. In the case of the Excess Profits Tax Act he is taxed on the same basis, and the ascertainment of the income for the purpose of determining the liability for excess profits tax is based on income, as that term is used under the Income War Tax Act. In other words, he is taxed for excess profits tax purposes on the net income, as that term is used in the Income War Tax Act. I am not just clear about the point raised by the hon. member.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not quarrelling with the basis for the ascertaining of the amount of income. My question has to do with the basis for ascertaining the foreign tax and whether the full amount of tax paid in other countries is allowed as an exemption in this country.

Mr. ABBOTT: The basis for ascertaining the tax is that the taxpayer takes credit for all the taxes paid in a foreign country with respect to income on which he is taxed in Canada for income tax or excess profits tax purposes up to, but not exceeding, our rate of tax on the same income. In other words, if the income of a Canadian taxpayer from all sources anywhere in the world is $100,000, of which $50,000 is derived from the United States, he would be taxed in Canada on his gross income of $100,000 from the two countries. He would estimate his tax at the Canadian rates and then he would deduct from that tax when ascertained the income tax paid in the United States with respect to the $50,000 earned there, provided that that tax was at a rate not exceeding the Canadian rate. That is the tax position with respect to the Canadian taxpayer. He would pay that tax whether the income was earned at home or not.

Mr. KNOWLES: I felt from the explanation of the parliamentary assistant that he was assuming that the phrase, "in respect of the income of the taxpayer derived from sources therein" applied to section 6 which is now before us, but my point is that it is not there and I felt it was an oversight.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a little technical. The hon. member will note that up above it says that the taxpayer may deduct from his tax and so on the amount paid to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the like in respect of the profits derived from sources therein. That is what he may deduct. Then the proviso reads:

> Provided that the minister may in his discretion allow a taxpayer to deduct from the aggregate of the tax under the Income War Tax Act and the tax under this act payable by him the aggregate of the income tax and excess profits tax paid to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland or to any of His Majesty's self-governing dominions or dependencies or to a foreign country.

As I said a moment ago, the reason is that income for the purposes of the tax is determined under the Income War Tax Act, and this provision is a tax credit against the tax and therefore the tax which has been determined on the income from sources abroad sets the Canadian tax liability. He deducts from the excess profits tax or the income tax as the case may be the amount paid abroad provided that tax rate is not greater than the Canadian rate.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just on the last reference of the parliamentary assistant, the provision that deduction for taxes paid abroad shall not be greater than the amount the taxpayer would have paid in Canada is set out in plain English on page 10 of bill No. 180. The parliamentary assistant is speaking now as though that same provision were included in section 6 of this bill, but I do not see it. That provision is not there. The parliamentary assistant is saying that the total tax deductions allowed in lieu of taxes paid abroad shall not be greater than the amount of the taxes that would have been paid under Canadian law. That provision is in bill No. 180, but I do not see it in bill No. 182.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sorry I have not been able to make it clearer. As my hon. friend realizes, it is pretty technical. The Income War Tax Act and Excess Profits Tax Act are interdependent, but I am assured by the solicitor for the department and my expert advisers that this section does cover the position I have indicated to the committee. There is no loophole whereby the tax may be avoided or a greater tax credit taken than the tax paid in a foreign country with respect to earnings earned there, and there is the further restriction that the rate in the foreign country must not be greater than our rate. One really should have the two acts side by side.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

National harbours board—

407. Advance to national harbours board, subject to the provisions of section 29 of the National Harbours Board Act, to meet expenditures applicable to the calendar year 1944 on any or all of the following accounts:

(a) Retirement of maturing debentures—

Saint John, $47,500.
Three Rivers, $158,400.
Total, $205,900.

(b) Reconstruction and capital expenditures —generally — unforeseen and miscellaneous, $200,000.

Mr. ISNOR: This item deals with the national harbours board, a matter in which I am particularly interested because of the large number of men employed on the waterfront at Halifax. On a previous occasion I made a suggestion to the Prime Minister which he was good enough to say was a helpful one, and later he indicated that the Minister of Transport would consider my suggestion.

I felt that the time was opportune for the Department of Transport, through the national harbours board, to take complete control of the labour situation on the waterfront at Halifax and at other ports which are under that board. I would respectfully urge that the minister give this matter his earnest consideration. We all know that there is a great amount of money invested in the operations of the national harbours board. In 1943 the board had a revenue of $10,861,081 and an operating income of $5,583,507. I feel that the investment is sufficiently large, particularly when we take into consideration the assets of the national harbours board amounting to $224,892,400.27 to warrant the closest supervision so far as the labour situation is concerned. Instead of having a large number of concerns looking after labour on the waterfront I believe that greater efficiency of operation would be secured if my suggestion were adopted, and I think it is particularly important at a time like this when Canada is at war and the quick dispatch of our ships both entering and leaving the ports is so necessary.

I could enlarge upon this but I indicated my views on a previous occasion and I shall not take up further time now. I will content myself by urging the minister to give favourable consideration to establishing a policy under which the waterfront workers, such as the longshoremen, the freight handlers, checkers and casual labour, would receive a guaranteed weekly floor wage. The situation in the past for many years has been that large numbers of men will come into Halifax and other ports and take work for short periods, at fairly good rates of pay, but I think it would be much better for the men themselves and result in greater efficiency in the operation of the ports if the men were guaranteed a weekly wage spread over the entire year. I hope the minister will give that suggestion very serious thought.

Mr. MICHAUD: I thank the hon. member for Halifax for having brought this matter to my attention. It is a very important question, and I can assure him that it will be given every consideration.

Mr. GILLIS: The senior member for Halifax has raised an important question. I do not know very much about the organization of the waterfront workers in Halifax, but I am of the opinion that each of the labour classifications mentioned by the hon. member is organized in a legitimate bargaining agency, and by order in council a commission was set up by the federal government for the purpose of coordinating the organizations mentioned. Just how well it has been working out I do not know. I would ask the minister if representations have been made along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Halifax by the unions along the waterfront in Halifax, or are they satisfied with the present arrangements? The commission was set up by order in council after consultation with the Department of Labour and the unions concerned.

Mr. MICHAUD: What the hon. member for Cape Breton South is referring to I think is the temporary wartime arrangement which has been made under order in council to take care of the war business in the harbour. But what the senior member for Halifax has in mind is a permanent rearrangement of the waterfront labour at all the ports, and that is a matter that we are going to look into.

Mr. GILLIS: Does not that commission handle it?

Mr. MICHAUD: So far as war work is concerned.

Mr. GILLIS: And there is some kind of floor wage?

Mr. MICHAUD: Oh, yes.

Mr. ISNOR: Perhaps I can throw a little light on the question raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I would be the last to want to interfere with any satisfactory arrangement that any labour union has at the port of Halifax. The hon. member is right in part in saying that there is a floor wage. There is a floor wage for what is known as the pool, which consists of approximately six hundred to seven hundred men. Originally they had a floor wage guarantee of $45 a week, but that has been reduced to $30 a week. Recently the checkers' union at Halifax made representations to the port controller that they come under an arrangement similar to the pool system and be guaranteed a weekly floor wage. I had no thought of taking away any bargaining rights which any union may have at the present time. My thought was rather that if all the waterfront activities were brought under the national harbours board it would lead to greater efficiency in the port's operations, and the labour unions which the hon. member has in mind would still continue to enjoy their present bargaining rights. They would be dealing with one organization, namely, the national harbours board, instead of with a large number of employers. I feel that my suggestion would be a move in the direction of greater efficiency in the handling of freight both incoming and outgoing to the port of Halifax.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I would like to add a word to what my colleague has said. There is one class of our waterfront employees at Halifax who I think will be entitled to a better deal at the very first moment an opportunity presents itself, and that is the freight handlers, particularly those who are handling wharf freight. Prior to September, 1942, this class was employed by the Canadian National Railways, but because of considerations arising out of the war it was deemed advisable to have these men employed by a stevedoring company to whom the handling of freight was given by the railways. This situation has been tolerated during wartime, but I submit that, now the end of the war is in sight, different principles must apply. These men should once again become employees of the Canadian National Railways. Many of them were employed by the railways as long as thirty years. They enjoyed certain benefits owing to the relationship to the Canadian National Railways; for example, they were entitled to temporary and yearly passes. While they were not permanent employees they had many of the rights and benefits which permanent employees of the Canadian National Railways enjoy. Some of them lived outside the city. Their passes enabled them to travel to and from work free of charge.

There are one or two other observations I wish to make about national harbours board operations at Halifax. Halifax has been called during the war the world's busiest port. It looks very much as though its activities may continue, if not on the same scale, upon a very large scale, for some years after the war. But because of the activities in Halifax during the past few years there has been no time for national harbours board to take care of ordinary maintenance of harbour works, let alone new construction. I wish to suggest, for the consideration of the minister and officials of the harbours board whom I see in front of him, several matters.

In the first place, there should be a new deep-water pier in place of existing piers three and four at the deep-water terminals. The existing wooden piers are quite old and are now almost a fire hazard. They could be replaced by a large pier, or even, if deemed advisable, by two small ones. That is something which should be taken in hand at the earliest possible moment.

Another matter: at pier 9, in the northern part of the city, an extension was made during the past year. Most of the pier, however, is of timber construction, built almost forty years ago, and its period of usefulness is now approaching an end. Consideration should be given to the construction of a new and more permanent type pier.

A new transit shed is required at pier 26. It is true that at the moment the open dock at pier 26 is under lease to one of our large corporations, but the time will likely soon come when they can release it and possibly confine all their operations to pier 9, where they are also operating. In that case pier 26 with a new shed could be used as an ordinary pier for the transit of cargo.

We hope that Halifax will become a very important fish centre after the war, and much more important in this respect than it is to-day. It is now the centre of very considerable fishing activities, but it is contemplated that these will increase, and I would suggest for the consideration of the minister and his officials that the cold storage plant be extended. Additional freezer space is required at the plant, and the new fish pier should be constructed in its vicinity.

One other matter which I suggest should be taken into consideration by the minister is the coordination of the fire services in Halifax harbour. Unfortunately a fire occurred on the national harbours property during the past winter, and a considerable delay occurred between the time the fire was first known to exist and when the alarm was sent in. A very full investigation was made by the fire marshal of Nova Scotia, and one of his recommendations was that the fire services of the Halifax-Dartmouth area be coordinated. The national harbours board have their own fire-fighting equipment there and their own fire services under the supervision of a very competent official, Mr. James Cody, who has had long experience in the work of fighting fires and has a capable staff under him. The city has its own fire services; so has the town of Dartmouth. I suggest, now that some effort is being made to coordinate these services, that the minister interest his officials in the matter.

Mr. ISNOR: I want to support the suggestions of my colleague. They have been talked over on many occasions. I hope the minister and the officials of the national harbours board will bear in mind that my colleague is not simply asking for expenditures. We believe that these are real investments which have been suggested for the port of Halifax. For some reason or other, and I do not say this unkindly, officials of the board when they come to Halifax are over-careful of spending a dollar. Perhaps it is because of the fine natural harbour we have, where there is no necessity of doing any dredging or carrying on such expenditures as are required in harbours where it is necessary to make channels. We have a natural harbour, with an inlet from the ocean leading into the port of Halifax, open the year round, and perhaps it is because of this fact, and the very few demands we make, that our suggestions occasionally made for the spending of money are sometimes overlooked. I repeat that they are not to be regarded as ordinary expenditures but as an investment to take care of future business. I support the constructive suggestions of my colleague, and I hope that the minister and his officials will be a little more kindly disposed in the future towards spending a few dollars, because future years will bring many dollars in return. Good common business sense dictates an investment in something which is going to make a very handsome return.

Mr. MICHAUD: The suggestions for improvements and extensions of Halifax harbour which have been made by the junior member for Halifax and approved by the senior member have been under consideration, and are projects which will certainly enter into the post-war reconstruction programme. As to the need of carrying on the shipping activities connected with the war, I believe both hon. members will agree that everything which could be done under the circumstances has been done to make Halifax harbour a port which could best serve the war effort.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I think that is so, but we are concerned more with what is going to happen when the war is over.

Mr. MICHAUD: The suggestions which the two hon. members have made have not escaped the attention of the members of the harbours board, and will be submitted in due course, as soon as circumstances and conditions permit, in the programme of reconstruction.

As to the coordination of the fire-fighting apparatus in the port of Halifax, there are three means of fighting fires, the city service, the town of Dartmouth service, and the two fire tugs owned by the harbours board. In the use of these three elements in fighting fires in the harbour of Halifax, I am satisfied that the harbours board has done everything that is possible, and I can assure the hon. members representing that constituency that it will continue to make every effort to secure better cooperation if that is possible among the different factors.

Item agreed to.

Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals—

409. Amount required to provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1944-45 to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the National Company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport made from time to time by the National Company to the Minister of Finance and to be applied by the National Company in payment of the deficit (certified by the auditors of the National Company) in the operation of the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals arising in the calendar year 1944, $564,200.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prince Edward Island car ferry has been before the house so often that I have no desire to raise the question again except to say I understand a new boat is being built, and perhaps the minister will tell us when it will be put into service.

Mr. MICHAUD: According to the contract we expect to have it delivered on the last day of October 1945, for the navigation season of 1945-46.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

395. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder, $256,800.

Mr. ROWE: Will the minister explain this?

Mr. MICHAUD: This is the cost of administering the civil aviation branch of the department as at present constituted under the Aeronautics Act, and carrying out all regulations made thereunder. I have not the details as to employees, but this is nothing new, nor has it anything to do with carrying out the amendments to the Aeronautics Act passed by parliament at this session.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will any part of this vote go to the airport at Malton?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is possible that under this item some officials employed by the department at Malton are paid.

Item agreed to.

396. Airways and airports—Construction and improvements, including lighting and radio facilities—(revote $592,400)—capital, $2,035,800.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), who usually has charge of this section of the estimates of the Department of Transport, is not here, because some of the things I would like to say under this item are by way of an answer to statements he has made in reply to questions of mine about Stevenson field at Winnipeg. I do not know whether the present minister is willing to let the item stand or whether he wishes me to go ahead.

Mr. MICHAUD: Go ahead.

Mr. KNOWLES: On several occasions I have asked questions on the floor of the house or through the medium of the order paper with regard to Stevenson field at Winnipeg, because in the view of those of us from that city the time is overdue for an enlargement of that field and particularly for an extension of the runways. A year ago when I pressed this matter under this very item the Minister of Munitions and Supply insisted that the runways at that field, in their present condition, are long enough for the largest planes that might wish to use the field. I quoted from one of the Winnipeg newspapers and made the statement that some of the larger planes that had sought to use the field had found it difficult to do so. I was in a very difficult position because I felt that some of the information that had been given me was in the nature of a military secret and so I was unable to press my point. Instead I had to let the minister's statement stand, that in his view the runways were long enough. Now, with the information that has been released about the purchase by Canada of bases in the north built by the United States government, and also with the information that has been released regarding the number of American planes that have been flown over Canada to the Soviet Union under the terms of lend-lease, perhaps we are in a position to discuss this matter much more freely. What I was told before, when I spoke about the matter a year ago, was that on two or three occasions some very large planes, American Flying Fortresses, had landed on Stevenson field but that the pilots who brought the planes down found that, although they made successful landings, they brought their planes to a stop so close to the end of the runways that they felt they did not wish to continue bringing these planes down on Stevenson field. That information was given to me by an official in the city of Winnipeg, but knowing myself that it might be in the nature of a military character I did not feel free to continue the argument with the minister last year. I understand that as a result of the experience of these pilots in finding the runways at Stevenson field not long enough for Flying Fortresses an arrangement was made whereby the United States government constructed a larger airport with larger runways at Edmonton. Consequently some of these larger planes which might have flown via Winnipeg and thus helped to build up the route through that city were flown instead through Edmonton and on to Churchill and thence to the Soviet Union.

I have no desire to say anything that could be interpreted as critical of the future of Edmonton as an important airport on the world air map of the future I have no doubt that Edmonton will be a place of great importance in that respect, but I feel that the same is true of Winnipeg. Winnipeg is at the very centre of the Trans-Canada route. We have large facilities there at the present time, but the people of my city feel that we have been given the go-by so far as plans for enlarging that field are concerned. Perhaps I should qualify that by saying that there have been plenty of plans drawn. I have seen them. Plans have been laid on the table of the house in response to motions on the order paper. But that is all that has happened. Nothing further has been done, despite the fact it is desirable to know what is to be done so that the necessary property can be purchased and any railway lines moved, if that should be necessary.

In reply to my representations on behalf of enlarging Stevenson field and extending its runways under this item, the minister's reply last year was, as I have already said, that the runways at Stevenson field were perfectly long enough for any plane to land there. The information that has now been published suggests that the runways are not long enough for planes that might have used the field during the past two or three years.

When the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was making representations the other day on behalf of certain airports in Saskatchewan, the minister made a slightly different reply to him. The reply on that occasion was that it was due to shortage of material and man-power. I suppose that that answer might now be made with respect to the situation at Stevenson field, and with some validity; but I am now seeking to refute the answer which the minister gave me last year when he said the runways were perfectly long enough. They are not long enough for the largest planes that are now flying, and because of that we feel that not sufficient attention has been given to the importance of Winnipeg on the air map of the future, not only on the T.C.A. route that runs from east to west, but on the route that will run from the United States through and across Canada to Europe and to Asia.

Now that the story of what has gone on in the past few years with respect to flying planes across this country is out in the open I hope that the government may reconsider its position so far as Stevenson field is concerned; that instead of a statement to the effect that nothing is necessary there, we shall have active consideration given to enlarging the field and extending the runways. I hope the fact that if this field is enlarged and the runways extended this work will be done in the constituency I have the honour to represent is not the reason why nothing has yet been done about this matter. The people of Winnipeg are deeply interested in this, and I earnestly hope that some active consideration will shortly be given to the matter. They are also deeply interested in the request that I made to the minister the other day, when I repeated the request which was made to him in the first instance by Mayor Coulter of Winnipeg, namely, that that part of Canada should be represented in the party that is leaving to-day to tour these northern air bases to see what use can be made of them in the post-war period. It is not good enough to try to sidetrack us in Winnipeg on this matter; it is not good enough to say what development there may be in the years that lie ahead. This is the kind of thing that calls for planning in advance, not only in the interest of Winnipeg but in the interest of Canada as a whole with respect to post-war civil aviation. Particular attention should be given to developing the largest, and most modern and most-up-to-date airport we can have in the city of Winnipeg. I hope there will be a change of attitude on the part of the government in connection with this matter.

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not think the hon. member is warranted in making the statement that he hopes there will be a change in attitude on the part of the government toward Stevenson airport. He knows better than I do that the airport at Winnipeg is one of the largest in the west and that it is a civil airport. During the war it has been sufficiently large to accommodate ordinary civil air travel. The incident which he mentions to support its contention that the runways should have been enlarged is that on occasions some very large fighting planes coming from the United States, found it difficult to land or take off from the airport. That may be true. These were exceptional occurrences during the period when it was difficult to expand the runways. The hon. member knows that the airport at Winnipeg is centrally and strategically located. For post-war world needs it will be necessary to revise the set-up. I may repeat to him what has already been said, that at the present time the technical staff of the department is working on a master plan to improve the airport in order to meet the possible and obvious requirements of post-war conditions. In order to meet war requirements some $1,342,000 have been spent on urgent improvements and enlarging of runways. I have no doubt that in the near future it will be necessary to enlarge them again, and possibly to revise the whole set-up and make it a much more modern airport than it is to-day, although I am told it is a very good one now. My hon. friend need not worry; the matter is receiving the attention of this branch of the service; the officers in charge know what the requirements of the future will be, and they will be able to take care of them.

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN-YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS

The house resumed from Tuesday, August 8, consideration in committee of bill No. 91, respecting banks and banking—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The discussion is on the amendment to section 59 moved last night by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

Mr. McGEER: Last night I was pointing out the necessity for this measure of control over the issue of bank deposit credits, as a substitute for Canadian currency. I would draw the attention of hon. members to the inflationary condition which existed between 1926 and 1929, and the deflationary condition between 1929 and 1932, which followed the line of the flow out of bank deposit money, and its withdrawal.

From 1926 to 1929 bank deposits were increased by $335,000,000, and from 1929 to 1932 they were withdrawn to the extent of $338,000,000. It was that amount of money, that amount of inflation of bank deposits, and that deflation of bank deposits that played a preeminent part in the stock boom and collapse.

To-day, under the law as it stands in section 59, the banks have issued $5 billion of bank deposits. They have, as the evidence before the banking and commerce committee shows, issued that on a ten per cent reserve of cash, holding, as they say, $501,000,000 of Bank of Canada cash on deposit in the Bank of Canada, or in their till. They therefore can now, under the law, issue another $5 billion, or increase the bank deposits to $10 billion, on the five per cent cash reserve requirement. But that is not all. Since the war began the Bank of Canada, in financing the government, has issued roughly a billion dollars in bank of Canada cash. The total in round figures today is, roughly, $1,400,000,000 in Bank of Canada cash in circulation, or on deposit with the Bank of Canada, or in the bank's possession. Now, of the $501,000,000 which the banks say they hold, and taking that from the $1,400,000,000, there is another $900,000,000 of Bank of Canada cash in circulation, a very substantial portion of which is potential cash reserves for the banks. Any time anyone takes a Bank of Canada bill and deposits it with a bank, that becomes a chartered bank cash reserve. Therefore you have an uncontrolled inflationary condition of $5 billion, and in addition to that reserves in issue and in circulation to the extent of $900,000,000, or sufficient to carry $18 billion of new bank deposits. This makes in all a margin, under the law as it stands, and reserves that are in issue, of a potentially possible sum of $23 billion of bank deposit money. That is the ceiling placed on them by the law.

Is it good enough to say, in the face of that situation, that the Bank of Canada which controls the situation now can prevent an inflationary condition of, let us say, $400,000,000 or $500,000,000, which would be quite sufficient to set in motion again the same type of inflationary boom and the same type of deflationary collapse we had between 1926 and 1932?

But there is something even more important than that danger. We are told by the Minister of Finance that we cannot use national currency to pay for government services. It is not because national currency is not a good medium of exchange. I have never been able to know the reason why the government, operating on a managed paper standard, was not in a position to create its own money and pay for the services and goods it requires. What could be wrong with the government letting a contract for a bridge and, when the construction was completed, handing the contractor Canadian national currency for his work? Why should it not pay for the transaction in that way, and put into circulation the money required to build the bridge? What would be wrong with that transaction? Those who received it would have the money to pay, and those who did the work and supplied the materials and skill would receive their wages. But why in the world would we go through the mumbo-jumbo nonsense of giving some cash to the chartered banks and then having the chartered banks create in a bookkeeping system a medium of exchange that we would borrow back and pay interest for?

People say, "Well, that would cause inflation," but they forget that we have done that very thing with a billion dollars of Bank of Canada cash in this war. The Minister of Finance says that you cannot do that under section 59 as it stands because you would threaten the country with the danger of inflation of the medium of exchange in common use, bank deposit money. Let me put that right on the record as he stated it himself on July 15, 1942, in the House of Commons:

> Every one familiar with the working of the banking system knows that, the moment the banks get their hands on additional cash—I mean by that Bank of Canada notes, or deposits by the Bank of Canada which are convertible into Bank of Canada notes—when the banks get those reserves in their hands powerful forces are set in motion to get the banks to buy securities themselves, to make loans themselves, so that the deposits of the chartered banks will be seven, eight, nine or ten times as great as their cash reserves. That lies at the base of their whole profit-making activities; the way they make money is by lending more money than they have. What they have is their cash reserves; and unless a bank has out several times—six, seven, eight, nine or ten times—its cash reserves, it is not being profitably, or from a banking point of view, properly conducted.

Are we concerned with issuing Bank of Canada cash so that the chartered banks can lend eight, nine or ten times more than the cash they have, or are we concerned with maintaining the solvency of the nation? Do you think it is reasonable to allow any private monopoly, any private corporation to take the cash of the Dominion of Canada and lend seven, eight, nine and ten times more than the cash they have in their possession? That surely is the power of issuing a substitute for money in terms of private gain and to the detriment of the economy of the whole nation.

So long as section 59 remains in its present position there can be no possible use of the Bank of Canada as the main utility of the nation. The Minister of Finance suggests that I am not concerned, but I say that I would use Bank of Canada cash, that I would tax and that I would borrow. I happened to have handed to me the other day an article which appeared in Maclean's magazine of March 15, 1933. This was written by me as a part of a debate conducted by Maclean's magazine between myself and Professor A. F. W. Plumptre. At that time I wrote these words:

> As a system, the banks no longer merely passively receive deposits and distribute loans but are the chief creatures of loans and deposits. . . . The system as a whole creates and distributes credit. . . . All the defensive arguments which picture the banks merely as society-serving go-betweens between outside depositors and borrowers fall to the ground.

Professor Plumptre agreed with me to this extent:

> There can be no doubt that, as a system, the Canadian chartered banks control in large measure the volume of money available in Canada—and agrees with me that the volume of purchasing power, which he agrees now consists of token currency, bank notes and bank credit, does affect "the general prosperity of the country."

And later on:

> Now, I proposed that the taxpayers' burdens should be relieved and the consumers' purchasing power augmented by financing all public enterprise with national instead of private bank credit, and to regulate and control circulation by regulatory taxation. Mr. Plumptre dismisses this proposal on the ground that it is impracticable, arguing that the necessary measures for the control of the volume of credit in issue through taxation would not be "politically popular."

That is exactly what has taken place since the war began. We have not regulated the price level by depending upon the money in circulation. We have done that by the use of deliberate controls. There is no monetary system in the world that could prevent prices from falling too low or rising too high without the assistance of direct controls exercised by the government. The same thing is true of your foreign trade. You cannot regulate the value of your money by any monetary manipulation and your only hope of sustaining your foreign trade is by the deliberate management and intelligent regulation of it. If you keep your exchanges of goods and services with other nations in balance you will find the value of your purchasing power internationally sustained. In that same article written in 1933 I laid down this as a general programme:

> (1) That the cause of the depression is due in large measure to the failure of the circulation of credit purchasing power.
> (2) That international agreement is not possible, and that Canadians must resort to their own devices to reestablish Canadian prosperity.
> (3) That bankers can now control in large measure the volume of purchasing power in issue and in circulation.
> (4) That the volume of purchasing power could be increased by financing all public enterprise with national credit, and that circulation of credit could be controlled by taxation.
> (5) That government should set up the economic machinery essential to the regulation of the issue and circulation of credit, and some measure of price level control.
> (6) That a closer approximation of the ideal volume of credit in circulation can and should be maintained.

What we have done in this war is what we did when we started moving out of the depression. There was no magic monetary factor used at that time. The enormous spending programme of the Roosevelt administration and the fact that we went into a spending programme in Canada brought us out of the depression with an accumulated budget deficit of roughly $1,000,000,000 in ten years. We have done exactly the same thing in this war. There is no trick in converting government bonds into money of the form that we use. We have done exactly in this war what we did in the last. We have used more national currency proportionately, and I believe we have used more taxation and more price control, but we have gone ahead exactly as we did between 1914 and 1920, elevating the debt load by discounting the future. Do not make any mistake about it, the borrowing to be spent to-day and to be paid back to-morrow or some time in the future is merely deferred taxation.

In addition to increasing our bank deposits by $2,000,000,000 we have roughly increased our issue of bonds by $7,000,000,000, and that is continuing at the rate of possibly $1,500,000,000 to $2,000,000,000 a year. Now where did the money come from that was used to buy those bonds? We certainly did not have it available in 1939. That money has been turned out through the chartered bank system, by a system of loans and advances and paper. But that $7,000,000,000 of money that was used to purchase those bonds must have been produced at a profit either on wages or other operations because those bonds have been purchased and paid for outright. What is going to happen to a country that piles up $7,000,000,000 of profit in four years of war and has that profit converted into $7,000,000,000 of national debt? I doubt very much whether very many people owning government bonds to-day are willing or anxious to convert that capital into some form of private enterprise. The risks are too great and the uncertainties too many. One of the most dangerous things any nation can face is a situation where far too much of its wealth is invested in first mortgages on the whole nation. We cannot issue national currency because if we dared to do it the banks would inflate through bank deposits. What I propose in this amendment is that they cannot issue any new money in the future for the purchase of government bonds or anything else unless a committee of the governor of the Bank of Canada, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister responsible to this parliament authorize it, and you can rest assured that with that power there, they would never authorize the issue of the volume of bank deposits that was required to start the last boom and to precipitate the last depression.

I know that it is easy to say that men are eloquent and that their oratory runs away with their intelligence, but I have never been ashamed of what talents I have. I have tried to use them in whatever public service my friends and neighbours have elected me to. I am not alone in advocating monetary reform. I would like to add to the list a few names of people who have advocated monetary reform, because we must be all crackpots together.

Woodrow Wilson said in 1911:

> The great monopoly of this country is the money monopoly. So long as that exists, our old variety and freedom and individual energy of development are out of the question. The growth of the nation and all our activities are in the hands of a few men who, by reason of their own limitations chill, check and destroy a genuine economic freedom.

Senator Elihu Root, recognized as one of the greatest councillors that ever spoke in the United States Senate, predicting what would happen and what did happen in 1933, said when the Federal Reserve Act of 1913 was being passed:

> This bill (the Federal Reserve Act) proposes to put in pawn the credit of the United States. We are setting our steps in the pathway that brought Rome to its fall.

Louis D. Brandeis, the distinguished American counsel at the Pujo commission in 1907 and afterwards an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, said:

> We must break the money trust or the money trust will break us.

Following these statements, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, after he was elected in 1933, said:

> Nature still offers her bounty, and human efforts have multiplied it. Plenty is at our doorstep but a generous use of it languishes in the very sight of the supply. Primarily this is because the rulers of the exchange of mankind's goods have failed through their own incompetence. Practices of the unscrupulous money changers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men.
> The money changers have fled from their high seats in the temple of our civilization. We may now restore that temple to the ancient truths.

Lloyd George, describing Roosevelt's fight for monetary reform, said this:

> The intrepidity with which he is fighting against the machinations of the established and arrogant priesthood of the golden calf is being watched with a thrill of admiration by those who, all the world over, have been suffering from its thraldom. If he wins he will have rendered a service to mankind which will exceed that of Lincoln when he abolished a more limited slavery.
> But his task is even more formidable, for the hierarchy he has challenged is powerful and its janissaries in all lands are federated in a well-knit, well-drilled and well-equipped brotherhood in arms. They play into each other's hands —they fight each other's battles. If they fail, they will share each other's ruin—if they succeed, they will divide the loot among themselves.
> In London and in Paris they are unassailably entrenched. To adopt the Scriptural quotation, "Judas is their law giver. Industry is their wash-pot and over successive ministries have they cast their shoes."

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGEER: That is not my language.

Mr. STIRLING: It sounds like it.

Mr. McGEER: It is Lloyd George's, and he is talking about President Roosevelt. Listen to what he says:

> The President has resolved that this verse shall no longer apply to American governments and American producers.

And we sit here and pass a bill that gives away for ten years the right of this nation to create and issue and use its own money, and we accept in its place a form of money issued by a private monopoly for private gain. I speak a word of warning to this government, because I want you to know that you have no special dispensation here. My own humble opinion is that the situation in Canada is such that we face a more terrible division of opinion than we have ever faced before in our history. Monetary reform is marching in the vanguard of the ambitions of the common people for a better Canada. Do not make any mistake about the votes in Saskatchewan and in Alberta. They are the people's votes and they are economic votes. The people in both these two great provinces have completely repudiated the old political parties.

I read a book in 1925, written not by a monetary reformer, not by a crackpot, but by one of the most astute and distinguished business men in the United States, a great philanthropist and a great success. Edward A. Filene, famous in Boston and throughout the world, published "The Way Out" in 1925 and he has this indictment to offer of the private money system:

> It is clear beyond need of explanation that most of the sins for which the modern revolutionist indict our social system are sins of the financial point of view, not of the administrative. I could bring numerous instances to show how the substitution of the banking for the administrative point of view affects good relations between employer and employee and seriously hinders social progress. As an astute critic of our social system has said: "An adequate study of the modern political organ that has grown out of the ancient business of exchanging and storing money must soon be undertaken."
> For the fact is that the administration of credit has become one of the greatest forces of social control in modern times. Credit is the lifeline of the business system which feeds, clothes and shelters mankind. It is therefore a species of social treason not to regard its administration as a public responsibility and a creative opportunity. The real rulers of modern society are not the men who own the most but the men who exercise most control over enterprise, namely the men who administer the world's money.

I think it is true to say that the slow and, to my mind often sinister, encroachment of the financial upon the administrative point of view in business and industry has given the modern revolutionist one of his best arguments.

In his May day speech of 1942, Premier Stalin of the Soviet Union had this to say:

> The German army is a blind tool in the hands of these gentlemen and is called on to shed its own blood and the blood of other peoples and to cripple itself and other peoples not for the interests of Germany, but for the enrichment of the German bankers and plutocrats. That is what the experience of war tells us.
> In reality the German fascists are enemies of European culture, and the German army is an army of medieval obscurantism, called upon to destroy European culture and assert the slave-owing "culture" of the German bankers. This is what the experience of war tells us.

Emil Ludwig, who has just written a magnificent sketch of our own Prime Minister, writing the life of Stalin, makes these observations:

> I am irresistibly attracted by the social justice of the world. Though I am convinced that the power of personality is greater than that of numbers and I cannot be taken for a Marxist, the foundation of the Soviet Union appears to me as the greatest event produced by our century till to-day. The Russians are the only people that have broken the reign of money.
> Stalin is so outstanding as a colonizer and general that he towers above most of our contemporary leaders—no matter what his end is going to be. Probably he will be the only dictator who survives the war. Who fears that Stalin's victory will bring world revolution is not aware of the fact that we are in it already.

We are following in the same steps that brought Germany to disaster. It was the debt load which precipitated the invasion to extinguish us. It was the debt load and the impossibility of advancing the Russian masses that compelled the Kerensky government to collapse and permitted Lenin to take over. And do not make any mistake about the programme that Kerensky had. He had a programme of social justice, of independence and freedom and of national development infinitely superior to anything which has been presented by the budget of this parliament. But it was too late. Do not make any mistake about what brought Mussolini into power in Italy or caused the revolution in Spain. It was the idea that you could go on financing by issuing debts based on the assumption that it was sound business to pay off promises you could not keep by making more promises that you knew you would not be able to meet.

We can, of course, balance our budget. But how are we going to finance our municipalities? How are we going to finance our provincial governments? How are we going to maintain the national income at the level estimated by some to be, to-day, over $10,000 million a year? We must maintain a monetary system that can circulate a medium of exchange created and issued by the government, not by a private monopoly.

I just want to say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that you will find confirmed beyond any question as to how we are financing the war if you will examine page 6 of the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada. He says:

> During 1943, the Canadian deposit liabilities of the chartered banks increased by $748 millions. In addition, total active note circulation (including Bank of Canada notes) rose by $161 millions, making the total expansion in the volume of money, therefore, $909 millions during the year.

Why did we not have $909 million of Bank of Canada cash? We did not need to have any debt. They say, "Oh well, if you did that the banks would have to service it through the exchange system." That is perfectly true. But why should the government pay interest charges and pile up unpayable debts for the purpose of bonusing the banking system? That is what you are doing. You are bonusing the banking system by clamping on the nation hopeless and impossible debts, and that in itself could never be justified. If anybody wants to put his money in one of our chartered banks and have them look after it and have them service it by transferring it under a cheque system, why should not that individual pay for that service? Why should the nation go into bankruptcy or accumulate unpayable debts to allow a person getting a service that is worth something to escape paying for it? If large corporations like departmental stores or general stores and merchants of all kinds want to use the banking system as their exchange headquarters and to facilitate their business, why should not they pay for that service? In Australia, of course, they have changed to 100 per cent cash reserve, and that means that when you have a deposit in a bank in Australia you have money in the bank behind it. But in Canada you have the promise of a banker to pay, and all the money he needs to have to make that promise good is five per cent of your deposits. Of course Australia is paying a service charge, but they cannot accumulate debt when they issue national currency and pay a service charge on it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The government is paying a service charge, though.

Mr. McGEER: Of course, and why should not the government pay a service charge? But it is not three per cent for bonds; and do not think that your banks have not got plenty of three per cent bonds in their vaults. You know they have.

Mr. ILSLEY: What corresponds to the Australian transaction is the deposit certificate transaction here, which is three quarters of one per cent.

Mr. McGEER: Well, that is only part of your programme.

Mr. ILSLEY: So it is in Australia.

Mr. McGEER: The Australian programme does not carry any debt with it at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the debt of the central bank instead of the debt of the government, that is all.

Mr. McGEER: How can it be the debt of the central bank? It is not redeemable in gold. When that money is paid out of the central bank in Canada, what debt is there of the bank on any piece of currency or on any bill it issues?

Mr. ILSLEY: Our bonds are not redeemable in gold either.

Mr. McGEER: Of course not, but they are redeemable in taxpayer's money, which is as good as gold.

Mr. ILSLEY: No difference in quality.

Mr. SLAGHT: A difference in burden, though.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no difference in burden either.

Mr. McGEER: Let us look further at page 6 of the governor's report. Here we are told that the dominion and provincial government securities held by the chartered banks rose by $626 million during the year, and most of this increase was accounted for by special short-term issues which were sold to the banks, and then he goes on to say that the cash reserves of the chartered banks rose $82 million during the year, as shown in the table on page 10. That is to say, $82 million of cash came from the Bank of Canada to the chartered banks and the chartered banks increased that to $748 million of bank deposit money which they used to purchase interest-bearing securities. Now analyse that transaction for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes. If I may be allowed to do so at this point, I know that under the proposed amendment it is difficult for hon. members to focus attention on any single question, but I would point out that standing order 40, at page 89 of volume 2 of Beauchesne's, refers to repetitions. I do not think it is in order for hon. members to repeat the same thing over and over again. I am not making any allusion to any particular speakers, but I wish to urge that point upon hon. members as sincerely and as strongly as I can.

Mr. MOORE: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) was generous enough, and indeed generous, when he stated that there were two sides to this matter. I shall try in a few words—a very few words—to present, shall I say, the other side to that to which we have been listening. I think there is need, Mr. Chairman, for just a little bit of sober thought about the nature of money. What is money? Well, it may be anything in form, but in essence, I suggest, it is a claim on goods. We want money only because of what it will buy.

Now we have several conditions of life. Unfortunately we have learned that there is such a thing as crisis. There is such a thing as war need, and money for war need. And what is that? A need for claims on goods. Our government has not been peculiar in the matter of war finance; it has followed, as I see it, a rather common pattern of financing war, and it has done so in three ways, first of all by the usual method of taxation, which in effect is a conscription of claims upon goods. War needs were insatiable. The government went on to borrow future claims on goods and as I gathered from the Minister of Finance last night in his very able speech, it borrowed in several ways, first directly by way of loans from the people, from individuals and from voluntary associations. And then it borrowed from institutions such as the banks —and the banks were only one of several institutions. It borrowed from them claims on goods, or moneys, if you like, that had been deposited with them as trustees.

But the government went a step further, and all governments practically have done the same thing. It went on to write out claims for itself by way of the issue of money through the central bank, and of course that may be done in various ways.

Mr. McGEER: Not all governments.

Mr. MOORE: Not all governments. I am saying this government did.

Mr. McGEER: You said all governments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MOORE: I have no objection to anybody asking questions or intervening in what I have to say, because the matter is a controversial one and it is most important that we get at the truth of it. The government, I say, proceeded in three ways. First they taxed and taxed and taxed, and then they borrowed and borrowed, and then they issued what is commonly called fiat money. I take it that the objection from my hon. friends who have spoken so strongly on the subject is that they did not issue enough of the fiat money. But there is a further objection. They look forward, as we all do, with apprehension into the future.

Again we have a difference of opinion and I wish to be perfectly frank in stating my opinion. My trouble is not with the money of the future. I may be accused of being orthodox in my views, and sometimes orthodoxy in these days is not regarded as a virtue, but I contend that all marketable production can be financed. My trouble is to foresee production. I have no trouble about finance, because I realize that it will follow naturally.

A Scandinavian economist, whose name I believe was Pierson, likened money to a shunting engine. It went up the tracks and pulled down cars and put them on the main highway and away they went. Now, you will never solve this problem by multiplying the number of shunting engines. What counts is the load in the cars.

I want to come right down to the issue in this thing. I hear a great deal about monetary reform. I never used the word "crackpot", never in my life, and I have never used the words "funny money", but I do object somewhat when people tell me they have a new idea, that there is something new in the idea that the state should finance itself by issuing its own money, fiat money.

The hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. McNevin) spoke yesterday about greenbacks. Well, we might go back to the war of 1812. We might go back still farther, as the Minister of Justice will recall, to France in the revolutionary days when that theory swept the people. I am not going back that far, for history does repeat itself. I have listened and listened to the suggestion that we should serve ourselves and our future by issuing money, and I think of the words that were written by an eminent monetary economist. The name may be familiar to some hon. members—Ludwig von Mises. During the critical days after the last war he was professor of economics in the university of Vienna. He is in this country now. He has written a book recently, and was somewhat surprised to hear us—I do not mean in this house—in this country saying the very things that were said after the last war in Europe. This is one of the things they said: Why should not people issue fiat money; why not more money and more money? He said then that it was regarded as a wicked thing to think that the state could not build railways, could not build anything and everything that it wanted to build because it had to borrow from capitalists and the money interests. I am giving his statement in digest form. I have it here, and if the committee wishes I shall read it later on in detail. What I am interested in is the result of that policy; what was the result of issuing fiat money as it was issued then? In 1923 there came chaos to Europe and particularly to Germany. Why did it come in the form in which it came? Remember; go back a little, if you do not mind my adopting the school-teacher attitude. Money is a claim on goods. At the time fiat money was regarded as a species of taxation. Fiat money is a species of taxation, but it is a bad species. It is a disguised absolutism, because when the Minister of Finance brings down a taxing bill we in this house ask ourselves, upon whom is the burden going to fall? And our constituents judge us by our answer. We in this house have adopted the policy and the principle—and it has been adopted in democracy generally—that the burden should fall according to the ability to pay, the capacity to pay.

What happens when the state issues fiat money of the sort we are discussing? Nobody really knows where the burden is going to fall. The impact of it nobody can see, but we are certain of this. We are certain it is going to fall hardest of all on the people with fixed incomes. It falls hardest of all on the wage-earner. I am going to give the committee some figures as to what happened in Germany. It is very easy to know what brought about the collapse in Germany in 1923. I maintain that it was not the increase of debt; it was the increase in the amount of state money issued, fiat money. This is what happened. The number of unemployed in Germany was relatively small in 1923. Real wages were falling lower and lower between April and October. In October of that terrible year the wages of trained and skilled worker for one week were just about sufficient to buy a hundred pounds of potatoes; nine or ten hours of work were necessary to pay for a pound, not of butter, but of margarine; to buy a pound of butter a man would have to work hours longer. A hundred pounds of fuel briquettes took the pay of twelve hours' work; a pair of ordinary boots took six weeks and a suit of clothes twenty weeks.

In commenting on that state, Professor Bruck, who was then on the staff of University college in Wales, said:

> We have to bear these facts in mind as a background for the fearful convulsions in which Germany was involved at this time. She was shaken by the fear of revolutions by both communists and national extremists. At this time mass-psychology and ideology were shaping themselves into the antagonistic ideas which clashed during the next period and came to a head in January, 1933.

Mr. McGEER: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MOORE: Yes.

Mr. McGEER: It it not a fact that as a result of that action Germany did liquidate her entire internal debts?

Mr. MOORE: Yes, repudiated them.

Mr. McGEER: Is it not a fact that following that she proceeded with the same kind of currency to build a war machine with which she attacked the world?

Mr. MOORE: We will just follow that with you. We have heard that the thing can be done by price control. If we wanted to liquidate our foreign debt as has been suggested, repudiate our foreign obligations, we might do it. I would not vote for the measure.

Mr. McGEER: Who suggested it?

Mr. MOORE: I would not vote for the measure.

Mr. McGEER: Who suggested that?

Mr. MOORE: Inferentially the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, by his question.

Mr. McGEER: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MOORE: I want to be fair. That is all right.

Mr. McGEER: I am not worried about the brute majority.

Mr. MOORE: I am not either.

Mr. McGEER: You have it behind you; I have not.

Mr. MOORE: I do not know whether I shall or not when I get through. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard asked if it was not true that by these measures Germany repudiated its internal debt. I say I am not in favour of repudiating our internal or external debt by that kind of measure. I believe it was last night that either the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard or the hon. member for Parry Sound—I am not sure which—said that we did not need to fear anything of the sort, that inflation was a bogey, now that we had learned how to have price control. Well, let us look at that for a moment. We have price control. We have it as a war measure, and for more than one purpose. I would assume that one purpose is to divert the earnings or claims of the people, as far as can be done, to war services. The other is to keep prices down. We are used to the word "ceiling", although some people are not used to that word when it is applied to wages. On the whole however we take it, and take it well. We do so because we think of those boys overseas who have much heavier burdens than we have. But there is a different outlook when peace comes; you have a different problem of control. We must remember that we can have price control, and that they can have it in Russia much easier than we can have it in Canada. Whatever else we may be, we are an almost maturely developed country. There are something like a million articles in modern commerce, and they cannot be controlled by a central authority, no matter what the capacity and capabilities of the price control board may be.

I have quoted from von Mises. I want to give the committee his considered opinion, for I have the highest respect for him, and I know everyone who is interested in international economics holds him in highest opinion. This is his conclusion:

> A government that sets out to abolish market prices is inevitably driven toward the abolition of private property. It has to recognize that there is no middle way betwen the system of private property in the means of production combined with free contracts, and the system of common ownership of the means of production. It is gradually forced toward compulsory production, universal obligation to labour, rationing of consumption and, finally, official regulation of the whole of production and consumption.
> This is the road that was taken by economic policy during the war. The etatist, who had jubilantly proclaimed the state's ability to do everything it wanted to do, discovered that the economists had nevertheless been quite right, and that it was not possible to manage with price regulation alone. Since they wished to eliminate the play of the market, they had to go farther than they had originally intended. The first step was the rationing of the most important necessaries; but soon compulsory labour had to be resorted to and eventually the subordination of the whole of production and consumption to the direction of the state. Private property existed in name only; in fact, it had been abolished.

And when that had been done the form of government had to be changed. Because, after all, even forms of government must be altered, changed and adapted to the functions they are called upon to perform. And in that way Europe generally, and Germany especially fell into the condition which we are trying in this war to overthrow, and which we will never permit to come into this world again.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the process of debate to reply to the hon. member for Ontario. I appreciate that this good man is highly trained. Nevertheless I believe it will be in the interests of this committee that several observations be made with respect to some of the things he says. I trust I may be able to continue in the calm and quiet way in which he spoke—and I believe I can.

The hon. member said that money is a claim on goods. That is exactly right. The more goods a nation has, the more claims it can have. Is that not so? Is that not common sense? If money is a claim on goods, then the goods in a country can be increased and the claims on those goods can also be increased, just as fast as the goods increase. That ought to be quite clear. And if a nation is producing the goods, can anyone conceive of any reason why it should have to borrow the claims?

That is the contention of the hon. members for Vancouver-Burrard and Parry Sound. We in Canada are increasing goods and are able to increase our goods indefinitely, because of the bountiful resources this country has, because of our highly-trained human material, and also because of our great industrial development. Why should we ever have to borrow the claims on those goods?

Just as an illustration: If the hon. member for Ontario owned a large theatre with a seating capacity of one thousand, he could create one thousand tickets or claims on the seats. Can anyone conceive any reason why he should have to borrow those tickets from somebody else to claim the seats in his own theatre? Why should the tickets be borrowed and owed to somebody, and interest paid on them? That is a question this committee must examine.

The hon. member for Ontario used the illustration of the little shunting engine, and I gathered from what he said that he questioned the need for increasing the number of engines. I would ask hon. members this simple question: If a shunting engine were able to handle one hundred cars successfully, and the number of cars increased to two hundred, I wonder if the hon. member for Ontario would still try to handle all those cars with one engine. Would he not increase the number of engines to meet the increased number of cars?

Mr. MOORE: Is the hon. member putting a question to me?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. MOORE: I just repeat what I said, that any marketable goods can always be financed.

Mr. McGEER: Then why were they not financed in 1936 and 1937?

Mr. MOORE: I am glad to reply to that. As a matter of fact I have some very interesting information here, if the hon. member would care to have it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should be glad to have the hon. member reply. I want to be perfectly fair to the good member. I have high respect for his knowledge and understanding, but I believe he is not yet too old to learn.

Mr. MOORE: I may say that I have been in a hard school these last two or three months.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall be very glad to have him answer because I want to be fair. But beyond the shadow of a doubt, if the number of cars that the shunting engine has to handle increases sufficiently, there will have to be another shunting engine.

Mr. MOORE: Quite.

Mr. BLACKMORE: So that the number of shunting engines is not fixed in any given economy, nor is the amount of money which a country can have to effect its exchanges. When a country has to have new money, the contention of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, the hon. member for Parry Sound and a few others of us is that a number of tickets can be created by the state and the state does not need to owe anybody for the tickets.

May I say a word or two about the European situation. The Europeans were asking the question, "Why not create money to advance national projects?" after the last war. An all-important matter has to be raised and understood. As a whole the European countries are "have-not" countries. Germany was a narrowly restricted country with 66,000,000 people as compared with Canada, almost an empire in area, with but 11,000,000 people. Who can draw a parallel between the conditions in Germany and those in Canada?

First of all let us bear in mind that the European countries had large populations and relatively meagre resources as compared with Canada. Having that in mind let us turn to what happened in Germany. In the first place, Germany was a small country with a large population and with relatively meagre resources. In the second place, Germany was exhausted as a result of a most disastrous war. In the third place, she had had fastened upon her the terms of the treaty of Versailles which were positively ruinous. They demanded the delivery of the very goods and services which would have supported the money that Germany could issue. They demanded railroad cars, railroad ties, coal and many other commodities to be delivered in almost impossible abundance. At the same time they demanded the delivery of a great deal of gold. How could you judge a country which was in the condition Germany was by ordinary monetary standards? Any one who attempts to compare what happened in tragic Germany in 1920 with what might happen in blessed Canada with her boundless resources and small population simply is not capable of forming a correct judgment. Germany's great lack was goods. In normal times Canada can produce more goods than her people can possibly use. Our problem is one of distribution.

May I turn to the taxation aspect of money? The hon. member for Ontario said that the creation of money was a form of taxation. Mr. Chairman, I emphatically challenge that statement. The creation of money will not constitute taxation unless that money causes a rise in prices. Money will not cause a rise in prices if there are already more goods on the markets than there is money in the economy. To create money to equal the goods on supply is not a form of taxation in any sense of the word because it does not cause a rise in prices. I challenge the hon. member to question that.

The question was raised as to price control. We realize fully that price control is not always easy. Let me draw this to the attention of the hon. member for Ontario. You can always bring down the price of a commodity by increasing the amount of that commodity beyond what the people can use. As a simple illustration, if we have a bumper crop of potatoes in Canada, the price of potatoes comes down. The same thing will happen with any other commodity you can name. If you want to bring down prices, you increase production and then your prices will not go up. The main difficulty then will be of putting floors under your prices.

I think this is one of the points the hon. member for Ontario made. By using a scientific method of price control prices can be completely controlled. First, let there be abundance of production of every kind the nation can produce to the point at which there is more of each kind of commodity than the people can use. Then prices will not rise because of demand. You will have no inflation. If you put floors under the prices you will keep them from falling too low. If there is a tendency for prices of manufactured goods to rise prices can be brought down by means of a government subsidy or by discounts with compensation. By the use of price floors and discounts with compensation the price levels of the community can be brought into alignment and thereby prices can be almost completely controlled.

I do not wish to go further in the debate at the present time. I will let it go on just as it was going, but I wanted to answer those remarks of the hon. member for Ontario. I think I have said enough just now.

Mr. SLAGHT: May I have just a word with reference to the scholarly and interesting contribution to this debate made by the hon. member for Ontario, for whom we all have the greatest respect. I listened closely to see whether he would discuss the amendment, and except that he would have the committee draw some inference from what he gave us, he did not in my view, and I say this with great respect, discuss the true point at issue.

Mr. MOORE: I was trying to follow the remarks of the mover of the amendment, and I confined myself to those remarks.

Mr. SLAGHT: That may be the reason why the hon. member did not discuss the true issue involved in the amendment as between it and the section we are seeking to alter. I accept his explanation. I want to say a word on his attempt to make an allegory or comparison between what those who support this amendment propose should be done in Canada and what he told us was done by the German gangsters after they incurred such enormous foreign debts after the last war.

Mr. MOORE: Not gangsters.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member says "not gangsters?"

Mr. MOORE: In 1923-24, the period of which I was speaking, Germany was governed by a democracy.

Mr. McGEER: Schacht was in charge in 1923 as he was in 1932.

Mr. SLAGHT: Use any name you like, but they were the greatest monopolistic financial gangsters that ever ruled in any country. By any other name a rose would smell as sweet. That same crowd of financiers deliberately flooded and overflooded Germany with marks for the purpose of inflating her currency to the point where no country could stand it. That is the same crowd that helped Hitler build that system of army and munitions which invaded the Ruhr and then passed along for six years to engage in the cruelest and greatest gangster war the world has ever seen.

Mr. CLEAVER: To what extent does the hon. member suggest that we should flood Canada with the same sort of dollars?

Mr. SLAGHT: Not at all. I am coming to that, if the hon. member will be patient, but I do not want to spend too much time on it because I have other things to deal with.

The financial chaos in Germany was deliberately created for the purpose of repudiating her debts, and it succeeded; it worked. There is no suggestion in anything that has been put forward by myself or my colleagues that we should adopt a fraudulent course of that kind in Canada. I have made it clear throughout, following the close analysis of my hon. friend the member for Ontario, with which I agree, that throughout the war this country has had recourse to three sources of getting money: taxation, borrowing all you can by victory bonds from the public, and then there has been a gap between those two sources and our necessary war expenditure which it has been necessary to fill. My complaint is with the method that the Department of Finance adopted to fill that gap. Is that a matter of flooding the country with money in order to repudiate debts? My hon. friend knows better than that. I have never advocated any such thing, and it is a poor answer to drag in the gangster fraudulent intent which worked in Germany as against the arguments presented against the monopoly which the Canadian banks enjoy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to emulate if I can the excellent and quiet delivery to the committee of the hon. member for Ontario. I recorded yesterday the original capital of the banks, $145½ million, and their well-earned and disclosed reserve of $136¾ million, making a total of approximately $282 million, which is employed in the business of Canadian private banking. That is the amount that went into that business. In addition to that we permitted the banks some years ago to print and create, for the mere cost of the paper and the printing, $140 million, amongst them, of their own bills. That is now reduced to some $40 million and will disappear in a few years. Somebody tried to tell us in the banking and commerce committee that that was not a privilege that we gave them, but a liability. I would not bother answering that, because the banks printed bills and lent them out at five and six and seven per cent interest.

Mr. CLEAVER: I think we should be fair. The statement was that it was both a privilege and a liability.

Mr. SLAGHT: It is not a liability at all. It is a monopolistic privilege added to the other one that they enjoy.

I come now to the runaway character of the government borrowing from the private banks, and will show you the figures. They are very important. In 1933 the total dominion government borrowing from the chartered banks was $578 million. We have increased that now to $2,700 million, an increase of approximately 450 per cent. Another interesting fact in connection with that monopoly is that this same government on December 31, 1943, although indebted to the chartered banks for $2,700 million, had to their credit on deposit with the banks the enormous sum of $750 million. It is true that you would need to keep some sort of liquid amount, but they had on deposit with these same banks $750 million of the $2,700 million on which they were paying interest to the private banks.

I am not going to spend any further time on the proposition that the banks do create money. A year ago people challenged that, but the Minister of Finance in the quotation the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard gave a few minutes ago put that at rest, along with Mr. Towers and others, when he said that the banks lend eight, nine and ten times their cash reserves. I quoted yesterday from Mr. Eccles and various other authorities, and so I take it that the committee is satisfied on that point. But just let me give this one further reference, which is so recent. I was questioning Mr. Towers in the banking and commerce committee on May 19, 1944, at page 161 of the proceedings, as follows:

> Q. You told us yesterday that the banks create money. When the finance minister takes a bond for $1,000,000 to a chartered bank and they receive the bond and credit him with a mililon dollars, you told us that in doing so they were creating money; is that correct?
> A. That is true. The moment it is credited, however, it becomes a loan from the depositors of the bank.

No one has ever questioned that. It goes on.

> Q. I appreciate that—the reason being that instead of turning a crank and making billions of credit, they make it by a bookkeeping entry?
> A. Yes.

Now let me deal for a moment with the excuses and, if I may say so without disrespect, the smoke-screens that have been put up on behalf of the banks by their advocates as to why we should not retake from the banks and exercise ourselves the right that under the British North America Act was vested in the dominion government on behalf of the people of Canada.

The first one is this. They use the expression with reference to creating interest-free money through the Bank of Canada—it was used some weeks ago by a very distinguished gentleman in this house—"you cannot get something for nothing." He brought out that old platitude. There is a great tendency to whip up a saying of that kind and throw it out as though that ended the matter. But that quotation has nothing whatever to do with the situation. The Minister of Finance in the last four years has financed through the Bank of Canada practically one billion dollars, although a couple of years ago when I wanted him to finance through the Bank of Canada to the extent of one billion dollars he was shocked and he told me: If you do that you will blow the lid off.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman was advocating that we should do that at once. He made his suggestion in the spring of 1942. The billion dollars that we have borrowed from the Bank of Canada has been spread over the entire period of the war, and in that is something like seven or eight hundred million dollars of bank notes which are carried around by the people and have not gone into the chartered banks at all as cash reserves. That one billion dollars was gradually spread over a long period. That is quite different from the proposition of the hon. gentleman, put forward in the spring of 1942 here, that we should immediately issue $1,200 million of national currency.

Mr. SLAGHT: I was pointing out that this great bugaboo of inflation that is always raised in answer to the proposal to issue our own currency in terms of public need is a spectre that is waved before us to threaten us with every time that we propose to finance in that way.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Utterly contemptible!

Mr. SLAGHT: I am not saying that. I believe the gentlemen who put it forward are, if I may say so, absolutely sincere, but they have been educated in that fashion by the bankers for forty years. That was used ten years ago when there was a suggestion by the Liberal members of the banking and commerce committee, notably the Hon. C. G. Power, that we should do just what we have proposed to do at this time. The government of the day, under the able chairmanship of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, trotted out the same old bugaboo on behalf of the banks, that if you did that you would have inflation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And the Liberals swallowed it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Power never made any such suggestion.

Mr. SLAGHT: The suggestion I refer to has no possible bearing on the point we make, and I will tell you why. We do not propose to get something for nothing. We propose to regain for the people something which was given away by our forefathers to these private banks, something which was of great value, and when we come to take back something which was given away to people who we think are not entitled to keep it any longer—something of great value—in order that it may be used on behalf of the people as the British North America Act intended it to be used, what possible application has it to that philosophy to say that we propose to try to get something for nothing?

The second excuse or, if I may so call it, smoke-screen set up on behalf of the bankers is usually the bugaboo of inflation. They suggest that if we create our new money without interest it will have a greater inflationary effect than if we borrow it into existence through the private banks. That has no foundation, and you do not need to take my word for it, because the Minister of Finance has admitted it at least twice to me, and published it in Maclean's magazine, that if you amend section 59 of the Bank Act, then, to borrow and issue our money with government notes into existence through the Bank of Canada has no more inflationary effect than to borrow it through the chartered banks. Let me put him on record. I quote from Maclean's magazine of October 15, page 52:

> When the banks lend large sums to the government, they create additional deposits in the process. In the first instance, the new deposits are turned over to the government by the banks when they make the loan. The government spends these deposits by drawing cheques against them—and they arrive in the hands of the public in exactly the same way as if the government had printed more dollar bills to pay its expenses.
> These bank deposits are the commonest and most important form of money these days and the increase in them produces the same inflationary effects, and must be subject to the same sort of limits, as the issue of money described in question 13.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I suggest that this is "Parry Sound money" that the hon. member is advocating.

Mr. SLAGHT: I did not catch what my hon. friend said.

Mr. McGEER: Northumberland wit.

Mr. SLAGHT: If there is anything there which is worthy of an answer I should like to hear it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Not an answer, a suggestion. I was saying it to your constituents.

Mr. SLAGHT: Well, you had better think of your own if you are going to oppose this amendment. I know what my constituents think.

At a later stage or on other occasions the Minister of Finance dealt with this matter, and another reference to the subject, under date of March 20, 1941, page 1717 of Hansard, where it is very neatly put, is as follows:

> This could be nullified or offset if we were to raise the reserve ratio.

By that he was referring to the possibility of inflation by using the Bank of Canada.

> The legal reserve ratio at the present time, as the hon. gentleman knows, is five per cent. If we were to make it 100 per cent, we would have no more inflationary effect if we borrowed from the Bank of Canada than if we borrowed from the banks. . . .

I think the minister is sufficient authority for me on that matter of the inflation bugaboo, and I am going to leave it there.

A third excuse put forward for the banks is the one given yesterday by the minister: "Oh, if you pass this amendment you will wreck the banks; they will not have enough profits." And in his able address when he introduced the Bank Act he went to some length to show us how modest the profits of the banks were.

Let me remind this committee of some factors which stand out. First, the profits of the chartered banks for the past twenty years and the dividends they have paid their shareholders have been rich, fat profits, and rich, fat dividends on their capital stock invested. The figures from the "Canada Year Book" for ten years up to 1941 show an average dividend payment of about ten per cent, and that is on top of the reserves which they have been tucking away and hiding and on which they are getting freedom from taxation in the current year, and which they will not tell us. If we had those, you have no idea what secret reserves would be added to the picture. By reference to exhibit 10, page 117 in the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee, it will be found what rates of dividends were being paid by the banks in the early thirties, when people were in dire distress and riding the rods, when numerous failures were occurring, and the stock market was in the depression of 1932. Here are the rates of dividend paid by the chartered banks in that year: 12 per cent, 14 per cent, 12, 12, 12, 12, 8 and 12.

Mr. CASSELMAN: That is on par value.

Mr. SLAGHT:: On par value, certainly. You never pay dividends on anything else.

Mr. CASSELMAN: But you may pay two and one-half times the par value, so that you would not get that return.

Mr. SLAGHT: I am looking at whether this is an industry as to which we should cry "wolf" the minute you desire to lessen their power to lend money which they have not got, or as has been put by the minister, ten times more than their cash reserves. The period I have mentioned includes the worst depression we have ever known, but the banks sailed merrily along so far as paying dividends was concerned. In the second place they built up their reserves over a long period to just about the original capital. In other words they have doubled their money. Mind you, that is only the disclosed reserves. If we had the other reserves brought into the daylight it might appear that they have trebled or quadrupled their money. The minister knows but, as the little boy says, he won't tell. He won't tell parliament. I discussed that yesterday. I am not blaming the banks for building up cash reserves equal to their capital by their thrift and business ability. I think it is a splendid thing to do. They have built three thousand buildings scattered all over Canada; excellent buildings, valued by themselves at $70 million and all paid for. The next item is that they have had for years and still have the use of some $40 million of their own bank bills, created by paper and printing ink and lent out at five and six per cent, and have added the profit on these bills to their annual intake. In addition to that let me point out that some fifteen or twenty years ago they were paying dividends as high as fourteen or sixteen per cent on their capital, and at the same time piling up the hidden reserves. Over a considerable period of time, on top of these figures, they were paying for many years income tax of their staff out of profits and deducting that from their profits before those profits were taxed. They have a substantial and satisfactory pension fund for their employees in which they have set aside out of profits, in the last fifteen years, $22½ million. I do not complain of that; I think it is a splendid thing. I only wish we could provide for our civil servants on the same basis. But I want to answer this question about wrecking the banks.

Mr. ILSLEY: Civil servants are provided for on a more generous basis.

Mr. SLAGHT: So my hon. friend says.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is true, too.

Mr. SLAGHT: That does not seem to be the opinion that is held. Let us not forget that out of 11½ million people there are 51,000 shareholders, and some of the shareholders are corporations, who in turn represent many shareholders who share at second hand in the rich dividends that the banks are able to declare.

They try to frighten us by saying that if you take away this privilege of lending to the government, they may stop paying to the savings depositors 1½ per cent, which is the nominal rate, but which Mr. Towers states works out at only slightly more than one per cent as representing what the savings depositor secures. It was suggested that this is a burden on the banks and that if we clipped their wings at all by taking this monopoly from them they would reduce the interest rate. I am not alarmed by that, and I again quote the Minister of Finance at page 2546 of Hansard:

> There can be no doubt about the competition for deposit accounts; even though the banks pay the same rate of interest on deposits there are other ways in which the keen competition manifests itself.

So that the banks are only too happy to get savings accounts deposits. If you have read, as I did in the last three months before the committee sat, the advertisements in the press of the chartered banks you will recall that they pointed out what great virtue there is in having competition among the banks, and they invite savings deposits. They invite you to accept their service. It must not be forgotten that we run a savings deposit account in our post office department. I was greatly intrigued by the alarm set up by the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont., who said that it would not be safe to deposit money with the post office savings department because the building might burn down or it would be an inducement for robbers to enter the post offices and steal the money. That is the type of argument that is being sought out and put forward on the floor of the House of Commons in opposition to the retaking of this monopoly privilege which in my view the banks should never have enjoyed.

Let me suggest this. The banks may have to reduce their dividends slightly for the first year if this amendment carries. They may have to stop piling up further hidden reserves at the rate they have been doing and the amount of which they refuse to tell us. They may have to drag out into the open some of these hidden reserves. But so far as other results are concerned there is nothing to interfere with the shareholders of the banks. There is nothing unfair to them or to the people of Canada, and such fears are purely imaginary and conjured up. They will not stand investigation.

Let me put to you in a word what rights the banks would still have left to themselves if this horrible calamity which is going to wreck them were put into effect. I will tell you in a nutshell what they could still do. We do not interfere in any way with the remunerative business the banks do in carrying on legitimate commercial banking by lending to industries and to the business men of the country, which we are told last year, with their loans abroad, as well as in Canada, produced a revenue, on loans and discounts, of $55 million on an original capital of $145,500,000; nor will this amendment interfere in any way with the excellent business they do in exchange commissions, service charges and other current operating earnings. That is an item they insert, and last year the ten banks had a revenue of $35 million from these sources, which would not be interfered with. The amendment we propose will however have the effect of forcing the banks to bestir themselves to lend their money to the general public in a greater degree instead of sitting back and locking up government securities in their vaults and folding their hands complacently with the knowledge that they cannot lose. That, I suggest, would have a healthy effect on Canadian industry and prospective borrowers. Let me give some figures which I think may startle hon. members although we are familiar with them in the committee.

What our amendment, if carried, still leaves the banks the right to do business on is this: $145,500,000 original capital, on which they would be allowed to lend, and $136 million of reserve, a total of $282 million. On April 30 last, as taken from the official figures, the private banks had savings deposits of $2,254 million, which with the two items mentioned makes a total of $2,536 million, or roughly speaking $2½ billion, which after our amendment carries they will be entitled to lend to the people of Canada but not to the government of Canada.

Let us see what their needs have been in lending to the public during the last ten years. First, it will interest you to know that their lendings in 1944, on April 30 of this year, their outstanding loans to the public, were in Canada $962 million only. That is a bit low. I want to be fair about this. It is a bit low because the government itself has been financing industry to such a large extent that the needs of private borrowers have been less. But get these figures: $962 million is the total that the banks had out, lent to private persons or industry in Canada on April 30, a couple of months ago. They had lent abroad an extra $197 million, in Nassau and Cuba and in their foreign branches, making a total of money on loan of $1,159 million. I showed you that they would have $2,600 million under this plan. But, you may say, back through the years it may be they were lending the public a great deal more than that. Let me hurriedly give you the facts. In 1938 their total loans, Canada and abroad, were $1,191 million; in 1939, $1,236,000,000; in 1940, $1,317,000,000; in 1941, $1,497,000,000; in 1942, $1,367,000,000 and in 1943, $1,333,000,000. In each of these years they would still have only about one-half of the money left to lend to the public in future years if we do not wreck them by the amendment being put into effect.

A word about service charges; I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard covered that sufficiently this afternoon. I entirely agree with him. What hon. member in this committee will say that the man who receives the benefit, the large corporation that gets the major benefit out of being serviced by the splendid banking system ought not to pay for it? Under the present system all the taxpayers of the country pay it in the interest they pay on the bonds that the government of Canada have lodged in the vaults. All the taxpayers of Canada pay the service charge regardless of who gets the most benefit. I should like to have an hon. member of this committee rise and defend the continuation of that system. Somebody says, why should they not pay it all, because the little fellows, the poor people, the under-dogs have not bank accounts anyway? They have not sufficient income to come within the lower brackets of the income tax. I say that there are 958,000 Canadians who are in the two lower brackets; that is, the unmarried man from $660 to $1,200 and the married man from $1,200 to $1,800. That group constitutes 958,000 taxpayers out of something over two million in Canada who pay a total of $882,000,000. The two groups I have mentioned paid $87,000,000, a small amount but it is big to them. Taxes bear more heavily on them. They are not based on such a heavy ratio on the little fellow as on the big fellow, but on top of that every man who has a little family pays an eight per cent sales tax on everything that he buys for his children, and he has to buy three outfits in a year. We are to-day taking a part of the salary of the little fellow to bonus, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said, to finance the private banks of Canada. I want to quit this sort of thing. I think it is time we quit it. It is not a good enough reason to refuse to vote for this amendment to say—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member has now spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. McGEER: One or two statements made by the hon. member for Ontario should not, I think, be allowed to go unchallenged. He dragged out the old bugaboo of German inflation. "Germany's Master Plan," written by Joseph Borkin, who has been for many years economic adviser to the anti-trust division, department of justice of the United States, particularly with regard to foreign international cartels, and Charles A. Welsh, who is an authority on international trade and finance and is a cartel expert for the office of price administration, outlined how Germany had merged economic and air commands, and marshalled light metals and gas and everything else for the purpose of establishing world conquest. At page 9 they say:

> How perfectly these tactics interlocked in the design is evident in the sucession of manoeuvres which made up German policy during the 1920's. A planned inflation liquidated the cost of the first world war.

A planned inflation was carried out in 1920 as the first step toward liquidating the debts so that they could move with the same managed currency to build the greatest war machine in the world. It was the accumulation of debts that demanded the inflation which liquidated them, not the inflation that caused the collapse of the debts. I take it that those gentlemen are probably in a position to speak with even greater authority upon that particular issue than the hon. member for Ontario. He also referred to the fact that fiat currency is dangerous currency. We have had a fiat currency since 1928. Mr. C. E. Neill, vice-president of the Royal Bank of Canada, refutes the statement of the hon. member for Ontario with regard to his ideas of the supply of money in relation to the distribution of goods and with regard to his ideas about fiat currency. May I place on the record Mr. Neill's statement taken from the annual report of the Royal Bank of Canada in 1932. This is what he says:

> These wide fluctuations in the money value of output are clearly a monetary phenomenon which, if properly understood, could be prevented. Over-supply of individual commodities could explain the decline in the value of one commodity in relation to another. Over-production of agricultural products in relation to manufactured articles would justify a decline in the price of farm products as compared with the products of industry, but when the average of all prices declines this can only be explained by an undersupply of that in which prices are expressed, i.e., money, and it would seem that if the effective supply of money is kept in the right relation to production of commodities the phenomenon of a declining average price level will not occur.

He then goes on to say:

If on the collapse of the stock market boom the principal central banks of the world had decided that drastic contraction of currency and credit was not to be permitted, a drastic fall in the price level could not have occurred. Thus the countries with fiat currencies, such as Argentina, Uruguay and Spain are not suffering anything like as acutely as the gold countries.

I take it that Mr. C. E. Neill, because of his position, is probably a better authority than the hon. member for Ontario. I wish to put one more quotation on the record in answer to the old wheeeze that you cannot get something for nothing. On April 24, 1939, Mr. M. S. Eccles, chairman of the federal reserve system, explaining how the $15,500,000,000 of gold was paid for by the treasury of the United States, made this statement:

The process by which the treasury acquires gold and puts it into use involves a number of technical steps, partly the result of custom, partly the result of law and regulation. Reduced to simple terms they are as follows:

1. The treasury receives the gold—usually at a United States assay office or mint—and issues a cheque in payment for it.
2. The cheque is deposited by the seller of the gold at his bank, which gives him credit in his deposit account.
3. The bank deposits the cheque in the federal reserve bank and receives credit in its reserve account.
4. The federal reserve bank charges the cheque to the balance which the treasury maintains with it.
5. The treasury replenishes this balance by crediting gold certificates to the federal reserve bank in exchange for deposit credit.

At the conclusion of these five steps the matter stands as follows: The treasury has possession of the gold; bank deposits and bank reserves have both been increased by the amount of the gold; and the treasury's checking balance at the federal reserve banks, reduced by the purchase of the gold, has been restored by credits based upon the gold.

The purchase of the gold has cost the treasury nothing.

If you can get $15,500,000,000 in gold into the treasury of the United States for nothing, by a sane management of the national currency power, you can do something of the same kind here.

Then, one word in regard to the argument that this amendment is inflationary. All this amendment proposes is to give the Minister of Finance, the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Prime Minister power to say to the banks, "You cannot inflate your bank deposit money, and you cannot issue money to the amount of eight, nine or ten times the amount you have." This is to prevent that kind of inflation which caused the last disastrous collapse. It is not to create an unlimited supply of money, but rather to place the government, in its intelligence and understanding, in a position to stop this pyramiding of debt, to use national currency in terms of private need, and to substitute that process for the one of allowing bankers to issue a fiction of money in terms of bankers' greed.

The CHAIRMAN: I must repeat that there has been considerable repetition. We shall have to do something about that, and must stay more closely to the section.

Mr. MOORE: May I be allowed in a few words to reply to the statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Parry Sound. They have referred to the monetary cause of the depression. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has put my word up against that of one of the bankers. Well, I propose to seek shelter in the word of an economist from the London school of economics, Professor F. A. Hayek.

We are marshalling our authority, and it is for the committee to decide, not which are the better authorities, but which carry the most conviction. Professor Hayek, writing in 1932, in the midst of the depression, said:

There is no reason to assume that the crisis was started by a deliberate deflationary action on the part of the monetary authorities, or that the deflation itself is anything but a secondary phenomenon, a process induced by maladjustments of industry.

Mr. SLAGHT: Is he speaking of a country?

Mr. MOORE: He is speaking of the world depression, and continues:

If the deflation is not the cause but an effect of the unprofitableness of industry, then it is surely vain to hope that by reversing the deflationary process we can regain lasting prosperity.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is the meaning of the expression "maladjustments of industry" used by the professor?

Mr. MOORE: I cannot tell the hon. member in a word. I think it would take me more time than this committee is prepared to allow me to give the causes of that depression. As will be recalled, I quoted some of them in the banking and commerce committee, drawn from the economic committee of the League of Nations, and the hon. member was good enough to say that they were a valuable contribution to the discussion. Professor Hayek went on to say:

> To combat the depression by a forced credit expansion is to attempt to cure the evil by the very means which brought it about; because we are suffering from a misdirection of production, we want to create further misdirection—a procedure which can only lead to a much more severe crisis as soon as the credit expansion comes to an end.

I wish now to refer to another matter. I am not satisfied with the statements of the hon. members for Vancouver-Burrard and Parry Sound. This word "inflation" is a bad word. It is something like the word "toadstool"—it has no scientific meaning. But I think in the way the term is now used I can use it to point out that the inflation in Germany was not brought about, solely at least, by a parcel of crooks. There were honest men in Germany—then, at any rate. And there were honest men who advocated the issue of state money to solve their problems.

I spoke of the opinion of von Mises. I have now before me an exact quotation of the arguments of honest men, such as we have here to-day in the house, as to the objective and the desirability of issuing more and more state money. He said that this was their argument:

> Let the state create money, and make the poor rich, and free them from the bonds of the capitalists! How foolish to forgo the opportunity of making everybody rich, and consequently happy, that the state's right to create money gives it! How wrong to forgo it simply because this would run counter to the interests of the rich! How wicked of the economists to assert that it is not within the power of the state to create wealth by means of the printing press!

And during this debate I have thought of these next words several times:

> You statesmen want to build railways, and complain of the low state of the exchequer? Well, then, do not beg loans from the capitalists and anxiously calculate whether your railways will bring in enough to enable you to pay interest and amortization on your debt. Create money, and help yourselves.

Those were the statements of men who at that time in that country honestly—quite honestly—believed that they were doing the best thing in the interests of the public.

I should like to say just a few words about the topic discussed by the hon. member for Parry Sound, namely that of hidden reserves—sometimes known as inner reserves, undisclosed reserves or secret reserves. If our banks are wrong in having them and if the Minister of Finance is wrong in permitting the banks to have them, certainly we in Canada are not alone, because they are the general practice wherever there is a good and efficient banking system. It is the general practice throughout the world.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will the hon. member say that in the other jurisdictions he has in mind the banks are abetted by the treasury department in a refusal to disclose to parliament the amounts of their secret reserves?

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly.

Mr. MOORE: There are different organizations of banking laws and banking systems. They are quite different. It is well known, however, that the English banks have secret reserves; certainly there is no secrecy about the existence of those reserves. It is a well known fact that in Switzerland—and Swiss laws are very modern—they have secret reserves. Of what? Bankers are a little different from the corner grocer or most of the rest of us.

Mr. SLAGHT: Indeed they are.

Mr. MOORE: They are called upon to pay on demand. There must be no hesitation; they must pay over the counter. In normal times that is an easy thing to do. They have their disclosed reserves which are counted in millions and which are there for the protection of the public, of the man who wants his money paid over the counter. In normal times there is no trouble, but when those reserves begin to go down they are considered to be something like a barometer. People begin to fear that there is going to be trouble. I suppose members of parliament would not mind watching them go down. Some members would not, I suppose, but I wonder if they would. People begin to think they had better go to draw out their money. That would be generally true of the public mind. What is the reason? Inner reserves are difficult to deal with, statistically speaking, because of the fact that they are not disclosed. I admit that, but they seem to be a necessary thing as long as you are going to have published reserves.

Mr. McGEER: Is it not a fact that, according to the evidence before the banking and commerce committee, right in the depths of the depression in 1933 five banks disclosed $29,500,000 worth of losses and that this did not affect public confidence one bit? They said they had to make up their inner reserves to that extent.

Mr. MOORE: That is rather extraneous to what I was attempting to say. I was going to give an opinion as to why there are inner reserves as given by a man who I consider as probably the greatest authority in the world as to modern banking systems, Sir Otto Niemeyer. The deputy minister of finance will remember that Sir Otto's last work dealt with the reorganization of the banking system in the Argentine. Here is what he said:

> I am sure there is a feeling in many parts of the world that if at any moment the cover goes down, something awful is going to happen. That is very prominent in many of the smaller countries of Europe. Anything which could induce the public to realize that a variation in the margin of cover following seasonal needs was a perfectly normal thing, and you ought to expect to see it, might offer a considerable alleviation of our difficulties. It is perhaps natural that the usual feeling should be the contrary after the currency disturbances which we have had. Public opinion in a great many cases is extraordinarily susceptible to the minor fluctuations of cover, not unnaturally, because they have lived through periods of heavy depreciation and heavy devaluation.

Mr. McGEER: He was director of the Bank of England, was he not?

Mr. MOORE: The taxation of those inner reserves is an entirely different matter and one which I think should be discussed and which has been discussed over and over again. Are those reserves to be subject to taxation? Under the old theory, no, because the very keeping of reserves meant a tax because the reserves were then kept in non-interest producing gold. Now they are kept very largely, as we know, and as Mr. Allen, secretary of the British Banking Institute, points out, by writing down the assets. That is largely the practice here; it is done by the conservative, the ultra-conservative or shall I say the progressive conservative devaluation of assets.

We had this difficulty. These inner reserves are disclosed to the inspector general of banks who in turn discloses them to the Minister of Finance. I assume that they did not go directly to the Minister of National Revenue, although I cannot tell what one minister says to another. But at any rate under the amendment to the bill the Minister of National Revenue is to have information of that condition. I have very little more to say.

Mr. SLAGHT: Let me correct the hon. member. The amendment does not say that he is to be informed of that condition. It says that the banks are to continue to disclose them to the Minister of Finance and if, and only if he in his judgment decides that they are excessive, then he shall inform the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: As I said last night, the Minister of National Revenue is entitled to the information from the banks as of his own right just as he is entitled to information from any other taxpayer.

Mr. SLAGHT: The evidence was that for fifteen years he never had it from the banks.

Mr. ILSLEY: Because he relied on the Minister of Finance.

Mr. SLAGHT: The rest of us do not rely on the Minister of Finance to evade taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: No taxation has ever been evaded.

Mr. MOORE: I have just one more observation to make with regard to the matter of secrecy. Yesterday one hon. member said that he had asked one banker the amount of his inner reserves aud had been refused the information. He complained of that secrecy. Well, is our own house quite clean? We have insisted upon secrecy in the management of our moneys or the moneys we represent. I turn to the Exchange Fund Act, chapter 60, 1935, section 10 of which reads:

> (1) No person employed in the service of His Majesty or of the Bank of Canada shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto—

That includes members of parliament.

> —under the provisions of this act or by direction of the minister, any information with respect to the operation of the said special account, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement with respect to the said account.

I am dealing now only with the principle of secrecy and the necessity for it in the conduct of some matters, including this matter. This section continues:

> (2) Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months or to both fine and imprisonment.

There is the principle of secrecy. I appreciate your permission, Mr. Chairman, to speak again and I shall try not to trespass again.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to say a few words about the amendment and about some of the remarks made to the committee in support of it. The hon. member for Parry Sound has made two speeches, one last night and one this afternoon, which have been dealt with to some extent by other speakers, but some of the points are still outstanding. The hon. gentleman, both in the banking and commerce committee and in his speech last night and again this afternoon, repeated with great emphasis the allegation that depositors or others using the chartered banks should pay for that privilege, and that if a system is established under which they do not pay the full services charges, that is unjust to the general body of depositors and discriminates against them in favour of what are called the wealthy corporations. An argument is built up on that and members are virtually being challenged to rise in their places and say that there is no justice in the present system.

Just consider the situation. A depositor establishes a deposit in a bank. That is money. It may be argued by Social Crediters and others that it had fountain-pen origin or something of that kind. But when a depositor is in a position to make a deposit in a bank, that is money. It is as exactly good as legal tender. He is entitled to legal tender for it and he is in a position to get it.

Why does he deposit that money in a bank? Ordinarily if he deposits it in a current account he expects bank services in connection with the deposit. He expects to be able to draw cheques upon the account, to get his money out when he wants it, to put other money in to add to the account, and so on. These services cost something. They cannot be rendered unless the bank has the necessary equipment, the buildings, the staff that knows its business, and so conducts its business that it is in a position to be able to discharge its obligations in reference to the deposit at any time. Almost anyone would think, if he were depositing his money in a bank and getting these services, the bank should be able to make use of the money deposited and get what benefit it could from the use of that money before a charge against the person making the deposit is made. I think almost anyone would say that that was fair. If the government were to step in, as is suggested here, and take the total amount of that deposit away from the bank, move it to the Bank of Canada and hold it there without paying any interest on it, that would be depriving the bank of any opportunity of earning anything by using that money and thereby depriving the depositor of the benefit of the use of his money. It would be taking that away from the depositor. I submit that that is unfair, and in the only jurisdiction in which this system has been adopted, in Australia, the unfairness of it was recognized and the government paid the service charge. It was not sought to throw the service charge on the person using the bank. To do that would be equivalent, as I said in the speech in which I introduced the Bank Act, to putting into effect a compulsory loan without interest from the depositor or from the bank or from both.

But in another aspect it is imposi g a tax upon those using the banking facilities. When I say it would fall wholly upon the depositor, the banks might, of course, pass the burden on to other classes, to their savings depositors or to their shareholders or to their employees, but the natural body upon whom the burden would fall would be those using the facilities of the bank; that is the depositors.

In the amendment before us it is proposed that steps be taken by which dominion government securities, amounting to about $2,700 million, now owned by the banks would be taken from the banks, and the banks would be deprived of their interest charges which amount to about $39 or $40 million, with the result that the banks would be heavily in deficit and would have to pass on a large part of that to those using their facilities. Is that a good tax? Is it a better or a worse tax than the kind of taxes out of which the interest is paid?

The hon. member for Parry Sound says that it is a better tax. He says it is a better tax than the sales tax. I think it is generally appreciated that the great bulk of our revenue of $2,750 million is raised from income tax and from excess profits tax. But the hon. member for Parry Sound picks out the $305 million that is raised from the sales tax, a very substantial part of which is fictitious because it is on government purchases. But he picks out the sales tax and says: We are making the humble purchaser, the man who buys boots and shoes and clothing for his children pay, through the sales tax, on the things he has to buy, for what the big corporations using the banks ought to pay. But it is not only the big corporations that use the banks. There are five million bank accounts in Canada, a large number of them savings accounts, and some of them current accounts. To put a gigantic service charge, such as this would be, upon those using the facilities of the banks would be to impose the most unsound of all taxes. It would be what is called a regressive tax. It would have no reference whatever to the ability of the person to pay it. It would bear most heavily on small persons and businesses. It would be a tax that would be pyramided in the normal course of events and it would make its appearance in the price. If it did not make its appearance in the price, it would be at the expense of the government. A large part of the service charge would fall upon the government itself. It is one of the greatest users of banking facilities in Canada at the present time. Judged by any standards that apply to sound taxation, it would in my judgment be a very bad tax.

I am glad, however, that the issue has been driven to that point because that is the point where it ought to have been from the beginning. We have been discussing this matter for the last two or three years. First those who were advocating this system of borrowing from the Bank of Canada thought it would be just money saved; there would be no expense to anybody in borrowing from the Bank of Canada; it did not cost the Bank of Canada anything because they did not have to service deposit; therefore it did not cost anybody anything. That was just too good to be true. It was just reached for and brought down out of the air. But when the proposition is analysed it is found that somebody has to bear a burden substantially equivalent to the very moderate interest that we pay on these loans. Somebody has to bear the burden and it is a question whether that burden should be shifted or not. The issue becomes clarified when members argue on that instead of basing their arguments on other considerations. If the hon. gentleman could establish by anything in the evidence anywhere that the banks are making excessive profits, he might very well argue that the banks should bear a portion of that burden. But there is no such evidence whatever. We knew the importance of that and that is why we had the table compiled which appears on page 2550 of Hansard of May 2, 1944. The figures in that table are concrete. They show the average of the years from 1929 to 1943. They show that for the past fifteen years between 1929 and 1943, including some bad years and a great number of good years, the ratio of shareholders' net income to the total published shareholders' equity was 5·09 per cent, and if inner reserves were regarded as unpublished shareholders' equity it would be less than 5·09 per cent. It would not be that much. Nobody, I think, can argue that a 5·09 per cent return over a fifteen year period on shareholders' equity justifies any contention that the banks of this country are making excessive returns. In 1943 the return was a little higher than that; it was 6·03 per cent, and that was a year of admittedly heavy earnings. But these figures are certainly no justification whatever for the contention made this afternoon that the bankers have been profiteering at the expense of the Canadian people.

There have been many errors of statement in the speeches which have been made. For instance, the hon. gentleman talks about "their well-earned published reserves". It has been repeatedly pointed out to the hon. gentleman that about one-half of these published returns were not earned; they were subscribed. They were premiums on stock. Why, then, refer to these reserves as "well-earned"? "I do not begrudge it to them", he said, "these well-earned published reserves". As a matter of fact something over $60 million of that was subscribed.

Then we have this reference to the "smoke-screen" of the banks put on by their "advocates". Those of us who have views about what ought to be done with reference to the banks of this country are not advocates of the banks; we are simply expressing what we consider to be in the public interest. As to this reference to inflation as a "bugaboo" and a "spectre", there is nothing of the bugaboo and the spectre about inflation. Inflation is one of the greatest dangers which can confront any country in time of war, and many countries have been utterly unable to cope with it. And if we were to take the steps which were advocated two or three years ago, namely, a large borrowing from the Bank of Canada, section 59 being as it was, we would have been taking a course which inevitably would have led to a very serious degree of inflation.

May I now refer to inner reserves, which have been dealt with by a number of speakers. I was confronted with a very great and very grave responsibility when the hon. member for Parry Sound in the banking and commerce committee called upon me to do what had never been done by any other finance minister in the history of this country, and what no banking and commerce committee which had considered the matter—and several of them had—would ever take the responsibility of doing; that is, to say that there should be no system of inner or undisclosed reserves in the banking system of the Dominion of Canada. I had to take a very great responsibility when the hon. member started out by wanting the inner reserves of the Canadian Bank of Commerce disclosed. The general manager of the Canadian Bank of Commerce said that he did not know whether it would be proper for him to disclose them or not. Thereupon the hon. member turned to me and asked me to take the matter under consideration. I took the matter under consideration, made inquiry as to what was done in other countries and the reasons for the practice which had been adopted in this country, and came to the conclusion, as I had every right to do, that it was not in the public interest to disclose the reserves of the Canadian chartered banks. I came to that conclusion for, I believe, very good reasons, indeed, for the same reasons by which finance ministers everywhere have come to the same conclusion when the question came before them for consideration. I have had an opportunity of discussing these matters with the finance ministers of two other countries, and with a very highly placed treasury official of another country who, for a purpose of this kind, would be practically the same as a finance minister; and they all have the same story. They say they get the information; they watch the situation very carefully, but they do not publish those reserves, and they do not publish those reserves for two or three reasons.

In the first place, publication is bound to give rise to serious misinterpretations and misconceptions. One need only listen to the debate in this house to realize how intricate and difficult the matter is and the misunderstandings which are bound to arise as to what is there. After all, there is nothing there except a write-down of the assets to a conservative valuation. There is no shareholders' equity there at all. If the inner reserves are correctly appraised they will all be required to meet bad debts and losses on securities on realization.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): There is no pot of gold.

Mr. ILSLEY: As the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, says, there is no pot of gold. But once you call them "inner reserves", and particularly if you add adjectives such as "secret", "hidden" and so on, it is regarded and would be regarded by a good many persons as a sort of treasure trove which could be drawn upon by the public, especially when times were good, when it did not look as if the reserves were needed, and when there was not any apparent danger of decline in the value of loans and securities. But far more important than that is the danger of fluctuations in reserves, that they might go down and down and eventually disappear, and then the published reserves would have to be resorted to, as they were once in the history of this country, in 1933. And when hon. gentlemen say that that did not do anything to impair confidence in the banks concerned—for all of them were not concerned—they are not making a statement in accordance with the evidence before the banking and commerce committee or with the facts. The evidence there indicated that the banks concerned suffered to some extent from lack of confidence and withdrawal of deposits. But whether they did or not, nobody in his senses would want a repetition of that experience. Nobody would want successive or repeated resorts to published reserves, or publication of the lowering of the level of the inner reserves. These are reasons for my coming to the conclusion I did.

The hon. gentleman talks about the banks having been "caught" in an attempt to evade taxation. The hon. member for Northumberland, Ont., dealt last night with that part effectively and very truly. This year it was late—after the banking and commerce committee met—when I went over this matter with the inspector general of banks; and I came to the conclusion, after conferences with the deputy minister of finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada, that I did not agree with the valuations placed upon securities in certain of the banks—in two, perhaps three. That does not justify language such as the hon. member for Parry Sound used about the banks having been "caught", and I think in other places he talked about their being obliged to "disgorge". It merely means that the judgment of their auditors, who are quasi public officials, and of their directors, who I think exercised their responsibility, differed somewhat from the judgment of the governor of the Bank of Canada, the deputy minister and myself. But there has been no evasion of taxation responsibility by the banks, nor will there be as long as I have anything to do with the matter. These inner reserves are reported every year, like the other affairs of the banks, to the inspector general and are discussed with the finance minister.

The hon. gentleman said, "Very well, but we are proposing a remedy. What is your remedy? It is admitted that there will be great problems during the next few years. At least we have a remedy."

I want to state my agreement with the hon. member for Ontario when he says that monetary remedies are not the most important. The monetary policy is not the most important policy of a country. The most important policies are those which result in the stimulation and maintenance of production, the raising of the national income and a fair and equitable distribution of the national income. If I were to outline what I should like to see in this country in the post-war years—I do not think I have the time to do it fully this afternoon—I would say that we must make sure that we take steps for the stimulation and expansion of export trade, and there are a great many ways in which it can be done; we must make sure that we take steps to ensure the maximum volume of private investment, and there are a great many ways in which that can be done; steps for the stimulation of domestic consumption, and there are a great many ways in which that can be done; and for a programme of public expenditure if it is necessary; that is, if private investment and private expenditure fall down so that a programme of public expenditure is necessary.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should be glad if he would specify some of the ways in which consumption can be stimulated. He says that there are several ways. It would be a real contribution to the discussion if he would do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: By family allowances and certain other social security measures, by veterans' reestablishment measures, by the encouragement of improved nutritional standards, by credit facilities for the purchase of amenities for farm homes, by maintaining a proper balance between various sectors of the economy, for example by the support of farm purchasing power, and so on. These are some of the ways.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The money for that would be derived from the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would hope that if we could get a sufficiently large volume of private investments and expenditure we could maintain full employment and possibly finance without borrowing at all. But if we did borrow we would borrow from the public before borrowing from the banks, and if it came to borrowing from the banking system we would have to use our judgment as to whether and in what proportions we would borrow from the Bank of Canada and from the chartered banks. But—

Mr. SLAGHT: Hear, hear.

Mr. ILSLEY: I beg your pardon?

Mr. SLAGHT: Hear, hear.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is exactly what we are doing now. I see no advantage whatever in borrowing from the Bank of Canada rather than from the chartered banks and none has been established.

With regard to the amendment, it proposes that a board be set up consisting of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada, to pass upon, control and regulate loans, investments and securities made by the banks—at least those that would result in the creation of deposits. That, I gather, is the proposal, and it applies to each bank. As regards the wording of the amendment, I do not think it is good. I think it is in language of monetary economics rather than in the language of legislation. But if that is what the amendment means, that this board is to pass upon all loans, upon the limit of the loans that may be made by any bank, the limit of securities that may be bought by any bank, it seems to me it places a virtually impossible task upon a government board. I cannot imagine the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada being able to do that intelligently or effectively. It would mean a quota for each bank. The bank of Montreal could make loans and buy securities up to a certain amount; the bank of Commerce could do likewise. But there would be no limit upon their calling in loans. There would be no limit upon the restriction but there would be upon the expansion. It is based upon the theory that our present control, the control of the volume of cash reserve by the Bank of Canada, is ineffective, and it certainly has not been proved that that control is ineffective. I could not imagine that kind of interference with the management of the banks on the part of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada. I submit to the committee that no case has been made for it and I shall have to decline to accept it.

Mr. SLAGHT: May I say one word arising out of what the minister has said. I will not detain the committee. On the last point he said that monetary policy is not the most important policy in a country. I wish to read what his leader said in that regard:

> Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit shall be restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile.

I leave the two opinions to the judgment of the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall take only a few minutes. I did not wish to intervene during the discussion that was going on with regard to monetary theory between certain hon. members and the minister. In my view the amendment now before the committee is an attempt to place under the control of parliament, to some degree at least, monetary policy and particularly the policy of making loans and creating deposits, and to that extent I am in agreement with the proposal. We have heard a very great deal in the last two or three months about money and monetary systems. In my opinion the whole discussion before the banking and commerce committee and in this house drives us more and more to the inescapable conclusion that there is no satisfactory way of bringing our monetary system under the control of this parliament except by the national ownership and control of our banking and financial system. The alternatives that are presented to us are pretty much those of continuing as we are, on the one hand, and on the other, of bringing the monetary and financial system under the control of parliament through the socializing of the banking system. That, of course, has been our view throughout. I have before me a copy of the Regina manifesto, which we approved in 1933, calling for the socialization of finance. I quote:

> Planning by itself will be of little use if the public authority has not the power to carry its plans into effect. Such power will require the control of finance and of all those vital industries and services which, if they remain in private hands, can be used to thwart or corrupt the will of the public authority. Control of finance is the first step to the control of the whole economy. The chartered banks must be socialized and removed from the control of private profit-seeking interests.

That is from the Regina manifesto of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. That was our view in 1933 and is our view now, and the more this discussion has gone on the more we have been driven to the inescapable conclusion that if we are to deal with this power which is called financial, the only way to do so is to take the control out of private hands.

With regard to some of the other points in the discussion, mentioned in connection with this amendment, I merely want to say this. It is almost impossible to compare monetary policy under different systems within different nations with the system which we have in our country. We have heard some discussion to-day about what happened in Germany. Well, the men who brought about inflation in Germany may have been honest, but the effect was to destroy the equities of many people in physical property and to transfer, in effect, properties from one group of people to another in that country, with the result that they were free of debt and able to start all over again and build up their war machine, as has been pointed out here several times.

Mr. McGEER: They did it deliberately.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will not say whether they did it deliberately or not. We have not access to their minds and therefore I am going to leave that an open question.

The Russian monetary policy was mentioned yesterday and the rates of interest in Russia have been mentioned from time to time. But again let me say that it is almost impossible to compare the monetary system in Russia with the monetary system in this country. After all, in that country the value of money was deliberately destroyed. Money as a commodity ceased to exist and the money in the pockets of the people meant very little indeed in our terms. The financing of this country is done in an entirely different way. When we make comparisons I think we make an understanding of our own system a little more difficult. We cannot compare things that are unlike. The purpose of money in the Russian economy is money of account and, to only a small degree, money of exchange. Certainly money is not a commodity to be bought and sold and lent at interest as it is with us.

Perhaps the governor of the Bank of Canada placed before the banking and commerce committee a point of view that we should keep in our minds. He said:

> The real cost of government expenditures is the use of labour and equipment required to carry out projects. When the question is asked if we can finance a certain government expenditure, the fundamental problem is whether we can afford to devote a certain amount of our productive resources to the projects in question. The problem of how the government can obtain the money which will give it title to the labour and equipment . . . is not the fundamental question.

Mr. McGEER: How are you to get it if you have not the money?

Mr. COLDWELL: The fundamental problem is the problem of the resources, of the equipment and of labour under a proper plan. If you have these things there is no reason in the world why money cannot be found to move the goods and services from the producer to the consumer.

Mr. McGEER: Where and how is it to be found?

Mr. COLDWELL: If you own your resources and if you can plan your production and control your goods, then through your financial system the money can be found.

Mr. McGEER: Where?

Mr. COLDWELL: It will arise and be distributed through the process of production. It is intimately connected with this. I presume that one of the reasons why we are so much interested to-day in this question of money and of financing is our experience during the years of depression and the fear of the future. I had intended to place this thought before the banking and commerce committee at the appropriate time, but I am going to put it before this committee now. From time to time some of us are accused of being unduly pessimistic about the future; that we are promoting the psychology of fear and all the rest of it. That is not true. I do not believe there is any reason why we should be afraid of the future in this country if we have a proper economic system and a proper monetary system to move the goods and services around. I do not think there is any need for fear, but I point out that that fear arises in the minds of people who are intimately acquainted with the present economic system. For example, a short time ago Mr. Roger Babson issued a report, as he frequently does, and that report as most hon. members know is regarded by a good many business men in this country as a guide and almost as a sacred document. His weekly report for May 1, 1944, must have come as something of a shock to his well-to-do subscribers. It contained a supplement entitled "Mr. Babson's Personal Message to Parents with Boys in the Service". This is what he had to say. Remember, when I read it, that Mr. Babson is a supporter of the Republican party, and consequently the injection of the Republican party into this opinion is only of significance because of Mr. Babson's association with that party.

> Within a reasonable time after world war II, the United States should have a few years of good business, stimulated by a complete Republican victory in 1948. But sometime after 1950, we will again be in a violent business depression accompanied by great unemployment. This could result surely in another new deal victory in 1952, if not in a bloodless revolution of some kind. Much depends upon the then existing economic conditions in Russia. If Russia's collective system with her planned economy has failed, we have little then to fear here. Otherwise, we are destined to suffer from violent United States inflation and the unwise legislation which may make stocks, bonds, mortgages, and bank accounts of little value.

These are not my words. They are the warning words of Mr. Roger Babson. In discussing the Bank Act it seems to me that we ought to see to it that as much authority as possible is preserved to this parliament. That is why I am going to support the amendment. I support it because I believe it is an attempt to put the responsible ministers, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, together with the governor of the Bank of Canada, in a position where they can influence monetary policy in this country in the post-war years. I do not wish to delay the committee, but there are two or three other things that I should have liked to have said. However, I see it is six o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the committee rises may I say that after eight o'clock I am going to try to keep the discussion within the orbit of the amendment now before the committee. Most of the discussion this afternoon has been absolutely outside the amendment now before the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: If you wish to call the question I will not say any more on it since the discussion has been prolonged.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not think it is in the interest of the committee to call the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Amendment negatived.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, I believe it would be in the interests of all concerned if I were to spend a few moments in reviewing this whole question of the validity of the claim that money can be created. There are some opinions of men who ought to be regarded as authorities, or at least opinions which are worthy of consideration, which it would be well to place before the committee before we leave the discussion of the matter.

I believe it has been fairly well recognized by a great number of those taking part in the debate during the last two or three days, and by many who were in the banking and commerce committee, that it is thoroughly feasible to create debt-free money. I think the minister has not questioned that. He has merely set before the committee the idea that under present circumstances it seems it would be just about as expensive to the government to finance with debt-free money as it is to finance with money borrowed from the banks. That seems to be the argument.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that section 59 deals with cash reserves in Bank of Canada notes and deposits, and I do not think it would be in order at this time to reopen the discussion with respect to debt-free money. I leave this in the hands of the committee, but I do not think it is in the mood to accept that discussion again. In my view at this time we should keep to the section before the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The committee was particularly desirous of disposing of the amendment before six o'clock. I realized that fully, and because of that I surrendered my right to discuss the matter on that occasion. Technically, I believe I could be ruled out of order at the present time and, Mr. Chairman, if you persist in doing so, in the light of circumstances as they now stand I must bow to your ruling. I believe, however, that without any great effort you could stretch the rules of the house to allow me to make this speech.

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the hands of the committee and the minister. Many hon. members have been brought to order in the discussion of section 59. However, if it will shorten the discussion or make it more direct to the clause before the committee I would be in favour of the hon. member's proceeding.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe that all I have to say, or all I think I should say at this time, can be said in about thirty minutes, and I believe it would be well worth while for me to do so. However, Mr. Chairman, if you feel I should not proceed I shall bow to your ruling.

As I was proceeding to say, the general argument of the Minister of Finance before the banking and commerce committee, and in this committee of the whole, has appeared to be that it is just as expensive to finance with debt-free money as it is to finance with borrowed money. I am not going to argue that aspect of the question, except in a general way.

Let us suppose that we are on an island where gold is to be used as money, and let us suppose further that the rulers of that island have found a gold mine which has yielded choice nuggets. I wonder if they would find it impossible to finance their affairs with the nuggets they could get without any debt at all. I wonder if it would cost as much to finance their affairs with solid gold nuggets as it would with money they would have to borrow from the banks. It just does not make any sense, does it?

I think in the light of the situation, as this illustration presents it, it must appear reasonable to the minister and to members of the committee that where money can be obtained by the simple process of printing it, and when we know so much to-day about financial controls, what causes inflation, and various other things which pertain to sound money, it must surely be more economical, and it must be possible to organize so that it will be more economical to finance with money we can obtain without a debt.

I do not propose to argue that matter. The minister has presented his case, and it is a clash of opinion. What I would like to lay before the committee in the few minutes at my disposal is a general statement as to the feasibility of having debt-free money. May I read for the information of the committee a statement found in a book I hold in my hand entitled, "The Canadian Banking System," by James Holladay. This book was published in 1938. At page 140 I find a passage which, I believe, sets forth some truths for the Canadian people. It states:

> The Bank Act of 1934, however, sets up a specific quantitative reserve which the chartered banks are required to hold against their deposit liabilities. In form, this reserve must consist of a deposit in and notes of the Bank of Canada. In amount, it must be equal to five per cent of the deposit liabilities in Canada. As a result the chartered banks, as a group, can legally create deposits amounting to $20 on the basis of a one-dollar reserve. A much larger secondary expansion is made possible, however, for the Bank of Canada is required to hold only a twenty-five per cent reserve against its liabilities, which in turn constitute the reserves of the chartered banks.
> Consequently the Bank of Canada can expand a dollar into four dollars of liabilities which, if borrowed by the chartered banks, will enable them to lend an aggregate of $80 against a primary deposit of one dollar. This compares with a possible legal expansion of $28.50 under the federal reserve system in vogue in the United States.

Briefly put, this simply means that the Bank of Canada can take paper and ink and print a one-dollar bill for whatever it costs to print a one-dollar bill. And when it prints that dollar bill it has a dollar which belongs to the Bank of Canada. Nobody owes it to anybody. This one-dollar bill can be expanded into four dollars by the Bank of Canada, and the four dollars can be expanded by a chartered bank—the bank of Montreal, for instance—into $80. This means that on a basis of a one-dollar bill which the Bank of Canada creates we can erect a structure of $80 in money, in the Dominion of Canada. And every dollar of that has been created in Canada and belongs to the people who created it. In the light of that fact surely there is a tremendous reservoir of financial resources available to the government of the Dominion of Canada. The contention of the monetary reformers is simply that by some mechanism the capacity to create money should be exercised by the state, for the state, and used for the benefit of the people as a whole. The great problem which confronts us nowadays is that of distribution. Surely the money which could be obtained by this method of money creation and credit expansion can be used to distribute the goods which Canadian people are able to produce. That would seem to be just pure common sense, would it not?

I have referred once or twice in this house to the experiment which was conducted in the last war. If hon. members will take the report of the royal commission on banking and currency which was published in 1933 and turn to page 22, paragraph 47, they will find an account of the creation of $26,000,000 of bills by the dominion government during the last war. That $26,000,000 belonged to the dominion government; it was created by the treasury department; it constituted no debt and Canadians have never paid a cent of interest on it and do not now. That money was spent into circulation for various governmental purposes and was just as good money as any which was taxed from the people or which was borrowed from any lending institution. That is a striking illustration of the power to create money and the power to use it safely. On the same page, paragraph 51, there is a statement which I think is valuable to us at the present time. I read:

> But extensive use continued to be made of the power to issue dominion notes to the banks against approved securities with the result that it was decided in 1923 to make this part of the Finance Act mechanism a feature of the normal Canadian financial system. In introducing the new legislation, Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance, made the following brief explanation of its purpose:
> "The act (Finance Act) was adopted as a war measure, and no doubt was exceedingly useful in the financial operations during the war. It may be said that the war being over we no longer have any need for the act, but experience has shown that the act is still required; indeed, I am inclined to think that something of the kind will have to become almost a permanent part of our financial system."

A former Minister of Finance of this government of Canada, realizing the value of the mechanism of creating dominion notes, recommends that device in 1923 for use in peace time. His recommendation has not been accepted or acted upon. I submit that that recommendation ought to be reviewed with the idea of finding out what benefit there is in the recommendation. May I refer to the work of a man who, I believe, is worthy of some respect, Paul H. Douglas, Professor of Economics at Chicago university. In a book entitled, "Controlling Depressions", published in 1935, he refers to what should be done in order to keep the economy in sound condition, and on page 278 he makes these recommendations:

> (3) A nationally managed system of currency and credit until such time as an international system may be perfected.
> (5) The creation of credit by this socialized agency should follow two main principles; (a) to provide, so far as possible, employment or useful work for those thrown out of their jobs by business depressions, and (b) to stabilize in a rough manner the general price level.
> (11) The use of a social dividend to consumers or an increased expenditure upon cultural services if the amounts distributed to the purchasers of mass production goods are not sufficient to consume at a profit to industry and under competitive prices the mass production goods and services which are turned out by industry.

Hon. members will recognize that what Professor Douglas is recommending is in fact a form of Social Credit system. He is recommending that money should be created and used to stabilize prices, to increase the consumption power of the people, and generally to improve economic conditions by the employment of men and so on. When one recalls the remarks of Liberal members such as the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg and the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, apparently designed to ridicule the idea of debt-free money, one cannot escape the thought that these members really ought to inform themselves a little more before they set themselves up as authorities on this whole matter. Here is a man worthy of consideration, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard indicated this afternoon.

May I turn to another man who, I think, is worthy of a good deal of thought and consideration. I refer to Vincent C. Vickers, of Armstrong Limited of Great Britain. This man wrote a book which he finished almost on his deathbed entitled, "Economic Tribulation". I should like to read some passages which I consider worthy of real attention on the part of hon. members of this committee and others throughout the country. First of all, let me read who Mr. Vickers was:

> Vincent Cartwright Vickers was born on 16th January, 1879, and educated at Eton and Magdalen college, Oxford. He was a deputy lieutenant of the city of London, a director of Vickers, Limited, for twenty-two years, and a director of the London Assurance from which he resigned in January, 1939. In 1910 he was made a governor of the Bank of England, and resigned this appointment in 1919. Later, he became president of the economic reform club and institute.
> He died on 3rd November, 1939, after a long illness during which, against time and with failing strength, he was working and writing on economics. A few days before his death he wrote: "My keen desire to help up to the end has been the sole incentive which still enabled me to carry on perhaps a few weeks longer."

That indicates that this man had been well trained, well educated and had a wealth of experience in affairs, apparently with a great deal of success because he had been promoted to high positions. This should have given him the opportunity to know a great deal about finance and industry and business generally. In the light of that fact, let me read from the foreword as follows:

Ever since that day in 1926, when, not in arrogance but with humility, I felt it my duty to explain to the governor of the Bank of England, Mr. Montagu Norman, that "henceforth I was going to fight him and the gold standard and the Bank of England policy until I died"—(and well I remember the words of his reply!)—I have been an ardent money reformer. Some few years afterwards I resigned my long directorship of Vickers, Limited; since when I have spent much time and money in advocating the necessity for a reform of the monetary system.

Further, on the same page I read as follows:

I bear no ill-feeling towards my own class or any other class. I seek neither notoriety nor kudos. If someone can change my convictions I shall be only too ready to alter them. But in fifteen years nothing whatever has occurred to make me alter my views. I still believe that the existing system is actively harmful to the state, creates poverty and unemployment, and is the root cause of war.

This personal confession is merely to demonstrate that I have seen both sides of the picture. My opinions are based upon my own experience and knowledge. I am to-day in the unique position of being absolutely and entirely devoid of animosity and wholly disinterested. I feel myself no longer under any restrictions whatsoever, except to guard against doing harm to my country or giving offence to anyone.

Vincent C. Vickers.

I think the words of a man who has had experience of this sort and who approaches his subject with such humility and earnestness ought to be of some value to us in this critical time.

May I read now from page 70 of "Economic Tribulation", to show some of the things which he has to say to bankers as a class. He is speaking to the bankers:

1. I ask you to remember that you are dealing to-day with a general public of a far greater education and of a more thorough knowledge of affairs, of foreign policy and of financial policy, than they have had in previous times; and that the majority of these are conscious that, in some way or another, the key that locks them out from the enjoyment of the good things in the world's shop window is money.

2. That, because the public come into contact with the monetary system mainly through the medium of banks, they naturally tend to blame the banks for the difficulty; not realizing that they are, in large measure, tied houses—tied, that is, to the monetary system, and that, however great or small the faults of banks, it is in reality the system which is at fault.

3. That banking is an industry working for profit, just as a gas company or any other utility company works for profit. And the people, realizing this—erroneously, perhaps—do not believe that any essential supply company should, at one and the same time, have control of the volume of its output and control of the price of its output, when the supply of its product is essential to the lives and welfare of those masses of the people who are dependent upon that product.

4. That, whilst it may be possible, having regard to the immense power of money, artificially to maintain and uphold the present position for some months or for some years to come, against the rising revolt engendered by the present system, yet the time must eventually arrive (as it did in Russia, as it has in Spain, and as it may do in France) when the mass of the people will insist upon their right to possess a much larger share of the country's available wealth, and when they will insist also upon a much nearer approach of to-day's poverty to to-day's wealth. With all earnestness and honesty I implore them to think of this possibility and to take warning in time; to recognize what is inevitable, and to decide: Whether it is best to continue the present regime and, with the power of the press and with the power of money, to continue to fight for its supremacy; or, alternatively, whether it may be best to recognize that, for the good of the country, the maintenance of the empire, the benefit of the British world community, and for their own benefit, they should immediately take steps to associate themselves with those who are demanding reform of the monetary system. This refers more especially to the controllers of the system, embracing the whole of that particular section of the community which deals in, manages, and controls money, credit, and finance, and whose business mainly depends upon the indebtedness of others.

There are two other recommendations, Nos. 5 and 6, which in the interest of brevity I shall not read at this time but which I would recommend hon. members to read at their convenience. The whole of this appeal to the bankers strikes me as being so sensible, so humble and earnest and so sound that I think this House of Commons should be advised as well as the bankers themselves as to the matter under discussion when Mr. Vickers speaks.

I turn now to page 74 and read some of his suggestions for future policy:

1. State control and state issue of currency and credit through a central organization managed and controlled by the state.

2. Stabilization of the wholesale price level of commodities. That is to say, a fixed and constant internal purchasing power of money; so that a pound will buy to-morrow what it bought yesterday; an honest pound, not a fluctuating pound. And this can be done by so issuing and regulating the volume of available credit and currency that it shall at all times be adequate to permit of the purchasing power of the consumer being equated with the volume of production; not by limiting the purchasing power, but by firstly increasing purchasing power more in proportion to the productive capacity of industry.

May I pause there to point out that the attitude taken there is exactly the attitude taken by the Social Credit movement? Our contention has been from the beginning that the cause of our trouble was that there was too little purchasing power in the hands of the people and that measures should be taken to put purchasing power into their hands to enable them to purchase the goods that were available. I go on:

3. Fixation of foreign exchanges by foreign exchange equalization funds, and agreement with empire countries and all other countries willing to fall into line; and, once this was accomplished, the removal or diminution of trade barriers which to-day protect the countries from the results of a bad monetary system.

4. Any additional supply of money—

Debt-free money. I interpolate that.

4. —should be issued as a clear asset to the state; so that money will be spent into existence, and not lent into existence.

The minister will recognize that as being exactly the contention of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, the hon. member for Parry Sound, Social Crediters and the various others in this house. I go on:

5. The fluctuating quantity of gold lying in the vaults of the banking system should never be permitted to govern the volume of credit and currency needed by the country.

6. The elimination of slumps and booms; and more direct procedure for eliminating unnecessary poverty.

7. The abolition of the debt system where all credit is created by the banks and hired out at interest to the country.

May I point out there that that is exactly the contention of the monetary reformers in this house, that debts should be eliminated from our economy, and our contention is that they can be, just as this man indicates, by the right sort of management of our financial system. I go on:

8. Absolute state control over all foreign lending; and the adoption of the general principle that our foreign trade should be so conducted as to preserve—

(a) the interests of the home market,

(b) the interests of the empire countries and the English-speaking nations,

(c) the interests of foreign nations, and that this principle should particularly apply in the case of home production and foodstuffs.

There is the advice of an eminent man of great experience, Vincent Cartwright Vickers. If I might impose on the committee to read just a few more extracts from another publication I shall have an end to speaking on this particular subject for this year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can realize how glad members are to hear that, but they would have four times as much cause for rejoicing if they saw through the meaning of all this and therefore were in a position to enable this country to face the future with a measure of confidence which it certainly does not have now as it faces the future.

The next publication from which I propose to read excerpts is a report of the London chamber of commerce on "General Principles of a Post-war Economy". Whatever may be said regarding the London chamber of commerce I think almost everyone will recognize it as an organization which is worthy of a measure of respect and of consideration. On page 3 of a little pamphlet which they issued I read as follows:

The chamber submits that constantly raised tariffs, the imposition of quotas and prohibitions, and other signs of growing economic belligerency between the nations in the inter-war period, were not the result of stupidity nor ill will but were, on the contrary, imposed for most compelling reasons. They represented attempts by the nations to defend themselves against very real and pressing dangers. The chamber is convinced that until those dangers are recognized and removed, a direct attack upon trade barriers can serve no useful purpose but will, on the contrary, merely increase fear. In short, trade barriers are not themselves the disease but merely the symptoms of the disease.

May I interrupt there to comment thus? We read a great deal in the newspapers nowadays as to the desirability of lowering tariffs. The London chamber of commerce points out that to lower the tariffs without removing the causes of the tariffs would simply spell disaster. May I read again from the report, as follows:

It is widely admitted that there was something radically wrong with our economic system. It was palpably absurd that nations should be desperately anxious to export more of their real wealth to other nations than they received in return. It was equally absurd that men in want of the necessaries of life should be denied the money with which to buy them because there was a superabundance of those necessaries and therefore their services were not required to make more. There has not, however, been the same readiness to recognize that there must be a serious error in our economic thinking in order to produce, in action, absurd results.

May I comment again, that the thing which astounds me in this house is that there seems an indisposition on the part of so many hon. members to recognize that there must be something radically wrong with our system? There seems to be no desire to try to find out what that something is which is wrong, or what the remedy should be. Monetary reformers may be quite wrong in their analysis and their diagnosis of the disease, and they may be quite wrong with respect to the remedy which they prescribe; but it certainly would be a comfort to hear someone in the house offer an alternative remedy which would have as good reason for being considered as our proposal has. Strangely enough, neither in the banking and commerce committee nor in this house have I heard any recommendation which seemed to offer any hope of solving the problem.

May I now turn to page 9 of this excellent little booklet and read as follows:

When, however, it is remembered that even wealthy nations have a large percentage of their population underfed, ill-clothed and ill-housed, it is clear that these would be the best recipients of this alleged surplus wealth. What is necessary is to improve the technique for the internal provision of money, so as to convert this human demand into effective demand.

May I interpolate here that this is exactly the contention of the Social Credit movement, exactly the contention of monetary reformists? What is needed, may I repeat, is "to improve the technique for the internal provision of money, so as to convert this human demand into effective demand." But may I recall now what was brought out in the quotation which I placed on Hansard from the "Canadian Banking System", which indicated how easily this country could obtain money to provide the internal purchasing power, and then ask hon. members to put those facts along with this statement and consider the whole question in the light of those facts? May I go on to read:

The chamber considers that it is a perversion of export trade to employ it for the purpose of exporting domestic unemployment and dumping it on other nations which already have their own problem to solve. These surplus exports might confer a benefit on some countries if they were sent as a gift; and the recipient country had an internal financial mechanism capable of distributing enough purchasing power to its people to enable them to buy excess imports of consumers' goods in addition to, instead of in competition with, the goods already there. They are, on the contrary, used for the purpose of getting other nations into unpayable debt; and moreover, the recipient nations have not the mechanism for distributing additional purchasing power to buy them so that they do, in fact, displace goods already in the market, and cause distress selling and a slump in prices.

There is a passage which contains profound wisdom. I make no further comment; I merely commend that to the most earnest attention of all members of the committee. May I now read further, on page 10:

Instead of trying to equate supply with effective demand, the chamber advocates that, in future, effective demand should be equated with supply. There can be no such thing as general over-production, of which complaint was made after the last war, although of course there can be over-production of a particular commodity in relation to others. The real trouble is under-consumption.

The fundamental problems then, which a satisfactory system must be designed to solve are:

(1) The elimination of the fear and hostility resulting from the struggle of all nations to obtain an "active favourable balance of payments", the penalty of the vanquished being economic servitude to the victor. This struggle has resulted in attempts by all the nations to restrict imports by barriers to trade, and to increase exports by subsidies and other artificial means, and by the use of political and economic pressure.

(2) The distribution internally of the purchasing power necessary to enable the nations to consume the whole of their own production: if this were done they could equally consume the goods of other nations which they might exchange for their own production. This problem is closely connected with (1) because an excess of exports over imports furnishes an excuse for increasing effective demand within a country (through the distribution of wages) without increasing the number of goods awaiting consumption in the domestic market.

I will burden the committee no further with quotations.

The CHAIRMAN: I beg to inform the hon. member that he has now spoken for forty minutes. Shall the section carry?

Mr. McIVOR: I was just thinking of the length of time that the Minister of Finance has sat in his seat this session listening to debates on the budget and all kinds of legislation which come before his department; and it seems to me that, out of common courtesy, no man should rise in his place in this chamber unless he has new material. There are champion sitters in this house who sit here, and have to, to make the house look decent. There are champion speakers in this house, who do not listen to very many speeches, and I suggest that, in common courtesy to the rest of the membership and to the Minister of Finance we should say, "Thus far . . . and no further".

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I suggest that out of "common courtesy" to the future generation the hon. member should bring his economic thinking up to date.

Section agreed to.

Section 75 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the bill be now read a third time?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: On division?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would it not be advisable to have the third reading to-morrow?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member wish to have a vote?

Mr. CRERAR: Do you want a vote on it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us have the division, then.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Ilsley) which was agreed to on the following division:

FARM CREDIT

LIMITED GUARANTEE OF BANK LOANS FOR IMPROVEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF FARMS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on bill No. 134, to encourage the provision of intermediate term and short term credit to farmers for the improvement and development of farms, and for the improvement of living conditions thereon.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. STIRLING: On the resolution stage I asked the minister whether works for the purpose of irrigation were included in the definition of general farming.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they are.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Payment of bank losses.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a slight amendment to paragraph (d) of section 3, subsection 1. The motion will be that paragraph (d) of subsection 1 of section 3 be amended by inserting the word "guarantee" before the words "farm improvement loans" in line 15 on page 3 thereof.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the minister inform the committee as to whether or not any lending institutions other than banks will be granted this privilege of the guarantee? I have in mind cooperatives and lending institutions such as credit unions.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; only banks are covered. We have no control over the other lending institutions mentioned by the hon. member. We have no system of inspection of them. They are not under dominion jurisdiction.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: This removes practically any risk from the loan?

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not remove all risks; it lessens the risk.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Under paragraph (f) the rate of interest is five per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the maximum, yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The guarantee exists only on loans on which five per cent is charged?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If there were loans made at more or less than that then there is no guarantee.

Mr. ILSLEY: They may be made for less than that, but they cannot be made for more.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 4 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—Coming into force.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister in a position to indicate when the proclamation will be made by the governor in council? Is it expected that the measure will come into operation very soon?

Mr. ILSLEY: That question was asked me in the banking and commerce committee, and I said it was reasonable to expect that it would before very long. That is as far as I could go.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would that statement mean before the end of the year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would expect much before that.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

HOUSING

PROVISION FOR LOANS FOR CONSTRUCTION, REPAIR, ALTERATION, ETC.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 183, to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, the improvement of housing and living conditions, and the expansion of employment in the post-war period.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I imagine that one reason why the last bill, bill No. 134, with reference to credit to farmers, went through so quickly was that it was given a thorough study in the banking and commerce committee. The first comment that I should like to make at this stage of bill No. 183 is that it is so voluminous and so important that I feel it, too, should have been referred to a committee for thorough study. However, since that was not done there are two or three comments I should like to make.

First of all I may say that because this legislation will result in the building of some houses in Canada and because housing is sorely needed in this country we shall support the measure when the vote is called. However, a number of features about it are very disappointing to us. To me the feature that is most disappointing of all is found in section 12, subsection 2, paragraph (b). By that provision the government insists that no assistance will be given to municipal public housing authorities to undertake on their own behalf the construction of low-rental or other housing projects. This matter was discussed when we were in committee on the resolution preceding the bill. At that time the minister said that he did not believe the municipalities could handle such projects with the efficiency that he ascribes to limited dividend housing corporations and to life insurance companies.

We take sharp issue with the minister on that point. In fact, I feel the stand he has taken is in the nature of an insult to municipal government in this country; and as a former alderman of the city of Winnipeg I resent the suggestion that municipal governments are not competent to undertake projects of this kind.

In addition to that, it seems to me that this provision of the bill is flying in the face of the whole tendency of this day in the matter of housing problems. I need only mention municipal housing projects in Great Britain, and in other places, to which I shall refer more fully when we are in committee, as outstanding examples of what can be done by municipal public housing authorities.

Further, as I said when the measure was at the resolution stage, I am satisfied there is a growing conviction among members of our city councils and municipal bodies that this is a social problem of the first magnitude which they should be tackling. They are the ones who should be encouraged to go in for the construction of housing projects. In my view they are the ones who can be counted upon to get the job done. They are closest to the people who require housing, and I still hope that the government will see fit to reconsider this part of the bill.

In Winnipeg at the present time a sum of $70,000 has been allocated from a housing fund left over from some years ago, and as a result the municipal authorities in that city are building a small number of houses. A short time ago in Winnipeg, during one of the moving periods when the housing shortage was particularly acute, the council renovated an old building, making it into suites of which we were not too proud but which were at least clean and fit for decent habitation. The city is renting those suites to people in need of accommodatoin, and the managing of the project has been quite satisfactory. I am satisfied that Winnipeg is competent to carry out a municipal housing project, and I feel sure that is true of other municipalities as well.

When one looks at this provision in section 12 he realizes at once that it is in line with the underlying principle of the entire bill. Hon. members in this group contend that the problem of housing should be approached directly through the medium of public housing authorities. The stand taken by the government is that private lending institutions and private life insurance companies should have some of their risk underwritten, and that they should be encouraged to enter into housing projects. If, then, even on a limited basis any profit is made out of this very serious situation, that profit is to go to private interests. That, we consider, is in direct contradiction to the trend of the times. We feel, further, that that is not the way to get the job done.

When faced with the demands of war this government went directly at the problems facing it. When it decided to bring in a piece of social legislation to assist the children of the country, the government went at it in a direct fashion, by providing family allowances which, after next July, are to be paid directly to families in which there are children. But in facing this problem, that involving the need for housing accommodation in Canada, the decision has been to go at it in an indirect fashion.

Thus, apart from my dislike for the fact that some profit will be made out of this extremity in our country, and apart from the fact that the risk is being lessened if not effectively removed—a condition which seems to question the supposed virtue of private enterprise—there is the fact that, in my opinion, this legislation will not result in getting the job done in the way it ought to be done.

The other outstanding disappointment in the legislation is the lack of any comprehensive plan, either in the bill or in the comments thus far from the minister. We feel that this matter of housing, both from the point of view for its need in the country and from the point of view of providing a large measure of employment in the post-war period, is one of the most important matters facing us at the present time. In our view what we should be doing is planning the rebuilding of our cities, and the revamping of the kind of homes in which our people in rural Canada must live. In other words, we should be getting a vision of a new kind of life for our people, one which will express itself in the very best kind of homes modern technologists can devise, and also in providing adequate employment for our people after the war.

Committees have studied the problem. In particular I draw attention to subcommittee No. 4 of the James reconstruction committee, which was headed by Professor Curtis of Queen's university. That committee presented some of the basic considerations which should be faced, and went so far as to indicate the number of homes required in Canada in the next ten years, if we are to face up to the housing problem. The figure given in the Curtis report is 700,000. That report indicates that it can be determined where, in what cities and in what parts of the country houses should be built.

This legislation not only falls far short of providing 700,000 homes, but does not approach the problem of building those homes, with any plan as to where they should be built to meet the most pressing needs of our people. I have not the Curtis report before me, but one quotation I placed on record the other day is to the effect that the very first thing which should be done in approaching Canada's housing problem is to plan our towns and our country so that the construction of houses will be rational and will help to meet the needs of our people.

These, then, are the features about this bill that disappoint us. First of all, the municipalities have been snubbed by the provisions of section 12, which suggests that something is to be done about slum clearance, but which turns out to be only a bagatelle. Worse than that, the municipalities are to be assisted to buy land in slum areas for clearance only on the condition that they resell the land to a limited dividend housing corporation or a life insurance company. That feature is bitterly disappointing to us, and I say that after some little experience in the municipal field. We are also disappointed that the government has not seen fit to go at the housing problem directly, but has gone at it in a roundabout way by underwriting part of the risks of private companies. Perhaps worst of all is the failure of the government to bring down a definite plan for the remaking of our cities and towns and the building of houses on the basis of a programme designed to meet the needs of our people. Apparently houses are to be built only on the decision of private lenders and private insurance companies where the risks are the least and where profits, even on the limited basis provided, can best be made.

We suggest that that is not good enough for a generation of Canadians who dare to believe that after the sacrifices they have borne during the past four or five years the time has come to rebuild Canada and shape a good life for our people. We shall vote for the measure because it will result in the building of some homes and Canada needs homes badly, but we hope that the time is not far distant when a government of the day will bring down much better housing legislation than we have before us in bill No. 183.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, this is the most important bill that has come before this parliament this session. A general housing scheme is of national importance to our urban, suburban and rural communities. I wish to support the principle of the bill because I think if it is given a fair trial it will prove to be of great advantage after the war to those who are without homes. In the city from which I come nearly 100,000 people have had to leave their small homes and move into apartments, and we are becoming somewhat of an apartment city. The bill goes much farther than I had expected it would, and I am glad.

In 1935 I moved a resolution in the house on housing and reconstruction and an elaborate report was made. The government of the day was defeated, but the present government came in and in 1937 and 1938 the National Housing Act was introduced. The present minister has done a great deal of good work. About $83,000,000 has beeen spent by the banks with the government providing up to fifteen per cent, and this has done a great deal of good, not only in the outskirts of the city but in the city itself.

At the present time there is a great scarcity of houses in our urban, suburban and rural communities and I am glad that this bill has broadened out considerably. It is intended to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, the improvement of housing and living conditions, and the expansion of employment in the post-war period. That last is a very important part of our reconstruction work.

The plan is quite elaborate. On August 5 the minister gave a detailed and excellent description of the wide features of this bill. The old National Housing Act of 1938 has been broadened out and made more effective. A man may own a small lot. He goes to a loan company, and in conjunction with the government they lend him money after an inspection of the property is made and specifications of the proposed house drawn up. That money is lent jointly by the government and the lending agency. The applicant repays in monthly instalments which cover interest, fixed charges and taxes on the property. If there is any loss it is borne jointly by the government and the lending agency.

There is nothing that would create better health and happiness for the people than the provision of up-to-date housing. One of the main causes of ill health is poor housing conditions. I am glad to see the improvements that have been made in the bill. I am glad to know we are to have a modern system adapted to future needs, something that will improve public health. I have received many letters from men who are overseas. I received a letter recently from a soldier now in Normandy who formerly resided in Eglinton riding. His wife has been living in a small home for four years, and he complains to me that she has received an order to move out by September 1 and cannot find another home.

This condition was explained to the government last Friday to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, the Postmaster General and the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I do hope that there will be some way to get the necessary materials and labour for this work. This is a most urgent piece of work; in fact it is a war work. It is needed to provide homes after the war for the large number of soldiers who will be returning to Canada. In the city from which I come there is only ·062 per cent of vacant houses. Five hundred soldiers have received orders to move out and applications are being heard by the county judge under the overholding tenants' act of the province. These people have no place to go. Last week the government came along and agreed to build five hundred houses for soldiers.

We should have had this bill years ago. As hon. members know, every country in the world is suffering from a lack of houses and there has been a lack of employment for those in the construction industry. On May 12 Mr. Churchill brought down a programme for the construction of 500,000 prefabricated houses in the old country. I hope that something will be done this session or after the session to see that Canadian industry gets its share of that business. I hope that the construction industry of this country will be greatly helped. I say again that this is the most important bill that we have had and I hope that there will be no delay in putting it into effect.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the session we have before us this bill, one of the most important that has come before this house this session. I am going to be brief because it is too late to discuss a bill of this magnitude and it would not be fair to take up much time in doing so. But I do want to place myself behind the proposal of the government to go on with this large scheme of rehousing and reconstruction. If I had any fault to find with the measure it is that the government is late in bringing it in.

Last fall, on November 25, a very large group of housing men came to Ottawa and presented a brief to the reconstruction committee, recommending the construction of some 300,000 houses in a five-year programme. I would have thought this bill would have been brought down much earlier in the session because the government was thoroughly conversant with the programme that had been presented, and if that had been done I believe that we could have had the programme under way now. Certainly we can do very little under this legislation to satisfy the demands for housing this year. The minister is familiar with the different presentations that have been made for housing construction during the last year and prior to that by the city of Toronto through the mayor and various members of the board of control who have been here on quite a number of occasions, one of them being last week. I wish to thank the minister for his kindly and courteous reception of that delegation from Toronto last week, when I believe that he undertook to provide money for the construction of five or six hundred houses. I believe that it had been previously agreed to build one hundred houses and the programme was changed or added to so that five or six hundred houses will now be built. The minister was exceptionally kind and courteous to the delegation, and apparently they went away quite satisfied. It is only right that the minister should have been as kindly and courteous and generous as he was to the delegation because the housing problem in Toronto is one of very great magnitude. I am not going to detail it here to-night because that has been done on many occasions. I will merely say that the demand for houses is very great.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) spoke of receiving several letters to-day. I received three letters myself to-day from returned soldiers. One of these soldiers belonged to that famous Toronto family which was widely pictured in the Toronto Telegram and the Toronto Star only a few days ago. I refer to the Seggie family on Harvie avenue, who have seven sons serving in this war. One of them returned from overseas just a few days ago and he was one from whom I received a letter to-day asking by what means he would be able to obtain assistance, from whatever organization I presume is to be set up under this bill, to proceed with the erection of a cottage. He has a wife and small family, and is at present housed in two or three small rooms. That only serves to emphasize that the demand for housing accommodation in Toronto is very great indeed.

I would like to say a great deal on this subject because I have made an exhaustive study of it. But it is too late to say much now. I made my own survey of the housing programmes of many of the large cities of the United States: Richmond, Virginia; Memphis, Tennessee; Cleveland, Detroit, Washington and a score of other cities. I went carefully into their programmes and went out to see the various sites where they are building their houses, and I had prepared myself to give to the house what I had hoped would be a constructive address advocating housing.

But the minister has brought down his bill, and every minute that I take up I feel would only be delaying the actual starting of work under this bill. I do not want to do that. I am afraid that if I got started on the subject I would take too long because I have studied the matter exhaustively, and so I feel that I should simply urge the minister to proceed as rapidly as he can and in every way possible to get along with the actual construction of housing under this legislation.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was speaking he presented a request similar to what we have been asking for in Toronto, namely, that the federal government supply a sum of money to the municipality to assist them in providing housing. But that may not be in order. In any event I do not think it is provided for in the bill. But I can tell the minister this, from what I have seen in travelling around Ontario and other parts of Canada, that the demand for housing is far greater than I have heard anyone express here. Perhaps the minister knows. I feel sure that he must know that under the circumstances there is not a minute to lose.

Without taking up further time, Mr. Speaker, having said what I have said, I urge the speedy passing of this bill.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to hold up the passing of the bill, but I should like to take a few moments to answer the criticisms made of the bill by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and also to make one or two suggestions which I think will be helpful.

I have felt for many years that one of the most important things we can do to help build a strong virile nation is to see that our people are properly housed. Quite recently, and many times before that, I have urged that just as soon as this war is over and we are able to do it, active steps should be taken to improve housing conditions in Canada.

The lowest reliable estimate that I have heard as to our present housing shortage is 300,000 homes. I entirely agree with the policy which the government felt it had to follow during war time. It was felt that on account of the demands of war the people should double up and get along as best they could with our present housing accommodation until the war was over so that we would not be using vitally needed war materials and labour in the building of new homes during the war. But now that we can see the end of the war in sight it is gratifying to me that the government has seen fit to bring down such a comprehensive and all-inclusive housing bill as we have now before us. I do not see how it could have safely been brought down a day sooner. In fact, it may be that even this year, under the present housing act we may run into acute shortages of material and labour. With this new enabling legislation put on the statute books many people will want to get started at once to build homes, but I am afraid that they will find acute shortages of both materials and labour this year.

The criticism of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as I understand it, is twofold. In the first place he says that the present measure is one to add profits to lending companies rather than to supply homes to Canadians. I do not think I need to answer that argument. If my hon. friend will take the time to read the bill I think he will convince himself that no lending company is going to get wealthy out of lending its money and servicing its loans at 4½ per cent.

As to his other criticism I believe I can speak with a little personal knowledge. He has in effect said that the government has practically insulted the municipalities by more or less by-passing them in this scheme. My first answer to that is this. To my way of thinking, the major part of any housing scheme is one that will supply homes to owner occupants. That is one suggestion I make to the government. As soon as this war is over I should like to see an all-out publicity campaign across Canada for every man to own his own home. The major part of the scheme is to supply homes to owner occupants; the tenant part of the scheme is a very small part. I believe that we have in Canada a type of citizen who wants to and should own his own home; we should have as few tenants as possible.

I well remember that in Ontario we had a housing scheme after the last war. At that time I was mayor of my home town, and pressure was put on me to have a rental scheme under which the homes would be owned by the municipality. To that I was strongly opposed, for this reason: a municipal landlord is the worst type of landlord you can have. In the first place, maintenance and repair costs are much higher when the landlord is the government or a municipality. Tenants do not take the same care of the property.

Mr. MacNICOL: And it costs twice as much.

Mr. CLEAVER: Yes. The second point is that when a municipality or a government attempts to do anything it always costs more than when the project is built either by owners who are going to occupy the homes or by privately owned corporations. There is another point which I hesitate to bring up, but it is incontestably true. Tenants do not pay their rent to a municipality or a government as they do to a private landlord. After the experience of municipal housing in Ontario after the last war, I congratulate the minister upon the fact that he has not embarked upon the kind of scheme which was such a failure in that province.

It may be that in the city of Winnipeg and one or two other municipalities they were fortunate enough to have as chairman of their local board someone who was more than ordinarily clever, who spent all his time on the work, and made a success of a such a scheme. But looking at the whole picture, I can tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of dozens of municipalities in Ontario which have sustained losses and are thoroughly disillusioned with their venture into municipal housing for rental purposes.

As to the criticism regarding slum clearance, I believe it was two-fold. In the first place the amount was not large enough to suit my hon. friend; I believe he called it a mere bagatelle. Well, to me it seems quite an amount to be provided in the first year of the coming into force of the measure. His other complaint was that where a slum clearance scheme is entered upon, the land must be cleared of the slums and new homes built which must be resold to a limited-dividend corporation. Am I right?

Mr. KNOWLES: No: if the hon. member wants to be fair, that is not quite what I said. I quoted the wording of section 12, subsection

2 (b), which is to the effect that after the land has been bought and cleared it must then be sold to a limited-dividend housing corporation or a life insurance company so that they and not the municipality, may construct the project.

Mr. CLEAVER: In order that I may have that clear, what is my hon. friend's complaint in regard to the dividends being limited with respect to a project of this kind?

Mr. KNOWLES: I was not objecting to the dividends being limited; I was objecting to corporations being set up with the privilege of making dividends at all out of our housing extremity, instead of having it tackled directly by a public authority.

Mr. CLEAVER: Well, as I understand the proposal in the bill, the services are to be supplied at cost; the reason why the dividend is limited is to restrict it to actual cost; and I do not believe that you would find any municipality willing to supply these services and put up the interest, for the carrying charges.

I have some rather decided views on slum clearance, and I should like to take a moment to express them. I think it is a most futile thing to spend millions of dollars in clearing a slum and then allow another slum to build up in the very same city. The way to clear a slum is to remove the cause. Obviously no tenant lives in a slum as a matter of choice; he lives there only as a matter of necessity because he cannot afford decent housing accommodation. Therefore I say that the physical clearance of a slum has very little appeal to me. I think we should make housing accommodation available to the extent necessary to supply it at less than an economic rental to those unfortunate groups in our society who cannot afford to pay an economic rent; I refer to old age pensioners, mothers on widows' allowance, part-time war pensioners, war veterans with a fifty per cent pension who cannot get employment; and I would restrict the utilization of any low rental scheme to these limited groups.

Generally as to slum clearance, once you remove the cause of the slum; once you supply decent housing accommodation for the people who are now living in slums, neither governments nor municipalities will have to clear those slums; they will become depopulated because people will move out of them and the owners will have to tear them down at their own expense. I repeat that it is futile to tear down slums without removing the cause and then allow other slums to develop in the same municipality.

In this connection may I say I am very glad that the municipality is tied into this scheme, for this reason. Many slums in our large cities are located in an area midway between the business section and the residential section, on land which is being held for speculative purposes, the owners hoping that it will grow in value and eventually be in demand for business uses. That is no place to build more homes; such areas should not have people living in them at all. Once you provide decent housing accommodation in an attractive part of the city at a rent which these unfortunate people can pay, your slums will become depopulated and the owners themselves will pull them down.

With regard to this bill, I compliment the minister and his advisers upon drafting what, in my opinion, is one of the finest housing acts that I have ever read or that has been passed by any country to this day. Ever since 1936, when I first came to this house, I have taken a great deal of interest in housing. I am free to admit that housing was one of the things which motivated me in seeking election in 1935. At that time we had 60,000 of the building trade in idleness on relief, and a serious shortage of homes. I felt that something should be done about it, and I was willing to try to do my part.

The National Housing Act of 1937 has done a wonderful job. Under that act we have built something like 20,000 homes which are practically all owner-occupied. And while the government participated in the cost of those homes, the losses to date are less than ten cents a house. I am very glad indeed that the minister and his advisers have chosen to build the new act on the firm foundation of the National Housing Act and to simply expand that project.

The reduction in interest rate is very gratifying and will pull down substantially the monthly payments. The increase in the amortization period is very gratifying and will also tend to that end. When you check the figures you find that a man to-day under this bill can build a house costing $4,000 and puts up only $400 of his own money; and do you know what the monthly payments are? They are $18.04, and at the end of thirty years he owns that home which under normal conditions would rent from $35 to $40 a month. Yet this man, on the payment of $400 as a down payment, plus $18 a month, in thirty years, instead of having a collection of thirty years' rent receipts owns his own home.

Another feature about the bill that pleases me immensely, and one that I have been urging for some time, is that provision is to be made whereby the unpaid balance of the loan is to be taken care of in the event of the death of the bread-winner. Term insurance will be made possible so that if the bread-winner is taken away, the widow will own the home without encumbrance. That is a decided advance. Think of the sense of security and independence a man will have who has bought a home under this legislation and knows that if anything happens to him his wife and family will have a home clear of encumbrance.

Another feature I like is the extension of the list of lending companies. Under the old act the lending companies were restricted to insurance companies, loan companies and trust companies. Now the list has been very much broadened; trustees and trust funds may come under the measure, as well as building societies, credit unions and cooperative credit societies. Then there is provision for the owner who wishes to do part of the work on his own home. He can do that and be allowed for it in the cost of the home.

There is another provision whereby men may group together, so that a group of individuals collectively may build homes for each other. There was such a cooperative arrangement in the town of Oakville in my riding, where men working at the basket factory wanted to build a number of homes for themselves, and they all chipped in and helped in taking out the foundations and doing labouring and carpenter work and painting. That sort of thing was cumbersome under the old act, but now provision is made whereby such things can be done.

The next feature is the one which to me is the most important in the bill. The down payment has been reduced to a point where everyone in this country who wishes to do so can start to buy a home for himself. In the case of a home costing $2,000 a man has to make a down payment of only $100 and he is on the way to become the owner of his own home. In the next group, from $2,000 to $4,000, the down payment is fifteen per cent on the second $2,000, and over $4,000 the down payment on the excess of $4,000 is thirty per cent. This is only as it should be because, if a home costs seven or eight or ten thousand dollars, there should be a substantial down payment before work is started.

I like the measure also because it recognizes the fact that we need a good many new homes on farms, whereas the old act has no such provision.

I have taken a good deal more time than I had planned and I apologize for doing so. I wish to close with two suggestions. I should like to see a nation-wide campaign put on for every man in this country to own his own home, and in furtherance of that campaign I should like to see a provision made whereby a man can buy a second-hand house, a house already built, and finance it together with improvements to it in the same way exactly as he finances a new home. Obviously there are a good many homes in the country which are tenant-occupied. I suggest that it would make for a happier people if every man owned his own home and I do not think second-hand houses should go into the discard. We should make provision for these tenants to buy the houses in which they now live, and make the necessary improvements and repay the cost of the house and of the improvements on a monthly payment basis in the same way as new homes are paid for.

My other suggestion is this. I fear that we shall run into a great scarcity of material. Already scarcity has caused a distinct stiffening in the price of lumber and other building materials, and I would urge upon the minister and his department that steps be taken to organize for and make available building materials in large quantities in the immediate post-war period.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): At this late hour I do not intend to delay the house for more than a few minutes. I have already spoken on the resolution stage and said some of the things I wished to say. I then expressed approval of the bill and congratulated the minister upon the great improvement over the bill introduced in 1938. As I said before, much that we have in this bill should have formed a part of the 1938 measure, because of the recommendation in the Purvis report in 1937 that provision be made for the unfortunate individuals in the lowest income group who cannot afford to pay an economic rent. However, there is no use now in complaining of that omission.

I am glad even at this late date that we have such a comprehensive bill, but I should like to make one or two suggestions with reference to it. First of all, this measure, which after all is a very important health measure, should receive careful consideration and support. I do not think there is any single factor which contributes more to the sound health of our people than good housing. We all know that overcrowding is a source of ill health and danger from infectious diseases and produces many social evils that we should like to avoid.

This housing measure is to be administered by the Department of Finance. We all know how hard the Minister of Finance (Mr.

Ilsley) has to work. I suggest that we relieve him of this part of his work by placing the housing act and the administration of it where it properly belongs, namely, in the Department of National Health and Welfare. It is not in any sense of the word a financial measure and hard-headed financial men should not be responsible for its administration. We want a humanitarian such as we hope will be in charge of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Therefore, I am suggesting that the Minister of Finance be relieved of some of his onerous duties.

Mr. ILSLEY: What about the Minister of Reconstruction, would he not be the man?

Mr. BRUCE: No; I prefer to have it under health as it is in England, because, after all, it is a health measure. In considering all the items that go to make up good health, I believe that this is the most important of all. In the consideration of the national health act in the special committee on social security a good deal was said about the importance of decent housing in promoting good health.

I am glad to know that the minister has made provision for a central bureau for technical research and many other matters connected with the promotion of good housing and community planning. That is undoubtedly very important. I do not intend to attempt to go into the details of the bill, but I should like to comment upon the interest rate charged on money to be used in the construction of those low rental houses. May I congratulate the minister upon reducing the rate to three per cent. In so doing I think he has done a very great service to the community. As I said before, he might take a leaf out of the book of the United States housing administration and reduce the interest still lower to two per cent, and further to arrange to purchase bonds of those housing companies which would enable them to carry on their work more satisfactorily in their effort to meet the needs of a large portion of our population. In my opinion, the amount set aside for this purpose is not sufficient, and should be increased to $100,000,000, instead of $50,000,000.

Now I should like to say a word about slums. I entirely approve the proposal of a grant for the clearance of slums. It is much more far-reaching than the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) seems to indicate. My chief criticism is that a sufficient amount has not been allowed, and that it should be $50,000,000 instead of $20,000,000. There are slums in every large city in Canada. They are the breeding place of infection, immorality and criminal tendencies. I believe that all these places should be cleared out as speedily as possible and replaced by suitable, adequate, decent houses for these unfortunate people. The municipalities have not the money to undertake this work. Unless they are assisted by the federal government I am afraid this work will not be done.

The hon. member for Halton spoke about this measure as being the most advanced measure in the world. Although I heartily approve what the minister is doing, I am afraid I cannot be as extravagant as that in my praise. Great Britain has built many houses over a long period of years. Since the last war she has built some three or four million houses. She has under contemplation, following this war, the building of from four to five million more houses. Continental countries, such as Sweden, Austria and some of our enemy countries have been building houses for twenty or twenty-five years. The method that was suggested here a few days ago of prefabricated houses had its origin in Europe and has been carried out successfully there for a number of years. Therefore we are by no means the most advanced country in the world in so far as providing housing for our people is concerned. We are making progress; we are a young country and we cannot do everything at once. I think great commendation should be given to the minister for bringing forward as good a bill as this. I hope that it is only a beginning, and that in time all our people will have decent houses in which to live. I do not know that I need delay the house longer to-night. My views on the housing problem were published in a report ten years ago, and all I need say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, is that this measure has my hearty approval.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I wish to ask the minister a question. I do not desire to retard the progress of the bill—

Mr. ILSLEY: We are not in committee.

Mr. LOCKHART: I will put my remarks in the form of an interrogation and perhaps the minister will answer them later. I do not suppose there is anyone in the house who is not in full accord with the bill. I should like the minister or someone to make definitely clear just what the permit system is to be when it is invoked in order to get these houses built. I shall not hold up the progress of the bill by asking many questions at this time. But there is another point that the minister might perhaps be in a position to give a little information on when the bill is being considered in committee, namely, how he is going to proceed to organize for this work. I think a clear statement should be made with respect to the organization and the amount of staff that will be required. There have been some criticisms in the past and I think the minister should be prepared to answer that question.

I cannot say that I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in his remarks on the attitude toward municipalities engaging in this type of work. Those of us who have had municipal experience, and had responsibilities under the old housing schemes of many years ago, will agree that they became rather serious headaches to those charged with the responsibility of looking after the affairs of municipalities. I refer particularly to the difficulties that were experienced when we tried to straighten matters out when people fell into arrears. The system that was introduced for building houses under former housing schemes many years ago was so tremendously cumbersome that in many instances it proved to be a detriment to home owners rather than a help.

I can only add my word of commendation and, as I say, there are some other comments I shall make as the bill goes through. I trust that the minister will be prepared to deal with the permit feature, and one or two other features I have mentioned. I shall do all I can to help the minister, and to see that the bill is put into full operation in my locality.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in view of the publicity through both press and radio, in connection with the housing situation in Halifax I could, without the slightest effort, talk for forty minutes on this bill. But if I were to do so I know I would be about as popular as that little animal which is not welcomed at garden parties.

I do not propose to take up any considerable time—in fact I propose to make the shortest speech made by any hon. member during the session. On several occasions delegations from Halifax have appeared before the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in connection with assistance for housing. We are very happy to see this measure now before the house. There is no question that it will be welcomed not only in Halifax but throughout Canada. We approve in full the measure, and welcome it because it will be the means of providing to a larger number of people the possibility of building homes, and thereby becoming better citizens of this great dominion.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to go on record as entirely supporting the bill. My only criticism is that it does not go far enough. It has, however, one defect which I think should be pointed out to the minister at this early stage of the discussion. The defect is that sufficient recognition is not taken of the three governing bodies, namely municipal, provincial and federal.

This is a bill to assist in the construction of houses. Section 12 provides remedial assistance to do away with slum areas and congested conditions which have developed as a result of our industrialized civilization. In my view, insufficient attention has been given in the bill to having proper town plans prepared. Town planning is just as important for a man who builds a $4,000 or a $5,000 house as it is in connection with a definite scheme of slum clearance.

Section 12 (2) (a) gives slight reference to the necessity for having a plan. Slums in many of our cities to-day are not composed of cheap houses. Rather they are composed of areas which years ago were residential sections. But because those residential sections have been improperly or unscientifically constructed they have deteriorated to slum conditions. Hon. members will know of cities right across the dominion where this condition has developed. Older residential areas have become blighted areas because they were not properly planned. They were constructed without consideration for transportation, for access to arterial highways, for schools, or for industrial planning. The consequence is that we have a destruction of investment.

This bill proposes the expenditure of a certain amount of money. Whether that amount is adequate or not I shall not now discuss. I am of opinion that a great deal more will have to be spent to do a real job, but I shall not discuss that feature at the present time. However, when we spend these sums of money we must be sure that we are making a good investment. We cannot be sure of that until we have secured the cooperation of the provinces and municipalities, so that the houses built will be houses which will not deteriorate through industrial blight.

The city of Toronto has made a master plan. They took several years to do so, with the result that the plan is in my opinion an excellent one, and demonstrates just how alive and awake municipalities are to this pressing need for housing.

The city of Montreal has quite recently gone into the business of making a town plan. The recent issue of the Journal of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, in connection with a survey and replanning of Montreal, has four significant things to say in this matter.

I shall read them, because I believe they are of importance to every municipality in the country:

> Montreal, like all other cities which grew during the development of industry and trade in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, is characterized by four typical deficiencies:
> (1) There is no planned relationship between working districts and residential areas from the standpoint of easy communication. The transportation system is consequently unduly large and complex.
> (2) The prevailing west wind was not considered in the location of industrial and residential areas, hence industrial smoke and fumes pollute the air over most of the city with ill effects to the health of the community and obvious aesthetic undesirability.
> (3) Houses in the residential areas are built too densely and are oriented without regard to sunlight, and are, therefore, predestined to become slums.
> (4) Recreational areas are lacking where they are most needed.
> The correction of such deficiencies must begin with the separation of city elements according to functions and the coordination of these elements by a transportation system.

While I think this bill is a step in the right direction, we must see that the houses we are going to build will be permanent investments. Let us see that they will be the dwelling houses for numbers of years of those people for whom they are built, and let us build them so that we may not find in a number of years that, because of an undesirable change in industry or in transportation or for other reasons, the areas in which we have built houses and in which we have made investments have become blighted areas. That is very important. We must in every instance insist that wherever these new homes are built there must be a proper and coordinated town plan so that the investment will be a permanent one.

A proposed draft bill has been offered by the province of Quebec architectural association and this can be found in the July issue of the Journal of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada. I do not intend to go into it in detail because it is much too long. It sets out all the salient facts with regard to the necessity of having our investment made in a properly planned way. In the reconstruction period there will be no more important industry than the building industry. The building industry probably more than any other can solve the problem of unemployment. We must see to it that the building industry has a plan prepared for it now, so that when demobilization takes place there will be year round work for all. I wish to emphasize again that before we go ahead and commit ourselves we should act in a scientific manner and not build houses haphazardly all over the countryside without seeing that they will maintain their value and usefulness as dwellings.

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, for many years I have been connected with the Toronto Housing company, a semi-philanthropic institution in Toronto. This is a limited-dividend company which was set up in 1913 by some public-spirited citizens. The dividend was limited to six per cent and the capital stock was about $100,000. The city guaranteed the bonds of the corporation to the extent of eighty-five per cent, which meant that there was roughly $800,000 of bonds and $100,000 of stock. The company went along very nicely until the depression of 1931-32. The bonds were floated in New York.

Two developments were carried on, and the rentals of the units ran from $20 for a one or two-roomed unit to about $40 for a six-roomed unit. The idea was to have accommodation for various sized families. But the depression came along in 1932 and vacancies increased. Also the exchange rate was against us. Dividends had to be discontinued. Many families in Toronto were doubling up; vacancies increased; the company finally got into difficulties, and at the present time it owes the city of Toronto quite a lot of money.

Some provision should be made in this bill to refinance companies like this and put them on a proper basis. This company has had the experience of running these projects and I really think it would be a good idea to put it on a proper basis. The ten per cent exchange works against us in paying the interest and also the principal in the United States. If the company could be reorganized to take advantage of this three per cent provision it could get out of its difficulties. I am sure it would be quite willing to reduce its capital.

One clause in the bill provides for the ratio as between rentals to be charged and the family income, and states that it shall be such rate as the minister may deem to be fair and reasonable. In any housing projects that are carried on, provision should be made for different sized families. There are many low income families with two or three children and provision should be made for them. I do not think we should have all units the same size.

Ever since I have been in this house I have advocated slum clearance. There are slums in my constituency, as the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) knows. A large part of the survey referred to in his book was carried on in that area. We have not been able to do anything about these slum areas and they are becoming worse and spreading. I am glad to see provision made here for this work, but I do not know whether the $20,000,000 provided will be sufficient.

There must be cooperation between the federal, provincial and municipal authorities. Those three bodies must enter into this whole project. After all, the municipality is controlled to a large extent by the provincial government. I have no more to say except that I endorse this bill which has been a long time overdue.

Motion (Mr. Ilsley) agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. LOCKHART: How is the permit system going to work under this legislation as compared with the old act? Will permits be required for the construction of all housing units under this legislation?

Mr. ILSLEY: If we are in committee tomorrow on this, which I hope we shall not be, I shall get the Minister of Munitions and Supply to make any statement that he can about the probable developments of the permit system. I presume the hon. gentleman is referring to the permits which have to be obtained from the controller of construction before a house can be built?

Mr. LOCKHART: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Those permits are required under war-time conditions for the prevention of extravagant building and unnecessary building of all kinds, and they are very necessary restrictions, but they are not the kind of restrictions that should remain as a permanent part of our governmental system; at least I have never heard it suggested that they should. I do not really think the Minister of Munitions and Supply could say anything except that the restrictions will have to stay on so long as there are severe shortages of materials, as there are at the present time.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is the very point. If there is some reason why we cannot build houses; if it is because of a shortage of materials, how do we ever expect to build under this legislation? I am speaking of a permit to build a $4,000 cottage. You cannot get a permit to-day for that. It is held up. Is building to be held up under this legislation too through the permit system?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was not in the house when the Minister of Munitions and Supply made his statement about the shortage of building materials.

Mr. LOCKHART: I was.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is just too bad that there is a shortage; it is too bad that there is such a terrible war in progress. We cannot do the two things together. We cannot have everything perfect here at home and at the same time carry on the war. There is nothing that can be done about it. This housing legislation is to cover the post-war period and the intervening period as well, but we cannot for the sake of making a success of our housing legislation stop supplying materials for the war.

Mr. LOCKHART: Does the minister anticipate that this measure will come into operation in the near future, because there is a real need of it?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. LOCKHART: Even to-day I have a request for a very moderate six-room cottage costing about four thousand dollars. I have tried to get a permit, but it is held up, and it is an urgent case. I have explained the circumstances to the controller of construction and asked him for a little speed, if possible. I am bringing the matter now to the attention of the minister and pointing out that this legislation cannot possibly become operative and houses be built if this extreme shortage continues. I am quite aware of the fact that we are fighting a war, and I am simply giving my ideas to the minister in the hope of being of some assistance in getting this housing under construction. I should like a little more information on the permit system and what is to be done about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: We want to get ahead with the actual building just as soon as we can. I think I would be safe in saying that the restrictions will be removed as soon as they can be.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Perhaps the minister would say something about the point I raised, the refinancing of limited-dividend corporations.

Mr. ILSLEY: A limited-dividend corporation such as the one that the hon. gentleman mentioned cannot be assisted under this measure. This bill is to promote the building of houses, to provide an addition to the housing facilities of the country, not to help out in its financing an already established limited-dividend corporation.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But this corporation would come under this bill for future building.

Mr. ILSLEY: For future building, yes, and put up some more money themselves, and limit their dividends to a greater extent than they already have.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there any reason why they could not be refinanced and used to a far greater extent than they are now being used? The question that enters into the picture is not the amount of money but the interest rate which they have to pay on outstanding obligations. It seems to me that the logical thing to do would be to make some rearrangement so that the services could be utilized of an already going concern which understands this business. That might be done by refinancing their outstanding obligations. I am not suggesting the doing away with their obligations or anything like that, of course, but I say that they should be put on a basis where they would not be losing money every year. Right at the present time they are under the thumb of the rent controller. I have tried time and again to get an increase in the rents, but in spite of the fact that they are losing money every year they cannot raise the rents. They are going on because they are a public-spirited corporation. I hope the minister's attitude is not going to be that the city of Toronto will take the blame. If some refinancing of outstanding obligations were done it would put them on easy street. It is just a question of the interest rate.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not what the bill is for.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The bill is to provide housing and to utilize the best instruments we have for the production of housing, and one of the best instruments we have is the Toronto Housing company. It is a well managed firm, and had it not been for the rent freezing they would have been out of the woods, but unfortunately rents were frozen just about the day before they were going to raise the rents to where they could make a little money. Now they cannot do so because the rents are frozen.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. ILSLEY: A slight amendment to correct an error in wording is necessary.

Mr. McLARTY: I move:

That subsection 33 of section 2 be amended by striking out the word "rental" appearing between the words "means a" and the word "housing" in line 22 on page 4.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. STIRLING: I was going to ask the minister on the committee stage a question to which the hon. member for York West referred. Does the minister retain any supervision over location of building, description of building, design of building, or anything to do with how the matter shall be dealt with? Public attention is being paid a great deal more to town planning as the years go by, and if this bill catches on with the public I can imagine many instances where none too desirable buildings will be erected in places where, possibly, town planners do not want them erected. Does the minister exercise any supervision over the plans which a lending institution is ready to accept?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The director of housing certainly does. The housing administration must approve the location, the design and the plans.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that covered in some clause here?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so.

Mr. STIRLING: I cannot find it, except a sort of left-hand reference, through regulations.

Mr. LOCKHART: Yes, that is all there is.

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 4, subsection 2 (b) is one clause. There are others, I believe.

Mr. STIRLING: In other words, the lending institution has not a completely free hand to accept any scheme?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister retains supervision?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is a question which I have been asked a number of times and to which I have already given an answer which I think is correct, but because the question has been asked quite often I think it might be well if the minister would make a statement on it. The question is this: when a person applies for a loan he is told that he may get a loan up to a certain percentage of the lending value of the property. Does that lending value include cost of the land which the prospective borrower may already own? I have given the answer, "yes," but because of the interest in this question, if the minister would clarify the point it would be appreciated.

Mr. ILSLEY: It includes the value of the land; not necessarily the cost of the land if he already owns it.

Mr. KNOWLES: The reason why I asked the question at this time is that I believe it is covered by subsection 6 of this section, where as far as the land is concerned it is either the cost or the appraised value, whichever is the lesser. But what bothers some people is this: if the computation results in the necessity, we will say, of borrowing $1,900 to build a house, and he already owns a lot worth $100, it will not be necessary for the applicant to put up an additional amount of money; the $100 he has in that lot will be his five per cent of the $2,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: The figures are purely hypothetical.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. But do not forget that it is not the original cost which counts in that case; it is the value.

Mr. KNOWLES: The value or the cost, whichever is the lesser.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Subsection 34 states:

"Semi-detached dwelling" means a family housing unit joined by a common or party wall to one or more family housing units;

Does that mean houses in a row?

Mr. MacNICOL: Like a terrace.

Mr. STIRLING: Then it is not semi-detached.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I understand the question the answer is yes. There might be a number of family units joined by a common or party wall. "One or more family housing units"; I think they could be separated by party walls.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The one in the centre would be fully attached if there were three.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are called "semi-detached". This is a definition of what "semi-detached" means.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Powers of approved lending institutions to loan on first mortgage.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry that an amendment must be moved to this as well.

Mr. McLARTY: I move:

That section 3 be amended by striking out the words "this part" in line 32 and substituting therefore the words "parts I and II of this act", and by adding the following words at the end of the said clause, "or of the lending value of a rental housing project specified in paragraph (b) of subsection (2) of section 8 of this act".

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask what the minister means in the amendment by "lending value"? The same words appear later on.

Mr. ILSLEY: The addition of the words gives the lending institution the power to make the loans which are required under part II as well as under part I. Part II of the bill relates to housing for rental purposes. Apparently the section was drafted in such a way as to apply only to part I of the bill, namely home ownership houses—that is perhaps the correct phrase—the case where a person applies for money and builds a house and owns it. But it is also contemplated that there will be some lending under part II of the bill, which provides for rental. This makes it clear that lending institutions can lend under part II as well as under part I

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Minister may enter into contracts.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What is the minimum amount that will be lent?

Mr. ILSLEY: Fifty per cent.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In dollars?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a limit in percentage but not in dollars.

Mr. HAZEN: I would refer the minister to subsection 2 (c):

a joint loan shall not be less than fifty per centum of the lending value of the house. . . .

"House" is defined as a building intended for human habitation. No reference is made to land there. There is a definition of lending values and cost of construction, but there is no reference to land there. As I read the section, in conjunction with the definitions, it appears to me that it could be interpreted to mean cost of construction of the house or cost of improvements, and I am wondering whether it is the house without the land.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman sounds as if he is right. If there is an error there it has always been there. Perhaps the definition of cost of construction cures it. I should like to look at it, because this is the way it has always been done. It is I think, a little subtle. We have to interpret what the phrase "lending value" is. We start with that. That phrase raises a difficulty, and it will be found on page 5, line 6, of the bill. Now what do we mean by "the lending value of the house"? We thought we meant the lending value of the house and land.

Mr. HAZEN: There is a definition of "house" on page 3, section 2, subsection (19).

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right, and the definition of "house" does not include land.

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: That adds still further to our difficulties. Then we go to subsection (23) on page 3 and we find that "'lending value' means the estimated cost of construction or cost of conversion, or the appraised value, whichever is less, of a house or housing project". Then we go to cost of construction which undoubtedly brings in the land. What the combined effect of all that is I do not know off the bat.

Mr. STIRLING: Surely subsection (23) must include the value of the land.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. This was passed by the Department of Justice and carries the wording of the old act. Certainly I do not want to have a mistake about it.

Mr. LOCKHART: Cost of construction does not usually include the land value.

Mr. HAZEN: We shall hardly get through the bill to-night.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the section had better stand.

Section stands.

On section 5—Orders and regulations by governor in council.

Mr. HAZEN: With regard to section 4 I would refer the minister to subsection 2, paragraph (j):

> a joint loan shall be made on such terms as to payment of principal, interest and taxes by monthly instalments as may be prescribed by regulation or as the minister may determine.

Is there any provision about insurance? I suppose the owner of the house would have to keep it insured, or will that be provided for in the regulations? Perhaps it is in the mortgage.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The mortgage requires the house to be insured, always.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister a few minutes ago, in reply to a question of mine, referred to the supervision which the director of housing would exercise. Is there any link in this bill to the director of housing, showing where he enters into this matter and has any jurisdiction over it.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the minister, and "minister" includes the person to be designated.

Mr. STIRLING: I see. That is the way in which the director of housing comes in.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the minister is going to check on the wording with reference to lending value and cost of construction, perhaps he should creck up on section 5 (1) (a) as well, because there you run into similar wording again:

> The governor in council may, on the recommendation of the minister, by regulation, (a) prescribe the manner in which the cost of construction of a house or of a housing project shall be estimated. . . .

You have it defined in one place and now you put it in the hands of the governor in council. I did not think there was any difficulty in the wording under the previous legislation. I thought the intention was quite clear. But maybe it should be checked.

Mr. ILSLEY: The section that needs to stand is the one containing the definition of "house" rather than this section.

Mr. KNOWLES: That would be section 2. It was section 4 that was made to stand, but not section 2.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 5 carry?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps it should stand, in view of the comment.

Section stands.

Sections 6 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Loans to limited-dividend housing corporations.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have an amendment to suggest to this section. It is that paragraph (g) of subsection 3 of section 9 be amended by striking out the word "or" at the end of line 24 and substituting therefor the word "and". It seems to be a minor drafting change.

Mr. McLARTY: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask one question with reference to paragraph (g) of subsection 4 of section 9? Will the department have in large centres such as Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver or elsewhere an agent to look after the department's interest?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, undoubtedly we shall have to have officials in those cities.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Subsection 3 of section 9 reads:

A loan may be made under this section only to a limited-dividend housing corporation which has entered into a contract with His Majesty on the terms set out in the next succeeding subsection, to construct a low-rental housing project or to convert existing buildings into a low-rental housing project. . . .

And so on. Is there any reason why the company I was talking about a while ago could not convert these into low-rental projects by refinancing their proposition?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are low-rental units now, are they not?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, but they could be lower and they would serve a very much more useful purpose. I think something ought to be done about the matter. I do not think it makes very much difference to anybody except that these things could be converted. There is a lot of money in the trust company and there is a sinking fund of two or three thousand dollars there as well. I may be wrong in the amount, but interest at five per cent is paid on that money into the trust company every year, and a portion of the sinking fund has to be paid as well. Even that would be all right if the five per cent bonds were exchanged for three per cent bonds. The dominion government would not be out anything. The money would be lent in the same way. That money and other money would come back and would save two per cent. It would make a lot of difference to a company of that kind. This company is just aching to get busy on low-rental housing. Men who are interested in it are all public spirited men. The director of the corporation is L. M. Wood of Toronto. He does some work in connection with the blind. Many of these fellows have been interested in this work for a long time. Here is an opportunity to use an organization that is a going concern. They have had experience in this country on projects of this kind and know what it is about. It seems to me that some clause should be inserted there to help out a situation like that. They are always getting kicked around by the board of control in the city of Toronto because they do not understand the situation. It is not because it has not been well financed; it is because of the circumstances. There is the high interest rate and the ten per cent exchange rate which they have to pay. These bonds are at five per cent plus the exchange. Any portion of the capital that is paid off is paid off at a ten per cent premium. What I ask could be easily done. There may be other organizations in Canada that could be helped out in the same way.

Mr. ABBOTT: Get the hon. member for Rosedale to refinance it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Or perhaps St. Antoine-Westmount.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I am not in that business.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have taken this matter up with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance many times in connection with rentals on these places. The rentals are frozen and they were frozen at an unfair rate. They were frozen the day before the corporation had intended to raise its rents. We did not want to raise the rent because we are a philanthropic institution, but you have to face costs. Take the increased cost of coal alone. We all know what has happened to coal in this country. The place has to be heated; hot water has to be supplied and all the other upkeep has to be taken care of.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RECOMMENDATIONS OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION WITH RESPECT TO CLASSIFICATIONS, ETC.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to lay before the house reports and recommendations of the Civil Service Commission with respect to the permanent appointment of a secretary to the Speaker of the House of Commons; a change in classification of the Clerk of Orders and Notices, and an increase in compensation to the Debates Reporting branch.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Sixth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Picard.

Tenth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Moore.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

LONDON SCREENING COMMITTEE

Mr. FULFORD:

1. Has Canada a representative on "the joint committee of non-munitions committee and the London food committee", commonly referred to as "the London screening committee"?

2. If not, how are Canadian products allocated to other parts of the British commonwealth, including the middle east supply mission at Cairo and the India mission?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Canada has an observer on the joint committee of non-munitions committee and the London food committee.

2. Canada is a full member of the combined production and resources board and of the combined food board which deal with the allocation of industrial and agricultural products amongst the united nations. On UNRRA, the agency dealing with relief and rehabilitation requirements, Canada holds the chairmanship of the supplies committee. On other committees operating in more limited fields, Canadian interests are protected in some cases by full membership, in others by an observer and in others by working arrangements with operating subcommittees.

Arrangements have been made with the middle east supply centre, Cairo, for Canada to receive programmes of the requirements of middle east countries as soon as they are made available to the United Kingdom and the United States. Arrangements have also been made for the inclusion of Canada as a source of supply on the middle east commodity index. Close contact is maintained between officials of the centre and the Canadian trade commissioner in Cairo. These provisions enable Canada to be specified as a source of supply for any commodities or materials in the supply of which Canada is interested.

The Indian supply mission has a representative in Ottawa working closely with the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Munitions and Supply.

INCOME TAX—$10,000 PER ANNUM AND OVER

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many persons in Canada had a personal income of over $10,000 per annum in each of the years 1940 to 1943 inclusive?

2. (a) What was the total income of said group in each of the said years; (b) what was the total amount of income tax paid by said group in each of the said years?

Mr. GIBSON: Income tax statistics have been compiled on a government fiscal year basis from the returns assessed within a given fiscal year. Such statistics therefore represent the income assessed and the tax assessed and do not reflect the income actually earned or the tax actually paid in the period covered. Steps are now being taken to prepare statistics on a calendar year basis. The following table is based on assessments made in fiscal years ending March 31.

Fiscal Year	No. of taxpayers assessed having incomes over $10,000	Total income assessed	Total tax assessed
1940 ...	11,816	$240,822,309	$38,643,690
1941 ...	10,956	225,776,323	38,745,329
1942 ...	6,910	141,769,758	31,611,008

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—TEXTILE PRODUCTION

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Has the Minister of Munitions and Supply set up a textile production branch or a new department of textile production?

2. If so, who is the director of this department and what are his qualifications and salary?

3. What are the names of the others constituting the personnel of this directorate and what are the qualifications and salaries in each case?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Yes.

2. S. H. Pettitt, director general, salary, $6,600 per annum.

Mr. Pettitt in civil life was a textile consultant and production and cost expert, and is a registered member of the Industrial Cost Accountants and Industrial Engineers Society of Ontario.

Since 1909 Mr. Pettitt has had wide experience in the textile industry in Australia, United States and Canada. Immediately preceding the war he conducted his own business as consultant in the production of textiles. During his business career he has conducted surveys for the governments of the dominions of Australia and New Zealand.

He has been an officer of the cost accounting section of the treasury and the Department of Munitions and Supply since September, 1940, dealing solely with textiles, and has done extremely valuable work.

3. Inasmuch as this branch was created recently the personnel of the branch has not yet been appointed.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CIVIL SERVICE—ADDITIONAL SERVICES AND REMUNERATION

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Are there any permanent civil servants who have been paid, in addition to their regular salaries, for performing, together with their official work, additional duties assigned to them, (a) by reason of the organization of the new war services; (b) as a result of the absence of other civil servants who have joined the army, navy and air force?

2. If so, what are their names and what additional remuneration was paid to each of these permanent civil servants?

TRANSFERS FROM NOVA SCOTIA FOR EMPLOYMENT IN OTHER PROVINCES

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. How many persons in Nova Scotia have obtained employment and been instructed or authorized to report for work in another province?
2. What has been the total transportation, living and other expenses paid on account of such persons?
3. Have any persons, who have been instructed or authorized to report for work outside of the province, refused to take such employment, and if so, how many?

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCH—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. ROEBUCK IN DEBATE ON AUGUST 4

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to call the attention of the house to page 5950 of Hansard of last Friday, August 4, where the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) says:

In that attitude I believe we are far stronger than in that advocated from across the aisle; that is to say, an adult nationhood but in some way subservient to some other nation.

Let me say that such remarks were never made by me at any time.

The hon. member went on:

If I understand the English language aright he (Mr. Church) desires some sort of centralization of power across the ocean.

That is ridiculous; I never suggested that. He went on:

I heard the hon. member say that the strength of the empire is in unity, and of course with that statement I thoroughly agree. The strength of the empire is in unity; but if that unity is to be brought about by subservience on the part of Canada to any other people—

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I never made any remarks like that here or at any other place at any time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE IN INTRODUCTION OF MEASURE FOR WAR SERVICE GRATUITIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will doubtless have noticed that in to-day's Votes and Proceedings there appears notice of a motion in my name relating to war service gratuities to be paid to members of His Majesty's Canadian forces who served on active service during the war and to assist them in their reestablishment, having regard to the length, sphere and terms of their service. I should like to have the bill presented to hon. members at as early a moment as possible. If we followed the ordinary procedure it would be necessary to wait until to-morrow to advise the house that His Excellency has been informed of the subject matter of the resolution, and it would not be possible to proceed in committee of the whole with the resolution until later. Unless there is an objection to my so doing, I would ask leave of the house to introduce a motion which would enable the house to take up the resolution in committee to-day, with the understanding that if the resolution carries the bill itself will later be distributed so as to be available for hon. members for second reading and discussion of its provisions at another sitting of the house. If this course meets with the approval of hon. members I would ask the permission of the house to introduce the following motion:

That notice of the resolution standing in Votes and Proceedings with respect to payment of war service gratuities be deemed sufficient, and that the said resolution be considered in committee of the whole during to-day's sitting of the house.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I can see no objection to meeting the Prime Minister's suggestion with respect to having the resolution advanced this stage so that we can discuss the resolution to-day. I would like, however, to point out that it is one hundred and twenty days since on January 27 this measure was mentioned for the first time in the speech from the throne. While it may be quite a good argument to say that legislation which is perhaps not properly classed as a war measure should be left to the end of the session and that war measures should be given preference, this proposal is definitely both a war and peace-time measure and one which in all propriety should have been before us long ago. It is six and a half months since it was first envisaged in the speech from the throne; and as I understand from the Prime Minister's suggestion to-day, and in this I think he is quite right, it is doubtful whether the bill even yet is printed and ready for distribution.

I am not anxious to have to make the observations which I am making this morning. Few people in the house are more weary than I am or more anxious to see the house come to a conclusion reasonably soon; and I suppose most hon. members who understand the strain which members generally, and those who are leaders in the house particularly, are under during this time of rush and pressure of legislation, will recognize the significance of the remarks I now make. At the risk of being unpopular with some hon. members, since the pressure is so great to have the house rise at the end of the week I do not relish the idea of suggesting, but I do suggest, that we shall have to give this proposal the full measure of consideration to which it is entitled, no matter how long we have to sit. More than that, I cannot see how we can very well give this bill full consideration and still end our session on Saturday night. No matter what the personal inconvenience to members of this house or to any of us, it is pretty small compared to the inconvenience that the men this measure is designed to help have to endure for us while they are serving overseas and in other places. Parliament should give this measure the fullest consideration to the end that it will be the best measure we can possibly present to these men and women when they come back. If it is possible to do that before the end of this week, by all means let us do it. But let us not hurry this legislation; let us not be accused of hastening it just for purposes of speed. Rather let us make sure that whatever time and whatever money are necessary shall be allotted to a measure which is so very important that I regard it as perhaps the most important to come before this house at the present session.

I do not think we would ever forgive ourselves if we were inconsiderately to push this bill through or give undue signs of haste. After all, it has to do with the lives and the future of men and women who are our No. 1 citizens. Definitely we owe this to them. I know the government will be in thorough agreement with what I have said, but I thought it only fair to point out to the public and to the house generally that, whatever happens, this measure must have the fullest consideration regardless of the inconvenience to members. Whatever responsibility there may be, in all fairness the government must share it, because this measure should certainly have been before the house for consideration long before this.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a great pity that this measure is coming before us in the manner in which it is to-day. I have not yet seen it. I do not know what the resolution is. I know it is purely formal, but I hear rumours that it involves the expenditure of about $730 million, or fifty per cent more than the pre-war budget. If that is so we should certainly have had much more time and warning than we have. The Prime Minister says that the resolution is on to-days Votes and Proceedings. So far I have not been able to get a copy of yesterday's Votes and Proceedings, although I sent out for one a few minutes ago.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is to-day's Votes and Proceedings which record yesterday's notices and proceedings.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have not received it yet.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: May I send mine across?

Mr. COLDWELL: I know it is not in my box, because I just got my mail.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I regret that to-day's Votes and Proceedings have not reached him, but that must be due to some oversight or mishap. It could not be intentional.

May I say at once to the leader of the opposition that I greatly appreciate what he has said by way of accommodation to enable us to bring in this resolution immediately. I hope that hon. members of the house are in agreement with the leader of the opposition to have the resolution introduced at once and the bill brought in later. With regard to the bill being printed may I say to my hon. friend that I have a copy of it in my hand. It has been printed but there are one or two clauses which the government would like to look over before having the bill distributed. There will be no delay in having the bill distributed.

With my hon. friend, I wish it might have been possible to have this important measure brought down earlier in the session. It is a war measure, but as my hon. friend will see, its provisions relate more particularly to the post-war period. I mention that only by way of explanation. The session has been a very heavy one. Some ten weeks or more were occupied in discussing the war appropriations and that accounts in part for there having been some delay in the introduction of this measure.

The measure is one that affects five departments of the government. As hon. members are well aware, the ministers of defence, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Pensions and National Health, all of whose departments are affected by the measure, have had exceptional duties to perform during this latter part of the session and along with their officials have been giving every moment of their time to the immediate questions that are before us. I mention that as one of the reasons why it has been impossible to bring this measure before the house sooner.

May I say to the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) that when a similar measure was enacted after the last war it was not brought before parliament at all, it was enacted by order in council, and that not until after the war was over. The present administration took the view emphatically that we should not attempt to enact a measure of such importance by order in council even if its introduction involved lengthy discussion here. We felt that hon. members of both houses had a supreme right to consider and to be immediately associated with the enactment of a measure of as great importance as this. For that reason we have brought it in as part of the programme announced in the speech from the throne.

Let me say further to my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, that I agree with every word he has said about the time that should be devoted to the consideration of this measure. No one in the house is more anxious to see the session ended than myself, and I am sure there are some members of the administration who are even more anxious than I am because in many directions they have carried heavier loads than I have. But that should not cause us to fail to give the measure every consideration that this House of Commons should give to what I think, along with my hon. friend, is perhaps as important as any measure introduced, not only during this session but during this parliament and I might say during any parliament of Canada.

I believe that the measure is one that will commend itself to all members in this house. I think the view of the House of Commons generally with regard to the recognition to be given to the men who have offered their services at the risk of their lives is a view that is held in common, namely that there is nothing that we can do, having regard always to what the public interest makes possible, that could be too much in the way of recognition for the services that they have rendered and are rendering.

Apparently the house is agreeable to proceeding with the resolution, so that I shall move, seconded by the Minister of Mines and Resources:

> That notice of the resolution standing in Votes and Proceedings with respect to payment of war service gratuities be deemed sufficient and that the said resolution be considered in committee of the whole during to-day's sitting of the house.

If the motion carries, I would suggest that we proceed at once to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before putting that motion the resolution should be before the house with the Governor General's approval.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I intended to mention formally—I thought I had—that His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion will be that the house go into committee of the whole this day. I would point out that there is an error in the second line of paragraph 1 of the resolution where it states that the war commenced on the 3rd day of September; that should be the 10th day of September. Also in the second line of paragraph 2 the date 3rd day of September is mentioned; this should be the 10th day of September.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the urgency of this resolution is not greater than its form of discussion here. It looks to me as if the grants will not buy clothing for these men let alone houses; they are too small. Will it come up later to-day

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN FORCES

REPORT AS TO PROPORTION OF CANADIAN DIVISIONS IN CANADIAN ARMY IN NORMANDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the misconception which exists about our Canadian Army—the report being that it includes powerful units of British troops—will the minister clarify the situation by telling the house if it is made up mainly of Canadian divisions, or if not, in what proportion?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): No, I cannot make a statement, but I can say to my hon. friend that the Canadian Army is composed just as I forecast it would be composed when I addressed the house in connection with my estimates in February of this year. My hon. friend and the house will realize, I believe, that I am not in a position to make and should not make a statement regarding the composition of the Canadian Army. That will be disclosed in due course.

AVAILABILITY OF N.R.M.A. MEN FOR SERVICE ANYWHERE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the government, before this session closes, pass the order in council necessary to make all those drafted under the National Resources Mobilization Act available for service anywhere?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member will be fully aware of the government's attitude as soon as any change is made, before or after the session is concluded.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like to ask a supplementary question. When the European war is terminated will the government ask those who have won that war to fight another war on the Pacific without in the meantime making the home defence army available for that task?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would be utterly improper for the government to make any announcement with respect to matters that relate to the strategy of the war and which are part of the general plans for the war. The hon. member I am sure on reflection will realize that it would be most unwise to inform the enemy of anything that we are going to do.

PACIFIC AIR LINE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER OF NEW ZEALAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply in connection with a statement made by the Prime Minister of New Zealand in the New Zealand parliament some two days ago wherein he advised that the New Zealand government had taken up with the United States the question of landing rights for the establishment of an empire air line. It is indicated from the press dispatch that there is a possibility of Canada participating therein as well as the United Kingdom. Is the minister in a position to give information in regard to the projected Pacific air line referred to?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I have stated before in the house that the Canadian government is carrying on active negotiations leading to a service across the Pacific. New Zealand and Australia are also interested in the negotiations covering the same territory. The negotiations are not at this moment at the stage that warrants a statement from me, but the house will be advised as soon as definite conclusions have been reached.

MONETARY CONFERENCE

RECOMMENDATIONS OF BRETTON WOODS MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I wish to direct two questions to the Prime Minister. I have not previously given him any notice. First, what provisions if any have been made or are being made by the government for rendering available to members copies of the white paper setting forth the recommendations of the Bretton Woods conference on international monetary organization? Second, when is the house to be given an opportunity to discuss these recommendations?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It would be possible to have the report printed and, I hope, distributed at once. Just when it may receive consideration I am not in a position at the moment to say.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Did I understand the Prime Minister to say that the report is now being published so that copies may be available to members?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said I thought it would be possible to get the report printed at once, and I shall seek to have that done so that hon. members may have it.

OIL

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): In connection with the agreement entered into at Washington, between Great Britain and the United States in reference to oil, is Canada a party to that agreement, and is there to be a restriction or an increase in production of oil in Canada?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Canada is familiar in a general way with the terms of the agreement. Canada is not a party to the agreement, but the agreement will have no effect on the production of oil in Canada, either in there being more oil production or less oil production.

HEALTH INSURANCE

PROBABLE DATE OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the proposed national health insurance measure is awaiting consideration by a dominion-provincial conference, before being introduced in this house, will the Prime Minister inform the house when such conference will be held, or whether it has yet been arranged?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I regret that I am not in a position to tell the hon. member just when the conference will be held. There are many circumstances to be taken into account in connection with the arrangement of the time.

AIR RAID PRECAUTIONS

QUESTION AS TO DISBANDING OR MAINTENANCE OF ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. Since the danger of invasion has now passed, will the minister tell the house whether he has disbanded the A.R.P. organization and stopped all expenditures in connection therewith?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): In the first place, my hon. friend bases his question upon an allegation of fact, which is contrary to the rules of the house, and is of somewhat doubtful purport. In the second place, it is not the intention, so long as there is any possibility of insecurity in Canada, to disband the civil defence organization.

INCOME TAX

POSSIBILITY OF EXEMPTING MERCHANT SEAMEN FROM OPERATION OF ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question. I was surprised to read this morning an article in which it is stated that merchant seamen who are on active service are not exempt from income tax. Will the Minister of Finance inform the house whether it is the intention of the government to give relief to merchant seamen in connection with income tax?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The question, I suggest, is not in order. The matter has been discussed repeatedly in this house, both last year and this year, and the policy of the government is well known, I think.

GASOLINE

SUGGESTED EXEMPTION OF SOLDIERS' CARS FROM RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply a question. Will he consider extending the provisions of the gasoline regulation, which applies to war workers using cars, to soldiers who have cars and who use them going to and from camps? Outside the camps, coming along the road, they pick up privates and give them a lift into the city. I see no reason why the provision should not be extended to include soldiers as well as war workers.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I shall be glad to bring to the attention of the oil controller the suggestion which my hon. friend has made.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not see why soldiers' cars should be discriminated against.

WAR SERVICE GRATUITIES

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES ACTIVE SERVICE PERSONNEL—PAYMENTS ON RETIREMENT OR DISCHARGE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That in order to recognize the service of members of His Majesty's forces who have served on active service during the present war and to assist them in their reestablishment having regard to the length, sphere and terms of their service, it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide:

1. That to every member of the naval, military or air forces in Canada, who, during the war which commenced on the tenth day of September, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-nine, has enlisted for general service in such forces or who, pursuant to the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, may have been at any time obligated to serve without territorial limitation, or who has served in the Aleutian islands, there be paid, subsequent to the retirement or discharge from the forces of such member:

(a) the following as a war service gratuity in respect of the period during which such member was enlisted or obligated for general services or served in the Aleutian islands:

(i) for every 30 days of service in the western hemisphere, excluding the Aleutian islands, $7.50;

(ii) for every 30 days of service overseas, or in the Aleutian islands, $15;

(b) for each six months of service overseas, or in the Aleutian islands—7 days' pay and allowances;

(c) subject to certain conditions, a re-establishment credit, to be available for specified rehabilitative purposes, equal to the total amount of the gratuity payable under clause (a) of this paragraph.

2. That a similar gratuity and credit be payable to persons domiciled in Canada on or after the tenth day of September, 1939, who subsequent to that date served on active service in any of the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty other than those raised in Canada who resume residence in Canada within one year of the date of retirement or discharge from any of such forces; subject to there being deducted from any such gratuity or grant any benefit of a similar nature which any such person has received or to which he is entitled from any government other than Canada in respect of his service.

3. That the said gratuity and credit shall not be payable to any person who has been retired or discharged from the forces by reason of misconduct.

4. That payment of the said war services gratuity may be made under certain conditions to or on behalf of the dependents of members of the forces who have died either prior to or subsequent to retirement or discharge from the forces before receiving such gratuity in whole or in part.

5. That the said gratuity and credit shall not be subject to attachment, levy, seizure or assignment, or to taxation.

6. That the amounts required under the said measure be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

7. That the expenses necessary for the administration of the proposed measure be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for such purpose.

8. That the governor in council may make regulations governing all matters relating to the payment of gratuities or the making of re-establishment credits available and the evidence to be required in support of applications therefor, to prescribe penalities for breaches of the said regulations and generally to give effect to carry out the objects of the measure.

He said: The proposed resolution implements the policy set forth in the speech from the throne, respecting war service gratuities and measures to supplement the existing rehabilitation programme. It is designed to give a token expression of the gratitude of our country, in so far as anything can begin to express the country's feelings, to all the men and women of Canada who in the present war have voluntarily offered their services at the risk of their lives. It is with a sense of deepest obligation to the fighting forces of Canada that, on behalf of the administration, I beg leave to introduce the resolution.

Gratuities represent an attempt to recognize a service upon which no price can ever be placed. Those whose services are involved have not thought of their duty as something which would entail a monetary reward, but as I shall seek to explain, the proposed war service gratuities will be both an acknowledgment and an encouragement: an acknowledgment of burdens borne and sacrifices endured; and an encouragement to the men and women who, having voluntarily given their services, have survived the vicissitudes of this the most terrible of wars in the world's history and may soon wish to resume those civilian occupations which were laid aside by them by the onset of war, or to enter upon new callings as a means of providing a livelihood through the years to come.

I should like to make it clear that gratuities are not to be confused with rehabilitation and reestablishment, though they will contribute to these important ends. This measure is the crowning feature of a comprehensive rehabilitation programme which provides for several carefully considered forms of assistance. These include:

A. Maintenance allowances to veterans and their families in the form of

1. out of work benefits if employment is not immediately to be had, and unemployment insurance if employment is interrupted;
2. temporary incapacitation grants;
3. "awaiting returns" grants to farmers and fishermen;
4. vocational training grants;
5. university training grants;
6. post-graduate training grants;
7. unemployment insurance benefits.

B. In addition, under the Veteran's Land Act, assistance is given for land settlement and fishing.

C. Employment assistance is afforded through

1. compulsory reinstatement in previous employment;
2. preference in civil service competitions;
3. veterans' welfare officers.

D. The provisions of the National Housing Act are of benefit to veterans as well as civilians.

The provisions for pensions and medical treatment have been steadily broadened over the past five years. At this present session veterans' insurance legislation has been enacted.

The measure provides cash, and credit which may be converted into cash; for approved rehabilitative purposes. It is an advance over former gratuity and bonus legislation in that, while it gives to the veterans a nucleus of funds which they may use according to their own best judgment without official restraint, it also provides an equal amount to be used directly in rebabilitation. By way of illustration, I might mention: purchase of a home under the national housing act; purchase of a business; purchase of tools and implements of trade; any other purpose soundly recommended as practical and contributing to reestablishment may be approved by the minister.

I think it can be said, and with pride, that in so far as there can be such a thing as generosity towards those who have been prepared to risk their all in war, no country has been more generous in its recognition of the services of men and women in the armed forces than Canada has been. The rehabilitation programme, set in motion in Canada while the war is still being fought, has been widely commended abroad; and some aspects of it have served as a model for certain of the allied powers. Beyond the question of acknowledgment altogether, there is the concern of the present administration that the already comprehensive provisions should be improved wherever possible. Only constant attention will ensure the sympathetic and efficient reestablishment of veterans in civil life.

Some of Canada's fighting men have been on active service for nearly five years. They deserve, as they will have, a first claim upon our resources for reestablishment. Throughout its various measures for reconstruction and social security, the government is seeking to ensure that there shall be for those who have thus served our country and the cause of world freedom abundant opportunity and security in body and mind.

This measure is the culmination of an earnest desire to provide for service men and women what we believe the nation will expect any government to provide. It is a rounding out of measures provided over nearly five years of war. In the many years I have been in parliament I can think of no measure which it has been my privilege to introduce which has afforded me as deep a feeling of pride and satisfaction to introduce as the present measure. It is one to which I believe the response of the parliament and people of Canada will be unanimous, whole-hearted and sincere.

I have already mentioned that the bill based on the resolution is the work of five departments, namely, the three defence departments, the finance department and the Department of Pensions and National Health. I should perhaps add the Department of External Affairs, as well. Explanation in detail will be given by the ministers of national defence and the Minister of Pensions and National Health.

The total cost of the gratuities and reestablishment credits is very difficult to estimate. Assuming that the service of the present members of the armed forces is extended to March 31, 1945, gratuities in an amount of something over $400,000,000 would be payable. I wish to pause here to say that by assuming that the services of the present members of the armed forces is extended to March 31, 1945, I do not wish to imply that the war will extent that long or that it may not extend considerably beyond that period. I only mention that date in order to enable hon. members to see the basis on which the estimate has been arrived at.

In estimating the cost of the reestablishment credits provided by this bill, which are in addition to the gratuities, it is necessary to take into account the present programme of benefits for discharged men under the Veterans' Land Act and under various orders in council providing for vocational training, university training and so forth.

The estimated amount of the reestablishment credits which will be set up under this bill for the benefit of discharged members of the forces will be approximately $350,000,000. Some veterans will, however, take up their credits, either in whole or in part, in benefits under the Veterans' Land Act or under various schemes of training. To the extent of these offsets, the $350,000,000 estimate which I have mentioned will be reduced.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I take it from the language used by the Prime Minister when he introduced the resolution that the ministers of other departments would be prepared to make further statements with respect to this programme. Whether these will be formal statements is something which the house must of course leave to them.

I have no desire at this stage to go into any of the details of the resolution, because it has been in our hands only a few minutes. Because of that I do not think hon. members are in a position at this stage to make other than general observations. When the resolution reaches the committee stage we shall have an opportunity to ascertain the true picture and to learn the details of the proposal and the methods by which this laudable object which the government has in mind will be attained.

I wish to say that it can be echoed and reechoed that whatever material or financial compensation we give to the men and women in the armed forces we cannot fully discharge the obligation that rests upon this parliament, this government and the country. This measure I am sure is one of the items of legislation which will find a favourable response not only in the purses and in the minds of the people of Canada but in their hearts as well. The sacrifices that men and women make in their service on the fighting fronts cannot be measured by the yardsticks ordinarily employed.

In addition to making sure that our men and women are given a hearty welcome when they come back, the question of jobs, the question of the rehabilitation programme, the question of cash gratuities such as are suggested here, and the rehabilitation credits, are the least that we as a country must provide at this time.

Hon. members will recall that during past sessions while the war has been in progress and before I became leader of the opposition in the house I suggested that from the beginning of the war there should be set aside a nest egg to be put beside the service pay and allowances of the men in the armed forces so that at the end of hostilities they would have something that they could call their own, something on which they could lay their hands that would be more tangible than educational advantages and many of the other things that go toward helping the men when they come back. It is very important to them. If that suggestion had been carried out they would be assured of some cash in their hands to do the things that they will find it necessary to do when they come back.

Then there is this other thought. While these men and women have been away, opportunity has been afforded to the civilian section of our population to put away something for a rainy day through the medium of victory bonds and the high level of our national income. That has not been possible for the men and women in the armed forces. A measure such as this, which envisages the placing of cash in the hands of men and women when they come back, will be a step forward in equalizing the positions of the men and women in the armed forces and the civilian population. Actually there can never be an equalization of their positions, but this, I say, is a step in that direction. The men and women in the forces will at least feel that as a nation we are trying to take up the slack that they lost in the opportunity for earning which might have been theirs had they stayed at home. Because they made it possible for those who remained here to live in security and safety, let us by this measure try to do something by way of compensation for them. Let us try to equalize their financial position, although actually we cannot equalize it no matter what we give them in dollars and cents. I am confident that the resolution will have the general support of the members of the house.

Of course close study will have to be given to the details of the measure, but from the broad general point of view of helping these men with cash gratuities it will be only the question of the distance and the degree to which the government will go that may bring out any issue as far as members of parliament are concerned. We may find that the government have not gone far enough. We may find that by certain changes in the bill, when it is brought down, we may be able to do something even better in behalf of these men than is called for in this measure. But this will be a signal occasion, I think, and one time when this House of Commons will try to do its best, each member in his own way and in his own right, to see that this measure does what is proper, not just in relation to what this nation can afford but in relation to what these people deserve when they come back. I believe that must be the sole consideration.

During the difficult period of stress and strain of this war, particularly when this nation, the empire and the united nations were in such danger, there was not a member of this house or a citizen of Canada who would not have been willing to throw aside every bit of his material resources, every hope for the future, every business possibility, in order that these men who were serving in the areas of danger in our behalf should have everything they required and more. So that while in connection with other legislation we may have to apply other yardsticks it seems to me that the true yardstick by which we must measure this legislation is what these men and women require and deserve when they return. When we have established that, we will find the money; we will find the materials and the resources, or we shall have failed to live up to the pledges we have made and the requirements of the time in which we live.

This is our first obligation. It is too bad that it has come before us at this late stage of the session, but it remains our first duty. I hope hon. members will pardon me if on an occasion like this my emotions are perhaps more conspicuous than they might be. Looking back over the period between the last war and this war we realize that as a nation we cannot afford to have a single man or woman return to civil life in Canada dissatisfied with what we are prepared to do for those who have fought for us. It seems to me that is a cardinal principle, not only so that we may play fair with them but that we may have a future of which Canada can be proud. It seems to me this will be of major significance to our future, because we shall only have a Canada that is worth while if we have done our duty to the men and women who have made it possible for Canada to survive.

I want to close by repeating, with all the emphasis and conviction I can possibly summon, what I have said before in this house. I am quite sure most of us feel that during this war-time period we civilians have done little, no matter what may have been our station in life. It is all very well for people to say that the responsibilities of civilian life have been heavy. Of course there have been great responsibilities, but they have been responsibilities without corresponding dangers. I think I can speak for every member of this house when I say we realize that we have done little while they have done so much. That fact, I think, will prompt the House of Commons to support this measure, not because we are satisfied that it has gone as far as it should but because we believe it is a step in the direction of discharging an obligation which is greater and more important than any other obligation resting upon the citizens of Canada to-day. Let us see that when parliament adjourns we shall be able to look back upon this session, whatever may have been its other achievements, and say that at least we, as citizens of Canada and representing other citizens of this dominion, have not hesitated to go as far as possible to meet the demands of this moment, to recognize the sacrifices that have been made by others in order that we might live and progress and still have a worthwhile Canada for ourselves and our children in the days to come.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I think we can all agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) that the house will give unanimous approval to this measure. As has been suggested, it is something that should be done, and I am glad the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has brought this measure before the house instead of adopting it by order in council. I believe this is the proper thing to do, and I believe it is also the courteous thing to do because it gives every hon. member of this house an opportunity of sharing in what is intended to be a tribute to the men and women who have served at great cost but which still must necessarily fall short of adequate recognition. I want to say, however, that while we are doing this we should not forget that it will only tide them over temporarily; that it is our duty as a parliament to see to it that conditions in this country are such that after this amount has been expended, or the other gratuities have been used up, men and women will have the opportunity to earn a decent living. That is the real obligation we owe to the men who have fought to preserve the democratic way of life in our own country.

I am not going to say very much more. The bill is not before us; this resolution foreshadows it. There is one omission, however, to which I should like to draw attention at this stage, in case it can be rectified before the bill is discussed. I notice that Canadian nationals who resume their residence in Canada after having served in the armed forces of Britain will be entitled to these benefits. That is good. But there is one group of men who I think deserve well at the hands of this country, and who are not included unde this legislation. I refer to the merchant seamen, who again and again have undertaken risks that are equivalent to those which have been undertaken so often by the men in the Royal Navy and on the field of battle; and those risks have been continuous. I suggest to the government that before this bill is discussed some further consideration be given that point. There are too, of course, the men in the ferry command, who are excluded from a great deal of our wartime legislation. The ferry command is a small group, and the merchant seamen as far as Canada is concerned is not a very large group. I think they should be given some consideration. May I say to the house without emotion and in the coolest of words I can muster that I think every individual in this country will support the government wholeheartedly in this rehabilitation measure.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words regarding this particular resolution, coming as I do from a district which in the last war sent 55,000 soldiers overseas and which in this war has the largest representation of any city and county in Canada. During this session we have been dealing largely with material things. We passed a billion dollars for certain agencies. Only the other day, after all these years, we provided a small gratuity for the Fenian raid veterans. The men who came back from the Fenian raid and northwest rebellion were given a little grant of land which many of them never saw. Then we tried to take care of those who went overseas in the last war. When you consider the three sections of this resolution you cannot help thinking by way of comparison, of what has been provided for family allowances. All that a man can get under subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c) is $540 for three years' service. What is that as a gratuity to a soldier who has served in Sicily and Italy and Normandy under the intolerable conditions that exist, under what was simply a hell on earth?

I am disappointed in the amounts provided by this resolution. For the past few weeks we have been dealing with material things in many bills involving millions. I have been visiting the homes of many people who have lost their loved ones in this war. I represent, in part of my constituency, a poor man's district. Many of these men served in the Fenian raid, others have belonged to the militia down through the years, and their sons and grandchildren are now serving overseas.

Why should not this gratuity be large enough to put these people in the position they were in before the war? That should be the principle governing the payment of gratuities. They should be put back in civil life to a position where they can make a success of life and be able to send their children to high school. Just recently I received a letter from a soldier in Normandy who has since been killed in action. He told me that many of the young men overseas never expect to see their families again.

I have seen many of them go overseas and many do not return. This young soldier quoted what Saint Paul wrote from Rome in II Timothy as he was about to be brought before Nero a second time. Those were very troublesome times in the history of the Roman empire. Saint Paul wrote to Timothy:

> Thou therefore endure hardships as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.
> No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life: that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier.

This country did not have to choose these men. Many of these soldiers went with the first and other divisions as volunteers; in fact nearly all were volunteers. Is this all we have to offer them when they come home for what they went through?

I notice that this is a different scale from the one we used when we were dealing with war workers, and I wish to pay a tribute to what all war workers have done. At the same time a soldier cannot even get gasoline for his car when you see all these young people going home from camp over the week-end. Some of them will be killed before the war is over.

In my opinion these gratuities do not go far enough, they do not provide sufficient for reestablishment. They are much less than the gratuities provided in the civil estimates. Nothing has been done for the parents of those boys who have suffered the extreme barbarism of the axis powers, the prisoners of war who have been shot. We should pay the parents of these boys a gratuity of $5,000 or $10,000 for the brutalities that have been practised on their boys and then collect from Japan and Italy and Germany in reparations at the conclusion of the war.

There is no provision in this resolution for the young people who rushed to the colours in the early days of the war, who went over to join the Royal Air Force and all that kind of thing. They, and all Canadians in the imperials, should be included. Even the maximum amount that would be paid under sections (a), (b) and (c) will not exceed the sums that some of our soldiers' families have been paying in interest to shark loan companies at the rate of two and a half per cent per month. These families have had to give chattel mortgages and bills of sale on all they possess.

[Mr. Church.]

With these gratuities many of these soldiers when they come home will not be able to clothe themselves and send their children to high school. I started with the school board and I have been intimately in touch with the secondary school system since that time. I have been talking to high school principals and soldier families about this thing. One of them commanded one of the most distinguished regiments that went from the Toronto district in the last war and he is now the principal of the largest collegiate in Toronto. I was talking to him about it the other day and he told me that if something more is not done by way of gratuity than was done in the last war some of the youth of the schools whose parents were in the forces might not be able to attend secondary schools but would have to go to work.

I think some of the soldier widows of this war should be given homes which are to be provided by the Minister of Finance in addition to the total of this gratuity. I realize the government have a difficult problem on their hands and I believe in many ways they have done the best they can under the circumstances. I do not believe that these small allowances will commend themselves to the wisdom and judgment of the country especially when the people are expecting us to do our duty at a time like this.

I am disappointed in the resolution because it does not go far enough. It does not provide for a proper system of housing and for a high cost of living bonus to be paid to all dependents of soldiers and adjusted from time to time to include better allowances for their children and protection from unemployment after the war. That is what is covered by a resolution of mine that has been on the order paper since the war started. There should be some provision for a moratorium from foreclosure and eviction as well as more adequate and improved housing for soldiers and their families at low cost. This is only a start and not at all what I had hoped for. It is only pin money in any event.

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, as I read the resolution it applies to all members of His Majesty's forces and makes no distinction between men and women, and so I take it for granted that women are included at the same rates as the men, and I express my deep appreciation of that. I think it is only fair and just that the women should be given this gratuity at the same rates as the men if they have given similar service.

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Of course not many women will be on active service overseas, and there is a difference between those in Canada and those on overseas service. The women have been put on the same basis as the men for educational and other grants, and now again in connection with this gratuity. The hon. member who just took his seat (Mr. Church) did not mention that a number of benefits have already been established for those who have been engaged in this war. This gratuity will go a long way towards helping some of those in the armed forces provide themselves with a house under the provisions of the new housing legislation. I express my very warm appreciation of this measure. We can consider it in detail when it comes before the committee, but it looks now as if there is something here that women will be glad to see, in that they are being treated on the same basis as the men for this gratuity.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, just one word on the resolution. I think we should commend the principle behind it, but it occurred to me as the discussion proceeded that one form of service that has been rendered our country and which we should recognize has not been recognized in the bill. I refer to those who will not come back to receive any gratuity or token of our appreciation, to those who have paid the supreme sacrifice. I believe there are many cases right now, and there will be more, where the boy who has paid the supreme sacrifice has left dependents at home who I think should benefit from this gratuity as well as those who are more fortunate and come back. I do trust that the government will see to it that that gratuity shall go to the dependents of those boys who have paid the supreme sacrifice in this war.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend look at section 4?

Mr. BOUCHER: I hope that will be done. I feel that we should have given more consideration to our soldiers in the family allowance scheme. Those benefits should have gone almost entirely to our soldiers and their families. I hope the government will consider this suggestion.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, section 1 (b) says:

> for each six months of service overseas, or in the Aleutian islands.

I would ask the minister whether Canadian forces were engaged in the Aleutian islands for a full six months period, and if not will the gratuity be adjusted proportionately? I think it should read: "for each six months of service or portion thereof".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We can answer questions better when we get into committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to have some information as to the various categories of our soldiers, those under the N.R.M.A., for instance, and others in branches of the army, and how they will be affected by these provisions.

Mr. RALSTON: The bill will apply first to a man who has enlisted, whether he is in Canada or overseas.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who is a volunteer.

Mr. RALSTON: A volunteer. "Enlistment" is the word we use with respect to the volunteer, and "enrolment" with regard to the N.R.M.A. man. The word "enrolment" is not used in the bill. As I said, it applies first to men who have enlisted, whether they are in Canada or overseas, and different rates apply, as the resolution indicates, depending on where service may have been rendered. It applies also to men who have been obligated for service anywhere under N.R.M.A.; that is to say, if action is taken by order in council to make men available for service without territorial limitation, the gratuity applies to these men.

Mr. GRAYDON: Without the order in council they would not come under it?

Mr. RALSTON: Not until they are obligated under the order in council.

Mr. GRAYDON: Except those who have seen service in the Aleutian islands.

Mr. RALSTON: I am going to refer to that. It applies to men who have been obligated by order in council for service without territorial limitation, and different rates apply.

Mr. GRAYDON: Suppose within a few weeks of the end of the war an N.R.M.A. man decides to go active; would he be entitled to the gratuity?

Mr. RALSTON: He would get his gratuity for the time that he was an enlisted man.

Mr. GRAYDON: But not for the time he was under the N.R.M.A.?

Mr. RALSTON: That is right, and if an order in council were passed within one week of the end of the war, the same thing would apply. It is only after a man is obligated either by enlistment or under N.R.M.A. to serve without territorial limitation that he is entitled to the gratuity.

Mr. GRAYDON: It only covers the period of universal service?

Mr. RALSTON: That is right. It does not apply to men unless or until they have enlisted for general service or the area of their service has been extended to include universal service, to use my hon. friend's expression.

Next it includes those who have served in the offensive operation in the Aleutian islands. In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Yorkton, assuming that the service in the Aleutian islands did not last for six months would the gratuity be proportionate to the length of service there, the Minister of Justice has just advised me that in the draft bill the gratuity does apply proportionately.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Every woman in the service has enlisted. They are all volunteers. Is that not right?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Then they would come under this as volunteers.

Mr. GREEN: Is the gratuity payable to men who have already been discharged?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: In other words, the provisions of the bill will be retroactive?

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: Then there seems to be no mention at all of the men who are serving in the merchant navy, or in the corps of fire fighters, or in the auxiliary services such as the Legion, the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army and the Y.M.C.A. Is it the intention that they should be entitled to the gratuity? I think these groups have not been treated fairly throughout, and I would urge upon the government that provision be made to pay them the gratuity.

One other question, which has to do with clothing allowance. As the Minister of National Defence knows, there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction over the smallness of the clothing allowance. I should like to know whether there is any intention of increasing that allowance to a reasonable amount, or whether this gratuity is to be taken as covering that expense also.

Mr. RALSTON: In connection with a short statement which I intended to make with respect to the bill, I had it in mind to mention the matter of clothing allowance, on behalf of my colleagues and myself of the defence services. The matter has been considered, and what is proposed to be done is to amend the regulations by increasing the clothing allowance to make it an allowance towards clothing of $100 flat for all ranks, that is including the officers. May I add that that is arrived at, not by any meticulous computation of the cost of a collar or a shirt or a pair of socks or boots or an overcoat or things like that, because some people require more and some require less. It is felt that the best that can be done is to arrive at what appears to be a substantial—a very substantial—contribution towards outfitting, and leave it to the individual to decide whether to spend more or less than that.

Mr. GREEN: I do not think anybody will contend that $100 will enable a man going out of the forces to equip himself with clothing for civilian life. I doubt if any hon. member will contend that; and my submission throughout has been that men should be entitled to enough to enable them to go out and equip themselves with clothing. I do not understand why the government has not made that provision.

Mr. RALSTON: I made this announcement at my hon. friend's suggestion. We are not on the bill, and I suggest that if we want to discuss clothing allowance I should be glad to do it at any appropriate time. But is this really the time to discuss the merits or demerits of the proposal? I made an announcement which I thought would be regarded as a pretty satisfactory solution of this matter. It compares with a grant of $35 in the last war, when money would not buy as much as it will buy in this war. There was an increase to $65 some time ago, and it will be further increased to $100. That is considerably ahead of, at least, Australia and New Zealand, although I am not saying that we should set them up as a yardstick.

Mr. GREEN: They do not have to buy overcoats over there.

Mr. RALSTON: At the same time, we do have some regard to what other people are doing.

As I said a minute ago, we are not attempting to take a man who has not a stitch of clothes—if you can imagine a man of that kind—and fit him out from head to toe; nor are we taking into consideration personal desires or preferences or degrees of comfort or of style that a man wants. We are saying, "There is $100 on account of an outfit; you do anything you like with it." We are not asking him to buy clothes, and my hon. friend knows, as most other hon. members know, that a good many men will not use the money to buy clothes, because many of them—and here I am speaking from some personal experience and knowledge—have their civilian clothing yet. I do not think it can be assumed that a man will have no civilian clothing when he comes back. I hope that with this explanation we can leave the clothing grant at the present time—if my hon. friend wants to discuss it later we can do so—so that we may get on with the resolution.

Mr. GREEN: Will the difference be paid to the men who have already been discharged and have received only the smaller amount?

Mr. RALSTON: No, there has been no provision made for that. As my hon. friend knows, the $65 was not made retroactive—or rather it was made retroactive, I believe, to November or some such time, but not to the beginning of the war.

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not deal with my other question, with regard to the merchant navy, the fire fighters and the men of the auxiliary services.

Mr. RALSTON: As my hon. friend sees, they have not been included in this bill. The persons with whom we have been dealing are the members of the armed forces; that is what this bill was intended to cover. I heard what my hon. friend said, and the same question has been raised by others. But these services, as my hon. friend sees, are not included in the resolution.

Mr. GREEN: Will the government give consideration to providing for these men?

Mr. RALSTON: I am not in a position at the moment to speak on that point.

Mr. GREEN: I would point out to the minister that in Normandy to-day, and in Italy, the men of the auxiliary services and, I believe, the fire fighters, are serving with the troops.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And some of them have been killed.

Mr. GREEN: They should be treated in the same way as the troops. As to the merchant navy, we all know what they have done in the war. Probably the war would have been lost but for their services. I suggest that some provision should be made for them, if not in this bill, perhaps by order in council, because that is the way in which provision has hitherto been made for them.

Paragraph 4 of the resolution says:

4. That payment of the said war services gratuity may be made under certain conditions to or on behalf of the dependents of members of the forces who have died either prior to or subsequent to retirement or discharge from the forces before receiving such gratuity in whole or in part.

Could we have some idea what is meant by that paragraph? Is it only to cover the cost where a man dies after being discharged and before actually getting the money, or are there other types of cases which are to be covered?

Mr. RALSTON: It would be better, I think, if the committee saw the bill. If I remember correctly, the only condition in this connection which is provided for in the bill is that the amount may be paid to someone other than a dependent to be administered for the benefit of the dependent in certain cases. I think that is the only condition.

Mr. GREEN: It really is not very extensive.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. GREEN: It does not cover very many cases.

Mr. RALSTON: It is a procedural situation which does arise sometimes when it is thought best to make payments to someone for a dependent.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member for Vancouver South is quite right in deprecating the fact that the merchant navy, the fire fighters and the auxiliary services are left out of this. I cannot understand why a man coming back from the fire fighters' organization, for example, to practically a strange country, should not be treated exactly as one of the service personnel. He has all the problems of rehabilitating himself, yet he is without the protection of the legislation which we are providing. As to the merchant service, I never could understand the attitude of completely ignoring them. In my opinion the merchant navy has made the greatest contribution to this war of any service, either on land or in the air, yet they are completely left out of everything. Your air force, your army, and the rest of them would have starved to death in Britain had it not been for the merchant navy.

Mr. RALSTON: Everybody would have lost the war if it had not been for somebody else—in every case.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to argue that with the minister, but that is a plain statement of fact. They have all made their contribution in their own field; there is no doubt about that. You could not have landed the army or the air force in Britain or Italy or in France without the services of the merchant navy, because they would have starved to death otherwise. The greatest contribution has undoubtedly been made on the water. However, I will not argue about that. Evidently the government has made up its mind on the question. I rise to ask the minister one question; others have anticipated other questions I might have put. Paragraph 1 (c) of the resolution reads: "subject to certain conditions, a reestablishment credit, to be available for specified rehabilitative purposes, equal to the total amount of the gratuity payable under clause (a) of this paragraph." I have received many letters from men in the service who have mortgages on their homes. They are finding it difficult to make the payments. When they come home, can this gratuity be used for that purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There are two distinct portions of the resolution, one having to do with cash and the other with credit. This is intended as far as possible to remove the inequality existing at the present time. We have already made provision under the reestablishment order P.C. 7633 in particular, and in connection with the Veterans' Land Act, for benefits for ex-servicemen, first of all on the land, secondly on small holdings, and thirdly in fisheries. Then there are these specific benefits indicated in P.C. 7633. Men who come back and are not able to avail themselves of the specific benefits already provided by this parliament will find ten different headings, which will be analysed in the bill, giving them an opportunity of accepting certain reestablishment benefits such as paying for a home, paying for furniture, paying a part of the premium on returned soldiers' insurance, and various other benefits which are all specified. It is intended to be a constructive provision for the returned fighting men as well as for the nation.

Mr. GILLIS: This is applicable only to those who are not being helped by some other method?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not necessarily at all. The two might in certain cases be supplementary one to the other.

Mr. BOUCHER: I have in mind individual Canadians, men of Canadian nationality who, not having been able for various reasons to join the Royal Canadian Air Force, paid their own way over and joined the Royal Air Force or the Air Transport Auxiliary, or entered some branch of the army, not Canadian. As Canadians, however, they either proudly made the supreme sacrifice or came back disabled after serving in the British army or any of the allied armies. Is there any provision for such men?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In paragraph 2 of the resolution.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is this simply an amount which they can borrow with interest?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No. This is an amount that is placed to their credit. If they are sick or if they choose to do so they can take advantage of one of about ten different benefits in regard to reestablishment. This amount is there for that purpose, over a number of years if necessary.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Repayable?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is a straight gift. It is a reestablishment grant.

Mr. STIRLING: Hon. members have very properly lauded the service of the men engaged in the merchant marine, and it seems to me a notable circumstance that in this case they are omitted. I agree with the Minister of National Defence that it is easy to argue that this set of people could not have done so and so without the help of that other set of people; but, as he has also said, they have all worked as a team. If they have worked as a team, then under this legislation certain members of the team are receiving certain grants which others are not. I think arrangements should be made either in this or in some other measure to prove that the services of merchant seamen, without which the troops could not have reached France on two occasions, should be recognized. Will the minister explain paragraph 1 (a). It says "for every thirty days of service in the western hemisphere." Does this apply to enlisted men or women engaged in service between the Atlantic and the Pacific? To whom does it refer—everyone in the active army?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend speaks of the active army. That term has been used very loosely by the public and many people have the impression that the active army means solely volunteers. Everybody who is full time in the Canadian army is in the active army, so that in that sense (a) does not apply to everyone in the active army. I may say that (a) (ii) applies to persons mentioned in the first part of the paragraph, those who have enlisted for general service in such forces or who, pursuant to the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, may have been at any time obligated to serve without territorial limitations, and it applies, to use the phrase of the leader of the opposition, only to those who have enlisted or obligated themselves for universal service, and for the time only for which they enlisted or were obligated for universal service and served in the western hemisphere or the Aleutian islands. That is the application of (a) (ii).

Mr. STIRLING: Let us leave out the application of the National Resources Mobilization Act and consider only those who are enlisted in the Canadian Army. It leaves out the reserve army and the enrolled people. Do all the rest of them come in under this? Those who belong to units or batteries or service units which subsequently perhaps have gone overseas or perhaps have not gone overseas—does it cover all of them?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. But my hon. friend must be careful. He says "which subsequently have gone overseas."

Mr. STIRLING: They come into another category.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; that is it. They come in under (i). The time spent by them in Canada comes under (i) and the time spent by them overseas comes under (ii). The scheme of the last war was not this scheme. Under the scheme of the last war, if a man had been overseas any time at all he became tagged as overseas and got the overseas rate based on the whole period of service, with a limitation of three years. This is different in that it actually gives a man credit for service in Canada at a certain rate and service overseas at a certain rate It is a double rate overseas plus something else—that is, plus seven days pay and allowances for six months of service overseas or in the Aleutian islands, and that is pay of rank. This is also in addition to the present rehabilitation grant which is paid to every man who is discharged and which consists of one month's pay and allowances of rank.

Mr. ROSE: This is over and above that.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Will that be continued?

Mr. RALSTON: That will be continued, and it is over and above the clothing allowance I have mentioned.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: This includes the veterans guard?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: In connection with paragraph 1, subparagraph (c), would it not have been fairer if that reestablishment credit had been made equal to the total of the amounts set out in subparagraphs (a) and (b)? I note that it applies only to the amount set out in (a). Would the minister explain why a person cannot get up to the total of both (a) and (b)?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): For the reason that (b) is not, strictly speaking, a gratuity at all. It is based upon service according to pay and allowances; but the amount of the credit is an exact equivalent of the gratuity as such. Then you must add the seven days, which amounts to about $50,000,000 based upon the pay and allowances of those who have served.

Mr. GREEN: A man who served overseas should be entitled to get the full amount as a reestablishment credit.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is. The other is a special category.

Mr. GREEN: The total of (a) and (b).

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is based on the months of service.

Mr. RALSTON: It is based entirely on the months of service.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The gratuity is based on the months of service.

Mr. GREEN: Is the gratuity payable in cash on discharge, or will it be paid at so much a month?

Mr. RALSTON: The gratuity is payable in instalments monthly at the rate of pay and allowances which the man was receiving at the date of his discharge.

Mr. GREEN: It is not to be paid in a lump sum?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any power taken to pay it in a lump sum?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not remember that there is.

Mr. GREEN: Is paragraph 2 wide enough to cover the case of the young Canadian who enlisted in the Royal Air Force in 1937 or 1938? Many young Canadians did that and took part in the battle of Britain. I do not believe this paragraph is wide enough to cover them. We had that same condition to meet when we were amending the Pension Act of 1941, and we put in a special clause to take care of those very men who had gone over before there was any sign of the war. I notice the language of the paragraph is as follows: ". . . persons domiciled in Canada on or after September 10, 1939." I suggest that is not wide enough to cover these young men who went to the Royal Air Force.

Mr. RALSTON: I am taking a note of that.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister think that is the case?

Mr. RALSTON: If he is still over there, obviously he is not domiciled in Canada.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Why not? He may be over there and still be domiciled in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, that is right. It depends, of course, on his intention. That is the test of domicile. It may be that he was domiciled in Canada. As a matter of fact I think the phrasing is taken from the order in council of 1918, but I shall look into that and see.

Mr. GREEN: I think it should be cnecked up.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to merchant seamen and the auxiliary services and the fire fighters, as I said before, this measure is intended to be a special measure for members of the armed forces. I am not sure whether in the regulations of at least the Department of National Defence the auxiliary service officers might not be included. My hon. friend shakes his head. I have in mind a situation which came up the other day which makes me think they might be included. But obviously merchant seamen are not included. Obviously fire fighters are not included. Another group that my hon. friend has not mentioned is the pilots of the ferry command. I think you could extend the list not ad infinitum but to a considerable distance to show, to use my hon. friend's reference to my expression, that everybody is a member of the team somewhere; but there is some place where you have to say: "Yes, you are a member of the team, but you are doing something else." Munition workers in Canada are members of the team, but they are not included in this bill. Therefore it depends altogether on the importance and risk and so on of the work that is being done. I yield to no one in my admiration of the work of the merchant seamen and of other classes as well. As I said before, I am not in a position to say that the government will give consideration to putting it in this bill. I should not think that would be the proper place for any provision to be made for them. The Prime Minister is carrying the bill and I am speaking in his presence. Certainly we shall discuss the matter of inclusion to see whether some separate provision could be made for others in these classes.

Mr. BOUCHER: I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South with respect to paragraph 2. I can appreciate the fact that domicile means much more than residence. At the same time the word "domicile" does not seem a clear enough distinction between Canadian citizens who may not have been domiciled in Canada on that particular date and may not have been resident in Canada, and others. As I read the paragraph it may throw those benefits open to persons who were not Canadian citizens although they may be domiciled in Canada. I believe the word "domicile" should be checked very carefully to see that it does bring in the right class of people.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think it is intended to limit it to Canadian citizens who were resident in Canada on September 10, 1939.

Mr. STIRLING: What will be the position of members of the three services whose service has been partly on this side and partly on the other? A sailor is a typical example. A sailor is afloat at times and at shore establishments at other times. Is he covered for the whole time of his service?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Perhaps I can illustrate the statements of my colleagues by taking a specific case. Take the case of a private soldier in the army who had one year's service in Canada and two years' service overseas. If that man had twelve months' service in Canada he would receive $7.50 a month, or $90. For the twenty-four months overseas at $15 a month he would receive $360. In other words the total gratuity payable to him immediately, or within a few months after discharge, would be $450.

Mr. STIRLING: Would he not come under subparagraph (b)?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): He would first come under subparagraph (a). Then of course in addition to that he would get seven days' pay and allowances for each six months overseas, which would give the private soldier another $77. In other words that man would have a total of $527, plus one month's rehabilitation grant, plus clothing allowance. In addition to that, to answer the hon. member for Yorkton, that man would be entitled to a rehabilitation credit of $450 over and above the amounts that I have mentioned. In other words he would be entitled to a credit equal to his cash gratuity, which credit he might use to make a deposit on a house, to pay insurance premiums, to buy furniture, to do any one of the various things mentioned by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. That is over and above the cash grant. That credit in itself is a straight grant without any interest, without any loan, without any repayment or anything else, but it must be used for certain specific purposes.

Mr. ROWE: If he were an officer it would be correspondingly higher?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No; it is a flat rate. Officers and men get the same gratuity. In the matter of the rehabilitation grants, they are based on pay and allowances and go, of course, according to rank.

Mr. STIRLING: That hardly answers my question with regard to the sailor who is sometimes afloat and sometimes at a shore establishment.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The same principle would apply, as I see it, though I should like to think that over a bit. Take the sailor who has served six months at Stadacona barracks at Halifax, and say a year and a half at sea. I would assume he would be credited with six months at the rate of $7.50 and eighteen months at the rate of $15.

Mr. STIRLING: And after that period suppose he is attached to a shore establishment for possibly a year?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Then he would go back to the $7.50 rate. These things would all show on his papers, and the matter could be calculated exactly.

Mr. LOCKHART: I should like to pursue the inquiry about the payment of this money, because there seems to be a good deal of confusion here. I understood the Minister of National Defence to state that this money would not be paid as a lump sum in any instance. How is a young man to be able to buy furniture or a home or anything else if that is the case? I know many of these people are just waiting to come home and get themselves set up.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend is under a misapprehension. What I said was that the cash gratuity, the basic gratuity, was payable in instalments. The reestablishment credit, which is equal to the basic gratuity, is there in a lump sum and can be drawn upon for any of the specified purposes in such sums and subject to such limitations as will be provided in the act. In connection with the reestablishment grant of one month's pay and allowances, the provision is that it shall be paid on the same basis as the pay and allowances the man was receiving at the time of discharge. This means that the credit is there and he can get that credit in the form of a cash grant, but he gets the gratuity in monthly instalments.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then from what the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services said, and using his figures, a man would get $450 as a credit which could be used for the purposes I have mentioned.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is right.

Mr. LOCKHART: But if he wanted to buy both furniture and a home he would have to wait for his gratuity, for a period of six months or so. He could not use both these amounts of money to establish a home and furnish it; he would have to wait for the gratuity.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, but the amount of the credit would be available to him immediately.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is the $450, but he must wait for the remainder.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The cash gratuity is paid in instalments.

Mr. HOMUTH: The navy minister gave the house the impression that these two sums were available, but actually they are not. The credit is available, and the rest of the money is paid in instalments. The man gets the credit and the instalments will be used to pay off the credits undoubtedly.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am sorry if I was not understood. Let me take again the case of a man with one year of service in Canada and two years of service overseas. His total gratuity is $450; that is cash which will be paid to him in monthly instalments. In addition he is entitled to a rehabilitation credit of $450 which he can use for certain designated purposes, and which as I understand it will be paid to him in a lump sum at any time within a certain period of years, I think three years or perhaps even up to ten years. Having been given his gratuity of $450; having obtained his pay and allowances for one month; having obtained his clothing allowance; having obtained his allowance of seven days' pay and allowances for every six months overseas—having obtained all that money within the first few months, he can come back any time within a certain number of years and get another $450 with which to buy furniture, pay insurance premiums, make the down payment on a home, buy tools or do various other things set out in the bill. That is the lump sum payment.

Mr. SENN: What check will be made to see whether this money is really used for the purpose stated? I understand that it can be used only for certain purposes, but what will be the result if the man uses it for something else?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The total amount is to his credit and must be used for one of these approved projects, which are all set out in the bill which will be introduced If the total amount of his credit is not used for one of these purposes, the rest of the money can be used for another of these ten schemes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The navy minister mentioned a man in barracks at Halifax, say, and a man who would be at sea. Would Newfoundland be considered at sea or in Canada under this legislation?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The man has been ashore in Newfoundland?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): If he were stationed ashore I think he would have to be paid at the rate of $7.50 per month.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then he would be considered to have been in Canada?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes; it would, be in the western hemisphere; and the measure provides that for every thirty days of service in the western hemisphere the gratuity shall be $7.50. I do not say that if a man happened to come in for two or three days, as they often do, while his ship is turning around, that would be worth bothering with; I am referring to the man who was permanently stationed there. He would get the $7.50 rate.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is the man in the barracks in Newfoundland?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, I think so.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then consider the man at sea. Would you count a man at sea as soon as he got on board his ship, whether or not he is in harbour?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I should like to read citation 439 of Beauchesne:

> The object of the resolution recommended by the crown is to give the house a first opportunity to discuss the advisability of making a certain expenditure. The details of the projected measure are not then disclosed and debate is confined to the resolution which should not be lengthy. . . .

Direct questions, I believe, should not be asked at this stage.

Mr. LOCKHART: Here we are in the dying days of the session and we are being choked off from asking questions.

The CHAIRMAN: Order; I hope the hon. gentleman will get the meaning of what I have just said. I am only citing the rule to the committee, and doing nothing else. I am not dictating or trying to choke off discussion. I am saying it is out of order to ask direct questions which could be more easily answered on the bill itself, when the ministers have their officials in front of them.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I was only trying to get it definite in my mind as to who were concerned in this measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The western hemisphere includes the continents of North and South America, the islands adjacent thereto, and the territorial waters thereof, including Newfoundland, Bermuda and the West Indies. It will be noted that Greenland, Iceland and the Aleutian islands are thus, for the purposes of this bill, considered to be overseas. That is quite clear, I think.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is all right. Now I want to find out about the man at sea. I understand the government considers a man at sea only when he is out of the harbour, or is a man at sea as soon as he is assigned a ship?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I would have to think that over. I have a note here, but I do not know that it is very clear. It states that duties performed outside the territorial waters of Canada, or in a seagoing ship of war, are held to be overseas. I would think that service in a harbour probably would not be classed as seagoing service.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then a man who was on a ship for a year might be classed as being at sea for only four or five months.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, I think that would be possible; I believe my hon. friend is right, though I am not sure.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister was going to tell us whether boys in the navy would count their time from the time they got on the ship and until they left or from the time the ship left the harbour.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Overseas service is defined as service involving duties to be performed outside the western hemisphere and includes service involving duties required to be performed outside of Canada and the United States of America and the territorial waters thereof in aircraft or anywhere in sea-going ships of war. If that man was on a sea-going ship of war he would be entitled to a gratuity on the higher scale. If he was on a ship in a harbour which was not a sea-going ship, he would receive a gratuity on the lower scale. That is my interpretation.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If he were on the triangular run from Halifax would he include all the time he was in port at Halifax?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): For only a day or two?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): A few days.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I would say he would be included.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Before the recess a question was raised with regard to air force men who left Canada in 1937 and 1938. I feel that the resolution as it now stands does not cover these men. Section 2 provides that gratuities shall be payable to persons domiciled in Canada. Anyone who left Canada in order to join the permanent force or the Royal Air Force I presume would have lost his domicile, it being a matter of intention. If he were joining only a volunteer force the situation would be different.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Those men who went over before the war enlisted under what were called short-term commissions, and they intended to come back to Canada. Speaking generally, I think they would retain their domicile.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I realize that those who took short-term enlistments or period enlistments would not lose their Canadian domicile, but I am thinking of those who joined permanent forces, whether the British regular army or the Royal Air Force, to make it a career. I believe they would lose their domicile and I suggest that consideration be given to that particular phase. This morning the Prime Minister stated that this measure was to be a tangible expression of gratitude by the Canadian people to those who have voluntarily served.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say, in so far as one can express gratitude for so great a service.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate that that was in his mind, as it is in mine. Some reference was made to the fact that this system is much more extensive and comprehensive than that in effect anywhere else. Will the minister tell us something of the system recently adopted in the United States of America with reference to mustering out pay? To what extent is this plan modelled on the legislation which became law in that country within the last few months?

Mr. RALSTON: What my hon. friend has said with regard to air force personnel will be taken into consideration.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wanted to cover the navy and the permanent army also.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the particulars of the mustering out provisions in the United States, but speaking roughly their mustering out pay varies from $100 to $300 depending on the length and sphere of service. These payments apply up to the rank of colonel; it is a flat rate, the same for everyone up to the rank of colonel.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have the act here, but I do not know whether it includes all the amendments.

Mr. RALSTON: As I remember it, the bill at first provided for payments from $100 to $500, and the maximum was reduced to $300.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The United States legislation is more generous as to short-term service, but not so generous as to long-term service.

Mr. RALSTON: There is a floor under it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is $300 for persons who have been on active service outside the United States for more than sixty days.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought the service had to be eighteen months.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is the act of 1944, and it provides that those who perform active service beyond the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska shall receive $300 if their service is for sixty days or more. If their service is within the confines of the continental limits of the United States and is sixty days or more, they receive $200. Anyone who has served less than sixty days receives $100. It is difficult, Mr. Chairman, to know the entire position without having the bill before us. I do not want to contravene any rule, but we are trying to get this through.

The CHAIRMAN: They are not my rules; they are the rules of parliament.

Mr. ROWE: Your interpretation.

The CHAIRMAN: I just enforce the rules.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I hope no harm will be done if we happen to contravene a rule, particularly when we are cooperating in order to have this matter brought before the house as quickly as possible.

Paragraph 4 of the resolution states that payment of a war services gratuity may be made under certain conditions, and some explanation of it was given this morning. However, I could not follow the minister exactly as to the conditions under which it would be payable. Where a soldier was killed on active service a year ago and his widow or other dependents are receiving a pension, will the gratuity be paid in addition to that pension?

Mr. RALSTON: That is so.

Mr. GREEN: Some mention has been made of men serving in the navy. What is to be the rule for the men who are flying in the western hemisphere? Under the income tax law a man who spends so many hours in the air, even though he is serving in the western hemisphere, is entitled to exemption just as though he were overseas. Are the men who are flying in Canada or in the territories adjacent to Canada to be treated as overseas or as men who are serving at home?

Mr. RALSTON: If the service involves duties required to be performed outside of Canada and the United States of America and the territorial waters thereof in aircraft, they would be regarded as overseas.

Mr. GREEN: That is, the men who are flying on the Pacific coast would be treated as though they were serving at home and would not be entitled to the $15 but will be paid at the rate of $7.50?

Mr. RALSTON: I said that if the service involves duties required to be performed outside of Canada and the United States of America and the territorial waters thereof—I am reading from the bill—they will be treated as overseas.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister amplify that statement? He knows about the men flying on patrol on the Pacific coast.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Does my hon. friend mean men flying out over the Pacific?

Mr. GREEN: Yes. Will they be treated as overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: If the service includes duties required to be performed outside of Canada and the United States of America and the territorial waters thereof.

Mr. GREEN: I am afraid that that language would not cover them. I suggest that the government give further consideration to treating all the men who are flying in the same way as the lads who are on service overseas.

Mr. RALSTON: All the men? Men flying in Canada?

Mr. GREEN: Yes. I have another question. Is this act to be administered by the Department of Veterans' Affairs or by the Department of National Defence?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask hon. members to adhere to my ruling that questions cannot be answered until the officials are here to assist the minister. We are on the resolution, not on the bill.

Mr. HOMUTH: Apropos of your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I understand that the idea of discussing a resolution in committee is that the views of the members may be expressed before the bill is introduced. The government may adopt some of the changes which may be proposed in the discussion, so that I think that we are in order in discussing the various provisions of the bill and asking for an explanation of the provisions.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I add a word, Mr. Chairman. This resolution comes into the house under different conditions from most resolutions. We have tried to facilitate the bringing in of the resolution. When a resolution is before the committee the broad principles upon which it is based are brought out, information is given in answer to questions, the discussion goes out to those affected by the proposed provisions of the measure, and their reactions come back to us in this house. In this case, sir, if you extend the latitude that is ordinarily given in discussion of a resolution it will, I am sure, meet the wishes of the house and of the country. This is one of the most important measures to come before the house, and I would not like to see the Chair put in the position of even appearing to prevent a full examination of the proposals of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe that the Chairman of the committee is simply seeking to draw the attention of the house to the rules. At the same time may I say that I agree with the leader of the opposition and others who have spoken as to the special circumstances of the moment, and I hope that the Chairman will give every reasonable latitude for discussion at this time. The Chairman is in a very difficult position. One day he is knocked about for having gone too far, and the next for not having gone far enough.

Mr. GREEN: I wonder if I might have an answer to my question as to which department is to administer this act. There are certain provisions, for example, the ones having to do with the reestablishment credit, which perhaps could best be administered by the new Department of Veterans' Affairs. Which department is to administer the act?

Mr. RALSTON: Under the bill the minister will be the Minister of Pensions and National Health or the Minister of Veterans' Affairs. It is quite possible and probable that the payment of the cash gratuities will be made by the service departments. That would probably be the most convenient method, because they have the pay accounts and know exactly the pay and allowances which would be payable on the day of discharge. But the long-term administration will be under the Department of Pensions and National Health or the Department of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. BOUCHER: There has been considerable discussion of paragraph 2 entitling persons domiciled in Canada on and after September 10, 1939, who subsequently go on active service, to the gratuity. In the Pension Act the yardstick is much more elastic as to domicile. I have not the act before me but my recollection is that the domicile required in Canada is a period of four years. I would suggest to the minister that in reconsidering this paragraph, which he has stated he will do, he consider the advantages of making the provision as to date of domicile much more elastic so that it would take in those who left Canada before the war, even though they joined the permanent forces of the United Kingdom. I think if we borrow the provision that is contained in the Pension Act, and which specifies a period of four years preceding the outbreak of war, it would facilitate matters. I recommend that thought to the minister before the bill is brought down.

Mr. RALSTON: I will take that suggestion into consideration, along with that of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. ISNOR: The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services will recall that in the assembling of convoys at Halifax and other ports, particularly during the period when the merchant marine were being outfitted with guns, a large number of gunners served on these merchant marine ships who were not in uniform but were certainly acting as gunners. Are they included in this bill?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): My hon. friend is referring to merchant mariners who are gunners?

Mr. ISNOR: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Under the bill as it now stands I think they would not be included. There are certain gunners, or were at any rate, on these merchant ships who belong to the naval service. I assume that they would come under the provisions of the resolution. But the others, being members of the merchant marine, would not seem to be covered by the resolution as it stands.

Mr. ISNOR: I have particularly in mind the gunner who belongs to the merchant marine and served in that capacity following the installation of guns on merchant ships. Such a man, while operating as a gunner, I would say certainly served as a civilian, a civilian gunner.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I doubt if that man, being a civilian member of the merchant marine, is covered by the resolution.

Mr. GRAYDON: There has been a good deal of discussion in the house from time to time, as the minister knows, with respect to the merchant marine. In the matter of the income tax, first of all, they have not been given, to my mind, plain ordinary justice. On the other hand the government has its own argument with respect to that, and evidently its decision cannot be changed. But here is a situation which I think we may properly discuss on the resolution, to give the government an opportunity to amend any bill which they have already drafted, and with a possibility of doing justice to these men in the merchant marine. I believe everybody in the house has practically the same point of view on this subject. An hon. member from the maritimes, when the position of these men as compared with those in the navy, especially during the height of the submarine menace, was discussed under the income tax resolutions, indicated that while the navy had at least a gun to shoot back with, the merchant marine simply had to take it, without proper defence. That struck me as being an impressive argument for comparable treatment. I believe the minister should give the assurance that before the bill is brought in consideration will be given to the case of the merchant seamen, or justice will not be done to a class of citizen that has done more and performed tasks under conditions of greater danger, than many who will receive the gratuity. That is no reflection upon those who will receive it. If those who not only individually but as a class, performing their duties under such dangerous conditions, are refused a gratuity, while those who are not subjected to equally dangerous combatant conditions are to receive it, the government will be open to criticism, which as opposition leader I have a duty to point out so that the government and parliament may avoid the occasion for it. There may be reasons why these things cannot always be done as those of us on the outside think they should be, but I believe the government will have to show good and sufficient reason for failing to make this provision if the public mind is to be content on that score.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will realize that there is some merit in giving separate and distinct recognition to the armed forces of Canada. That consideration was in the mind of members of the goverment when this bill was being framed. There was no intention of ignoring anyone; in fact it was recognized that, once the bill was introduced, the claims of others would be very strongly pressed, and the government felt that for that if for no other reason the bill should be confined to the armed forces.

What hon. gentlemen have said about the recognition which is given to others is something which the government would be only too ready to consider, and will be helped in its consideration by what has been said. What I wish to make clear is that there is no intention in this measure, by not mentioning merchant seamen, that they are necessarily to be merely ignored. In connection with the armed forces information is available in the departments to-day of the nature and extent of their services and the reason they should receive this and that, which has not been available to a corresponding degree in respect to the merchant seamen. It may be that a little time will be required to give to the case of merchant seamen the consideration which it should receive. I just want to make it clear to-day that the fact that they and other classes which have been alluded to as not being mentioned in this bill does not mean that they are being ignored. The government's desire has been to have this special recognition to the armed forces, with the knowledge that suggestions would be forthcoming as to further recognition which might have to be given.

May I mention also that the war is not over yet. We do not know how much longer it may last, and I would recall the fact that, even for the forces for whom we are making provision to-day, no provision was made for gratuities after the last war until some time after that war ended. So that there is ample time in which further to consider the many matters which have been mentioned this afternoon.

Mr. ROWE: I think that with the general principles of the resolution we are pretty much in agreement. But there appears to me, as regards paragraph 1, clause (c), room for some misunderstanding as to the principle of the resolution, in the reestablishment credit which is proposed to be available for rehabilitative purposes. I believe that before lunch some hon. members were under the impression that this money was to be a loan, to be repaid.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. ROWE: Then we are to understand that it is to be a straight gratuity?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A reestablishment benefit or credit.

Mr. ROWE: It is termed a credit. It seems to me that it would be clearer to term it what it is, a gratuity or a grant. It is a rehabilitative assistance, is it not? As such it leaves room for inequalities. If a returned man does not require the money for rehabilitative purposes or is not in a position to expend the money for such purposes, and secures a job, he is prevented from taking advantage of what in fact and in amount is equivalent to all his other grants, that is, to the total gratuity given under clause (a), subparagraphs (i) and (ii). In other words he might, as the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services said before lunch, receive $450 for three years of service, one year in Canada and two years overseas, and he is entitled to another $450 as a gratuity under this clause if, as and when he may desire or be in a position to provide the conditions necessary to receive it. But the conditions of this man are going to be varied; they may be such as will make it impossible for him to provide the conditions.

Mr. RALSTON: He has ten years.

Mr. ROWE: He has ten years to provide the conditions?

Mr. RALSTON: To draw down his credit. He can do it at any time in ten years—

Mr. ROWE: At any time in ten years?

Mr. RALSTON: He can take advantage of it.

Mr. ROWE: Of course that does clarify it to some extent. It seemed to me that a great opening would be left to inequalities. I thought it would be much simpler and of greater benefit to the man if it were included in clause 8, so that he would receive it all and would know what he was getting. I still think that an initial grant would be better than having it subdivided in the manner indicated.

Mr. CASSELMAN: If a man has been reestablished, having been overseas and returned to Canada, and his position is satisfactory to himself, does the fact that he has that position preclude him from getting this reestablishment grant?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No. May I indicate the various forms in which this credit can be used: the acquisition of a home under the National Housing Act, 1944; repair or modernization of a home if owned by him; purchase of furniture and household equipment for domestic use in an amount not to exceed two thirds of the cost; provision of working capital for his profession or business; purchase of tools, instruments or equipment for his trade, profession or business; purchase of a business by him in an amount not exceeding two thirds of the equity required for such purpose; payment of premiums under any insurance scheme established by the government of Canada; purchase of special equipment required for educational or vocational training; any other purpose authorized by the governor in council.

Mr. SENN: Does that include live stock if he is a farmer?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I should think so.

Mr. ROWE: Would it include his own insurance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, just soldiers' insurance.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am getting a little clearer insight into this subject than I had at the outset, but the minister of pensions has just made a remark that brings out precisely the point I have been trying to clarify in my own mind. He says that when the bill comes down it will be found to provide for the purchase of a home, and he goes further and adds, under the National Housing Act. I know of scores of young men who are anxiously waiting to buy homes when they come back. Perhaps preliminary steps are being taken now to assist them. They expected that some assistance would be given them, but now we find that in large part it is diverted into the form of monthly payments. It is on a monthly basis. The minister speaks of purchasing a house under the provisions of the bill, and then he qualifies that by referring to the National Housing Act. There are many ramifications of this whole question that have to be considered. Young men are coming back and will want to get married. During the time they have been overseas they have had no opportunity to save anything apart from the odd $50 bond. The young men who have stayed on the farm or in the factory have had a greater opportunity in this direction and many of them have taken advantage of it. These young men are about to step into a new state of life and they are anticipating that they will have a job to go to and that they will use this assistance to buy a home and furniture. I do not think we should attach all the strings to it that apparently we are putting on. We must not do anything that will impede them in their progress towards reestablishment in civilian life.

The Prime Minister has referred to the $900 as a token of gratitude. I appreciate the fact that we cannot express in dollars and cents all that we should like to do for these men. On the other hand, the illustration given by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services has more or less put the matter in summarized form. He has spoken of the $900 plus a month's pay and one or two little things. What worries me is the fact that we are attaching too many strings to this benefit that we are extending to the young men who have been overseas for two or three or four years. They will want to know where they are going to get the money to get started. That is what concerns me. I wish the government would give this whole question very serious consideration and try to look at it from as broad a point of view as possible.

I would remind the government that a great many fire fighters as well as men engaged in the merchant marine and in the auxiliary services have already been killed. I am sure the ministers themselves are aware of the casualties that have occurred in all these services. The fire fighting service has been recognized in the matter of pension rights. There have been casualties among the fire fighters who are now on the coast of Normandy, and the casualties among the men of the merchant marine are untold.

Reference was made to the fact that you could not go on extending this. The Minister of National Defence said that you had to draw the line somewhere. Apart from the fire fighters, the men of the merchant marine and those in the auxiliary services, I do not know of any other groups, certainly there are not many, who could make the claim that these particular groups can.

Mr. RALSTON: A claim has been made on behalf of the men of the ferry command.

Mr. LOCKHART: Well, the ferry command; perhaps those four groups.

Mr. RALSTON: Those are not the only ones.

Mr. LOCKHART: Other claims would be infinitely small. Having in mind the fact that pension rights of certain groups have been recognized and we are already paying pensions to the dependents of certain men, and the fact that the dependents at home of men overseas or in the extra services have had no opportunity whatever to save money, I say that this is little enough; in fact I should like to see the amount increased to help these men become established in home life in Canada. I urge on the government therefore the importance of removing all barriers from the $900, for example. All barriers should be removed entirely, because I know that there are scores, yes, thousands of these young men whose sweethearts at home are waiting anxiously for them to come back and they would like to use this money. We cannot do enough to help these men and I do not like to see it held up in monthly payments. I want to see them get it so long as they make proper use of it. I urge the government therefore to consider these qualifications very carefully. I suggest that we should go to the other extreme rather than put any barriers in the way of the men who are coming home shortly.

Mr. SENN: There is another aspect of the question which may have been touched on while I was out of the house. A year or two ago we passed the veterans land act to assist soldiers in purchasing farms and equipment. If a veteran comes under that act and is given assistance will he be able to take advantage of this $450 personal reestablishment grant?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. ADAMSON: At the beginning of the war, for the first year of hostilities, there were a great many men in the army who were called out under what was known as G.O. 139—general order 139. They were referred to as being called out. They happened to be doing specialized jobs in most cases. I presume that the date of this gratuity will take effect from the day they were called out, because it was before the active army was formed. It was in the days when the Canadian forces were known as the Canadian Active Service Force. I believe nearly a year elapsed before the active army actually came into being.

Another question that needs to be clarified is the position of men who are discharged to Department of Pensions and National Health. A man is wounded and sent to military hospital. He is then boarded out of the army and discharged, but left in a Department of Pensions and National Health hospital for a period of six months or a year or longer. Provision should be made in the resolution for the period of time the service man spends in a Department of Pensions and National Health hospital. That time should be included in his active service. I do not think it is included in the resolution. While the man is in the hospital he is not on war duty but he is still definitely totally engaged; his whole being is there; he cannot be in civilian life. I suggest that that time be included in the bill.

A word with regard to domicile. After the war ends a number of Canadians may not wish to return immediately to Canada. Some of them may wish to serve with the army of occupation in enemy territory. Some of them may wish to remain in England, possibly for educational purposes. Some may be offered employment in England. There should be no stigma with regard to domicile after the war. This amount should be paid irrespective of where the Canadian active service force man or the Canadian service man is domiciled after the war.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend's first question was with regard to when called out under general order 139. I think they are included. I cannot tell my hon. friend the date, but I made a note of what he said and I shall make inquiries about it. With regard to the time in the Department of Pensions and National Health hospital, if a man is still on the strength of the army his time counts. If he is on the strength of the army he is not discharged.

Mr. ADAMSON: If he is discharged to hospital?

Mr. RALSTON: The time does not count then.

Mr. ADAMSON: I think it should.

Mr. RALSTON: What does my hon. friend mean? Where would he put the limit?

Mr. ADAMSON: There should be a limit of two or three years. When a man is forced by wounds or by incapacity to spend a year or so in hospital, he should still be entitled to count that time.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no doubt that that appeals to my heart, but this is a service gratuity. It has to do with service. It applies only to the man who is on the strength of one of the three services. When I asked my hon. friend to fix the time he immediately saw the difficulty. A year or so after discharge we may be asked, why is not the man who is in civil life entitled to the grant for a year after, too?

Mr. ADAMSON: Because he is capable of earning his living.

Mr. RALSTON: He may be, but he may not have had the opportunity. He may not be established and may want to do something else. He may be on vocational training and getting only the living allowance, just as the man in hospital is getting the living allowance. I do not think we can extend it beyond the period of a man's service, when we are talking about a war service grant.

The other point my hon. friend mentioned was with regard to those who remained in the armed services abroad. What he is asking is that the provision which is contained in paragraph 2 of the resolution should be extended; that the statement of the requirement that they shall resume residence in Canada within one year from the date of retirement or discharge be extended. Is that it?

Mr. ADAMSON: That is it, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not quite see the point of that. This is for anybody who is serving in His Majesty's forces overseas in the army of the United Kingdom or in the armies of the commonwealth. We cannot leave it open indefinitely. If he is serving in the other forces he must return to Canada some time in order to qualify. In the first place he is not in the Canadian forces. This is an extension of a concession to grant the gratuity which is payable originally to members of the Canadian forces. He has elected to join another force and he gets whatever gratuity or provision is applicable to that force. Now, Canada says: "If you return and reside in Canada within one year from the date of your retirement we will make up the gratuity to the amount of the Canadian rate instead of the rate which you have received." I think the committee will see that that is a fair provision.

Mr. ROWE: In the event that the present home army is sent overseas on active service will the men comprising that force receive the $7.50 per month for the time they have been in the force and the $15 per month for the time overseas, or will they be taken as a separate army of to-day and at a later date perhaps be put in the active service overseas and then be entitled to $15 per month?

Mr. RALSTON: They will be entitled to $7.50 for service in Canada only from the time that they become obligated to serve without territorial limitation; that is to say, only from the time that they have become obligated for universal service.

Mr. ROWE: Let us suppose that these men who were drafted and who have been away from their vocations for perhaps two years are finally—I hope some time soon—placed in support of the army overseas. If the war continues for some time longer, which I hope it does not, they get, let us say, one year of active combat service. On their return they will get none of those advantages at all?

Mr. RALSTON: They will get the advantages as and from the time that they became obligated to universal service only. They will not get the gratuity in respect of the time served so long as they have only been required to serve within Canada.

Mr. ROWE: Only from the time the government decides to send them overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: That is right, or the time they enlist.

Mr. ROWE: Would it not be retroactive?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. ADAMSON: Only from the time the government passes the order in council, if it does?

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to get this matter of domicile cleared up because I have had a number of cases in which the question has arisen. If a soldier decides to remain in the imperial army or in the Royal Air Force after the war is over and signs on for a three or a seven year period, he will not be entitled to the benefits of this resolution; is that so?

Mr. RALSTON: If he were a Canadian he would.

Mr. ADAMSON: Should he decide to remain in the permanent force for a three year period or for a five year period he would not be entitled to the benefit of this resolution?

Mr. RALSTON: He would, if he remained on after his service. Here are the terms of the resolution. I am reading from paragraph 2:

That a similar gratuity and credit be payable to persons domiciled in Canada on or after the tenth day of September, 1939, who subsequent to that date served on active service in any of the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty—

That is the imperial army, about which my hon. friend is speaking.

—other than those raised in Canada who resume residence in Canada within one year of the date of retirement or discharge from any of such forces—

Mr. SENN: Do I understand the minister to say that those who come under the Veterans' Land Act would not be entitled to the benefits of either of these two provisions, that is, the reestablishment credit or the war service gratuity?

Mr. RALSTON: They would be entitled to the war service gratuity.

Mr. SENN: Suppose a man comes home and does not apply to come under the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act until such time as his war service gratuity has been expended. Would he then be entitled to come under the Veterans' Land Act?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. SENN: Without losing any of the benefits under this act?

Mr. RALSTON: There are two benefits under this act. One is the war service gratuity, about which we have spoken. That is the amount which is payable monthly, and he would be entitled to that even if he applied immediately to come under the Veterans' Land Act. What it would interfere with would be the reestablishment credit, because under the Veterans' Land Act he would receive very much more than the reestablishment credit.

Mr. GRAYDON: I had to leave the committee for a few moments, and it may be that the question I am about to ask was dealt with during that time. However, since the question of combatancy is not the actual test in regard to the gratuities, and since the line is drawn in regard to overseas service—

Mr. RALSTON: Geographically.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, perhaps that is more expressive than the word I was about to use. In any event geography rather than combatancy is the test, and naturally there will be some borderline cases that will cause the government no end of concern. One such case comes to mind in connection with the air force. Men who have served in Canada in instructional work, and perhaps in reasonably dangerous lines of endeavour in connection with the air force, will find themselves in receipt of gratuities under this act on a much lower scale than some non-combatants who have been overseas but in some cases in perhaps no more dangerous surroundings, if one can properly put it on that basis. No doubt the one man would be more definitely exposed to the dangers connected with combatancy than the other might be, but still the gratuity would be much less in the one instance than in the other. I fancy that is a matter to which the government have given a great deal of study, for it is a real difficulty that will have to be faced if we are to have justice and avoid discrimination. Has the government considered the possibility of utilizing some discretionary power to avoid those injustices which in the very nature of the test applied under this act, that is geography rather than combatancy, may arise from time to time and which would be very embarrassing in the administration of the measure. I know how difficult it is to deal with these matters of discretionary power, but I was wondering whether or not that point had been considered by the government and, if so, whether any solution had been arrived at which does not appear in the resolution as it is now on the order paper.

In that connection I would point out that many of the airmen who are doing pretty dangerous work here in Canada would be overseas if the department would permit them to go. I suppose there are literally thousands upon thousands of airmen in Canada who are desperately anxious, who have been pleading and urging and doing everything short of committing a crime to get overseas. These instructors and others find themselves subject to the payment of income tax, except under certain circumstances in which they are given relief, and now we find that those non-combatants overseas, some of them in not much more dangerous circumstances than exist here may be granted a much larger gratuity under the terms of this legislation. I do not want it to be understood that I desire to interfere with those overseas who come within the higher gratuity category. That is not my purpose at all in rising. I am only attempting to clear up the point in regard to the men in Canada, to see if it is not possible to increase the gratuity they will receive under the terms of the bill which will be founded upon this resolution. I point out the more favourable position of the non-combatants overseas with respect to the income tax, and other matters, only to show the possible injustice that may be felt by some airmen here in Canada. Certainly I have no desire to interfere with what may be received by those who are overseas. They deserve it but would the government care to make any comment with respect to this point, and indicate how they arrived at this position?

Mr. RALSTON: I assure my hon. friend that, as he anticipated, we gave very careful study to the matter of the differentiation in rates and the principles on which it should be based. In the first place danger is a factor. Men fighting in Italy and France probably have been, in many circumstances, in much more danger than anyone else, but the question was whether we could separate the degree of danger. I do not think my hon. friend will find many men in Canada who have endured the dangers that our men in England endured in 1940 and 1941, at the time of the blitz. Neither do I think he will find many people in Canada enduring anything like the danger being endured to-day during the blitz of robot bombs. Neither do I think he will find men in Canada who have endured the danger which was endured by men in England on anti-aircraft work on the coast, in endeavouring to keep the enemy away in the days when the bombing was so severe. We endeavoured to see if there was any possible test of combatancy, but, as my hon. friend has anticipated, it was extremely difficult to find any such test. So we had to take geography to indicate the theatres in which danger was most likely. In the second place, we coupled with that, separation, which we regarded as a factor to be considered. That is to say, it is one thing for a man to be in Canada, even though he may be in dangerous work, and to be able to get his seven or fourteen days' leave every six months and go home to his family, and be in touch with Canadian affairs. It was quite different with a man even in England, who also got his leave but whose leave only gave him an opportunity to go to London, or to go north, or to enjoy the hospitality of friends. It did not give him that which men prize above everything else, the opportunity to get home and see his loved ones.

The idea of general area of danger, and the idea of separation, were two of the factors which led the government to come to the conclusion that the only way we could make a distinction—not a fine or accurate distinction—which would appeal generally, was to deal with two classes of service; that is, service in the western hemisphere and service overseas. I think we were backed up in that by the fact that in their mustering out provisions the United States, to which the hon. member for Lake Centre has referred, used exactly the same test. Service in the United States was considered as being one thing and service in other geographical areas was dealt with at another rate. In South Africa no difference is made as to service; they pay the same rate to all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the rate in South Africa?

Mr. RALSTON: For European men it is 30 shillings per month of service; for European women, 15 shillings per month of service; for coloured personnel, 10 shillings per month of service, and for native personnel, 5 shillings per month of service. In New Zealand they have adopted a simple formula which appears to be applicable to all their troops. They have added a shilling a day to the man's pay and made it retroactive to the beginning of the war. However, this is not paid to him; it is treated as a deferred credit to be received by the man after the war. There again no distinction is made as to service. I have mentioned the United States, South Africa and New Zealand. Then lastly, in the last war exactly the same distinction was made as we are making here, that is, overseas service was one thing regardless of whether it was in France or England, and Canadian service was another.

That is why we have arrived at this distinction. I admit it is not precise; I admit it does not take account of many special situations, but it seems to be the best you can do unless you have a most complicated system of boards which would try almost every individual case to arrive at the degree of danger in which a man served. Someone has suggested that the test should be that a man has been within rifle shot of the enemy, which would be a little over a mile. One can see how difficult it would be to apply that test in connection with each particular individual.

What my hon. friend has said about men in the air force is perfectly true. It is just as true of the army. There are literally thousands of men in Canada who would much rather be overseas but who have worked hard in Canada in order to train others. There are men who have been located at outposts which while they may not be as dangerous as service overseas have been under pretty grim conditions. The same thing applies to the navy. There are many thousands of men in Canada who would rather be at sea. However, it is just the luck of the draw, as they say. The fact that they have been nearer their families is at least some compensation for the lower rate that will be paid.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think we all appreciate the difficulty in drawing a line, but on the assumption that further consideration may still be given to this matter I would call the attention of the government to the manner in which the line is drawn in the Income War Tax Act. Section 4 refers to excepted incomes and paragraph (t) reads:

> The service pay and allowances of—
> (i) members of the Canadian naval, military and air forces while in the Canadian active service forces and overseas on the strength of an overseas unit outside of the western hemisphere, and > (ii) members of the said forces while on active service in Canada, or anywhere in the western hemisphere, whose duties are of such a character as are required normally to be performed afloat or in aircraft.

Apparently the same problem which the government has been confronted with here confronted them with respect to income tax exemptions, and the section I have quoted would seem to indicate that the decision arrived at then is slightly different from the decision arrived at now. If the present decision were comparable to the former one the members of the forces whose duties are such as are required normally to be performed afloat or in aircraft would be included with those who have served overseas without regard to geography. You have here a group of service personnel who for income tax purposes have been treated the same as the service personnel overseas. It will be a bit of a surprise to them to discover that they are not to be included in that same category in this legislation. If further consideration is to be given to the question as to where the line is to be drawn I hope the government will refer to the section of the income tax legislation to which I have referred.

Mr. RALSTON: I assure my hon. friend that those things have been taken into consideration and the conclusion has been reached, as has been indicated here, that the distinction which it is proposed to make in this legislation is the fairest under all the circumstances.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will the credit provided in this legislation be available for university training beyond what is provided under other legislation? Could we have some explanation of clause 4 of the resolution which states that the payment of the war services gratuity may be made under certain conditions to or on behalf of the dependents of members of the forces who have died either prior to or subsequent to retirement or discharge? What are the conditions referred to?

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps my hon. friend was not here this morning when I indicated that the only condition is that under certain circumstances the payment may be made to someone for the dependent instead of directly to the dependent. My hon. friend will understand that under some circumstances that may be desirable. With regard to university training, that was not included in the list read by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. There is a general clause, which probably my hon. friend has noted, which covers other purposes which may be regarded as proper by the governor in council.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many men have been discharged from the Canadian armed forces? I understand that these payments will be available to all those who have been discharged up to the present.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Roughly 150,000.

Mr. RALSTON: The Minister of Pensions and National Health has the figure at hand more readily than I and he indicates that it would be around 150,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This resolution brings into focus the whole question of demobilization. It becomes effective on demobilization.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. RALSTON: No, on discharge; there is a difference.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Individual demobilization, not the demobilization of the forces. There is one thing about which I do not believe there has been an announcement by the Canadian government, and that is the question as to how demobilization is going to be proceeded with and what plans have been arrived at by the special directorate that was set up by the government to deal with the matter. All of us I think have received letters from men who have been overseas, some of them for almost five years, endeavouring to secure information as to whether or not the government has a plan for orderly demobilization. In England the matter has been clarified by Mr. Ernest Bevin, who, speaking of the demobilization plans, said that the point system that was used in the last war was not to be used in this war, but that the general principle in Great Britain would be, to use his own words, "first in, first out." Is the minister in a position to deal with that? It would go a long way towards improving the morale of our men overseas, some of whom have been for five years removed from their families and their loved ones and all that is near and dear to them, if they were made aware of the fact that in any demobilization plans they are not going to be held over there in an army of occupation unless they wish to do so; that service in the army of occupation should be applicable to those with the shortest service, and that the men with the longest service will have the first opportunity to come back to their homes.

This morning the Prime Minister was asked whether it was intended that when the war in Europe is over our armed forces in Europe will be sent elsewhere or returned to Canada. I will not go into that question because the Prime Minister, if I understood his meaning aright, said that that was a matter that could not now be decided because of defence considerations and the like. But if the Prime Minister's statement as reported the other evening was a correct one, that there will be no election held during war time and there will be no postponing of the life of parliament, he must have had in mind, to synchronize those two statements, that the war in Europe is about over or will be over before April 1, 1945. If that be so, this is possibly the last opportunity that will be available to members of this house to ascertain just what the government's demobilization plans are. A full statement should be given to the house and the country on the whole plan of demobilization. The Minister of National Defence on a previous occasion answered me most fairly when I suggested that a similar system to that worked out in the United States should be available in Canada, under which, after a period of active service—I believe in the United States it is nineteen months of active service—the men in the army are given the opportunity, subject to the exigencies of war, to return to their loved ones for a furlough. The minister pointed out the difficulties arising from the general war situation and also the shipping difficulties at the time. But this is a matter upon which our men overseas would like to get information. As it is now, they have been over there several years without hope of returning home until the conclusion of hostilities and even then there is the uncertainty because no one knows whether the principle of "first in, first out" of the United Kingdom will be adopted. It is a serious matter and one upon which the men in the armed forces and their dependents in Canada would welcome a statement.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry that I cannot make a statement to the house now as to a plan of demobilization. I do not think any country yet has made a statement on its plan of demobilization. My hon. friend mentioned the general principle of "first in, first out", and that general principle is certainly an objective to work to. But there are many difficulties in connection with that principle, and one of the difficulties is the matter of units. I am speaking particularly of infantry units, as an infantry man myself. There is the difficulty of breaking up units by withdrawing men of so many years service and leaving the others there. There are two sides to it. It is a matter which the chief of staff in the United Kingdom, who is over here now, is discussing with us while he is here. I therefore cannot make any statement as to a plan of demobilization except to say that it is and has been receiving the most active consideration. For the last six months at least we have been giving this whole matter constant study and examination both here and overseas. We expect that we will have a plan of demobilization which will be as satisfactory as possible. No plan can be wholly satisfactory to everybody. I remember in the last war that when I received the news that soldiers were to be withdrawn according to their occupations I was completely disgusted because that meant the breaking up of units, and the idea was abandoned.

I know that the point system to which my hon. friend referred has been most severely criticized in England. It was a system that took into account and gave so many points for long service, so many points for essentiality of civilian occupation, so many points for being married or single and points for various other things. It was excellent in theory but it just did not work. When you are bringing home units, there is the question of esprit de corps and certain traditions to be thought of. When you bring a unit back to its home town the men feel that they should have the privilege of being met by their fellow citizens, and their fellow citizens in turn feel that they should have that opportunity.

I can only say that the matter is engaging our most intensive attention and we are satisfied that a plan will be worked out which will be the best possible under the circumstances.

With regard to individual leave—for that is really what my hon. friend was speaking of—I have studied the system in the United States, and no doubt my hon. friend has the same information on it that I have. The system there is not as broad as my hon. friend's statement would perhaps indicate. The system is that leave is granted to certain particular individuals, and there are three principal classes, as I understand it. One is the class that has undergone extraordinary hardship or privation or difficulties in a most intensive theatre of war; in other words, those who are broken down by their service but would not be discharged as medically unfit. Another is the class that is needed at home for instructional purposes. The third is the class of those who have been successively wounded. Those I think are the three main classes. The information I have is that up to date the number who have been granted leave under that scheme have amounted to something like one to one and a half per cent. I have here with me certain plans and certain arrangements which we are endeavouring to work out with the adjutant-general with regard to that same matter. But with the situation as it is at this moment in Italy and Normandy I feel that I should not discuss the matter of leave at the present time. Hon. gentlemen will understand why. I believe our men both in Italy and in Normandy understand that. I hope the day is not too far distant when the opportunity may be given. I do not think there is anything I can usefully add to that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate the explanation which has been given, but here is the thing which the men in the army overseas want to know. I know that the special directorate on demobilization has given serious consideration to the whole question of demobilization, but has a decision been made on the question as to whether or not the N.R.M.A. men serving in Canada will receive their discharges and be permitted to enter civil life before those who serve overseas are returned to this country? It has important consequences because if seventy or eighty thousand N.R.M.A. men in this country, all of whom are in the same position under the law as other enlisted men as to their right to reinstatement in civil positions, are discharged before the men from overseas come back, many of the positions which would ordinarly be available for the men serving overseas will have been taken by those who under compulsory service served only in Canada. As I understand the provisions of the law as to reinstatement, as soon as a man is discharged from the forces he is entitled to go back to his former employer and demand reinstatement in the position he previously held. Unless there is a plan, the position of affairs will be this. Some of these men in the N.R.M.A. took positions vacated by men who voluntarily went on active service. If these N.R.M.A. men are discharged before the men who are overseas, they will be able to insist on their reinstatement in the positions which they previously held to the detriment of the volunteer for overseas service.

I do not doubt that our overseas forces will be satisfied with legislation such as is brought before the house to-day. It is all to the good and is not at all a matter of party politics. As the Prime Minister has said, the plan has been worked out to cover the entire gamut of demobilization and rehabilitation, and this resolution is for the time being the concluding chapter. I repeat that all this is to the good. One thing remains: the men in the armed forces want to be assured of a job with fair pay when they return. Legislation such as this, although helpful and necessary, is merely of the nature of a stop-gap. Without there being a plan for demobilization, seventy thousand men overseas, who otherwise would have positions available to them when the war is over, will be denied positions to which they are entitled if the men who were called up and did not volunteer to go overseas are discharged first and enabled to take over these positions. I should like to hear a declaration of the government with reference to this. It would complete the picture regarding demobilization. Not only would you have a rehabilitation plan—and this is a most commendable one, with which all of us are in agreement—but you would say to the men who serve overseas, "You are not going to suffer because you volunteered. Your positions will be available to you, and no one else who was called up and did not volunteer will be allowed to preempt a position which should rightfully belong to you in the post-war world."

Mr. RALSTON: I know that my hon. friend does not think for a moment that the position he has put so forcibly is not constantly present in our minds.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I know.

Mr. RALSTON: That is part of the planning we are doing with regard to demobilization, to consider these very situations to which he refers. I assure him that that is being considered. To deal with it will be part of any plan of demobilization. I cannot now say more than that. I know my hon. friend does not expect me to announce a demobilization plan piecemeal, and I do not think I should do it. I agree thoroughly with my friend in this particular—I found it when I was in Italy —that in spite of what we are doing in this bill, the men over there are not much concerned with the matter of a war service gratuity as they are with having a job and having the chance themselves to be able to work out their own destiny. While it is not relevant to this bill, I do not at all complain of my hon. friend having brought it to our attention just now. It is not the function of the service departments to find jobs, but it certainly is their function to see to it that as far as possible their demobilization plan fits in with the opportunity of finding jobs, and that is what we shall endeavour to do in connection with this plan.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister allow a question on that matter? I thank him for his statement. Does he then say that no decision has been arrived at yet as to whether or not the men in the N.R.M.A. will be discharged before the men in active service overseas are discharged?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot at this stage make any further statement than I have made.

Mr. GILLIS: In the debate on the address, recognizing that we had entered a phase of the war when the matter which the hon. member for Lake Centre has raised should get major consideration, I occupied my forty minutes in setting out as clearly as I could the mechanics which I thought should be employed in the demobilization period. It is not my intention to pursue the matter now; I simply wish to ask the minister a question. There are six different kinds of discharges, and letters which I receive from time to time indicate considerable apprehension in the minds of a number of men being discharged from the services as to where they fit in under the rehabilitation regulations. I sent out a questionnaire containing seventeen questions. I communicated with army officials through the Department of Pensions and National Health and had these questions answered very clearly, and I have clarified the matter in the minds of most of the people who wrote to me. But I would ask the minister if the provisions of the resolution now before the committee are affected in any way by the type of discharge a man may receive. Here is an example of what I have in mind. A considerable number of men are coming back from overseas and being sent to their various military districts. In many cases they are held there for one reason or another for a long time, and they become impatient; they decide that they do not want to sweep floors, or something of the sort. They would rather have a discharge from the service, but they feel that if they ask for a discharge, the kind of discharge they would receive would be under routine order 1029-12, namely, discharged at their own request. If a man takes that kind of discharge will it militate against him in the application of this gratuity? It does militate against him in other instances.

Mr. RALSTON: The only sort of discharge which disqualifies a man for war service gratuity is misconduct. May I add this word. I have not given my hon. friend the direct answer to his question because of the fact that I considered it was part of the demobilization plan. I do not want any doubt in anyone's mind that we are fully alive to the danger of having men's jobs filled by N.R.M.A. men. In that connection I may say that we intend to see to it as far as we possibly can that the danger is avoided. That will be one feature of the plan, and I want to make sure that the house understands that. I understand fully what my hon. friend says and certainly I will do everything I can, and I know that all the service departments will do what they can, to see to it that preference for jobs goes to men who have been overseas.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 184, to provide for the payment of war service gratuities and for the grant of reestablishment credits to members of His Majesty's forces in respect of service during the present war.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE

MEASURE TO FACILITATE AND DEVELOP TRADE BETWEEN CANADA AND OTHER COUNTRIES —CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 178, to incorporate the Export Credits Insurance Corporation and to promote the revival of trade by the provision of dominion government guarantees to encourage exports from Canada.

Mr. ADAMSON: Perhaps the minister will explain the amendments.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The amendments are really a matter of drafting and rearrangement; there is no difference in principle at all. Subsection 4 of section 7 of the bill is removed from its present position and made subsection 2 of section 4, part I. It is simply moving that clause into another place. To section 13 there is an addition; (b) is to provide in part I of the act that the Minister of Finance can use the corporation as an agent. That is at present in part II of the act and this simply puts it in part I; and (c) provides that the corporation may do all such things as may be incidental to or consequential upon the exercise of its powers.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

HOUSING

PROVISION FOR LOANS FOR CONSTRUCTION, REPAIR, ALTERATION, ETC.

The house resumed from Wednesday, August 9, consideration in committee of bill No. 183, to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, the improvement of housing and living conditions and the expansion of employment in the post-war period—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 10, regulations by governor in council.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister been able to straighten out the difficulty with regard to the question whether the cost of land is included in the value?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yes. We consulted the Department of Justice and they think that the cost of the land is included in the house, but they agree that it would be better to amend the definition of "house". The amendment therefore is proposed that paragraph 19 of section 2 of bill

183 be amended by inserting the words "together with the land upon which it is situated" immediately after the word "building", so that the definition of "house" would read:

"House" means a building, together with the land upon which it is situated, intended for human habitation comprising one or more family housing units including facilities ordinarily required in connection with a dwelling place.

It means that we shall have to revert to section 2. If I remember rightly that was passed.

Mr. STIRLING: It developed in the discussion of subsequent sections.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Do I understand the minister to say that the amending of paragraph 19 of section 2 will clear up the difficulty with regard to the other paragraphs that were involved?

Mr. ILSLEY: So I am advised. I move that we revert to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN: By unanimous consent, we will revert to section 2, Definition.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move the amendment that has been proposed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That definition will mean that any loan which is made for the building of a house will include the cost of the lot upon which to build it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It always has; yes, that is the intention.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What will be done with respect to the larger multiple dwellings where people go together to construct an apartment house or a cooperative apartment?

Mr. ILSLEY: The same thing applies.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And the ownership of the land will go with the house under this act?

Amendment agreed to.

Section 2 as amended agreed to.

On section 11—Life insurance companies investment.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not think section 3 was carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Sections 4 and 5 stood at the last meeting of the committee. Shall section 11 carry?

Section agreed to.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What about section 10 on page 12? I should like to refer to paragraph (b).

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Section 10 is carried. We have just carried section 11.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We started on section 10 and went back to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN: We shall revert to section 10.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Paragraph (b) of section 10 reads:

The governor in council on the recommendation of the minister, may by regulation:

(b) prescribe sound standards of construction and the arrangements that shall be made to assure adequate supervision of any construction or conversion in respect of which a loan is made under this part.

What is the machinery by which the minister determines that? Has it to come under certain construction association or architectural standards? Are there certain regulations with regard to construction in Canada? What are the standards? Unless there are standards it is possible for discrimination to take place.

Mr. ILSLEY: Standards have been laid down and have been published in a booklet of the national housing administration. These booklets are available. They are approved by the governor in council.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: All construction must conform to these standards with regard to architectural design and construction as provided in this booklet?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 12—Slum areas.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is the section on which we held discussion to some extent on the resolution stage and on second reading. During that discussion we had the pros and cons of municipal public housing versus housing projects constructed under the direction of private interests. In reply to some of the statements that I made last evening, the hon. member for Halton still further attacked the competence of municipalities to go into this kind of thing and still further defended the idea that it should be done solely by private interests. I shall not argue the point at length, but I should like to bring the hon. member for Halton and other hon. members up to date on what is happening in this field in the world of to-day. I hold in my hand as one exhibit an interesting book put out by the Boston housing authority, showing the work that has been done in that city under that municipal housing body. On the fly leaf of this book there is an interesting quotation from the United States Housing Act of 1937, a portion of which I should like to read:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to promote the general welfare of the nation by employing its funds and credit, . . . to assist the several states and their political subdivisions to alleviate present and recurring unemployment and to remedy the unsafe and insanitary housing conditions. . . .

And so on. The point in the quotation to which I call attention is the deliberate policy of the United States government to assist the several states and their political subdivisions in this field. Under that legislation and under enabling legislation in the state of Massachusetts a good deal has been done most effectively and most satisfactorily in that state. If time permitted I could give hon. members a great deal of material out of this book which would prove of real interest. I have here also a copy of the eighth annual report of the New York city housing authority for the year 1941. Here again we have the housing problem attacked by a municipal housing authority. Surely there is no city in Canada that can be faced with any greater housing problem or any greater slum clearance difficulties than the city of New York. Yet the report indicates considerable satisfaction so far as the public administration of housing projects of that city is concerned. I should like to read just two short quotations from a letter contained in this report. The letter was written by the chairman of the New York city housing authority to Mayor LaGuardia of that city, and is dated January 15, 1942. The first quotation is as follows:

During 1941, with the aid of federal and city funds, 2,943 additional families were provided with low-rent, modern, sanitary housing in four new projects: East River Houses, Manhattan; Kingsborough Houses, Brooklyn; Clason Point Gardens, Bronx, and Wallabout Houses, Brooklyn (a defence housing project near the navy yard).

The next paragraph I quote is in reply to the statement of the hon. member for Halton that municipal authorities cannot manage rental projects satisfactorily. The quotation is as follows:

The authority now operates twelve completed projects with a total occupancy of 13,180 low-income families. Naturally, there are many human problems constantly arising in the relations of the authority with such a large group of tenants. These problems have been handled with patience and tact by the managers of the projects and with satisfaction to the tenants.

Another report that I have on my desk is also from the New York city housing authority. It deals particularly with the South Jamaica houses, one of the projects carried on by that authority. Again the story of what has been done is a good one. There are pictures here that would be of interest to hon. members. They show the situation before and after the housing authority had done its work. These pictures tell a real story. I quote from this report:

The cost of South Jamaica houses is $2,196,000 of which ninety per cent is lent by the United States housing authority and ten per cent will be financed by the sale of bonds by the New York city housing authority. This is an average total cost of $4,888.39 per dwelling unit and $1,222.10 per room. The cost will be repaid over a period of sixty years out of revenues of the project, and annual contributions made by the United States housing authority.

Rents are from $20.50 per month for a 2½ room apartment to $25.75 per month for a 5½ room apartment, which includes gas for cooking and electricity for lighting and refrigeration as well as heating and hot water. This averages $5.60 per room per month including utilities.

So one might go on with various sections of these reports of municipal public housing authorities in the United States to show that when we advocate this kind of thing we are not just propounding theory but are talking in the light of what is actually taking place in the world in which we live to-day. I feel that the position taken by the hon. member for Halton in defence of the government's refusal to consider supporting municipal bodies in this field is, to put it mildly, a voice out of the past.

Another document from which I should like to quote briefly is a circular which was sent out by the British ministry of health under date of March 4, 1943, to the housing authorities of the county councils of the United Kingdom. Hon. members should bear in mind that this circular was sent out right in the midst of the war, when it was not possible to do all the actual construction that one might like to have done, but it will be seen that the view of the United Kingdom government is that plans should be made for the building of homes as soon as the war is over, and that in their view the important people with whom the central government should deal are the housing authorities of the local councils. Let me quote one or two passages to make the position clear. This is what the ministry of health has to say to the county councils of England:

But it is clear that the need for houses is already substantial, and the minister is anxious that local authorities should now begin to formulate plans so as to be in a position to make a quick start immediately conditions permit, whether during or after the war. I am accordingly to ask that the council, if they have not already done so, should review their housing needs and that they should concentrate on the preliminary arrangements necessary as a practical measure to enable them to start on such part of the programme as would comprise a one year's building work as they are authorized to do so.

Then the two last paragraphs from this circular:

The minister will be glad to be informed in due course of the number of houses which the council have in mind for their first year's programme and of the extent to which they already have land in their possession available for these houses, or of the additional sites which they propose to acquire.

I am to add that directions have been given to the ministry's regional architects to continue to call on the local authorities in their region, as and when they can, to discuss with them their programme for housing after the war. If the council wish subsequently to discuss matters further, the minister will be glad to arrange for a deputation to be received by the ministry.

That is signed by L. F. Hearder, assistant secretary of the United Kingdom ministry of health. In that document are two points to which I call attention. First is the recognition by the central government in the United Kingdom of the important part to be played in housing by the local housing authorities of the county council. There is also in this circular a recognition of the necessity of planning the construction of houses. There you have the central government asking all the county councils to survey their needs and to report on those needs to the central government, so that the building of houses may be planned in the light of those needs. I mention that because to me it is in striking contrast to the lack of any plan in the housing legislation now before us. As I said last evening, this measure will no doubt result in the building of many houses in Canada, and because those houses are needed we support the legislation. But I think hon. members who rose in their places to say that this was the finest housing legislation any government had ever brought down were, to say the least, a little extravagant in their statements.

I have before me as well some quotations from Lord Woolton, the British minister of reconstruction, similar to those which appear in the circular to which I referred. For example, he said in December, 1943:

The next step is to advise local authorities what kind of houses they should build so that they can get further ahead with their detailed plans. I can promise local governments that they will have the best advice on this matter that the central government are able to give them, and they will have that very quickly. . . .

I emphasize again the view in the United Kingdom that there should be this close co-operation between the central government and the public housing authorities of the county councils.

[Mr. Knowles.]

In addition to the references to other countries I would mention the report of the subcommittee on housing and community planning of the James committee on reconstruction, in which it was urged that not only should there be planning in advance of any housing project but particular consideration would have to be given to all three levels of Canadian government. I quote:

It is important to recognize that actual achievement of great numbers of new houses constructed and operated on a sound basis depends upon a reasonable and cooperative division of labour between the three levels of Canadian government.

If there were time I might mention other parts of that portion of the report to indicate that the James committee recognized the important part to be played in any rational, satisfactory housing programme by the municipal councils, those who are closest to the people and to our housing problems. I regret very much that the government has taken what to my way of thinking is a retrograde step, by including in this legislation a provision that to all intents and purposes snubs the municipal bodies. The minister has stated his reason for this position; he is not satisfied that the municipal bodies can display the efficiency of the private limited-dividend housing corporations and the life insurance companies. We beg leave to differ with that. Some of us have had some experience in this field. We feel that greater reliance should be placed upon the municipal bodies, and that there should be the kind of cooperation with those bodies which is evident from the quotations I have read both from the United States and from the United Kingdom.

I rose in part simply to reply to some of the comments that were made last night, and also that I might express my objection to the position embodied in section 12 of the bill; we favour instead the wider development of municipal public housing authorities.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are a few words in the first part of section 12 to which I should like to refer. I am going to try to direct my remarks not to the whole gamut of housing but to what this section calls for, namely slum clearance. Section 12 reads in part:

In order to assist in the clearance, replanning, rehabilitation and modernization of slum areas or blighted or substandard areas in any municipality.

As I understand it, under subsection 3 the municipalities are to be advanced one-half of the purchase price of the slum area which is to be rebuilt on by the insurance company or other builders with whom the government may deal. Will the cities be able to take over such areas by expropriation proceedings? I have looked over slum areas in a great number of cities, but I should like to refer particularly to Toronto. Land fronting on the bay from Bathurst street, indeed from Simcoe street west, used to be a very high class residential district many years ago. The mansions of the rich people of those days, including the lieutenant governor, were south of King street. What drove those people away? The railways came in and their smoke drove out all residents who were able to move away. They went north until in time the city extended north for perhaps seven, eight or nine miles. This area is now occupied by people having low salaries or humble people who have no salaries at all.

I doubt if any insurance company or other builder could make houses pay in this area unless the railways were electrified and the smoke nuisance eliminated. Along the south bank of the Thames, and I believe also along the north bank, in London they have electrified the railroads. If this were followed out in Toronto, then I believe this so-called slum area could be rebuilt with houses and apartments to be occupied by people with low incomes or even by people with higher incomes. Buffalo is in much the same position as Toronto. In these cities people who work downtown in the office buildings and stores have to travel seven or eight miles to and from their work when it should be possible to build homes in areas where it would be cooler and where people would be closer to their work.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I had better explain this. If a municipality wishes to acquire an area on which there are slums it may do so with the consent of the province and of the dominion. The consent of the dominion is necessary if we are to contribute one-half the excess acquisition cost. Demolition will be necessary, and if this cost and the cost of the land were to be borne by a limited-dividend corporation or a life insurance company it would be impossible to make the project pay. On the other hand, if only the cost of the land is to be paid by the limited-dividend corporation or the life insurance company it probably will be an economical investment.

Who is to pay the cost over and above that of the land? This bill provides that if the project is approved by us, by the province and by the municipality, we will contribute fifty per cent of what we call the excess acquisition cost. It is contemplated that the other fifty per cent will be provided by the municipality or by the province or by both. The only cost to the limited-dividend corporation or the life insurance company would be the cost of the land. The project is gone ahead with, and in the case of the life insurance company they get a guaranteed return of two and a half per cent. There are certain provisions as to how they must apply the amount they earn over a certain amount. In the case of the limited-dividend corporation, they get a loan from the government up to ninety per cent of the cost of the land and buildings. Under those favourable conditions they are enabled to charge low rents to tenants who occupy the buildings constituting the project.

Mr. MacNICOL: This one area in Toronto covers a lot of territory. Starting at Bathurst or even Simcoe street south of King street there are a large number of humble but very fine people residing in houses which perhaps should be condemned. Only $20,000,000 is being provided, but the minister said the other night that this was just a start. If this work is confined at the beginning to the four cities with over 200,000 of population, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal, and the amount is divided it will mean approximately $5,000,000 for each city; that would not go very far if we are to take in what the minister has just indicated.

I want to see a start made and I want to see a success made of it. It seems a pity that in those cities located on lakes or rivers or harbours use cannot be made of the land along the waterfront because of the railways. In many cities these districts are occupied by people who cannot pay any great amount of rent. That prompted my other question as to whether the electrification of railways might be considered under the provisions of this bill. The whole frontage of Toronto is taken up to-day with the railways; trains run along every half hour or oftener belching out great columns of smoke. I cannot imagine anybody taking over that land and using it for housing purposes. I should like to know if the minister has given any thought at all to the future electrification of our railways entering large cities like Toronto. The steam engines could be parked at Mimico on the west or elsewhere, and at Scarboro on the east side of the city, and the trains brought in by electrical power. That would mean that the front of the city would be a desirable place to take over and erect housing on for our humble people who cannot pay a high rent but who nevertheless are entitled to every consideration possible for the sake of their health and the health of their families. These areas once cleared should have playgrounds, swimming pools and everything that would be beneficial to the health of the children. Has the minister given any thought to that, or have any suggestions been made in connection with slum clearance to eliminate the smoke nuisance in the lower part of our big cities?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the dominion government should assume responsibility for the elimination of the smoke nuisance or anything of that kind.

With regard to the amount that might be spent on slum clearance, $20,000,000 is provided for in the bill, but it should be noted that this amount is to take care of only half the excess acquisition cost of the land to be acquired for low-cost and moderate cost rental housing projects. An excess acquisition cost of $40,000,000 will make possible a substantial amount of slum clearance work, because it must be remembered that the land so acquired is to be sold to limited-dividend companies, life insurance companies or other approved lending institutions at fair and reasonable prices. If we assume that the excess acquisition cost is as large as half the total cost of the land acquired and cleared, section 12 of the bill makes possible the acquisition of land in our municipalities at a cost of $80,000,000 to provide a location for low-cost and moderate cost rental housing projects.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the government help to put in sewers and water-mains?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They will not do that?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the government insist on modern and sanitary plumbing being put in?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They will insist on that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not think this $20,000,000 will go very far in slum clearance. Here is an estimate made by the advisory committee on house planning at Toronto, which gives some idea of the cost: Elimination of 900 rear and alley dwellings, assessed value $900,000. Acquirement of ten blocks, containing in all nine hundred houses, at an assessed value of $1,800,000. That only takes into consideration rear and alley dwellings. That totals $2,700,000 and provides only 900 single family dwellings.

This scheme will have to go much further if we are to get any place, and I think it will require the cooperation of the provincial and municipal governments. Low-cost housing depends to a great extent upon the interest rate that has to be paid. In the state of New York, as the minister probably knows, a subsidy is paid to reduce the annual cost so that the rent can be brought down to a reasonable figure. I have something here that is very interesting, particularly in answer to my hon. friend to my left. The project of the Metropolitan Life Insurance company at Parkchester provides for 15,000 families. This development is located at the northerly end of the city. The project cost $50,000,000. They have several similar projects in the United States, one at Los Angeles, for instance, and at many other places. This particular project does not produce low-cost housing because it averages a rent of $14.50 per room per month. The Equitable Life has another project housing one thousand families, where the average cost is $15 per room per month. In the state of New York there are fourteen limited-dividend companies, representing an investment of $30,000,000. These projects enjoy partial tax exemption and are subject to certain restrictions by a housing commission. They are limited to paying six per cent to the stockholders. The rents are fixed by law at $12.50 per room per month in New York county and at $11 per room per month in other counties of the state.

After all, it must be remembered that the average man can afford to spend only twenty per cent of his income on rent. It would seem that the only way that you can get rents down is by some kind of subsidy. We have economic rentals at a rate of 9½ per cent. When you take into consideration the taxes, an average of 2½ per cent, it brings the 9½ per cent to 12 per cent.

The minister in his bill suggests that the municipality pay half the cost of slum clearance. But what happens about the taxes? Take the case where they received in taxes $36,000 on the old property. By the time you get your new buildings up, the taxes are going to be a lot more, and some arrangement will have to be made with the municipalities and with the provinces with a view to getting a fixed tax rate. In New York this is done by a fixed rate in accordance with the assessable value of the property taken over before demolition and the tax rate is kept at that figure. There is not a new assessment put on the new property. That is about the only way in which you can get low-cost housing down to rentals which the average man can afford to pay. The average man earning about $900 or $1,000 a year can afford to pay only twenty per cent of that for rent, which means at the most $200 a year. That does not amount to very much a month. I think there ought to be something in this bill as well to enable the government to subsidize by way of an annual payment or something of that kind. I would ask the minister another question. After the land is cleared, when it is taken over and the slum clearance has all gone on, who owns the land and for how much will it be sold to the limited-dividend corporation?

Mr. ILSLEY: The municipality acquires the land and then transfers it to a limited-dividend corporation or a life insurance company or other approved lending institution, which goes forward with the project.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): At the cost to itself, or whatever cost it likes, or what?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman apparently has not been following this. The arrangements under which the limited-dividend corporation or life insurance company goes forward are all set out in the bill. I went all over them conversationally just fifteen minutes ago in reply to the hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. KNOWLES: If I heard the minister correctly just now, he said that this would be done if the land were sold to a limited-dividend housing corporation or a life insurance company "or other approved lending institution." I believe the minister used those last words. They are not in section 12, subsection 2 (b). If they were there you might at least bring in cooperative organization. Section 12, subsection 2(b) refers only to "a limited-dividend housing corporation or a life insurance company."

Mr. ILSLEY: I refer the hon. member to page 14 of the bill, subsection 5 of section 11:

(5) The governor in council may for the purposes of this section designate an approved lending institution subject to the jurisdiction of parliament and in such case the provisions of the four last preceding subsections and the next following section shall mutatis mutandis apply to the said lending institution except that the amount of its funds which may be invested shall not exceed five per centum of its assets in Canada at such amount as is approved by the governor in council for the purpose of this section.

Mr. KNOWLES: But my point, Mr. Chairman, is that there is no reference to "approved lending institution" in section 12, subsection 2(b), for the provision of section 11, subsection 5, to refer to.

Mr. STIRLING: But subsection 5 of the previous section puts it there.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is nothing to apply mutatis mutandis. My point is that if there were any reference to an approved lending institution in section 12—

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a moment. I am trying to get the information. The point is clearly covered. I will not read subsection 5 again, but I will direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the words "the next following section" in lines 9 and 10 on page 14.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Paragraph (b) of subsection 2 mentions—

. . . at a price which in the opinion of the minister will enable the family housing units to be provided by the rental housing project to be leased to tenants on a fair and reasonable basis.

Will the minister tell me what he thinks is a fair and reasonable basis, and what rent should be paid?

Mr. ILSLEY: About one-fifth of the family income would be a fair and reasonable basis.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Well, will the minister tell me how under this scheme he can get the rental of these houses down to $200 a year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Under part I, on a 4½ per cent basis, a $4,000 house can be built; the monthly payment will be about $18, plus taxes, and then the man is buying and getting his house.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is provided in subsection 2 (b) that the land must be sold by the municipality to a limited-dividend housing corporation or to a life insurance company. No other approved lending institution is mentioned therein. Then, under subsection 5 of section 11:

The governor in council may for the purposes of this section designate an approved lending institution subject to the jurisdiction of parliament and in such case the provisions of the last four preceding subsections and the next following section shall mutatis mutandis apply to the said lending institution. . . .

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: But no approved lending institution is mentioned in section 12.

Mr. ILSLEY: The next following section is section 12, and when the governor in council designates an approved lending institution the provisions of section 12 apply to that approved lending institution.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But in section 12 there is no approved lending institution he can refer to other than a limited-dividend housing corporation or a life insurance company.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, there would not have been, had it not been for subsection 5 of section 11. That subsection says that the provisions of section 12 apply to designated lending institutions. In other words, section 12, subsection 2 (b) includes not only limited-dividend housing corporations and life insurance companies but those other approved designated lending institutions, because subsection 5 of section 11 says so.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If that is the minister's explanation of the section we shall have to accept it, but it does not seem to us to read that way. It seems to me that subsection 2 (b) of section 12 precludes the possibility of a municipality being allowed to go into the housing business.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it can go into the housing business all it likes. It is under the jurisdiction of the province, not under the jurisdiction of the dominion. It is a creature of the province, not of the dominion, and any municipality can go ahead to its heart's content.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does it get the benefits?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. It does not require our consent to go ahead, but it does not get the benefits under this bill.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Why should it not get benefits under this bill? You compel it to take its share of the loss on slum clearance.

Mr. ILSLEY: How? We do not compel it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You do not permit it to gain any benefits. If a municipality wants to clear its slums it must take the losses. The government will take half of that loss, but—

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not half of the loss, it is half of the excess acquisition cost.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is what it amounts to in the way of a loss. But you do not give a municipality any opportunity of getting the benefits under this bill by permitting it to have access to the loans and guarantees that you give to private enterprise. Let me refer the minister to section 11, subsection 3. The minister, it is provided, shall guarantee to the company, for as long as it retains ownership of the whole of the project, a net return in any year after the completion of the project of 2½ per cent per annum of the cost of the project for a period not exceeding the estimated useful life of the project and in any case not exceeding fifty years. In other words, a life insurance company is guaranteed its returns, its profits out of returns, but a municipality can not come under these benefits.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But it has to take a loss.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not have to take anything unless it wants to.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In other words, it can keep its slums; but you give a guarantee against loss to a life insurance company or to some lending institution that you approve, while you refuse to extend that privilege to a municipality.

Mr. ILSLEY: This bill does not provide for assistance to municipalities directly for housing purposes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is where we find fault with it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know the hon. gentleman does.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Consider what they did in Russia. They provided a bank for lending money for housing at low rates of interest. They do the same in the United States in the matter of assistance because they believe in giving service to the people. But this government's attitude is that life insurance companies and lending institutions are the ones to be guaranteed the opportunity of working under such a scheme with government assistance to prevent them from having a loss.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman think this is going to be a profit maker for the life insurance companies? The great trouble will be to get a life insurance company to go into it. The guarantee is 2½ per cent. The life insurance companies are trustees for the policy holders and they have to get a certain return to carry out their obligations under their policies. We thought 2½ per cent would be all right, but do not let the hon. gentleman get the idea that this is a money maker either for the life insurance companies or for the limited-dividend corporations.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is supported by the government for a long term.

Mr. ADAMSON: May I say one word with regard to paragraph (c) with respect to approval by the government of a province. I do not think that is comprehensive enough. In all worth-while schemes made for slum clearance, slum clearance is only one part of the main job. It has been the municipality or a planning board of the municipality that has made the plan, and I feel that first of all these loans should be restricted to municipalities or to districts that have made a plan, which plan is accepted by the province and by the dominion. That is very important. Ontario has a minister of planning, Mr. Dana Porter. I think this is one of the things that might come under the department of reconstruction. The hon. member for Parkdale suggested the department of health but I think reconstruction would be the proper department. The dominion government should see to it that the money so spent shall do the maximum amount of good. It takes a very great deal of preliminary work before you can undertake such a big project as slum clearance, which requires the consideration of questions of various kinds such as different types of residences, single, family, double family, multiple family residences, and so on, and other questions such as light industry, or heavy industry on the other hand, obnoxious industry, commercial institutions, and so on. All these things must be considered in clearing slums. Unless they are considered, no matter how clear the slums or what houses you build, you will reproduce slum conditions. You must have the municipality undertake an over-all plan. In my opinion this is the whole crux of the bill. I am in favour of the bill as far as it goes, but more attention should be given to the municipal angle, and the dominion government should be quite careful not to undertake work in a municipality that has not a comprehensive plan. It must be more than a mere slum clearance plan. Take Toronto or Montreal. The whole topography of these cities is undergoing a change. It is a slow change, and the money invested in real estate is a long-term investment, so that it is very important that the house should be of equal livability value ten, fifteen, or twenty years from now. Unless you see to it that the district in which your houses are built does not become a blighted area by the construction of some obnoxious industry; unless the municipality passes enabling legislation to zone the area, then you will run into great danger that the money so spent will be lost and the houses so built will deteriorate.

There is another matter with regard to this clause which has not been mentioned. I refer to the outright renting of houses; the building of houses for rent and not for home owners. There is a large class of people in Canada, varying from time to time, who rent houses instead of owning them. There are young men who will come back and want to get married and to occupy one of those "wee white dream houses" that the national war finance committee spoke about in one of its advertisements in connection with the last victory loan. That is all right; but a man entering into business may often find himself tied up with long-term obligations in connection with the purchase of a house He may find after a year or two in one municipality or one location that he is offered a much better job elsewhere, but he is obligated over a long term for the house he now occupies. He finds that buying and selling houses involves the loss of a great deal of principal value. He may have made payments for four or five years, and in selling a house in one municipality and buying a house in another he may find that his savings have gone out of the window. This is a consideration that has not been taken note of in this bill, the building of houses for rental. It has not been given sufficient consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is provided for in part II.

Mr. ADAMSON: Briefly provided for in part II.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. ADAMSON: It is one of the most important things. I will not take up more time, but I wish to emphasize the importance of seeing to it that the houses which are built are built in accordance with a definite plan uder the municipality.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I say something about community planning. I am surprised that hon. members have even suggested that we have not gone just about the limit in trying to encourage community and town planning. We have been doing that for years This bill lays tremendous emphasis on it. Take section 12. The hon. member said that slum clearance projects should be developed in accordance with a plan. Subsection 2 of section 12 states:

> A grant shall be made under this section only if:
> (a) the land is acquired and cleared and is to be developed in accordance or in harmony with an official community plan, satisfactory to the minister.

Moreover, it must be satisfactory to the province because paragraph (c) of subsection 2 of section 12 states:

> The acquisition and clearing of the land by the municipality have been approved by the government of the province concerned.

Mr. ADAMSON: I would enlarge that and make it approved by the federal government too.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has to be approved by the federal government too. That is the very fundamental of it. The municipality, the province and the federal government have to agree. It must be with the approval of the governor in council as set out in line 26 on page 14 of the bill. Therefore we have provided for everything for which the hon. gentleman has asked.

Let me say something about the emphasis that this bill lays on community planning, because criticisms have been made two or three times that we ought to lay more emphasis on community planning. When I made a statement a few weeks ago forecasting several of the provisions which the new bill would contain, I laid particular emphasis on the importance of and need for community planning; said that our new legislation would be specially designed to encourage municipalities and metropolitan areas throughout the country to adopt official community plans by withholding the provisions extending the term of loan to thirty years from communities and areas which had not adopted satisfactory community plans and adequate zoning restrictions; urged provincial governments immediately to see that they had adequate enabling legislation on their statute books to permit municipalities to prepare and adopt official community plans; and urged municipal authorities immediately to set about the preparation of sound plans for their own communities. We had already done considerable work on community planning and given considerable assistance to municipalities in connection with community planning through the national housing administration of my department, and immediately after I made the announcement referred to we added to our staff one of the best known and most competent town planning engineer available in this country. When I announced the appointment of this official, Mr. John S. Galbraith, I gave a release to the press, in which, amongst other things, I stated:

> I must emphasize that it is not the dominion's function to prepare or be responsible in any way for specific projects or community plans. Provincial governments should see that there is enabling authority on the statute books to allow municipalities to take the necessary steps to develop and enforce strict zoning ordinances and sound community plans, but the people of each community through their local authorities and planning boards or commissions must be responsible for the working out of specific plans or projects adapted to the needs and conditions of the particular community.
> Officials of the national housing administration will be prepared to assist municipalities in their planning to the extent of explaining to municipal officials and boards or commissions and to the general public the benefits to be derived from community planning, the principles underlying such planning and in a general way the methods and procedures which might appropriately be followed. Mr. Galbraith's duties will fall primarily in this field.

In connection with this general matter of community planning and the development of sound housing, I might also refer to the fact that some years ago my department, in co-operation with the national research council, promoted the appointment of a representative committee to look into the whole situation in regard to municipal building codes and to prepare recommendations in regard to satisfactory building codes which could be adopted by municipal authorities. As a result of the working of this committee extending over two or three years, we issued in 1941 a model building code and distributed it for the guidance of municipalities which wished to adopt more scientific and more up-to-date building codes. Of course, the dominion has no jurisdiction in this field whatsoever and all it could do was to assist by way of information, advice and cooperation. Some municipalities have made modifications in their building codes as a result of the publication of this model code, but there are many who believe that the municipalities could go a great deal further in improving their existing codes in a way that would ensure both sounder housing construction, and, more important, lower cost.

Now, if hon. members will study the bill carefully, they will find that it is shot through and through with the idea and necessity of community planning. In paragraph 30 of section 2, "official community plan" is defined as "a master plan of community development and land utilization prepared by a local planning authority and legally adopted by or on behalf of a municipality". In paragraph 1 of subsection 2 of section 4, it is provided that joint loans under part I of the act shall be made for a term not in excess of twenty years, except that in the case of a house to be constructed in an area which, in the opinion of the minister, is adequately protected by community planning and appropriate zoning restrictions, the loan may be for a period up to thirty years. The purpose of this paragraph is, of course, to give every encouragement possible to municipalities to plan their areas and to the people of such communities to bring pressure to bear on their authorities to see that adequate community plans and zoning restrictions are adopted. Again in the case of ordinary rental housing, there is a provision—paragraph (h) of subsection 2 of section 8—which provides that loans of this type shall be for a term not in excess of twenty years except that in the case of a project to be constructed in an area which, in the opinion of the minister, is adequately protected by community planning and zoning restrictions, the loan may be for a term up to twenty-five years.

Section 9 deals with low rental housing projects constructed by limited-dividend housing corporations. Before loans are made to such curporations, evidence must be presented, satisfactory to the minister, "of the need for the said project, by reason of shortage, overcrowding, congestion or the substandard character of existing housing accommodation in the municipality or the metropolitan area in which the said project is to be situated," and it must be demonstrated that the area in which the project is to be situated has, in the opinion of the minister, been adequately planned and that zoning regulations are "sufficient to ensure the suitability of the area for the said project throughout the term of the loan."

Under section 11, which deals with rental projects developed, owned and managed by life insurance companies and other designated, approved lending institutions, the minister must be supplied with certain information, including maps showing the location of the land and the structures thereon and must be satisfied that the project to be constructed will be in accordance or in harmony with a satisfactory official community plan.

Section 12, which provides for substantial grants to municipalities by the dominion in connection with slum clearance is designed solely to assist in the clearance, replanning, rehabilitation and modernization of slum areas or blighted or substandard areas, and no such grant is to be made unless the land which is being acquired and cleared is to be developed in accordance with or in harmony with an official community plan satisfactory to the minister.

Finally, part V of the act deals wholly with problems of housing research and community planning. It first places upon the minister a responsibility to cause investigations to be made into housing conditions and steps to be taken for the distribution of information leading to "the construction or provision of more adequate and improved housing accommodation and the understanding and adoption of community plans in Canada." It then goes on to outline measures to be taken by the minister for carrying out this responsibility, amongst which are the following:

1. The preparation and distribution of information, not only by means of booklets, but also by public lectures, to promote "an understanding of the advisability of and the principles underlying land, community and regional planning";

2. The preparation of studies on land utilization and community planning and the making of arrangements for the "furnishing of information and advice with regard to the establishment of community planning agencies and the planning of regional areas, communities and subdivisions in cooperation with any local or other authority having jurisdiction over community and land subdivisions or otherwise, with a view to promoting coordination between local community planning and the development of public services"; and

3. The making of provision, in such manner as he deems advisable, directly or in cooperation with any other department or agency of the government of Canada, with the government of any province or with any university, educational institution or person for promoting training in the construction and designing of houses, in land planning or community planning or in the management or operation of housing projects.

A mere reference to these provisions of the bill seems to suggest that those who criticize it on its failure to emphasize community planning either have not studied the bill or have failed to understand the constitutional limitations of the dominion's jurisdiction in respect of this matter. In my opinion we have gone as far as we reasonably can to promote, encourage and assist in the better planning of our municipalities, and it is my earnest hope that the provincial and municipal authorities which have jurisdiction in the matter will respond to the lead which we have given and accept the cooperation which we are prepared to give.

Mr. ADAMSON: That statement was made to the press, was it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, just a very short portion at the beginning, with reference to the appointment of Mr. Galbraith; that is what was given to the press. Most of it I am giving to-day for the first time.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am glad to have it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister expressed some doubt as to whether it would be possible to get life insurance companies and other lending institutions to advance money for the construction of houses under this bill. I believe the minister's anxiety is well founded, because, after all, a guarantee of two and a half per cent is not very practical or attractive for companies which have rather heavy commitments to their policy holders. If the money is not forthcoming under this bill the minister will be in an awkward position with respect to housing. He is going to have a plan for a most attractive body—for I think everyone must grant that the outline he has given constitutes a most attractive body—without any means of pumping the lifeblood into that body.

I do not wish to elaborate this point at the present time, but I suggest that the minister might have organized a dominion body somewhat similar to the bank for granting industrial loans, and might have supplied the money for that body from the Bank of Canada. Then this money could have been advanced through the provinces and municipalities to prospective builders of houses, at very low rates of interest; I think perhaps two and a half per cent would not have been too low. If I were to make a suggestion to the minister for the future it would be along that line. I believe the hon. member for Yorkton referred to what is being done in Russia and the United States. I do not profess to be familiar in any detail with what either of these countries is doing, but I am positive that with the power the Bank of Canada has to create and advance money it is quite feasible for the dominion to build up a loan company or a housing corporation or an organization under some suitable name which would be able, through the provinces and the municipalities, to advance all the money necessary for the building of houses, so that these beautiful plans the minister has laid can be carried out to the great blessing of the Canadian people.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want the hon. gentleman to understand that I thought the lending institutions and life insurance companies would not do anything under this bill. In many respects probably the most important part of the measure is part 1, and there is no doubt that the moment the materials are available there will be a vast expansion of building and a vast amount of lending by life insurance companies and other institutions under that part of the legislation. I was confining my remarks entirely to the slum clearance projects in which we hoped to get lending institutions and limited-dividend corporations interested. The plans that we offer are different, one plan for one and one for the other. All I can say is that I am optimistic about being able to get them interested, but certainly it will not be because there is in sight an excessive return, or because an excessive return has been guaranteed. The guaranteed return is very small.

On the issue of municipal housing versus the kind of housing that we envisage under this bill, that matter can never be settled. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believe in the state operation of things; they believe in state housing. They think that is a good way to do things, and in some places, under certain conditions, it may work very well. But our experience in Canada has been very sad in that regard. Last evening we heard from two hon. members who knew something about how that worked and how the municipalities got along. We do not think our experience in the past has been such as would justify us in promoting a scheme of municipal housing. In Great Britain the municipalities are directly under the authority of the central government. Here the municipalities are under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature; they are creatures of the provinces. At the end of the last war we dealt with the provinces, not the municipalities; the provinces dealt with the municipalities, and a number of municipalities got themselves into a great deal of trouble, as the hon. member for Lincoln said last evening. He was speaking from knowledge; he went through this experience, and it was a great headache. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was an alderman of the city of Winnipeg, and I believe it is correct to say that Winnipeg was particularly successful in its housing scheme, away above the average if my information is correct. That, however, was not the experience of a great many municipalities in other parts of Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not particularly advocating that the municipalities should build and own the houses, but I see a great possibility for the municipalities to supervise the planning, construction and management of these buildings, and to assume with the provinces a certain amount of responsibility in connection with collecting the money. I believe we should take our municipalities into our confidence in carrying out this scheme.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: I believe Alberta was the province that took the least advantage of the National Housing Act, for reasons with which the minister is familiar. Is there anything in this legislation that will make it more likely that the people of Alberta will be able to take advantage of this measure for the construction of homes? That is one question I should like to ask. The other is this. Up to the present time the city of Edmonton has issued about 650 permits for the construction of houses in that city. Will those who have already taken out their permits benefit in any way under this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know the conditions under which the permits were granted. If they were granted for the construction of specific houses, for which the builders had to submit plans, I presume those plans have been submitted and all arrangements have been made. I do not think any lending under the housing act takes place in Alberta at the moment, so that I presume those people will go ahead in accordance with their present plans. Perhaps the answer to the other question, as to whether there is any better chance of Alberta coming under this legislation, should be left until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

WORKERS BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

The house in committee on bill No. 90, to incorporate Workers Benevolent Association of Canada—Mr. Maybank—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 1, 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Power.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the hon. member proposing this bill give us an explanation?

Mr. MAYBANK: I intended to do that on the third reading but I can do it now just as well. This is merely an application for a charter. The bill received second reading, as hon. members will recall, and was referred to the banking and commerce committee and it has been reported back from that committee.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 157, for the relief of Everett Roy Clow.—Mr. Douglas.

Bill No. 158, for the relief of Elmore MacLean MacKay.—Mr. Douglas.

Bill No. 172, for the relief of Ruth Usher Garson.—Mr. Factor.

Bill No. 173, for the relief of Albert Daniel Joseph Doherty.—Mr. Fulford.

HOUSING

PROVISION FOR LOANS FOR CONSTRUCTION, REPAIR, ALTERATION, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of bill No. 183, to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, the improvement of housing and living conditions, and the expansion of employment in the post-war period—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 12 carry?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Edmonton East asked whether loans could be made under this legislation in Alberta. There are two provisions in the bill which make it more likely that loans will be made in Alberta under this legislation than under the existing legislation. The definition of "lending institution" will be found in paragraph 22 of section 2. It reads:

> (22) "lending institution" means a loan, insurance, trust or other company or corporation, trustee of trust funds, building society, credit union or other cooperative credit society authorized to lend money on the security of real or immovable property.

The institutions which have been added cover some that would be in Alberta. It is more probable that local institutions will lend money, but I do not say that outside institutions will not lend money in Alberta. They ceased doing so some years ago owing to the treatment which certain outside creditors received. It may be that their attitude will change, but I do not know about that. There is another amendment to the act which has some bearing on the probabilities. Subsection 2 of section 6 reads:

> In any case where the minister deems it in the public interest, he may on behalf of His Majesty, purchase all the right, title and interest of an approved lending institution in any joint loan or in any security taken for the repayment thereof.

If discriminatory or confiscatory legislation or anything of the kind were passed that affected outside lending institutions, the crown in the right of the dominion could take over the mortgage and be not subject to the provisions of that legislation. This may have the effect of encouraging lending institutions to lend in Alberta.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Before the dinner recess I said a few words in connection with slum clearance, but the minister did not seem to think I knew what I was talking about. I have a few figures I should like to put on the record. This section deals with slum clearance, but I say that it will never do the job it is supposed to do. Slum clearance cannot be carried on as a private enterprise; it has to be done in a different way altogether. Another point is that you must have some place for the people to go to when you carry out your slum clearance. If you are going to clear a space you must provide the people living there with other decent living conditions. It is not sufficient just to clear away the slums; you must provide decent surroundings, and playgrounds for the children. You must have low rentals; you must have a decent development, including playgrounds for the children and all that sort of thing, and you must have education among those who dwell in this new development so that they will not want to go back to slums again. It is not just a question of having people move from one building to another; they must be educated to appreciate these nicer surroundings. It will not do just to provide them with quarters to live in.

When I was speaking before six o'clock I had touched on what is being done in the United States. I intend to give a few more figures. The advisory committee on housing in Toronto is composed of Mrs. J. W. Bundy, Mr. F. D. Tolchard, Lieutenant-Colonel E. H. Marani, Mr. L. M. Wood and Mr. E. W. Sinfield. These people have always been interested in low-cost housing for the purpose of clearing slums, so that they know what they are talking about. Before the committee rose at six o'clock, I gave the estimated cost of doing some clearing of slums that has to be done in the city of Toronto. There are 900 rear and alley dwellings, assessed at $900,000, to be cleared away. Then they acquire ten blocks, containing 900 houses, assessed at $1,800,000. I am giving these figures to show how the thing works out. That makes a total of $2,700,000. The government pays half of that, or say $1,300,000. The estimated cost of putting up in place 1,800 new dwelling units is $4,050,000. That makes a total cost of $5,350,000 for the project, of which the dominion government pays $1,300,000, and the city or whoever buys the property pays the remainder.

Let us take taxes in the city of Toronto at 3½ per cent. The house costs $2,250 and the lot $722, or a total of $2,972. Try to build a house now for $2,250. You may be able to do it after the war when prices come down. The limited-dividend company will have to borrow the money at three per cent. I have allowed nothing for upkeep. Repayment over a period of forty years will amount to 4 per cent, without upkeep at all. So that we have taxes 3½ per cent, interest 3 per cent, and repayment 4 per cent, or a total of 10½ per cent, and remember that that does not include upkeep. The total cost of the house and lot is $2,972, and 10½ per cent of that gives a rental of aproximately $311, or practically $26 a month. That is not a low-cost house either. You cannot have low-cost housing; you cannot have slum clearance unless you give something to the slum people by way of education. You have to give them slum rentals, in the meantime they have to have some place where they can go, and if you do not give them slum rentals in nice surroundings they will go back to slum conditions. You have to give them some education.

I have received some information from the executive department of the division of housing at 80 Centre street, New York city. This is a summary of their views, and I am not going to go into the question of limited-dividend companies because I do not think we are interested in that at the moment. I am dealing now with the local housing authorities and what is to be done to meet the situation. Let me say that $26 a month is not a slum rental. As the minister said, he expects people to pay about one-fifth of their income a year in rent. Of course one-fifth of the income of a man who has only a low income is a very much larger amount to him than one-fifth of the income of a man drawing $1,500 or $2,000 a year. The man with the bigger income has so much more left. I have been very much interested in this matter. I have studied conditions in my own riding in the city of Toronto and I know what has to be done. But it cannot be done under this plan of the government's. So far as this plan is concerned it is just so much camouflage. Now I quote from the summary. It is headed "local housing authorities" and reads:

> The United States housing act embodies a plan for producing new housing at rents equivalent to those charged in the slums. It accomplishes this by authorizing the federal government to perform two separate financial functions; that of banker and that of donor of annual rent subsidies. As banker, the USHA loans to the local housing authority, by purchase of its bonds, up to ninety per cent of the capital cost of a project. After a project is completed, the USHA assumes its second financial function. It grants annual subsidies in an amount sufficient to cover the difference between the annual cost (economic rent) and the rent which low-income families can afford to pay.
> Local authorities were forbidden by the USHA to place any mortgages on public housing projects.
> At first timidly, but then, as time passed, with increasing confidence, banks, insurance companies, and private investors have been buying local housing authority bonds. The financial arrangement originally contemplated, under which ninety per cent of the capital funds were provided by the federal government and ten per cent by the investing public, has gradually been changed so that to-day it is not uncommon to have eighty per cent of the capital funds provided by the investing public and only twenty per cent by the federal government. Local housing authorities are able to market bonds running up to the year 1985 and they sell these bonds at interest costs which average less than two per cent. The way has thus been paved for establishing the public housing programme of the post-war era on a basis of financing which will relieve the federal government almost wholly of the responsibility for providing the capital funds.

I give that as an example of confidence. They grant subsidies, or, as the summary says, "annual subsidies in an amount sufficient to cover the difference between the annual cost (economic rent) and the rent which low-income families can afford to pay." I have given these figures to show that you cannot possibly do that under this legislation. I have taken the figures of the National Housing Act, which allows four per cent of the cost for repayment, without any upkeep at all. I think all my figures are correct, and I come to the conclusion that $26 a month is as low as you can go in a slum clearance project. It is based on an investigation by prominent men in the city of Toronto. I have had some experience in this housing business for a long time. As I told the minister last night, I have been connected with a Toronto housing company, and we have tried to do a good job, but the only reason why we have been able to keep our rents down is that the projects which we put up years ago were erected at a very much lower cost than would be required to-day, or even within the last fifteen years. That is why we have been able to maintain low rents; nevertheless we are losing money. The only solution of slum clearance is through some kind of subsidy by the federal government or other governments. After all, the government is not giving anything away by granting money at three per cent, because it can raise money at less than that rate. I admit that the government, by making these grants, is doing a good job in facilitating slum clearance, but that is part of the national job which should be done.

I do not wish to criticize this bill too much; I believe it has some excellent features; but I could not let it pass without pointing out these things.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Could the Minister give us any idea whether the treasury branches in Alberta would be acceptable as one type of approved lending institutions?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are not within the definition of "lending institution."

Mr. BLACKMORE: I gathered from the minister that an institution which is taking care of funds in trust is within the definition. The treasury branches would certainly qualify under that heading.

Mr. COLDWELL: It seems to me that the hon. member for Lethbridge is right. Surely the treasury branches of Alberta gather funds from the people; they are supported by the provincial government; and they would be in very much the same position as, although of course of a different type to, credit unions. Credit unions accumulate funds of members of a union, and in this particular case the treasury branches are accumulating funds of the people of Alberta. I should think they would come under "lending institutions."

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think they are authorized to lend funds on the security of real estate.

Mr. COLDWELL: Since we are talking about various types of houses, may I ask a question which has been asked of me and which I have been unable to answer. I think it will require only a yes or no. I am asked if a group of people wishing to erect an apartment building cooperatively with a view to occupying it would come under this bill. It will be a small building containing half a dozen suites.

Mr. ILSLEY: They will qualify as a borrower. They can borrow.

Mr. COLDWELL: They can qualify as borrowers if they are building such a building?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is all I want to know.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We people of Alberta are vitally concerned in this matter. We are part of the Dominion of Canada and we are entitled to the privileges and benefits which come from dominion legislation—

Mr. GRAYDON: You are a pretty good part of Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —even though we do have our own way of going about things—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Especially in elections.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —which troubles some people in this country. I am trying to find out if there is any way whereby our province can avoid being discriminated against under this legislation. Supposing we organize a co-operative housing organization under the government's directions in Alberta. Would we be able to qualify for assistance?

Mr. ILSLEY: The definition includes a cooperative credit society authorized to lend money on the security of real or immovable property. It does not mean that every institution which comes within the definition here would be an authorized lending institution. The dominion government says which ones it will approve and which ones it will not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The dominion government would accept the minister's advice on the matter, I imagine?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I think they would.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We just want to mention it to the minister now so that he will have a chance to think it over. I have indicated three or four times that we have ideas of our own as to how things can be accomplished between the dominion and the provinces. If an individual province could organize a cooperative housing scheme and the dominion government would support that scheme with funds, great advantage would accrue to the province and the dominion in the matter of building houses. Would the minister be ready to consider any scheme if it just happens to be off the beaten track or a little bit unorthodox?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would give consideration to it.

Mr. ADAMSON: A cooperative could undertake construction, surely.

Sections 13 and 14 agreed to.

On section 15—Contract with manufacturer of component parts of houses for experimental production.

Mr. LOCKHART: I should like a little explanation of what is meant there by contracting by the government with manufacturers.

Mr. ILSLEY: I gave a pretty full explanation when I introduced the resolution. I shall have to give the explanation again.

Mr. LOCKHART: Just briefly.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was quite fully explained. This section authorizes the government to enter into contracts with manufacturers to assure them of the sale of a large quantity of output in order to get the cost of these articles down. The main trouble about getting the cost down of component parts of houses and so forth of a certain type suitable to rural homes is that the manufacturer does not know how many he will be able to sell.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. LOCKHART: Do you not think a manufacturer knows now what is required to build rural homes, urban homes and any other kind of homes? What I am trying to find out is if the intent and purpose of this clause is to develop prefabricated homes and that type of thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that is not it at all.

Mr. LOCKHART: The Postmaster General shakes his head. I am not sure about that.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that is not so.

Mr. LOCKHART: Standardized designs?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is what I said in introducing the resolution, as reported in Hansard, at pages 5978 and 5979:

> In part III of the housing legislation, which I am now discussing, we are taking another step forward by authorizing the minister to enter into contracts with manufacturers for the experimental production of plumbing and heating equipment and other component parts of houses. Actually we have already encouraged building equipment manufacturers to devote extensive study to the development of standardized units of equipment which would have high efficiency and low cost. This clause will enable us to push this type of encouragement to a much greater extent. More important still, the bill will authorize the minister, with the approval of the governor in council, to guarantee or underwrite the sale of a specified number of standardized units of equipment or component parts manufactured for installation or use in farm or rural houses. The significance of this provision will, I think, be immediately apparent to hon. members. Let us say that as a result of extensive research an equipment manufacturer designed a bathroom unit or a heating unit specially suitable for rural homes. The manufacturer would not know whether he could sell a dozen, or a hundred, or a thousand, or ten thousand of these units to farmers, and the natural tendency would undoubtedly be to produce them on a small scale which would mean a high cost per unit. Under this new provision we could guarantee that the manufacturer would sell, say five thousand or even a larger number of the units in question and thus assure that the particular equipment would be made available to farmers at the lowest possible cost.

Mr. LOCKHART: That statement is all right, but what is the definition of "component parts"? You refer to one part of heating and equipment and "other component parts". That means the component parts that go to make up a home and in connection with which the government would be prepared to enter into an arrangement with the manufacturer of a prefabricated house or something of that sort, so that the small contractor or builder in a particular locality would be put out of business.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not mean that.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then what are other component parts?

Mr. ILSLEY: They would include every part of the house. There is no intention to get parts of a prefabricated house in that way. That is not what it means. These are manufacturers of plumbing or heating equipment "or other component parts." That is just to make it general, so that if we wish to enter into contracts for the manufacture of other parts that come under the description of plumbing or heating we may do so.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am quite satisfied to take the minister's assurance, but I felt there was some doubt about the interpretation.

Sections 16 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

On section 20—Regulations.

Mr. GRAYDON: In the matter of regulations, I have not perused the latter part of the bill. Is any provision made for the publication of these regulations in the Canada Gazette or otherwise, or what is the scheme?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is provided for in section 31.

Mr. COLDWELL: Suppose a group of people were able to build a house themselves. Suppose they got the materials and proceeded cooperatively to build it. They have little in the way of labour costs. Would they be permitted to build under those conditions?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That is a new feature of this bill, that the labour of the owner may be taken into account in arriving at the lending value.

Section agreed to.

Sections 21 to 23 inclusive agreed to.

On section 24—Ministerial investigations into housing conditions.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the dinner recess the minister replied to the criticism that some of us on this side of the house had made that there was a lack of planning in this housing legislation, and in his reply he referred to the many places in the bill where the phrases "town planning" and "community planning" appear, and also in particular to this part V which we are about to consider. I want him to know that before we made the criticism we offered, we—some of us at any rate—had studied the bill closely and were fully aware of all these references in it. My point is that the effect of this legislation will be determined not by the use of words in reference to town planning and community planning but by the financial provisions of the bill; and when one studies those provisions I feel that they have not the effect in regard to planning, so far as attempting to meet our housing needs in the immediate post-war period is concerned, which we should like. The results will be quite haphazard. Houses will be built under this legislation not according to the report of the James committee or of other committees, not according to the needs which may be specified by the municipalities that are closest to the problem, but according to the results of the assistance being given financial institutions under the bill. It is on that basis that we criticized the bill as not being founded on the concept of planning; nevertheless we welcome the part of the bill to which we have come.

Mr. ILSLEY: What does the hon. gentleman mean? Does he mean that we should pay the municipalities to make plans, or that we should make plans ourselves over the heads of municipalities and pay the costs?

Mr. KNOWLES: I mean that there should be cooperation between this government and the municipalities in drafting plans and deciding where houses are to be built according to the needs which have already been specified and laid down, and that there should be a definite subsidy, definite federal contributions toward the cost of building houses under public housing authorities.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In other words, we want to know whether money will be the servant or the master. If it is the master we shall not have very many houses; if it is the servant we shall have plenty of houses.

Mr. CHURCH: I hope the minister will investigate in Toronto the private company which was appointed toward the end of the last war to provide housing accommodation. I was head of the city at the time and it was one of the most mischievous institutions we have ever had. They built no houses but built apartments at high rentals, so that they did not relieve the housing situation at all. I would ask the minister to make an investigation under section 24, which provides for ministerial investigations into housing conditions. They had good intentions and did public work, but I am sorry to say I really do not believe that the housing situation was assisted at that time.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That calls for some remarks from myself, if the committee will permit me. It only goes to show what misconception there is about the institution in question. About that time there were two institutions, one called the housing commission, set up in Toronto by the government. It was an absolute failure. The city had to take over the whole thing and it lost a lot of money. Up until the last few years the Toronto Housing company has given housing at low rents. Hon. gentlemen to my left have asked about planning. I suppose that this man I was talking about to-night, Mr. L. M. Wood, has done more in connection with the planning of houses and all that sort of thing in Toronto than any other man. Because of the difficulties we got into I must defend myself. I have been a director of the company without any remuneration for about twenty years. I would suggest that the Toronto housing commission be investigated, not the Toronto Housing company.

Mr. CHURCH: The board of control and our officials also know about it all. This company put it over the city. It cost the city a lot of money.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. CHURCH: Hon. members may laugh. The company had good intentions no doubt, but they never did a thing for housing. The company was formed and it had a provincial charter. What did it do to relieve the housing situation? It did nothing. Some of it is in my riding. I could tell you what the rents are. I would ask the minister to investigate that city company to see if it is the policy of the government to carry on the old principle under which private companies are appointed to relieve the housing situation. They did nothing to relieve the housing situation.

A national bill is a good thing if it does not wind up by allowing private companies to charge fabulous rates for housing.

Mr. COLDWELL: It seems to me that our hon. friends to my immediate right should get together and define what they mean by "semi-philanthropic".

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister said that he might have some slight difficulty in getting the life insurance companies to invest their money if they were guaranteed only 2½ per cent. May I suggest to him how they might do some planning by which it might be possible for those companies to get more than that out of it? Under this set-up the life insurance companies through their interlocking directorates might cooperate with the lumber companies, the cement companies, the steel companies, the construction associations and government to arrange to put up some very nice $2,000 dwellings to show a cost of $4,000 with the rentals in proportion, and they might easily clean up five per cent or more on their investment.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

On section 25—General and special powers of minister.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like to ask the minister if this money will be spent in this country on a pro rata basis of the population in each province, or will it be on a haphazard distribution according to the request from each province? I ask that question because I should not like to see a repetition of the outburst of temper and prejudice we heard last night from the premier of Ontario.

Mr. GRAYDON: He had some pretty good precedents during the last two or three weeks.

Mr. DUPUIS: May I refer to paragraph 11 of section 2 of the bill which states:

> "Family of low income" means a family which receives a total family income less than five times the economic rental of a family housing unit required to provide sufficient accommodation for the said family.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, since the time of the union of lower and upper Canada most of the rich families have lived in upper Canada and a large number of the poor families in lower Canada, the province of Quebec to-day.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ross, Calgary East): I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that we are considering section 25.

Mr. DUPUIS: As a member from the province of Quebec I think I am entitled to be assured, before this bill passes, that there will not be any further outbursts of prejudice and discrimination from any other provinces. I think I am entitled to that, Mr. Chairman. May I say that during the Bennett regime hundreds of millions of dollars went to the west. We gladly contributed to it, and whenever Ontario needed special legislation to help it out we never heard a voice from Quebec raised in this chamber or outside of it against Ontario.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ross, Calgary East): I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the section under discussion.

Mr. CHURCH: Section 25 deals with the general and special powers of the minister. Housing is ninety per cent a problem of giving local services. I suggest that an investigation be made of how municipalities can help out. I wish to refer to what the city of Toronto has done. As the committee knows, before the city of Toronto owned the street railway we had housing problems there. We gave to a radius of fifteen miles light, power and transportation services. As the hon. member for St. Paul's said, we had to rely on private companies and others at the start. Public ownership solved the problem. By taking over the street railway which served only half of the old city, and by giving cheap light, water, sewers and power, and by the development of the new city in the other half we made considerable progress. We bought the street railway out; we bought out the buses; we bought out the radials, and we gave them light, power and transportation.

Under section 25, general and special powers of the minister, the minister will have authority to carry out investigations of the companies undertaking housing construction. Paragraph (b) of that section deals with studies to be made of investigations into housing conditions and housing accommodation. We should study the situation in the municipalities and see what the municipalities have done and how they can surely solve the housing problem. They have done more for housing by developing their districts, cities and towns in Canada and their agencies than anybody else, provincial or federal. The city of Toronto is just an industrial city. In the olden days a private company owned the railway up to Bloor street. That was only one-third of the present city. The city expanded up to St. Clair avenue and then up as far as York Mills. The city of Toronto had to pay the whole cost of giving transportation, light, water, power, and all civic services. We bought out the street railway which only served one-third of the old city. We bought out the privately-owned systems, the radials; there were eight or nine fares in the area now covered by the present city. What developed the city of Toronto? The building of the viaduct on Bloor street, the building of the bridge on Gerrard street, Dundas street, the high level bridge on Queen street, the waterfront improvement on which the city spent $33,000,000.

Under the general powers of the minister I hope that an investigation will be made of what the municipalities have been doing with regard to light, power and transportation and other municipal services to develop housing. Housing in Toronto has been developed by taking over the railways, as the Minister of Munitions and Supply knows, by giving water service, sewer service, buses and transportation. After all is said and done, the housing situation is ninety-five per cent a transportation, local service municipal problem. All these municipal services are given not only to the whole city of Toronto but free and without cost by Toronto to all three counties, to the riding of my hon. friend the Postmaster General, York North, right up to Richmond Hill and transportation to lake Simcoe, which aided suburban housing. In Peel, the riding of my leader, we bought all the power companies, light, power, and transportation, as well as in the county of Ontario, the riding of the chairman of the banking and commerce committee.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ross, Calgary East): Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the section under discussion.

Mr. CHURCH: I was just developing my argument how housing is assisted when you interrupted me, Mr. Chairman. We bought all the light, power and transportation in Peel, York and Ontario. It solved housing for twenty years. I hope the minister will make an investigation all over Canada into this matter because real municipal services are the key to proper housing.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to ask a question on paragraph (f) of section 25. Under this paragraph the minister merely has to study land uses. In most of the plans that have been formulated by the major metropolitan centres of this country there is a restriction on the use of land, generally speaking, in a belt around the city. In Toronto, for instance, they have copied the English system of having a green belt, in which housing of any kind is liable to be restricted. Under this section the minister merely has power to study, as I understand it, and has no power to act in any way.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right; we have no constitutional power.

Mr. ADAMSON: Under the Uthwatt report, which, of course, applies to a different constitutional situation, they have power to restrict buildings on certain types of land. In Manchester, for example, there is a definite green belt established right around the city, and we hope to do the same thing in Toronto. Under this bill, as I see it, the minister cannot be of any great assistance in the establishment of any such green belts; he merely has power to study them.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Section agreed to.

On section 26—Technical research and investigation.

Mr. MacNICOL. In paragraph (b) reference is made to the pilot-plant stage of production or development, and the testing of materials, equipment or component parts. I am afraid of a section like this. We already have many capable institutions, such as the hydro electric power commission, the university of Toronto and private engineers, all of which maintain facilities for the testing of materials and work of that kind. I should imagine that all this sort of work could be done by one or another of these agencies at much less cost, because when the government starts to run pilot plants it gets into a very devious business.

Mr. ILSLEY: This provides power to enter into contracts with other persons for the construction of pilot plants and so on.

Mr. ADAMSON: Under this section could you provide for the construction of prefabricated houses?

Mr. MacNICOL: I have not heard anyone proposing prefabrication. The men who appeared before the reconstruction committee were against the prefabrication of houses in this country. Has anyone been suggesting it to the minister, or does the programme envisage anything in connection with the prefabrication of houses?

Mr. ILSLEY: There have been suggestions.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then I will just add that the best qualified men, those who appeared before the reconstruction committee, were opposed to it and gave their reasons for that attitude.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: There has been some talk in the United Kingdom of a million prefabricated houses.

Mr. LOCKHART: This brings us back to the point that was raised previously, and this time I will confine my remarks strictly to the wording of the clause. I refer particularly to the word "fabrication" and point out that the section goes on to give the minister power to enter into contracts. Are not the manufacturers of standard building materials in this country competent to carry on their own research departments? I could mention fifty of them who are carrying on such work. Now you are going to insist on setting up another department of government to do the very thing that manufacturers of all types of construction material have been doing for half a century. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have tried to make it clear to the hon. member for Davenport that the government proposes to get other people to carry on research. The power given here is to enter into contracts with other people for carrying on research and establishing pilot plants, not to do it ourselves.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Why could not the government carry on that work itself, through the national research council?

Mr. GRAYDON: Because that would be a C.C.F. system.

Mr. COLDWELL: Simply because one suggests something that is intelligent, why should it call forth a political rejoinder?

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely we have not reached the point where it is an insult to brand anything C.C.F.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, it is a compliment. After all, there will be chaos if you have forty or fifty people endeavouring to fix a standard. That standard should be set by some competent authority which could adjudicate as between the forty or fifty others. It seems to me that this is a place where the government research organization, the national research council, could do a good job by standardizing some of the equipment and component parts.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to take into account the conflicting representations of the C.C.F. and Progressive Conservative parties on this point, and perhaps do some of each.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is all right.

Mr. ADAMSON: I think most units in connection with plumbing and heating are now standardized. I know definite steps have been taken toward that end, and great advances have been made in the last few years.

Section agreed to.

Section 27 agreed to.

On section 28—Professional, technical and other assistance.

Mr. LOCKHART: Might we have a brief explanation from the Minister of Munitions and Supply as to the point I raised yesterday in regard to the permit system? A great deal of difficulty has been experienced in getting permits to build houses, and I want to know if these permits will be facilitated now so that we can go ahead and put this bill into operation, or whether the same restrictive measures are to be continued.

Mr. HOWE: I must point out to my hon. friend something we are apt to overlook, that the war is still on and that materials are still needed to meet war requirements.

Mr. LOCKHART: We had that yesterday, when you were not here.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but it is well to speak of it often. The purpose of the Department of Munitions and Supply is to divide up the available building material in a way that will accomplish the greatest good for the greatest number. We endeavour to increase the production of building materials to the greatest possible extent and to divide those materials in such a way as to give the small home owner the preference. We have not been able to bring the supply of materials up to the full demands of the builders, unfortunately, and therefore there must be strict allocation with the objective in mind. But the minute that supply is up to the demand the restrictions will be lifted.

Mr. LOCKHART: The Minister of Finance was unable to answer my question yesterday. Then I have the assurance of the minister that the small home owner, who will probably take the greatest advantage of this bill, will be given every possible consideration in the matter of getting his permit and making use of the facilties of this legislation?

Mr. HOWE: That has been the case and will continue to be the case.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Would the minister also consider the most congested areas in connection with the granting of permits? Edmonton is one of the most highly congested areas in Canada, and I suggest that not only the small home owner but also the city which most needs the homes should be taken into consideration.

Mr. HOWE: The need for housing plays a very important part in the allocation.

Section agreed to.

On section 29—Loan insurance.

Mr. BRYCE: I am quite interested in this housing plan, because I know the tremendous number of farm homes in western Canada that require to be rebuilt and modernized. Would the minister be good enough to explain what is meant by this section? I want to be clear on that before I go back west, so that I may answer the questions I am sure to be asked. Who is to get this insurance, and how will it work? Will the minister please take a specific case and explain it?

Mr. ILSLEY: This section provides that:

> The minister may make arrangements with an insurance company or companies under which any borrower under any part of this act may purchase reducing term insurance to pay the amount of the loan made to him in the event of the death of the borrower. . . .

Then a regulation may be made to effect that end. I think the section is self-explanatory; it is for the protection of the widow or heirs of a man who dies before his mortgage is paid off. Reducing term insurance means a term insurance issued in reducing amounts; I presume it would reduce as the mortgage is reduced.

Mr. COLDWELL: Most term insurance requires a medical examination, and that might debar a person who could not pass the examination from being insured.

Mr. ILSLEY: This would be what is called a non-medical policy.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then the rate would be higher?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: If a man felt that he could pass a medical examination would he have the right to take out that type of policy at the lower rate?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think we could arrange to give him his choice. This would be group insurance; it might cover all the borrowers under the bill and probably the rate would be favourable.

Mr. BRYCE: Is it compulsory in any way.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would the taking out of a policy be compulsory, my hon. friend is asking? It says that the minister may make regulations prescribing classes of cases, but I notice that it is not mandatory.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be compulsory, or it may be compulsory only for certain cases.

Mr. COLDWELL: Classes of cases.

Mr. BENCE: May it be made a condition of the loan?

Mr. ILSLEY: In certain cases or classes of cases it may be made a condition of the loan.

Mr. BENCE: In other words, if the insurance company insisted, it would be made a condition of the loan?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not necessarily.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not unless the minister prescribed it.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; that is right.

Mr. COLDWELL: This seems to be a bill heavily loaded in favour of the insurance companies, both in lending and in every other respect. I would like to see the government extend its annuities branch. I intended to say something about that this session but it is now too late. When we examine the rates and so on of the insurance companies it would appear that there is a marked need for a publicly organized insurance corporation which at least would meet our own needs in cases of this sort. We are doing a great deal of building and putting on a number of insurance policies to spread the risk at low rates, and I think we should have our own insurance corporation set up for this kind of service. There is also soldiers' insurance to be considered.

Mr. ILSLEY: I might point out that the Curtis report advocated this type of insurance, so that we are taking the power if we find it advantageous. I do not agree that the bill is heavily weighted in favour of the insurance companies. We have reduced the rate of interest that may be charged by the lending institution. It is a very moderate rate, and we should not be accused of weighting the legislation in favour of those who have money to lend if we establish the facilities under which they can lend the money and restrict their earnings and provide that the money shall be lent in an extremely useful way.

Section 30 agreed to.

On section 31—Regulations.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is this a loophole section? It states:

> In addition to the authority elsewhere in this act conferred upon him, the governor in council may make regulations for any purpose for which regulations are to be made under this act.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a very innocent section. If the bill says that such and such a thing can be done by regulation, this section provides that the body that is to make the regulation shall be the governor in council.

Mr. COLDWELL: It gives no additional power?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It might be a good idea to have a consolidation of the regulations issued from time to time, because there are bound to be many changes in them and it is difficult to follow them.

Section agreed to.

On section 32—Coming into force.

Mr. GRAYDON: When does the minister expect that this legislation will finally come into force?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a great demand for part I and we shall have to proclaim that very soon, and possibly some of the other parts as well although they may be proclaimed at different times. The activity under the bill will be severely restricted by shortages of materials; nevertheless we intend to make it effective as soon as possible, at least part I.

On section 5—Orders and regulations by governor in council.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the minister anything to say on the point that was raised at the time these two sections were allowed to stand? The minister was to check on the wording.

Mr. ILSLEY: I introduced an amendment this afternoon.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

He said: I do not know whether I should take up the time, but there has been some criticism of the scope of the bill on the ground that it is insufficient to meet the needs of the situation. I think those who criticize the bill on that ground fail to understand the provisions of the bill and of certain collateral legislation which has been enacted by or is now before this parliament, and have also failed to consider the appropriate parliamentary procedures in respect of appropriations of money out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Some hon. members have referred to the report of the subcommittee on housing and community planning of the advisory committee on reconstruction and have pointed out that this subcommittee recommended that a complete urban housing programme must contemplate the construction of 600,000 units in the first post-war decade, and that a minimum rural housing programme would require an additional 125,000 units. These are very high figures, and others have estimated that at least 300,000 housing units will be required, although it is true that there are some who think that even the figures given in the Curtis report are too low. The first thing to emphasize is that those who are making these estimates are talking, not about the first year or two after the war, but about the ten years following the termination of hostilities.

I am quite sure that if we brought down a bill that asked parliament to appropriate one or two billions of dollars for housing purposes over the next ten years, some hon. members who are now criticizing the appropriations asked for in this bill would criticize us, and I would say they would do so with a great deal of justification, for endeavouring to bind the hands of parliament over so long a period and for giving the executive arm of government so large an appropriation which could only be spent over a long period of years. The principle we have followed is, I think, a very much sounder one. We have asked for what in our opinion is a very substantial appropriation, but it is one which is intended to take care of, say the next two or three years. It is asked for, moreover, in the full knowledge that if after a year, or two or three years, more funds are required, the government of the day can go back to parliament and ask for any further appropriations that may be required. These appropriations can then be made if parliament is satisfied, after a full review of experience under this measure, that the principles which it embodied are sound and desirable. That is my first point.

My second point is that the appropriations for which we are now asking will make possible a huge volume of construction in the next two or three years. Under part I of the bill we are asking for $100 millions which, as the house knows, means total joint loans of $400 million and a total building construction somewhat in excess of that amount. Under part II we are asking an appropriation of $50 million for loans for rental housing purposes. If all these loans should take the form exclusively of joint loans with lending institutions under section 8 of the bill, this would mean total joint loans of $200 million and a volume of building construction probably considerably in excess of that amount. For the sake of this argument, however, let us assume that half of this appropriation goes into loans to limited-dividend housing corporations and only the remaining half into joint loans for ordinary rental housing. This would make possible a total volume of house building of something in excess of $125 million. I have now reached a total figure of at least $525 million and perhaps something in excess of that up to $600 million.

In addition, however, part II provides for investments in rental housing projects by life insurance companies and certain other designated approved lending institutions. If these institutions should take full advantage of the enabling powers thereby granted, we would have an additional volume of house building of a value something between $150 million and $200 million.

To this should be added, of course, the grants up to a maximum of $20 million for slum clearance purposes. I showed that the terms of the section really make possible the acquisition of land in municipalities to the amount of $80 million to provide the location for moderate or low-cost housing projects. I went into that this afternoon and showed that the $20 million contributed by us is only a start on this project.

In regard to rural housing, some hon. members have apparently overlooked the fact that the loans for rural housing are to be made out of the appropriation of $100 million provided for in part I of the bill which, as I have already indicated, makes possible total joint loans of $400 million.

The appropriation of $5 million provided for in part III of the bill is merely for the purpose of covering the government's direct or contingent liabilities arising out of the contracts which it may enter into for the purpose of ensuring the production and sale at low cost of standardized units or components of houses intended to be sold to residents of rural areas.

In part IV of the bill we provide that the government may guarantee loans up to $100 million for the purpose of making repairs, alterations and additions to urban homes.

Adding all these appropriations together, and excluding the appropriations which will be necessary for carrying on the administration of the bill and which will be provided for in the main or supplementary estimates year by year, we get a total appropriation requested by the new bill of $275 million; but, as I have indicated, this appropriation will make possible a total volume of house building, housing repair and land clearance of at least $665 to $740 million, to which of course should be added another $150 to $200 million made possible by section 11 of the bill which enables life insurance companies and certain other approved lending institutions to buy land and develop thereon rental housing projects.

All this, however, does not take into account the fact that in the farm improvement loans bill we provided for the guarantee of loans to be made by banks up to a total amount of $250 million for the purpose of buying machinery and equipment, rural electrification and the making of other permanent improvements in connection with farms. I think it is beyond doubt that a substantial portion of this large amount will go not only for the repair, renovation and reequipment of farm houses but also for the building of new houses and of labourers' cottages on farms.

Finally, hon. members will note the substantial impetus which we are giving to the construction of new houses and the repair of old houses in connection with the veterans' reestablishment programme, the resolution in respect of which was discussed this morning.

When all these things are considered, I think it can safely be said that Canada is making preparation more adequate than, or at least as adequate as, the preparation made or being made by any other country to take care of the housing problem during the transition period immediately following the war.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask the leader of the opposition a question? I can take the industrial development bank bill now if there is no objection, but if there is any objection I will let it stand because notice was not given.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have been canvassing the situation with respect to the industrial development bank bill and I find that there are one or two of our members who perhaps would like to have it left over. But the feeling is not sufficiently strong that, if the minister feels he wants to get ahead with it, we will object.

Mr. ILSLEY: Thank you.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL CREDIT FACILITIES FOR FIXED AND WORKING CAPITAL

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on bill No. 7, to incorporate the Industrial Development Bank.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. McCann in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When the aeronautics bill was before the house the Minister of Munitions and Supply mentioned that the bill would take care of the men returning from overseas by helping to set them up in the air transport business. The way I look at it, this bill will not cover that. I should like the minister to clarify the minister's statement on that. Also will he state what the floor is to these loans and what the ceiling is to be? In the banking and commerce committee I believe it was mentioned that as much as $15 million would be made in a loan. If that is to be done, it certainly is not going to look after our returned men. It will not benefit the little fellow; it will take care of big business, as some people thought. I know this was discussed in the banking and commerce committee, but it should be brought out in this chamber. The bill will not be of much benefit to the boys returning from overseas, who will want, not a million dollars, but fifteen or twenty thousand dollars, or perhaps less.

Mr. ILSLEY: The loans which can be made under this bill can be made only to industrial enterprises.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

(d) "industrial enterprise" means a business in which the manufacture, processing or refrigeration of goods, wares and merchandise or the building of ships or vessels or the generating or distributing of electricity is carried on;

I did not hear the speech of my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply to which the hon. member refers, and I should not like to comment on it unless I see a report of it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then this, definitely, would not cover aviation?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would cover the manufacture of aeroplanes; it would not cover operation.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It would not cover the operation of an air line?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it would not.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Absolutely not?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Well, the Minister of Munitions and Supply made that statement. I have not my Hansard here, but he made that statement to the house, and I just wanted the minister to inform me whether that is right or not. Will the minister tell us what the ceiling of these loans will be, and what the floor will be? The floor, I believe is $5,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no floor. As to $85 million of the money lent the ceiling is $200,000; as to the remaining $15 million there is no ceiling.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then the remaining $15 million could be lent to just one enterprise?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but if they lent it to one, it would be the only loan over $200,000 they would give in the whole course of their existence. It would be ridiculous.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I agree with the minister on that.

Mr. CHURCH: On the first section of the bill, the short title, I raise the same objection which I did when it was first introduced. This bill went to the banking and commerce committee, and in that committee there was a wide difference of opinion as to the principle of the bill, its functions, scope and object. If the bill was to have any effect, the industrial development bank would immediately swallow up and liquidate all the shark loan companies which have been running all over Canada for the past ten years, charging interest of two per cent per month to civilians and soldiers.

During the discussion of the bill in committee I do not notice here now the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, whom I call "the admiral of the bay of Quinte", but he raised a very important principle. He was asked by the likable, learned and able man who is the deputy minister, Doctor Clark, about this first clause of the bill, "Does the hon. member think he knows more about banking than I do?"—which is a very humorous remark. I wish to point out to the minister that if it were proposed that this bank could lend money without security it would be a very fine thing; is there anybody who does not want to borrow money without security? Why does not the minister lend some money under the bill to those who are in the house and those who are out of it who write us? We are to lend money under this new project of an industrial development bank, which does not develop anything, is not industrial and is not a bank at all. The lending is a straight gift, that is all it is.

My hon. friends here who are laughing on my right should get up and oppose the bill and say something. The hon. member for York West is here this evening; I can tell him—and I speak what I know—that in his riding there are shark loan companies charging two per cent a month. What do they do? Their practices are the same as the principle of this bill. They take a chattel mortgage from those who seek a loan; they take a bill of sale on goods and chattels for security to protect their two per cent a month charge.

What is the principle of the bill? If it were to swallow up all these various loan companies which are operating under federal charter and replace them by the industrial development bank, it would be a good thing and a blessing. But it is not. They are not doing that at all, and the existing banks and loan companies can do the business.

This is not a bank at all. We are simply lending money without security. It is a violation of the British North America Act and contrary to the interests of provincial institutions. There is no security for the advances made. It does not aid industrial workers at all. The industrial workers are the forgotten men, and although we on this side of the house are supported by the votes of the industrial workers we do nothing here to protect them, under this or any other bill.

I object to the principle of the bill as set out in the preamble. This bill commends itself neither to the judgment of the country nor to that of the small private business men who are victimized by the shark loan companies without a chance to rehabilitate themselves, and wind up by being swallowed up in this bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like some explanation by the minister of the principle of the bill, how it affects industrial workers, and whether those people who have borrowed money from shark loan companies can qualify under this bill or not. If they cannot, the bill is of no effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suppose that by "shark loan companies" the hon. member means small loan companies. The reason why I say that is that he referred to these shark loan companies as being incorporated under dominion legislation, so that I suppose he means that they are companies governed by the Small Loans Act. Now, small loan companies make personal loans; they do not make loans to industrialists for industrial purpose, and therefore borrowers from the small loan companies would not be able to transfer their borrowing to the industrial development bank.

Mr. CHURCH: It will be a bank without security, reminding one of "The man who broke the bank at Monte Carlo."

Mr. MacNICOL: This section begins:

In this act, unless the context otherwise requires. . . .

And then:

(d) "industrial enterprise" means a business in which . . . the generating or distributing of electricity is carried on.

What is the basis of writing into this clause the last line I quoted with regard to the generating or distribution of electricity? Is it the intention of this programme to initiate or permit or induce the production of electricity?

Mr. ILSLEY: It simply means that power companies and distribution companies may come to the bank for a loan if they wish, or an advance under the terms of the bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does it mean that some company or plant or organization which is now producing electricity might come for a loan, or does it permit a new organization or a new company to come?

Mr. ILSLEY: Either. They may be carrying on business, or they may be about to do so. Section 15 provides that loans may be made to persons engaged in or about to be engaged in industrial enterprises and "industrial enterprises" include power companies or power distribution companies.

Mr. MacNICOL: So that if some organization in western Canada conceives the idea of harnessing a part of the Saskatchewan river for the production of power it can come to the bank, and if it presents sound reasons for being given the money it will be able to obtain assistance.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be eligible. It must be borne in mind that they will get loans only if credit is not available elsewhere on reasonable terms.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not able to attend the sessions of the banking and commerce committee, and I wonder whether consideration was given there to an alternative proposal that I put forward on the second reading. It was not advanced in the form of a definite proposal but rather as a suggestion for consideration by the committee. That suggestion was as to the advisability or otherwise of embarking upon a duplicate banking system across Canada as envisaged by section 8, involving staffs, branches and agents. I suggested at that time that consideration might properly be given to the question whether, by guarantee or otherwise, existing lending institutions could be utilized for the purposes of the legislation. The minister gave a detailed explanation either when the bill was introduced or perhaps on the second reading; I do not recall at which stage it was. At any rate, he discussed the question whether this guarantee or some similar system might be employed to loosen up credit—the method of government guarantees—without the duplication of services throughout Canada. One of the objections which have been made to this bill has been the fact that we are setting up a duplicate banking system to some extent. I realize that the argument may be met by the statement that it is only to a certain extent and that it does not represent anything like complete duplication. I would be inclined to demur to that argument. At any rate, I think some consideration might be given to the question. Perhaps it came up in the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was argued at great length in that committee, certain members of which were very much in favour of the government adopting the home improvement loan principle and the principle of the farm improvement loans bill instead of setting up a government bank, so to speak. But the proposal was considered months before we decided to introduce this legislation at all, and it was also debated in the house. I remember giving the reason once before, in the month of May. I am not sure that I stated it very well on that occasion and perhaps I cannot state it very well now, but the pool guarantee principle is generally regarded as more appropriate to a large number of small transactions of a more or less standardized type than to a small number of large transactions such as the ones that will be carried on by this bank. For instance, if we had adopted the other principle and one of the chartered banks made ten loans in the course of the year and the pool guarantee were applied, that we would protect them against loss up to the extent of ten per cent of those loans, I am doubtful whether it would be an inducement to the banks to make loans, because one very bad one would go beyond the ten per cent. That cannot very well happen in a very large number of small loans if reasonable care is taken. It is ten per cent in the farm improvement loans bill and five per cent under the home improvement section of the housing act, and as a matter of fact five per cent would have been abundant according to the subsequent experience under the old Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act. But I do not think that a pool guarantee of ten per cent would be any inducement to the chartered banks, nor do I think that individual guarantees of ten per cent would be an inducement or would be justifiable. As I said in the banking and commerce committee, I do not wish to lengthen too much the list of guarantees to private institutions, especially on transactions of this kind. For these big loans, to guarantee a loss up to ten per cent would not look right. It would not look right to me and I would far rather have the government go into the business itself as it does here. I would not say that, probably, if we had to set up a thousand or two thousand branches; but there would be only a few branches of this bank, maybe one in each province.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not intend to press the matter at this stage. I felt that by bringing it to the minister's attention prior to the reference of the subject to the banking and commerce committee it would at least give that committee an opportunity to study it, because they are supposed to be somewhat expert now in matters of finance, if one can judge rightly by the volume of argument that seems to reach the press and other places from time to time, through the lengthy discussions we have had this spring and summer. I would point out to the minister that on the second reading I took a rather confident course in relation to the adoption of the principle of the industrial development bank, and one of the considerations that prompted me to do so was this. There is not much use in talking about priming the pump of industry and keeping the wheels rolling unless you do something about it, and credit is one of the things that must be obtained. We might as well face it frankly. I was not quite sure that this was the best way to do it, but at least it was one way to do it. If we are to have the existing lending institutions guaranteed only for a certain amount, and if that did not prime the pump and keep the high level of national income and maximum production and expanding economy and all these things that are to be maintained when the war is over, then of course it would not meet the situation. The people of this country are going to expect that, when the war is over, there shall not be a falling off of production and national income and of the standards to which this country has now become accustomed during the war. They have tasted a new era of economy during the war. Having tasted that economy, they like to have jobs; they like to have full employment. They are insistent that this shall continue. I am one who believes that we have to see that it continues. We shall run into some pretty difficult doldrums and perhaps reach economic chaos unless this is done. It is quite a test for private enterprise, free enterprise, free initiative, or whatever you like to call it. But as I see it, that is what has to be done in Canada.

So far as this industrial bank is concerned I should like to have seen a little less duplication of the existing services, because duplication of existing services does not indicate that there will be the maximum efficiency. It was for that reason that I made the suggestion I did on that occasion. If, after close study, the banking and commerce committee has taken the position indicated by the minister, and if they felt that the other system would not meet the conditions and would not provide the remedy which I think is necessary to keep the wheels of business going, then I feel that I should bow to the decision of the committee and raise no further objection at the moment, except to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that the suggestion was made from this side of the house in an honest effort to see that if the best plan were finally adopted the suggestion might be considered at arriving at that best plan.
