Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Apropos of what the Minister of Finance has said, I understood from the governor this morning that the chartered banks were to be used to a certain extent and that losses were to be guaranteed and that they would share in them. I think he said this morning that where they were both entering into a loan he would like to see the chartered banks bear some part of the loss. I understood from him that any losses would probably be shared.

I have been a member of the banking and commerce committee for some time. I have listened with great interest to what has gone on there. Very fine arguments pro and con took place on the bank bill. As I listened to those arguments, what impressed me more than anything else was the words of the governor of the Bank of Canada when he said that this was an experiment and that we would need to have many experiments. I am in favour of anything that will encourage private enterprise. I think we need to encourage it as much as possible. What I am really worried about is this. If an outfit gets stuck a little bit and cannot get its funds in any other way, everybody will be running to the industrial development bank. I think we have to trust the governor and his directors to see to it that that is not done.

I should like to point out that the bank must be kept free from any kind of political patronage. That is one of the difficulties in an institution of this kind, particularly when it is a government bank and where influence might be brought to bear. We have to trust the government to see to it that this does not happen. I believe this bank might serve a useful purpose. However, the commercial banks are the ones that can be used to the greatest extent. This is an adjunct of the private banks. It will be more useful for small industrial businesses than for others.

My leader said that a great volume of business was done in the committee. It would be better to say that a huge number of words were spoken and that a lot of repetition went on. A lot of business could be done without so much repetition. The banking and commerce committee gave this bill a great deal of study. All one can do is to form his own conclusions from what was said there.

Mr. BOUCHER: To what extent and by what means will the benefits of this bank be made available to the smaller communities? I understood the minister to say a few minutes ago that very few banks will be set up, possibly one in each province. Fundamentally our problem is in the smaller centres. Those communities should be rebuilt by enterprises being fostered in those centres. Those enterprises should consist of small businesses. They should be established there rather than in the congested cities. These banks will be set up as separate entities. Unless there is some machinery devised and cooperation insisted on to make that machinery accessible to the smaller communities, the largest portion of our country needing help along this line will not be served at all.

I cannot see the necessity of setting up an industrial bank to lend only to those people and to those concerns in the larger communities to whom the chartered banks will not lend. Nor can I see where the smaller enterprises in the smaller communities will be able to take advantage of this bank unless there is much greater cooperation and organization to bring the benefits of this bank to those communities. I cannot help feeling that this war has taken an undue toll of the smaller centres of Canada and has congested our people and our enterprises in the big centres to the very great detriment of this dominion. Our biggest problem is to build up the smaller communities and to assist the agricultural areas by so doing. This can be done not by bringing the people from the rural sections into our congested cities, but by taking industries out to our smaller towns and villages so that our people may stay there. Has the minister given thought to that, and can he give us any enlightenment on that point? I could go on and express many different points of view and put forward arguments in favour of what I suggest, but at this very late date I do not feel like holding up the committee. I should like the minister to make it abundantly clear that what I have suggested will be kept in mind and that he will make every effort to make this industrial bank justify itself primarily and mainly in the smaller communities.

Mr. ILSLEY: The person or corporation desiring a loan will get in touch with the bank probably by writing to its head office, which will be in Ottawa, or it may get in touch with the provincial branch and make its submissions in the usual way. If the size of the loan is such that there will have to be a little travelling either by the applicant or by a representative of the bank to look the enterprise over, that may take a little time. It is not the ordinary commercial banking business that will be carried on by this bank, with an office in every town or anything like that; nor would there be any need of that. The functions to be discharged by this bank are those which to some extent have been discharged by investment bankers rather than by commercial banks, and it is the kind of lending business that will require only a small number of branches.

I do not know that I can say anything about the other parts of the remarks of the hon. gentleman. He advocates the decentralization of industry. The result of establishing an institution which will be available to make loans to small industries in the country would go some distance in preventing the concentration of industry. It would work in favour of decentralization rather than centralization.

Mr. BOUCHER: But the minister will appreciate the fact that this bank, according to his explanation, will be of very little if any use to the small communities. Certainly the small business man in the rural community is not going to use this bank to the extent I think we should have him use it. I believe that greater cooperation would be achieved with the existing chartered banks. I would not approve the industrial bank setting up branches in small communities, but I think that if we had greater cooperation and a better liaison between the chartered banks in the small communities and the industrial development bank it would bring this bank nearer the small individual enterprise, and would be much more useful in that regard than in the cities, where so many institutions now exist. We all know that investment bankers do very little in the way of promoting enterprise in rural communities. We also know that in the past the chartered banks have been criticized severely, and I think justly, because of the rigid requirements they have been compelled to exact in the small communities. I think the greatest cry of our people against the chartered banks to-day arises from the niggardly way in which they have dealt with industry in small communities. I do not think there is any question about that. I believe that the greatest cause of criticism of our banking institutions in the past has been the drying up of the lending power of the chartered banks in the smaller communities, and I think it should be one of the first and fundamental aims of the industrial development bank to remedy that situation. I do not believe that under this legislation that condition will be met to even a small degree.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Management.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand that when we carry these sections we carry them as amended by the banking and commerce committee?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On section 15—Loans and guarantees.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is the section, as far as I am concerned—

Mr. ABBOTT: It has been amended.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes; I have the amendment here, but I should like to refer to the principle. This section contains the whole pith of the bill; and when I supported this bill strongly, I have forgotten whether it was at the resolution stage or on second reading—

Mr. ABBOTT: It was on second reading.

Mr. MacNICOL: —I had an idea that this proposed bank would be of great assistance in promoting the organization of industry. I am sorry to say I have lost that idea now. I do not see in this bill the value in regard to the promotion of industry that I thought I saw in it at the commencement. This bank is not going to do anything at all along the lines of the industrial organizations of the two great railways, the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific. All through the years they have promoted and induced capital to organize businesses throughout the country. Many of our cities have their industrial commissions. We have had the Toronto industrial commission for many years. It has done a marvellous job and has been instrumental in bringing to Toronto—to use an arbitrary figure—anywhere from one hundred to two hundred and fifty industries of one kind or another. In my time the head of that commission was Mr. Charles M. Burton, president of the Robert Simpson Company, and under his chairmanship the commission did wonderful work. The city of Welland, and many other cities in Ontario have had industrial commissions for many years.

In the commencement I thought the purpose of this bank was to assist in the promotion of business, but now I cannot see that at all; I cannot see that we are going to get any real value out of this legislation. I really do not see anything in it any more. It has not the same vision I thought it had. If it does not do that, what is it going to do?

Mr. ISNOR: It should help business to carry on.

Mr. MacNICOL: No; business is not organized in that way. Business has to be promoted and organized and induced to go forward, as the industrial commissions have done. The chartered banks do everything else, but this bank does not come forward to try to initiate production in any way. What is it going to do? When I referred to the matter earlier in the evening the minister mentioned paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of this section, which has to do with a person engaged in or about to engage in an industrial enterprise in Canada. There is no promotion in that. If a person who engages in or is about to engage in business goes to the bank and submits his proposal, the bank will first ask, "Why didn't you go to a chartered bank?" "Oh, well," the applicant may say, "I have been there and the chartered bank did not want to assist me in this matter and I come to this new industrial bank." If this bank is not engaged in the promotion or creation or organization of new business it will take little interest in what the promoter has to say. I was looking for something like the Toronto industrial commission but with finance behind it, or something like the Canadian Pacific or Canadian National industrial commission, all of which have done such magnificent work.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why do they not keep on?

Mr. MacNICOL: In my room I have the last report of the Toronto industrial commission and there is a list covering many pages of the businesses which have been started in Toronto alone. I imagine I was wrong when I thought this industrial bank was being organized for the promotion of business. As some one said earlier—I believe it was the hon. member for Carleton—if business is not going to be promoted, how are we to create the small businesses that the chartered banks will not have anything to do with?

Mr. HOWE: Do you think the government should promote business?

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not in favour of the government going into business on anything. My observation is that this is more or less of a farce if it does not assist in promoting business, and no one knows that better than the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. HOWE: I thought you were advocating that now.

Mr. MacNICOL: No, I am not; I am only advocating that there should be organization to assist private industry to carry on business. I imagine I let myself down when I approved this bill earlier in the session.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think what the hon. member says is right. We are merely being given a shadow without any substance. With the limitations imposed I cannot see how this bank can perform any useful function that the chartered banks could not perform. If there is to be only an office of this bank in each province or thereabouts, how will it be able to lend advantageously to private enterprise?

Mr. ILSLEY: Do not get too discouraged; just wait and see.

Section agreed to.

Sections 16 and 17 agreed to.

On section 18—Rights vested in bank as holder of warehouse receipts or bills of lading.

Mr. HOMUTH: Where does the creditor come in under this section? The government will be in the same position as a bank would be under the Bank Act and creditors will be just out of luck.

Mr. ILSLEY: No more than they are under the Bank Act.

Mr. HOMUTH: This was to be a bill to give a chance to people to create businesses, but what we are doing under this bill is to put these people in the same position as they would be under the Bank Act. At the present time the government is prepared to put up a certain amount of money to cover bad accounts, or at least the accounts that the other banks are sceptical about.

Mr. ILSLEY: They ought to take some security.

Mr. HOMUTH: Certainly, but they take the security at the expense of the creditors on the same basis as the chartered banks do. A man comes to a chartered bank and says that he wants another $20,000. They ask what his inventory is and he tells them. They then tell him to increase his inventory by $40,000 and they will lend him another $20,000. He goes out to buy, and the people from whom he purchases feel that since he is good for it they can sell him another $40,000 worth of goods. We are doing nothing under this bill except to make it possible for those whom the chartered banks consider to be bad accounts to come to the dominion government, and perhaps if they have sufficient pull and prestige they will get some money. It is just a question of whether the dominion government will get anything out of it or not.

Section agreed to.

Section 19 agreed to.

Section 20 agreed to.

Section 21 agreed to.

On section 22—Power to acquire and hold real property mortgaged as collateral security.

Mr. HOMUTH: This is something new. This is not in the Bank Act?

Mr. McLARTY: Not as collateral security.

Mr. HOMUTH: The chartered banks do not lend money on real property.

Mr. ILSLEY: They can take it later as security for a loan.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. HOMUTH: But they will not make loans on real property?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BOUCHER: Is this the same clause as is in the Bank Act?

Mr. HOMUTH: No, it is different.

Mr. BOUCHER: I take it that this section permits them to lend on the hypothecation of a mortgage, whereas a chartered bank cannot do that. A chartered bank can take a mortgage only to support an existing loan. This goes farther than the Bank Act.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. HOMUTH: It is not carried. I want to know whether this is different from the Bank Act and whether a chartered bank can lend on real property? If you want to get this session over you cannot rush this bill through like that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will get the Bank Act and in the meantime perhaps the hon. gentleman will not worry.

Mr. HOMUTH: We are not worried; you are the people who are worried.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would follow section 22 of the industrial development bank bill as I read section 81 (1) of the Bank Act, which reads:

> The bank may acquire and hold an absolute title in or to real or immovable property mortgaged to it as security for a debt due or owing to it, either by the obtaining of a release of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged property, or by procuring a foreclosure, or by other means whereby, as between individuals, an equity of redemption can, by law, be barred, or a transfer of title to real or immovable property can, by law, be effected, and may purchase and acquire any prior mortgage or charge on such property.

There is another subsection but I do not think it is material. The wording of this bill seems to be different.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is very much different.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no substantial difference.

Mr. BOUCHER: There is a definite prohibition in the Bank Act against a bank lending ab initio on the hypothecation or pledge of a mortgage. There is nothing like that in this bill. The wording of this bill, corresponding to section 81 of the Bank Act, is changed just to allow for that very thing. Section 22 leaves it open for the industrial development bank to lend money on a mortgage ab initio.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course it does.

Mr. BOUCHER: But the chartered bank cannot do that.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a different type of loan.

Mr. BOUCHER: That is the very point we are after. The industrial development bank can lend directly on the security of a mortgage given directly to the bank in the first instance, while the chartered bank never could.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether my hon. friend was here on the second reading of the bill, when we had a long debate. I was in charge of the bill at the time since the minister was absent. I pointed out that this bank could lend money for five, ten or fifteen years and would take security in the form of bonds secured on real estate and mortgages. This section does nothing more than allow the bank that holds the mortgage to take title to the property.

Section agreed to.

Section 23 agreed to.

On section 24—other powers.

Mr. MacNICOL: Paragraph (b) says that the bank may:

(b) accept deposits from debtors of the bank for the purpose of facilitating the payment of any moneys owing to the bank.

This means that the debtor could open an account with the bank and carry an account there?

Mr. ABBOTT: That question came up on the second reading. This is only to facilitate the operation of the loans. It may be that the borrower may be making payments to the bank in satisfaction of his loan, and it was felt that it would be wise for the bank to take power to accept deposits, but deposits from borrowers only, not of course from the general public. The debtor can open a deposit account, on which naturally cheques would not be drawn. It is solely to facilitate the servicing of the loan itself.

Mr. HOMUTH: When the depositor deposits money in the bank, immediately it is under the control of the bank and the depositor has no power over it. He could not draw anything out of his account. The bank would hold it as security.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right. He would have no checking privileges.

Mr. HOMUTH: If he did not want to pay off his loan he would open an account with some other bank.

Section agreed to.

On section 25—Prohibited business.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is there any limitation on the type of stocks or bonds that the bank may hold?

Mr. ABBOTT: This is a prohibition.

Mr. HOMUTH: It might be an idea.

Section agreed to.

Section 26 agreed to.

On section 27—Audit by government auditors.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is there any provision in the bill that the auditors' report shall be submitted to parliament?

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 29 refers to the accounts. I suppose that would be the audited accounts.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would it be?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what other accounts it would mean. It says:

A copy of the accounts and of the president's report shall within fourteen days after the receipt thereof by the Minister of Finance be laid before parliament.

Mr. HOMUTH: There is nothing there to say that parliament shall be furnished with details of the various loans or their conditions. All we would get under that clause would be a general statement from the bank. There would be nothing specific such as we get from the department of insurance when it makes its report to parliament.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no provision for tabling the report of the auditors, but provision is made for tabling the accounts of the bank as audited.

Mr. HOMUTH: But not in the same way, not as fully as we get reports from the department of insurance. If we are to lend public money in this country to develop business I think parliament ought at least to get a detailed report on all the various loans, what their position is and as to the credit standing of the people who are borrowing the money. We should have more detail than is provided for under this clause. The report that comes in from the department of insurance shows every detail, the various investments made, sales and everything else. If we are to set up a public bank, parliament is entitled to know the position of the various loans which this government, for the time being at least, is making to various companies throughout the country to set these people up in business.

Mr. ISNOR: I think the point raised by the hon. member for Waterloo South is very well covered by section 29 (4) which states:

A copy of the accounts and of the president's report shall within fourteen days after the receipt thereof by the Minister of Finance be laid before parliament if parliament is then sitting, or if parliament is not sitting, it shall be laid before parliament within fourteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

Each and every account would have a ledger sheet. These accounts are audited. It is implied in section 32 that it is an offence for the auditor of the bank to do other than certify his statement properly. In my opinion this is covered in a regular business-like way; the president makes a report of the accounts.

Mr. HOMUTH: I contend that it does not provide that at all.

Mr. ISNOR: Well, read it.

Mr. HOMUTH: It does not provide for a detailed account of each of the loans made by the bank. It provides only for a copy of the accounts and of the president's report. It will be a summary of the bank's manipulations throughout the year.

Mr. BOUCHER: "Gesticulations", not "manipulations".

Mr. HOMUTH: It will be nothing detailed such as an insurance company would have to make. If we are to lend public money to people whom the chartered banks will not accept as sufficient security, parliament should know what is being done with that money and in what position these accounts are.

Mr. BOUCHER: In detail.

Mr. ILSLEY: I must say that I have not given attention to that point, but I am inclined to disagree with the hon. gentleman. I could not imagine a bank making public—and that is what it means—a list of its loans and the state of each loan each year. I should not think that should be expected of the industrial development bank or of any bank.

Mr. HOMUTH: But we are not dealing with chartered banks which are lending money to private enterprise and which accept the responsibilities of private enterprise in doing so. We are lending public money. We are lending the money which is taken from the taxpayer, whether he is a moulder in a moulding shop or the head of some financial institution, and I think parliament has the right to know what the position of these accounts is and whether the bank is being carried on in a proper, efficient way.

Mr. BOUCHER: I believe that if we endorse the minister's attitude we are in effect setting up a board which is responsible only to the minister, about the particulars of whose work the members of this house cannot get particulars. It is important that when we set up an industrial development bank the board should be accountable in detail to parliament itself. Here we are lending the people's money to a borrower through the agency of the president of the bank, and not asking him to tell us how he lends it or how the accounts stand. This being a government bank, we should scrutinize its affairs in much more detail; the accounts should be presented in detail so that the facts can be referred to in the house if they are required. There should be sufficient particulars so that hon. members could refer any phase of the operations to a committee for investigation and to see how things are going on. Certainly there should be detail equivalent to that in the auditor general's report, and so that a matter could be referred to the public accounts committee and examined by it. If there is to be nothing beyond a summary of assets and liabilities, it will be a case of parliament having no knowledge of how the nation's money is being handled.

Mr. McILRAITH: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BOUCHER: Yes.

Mr. McILRAITH: Following out the hon. member's argument, would he suggest that the Canadian farm loan board should give particulars to parliament of each mortgage loan it handles in Canada?

Mr. HOMUTH: Why not?

Mr. BOUCHER: I suggest definitely that if we as members of the House of Commons, responsible to the people, set up an institution to lend the people's money, we should be accountable for that institution's doings and know what is going on, so that we can tell the people who sent us here what we did with their trust.

Mr. McILRAITH: That has no bearing on the question I asked.

Mr. BOUCHER: It has very much bearing.

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member for Waterloo South said that we should have particulars of each loan made and the state of the account.

Mr. HOMUTH: Certainly.

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member for Carleton was following that up. The thought occurred to me that we are also lending public funds through the Canadian farm loan board on mortgages, and I asked him if he would suggest that particulars of each mortgage account should be given in the board's annual return, instead of the report—which is a rather full return—that they make each year.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think the hon. member is making a man of straw, because the situation he speaks of is vastly different. This bank is to lend only on occasions when the chartered banks will not lend. The operations of the farm loan board are not at all of that kind. Here we are, as I say, giving out the money of our people through a board and not requiring that board to account to us for what they are doing.

Mr. McNEVIN: I believe that there should be a broad general statement of the position of the accounts at the end of each year, as gone over by the auditor; but to undertake to divulge to parliament, and through parliament to the public, the intimate position of every company's business would be, to my mind, entirely impracticable.

Mr. HOMUTH: But we are not divulging any secrets of a company's business. What we are doing is this; we are stating what money we have lent and what assets there are as security. Remember we are lending public money, and under those circumstances the public have the right to demand and to know where that money is going and what is being done with it. I could easily imagine the situation of some man who comes to this bank and gets a loan. The chartered banks have turned him down; but he puts up with this bank whatever collateral he has, collateral which the chartered banks would not accept, and it is accepted by this bank. There may be a little "pull" in regard to the getting of this loan, or a little pressure may be brought to bear. The first thing you know, someone, perhaps in mediocre circumstances, who is trying to finance a business in some small or large community, will suddenly branch out as an industrialist in that community; but he will do so with the people's money, and the people in that community ought to know why; they ought to know what it is all about. Parliament certainly ought to know what the bank does with the money of the people of Canada, because the people who are working in that very community, working at their benches every day, are supplying the money to parliament to lend these men money with which to run their businesses. I come from a county in which practically ninety-five per sent of the businesses were started by people in a small way two or three generations ago. Men worked hard; they built up their businesses; everything they earned they put back into their businesses. They never asked for any pap from any government. They worked hard and developed their businesses with the aid of loyal employees. Now we are to have a lot of upstart businesses financed at the expense of the taxpayers and without any report to parliament as to the position of their accounts. I do not think it is right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, the Minister of Pensions and National Health comes in and with his loud voice says "carried" again. He has not been here for a while and does not know what is going on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I much regret the lack of vision of the hon. gentleman. I have been here all evening.

Mr. HOMUTH: My glasses were blurred, then. I think we should have some statement from the minister in charge of the bill as to what he himself thinks about the matter of giving a more detailed report to parliament.

Section agreed to.

On section 28—Fiscal year.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why is the year to end on September 30 instead of on March 31, when the government's own fiscal year ends?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I had better answer that question. It is some time since I asked the same question of the officials who were with me on the second reading of the bill, and my recollection of the explanation is this. Since the bank is a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada they wanted to have the fiscal year end a bit ahead of the Bank of Canada's year so as to facilitate audit and that sort of thing.

Mr. MacNICOL: When does the Bank of Canada's year end?

Mr. ABBOTT: On December 31, so that this would end two or three months ahead of that.

Section agreed to.

Sections 29 and 30 agreed to.

On section 31—Insolvency or winding-up acts not appliable to bank.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why is that?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is the same as the Bank of Canada. There is a similar section there.

Mr. HOMUTH: But this is not the Bank of Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Bank of Canada.

Section agreed to.

Sections 32 and 33 agreed to.

On section 34—Coming into force.

Mr. HOMUTH: When will it come into force?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HOMUTH: Wait a minute. I want to know whether the minister will give us an intimation as to when it will come into force. Will it be after the next election?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): I would remind the hon. gentleman that if he wishes to speak he must rise in his place and address the Chair.

Mr. HOMUTH: I asked the minister a question which could have been distinctly heard. Can he say when it will come into effect?

Mr. ILSLEY: Soon, I should say. There is no reason for delay.

Mr. HOMUTH: What does the minister mean by soon? Will there be a proclamation before the house adjourns?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would be doubtful.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The leader of the opposition requested that the third reading stand until to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the house.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. McCann in the chair.

TRANSPORT

Air service—civil aviation division—

396. Airways and airports—Construction and improvements, including lighting and radio facilities—capital, $2,035,800.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will this be for the construction of new facilities or airports? If so, where will they be located?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): This vote is confined entirely at the present time to small extensions and capital repairs. About half the vote is required for improvements in lighting and short extensions to runways, and about half the increase represents facilities including certain radio beams such as the one from Winnipeg to Edmonton. There are no new airports involved.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister mean that the item pertains to T.C.A. alone.

Mr. HOWE: Chiefly the airways that are now in use for transport purposes, practically all the main line of Trans-Canada—extensions to the main line.

Item agreed to.

Air service—civil aviation division—
Airways and airports—operation and maintenance—

397. Civil aviation services, $891,495.

Mr. MacNICOL: What does this cover?

Mr. HOWE: This represents operating costs of airways that are operated by the Department of Transport. It is the cost of operating civilian airways.

Mr. ROWE: Why the increase of $180,000?

Mr. HOWE: There are more airports involved. Certain military airports are turned over to the Department of Transport for operation, or are in process of being turned over.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does it cover the same services as in the previous item?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but this includes all airports that are being operated by the Department of Transport. It includes a greater number of airports than are covered by the previous vote.

Mr. ROWE: Is it the intention to turn over the others?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. As soon as any military airports are surplus to military requirements they are turned over for operation in civilian aviation.

Mr. ROWE: Is that the general policy of the government, to turn them over as they become available?

Mr. HOWE: As they become surplus to military requirements.

Mr. ROWE: Is it intended to use all these throughout Canada?

Mr. HOWE: They are turned over in the first instance to the Department of Transport, and they determine the place of the airport in civil aviation and the value of the buildings on the airport to civil aviation. If there is no use for an ariport or building the Department of Transport declares the airport surplus to transport requirements and it goes to the War Assets Corporation for disposal. In the case of the field itself when it is likely to be required for civil aviation and certain buildings are not required, these buildings are turned over by the Department of Transport to the War Assets Corporation for disposal.

Mr. ROWE: So far none has been turned over to the War Assets Corporation?

Mr. HOWE: I think not. No airports have been turned over to the War Assets Corporation, but there is a study going on as to certain buildings on airports which may be turned over.

Mr. ROWE: Already sold?

Mr. HOWE: No. They are under study.

Mr. MacNICOL: These four items, 396, 397, 398 and 399, all pertain to government-operated airports?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: They have no reference to those operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway company in the north country?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Do other planes besides government-operated planes use those airports?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; they are for the use of government planes and other planes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there a charge made for the use?

Mr. HOWE: There is a schedule of fees for all airports. All aircraft landing on an airport pay a fee.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Do the Trans-Canada aeroplanes pay the same fee as the others do?

Mr. HOWE: Trans-Canada Air Lines pay a schedule of fees on a monthly basis. It is $100 per plane per month. If there are five planes landing it is $500 a month.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is $500 a month?

Mr. HOWE: If there are five schedules into an airport; if it is one schedule it is $100.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It makes no difference how many times a week? That is just the regular planes going across every day, and so on?

Mr. HOWE: A number of schedules per day.

Mr. KNOWLES: How do the fees paid compare with the cost to the government of the service provided?

Mr. HOWE: The situation is so confused with the use by military planes which pay no fee that I doubt whether any of the airports are on a self-sustaining basis to-day, although before the war a number of airports were on a self-sustaining basis. After the war, when the operation is confined wholly to civilian services many of the airports will be on a self-sustaining basis.

Mr. KNOWLES: When the minister speaks of an airport does he include all the meteorological service, beams and so on provided by the government?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; the operation of an airport involves the use of the beam which serves the airport.

Mr. ROWE: Does the minister mean that there is commercial and civil aviation on the same fields as military aviation?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ROWE: That is where the increase occurs in this item?

Mr. HOWE: No. Airports that are used for commercial aviation are in general operated by the Department of Transport. The military have the privilege of using the airport. For example, Malton is a civilian airport; yet there is a training school there and the military use it. But it is operated by the Department of Transport. The same thing applies to Dorval. Dorval is used chiefly by United States planes being ferried to Europe. It is operated by the Department of Transport as a civilian field.

Mr. MacNICOL: What about the airport on Toronto island? Is that under this vote too?

Mr. HOWE: That is owned by the city of Toronto. It is not operated by the Department of Transport. I believe it is under lease at the moment to the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Item agreed to.

Air service—civil aviation division—
Airways and airports—operation and maintenance—
398. Radio aviation services, $859,230.

Mr. ROWE: Would the minister explain the $78,000 increase?

Mr. HOWE: That is owing to the fact that additional beams have been installed during the past year. Three additional beams have been installed. They provide for the three new beams going in on the route from Winnipeg to Edmonton, Neepawa, Yorkton and Dafoe.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is none of this vote for the far northwest country?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: How do planes going up in that country get their directions?

Mr. HOWE: Beams have been installed, but they have been installed out of a war vote. The northwest staging route is a military expenditure.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am contemplating making a trip very shortly by plane away up to the far north country. I am anxious to know that the plane I am going in will have all the scientific directions and so on. So far as I know it will be a Canadian Pacific plane. There are no other planes that operate in that country. I am speaking now of to Aklavik at the mouth of the Mackenzie river. Does the Canadian Pacific Railway company have to finance everything itself in the far north country, whereas the government under these four items pays $4,000,000 for other air lines? I am glad they do it. I have no fault to find with it. But the Canadian Pacific is the only air line operating in that great north country. Some air line must operate in it; otherwise folks will not be able to get in there. Has the Canadian Pacific to supply all its aviation arrangements and beams and so forth?

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend is travelling over the northwest staging route he will travel on a military beam. All the facilities will be there but they are operated by the R.C.A.F. If he is travelling on the Mackenzie river route, these airports have just been taken over by the Department of Transport. They were built by the United States government. They have recently been taken over. I think he will hardly travel on beams between those airports at the moment. It is not a main route. It is a route built for a special purpose and it is not provided with radio beams.

Mr. MacNICOL: As I understand it, I shall be travelling on Canadian Pacific planes.

Mr. HOWE: That may be so.

Mr. MacNICOL: Paying my way as a passenger.

Mr. HOWE: You will be travelling on very good planes, with very good pilots and with a very good company, but you will have no radio beam.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How about the Toronto island airport? Is there a beam there?

Mr. HOWE: There is no beam at Toronto.

Mr. ROWE: Does the minister imply that there is no commercial planning in the Northwest Territories; that it is all R.C.A.F.?

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. HOWE: No; there is plenty of planning and plenty of facilities but they happen to be operated by the R.C.A.F., because the traffic is ninety-five per cent military. There is very heavy traffic indeed on the northwest staging route, but it is chiefly military traffic, and as a matter of convenience the airports are operated by the R.C.A.F.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does that mean from Edmonton to Norman Wells, or to White Horse?

Mr. HOWE: Edmonton to White Horse.

Mr. MacNICOL: The route I was speaking of is from Edmonton to Norman Wells and on down to Aklavik.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend should travel in good weather on that route.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not going to discuss that with the company. The company operates the plane; I pay my money and I expect that they will take me there and bring me back.

Item agreed to.

Air service—civil aviation division—
Airways and airports—operation and maintenance—
399. Meteorological aviation services, $475,000.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is there anything being done with regard to assistance to boys going through schools? This vote is for the purpose of advanced aeronautical instruction. In what way will it work out?

Mr. HOWE: This is the cost of the meteorological service for all Canada. It covers the cost of operating many hundreds of observation stations, the cost of war service and the appointment of staff. The training is arranged. I do not think it is by grants to schools particularly; I believe the department carries its own courses. During the war we have trained hundreds of new operators for this service and for military service.

Mr. HOMUTH: Does it mean that grants will be made to private clubs, for instance?

Mr. HOWE: I do not think we have come to that item yet. We are talking about item 399, meteorological service.

Mr. MacNICOL: Now the minister has me interested in this. I cannot go to Aklavik, for instance, except by Canadian Pacific Air Lines; I cannot go by R.C.A.F. Do the Canadian Pacific planes receive this meteorological service?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then this item would—

Mr. HOWE: Help you quite a bit.

Mr. MacNICOL: —provide for the furnishing of meteorological service to Canadian Pacific planes, as well as any others in that area?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What is the difference between these two items? Here we have radio aviation services, and in the next item we have meteorological aviation services, $475,000.

Mr. HOWE: Item 399 is the aviation service. That is a short-term service, forecasting the weather for about eight to ten hours ahead, with great accuracy. The other vote is for a service to farmers and citizens generally, forecasting the weather for much longer ahead, and it is less accurate for that reason.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the work of the two coordinated?

Mr. HOWE: Absolutely.

Item agreed to.

Air service—civil aviation division—
400. Grants for advanced aeronautical instruction and to aeroplane clubs, including grant of $5,000 to the Canadian Flying Clubs Association, $8,000.

Mr. ROWE: This seems a very small item. Surely we give more support to these clubs than $8,000?

Mr. HOWE: Before the war, many private flying clubs were assisted by the government. When the war began, the military undertook this training on a very much larger scale. Most of the flying clubs were made units of the military training, under an arrangement with the military authorities. Therefore this item has been cut down to the point where it merely pays the salary of the secretary of the association and a few administrative costs. There are no flying clubs operating to-day for the training of pilots except under military auspices.

Mr. ROWE: There would be but for the war, would there not?

Mr. HOWE: There will be when the war is over.

Mr. LOCKHART: The government has no commitments at all to private clubs?

Mr. HOWE: Not at the moment. As a matter of fact we give each club $100 a year to help keep the organization together.

Mr. ROWE: It seems a very small consideration.

Mr. HOWE: They are not doing any business.

Item agreed to.

Air service—meteorological division—
402. Grant to Kingston observatory, $500.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is this for time?

Mr. HOWE: No; we had an old arrangement with Kingston to perform scientific work for the meteorological service. The university undertakes certain work for which we have been paying $500 annually for some years.

Item agreed to.

Air service—radio division—
403. Administration of the Radiotelegraph Act and regulations, $136,880.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is this the item under which radio stations are licensed?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish to ask the minister something about the situation in connection with the radio station at Halifax. As the minister probably knows, I was a member of the radio committee; and on June 28 Doctor Frigon, acting general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, made the statement before the committee that they were making a capital expenditure at Halifax to carry out essential services to the people of Nova Scotia and the maritimes generally, through their station there. Subsequently the newspapers carried the story that by some means or another an attempt was being made to block the erection of the C.B.C. station and to revive an old permit that had been granted to a private organization back in 1938. During the debate the Minister of National War Services did not seem very clear as to what really was the situation, and I thought under this item I would ask whether any licences have been granted at Halifax. It seems to me essential that the C.B.C., having arranged for the setting up of a transmitter there, should be the organization to go forward with the erection of this station. It is said that the other station might give satisfactory service to the community, but, after all, a private station gives only a certain part of its service to the community, while a C.B.C. station can render public service all day. I am not fully informed as to this situation, but I noticed the answer given by Doctor Frigon, and I followed very carefully the debate in which the senior member for Halifax took part, on the estimates of the Minister of National War Services. I should like to know the situation from the point of view of the Department of Transport, which is called upon to issue licences for the stations.

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Transport issues licences under the Radio Act, after having obtained the recommendation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The situation at Halifax is that the Halifax Herald has had a licence for many years. It is the broadcasting corporation in Halifax. In 1939, I think, just immediately before the war, a licence was granted to the Halifax Chronicle. The work was not proceeded with because they could not get the plant and equipment, and the application lapsed. Recently we were advised of a new application from the Halifax Chronicle which came with the recommendation from the C.B.C. that the contract had been revised. I may say that the contract specified that there were no commitments as to any network. To my knowledge the C.B.C. have not applied for a wave-length or for a licence to build a radio station in Halifax. I know nothing about that. I heard they were to build one there, but as far as I am aware—and my memory is fairly good—I have no recollection of any application coming through from the C.B.C.

Mr. COLDWELL: Doctor Frigon said:

> . . . we are providing now for a provincial outlet in Nova Scotia, Halifax. The report has gone to the minister.

Then the senior member for Halifax asked:

> Q. That is, you are making capital expenditure so as to carry out services of the second network?
>
> A. Right.
>
> Q. Are there any others besides the one in Nova Scotia?
>
> A. There is only one station, CJBC, which was not on the network before and which is being placed on the dominion network, and the one which we are building to provide an outlet in Halifax for the dominion network.

Doctor Frigon stated that they were providing an outlet.

Mr. HOWE: My officers confirm my memory that we have had no application from the C.B.C.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do they already possess a permit for a station.

Mr. HOWE: I am informed that the minister in charge of the C.B.C. confirms my understanding that no application for a frequency has been filed.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Shall the item carry?

Mr. HOMUTH: No, Mr. Chairman.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Friday August 11, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

DEFENCE OF CANADA

Second and final report of special committee on the defence of Canada regulations.—Mr. Bertrand (Laurier).

MONETARY CONFERENCE

RECOMMENDATIONS OF BRETTON WOODS MEETING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party mentioned yesterday that he would like to have a copy of the final report of the united nations monetary conference held at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, from July 1 to July 22, and asked that this be printed. I have taken up the matter with the officials of the Department of External Affairs and I am informed that the official text of the document in French will not be available for some days yet. The document is highly technical and I think it would scarcely be appropriate to have one translation in French on our Votes and Proceedings and an official translation that might differ somewhat from the other translation appear later from the conference authorities. In the circumstances I think it advisable to table this document and await the official translation before having the English and French versions printed and available for distribution. The document contains the following:

1. Resolutions, statements and recommendations adopted at the conference.

2. Articles of agreement of the international monetary fund which are attached at annex A.

3. Articles of agreement of the international bank for reconstruction and development, which are attached as annex B.

4. Summary of agreement of the conference, which is attached as annex C.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITIONS

ORDER IN COUNCIL AUTHORIZING DENUNCIATION OF CONVENTION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to table for the information of members of the house copy of P.C. 4666 of July 31, 1944, which authorized the Secretary of State for External Affairs to take steps in respect to denouncing the international convention relating to international exhibitions, which was signed at Paris on November 2, 1928. The purpose of the convention was to limit the number of international exhibitions and to establish a uniform code for their organization and administration. It applied only to exhibitions that were official or were officially recognized and lasted three weeks or longer. The contracting countries agreed to withhold subsidies from every international exhibition coming within the scope of this convention which did not comply with its provisions. The convention was administered by an international bureau at Paris and jointly controlled by the contracting parties.

The Canadian government has decided to withdraw from the convention in view of other denunciations of the convention by other governments and with a view to clearing the ground for a new convention dealing with the same matters. In pursuance of minute of council, notification was deposited on July 1 with the various other parties to the convention with which Canada maintains friendly relations, of the termination of the convention on behalf of Canada.

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—EXCHANGE OF NOTES—DISCOVERY AND DEVELOPMENT OF OIL FIELDS IN NORTHWESTERN CANADA

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table three copies in English and three copies in French of an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States of America recording an agreement concerning the discovery and development of oil fields in northwestern Canada. This agreement was signed at Ottawa on June 7 and is No. 16 in the published series for 1944.

I might say that my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) in the discussion of his estimates has already made a statement regarding this matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): While I am not hopeful that we can conclude the session to-morrow, in view of the possibility of it there is a matter with respect to the order of business which I think should be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister. There are some questions which the government should answer before the session concludes. May I ask the ministry, and in particular the Minister of National Defence to let us have an answer to-morrow to question No. 4 in my name on to-day's order paper, with respect to furnishing information to next of kin of members of crews of missing aircraft, in case by good luck or good management the session concludes to-morrow night. I believe the department is ready to give it.

Mr. RALSTON: I sent a note to the officials yesterday, and I thought the information would be ready.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want to let it go beyond the end of the session, because as the department knows it is important from several angles.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should be very happy to meet my hon. friend's wishes. He has referred to good luck and good management. My experience in public life has taught me there is nothing like cordial cooperation. If we have that I think there will be little doubt of our being able to complete the business perhaps by the end of this week without sacrificing any public interest.

As to the conclusion of the work this week it might help to make certain what otherwise would be a little doubtful if the house were agreeable to beginning its sitting an hour earlier this afternoon and to continuing its sitting for an hour after six o'clock. That does not mean that all hon. members will have to be in the house continuously. The British house, as one knows, sits through the dinner hour as a matter of ordinary procedure. If, when one o'clock comes, the house would be willing to adjourn until two o'clock, and possibly again at six agree to adjourn until seven, we would I believe make the progress which would help to ensure our completing the business late to-morrow night.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no objection to that for to-day. I would like to make this clear, however, that if at the end of to-day's sittings it looks as if we cannot complete our business by Saturday night, we ought to revert to reasonable hours, so that we can complete the session in an orderly way next week, if that is the earliest possible time of conclusion.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): For some days this house has been sitting continuously from eleven in the morning until eleven at night, including Saturdays. I think most hon. members are feeling the strain of these continuous sessions. I know that I am and the members of my party are. I do not think the house should assemble at two o'clock, and I certainly do not think we should continue until seven. If we can finish the business within the ordinary hours of the house as we now have them, that is all right, but we should not prolong the hours of sitting beyond the present limits. It is physically impossible to stand this strain when we are giving to the house the attention which some of us are trying to give.

Mr. GRAYDON: I took it for granted when I made my statement that there was unanimity in the house on that point. If there are hon. members who feel that the work is being pressed too much, we had better come to the conclusion that it is impossible to finish on Saturday night unless these hours are extended, having in mind that we should not as a parliament rush things too much. I mentioned that yesterday. I was agreeable, if the rest of the members were, to having the hours extended, but if the hours are not to be extended by unanimous consent it is physically impossible to close on Saturday night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When I made the suggestion I did, I had been given to understand that there was a general wish among hon. members that that course might be taken. However if there is any objection to it I would not press it for one moment. At the same time I do not despair of the house being able to conclude its business by tomorrow night, if hon. members will indicate immediately what particular matters they wish to have brought forward. There remain only the estimates after we have finished with the war services gratuities bill. The estimates have been before the house since the beginning of the year; they have been discussed in large part under war appropriation and at other times, and it is not necessary to have a fresh discussion or any discussion of every item. There may be a few items which hon. members would wish to single out and have brought forward for purposes of discussion. If so, the government would seek to arrange matters accordingly.

Having in mind that particular aspect, and knowing that hon. members are anxious to have the estimates of the Department of External Affairs discussed further—the leader of the opposition mentioned to me that one of his following was particularly anxious to speak on these estimates. I said I would bring them on as soon as the last of our legislation was down. I am prepared to go on this morning with the external affairs estimates. I mention this because unfortunately, while all my colleagues were remembered, in the matter of their estimates, I was overlooked by my hon. friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health in his announcement last night of this morning's business.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope this does not mean that the Prime Minister's leadership is at stake.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the business of the house, I think I should mention, although it is not very important, that there is one small bill, which I think will be entirely non-contentious—it has not yet been placed even before the government—which I should like to introduce and get through; which will be in addition to the estimates.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that pretty well settles for us the situation we were discussing.

Mr. ILSLEY: It should not take fifteen minutes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, Mr. Speaker, we desire to be very cooperative, but there is a limit to what we can do if cooperation implies the abandonment of our duties as an opposition. We have the right first of all to see the legislation. It is all very well for the Minister of Finance to say that it will only take fifteen minutes. It is partly our job to determine how long the discussion of a bill will take.

Could the Prime Minister indicate what the position is at the moment in connection with the report of the joint committee with respect to the city of Ottawa and the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That report is before the government for consideration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MONTREAL TRAMWAYS STRIKE—REPORT AS TO INTENTION OF COMPANY TO REOPEN LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. According to this morning's Montreal Gazette, the street railway company in Montreal seek guards to reopen their lines. If action of that kind is taken by the company I fear serious repercussions. Is the government considering any steps to offset a further tie-up in Montreal in the tramway situation? I am sorry I did not have a chance to give the minister notice of the question.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The policy of the government in connection with the Montreal street car strike will be known in due course.

FEMALE HELP FOR PROCESSING FRUIT AND VEGETABLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): As a brief and final appeal to the Minister of Labour, is there any hope of female help being brought in from outside points to the areas affected in the processing of fruits and vegetables?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): All I can say to my hon. friend is that everything is being done that possibly can be done. I remember the pressure last year of the same description. We have a special division set up to attend to this matter. We canned the fruit last year and, with the cooperation of all concerned, the government and those engaged in industry and agriculture, we expect to can it this year.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is a great help.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL CREDIT FACILITIES FOR FIXED AND WORKING CAPITAL

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 7, to incorporate the Industrial Development Bank.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

36. Departmental administration, $410,189.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: At the risk of holding up the committee, there are a number of matters that I should like to direct to the attention of the Prime Minister with a view to securing explanations which have not so far been given concerning certain matters in these estimates. I shall refrain from repetition of any of the arguments that have been advanced with respect to the whole field of external affairs.

Several matters have arisen during the last few days on which I think the Prime Minister should give some information. The first has to do with a meeting that recently took place in London of the shipping representatives of the united nations to ensure continued availability of their tonnage resources for all purposes of the united nations. Canada was represented at that conference, the other governments being Belgium, Greece, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, the United Kingdom and the United States, as well as Denmark and the French committee of national liberation.

According to a press dispatch of August 8, the governments concerned declared that they accepted as a common responsibility the provision of shipping for all military and other tasks necessarily arising out of the completion of the war in Europe and the far east, and for the supplying of all liberated areas as well as of the united nations generally and the territories under their authority. I should like the Prime Minister to indicate the extent of the decisions arrived at at this conference and generally the point of view taken by Canada in relation thereto. This is, I submit, an important link in the chain of decisions that show the determination of Canada to continue in this war until the destruction not only of Germany but also of Japan is achieved.

At the risk of introducing a matter with respect to which the Prime Minister has stated that no information will be forthcoming at this time, I ask him to reconsider the question whether he is in a position to advise the people of Canada as to the continued use in the war against Japan of the veterans who are to-day overseas in Italy and France and who have served so long, so nobly and so well. I ask that question not in any desire to bring before the country any matter concerning which information should not be furnished on the ground of disclosing our situation for the benefit of the enemy; but in the United States the situation is being freely discussed. It has been discussed in congress and by those in authority and the attitude taken has been that at the conclusion of hostilities in Europe there is bound to be a partial demobilization, and in particular that those who have served the longest will have an opportunity if they so desire to secure discharges from the army.

I wish also to ascertain from the Prime Minister whether he can furnish the committee with information regarding an international police force. He dealt at length with the question of international security and showed—and in this he represented the viewpoint of the Canadian people as a whole—the willingness of Canada to participate with the other nations of the united nations in a great scheme of international security. The experience after the last war showed that while in 1919 all the signatories to the league of nations accepted responsibilities, when it came to carrying those responsibilities into effect they failed to do so because there was not mobilized behind them the public opinion in their various counties. The United States have gone a long way in this connection in the last three years. A year ago when, as a member of the empire parliamentary association, I was in Washington, we met with Congressman Fulbright who introduced that now famous resolution in the House of Representatives setting out the stand to be taken by the United States to assure the united nations of a united front after the war in order to prevent future wars. While we in Canada have made a declaration to the same effect, so far as I know we have no official declaration as to what contribution Canada is to make. These are not matters of a partisan nature. If there is one subject that must be discussed in a non-partisan way, in a national way, it is the subject of external affairs, upon which we must endeavour by collaboration and cooperation to arrive at a common and definite point of view representative of the people of Canada as a whole.

In dealing with employment after the war Doctor George Weir suggested some months ago that when the war is over a large number of the men in the navy, the army and the air force in Canada will be assured of the opportunity to continue their careers in those services. In particular he referred to the fact that in going up and down the length and breadth of Canada he found that the Canadian people felt that Canada should contribute to an international force and that this force should come in the main from her air force which has achieved so much in this war under the British commonwealth scheme. Is the government in a position to advise what Canada's contribution will be? It may not be definitely known at this time, but is it intended that there shall be set up an international force in which Canada will be represented to ensure peace in this world and punishment for all aggressor nations?

In view of the tremendous oil resources of the world and of the great importance of oil in war and peace, according to the Associated Press, Great Britain and the United States signed a pact on oil policy on August 8. According to the dispatch, this policy is designed to prevent peace-time disputes between these two allies and serve as a prime weapon to enforce peace. The dispatch goes on to say:

> The agreement, negotiated by the acting secretary of state, Edward Stettinius, for the United States, and Lord Beaverbrook for Britain, is the first pact dealing directly with post-war trade and security.
>
> Both countries agreed that it shall go into effect when each has notified the other "of its readiness".

The dispatch continues:

> The agreement emphasizes the view that world security must remain uppermost in all international considerations, and make the distribution of oil "to all peaceable countries" subject to a future world organization to check aggression and maintain peace.

To what extent is Canada a party to this pact, and to what extent has she been consulted in reference to this very important matter? Had there been a control over the oil resources of this world prior to the war, such as is contemplated by the agreement that was entered into recently by Great Britain and the United States, the possibilities of aggressive war on the part of Germany would undoubtedly have been obviated to a considerable degree.

Another matter that has arisen since the Prime Minister made his speech on the subject of external relations has to do with civil air transportation within the empire after the war. The Prime Minister said the other day that through the session, from January to the present, matters of external relations had been discussed and because of that I am not going to make any formal speech to-day. I am merely asking questions on matters on which we have as yet no information. The subject of air transportation was dealt with at great length for many days, but within the last few days the Prime Minister of New Zealand, speaking in the parliament of that country, indicated that an arrangement had been arrived at—at least that is the way I interpret his words—between Canada, Australia and New Zealand, under which a Pacific all-red air line would be established. He went on to point out that application had already been made to the United States for the privilege of securing landing rights in Hawaii. One factor that kept back the development of an empire air route or an inter-empire air route in the Pacific from 1919 to 1939 was the fact that the United States refused to allow the nationals of any other country to fly over the Hawaiian islands. It was felt that in the interests of the defence of the Pacific, information gained through flying over the islands should be denied to Japan, and all nations were excluded, although when war came events proved that the Japanese had full information with regard to the Hawaiian islands. The step has been taken by the government of New Zealand, I believe in cooperation with Australia, to establish an all-red air line. The press dispatch, which I have not before me, indicates that the United Kingdom may participate in it. I asked the Minister of Munitions and Supply a question with regard to this matter yesterday, but I did not receive very much of an answer. In fact I received less information than the Prime Minister of New Zealand gave when he spoke in the parliament of that country. This is a matter of very great importance to the people of Canada, and generally speaking to the people of the empire. It is important to know how far we have gone and how far we shall go in establishing within the empire or within parts of the empire a united air line in order to bind the empire closer together by closer communications than have heretofore existed.

I should like to refer to the empire council. All of us are in agreement that the conference of prime ministers was a most successful gathering and one which did much, and will, I I am sure, in the years to come do more to bind the empire closer together than ever before. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, as I read the speech of Lord Halifax of January last, and the Prime Minister's speech delivered in this chamber the other day, I believe the Prime Minister and Lord Halifax in their respective fields are much closer together to-day than they were in January last.

There is agreement among members on all sides of the house, particularly so far as the empire as a whole is concerned, that our external affairs policy must be consistent with our interest. And there is no inconsistency if we so proceed as to ensure that British commonwealth traditions and ideals, and its way of life, shall in the years to come continue to exercise their power for good.

All of us are agreed that this is no time for recrimination in connection with what happened in the past. The war has proven that so far as Canada is concerned, the days of convenient detachment in the affairs of the world at large are at an end. Yet that view represented the attitude taken in Canada—an attitude which I describe as one of convenient detachment—between 1935 and 1939. We have learned that no nation by abstaining from world cooperation and world collaboration can prevent its becoming involved in any widespread war. That is why many of us believe there should be set up, sitting from time to time in London, in Ottawa and in other capitals of the empire, an empire council to collaborate together and to exchange information of mutual interest to the security, defence and welfare of the empire as a whole.

Listening to the Prime Minister one might conclude that the question of an empire council had been decided finally. Prime Minister Curtin, upon his return to Australia, and as reported by the Canadian Press on July 17, said that he——echoed Marshal Smuts' declaration that "in an experience of forty years no imperial conference could compare with it in the magnitude of the issues raised and the spirit of mutual understanding which prevailed throughout."

Referring to his own proposal for a permanent empire consultative body, Mr. Curtin said the conference had agreed to consult with the respective governments on the suggested empire council and the possible centralization of empire cooperation on financial, economic and social questions.

Apparently therefore the decision as to whether or not a council or alternatively a secretariat shall be set up was not finally concluded by the conference of prime ministers. And if I am right in that assumption, from what Prime Minister Curtin said, I would ask the Prime Minister of Canada whether or not, representing Canada, he would be prepared to consent or to accept the set-up of an empire council or secretariat representative of cabinet ministers from various parts of the empire, meeting from time to time in order to arrive at unity of policy—if necessary meeting continuously, subject to this, that whatever decisions are arrived at by the council shall be submitted to the respective governments in the various parts of the empire.

I see no sacrifice of autonomy in that. We talk so much about sovereignty and loss of sovereignty, and about danger to our autonomy. But, Mr. Chairman, when met with that argument the question which always suggests itself to me is this: Are we not prepared to trust our blood and kindred within the empire, as we are prepared to trust the nations without the empire, in a great international organization in order to secure peace and assure its perpetuation? I believe this, that not only on the ground of sentimental ties—and sentiment means much in the life of a people as well as in that of an individual —but also on the strict foundation of common interest there must be a closer cooperation between Great Britain and the dominion, whereby machinery shall be established so that the highest measure of unity of policy and unity of action in international and empire matters may be attained.

Canada secured equality of status under the statute of Westminster. But, as Lord Halifax stated "there was hardly any equivalent effort toward securing what I call equality of function." As I listened to the Prime Minister in a speech which I am sure will rank as a very great exposition of Canada's constitutional position, I take it that he has arrived at the position where he believes that it would be——an immeasurable gain if on vital issues we could achieve a common foreign policy, expressed not by a single voice, but by the unison of many.

Those were the words of Lord Halifax in January last. In effect, as I understand them, they were the words of the Prime Minister of Canada in August 1944. And without there being any loss of sovereignty, and also without any suggestion of compulsion I believe that it should be extended as well to cover defence and empire communications.

I have already said that I do not share the view that closer ties with the empire mean domination by anyone, diminished sovereignty or subservience to anyone. To me the hope for the future is in the extension of partnership in the empire and of its being fortified by closer collaboration, through common endeavour, common idealism and a common desire to assure that the future shall be brighter than it was in the days between 1919 and 1939; that we endeavour by common representation and collaboration to arrive at a policy for the commonwealth, of the commonwealth and by the commonwealth. We should not do as we did between 1919 and 1939 when, because of Canada's abstention from active participation, policies were determined by one part of the empire and in the result the other parts of the empire, having had little to do with that policy, nevertheless followed the course decided upon.

I have already asked the Prime Minister whether the door is permanently closed to an empire council or a permanent secretariat. I do not mean that there should be a rigid organization, for this empire and commonwealth have not been built upon rigid formalism. They have been built through cooperation and gradual growth, and upon the determination to collaborate with each other. Freedom of the dominions would not be lost if men from all parts of the empire met together continuously, to the end that through diversity of opinion a unity of idealism in inter-empire and international affairs might be arrived at. While it is always dangerous to speculate as to what might have been, how often the thought occurs that the course of history might very well have been changed had there been a common direction and common effort in the matter of defence, participated in by all parts of the empire, during the years when Hitler was rising to power. If Hitler had only known that the empire was united, that there was no division; if there had been a united voice for all parts of this empire, represented by such a council, to tell him what would happen if he were to transgress, the course of history might have been changed. This is speculation, and perhaps it is fruitless to indulge in it, but we should assure that in the future which we have in our making the mistakes of the past shall not be used as the foundation for our future policies.

There is just one other point in connection with the question of international security. On July 17, 1944, Mr. Cordell Hull, the secretary of state for the United States, announced that exploratory conversations on an international security organization for maintaining peace were under way and would culminate in a meeting in August in Washington. I do not know that the Prime Minister has yet informed the house as to whether Canada is indirectly represented at that conference, for it seems to me this is a most important conference as far as Canada is concerned. Canada has a special interest in any conversations that take place in connection with post-war security, occupying as she does the strategic position of neighbour to both the United States and Russia. In their declaration of common aims, in the great charter of the commonwealth, the dominion premiers used these words:

> We affirm that after the war a world organization to maintain peace and security should be set up and endowed with the necessary power and authority to prevent aggression and violence.

That is a great aim and a great dedication by all parts of the empire. But promises, unless they are fulfilled; hopes, unless they are translated into action, are dangerous in times like these. Having regard to that declaration I believe at this time the Prime Minister should be in a position to let the rest of the empire know that Canada intends to contribute her share of the necessary manpower and what we have in the way of strategic bases to the end that there may be set up a police force, and that some of the police beats shall be located in the strategic airports within this dominion.

There were other matters with which I should like to have dealt, but I appreciate the opportunity the committee has given me to discuss these matters and I shall not proceed much further at this time. As one reads the casualty lists each day one is impressed with the fact that, without regard to racial origin, Canadians are living and dying for their country and their empire. Yet when these young Canadians return to this country, what do they come back to? They come back to a Canada which insists that they shall not designate themselves as Canadians but shall prefix their paternal national origin, regardless of the number of generations their families may have been in this country. A Canadian returning to Canada from a visit to the United States or from any part of the world is met at the border of this country by an immigration inspector who insists that before that Canadian can enter the country of his birth he has to say what is his paternal racial origin. In this regard I think we can learn something from the United States. We want to unify this country. Time and again the Prime Minister has declared for national unity, for doing away with the things that separate us. I do not believe we could do anything that would go further toward uniting the people of this nation than to have parliament make a declaration as to the right of an individual to call himself a Canadian, irrespective of racial origin. That is what they have done in the United States. As I have said before, no one thinks of Mr. Roosevelt as a Dutch-American. No one thinks of General Eisenhower as a German-American. No one thinks of Mayor LaGuardia of New York as an Italian-American. They are great Americans. We perpetuate this thing every ten years in our census, the excuse being that it is necessary to have the information as to ethnic groups. How authentic is the information thus secured? Not very; for when a woman is married, irrespective of her racial origin, in the census she appears as belonging to the ethnic group of her husband. The necessity for ethnic information may have been important at one time, but if I may repeat the thought I expressed in the first speech I ever made in this house, if parliament wants to do one thing that will bring together people in this country of all origins, let it enact legislation to give Canadians the opportunity and privilege of calling themselves Canadians. In that way parliament would do more to bind this country together in the common idealism of a common purpose and common dedication than by anything else that could be done. Those who serve in the Canadian armed forces are proud of the "Canada" on their shoulder-straps, and without regard to hyphenated considerations. While they serve, they are Canadians. I ask the Prime Minister to round out this great programme which he has placed before the house in the last few days for the benefit and rehabilitation of our men who serve by making the necessary amendments which will once for all and without regard to origin enable men and women of this country to call themselves Canadians, and by so doing unite this country as never before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, may I say first of all to my hon. friend that I wholly agree with him that in these matters which relate to external affairs there should be as little of partisanship as possible. It is, however, inevitable that in our consideration of some international affairs we may look at matters from different angles. Some are strong in their conviction that centralization is the best way to build up the empire, while others of us are equally strong in our views that a measure of decentralization based on autonomy is as between all the parts a more effective way of preserving permanency and avoiding friction. I think we shall have to look to the record of the years to see which of the opposite points of view has on the whole most to commend it. These differences of view will exist and it is right that we should debate their merits, but apart from that I believe all hon. members will agree that the tradition which they have sought to follow in the British House of Commons whereby foreign affairs are viewed as something which relates essentially to the nation as a whole in its relations with foreign nations, and keeping discussion therefore as far as possible from partisan considerations, is the correct and proper attitude to follow. I have tried to follow that tradition. I may have differed in the point of view that I have indicated from some other hon. members but I have never tried to make any aspect of external affairs a major party issue.

I wish to say in regard to the questions which my hon. friend has asked me that I would like to give a direct answer to every question in the sense of disclosing fully all that I know, but my hon. friend will realize, as all members of the house will realize, that throughout the period of the war there have been conferences and negotiations, exchanges of communications and the like, not only between all parts of the British empire but between all of the united nations, more particularly those who are allied in the waging of war on the field of battle. From the beginning it has been essential for one to decide how far pronouncements should be made, in the first instance, from one or other of the dominions rather than from the government at Westminster, and how far announcements should be made by me in this House of Commons rather than by the President of the United States or the Prime Minister of Great Britain on matters which affect all their peoples just as completely as they affect the citizens of Canada. Knowing how meticulously careful both the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States have been in making known major developments with respect to any aspect of the war or any aspect of the peace or of post-war policy without reaching agreement between themselves as to by whom the announcements were to be made, whether they should be made simultaneously, whether they should be made in several parts of the world—knowing that and much more which bears on the question of making decisions public, I have of necessity to exercise a degree of reserve in what I disclose which goes much further than my own personal inclination would go. I feel there is an obvious obligation which this government owes to the other governments having to do with these matters, and which our country owes to all the countries which are of the united nations. That is the sole reason why in some of these matters I have not given and have felt that I was not entitled to give to the house as much in the way of what might be termed inside information as I otherwise would be ready and anxious to give.

I must add this further fact, that whatever is given out in this house on those matters is usually construed as something which necessarily immediately affects all different parts of the British empire, affects all the united nations if the question is large enough, and as such may give information to our enemies as well. I do not know how often I have heard in conferences the point of view stressed that by a little pronouncement here and a little pronouncement there those who are most skilled in these matters are able to piece together in a very short time a pattern which pretty well discloses the whole. It is that pattern which at this time no one who is interested in what is going to be for permanent good would wish to have known to those against whom we are fighting. I think that will be quite clear to all hon. members. For that reason in answering my hon. friend this morning I may have to reply to one or two questions that he asked less completely than I otherwise would wish. However, as far as I remember his questions I shall mention them and seek to deal with them.

The first matter my hon. friend mentioned was the meeting which is being held in London on the question of shipping. As the committee is aware there has been throughout the period of the war between the different allied nations the closest kind of cooperation with respect to shipping in relation to war matters that it has been possible to have. The meeting in London has been for the purpose of carrying on into the immediate post-war period that same kind of cooperation. There will of necessity be need for quite as close if not closer cooperation in the matter of shipping between the shipping interests of the different countries once the great work of the liberation of Europe and the restoration of those countries gets under way. This meeting is obviously desirable to anticipate as largely as possible what will most effectively help to meet the emergency that will arise just as soon as European hostilities end, and this other great task is assumed by the nations that have been cooperating together up to the present.

My hon. friend asked me a question with respect, I take it, to the extent to which our armed forces would be used against Japan. That is a matter which I am not in a position to disclose at the present time. Any matter that relates to the disposition of our defence forces would necessarily be one of which the department of defence would have the fullest knowledge and upon which it would not wish to give any information until the moment had come when agreement had been reached by all intending to contribute as to the extent of their contributions. But this I will say, as is well understood, that the government has always assumed and said that the armed forces of Canada would be used to the end of the war, whether against the enemy in Europe or against the enemy in Asia, and that it is well known to be the policy of the government that our armed forces will continue to take their part in the war against Japan. There is this always to be kept in mind, that from the beginning of the war our forces have been employed in many parts of the world, but mainly in Europe, and that the United States forces have not been in the war as long as our forces have, also that the United States have large forces already employed in Asia, to an extent greater than there are British and other forces employed there. What disposition therefore will be made of armed forces as between the United States, the British and those of the different dominions I am not in a position to say at the moment. But I would make it perfectly clear that the policy of the government is to see that our appropriate part is taken in the war against Japan to the very close of the war.

My hon. friend asked whether I would tell him about the return of some of those who have been longest overseas, whether they would be brought back first. I assume he was not in the house yesterday when the Minister of National Defence spoke on that matter. As I recall what the minister said, he made it clear that involved in this question was the matter of breaking up units, and that that was a consideration of which account would have to be taken before he could say who would come back first or who would come back later on. I think I should allow that matter to stand at the point at which the Minister of National Defence left it.

The next question asked by my hon. friend was the matter of an international police force. That question is bound up of course with the whole matter of post-war world organization and, as is well known, it is a subject which has been receiving for some time past the closest attention of the united nations, particularly those of the British commonwealth and the United States. The conference which is to be held in Washington relates to post-war organization and is an outcome of the Declaration of Moscow, at which it was agreed that representatives of the four great powers would meet to discuss this matter in the first instance. There again, these matters follow a certain well-recognized procedure. From the beginning of the war it has been apparent that it would be impossible to have all the united nations taking exactly the same part or having the same voice in the discussion and settlement in a tentative way of some of these world questions. We have recognized that in the direction of the war, Mr. Churchill, the President, Mr. Stalin, and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, as the representatives of the four great powers, were in a different position—enjoyed, I might say, a certain priority in the consideration and discussion of these problems which affect us all. We have, I think wisely, recognized that fact, and instead of seeking to embarrass the working out of problems by at all times asserting that we must have equal rights and opportunities, we have rather sought to make it perfectly sure that in no particular were Canada's interests being in any way overlooked; and being satisfied of that, being kept fully informed of what is taking place, we have proceeded on the lines of helpful cooperation, I might say behind the scenes, rather than out in the public arena. I would like to make this very clear, that I do not think there has been any matter of major concern—certainly none of immediate concern to Canada—in any of these international affairs in which we have not been kept very fully informed. There have been one or two or three or four slips here or there, where public announcements have been made by others a little sooner than perhaps they should have been made but, having regard to the vast organization which has had to carry on this work, I think the number of such embarrassing instances has been very few indeed. But we have been kept informed and we are informed to-day. We know the line which will be presented, for example, at Washington in regard to world organization by the officials who are discussing matters there. May I say that we know it in relation not merely to what may affect Canada but to what may affect any or all parts of the British commonwealth. At the meeting of prime ministers in London there was no question, unless it were questions related immediately to the conclusion of the war, which received more attention and discussion than matters relating to the post-war order, and particularly this great question of world organization; and there I think I might say, as the pronouncement at the end of the conference made clear, we were all in agreement on the general line that should be taken. There has been no difference of view that I can recall with respect to any authority that the officials at Washington will have at the present time. They have their instructions; they are following them along lines that are known to South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and the United Kingdom, and they will be presenting, with the other nations meeting at Washington, through the officials, points of view which have been fully discussed in advance.

Let me say at once that, had Canada insisted on being represented at the conference at Washington at this stage, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, as well as the lesser nations of the united nations, would have had an equal right to demand a like representation. After all, what is being done now is to try to bring into being some form of world organization which will be the best that can be devised. It would be going too far to say that the whole business is still in a nebulous state, because it is beginning to assume a very definite form, and that form has not been concealed from the governments of any of the countries concerned but rather is well known to them. It will not be definitely settled until there has been some opportunity to see, as between the powers which are meeting together, how far they are in common accord and what differences may still remain to be ironed out.

Let me repeat, the whole question of organizing world security is receiving the most anxious study of all the united nations. We have made it clear that Canada will do its full part in carrying out agreed security schemes, whether they involve the creation of an international police force or, alternatively, of measures for seeing that there will always be an overwhelming preponderance of power available to protect the peace. That goes as far as I think I should go at the moment in indicating Canada's attitude toward a readiness to accept, with all the other nations that are united in the furtherance of world organization, such obligations as may be expected of them.

My hon. friend spoke about the agreement between the United States and Great Britain recently made with regard to oil resources, and asked if we were represented. That was an agreement between those two governments in a matter which is of vital concern to each of them. Canada is not in the same position as those two countries in the matter of oil resources. Canada is not a party to the United Kingdom-United States oil agreement, but we have been kept fully informed in regard to the discussions. We are not in fact an important oil producer, as we depend for four-fifths of our requirements upon imported supplies. The United States-United Kingdom agreement may well lead to a wider agreement, including all oil-producing and all oil-consuming countries, in which case Canada would of course cooperate.

I think it must be clear that in these matters of agreements which affect many nations the right way to start is to begin with the two which are most concerned, and if agreement is concluded between them that of itself undoubtedly will help to further the next step. But if agreement is not concluded between the countries most concerned, it would serve very little purpose, I think, to have other countries intervene too soon in those matters.

My hon. friend has spoken about civil air transport within the empire after the war, and has referred to remarks of the Prime Minister of New Zealand, reported to have been made recently, as to some arrangement between Canada, Australia and New Zealand. I might point out that that rather helps to illustrate the danger of these matters being discussed prematurely in the parliaments of the different countries. I am not aware of any agreement, and I would want to see the statement made by the Prime Minister of New Zealand before commenting upon it in any way. We have discussed with New Zealand and Australia the importance of an arrangement which will ensure air transportation with these countries and an arrangement which will ensure that whatever we do is a part of a great cooperative effort.

The air routes which Canada should operate, or in the operation of which she should cooperate, is the subject of very thorough study and of examination with other interested governments and it would be premature to make any statement now with respect to the possibility of operating particular routes.

I think it would materially impair immediate and very important discussions that will be taking place if I were to say anything at this time which would lead anybody to gain from my words certain impressions which might not be justified at all. All I can say is that in this matter, as in everything that affects relations between countries of the commonwealth, there is, I believe, the strongest desire on the part of all to cooperate in the most effective way. Whether that cooperation will endure more effectively through some great centralized organization or by means of a series of cooperative organizations is something which I think will have to be considered very carefully.

The next question which my hon. friend asked was with reference to an empire council and a permanent secretariat. Here I must ask the hon. member whether, in presenting the views he has stated, he is giving voice to the official opposition, or speaking for himself, or speaking for the leader of the Progressive Conservative party. He was out of the house the other evening when the matter came up and, at that time, I placed before the house the answer to some of those questions as given by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party. Perhaps I had better read again what I read at that time so that the hon. gentleman will know, if he is not already aware of them, what the views of the leader of the Progressive Conservative party are in this matter.

I said there had appeared in Maclean's magazine on May 1, 1944, a statement made by Mr. John Bracken on these very questions of Canada's relationship to Britain and the British commonwealth, and on the question of an imperial council, and the question of the "one voice". I shall read again the questions and answers as they appear in Maclean's, because I think this is very important. I have noticed that certain hon. gentlemen opposite would seek to have it appear that I am taking a view that suggests an isolationist attitude on Canada's part in commonwealth and empire affairs, and they direct their arguments at me in that light, or some of them do at any rate. The present leader of the Progressive Conservative party has made his view quite clear. I find that on most of these points it would look as though he had read what I said in the house in the debate on the address, and had been careful to frame his views in accordance with what I there expressed. At any rate, I give the questions and answers:

What should Canada's relationship be to Britain and the British commonwealth?

Answer: It should be that of an adult member of the commonwealth family. She should cooperate generously but she should retain the right to make her own decisions. She is bound however to the other members of the family by the ties which hold together any household that is loyal to worthy traditions and which looks back with pride to a good heritage. Canada's attitude should be one of willing and cheerful cooperation with other parts of the British commonwealth, freely associating with them and seeking every possible means to further the trade and peace and progress of the world, but wholly autonomous in her relations with them.

The next question is:

Question: Should the commonwealth set up an imperial council—

My hon. friend has spoken of that.

—as suggested by Australian Prime Minister John Curtin? If so, should this council have executive or merely advisory functions. Should its decisions be binding on commonwealth members?

Answer: I am in favour of strengthening the ties which bind the nations of the commonwealth together and I believe that a technique of continuous consultation in matters of common interest should be developed. The present arrangements I regard as inadequate; we fight wars but we don't help to prevent them. I believe in frequent commonwealth conferences and closer cooperation toward common obpectives of a constructive character but I do not favour the establishment of any permanent agency which would unduly centralize the influence or increase the rigidity of the commonwealth structure.

Mr. GRAYDON: Unduly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is right. I continue with the answer:

Such conferences as are held should be advisory and consultative and their findings should not be binding unless approved by parliament.

Question: Should Canada be committed to fight in defence of the interests of any part of the commonwealth?

Answer: Does this mean a prior commitment? I do not think the Canadian people would agree to a commitment which might precipitate them into a war, the causes or consequences of which they could not foresee.

In the commonwealth councils our efforts should be directed toward preventing war. In the contingency you raise, that of war affecting the interests of any part of the commonwealth, our position would inevitably incline us to aid in preventing unjust aggression; but the decision should rest with the Canadian parliament. It would then know the existing circumstances.

Mr. GRAYDON: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear." When I took the attitude that is now taken by the party he is leading in this house I was told on all sides—

Mr. GRAYDON: If you want to go back to what you were thinking before the war it would be very interesting too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend kindly address the Chair and not be carried away too quickly.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was following the Prime Minister on that too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I want to make clear to my hon. friend is this: Over and over again I was told, before the war, that it was my duty to say that Canada would go to war the minute Britain went to war. My hon. friend knows that that was the attitude of his party. Had I taken that position I doubt very much if this parliament would have entered the war unitedly.

Mr. GRAYDON: Were they not repeating what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend allow me to state my position? What I wish to make clear is this, and I think it is fundamental. I was attacked as strongly as any man in public life could have been attacked for the attitude I took before the declaration of war, for saying that I would wait to see what the war was about, and have parliament decide before any step was taken. I was told that leaving the matter to parliament was preposterous when we were dealing with a situation of the kind. Well, I held to my attitude. I claim that my attitude was wholly justified by the fact that parliament unanimously agreed to enter the war. If there ever was a policy that, in the light of subsequent events, was justified, it was the policy which was taken by myself and my colleagues, that, until we knew what the cause of the war was, and what it was about, and the relevant circumstances, we would make no commitment in advance, and that, when we came to make a statement of the government's view we would make it in parliament, and ask for the decision of the Canadian parliament on the issue. However, to return to Mr. Bracken.

It would then know, for example, whether the structure of the commonwealth was in danger, any international covenant to which we might have subscribed broken, and the degree to which our interests were affected. In the light of such circumstances it should make its decision.

That is exactly the position I took, and I am not at all sure that you will not find in what I have said on many previous occasions the exact words that appear there. Another question was:

At last year's session of parliament two opposing views on foreign policy became apparent—one, that commonwealth nations should speak with "one voice" in world affairs; the other, that Canada should develop her own foreign policy, which might not necessarily agree with the foreign policy of other commonwealth nations. What is you own view on this issue?

Answer: This question suggests there are only two alternatives. This is not necessarily so. In my opinion the best means for Canada to influence world affairs at the moment is in two directions: through her influence in the commonwealth family and through her individual relationships with all other nations, particularly the United States. These commonwealth nations should endeavour to reach common agreement with respect to peace, trade and other matters and I would hope they would generally succeed; but they should not be required to accept majority decisions except on the approval of their parliaments and they should not be denied consultation with other nations. In my opinion that is the most sane and practical mode of cooperation within the commonwealth and the most acceptable form of relationship with other nations. But our parliament must continue to be free to determine its own course.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the Prime Minister complete the paragraph? He did not do so on the previous occasion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The Prime Minister omitted the next paragraph.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very happy to.

Canada should take no steps toward further separation from the commonwealth. We should facilitate the freest possible consultation and collaboration of its autonomous parts.

That last sentence sets forth exactly the position that I have always taken. I take exception to the words: "should take no steps toward further separation from the commonwealth." I am not aware of any steps that have been taken toward separation from the commonwealth. All the steps that have been taken, so far as this administration is concerned, have been steps which we believed would help to make the commonwealth a permanent institution in the world. I wish to repeat here what I said on Monday last. So far as the British Commonwealth is concerned I believe it to be the greatest agency for the maintenance of peace throughout the world that this world has ever known; and I hope with all my heart that as the years go by the association between the different nations of the commonwealth will become closer and closer, and that it will be an enduring commonweath for the good of the world. I cannot express too strongly my feeling in that regard. It is a feeling that I have had all of my life. If hon. members would care to look at similar statements made at different times by me I shall be very happy to make them available; but I do not make a point of perpetually proclaiming my loyalty. I have not thought it necessary to do that. I have felt that actions were louder than words; and I should like to be remembered in this parliament in future years as one who in his every action in relation to affairs within the British empire has taken those steps which he believed would help to make that great cooperative commonwealth we know as the British commonwealth of nations an enduring instrument for peace, progress and prosperity throughout the world. I wish to see the British commonwealth endure and flourish, because I believe that this great community of nations joined by ties of similar ideals, aims and purposes and the great nation to the south, which share like ideals and aims, can work together, and that more than to any other nations, the world has to look to them for its future peace and security. That is the view I have always held.

My hon. friend referred to Lord Halifax, and the alleged difference of views between us, and in this connection spoke of secretariats. Let me read a few paragraphs from what I said at the meeting of prime ministers in London and also what I said publicly in the address I made to both Houses of Parliament in Britain, which was broadcast to the world. These are my views on this matter of centralized secretariats.

From time to time it is suggested that we should seek new methods of communication and consultation.

I believe very strongly in close consultation, close cooperation, and effective coordination of policies. What more effective means of cooperation could have been found than those which, despite all the handicaps of war, have worked with such complete success.

It is true we have not, sitting in London continuously, a visible imperial war cabinet or council. But we have, what is much more important, though invisible, a continuing conference of the cabinets of the commonwealth. It is a conference of cabinets which deals, from day to day and, not infrequently, from hour to hour, with policies of common concern.

When decisions are taken they are not the decisions of prime ministers or other individual ministers, meeting apart from their own colleagues and away from their own countries. They are decisions reached after mature consideration by all members of the cabinet of each country, with a full consciousness of their immediate responsibility to their respective parliaments. Let us, by all means, seek to improve where we can. But in considering new methods of organization we cannot be too careful to see that, to our own peoples, the new methods will not appear as an attempt to limit their freedom of decision or, to peoples outside the commonwealth, as an attempt to establish a separate bloc. Let us beware lest in changing the form we lose the substance; or, for appearance's sake, sacrifice reality.

I believe in the truth of those words as strongly as I believe in anything. I cannot understand how anyone, looking over the past twenty-five years, seeing how closely the different parts of the British empire have been brought together under the policies which have prevailed throughout this time, can wish to adopt any system which might prejudice, in any way, what up to the present has worked so successfully. The real test came when war came, and in the conduct of the war. In the course of this whole war where, I ask, has there been a single difference between Britain and Canada, between Australia and Canada, between New Zealand and Canada, between South Africa and Canada, from the beginning up to this very moment What finer cooperation could there possibly be? And that cooperation has come about, not through having some centralized secretariat in London directing the affairs of the war or any of the affairs of the commonwealth, but by the method that has grown up in recent years, whereby we have the freest and fullest day to day exchange of views and information between all these governments. As hon. members know, we have the services being rendered by our high commissioners in other countries of the commonwealth and by their high commissioners in our country. We have the exchange of communications between Mr. Churchill and myself as the leaders of government, and between myself and Mr. Curtin, Mr. Fraser and General Smuts. In addition we have the communications that come day by day, yes, hour by hour, from the secretary of state for the dominions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the replies and other communications that are sent from here. And these matters are considered by the cabinet as a whole, and the decision that is made, where a decision is necessary, or the opinion that is expressed, where an opinion is sought, is the decision or opinion of gentlemen who are seated here in this House of Commons day by day, who may be questioned as I am being questioned at this moment by hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not think the peoples within the British empire have awakened as yet to a realization of how closely knit we are through these agencies of representation and communication in considering all the affairs that are of concern to the nations of the commonwealth. I might go on at length, but I think perhaps I have made the position clear.

My hon. friend referred to what he called, "convenient detachment from world affairs from 1932 to 1939." May I say to him that history will be the judge as to whether the position taken in those years was sound. I have nothing to take back with respect to Canada's attitude in regard to world affairs during any period this government has had the responsibility for Canada's attitude. A great many people like to hear themselves say, "If Hitler had known that Canada was going into this war, there would have been no war." I must say these people can have very little knowledge of what had been going on in the German war departments for decades, or of the extent to which even Hitler himself has been made the tool of the German war machine. If anyone thinks that Germany went into this war because Canada had not declared, months in advance, that she would go into the war if Germany started a war against any country, he has a very limited view of the factors that weighed in bringing about this attempt to conquer the world. But may I tell my hon. friend that Germany had a very definite knowledge of what Canada's attitude would be in the event of war. I heard Mr. Anthony Eden, the British foreign minister, tell hon. members in this very chamber that he for one could not be too grateful for the part the Prime Minister of this country had taken in going to Germany and telling the German government what he did. I have never sought to make any capital one way or the other out of matters of this kind, but I do tell this House of Commons to-day that my visit to Germany had as its objective to make it perfectly clear that, if there was a war of aggression, nothing in the world would keep the Canadian people from being at the side of Britain. That was known to the German government at that time, and my action in the matter was fully known to the British government; but I did not talk about it at the time, for it is just as well that some of these matters should not be spoken of until later years.

The attitude of this government and of Canada—I do not say it is the point of view of this government only, because it was held by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and by Sir Robert Borden as well as the present administration—was that our relations at the League of Nations and the positions that were to be taken there required the utmost caution and care. To have committed Canada, for example, as has been suggested, to instituting sanctions against Italy; to have been the country immediately responsible for such action, and to suggest that if we had been prepared to take it we might have averted this war, is not to appreciate the facts and to fail to realize what would have been said of Canada's action if as a consequence war had followed. Anyone who will look over the events of the last twenty-five or fifty years will not have any occasion to blush at the sane, rational, reasonable and helpful attitude Canada has taken on these matters.

The question of international security has been referred to. I have mentioned the exploratory conversations which are under way. Then in regard to any reference made by Mr. Curtin in London or elsewhere, let me repeat that while in London I made it clear that our government would be only too happy to explore any suggestions that might be made by Mr. Curtin or any of the other prime ministers on any subject whatever. I think perhaps what Mr. Curtin had in mind has never been quite fairly represented as far as he is concerned.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the Prime Minister would permit me to ask one question, which I intended to ask previously. It has never been quite clear to hon. members of this house, I think, and certainly it has never been quite clear to me just what the Prime Minister of Australia had in mind with respect to the matter of a secretariat. We hear the word used a great deal, but we do not know whether it means an unduly centralized organization or whether it is something entirely different, and I was going to ask the Prime Minister to clarify the point, because a good deal hinges upon what was really meant.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would much prefer that Mr. Curtin should give his own explanation, but I will give an interpretation of what I think Mr. Curtin had in mind, though here again I do not know whether I am disclosing more than I should. I think Mr. Curtin felt very strongly, at one stage, in regard to his own country, that he should have had more information than he had about the plans with respect to the war as they affected the far east. Not having had that information he felt very much embarrassed, and he had hoped that somehow there might be brought into existence some organization that would ensure that all the nations of the commonwealth were immediately informed on matters that were of concern to them; and particularly that there might be somewhere what might be regarded as a research bureau which could be working on questions affecting any part or all parts of the empire, and to which any part would have access. So that, if a question should come up, questions, for example, such as some of those we have been discussing this morning, each part would get the benefit of the research. It would be like a reference library from which one could get information immediately.

Mr. GRAYDON: There would not be much objection to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: None at all. In fact, I should be delighted to see it furthered. But that is a different thing altogether from advocating a permanent secretariat in London which would be dealing with questions or programmes for all parts of the empire, and attempting to settle matters there. And it would be different from what was suggested this morning by my hon. friend, that we should have a council where cabinet ministers would be meeting in London. I think he went so far as to say that they might even meet continuously.

I feel particularly strongly, from a close study of this question, and after having to do with questions of the kind in a practical way, that while conferences are a good thing, the best place for a prime minister to be is in his own country at the time he is most needed there, and not to be away at a time which may be of most inconvenience to him and possibly prejudicial to his own nation.

I wish to conclude by referring to what my hon. friend said about hoping that we might, in some way, find it possible to have the citizens of this whole nation bound together as Canadians and so recognized and recorded in all government records and registrations. He said that, without regard to racial origin, Canadians are living and dying for their country, and that, above everything else, we should see particularly as respects those brave men who have been fighting overseas, that upon their return they should be all classed as Canadians. He hoped that, irrespective of racial origin, they would be recognized as Canadians without having to put any prefixes before their names.

May I say to my hon. friend that in that I am in entire and wholehearted agreement with him. I cannot express too strongly the feeling I have that some of these practices which have been carried on by the census branch for statistical purposes, or possibly for ethnological purposes—I believe that is the way it is described—might be done away with. I would be happy to join with my hon. friend and with any others in seeking to do my part to see absolute recognition, or recognition made in an absolute way of men and women who were born in this country, and those who have become Canadian citizens being regarded as Canadians first, foremost and all the time.

And may I say this to my hon. friend, that he has touched upon a very real subject, when he speaks of men who have fought and died as Canadians, irrespective of race and religion. I regret much to see in this country at the present time some gentlemen who are in positions of high respect, and who know better, seeking to raise matters of creed and race, with the suggestion that things are being done for people of one area rather than for those of another. May I say to this committee that if anyone wishes a battle on the question of whether we are to have one part of this country singled out as non-Canadian as against what of others is said to be Canadian, no one would welcome that fight any more than I would.

And anyone who raises the question of race to prejudice anyone of another race in this country is doing the greatest disservice that can be done to Canadian unity and to Canadian nationality. And not only do I wish to see our people recognized as Canadians, but I also wish to see a Canadian flag recognized in this country. I would like to see it the flag that our Canadian men are fighting under to-day. We have a Canadian flag unfurled in battle to-day by our very brave men in Italy and in France. I think in time the people of this country of Canada will say we want to have as a Canadian flag the flag they are carrying in battle to-day.

And what is more, I would like to see a Canadian anthem, recognized as a Canadian national anthem. I think we should sing "God Save The King" as the anthem of the British commonwealth or the British empire wherever in all parts of the empire the King is recognized as the sovereign head; but as a Canadian I also feel that as the Canadian national anthem I might rise and sing "O Canada".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: One reference I wish to make at the outset: The Prime Minister asked me whether I was speaking for myself or for the Progressive Conservative party. The views which I expressed to the committee regarding the empire—for, after all, in a matter of Canada's external relations there cannot be rigidity of view—are also the views of Mr. John Bracken, the leader of the party to which I belong.

The Prime Minister read an excerpt from Maclean's magazine to-day, and I wish to place on record, alongside of it, the statement made by the Hon. John Bracken in the early part of this year on the matter of empire policy of this party. This is what I read, as reported in the press on April 18, 1944:

John Bracken, national Progressive Conservative leader, outlining his party's policy on empire relationship last night urged "even closer" cooperation with other commonwealth nations.

Then he said:

"I am in favour, therefore, of Canada acting, as an autonomous power, to strengthen the ties which bind the members of the commonwealth together and to this end I believe that a plan for continuous consultation in matters of common interest should be worked out by us all" he said in a statement.

"By that I mean consultation not just for purposes of thought whether described as exchange of views or as verbal collaboration, but definitely with a view to a meeting of minds on matters of practical policy. It has not been suggested, as it could never be considered, that there should be such rigidity to any plan as would subtract from our sovereign rights."

There was one question I asked the Prime Minister, as to the stand he now takes on empire affairs, that he did not face. Is there any difference between that and what Lord Halifax spoke of in Toronto in January? Lord Halifax never said there should be a unity of viewpoint which would deny the right to various parts of the empire to their autonomy. But what he did ask was whether an empire policy could be achieved by a unity of ideas in respect of defence, communications and certain other matters, in order that a united front might be established in the empire. He went on to say:

Mr. Bracken denied that Lord Halifax had asked Canada to fall in line in any event.

Just in that connection the general idea which the government endeavoured to leave with the people of Canada so far as Lord Halifax's speech was concerned was that he was trying to reduce Canada to the level of colonial status, and that she would be dictated to by other parts of the empire. On the contrary the attitude taken by Lord Halifax was that the empire should endeavour to secure equality of function. Mr. Bracken said:

Lord Halifax made no such request or even suggestion. Very definitely he recognized our completely autonomous position. He asked us to seek to agree with the other members of the commonwealth and invited our full cooperation at the table of the British nations in the determination of those features of commonwealth policy in which all of us are concerned.

The Prime Minister objects to a phrase that I used in relation to the pre-war days. Canada refused in those days to sit down with the other parts of the empire and discuss imperial defence, according to Mr. Duncan Hall in his book on the British commonwealth. The Prime Minister says that it is idle to speculate on what would have happened, that it is foolish to think that things would have been different had Hitler known Canada's stand. I say, Mr. Chairman, that Hitler was entitled to rely on the speech made in the House of Commons on March 30, 1939, which indicated that Canada's attitude was this, that the Prime Minister thought it was foolish to expect that Canada should go to war to save Europe every twenty years. Everybody knew in 1938 what Hitler was going to do, and yet it was in 1938—was it not?—that the matter of the commonwealth air training plan came before this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend asked for time to reply in regard to one concrete matter. I did not know that he was going into the general field. If he intends to take in the general field I shall be happy to follow him later on.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again this day.

Mr. NEILL: I protest against that. The Prime Minister said this morning that it was highly desirable to get on with the business of the house. He suggested we should add two more hours to our sitting, and said that it was not necessary for every hon. member to be present, that a member needed to attend only on those items with which he was concerned. I have been sitting here for two days waiting for the item to come up. I gave way this morning to the hon. member for Lake Centre, although I think I was on my feet before he was. Then, of course, the Prime Minister had the right of way after that. Then I had the floor, but the hon. member for Lake Centre wanted to say just those last few words in answer to the Prime Minister, and he took advantage of the situation to introduce some totally irrelevant and extraneous matters, which of course would call for a reply from the Prime Minister. Now we are told that we are to drop this order of business and go into some other subject. We were not told we were going on this morning with the estimates of the Prime Minister. It practically means that every hon. member who is interested in any subject has to sit here in this sweltering heat from eleven in the morning to eleven at night on the off-chance that something may come up in which he is interested. Now that we are going on with this other subject may I ask the Prime Minister when we may definitely expect to go on with the estimate which was before us at one o'clock?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has been inconvenienced, and I extend to him my deepest sympathy. The announcement which was made last night was definite in this particular, that it stated certain matters for the morning, and then was quite clear in the announcement that—in the afternoon we shall take up the second reading of the war grants bill and continue until it is concluded.

The reason for that is that the government is anxious to get its bills over to the other house as rapidly as may be possible. We would have taken the war grants bill first thing this morning except for the fact that I understood hon. gentlemen opposite would prefer to go on with it in the afternoon, the bill itself not having been distributed quite soon enough. It is for that reason that I am asking now that the committee rise and progress be reported, so that we may go on with the second reading of the war service gratuities bill.

As to my hon. friend's request, I wish I could give him some assurance as to when the estimates of the Department of External Affairs will again be to the fore, but that will necessarily depend upon the progress which is made with other matters, and for that reason I cannot give him the assurance he asks. Any inside point of view I may gain I shall try to let him have it.

Motion agreed to.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Neill.]

WAR SERVICE GRATUITIES

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES ACTIVE SERVICE PERSONNEL—PAYMENTS ON RETIREMENT OR DISCHARGE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 184, to provide for the payment of war service gratuities and for the grant of reestablishment credits to members of His Majesty's forces in respect of service during the present war.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I really do not know that there is very much that one can add on the second reading of the bill to the discussion which has taken place on the resolution. The resolution was purposely made as full as possible in order that hon. members might get a general outline of what the plan is.

I can assure the house—and I am speaking now particularly with regard to the first part of the bill, which has to do with war service gratuities, but it also applies to the general scheme of the measure—that this measure is the result of long and earnest study. We have examined all the information which has been available regarding planning in the United Kingdom, in the United States, and in other dominions. We have studied the provisions of the measure on the same subject which was brought down after the last war. The plan which is covered by the bill is the outcome of no less than ten different plans which have been considered. That is to say, from time to time certain features have been adopted or discarded or changed, and this bill is the result of the tenth—and the final—draft of a plan with regard to war service gratuities and rehabilitation.

I want to put in concrete form and on record an outline of the plan.

First, as to its application. It applies only to those who have enlisted or who have been at any time obligated to service anywhere; that is to say, service without territorial limitation.

Firstly, it applies to the man who has enlisted, whether he is in Canada or overseas, but at different rates depending on where that service may have been rendered.

Secondly, it applies to men who may be obligated by being called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act for service anywhere, that is to say without any limitation as to territory. There again different rates apply to the portion of the service which may be in Canada and the portion which may be overseas.

Thirdly, it does not apply to men who are called up for service in Canada unless and until they have enlisted for general service, or the area of their service has been extended under the National Resources Mobilization Act to include overseas.

Fourthly, it includes those who served in the offensive operations in the Aleutian islands, for the period of that service.

The plan, as has been indicated by the resolution, is divided into two parts: first, a cash grant as a war service gratuity, payable in monthly instalments, plus certain pay and allowances the rates of which will appear; secondly, in addition to those, a reestablishment credit which a man may take advantage of for certain specified purposes at any time within ten years. This reestablishment credit is an amount equal to the war service gratuity.

The basis on which the war service gratuity is paid is, first, $7.50 for each thirty days of service in respect of service in the western hemisphere; secondly, $15 for each thirty days of service in respect of service overseas and in the Aleutian islands; and thirdly, in addition, for each six months of service overseas or in the Aleutian islands, a man gets seven days' pay and allowances of rank.

That last feature is based on the fact that those serving overseas or in the Aleutian islands, or at least those serving overseas, have had no opportunity of obtaining leave to visit their families. This seven days' pay and allowance for each six months is to give them the equivalent of the leave they would have had if they had been in Canada and had had the opportunity to visit their families. Fourteen days a year is exactly comparable to the leave given as annual leave to those serving in this country, with a few exceptions. There are some special exceptions in which it is twenty-eight days per year.

The basis of the rehabilitation grant is one month's pay and allowances of rank. That grant, as has been indicated in the discussion on the resolution, is already in effect, and that will continue to be paid in addition to the payments I have already mentioned.

Then there comes the reestablishment credit, and as I have already said, that credit is an amount equal to the amount of the war service gratuity on the basis of $7.50 per month or $15 per month as the case may be. That is essentially a reestablishment matter, and the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) will be the minister who will deal with that in the discussion that will ensue. As I have already indicated to the committee, the long-term administration of the act, and that applies particularly to the reestablishment credit, will be under him.

In connection with the reestablishment credit, as has been indicated in the discussion in the committee stage of the resolution, there have been a great number of other reestablishment benefits already provided for, and the minister of pensions will I am sure indicate them to the committee if that is desired.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that when the minister speaks of the minister of pensions he means the present minister, who will no doubt be given some identification, perhaps in relation to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is perfectly right. The act provides that it is the minister of pensions or the minister of the Department of Veterans Affairs which has been established at this session. That reestablishment credit, I may say, provides an alternative to these other forms of reestablishment, and there is a considerable list, as the house will see in the bill, of uses to which the reestablishment credit can be put, and which it is hoped will assist materially in getting the individual settled in his community in post-war life.

Perhaps I should mention the principles on which the plan is founded. There were two alternatives in connection with war gratuities. One was a flat rate irrespective of rank; the other was a gratuity according to rank and based on pay and allowances of rank. No doubt good reasons could be advanced for either of these systems, but the government felt that to adhere rigidly to either of these plans could not be regarded as the fairest thing to do, and the plan therefore, as indicated in the resolution and in the bill, combines both principles. First, there is the basic gratuity of a flat rate of $7.50 and $15, which gives a flat amount, regardless of rank, for all ranks with the same lengths of service in the western hemisphere and overseas; and, secondly, rank is given consideration in providing for pay and allowances of rank, for a certain number of days for those with overseas service and also in connection with the rehabilitation grant of one month's pay and allowances, which is already in effect.

Then there were two other principles, either of which might be considered: a simple cash grant and call it a day and say to the men, "That is the payment we are going to make; do what you like after that"; and the other would be to devote everything to rehabilitation measures, assistance in kind, rather than in cash, so to speak. Those two principles have been combined in the bill and we have therefore a substantial cash grant and along with that a credit for reestablishment purposes of an amount equal to the basic gratuity. It is felt again that the combination of the two ideas would be better than the adoption exclusively of either of them.

In making a comparison with the gratuities payable at the time of the last war, I want it understood that I am offering no criticism whatever. The gratuities then were based on what I have no doubt was regarded as the best form in which the matter could be worked out. A grant was made almost immediately at the close of the war. But there are some anomalies in the provision made in the last war and we have had the benefit of an examination of those anomalies and a thorough exploration of the possibilities for improvement, and I should like to refer to some of these.

The first point is that gratuity in the last war was based entirely on pay and allowances of rank. In other words, the first alternative I mentioned a moment ago was adopted. That last war plan was one month's pay and allowances of rank for each year of service for those who served in Canada and two months' pay and allowances of pay and rank for each year for those whose service was partly overseas. The result was that there was a great disparity between the gratuity payable to officers and that received by the men.

I may say that the United States in this war, as was indicated in the previous discussion, provided for mustering-out pay based on a flat rate for all ranks up to the rank of colonel, I think it was, and we have adopted the flat rate irrespective of rank for the basic gratuity and have given recognition to pay and allowances of rank in respect of payments for seven days for each six months of service overseas and in respect of the rehabilitation grant.

The second point to be noted is that in the last war there was a floor of $70 for single men and of $100 for married men. In other words, that was the minimum which was provided for each man.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was there any clothing allowance at that time?

Mr. RALSTON: At that time it was $35, the same as our original clothing allowance in this war.

We have not adopted that principle of the floor in this bill. It provides for allowances based on actual length of service and does not provide any floor.

A third point is that in the last war no one got pay and allowances in respect of service beyond three years. There was a ceiling. That is to say, the gratuity for four years' service was the same as the gratuity for three. Here again we have avoided that anomaly by putting in no arbitrary limitation on the period of service in respect of which the gratuity will be paid.

A fourth point is that in the last war the gratuity was so much per year of service and there was no proportionate gratuity allowed for parts of a year. A man serving twenty-four months received a gratuity of two years' service and a man serving twenty-three months received a gratuity for one year's service only, that is to say, only half of what the first man received, notwithstanding that both periods of service were almost identical in length. This measure endeavours to assess the service much more equitably by estimating the amount to be received in months and not in years.

One other difference in the provision made in the last war was that if a man got overseas his whole service was regarded as overseas service. That of course did make a substantial difference in a man's gratuity. In this bill we double the overseas rate, but provide an additional amount for actual overseas service in the form of seven days' pay and allowances for each six months overseas, and we have felt that it would be better and fairer that the rate to be paid should depend on just what service is actually rendered in each particular theatre. Therefore $7.50 is provided for such service as is in Canada and the western hemisphere and $15 for such service as is overseas. In other words, there is not an artificial service created by reason of the fact that a man has at some time been overseas.

Mr. BURTON: Suppose a man has offered to go overseas. Suppose he has volunteered to go overseas but the department has considered that he is better in Canada than being overseas. He remains in Canada, therefore. What provision is made for him?

Mr. RALSTON: That was what I had in mind yesterday when I spoke of the luck of the draw. It is not his fault, and there are thousands of men in the same position. That man would be shut out in the same way under the provisions of the last war unless he actually got overseas, and I have no doubt there were many men in that class in the last war. But notwithstanding the fact that he was willing to go overseas, and every man who volunteers for general service has the will to go overseas, there is this feature to be considered, that he has the benefit of non-separation, at least by long distance, from his family, and he does have the opportunity of visiting his family from time to time and keeping more closely in touch with employment and domestic conditions in Canada while he is here. That is the reason for providing that he shall be paid in accordance with the rates for Canadian service.

Mr. BRUCE: Does the same regulation apply to men who have gone active and remained in Canada, as to those in the home defence army who have not been willing to go active?

Mr. RALSTON: When a man enlists, whether he may have been an N.R.M.A. man, or whether he may have enlisted off the street, so to speak, he becomes an enlisted man and is entitled to the Canadian rate so long as he is in Canada, but only from the time he enlists.

Mr. BRUCE: Whether he is in the N.R.M.A. or not?

Mr. RALSTON: He is out of the N.R.M.A. when he enlists. His time counts only from the day he actually enlisted. That was dealt with when we were discussing the resolution yesterday.

Now, with regard to other countries, in New Zealand what appears they intend to make for post-war is a retroactive increase in pay of one shilling to be paid to all ranks going back to the date of enlistment. In other words, while it is called a retroactive increase in pay it is really a credit of a shilling for each day that the man has served. The amount is credited in pay accounts and it will be paid in a lump sum at the time of discharge. That means, of course, a flat rate for all ranks.

Mr. SENN: The minister spoke about this dating from the time of enlistment. I know of a number of boys who tried to enlist and who were not called up for a month or six weeks after they had offered. When would the time begin in a case like that?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know what was done in that case. The service would count from the time of the signing of the attestation paper. I could not tell, unless I was given the particular case, when they were attested. If they were sent away to come back in six weeks' time the time would not apply until attestation. Were these air force men?

Mr. SENN: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: There were cases in the air force in which men were attested and given leave, perhaps indefinitely. In such a case it would be regarded as service.

Mr. SENN: They were accepted, but I do not know whether they were attested.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not imagine they were attested until they came back.

Australia has not as yet completed a war service gratuity plan. I have some information with regard to plans that were under consideration, but the information is confidential at the moment. As I indicated yesterday, South Africa has provided for a flat rate for all ranks regardless of the area of service; whether they serve in South Africa or anywhere else it is the same—thirty shillings a month for each month of service for European men; fifteen shillings a month for European women; ten shillings a month for coloured personnel and five shillings a month for native personnel. The payment in these cases is to be made in union loan certificates. The house may be interested in this. In going over the reports of 1918 and 1919 I happened to find—the government claims no pride of authorship of this plan—but as a matter of fact it was after we had evolved the plan that we found that a similar plan was proposed by the late Colonel J. W. Margeson, of Nova Scotia by the way. He presented it to the civil reestablishment committee in 1918 or 1919. He proposed a plan whereby everybody would be paid up to $500 in cash, and—

Mr. GRAYDON: That was a Canadian committee?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes—also proposed that some provision should be made for a credit whereby a man might be paid up to $1,500, and he designated certain purposes to which this credit might be applied, purposes similar to the purposes set out in sections 8, 9 and 10 of this bill. As a matter of fact the purposes he mentioned to the committee were not nearly as comprehensive as the purposes in this bill, but it was the same idea—part cash and part reestablishment credit. That plan was not accepted at the time. I should say that proposal was made to the reestablishment committee after the war services gratuities had been passed by the government.

I do not think there is anything further I can add in explanation of the bill.

May I just add this. Having regard to my responsibilities, to me this bill is just as important as, if not more important, than any other measure that has come before this house. We have dealt with many other important measures, but I think this one takes second place to none. All our efforts in this war are directed toward the defeat of the enemy. That is the thing we are driving for, and the point is that the enemy cannot be defeated without fighting men. The culmination and summit of our activities against the enemy is the presence to-day of the fighting forces of Canada on sea, on land and in the air, adding their weight to the blows which are being rained on Hitler and the German army, in the east and in the south and west. The casualty lists that I have the sombre opportunity of reading every day tells the story of the courage and devotion of those men, and I may say of the women too. It is those men and women, and those in Canada who are doing their part by backing them up in the way of training, equipment and reinforcements, that this bill seeks to recognize. Many of those who have gone into the battle lines in the navy, the army and the air force will, alas, not come back, and it may be that more will join that heroic army of the fallen. Many will have suffered wounds, but most of them, whether or not they have been fortunate enough to escape injury, will have suffered ills or hardship, physical, mental or financial. They cannot escape that. These men and women who come back will, I hope and believe, be the backbone of post-war Canada. It seems to me we cannot dwell on that too much, because men who have done the things they have accomplished, and have gone through the hardships they have endured, and have shown the resolution they have displayed, are going to be a potent force in this dominion. We cannot hope either to repay or to make up to them in any material way what they have lost in those years in the separation from their homes and from their peace-time occupations. But we do say, and we try to say it in this bill, that this country must do all in its power to make sure that the change-over to civil life, when it comes, shall be as speedy and as successful as we can make it. It is with that objective in mind that I commend this bill to the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I be permitted to ask one question? I had intended asking permission to make the inquiry before the minister came to the general part of his remarks. Did the government give consideration to a payment in the form of a battle line bonus for those who have actually been in contact with the enemy, over and above this standard gratuity that has been provided for? It would seem to me that that involves an element that should not be completely disregarded in a bill of this kind.

Mr. RALSTON: As I indicated yesterday, the committee which was dealing with it considered very carefully the matter of what some people call a combatant gratuity or bonus, and endeavoured to see if it were possible to draw any line or make any distinction or adopt any definition which would give special recognition in that respect. As I indicated, it finally came back to discussion of a flat amount regardless of pay and allowances for those who were overseas, no matter in what theatre of action. The view was that they all were more or less in a theatre of action, and the idea of a distinction in degrees of danger was discarded and the principle was adopted of double gratuity and the seven-day pay and allowances based directly on service over there, and rank so far as pay and allowances were concerned. That one item of the seven days pay and allowances amounted to something like $50,000,000. I endeavoured to explain to the committee yesterday some of the difficulties of endeavouring to draw any line. I have no doubt that a lot of people would try, as we have tried, to see if they could reach any definition which would help and which would not at the same time have elements of hardship or elements of unfairness or elements of inequity. I think there is no way in which it can be done unless you took the individual man and had a board try his individual case to find out exactly what danger he was in at a particular time; because I can conceive of occasions of a man in a unit being at a particular time in danger when the rest of the unit was in comparative safety for the time being. Certain troops may be further up than the rest of the troops with whom they are serving, and consequently may be in more danger. You cannot adopt any rule having regard to actual contact with the enemy which will be fair and which will not include some who would not be entitled on the basis of that test, and would not at the same time exclude others who might be entitled. Therefore the provision of the bill distinguishes between overseas and Canada, first on the basis of risk and second on the basis of separation, to mention only two of the features. These are the fairest tests, the two principal tests that may be applied; and as I indicated we seem to be backed up in that by the fact that the United States have adopted the same idea. South Africa has not even gone that far but has made the allowance absolutely flat, regardless of area of service; and if I remember correctly New Zealand has done the same. They have not even attempted to differentiate between service overseas and service in the country. There is also the point that after the last war exactly the same distinction was adopted in the Canadian war gratuity scheme.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to recognize the service of members of His Majesty's forces who have been on active service, and we support the government in this recognition. I should like to make a plea this afternoon, however, in behalf of those who bear the real brunt and pay the real cost of the war, but who are not recognized under this legislation. I am going to ask the government if they will not give consideration to the granting of gratuities to the next of kin of those who pay the supreme sacrifice. Parents who are actually dependents now come under the act and receive gratuities, but in thousands of cases the father is still earning a living, and because the boy has made no request for dependents' allowance his parents do not qualify under this legislation. All the mothers and fathers of our boys know anxiety and worry. If you have watched them, as I have, listening to the news over the radio, knowing that their boys are on bombing raids over enemy territory if you have seen their anxious expressions every time the mail man comes or the telegraph boy passes by, you must retalize something of what these people are going through. We can never repay them for the loss suffered when their sons pay the supreme sacrifice; a gratuity of any kind can be only a sort of token, but in many cases it would help a great deal.

I have in mind parents who are approaching the time when their ability to earn a living will be greatly diminished. I am thinking of fathers who have been incapacitated since their sons have gone on active service, and who have not had the opportunity to apply for dependents' allowance. The payment of a gratuity to the next of kin, I should say not less than that which would be paid to a soldier who had spent two years on active service, would do something to recognize the service of those who have lost their lives. Perhaps some of the parents would not want this money; they might prefer to donate it to a fund for the purpose of waging war against the causes of war, but in many cases where the parents are reaching their declining years, when they might have depended upon their sons to assist them in some degree, the payment of a gratuity of that kind would be of great help. I do not think the expense would be very great, since the payments would be comparatively small, and if the government would give consideration to expanding the payment of these gratuities to take in the next of kin I am sure that action would be very favourably received. At least it would be a gesture; in some cases it would be a great help—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is that not covered by section 4?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not as I read it. If the minister will give me his assurance that the next of kin are covered, I shall be very happy, but I believe this deals only with those who have been recognized as dependents.

Mr. RALSTON: Or who have received assigned pay.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is so, but there are some cases in which the pay has not been assigned. I do ask the government to take this suggestion into consideration, for I am sure it would receive the unanimous support of this house, and in many cases it would relieve definite hardship. The cost of the war in blood can never be paid, and these are the real costs. A battleship sinks; no one loses very much as a result, because those who have lent their millions are guaranteed the return of their money, but the men who go down with that ship can never come back. I am sure this gesture on the part of the government would be gratefully received, and I should like to know if the government could not find some way in which a regulation could be added to make such payments possible.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): I think hon. members generally regret that this bill has come before us in the dying hours of this session, for it is perhaps the most important measure to be brought before the house; it will mean so much to those who are doing so much for this country and for the world generally. Had the bill been brought in earlier it would have been given more publicity, and I believe the government would have changed their ideas in regard to some of its provisions. As the minister said yesterday, this is at least a gesture of appreciation on the part of the Canadian people of the service rendered by the men who have enlisted for active service and gone overseas. Yet we have imposed so many conditions upon the payment of these gratuities that in my opinion the scheme looks rather ridiculous.

Let us take the case of two men who enlisted for active service, and who served one year in Canada and two years overseas. As the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) said yesterday, each will receive a gratuity of $450; each will have a credit set up of another $450, making a total of $900 payable to each of them under certain conditions. Under section 9 of the act the credit must be used for one of the purposes there set out. A single man coming back may have no interest in a home, or in furniture, or in buying tools for a trade, or in furthering his education, or in any government scheme of insurance, or in any of the other matters dealt with in section 9. In that case he does not get any of that money. Yet someone else who wishes to buy a house or to do one of the things provided in the section will get twice as much money as the one who has no intention of doing any of those things.

Surely if we are going to give these men something in appreciation of what they have done for us and the country we should not hedge it in with provisions as to how they should spend the money. We should not say: We are going to supervise the spending of it; we are going to take charge of that part which is marked as credit; and if you do any of these things you will get so much money, but if you do not you will get only half as much as the other soldier who has seen the same length of service.

If we wish to treat these men right and fairly and equitably the only way we can do it is to give a lump sum. We must not say to them: We cannot trust you to spend this money in a proper way. We should say: This money is yours; do with it as you like. Had this bill been introduced earlier in the session I believe some of its provisions could have been given more consideration, and some of these things would have been changed. I protest against any government paying gratuities to men in our fighting forces and then saying to them, through legislation: We will give you this money, but we are going to see how you spend it. We had faith enough in them to let them go over there to risk their lives for us and for the country. Surely we can have the same faith in them, if they are given this money in a lump sum. Surely we need not hedge them in with a lot of provisions and stipulations as to how they must spend it.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) spoke to-day on the point I raised yesterday when the resolution was under consideration. I notice that in section 4 of the bill provision is made for the dependent, of those who have paid the supreme sacrifice, in the event of their receiving dependents' allowance or assigned pay. There are two problems coming within the scope of section 4 which I think the minister should take into serious consideration. I have in mind the case, for example, of the young airman who has paid the supreme sacrifice, but who may have served overseas only one month. After that length of service the grim reaper calls him, and in calculating his gratuity he would be entitled to payment only for a very limited period of service overseas. Although this young man has paid the supreme sacrifice, his dependents will be cut off from allowances by virtue of his death. The fact that the sons, brothers or husbands of these people have lost their lives on the field of battle, after only short service, should not deprive them of compensation. Young boys may have left to join the armed forces before making any financial contributions to the home; their parents may not have been dependent upon those young men at the time they enlisted. In such cases the next of kin, not having qualified as dependents, will lose a considerable portion of these benefits. In my view section 4 does not go far enough in dealing with such cases.

[Mr. Homuth.]

The dependent whose son returns is much more fortunate than the one whose son will never come back. In considering the provision for beneficent tokens of appreciation, limited as they are and inadequate as they must of necessity be, we should have given our first thought to the next of kin of those who have paid the supreme sacrifice. The fact that they have been killed in battle early in their term of service should not militate against the receipt of benefits by their next of kin. I suggest that these two points should be covered more fully than they are in section 4 of the bill.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, almost all this discussion has been directed to the different sections of the bill. It would be much more convenient for hon. members, and I am sure for the ministers, if we were to go into committee immediately after the bill is given second reading.

Mr. GRAYDON: There are some others who wish to speak on second reading.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, on second reading there are some points I should like to bring to the attention of the house. May I say at the outset that there have been some grave errors made in connection with this bill. Under paragraphs (a), (b) and (c), now incorporated in parts I and II of the bill, members of the forces shall receive $7.50 for each 30-day service on the western hemisphere and $15 for the same length of service overseas. Those payments are deferred. As I read the bill the mistake made is that these men will have to wait for their discharges before they receive those benefits. Many of the men will be wounded, and they will not get their discharge papers immediately.

While this bill is commendable in many respects, I am afraid that in the larger cities it offers no direct assistance to the men until discharge papers are obtained. My contention is that the principle of the bill is all wrong. It involves process of gratuity and credit, together with rehabilitation, where it should be based on one broad principle, namely that upon discharge the soldier should be put back into the position he held when he signed up for war, in his attestation papers. I find no such principle in this bill. There are many mistakes in it. There is the large amount of $350,000,000 allocated to the soldiers. But that is not the correct amount at all, because we have to take out those who are qualifying under the housing act, those who are qualifying under the veterans' land act, those who are going to universities or who are taking other forms of training in vocational pursuits. So that this sum will be reduced to only a portion of $350,000,000 in direct aid.

The worst feature of the bill is the manner in which it gives the aid to the soldier when he arrives on the streets of his village or town, or on the farm. How will it help? This provision puts me very much in mind of the man who makes a will in which he gives a grant of $5,000 but ties it up so completely that it is not worth a five-cent piece until the beneficiary dies or until somebody else gets it. The same principle is found in this bill. Too many lawyers have had something to do with it—and I am not referring to the three able lawyers who are ministers of the crown; far from it. But there has been no attempt to do some direct and final things for these soldiers who come home. I see them on Yonge street and I see them in Ottawa, in other parts of the country and on the trains. I talk to them, and some of them tell me they have not received a cent yet for clothing. And yet there are some who are walking around the streets of Ottawa, who have five or six uniforms, but have never been out of Ottawa.

This allowance of $100 is not enough to buy an overcoat. I do not know where these men are going to get outfits for $100 in these days. In the first place that is not enough money to buy them, and in the second place the supplies and equipment are not available. They cannot be fitted, and there are many other difficulties.

This bill is drawn up in such a way that it does not include certain young Canadians who should be included. Let us consider, for instance, those who after Munich, but before the war broke out, rushed to Great Britain when her rearmament began. Many of those men had just graduated in 1938 from Canadian universities. What did they do? They thought war was coming. Everybody knew it was coming. We in this House of Commons knew it was coming, but if we said so we would be called warmongers. I can tell you this, that these following classes should be added to the bill: First, those young Canadians who went overseas to join the British forces, many of them in cattle boats, at their own expense. Second, the merchant marine. There are a great many others who should be included. For instance, those who are serving with the imperials. Surely we should learn something from the last war, when many went overseas and served with the imperials, then came back to Canada, where they had owned a home before the war. They are not included at all.

I have calculated what the $7.50 in respect of service performed in the western hemisphere and the $15 in respect of overseas service will amount to for a soldier who has been fighting in Africa or in France or Normandy for three years. It means that he will get a cash grant of $480 for three years when he comes home. What good will that be?

The resolution and this bill have been drafted by the three defence ministers, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Pensions and National Health and I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Five or six ministers have combined in drafting the bill and its terms of payment. The bill itself is a short one. It starts with a clause of definitions, defining "credit", "dependents' allowance", "overseas service", "forces", and so on. The definitions are not very long. Then we come to part I, which deals with the actual gratuity, and this part dealing with the terms of payment is very important. One section deals with the payment of gratuity in case of the death of a member of the forces. The dependents of every member of the forces who has been killed in this war should get the benefit of this cash gratuity as well as other benefits, particularly housing. In the city from which I come only one per cent of the houses are vacant. As the hon. member for Davenport said, the government gave a courteous hearing to the deputation which waited upon them from the city of Toronto with respect to housing. But you cannot build houses without all kinds of necessary municipal services, light, power, water, sewers, transportation and so on. That is the key to the whole housing situation, as everybody knows.

As I read the bill, the widow and children of a member of the forces who has been killed in this war will not qualify for the reestablishment credits provided for in part II of the bill. When the resolution was under discussion I referred to the way in which this country has been dealing with material needs. Parliament this session has provided $1,050,000,000 for material needs. We have provided for the soldiers only $350,000,000. A great many who should have been eligible to receive the benefits of this gratuity I am afraid will not come under the bill.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health has got out a splendid booklet and fifty copies have been ordered by the city council of Toronto for distribution among the heads of departments. I find in it a great deal of useful information in support of this bill. I have often spoken of university training. In the last war only about twenty per cent of the members of the forces had had secondary school education. The percentage is much higher in this war. I know that a great many enlisted in the city of Toronto who were attending our high schools and the university there. We had 900 young boys of seventeen, eighteen, nineteen and twenty years of age killed already who entered the forces from the secondary schools of Toronto. Some others of them, not home yet, have been only a year in the service and they will not get a very large cash gratuity, but they will qualify for the university training with small pay. This splendid booklet got out by the Minister of Pensions and National Health explains the principles in dealing with university education.

The sections of this bill which deal with reestablishment and rehabilitation credits cover a whole lot of people who will not actually get any benefits under the bill. The Prime Minister referred to a maintenance allowance for veterans and their families who are out of work. A great many of them will be out of work, particularly those who have come back and are not one hundred per cent physically efficient. I advocated when the war started that we should have a national system of insurance to take care of unemployment of soldiers, because I know what our experience was in the last war. A wounded soldier who was not one hundred per cent physically efficient had great difficulty in getting employment because employers did not want labour which was not one hundred per cent efficient. This class will have the same trouble in getting work after this war is over, but they would have been looked after if my resolution for a national system of insurance and to provide against unemployment for three years after the war had been adopted.

The bill is not broad enough. It does not give cash at the time it is needed to the soldier when he arrives back home and goes to his own city or town or farm. That is when he needs the cash, and three or four hundred dollars will not help him very much, especially if he has a bill of sale or chattel mortgage on which these shark loan companies are charging two or three per cent a month under legislation passed by this parliament. I hope that this bill will be a success but it does not reach all the people to whom I have referred and who should be included under the bill. It does not adopt the principle that this parliament ought to put the returned soldier back into the same financial position he was in when the war started. It does not provide for maintaining him if he is out of employment.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. G. T. FULFORD (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to go on record as completely and entirely in favour of this bill. In my opinion it is the finest and the most humane bill that has been brought down in this chamber since I have been a member of the house. This bill is after all but a small token of the appreciation of Canada of the services of those who have offered their lives to defend this country in this time of crisis. I know that it is the general desire of the house and the country that we should in a concrete form express our appreciation of the sacrifices that our men and women have voluntarily made in this war. At the same time I wish to state that there is no one in this chamber who regrets more than I do that the government have not seen fit to implement the terms of the National Resources Mobilization act and draft all who are enrolled in the army for overseas service. I am glad, however, that expression is given in this bill to our desire to assist those who have voluntarily enlisted and show them that we appreciate their efforts and the sacrifices they have made. I wish to compliment all the ministers who have been responsible for bringing forward this measure on the thought that has been put into it, and I trust that it will soon be passed.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I did not say anything on the resolution stage, because something the Prime Minister said during the course of his able speech in introducing this bill recalled to my mind the sons of four of my neighbours. One was a young hero named Robert Lockhart, one named William Winter, one named David Duncan, one named Murray Fitzpatrick. All these four boys have passed on, and in the presence of such tragedies, words seemed empty of meaning. However, if I do not say something in support of the bill my silence might be misconstrued.

The bill proposes a much better system of benefits for the soldiers who come back from this war than were available to those who returned from the last war. I remember very clearly what took place at that time. I used to come to Ottawa on many occasions in those days on behalf of the returned men of the riding in which I lived and from which a very large number enlisted. With that experience in mind, I compliment those who framed and those who were associated in framing this bill upon what it proposes. I do not feel competent to say that it is perfect, but it goes a considerable distance in the right direction, and I have no doubt that if it does not do all that is intended, future administrations will see that the situation is remedied.

There are some aspects of it which I like very much. I compliment whoever is responsible for allowing ten years to the returned soldier to decide whether to apply for the re-establishment credit. Many of the boys who came back from the last war were anxious to get out of khaki and be done with the whole business, and I am afraid that many of them lost what were their rights. The allowance of a period of ten years in this measure is a step in the right direction.

Much has been said as to whether these heroes and heroines, when they come back, should be given all these benefits outright. I am of two minds on the matter. In two speeches yesterday the view was expressed that everything should be given to them at once and that they should do what they liked with it. I remember, following the last war, calling one day at a home where the young man had come back from overseas. He had been over there four years, and knew little more about what to do with money than a child would know. If my memory is correct he received something over $600. While I was talking to his mother he drove up to the door on a motorcycle with a sidecar. The mother said, "Where did you get that?" "Oh," he said, "I bought that to take you out." He had paid nearly six hundred dollars for that motorcycle. It was his right; he could do what he liked with the money, but the family were in humble circumstances and had a heavy mortgage on their home, and I have often wondered whether it was just right to distribute money in a lump sum or whether it would have been better for the government to try to protect such men against themselves.

Later on I had much to do with reparations connected with men of the merchant marine, and I came to Ottawa to make representations to the authorities on behalf of these men. I do not remember which government was in power; it makes no difference. Among those who received a grant was one woman whose husband had been killed in the discharge of his duty as a sailor of the merchant marine. I do not know how the amount of the grant was arrived at, but I understand that where ships are captured, those who are serving on the vessel which makes the capture draw large sums of money, as in the old days when sailors divided prize money among themselves. This lady—she was a fine woman, who lived in a humble home in my end of the city—received as her share $26,000. I pleaded with the authorities not to give her all the money outright, but rather to supply her with some ready cash and provide her with the interest on the money, or give her perhaps a thousand dollars a year; for I feared she would not know how to handle such a large amount of capital. However, whoever was in charge of the distribution of the money did not want to be bothered with it; his attitude was, "Let them have it, let them squander it, let them tear it up or burn it, let them do what they like." The woman had no sooner got the money than someone, if I remember rightly, sold her a house for $17,000, and a furniture company sold her a large quantity of furniture for the house. To make a long story short, I am sure that both her house and her furniture were gone long before five or six years, and she was back where she had been when I first knew her. There is no sense to that, is there? An income of a thousand dollars a year for the rest of her life would have been a much more satisfactory provision. However, I am not going to say how much should be given, or whether it should all be given at once.

I am pleased with the provision for an outright cash gratuity which amounts to about $900 to a soldier or woman participant who serves overseas four or five years. It is a fairly substantial gratuity, and I assume that they can do as they like with it. I also approve the part of the bill which provides a credit, under section 9, to assist them to an equal amount to buy homes, et cetera. Many returned veterans of the last war who received gratuities put the money in small houses and so were able to become possessors of their own little homes, and that was a fine thing. Some men, like the young man I mentioned, did not do so, but the rest should not be condemned because a few spent their money unwisely. I strongly support section 9, which provides for the acquisition of a home, for its repair or modernization, for the purchase of furniture, the provision of capital for a business, the purchase of tools, the purchase of a business, the payment of premiums, the purchase of special equipment, and any other purpose authorized by the governor in council. This must be all to the good. I hope that in framing these provisions, whoever drafted the bill conferred with and obtained the approval of the Canadian Legion and other returned soldier organizations, because they are far more competent than any civilian to suggest what should be done. If they have approved all this, it must be good.

The problem is huge. I am not going to say much about it because I am not competent to do so. Nothing can compensate these men for what they have undergone. I have two nephews who are in the services. One of them was not nineteen when he enlisted. He is a pilot in the fleet air arm, and I have been told that casualties amongst these lads are heavy. I know that it is God's providence that in many cases the boys get back on their ship again from a fight. The other young man gave up a big position as a statistician in New York city. Like his cousin, he has the martial spirit, his heart was in the fight, and he came home and volunteered and is overseas. The other boy, of course, volunteered too.

What is one to say about these young men? No one can possibly figure in dollars and cents what they have gone through. Those who come home are happy in their good fortune; those who do not return—well, nothing can compensate them. The hon. member for Yorkton, however, made a suggestion which I rather support and I do so partly because of the fact that at present I do not know exactly what the bill provides for.

As regards those who die leaving no next of kin who are entitled to their share, what is to be done with the contribution that would have gone to those men? If a large sum accrued to the honoured memory of such boys perhaps it could be set aside for the building of schools to educate the sons of those who do come back and who later on require assistance. In the last war three boys whom I knew very well were all killed—they were Scotch—and their mother would not take anything all her life since the great war. She has just plodded along on a small farm and to this day has refused the compensation to which she is entitled of $40 a month. I suggest that there is no reason whatever why anyone should refuse to take that money. They are entitled to it.

It would only be taking up the time of the house if I spoke any longer. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I could have sat down at the outset by merely observing that I fully support this measure. I support the best intentions of the bill, and I sincerely pray that it will bring the greatest possible comfort to all those who do come back, to their relatives and friends and to all who are entitled to it. I hope that what is planned for the rehabilitation of these young men will succeed in reestablishing them properly and that every one of them from the time he comes home and has received from his country that to which he is justly entitled, will try to forget the days that have gone and will concentrate on building up this great country, the richest in the world, with incomparable resources. I hope they will all make good and I hope too that a multitude of others from the old land will come with them and be equally successful.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I do not intend to discuss this bill in all its ramifications. I merely rise to clarify something in my own mind. We are dealing with the principle of the bill, and in section 4 the principle of making the gratuity available to certain classifications of next of kin is established. Those who had assignment of pay, or assignment of pay and allowance, and who may lose their lives during the war must be considered. The gratuity can be paid to dependents coming within the classifications mentioned, but that is all contingent upon certain discretionary powers given the minister, who may determine what the administration of the regulations shall be.

What I wish to have clarified is this. In making these payments, is the question of necessitous circumstances to be one of the governing reasons why the minister may use his discretion to make the gratuity available to the classes here set out? Or will the bill be so administered that the Minister of Veterans Affairs shall be required to check dependents' allowance files and to pay to all those set out as dependents within the meaning of the regulations as indicated in clause 4? Or will this discretionary power give the minister such latitude as will enable him to determine whether the classifications for whom we are attempting to legislate here may be eligible or otherwise? I am afraid there is some ambiguity about this provision. If we are going to pay the gratuity to dependents as set out here, there is no necessity for discretionary powers on the part of the minister, and when such powers are set out I am led to believe that there may be certain qualifications that will determine the question whether a dependent may be brought within the scope of the regulations.

With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Yorkton, that service personnel who may lose their lives overseas should also be included in this principle, I am not so much concerned about that because I think the great majority of service personnel to-day in any of the services have an assignment of pay on coming back home. The number of those who have not an assignment is very small, and if I read this clause correctly I think we are protecting everyone who needs protection. There may be an isolated case here and there that should be taken care of by those administering the regulations, but if I am not right in assuming that this question of necessitous circumstances, with all the ramifications of the pension act in determining eligibility in regard to dependents, will form a part of the picture: if it is mandatory and obligatory on the part of the minister who will administer the regulations to take all the files of those coming within the meaning of dependent as defined in the dependents' allowance regulations, and set out in this clause, then the clause is all right. What I wish to have explained is this discretionary power.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I wish to join in the many expressions of approval of the principle of the bill to do the very best we can for our returned men and for their dependents. Nothing that we can do in a material way will ever repay them for the sacrifice and suffering which they have undergone. I hope that at this time we shall do better for them than we did after the last war. It is a very depressing thing to see returned men begging on our streets, as I have seen on more than one occasion. I do not know whether or not the provisions of this bill can definitely prevent that. I believe it is wise not to give them a lump sum at once, but if possible to spread it over in the form of an annuity to ensure that if employment is not provided for them they will at least be taken care of adequately for the rest of their lives.

This morning the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) brought up the question of demobilization and the plan of demobilization and spoke of the principle "first in, first out." That would seem to be a desirable thing. The minister has, however, indicated that he and his associates have not yet been able to decide upon a plan of demobilization. May I express the hope that before long such a plan will be devised because, nothing could be more helpful to the morale of our men.

I notice that a distinction is made in this bill between men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act and those who have enlisted for active service, although the latter have not gone overseas. A definite distinction is drawn in regard to the grants that each will receive under this measure. This shows clearly that when the government said that these men of the home defence army were performing a very useful service in Canada by remaining in Canada, they realized there was a distinction between them and the active army; for otherwise the government's attitude is inconsistent when it denies the home army equal treatment with those who have enlisted but are still in Canada and not serving overseas although willing to do so. I cannot reconcile the attitude of the government in saying on the one hand that these men are doing a useful service for their country by remaining here in the home army, and on the other hand in not giving them the same compensation or consideration that they give to the men who remain home doing similar service but who have expressed their willingness to become active.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend advocate that the N.R.M.A. men called up for service in Canada should have the same as the enlisted men?

Mr. BRUCE: I am not saying that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RALSTON: I think that is what my hon. friend is saying.

Mr. BRUCE: No, I most certainly am not saying that, because my view is that they should all be made to go active by the government, which so far has not had the courage to pass the necessary order in council to make everyone in the home army available for active service anywhere, where the fighting is going on.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not a matter of courage; it is a matter of necessity. It is a question of when it is necessary, not a question of courage.

Mr. BRUCE: I do not know. There will be a difference of opinion as to when it is necessary.

Mr. RALSTON: Of course.

Mr. BRUCE: When we read in the press of the tremendous casualties overseas—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I hope that the hon. gentleman is not going to go into a subject which is entirely outside this bill, namely, the question of the desirability of passing an order in council to enforce conscription. I hope that issue is not to be raised on this bill.

Mr. BRUCE: May I say that I did not raise this issue?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, you did.

Mr. BRUCE: The minister did.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. BRUCE: Surely I have a right to answer.

Mr. RALSTON: I asked the hon. member if he advocated that the N.R.M.A. men be paid the same gratuity as the men who enlisted. My hon. friend refused to answer that question, and launched into a discussion as to whether or not it was necessary to call up men for active service.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Somebody asked a trick political question and did not get an answer.

Mr. BRUCE: I think it is perfectly proper for me to say this, that when appraising the value of the service of our men, which we are doing in this bill, we have to remember what sacrifices and dangers these men have made and the terrible risks to which they have been exposed. I think the minister and the government should indicate to the house what it intends to do later on with respect to another battle in the Pacific, about which I made an inquiry yesterday. I cannot imagine anything more likely to cause trouble and disunity in this country when the war is won in Europe than to ask our men, who are now fighting there, to return home and cross Canada when they will see thousands of men of the home defence army wearing the same uniform but doing nothing to win this war and not being made to go and fight the battle in the Pacific. I should like to refer to that because it has a bearing on what we are discussing here.

I asked a question yesterday in regard to this matter, which question was as follows:

When the European war is terminated will the government ask those who have won that war to fight another war on the Pacific without in the meantime making the home defence army available for that task?

I received the following inadequate answer:

It would be utterly improper for the government to make any announcement with respect to matters which relate to the strategy of the war—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must insist upon the hon. member confining his remarks to the bill before the house. If the hon. member will show me or explain to me the relevancy of the remarks he is making to the provisions of the bill, I shall be glad to hear it. I must say there is no connection between his remarks and the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BRUCE: Well, I do not know. We seem to be making a lot of regulations here to prevent hon. members from expressing their views.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must not reflect on the Chair. I invited the hon. member to give me the relevancy of the remarks he is now making to the provisions of the bill. If the hon. member can show me or satisfy me that what he is now saying is relevant to the provisions of the bill he will be allowed to proceed, but so far as I have heard his remarks in my judgment they are not relevant to the bill.

Mr. BRUCE: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that they are, because we are speaking about the welfare of our soldiers and are making provision to take care of them when the war is over. I am introducing something that has to do with the morale of the army. We all agree that our first consideration is the winning of this war, and I am of the opinion that nothing would be more likely to improve the morale of our men overseas than to hear over the radio to-morrow that the government has voted this large sum of money for them when they return home, and in addition has passed the order in council which will provide adequate reinforcements when they are required.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Nothing we do here under this measure can repay the men who have gone overseas; the most we can do will be too little. My greatest criticism, however, is that the bill has been brought in too late in the session. Such an important measure should have been brought in much sooner, at least two or three weeks ago, and hon. members would have had an opportunity to study it. It is all very well for a few groups of people to get together to study a matter, but after all the members of this House of Commons have their fingers on the pulse of their constituents all the time; they receive suggestions, which they are only too glad to pass on, and as we know from experience measures of this kind are often altered after being introduced. This is a non-partisan bill; we all want to do everything we can for our soldiers, but I should like to mention one or two points about it which do not seem quite right.

In the first place, the men who are discharged from the army want jobs more than anything else. We have the provision which states that a man shall be taken back into his job, and that his position shall be not worse than it would have been if he had not enlisted. That is not the way the clause has been interpreted, however. It has been held to mean that a man is to get his old job back again. On several occasions I have asked the government to clarify that provision, but so far nothing has been done. Then some parts of this bill contain too many restrictions of one kind or another, and it is hard to decide just what section 4 does mean. If a man lives he will be entitled to his gratuity; there is no doubt about that. If he dies, however, in certain circumstances his dependents will not receive this gratuity. I think that should be clarified. This gratuity belongs to the individual soldier, or to his heirs no matter who they are, to use as they wish.

Then, to deal with the other provision which was mentioned by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), why should we tell these men what they may do with this money? Why should we not let them have it to use as they wish? Heaven knows they have been over there long enough to deserve at least a portion of this money to spend as they see fit. In addition, there are not nearly enough of these classifications under which they may spend this money. These men may want to do many things, but unless they come within the terms of section 9 they fall under the other provision, which says, "and any other purpose authorized by the governor in council," so that they have to go to the governor in council to find out how they may spend their gratuity.

Those are one or two points that occur to me in connection with this measure, but of course my greatest objection is the short time we are given to discuss this matter. We received this bill only this morning, and we cannot give it proper study in this short time. We do not know what its ramifications are; we do not know how far it goes, or what is really in the mind of the government. That is the principal criticism. I venture to say this bill will have to be altered before it has been in force very long, and I suppose that will have to be done by order in council. That ought not to be necessary; the bill should be discussed at much greater length, and we should be given a much better opportunity to study it. On many occasions we have asked the government to let us know what they were going to do, and only now are we given an answer.

In connection with the clothing allowance, those returned men who were discharged and given only $35 will get nothing more. Those who were discharged and given $65 will get nothing more. Those discharged from now on will get $100. What will be paid those discharged six months from now—$120? The men who were discharged earlier need the clothing just as much as anyone else. How is this measure going to work out? I certainly support the bill, so far as that is concerned, but with these reservations.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I have three points I should like cleared up so that when we get into committee we may be able to deal with one or two of the clauses. Perhaps I might make one general comment. As I said previously, we are hedging this bill about with a great many restrictions. When we passed the family allowance measure a day or so ago I did not notice that it had any restrictions of this kind. Perhaps I am out of order in making reference to that measure, but I am wondering why we can pass one bill of such magnitude with very few restrictions, while in this measure we must impose numerous conditions upon the returned soldier or his dependents.

I should like some particular information before we reach the committee stage, and perhaps I may illustrate my point by mentioning a specific instance. It will be recalled that immediately after war was declared one division or part of a division was sent overseas. Take the case of a young man who went overseas at that time; he had assigned his pay, and an allowance was being made. He was in the army only three weeks before being sent overseas; he was in England for only two weeks when, during the course of training, he was killed when a truck overturned and rolled down an embankment. How are the dependents of that young man going to get any compensation under this legislation? If the gratuity to the next of kin is based upon the length of service, which was only three weeks in Canada and two weeks overseas, it will be infinitesimal.

The next point on which I should like some information is in connection with the real meaning of this reestablishment credit. Could I be informed whether the credit to be set up is to equal the total of the gratuity, pay and allowance, and clothing allowance?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. LOCKHART: It is equal to the gratuity only?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then I am opposed to that principle. Perhaps I will have more to say on one of the sections of the bill, but take the case of a man who enlisted for active service and went overseas. Six months later his wife became actively interested in army work over there and rose to a high rank. Will they both receive gratuities and allowances as though they were separate entities or separate individuals?

Mr. RALSTON: Not as though they were separate individuals. There are certain rules with regard to dependents' allowances which are applicable where both husband and wife are in the services. That rule would still apply in connection with gratuities. They would both receive gratuities. Any wife who is in the Canadian Women's Army Corps and who gets more than $2,100 does not receive dependents' allowance in respect of her husband who is already in the service. But subject to a distinction of that kind I think they would be treated separately.

Mr. LOCKHART: As separate individuals?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: I think that covers the point. When we come to the committee stage I may have some further questions.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I now have an answer to my question? I am referring of course to the 10th Battery, which was enlisted immediately and in three weeks went overseas. They were there at Christmas of 1939, and there were casualties. I have one in mind where a truck, in training operations, rolled down a bank and there were one or two serious casualties. What happens in such a case, under this word "credit"? What comes to the next of kin? I know of three or four instances of the kind, and I have no doubt other hon. members know of others.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is putting forward an individual case. He must see that the provision would be simply the provision for service in this particular bill. I do not think the rehabilitation grant would apply in the case the hon. member has mentioned, because, if I remember correctly, it is payable in respect of service of more than 183 days.

Mr. LOCKHART: And in this particular instance, then—

Mr. RALSTON: In which particular instance I do not think this bill would provide any substantial compensation.

Mr. LOCKHART: And where there are next of kin, they would be out of luck.

Mr. RALSTON: There would be very little gratuity. I understand the case to be that of a man who enlisted very early in 1939, who served in Canada only a few weeks—

Mr. LOCKHART: The 10th Battery went over almost at once.

Mr. RALSTON: —and who within two or three weeks of arriving overseas was killed. I have no doubt the dependent is receiving a pension.

Mr. LOCKHART: No, there is no pension; but there was payment of dependents' allowance.

Mr. RALSTON: But there must be a pension.

Mr. LOCKHART: Assigned pay was being paid.

Mr. RALSTON: But there also must be a pension, if there was a dependent.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

Mr. LOCKHART: No, there is no pension being paid, because perhaps of particular circumstances. But assigned pay was sent home to meet certain family obligations. There are two or three other cases—

Mr. RALSTON: Let us stick to this one. This case interests me.

Mr. LOCKHART: The young man went overseas and assigned pay to his mother, although the mother was not particularly dependent upon him. That is, there was a husband in question—or, shall I say, a kind of husband. But the young man did provide as assigned pay all he could possibly afford, to be paid to his mother. He was there only a very short time when he was killed through an accident, caused I believe by a truck running down a bank, or something of the kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Was the mother dependent upon the boy?

Mr. LOCKHART: Only partly so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Then that is why the pension is not payable.

Mr. LOCKHART: In that case it would appear as though next of kin would not get anything.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why would not the mother get something?

Mr. LOCKHART: I am wondering if there is any provision whereby under which in a case of that kind some relief might be given. I can bring to the attention of the committee other cases involving men who enlisted in the early stages of the war, before Christmas of 1939. In those cases there might be no pension rights, or it would be difficult to show any pension rights, although there might be a certain amount of dependency because of the irresponsibility of, perhaps, a father.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Could she establish that she would have been dependent upon him if he had returned from overseas service?

Mr. LOCKHART: The way circumstances have developed since, she could have established it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Then she is entitled to pension.

Mr. LOCKHART: We will take it up, then.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be very glad to deal with it.

Mr. LOCKHART: That covers the point.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it right to assume that paragraph (i) is the one place in the bill where the dividing line is drawn between enlisted and enrolled men?

Mr. RALSTON: No; there really is not a dividing line. The word "enlisted" is used there to make sure that the volunteer is recognized. The enlisted man is, of course, obligated to serve. But we put in the word "enlisted" and the expression "obligated to serve". There is no dividing line.

Mr. STIRLING: In paragraph (d) the word "forces" means the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty raised in Canada. That clearly covers N.R.M.A. men, does it not? Then, "overseas service" applies to service of members of the forces, and therefore could include N.R.M.A. men?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: And when we come to paragraph (i) we have the word "enlisted", which led me to suppose that that indicated a dividing line. What is there in this bill to show that the N.R.M.A. man is not entitled?

Mr. RALSTON: What is in this bill is that there is no provision for entitlement of a N.R.M.A. man who is not obligated to serve without territorial limitation.

Mr. STIRLING: But he is a member of the forces?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, but he must have service; and "service" is defined in paragraph (i), which states that service must be either while enlisted, or obligated to serve without territorial limitation.

Mr. STIRLING: Then, paragraph (i) is therefore the one place where the dividing line is drawn.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not understand my hon. friend in the first instance. I thought I made that clear, that this constituted the only eligibility for gratuity.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Is there any difference between the two expressions, "enlisted" and "obligated to serve"?

Mr. RALSTON: I think there is no difference legally. The enlisted man is certainly obligated to serve, by contract. The N.R.M.A. man would be obligated, pursuant to action taken under the National Resources Mobilization Act. It was thought better to include the word "enlisted" as well as "obligated".

Mr. STIRLING: Those two terms—"enlisted" and "obligated to serve" cover everybody in the services?

Mr. RALSTON: No. It reads "obligated to serve without territorial limitation"—and there is a big difference. That is the limitation, and that is the difference. If we said only "obligated to serve" a man who had been called up for service in Canada would be considered as "obligated to serve"; but it is "obligated to serve without territorial limitation"—which means anywhere.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wish to return to my favourite subject, and I hope the minister will understand my motives. I feel pretty keenly in respect of one feature which in my opinion works an injustice. I do not suppose one can have a measure of this kind where there would not be some injustice. But the whole matter of gratuities having been decided on the basis of geography and of service in certain theatres, I think an injustice arises in respect of those who are actually in contact with the enemy in a major way. There cannot be much fault found with the proportionate manner in which the gratuities are to be given in certain instances, but I think in this legislation we are losing sight of one of the most powerful factors.

I draw to the attention of the committee and of the ministers this one case. Perhaps it is not fair to single out a particular case and I do so only to illustrate my argument. But take the air force. I am not sure that we are dealing justly with the air force by giving every person who happens to be serving in the force outside Canada exactly the same treatment without regard to the degree of danger in the service that he performs. I suppose that one of the most hazardous tasks of the air force is the bombing of enemy territory, and I am sure that there is hardly a night when the majority of the citizens of Canada are not concerned when they go to bed for the safety of the lads who are going out on these bombing raids over Germany. It is a terrifying experience to the ordinary civilian even to think of it. It is a job that calls for the highest kind of courage and heroism on the part of the man who undertakes it.

I am just wondering whether this bill meets that situation as it should be met. Without interfering with the present set-up of gratuities I think it would be possible to add something by way of a battle bonus which would recognize extremely hazardous service such as is performed by aircrew where it is found. I realize the difficulties which the government might have in arriving at what is actually battle-line service and what is not in all branches of the service; but even if errors were made in the direction of more liberal treatment and greater generosity I am sure that that would not worry many of the taxpayers in this country because, as I said when speaking on the resolution, it is not a question of what this nation can afford; it is a question of what these men and these women deserve, and having that thought definitely in mind I would ask the government if it is not possible for them to give consideration now, before this bill goes through the committee, to ironing out that type of injustice which I have just brought to the attention of the committee.

If we pass this bill without giving consideration to that and without amending the bill in such a way as to give some sort of battle-line bonus, I believe that the government and this bill are going to be in for some heavy criticism not only from those directly concerned with the gratuity but from the public generally. I think the government will realize that the argument I have put forward has a strong appeal to the public generally, and the government will have to provide a pretty powerful argument as an antidote because frankly I feel that this bill as it stands, in order to render justice to the men who have really come into contact with the enemy, needs amendment. Unless we do something along the lines I have suggested, I think we are doing less than justice to the general situation. I do not wish to appear too insistent, but I really feel that the government will be making a mistake if they do not include in this legislation something in the way of a battle line bonus.

Mr. RALSTON: I have already dealt with that at length. I understand, and nobody understands better than the ministers and the officials who had to do with the matter, the difficulties in making a distinction. I sympathize with the idea put forward if it could be worked out and if you could make fair distinctions. But you have to have some sort of rules to work on unless you are going to make a different ruling for each different case and assess the degree of danger in which each particular man was. Nobody can express, not even the eloquence and earnestness of my hon. friend, the admiration we all feel for the great heroism of these airmen, but at the same time these men return to their bases to find their comrades suffering from robot bombs and from the blitz. Are those who suffer from robot bombs entitled to the bonus that my hon. friend speaks of? He says that the taxpayers would not worry about that. All right. Are the anti-aircraft men entitled to the bonus?

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I have given consideration to that point. If my hon. friend brings that up his argument is not tenable because he would have to bring in all the civilians as well. They appear to be suffering from the robot bombs just as much as anybody else.

Mr. RALSTON: Is that not making my hon. friend's argument less tenable, not mine? He gets into a class where there may perhaps be as much right to compensation from the state as/or any other class so far as robot bombing is concerned. Surely my hon. friend sees the difficulty the minute you start to make a separation into degrees of danger because a man will come along and say: I was just as much exposed to danger as that man, but I happened to be in a different classification, or I happened to be in a different territory. Just the other day we had thirteen men killed at a training centre in Canada by a premature bomb explosion and thirty-seven men wounded. Perhaps it would be said that a battle-line bonus for them would be fair because they had lost their lives in connection with the war. They might say: We took some risk; we did not know how much. I only mention these things to indicate how impossible it is to start making these distinctions, but if my hon. friend has any definition to suggest I am sure that we will look at it here. But I can assure him that we have worked at this thing with great care. This is no overnight plan. It is the principle we have adopted not because it is perfect but because we believe it is the most practicable principle to apply.

I come back to this. It is some testimony to the bill when I say that other countries have just had to adopt the same kind of test as we are doing. No doubt they all had before them the thought which my hon. friend has suggested. They have all been in exactly the same position and have had the same problems to consider and the same sort of service to reward.

Mr. STIRLING: May I just finish what I was discussing before? On the resolution stage it was made quite clear in the course of the discussion that the enrolled men as the minister described them, the N.R.M.A. men, were not included in this measure. When the bill came into my hands I therefore looked through it to find the wording used to ensure that, and the only thing in the bill that I could find was section 2 (i) where there is a dividing line. It seems to me strange that in that rather involved sort of way the matter is disposed of, and I understand the disposal of it to be that the N.R.M.A. man is not included. The military forces in Canada are, surely, the active army, the enrolled army, and the reserve army or those that used to be N.P.A.M.—non-permanent active militia. I do not think I have overheard the enrolled men described as the active army. Are they?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: It is a portion of the active army? Then still more, it seems to me, in this bill a definite dividing line should be laid down between the enlisted man and the enrolled man. I do not think it is at all clear.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall have to fall back on the lawyers. I had nothing to do with the drafting of this section or the form in which it was put. The instructions were that N.R.M.A. men for service in Canada would not receive any gratuity. This is the bill which was evolved. I as a one-time lawyer now read the bill, and I find in section 3 that the only thing for which a man is given a gratuity is for every thirty days of service, and according to section 2 (i) the word "service" means—> time served on active service in the forces while enlisted or obligated to serve without territorial limitation, or time served on active service in the Aleutian islands.

I know that the N.R.M.A. personnel called up for service in Canada are not "obligated to serve without territorial limitation" and therefore I conclude that they are not entitled to the gratuity under section 3. They are just not in there; that is all. The only service which is recognized by this bill as entitling a man to a gratuity is service without territorial limitation or time served in the Aleutians. That is all that is provided for. You do not have to put in a negative.

Mr. STIRLING: I must accept that if that is the minister's explanation of my difficulty. Would he tell me this: where else, other than the Aleutian islands, have enrolled men served? Anywhere else?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; they have served in the western hemisphere, in Jamaica, Newfoundland, Labrador, Bermuda, I think, and some as a matter of fact in South America; Alaska, too.

Mr. STIRLING: They will be entitled, just as those who served in the Aleutian islands?

Mr. RALSTON: No; the Aleutian islands is regarded as a special operation. It was an offensive operation. The others were defensive operations; that is coast defensive operations, and were not regarded as being out of the class of other service in the western hemisphere.

Mr. STIRLING: So these N.R.M.A. men who served in the Aleutian islands are the only N.R.M.A. men who receive it?

Mr. RALSTON: Except those who might be obligated to serve without territorial limitation.

Mr. STIRLING: In the future?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I think I can see the difficulty of the hon. member for Yale. Men who are now N.R.M.A. do not come within the ambit of this bill, generally speaking, except those who have served in the Aleutian islands. But there may be a time when they will come under this bill, and consequently it is necessary to have such a definition of "service" as will include these men if and when certain events occur.

Mr. STIRLING: And of course that will not be retroactive. That will refer to that period of service.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Only from the date when they are placed on full and unrestricted service.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Universal service.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I think if you defined "service" and excluded them completely you might run against that difficulty; you would need a whole set of new sections dealing with it, eventually, whereas it is dealt with now at one stroke by that definition of "service".

Mr. GILLIS: On the resolution stage several hon. members raised the question of the merchant marine. We were in hopes that they would be included in this bill. However, I notice from the definitions that they are still on the outside looking in. There is only one observation I have to make in that connection, namely, that it is the branch of the war which has been carried on by private enterprise, and I trust that the shipping companies throughout the world with which Canadian and allied merchant service men have served during this war will take cognizance of the generosity of the government in the matter of gratuities and make some of the profits which they have amassed during the process of this war available to the personnel who have served them so faithfully in this branch of the war.

On this matter of definitions, there is something I should like to ask. The army medical corps is included within the meaning of "member of the forces". There is an auxiliary of the army medical corps which serves under that corps, namely the V.A.D. section. There is no limitation on their service; they are employed in the hospitals in Canada, and overseas if necessary. Do they come within the meaning of service personnel as defined here?

Mr. RALSTON: No, they would not.

Mr. GILLIS: I mean the St. John Ambulance Association, the V.A.D.,—

Mr. RALSTON: Nor the Red Cross.

Mr. GILLIS: They do not?

Mr. RALSTON: None of these are enlisted personnel, nor are they obligated to serve.

Mr. GILLIS: But they are serving under the army medical service.

Mr. RALSTON: When my hon. friend says they are serving "under" the army medical service, they are serving alongside, serving in hospitals. I am not sure about the V.A.D. I know the Red Cross are. I know the Red Cross are in Italy at the present time, but I do not know about the St. John Ambulance Association. But if they are serving, they are serving as auxiliary services, and are not obligated to serve, as a part of the armed forces.

Mr. GILLIS: They are definitely ruled out?

Mr. RALSTON: They are just not in. They are not included.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: What about the nursing sisters?

Mr. RALSTON: The nursing sisters are members of the forces. The Women's Division of the air force, the W.R.C.N.S. in the navy, and the C.W.A.C. of the army are all members of the forces.

Mr. MacNICOL: The men serving in the forts at Halifax may or may not have been under fire in this war, but they were under fire in the last war. If the men serving in the Halifax forts have been under fire in this war, would they be included in the bill?

Mr. RALSTON: No; they would still have been treated as serving in Canada and be subject to the lower rates.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member for Yale mentioned a moment ago to myself a question which was brought up by the hon. member for Vancouver South, as to those who have been flying out over the sea in the Pacific for the last two or three years searching for Jap submarines and so forth. Are they included?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): They are included.

Mr. RALSTON: Under subparagraph (h) they are included.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the same applies to those flying off Newfoundland?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Those who are flying outside the territorial waters of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: If they are out twelve miles they would be included?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is right—whatever the territorial waters are. Those who fly outside the territorial waters get the same treatment as if they were overseas.

Mr. MacNICOL: Anybody flying a distance of twelve miles from shore would be outside territorial waters?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am not sure whether three or twelve miles is our limit now.

Mr. RALSTON: In the old rum-running days it was twenty-one miles for a while, I think.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the distance?

Mr. RALSTON: As a matter of fact I thought it was three miles.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand that our men are flying not twelve miles only but sometimes as far as 300 miles.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is three miles for certain purposes and twelve miles for other purposes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Many of them fly farther than that.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will they not be protected by the bill?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: May we take it that in all phases fire-fighters are definitely out?

Mr. RALSTON: I would rather say they are definitely not in.

Mr. GRAYDON: With respect to fire-fighters and merchant seamen, there is a possibility later, under some subsequent legislation which will not deal with the armed forces, seeing that these men are not technically in the armed forces, that some hope will be held out for these men to get some consideration in the days to come.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know whether my hon. friend heard what the Prime Minister stated to the house, that the possibility was not ruled out of consideration; but, as he indicated then, he considered that this measure should be passed as a measure dealing exclusively with the armed forces. It would take some considerable time to deal with these other matters. Perhaps the hon. gentleman was not in the house when the Prime Minister spoke to that effect, but if he reads Hansard he will get the best apprehension of what the views of the government are.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was in the chamber when the Prime Minister spoke, and I interpreted his statement in the sense that I have just stated and very much in the sense that the minister himself has indicated. There is no difference between us. The door has not been closed.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Gratuity payable to members of the forces.

Mr. MacNICOL: Someone made the suggestion, after I had spoken a little while ago, that I was opposed to a gratuity in cash being given to the returned soldiers. He drew that inference from what I said. Certainly that is not what I said at all. I am not opposed to any such thing, because I understood by this section that every returned soldier who had served for four or five years would receive up to $900 in cash to do what he liked with.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Payment of gratuity in case of death of member of the forces.

Mr. GILLIS: On the second reading of the bill I asked the minister to clarify this question of discretionary power in the minister. Can he make a statement now?

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, it is this. You have to find out whether or not there was a person who was entitled to dependents' allowance, not necessarily the person actually receiving it but the person who was entitled to it. In that regard, may I repeat what I said. In connection with the members of the C.W.A.C., even though they may not be entitled by reason of the fact that they are getting pay and allowances which puts them out of the dependents' allowance; nevertheless that disqualification does not apply in this case, and if they would have been entitled had they not been members of the C.W.A.C., then the amount of gratuity would be payable to the dependent. A third case is that the person gets the gratuity if there has been an assignment of pay to the individual. What my hon. friend is asking is, to what does the exercise of discretion by the minister apply? I am always chary about giving legal opinions on the construction of statutes, because I recollect that there are courts all the way from the supreme court of a province to the Supreme Court of Canada and to the privy council to decide that I am wrong. However, I suggest that what this means is that the only discretion which the minister has is, after he finds one of these situations existing, namely, a person entitled to dependents' allowance, including a member of the C.W.A.C. in the circumstances I have spoken of, or a person to whom pay has been assigned, to decide for whose benefit the gratuity should be paid and whether to pay the gratuity direct to the dependent or person who would have been a dependent under ordinary circumstances, or whether the situation is such that it would be provident and proper to designate someone else to receive the gratuity. That is the only feature I know of to which discretion would apply.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does that cover the case to which I referred on second reading, the passing on of the gratuity to next of kin?

Mr. RALSTON: I would think so, yes; but it must be next of kin who are entitled to dependents' allowance.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is, the minister has the discretion of deciding whether or not they would be entitled to dependents' allowance.

Mr. RALSTON: No; the statute fixes that. The statute does not give it to next of kin who are not entitled to receive dependents' allowance. Take a single man who has been killed. He may have a next of kin who is not entitled to dependents' allowance, perhaps an uncle. The minister has no discretion to decide that it be paid to the uncle. It is only persons who are entitled to dependents' allowance or to whom assigned pay has been made.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It would not cover the case of a young man who has been killed, who had parents at home but had not made an assignment of pay to them, even though the parents were really in a position where they might be dependent upon him if he came back.

Mr. RALSTON: Not unless they were persons who were entitled to dependents' allowance. They might try out the question whether or not they were actually entitled, notwithstanding that it was not being paid. They are not ruled out simply because they were not actually receiving dependents' allowance at the time of death. There would have to be an investigation to see whether they were entitled to dependents' allowance. My attention has been called to the fact that a man might have more than one dependent entitled to gratuity, a mother and a wife, in which case the gratuity might be divided. That also might be a case in which the discretion of the minister might be exercised.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Can the minister give us any figures from which we can get an idea as to the percentage of men in the armed forces who are making an assignment of pay?

Mr. RALSTON: Under this section or some other section I was going to put on Hansard a statement showing the amount which would be received by persons of different ranks and with different lengths of service. It might be useful to members now and in the future. Perhaps I might indicate now what this table is. It is of the same nature as the tables the Minister of Finance sometimes files to show amount of taxation payable having regard to certain incomes. It applies first to length of service; one year in Canada, three years in Canada; five years in Canada; then a combination of service Canadian and overseas: one year in Canada and one year overseas; one year in Canada and two years overseas, and so on.

I commend to the committee the following examples: a private, unmarried, with one year's service in Canada and two years' service overseas would receive a basic gratuity of $450; plus $77, being seven days' pay and allowances for every six months of service overseas; plus rehabilitation grant of $45; plus clothing allowance of $100, or a total of $672. A private, married, with two children, with one year's service in Canada and two years' service overseas would receive a basic gratuity of $450; plus $135.90, being seven days' pay and allowances for every six months of service overseas; plus rehabilitation grant of $108.12; plus clothing allowance of $100, or a total of $794.02. A lieutenant, unmarried, with one year's service in Canada and two years' service overseas would receive a basic gratuity of $450; plus $187.60, being seven days' pay and allowances for every six months of service overseas; plus rehabilitation grant of $150; plus clothing allowance of $100, or a total of $887.60. A lieutenant, married, with two children, with one year's service in Canada and two years' service overseas would receive a basic gratuity of $450; plus $255.84, being seven days' pay and allowances for every six months of service overseas; plus rehabilitation grant of $223.12; plus clothing allowance of $100, or a total of $1,028.96. In all these cases there is in addition the reestablishment credit in an amount equal to the basic gratuity.

The table is as follows:

THE WAR SERVICE GRANTS ACT, 1944

Table Showing the Gratuity Payable Under Part 1 of the Act for Certain Ranks with Varying Length of Service.

The Rehabilitation Grant payable under R.O. 4415, and the Clothing Allowance of $100.00 are shown separately in each case.

BASIS OF GRATUITY

1. For every month of Service in the Western Hemisphere..... $ 7.50
2. For every month of Service Overseas..... 15.00
3. For every six months of Service Overseas—Seven days pay and allowance, including Dependents' Allowance and Subsistence Allowance.
4. In addition to the above an amount equal to the sum of 1 and 2 will be available for certain specified benefits. This amount is not included in the total below, but in each case it is the equivalent of the "gratuity".

Length of Service	1 year Canada	3 years Canada	5 years Canada	1 year Canada 1 year O/S	1 year Canada 2 years O/S	1 year Canada 3 years O/S	1 year Canada 4 years O/S	1½ years Canada 1½ years O/S	2 years Canada 1 year O/S	2 years Canada 2 years O/S	2 years Canada 3 years O/S
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
Private—
Single—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	38 50	77 00	115 50	154 00	57 75	38 50	77 00	115 50
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	308 50	527 00	745 50	964 00	462 75	398 50	617 00	835 50
Rehabilitation Grant	45 00	45 00	45 00	45 00	45 00	45 00	45 00	45 00	45 00	45 00	45 00
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	235 00	415 00	595 00	453 50	672 00	890 50	1,109 00	607 75	543 50	762 00	980 50
Married (2 children)—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	67 95	135 90	203 85	271 80	101 93	67 95	135 90	203 85
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	337 95	585 90	833 85	1,081 80	506 93	427 95	675 90	923 85
Rehabilitation Grant	108 12	108 12	108 12	108 12	108 12	108 12	108 12	108 12	108 12	108 12	108 12
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	298 12	478 12	658 12	546 07	794 02	1,041 97	1,289 92	715 05	636 07	884 02	1,131 97
Sergeant—
Single—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	48 30	96 60	144 90	193 20	72 45	48 30	96 60	144 90
Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	318 30	546 60	774 90	1,003 20	477 45	408 30	636 60	864 90
Rehabilitation Grant	66 00	66 00	66 00	66 00	66 00	66 00	66 00	66 00	66 00	66 00	66 00
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	256 00	436 00	610 00	484 30	712 60	940 90	1,169 20	643 45	574 30	802 60	1,030 90
Married (2 children)—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	77 75	155 50	233 25	311 00	116 63	77 75	155 50	233 25
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	347 75	605 50	863 25	1,121 00	521 63	437 75	695 50	953 25
Rehabilitation Grant	129 12	129 12	129 12	129 12	129 12	129 12	129 12	129 12	129 12	129 12	129 12
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	319 12	499 12	679 12	576 87	834 62	1,092 37	1,350 12	750 75	666 87	924 62	1,182 37

Length of Service	1 year Canada	3 years Canada	5 years Canada	1 year Canada 1 year O/S	1 year Canada 2 years O/S	1 year Canada 3 years O/S	1 year Canada 4 years O/S	1½ years Canada 1½ years O/S	2 years Canada 1 year O/S	2 years Canada 2 years O/S	2 years Canada 3 years O/S
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
Warrant Officer I—
Single—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	76 30	152 60	288 90	305 20	114 45	76 30	152 60	228 90
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	346 30	602 60	858 90	1,115 20	519 45	436 30	692 60	948 90
Rehabilitation Grant	126 00	126 00	126 00	126 00	126 00	126 00	126 00	126 00	126 00	126 00	126 00
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	316 00	496 00	676 00	572 20	828 60	1,084 90	1,341 20	745 45	662 30	918 60	1,174 90
Married (2 children)—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowance	.....	.....	.....	108 08	216 16	324 24	432 32	162 13	108 08	216 16	324 24
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	378 08	666 16	954 24	1,242 32	567 13	468 08	756 16	1,044 24
Rehabilitation Grant	194 12	194 12	194 12	194 12	194 12	194 12	194 12	194 12	194 12	194 12	194 12
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	384 12	564 12	744 12	672 20	960 28	1,248 36	1,536 44	861 25	762 20	1,050 28	1,338 36
Lieutenant—
Single—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	93 80	187 60	281 40	375 20	140 70	93 80	187 60	281 40
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	363 80	637 60	911 40	1,185 20	545 70	453 80	727 60	1,001 40
Rehabilitation Grant	150 00	150 00	150 00	150 00	150 00	150 00	150 00	150 00	150 00	150 00	150 00
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	340 00	520 00	700 00	613 80	887 60	1,161 40	1,435 20	795 70	703 80	977 60	1,251 40
Married (2 children)—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	127 92	255 84	383 76	511 68	191 88	127 92	255 84	383 76
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	397 92	705 84	1,013 76	1,321 68	596 88	487 92	795 84	1,103 76
Rehabilitation Grant	223 12	223 12	223 12	223 12	223 12	223 12	223 12	223 12	223 12	223 12	223 12
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	413 12	593 12	773 12	721 04	1,028 96	1,336 88	1,644 80	920 00	811 04	1,118 96	1,426 88

Captain—
Single—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	114 80	229 60	344 40	459 20	172 20	114 80	229 60	344 40
Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	384 80	679 60	974 40	1,269 20	577 20	474 80	769 60	1,064 40
Rehabilitation Grant	195 00	195 00	195 00	195 00	195 00	195 00	195 00	195 00	195 00	195 00	195 00
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	385 00	565 00	745 00	679 80	974 60	1,269 40	1,564 20	872 20	769 80	1,064 60	1,359 40
Married (2 children)—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	151 25	302 50	453 75	605 00	226 88	151 25	302 50	453 75
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	421 25	752 50	1,083 75	1,415 00	631 88	511 25	842 50	1,173 75
Rehabilitation Grant	273 12	273 12	273 12	273 12	273 12	273 12	273 12	273 12	273 12	273 12	273 12
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	463 12	643 12	823 12	794 37	1,125 62	1,456 62	1,788 12	1,005 00	884 37	1,215 62	1,546 87
Major—
Single—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	132 30	264 60	396 90	529 20	198 45	132 30	264 60	396 90
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	402 30	714 60	1,826 90	1,339 20	603 45	492 30	804 60	1,116 90
Rehabilitation Grant	232 50	232 50	232 50	232 50	232 50	232 50	232 50	232 50	232 50	232 50	232 50
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	422 50	602 50	782 50	734 80	1,047 10	1,359 40	1,671 70	935 95	824 80	1,137 10	1,449 40
Married (2 children)
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	171 08	342 16	513 24	684 32	256 63	171 08	342 16	513 24
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	441 08	792 16	1,143 24	1,494 32	661 63	531 08	882 16	1,233 24
Rehabilitation Grant	315 62	315 62	315 62	315 62	315 62	316 62	315 62	315 62	315 62	315 62	315 62
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	505 62	685 62	865 62	856 70	1,207 78	1,558 86	1,909 94	1,077 25	946 70	1,297 78	1,648 86
Lieutenant-Colonel—
Single—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	163 80	327 60	491 40	655 20	245 70	163 80	327 60	491 40
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	433 80	777 60	1,121 40	1,465 20	650 70	523 80	867 60	1,211 40
Rehabilitation Grant	300 00	300 00	300 00	300 00	300 00	300 00	300 00	300 00	300 00	300 00	300 00
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	490 00	670 00	850 00	833 80	1,177 60	1,521 40	1,865 20	1,050 70	923 80	1,267 60	1,611 40
Married (2 children)—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowance	.....	.....	.....	204 92	409 84	614 76	819 68	307 38	204 92	409 84	614 76
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	474 92	859 84	1,244 76	1,629 68	712 38	564 92	949 84	1,334 76

Length of Service	1 year Canada	3 years Canada	5 years Canada	1 year Canada 1 year O/S	1 year Canada 2 years O/S	1 year Canada 3 years O/S	1 year Canada 4 years O/S	1½ years Canada 1½ years O/S	2 years Canada 1 year O/S	2 years Canada 2 years O/S	2 years Canada 3 years O/S
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
Rehabilitation Grant	388 12	388 12	388 12	388 12	388 12	388 12	388 12	388 12	388 12	388 12	388 12
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	578 12	758 12	928 12	963 04	1,347 96	1,732 88	2,117 80	1,200 50	1,053 04	1,437 96	1,822 88
Major-General—
Single—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	303 80	607 60	911 40	1,215 20	455 70	303 80	607 60	911 40
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	573 80	1,057 60	1,541 40	2,025 20	860 70	663 80	1,147 60	1,631 40
Rehabilitation Grant	600 00	600 00	600 00	600 00	600 00	600 00	600 00	600 00	600 00	600 00	600 00
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	790 00	970 00	1,150 00	1,273 80	1,757 60	2,241 40	2,725 20	1,560 70	1,363 80	1,847 60	2,331 40
Married (2 children)—
Gratuity	90 00	270 00	450 00	270 00	450 00	630 00	810 00	405 00	360 00	540 00	720 00
Pay and Allowances	.....	.....	.....	344 92	689 84	1,034 76	1,379 68	517 38	344 92	689 84	1,034 76
Sub-Total	90 00	270 00	450 00	614 92	1,139 84	1,664 76	2,189 68	922 38	704 92	1,229 84	1,754 76
Rehabilitation Grant	688 12	688 12	688 12	688 12	688 12	688 12	688 12	688 12	688 12	688 12	688 12
Clothing Allowance	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00	100 00
Total	878 12	1,058 12	1,238 12	1,403 04	1,927 96	2,452 88	2,977 80	1,710 50	1,493 04	2,017 96	2,542 88

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the minister give us the percentage of men in the army who made pay assignments?

Mr. RALSTON: I have made a note of that and I shall try to secure the information.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Would there be a possibility of widening that section in this way? Let us assume there is a mother who is receiving assigned pay or dependent's allowance from her son. The son is killed and within the next few years the father dies. Will it be possible for that mother to come back after the lapse of a few years and be included in this section?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows, I think, that what would happen in that case would be that the mother, the prospective dependent, would be entitled to pension as I understand it. I do not think it is contemplated under this legislation, and was not contemplated under the 1918 legislation in fact, that war services gratuity should revive and become payable. As one can readily realize, you have to provide for a great many other contingencies of different kinds. There might be a case where somebody became dependent or would be in a position where, if the soldier had been living, he would have contributed to their support, but you cannot provide for that in a war service gratuity. When you find somebody who is actually entitled to the dependents' allowance, it does seem that the person to whom you might pay this gratuity could be clearly identified in that way or as the person to whom pay had been assigned, which indicates that the deceased had some interest in his or her welfare.

Mr. CASSELMAN: In view of what the minister said a few moments ago I think I am correct in assuming he is not anxious to give a legal opinion, but, having protested that, he then gave an opinion. I should like to place before the minister a set of facts. This is an actual case of a soldier, a father, who died in the service. He had enlisted for active service. His dependents were his wife and his son.

Mr. RALSTON: Excuse me; you are referring to the husband.

Mr. CASSELMAN: The husband.

Mr. RALSTON: The soldier died who was the husband and the father?

Mr. CASSELMAN: The husband and father died. He left surviving him a wife and a son. The son is now in active service. The mother has died. Is the son entitled to receive the benefits under this act?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Is the son in the service now?

Mr. CASSELMAN: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The question is, who was entitled to receive the dependents' allowance at the time the father died, or who was receiving the assigned pay? One would have to know that. Was it the son or the wife? If the mother was receiving the dependents' allowance and is now dead, that leaves her out, as I understand it.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: There may have been dependents' allowances on account of the boy. If he were under sixteen, there would be dependents' allowance payable in respect of him. It would depend altogether on who was entitled to dependents' allowance, whether the boy was entitled to dependents' allowance at the time of death or before, or whether the boy directly or indirectly—I suppose indirectly—was receiving asssigned pay. I do not suppose it is effective now because he is a member of the forces.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why is this amount of gratuity after death made discretionary? Why is the minister given discretionary powers? This is the way the section reads:

> If a member of the forces dies on service or after discharge but before he has been paid war service gratuity in full, payment of all or any part of the gratuity or of the unpaid balance thereof may, in the discretion of the minister, be made. . . .

The minister is not in the same position as the governor in council. If the power rested with the governor in council the permissive "may" would be used, but as far as the minister is concerned, if it is to be mandatory should not the word be "shall"?

Mr. RALSTON: I should not have thought so. I thought the discretion of the minister applied to those he was selecting to whom the payment should be made, and to the question of whether or not he should pay to that person or to somebody else on his or her behalf.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The words "in the discretion of the minister" are so separated from that portion of the paragraph which deals with the discretionary power that I think it is indifferently worded and not very well drafted. If the minister will just read it over he will see that it says:

> If a member of the forces dies on service or after discharge but before he has been paid war service gratuity in full, payment of all or any part of the gratuity . . . may, in the discretion of the minister, be made . . .

I think that should read "shall be made in the discretion of the minister" to the person named in the alternative. As it is worded at the present time, the discretionary power is in the minister as to whether all or a portion is to be paid.

Mr. RALSTON: In the first place I want to say quite frankly that I think the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas is right when he suggests that my opinion was wrong in calling attention to the position of the words "in the discretion of." I am not sure that this does not mean there is absolute discretion in the minister in regard to making the payment, and that the discretion is not necessarily only in respect of the person to whom the payment shall be made.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is exactly the point I make. The discretionary power, as the section is constituted at the moment, appears to me to be one that determines two matters. The first is whether or not a payment shall be made at all.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): And you want that first one eliminated.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the point.

Mr. RALSTON: We will take the suggestion into consideration.

Section stands.

On section 5—Deductions from gratuity.

Mr. RALSTON: I am suggesting an amendment to this section, to provide that the only amount which may be deducted from the war service gratuity is an overpayment of pay and allowances. As it stands at present, a deduction may be made on account of a debit balance standing in the service pay account of the member of the forces, or action might be taken under the act respecting debts to the crown. I am proposing an amendment which leaves out those two features and simply confines it to the overpayment of pay and allowances. I will ask my hon. friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health to move the amendment:

That section 5 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"The amount of any overpayment of pay or allowances made to a member or his dependents may, pursuant to the regulations of the governor in council in that behalf, be deducted from the war service gratuity."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Mr. LOCKHART: At least we have a couple of hurdles removed.

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What deductions are made from the pay of a soldier, or from the balance due to the next of kin, in the case of a man killed in action? Are there any expenses in connection with his burial?

Mr. RALSTON: None at all.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There might be a mistake of some kind; an overpayment might have been made, and in that case we would be allowed to make the deduction. It would be an unusual case.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There are no burial expenses?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Pay and allowances supplementary to gratuity.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps this point is not sufficiently important to mention, but I do not think the draftsmanship of this section is very good. It says:

Every member of the forces whose service included overseas service shall, upon discharge, be entitled . . .

I believe it should read, "Every member of the forces shall be entitled upon discharge."

Mr. RALSTON: I am strong on the way it is now; I like splitting verbs.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know the theory of splitting infinitives had a powerful sponsor somewhere in the government, and now I have found out who it is.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Manner of payment of gratuity.

Mr. LOCKHART: I wonder if we could not remove some more hurdles here by giving the minister discretion to make these payments under certain circumstances. He is given a great deal of power all the way through this bill, and if a young man wanted to go home and set himself up in domestic happiness he should be able to get this money a little faster than is now provided. I wonder if there would be any objection to giving the minister discretion here.

Mr. RALSTON: I imagine my hon. friend would be willing to move that amendment provided that he was sure he would not be the minister himself. I cannot conceive of any power which would give a minister greater difficulty.

Let us take the case of a private, a married man with two children, who has one year of service overseas and one year in Canada. His gratuity is $270.00; plus $67.95, being seven days' pay and allowance for every six months of service overseas—or total of $337.95. He gets that in a little over 3 months, in monthly instalments of $108.12 each. I am taking the $108.12 because that is the amount of the rehabilitation grant and I presume that is equal to one month's pay. In addition he gets a rehabilitation grant, and a clothing allowance of $100 right away, so that he does not do too badly. His total is $546.07.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is the payment of war service gratuities over a period of three months?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, it might be four months, but not more. You can take any of them. The large ones, of course, generally come from the fact that the pay and allowances are larger, as well as the length of service. Therefore the monthly instalment is greater, and your divisor is greater, even though your quotient is correspondingly greater.

Mr. LOCKHART: Has the minister the information with respect to a corporal? I have in mind the case of a corporal who was one year in Canada and four years overseas. His wife has been to see me twice about what I thought could be done to get a little home together as soon as he gets back. This man has two children. Where would he stand?

Mr. RALSTON: Well, if I promote him to sergeant for the time being I can give the information.

Mr. LOCKHART: All right.

Mr. RALSTON: The total amount he would get, outside of the reestablishment credit, would be $1,350.12. His gratuity alone would be $810. Then he gets $311, being seven days' pay and allowances for every six months of service overseas. That makes a total of $1,121. He would get his rehabilitation grant of $129.12 at the time of discharge, plus clothing allowance of $100, making $229.12. The next month he would get $129.12, divided into his $1,121. So that he would be about eight months in drawing that amount.

Then, he knows that the Dominion of Canada is good for it and his money will be coming in at that time in monthly instalments. In addition to that, he has $810 reestablishment credit which he can draw down for any of the purposes indicated. That does not have to be over a given period. If he has a purpose to which it ought to be devoted at once, he can draw it down immediately.

Mr. GRAYDON: With respect to section 7 may I point out that there was nothing in the resolution to indicate whether part of this gratuity was paid in instalments, or whether it was to be paid in cash. I think most people felt that those who will be returning would have at their disposal a little more ready cash than is envisaged in this legislation.

I realize there are arguments on both sides in the matter, and I rise only to have one point clarified for my satisfaction. The minister said, in respect of men coming out of the forces on demobilization that, in so far as war service gratuities are concerned, three or four months would be required before the cash would be fully paid to them.

Mr. RALSTON: In one case it was six months.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is the estimate, in any event, for a certain category. We have not yet come to the reestablishment credit mentioned by the minister as a cash possibility. My understanding, however, is that there are special strings attached to that. I am wondering whether or not this will not be a sort of let-down to our men who may have expected to be able to lay their hands on some cash as soon as they come out, for the purpose of reestablishing themselves.

I am not pressing the point specially, but I suggest that it should be made a little clearer than it has been, so far as reestablishment credits are concerned. I do not think that is a cash payment which could be called such. It looks to me as though the whole thing is on a sort of credit or instalment basis. There are three or four months for gratuities, and strings attached to the rehabilitation credit, and I am wondering what the man who comes out of the service and has an opportunity to utilize some cash quickly will think. We must remember that the civilian will have his victory bonds he can cash right away, and this may be a let-down for the men who have been in the services. Perhaps the minister might have some explanation?

Mr. RALSTON: I have made all the explanation I can make in the matter. The gratuity is absolutely sure. It is sure within a reasonable length of time. It is sure in specified amounts; it is sure to be paid; it is easily computed and quickly payable. It is exactly what he has been getting all along. It ensures no let-down in family income of any kind, and it provides payment over a reasonable number of months.

On the other hand, I think it is probably useful in the Canadian economy not to have it paid out in one lump; that is to say, to have a tremendous amount of money in circulation immediately—and I am not blaming the men for spending it, at all. They have a perfect right to do that. But it would send everything sky-high if that were done. Spreading it over a reasonable length of time gives at once the assurance that he will get it, and enables him to get credit, and bank on it, in fulfilling whatever obligations he may wish to make. In addition to that, the reestablishment credit could be drawn down in cash, if the purposes were complied with.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not agree with the minister when he talks about everything going sky-high. We were told that with respect to family allowances that obstacle, with which we were concerned, did not enter into the matter. Therefore the question of any inflationary development—

Mr. RALSTON: They are paid monthly, just as these are.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not arguing otherwise. I am only saying that when the minister talks about sending everything sky-high I take issue with him, because this could not enter into the cost of production, and could not possibly lead to inflation, as the minister's words might indicate. I took it from what he said, when he referred to "sky-high"—

Mr. RALSTON: I did not suggest that.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps I misunderstood the minister. But when he spoke about things going sky-high in Canada, I naturally thought he was talking about the inflation of prices. And, that being so, while I did not wish to press or urge a change in the legislation, I would say that there are cases where, without question, the cash would come in extremely handy when the men leave the services. There are other cases which by his legislation the minister is evidently attempting to avoid. Those would be cases where men might get all their money at once and perhaps it was feared that it might not be utilized to the best advantage. I take it that, having weighed in the balance the possibilities of both methods, the government has decided that this is the better.

Mr. RALSTON: That is so. But I just wish to say this word about family allowances. If this gratuity were paid in a lump sum at the time of discharge it would be just the same as paying from four to six months' family allowances at one time.

This is not a matter of anything entering into the cost of production. It is a matter of trying to take account of the limited amount of goods on the market, and preventing the driving up of prices of goods by making an enormous amount of money available for spending at one time.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the comparison made by the minister was not a fortunate one. In one instance the payments will be regarded as income to the family. But in this particular case it is not just a matter of income, because this will be regarded by the many who will be rehabilitated as a first step toward gathering together some capital with which to rehabilitate themselves in a normal course of business. There is a distinct difference between family allowances and this gratuity which, in my opinion, is in an entirely different position.

Mr. RALSTON: But it is money nevertheless, and if it is available it can be spent.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is meant by the words "payable in arrear".

Mr. RALSTON: That is to say the first one would be payable one month after discharge. The rehabilitation grant is payable immediately upon discharge, and the first instalment of war services gratuity is payable one month after.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: There would be no time between the cessation of a soldier's pay and some income? There would be no time when he would have no income?

Mr. RALSTON: The first month is taken up with the rehabilitation grant, and his war service gratuity does not begin until the beginning of the second month. But along with the rehabilitation grant is the $100 for clothing grant.

Mr. GRAYDON: What it really amounts to is the continuation for a while of the soldier's army pay into the peace-time period.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Reestablishment credit.

Mr. BRYCE: I was pleased to hear the minister say yesterday in reply to the hon. member for Edmonton East that men and women in the armed forces were to be treated alike, but line 23 of page 3 of the bill says "the total amount payable to him." If this is to apply to women and men equally we shall have to say "the total amount payable to him or her."

Mr. STIRLING: "Him" means "her".

Mr. BRYCE: May I have the assurance of the minister that men and women are to be treated equally?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, "him" includes "her" in this case.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the minister explain why it is that any member of the armed forces who elects to take benefits under the Veterans' Land Act, or any educational, vocational or technical training benefits provided by parliament, shall not be eligible for the reestablishment credit?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The section outlines the various forms of reestablishment assistance that are provided, but there may be those who do not wish to avail themselves of existing reestablishment provisions such as the Veterans' Land Act, educational, vocational or technical training. The idea underlying this is to provide for those who are unable or do not wish to avail themselves of the benefits already in existence such as possibly $2,320 under the Veterans' Land Act, or benefits in commercial fishing, and four or five different benefits under P.C. 7633. There are only three major benefits: educational, vocational or technical, and the Veterans' Land Act, including commercial fishing. Under the provisions of P.C. 7633 it is quite possible that a boy coming back from overseas, if he is exceptionally brilliant, because of a graduate or post-graduate course might be in receipt of four or five thousand dollars from the state, and a boy going on the land may possibly get $2,320 from the state. It was felt that in fairness to the others coming back and not going to the university or engaging in farming or fishing or taking vocational training, alternate benefits should be provided, and therefore these benefits are provided in section 9. That is the basic primary reason for the distinction here.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Suppose that he does not qualify under the educational, vocational or technical training benefits and becomes eligible for reestablishment credit; could he then of his own volition use that credit for educational purposes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, for "any other purpose authorized by the governor in council".

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What does that mean? There may be lots of things.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The words mean exactly what they say—for any other constructive purpose which would be of service to the returned fighting man and which the governor in council would approve.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): He may not want to use it for any of these things. Does the credit not belong to him?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend is confusing two things. He is confusing the cash gratuity principle with the reestablishment credit. There are nine alternatives now, and there is a possibility of extending these alternatives. They are all concerned with the essential principle of reestablishment.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Purposes for and time within which available.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: I should like to see enumerated among these purposes doctor's and hospital bills which may have been piling up in the meantime.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We welcome suggestions such as the one made by my hon. friend. The government will be glad to consider any suggestion made by any hon. member.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In some circumstances this reestablishment credit would not be used at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is quite possible, but I think in practically every case it will be used because there is a period of ten years in which it may be used, and the man who may not want to use it when he comes back may have to use it or be very glad to use it within two years time.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has the soldier to show that he is entitled to it? Has he to produce documentary evidence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The mere fact of his service is sufficient.

Mr. EDWARDS: Will he have to produce a certificate to that effect? He may have a proposition that he will want to go into. What will he need to have in tangible form to show to the person with whom he wants to do business, that he is a returned man and entitled to the credit?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): His discharge certificate.

Mr. EDWARDS: Will that indicate how long he has been in the service, and where, and the amount to which he is entitled?

Mr. BOUCHER: Take the case of a returned man who goes back to his old employment. I do not see how he can take advantage of this credit.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He may bring back a war bride who wants to buy furniture.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister did not do that.

Mr. BOUCHER: A great deal of credit is due to the man who returns to his old job and we should give him any benefits that we can. He may want to set up house or enter into business or a profession, but perhaps that is all covered by the clause "any other purpose authorized by the governor in council".

Mr. HOMUTH: The fact of the matter is that under clause 9 the man can manoeuvre to get this money unless you have a gestapo to look after him. The man may want to go into business, buy a small gas station on the corner. But the government says to him: We must first of all look into this and check up. Here we are by this bill saying to the returned men: Here is something of value to you, but we are going to see how you spend the money. I think it is ridiculous, nonsensical for us to say to the men: We are willing to trust you to go overseas and fight the battles of the country, to risk your life in preserving democracy, but when you come back we cannot trust you with this credit. There will be so much red tape, so much checking before the soldier can spend the money, that it is practically saying to the soldier: We cannot trust you to spend the money yourself. If this is a gratuity let us give it to the soldier.

Mr. RALSTON: We do.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We do. My hon. friend used extreme language. He called this ridiculous. We had a committee of twenty-five veterans of the last war working on this for two and a half years and they were unanimous in preferring the principle of credits for reestablishment as against the principle of cash gratuities. Now they have both; they have the cash and the credit. After all, if we follow out the argument of the hon. member for Waterloo South, we can ask a man to go on the land to-day without seeing what the land is like; we can give freedom of action as to the type of farm he shall take up and where he will settle. But we are trustees for the national welfare, acting in the national interest and in the man's own interest, and we are applying to him the same rule we did in the case of the Veterans' Land Act—the security and the welfare of the man himself.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES

EXTENSION OF AUTHORIZED INVESTMENTS IN UNITED STATES SECURITIES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 185, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

He said: With the consent of the house I wish to introduce this bill, which I mentioned this morning. It is a very brief bill, entitled "An act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932," and if I get leave to introduce the bill I will explain it.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Before the bill is introduced it should, to say the least, be in proper form. There is no explanatory note to the bill; I do not know why, because this is a bill which falls within the purview of the rules which require an explanation for a bill of this nature. An explanatory note is, I think, particularly important and significant in a bill which amends an act like this, originally introduced in 1932. Perhaps the minister has an explanation, but I do not think the omission should pass without some comment and protest.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that technically it is in violation of the rules, in not having an explanation. I was not aware of the fact that there was no explantory note until the point was called to my attention this afternoon. But it is so self-explanatory that such a note could hardly add anything. All this does is to add to the list of investments authorized for life insurance companies. The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, authorizes investments in certain securities and in certain types of real estate. This bill will authorize the insurance companies to invest in bonds or notes secured by mortgages or hypothecs on real estate or leaseholds which mortgages or hypothecs are insured by the federal housing administrator of the United States of America, and also on the security of real estate or leaseholds if the mortgage or hypothec thereon securing the loan is insured by the federal housing administrator of the United States of America.

For some time the Canadian insurance companies have been at a disadvantage in the United States—a competitive disadvantage—because United States insurance companies with which they are in competition are authorized to invest in this type of security. This is a desirable type of security. The Canadian insurance companies have to buy securities in the United States for the purpose of keeping reserves in the United States against their liabilities. If they buy United States bonds they get at the most two and a half per cent or thereabouts, but under these types of securities, which are guaranteed by the United States government, they can get from three to four per cent; and their competitors are in that position. So that this simply puts them in the competitive position with United States companies which they should be in for the purposes of their United States operations.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why should there be such a great difference between the return on United States government bonds and United States guaranteed securities?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what the reason is, but that is the fact.

Mr. GRAYDON: There must be an impairment of security or else there would not be such a great difference, surely, in the return of interest.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give the answer to that question, but I was talking to the superintendent of insurance a couple of hours ago and he gave me these rates of interest as being the rates realizable from those respective classes of securities. It may be that for some reason or another people would prefer to have United States bonds rather than bonds insured by the federal housing administrator of the United States of America. I believe there has always been a difference, although I am not sure about this, but it seems to me I remember having heard that there is often a difference between the return on dominion government securities and the return on railway securities guaranteed by the dominion government.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is some difference, but there is not such a big spread as the minister indicates there is in the United States.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister tell us what the urgency is which justifies bringing the bill in this evening?

Mr. ILSLEY: If it is not passed this session it cannot be passed for another year; that is all. There has really been considerable urgency for a long time, and we have delayed it. I feel that I should not like to allow a grievance outstanding to remain unremedied, particularly since we are going to ask the insurance companies for their cooperation in our housing legislation; and this is really something which just should not exist; that is all. I do not know of a single argument which anybody can raise against removing this inequality or inequity.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this a situation which has cropped up just lately, or has it gone on down the years, and if it has gone on down the years why was it not like this ten years ago?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am trying to get that information. It is not "down the years", ten years ago, or anything like that. The guarantee by the federal housing administrator of the United States of America of bonds or notes secured by mortgages on real estate there is, I feel sure, of fairly recent date—two or three years ago, I would say.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before the bill is introduced, the government will understand, and the minister particularly, why we cannot allow this bill to be introduced without some special explanation, and the minister has been good enough to accede to that request. Is there a single reason why this bill should not have been brought down early in the session?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not a single one. Not one at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: At least the government has taken the wind out of my critical sails; I will say that much. But if there is no reason why this was not brought down before, I think I am free to criticize the government with respect to this particular point, because they admit they have no defence with regard to it. Having disposed of their defence, may I lay my case? It is, in my opinion, a deliberate flaunting of the parliament of Canada to bring this sort of thing in at the last minute.

Mr. ILSLEY: "Flouting", isn't it?

Mr. GRAYDON: Let the minister keep quiet, because he has admitted he has no argument.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just for the record: "flouting" is the word, not "flaunting".

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps "flouting" is the word, and I am glad the minister corrected me. I knew he felt in his own mind that that is what he was doing, so that perhaps he had the word on the tip of his tongue. I say to the minister that if the present situation, with the legislation which has come down in the last two or three weeks, does not make parliament appear ridiculous in the sight of the public, it will be the public's fault for not judging this parliament as it should be judged, because the government has put parliament in a most awkward and embarrassing position with respect to this legislation which has just been brought in. As far as I am concerned, this is the last straw which breaks the camel's back. I am willing to cooperate and I think our party has cooperated to the fullest extent we can, but actually to fly in the face of parliament by bringing this legislation in at this time, when the government is attempting to close the session to-morrow night, seems to me to be an act which no leader of an opposition or anyone sitting on this side of the house—indeed it applies also to private members in every quarter of the chamber—can regard otherwise than as a direct slap in the face. I do not feel at all contented about the position which we are in with regard to this legislation. Too much of this legislation has been handed to us to attempt to analyse it in principle and in detail when the printer's ink is hardly dry on any of the bills. Yet one wonders afterwards why flaws are found in the other place or, perhaps, by those who are operating under this legislation which is so passed. It is no wonder that errors arise under the circumstances. For the moment I content myself with pointing this out to the minister and the government. There is not much use in saying they ought to do better again, because they will not have an opportunity.

Mr. GILLIS: I would judge that this grievance, if there is one, must be an outstanding one going back to 1932.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will get the exact dates.

Mr. GILLIS: You are changing the statutes back. That is where I got the idea. There are half a dozen different statutes affected by this measure, and what is uppermost in my mind is this. This in no way affects our Canadian housing. I would judge that Canadian insurance companies investing money in the United States in housing projects must be tied up in some way because of the lack of legislation of this kind. Am I right in that? If that is not the assumption there is no need of this.

Mr. ILSLEY: This affects their revenue.

Mr. GILLIS: It is all applicable to the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: It affects their revenue, yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Canadian companies invest their money in housing projects in the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: In mortgages on property, in the United States, yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, I will not quarrel with it because I do not know enough about it, but it certainly opens up a wide field. If you are going to take the insurance companies and make a proper analysis of them, I do not know whether this is right or wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not ask the house to pass the bill to-night. I merely wish to introduce it and have it given first reading so that it may be circulated. Let any member call up anybody or interview anybody, the superintendent of insurance or anybody else—

Mr. GRAYDON: You would have to get them out of bed before this belated bill could be dealt with.

Mr. ILSLEY: Ask anybody if there is anything wrong with the bill and, if there is, do not give consent to its going through. It is in the hands of the house. I would not at the last minute introduce a bill on a subject which would prove controversial.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Properly speaking, should not this bill have gone to the banking and commerce committee first?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We must try to have it introduced into this house first. It could not go to that committee unless it were first introduced here.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is right; I beg your pardon. Well, does it go to the banking and commerce committee?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think there is any need of that.

Mr. HOMUTH: The committee have all gone home.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is this the resolution, or is it the bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The motion is for leave to introduce the bill and have it given first reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the second time. Now?

Mr. ILSLEY: That would not be fair, Mr. Speaker. It should be to-morrow.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are not giving it second reading?

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is bad enough to give it first reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, it is not.

Mr. GRAYDON: I disagree with you.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the house.

WAR SERVICE GRATUITIES

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES ACTIVE SERVICE PERSONNEL—PAYMENTS ON RETIREMENT OR DISCHARGE

The house resumed consideration in committee of bill No. 184, to provide for the payment of war service gratuities and for the grant of reestablishment credits to members of His Majesty's forces in respect of service during the present war—Mr. Mackenzie King—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 9.

Mr. HOMUTH: Just before the committee rose for the dinner recess the minister of pensions said that a group of twenty-five men, many of them veterans of the last war, had been studying this bill for two and a half years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no, not this bill.

Mr. HOMUTH: Or these recommendations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; the question of cash gratuities.

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, this bill is the result of those things.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not necessarily.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not care whether twenty-five men studied this proposal or not. Twenty-five men can be wrong. We have a government of over 170 people and the people think it is wrong, so that I do not hesitate for a moment to express my views with regard to this section 9. I said that there were certain men who had served an equal length of time in Canada and overseas who cannot or do not wish to comply with any of the provisions of the bill and therefore will not get the credit gratuity. In other words, they will not get as much as someone else who has served a similar length of time. They will get only half as much.

If this is being done as a token of appreciation to the men who have served in the armed forces, then surely we should not put any man in the position where he cannot get this money. A man may come back and have a home or a business to go to. He may desire nothing that is set out in section 9, but he may wish to buy a car so that he can enjoy the pleasure of taking his family out. Under this section he could not buy a car.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Who says so?

Mr. HOMUTH: Simply because there is no provision for buying a car for pleasure purposes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What about subparagraph (i)?

Mr. HOMUTH: That will give the minister an opportunity to say to Tom and Dick, "This is what you can do," but to Harry he can say, "You cannot do so and so." It is putting a tremendous power into the hands of the minister and we have done too much of that this session. Here is a single man who comes back from overseas and goes into a hospital in Canada. He may never get out again; he may spend the rest of his days there. He cannot go into any business or live in any house; he has no one dependent upon him for whom he would like to purchase a house; he does not get that extra money; he does not get that credit; yet lying in that hospital there might be times when he would like various little things that he cannot get under the clauses of this bill. If the minister says that he can under subparagraph (i), then why put the thing in at all? Why do so if it is to be made possible for them all to get it?

A week ago we passed legislation in this house for baby bonuses amounting to $250 million. There are men here who were called for service and who rushed into the bush and are in hiding until this war is over. When the war is over they will come out and will be granted an amnesty from any penalty. They will get married and raise babies and get the baby bonus, and there will be no check up on them as to how much baby bonus they get except the limitation as to the number of children in the family. There will be no check-up as to how they spend the money.

Mr. RALSTON: What has that to do with war service gratuities for soldiers?

Mr. HOMUTH: It has this to do with it, that those men who sneaked away are going to be in the public treasury with no check-up unless someone puts in a complaint to the department. The men who went over there and fought are told that if in certain circumstances they want this money they can get it. I think it is very unfair that the government should tell these men how they are to spend the money that a grateful country is giving them as a token of what they have done. If, as the minister says, it can be done under subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a) of section 9, then there is no use in having the limitations at all. I would trust the men to spend their money. They know how to spend it. If there are a few who waste their money, let them go ahead and waste it; it is their money. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. MacKinnon):

That all the words after the word "therefor" in the twenty-eighth line on page 3 be deleted from section 9.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Speaking to the amendment, Mr. Chairman, this means the depriving of the veterans of Canada of some $350,000,000. If the mover of the amendment and the party to which he belongs are supporting that, then we want to know here and now. It means that the alternative benefits under this scheme are absolutely wiped out by the amendment of the hon. member for Waterloo South, because this scheme, as has been pointed out, means $350,000,000 in straight cash gratuities, $50,000,000 for pay and allowances, and $350,000,000 for reestablishment benefits. The hon. member now wishes to strike out the portion of section 9 which deals with the rehabilitation gratuities. If that is what he wishes, then I wish to have a vote at once to see what position the Progressive Conservative party takes in this house with regard to depriving our Canadian soldiers of $350,000,000.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is all rot.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister, of course, jumps to his feet. I wish to say to him that he had better read the amendment. I think the purpose of the amendment ought to be clear to the committee generally. What the hon. member for Waterloo South has in mind—and I think the minister knows full well what he has in mind—is that he wants to give $350,000,000 to the men who come back without any strings attached to it, as have been attached by this government. That is the motive behind the amendment and that is the meaning of the amendment. Let us be clear on that. When the government and the government's followers vote against this amendment, let me point out to the minister that this government is voting to put strings on this money and to attach conditions to it rather than to allow the money to go in cash to the veterans who come back. Therefore, may I throw back into his teeth the same language that he used when he was trying to accuse this party of depriving the soldiers of $350,000,000. Let me say to the government of this country that the soldiers, the sailors and the airmen who come back will know that the government is on trial to-night with respect to this matter. May I make clear and plain the motive and the meaning of the amendment which has been moved, namely, to give the money to the soldiers, sailors and airmen without strings attached to it. Let not the minister or anyone else misrepresent the terms, the motives or the meaning of the amendment which my hon. friend has moved.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I should like to say a word on the amendment. First of all I should like to point out to the hon. member for Waterloo South, who, I am bound to say, made a very strong case this afternoon from his point of view, that ever since the last war there have been certain strings attached to certain benefits granted to returned soldiers. My hon. friend must know that; the leader of the opposition must know that. Ever since the last war, in addition to the gratuities which were payable to returned soldiers on their return to Canada, there were such things as vocational training and training allowances; there were such things as medical care, hospital care, surgical appliances and treatment; there were such things as benefits under the Soldier Settlement Act. In all of these cases there were certain strings attached, if my hon. friend wants to put it in that way. At all events, there were certain conditions that had to be fulfilled before the ex-service man would put himself in a position to take advantage of those benefits. I would point out this also, that to-day, before this bill is passed, there are a great many additional benefits available to returned soldiers. They were cited yesterday morning by the Prime Minister in his speech on the resolution. They are to be found in Hansard at page 6200. Some of them are the Veterans' Land Act—there is a string attached to that, if my hon. friend wants to call it that—out-of-work benefits, vocational and technical training benefits, the benefits of university training which a returned man may have, correspondence courses which he may take. There is the right to reinstatement in his former job. There is the right to preference in the civil service, and so on. These are all benefits which may accrue to an ex-service man, which do not accrue automatically, which can accrue only if certain conditions are complied with.

Speaking frankly to this committee, I am bound to say that when this whole matter was discussed—and it has been discussed for nearly six months—no fewer than ten separate schemes of treatment of ex-service men were suggested, some drawn up here, some suggested by the Canadian legion, some suggested by the services, the one that we are now presenting to the committee being the tenth in a series of schemes—I am bound to say to the hon. member for Waterloo South, who, as I have already said, made a very strong case this afternoon from his point of view, that my own judgment for a long time was not in accordance with the principle of this bill. My feeling was that the benefits already provided for ex-service men in the statutes and in the orders in council of this country, plus one or two additions, to take care to some extent of the small business man and to take care of any professional man starting out on his career, up to the present rehabilitation schemes, made what was virtually a complete rehabilitation programme. But I had thought that—and here is where I agreed with the hon. member for Waterloo South for a long time—more money should be given to the soldier in the way of cash gratuities. I did feel that the gratuities should be considerably higher than they are in this bill, and that these higher gratuities with the schemes under our statutes and under our orders in council, together with some assistance to the small business and professional man, would give us an excellent general plan. But on reflection and after full discussion with my colleagues of the government, with members of the civil service, returned soldiers and others, I came to the point of view which is expressed in this bill. The gratuities are considerably smaller than I originally hoped, but there are, in addition, these large credits available over a period of ten years.

The point that I rose to make on speaking to the amendment is that it is incorrect to say or to suggest that strings are now being attached for the first time to these benefits that are available to returned soldiers. I am as keen for the welfare of the returned soldier as anyone in this house. But I do not think it is unfair to suggest that if we are going to pay out money over a period of ten years we should lay down certain conditions, which I suggest are not onerous, and do not work any hardship, and which I am sure every returned soldier can readily accept if he wishes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to ask a question with regard to this section, which reads:

> All or any part of the reestablishment credit herein provided for may, within a period of ten years from the date of the coming into force of this act, or of the date of his discharge, whichever is the later, be made available to or for the member of the forces eligible therefor for such of the following objects as, in the opinion of the minister or of such person or persons as he may designate for that purpose, are desirable in respect of the reestablishment of such member.

What is the reason for the insertion of the words "in the opinion of the minister or of such person or persons as he may designate for that purpose, are desirable in respect of the reestablishment of such member"? Does this mean that every soldier will not be entitled to these benefits in the matter of the reestablishment credit, even if he qualifies and comes under the provisions of paragraphs (a) to (h) inclusive, unless the minister or some undetermined individual or individuals decide that he shall be so entitled? Personally I see no reason for those words in the section at all. The purposes in respect of which reestablishment credits will be considered and permitted are set forth in this section. Why is it necessary to add a further string, if you will, by providing that a soldier shall not be entitled to this reestablishment fund, even if he intends to use the money for one of the purposes set forth in these paragraphs, unless the minister or some other person so determines? In the first place I think those words should be deleted. They confer power upon the minister, or a person as yet undetermined, to decide each case on its own merits. As far as the amendment is concerned I certainly am not of the opinion, and I submit there is no justification for the opinion, that it is intended to take away from the ex-service men and women of this country some $350,000,000. I imagine that statement was made by the minister perhaps in a moment of thoughtlessness, for to-day our irritation point is rather low, no doubt due to the temperature of this chamber. In any event I feel that the words to which I have referred should be deleted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I point out to the hon. member for Lake Centre that this committee has already passed section 8, and I believe the mover of the amendment has completely lost sight of the fact that section 8 deprives the recipient of these gratuities of the benefits of vocational training and the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act. Section 9 merely sets up other alternative benefits for those who are unable or do not choose to qualify for the benefits of the Veterans' Land Act, or vocational or technical training, as I pointed out before six o'clock. That is an important point. This is only an alternative series of benefits, I think about nine or ten in all, with the last one very generic in its terms.

Coming to the point raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre, I believe there is some merit in the second part of his remarks in regard to persons to be designated; but you must have advice and direction. This measure is essentially concerned with reestablishment, with the rebuilding of the lives of the boys who come back, in various endeavours; and I think they must have counsel. We have vocational counselors and guidance counselors in the department now, where we have nine or ten major benefits functioning already. We have these advisers for one purpose only; not to regiment anyone but to try and render all the assistance we can. We have personnel counsel in the hospitals to-day, to advise those who are wounded in regard to what they may desire to do. Someone mentioned that a few moments ago. The idea certainly is not to regiment anyone; it is to offer cooperation and assistance. I see no objection to the argument advanced by my hon. friend in regard to the other persons who may be designated, as mentioned in the section. If the power is left to the minister he is responsible to parliament and must answer to parliament, so that I think you must leave that power there. As far as I can see that should not be altered.

Mr. ROWE: Why not let the section stand for the present and go on with the others?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am in the hands of the committee, but I see no reason why it should stand. I believe we are all in agreement on it. If my hon. friend would like to strike out the words "or of such other person or persons as he may designate for that purpose," which may refer to boards or other organizations, I would have no objection. I think the minister must be left there, however, because he is responsible to parliament and he must do the advising, through his deputy minister and his counselors, purely for the purpose of assisting and reestablishing the veterans who come back. That is the only principle underlying this section. I think we are all agreed upon that point, and I believe my hon. friend from Lake Centre is right in his second point, that the section goes too far and allows too much latitude when it refers to such other persons as may be designated.

Mr. HOMUTH: This perhaps indicates the advantages of having some lawyers in the house. We do not want too many, but it is a good idea to have some. I drew up the amendment very hurriedly; I read over the provisions of the bill, and I thought this amendment would do what I should like to see done. I still feel, and I shall continue to feel, that when we are giving men gratuities for service in the armed forces, those gratuities should be equal to all and should not be predicated upon whether or not a man does something which under the act may be designated by the minister or by some board. If we are going to express our appreciation to our fighting men in this rather modest way, then let us make it apply to them equally; let us see that they all get the same amount, and that some are not deprived of their share because they cannot come under the provisions of section 9. I realize that my amendment may be badly drawn, and I am prepared to withdraw it. Before this bill passes, however, I hope that the government will consider what I have said in regard to the necessity of seeing that everyone gets an equal amount of money under this legislation.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I appreciate very much the spirit of cooperation shown by my hon. friend in withdrawing his amendment, but I am afraid he is confusing two things. He is confusing the gratuity with the reestablishment credit. Under this scheme everyone gets the same amount of gratuity, except that under one of the provisions there is reference to the amount of pay and allowances of the individual. In regard to the reestablishment credit everyone from the private to the general, from the airman to the air marshal, gets the same treatment and the same opportunity to avail himself of the credits that are available for reestablishment under this measure. So that when my hon. friend says that there is discrimination here, there is not; there is the greatest equality, more so than in any similar scheme proposed throughout the world, as I am sure hon. members realize.

Take the cash gratuities; they are the same for all, with no question of rank. The only difference arises in connection with the rehabilitation grant involved in this proposal, which has to do with the payment of seven days' pay and allowances. From the private to the field marshal, if we were fortunate enough to have one in Canada, they are all the same. You then come to credits, and they are the same for everybody. They are invited to take advantage of these nine or ten different schemes up to a period of ten years. Where is the discrimination there? It is equality of opportunity for everyone serving to-day in the fighting forces of Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: What about the merchant navy?

Mr. LOCKHART: Is the amendment withdrawn?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then I shall refer to section 9 (a) (ii).

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. LOCKHART: I draw the minister's attention particularly to this paragraph. On more than one occasion I have expressed my opinion that there are too many hurdles to get over.

I shall read this paragraph. It states:

(a) The acquisition of a home . . .
(ii) if not under the National Housing Act, 1944, in an amount not exceeding two-thirds of the difference between the appraised value of the home as approved by the minister or the purchase price, whichever is the lower, and the amount of the encumbrance or encumbrances thereon, if any.

I have good reason to make reference to this, because in my community there are 785 war-time houses. There is some indication that soldiers who have already returned have expressed the desire to purchase some of these homes. Whether opportunity is given them or not, we are not quite sure. The president of Wartime Housing said that those houses would be torn down in six months. That was his statement to a citizens' committee of seventy-five people. And yet there is the offer to purchase some of these homes and put foundations under them. How is the appraised value of some of these homes built under the Wartime Housing Act to be arrived at? The section refers to "the appraised value of the home as approved by the minister", or some such person as the minister may designate. How are we to arrive at a price of a war-time house, when prices in Hull, Quebec, were over $4,000, while those in another centre were only $2,820? There will be a lot of confusion.

I am definitely of the opinion that if we had followed the suggestion of the minister and stopped at the words "for such of the following objects as" and deleted the latter part of the section, which is only going to make things cumbersome for the soldier who wants to buy a home of some kind, it would be much better. Yet he is placed in a position, under section 9 (a) (ii), where he has to go through all this trouble to buy some little cottage which has been erected, and which he might finance with his limited amount of money. I urge the minister and the government to simplify this situation for the man who will try to get himself a home. I know there are scores of them who are anticipating doing that. I am complaining particularly about section 9 (a) (ii), under which a man has to go through all kinds of cumbersome procedure with the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is refreshing to recall that this section was placed in the bill after representations which were made by hon. members opposite. We had the resolution before the house, and we tried to meet the wishes which have just been expressed—the wishes, perhaps not of the hon. member who has just spoken, but certainly those of other hon. members opposite.

The position was this: Why narrow some of the returned men to the provisions of the National Housing Act, 1944? Why not give them an opportunity of private endeavour, in regard to removing any encumbrances that may be upon the house?

Mr. LOCKHART: Why put strings upon it at all?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would say this, that it was only to meet the wishes of the opposition two days ago that paragraph (a) (ii) was inserted. I can assure my hon. friend that this paragraph was drafted with the greatest possible care, and that the only idea in mind was to assist the veteran to purchase a home on the basis of two to one. That is all there was to it—to remove encumbrances and to obtain a house properly and privately, apart from the provisions of The National Housing Act, 1944.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Let me give an illustration, just to see if I understand the bill. Here is a home valued at $2,700. That is either the assessed value, the appraised value or the purchase price. Against it is an encumbrance of $1,500. That leaves $1,200 which must be put up to buy the home. Under the bill, all that will be allowed is $800; is that correct? That leaves $400 he has to find, himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Well, that is what it says.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It says, "not exceeding two-thirds of the difference."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; he could put up his entire reestablishment credit, if it amounts to $1,200, provided that he puts up $600 more of his own.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But that is not what it says. What it actually says is what I am telling the minister; that is, the appraised value of the home is $2,700, and there is an encumbrance of $1,500. That is quite clear, and it leaves $1,200 in cash that must be put up. The amount that will be advanced is two-thirds of the difference. Two-thirds of the difference between the appraised value of the house, and the encumbrance—which is $1,200—is $800. That leaves $400 he must find himself. Why?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Under the case advanced by my hon. friend he can put up two-thirds of the amount of the encumbrance, which is $800. But if he has further reestablishment benefits to his credit, he can use them in other directions.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But it is not two-thirds of the encumbrance which he puts up; it is two-thirds of the difference.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Of the amount necessary to clean up the transaction.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But this section does not say that. It says merely, "give him two-thirds of the difference between the value of the home or what he pays for it, and the encumbrance"—which in this instance is $1,500. In this case the amount left would be $1,200, and you will give him only $800. He has to go and find $400. You are keeping the $400 for what?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Any other benefit that he may seek to possess, such as furniture, or any of these other benefits outlined.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think this is ridiculous. It just shows how ill thought out some of the things in this bill are. He will not buy a house unless he has furniture, or something like that. Surely to heavens in a case of this kind, if he wishes to do that, and if he wishes to have help to the extent of $1,200, we should let him have it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): One of the most constructive things is this provision for two-thirds of the amount. This encourages the investor or the beneficiary to invest some of his own money. I am certain that is absolutely sound in every respect.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is the most unsound thing I have ever heard of. That is all there is to it—where a man can get only $800 out of the money coming to him. That is altogether wrong—and perhaps he will have to borrow on a second mortgage, or something like that, in order to get that money.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I think my hon. friend is under some misapprehension as to the purpose of the two-thirds provision. As I understand it, the returned soldier can use his entire rehabilitation credit for the purpose of buying a home. He can use whatever rehabilitation credit is coming to him for the purpose of buying that home, provided that that rehabilitation credit does not exceed two-thirds of the difference mentioned in the section. My hon. friend has mentioned a case where the home is worth $2,700, with an encumbrance of $1,500, leaving a difference of $1,200. If the returned soldier has coming to him a rehabilitation credit of $800 there is no doubt that he can use that entire credit of $800 for the purpose of buying his home, but he cannot go beyond that, and the reason why he cannot go beyond that is, as the minister of pensions has said, that it has been considered desirable by all who have had experience in the matter of housing that the buyer should have some equity in the home. In other words, he puts up $400 of his own money. Perhaps he would take it out of his gratuity, perhaps out of his earnings after he came back to this country, and then, having put up the $400, he meets the requirements of section 9.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): He might have $1,800 coming to him. Therefore he just cannot use it. He cannot get the money, and he would have to borrow the $400 somewhere to put into his home. The thing just does not make sense.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He can use the credit under other benefits.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It can be done, I suppose, under the clause "any other purpose authorized by the governor in council." That and the first part of the bill might enable him to do it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am wondering whether we cannot straighten out section 9 so that it will read more clearly. In the first place I am glad that the minister agrees that parliament should not permit any person or persons designated by the minister to make the decision on such an important matter as the eligibility of a veteran to the benefits of reestablishment credit. I would suggest that section 9 be revamped to read as follows:

All or any part of the reestablishment credit herein provided for may, within a period of ten years from the date of the coming into force of this act, or of the date—

Mr. RALSTON: Leave out the "of".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. I go on:

—of his discharge, whichever is the later, be made available to or for the member of the forces eligible therefor—

Then I would strike out all the following words to the end of line 32 and substitute the following:

—when it is shown to the satisfaction of the minister that such credit is to be used for . . .

Then follow (a), (b) and so forth. That would allow the minister to designate whether or not the individual in question is eligible for reestablishment credit.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There will be a tremendous number of these cases.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate that, but the minister has the power to secure the opinion of others and necessarily acts upon that opinion. What I do object to is parliament giving authority to individuals over whom parliament has no power. Every veteran should be entitled to this reestablishment credit, provided that he is not receiving benefits under the Veterans' Land Act, or educational, vocational or technical training benefits as mentioned in section 8.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We can let the section stand so that we can examine my hon. friend's proposed amendment.

Mr. RALSTON: Can we not go through the various paragraphs outlining the objectives, because all that my hon. friend is suggesting is a revamping of the operative part of the section?

Mr. ROWE: By a strange coincidence I had struck out the very lines that my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre suggested be struck out. I think we are very close to an agreement on this clause. The minister of pensions has stated that it is his desire that the returned men shall have equality of opportunity, and I submit in all fairness that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre would provide for that very equality of opportunity which the minister desires. I think the objectives as set out in the bill are reasonably sound and desirable objectives. I think we are all more or less agreed on that. All that the minister is asking is that Mr. Jones and Mr. Smith when they return from overseas shall have an equality of opportunity to get reestablishment credit, and the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lake Centre would bring that about. I cannot agree with the minister for naval services because there is a principle involved here and the payment of a large amount of money. I think it is sticking closer to responsible government to make the minister responsible, and if that suggestion is accepted I think we can expedite the passing of this section.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So far as the objectives are concerned, I dealt with this question on one occasion at some length in the house, and I personally feel that paragraphs (a) to (h) very well cover almost every known means whereby a soldier could rehabilitate himself in the post-war period. I think paragraph (i) is necessary in order to cover such matters of rehabilitation as cannot be specifically set out and which might be necessary. As far as the purposes for which reestablishment credit should be established are concerned, I for one am in entire agreement with the section.

Mr. LOCKHART: I think that if the latter part of the section delegating authority to such person or persons as the minister may designate were corrected it would work out all right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre will draft his amendment as he proposed the government will accept it.

Mr. ROWE: Can you accept it now?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I move, seconded by Mr. Rowe:

That all the words after "therefor" in lines 28, 29, 30, 31 and 32 be deleted and that the following be substituted therefor:

"when it is shown to the satisfaction of the minister that such credit is to be used for"

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Will you combine with that the deletion of the word "of" in line 26, which was mentioned before?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: As I understand the section, prior to amendment it meant this, that in the working out of this legislation you will require considerable help and you will need quite a large personnel to whom applications will be made under the provisions of this particular clause. Am I to understand that the amendment made by the hon. member for Lake Centre means that, regardless of all your service personnel and counselors and advisers and officials across the country who may be rendering judgment on these matters, it will not be possible to receive a grant until such time as the minister in his judgment approves it?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No.

Mr. GILLIS: That is what it states.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I hope not.

Mr. GILLIS: Who is to be the minister who administers this?

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, well, we shall settle that.

Mr. GILLIS: I am a little doubtful about this section. I do not want to see the thing messed up.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, it is all right.

Mr. GILLIS: As I understand the wording of the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre, the minister's approval is needed. That means that a board which is sitting in British Columbia or in Nova Scotia or in Sarnia, where your service personnel is coming in and trying to take advantage of this particular section, will be told by the board, "We must inform you that until such time as the recommendation is approved personally by the minister no action will be taken."

Mr. ROWE: No. It is just like any other departmental administration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I point out to the hon. member that under the Veterans' Affairs Act the minister is entirely responsible for the reestablishment of the veteran. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lake Centre carries out the same idea. I do not think the difficulties contemplated by my hon. friend will ever arise.

Mr. GILLIS: I appreciate very much what the minister says, but I still have in mind the answer we received across the floor, "It does not make any difference what I say in the house; it is the regulations which speak." Remember?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There will be regulations under this too.

Mr. GILLIS: That is exactly what the regulations are saying—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no, the regulations are not drawn up yet.

Mr. GILLIS: —that it must have the personal approval of the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Don't worry about that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With regard to the other part of the amendment, it states, the word "of" in line 26. Which "of" is it? There are three.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The last one.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 10 and 11 agreed to.

[Mr. Gillis.]

On section 12—Exceptions to entitlement—seaman, soldier or airman.

Mr. GILLIS: I think this section requires some explanation by the minister.

Mr. ROWE: Section 11 has the same principle.

Mr. RALSTON: I dislike quoting the other order in council, the order in council of 1918, but it is practically in the same form. I understand that paragraph (a) is in terms which the naval forces use; my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services will correct me if I am wrong. The other paragraphs apply in the usual cases of those who are dismissed the service for misconduct.

Mr. GILLIS: This is what I have in mind. A boy is picked up by the civil authorities, in many instances for some quite trivial act. He goes before the local magistrate and is sentenced for some infraction which is of no significance—I have such cases in mind—to a year in gaol. The boy is discharged.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Not necessarily.

Mr. GILLIS: I know cases where they have been.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, but for a serious offence.

Mr. GILLIS: Not too serious. However, I am not going to argue that because we have not any jurisdiction over it. What I am concerned about is that under this section the military authorities will be accepting the decision of some local magistrate. That boy is penalized; he is stigmatized and he is deprived of what we are now providing for our service personnel. The thought I leave with the minister is that before this section should become operative a boy convicted by a civil court should at least be given a fair trial by national defence officials as to the justification for the sentence in the local magistrate's court. There should be some court of appeal. If I could sit down for fifteen minutes with the Minister of National Defence I could prove to him that he has lost at least two soldiers through the stupidity of a local magistrate right in this province, and all I am trying to provide for here is a square deal on the part of military officials where service personnel are convicted by civil courts.

Mr. RALSTON: I am advised that there is nothing automatic about it. A man is not necessarily discharged because of having been sentenced by a civil court, and I do not think there is in the regulations anything that provides he shall be. It may be that a sentence of two years would have that effect. All I can say to my hon. friend is this, and it is not of very much use to him because it is general. Because of this additional penalty which is imposed on a man we shall endeavour to see that proceedings for discharges following commission of civil offences and conviction by civil courts are examined as carefully as possible. We shall see that instructions are sent out to that effect. I cannot promise that we shall have an army tribunal review the actual evidence before the court, but we shall look into it to see what the man's character is. Sometimes these fellows that commit offences are the best soldiers, and we do not want to drop them out of the ranks simply because they happen to get into trouble; nevertheless they must not get into trouble that extends over too long a period because in that case they are of no use to us.

Mr. GILLIS: Let me give a case in point. A boy has served for two and a half years overseas and he comes back. He is at home for only two or three days when he gets into a little bit of trouble with the local authorities and he is sent up the river for a year and is automatically discharged from the service.

Mr. MUTCH: No, he is not; not automatically.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to argue with the hon. member. I know this is true because I happen to have made representations in this case. By virtue of the fact that he is sentenced to a year and is discharged he comes under this provision and is deprived of his gratuity. I know you cannot make a blanket provision in regulations governing matters of this kind and these are perhaps isolated cases. At the same time they constitute an injustice, and even if there is only one man who is affected I think we should do what we can to avoid injustice. I leave that with the Minister of National Defence, and I suggest that within the terms of the regulations there should be sufficient latitude that in a case of this kind the army officials should have the right to review the circumstances and render justice within the meaning of this legislation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I suggest that this bill could be improved by the entire deletion of this section. If the bill means anything it means that after a boy has served overseas, after he has fought, he is entitled to a number of benefits. Suppose he makes eight or ten operational trips over Germany; he is entitled to benefit. But he might run into a mishap such as has been indicated by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and he is deprived of those benefits. How can you get justice out of that situation? I have in mind cases which have come to my personal knowledge where men have been railroaded out of the service through unjust courts-martial. There was a deliberate attempt and plan to "get them", and they got them out of the service. Any man who has been in the army and has gone through the experience knows of cases similar to the one I have in mind. Are these men to receive nothing at all in consideration of the service they have rendered their country? Surely this section should be reviewed with the greatest of care.

Mr. ADAMSON: What is the ruling under king's rules and regulations about civil offences?

Mr. RALSTON: They are not automatic. There may be cases on discharge, for instance, conviction for an offence of a felonious nature.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is there a time limit?

Mr. RALSTON: No, there is no time limit.

Mr. FAIR: I can see that there will be some discrimination against certain members of the forces. I think we are thankful to all the men and women who have gone overseas. We owe them much more than is contained in this bill and in the other legislation already placed on the statute books, and because we may do an injustice to a few I suggest that it would be much better to delete this clause entirely. I move that the section be deleted.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the section carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is a motion to delete the clause.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Who made the motion?

Mr. FAIR: I moved that section 12 be deleted.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not like a motion of this kind; I do not think the hon. gentleman quite realizes the responsibility he is taking. This is the law with regard to the gratuities of 1918; it is the law in effect with regard to the various rehabilitation provisions which are in force to-day, and I do not think we can quite take the responsibility of striking out a section which provides that you will not pay war service gratuities to men who are discharged for misconduct, naval personnel who have been sentenced to be discharged with ignominy or men who are discharged by reason of having been convicted by a civil court or by court martial during service. I do not understand the attitude taken. I know the case to which the hon. member for Lethbridge refers. He has had it before the House of Commons and I have had it before me. I do not agree with him in that matter. I have been through it from cellar to attic. He says that someone was railroaded out of the army and he does not want anyone to be disqualified on that account. Without in any respect derogating from the position that I have just taken in relation to that case, I have no doubt that men are convicted at times before civil courts in connection with matters in respect of which somebody else might have let them off. That happens. But when men are convicted it is not only the conviction that counts so far as the army is concerned. The question is whether or not they will be good soldiers. The army does not discharge men who are likely to be good soldiers, because it wants good soldiers. That is why we are here to see that the gratuity is paid in the most generous and ample terms possible for the benefit of the men who are giving service. What this section says is that if the offence has been so serious, if they have been convicted by a civil court and been sentenced for such a period that we cannot use them in the army, then we do not pay war service gratuity. My hon. friend may make his motion if he wishes to do so, although as a matter of fact it is out of order because it would mean an additional financial provision. The resolution that was passed by the house, on which the bill is founded, expressly provided this very thing, namely, that men would not be paid gratuity if they were guilty of misconduct. My hon. friend moves to delete the section and that would mean an increase in financial liability under the bill.

On that ground, without any other argument, I submit that the motion is out of order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It is not in order for the hon. member to move that the section be deleted. He can move that it be amended.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He can vote against the clause.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member has the opportunity of voting against it. It is not in order to move that it be deleted.

Mr. FAIR: May I suggest the section stand until to-morrow?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. GILLIS: I recognize the fact that it is not desirable to strike out the clause completely. I believe that there is a place for discretionary powers. I believe that the minister should have discretionary powers under this section. With all due respect to the observation of the Minister of National Defence that men are tried and put away for cause, I am convinced there are times when they are put away because of, as I said, stupidity in some cases, and I am prepared to support that in the proper place.

May I give an example? A kid of seventeen or eighteen years of age enlists. He comes to this province. He goes out from camp in the evening and drinks some beer sold to him by the government of Ontario. On the way home, as is the common practice in the towns around close to the camp, he picks up a car and probably takes it for a ride. It may happen that he did not take it at all. I know of one case where a truck was moved approximately four feet. The kid is charged with theft under the criminal code. There is no alternative but to give him a year in gaol. The kid is sentenced to a year in gaol and he is discharged from the service. He is stigmatized after having been trained for perhaps a year or more. It is stupidity on the part of the magistrate to render a decision of that kind. I do not think that kid committed a crime. The only crime he committed was drinking beer sold to him by the government of Ontario. If the minister checks up he will find a lot of that going on. I know the minister is too busy to bother with it; he has other things to think about. But there are a few cases that might be reviewed in the interest of the service personnel. I am not concerned with allowing anyone off who has been punished under king's rules and regulations or by the civil courts, but I am concerned with correcting injustices brought about in the first instance by magistrates who are not competent to administer the law because they have not the training. I hope that matter will be discussed when the time and opportunity arise.

I move that section 12 of bill 184 be amended by adding the following subsection:

(2) Provided that the minister may exercise discretionary power in connection with the preceding section.

What I mean by that is, if there is a kid who has a legitimate complaint when this legislation is being administered, that he be given the right to place his case before the minister; that the minister administering this legislation then has the power and the duty to make an examination into that case and that if the boy has not been fairly dealt with in being let out of the service, then the minister has sufficient latitude under this regulation to correct any injustice that may have been committed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, before you call the vote may I reply to what the minister said a moment ago? The argument that this section is sound because it resembles what was placed in the act after the war of 1914-18 is not valid. During the war of 1914-18 we did several things in the army which we are too much civilized to do to-day. There are a good many things we are doing in the army to-day that we shall not do in the next war because we shall be too civilized. I look on this measure as being an act of reward, not an act of punishment. Let us say that the boy is discharged. Is not the fact that he is discharged looked upon to-day by the army as being a punishment adequate to the crime. If the boy has been discharged for a misdemeanour, surely he has been punished. Why deprive him of the benefits which would naturally accrue to him under this bill and thereby punish him doubly? Surely there is no justice in that?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend just put his finger on the point. He says, if the man is discharged for a misdemeanour. The army does not discharge men for misdemeanours if they are good soldiers. The army discharges them for serious offences which have been committed and for which they have to serve long imprisonment, which means that they are useless in the army. I know that my hon. friend has a kind heart; we all have. We are all just as sympathetic toward the unfortunate as he is. My hon. friend always speaks of boys. They are not all boys. Here is a situation where a court constituted in this country has made a finding and has imposed a sentence. That sentence has had to be accepted by the army and they have to take the necessary action in order that they may not have on their strength a man who is not capable of army service. The simple question is whether or not the Minister of Pensions and National Health or the Minister of Veterans' Affairs under this amendment is going to review the action taken by the civil court, and the action taken by the navy, army and air force and reverse the action taken by saying, "that was not a serious offence after all, you should not have been discharged from the forces." That is the effect of the amendment. I know what my hon. friend is looking for. He is looking for some way out to assist the odd case, but I submit to him that you cannot do it in that way. And I really and sincerely feel that it would be impossible for the minister to examine literally hundreds, and I am sorry to say, thousands of cases in which men have been discharged from the services from time to time. I do not think my hon. friend ought to press the amendment. If he feels that he should in order to get the opinion of the committee, then speaking for myself and for the government we see no other course than to vote against it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let me present a case to see if it would come under this section. An airman has been engaged in flying over Germany. Physically he has got into a state of nervousness which affects him to such extent that he cannot fly. He gets sick when he goes up alone. He is discharged from the air force and is automatically deprived of the benefit under this legislation.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It says here definitely, if he is discharged. Then it goes on to state the various reasons for being discharged.

Mr. RALSTON: If he is discharged not for developing a state of nerves but because he was convicted in a civil court, by a court martial during his service or for misconduct, then he would not get the benefits under this section. My hon. friend will not find in the air force a man of the kind he has described being discharged for misconduct.

Mr. GILLIS: The Minister of National Defence is not correct in his interpretation of my views on this matter. I do not desire to test the decisions made by army or navy courts martial. I know enough about military affairs to realize that a man who is court-martialed gets a reasonably fair deal. I do not want an examination of all the cases, nor do I think there would have to be an examination of all cases. I have in mind the few who have grievances, who have perhaps been sentenced by local magistrates and as a result have been discharged from the service. You might have one, two or a dozen cases, but I believe any man who is affected by these regulations should have the right to appeal; the door should not be closed. That is my point. If you go back through the discharges from the air force you will find that many men, because of the condition described by the hon. member for Lethbridge—nervous, worn to the breaking point—refused to go up, and as a result lost their commissions and left the service. I do not know how you discharge them; it may be for misconduct, or you may use some other term, but there will be quite a number of men dealt with in that way. I believe you will find a number of men who have grievances under this section, and I want to provide some machinery whereby they may have an opportunity of airing those grievances. As it is now drawn, this legislation closes the door completely. I do not visualize checking back on courts martial and all that kind of stuff, but I am trying to insert into this legislation provision for a court of appeal. I feel so strongly on the matter that I should like to take a vote on it.

Mr. CHURCH: This section has to do with discharges brought about by reason of civil prosecution or for other reasons, and I point out to the minister that under section 2 the word "discharge" means ceasing to serve on active service in any one of the three services.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The question before the committee is the amendment moved by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, which would add a provision to the section.

Mr. HOMUTH: I believe that the hon. member was about to discuss the very matter dealt with in the amendment.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to point out that in England there have been some thirty thousand prosecutions in connection with breaches of war-time regulations, and that in Canada we have had about one-tenth that number of prosecutions for breaches of the regulations of the wartime prices and trade board. Offences against those regulations in time of war are not offences in days of peace. Would the provisions of this section rule out a man because he committed some minor breach of the regulations of the wartime prices and trade board, with all the controls and bureaucracy we have now? If that is the case I believe the section is really too drastic.

Mr. RALSTON: I would agree with my hon. friend if the section did mean what he evidently thinks it means. The offence for which a man was convicted must have been so serious that it showed he would not make an efficient soldier or his sentence would take him away from the service for so long that it would seriously impair his usefulness. Then he would have to be discharged from the army, the navy or the air force. The whole section is governed by the word "discharged" in the second line. If a man has been sentenced, even for an offence under the wartime prices and trade board regulations, which takes him away from service for a very long time, so that he cannot be of use as a soldier, sailor or airman, then paragraph (b) would apply. In practice, however, I do not think it would apply at all, because a man would hardly be discharged from any of the three services for an offence of the kind which my hon. friend has quite properly described as a war-time and not a peace-time offence.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. CHURCH: Probably my point would be covered by the minister under his power to make rules and regulations.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to point out that as the section stands now, without the amendment, the door is absolutely closed; that no man who has been convicted and sentenced by a civil court, and who as a result has been discharged, has any chance of coming under the bill no matter how just his case may be. This amendment would merely provide a loophole which would permit the minister to exercise a little discretion. After all, Canadian soldiers are just civilians who have put on the uniform. Most of them have not been accustomed to military discipline. Life in the army is apt to be more or less grating at times, and the sort of treatment and justice a soldier receives is so entirely different from what he has been accustomed to in civilian life that very often he builds up resentment against those exercising that control. Then very often when he gets away from that discipline he does foolish things, such as the instance pointed out to-night which involved nothing more than getting into a truck and moving it three or four feet. The man who did that was convicted by a court in this dominion and sent to the penitentiary for one year. As a result he was discharged from the army. Surely that offence was not so great that it should entirely take away any opportunity he might have of getting the benefits of this legislation. We are trying to help these young lads to get back into civilian life. This amendment would not only provide a means whereby an unjust clause may have some justice in it, and I intend to support the amendment.

Mr. FAIR: I intend to support the amendment also. When I moved my own amendment I had in mind one matter that so far has not been discussed. A number of young men in the forces to-day have left home for the first time. Before leaving home they were not accustomed to liquor, but since leaving home they have become accustomed to it. I believe that is one of the things that get many of these young fellows into trouble. They serve for four or five years; then as a result of some misdemeanor they are taken to court, with the results that have been described to-night. For that reason; because some provinces cannot find any better way to raise money than through the profits on the sale of liquor, I am satisfied that something should be done. I believe that the minister should have discretionary power under this section, and for the reasons that have been mentioned already I intend to support the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Gillis) negatived: yeas, 7; nays, 38.

Section agreed to.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Application to be made for gratuity or audit.

Mr. CHURCH: I understand that the only person who can make an application is a member of the forces. Suppose he is incapacitated or suppose he has been killed. Can any other member of the family—his wife, for instance—make application?

Mr. RALSTON: The wording is "by or on behalf of".

Mr. CHURCH: Under the section the minister can make regulations?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, under section 24 of the bill.

Mr. ROWE: Under this particular section is it the intention of the government to make it obligatory to make application before even the gratuity is given? I can understand the situation with respect to the reestablishment credit; but as it reads now, a man has to make application even for gratuity. My submission is that there will be extreme cases where men coming back would not have any friends or other people who could make application on their behalf. They perhaps may not be familiar with the gratuities available. My submission is that this should be clarified.

Mr. RALSTON: We were discussing that matter to-day, in anticipation of the passage of this bill. Regulations are now being prepared in regard to the matter of applications. I think I can say now that the usual procedure will be that the moment a man is discharged, and at the time he receives his rehabilitation grant, he will then sign his application for war services gratuity as well.

As I said to the house the other day, the administration of the measure will be under two departments, to some extent. That is to say, the war services gratuity will be paid by the service departments, and the reestablishment grant will be administered by the Department of Veterans' Affairs. I rather anticipate that payments on war service gratuities will be made by the service departments for the Minister of Pensions and National Health, or the Minister of Veterans' Affairs. I think the matter of application can be worked out so that it will be signed at the time the man receives his rehabilitation grant.

Mr. ROWE: Should that not be said?

Mr. RALSTON: We will say it in the regulations.

Mr. HOMUTH: But can the regulations override the wording of the bill?

Mr. RALSTON: But the wording of the bill is sufficient to permit that, because it says, "by or on behalf of". Then section 24 states:

> The governor in council may make regulations governing all matters relative to the manner of payment of gratuities or the making of reestablishment credits available and the evidence to be required in support of applications therefor, to prescribe penalties for breaches of the said regulations and generally to give effect to and carry out the objects of this act.

Mr. ROWE: All right.

Mr. ADAMSON: With respect to section 13—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Section 13 is passed; we are on section 14.

Mr. ADAMSON: Then may I make one observation with regard to section 13? I do not wish to take up the time of the committee unnecessarily, but I notice that in line 4 of that section we find the expression "penal servitude, imprisonment or detention". The word "detention" means detention for a small period of time, possibly a week, fourteen days or twenty-eight days.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It can be more than that in the navy.

Mr. ADAMSON: The detention may be for a very short time, or for a long time. The word "detention" applies to anyone who is committed to the guardroom. I would suggest to the minister that under this section he is going to penalize many service men who have committed some small misdemeanours and who have been given forty-eight hours in the guardroom, or perhaps up to seven days or fourteen days. I do not wish to offer an amendment, because enough of them have been moved. But I would suggest that after the word "detention" the words "for a period greater than twenty-eight days" be added. Then we would be penalizing only the man who has committed a serious crime and would not be penalizing the man who possibly went out and got drunk, with the result that he was committed to the guardroom for possibly seven days, or forty-eight hours.

There is another feature to which I would direct attention. I notice the expression "or period of service in respect of which pay is forfeited". Forfeiture of pay has become rather a common, and I think unnecessarily common, type of punishment in the army during this war. A man may be absent without leave or late on a pass, and frequently his punishment is a forfeiture of two, three or four days' pay. The punishment would depend upon the length of absence without leave.

These are small crimes in the normal life of many service men in this war. Even excellent soldiers have at one time or another been absent without leave for a day, or late on a pass, or committed some small crime for which they have suffered stoppages of pay, or have been committed to the guardroom for some hours, or possibly for two or three days. The expression in the section is too all-embracing, and I would suggest that after the word "detention" the words "for a period greater than twenty-eight days" be inserted, and that after the word "or" the word "like" be added.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Section 13 has been carried. We can revert to it only with the consent of the committee.

Mr. ADAMSON: I understood that the committee had consented?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I do not think so.

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister can clear it up.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): All right, if that is satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot accept my hon. friend's suggestion. It simply means that you would be giving a man war services gratuity for the time he was in detention. You do not give him pay, but you give him war services gratuity.

Mr. ADAMSON: Up to twenty-eight days.

Mr. RALSTON: He can be given detention for two years.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes, but I am stipulating over twenty-eight days.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there any principle upon which you can permit a man who is in detention, and for whom you have to provide provost personnel and a detention barracks, to receive a bonus for his detention? I cannot see it.

Mr. HOMUTH: Somebody has to pay for the gaol.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Benefits received from other governments.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is in this section something which has been overlooked and which I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. There are certain decorations, possibly from other countries or from our own country, which carry with them a certain amount of money, payable each year for life, which are given to the members of armed forces. I do not think that has been considered in connection with this section. The section ought to be amended so that they would be included.

Mr. RALSTON: No, I am quite satisfied that is not correct. I realize that I expressed a legal opinion before, and that I reversed myself a while later—although I have come to the conclusion that I was right.

Mr. HOMUTH: Which time?

Mr. RALSTON: In the first place. But I am right in this, that I do not think there is any chance in the world of this applying to any gratuity or credit which is given as supplementary to a decoration. I do not think this section refers to the sort of gratuities or credits about which my hon. friend has been speaking. The gratuities or credits to which he referred are credits, gratuities or cash grants which go with certain decorations for gallantry, or recognition or reward for services of merit.

This section applies only to any "pecuniary benefit of the same nature as the gratuity or credit payable or which is granted under this act." That is, if another country grants a war service gratuity or a reestablishment credit, then the provision is that one-half of those benefits would be deducted from the gratuity and one-half from the credit, when the member of the forces is drawing gratuity here.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I find it difficult to understand what "of the same nature" means. After all, this is given for a number of different reasons. I am only bringing this matter to the minister's attention for the sake of clarity.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me say to my hon. friend for his comfort that I have another legal opinion. That makes two lawyers on this side of the house who agree that "of the same nature" does not refer to pecuniary benefits or grants in respect of decorations.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is very interesting, two opinions on the other side.

Mr. RALSTON: But they are both of the same mind.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But both may be bad lawyers. However, I will leave it to the minister, having stated my opinion. I just wanted to be sure.

Mr. CHURCH: Would this section apply to gratuities of the same nature paid by other countries such as Russia and the United States? Some of our soldiers are having the difference between their army pay and what they receive in civil life made up by the municipalities or corporations for which they worked. For example, the municipality or corporation would give them $3.70 which, with their army pay of $1.30, would bring them up to the $5 they were earning in civil life. As I understand it, there is no deduction on account of these pecuniary benefits in Canada. Many of our soldiers are firemen and policemen, with pension and gratuity funds of their own. Lever Brothers, for instance, have a great system of helping soldiers, giving benefits and credits of all kinds. It is the finest system in Canada. That will not be interfered with under this section?

Mr. RALSTON: Not at all. This applies only to grants by governments in respect of service with other than Canadian forces.

Mr. ROWE: The latter part of this section states:

> in respect of service performed with the naval, military or air forces of any such dominion or power, one-half of the amount of such benefits shall be deducted from the gratuity and one-half from the credit.

Suppose a soldier does not take advantage of the reestablishment credit and takes only his gratuity. He gets certain pecuniary benefits as have been mentioned. If he does not take the reestablishment credit I doubt whether one-half of the benefits he receives from the government of any associated power should be deducted from his gratuity.

Mr. RALSTON: I admit that it was an arbitrary division. They said: You must not take it all from the gratuity or all from the reestablishment credit. So that it is taken half from each. If a man has received a gratuity or credit, perhaps both, from some force with which he has served for the time being, we do not want to give him a double credit or gratuity. Then the question comes, how to apply the deduction and the rough and ready way to apply it is to take it half from the gratuity and half from the reestablishment credit.

Mr. ROWE: That seems too rough and ready.

Mr. RALSTON: There would be no other way in which we could do it without meticulous accounting. We cannot tell what particular sort of benefit it would be.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the minister anything specific in mind? I cannot imagine how anything like this would come up.

Mr. ROWE: Many men may not take the reestablishment credit at all. They might get some other pecuniary benefits instead. In that case I do not think we should deduct one-half from the gratuity. I think the section should be amended accordingly.

Mr. MUTCH: The bill expressly provides that a man has ten years within which to elect whether he will take reestablishment credit, and no soldier can say until the end of the ten years that he is not going to take the benefit of the reestablishment credit.

Mr. RALSTON: The reestablishment credit has a definite dollar value, and you take it off the maximum credit.

Mr. ROWE: Off whatever credit would be available?

Mr. RALSTON: That is it.

Section agreed to.

Section 16 agreed to.

On section 17—Persons of Canadian domicile who serve in other commonwealth forces.

Mr. HOMUTH: This is a clause that I think needs clarification with regard to the question of domicile. What position are the men going to be in who left Canada and went over to England in 1936, 1937, 1938 or 1939 and enlisted in the Royal Air Force, served throughout the war and then came back here? Under this clause they would not be domiciled in Canada and they would not come under this provision. Yet one of the other acts that we passed granted to men in the like circumstances all the preferences given to members of the Canadian forces. Surely we should not debar these men from the benefits of this legislation because they went over to England between the years 1936 to 1939, and incidentally they were the backbone of the Royal Air Force in the darkest days of the war. We should not bar them from these gratuities.

Mr. ADAMSON: This would bar all the men of the permanent force who were outside Canada.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to support what the hon. member for Waterloo South has just said. I know of my own knowledge several men who did that very thing, some enlisting in the Royal Air Force, some in the British navy. They were not domiciled in Canada in 1939.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend says that, but is it correct? Did they leave Canada to take up their domicile somewhere else?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): They went over there to join the Royal Air Force or British navy because they thought the war was coming on.

Mr. RALSTON: That does not mean that they changed their domicile.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): They were not domiciled in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly they were unless they intended not to return.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Not in 1939.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Certainly.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Clarify that.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend asserted positively that they were not domiciled in Canada. Domicile means that a man leaves his country intending to make his home somewhere else, or, putting it the other way, not intending to return. Did these men leave under those circumstances? If they did, why should they have a gratuity now from Canada? The point is, they did not leave with that purpose. Therefore, they were domiciled in Canada in September, 1939.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not know what "domiciled" means.

Mr. RALSTON: I know that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, I do not know, and all I am asking for is a clarification. These men went over to join the Royal Air Force, or the navy over there, because they believed that war was coming; not only that, but because they could not get into the forces here. You have to give them some consideration. As I understand it, the term "domicile" ordinarily means if you leave the country for a whole year, or something like that, you are out.

Mr. RALSTON: You can leave for five years and not lose your domicile.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): So long as that is clear.

Mr. RALSTON: I mean that you can leave for five years and not lose your domicile if you have not intended to lose it, but you can leave for ten minutes and lose your domicile if you leave with the intention of not returning. But I rather take it, from what I understand about these men, that they did not intend to deprive themselves of their Canadian domicile. They simply went for the express and very laudable purpose of taking part in the war. Those are the men we are providing for here. If, however, they left—I say this seriously—to take up their domicile in the United Kingdom or some other country with whose forces they became associated, I do not think it would be quite fair to have them come back some time and take a Canadian gratuity. That is the point. The whole question is, are they Canadians over there or are they Britishers in respect of their permanent home?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): My other question is this. I know of two of these men who married English wives.

Mr. RALSTON: There are a lot of Canadians over there who have done that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am only talking about two, but there must be dozens of others. Is there any danger of their not coming under these benefits? That is all I want to know.

Mr. HOMUTH: What I had in mind when I asked the minister the question was that a number of boys left my riding to join the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force. In joining those branches of the service from 1936 to 1939, did they have to make any declaration or take any oath which might imply that they abandoned their domicile?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. HOMUTH: All I want to be satisfied of is that these men who joined the British service, but with the intention of eventually coming back, have not lost their domicile.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I point out that a number of the boys who enlisted in the Royal Air Force went over to take the short service commissions, and we made special provision for them under the Pension Act amendments of 1941. I gave a press release with regard to the benefits. Under order in council P.C. 7633 we took the view that any Canadian boy who left Canada two or three or even four years prior to the outbreak of the war for the purpose of enlisting in His Majesty's imperial forces and returns to Canada upon his discharge will not have forfeited his domicile for the purposes of this order. Is that clear?

Mr. HOMUTH: Yes, that is perfectly clear to me, but I wonder if such a regulation could be put in this bill.

Mr. RALSTON: I think we must distinguish clearly. We are trying to benefit Canadians; that is really what this bill is for; and if a chap left here with intent to make his permanent home in another country he is not domiciled in Canada.

Mr. HOMUTH: No. Well, I do not think they did that.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think that man, no matter how laudable his services, should be entitled to come back here and reside here and say, "I am entitled to the Canadian war service gratuity because I have changed my mind and I intend to live here." But the man who left with intent to return is clearly domiciled in Canada, and that is the man we refer to when we say that the member of the forces who was domiciled in Canada on the 10th day of September, the day the war broke out, can come back and receive the benefits of the bill. As a matter of fact, that man could stay in the service over there for a good many years, then be discharged, and if he comes back within one year after his discharge he will be entitled to have the difference made up between the gratuity he receives there and the gratuity which is provided for in Canada.

Mr. HOMUTH: I just wanted that clear.

Mr. CHURCH: There is something in section 17 to which I think the minister has not referred. I want to find out the definition of the word "commonwealth". This section applies to His Majesty's forces in the other dominions and dependencies and colonies, but there is one mistake, which I point out to the minister. He includes in the marginal note the word "commonwealth". That is not in the bill; it says, "other forces of His Majesty". You have covered all these men who went to England for service in the military forces, as regards gratuities from the various dominions, but you have not included the crown colonies and the dependencies. There are Canadians serving in the far east. The word "commonwealth" in the marginal note cannot be read into the section.

Mr. RALSTON: No, not the marginal note.

Mr. CHURCH: Are all His Majesty's forces covered?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: Everybody?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: I take it then that this section does not exclude officers who have taken imperial commissions from the Royal Military College?

Mr. RALSTON: I am saying, if they had the intention to return to Canada.

Mr. ADAMSON: But I understand it is a seven-year course, is it not?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know.

Mr. ADAMSON: Who is going to be a judge of whether that was or was not the intention?

Mr. RALSTON: They could give evidence themselves as to their intention.

Section agreed to.

Section 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Gratuities and credits to be additional to certain other benefits.

Mr. ROWE: Is any provision made for those who have already been discharged, with reference to the change in the rate of allowances for clothing, to equalize conditions?

Mr. RALSTON: No. No provision of that kind has been made with regard to clothing allowance.

Mr. ROWE: A change has been made in the amount to be given.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; it has been increased to $100.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They are entitled to all the other benefits.

Mr. ADAMSON: The allowance of $100 comes into effect as of August 1st?

Mr. RALSTON: For all ranks.

Section agreed to.

Sections 20 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We now revert to section 4, which stood over.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member for Lake Centre raised the question as to whether the discretion of the minister might not be used to exclude a dependent from the benefit of the gratuity or the balance of the gratuity in case the soldier had become a fatal casualty. I have had the section redrafted. I sent over a copy to my hon. friend a little while ago and I received his assent; he has not initialed it, but he nodded to me to indicate that it is all right. I ask my colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health to move the amendment. I think the new section is really a good deal clearer. It provides that the balance of the gratuity may be paid either to a person in respect of whom dependents' allowance was being paid or a person in respect of whom it would have been payable had there not been a C.W.A.C. provision such as I spoke about, or a person to whom pay has been assigned, and that the discretion of the minister shall be exercised to determine to which one of these it is payable or to make a division between them and, as in the section now, to designate a person to receive payment in certain cases if he thinks proper.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It has been moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that section 4 be deleted, and the following be substituted therefor:

If a member of the forces dies on service or after discharge but before he has been paid war service gratuity in full, payment of the gratuity or the unpaid balance thereof shall be made to a person to whom or in respect of whom dependents allowance was payable on behalf of such member immediately prior to his death or would have been payable if such person had not been a member of the forces or to a dependent to whom pay was assigned by him. If more than one person is entitled to payment of the gratuity under this section the minister may direct that the gratuity be paid to any one of such persons or divide it among them in such manner as he may determine: provided however that the minister may in any case designate a person to receive payment of the gratuity and utilize the same for the benefit of the person entitled thereto in such manner as the designated person in his discretion may determine.

Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Mr. MacNICOL: I will neither oppose it nor support it. I cannot understand it from the way in which it has been read, and not having a copy in my hand, I must say that it has no effect as far as I am concerned.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I had only two copies and they were prepared in a hurry. I sent one over to the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. MacNICOL: He has been on the train for the last hour and that does not help the rest of us to understand it.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. RALSTON: We have been discussing, I may say frankly, the matter of the date of coming into force of the bill. We have been discussing with the officials the possibilities of getting ready for it, and what I suggest is that there be another section, section 25, to provide that the bill shall come into force on the first day of October, 1944. In consultation with the deputy minister of pensions and my own officials I think we ought to have that time at least, and that will be short enough.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why not earlier?

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: It is not in connection with the boys overseas but in connection with a hundred thousand or more who have been discharged in Canada, and it is a matter of getting organization started. That will be soon enough. We thought of proclamation, but I thought perhaps the committee would much prefer to have a fixed date.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move:

That section 25 be added, as follows:
"This act shall come into force on and from the first day of October, 1944."

Section agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I suggest that it is most important that the regulations be given the fullest possible publicity so that all returned men will know what the whole thing is about. I suggest that the regulations be tabled and published in the Canada Gazette so that members of parliament will understand what they are. Returned men come to members asking questions, and we are not in a position to answer those questions unless we are fully informed. It is important that something be done in this regard.

Mr. RALSTON: I assure my hon. friend that the regulations will be completed, drafted, published and made available to members and the public at the earliest possible date. It must be remembered that there is a heavy load ahead of officials undertaking the drafting of the regulations and all the rest of it, but not a moment will be lost in that connection.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the minister not think it would be a good idea to have a section in the bill providing that variations in the regulations from time to time shall be published in the Canada Gazette?

Mr. RALSTON: They will be.

Mr. McNIVEN: Has any arrangement been made or will any be made to see that a copy of the bill is placed in the hands of every member of the armed forces? This is a splendid piece of legislation, and I think definite steps should be taken to see that every member of the forces obtains a copy of it. We hear constantly that men and women overseas are inquiring and worrying about what will be done for them, what they are coming back to. I believe that the provisions of this legislation would go a long way toward allaying feelings of that kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Much better than sending the legal document comprising an act of parliament, I think a digest of this will be sent to the troops as soon as possible to supplement one million copies of "Back to Civil Life" which have already been sent to the army and to next of kin, besides 500,000 more copies which are in process of being printed. All necessary features of this legislation will be incorporated in the next edition of the booklet.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Air service—radio division—

403. Administration of the Radio Telegraph Act and regulations, $136,880.

Mr. HOMUTH: Last night when the committee rose I asked that this item be held over. Something was said last night with regard to the situation at Halifax and the broadcasting station there, which I believe needs some clarification. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party read into the record a statement made by Doctor Frigon of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. From the evidence taken in the radio committee and the statement made last night by the minister one wonders whether there is not an Ethiopian somewhere in the woodpile. The picture apparently is that an application for a broadcasting station must be made to the Department of Transport. That application would then be submitted to the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which would make a recommendation one way or the other. That recommendation would then come back to the Minister of Transport, and he has the power either to accept or to reject the recommendation. I understand that the Halifax Chronicle made an application for the right to establish a broadcasting station in that city; and I believe they were granted a licence but did not go ahead with the construction of the station. It was stated definitely by Doctor Frigon that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation intended to erect a station in Halifax. Rumour says they went so far as to bring the equipment there for that purpose. Anyway, a great deal of the equipment is there. The impression was left with hon. members that this station would likely be ready by the end of the year. According to the remarks made last night there is no record of an application by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to erect a broadcasting station in Halifax. Although apparently no record of the application exists, yet Doctor Frigon says that such an application was made and that such a station is to be constructed. The application of the Halifax Chronicle is on file and has been passed on. I understand that they are hunting around to get the necessary material to construct the station. There is no record of the existence of an application from this great public ownership enterprise, this enterprise that Doctor Frigon has said on so many occasions can be so valuable to this country, and that makes one wonder just a little. I say this very seriously. Is the future of this great public ownership enterprise to be jeopardized to some extent for political expediency and that men who have strong leanings toward the government and a newspaper that has strong leanings toward the government are to get preferenec over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which is a nationally owned enterprise?

We have been told on many occasions by the Prime Minister and the minister in charge of this enterprise that it must be kept out of politics, that it must be kept separate and distinct from politics. We have been told of the great value it can be to the people. When we see such a picture as I have described, it makes one wonder if politics have not entered into the picture somewhere. The question is, is the Halifax Chronicle to build the station there, or is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to build the station? I believe we should get a definite answer on what is happening in Nova Scotia.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I admit at once that I was in error when I spoke last evening. I said at that time that to the best of my recollection the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had not made an application for a wave length to the Department of Transport under this item. My officers called my attention to the fact that an application had been made and had been granted as of March 27, 1944, for a station of 100 watts on a wave length of 1,240 kilocycles. I had forgotten the fact. But actually the application was granted and is in good standing in favour of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. My officials tell me that the same difficulties which interfere with most broadcasting stations, namely, shortage of material and other difficulties, are responsible for delay. The matter is still under consideration but has not been brought to the final stage. My hon. friend is suggesting that there is some relation between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation application and the Halifax Chronicle application. There is no relation whatever. It is not unusual to have three radio stations in a city the size of Halifax. The Halifax Chronicle application dates back to July 24, 1938, and was again renewed and recommended by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation under date of July 4, 1944. The two are quite separate. The fact that neither of them is proceeding very rapidly is owing to the fact that it is imposible to obtain certain materials for broadcasting stations on account of war priorities.

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister will realize that as a result of his announcement last night it did look strange.

Mr. HOWE: Quite so; I apologize for the error.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In connection with the surveys that have been made on wave lengths and broadcasting in general, were they made by the minister's department or by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, or how were they made?

Mr. HOWE: The survey that my hon. friend is referring to is, I believe, a survey of coverage. That was made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was not referring to a survey of coverage. I was referring to a survey of frequencies and of the whole general picture. Was that made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or by the minister's department?

Mr. HOWE: My department polices wave lengths and frequencies. If it has anything to do with wave lengths and frequencies under the Havana agreement, such a survey would be made by the department of which I am minister. If it is a survey in connection with coverage it would be made by the C.B.C. under the broadcasting act.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have in mind a survey of the frequencies which can be allotted under the Havana agreement. What have we left in Canada; how many stations can we still have? Does that come under the minister's department? We were told in the committee that the judgment in connection with these matters was part of the job of the C.B.C.; that they had to be careful not to infringe upon the rights of the United States under the Havana agreement, and so on, although we know the power of the United States stations has been going up all the time. We have been told that the power of the United States stations was frozen in 1942; yet we hear that permits for increased power have been granted like nobody's business. The power of our stations was frozen at 1,000 watts. My opinion, and that of a great many engineers in Canada, is that Canada has lost a good deal by the freezing of the power of our stations. No one thinks more of the C.B.C. than I do. I believe it is well run. I thought the set-up under which we had a board of governors, a chairman who had to do with policy, and a general manager who looked after matters of administration and who could delegate power, was ideal. I understand, as a matter of fact, that many months ago a recommendation was sent forward by the board of governors of the C.B.C. requesting the appointment of a general manager, although I am not absolutely sure of that.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I interrupt my hon. friend to say that he is wrong?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister says that he has never received such a recommendation from the board of governors, and of course I accept his word. Now we are trying to create a new set-up, to fit the people we already have there. That is not the way to run a business. I believe the C.B.C. is run very well—

Mr. HOWE: I would point out that this item has nothing to do with the C.B.C. and how it is run.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I quite agree with the minister, but I am pointing out that the minister has to do with such matters as frequencies and the allotment of channels. Those matters come under him entirely, and the C.B.C. has nothing to do with them. It is the job of the broadcasting corporation to say whether there shall be one, two or three radio stations in one town, but the decision as to how we shall use our channels and our power, so that the public may derive the greatest advantage, is something for the Department of Transport. We have stations in Canada whose power has been kept down, and which could render much greater service if they are allowed to increase their power. They would not interfere with the C.B.C. at all; on the contrary they would help it. I want to make sure that all our channels are not usurped by the country to the south, and there is no doubt that our rights are being encroached upon at the present time.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to say a few words in connection with the matter brought up by the hon. member for Waterloo South. I am not as convinced of the correctness of the minister's answer as the hon. member apparently was, since he has now left the chamber. Personally I think there is something wrong in the Halifax situation. Everyone was pleased a few days ago when we learned that the personnel of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were being jacked up by the appointment of a new general manager, a new assistant manager and a permanent full-time chairman, at a great deal of expense to the taxpayers of Canada. We all approved that because we felt that this organization was very important and capable, and should be staffed by full-time officials. If that assumption is correct, and this committee is justified in voting money for the upkeep of that organization—

Mr. HOWE: This committee does not vote any money for the C.B.C.

Mr. GILLIS: The committee votes it.

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GILLIS: It does not operate on nothing.

Mr. HOWE: They collect fees from the listeners.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, those fees certainly do not cover the total expenditures of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The point I am getting at is that if it is the policy of the Canadian government to develop the airways of Canada along the lines suggested by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, then the advice of the technical officials should receive attention by those who are cooperating through the issuing of licences, and so forth. The whole set-up should work together. I was surprised to find on reading Hansard this morning that the minister was not aware of the fact that a licence had been granted to the C.B.C. for a station in Halifax, although I was glad to hear him clarify the position to-night. Of course I am not holding that little mistake against him; we are all liable to slip when speaking from memory. The point I am concerned about, however, is that radio reception in Nova Scotia from a provincial point of view leaves much to be desired, and we all want to improve it.

I was particularly pleased when on June 28 Doctor Frigon announced a second outlet for the city of Halifax. I was informed from a reliable source that a transmitter had been installed and that it could be put into operation on three hours' notice. The only thing holding it up, I understood, was the passing of an order in council to enable the work to go forward. I was led to believe that as far as the C.B.C. was concerned there was no shortage of the materials necessary to carry out the recommendation of Doctor Frigon. People in Novia Scotia became concerned as to when this second outlet might be expected to commence operations. Then we were informed that a licence granted back in 1938 to the Halifax Chronicle, which had been allowed to lapse, had been revived. It is significant to me that while the C.B.C. licence was granted in March, as pointed out by the minister, it was not until July of this year that the Halifax Chronicle revived the possibility of going into that business.

I do not care how many private stations are operated in Nova Scotia; that is the business of those who want to put money into that game. But the recommendation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its acting general manager is the business of parliament and the Canadian people. I do not visualize any service to the people of Nova Scotia, from the point of view of better radio reception or better service for that province, from the station proposed by the Halifax Chronicle. I am not concerned about that; it is their business. I am convinced that the statement of the hon. member for Waterloo South is correct, that their concern is to augment the work of their newspaper and to promote whatever politics they may be interested in. We have not any jurisdiction over them. What they will use that radio for will be their own business, but we do have jurisdiction over the C.B.C. Would the minister inform the committee if it is correct or otherwise that a transmitter has been installed at Halifax, and that it could be put into operation within three or four hours by the C.B.C. If the operation of the C.B.C. station is to depend upon the securing of material by these other people, I do not think it will be possible to get that material to-day.

My information, from a reliable source, is that the people who are endeavouring to use the old franchise granted to the Halifax Chronicle have been dickering for a second-hand set of equipment at Edmonton, Alberta. That is their own business. But I should like to be assured by the minister that the hold-up in the C.B.C. station at Halifax, which means a public service for that province, and one recommended by the general manager of the company, is not for the purpose of enhancing the possibilities of establishing other stations.

I am looking for information. Can the people of Nova Scotia within a reasonable length of time expect the implementing of the decision made by the responsible head of the C.B.C.? The minister's statement that a city like Halifax requires three radio stations is, I think, ridiculous. That is not necessary in a city of that size. But if someone wishes to spend money, and fool around with it, that is their own business. However, a time of war, when equipment is hard to get, and when personnel is scarce, owing to the requirements of the armed services, is not the time for local, private people to experiment, or to enter the game of radio.

I have had some confidence in the C.B.C., and in all these projects the government is slowly developing for the betterment of the Canadian people. I like to support those projects; but I hate to think that for the sake of promoting the interests of a particular group in Canada, progress in that field would be set to one side. I do not know the story but the minister should know it. If there is any truth in the statement that that transmitter is in Halifax, and that the order in council is being held back because of political pressure, it will shatter my confidence in the future development of radio in Canada, under government management. If that statement is not true, then it should be clarified. Would the minister give us some idea as to the correctness or otherwise of the fears I have expressed?

Mr. HOWE: May I make it clear once more that my duty is to administer the Radio Act. That act has nothing to do with broadcasting. It is the custodian of wave lengths assigned to Canada under the Havana agreement, and from time to time it issues radio licences assigning certain wave lengths, always on the recommendation of the C.B.C.

So far as Halifax is concerned, there has been one licence outstanding there for some time. In 1938 a licence was applied for, was recommended by the C.B.C. and was issued by my department. At the outbreak of war, possibly because of the difficulty of obtaining materials, that licence lapsed and was no longer outstanding. I found out this morning something I did not know yesterday, namely, that we did receive an application from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation some two or three months ago, that the licence was approved by the technical officers, and that it was issued to the C.B.C. Since that time we have received application for the restoration of the wave length previously granted to the Halifax Chronicle. After that application was referred to the C.B.C. it was recommended favourably by that organization, and the wave length was issued to the Halifax Chronicle. So that there are outstanding at the present time three wave lengths assigned to three radio stations in the city of Halifax. That is all I know about the situation.

I have had no association with the C.B.C. for a number of years. Whether they have equipment on the ground or whether they have not, I have not the faintest idea. I know there are a number of wave lengths which have been assigned over the last two or three years, and I know that none of those wave lengths is on the air, for the simple reason that it is impossible to obtain equipment. I will correct that by saying that fifteen wave lengths have been assigned since the beginning of the war, that six of them are on the air, and that the remaining nine are not on the air because they cannot obtain equipment. That is the information we have in this branch, and that is all the information I can give hon. members.

I would point out that the discussion affecting the C.B.C. should be on another item.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There have been many applications for increased power?

Mr. HOWE: A great many of them have been granted.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Have they been granted to a maximum of their power? A year ago the radio committee recommended in its report that stations should be encouraged to come up to their full power under the Havana agreement. Is it within the power of the Department of Transport to say whether they should come up to their full power, because we were told in the radio committee that there was a certain amount of interference. Who has jurisdiction in the matter?

Mr. HOWE: There again the Department of Transport would issue the power permissible on each wave length, but as a matter of policy it accepts the advice of the C.B.C. The policy of the C.B.C. up to two or three months ago was that private stations should be limited to one kilowatt. Some two months ago, I believe it was, that policy was revised, possibly on the advice of the radio committee, and a recommendation was made to us that the one-kilowatt stations be stepped up to five kilowatts, provided that the wave length would permit a five-kilowatt station. We accepted that recommendation, and permits have been issued to those stations to go up to five kilowatts. I do not think any of them have increased, for the reason I gave before, namely the impossibility of buying equipment at this time. But as soon as the equipment is available I believe every one-kilowatt station will step up to five kilowatts, provided that it is on a wave length where a step-up is permissible.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister will understand that the Havana agreement will not last forever. I have forgotten when it runs out. But in order to protect our wave lengths we must be up to our power requirements on these stations, or else we shall not have bargaining power at a later time. I do not understand why the stations were allowed to go up to five kilowatts. I think some of them might have gone up to three, others to four, others to ten, others to fifty, and so on. That is why I asked as to who made the survey. I understand that a survey was made by the C.B.C. Who made it? We have dual control here.

Mr. HOWE: No survey was necessary. We know exactly what the permissible power is on every wave length in Canada. That is fixed under the Havana agreement. I think my hon. friend will not quarrel with the principle that the C.B.C. should set the policy so far as the power of broadcasting stations in Canada is concerned. If he accepts that principle I think he will admit that we are carrying out the proper policy in connection with the radio stations in Canada. I should like to take my hon. friend's advice, but we decided to take the advice of the C.B.C.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not put myself up as being an engineer, but I happen to know a little about the matter. There are a great many engineers in this country and there is great apprehension among them that we are losing channels. I do not know how complete the survey has been. I do not know why we should put these stations up to five kilowatts all at once. I do not understand that at all. Different districts in the country, as the minister knows, are being treated in different ways. Last night I was listening to the radio in my room in this building and I could get only about two or three stations in Canada, but I could get plenty of stations in the United States. I got Schenectady and New York without any trouble. Are we using our power in this country to the fullest extent? I am all in favour of private broadcasting stations. What we have to do is to see that our facilities are used to the full in order to give the people of Canada the service to which they are entitled.

Item agreed to.

Air service—radio division—

406. Issue of radio receiving licences—(Transport department only), $205,220.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We collected a little over $4,000,000 in licence fees last year and it cost the department $205,000 to collect that. It also cost the C.B.C. something. Altogether it cost $536,000 to collect $4,000,000 in licence fees. The principle in the old days was correct, that those who used the radio should pay for it, but that principle to-day is out of date. There are plenty of people who do not have a radio but who listen to radio. Not only that, but the man who has only a $25 radio has to pay a licence fee of $2.50 just the same as the man who owns a $250 radio. The principle is wrong.

Mr. HOWE: The same kind of music comes out of both sets.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And the man who has no radio at all hears the same kind of music over the radio because everybody listens to radio. I ask the minister if he thinks it is economic to spend $536,000 to collect $4,000,000 in licence fees. Yet those are the figures. How long would the Dominion of Canada last if it cost us in the same proportion to collect our taxes? Not only is the principle of the licence fee outmoded, but it is just a nuisance tax to have these fellows coming around to your place and asking, "Have you your radio licence for this year?" The Department of Transport are also broadcasting over the radio: "Your licence is overdue and please go in and get it for this year; if you do not, we will take you to court and sue you for the $2.50." The whole situation is ridiculous. Imagine spending $536,000 to collect $4,000,000! What nonsense! The cost of collection is nearly twenty per cent. If you want to continue this licence fee system, why not collect it on the number of radios each man has? If he has five radios let him pay on five radios. Or the fee could be based on the value of the radio. But there is no fairness in the present system and it ought to be done away with immediately. That is all there is to it.

Mr. HANSELL: Does not the revenue from the licence fees pay for the cost of collection? Why should we vote an additional sum?

Mr. HOWE: The sum has to be voted by parliament under the government accounting system. The equivalent is paid to the receiver general of Canada. It is recoverable, just like many other items.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

Office of the coal controller—

Coal subsidies and subventions—

174. Dominion fuel board, administration and investigations, $32,120.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not know whether it is proper to ask this question under this item, but has there been any change in the coal situation in Canada? It has been causing considerable worry. Could the minister make a statement on the coal supplies for next winter?

Mr. HOWE: The coal situation is very difficult. It becomes increasingly difficult each year. We hope to have sufficient bituminous coal, but anthracite coal will be very short and we shall have to use great ingenuity in using coke and other substitutes for anthracite. I think we shall be able to protect the bituminous situation; I think our industries will be safe, but we ask householders to economize in every possible way and to use coal carefully and cooperate with us in using such substitutes for anthracite coal as we are able to make available.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There are people who use bituminous coal in their household furnaces. Would it be possible to have coils installed in furnaces to help out the coal situation?

Mr. HOWE: We are making the material available as far as we can, but I cannot say that everyone will be able to get it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think it would be one way of helping out the coal shortage.

Item agreed to.

Office of the coal controller—
Coal subsidies and subventions—
175. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council, $4,500,000.

Mr. HANSELL: We cannot pass an item of $4,500,000 in a few minutes. It is nearly eleven o'clock.

Mr. HOMUTH: We have been sitting here since eleven this morning. How long is this item going to take?

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps we might compromise and take the item if it is not going to take long, but if it is going to take any length of time I think we should rise because we have had a heavy day.

Mr. HOWE: This is a routine item voted each year.

Mr. HANSELL: Almost the entire coal industry depends on this one item. It is a matter of the payment of subsidies, and some of us would like to discuss the coal situation as we see it to-day in relation to this subvention and what is to happen in the future. We have not the time to discuss that in two or three minutes.

Mr. HOWE: This same item has been voted previously, but owing to the fact that the coal does not move the distances which it did move, only about $1,800,000 was spent last year. I think there is no great principle involved. It is a principle which is capable of moving coal from Cape Breton to the eastern part of Quebec and from the prairies into Toronto, but it is not possible to move the coal, for reasons other than the subsidy. Ample money is provided, but I cannot think of anything which can be usefully discussed under this item.

Mr. HANSELL: The fact is that it is the only item under which we can discuss the coal industry, because were it not for these subventions there would be no coal industry in Canada.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. It is now after eleven o'clock, and if this is going to take any time I certainly think the committee should rise. I know I cannot stand this heat any longer.

Mr. HOWE: Why does the hon. member not discuss it, if he wishes to discuss it?

Mr. HANSELL: I can discuss it if the minister wants to wait a little while.

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Go ahead.

Mr. GILLIS: I would not have any objection to letting this go through, because the possibilities are that the minister wants to leave town, or something, over the week-end, and wishes to get this through. There is an item under mines and resources for research into fuels. I think we could discuss anything under that item.

Mr. HANSELL: If the minister will give us that undertaking, that is all right.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Saturday, August 12, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

WAR EXPENDITURES COMMITTEE

Second, third, fourth, fifth and sixth reports of special committee on war expenditures.—Mr. Cleaver.

SELECTIVE SERVICE

MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS—CALL-UPS, POSTPONEMENTS, ETC.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table statement concerning mobilization of men in the designated age classes as requested by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) as reported in Hansard at page 2509.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO ADJOURN TO JANUARY 31, 1945, ON COMPLETION OF CURRENT BUSINESS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I should like to make a motion similar to that which I have made at the conclusion of each session during the period of the war. Hon. members will see in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday that I have given notice of the motion. It is:

That when this house adjourns, on completion of current business of the session, it stand adjourned until Wednesday, January 31, 1945, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with His Majesty's government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I take it from the wording of the motion that there is nothing therein to prevent dissolution in the meantime.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is nothing about dissolution in the motion.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN FORCES

DECORATIONS FOR GALLANTRY—CANADIAN ARMY

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): May I with the permission of the house lay on the table the names of 423 members of the Canadian Army to whom honours and awards for gallantry in action and devotion to duty have been granted by His Majesty; and I would ask that, as has become the practice, these names be given a permanent record in Hansard.

It will be recalled that on March 6 I submitted a list of 481 awards to the house. The list I am presenting to-day comprises the honours and awards conferred on the members of the Canadian Army since that date. The house will perhaps be especially interested in this list because there are in it 107 awards for gallantry which are being published this morning for the first time. They include 17 awards of the Distinguished Service Order, two bars to the Military Cross, 27 Military Crosses, four Distinguished Conduct Medals, and 17 Military Medals.

Without making any invidious comparisons, I am pleased to call the attention of the house to the fact that one of these four new D.C.M.'s, that is the Distinguished Conduct Medal, goes to a private soldier, Private G.22945, G. S. Clark, Ferry Road, New Brunswick. I may say that this award to others than non-commissioned officers is far from common and is regarded as showing exceptional qualities of leadership. The whole list which I present to-day, including 107 which have not been published before, takes in 392 operational awards for gallantry in action and 31 non-operational awards.

Summary of Awards

Operational
Victoria Cross	1
Bar to Distinguished Service Order	6
Distinguished Service Order	29
Bar to Military Cross	2
Military Cross	55
Distinguished Conduct Medal	9
Military Medal	125
Mentions in Despatches	157
		384
Foreign Awards		8
		392
Non-Operational
George Cross	1
Member of the Order of the British Empire	4
British Empire Medal	24
Commendations	2
		31
		423

	Number of awards pub. in Hansard No. 26 of 6th Mar., 1944	Present report	Totals
Operational	393	392	785
Non-Operational	88	31	119
Totals	481	423	904

Appendix "A"

Operational Gallantary Awards

Victoria Cross (V.C.)
Bar to Distinguished Service Order
Distinguished Service Order (D.S.O.)
Bar to Military Cross
Military Cross (M.C.)
Distinguished Conduct Medal (D.C.M.)
Military Medal (M.M.)
Mentions in Despatches
Foreign Awards

The Victoria Cross (V.C.)

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

Major J. K. Mahony, Canadian Infantry Corps, 313 5th St., New Westminster, B.C.

Bar to Distinguished Service Order

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

Brigadier H. D. Graham, D.S.O., E.D., Trenton, Ont.

Brigadier B. M. Hoffmeister, D.S.O., E.D., 4749 Belmont Ave., Vancouver, B.C.

Lt.-Col. J. C. Jefferson, D.S.O., E.D., Canadian Infantry Corps, 11319-79th St., Edmonton, Alta.

Lt.-Col. E. L. Booth, D.S.O., Canadian Armoured Corps, Penetanguishene, Ont.

Major G. A. Welsh, D.S.O., The Royal Canadian Artillery, Sunderland, Ont.

Second Bar to Distinguished Service Order

Brigadier (A/Maj.-Gen.) B. M. Hoffmeister, D.S.O., E.D., 4749 Belmont Ave., Vancouver, B.C.

The Distinguished Service Order (D.S.O.)

Major (A/Lt.-Col.) J. V. Allard, Canadian Infantry Corps, 512 rue Bureau, Trois Rivieres, P.Q.

Major (A/Lt.-Col.) A. A. Kennedy, Canadian Infantry Corps, 510 Ninth St., Owen Sound, Ont.

Major S. W. Thomson, M.C., Canadian Infantry Corps, Salmon Arm, B.C.

Lieut. (A/Capt.) J. F. McLean, Canadian Infantry Corps, Penticton, B.C.

Lt.-Col. W. P. Gilbride, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 7 Brock Ave., N. Montreal West, P.Q.

Major J. C. P. Mills, Canadian Armoured Corps, 138 Grande Alles, Quebec, P.Q.

Major D. E. Walker, Canadian Infantry Corps, 822-8th Avenue N., Saskatoon, Sask.

Capt. (A/Major) J. C. Clarke, Canadian Infantry Corps, Bond Lake, Oak Ridges Post Office, Ont.

Lt.-Col. J. S. Ross, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 32 Elmsthorpe Ave., Toronto, Ont.

Col. (A/Brigadier) D. C. Spry, Canadian Infantry Corps, St. Johns, P.Q.

Lt. Col. (A/Brigadier) W. S. Zeigler, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 10917-81st Ave., Edmonton, Alta.

Lt.-Col. P. G. Griffin, Canadian Armoured Corps, 465 Avenue Rd., Toronto, Ont.

Brigadier K. G. Blackader, M.C., E.D., Montreal, P.Q.

Lt.-Col. D. B. Buell, Canadian Infantry Corps, Kingston, Ont.

Lt.-Col. F. N. Cabeldu, E.D., Canadian Infantry Corps, Kelowna, B.C.

Lt.-Col. R. J. Colwell, E.D., Canadian Armoured Corps, Halifax, N.S.

Lt.-Col F. M. Matheson, E.D., Canadian Infantry Corps, 336 East 11th St., Prince Albert, Sask.

Lt.-Col. J. G. Spragge, O.B.E., E.D., Canadian Infantry Corps, 206 Heath St. W., Toronto, Ont.

Major W. R. Bray, Canadian Armoured Corps, Fort Francis, Ont.

Major W. D. Brooks, Canadian Armoured Corps, Brantford, Ont.

Major C. O. Dalton, Canadian Infantry Corps, 536 Castlefield Ave., Toronto, Ont.

Major R. H. Daughney, Canadian Infantry Corps, 351 University Ave., Fredericton, N.B.

Major R. B. Forbes, Canadian Infantry Corps, 86 Gray St., Fredericton, N.B.

Major F. A. McTavish, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 10 Trafalgar Place, Montreal, P.Q.

Major H. A. Procter, Canadian Infantry Corps, 46b Geneva St., Ottawa, Ont.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Major J G. Sevigny, Canadian Infantry Corps, Plessisville, Que.

Major V. O. Walsh, Canadian Armoured Corps, 4801 Grosvenor Ave., Montreal, P.Q.

Major McG. Young, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 48 Delisle Ave., Toronto, Ont.

Major L. R. Fulton, Canadian Infantry Corps, Birtle, Manitoba.

Bar to Military Cross

Capt. W. H. V. Matthews, M.C., Canadian Infantry Corps, Southern Milnes Landing, Vancouver Island, B.C.

Second Bar to Military Cross

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

Capt. N. B. Buchanan, M.C., The Royal Canadian Artillery, St. Stephen, N.B.

The Military Cross (M.C.)

Capt. (A/Major) E. W. Smith, Canadian Armoured Corps, 42 Colin Avenue, Toronto, Ont.

Capt. (A/Major) J. R. Stone, Canadian Infantry Corps, Edmonton, Alta.

Capt. (A/Major) W. DeN. Watson, Canadian Infantry Corps, Banff, Alta.

Capt. J. C. Armstrong, Canadian Armoured Corps, Sturgeon Pt. Rd., Derby, N.Y., U.S.A.

Capt. G. A. Eaton, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 12 First Avenue E., North Bay, Ont.

Capt. R. G. Fitzgerald, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Palgrave, Ont.

Capt. J. M. Galbraith, The Royal Canadian Corps of Signals, Winnipeg, Man.

H/Capt. W. E. L. Smith, Canadian Chaplain Services, Grafton, Ont.

Lieut. (A/Capt.) T. H. Burdett, Canadian Infantry Corps, 15 Bradley Avenue, Eastview, Ottawa, Ont.

Lieut. (A/Capt.) D. S. Harley, Canadian Infantry Corps, 118 Riverdale Avenue, Calgary, Alta.

Lieut. (A/Capt.) R. F. S. Robertson, Canadian Infantry Corps, 2627 Ottawa Avenue W., Vancouver, B.C.

Lieut. D. G. Bagg, Canadian Infantry Corps, 110 Wentworth Street, St. John, N.B.

Lieut. A. D. Carpenter, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 412 St. Clements Avenue, Toronto, Ont.

Lieut. B. S. Eby, Canadian Infantry Corps, 73 Highbourne Rd., Toronto, Ont.

Lieut. S. E. Lipin, Canadian Infantry Corps, 538 Ville Marie St., Montreal, P.Q.

Lieut. D. E. Smith, Canadian Infantry Corps, 194 Gilford St., St. John W., N.B.

Capt. H. Burnett, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Chateauguay, P.Q.

Capt. T. L. Carter, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 52 Prince Arthur Avenue, Toronto, Ont.

Capt. V. J. McKenty, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 924 Banning Street, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Lieut. R. S. Chamberlain, Canadian Infantry Corps, 90 Chestnut Street, St. Thomas, Ont.

Lieut. J. M. E. Clarkson, Canadian Infantry Corps, Primrose Hill, R.R. 2, Maple, Ont.

Lieut. F. Normandeau, Canadian Infantry Corps, 7-21st Avenue, Edmundston, N.B.

Lieut. J. W. C. Biggs, Canadian Infantry Corps, 610 Hamilton St., New Westminster, B.C.

Lieut. S. Lynch, Canadian Infantry Corps, 920 Bedwell Street, Vancouver, B.C.

The Military Cross (M.C.)—Con.

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

Captain F. Martin, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Chatham, N.B.

Captain J. C. Whittle, Canadian Armoured Corps, Shannon Rd., Eburne P.O., Sea Islands, B.C.

Lieut. D. J. Chant, Canadian Armoured Corps, 231 John St., Belleville, Ont.

Lieut. C. S. Wass, Canadian Armoured Corps, 837 Raymo Rd., Windsor, Ont.

Capt. (A/Major) A. S. Christian, Canadian Armoured Corps, 828 Preston Ave., Winnipeg, Man.

H/Capt. R. T. F. Brain, Canadian Chaplain Services, 379 Stewart St., Peterborough, Ont.

Capt. L. E. Cowan, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 1700 College Ave., Regina, Sask.

Capt. H. B. Gonder, Canadian Infantry Corps, 3520 Notre Dame de Grace Ave., Montreal, P.Q.

Capt. E. S. Gray, Canadian Infantry Corps, Bedford, N.S.

Capt. P. R. Griffin, Canadian Infantry Corps, Toronto, Ont.

H/Capt. R. M. Hickey, Canadian Chaplain Services, Jacquet River, N.B.

Capt. J. W. Powell, Canadian Armoured Corps, London, Ont.

Capt. J. A. Patterson, Canadian Infantry Corps, Newmarket, Ont.

Lieut. (A/Capt.) J. A. Fraser, Canadian Armoured Corps, 245 Strathmore Blvd., Toronto, Ont.

Lieut. (A/Capt.) J. P. Hanson, Canadian Infantry Corps, 454 Mount Stephen Ave., Westmount, P.Q.

Lieut. H. G. W. Bean, Canadian Infantry Corps, 252 Russell Hill Rd., Toronto, Ont.

Lieut. G. M. Fawcett, Canadian Infantry Corps, 23 King St., Campbellton, N.B.

Lieut. W. Foy, Canadian Infantry Corps, 17 Demers St., Thetford Mines, P.Q.

Lieut. H. B. Hall, Canadian Infantry Corps, 15 Robinwood Ave., Toronto, Ont.

Lieut. W. G. Herbert, Canadian Infantry Corps, 19 Chudleigh Ave., Toronto, Ont.

Lieut. W. A. P. Smith, Canadian Armoured Corps, 39 Russell St. E., Lindsay, Ont.

Lieut. W. Moisan, Canadian Infantry Corps, 16 St. Denis Ave., Quebec, P.Q.

Lieut. J. E. Whittaker, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, Campbellton, N.B.

Lieut. J. C. Woodward, Canadian Infantry Corps, 201-5th Ave., Ottawa, Ont.

Capt. T. Bond, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Calgary, Alta.

Lieut. W. D. Grayson, Canadian Infantry Corps, 14 High St. West, Moose Jaw, Sask.

Lieut. J. Mitchell, Canadian Infantry Corps, 160 Maplewood Ave., Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Lieut. A. C. Peck, Canadian Infantry Corps, Bralorne, B.C.

Lieut. V. R. Schjelderup, Canadian Infantry Corps, Courtney, B.C.

H/Capt. G. M. Jamieson, Canadian Chaplain Services, 26 College St., Toronto, Ont.

Lieut. J. L. Heaslip, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Brandon, Manitoba.

The Distinguished Conduct Medal (D.C.M.)

P.22238 Sgt. W. Demmy, Canadian Infantry Corps, Fenwood, Sask.

A.6091 Cpl. C. G. Forrest, Canadian Infantry Corps, 4560 St. Catherine St., Westmount, P.Q.

A.11701 L/Cpl. (A/Cpl.) M. J. Pickens, Canadian Infantry Corps, Gooderham, Ontario.

D.60277 Sgt. C. Lafleur, M.M., Canadian Infantry Corps, R.R. No. 3, Mansonville, P.Q.

P.3515 Sgt. C. N. Macey, Canadian Armoured Corps, 127 Arlington St., Winnipeg, Man.

B.65569 Sgt. S. T. Scrutton, Canadian Infantry Corps, 119 Jones Ave., Toronto, Ont.

G.22945 Pte. G. S. Clark, Canadian Infantry Corps, Ferry Road, N.B.

B.27938 Spr. W. R. Coveyduck, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, May Ave., Richmond Hill, Ont.

K.57492 Cpl. E. Jobes, Canadian Infantry Corps, Bevan, B.C.

The Military Medal (M.M.)

B.87937 W.O. II (CSM), G. R. Keeler, Canadian Infantry Corps, 5 Water Street, St. Catharines, Ont.

A.99497 Armt. Staff/Sgt. J. A. McCoig, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, Fairbanks, Alaska.

P.21454 Sergeant (A/W.O. II, CSM) W. D. Davidson, Canadian Infantry Corps, 2021—8th Avenue, New Westminster, B.C.

C.4697 Sergeant H. S. Dracup, Canadian Infantry Corps, 36 Bettes Street, Belleville, Ont.

B.73456 Sergeant F. J. Fontaine, Canadian Armoured Corps, 556 Church Street, Toronto, Ont.

A.3060 Sergeant A. J. Hocking, Canadian Infantry Corps, 145 Wharncliffe Rd. S., London, Ont.

P.28107 Sergeant J. C. Reid, Canadian Infantry Corps, 822 King Street, London, Ont.

D.41031 Sergeant J. P. J. Rousseau, Canadian Infantry Corps, 47 Girouard, St. Hyacinthe, P.Q.

G.17820 Sergeant E. N. Savage, Canadian Infantry Corps, Chatham, N.B.

H.11180 Sergeant C. A. Stewart, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 304 South Brodie St., Fort William, Ont.

M.15568 Lance Sergeant, (A/Sgt.) J. E. W. Dick, Canadian Infantry Corps, 9612-106 A Avenue, Edmonton, Alta.

A.19257 Lance Sergeant (A/Sgt.) O. L. Mellick, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, Thedford, Ont.

G.19076 Lance Sergeant R. E. MacDonald, Canadian Infantry Corps, Plaster Rock, N.B.

G.73902 Lance Sergeant, W. W. Melvin, Canadian Infantry Corps, 819-6th Avenue, Niagara Falls, Ont.

M.16888 Corporal (A/Sgt.) G. A. Campion, Canadian Infantry Corps, R.R. No. 2, Tofield, Alta.

C.18577 Bombardier, (A/L/Sgt.) A. Hope, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Colborne, Ont.

B.72545 Corporal C. E. Ellison, Canadian Infantry Corps, 564 Blackthorne Avenue, Toronto, Ont.

K.53341 Lance Corporal (A/Sgt.) G. F. Horan, Canadian Infantry Corps, 3525 West 26th Avenue, Vancouver, B.C.

G.4333 Lance Bombardier, (A/Bdr.) W. J. Doucette, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Marysville, York Co., N.B.

P.10739 Spr. (A/Cpl.), H. H. Patriquin, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, Truro, N.S.

B.42112 L/Cpl. C. J. Davino, Canadian Infantry Corps, 13 Dixon Street, Hamilton, Ont.

K.42868 L/Cpl. J. H. Teece, Canadian Infantry Corps, South Pender Island, B.C.

K.53671 Pte. (A/L/Cpl.) G. F. Clason, Canadian Infantry Corps, 33 Hiltside Terrace, Long Meadow, Mass., U.S.A.

C.2097 Spr. O. C. Billings, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 326 Cathcart Street, Ottawa, Ont.

F.32463 Pte. R. B. Crane, Canadian Infantry Corps, 41 Broadway, Sydney, N.S.

The Military Medal (M.M.)—Con.

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

B.87943 Pte. L. W. Kirby, Canadian Infantry Corps, 83 Rodman Street, St. Catharines, Ont.

B.87846 Pte. G. S. C. MacFarlane, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 6 John Street, Oakville, Ont.

G.5028 Gnr. R. G. Marquis, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Baker Brook, N.B.

A.49541 Pte. J. W. Marshall, Canadian Infantry Corps, Wallaceburg, Ont.

H.102349 Spr. M. C. McNaughton, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, Myrtle, Man.

F.29725 Pte. H. W. Pelly, Canadian Infantry Corps, Guysborough, N.S.

A.3469 Pte. A. A. Uruski, Canadian Infantry Corps, Mullinger, Sask.

F.40095 Pte. H. S. Waye, Canadian Infantry Corps, 155 Guy Street, Sydney Mines, N.S.

B.94589 S/Sgt. T. M. Monteith, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 470 Church Street, Toronto, Ontario.

K.53772 Sgt. C. V. Gale, Canadian Armoured Corps, 801 West 8th Avenue, Vancouver, B.C.

G.20009 Sgt. R. F. Shaw, Canadian Infantry Corps, 120 Loan Head Road, New Stevenson, Lanarkshire, Scotland.

H.11137 Cpl. G. R. Clarke, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Long Lac, Ontario.

E.10036 Cpl. M. Eglinton, Canadian Infantry Corps, Loretteville, P.Q.

M.31711 Cpl. G. E. O'Neil, Canadian Infantry Corps, Box 4175, Edmonton, Alta.

G.3363 Gnr. (A/Bdr.) J. R. Savage, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Chatham, Northumbeland Co., N.B.

A.11360 L/Cpl. G. A. Lyons, Canadian Infantry Corps, 344 16th Street E., Owen Sound, Ont.

D.106014 L/Cpl. J. I. W. A. Robert, Canadian Infantry Corps, 54 Laframboise Avenue, St. Hyacinthe, P.Q.

B.64205 L/Cpl. J. B. Smith, Canadian Infantry Corps, 48 Amherst Avenue, Toronto, Ont.

A.11166 Pte. F. Baker, Canadian Infantry Corps, Weston, Ont.

M.17111 Pte. C. G. Rattray, Canadian Infantry Corps, Lavoy, Alta.

K.74108 L/Cpl. D. H. Maxwell, Canadian Infantry Corps, Merritt, B.C.

D.86166 Pte. F. G. Leblanc, Canadian Infantry Corps, Campbellton, N.B.

K.47873 Sgt. E. Winding, Canadian Infantry Corps, Dawson, Yukon Territory.

C.118537 Cpl. R. G. Cartwright, Canadian Infantry Corps. 960 8th Avenue E., Vancouver, B.C.

C.70639 Cpl. H. B. Leppard, Canadian Armoured Corps, 36 Percy Street, Ottawa, Ont.

F.916 Pte. (A/L/Cpl.) A. D. MacLeod, Canadian Infantry Corps, 315 Church Street, New Aberdeen, N.S.

K.54071 Pte. N. I. Jakel, Canadian Infantry Corps, Alexis Creek, B.C.

B.78960 Pte. E. T. Ruck, Canadian Infantry Corps, 59 Morningside Avenue, Swansea Village, Ont.

E.0223 Sgt. W. Adams, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Prince Rupert, B.C.

G.17267 Sgt. R. S. Lloyd, Canadian Infantry Corps, Plaster Rock, N.B.

D.10886 Bdr. W. W. McCrae, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 85 Lakeside Drive, Schumacher, Ont.

K.4755 Sgt. S. R. White, Canadian Infantry Corps, Lynn Creek, B.C.

P.3509 Sgt. A. H. Williams, Canadian Armoured Corps, 154 Seven Oaks, West Kildonen, Winnipeg, Man.

D.56642 A/Sgt. A. Bernier, Canadian Infantry Corps, 1948 Dorion St., Montreal, P.Q.

K.47749 L/Sgt. L. Bailey, Canadian Infantry Corps, Winfield, B.C.

G.294 Cpl. D. H. Carter, Canadian Armoured Corps, 28 Duke St., Moncton, N.B.

B.93303 Cpl. W. I. DeW. Hutt, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 15 Connaught Circle, Toronto, Ont.

M.12448 Pte. J. W. Culling, Canadian Infantry Corps, Bluffton, Alberta.

B.69721 Tpr. T. E. Dickenson, Canadian Armoured Corps, R.R. 2 Georgetown, Ontario.

G.4195 Gnr. K. A. Fraser, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Penfield Ridge, R.R. 2, N.B.

H.63890 Tpr. J. K. Funk, Canadian Armoured Corps, Chortitz, Man.

B.93270 Pte. H. E. Scott, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 13 Kingdon St., Westmount, Ont.

C.53005 R.S.M. (W.O. I) F. A. Lockhart, Canadian Infantry Corps, 100 Ware St, Peterborough, Ont.

D.15157 C.S.M. (W.O. II) S. W. Howes, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 9 Church St., Truro, N.S.

B.101038 Sergt. J. A. Lacasse, Canadian Infantry Corps, Opasatika, Ont.

C.79390 Sergt. D. K. MacDonald, Canadian Infantry Corps, Renfrew, Ont.

D.136859 Sergt. G. H. Morgan, Canadian Infantry Corps, 3441 Hingston Ave., Quebec, P.Q.

C.21138 Sergt. A. Reed, Canadian Infantry Corps, R.R. 4, Picton, Ont.

P.10855 Sergt. J. A. Romain, The Corps of Royal Canadian Enginers, Belvedere Hotel, Truro, N.S.

B.27160 Sergt. A. Semple, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 88 Park Ave., Brantford, Ont.

B.64179 Sergt. C. W. Smith, Canadian Infantry Corps, 135 Banning St., Port Arthur, Ont.

C.21081 Sergt. O. Stanley, Canadian Infantry Corps, Metcalf, Ont.

H.26473 Sergt. H. W. Strawn, Canadian armoured Corps, Souris, Man.

H.26282 Sergt. H. Walterson, Canadian Armoured Corps, Norwood Court, Norwood, Man.

K.29317 L/Sgt. G. Chapman, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 1463 17th Ave., N. Westminster, B.C.

B.27890 L/Sgt. A. F. Killah, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 127 Edward Ave., Sudbury, Ont.

F.55261 L/Sgt. J. J. Martin, Canadian Infantry Corps, 136 10th St., New Aberdeen, N.S.

B.19523 Cpl. H. J. Beverley, Canadian Armoured Corps, 205 Walnut St., Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.

E.6133 Cpl. P. Desbiens, Canadian Infantry Corps, 31 Rue St. Andre, Riviere du Loup, P.Q.

C.20660 Cpl. G. C. Fraser, Canadian Infantry Corps, Ottawa, Ont.

E.5241 Cpl. M. Loncpre, Canadian Infantry Corps, St. Theresa de Blainville, P.Q.

F.67695 Cpl. D. B. MacDonald, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 113 Gottingen St., Halifax, N.S.

G.47155 Cpl. C. F. Mowatt, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 69 Dorchester St., Saint John, N.B.

G.23035 Cpl. F. S. Savage, Canadian Infantry Corps, Chatham, N.B.

The Military Medal (M.M.)—Con.

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

B.63945 Cpl. R. J. Tessier, Canadian Infantry Corps, 13 Main St., Lachute, P.Q.

H.2303 Cpl. J. N. Tod, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 39 St. Vital, Man.

D.114747 Cpl. B. Vennes, Canadian Infantry Corps, 67 5th St., Shawinigan Falls, P.Q.

B.112005 L/Cpl. W. A. Amos, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 116 Main St., Toronto, Ont.

B.27357 L/Cpl. H. J. Bartolacci, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 35 Cloverdale Rd., Toronto, Ont.

G.22058 Pte. R. W. Adair, Canadian Infantry Corps, Newcastle, N.B.

G.63194 Pte. H. W. Blakely, Canadian Infantry Corps, Rollingdam, N.B.

C.21722 Pte. A. F. Bond, Canadian Infantry Corps, 21 Craig St., Arnprior, Ont.

G.22764 Pte. H. C. Butland, Canadian Infantry Corps, Campbellton, N.B.

B.143426 Rfn. W. Chicoski, Canadian Infantry Corps, 2390 Portage Rd., Niagara Falls, Ont.

B.3047 Pte. W. S. Ducker, Canadian Infantry Corps, 16 Adrian Ave., Toronto, Ont.

D.15283 Spr. J. J. Duval, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, Rouyn, P.Q.

B.84186 Rfn. W. G. Edmonds, Canadian Infantry Corps, George St., Hespeler, Ont.

C.64101 Spr. R. D. Foster, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 291 Louis St., Peterborough, Ont.

F.45939 Pte. H. L. Fraser, Canadian Infantry Corps, R.R. 1, Trenton, Ont.

B.146477 Pte. R. A. Geddes, Canadian Infantry Corps, 296 Tarneaud St., Sudbury, Ont.

G.17520 Pte. L. S. Menzies, Canadian Infantry Corps, Dalhousie Jct., N.B.

F.60272 Pte. R. J. Noonan, Canadian Infantry Corps, Grand Lake, Sydney, N.S.

B.28910 Pte. W. Noval, Canadian Infantry Corps, 225 Seaton St., Toronto, Ont.

H.63809 Tpr. H. S. Runolfson, Canadian Armoured Corps, Lundar, Man.

F.91707 Spr. R. C. Spencer, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, Londonderry, N.S.

E.10064 Pte. W. Tremblay, Canadian Infantry Corps, Breakeyville, P.Q.

C.20592 Pte. T. A. Wright, Canadian Infantry Corps, 34 Ella St., Ottawa, Ont.

A.42276 Sgt. J. A. Stollery, Canadian Armoured Corps, 32 Princess Ave., St. Thomas, Ont.

K.74049 Gnr. H. R. Chaplin, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 607 Robson Ave., New Westminster, B.C.

E.21905 Bdr. (A/Sgt.) H. Dumas, The Royal Canadian Artillery, St. George de Malbaie, P.Q.

M.43916 Gnr. J. Holtzman, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Red Deer, Alta.

L.27753 Cpl. (A/L/Sgt.) W. D. Armstrong, Canadian Infantry Corps, Davidson, Sask.

L.24005 C. S. M. B. A. Currie, Canadian Infantry Corps, 1124 Rae St., Regina, Sask.

K.74092 Cpl. (A/Sgt.) A. L. Frost, Canadian Infantry Corps, Alberni, B.C.

L.105651 Rfn. O. A. Johnson, Canadian Infantry Corps, Smeaton, Sask.

L.27065 Rfn. J. E. Lapointe, Canadian Infantry Corps, R.R. 3, Dresden, Ont.

K.54023 Cpl. A. B. Mitchell, Canadian Infantry Corps, Vancouver, B.C.

L.27588 Rfn. C. H. Moorhead, Canadian Infantry Corps, Maple Creek, Sask.

L.27084 Sgt. L. M. Young, Canadian Infantry Corps, 812 Main St., North Battleford, Sask.

C.35565 L/Sgt. H. M. Fitzpatrick, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, R.R. 2, Cornwall, Ont.

Mention in Dispatches

Col. C. H. Playfair, O.B.E., The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 839 Main St. E., Hamilton, Ont.

Lieut.-Col. R. M. Crowe, Canadian Infantry Corps, 22 Tiffany St. E., Guelph, Ont.

Lieut.-Col. E. J. S. Dudley, Canadian Infantry Corps, 6976 Cypress St., Vancouver, B.C.

Lieut.-Col. G. L. Frawley, Canadian Dental Corps, 203 St. Leonards St., Toronto, Ont.

Major R. S. Malone, Canadian Infantry Corps, 894 Avenue Rd., Toronto, Ont.

Major (A/Lt.-Col.) G. F. C. Pangman, Canadian Infantry Corps, 45 Blair Rd., Galt, Ont.

Major N. Cooper, Canadian Provost Corps, Walkerville, Ont.

Major W. A. Oille, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 69 South Drive, Toronto, Ont.

Major J. H. W. T. Pope, Canadian Infantry Corps, Parksville, Vancouver Isle, B.C.

Capt. (A/Maj.) P. R. Bingham, Canadian Infantry Corps, 3586 Durocher St., Montreal, P.Q.

Capt. V. E. Aksim, The Royal Canadian Corps of Signals, 78 Wellington St., Kingston, Ont.

Capt. G. E. Baxter, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 329 Church St., Winnipeg.

Capt. W. H. Clare, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 44 Suffolk St., Guelph, Ont.

Capt. M. H. B. Cockin, Canadian Infantry Corps, Ottawa, Ont.

Capt. S. J. Derry, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 23 Sutherland Drive, Leaside, Ont.

Capt. H. C. P. Green, MBE, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Ottawa, Ont.

Capt. T. J. Green, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 2245 Toronto, St., Regina, Sask.

Capt. D. M. Irwin, Canadian Armoured Corps, Inverlynn, Whitby, Ont.

Capt. J. C. Martin, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, Chapleau, Ont.

Capt. R. E. Maze, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 317 Arnot Avenue, Victoria, B.C.

Capt. V. W. Mills, Corps of Military Staff Clerks, 1316-1st Street W., Calgary, Alta.

Capt. F. K. Reesor, Canadian Infantry Corps, Vegreville, Alta.

Capt. (QM.) R. D. Schoales, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 23½ Academy Street, St. Catharines, Ont.

Capt. B. H. M. Tedman, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 67 Farnham, Toronto, Ont.

Capt. J. Winn, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 4311 Harvard Ave., Montreal, Que.

Lieut. E. F. Merkel, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 1011 Rae Street, Regina, Sask.

P.35129 Condr. (W.O.I) D. M. Dorward, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 400 Centre Street, Pembroke, Ont.

C.15570 S/Condr. (W.O.I) J. T. Tighe, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 91 Concord Street, Ottawa, Ont.

P.35201 (A/W.O.I) A/S.M. E. W. Cole, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 23 Earl Street, Kingston, Ont.

M.15585 R.Q.M.S. (W.O.II)) C. A. MacDonald, Canadian Infantry Corps, 11917 80th Street, Edmonton, Alta.

H.16371 Q.M.S. (W.O.II) M. Thomson, Corps of Military Staff Clerks, 639 Maryland Street, Winnipeg, Man.

B.4563 Q.M.S. (W.O.II) L. H. Toder, Canadian Armoured Corps, Port Alberni, B.C.

D.36001 S.S.M. (W.O.II) N. Christofferson, Canadian Armoured Corps, Batiscan, Que.

P.27946 C.S.M. (W.O.II) (A/R.S.M. (W.O.I)) C. C. D. Cheshire, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 405 Nepean Street, Ottawa, Ont.

Mention in Dispatches—Con.

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

B.94412 C.S.M. (W.O.II) E. Henson, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 371 St. Clarens Ave., Toronto, Ont.

M.16547 C.S.M. (W.O.II) H. H. Ragen, Corps of Military Staff Clerks, 9755-86th Avenue, Edmonton, Alta.

C.70727 S.Q.M.S. (W.O.II) R. W. Forster, Canadian Armoured Corps, 307 James Street, Ottawa, Ont.

D.91551 S/Sgt. J. High, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 94A Fieldfair Avenue, Beaurepaire, Que.

H.2975 Sgt. J. A. Bartlett, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Silver Plains, Man.

B.61097 Sgt. G. L. Bastien, Canadian Armoured Corps, 125 Bannerman Ave., Timmins, Ont.

M.63240 Sgt. R. F. Torpy, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Meeting Creek, Alta.

C.3067 Sgt. M. L. Weber, The Royal Canadian Corps of Signals, 41 McLeod Street, Ottawa.

P.40256 Sgt. W. E. Wheeler, The Royal Canadian Corps of Signals, Holdfast, Sask.

H.5139 Bdr. W. J. Pinniger, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 77 Noble Ave., Winnipeg.

C.58282 Cpl. E. Noonan, Canadian Armoured Corps, 10 Victoria Ave., Perth, Ont.

C.42044 Cpl. M. R. Stewart, Canadian Provost Corps, Belle River, P.E.I.

B.94347 Cpl. H. J. Welsh, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, King Street, Bowmanville, Ont.

B.61184 Tpr. A. E. Street, Canadian Armoured Corps, 190 Silverbirch Ave., Toronto, Ont.

B.92647 Pte. G. R. Blackadder, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 67 Victoria Ave. S., Hamilton, Ont.

B.99095 Pte. A. W. Brunger, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 43 Albert Street, Thorold, Ont.

H.35767 Pte. J. N. Lenton, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Miami, Man.

M.28191 Pte. E. McKay, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Rocky Mountain House, Alta.

M.42127 Pte. W. Prime, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Pouce Creek, B.C.

F.21310 Pte. F. E. Quigley, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Port Hastings, N.S.

B.66635 Pte. J. Sinclair, Canadian Infantry Corps, 175 Milverton Blvd., Toronto, Ont.

Capt. H. Fine, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 32 Camberwell Rd., Toronto, Ont.

Brigadier E. W. Haldenby, M.C., V.D., Canadian Infantry Corps, 70 Crescent Road, Toronto, Ont.

Colonel G. H. Basher, O.B.E., E.D., Canadian Infantry Corps, 18 Brock Ave., Toronto, Ont.

Colonel G. R. D. Farmer, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 120 Herkimer St., Hamilton, Ont.

Lieut.-Col. H. L. Pease, O.B.E., The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 2415-26 A St. W., Calgary, Alta.

Lieut.-Col. R. W. Richardson, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 766 Wellington Crescent, Winnipeg, Man.

Lieut.-Col. D. K. Tow, O.B.E., E.D., Canadian Infantry Corps, 14 Summerhill Gardens, Toronto, Ont.

Major (A/Lt.-Col.) L. A. Deziel, Canadian Infantry Corps, 1574 Ouellette Ave., Windsor, Ont.

Major (A/Lt.-Col.) T. Warren, Canadian Infantry Corps, 194 Park Street S., Hamilton, Ont.

Major G. A. Browne, D.S.O., The Royal Canadian Artillery, 55 Delaware Ave., Ottawa, Ont.

Major L. G. C. Lilley, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 280 Charlotte St., Fredericton, N.B.

Major P. Manseau, Canadian Dental Corps, 2368 Sherbrooke St., Montreal, Que.

Major A. T. Smith, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, Winnipeg, Man.

Major P. H. Tedman, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 67 Farnham Ave., Toronto, Ont.

Major D. E. Walker, D.S.O., Canadian Infantry Corps, 822-8th Ave. N., Saskatoon, Sask.

Major D. A. Young, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 45 Belmont Ave., Ottawa, Ont.

Capt. (A/Major) A. R. Campbell, Canadian Infantry Corps, 28 Core St. West, Perth, Ont.

Capt. (A/Major) E. M. Counsell, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Montreal, P.Q.

Capt. (A/Major) C. H. Humber, Canadian Armoured Corps, Red Deer, Alta.

Capt. (A/Major) D. H. Jupp, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Toronto, Ont.

Capt. (A/Major) J. E. T. McMullen, Canadian Infantry Corps, 1599 Angus Drive, Vancouver, B.C.

Capt. A. O. Ames, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, Nelson, B.C.

Capt. J. G. Anderson, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Whitemore Apts., 84th Ave., Edmonton, Alta.

Capt. C. A. Campbell, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Hazelton, North Dakota, U.S.A.

Capt. M. C. Carter, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 430 Ontario St., London, Ont.

Capt. E. R. Clemis, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 1266-6th Ave. S., Lethbridge, Alta.

Capt. L. L. Clough, Canadian Infantry Corps, 1012 First Ave. N.E., Moose Jaw, Sask.

Capt. J. E. Dixon, Canadian Postal Corps, 27 Bostford St., Moncton, N.B.

Capt. J. C. Martin, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, Chapleau, Ont.

Capt. J. D. McKenzie, Canadian Infantry Corps, Swift Current, Sask.

Capt. L. M. Orge, Canadian Armoured Corps, 827 Temperance St., Saskatoon, Sask.

Capt. J. B. Pennefather, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 995 MacNaughton Rd., Mount Royal, Montreal, P.Q.

Capt. L. D. Publicover, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 9817-93rd Ave., Edmonton, Alta.

Capt. E. G. Radley, Canadian Infantry Corps, 5246 Byron Ave., Montreal, Que.

Capt H. V. Slemon, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Bowmanville, Ont.

Capt. C. A. Simmons, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 32 Dewhurst Blvd., Toronto, Ont.

Capt. H. B. Trites, The Royal Canadian Artillery Sackville, N.B.

Capt. D. A. Wanklyn, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 3600 Atwater Ave., Montreal, Que.

Capt. H. G. Williams, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 253 Frank St., Ottawa, Ont.

Mention in Dispatches—Con.

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

Lieut. (A/Capt.) E. C. Bannerman, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 236 Bentinck St., Sydney, N.S.

Lieut. (A/Capt.) R. S. Graham, Canadian Infantry Corps, 150 Oak St., Winnipeg, Man.

Lieut. (A/Capt.) S. A. Hulme, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Briercrest, Sask.

Lieut. (A/Capt.) R. G. Hunter, Canadian Postal Corps, 400 Queen St., Chatham, Ont.

Lieut. (A/Capt.) J. Praysner, Canadian Infantry Corps, R.R. No. 1 Korah, Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario.

Lieut. (A/Capt.) R. D. Prince, Canadian Infantry Corps, 3239 Cedar Ave., Westmount, Que.

Lieut. W. R. Chamberlain, Canadian Armoured Corps, 304 Wright Ave., Toronto, Ont.

Lieut. J. A. Charters, Canadian Infantry Corps, 2033 Clark St., Montreal, Que.

Lieut. J. G. Jarvis, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, R.R. No. 2, 20 Pinewood, York Mills, Ont.

Lieut. C. S. Munro, Canadian Infantry Corps, 432 19th Ave. West, Calgary, Alta.

Lieut. M. J. M. Richard, Canadian Infantry Corps, Quebec, P.Q.

Lieut. W. C. Stuart, Canadian Armoured Corps, 531 Brunswick Lower, Toronto, Ont.

Lieut. (N/S) A. M. M. Nicholson, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Neepawa, Man.

C.3519 R.S.M. C. T. Smith, The Royal Canadian Corps of Signals, 489 Gladstone Ave., Ottawa, Ont.

B.94240 Armt. Q.M.S. R. McCart, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 26 Meadow Ave., Toronto, Ont.

K.42026 Armt. Q.M.S. (W.O. II) F. H. Palmer, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 229 Abbott St., Penticton, B.C.

B.94308 Armt. Q.M.S. (W.O. II) R. D. Parsons, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 24 Roseneath Gardens, Toronto, Ont.

K.83007 Armt. Q.M.S. (W.O. II) D. G. Pringle, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, Victoria, B.C.

B.89949 Q.M.S. (W.O. II) J. Walker, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 154 Balson Ave., Hamilton, Ont.

B.4563 T.Q.M.S. L. H. Toder, Canadian Armoured Corps, Port Alberni, B.C.

M.7028 C.S.M. (W.O. II) H. W. Lewis, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 4406-5th Ave. West, Vancouver, B.C.

M.17359 C.Q.M.S. M. Rudyk, Canadian Infantry Corps, 9314-104th Ave., Edmonton, Alta.

P.7479 Armt. S/Sgt. H. M. Paige, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 846 Columbia St., Kamloops, B.C.

B.21178 S/Sgt. A. E. Houston, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 142-7th St., New Toronto, Ont.

A.9009 S/Sgt. L. D. Vousden, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 54 Euclid Ave., London, Ont.

A.11073 Sgt. E. L. Conte, Canadian Provost Corps, 8 Graham Avenue, Brantford, Ont.

B.85803 Sgt. A. E. Bishop, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 273 Windermere Ave., Toronto, Ont.

D.7137 Sgt. A. A. Dube, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Plaster Rock, N.B.

B.89516 Sgt. O. C. Galloway, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 189 Vaughan Rd., Apt. 7, Toronto, Ont.

F.59615 Sgt. G. D. Graham, Canadian Infantry Corps, Gaspereaux, P.E.I.

B.90912 Sgt. J. Hamilton, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 778 Broadview Ave., Apt. 32, Toronto, Ont.

H.82319 Sgt. W. Myer, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 552 Alexander Ave., General Delivery, Brandon, Man.

B.76685 Sgt. G. J. N. MacLachlan, Canadian Infantry Corps, 133 Gilmour Ave., Toronto, Ont.

F.54887 Sgt. W. A. Roberts, Canadian Provost Corps, 58 Mansfield St., Passchendaele, Glace Bay, N.S.

G.45055 Sgt. F. C. Handles, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, East Riverside, Kings County, N.B.

G.43048 Sgt. C. S. Pollock, Canadian Infantry Corps, R.R. No. 4, Norton, N.B.

A.9219 Sgt. W. E. Skingley, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 671 Dundas St., Apt. 5, London, Ont.

B.74113 Sgt. W. Stockman, Canadian Infantry Corps, 2 Digby St., Toronto, Ont.

B.28161 Sgt. H. H. Thompson, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 212 Commonwealth Ave., Scarboro Junction, Ont.

M.63224 Cpt. E. E. James, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 9327 106 A Ave., Edmonton, Alta.

F.93509 Cpl. W. J. MacNeil, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 13 Grafton Park, Halifax, N.S.

A.2120 Cpl. M. C. Murdy, The Royal Canadian Corps of Signals, 399 Park Hill Road, Peterborough, Ont.

K.7105 Cpl. E. Olson, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Fruitvale, B.C.

C.42039 Cpl. C. Stanyer, Canadian Provost Corps, 1540 Glenholme Ave., Niagara Falls, Ont.

F.43603 L/Cpl. (A/L/Sgt.) G. H. Smeltzer, Canadian Infantry Corps, Mahone Bay, N.S.

L.9046 L/Cpl. I. Borgford, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, Leslie, Sask.

D.62467 L/Cpl. M. Cyr, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 105 Grande Allee, Montreal East, P.Q.

B.130601 L/Cpl. E. Findlay, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Thorold, Ont.

B.95404 L/Cpl. R. R. Warner, Canadian Provost Corps, Fort William, Ont.

A.103145 Tpr. (A/Cpl.) C. F. Gammy, Canadian Armoured Corps, P.O. Elmira, Ont.

B.74613 Tpr. (A/Cpl.) M. Miller, Canadian Armoured Corps, 56 Golden Ave., South Porcupine, Ont.

L.2730 Pte. W. P. Casey, Canadian Infantry Corps, Windthorst, Stockholm, Sask.

A.18293 Pte. L. Charbonneau, Canadian Infantry Corps, 53 Well St., Stratford, Ont.

D.51367 Pte. R. Chartrand, Canadian Infantry Corps, Cheneville Comte, Papineau, P.Q.

M.27083 Tpr. C. W. Clark, Canadian Armoured Corps, 510 4th Ave., W., Calgary, Alta.

B.92647 Pte. G. R. Blackadder, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, 67 Victoria Ave. S., Hamilton, Ont.

F.89531 Pte. M. T. Duncan, The Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, New Ross, Lunenburg Co., N.B.

M.20740 Pte. W. Grieve, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Regina, Sask.

A.76023 Pte. W. R. Mansfield, Canadian Infantry Corps, 23 Mansion Street, Kitchener, Ont.

B.61585 Tpr. J. R. Wein, Canadian Armoured Corps, South Minooka, Ont.

REVISED EDITION

Mention in Dispatches—Con.

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

L.2356 Pte. D. Wiker, Canadian Infantry Corps, Maple Creek, Sask.
L.74516 Pte. A. F. Ziegler, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Stump Lake, Sask.
Capt. (A/Major) J. Wilson, General List, Cobden, Ont.

UNITED STATES AWARDS

Distinguished Service Cross

L.86555 Sgt. E. S. Fines, Canadian Infantry Corps, South Wellington, B.C.

Silver Star

F.28951 Sgt. V. J. Doucette, Canadian Infantry Corps, Starr's Road, Yarmouth, N., N.S.
C.10146 Pte. (A/Sgt.) L. Scharfe, Canadian Infantry Corps, Renfrew, Ont.
Brigadier H. W. Foster, Canadian Infantry Corps, Vernon, B.C.
C.5083 Sgt. G. W. Wright, Canadian Infantry Corps, Box 647, Picton, Ontario.
B.128511 Pte. (A/Sgt.) S. J. Zahara, Canadian Infantry Corps, 117 Hindley Avenue, E., St. Vital, Manitoba.

Bronze Star Medal

B.128506 S/Sgt. G. H. McDonald, Canadian Infantry Corps, 213 Lang Street, Cobalt, Ont.
C.54124 Pte. O. M. Ouderkirk, Canadian Infantry Corps, Box 54, Crysler, Ont.

Appendix "B"

Non-operational Gallantry Awards

George Cross (G.C.)

Member of the Order of the British Empire (M.B.E.)

British Empire Medal (B.E.M.)

Commendations

The George Cross (G.C.)

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

B.45960 Corporal (A/Sgt.) J. Rennie, Canadian Infantry Corps, 35 Fairview Ave., Kitchener, Ont.

Member of the Order of the British Empire (M.B.E.)

Lieut. J. Corner, Canadian Infantry Corps, Colquitz P.O., Victoria, B.C.
B.101634 W.O. II (CSM) H. T. Shepherd, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Georgetown, Ont.
F.14160 W.O. II (QMS) P. G. Hillier, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 40½ Park Avenue, Dartmouth, N.S.
Lieut. J. H. Smith, General List, 18 McNairn Ave., Toronto, Ont.

British Empire Medal (B.E.M.)

H.20966 Sgt. D. Shepherd, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Rumsey, Alta.
D.1560 Cpl. C. A. Saunders, Canadian Armoured Corps, 4841 Verdun Avenue, Verdun, P.Q.

[Mr. Ralston.]

B.215 L/Cpl. R. S. Eckhardt, Canadian Armoured Corps, 81 Albert Street, Port Dalhousie, Ont.
A.34214 S/Sgt. E. T. Newman, M.M., Veterans Guard of Canada, West Lorne, Ont.
B.54878 Sgt. (A/W.O. II S/QMS) H. G. E. Langstaff, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, Niagara-on-the Lake, Ont.
F.25535 Sgt. (A/W.O. II QMS) J. H. MacKay, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Queen Street, North Sydney, N.S.
B.40382 Cpl. (L/Sgt.) A. S. Lang, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 35 Herbert Avenue, Toronto.
E.610296 Cpl. J. Aubry, Canadian Infantry Corps, 13 St. Joseph Street, Shawinigan Falls, P.Q.
H.601959 Cpl. A. Cherniski, Canadian Infantry Corps, 456-21st Street, Brandon, Man.
F.25542 Bdr. W. J. Comeau, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Weymouth, N.S.
B.35362 Cpl. F. C. Lord, Veterans Guard of Canada, 213-1st Ave. E., North Bay, Ont.
A.54789 Cpl. T. E. Morrison, Veterans Guard of Canada, 1674 Crawford Road, Cleveland, Ohio, U.S.A.
K.68659 Bdr. E. A. Stebner, The Royal Canadian Artillery, 6620 Victoria Drive, Vancouver, B.C.
H.59148 L/Cpl. J. K. Robinson, The Canadian Provost Corps, Fort William, Ont.
B.26810 Pte. (A/Cpl.) J. E. Aubin, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 105 Queen Anne Rd., Kingsway, Toronto, Ont.
H.17366 Spr. (A/Cpl.) R. G. James, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, Carman, Man.
F.91802 Spr. (A/Cpl.) T. J. Murphy, The Corps of Royal Canadian Engineers, 12 Pennywell Road, St. John's, Nfld.
B.58786 Pte. (A/L/Cpl.) H. G. MacDonald, The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, 145 Madison Avenue, Toronto, Ont.
K.42569 Pte. K. A. Ingham, Canadian Infantry Corps, Blue River, B.C.
D.135121 Gnr. N. Miclette, The Royal Canadian Artillery, Bedford, P.Q.
A.9151 Sgt. J. Davis, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Delaware, Ont.
A.2105 Sgt. C. M. Stephenson, The Royal Canadian Corps of Signals, 233 Queen St. S., Kitchener, Ont.
C.42044 Cpl. M. R. Stewart, The Canadian Provost Corps, Belle River, P.E.I.
A.9185 L/Cpl. (A/Cpl.) C. C. Anderton, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 4 Saunby St., London, Ont.

Commendations

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

P.1067 Cpl. W. D. Stevenson, Canadian Armoured Corps, 7213 Casgrain Avenue, Montreal, P.Q.
B.72829 Pte. A. E. Foster, The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, 114 Brownville Ave., Mount Dennis, Toronto, Ont.

DECORATIONS FOR GALLANTRY—ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): On behalf of my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) I now lay on the table a similar list of gallantry awards to members of the Royal Canadian Air Force, Canadians in the Royal Air Force, R.C.A.F. personnel and Canadians in the R.C.A.F. decorated for gallantry by allied nations. This represents in all 490 awards for gallantry in the R.C.A.F. There are 440 members of the R.C.A.F. decorated for gallantry, 23 Canadians in the R.A.F. and 27 R.C.A.F. personnel and Canadians in the R.A.F. decorated for gallantry by allied governments. The period covered is from February 18, 1944, to August 11, 1944. I am pleased indeed to present this list and on behalf of the army to congratulate the R.C.A.F. on the magnificent record which these awards indicate. The names and the home addresses of the recipients are all contained in the list.

Gallantry Awards

For Period 18 Feb/44 to 11 Aug./44 inclusive

1. Members of the R.C.A.F. decorated for gallantry..... 440
2. Names and home addresses of recipients (1) see App. A.
3. Canadians in the R.A.F. decorated for gallantry 23
4. Names and home addresses of recipients (3) see App. B.
5. R.C.A.F. personnel and Canadians in the R.A.F. decorated for gallantry by allied governments..... 27
6. Names and home addresses of recipients (5) see App. C.

Appendix "A"

(Bars to D.S.O. and D.F.C. for personnel indicated by *)

Distinguished Service Order

Number—Rank—Name—Home Address

C1009 W/C Chapman, C. G. W., Woodstock Rd., Fredericton, N.B.

C325 A/G/C Davoud, P. Y., 495 Prince Arthur St. W., Montreal, P.Q.

J11265 F/O Denomy, B. C., Drawer B, Temiskaming, P.Q.

J3701 A/W/C Godfroy, H. C., 120 Oriole Parkway, Toronto, Ont.

J6002 F/L Kerrigan, H. F., 387 Roslyn Ave., Westmount, P.Q.

J4743 A/S/L Kipp, R. A., 359 Nicola St., Kamloops, B.C.

C871 A/W/C Ruttan, C. G., 9 Ridley Ave., Belleville, Ont.

C835 W/C Scott, J. C., 45 Lansdowne Rd., North Galt, Ont.

J24504 F/O Strange, M. S., 9 Rosehill Ave., Apt. 7, Toronto.

J15176 A/W/C Swetman, W. H., c/o A. M. Dewar, Metropolitan Bldg., Toronto.

J6650 A/S/L Westerman, C. F., 1263 Athol St., Regina, Sask.

Distinguished Flying Cross

J85622 P/O Angell, G. E. L., 315 B.C. Mining Bldg., Vancouver, B.C.

J17646 F/O Agrios, J. E., Camrose, Alta.

J5766 F/L Aldwinckle, R. M., Varna, Ont.

J15543 A/F/L Alexander, E. S., 3519 W. 26th Ave., Vancouver, B.C.

J16379 F/O Anderson, P. M., Union Point, Man.

J8924 A/S/L Anderson, W. B., 367 Scotia St., Winnipeg, Man.

J26495 F/O Ardis, B. D., Friendship, New York, U.S.A.

J13824 F/L Armstrong, S. W., 605 Agnes St., Winnipeg, Man.

R137690 W/O Arnott, M. A., 61 Brock St., Barrie, Ont.

J14000 A/F/L Atkins, J., c/o R. L. Miller, 8 Westminster Ave., Montreal.

J14781 A/F/L Baker, E., 339 Sherwood Drive, Ottawa, Ont.

R118197 W/O Balmer, D. H., Box 294, Courtenay, B.C.

C22669 F/O Bamford, J., 158 Cameron Ave., Hamilton, Ont.

J12855 F/O Banks, H. C. C., Ste. 6 Colgrove Apts., Calgary, Alta.

J28388 F/O Banning, J. E. V., 62-5th Ave., Timmins, Ont.

J9161 F/L Barron, J. H., c/o Mrs. A. Player, New Liskeard, Ont.

J85618 P/O Barrowman, A. M., Tisdale, Sask.

C22661 F/O Bateman, L. J., 2A Hamson Ct. 47 Kennedy St., Winnipeg.

J14654 F/O Bartlett, A. H., 999 Old Orchard Ave., N.D.G., Montreal.

J36688 P/O Beamish, R. W., 201 Torrens Ave., Toronto, Ont.

J14413 F/O Bell, A. G., 37 Golding St., Saint John, N.B.

J4821 S/L Bell, J. F. M. A., Las 3 Lagunas, Lasrosas, F.C.C.A. Argentina.

J16898 F/L Berrigan, L. T., Dunedin, Clyde River, P.E.I.

J18864 P/O Berry, D. A., 2353 Rockland Ave., Trail, B.C.

J23390 A/F/L Berry, G. A., 3826 Quadra St., Victoria, B.C.

J24434 F/O Biden, D. E., 183 Church St., Moncton, N.B.

J35981 P/O Billings, J., 844 W. 18th Ave., Vancouver, B.C.

J14132 F/O Blake, W. V., 25 Glenfern Ave., Hamilton, Ont.

J19258 A/F/L Blamey, D. O., 235 King St. E., Apt. 3, Hamilton, Ont.

J3467 A/S/L Blenkinsop, E. W., 1076 Joan Crescent, Victoria, B.C.

J85009 P/O Boal, E. W., 1141 Rae St., Regina, Sask.

J19306 P/O Bolduc, W. J., 2054 Grand Blvd., N.D.G., Montreal, P.Q.

J16264 A/F/L Bonnar, R., 41 Florence St., Ottawa, Ont.

J17932 F/O Borden, J. W., 77 Gore St., Stratford, Ont.

J19536 P/O Borrowes, R. D., 1140 Pine Ave. W., Montreal, P.Q.

J85054 P/O Bouchard, V. J., 2676 Broder St., Regina, Sask.

J14628 F/O Bowers, A., 294 Horton Ave. E., Transcona, Man.

C166 A/G/C Bradshaw, D. A., Beach Grove, Ladner, B.C.

J19441 P/O Britten, T. B., Little Current, Ont.

J10422 F/O Brook, A. C., Boissevain, Man.

R104757 W/O Brown, G. F., Danville, P.Q.

Distinguished Flying Cross—Con.

Number—Rank—Name—Home Address

J18143 P/O Brown, J. F. C., 185 Cyrille St., Quebec City, P.Q.
J16285 F/O Bryers, C. R., Box 595, 10 2nd Ave., Schumacher, Ont.
J20632 F/O Bull, C. F., R.R. No. 4, Hamilton, Ont.
J19249 P/O Burgess, F. W., Box 28, Drumheller, Alta.
J18363 A/F/L Burns, R., 472 North St., Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.
J9392 F/L Burroughs, G. W., 92 Bowie Ave., Toronto, Ont.
J39727 P/O Bush, D. G., R.R. No. 1, Kelowna, B.C.
J22142 F/O Byford, A. J. P., 550 Bay St., Ottawa, Ont.
J22379 F/O *Caine, J. T., General Delivery, South Edmonton, Alta.
J17785 F/O Cameron, T. H., Sylvan Lake, Alta.
J85691 P/O Campbell, S. E., Box 521 Bridge St., Drumheller, Alta.
C148 A/G/C Carscallen, H. M., 93 Victoria Rd., Halifax, N.S.
J19902 P/O Cattiny, G., 5A 15th Avenue, Lachine, Que.
J9135 F/O Chester, A. P. V., 1012 Angus St., Regina, Sask.
J18905 P/O Clark, C. F., R.R. No. 1, Summerland, B.C.
C18639 A/W/C *Clayton, A. C. P., 1686 West 61st Ave., Vancouver, B.C.
J5765 A/S/L Cleveland, H. D., 3490 Cypress St., Vancouver, B.C.
J10313 F/O Cloutier, W. B. B., 35 Parkway Ave., Toronto, Ont.
J18127 P/O Coburn, L. G., 400 Ketchen St., Temiskaming, P.Q.
R124700 W/O Connor, P. M., Kingston, N.S.
J18875 P/O Cook, D. T., Kelowna, B.C.
J17563 F/O Cook, H. R., R.R. No. 1 Abbotsford, B.C.
J11462 F/O Cooke, T. C., Dauphin, Man.
J4539 S/L Cooper, W. B., 517-25th St. S., St. Petersburg, Florida, U.S.A.
J18986 P/O Coutlee, C. M., 53 Findlay Ave., Ottawa, Ont.
J5304 F/L Court, G. L., 38 Second Ave., Ottawa, Ont.
J17793 F/O Craddock, B. A., 9 Norwich Ave., Woodstock, Ont.
J21466 F/O Craig, J., 399 Victor St., Winnipeg, Man.
J19373 P/O Cramer, L. G., Arborfield, Sask.
J10105 F/L Cunningham, C. C., 4718 Douglas Road, Burnaby, B.C.
R92557 W/O Curtis, R. D., 2073 2nd Ave., Trail, B.C.
J10795 F/L Dale, J. P. B., R.R. No. 2, New Westminster, B.C.
J19161 P/O Davidson, A. M., 1235-6th Ave. S., Lethbridge, Alta.
J19143 P/O Davidson, S., Clover Bar P.O., Alta.
J85334 P/O Davie, J., Box 207, Biggar, Sask.
J85093 P/O Davies, F. C., 81 East Young St., Halifax, N.S.
J2936 A/S/L Davis, J. T. J., Como, Quebec.
R107107 W/O Davy, H. W., 449-7th St. E., Prince Albert, Sask.
J16042 F/O Decher, K. A., 35 King St. W., Kitchener, Ont.
J2938 A/S/L De La Haye, A. L., 3348 Marine Dr., Hollyburn B.C.

[Mr. Ralston.]

J8964 A/F/L De Le Paulle, J. A. H., 1700 Massachussetts Ave., Washington, D.C.
J21039 F/O Dempsey, S. W., 639 Christie Ave., Oshawa, Ont.
J14707 A/F/L De Solla, H., 105-41-65th Rd., Forest Hill, N.Y., U.S.A.
J85975 P/O Dickinson, J. C., 329-19 St. W., Prince Albert, Sask.
J19107 P/O Dingley, W., 2130 1st Ave. N.W., Calgary, Alta.
R147280 W/O Douglas, C. L., Rossburn, Man.
J5709 F/L Draper, L. A., 70 Cambridge Ave., Toronto, Ont.
J16306 F/O Drimmie, G. R., 1547 Comox St., Vancouver, B.C.
J19955 P/O Duncan, J. D., Antler, Sask.
J16125 F/O Duff, T. R. N., 436-13th St. W., Prince Albert, Sask.
J5699 A/S/L Dyer, H. R. F., Minnedosa, Man.
J19824 P/O Edwards, J. F., 73 Garside Ave., Hamilton, Ont.
J16917 A/F/L Empey, G. C., 1303 Lyall St., Esquimalt, B.C.
J19792 P/O Evans, W. T., 484 Beverley St., Winnipeg, Man.
J6222 F/L Everard, H. J., 101 Tamarack St., Timmins, Ont.
J16328 A/F/L Ewer, H. F., Box 1326, Kelowna, B.C.
J16440 F/O Facey, H. R., 10632 104th St., Edmonton, Alta.
J14222 F/O Farb, H. R., 193 Lonemount Dr., Toronto, Ont.
R96333 WO Findlay, J. B., Fitzroy Harbour, Ont.
J13956 F/O Finlayson, C. G., 1040 Craigdarroch Road, Victoria, B.C.
J19797 P/O Fjeldsted, T. B., Arborg, Man.
J18382 P/O Folkes, F. W., 362 Bleeker St., Toronto, Ont.
J21918 F/O Fonger, O. W., Apt. 5, 383 Bayview Ave., Leaside, Ont.
J19915 P/O Fonseca, A. R. O., 179 Kensington St. N., Hamilton, Ont.
J21372 A/F/L Ford, C. G., Melfort, Sask.
J10690 F/O Francis, G. E., 11 Train St., Sydney, N.S.
J14225 F/O Franklin, A. E., Zealandia, Sask.
C1350 F/L Fraser, R. B., R.R. #1, Pictou, N.S.
J22321 F/O Fraser, T., 365 Belfast St., Medicine Hat, Alta.
C1617 A/W/C French, D. T., 110 Province St., Hamilton, Ont.
J18391 P/O Galan, P. R., Wisla, Man.
C18867 P/O Gargett, E., 212 Spencer St., Medicine Hat, Alta.
J16299 F/O Garrett, E. W., 363 Wolverleigh Blvd., Toronto, Ont.
J12273 F/O Gibbons, N., 2355 Marine Drive, W. Vancouver, B.C.
J17590 F/O Gibbs, J. C., Beech Ave., Bowmanville, Ont.
J18534 F/O Gorrill, V. I., Camp Lister, Creston, B.C.
J21811 F/O Gourlay, J. L., 3rd Ave., Ladysmith, B.C.
J18335 P/O Graham, D. D., 780 E. 31st Ave., Vancouver, B.C.
J21518 F/O Gray, J. M., 411 10th St., New Westminster, B.C.
J19799 P/O Gray, R. A., 827 Elias St., London, Ont.
J5683 S/L Grierson-Jackson, W., 534 Trunk Road, Ladner, B.C.

Distinguished Flying Cross—Con.

Number—Rank—Name—Home Address

J17559 F/O Grout, A. C., 1294 Clyde Ave., Vancouver, B.C.

J13388 F/O Hamblin, W. D. M., 1606 Defer Place, Detroit, Mich., U.S.A.

C1625 A/W/C Hamber, E. C., 17 Chilton Place, Hamilton, Ont.

J16121 F/O Hamilton, F. F., Mazenod, Sask.

J15599 A/F/L Hanson, J. R., 17, The Fairway, Clifton, Yorks, England.

J17377 F/O Harding, J. R., 84 East Rd., Tylorstown Place, S. Wales.

J9316 F/L Harland, G. R., 113 Villaire Ave., Riverside, Ont.

J9766 F/L Harris, W. J., 5 Visart St., Saint John, N.B.

J20064 A/F/L Harris, F. R., 611 Wilson St., Victoria, B.C.

J85081 P/O Harvey, J. D., 54 Lavinia Ave., Toronto, Ont.

R140172 WO2 Hayes, J. H., 335 Martin St., Banff, Alta.

R105406 WO Hayward, F. R., Emsdale, Ont.

J21121 F/O Healey, W. A., 141 Gibson St., N. Parry Sound, Ont.

C1469 A/S/L Hebert, R. J. C., Magog, P.Q.

J16650 F/O Heide, C. L. R., 1254 Venables St., Vancouver, B.C.

J11139 A/F/L Heron, P. W., 7818 104th St., Edmonton, Alta.

J18834 P/O Hicks, V. C., 3613 7A St., W. Calgary, Alta.

J15695 A/S/L Higgins, C. W., St. Avards, Charlottetown, P.E.I.

J16255 F/O Hill, V. P. B., R.R. #3, St. Catharines, Ont.

J19496 P/O Hind, J. P., 1207 Duke St., Victoria, B.C.

J85245 P/O Hirschfield, G. D., Goldenville, N.S.

J18609 P/O Hodges, S. C., 744 Ingersoll St., Winnipeg, Man.

J12835 F/L Hodson, A. H., Box 86, Vancouver Island, Alberni, B.C.

J19003 P/O Hopton, C. G., 310 S. Archibald St., Fort William, Ont.

R82755 WO Houston, J. T., Box 49, Carleton Place, Ont.

J85337 P/O Howard, T. J., R.R. 7, Lucknow, Ont.

J12639 F/O Hughes, J. R., R.R.1, Northwood, Ont.

J10708 F/O Hughes, P. G., Box 519, Courtenay, B.C.

J22196 F/O Huletsky, P., 6319 Third Ave., Rosemount, Montreal, P.Q.

C18877 F/O Hurd, E. J., Arundel, 6 Walnut Rd., Chelston, Torquay, Eng.

R58023 W/O Hurst, H. R., Grimsby, Ont. (Box 316).

J17380 A/F/L Hyslop, M. C., 10612-124 St., Edmonton, Alta.

J17096 A/F/L Ingalls, B. J., Sayabec Station, P.Q.

J18946 P/O Jackson, H. N., R.R. No. 2, Millet, Alta. (Box 24).

J19705 P/O Jarman, R. H., 11525-88 St., Edmonton, Alta.

J22577 F/O Johnson, C. H., Strome, Alta.

J14873 A/F/L Johnson, J. R. F., Omemee, Ont.

J19259 P/O Johnston, J. I., 65 Avenue Rd., Toronto, Ont.

J19171 P/O Jones, E. T., 9602-149th St., Edmonton, Alta.

J7548 S/L Keillor, H. G., Mitchell, Ont.

J20729 F/O Kelly, R. L., Miniota, Man.

J19139 P/O Kennedy, H. R., 475 Washington St., New Glasgow, N.S.

J18976 P/O Kimmett, T. H., 303-10th St. N.W., Calgary, Alta.

J4743 A/S/L Kipp, R. A., 359 Nicola St., Kamloops, B.C.

R145973 W/O Knight, D. H., 629 Simcoe St., Winnipeg, Man.

C1174 S/L Knox, D. G., Box 314, Shelburne, N.S.

J14639 F/O Lafond, P. C. E., 117 Hotel de Ville St., Hull, Que.

J18786 A/F/L Laine, S. R. W., 341 Clavet St., Port Arthur, Ont.

J86146 P/O LaPierre, J. J. B. G., 3452 Verdun Ave., Verdun, Que.

R92986 W/O Lawrence, J. W., 207-75th St. S., Lethbridge, Alta.

J85624 P/O Lebel, G. Y., Cacouna, P.Q.

J19641 P/O Ledger, W. H., 202 Belgravia Ave., Toronto 10, Ont.

J9775 F/O Leitch, A. K., 49 MacDonald Ave., Weston, Ont.

J85534 P/O Leslie, A. B., Snipe Lake, Sask.

R182122 W/O Lindo, W. A., 42 Myrtle Ave., Toronto, Ont.

J17417 A/F/L Linton, K. R., Plaster Rock, N.B.

J4330 A/S/L Lisson, H. S., 19 Edgewood Crescent, Toronto, Ont.

J8948 F/L Lock, W., 939 Esquimalt Rd., Victoria, B.C.

J19067 P/O Logan, E. A., 308 Aberdeen St., Medicine Hat, Alta.

J4883 A/F/L Lord, F. G., 31 Newton St., Sherbrooke, P.Q.

C1634 A/W/C MacDonald, D. C., Apt. 522, Carlyn Hotel, 2500 Q. St., Washington, D.C., U.S.A.

J15099 F/L MacDonald, G. W., Wanham, Alta.

J21612 F/O MacDonald, H. M., 3290 Marine Drive, West Vancouver, B.C.

J3103 F/L MacFadyen, D. A., 29 Chestnut Park Rd., Toronto, Ont.

J18192 A/F/L Mackett, R. E., 266 Hall Ave., Windsor, Ont.

J19268 A/F/L MacKinnon, L. L., Box 65, Ponoka, Alta.

J16777 F/O MacLeod, G. G., 323 Glenholme Ave., Toronto, Ont.

J15633 A/F/L Manning, R. V., 4623-10th W., Vancouver, B.C.

J18724 A/F/L Marvin, J., Kentville, N.S. (258 Cornwallis St.).

J22227 F/O Matheson, S. E., 1640 Ottawa St., Regina, Sask.

J35980 P/O Maxwell, W. C., 9 Bartonville Ave., Mount Dennis, Toronto 9, Ont.

J18290 P/O Meaden, W. H. D., 9745-86 Ave., Edmonton, Alta.

C19081 P/O Meeks, S. A., 22 Earl St., Kingston, Ont.

J6145 F/L Meyer, S. O., 1690 Canora Rd., Town of Mt. Royal, Que.

J15958 A/F/L Middlemiss, R. G., 6970 De-Normanville St., Montreal, P.Q.

J19404 A/F/L Middlemiss, W. S., Aneroid, Sask.

J21288 F/O Miller, G. N., 10710-10th St., Edmonton, Alta.

J19630 P/O Milne, G. S., 10025-83rd Ave., Edmonton, Alta.

C1596 S/L Milne, R. F., 61 Lancaster Ave., Saint John, N.B.

R69302 W/O Minogue, J. S., 264 King St. West, Ingersoll, Ont.

Distinguished Flying Cross—Con.

Number—Rank—Name—Home Address.

J4101 F/L Mitchell, J. F., 460 Beresford Ave., Toronto, Ont.
J18424 A/F/L Mitchell, J. M., Biggar, Sask.
J15697 F/L Montgomery, W. D. C., Timiskaming Station, Ont.
J18937 P/O Morrison, J. R., Montreal West, P.Q.
J13721 A/F/L Morrison, N. B., 581 Logan Ave., Toronto, Ont.
R74757 W/O Mower, A. J. C., Port Dalhousie, Ont.
C5645 A/F/L Muir, G. A., 181 Kilbride Ave., Winnipeg, Man.
R188011 W/O Murre, T. M. J., 169 Hibernia St., Cobourg, Ont.
J20392 F/L Murphy, C. E. J., 15 Harriet St., Belleville, Ont.
J7212 F/L Murray, B. A., 2341 Yonge St., Toronto, Ont.
J21443 A/F/L Murray, F. N., Barbados, B.W.I.
J16477 F/O Myles, J. R., 13 Lewin Park W., Saint John, N.B.
J6136 A/S/L McCormack, J. E., Estevan, Sask.
J18808 P/O McEwen, I. G., 2486-8th Ave. W., Vancouver, B.C.
C19702 P/O McGill, M. D., Homewood, Man.
J18816 P/O McInnis, W. N., Yahk, B.C.
J19308 P/O McIntosh, J. A., Box 175, Revelstoke, B.C.
J15175 A/W/C McKay, W. A., 3116 W. 2nd Ave., Vancouver, B.C.
J21892 F/O McKinnon, W. R., Delburne, Alta.
R102034 (J86249) P/O McLean, O. D., 1325 Princess Ave., Brandon, Man.
C1637 A/W/C McLernon, A. R., 3275 Cedar Ave., Westmount, P.Q.
J4886 A/S/L McLeish, W. A. G., 128 Grosvenor Ave. S., Hamilton, Ont.
J19570 P/O McQuade, A. R. R., 189 Bergemont Ave., Quebec, P.Q.
J17272 F/O Naylor, W. K., Coleman, Alta.
J18461 P/O Noyes, W. R. S., Marshal, Sask.
J12882 A/S/L Ough, G. B., Newmarket, Ont.
J15676 F/O Ovens, G., Enniskillen, Ireland.
J6832 F/L Owens, J. R., 1261 Lincoln Rd., Windsor, Ont.
J15818 A/W/C Palmer, C. W., Dundalk, Ont.
J85007, P/O Paterson, W., Mullinger, Sask.
J15159 A/S/L Patterson, H. T., Maryland Hill, Fredericton, N.B.
C18516 P/O Peck, G. R. H., 1 Belvedere Rd., Westmount, P.Q.
R139455 W/O Perrin, J. H., R.R. No. 1, Ayr, Ont.
J18238 T/F/O Peterson, I. N., Grassy Lake, Alta.
J19065 P/O Phillips, G. I., Box 96 W. Selkirk, Man.
J19005 P/O Phillips, W. G., 471 Victoria Ave., St. Lambert, P.Q.
J19053 P/O Pigeon, P. E., Williams Lake, B.C.
C1395 W/C * Pleasance, W. P., 638-1st Ave., Calgary, Alta.
J14032 F/O Plummer, A. G., 214 Pitt St., Saint John, N.B.
R104431 W/O Pothier, B. F., Pinkney's Point, Yarmouth, N.S.
J11222 F/L Powell, P. A., Copper Mountain, B.C.
J19064 P/O Powers, J. E., 1065 Bathurst St., Toronto, Ont.
J16236 F/O Pratt, J. H., 322 Baltimore Rd., Winnipeg, Man.

[Mr. Ralston.]

J19480 P/O Prebble, F. N., 751 Carlaw Ave., Apt. 6, Toronto, Ont.
J14679 F/O Protheroe, D. H., Box 91, Elnore, Alta.
R108311 W/O Racette, J. F., 3443 St. Hubert St., Montreal, P.Q.
J14658 F/O Rackham, P. R., Summerside, P.E.I.
J10421 A/F/L Ratcliffe, R. E. D., 375 Alfred St., Kingston, Ont.
J22187 F/O Rees, H. L., 1123 Front St., Nelson, B. C.
J8391 F/L Reid, T. G., Delore, Ont.
J16290 F/O Reid, W. H., 141 Old Forrest Hill Rd., Toronto, Ont.
J22484 A/F/L Renton, W. D., 1418 Vining St., Victoria, B.C.
J14577 F/O Ridgers, C. F., 156 Flatt Ave., Hamilton, Ont.
C7940 F/O Ritchie, J., Outremont, P.Q.
R117140 W/O Robertson, D. F., Sault Ste. Marie, Ont. (339 Cathcart St.)
J14214 F/O Robson, W. W., Crookston, Minn., U.S.A.
J17973 F/O Rocheleau, J. R. U., Stoney Point, Ontario.
J16289 A/F/L Roddick, F. J., Viking, Alberta.
C8323 F/L Ross, A. S., 1514 Beacon St., Brookline, Mass., U.S.A.
J19988 P/O Routledge, J. D., 511 Horne Avenue, Mission, B.C.
C16030 A/F/L Row, D. N., General Delivery, Almonte, Ontario.
J8954 A/F/L Rowand, J. G., Bethune, Sask.
J29626 P/O Roy, A. M., Maitland, Hants Co., Nova Scotia.
J12247 F/O Russell, W. A., LeRoy, Sask.
J8401 A/S/L Russell, W. A., 25 Buttonwood Ave., Mt. Dennis, Ontario.
J6275 F/L Sanderson, J. H., R.R. 2, Dresden, Ontario.
J20948 A/F/L Scott, H. N., 998 Dorchester Ave., Winnipeg, Manitoba.
J18809 P/O Scott, I. J., 135 Russell St., Brandon, Manitoba.
J8698 P/O Seaton, J. A. M., Castlegar, B.C.
J17172 A/F/L Shearer, H. M., 189 William St., London, Ontario.
J22103 F/O Sharer, N. M., 298 Sorauren Avenue, Toronto, Ont.
J15488 F/O Sherlock, A. A., 17 Ridley Gardens, Toronto, Ont.
J15489 F/O Sherlock, E. T., 17 Ridley Gardens, Toronto, Ont.
J10591 P/O Sherman, L., Yarmouth, Nova Scotia.
J23409 F/O Sherwood, M. C., 711-3rd Ave. West, Calgary, Alta.
J16511 A/F/L Shortt, H. S., 119 Kent Street, Whitby, Ont.
J19612 P/O Sim, F. C., Tisdale, Saskatchewan.
J16625 A/F/L Simpson, J. A. T., 52 Govt. Rd. W., Apt. 8, Bolton Bldg., Kirkland Lake, Ont.
C18818 S/L Skene, D. C., 157 King St. E., Kingston, Ontario.
J10025 F/L Smith, A. P., Sceptre, Sask.
J14627 F/O Smith, H. F. E., 1 Burnfield Ave., Toronto, Ont.
J18593 A/F/L Smith, N. J., 3436 W-7th Avenue, Vancouver, B.C.
J8371 A/S/L Smith, C. W., 3050 Alexander Blvd., Windsor, Ont.
J8656 F/L Smith, R. S., 127 Inherman St., St. Thomas, Ont.

Distinguished Flying Cross—Con.

Number—Rank—Name—Home Address

J18140 A/F/L Snell, C. R., East St., Sarnia, Ont.
J23988 F/O Spackman, G. L., Box 201, Raymond, Alta.
J14328 F/L Spafford, W., 235 Ash Street, Winnipeg, Manitoba.
J19030 P/O Stephen, G. C., 222 Melita Ave., Toronto 4, Ontario.
J14796 F/O Stewart, W. A. R., 385 Broadview Avenue, Toronto, Ont.
J10407 A/F/L Stockdale, A. M., 5477 Coolbrooke Avenue, Montreal, Que.
J8922 A/S/L Stover, C. H., 14 Grove Rd., Thorton Heath, Surrey, Eng.
J9653 A/F/L Stringer, R. H., Davyroyd Willows, Sask.
J86114 P/O Sutherland, C. B., R.R. 2, Truro, Nova Scotia.
J16044 A/F/L Sutherland, G. G., 802 Governor Avenue, Winnipeg, Man.
J86153 P/O Taggart, R. L., 858-4th Street East, Prince Albert, Sask.
J20993 F/O Taylor, E. A. T., 3441 Salsbury Way, Victoria, B.C.
J14909 F/O Taylor, P. H., 14-W-10th St. Kansas City, Missouri, U.S.A.
J5473 F/L Thomas, L. D., 13973 Rosemont Rd., Detroit, Michigan, U.S.A.
J85113 P/O Thompson, E. C., 649 Woodbine Avenue, Toronto, Ont.
J22515 F/O Thompson, H. J., Gelert, Ont.
C20880 A/F/L Thompson, J. G., 3 Peel Ave., Brampton, Ont.
J19187 P/O Thompson, W. A., Lipton, Sask.
R57750 W/O Thorburn, W. F., 3548 Georgia St. E., Vancouver, B.C.
R10916 W/O Todd, L. H., Box 413, Stettler, Alta.
J16079 A/F/L Toms, L. J., 444 Bridge St., Niagara Falls, Ont.
J19286 P/O Tremblay, J. A. G., 109-8th Ave., Quebec City, Quebec.
J17744 F/O Tucker, M. C., Westmount Ave., Lake View, Ont.
J17956 F/O Tucker, W. W., Greencastle, Indiana, U.S.A.
J15054 W/C Turnbull, R. S., Govan, Sask.
J21370 A/F/L Turnbull, J. C., Govan, Sask.
J18177 F/O Turnbull, W. W. W., 433 Woodlawn Ave., San Antonio, Texas, U.S.A.
C1577 W/C Turner, S. D., 131 Olive Street, Victoria, B.C.
J10677 W/O Veira, B. V. L., 1431 MacKay St., Apt. 12, Montreal, Que.
R119127 W/O Watt, O. A., 38 Afton Ave., Toronto, Ont.
J18309 P/O Watt, R. H., 327 Cambridge St., Winnipeg, Man.
J8757 F/L Walker, W. E., Blubber Bay, B.C.
J14570 F/O Walls, G. M., Aneroid, Saskatchewan.
J18784 P/O Weaver, C., 1201 N.W. 38th St., Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, U.S.A.
J19026 P/O Weeks, H. A., 426 Mary St., Chilliwack, B.C.
J22042 F/O Weldon, G. A., R.R. No. 1, Dartmouth, N.S.
R115716 W/O Westad, R. A., 3870 Lonsdale Ave. N., Vancouver, B.C.
J16965 A/F/L Westell, R. A., 19 Huxley Ave. South, Hamilton, Ont.
J9072 A/S/L Westland, J. A., 1386 Ouellette Ave., Windsor, Ont.
J23795 F/O White, A. S., 19 Union St., Sydney, N.S.
J85716 P/O Wilding, J. A., Red Lake, Ont.
J11131 F/O Wiley, D. R., 769 Dufferin Ave., London, Ont.
J85043 P/O Wilkie, G. A., 147 The Glen, St. Vital, Man.
J17906 F/O Williams, J. R., Collingwood Rd., R. No. 5 N.W. Grand Rapids, Michigan, U.S.A.
J23777 F/O Wilmot, B. E., 834 McMillan Ave., Winnipeg, Man.
J85676 P/O Wilson, F. A. W. J., 91 Crown St., Port Arthur, Ont.
J19982 P/O Wilson, P. J., Ste. "M" Commodore Apts., Edmonton, Alta.
J18773 A/F/L Wolton, G. W., 1134 Westmount Boulevard, Calgary, Alta.
J21768 F/O Wondolowski, C. A., 198 William St., Bridgeport, Connecticut, U.S.A.
J19016 P/O Wood, E. H., Kelwood, Man.

Bars to Distinguished Flying Cross

J15254 A/S/L Austin, L. F., 28 Butternut St., Toronto, Ont.
J7230 F/L McElroy, J. F., Box 212, Banville, P.Q.

Distinguished Flying Medal

J85441 P/O Allin, H. R., 186 Gibbon St., Oshawa, Ont.
R180986 F.S. Bodnoff, I. J., 69 Nelson St., Ottawa, Ont.
R110387 Sgt. Boynton, B. D., 1505-15 St. East, Calgary, Alta.
R136423 Sgt. Bruce, N., 64 Beresford Ave., Toronto, Ont.
R171696 F.S. Cable, A. B., Big Valley, Alta.
R72673 Sgt. Campbell, T. E., 99 Pownal St., Charlottetown, P.E.I.
R159333 F.S. Cantera, D. R., 9266-110-A Ave., Edmonton, Alta.
R179677 F.S. Cole, S. R., 256 Lake Promenade, Long Branch, Ont.
R187075 Sgt. Croteau, J. M. A., Bonnyville, Alta.
C86115 P/O Edie, R. A., Langham, Sask.
R195070 Sgt. Florence, J. P. A. A., 1418 Viau St., Montreal, P.Q.
R188973 Sgt. Fraser, N. C., 76 McDonald St., Ottawa, Ont.
R56103 Sgt. George, E. O., 1262-3rd Ave. E., Owen Sound, Ont.
R156584 Sgt. Glass, H., 287 Queen St. E., Toronto, Ont.
R157861 W/O Halvorsen, S. J., 856-13 Ave. East, Vancouver, B.C.
R129608 F.S. Hexter, G. E., 83 Smith St., London, Ont.
R139543 F.S. Kondra, W., Box 75, Prud'homme, Sask.
R155760 F.S. Lightfoot, D. G., Burnham, Sask.
R159115 F.S. Long, K. L., Devonshire Apts., 112th St., Edmonton, Alta.
R195860 Sgt. Mangione, J., 53 Louise St., Ottawa, Ont.
R79681 Sgt. Moritz, F. J., Gull Lake, Sask.
R191057 Sgt. McRae, C., Vivian Stn., Man.
J18125 P/O Pennington, S., 67 Sydenham St., Dundas, Ont.
R216097 Sgt. Petsche, J., 56-6th Ave., Ville La Salle, P.Q.
R111339 F.S. Pilon, J. N. J., Luskville, P.Q.
R179322 F.S. Price, M. G., 1621 Queen St. W., Apt. 27, Toronto, Ont.
R211243 Sgt. Ritchie, G. J. M., 4348 Melrose Ave., Montreal, P.Q.

Distinguished Flying Medal—Con.

Rank and Name—Corps—Address

J85488 P/O Salkeld, H. A. B., 133 Sherbrooke St., North Bay, Ont.
R165313 F.S. Steedsman, C. P. E., 131 Church St., Parry Sound, Ont.
R184363 Sgt. Sullivan, J. B., 28 Baker St., Cobalt, Ont.
J85311 P/O Sumak, L. S., R.R. No. 1, Hannon, Ont.
R135221 F.S. Tinmouth, A. W., Herring Cove, Halifax, N.S.
R123425 Sgt. Walton, W. J., 41 Beachdale Ave., Toronto, Ont.
R207740 Sgt. Wright, D. H., 817 Bank St., Ottawa, Ont.
R207226 Sgt. Ziomko, W. J., 2857 Ontario St., Montreal, P.Q.

Conspicuous Gallantry Medal

R138466 W/O Meek, R. J., 3195 W. 23rd Ave., Vancouver, B.C.

George Medal

J7526 F/L Abel, G. C., 3B Bevin Court, Yorkton, Sask.
R103014 W/O McGrath, W. K., R.R. No. 1, Bartonville, Ont.

Appendix "B"

Canadians in R.A.F.

Gallantry Awards

Number—Rank—Name—Home Address—

776068 W/O Anderson, W. M., Not available, D.F.C.
126404 F/O Apps, W. G., Not available, D.F.C.
39777 F/L Birchfield, F. E. W., New Westminster, B.C., A.F.C.
F/Sgt. Bishop, J. F., Calgary, Alta., A.F.M.
41344 S/L Cox, R. M., A.F.C.
41000 F/O Dundas, K. C. V. D., Pelly, Sask., D.F.C.
42341 F/L Ennis, J. M., A.F.C.
34218 S/L Fenwick-Wilson, R. M., Rock Creek, B.C., A.F.C.
36044 W/C Foord-Kelcey, A., A.F.C.
29009 S/L Foster, G. A. C., Shellbrook, Sask., A.F.C.
40306 F/L Knowles, P. H., Victoria, B.C., A.F.C.
G/C Livingston, P. C., A.F.C.
37858 A/W/C Lambert, F. F., Grantham, Lincolnshire, England, D.F.C.
F/O Martin, H. B., D.F.C.
S/L Martin, W., Calgary, Alta., D.S.C.
39562 A/W/C Piddington, J. A., Esquimalt, B.C., D.F.C.
GB1481880 F/Sgt Sumner, K. L., Old Berry House, Bubwith, Salby, Yorkshire, England, D.F.M.
110636 A/S/L Thomas, G. D. M., D.F.C.
42279 A/S/L Tripe, P. V. K., D.F.C.
90915 A/W/C Wynne-Powell, G. T., Toronto, Ont., D.F.C.
41761 F/L Wardle, H. D., 2245 Turner Rd., Windsor, Ont., M.C.
40965 S/L Wellburn, D. C., 2276 E. Broadway, Vancouver, B.C., D.F.C.
41888 F/O Whitecross, J. A., 183 Ash St., Winnipeg, Man., D.F.C.

[Mr. Ralston.]

R.C.A.F. Personnel Decorated by Allied Governments

United States Distinguished Flying Cross

J17877 F/O Carr, A. L., Box 78, Kyle, Sask.
J16176 F/O Churchill, J. M., 338-11 St. East, Prince Albert, Sask.
J9689 F/O Mackie, A. J., 611 Balfour Apts., Regina, Sask.
J17876 F/O Marin, A. A., Squamish, B.C.

United States Army Air Medal

J17877 F/O Carr, A. L., Box 78, Kyle, Sask., 2 Oak Lf. Clusters.
J11464 F/L Cox, R. S., 739 Wolseley Ave., Winnipeg, Man., U.S. Air Medal.
J17887 P/O Cruickshank D. H. 69 Mecklenburg St., Saint John, N.B., 2 Oak Lf. Clusters.
J17125 P/O Fleck, C. S., Middle Stewiacke, N.S., U.S. Air Medal and 4 Oak Lf. Clusters.
J11978 F/O Galbraith, R. F., Shelburne, Ont., U.S. Air Medal.
J17127 F/O Gall, R. D., Rose Valley, Sask., U.S. Air Medal and 3 Oak Lf. Clusters.
J26909 F/O Hobbie, N. H., c/o Dr. G. M. Maxwell, Route 4 Roanoke, Virginia, U.S.A., U.S. Air Medal.
J17136 F/O Lamoureux, A. P., 11251-92 St., Edmonton, Alta., U.S. Air Medal and 3 Oak Lf. Clusters.
J12044 F/O MacLean, W. M., 6 Athol St., Campbellton, N.B., U.S. Air Medal.
J11967 F/O McDuff, D. M., R.R. 2 Mona Rd., Ont., U.S. Air Medal.
J17876 F/O Martin, A. A., Squamish, B.C., U.S. Air Medal and 6 Oak Lf. Clusters.
J17880 P/O Martino, G. W., 5499 Bourette Ave., Montreal, P.Q., U.S. Air Medal and 2 Oak Lf. Clusters.
J17883 F/O Miron, W. A. J., 111 Lellington Ave., Toronto, Ont., U.S. Air Medal and 4 Oak Lf. Clusters.
J17129 P/O Paradis, J. J. P., 522 St. Jean St., Que., U.S. Air Medal and 1 Oak Lf.

Appendix "C"

R.C.A.F. Personnel Decorated by Allied Governments

United States Army Air Medal

Number—Rank—Name—Home Address

J4116 F/L Roseland, A. W., c/o Mrs. A. E. Weiler, Neustadt, Ont.
J17881 P/O Robertson, F., 605-33rd St. W., Saskatoon, Sask., with 2 Oak leaves.
J17128 P/O Robertson, R. D., Roblin, Man., with 3 Oak leaves.
J17878 F/O Sibbald, R. E., Cockrane, Alta., with 1 Oak leaf.
J3205 S/L Walker, B. R., D.F.C., 189 John St., London, Ont.
J6159 F/L Robertson, D. F., 410-2nd Ave. E., Owen Sound, Ont.
J13478 F/O Cochand, L. E., Ste. Marguerite, P.Q.

United States Soldier's Medal

R116959 Cpl. Harrett, D. M., 7 Montgomery Cresc., Wallaceburg, Ont.

Greek Distinguished Service Medal

J16144 F/O Hionides, H. T., 68-16th Ave., Paterson, New Jersey, U.S.A.

Supplementary List of Awards Recently Announced

Distinguished Flying Cross

Number—Rank—Name—Home Address

J18923 A/F/L Flewelling, M. F., 512-22nd Ave. West, Calgary, Alta.
J20820 F/O Campbell, W. J., No. 2 Fire Hall, Lethbridge, Alta.
J21640 F/O Haworth, R. J., 90A Hiawatha Road, Toronto, Ontario.
J22093 F/O James, R. H., 941 West 20th Ave., Vancouver, B.C.
J17270 F/O Williams, J. F. H., 22 Norwood Rd., Toronto, Ont.
J26921 F/O Campbell, G., 3015 E. 18th Ave., Vancouver, B.C.
J25802 F/O Hall, J. T., 86 Byron Ave., Apt. 2, London, Ont.
J19881 P/O Kalle, J., 1022 Bruce Avenue, Windsor, Ont.
J9081 F/L Lindsay, J. D., 205 Daniel St., Arnprior, Ont.
C1697 F/L Trainer, H. C., Bedford, P.E.I.
J20050 A/F/L Johnson, P. G., Not available.
J17857 A/F/L Moore, L. A., 1328 Hale St., Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A.
R114420 W.O. Foster, W. P., R.R. No. 6, Guelph, Ont.
J15707 F/L Hay, H. B., 67 Canada Rd., Edmonton, Alta.
J19783 P/O Mann, L. A., 103 Broadway S., Portage la Prairie, Man.
R130008 W.O. Korman, A. I., 17-8th St., Noranda, P.Q.
J10507 F/L Van Ness, J. C., 623-9th St., Saskatoon, Sask.
J10514 F/L Fockler, E. W., 1756 W. 10th Ave., Vancouver, B.C.
J9167 F/L Winslow, T. B., Ste. Agathe des Monts, P.Q.
J5343 F/L Sheblock, F. J., 530-21st Ave. W., Calgary, Alta.
J9348 F/L Pritchard, J. E., Middleton, Wisconsin, U.S.A.
J8947 F/L Carlson, A. T., 318-38th Ave. S.W., Calgary, Alta.
J15205 A/F/L Linton, O. M., Wolsely, Sask.
J15479 A/F/L Faurot, V. J. J., 425 Park St., Niagara Falls, Ont.
J16342 A/F/L Dover, D. H., 24 Cordella Ave., Mt. Denis, Ont.
J18075 F/O Date, H. B., 202 Maria St., Sarnia, Ont.
J18403 F/O Sorge, F. S., Pincher Creek, Alta.
J15930 F/O Howe, N. C. R., 68 Charles St. E., Apt. 19, Manhattan Apts., Toronto, Ont.
J7792 F/L Martin, O. A. J., 385 Chapel St., Ottawa, Ont.
J7913 F/L Thring, G. H., R.R. No. 5, Rockwood, Ont.
J10611 F/L Jasper, C. M., 170 South Post St., Clark Hotel, Spokane, Washington, U.S.A.
J2017 F/O McRae, J. M., Box 883, Yarmouth, N.S.
R117327 W.O. Bergevin, J. J. C., Cochrane, Ont.

Victoria Cross

J7594 F/L Hornell, D. E., Drayton, Ont.

Bar to Distinguished Flying Cross

J5023 A/S/L Conrad, W. A. G., Richmond, Ont.
J15246 A/S/L Buckham, R. A., Box 1036, Vancouver, B.C.
J13956 F/O Finlayson, C. G., 1040 Craigdarroch Rd., Victoria, B.C.

Distinguished Service Order

J22754 F/O Moore, K. O., 2645-5th Ave. W., Vancouver, B.C.

Distinguished Flying Medal

R195070 F/S Woolsey, A. R., 4320 Atlin St., Vancouver, B.C.
R81621 F/S Lacaille, V. J. P., 2 MacDonald St., Magog, P.Q.
R94919 F/S Enerson, T. H. N., Not available.

Conspicuous Gallantry Medal

R140754 Sgt. Engbrecht, P., 50 Brunswick St., Fredericton, N.B.

DECORATIONS FOR GALLANTRY—
ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I beg leave to table the names of one hundred and thirty-nine officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy who have received operational awards in the period 1st March, 1944, to 12th August, 1944.

I should like to say that in addition to the operational awards twenty-five non-operational awards have been granted to personnel of the Royal Canadian Navy. These non-operational awards have been made in the following orders:

C.B.	1
C.B.E.	2
O.B.E.	9
M.B.E.	6
B.E.M.	7

Royal Canadian Navy

Operational Awards

1st March-12th August, 1944

O.B.E.—3

LaPage, Theodore Nelson, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Vancouver, B.C., May 3, 1944.

Pickard, Antony Fenwick, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.R., South Porcupine, N.S., June 8, 1944.

Rankin, Angus Hetherington, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Vancouver, B.C., June 8, 1944.

M.B.E.—4

Arsenault, William James, Mate, R.C.N.R., Grindstone, Magdalen Is., Quebec, June 8, 1944.

Baker, Herman, A/Skipper Lieut., R.C.N.R., Yarmouth N., N.S., June 8, 1944.

Darrach, Claude Kenneth, Chief Skipper, R.C.N.R., Herring Cove, N.S., June 8, 1944.

Idiens, Leonard, Sub-Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Campbell River, B.C., June 8, 1944.

D.S.O.—1

DeWolf, Henry George, Captain, R.C.N., Halifax, N.S., May 3, 1944.

Operational Awards—Con.

D.S.C.—12

Burk, Charles Arthur, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Toronto, Ont., May 2, 1944.

Burke, Cornellius, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Vancouver, B.C., May 30, 1944.

Coughlin, Clifton Rexford, Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Ottawa, Ont., July 18, 1944.

Cosh, Digby Rex Bell, A/Lieutenant Commander (A), R.C.N.V.R., Ottawa, Ont., May 30, 1944.

Fraser, James Philip, Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.R., Halifax, N.S., July 4, 1944.

Gooderham, William George, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Vancouver, B.C., July 18, 1944.

Kirkpatrick, James R. H., A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Toronto, Ont., March 7, 1944.

Lincoln, John Hobart, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Calgary, Alta., July 4, 1944.

Maitland, John Douglas, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R. (A/Lieut. Commander), Vancouver, B.C., May 30, 1944.

Parker, Charles Rodger, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Toronto, Ont., May 30, 1944.

Stubbs, John Hamilton, D.S.O., Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N., Kaslo, B.C., July 11, 1944.

Wadsworth, Rein Boulton, Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Toronto, Ont., May 30, 1944.

Bar to D.S.C.—3

Fuller, Thomas George, D.S.C., Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Ottawa, Ont., April 4, 1944.

Plomer, James, D.S.C., Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Winnipeg, Man., April 18, 1944.

Stead, Gordon Wilson, D.S.C., A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Vancouver, B.C., May 30, 1944.

George Medal—1

Robertson, Owen Connor, Commander, R.C.N.R., Halifax, N.S., June 8, 1944.

D.S.M.—10

Abbott, Douglas, C.P.O., R.C.N., Official Number 2479, Victoria, B.C., July 11, 1944.

Badger, Edward, Petty Officer, R.C.N.V.R., V-7899, Toronto, Ontario, July 18, 1944.

Craig, Frances Dudley, Able Seaman, R.C.N.V.R., V-32905, Kamsack, Sask., July 18, 1944.

Forrester, Thomas Houston, Stoker 1, R.C.N.V.R., Nanaimo, B.C., June 20, 1944.

Longbottom, Arthur, Engine Room Artificer 3/c, R.C.N.V.R., V-10650, Moose Jaw, Sask., July 18, 1944.

Nunn, Allen, Able Seaman, R.C.N., O.N. 4118, Vancouver, B.C., April 11, 1944.

Richard, John Herren, Able Seaman, R.C.N.V.R., V-16076, Port Arthur, Ontario, July 4, 1944.

Starr, John, Signalman, R.C.N.V.R., V-24919, Winnipeg, Man., July 18, 1944.

Stephenson, Thomas, Able Seaman, R.C.N.V.R., V-17675, Toronto, Ont., July 4, 1944.

Stoner, Beverley Murray, Able Seaman, R.C.N.V.R., V-48169, Toronto, Ontario, July 4, 1944.

B.E.M.—7

Pickering, William Clifton, Chief Petty Officer, R.C.N.R., A-2654, Toronto, Ontario, June 8, 1944.

Aves, Frank Edward, Chief Petty Officer, R.C.N., O.N. 2617, Preston, Ontario, June 8, 1944.

Biddle, Henry, Chief Petty Officer, R.C.N.V.R., V-10186, Regina, Sask., June 8, 1944.

Allan, Peter Christie, Chief Engine Room Artificer, R.C.N.V.R., V-10347, Weyburn, Sask., June 8, 1944.

Campbell, Albert Bruce, Able Seaman, R.C.N.R. (F.R.) F.R. 244, Victoria, B.C., June 8, 1944.

Carson, William Samuel, Stoker, 1/c, R.C.N.V.R., V-68135, Toronto, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Roberts, Allen John, Cook (S), R.C.N.V.R., V-36211, Powell River, B.C., June 8, 1944.

Mention in Dispatches—Officers

Atherton, Thomas Herbert, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Parry Sound, Ont., July 18, 1944.

Bell, Ian Hunter, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Vancouver, B.C., June 8, 1944.

Bolus, Hal Baldwin, Lieutenant (E), R.C.N., Ottawa, Ont., July 11, 1944.

Boyer, Frederick John, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Toronto, Ont., May 23, 1944.

Boyle, Douglas Seaman, Lieutenant, R.C.N., Revelstoke, B.C., July 18, 1944.

Brock, Jeffry Vanstone, Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Winnipeg, Man., May 30, 1944.

Brooks-Hill, Frederick Bancroft, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Toronto, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Burke, Cornelius, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Vancouver, B.C., July 11, 1944.

Burrows, Freeman Elkins, A/Lieutenant Commander, Toronto, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Buxton, Sydney William, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Vancouver, B.C., June 8, 1944.

Campbell, Gordon Duncan, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Victoria, B.C., June 8, 1944.

Chipman, William Pennock, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Ottawa, Ont., June 13, 1944.

Cosh, Digby Rex Bell, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Ottawa, Ont., May 30, 1944.

Davis, James Sinclair, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Oakville, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Dolmage, Wilfred Gordon, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Vancouver, B.C., May 3, 1944.

Donald, James Clouston, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Winnipeg, Man., May 3, 1944.

Dunn, James Alexander, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Vancouver, B.C., July 4, 1944.

Evans, Philip Cabell, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.R., Miami, Florida, June 8, 1944.

Farmer, James, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., London, Ont., July 4, 1944.

Ferguson, Alexander John, Lieutenant, R.C.N.R., Hantsport, N.S., June 8, 1944.

Garner, Alan, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Calgary, Alta., June 8, 1944.

Gibson, William Simpson, Lieutenant (E), R.C.N.V.R., Toronto, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Gladwell, James William, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Montreal, P.Q., May 30, 1944.

Goodwin, Geoffrey Lionel, Electrical Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., St. Catharines, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Gross, Harold Victor William, Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N., Victoria, B.C., July 18, 1944.

Harley, Frank, Lieutenant, (E), R.C.N.R., Glasgow, Scotland, July 18, 1944.

Hart, Richard Wallace, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Belleville, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Heslam, Richard Murray, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Montreal, P.Q., July 11, 1944.

Mention in Dispatches—Officers—Con.

Hill, Henry Knox, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R, Kingston, Ontario, June 8, 1944.

Hill, Henry Knox, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Kingston, Ont., July 4, 1944.

Johnson, Rendall James Godschall, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Toronto, Ontario, June 8, 1944.

Karr, Sandon Alexander, Warrant Engineer, R.C.N.R., Chemainus, B.C., June 8, 1944.

King, Dudley Cowan, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Victoria, B.C., June 8, 1944.

Kirkpatrick, Archibald Miller, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Windsor, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Ladner, Thomas Ellis, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Vancouver, B.C. May 30, 1944.

Law, Charles Anthony, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Quebec, P.Q., May 30, 1944.

McQuarrie, John Glover, Lieutenant, R.C.N.R., New Westminster, B.C., June 8, 1944.

Mawer, Charles Needham, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Calgary, Alberta, July 11, 1944.

Mayne, Arthur Hugh Shaw, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Westmount, P.Q., June 8, 1944.

Moffat, William Purvis, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Montreal, P.Q., July 18, 1944.

Naftel, Frederick R. K., A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Chateauguay Basin, P.Q., June 8, 1944.

Nixon, Charles Patrick, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N., Victoria, B.C., July 8, 1944.

O'Brien, John Barry, A/Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Ottawa, Ontario, June 8, 1944.

Osborne, Fred Francis Lieutenant, R.C.N.R., Guysborough, N.S., June 8, 1944.

Percy, James Leslie, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Toronto, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Pickard, Herbert Marquis, Lieutenant R.C.N.V.R., Winnipeg, Man., May 30, 1944.

Pratt, James Charles, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.V.R., Windsor, Ontario, June 8, 1944.

Rayner, Herbert Sharples, D.S.C., Commander, R.C.N., St. Catharines, Ont., July 11, 1944.

Robarts John Parmenter, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., London, Ontario, May 23, 1944.

Spinney, Charles Wallace, Lieutenant (S.B.) R.C.N.V.R., Kentville, N.S., June 8, 1944.

Stacey, William Roland, A/Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.R., Vancouver, B.C., June 8, 1944.

Todd, Terence Charles, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Victoria, B.C., July 18, 1944.

Wilson, Harry Parks, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Orillia, Ont., May 30, 1944.

Woods, John Robinson, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Toronto, Ontario, May 2, 1944.

Woods, John Robinson, Lieutenant, R.C.N.V.R., Toronto, Ontario, June 20, 1944.

Mention in Dispatches—Ratings—43

Alerie, John George, Petty Officer R.C.N.V.R., V-5626, Montreal, P.Q., June 8, 1944.

Bourne, Leslie Norman, Leading Seaman, R.C.N., 4023, Vancouver, B.C., July 18, 1944.

Boyd, Clifford Douglas, Leading Seaman, R.C.N.V.R., V-2741, Saint John, N.B., July 18, 1944.

Brace, Ernest Robert, Leading Seaman, R.C.N.V.R., V-23145, Verdun, P.Q., July 18, 1944.

Butler, Edmund Harold, Telegraphist, R.C.N.V.R., V-7654, Toronto, Ontario, July 18, 1944.

Carrington, Arthur John, Chief Petty Officer Tel., V-13194, Calgary, Alberta, July 18, 1944.

Dempster, Lawrence Atherton, A/Petty Offi. R.C.N., 3782, Calgary, Alberta, July 11, 1944.

Dryden, Albert Gordon, A/Engineer Room Artificer 4/c, R.C.N.V.R., V-24854, Rainy River, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Fleming, Joseph Keith, Engine Room Artificer 4/c, R.C.N.V.R., V-55387, Malortio, Quebec, June 8, 1944.

Fortune, John Terence Martin, Petty Officer, (H.S.D.) R.C.N.V.R. V-1566, Prince Rupert, B.C., July 4, 1944.

Gosnell, Henry William, (Posthumous) A/Leading Seaman, R.C.N., 2791, Saint John, N.B., July 11, 1944.

Green, Virgil, Stoker 1/c, R.C.N.V.R., V-54609 Guelph, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Paris, Herbert Cecil, A/Engine Room Artificer, R.C.N.V.R., V-25877, Moncton, N.B., June 8, 1944.

Haugen, Gerald Ludwig, Stoker P.O., R.C.N.V.R., A-764, Dartmouth, N.S., June 8, 1944.

Haywood, James Mervin, Chief Ordnance Artificer, R.C.N., 40727, Port Arthur, Ont., July 11, 1944.

Honsinger, Benjamin Paul, Able Seaman, R.C.N.V.R., V-19515, St. Thomas, Ont., July 11, 1944.

Howitt, John William. A/Leading Stoker (M), R.C.N.V.R., V-25836, Alberni, B.C., May 2, 1944.

Laderoute, Norbert Joseph, Chief Engine Room Artificer, R.C.N.R., A-1666, Fort William, Ont., July 18, 1944.

Lang, George Pryce, Chief Stoker, R.C.N., O.N. 21372, Montreal, P.Q., July 11, 1944.

Lauder, Lester John, Leading Seaman, R.C.N.V.R., V-5731, Montreal, P.Q., July 18, 1944.

McCartney, John Lockhart, Supply Asst., R.C.N.V.R., V-43125, Saint John, N.B., July 11, 1944.

McGee, Aubrey, A/Petty Officer, R.C.N., O.N. 2580, Halifax, N.S., July 4, 1944.

McGinn, George Hunter, Leading Stoker, R.C.N., O.N. 21592, Kamloops, B.C., July 18, 1944.

Marshall, Robert, Petty Officer, R.C.N., O.N. 4775, Regina, Sask., June 8, 1944.

Mein, Stewart Ferguson, Chief Ordnance Artificer, R.C.N., 40626, Moose Jaw, Sask., July 11, 1944.

Miller, Jack, Chief Engine Room Artificer, R.C.N., 21324, Halifax, N.S., July 18, 1944.

Montgomery, William Merrill, Chief Petty Officer, R.C.N., 2561, Eastview, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Munt, Oliver Philip, Chief Stoker (Fire Fighter), R.C.N.V.R., V-46590, Truro, N.S., June 8, 1944.

North, Lloyd Victor, A/Leading Seaman, R.C.N.V.R., V-10323, Regina, Sask., June 8, 1944.

O'Brien, John Gerald, A/Chief Engine Room Artificer 3/c, V-48911, Montreal, P.Q., July 4, 1944.

Parker, John Edward Fitzgerald, Chief Stoker, R.C.N., O.N. 21345, Red Deer, Alberta, July 18, 1944.

Polischuk, Fred, Petty Officer, R.C.N.V.R., V-7424, Toronto, Ont., July 11, 1944.

Porter, Allan, Able Seaman, R.C.N.R., A-1533, Fox Island, Nfld., June 8, 1944.

Rainsford, Charles Frederick, Chief E.R.A., R.C.N., O.N. 21531, Victoria, B.C., July 11, 1944.

Mention in Dispatches—Ratings—Con.

Rodgerson, Morrill Henry, A/Petty Officer, R.C.N.R., A-4854, Shag Harbour, N.S., June 8, 1944.

Scott, Bruce Simon, Leading Seaman, R.C.N.V.R., V-2435, Saint John, N.B., June 8, 1944.

Shute, Thomas, A/Petty Officer Telegraphist, R.C.N.V.R., V-17066, London, Ontario, June 8, 1944.

Snow, Henry, Able Seaman, R.C.N.R., A-2212, Regina, Sask., June 8, 1944.

Stephenson, Carmen Ernest, (Posthumous), A/Leading Seaman, R.C.N.V.R., V-5646, Montreal, P.Q., June 8, 1944.

Strachan, Douglas Robert, Chief Petty Officer, R.C.N.R., A-4161, Toronto, Ontario, June 8, 1944.

Sweet, Walter Valentine, Stoker Petty Officer, V-10003, Regina, Sask., June 8, 1944.

Taylor, Reginald, A/Leading Seaman, R.C.N.-V.R., V-16072, Fort William, Ont., June 8, 1944.

Williams, John Elliott, Chief Engine Room Artificer, R.C N.V.R., V-22689 (now A/Warrant Engineer), Toronto, Ont., July 18, 1944.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MONTREAL TRAMWAYS STRIKE—PROPERTIES PLACED AT DISPOSAL OF CONTROLLERS—OPERATIONS TO RESUME MONDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Labour a question? He was about to speak and perhaps he anticipates it. I read in the papers to-day that the minister would at nine o'clock this morning give a statement with respect to the Montreal tramways dispute. I was going to ask him whether he had made such a statement, and, if so, whether he would repeat it to the House of Commons, because we are very much interested in it.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should say this. I thought it was my duty to tell the house first of the policy being adopted by the government to bring the strike to a conclusion, but in order to cooperate with the press—some of the newspapers go to press at ten and some at eleven—so that the people of Montreal might be fully informed, I gave them an advance notice of my statement, not to be released until 11.15. Unfortunately one of the agencies did not play the game and gave the story out, notwithstanding the clear understanding I gave the press men when I met them.

I now table copy of an order in council passed by the cabinet yesterday appointing controllers who have been given the responsibility of seeing that street railway traffic is resumed in Montreal on Monday next, August 14.

[Mr. A. L. Macdonald.]

The order in council directs the company to place its extensive properties at the disposal of the controllers and also requires the employees of the company to return to work on Monday morning.

The controllers named are E. L. Cousins, wartime administrator of Canadian Atlantic ports, Halifax; and J. E. St. Laurent, member of the National Harbours board, Ottawa.

The order in council, passed under authority of the War Measures Act, makes it an offence for any person to refuse to resume work or to recommend to any person that work be not resumed, and also makes it an offence should the company refuse to place its properties at the disposal of the controllers. The employees are required to return to work under the terms and conditions prevailing at the time the strike occurred.

The disputing parties are now directed to recommence negotiations for a settlement with the controllers to remain in charge of operations of the Montreal Tramways system pending an agreement between the company and employees. If at the expiration of sixty days the controllers report to the Minister of Labour that there is no prospect of settlement, the matter will further be reviewed by the government.

I need scarcely say that the government has taken this action in the public interest. A continuation of the strike might well result in grave injury in two ways; further great inconvenience to the population of the district of Montreal in not having local transportation facilities, and, war production, already seriously threatened, increasingly impaired if the strike continued.

The interests of employees and employer involved in the strike are decidedly secondary to the public welfare and convenience. The issue is not of sufficient importance to warrant a strike in war-time.

I want to make this point clear: the action of the government is not to be understood as lending support to the proposition that it intends to compel any worker to relinquish freedom of choice as to the union which he wishes to join, nor should the action be construed as any departure whatever from the principles laid down in the wartime labour regulations, which provide that employees and employer have freedom of contractual collective bargaining.

The public of Montreal are to be congratulated on the calm way in which they have accepted the inconvenience due to the strike and for readily accommodating themselves to the situation resulting therefrom.

I would like to add this precis of a telegram received from the city of Montreal and the provincial government, Mr. Speaker: Under date of August 11, the Montreal Tramways company sent a lengthy telegram to my colleague the Minister of Justice. The company quoted in full a reply received from Fernand Dufresne, director of police services for the city of Montreal, indicating inability to comply with a request of the company for police protection sufficient to enable the company to resume operation of street cars and buses. Mr. Dufresne estimated that 1,200 police officers would be required and stated that he did not have the men available. He did offer such protection as could be afforded by any of the 800 officers regularly on his force, who could be spared for special assignment. In the same telegram from the company there is quoted in full a message received from Hon. Leon Casgrain, attorney-general of the province of Quebec. Mr. Casgrain stated that the dominion, under wartime labour regulations, had assumed jurisdiction over disputes of the type in question; and consequently the company must look to the dominion for police protection. However, he advised that the provincial police would carry out any duties falling to them as provided under section 51 of the defence of Canada regulations.

The request of the company to the dominion was that the civic and provincial authorities having declined to afford protection for passengers, operators and property, the federal government should afford the necessary protection.

INQUIRY AS TO ARRANGEMENTS TO TRANSFER HELP TO WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I must apologize for not sending him notice, but owing to the urgency of the matter I hope he will overlook my oversight. Have arrangements been completed with the railway companies for the transportation of harvest help to western Canada? If not, how soon can we expect to have the arrangements completed? How many are expected to go west to help with the harvest?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I do not see any difficulty in connection with the arrangements with the railway companies. It is purely administrative. Last year we were able to get 5,000, but conditions were of such a nature that when it reached the point that 3,200 had gone, the western provinces asked us to send no more. I anticipate that we shall get as many this year as we got last year. I am speaking of civilians, not the men in the armed forces.

Mr. BURTON: I have been talking to some people who have been ready to go west and who have told me that the railway companies prevented them from taking advantage of the arrangements.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the answer to that is that harvesting is over in Ontario before Manitoba, and it is over in Manitoba under normal conditions earlier than in Saskatchewan and Alberta. We have to move these men across the country, and it may be for that reason that facilities are not arranged at the present time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Have any provincial governments entered into agreements with the federal government respecting the raising from $365 to $425 the total annual income allowed to an old age pensioner? If so, which provinces and from what effective date in each case?

2. Has the practice of filing liens or registration notices against the property of old age and blind pensioners been discontinued by Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario, or Manitoba, since the time of the last dominion examination of the provincial pensions accounts, referred to by Mr. Abbott on page 1742 of Hansard for March 23, 1944?

3. In any of the above-noted provinces where this practice has been discontinued, have liens or registration notices previously filed been withdrawn?

4. Has the federal government received from any of the provincial governments, since May 1, 1944, representations calling for an increase in the amount of the old age and blind pension? If so, from what provinces, and what amounts have been proposed?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes. Supplementary agreements effective April 1, 1944, have been completed with all provinces except Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. Prince Edward Island and British Columbia have submitted agreements which have not yet been completed.

2. The Department of Finance has not had any definite statement of policy from Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario or Manitoba regarding the filing of liens or registration notices against property owned by old age pensioners. The department's examiners have made an examination in Ontario since March 23, 1944. Cases examined had been dealt with by the pension authority prior to that date. Examinations have not been made in Prince Edward Island, Quebec or Manitoba since March 3, 1944.

3. The Department of Finance has not been informed by the authorities in Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario or Manitoba that liens or registration have been withdrawn.

4. No.

EXPERIMENTAL FARMS—NON-PERMANENT PERSONNEL

Mr. MATTHEWS:

How many non-permanent men, with a record of continuous service of three years or over, are employed in each of the experimental farms and illustration stations of Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: Experimental station, Morden, Manitoba, 10; experimental farm, Brandon, Manitoba, including experimental substation at Melita, 15; soil survey work, Manitoba, 2.

TEXTILE COMMISSION

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What action has been taken by the government on the recommendations made in the report of the Hon. Mr. Justice W. F. A. Turgeon, as chairman of the royal commission on the textile industry instituted under order in council No. 223, 1936?

Mr. ILSLEY: The recommendations made by the royal commission on the textile industry were such that no legislative action was necessary. The value of the report of this commission was in the facts uncovered and the material assembled during its investigation.

KINGSTON, ONT., COLD STORAGE EQUIPMENT

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Has the dominion government paid any loans or grants towards the construction or the installation of machinery and equipment for cold storage in the city of Kingston, Ontario?

2. If so, to whom were they paid?

3. On what dates were they paid?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes.

2. Kingston Cold Storage, Kingston, Ontario.

3. August 29, 1940; June 26, 1941; August 24, 1942; October 4, 1943.

R. J. DEACHMAN

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. Has a Mr. Robert John Deachman been in the employ of the government at any time during the past three years?

2. If so, in what position, for what period of time, and at what salary and allowances was the said person employed?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes, by the Department of Munitions and Supply.

2. Mr. Robert John Deachman was employed on the staff of the publicity branch of the department from August 26, 1940, until August 18, 1942, at a salary of $4,200 per year—no allowances.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN ARMY—COSTS OF RECRUITING—ADVERTISING

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What are the total expenditures that have been incurred, (a) since September 8, 1939, (b) since July 1, 1943, for the purpose of securing recruits for the army?

2. Of said expenditures, how much has been paid to or through the medium of advertising agencies during each of the years 1939 to 1944, inclusive?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Return tabled.

R.C.A.F.—CASUALTIES—INFORMATION TO NEXT OF KIN

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What practice and procedure is followed by the Department of National Defence for Air in furnishing information to the next of kin with respect to air crew listed as missing after operations?

2. Will the government give consideration to altering the present practice and procedure so as to furnish full information to all of the next of kin of members of the crew of each missing aircraft as and when information reaches the department with respect to any one or more of the said air crew?

Mr. RALSTON: Return tabled.

INCOME TAX — CIVIL SERVANTS OVERSEAS IN CIVILIAN CAPACITY

Mr. GREEN:

1. Are dominion civil servants who proceeded overseas for service in civilian capacities, exempted from income tax on salaries and/or allowances?

2. Were any such dominion civil servants exempted from payment of income tax on salaries and/or allowances for the years 1940, 1941 and 1942?

3. Were any such dominion civil servants exempted from payment of income tax on salaries and/or allowances for period commencing January 1, 1943?

4. Are all the men who have proceeded overseas for service with the auxiliary service organizations—Canadian Legion War Services, Y.M.C.A., Salvation Army, and Knights of Columbus, given exemption from payment of income tax on salaries and/or allowances, in a similar manner to the army, navy and air forces?

5. If not, what concessions have been granted in this regard?

Mr. BRUCE: May I ask the Secretary of State to make available to-day the answers passed to several inquiries of mine on the order paper?

Mr. McLARTY: I am not sure that I understand the question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): May I refer for a moment to the offer made to the opposition yesterday by the Prime Minister when he asked them if they would like to have any particular department called? In looking over the business for to-day as announced last night by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, who was leading the house, I find that the first order is the bill introduced yesterday afternoon by the Minister of Finance; then supply, post office, national revenue, secretary of state, mines and resources, trade and commerce, and at the end pensions and health. I believe that the question of health should have priority over the others. Might it be considered as the first item of business this morning?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that on these matters I generally arrange the order of business with the official leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). The announcement that was made last night was made to the house as a whole and we ought therefore, I think, to follow the announcement as made.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I say to the Prime Minister that the hon. member for Parkdale is specially interested in the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Some hon. MEMBERS:: We all are.

Mr. GRAYDON: Am I going to have an opportunity to say a word? I hope so. As I say, my hon. friend is interested in the Department of Pensions and National Health, and I have already indicated that I should like to have it come on as soon as possible in order to facilitate the business of the house and to give those who wish to say something on it an opportunity to do so at the earliest moment. The reason my hon. friend is so interested is that this department covers one of the wartime activities in a special way. Perhaps the Prime Minister will reconsider the matter and make some change in the order of business as indicated last night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have every desire to accommodate hon. members in all parts of the house. Perhaps during the course of the day my hon. friend and I might have a word together and we may be able to arrange a suitable time. In the meantime we shall proceed with the order as arranged.

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES

EXTENSION OF AUTHORIZED INVESTMENTS IN UNITED STATES SECURITIES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 185, to amend The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1942.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister to give at this stage a full statement with respect to this matter? When the bill was introduced a number of questions were asked and some explanation given. Perhaps the minister might combine with the statement he made last night some information with respect to the original act of 1932, which I think is necessary at this time to lay the foundation upon which the discussion can be based.

Mr. ILSLEY: The information asked for is now found in the explanatory note in the bill. Section 60 of the act provides as follows:

(1) Save as hereinafter provided, any company registered under this act may invest its funds, or any portion thereof, in the purchase of

(c) ground rents, mortgages or hypothecs on real estate in Canada, or elsewhere where such company is carrying on its business, provided that the amount paid for any such mortgage or hypothec shall in no case exceed sixty per cent of the value of the real estate covered thereby;

Subsection 2 of section 60 reads at the present time:

Any such company may lend its funds or any portion thereof on the security of

(b) real estate or leaseholds for a term or terms of years or other estate or interest therein in Canada or elsewhere where the company is carrying on business; provided, however, that no such loan shall exceed sixty per cent of the value of the real estate or interest therein which forms the security for such loan, but this proviso shall not be deemed to prohibit a company from accepting as part payment for real estate sold by it, a mortgage or hypothec thereon for more than sixty per cent of the sale price of such real estate.

In other words, as the law stands at the present time the company may invest in mortgages on real estate, but only to an amount up to sixty per cent of the value of the real estate. It may also lend on the security of the real estate, but only up to an amount of sixty per cent of the value of such real estate. It will be noted that at the present time there is power to invest outside of Canada. Note the words, "or elsewhere, where such company is carrying on its business."

The bill extends the powers of the companies in this way. At the present time they may only invest in real estate in the United States up to sixty per cent of the value. That provision debars them from investing on the security of real estate in the United States where the loan is insured by the federal housing administration of the United States, and it is desirable to extend the powers of the companies to invest without that limitation of sixty per cent of the value provided the loan is insured by the federal administration of the United States. That is the purpose of the bill, and as I said last night the effect is merely to put our companies in a fair competitive position with regard to the United States companies who have the power to invest in these insured securities on real estate in the United States, and who do so heavily and increasingly. I may say that loans under title II of the national housing act of the United States, protected by the insurance provisions of that title, have been made since 1935. Up to date nearly four and a half billion of insured loans have been made. The usual rate borne by the mortgage is four and a half per cent, and after allowing for expenses and charges it is estimated that approximately three and a half per cent is the net yield to the lender. Under the act, if foreclosure becomes necessary the property is transferred to the administrator and a debenture is issued by the administrator to the lender bearing two and three-quarter per cent per annum interest and maturing three years after the maturity date of the mortgage, subject to redemption on three months' notice at the option of the administrator. The number of properties transferred up to date has been remarkably small, ·4 of one per cent of the number of mortgages insured, and of those properties transferred 95 per cent have been sold, leaving less than two hundred out of the million properties mortgaged now on hand.

The Canadian companies are required to cover United States liabilities with deposits with governments or trustees there. Until recently, Canadian securities were permitted to form part of those deposits, but in later years the companies have been pressed to substitute United States securities for any Canadian securities now held and to cover increases in liabilities with United States securities only, and it has become a problem for the companies to get acceptable United States securities for that purpose to yield a rate equal to the rate on which their reserves are based, usually three per cent or at the most three and a half per cent. United States government bonds yield from two and a half per cent to two and three-quarters per cent and high grade utility and corporation bonds approximately the same rate. State and municipal bonds, by reason of the tax exemption feature, yield substantially lower rates, most of them less than two per cent.

The permission to the companies to lend on these mortgages will permit the Canadian companies to share in a comparatively remunerative investment field now open to all United States companies with which the former are in competition. The loans in question will be made from the proceeds of the United States business of the companies; even if any company should think of lending funds derived from its Canadian business on such mortgages the permission of the foreign exchange control board would have to be first obtained, but the yield rate on the mortgage is not sufficiently high to attract Canadian funds.

Mr. GRAYDON: There are some questions which will have to be asked in committee, but I believe second reading may properly be given.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Before this measure is proceeded with may I say that I am sorry this bill has been brought down at this stage of the session. I was unavoidably absent from the chamber last evening, but when I heard about it I considered whether it did not afford an opportunity to discuss the whole question of life insurance, and I considered very carefully last night and this morning whether I should not seize this opportunity to do just that. I have been awaiting an appropriate chance to do so throughout the session, and that opportunity has not arisen. However, I realize that the house wants to rise, and under the circumstances I do not feel that I should take advantage of this opportunity of discussing this matter, as I might otherwise have done.

So far as I can see, this is not a very important right that is being given the insurance companies of Canada, and I do not think serious objection can be taken to it. Like the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) I think we can ask in committee any questions we may have in mind with regard to the matter.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Mortgages insured by U.S. federal housing administrator.

Mr. GRAYDON: I followed carefully the explanation given by the minister, which seemed to indicate that in the United States there is a different basis of lending in the insurance investment field from that which prevails in Canada. So far as I know we here do not have a situation quite comparable to the situation the minister described as existing in the United States. Up to the time the federal housing administration entered the guaranteed field, if I may call it that, in the United States, in connection with these loans, evidently the same provisions applied with respect to the protection of policyholders; that is, a sixty per cent ceiling was placed upon loans on real estate which are accepted by the insurance companies. That, of course, would be in compliance with certain legal protection which has been afforded trust funds of this character in both countries. The investments of the public in insurance companies in Canada and elsewhere are very large. The popularity of insurance as a means of saving and protection combined has increased during the years, and we have seen it reach the point where the savings of many people find their way first of all into the coffers of the insurance companies by way of premiums, and then from the insurance companies into investments such as those envisaged in this act.

One point which was not very clear to me I think has been clarified to some extent by the minister's statements. When the bill was first introduced I was afraid we were inventing a departure from the system of protection which exists in Canada, under which the loan may not exceed sixty per cent of the value of the real estate, which was the system under which our companies operated in the United States.

I was fearful that perhaps the funds of those who are paying premiums in Canada might be utilized in a less protected fashion, when the company outside could utilize its funds for investment in the United States. But the minister points out that there is a definite limitation, a definite boundary line with respect to the investment of our funds in the United States, the same as there is in respect of the investment by the same company of United States funds in Canada. In other words, as I understand the minister's statement, this bill would apply only to the funds which are invested by a Canadian life insurance company doing business in the United States, but which will be utilized only for United States investments. In other words unless the foreign exchange control board authorizes differently, this will prevent Canadian funds by way of premiums going into the investment market in the United States under a different system, and perhaps under a lesser protection—although it is not clear as to that—than we have in Canada.

My understanding—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong—is that only funds of policyholders in the United States are the ones actually affected by this legislation, with the one exception, namely, in the event of this government's allowing, through the foreign exchange control board, a movement of funds from Canada to United States account to be invested in real estate there.

That, of course, is true now. But the first question which enters one's mind is that this legislation will apply for years to come. The foreign exchange control board will pass out of existence legally as soon as the War Measures Act becomes inoperative. This would be at some time after the war, or when the policy of the government then in power might be changed in respect of the movement of funds. So that the answer given by the minister is not the only possible answer in respect of the movement of Canadian funds for United States investment. It may be at this time, but it would not be in the future, when the war is over. So that I suggest the minister's argument falls to the ground. If the operations of the foreign exchange control board would cease within the next year, this legislation would still be in operation, and there would be nothing to hinder investment in the United States of Canadian funds paid in by Canadian policyholders to a Canadian insurance company under the provisions of this bill, and on terms which may be less safe and less protected than provided by Canadian law. Has this phase of the matter been considered by the government, as to whether the law in respect of investments in the United States under this act is different from the law which applies if the money is invested in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: The superintendent of insurance is now looking up the section of our Insurance Act which is applicable. My understanding is—and I shall confirm it in a moment—that Canadian insurance companies cannot leave investments in the United States greater than the reserves required to cover their liabilities there. That is set out in section 81 (2) of the Insurance Act.

Mr. GRAYDON: All right.

Mr. ILSLEY: The second answer is that they would not, if they could, under any condition that exists to-day, or that can be foreseen, because the interest rates are not as attractive in the United States as they are here. Then, the third answer is found in the foreign exchange control board. There is a fourth answer, and that is that under the act as it exists to-day they can invest in United States real estate, but only up to sixty per cent of the value—and that is a little outmoded. The owners or purchasers of real estate for the most part do not pay forty per cent into it, and therefore it is most desirable to have the power to invest in real estate where the security is greater.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is it not a fact that it is necessary for Canadian companies doing business in the United States to keep deposits equal to or greater than their reserves in various states? Is it not also true that it is becoming more difficult all the time for them to get investments which will yield what their rates are based on, namely three per cent? Therefore they are endeavouring under this measure to get investments which will help out the yield on that business.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is there any limitation as to the funds which may be used? Are they only funds taken in the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe that answer has already been given, and will appear in Hansard.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is satisfactory.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to express appreciation of the attitude of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell).

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

242. Departmental administration, $699,070.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Postmaster General two questions. I hold in my hand the report of the Postmaster General for the year ending March 1943, which is the last report issued, and also the report for the year 1942. We might think that the one ending March, 1944 would now be available, but apparently it is not. I should like to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to a change that has occurred in the preparation of this report. I suppose there are some six or seven thousand post offices in Canada and the procedure for many years past has been to divide the list of post offices into accounting offices and non-accounting offices, these, in turn being divided according to provinces.

I have some 100 post offices in my riding and when I wanted to look up a particular post office in the past all I had to do was to turn to the accounting or non-accounting section, and then look up the province in which I was interested. In the case of non-accounting offices for British Columbia these occupied only three pages, and I could speedily find the post office I was interested in. I think the same thing must apply to every other hon. member. But the system has now been changed and if I desire to look up a particular post office I must go through about 100 pages. If this meant some saving of time or paper the change would be understandable, but it means neither. It may be dumbness on my part, but I cannot understand the reason for this change. I have spoken to other hon. members and I find they have the same objection to this new system. It is very troublesome and inconvenient and I cannot see where there is any economy of time or paper or anything like that.

While I am on my feet I will take the opportunity of dealing with another matter I have in mind and then the minister can answer them both at once. I hold in my hand a letter which is marked "copy" and which was sent to a country postmaster in my district. It is from the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, 422 Metropolitan Building, 837 West Hastings street, Vancouver, British Columbia, and is dated January 14, 1944. Then comes the name of the rural postmaster who was to be the victim of this scheme. I shall not give his name for fear there might be repercussions, but the minister has seen the letter. It reads:

Dear Sir: I am circularizing all householders—

"All." Note what that would involve in work and expense.

—through post offices and rural routes soliciting support for our budget fund.

I am aware that postmasters and postmistresses take no active part in political movements, but you will no doubt be aware of some individual in your locality who would possibly be favourably inclined toward our movement, and perhaps you will be good enough to pass this letter along to him or her.

We require an individual in each district to assist us, and if they will communicate with this office I will see that they get supplies and any information they may require.

Yours very truly,

W. W. Lefeaux,
Chairman, Finance Committee.

As they say, they are circularizing all householders and they address themselves to the country postmasters. This man is asked to break the law and imperil his job in order to advance the political and financial future of a political party. Hundreds of postmasters are fired after every election for taking part in politics during the election, but in twenty-three years I have only had two fired because of grave charges. One was suppressing my mail and he was also short in his funds. This is from a party which sets itself up on a pedestal, both in the past and as to the future, a party which devotes a large portion of its time lecturing and damning the two old political parties. It is true that they have never had the opportunity to do the things which they accuse the old parties of doing because they have never been in power, and God willing I hope they never will be. Scripture says: "If these things be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" I think that quotation can be applied most effectively to what these people are doing.

I hate to think what these people will do if they get a little more power. If some postmaster or postmistress should take a chance and do these things and they once got a hold over them it is only a step farther for them to come along and say, "How much mail is Tom Jones getting, and from whom?" There might be no limit to what they might do once they got in power. It will be noted that they say they are circularizing all householders through post offices and rural routes. Is it not most important for the purity of our elections that our post office officials shall be trustworthy?

I remember one occasion when a postmaster was made a returning officer. I demanded an investigation after the election and it was found, first, that he had been drunk on election day; second, that he was short some considerable sum in his post office funds, and, third, that he had not distributed political mail of mine which had been properly prepaid and addressed to people. He assumed that it was not wise for them to get it until after the election was over. The investigation was held unfortunately by political associates of this gentleman and he was not fired; he was allowed to resign. I was simple enough to let it go at that. A couple of years later he bobbed up again in another part of the riding and was recommended as a postmaster. I put it up to the officials here and said that I did not think a man with that pedigree was suitable for the position, but the reply I got back stated that the gentleman who had recommended him as postmaster was the very same inspector who had conducted the previous investigation and that as he had not been fired, there was really no black mark against him. I sent the letter I have read to the Postmaster General and I received an unsigned reply from him stating that he did not approve of such proceedings. I should like to ask him what action was taken to prevent a recurrence of such a rapscallion piece of business.

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): With regard to the first question asked by the hon. member, I would say that some years ago the economy committee recommended that a change should be made in the method of setting out the post offices in the report. From a departmental point of view it was found to be more convenient to list the post offices in alphabetical order rather than to follow the old system. However, in view of what the hon. member has said I shall be glad to reconsider the matter and discuss it with him.

In regard to the second matter, as soon as it was brought to my attention the district directors in all postal districts were advised that such action was incorrect, and it would be considered that if postmasters or postmistresses took such a course of action, they would be guilty of political interference if they did it for any party and would be liable to be dismissed for that reason. I think it has been made quite clear to them that that suggestion should not be followed by them unless they wish to place their positions in jeopardy.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister give the committee the new rates for the postmen and other services in the post offices of Toronto? There was something in the paper about it a few days ago. I should like the present rates and the new rates.

Mr. MULOCK: The hon. member means the increases in salaries?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. The minister might give the former rate first. He could give the minimum and maximum of the salary range, and the change.

Mr. MULOCK: The changes are as follows:

Letter carrier. The compensation for this class, which is at present in the range $1,020 to $1,500, with allowance for uniform and boots, is revised to read as follows: range, $1,200 to $1,620, allowance: uniform and boots.

Senior letter carrier. The compensation for this class, which is at present in the range $1,560 to $1,680, with uniform and boots, is revised to the range $1,620 to $1,800, also with uniform and boots. These are in the larger post offices. I can give details about the smaller offices.

Mr. MacNICOL: What are they now?

Mr. MULOCK: They are now $1,200 to $1,860, provided that in post offices of grade 6 and up no post clerk shall proceed beyond the salary of $1,680 per annum until he has passed the major examination. As a matter of fact they take examinations at the present time.

Mr. MacNICOL: What about their holidays?

Mr. MULOCK: I might mention now, to keep the record clear, that in the post offices of grades 3, 4 and 5 the clerk shall not proceed beyond a salary range of $1,680.

Then, mail porters: their range was from $1,020 to $1,500, plus an allowance in the discretion of the department for uniform and boots, and that has now been raised from $1,200 to $1,620, with the same allowance.

Senior mail porters: their salary was $1,500 to $1,680; it has now been increased to a minimum of $1,620 with a maximum of $1,800, plus the same annual allowance as mentioned before.

Postal chauffeurs, now $1,140 to $1,500; new range, $1,200 to $1,620, with uniform and boots.

Postal garage repairman, range $1,440 to $1,620, now $1,500 to $1,740, with uniform.

Postal garage foreman, $1,620 to $1,800, changed to $1,620 to $1,860.

Railway mail clerk, grade 1, $1,080 to $1,800, plus allowance of one cent a mile for the distance actually travelled while on duty. The range is now $1,200 to $1,860, with the same mileage allowance.

There has been an increase of $60 per annum to each of the grades of railway mail clerk, namely grades 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5.

Mr. McILRAITH: I want to say a word of appreciation to the minister of this order in council P.C. 1/6268 of August 8 from which he has just quoted, changing the various rates of compensation as he has just set them out. It is the result of a long and sometimes involved agitation. My only regret is that it did not come a few months earlier, but now it has come I for one feel very grateful to the ministry. I should like to express that appreciation and have it placed on record.

Mr. BRUCE: I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday, when the Prime Minister was anxious to facilitate the business of the house by increasing the hours during which we would sit, he made this statement, reported in Hansard, page 6264:

> At the same time I do not despair of the house being able to conclude its business by to-morrow night, if hon. members will indicate immediately what particular matters they wish to have brought forward.

And again, at page 6264:

> There may be a few items which hon. members would wish to single out and have brought forward for purposes of discussion. If so the government would seek to arrange matters accordingly.

That is an invitation to hon. members. In answer to that invitation I requested the Prime Minister this morning to bring forward a certain department, namely that of pensions and health; and the Prime Minister showed a certain amount of irritation—

Mr. GIBSON: He did no such thing.

Mr. BRUCE: —and said that such a request would have to be made through the leader of the opposition.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. member that no question of privilege can be brought up in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. A question of privilege does not arise in committee; this is concerned with a particular matter which was referred to in the house when Mr. Speaker was in the chair. I want to tell the hon. member that he is not going to dragoon this government into any specific order of procedure in order that he may catch the three o'clock train to Toronto. I am ready at any time to proceed with the estimates of pensions and national health and answer any question the hon. gentleman may ask; but this is not the time to bring up this matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: I fancy the hon. member for Parkdale desired to rise to a point of order; and I do not think that the Minister of Pensions and National Health is quite fair in suggesting that the hon. member is trying to catch the three o'clock train. I happen to know that my hon. friend is not trying to catch the three o'clock train.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He talked about the "irritation" of the Prime Minister. There was no irritation.

Mr. GRAYDON: After all, that is a matter of opinion, I should think, and I suppose the opinion of other hon. members is entitled to as much respect as that of my hon. friend. There is merit in the point the hon. member has raised. The estimates of the Department of Pensions and National Health should not have been left over until the tail end of this session, and after the post office estimates have been concluded perhaps the minister will have no objection to bringing in his pensions and national health estimates. I do not want to have my silence regarded as consent to the order of business when there are those in the chamber who are anxious to discuss matters of great concern which are covered by the operations of the Department of Pensions and National Health. I want to add my voice to that of my hon. friend who has raised a question of privilege.

Mr. BRUCE: I rise to a point of order. A few days ago the minister of pensions himself opposed my motion to adjourn the house to consider the serious situation of our wounded.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. BRUCE: Just a moment. I ask the hon. member to take his seat. I did not interrupt him.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On a point of order—

Mr. BRUCE: I am speaking on a point of order, and I do not think you have any right to interrupt me. I did not interrupt the minister when he was speaking on a point of order. I was only able to cover a certain portion of the subject then, because of the intervention of the Speaker. Now I maintain that, knowing that situation, the minister instead of bringing forward his department at a suitable time to discuss these matters leaves them to the end, which would indicate that he considers the treatment of the wounded as less important than the Post Office Department.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. There is certainly no point of order in what the hon. gentleman says. We are in committee of supply in the Post Office Department and the hon. gentleman raises a question of privilege. He knows that there can be no question of privilege in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In order to prevent a false impression going out I wish to remind the committee, although it is entirely wrong to discuss the matter, that the hon. gentleman had a full opportunity to debate a certain question, and according to the rules of the house, once that subject has been disposed of for the session he has no right now to convey the impression that he has been deprived of full opportunity of debate.

Mr. BRUCE: I rise again to a point of order. I did not have a full opportunity to discuss the matter on a previous occasion because I was told by the chairman that I had to make the charge general across the dominion instead of relating it specifically to the question of Christie street in Toronto.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member is right in that.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask hon. members to come down to the work before the committee. We are discussing an item in the estimates of the Post Office Department and there is nothing else before the chair. I must uphold the rules.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely the government will not turn a deaf ear to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Parkdale. I hope that as a result of what he has said the government will bring in this department next.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The government will follow the procedure announced last night and concurred in. Hon. gentlemen will be given the fullest possible latitude and time to discuss any of the estimates.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not know how the government expects the opposition to cooperate when it takes the position that it does. That is not quite fair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The order of procedure was announced last night and accepted by the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: As to accepting the order of procedure announced, the minister knows that there is no such thing as acceptance of any order of procedure. The government announces the procedure and it is our job to see if we cannot get the government to change the procedure so as to suit the convenience of members.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The government is in control of procedure and intends to control it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Exactly as I thought. The government is taking a dictatorial attitude to the question.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: As a matter of privilege—

The CHAIRMAN: There is no privilege. Hon. members must confine themselves to the item before the committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand that we are now reverting to the item under discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): About time.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the minister rises again I would ask him to tell the committee whether these new rates conform with the rates suggested by the postal union or association in Toronto. Last January I attended a meeting at the labour temple before coming to the opening of the session and I found there a very orderly body of men. Any country might well be proud of the postal employees of Canada, for they are a body of men who are imbued with a sincere desire to serve to the best of their ability. They advanced certain rates. One of them was the amount now mentioned by the minister, namely, $1,800. Am I to understand that the postman now starts at $1,200 and advances to $1,620?

Mr. MULOCK: Is that the letter carrier?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, the senior letter carrier. How long is he in the service before he becomes a senior?

Mr. MULOCK : It is a matter of promotion to vacancies on merit.

Mr. MacNICOL: The senior letter carrier will now commence at $1,620 and go to $1,800?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is an advance of $180 over what the senior gets now. The senior letter carriers were asking for a maximum of $2,000. Am I right in that?

Mr. MULOCK: The representations made were for $300 increase all round. This matter has been dealt with, having received the recommendation of the joint council which was recently set up comprising representatives of the government and representatives of the services in which there are three representatives of different branches of the Post Office organizations. We have letters of thanks, one from the heads or representatives of some of the organizations for this change. It is not all that they asked for but it has corrected to a great extent the difficulty that has existed and has stopped men being brought in to work at less than $1,200 a year. The people in the lower incomes are the ones who will be helped most. The $1,020's are increased by $180. The hon. member has been interested in this matter for some time and he will agree that it will be a great help to raise the minimum from $1,020 to $1,200. That was one of the bad features and I am, and have been for some time, absolutely behind the increase. I am delighted that these changes have been made.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad that this improvement has occurred in the minister's period of office, because many years ago his celebrated grandfather made a change in the postal service and it is fitting that the grandson should emulate his example. I am glad that he has done what he has and I hope he will keep in mind improving the position of the men, because there is no country in the world that is served better by its postal employees than Canada. I am not discounting any other staff, but the outside letter carriers in Canada work in all kinds of weather, rain, or shine—yesterday for example they were working in a temperature of 100 degrees—and they wear clothes that are not designed for the maximum of comfort in such temperatures. This is a step in the right direction. Have the new arrangements been made retroactive?

Mr. MULOCK: They are retroactive to July 1.

Mr. MacNICOL: I had been hoping that they would be retroactive to the first of January for all senior clerks and all those who were on at that time. Has that been considered?

Mr. MULOCK: The matter has received a great deal of attention. The hon. member will appreciate the difficulties in making changes, with price ceilings and wage control and so on. He will understand also that changes have to be considered in relation to wages in other branches of the government service throughout the country.

Mr. MacNICOL: Some of these postal employees in Toronto and, I presume, in Montreal and other big cities, have had additional duties imposed upon them in consequence of the war. Are they being compensated for that extra work entailed by war duties?

Mr. MULOCK: In some cases when men are fulfilling extra duties supplements are given in addition. Some of them have gone through; others have been recommended by the department and are under consideration by the treasury board. I agree with the hon. member when he says that the men have had added responsibilities and added work. He realizes that that cannot be entirely avoided. Inexperienced men cannot deliver mail efficiently. They have to learn their route; they have to learn the system. Experienced men are carrying a big share of the load. When increases come along I am glad to know that we are appreciative of what they are doing. They have helped out and have taken on those added duties because they know they are necessary. We have a large number of men who are in different branches of the armed service—some are on loan to other departments of the government—during this war. I wish to say that I appreciate the service that the men have given right across this country and the spirit they have shown. I refer not only to the men in the civil service but also to the postmasters in the small offices across Canada who help in every way they can and who cooperate in taking on more duties frequently without charge to the public treasury.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will the Postmaster General give the committee an outline of the procedure followed by the post office officials when a vacancy occurs and a new postmaster is appointed? What happens when applications are received? What investigations are carried on when the final appointment is made? Who has the final say?

Mr. MULOCK: I shall answer the last question first. If the office has a revenue of $3,000 or more the appointment is made by the civil service commission. If the revenue is less than $3,000 the appointment is made by the Postmaster General.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Outline the procedure with regard to what happens when there is a resignation. I presume applications are called for?

Mr. MULOCK: Of course the hon. member is fully aware that there is a soldiers' preference in all these cases. When a vacancy occurs the legion is notified. Then no action is taken until the legion has been given a reasonable length of time to notify the returned soldiers organizations in that district so that men will have an opportunity for applying if they wish the position. If there is a suitable returned soldier he gets the preference over the civilian if he is a resident of the area to be served by the post office. The applicants are considered according to merit. Of course, the member or the defeated candidate of the government in power is notified. That has been the practice under every administration and is still the practice.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister had correspondence and communications from a citizen of Halifax who has been directing communications and complaints to the Prime Minister and the Postmaster General, and who on occasion has been good enough to send copies of the communications to me? The complaints made are fairly well detailed, and evidently the department has already received the information. I indicated earlier to the complainant that when the estimates of the Post Office Department came before the committee I would raise the question that has been brought to my attention. Without going into detail with respect to the matter perhaps the Postmaster General would give some explanation as to the problems, difficulties and complaints that are dealt with in these letters and tell us what action he has taken or intends to take with respect to it.

Mr. MULOCK: I may say to the leader of the opposition that I have seen these letters.

Mr. GRAYDON: The complaints of Mr. Regan?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes. Investigations were made by the district director, affidavits obtained, and I shall be very glad to give my hon. friend the file for his decision.

Mr. GRAYDON: My decision?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I want your decision.

Mr. MULOCK: I can tell my hon. friend that it has been thoroughly investigated. I have not the file here but I shall be delighted to show it to my hon. friend for his information at any time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did the Postmaster General find the complaints substantiated when the investigation was made?

Mr. MULOCK: The original ones, no. Certain other matters have come up and they are still under investigation.

Mr. KNOWLES: Did I hear the Postmaster General correctly a moment ago? Did he say that it is the policy of the government, when these vacancies occur, to notify either the government member or the government defeated candidate?

Mr. MULOCK: You did.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the policy? I can hardly believe it.

Mr. MULOCK: Certainly they are notified. Anybody can make a recommendation on a suitable person to be appointed.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is one thing for anybody to make a recommendation; it is another thing for the government to take the initiative on its own and literally to ask the government member in the constituency or the government defeated candidate for a recommendation. It seems to be far-fetched. I should think that the sitting member of the constituency concerned, and possibly some other defeated candidate, should be notified as well.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I asked the minister to outline the procedure completely with regard to these appointments. In his reply he did not refer to the superintendent. I want to know the various steps in the procedure where a resignation or a vacancy occurs in some other way. Would the minister go through the procedure from the beginning? First of all there is the call for applications, then there are recommendations. Following that there must be some kind of investigation to find out whether the applicants are qualified, and then the actual appointment. The minister has not given the position of the superintendent in regard to that at all. I should like to have the whole story given so that we shall know what procedure is followed.

Mr. MULOCK: After the applications are received? I presume it is from that time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Received by whom?

Mr. MULOCK: Sometimes the applications are forwarded to the district director, and sometimes they come directly to Ottawa. All applications are considered and are referred to the district director, who usually sends an inspector to interview the applicants to find out their qualifications and make inquiries as to their ability to fill the position; to see what applications there are and who are returned soldiers. If there are returned soldier applicants they are considered first. There is no use in going around to a lot of civilian applicants if there are suitable returned soldiers, because the returned soldier is going to get the position. Then the reports of the inspector are forwarded to the district director or superintendent, as the case may be, who in turn forwards them to the head of post office service at Ottawa.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And he makes his recommendation when he forwards them; he recommends who is to get the position? The final decision, however, does not rest with him; his recommendation might be entirely overridden by other interference?

Mr. MULOCK: I would not put it in exactly that way. There is a departure from that procedure only when there is a dispute, and then of course the matter must be the responsibility of the Postmaster General. If there is a dispute on the question of entitlement, the recommendation would come from the head of post office service as to what course of action he thought should be followed, and he could come in and discuss the matter. However, the great majority of cases are dealt with entirely without submission to the minister's office at all.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And the returned soldier always gets the preference?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes; the suitable returned soldier always gets the preference.

Mr. BURTON: I was greatly interested in the outline the Postmaster General gave in connection with the appointment of these postmasters. I understand that appointments in the revenue post offices are made through the civil service commission, but like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I was astounded to learn that appointments in the smaller post offices were sometimes of a political nature. Perhaps I was not as surprised as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, however, because I have in my hand a sessional paper No. 224 dated Tuesday, March 14, 1944, which was brought down in reply to a motion standing in my name. In following the outline given by the minister in reply to the hon. member for Yorkton in regard to the procedure followed in these appointments, I was surprised when he neglected to inform the committee and the hon. member just what connection the Department of Agriculture had with the Post Office Department. I was not surprised to hear the Postmaster General say that defeated candidates were consulted in regard to the appointment of postmasters, but I did not know that our present Minister of Agriculture was a defeated candidate in the constituency of Humboldt. I should like to go through this return, giving the committee the essential information it contains, because I am quite sure the committee will be concerned about the matter.

First I have a copy of a letter which was sent to the provincial secretary of the Canadian Legion at Regina with respect to a vacancy in the Dafoe post office; that is the village of Dafoe, not the Dafoe airport. Mr. Chase, the provincial secretary of the Canadian Legion, was notified by the department that this vacancy was to be filled. That was all to the good; we appreciated this step. Then on August 2, 1943, the date on which the Canadian Legion secretary at Regina was notified, I have a copy of a letter addressed to the private secretary to the Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa, reading in part as follows:

> The position of postmaster at Dafoe, electoral district of Humboldt, Saskatchewan, is vacant owing to the resignation of Mr. Cyril Lambe. Mr. Lambe has been on military leave and the office has been in the temporary charge of his wife, Mrs. Helen Maud Lambe since the 4th February, 1941. Mrs. Lambe now wishes to be relieved of her duties on the 15th August. As the appointment in this case rests with the Postmaster General, will you be so good as to submit as soon as possible for his consideration your minister's recommendation of a suitable person for appointment to this vacancy. An official nomination form is herewith.

I might add that I am sure the Minister of Agriculture was not in Ottawa at that time. Then on August 27 there is another letter addressed to the private secretary to the Minister of Agriculture:

> Re Dafoe, Saskatchewan
>
> With reference to the vacancy in the position of postmaster at the above mentioned office, permit me to inform you that an application has been received from Mr. William Ferdinand Werner, who states that he was born on the 29th January, 1890.

That is signed by George C. Avery, acting chief superintendent, post office service. The next letter is from Saskatoon to the chief superintendent of post office service, Ottawa:

Re Dafoe, Saskatchewan

Referring to previous correspondence, in regard to the vacant position of postmaster at the above named office, especially to my letter of the 23rd instant, enclosing an application form 5-B completed by Mr. William Ferdinand Werner, I wish to advise that the acting postmistress asked to be relieved of the office at the earliest possible date, and therefore, subject to the approval of the department, steps will be taken within the next few days to place the office temporarily in charge of Mr. Werner. Enclosed is a letter from Mr. W. E. Mason, secretary of the Dafoe branch of the Canadian Legion, to the effect that the branch is in favour of the appointment of Mr. Werner.

The next one is dated August 31, 1943, and is addressed to the private secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think this is absolutely out of order, but the hon. member is reading from a return which no doubt is available in the records of the House of Commons. This may be in order, but I doubt it very much, because after all the country has been put to some expense already in the preparation of this return, and I am sure most hon. members will be familiar with what is in it.

Mr. BURTON: I want to assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I do not desire to place on record anything that does not concern this case, but I submit that in presenting the matter to the minister and the committee it is necessary to quote from the return in order to show that injustices are done in matters of this kind and that returned men are not always given the preference they are supposed to receive. I submit that subject to your approval, I may place this information on record without causing any undue hardship to anyone.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not only the question of hardship; it is the question of whether or not the rules should be obeyed. Already some expense has been incurred by the country in having this return prepared and brought down, and I do not see that it is necessary for the hon. member to place it all on Hansard. There is no doubt that he has the right to base his argument upon the return, but I do not believe it is necessary to put all the information on Hansard again.

Mr. BURTON: I intend to show that in this case the Canadian Legion at this point in Saskatchewan made a recommendation supporting the appointment of the man who had been the assistant in this office. They wished to have him continue there, and here we have interference from the outside in connection with that appointment. To continue quoting from this return:

Private Secretary to The Minister of Agriculture.

Re: Dafoe, Sask.

I am enclosing for your information copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Dafoe Branch of the Canadian Legion in favour of the appointment of Mr. W. F. Werner as postmaster at Dafoe.

As the acting postmistress desires to be relieved of the office at the earliest possible date, arrangements have been made for a temporary transfer to the charge of Mr. Werner.

Then we come to the next one, which is a memorandum stating:

Re Dafoe, Saskatchewan.

Mr. Parker, Private Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, telephoned and stated that his minister recommended J. B. Holfeld instead of Mr. Werner.

Then here is a telegram:

The District Superintendent of Post Service, Saskatoon, Sask.

Re Dafoe if not too late transfer office to Holfeld instead of Werner.

George C. Avery.

And then follows this letter:

Ottawa, September 3, 1943.

District Superintendent, Saskatoon, Sask.

This will confirm telegram of September 2, reading as follows: "Re Dafoe if not too late transfer office to Holfeld instead of Werner."

George C. Avery.

Here is another telegram:

Saskatoon, Sask., September 3

George C. Avery
Acting Chief Superintendent Post Office Service, Ottawa, Ontario.

Re Dafoe Werner has already completed oath of office and arranged take over present premises and equipment. Temporary transfer set for September eighth. Please wire further instructions.

J. H. Hunter.

Then we have this further memorandum:

Ottawa, 7th September, 1943.

Re: Dafoe, Saskatchewan.

The information contained in the District Superintendent's telegram of the 3rd September was given to Mr. Parker, Private Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, by telephone. Mr. Parker stated that notwithstanding this his minister still desired to recommend Mr. J. B. Holfeld.

George C. Avery.

Then we have another telegram, as follows:

Ottawa, September 7, 1943.

District Superintendent of Postal Service, Saskatoon, Sask.

Re Dafoe notwithstanding information your telegram third proceed with transfer to Holfeld.

George C. Avery.

Then we have this further letter:

Ottawa, September 10, 1943.

Private Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, Ottawa.

In accordance with your minister's recommendation on the official nomination form, instructions have been issued for the appointment of Mr. J. B. Holfeld as postmaster at Dafoe, Sask.

Geo. C. Avery.

My submission is that in this instance the district postal superintendent wished to appoint a man who had been helping with that work, a man who had the recommendation of the Canadian Legion. Then there was interference and, as I have said, regardless of what the district superintendent had done, the Minister of Agriculture overrode the decision which had been made by the district superintendent and other officials of the Post Office Department. As a result there was appointed to that office a man who had not served overseas in a previous war, a man who had not been discharged from service in this war, and a man whose appointment was not approved by the people in that community. I have one other letter I should like to read, as follows:

Saskatoon, Sask., Sept. 25, 1943.

Chief Superintendent, Post Office Service, Ottawa.

Re Dafoe, Sask., Post Office.

Enclosed for your kind attention is a petition bearing 128 signatures, protesting against the appointment of Mr. J. B. Holfeld to the position of postmaster at the above mentioned office.

J. H. Hunter.

I submit that when we have interference of that kind, when the Post Office Department has men who are qualified and who should know the people they are dealing with, we should not find these little appointments—little two-by-four post office appointments—being interfered with by a man who never was a candidate in the constituency, who never was a member for the constituency, and who knows very little about the constituency. Yet he tells the people there who their postmaster shall be. I object to a procedure of that kind.

When I asked for this information, and the return was finally authorized, the Postmaster General said that with the usual reservations the information would be supplied. And if my memory serves me correctly the information was given and it was indicated that possibly all the information would not be supplied. The people in that district are satisfied that all the information is not supplied in the return. They reach that conclusion because they know that at the outbreak of war the Royal Canadian Mounted Police made a report with respect to this man who is now postmaster in that village. It will be noticed that that report is not in the files. I say that that is what the people believe. I do not know. The minister himself said when the return was brought down that possibly it would not be complete. I do say that this is not a healthy situation and the people do not like it, nor do they approve of it. The Canadian Legion has signified its willingness to have someone fill the position, and then they are overridden by a man who is not even connected with the Post Office Department. I want to know what connection he has.

Mr. MULOCK: If the hon. member had given me any intimation that he was going to discuss this matter I would have had the records here. He will appreciate that there are over 12,000 post offices, and I certainly cannot have all the files here concerning all of them. I cannot give him all the information he wants, but I shall be glad to make inquiries at once. That is all I can say at the present time.

Mr. BURTON: Can the minister give any reasonable explanation to the committee why the minister of another department should have the say-so in the Post Office Department, as to who an appointee shall be?

Mr. MULOCK: The minister of another department does not have the say-so in my department, but he may have made a recommendation.

Mr. BURTON: His recommendation is here, as brought down in the return. It shows that the minister's official, one whom I have always considered an able official, had made an appointment. But because the minister of another department overrode the official's appointment, he had to bow to the appointment of someone else.

Mr. MULOCK: A district director could not make an appointment; he could make only a recommendation.

Mr. BURTON: I realize that, but if we cannot have confidence in the men you have out there in the country, the men who are dealing with post offices day in and day out, and if we cannot have confidence in those men being permitted to make proper recommendations, then I say we are getting into a bad state of affairs so far as the Post Office Department is concerned. And furthermore, if your men in charge find that when they want to do the right thing they are interfered with, even from outside the Post Office Department, you are reducing the efficiency of your personnel in other parts of the country.

Mr. MULOCK: My hon. friend would put permanent officials of the department in an almost impossible position. If the inspector made the appointment he would have to take absolute responsibility. If he recommends a man who was a Liberal or a Conservative perhaps my hon. friend would object to him on that score. The inspector makes his inquiry and then reports to the head of the postal services in Ottawa. I will look into the matter the hon. member has brought up, but he will understand that I have not the details of all these cases right here.

Mr. WOOD: I think circumstances alter cases. I happen to have a vacancy in my constituency and I would be delighted to have a recommendation, even from the hon. member for Humboldt. It is easy for the hon. member to take one specific case in which a recommendation had been made by the legion. I honour the legion and I always consult them, but it has not seen fit to make a recommendation for this particular vacancy. In these days of prosperity, positions in some of these smaller offices are not so attractive. It may be that somebody had ambitions and went through the procedure of having the legion help to get him an appointment, and now the hon. member makes a political hubbub about a particular appointment. I think all cases have to be analysed on their own merits and I hope that the argument advanced by the hon. member for Humboldt will not be applied to all cases. As I say, I have found it most difficult to fill this particular vacancy.

Mr. BURTON: I appreciate what the minister has said, but I do not want him to think that I brought up this as an individual case. Despite what the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said, this is not an isolated case. There has been altogether too much of this going on. I bring up this case as one of many that have occurred in years gone by. If it was just an individual case I would be quite prepared to take it up with the minister, but this concerns a matter of apparent policy. The minister has permitted another minister to override the good judgment of his own officials. We are quite prepared to see that as far as possible these appointments are made on a non-political basis. He can say what he wants to say about the superintendent making the appointment, that one man may be a Conservative, a member of the C.C.F. or a Liberal, but we are quite prepared to have these appointments made by the civil service commission with the recommendation of the legion. In this case the recommendation of the legion was absolutely ignored and another man was forced into the position.

Mr. MULOCK: Will my hon. friend state that Warner who was recommended by the legion is a returned soldier?

Mr. BURTON: No, I will not state that Mr. Warner is a returned soldier.

Mr. MULOCK: That was the inference.

Mr. BURTON: The legion recommended that Mr. Warner be considered.

Mr. MULOCK: I understand that in his own statement Mr. Warner said he was not a returned soldier.

Mr. BURTON: Several returned men made application for the position but apparently they did not have a look in when the Minister of Agriculture asked that his appointee be considered.

Mr. MULOCK: I do not think my hon. friend is being fair to the legion when he makes the statement he did. He is saying apparently that the legion did recommend Warner, who is a civilian, in preference to returned men in the district who were suitable.

Mr. BURTON: The members of that branch of the legion were quite willing that the man who had been helping in the post office should be given the position, but later when a man was appointed of whom the general public and the legion did not approve, the whole thing blew up. Then there were returned men who said, "If they are going to make this appointment, I am willing to serve," and they made application but they did not get any consideration.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not concerned with the particular case which has been brought to our attention by the hon. member for Humboldt; I am not interested in any particular case. So far as my own constituency is concerned I have not had any complaint, but I am concerned about the general principle about the application of patronage to the civil service of Canada. It seems to me that if we are to have an effective democracy that kind of thing cannot continue. There are more implications than are seen on the surface.

It has been called to my attention that when certain patronage agents offer to take up cases for individuals it is felt that they will be able to get more than the member of parliament, particularly if the member is in the opposition. I have no complaint to make in that regard because any case I have taken up with any minister I have received very fair treatment. However, this matter has reached the point where some patronage agents find themselves financially benefited, and that is going too far.

Because there is political patronage many civil servants are tied down and prevented from giving expression to their own political views. I am sure other hon. members have met the same thing I have. As I have gone through my constituency individuals have come to me and whispered, "You know, I really should not be at this meeting, because I am a civil servant, but I thought I would like to come anyway." In one case I asked a gentleman if he would mind being chairman of the meeting, and he said, "Oh, no; I could not; you know I have a government job and that would not do." That sort of thing should not take place. I am not saying that this is true of all civil servants, but civil servants should be absolutely free to express themselves in any way they want to, just as any other ordinary citizen is free to do. That would be the case if political patronage was completely eliminated.

Mr. McLARTY: I merely make this observation by way of suggestion, but I know that a large number of members have made reservations in order to get home to-night. It would be only with unanimous consent. Would the committee be inclined to sit on after one o'clock?

Mr. GRAYDON: If there are many hon. members with reservations, they got their reservations at their own risk, because I think I made pretty clear, yesterday and the day before, what view I took of this matter, and I did it because I recognized that everybody wants to get out to-night, but on the other hand I believe everybody takes the position, "We will get out to-night if the work is done, and done as it should be done, but if we cannot do it as it should be done by to-night of course we shall have to continue next week." There is no other rule or rule of thumb that can be applied, and I think we shall have to accept the situation as it is. There were 196 items left over from last night. That does not mean that they cannot all be dealt with, but if they cannot be dealt with properly they will have to be left over till next week. I believe that this is the frank, the proper and the appropriate position for anyone in the house to take.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. McLARTY: I think the leader of the opposition is perfectly fair in his statement. I wonder whether as a measure of compromise the committee could reconvene at two o'clock. That would be a reasonable compromise, and I make the suggestion. Of course this can be done only with unanimous consent.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am going to object to it, for several reasons. One is that very few hon. members would know that we were going to convene at two o'clock.

An hon. MEMBER: The bell is rung.

Mr. COLDWELL: Most hon. members understand that we shall meet at three o'clock, and I think we should meet at that hour. I may say that yesterday morning when the matter was discussed I made some objection to the proposed increase of sitting hours, but I thought that with cooperation we could get through to-day. But may I point out that yesterday morning one and a half hours were consumed by two members of the house, and to-day one or two items have occupied the entire morning.

Mr. McLARTY: Naturally consent has to be unanimous, and in view of what has been said we had better arrange to reconvene at three o'clock.

Mr. KNOWLES: It was said last night that the supplementary estimates to be brought in to-day would be tabled this morning. Will that be done?

Mr. McLARTY: I understand that they will be, although it is after one o'clock and they have not been tabled. I shall be glad to make inquiries and see that they are tabled at the earliest possible moment, which, I suppose, in view of the decision of the committee, will be three o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Progress reported.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1944-45

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1945, was presented by Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

195. Departmental administration, $161,172.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say at the outset that it was a great disappointment to thousands of people in this country, particularly those in the low income group, that the national health insurance bill was not proceeded with during this session of parliament. In many sittings of the social security committee held last session we listened to some 117 witnesses, representing all phases of health activities, and went over very carefully the proposed draft bill. At the conclusion of last year's sitting we were given to understand that some members of the advisory committee, headed by Doctor Heagerty, an eminent physician and authority on health matters, would shortly proceed to each province to discuss with them these proposals, and following this it was hoped that a conference would take place between the dominion and provincial governments to deal with the financial aspects of the bill. When we reconvened this year we found that neither of these things had been done. I then called the attention of the minister of pensions and health to the urgent necessity of this conference being convened if we were to get this bill before parliament this session. Since then, no conference has been called, and although we have had many sittings and gone over the bill very thoroughly, and our chairman has laid it on the table of the house, it has not been considered by this parliament, for the reasons I have given.

If this bill had been passed it would have immediately brought relief to the many humble families suffering from sickness about whom the Prime Minister was so concerned when he brought in his baby bonus bill which is not to come into effect until July of next year.

When the Minister of Pensions and National Health opposed my motion to adjourn the house to consider the treatment of our wounded, he gave as his reason that an opportunity would be given when his estimates were considered; and at last this opportunity comes to-day. Unfortunately several of our ex-service members who intended to participate in this debate have had to return home: I refer to the hon. member for Lake Centre, the hon. member for Vancouver South, and the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough.

In dealing with this question I intend to call as witnesses certain people who have been making a special investigation of the situation at Christie street. First I will call Mr. O. T. G. Williamson, secretary of the Canadian Corps Association, whose letter to the Globe and Mail is as follows:

> The men in Christie Street hospital cannot be described as "humble poor" and yet they are deserving of rather more consideration than is being given them. A temporary fire trap overrun with cockroaches is hardly the place to which a grateful country should consign them. Far from being humble, they are proud. They have a proper pride in themselves and in their achievements. It is the task of us, who have remained at home in comfort, to see that they have no reason to lose their pride in the country they suffered to defend.
>
> If there was the slightest necessity for them now to be housed in a factory building which has been a "temporary hospital since the last war they would take it with a grin. Many of them received their first dressing under fire in a slit trench. They can take it when they have to. Now the necessity is past. If energy and goodwill had been shown by the Department of Pensions and National Health, Sunnybrook hospital might be complete to-day.
>
> Hospitals quite as large and permanent have been built in Australia and the United States in no more than six months. They go back to the outbreak of war. It is fair to the minister to say that he was warned of the necessity as long ago as March, 1943. Advised by deputies whose opinions at that time have since been shown to be without foundation, he stalled and procrastinated. When finally forced by public opinion to take action, he did so in ways which made it plain that he was sticking to his original intention of making the hospital a post-war project. To date, as far as actual construction is concerned, he has turned a sod and done some wholly unnecessary grading. It is now believed that tenders will be closed within a day or two for an up-patients building, a nurses' residence and the boiler plant. Even when these are complete, active treatment cases will still be relegated to Christie Street.
>
> From an extensive knowledge of building practice, the writer wishes to say that a contract could immediately be placed for the construction of the main building.
>
> Plans complete to the last detail are unnecessary. The structure could be commenced at once with good prospect of it being enclosed before cold weather. The final details would be ready long before that time. Men being wounded in Normandy could easily receive treatment in Sunnybrook hospital by next April at latest if energy is now shown. The departments of defence have a responsibility in this matter which they must not overlook. They should take on the job and at once.

This appeared in the Globe and Mail on August 5, 1944. I wish now to read a few extracts from a letter written by Colonel C. E. Reynolds, immediate past-president of the Canadian Corps, in which he says:

> I will stake my reputation as a construction man that the main treatment building at Sunnybrook hospital could be started at once and completed by the end of April of next year. To pretend otherwise is eyewash. Babies' diapers apparently mean more than bloodstained bandages to the people of Ottawa responsible for the care of our fighting men.

Any decent Canadian must be heartsick at the callous disregard being shown toward the cream of our manhood.

I wish also to quote an extract from another letter written by Mr. O. T. G. Williamson a few days later than the one I have already read. He says:

The minister's statement, published on August 5, is misleading and calculated to promote complacency at a time when it is of the utmost importance that the public should be aware of the truth. As far as hospital accommodation is concerned, it is significant that Mr. Mackenzie speaks in terms of beds and not of buildings. That sufficient hospital space has not been provided is amply proved by the recent decision to convert hostels at Peterborough and Kingston for this purpose. Beds, as Mr. Mackenzie insists, may be available, but suitable places to put them are not. The wards of Christie Street hospital are crowded far beyond the limits of decency and there are few empty beds. Within the last few days pressure had to be exerted to have three men in urgent need of operations, removed from Chorley Park to Christie Street. These men had been held for weeks in spite of their condition because beds were not available in Christie Street where the operations would be performed. Yet in spite of this situation Mr. Mackenzie is acquiring trumpery makeshifts instead of forcing the immediate construction of the active treatment wing at Sunnybrook Park. It is a sad outlook if every attack on callous disregard for servicemen is to be dubbed political.

It should be noted that all those who have fought for a new hospital have fully appreciated that the medical and nursing services available have been unsurpassed in any Canadian hospital. The pity is that devoted doctors and nurses should be working under such distressing circumstances.

That is the end of the quotation from Mr. Williamson's letter. May I add a word so that there can be no misunderstanding of my position in criticizing the inadequacy of the accommodation provided at Christie street. I have said before, and I repeat, that the surgical staff at Christie street is as expert and efficient as can be found in any part of the world. Operations of the most intricate and difficult character are done there by leading surgical specialists in the city of Toronto. The medical staff and those in charge of the X-ray department and laboratories are in every way most capable and efficient. The nursing staff is of the highest order and lives up to the best traditions of the nursing profession. In addition, the work of the voluntary aid detachment nurses is of a very high order, so that anything I say with respect to the accommodation provided for the wounded in that hospital must not be misconstrued as criticism of the staff.

Now I should like to read from a letter to the press by Mr. F. B. Bowman of Hamilton, who, if I mistake not, served as a medical officer in the last war. He states in part as follows:

Finally I wish to point out that to compare Christie Street hospital with hospitals in the United States housing returned American soldiers leaves a very bad impression. I do not think that soldiers want luxuries; all they want is comfort, good food and the most up-to-date scientific treatment. Many of them on returning complain that as long as they were in the army everything was satisfactory, but as soon as they were switched to pensions and national health the very opposite was the case. There is probably a good deal of truth in this observation.

Mr. GIBSON: Will you read the end of that letter? Read the last paragraph.

Mr. BRUCE: I will read the whole letter if you like.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The whole thing is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Some statements are being made that are certainly out of order.

Mr. BRUCE: He says that the soldiers do not want luxuries such as are to be found in the million dollar Red Cross hospital at Cliveden, England, grand pianos, Persian rugs and so forth.

All they want is to be looked after and not kicked around from place to place until they are completely discouraged. Ask some of the Dieppe wounded, if they wish to verify this statement. Let us give some credit to the work that has been accomplished at Christie Street . . .

The rest conforms to what I said a moment ago about the efficient staff at Christie street.

Miraculous healing surgery has been an everyday occurrence there and up-to-date medical treatment in the past; but has it been brought up to date in the present?

As I said before, I have no criticism of the treatment; it is excellent. Now I should like to read another extract—and I am reading only extracts because of the time it would consume if I were to read in full all the letters that have appeared in the press, which are available to hon. members. Miss Ruth Mendell, Red Cross V.A.D., wrote a letter which appeared on August 4, 1944, in the Globe and Mail under the caption "No Place For Ailing Veterans", which she opens with this statement:

Anyone who has ever visited patients at Christie Street hospital knows that the building is not fit to house sick men for weeks, months and sadly often years. But have we got the assurance that upon the new hospital's completion, the Red Chevron (Christie Street hospital's Davenport Road Annex) will be closed or will most of its patients, old sick veterans of the last war and a few younger veterans of this war be doomed to spend the rest of their days in tiny bare rooms lighted by inadequate windows, many of which face a wall three yards off? At the Red Chevron many patients spend the greater part of the day in a long narrow room ventilated by a very small window in one corner and a thoroughly inadequate air hole in one of the walls. On the bright and sunny morning while the unfortunate seven were outside for a few hours of fresh air this room was dark and the atmosphere terrible. The light from two small bulbs only emphasizes the gloom. For sane men the room would be a cruel sickening nightmare.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. I have been long-suffering in this matter. I refer you, Mr. Chairman, to citation 259 at page 106 of the third edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

The CHAIRMAN: Does any hon. member wish to speak to the point of order? I believe the point of order is well taken. I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member while he was speaking, but I would point out that the letters he is reading fall within the terms of citation 259, which is as follows:

It is a well-known principle that a statement made in this house cannot be contradicted by a statement made by a person who is not a member of the house.

I believe that that rule applies to a person writing an article. A statement contradicting what was said by a minister or any hon. member of parliament would certainly be out of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: On the point of order, surely we are not going to—

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my decision.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the chairman might have given me an opportunity before he made his decision.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The chairman asked if anybody wished to speak to the point of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I desire only to say that I do not know why the chairman is applying the rule as strictly as he is, because what the hon. member for Parkdale is now doing has been done by scores of hon. members during the session. Surely from the point of view of leniency a certain amount of latitude ought to be allowed. This is an important subject, and I do not think the chairman ought to take that position in the closing days of the session. I recall that on a number of occasions hon. members have made a similar breach of the rules. Perhaps that is a poor argument to use with respect to this particular point, but I do suggest to the chairman that this is not the time to invoke strict application of the rule and that discussion should be permitted to continue on this important matter.

The CHAIRMAN: I gave a ruling on the point of order. I know that the leader of the opposition realizes that I would be the last to curtail discussion. The leader of the opposition will agree with me that when the hon. member, who was speaking, read a statement written by somebody else, criticizing severely the Minister of Pensions and National Health, he was certainly out of order. I qualified my ruling by stating that I thought the statement that the hon. member was making at the time the point of order was raised was in order.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I seek your ruling with respect to this. Time after time there have been rulings given on reading letters in the house. My understanding has always been that when a member reads a letter he must give the name of the person who signed the letter or take the responsibility for the letter. The hon. member has given the name of the author of the letter, and surely that is sufficient in the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend has completely missed the significance of citation 259. It is as follows:

It is a well-known principle that a statement made in this house cannot be contradicted by a statement made by a person who is not a member of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: What statement has been contradicted? I have listened attentively to what the hon. member for Parkdale has said. So far as I know it is not a question of contradicting a statement. It is a question of stating the conditions that exist at Christie street hospital.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I raised the point of order, and the chairman gave a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: We should follow as closely as possible the rules of the house. I know the chamber is warm, but despite that we should follow the rules.

Mr. BRUCE: I have called certain witnesses to support the attitude that I have taken in criticizing this hospital, as has been done by other hon. members during the session, and in other sessions. I have never heard a protest such as the minister has made to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is not a protest. I read the rule and the chairman gave a ruling.

Mr. BRUCE: Well, I have never heard this ruling before. No one tried to impose the rule before.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The chairman has ruled.

Mr. BRUCE: I have read letters and other hon. members have read letters which have sometimes been asked to be placed on the table of the house. I have given the names of the individuals who wrote the letters and they are available to the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have them in the other direction too.

Mr. BRUCE: You may have plenty of them. I notice by to-day's paper that somebody had been sent by the minister's publicity department to get a report on conditions at Christie street from an ex-patient. After spending an hour going through the hospital this veteran published a statement which confirms all the charges that are made by the others whom I have quoted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I made no report. More Globe and Mail stuff.

Mr. BRUCE: The Globe and Mail is a very reliable paper, perhaps just as reliable as any paper in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Your political godmother.

Mr. BRUCE: This journal is trying to do a great public service, and thinking people in this country will be grateful rather than critical. The trouble with some people who are vulnerable is that they do not want the facts brought out. I have found the greatest difficulty in getting an opportunity to bring out some of the facts in connection with Christie street hospital.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You have had every opportunity you wanted.

Mr. BRUCE: The minister said there were reports on the other side. On August 10, a man signing himself T. W. A. Milgate gave a report praising the staff of the hospital. He has been a patient there off and on for twenty-five years. He does not say anything about the accommodation of the hospital. All he does is to praise the staff as I have done and as any other man who has gone through that institution and who speaks truthfully will do. Another man called Quinney did the same thing. He speaks in praise of the staff and nurses of the hospital.

I should now like to refer to what has been done there since last autumn. Eight months ago the citizens' committee of Toronto made certain representations to the Department of Pensions and National Health. After the situation was explained to them they agreed to a temporary building at Christie street, with the understanding that it be built at once. On June 2 the Public Works Department at Ottawa announced the awarding of a number of contracts; one was a temporary pavilion at Christie street to cost $128,789. It seems extraordinary that it takes eight months before any work is done on this temporary structure, and that now we have the noise and dirt accompanying the building to add further to the tribulations of the soldiers who are occupying that hospital.

There are a number of others who have publicly given their opinion in regard to the hospital, which confirms the statement made by Miss Mendel, whose account I have read. They are: Mrs. Hugh Dalton Baker, Mrs. Healy Willan, Beth Avery, Miss Laura D. Flanagan and Mrs. Grace McCullagh. These letters express appreciation of the letter of Miss Mendel and others who have exposed the inadequacy of the accommodation at Christie street hospital. I shall not attempt to read them all.

Now for a moment I should like to refer to the offer made by Premier Drew of the mental hospital at St. Thomas, when those premises are evacuated by the R.C.A.F., in order to assist the department of pensions and health to provide additional accommodation for the wounded. I understand that offer has been accepted, and that the hospital soon will be in use as an auxiliary to help out in the present situation. I think we are justified in assuming that a grave emergency has arisen in regard to hospital accommodation, which has not only necessitated the taking over of this St. Thomas hospital as soon as it is available, but also the conversion of two hostels formerly under the control of the Department of Munitions and Supply, one at Peterborough and the other at Kingston, which are expected to be transformed into up-to-date hospitals with operating rooms, X-ray equipment, laboratories and other accommodation for the care of our wounded within a period of six weeks. Well, I suggest that the minister and his associates will have to move much faster than they have moved in connection with Sunnybrook park if they are to get these hostels ready in six weeks. I doubt if that is possible; and even if it is possible it is only a temporary arrangement.

What I have been saying, together with many others, is that by this time we should have had adequate hospital accommodation for our wounded, at least equal to that provided for our civilians. We ask no more; but certainly they are entitled to the same accommodation, the same comforts and all the things that go to make up an up-to-date hospital, that are available to the civilian population, and that has not been done. It should have been possible for the minister to look ahead and have these hospitals ready and waiting when our wounded came home. I I think there is no excuse that will justify the fact that this matter has been delayed until we are approaching the sixth year of war. Other countries have been able to make such provision; it has been done in Australia and New Zealand, and in the press of to-day there is a reference to a hospital in Cleveland known as the Crile hospital, I presume named after the late Doctor Crile of Cleveland. This institution extends for a distance of eleven miles; it will accommodate five thousand people; it has all the modern conveniences, and it was built in the course of a few months. I do not understand why it was not possible to do the same thing here.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Is it a permanent hospital?

Mr. BRUCE: The Crile hospital in Cleveland, Ohio, is a military hospital; I had an account of it here, but I cannot lay my hands on it at the moment. However, I think I have said enough to indicate what has been done in other places and what surely might have been done here if the minister in charge of this department had been up to his job.

The other evening when I was dealing with this matter the Minister of National Defence asked me to give a specific case. I had not one at hand at the moment, but the following day I received particulars of a case which I shall now give the minister. I will not give the name or regimental number of this private, though I have them on this sheet of paper in my hand.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I want those names, privately.

Mr. BRUCE: I will give them to the minister privately. I do not wish to publicize this man's name because I do not want him to suffer any more mental anguish through being disturbed by people making inquiries in regard to his injuries, or as a result of bringing his case up in the house. I am sure the minister will understand that. We will call this man Private Jones. On February 17, 1944, he was seriously wounded in Italy, receiving a compound fracture of the right knee joint and the lower end of the femur. His back was also dislocated. He was hospitalized in Italy from February 18 to May 24, 1944, and received the best of care though these hospitals were frequently under shell fire. He arrived in England on June 1, where he received excellent care in the hospitals until he was evacuated to Canada. He arrived in this country on July 8, and was taken to Chorley Park. On July 11 the cast was removed and a dry dressing applied to the wound. Later on there was a very considerable discharge from the wound, requiring daily dressings. About that time a board was held for the purpose of filling out his discharge papers. On July 28 he was again examined by a doctor who found dead bone, and informed him that this would have to be removed and that perhaps his leg might have to be amputated. It was decided also to give him penicillin treatment. When the doctor told him that he would have to undergo an operation to remove the dead bone the private replied, "All right. When do we start, and how long before it heals?" The doctor answered that it could take at least six months to heal, but it would have to wait until headquarters got around to it and a bed was available at Christie street hospital, because Chorley Park hospital has not properly equipped operating rooms for the purpose, and that this might mean a delay of a week or a month.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Was he discharged at that time?

Mr. BRUCE: I do not know what has happened to him since then.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is very important.

Mr. BRUCE: The last information I have is in regard to July 28. Whether he has been transferred to Christie street I do not know.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Has he been put out of Chorley Park hospital?

Mr. BRUCE: He was at Chorley Park hospital, and when the condition I have described necessitated either the removal of dead bone, or perhaps later on the amputation of his leg, it was recommended that he be removed to Christie street. He was not able to get into Christie street immediately because there was no room for him there.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Where is that soldier now?

Mr. BRUCE: I presume he is still at Chorley Park, unless in the meantime a bed has been found for him at Christie street. I would hope that that is so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I understood the hon. member to say that he was put out of the hospital.

Mr. BRUCE: No, I did not say so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, he said that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Because there was no room for him.

Mr. BRUCE: No, I did not say that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Hansard will record what was said.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has a right to proceed.

Mr. BRUCE: I think my statement was clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is he receiving medical treatment at Chorley Park?

Mr. BRUCE: He will be receiving suitable treatment, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the case my hon. friend is making out?

Mr. BRUCE: He is receiving treatment in the meantime, undoubtedly, but he needs an operation. That operation could be performed for him if he could get into Christie street hospital where such work is done.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is lots of room at Christie street hospital for operations right now. My hon. friend has his facts incorrectly.

Mr. BRUCE: Those are the facts I have, and they are correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, no; they cannot be.

Mr. BRUCE: That is the statement given to me, which can be shown to be true, and proved to be correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I understood my hon. friend was endeavouring to substantiate a statement made in this house the other day that patients were sent from the hospital for treatment outside the hospital. This case he now brings up is that of a patient who is in Chorley Park, and getting the best medical attention there. And I will guarantee there are medical facilities at Christie street hospital for any operation of any kind at the present time. I cannot follow my hon. friend's argument at all.

Mr. BRUCE: My argument is very simple, and I do not think I need to simplify it further.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think you had better.

[Mr. Bruce.]

Mr. BRUCE: I stated clearly what the medical officer told this man at Chorley Park.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Did my hon. friend see this case himself?

Mr. BRUCE: I have not seen it, no. I have not been home.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Then it is just hearsay.

Mr. BRUCE: I would not say that it was hearsay. If the minister wishes to have the evidence I can produce it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Does my hon. friend say that this case has been denied the fullest medical attention?

Mr. BRUCE: He was denied the opportunity to go to Christie street at the time the medical officer at Chorley Park told him he should have an operation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I deny that. May I ask my hon. friend who is the medical officer who gave him this information?

Mr. BRUCE: I do not know the name of the medical officer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Good gracious!

Mr. BRUCE: I do not wonder you say "good gracious." You are much disturbed, of course.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): And you are more than disturbed; you are bewildered.

Mr. BRUCE: I can say to the Minister of National Defence, that I have no desire to involve more people in this matter than I have done.

Mr. MacDIARMID: Is it only in Christie street hospital that they can amputate? is that the only hospital in Toronto in which amputations are done?

Mr. BRUCE: I believe Christie street hospital is the hospital where they specialize in orthopaedic work, and orthopaedic surgery includes amputations. They have the facilities there not only for amputations but for fitting orthopaedic appliances such as artificial limbs, afterwards.

Mr. MacDIARMID: Then as I understand it, the criticism has been levelled at Christie street hospital that it is not a fit place to take them. I am very much interested in this, and I want to understand what the hon. member for Parkdale says. If Christie street hospital is not fit, then why take the case there?

Mr. BRUCE: Because there is nowhere else in Toronto equipped for this work.

Mr. MacDIARMID: The hon. member criticized them before and he is doing it now, if it is as he says it is I must say that I back him up, and if Christie street hospital cannot take the load and take the patients in there, then let this government get the accommodation or get a government that will.

Mr. BRUCE: I am pleased to have the hon. member back me up in this way. That is what I am saying.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Has the hon. member spoken to the doctor who was quoted, to verify the statement made in regard to the operation?

Mr. BRUCE: Have I what?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Have you spoken to the doctor who was quoted in this case, to verify the statement made?

Mr. BRUCE: I have not been home since I spoke in the house. This information was sent to me, from an absolutely reliable authority.

Mr. RALSTON: You see, I had the idea that my hon. friend was answering a question I asked him. He made a statement. The statement my hon. friend made, and which I questioned, was the statement that men had been sent from Christie street hospital to their homes, although they required medical attention. I asked him if the medical officers had said that the men who went home needed hospital treatment and he said he did not know.

My hon. friend has not dealt with that at all. To-day he is dealing with a case of a man who went to Chorley Park, who could not be given accommodation in Christie street hospital and was taken back to Chorley Park again. I am certainly interested in that case, but I call this to my hon. friend's attention, that he is not meeting the inquiries I made of him.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to enter into a long argument with the Minister of National Defence who, after all, is a very skilful lawyer. That has been his business for many years—to cross-examine witnesses. I am not his witness, and I do not purpose being put into that position.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend said he was meeting a challenge, but I am pointing out to him that he is not meeting any challenge at all. My question was with regard to a statement he made that men who require hospital treatment had been sent home from Christie street hospital because, as he alleged, they could not get beds there.

Mr. BRUCE: No, not because they could not get treatment, but because—

Mr. RALSTON: But my hon. friend has not dealt with that at all. He has not talked about sending men home; he has been talking about a man being sent back to Chorley Park.

Mr. BRUCE: I am talking about overcrowding at Christie street. And what I have said shows that the hospital is so crowded that men who require treatment there could not get in.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There are at least two hundred vacant beds there all the time.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to a point of order. I suggest the hon. member who has the floor should be allowed to continue, and that unless he consents to interruptions, they ought not to be made. Surely he should at least be asked to give his consent.

Mr. RALSTON: All I am objecting to is my hon. friend's suggestion that he is meeting my challenge, as he calls it, by referring to this Chorley Park matter. That is a different case. He is not meeting the question I put to him at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In the interests of public information and for the information of the country may I say that there are 327 beds at Christie street hospital that are available, and the hon. member's statement is absolutely inaccurate.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order is well taken, and the hon. member for Parkdale has the floor.

Mr. BRUCE: I have another case, but I will not record it, because I do not wish to be subjected to cross-examination such as I have been given.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I might say this to my hon. friend, that the rules—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are breaking the rules.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is breaking the rules by his own objection.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the hon. member for Parkdale not to be allowed to continue? Surely we have not got to that point.

The CHAIRMAN: I have allowed a lot of latitude to all concerned. The hon. member has five more minutes.

Mr. ROWE: He has been interrupted so often, he must have more than that.

Mr. GRAYDON: Go ahead.

Mr. BRUCE: I hope, Mr. Chairman, that you are keeping track of all these interruptions, and that I will be given credit for that time.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for Parkdale must be making out a good case; that is all I can say.

Mr. ROWE: He can speak for another forty minutes.

Mr. BRUCE: The other day the Minister of National Defence objected because I talked about Christie street hospital, and did not extend my criticism across Canada. I then referred to a situation in Montreal, and a statement made by Doctor Penfield which, I believe, confirmed the criticism I was making. In that connection the Gazette of May 30 contains the following:

The situation is one that calls for immediate and vigorously pressed action, which the Department of Pensions and National Health has thus far showed itself incapable of taking. As the responsible head of the department, Honourable Ian Mackenzie, should either show results within the near future or let somebody else take over this vital task.

I should like to refer for a moment to the words of a journal which is not unfriendly to this government, the Winnipeg Free Press of June 5, 1944, under the heading of "Stubborn Incompetence" has something critical to say about the handling of this department by the present minister.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): That is out of order.

Mr. BOUCHER: Everything is out of order that you people do not like.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): If the article which the hon. member proposes to read casts reflection upon any minister or member of this house, then it is out of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: On the point of order, for the first time since I came into the house we seem to be witnessing the government objecting to something being read out of the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. ROWE: If it is complimentary I suppose it will be in order?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend is entirely wrong there.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. BRUCE: Referring to Deer Lodge hospital this article states:

It was then urged that if more beds had to be provided they should be in a building placed as near as possible to the Manitoba medical college, that is to say, near the general hospital which provides the clinical background for all the teaching of medicine in Manitoba.

And again:

Striking confirmation of this view now comes from Montreal from the lips of the man whose claim to be considered the greatest surgeon in Canada is recognized by everyone but himself. Dr. Wilder Penfield, head of the Montreal neurological institute, which, in a few years under his dominant leadership, has won an international reputation. In his most recent report Dr. Penfield declared that, foreseeing the great increase in the type of cases handled by the institute, he had suggested to the government that an annex should be erected; or if not an annex that a new hospital should be built as near as possible to the institute. The suggestion was turned down flat on the ground that it would create an embarrassing precedent. Said Dr. Penfield, with studied moderation:

"It seems possible that returning service men with wounds of nerves, spine and head may think little of embarrassing precedents and much of their chance to regain their health."

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. BRUCE: I would like to have just a few moments to finish.

Mr. GRAYDON: There have been a number of interruptions.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member started to speak at five minutes after three o'clock and it is now five minutes to four o'clock. I have allowed fifteen minutes to the hon. member for the interruptions.

Mr. GRAYDON: Let him finish.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe it is the wish of the committee that the hon. member should complete his statement.

Mr. BRUCE: On Monday last the minister said:

I have been many times in that hospital (Christie street) and I must say I have never seen the slightest justification for the attacks which have been made.

By his own words the minister reveals his own incompetence to be in charge of hospitalization for wounded soldiers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Just what they found out about you in your medical administration in the last war.

Mr. BRUCE: Any man who is so blind and lacking in knowledge of what modern accommodation is like is incompetent to be in charge of work as important as this.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): If my hon. friend is reading from an article I submit that it is absolutely out of order.

Mr. ROWE: He is reading from his notes.

Mr. BRUCE: I wish the hon. member for Brantford City would please get glued to his seat for a few minutes and let me go on.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): On a point of order, I must say I have every right to rise when my hon. friend is out of order. I think he should stay within the rules of the house.

Mr. ROWE: On the point of order, the hon. member for Parkdale is not reading from any press clipping; he is reading his own notes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The Globe.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member for Brantford ought to know that there has been a steady stream of interruptions. When anything has been said that did not please the government, that is what happened. The hon. member for Parkdale is only following his notes. Surely a member can follow his notes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): It is impossible to know when the hon. member for Parkdale is reading from an article or when he is making a speech. He appears to be reading all the time. I think he should inform the committee when he is reading from a newspaper and when he is making a speech.

Mr. ROWE: That is a measure of intelligence.

The CHAIRMAN: If the statement made by the hon. member for Parkdale was read from an article, or is one that had been made by somebody else, it would be out of order. I believe the hon. member is reading his own written statement, and the peroration of his speech. I think he should have the right to finish.

Mr. BRUCE: If the hon. member would like to see my notes I will send them over to him. I have had typed for convenience sake the statement made by the Minister of Pensions and National Health and I have written underneath in my own handwriting a few comments upon that statement. If the hon. member for Brantford City thinks that is not a proper thing to do, then I am afraid that many hon. members have been out of order many times.

Mr. ROWE: The whole government is out of order.

Mr. BRUCE: Even from an economic point of view the necessity of restoring these men to health as speedily as possible should be recognized by any one. I submit that the statements I have read of impartial observers and investigators show that the situation at Christie street is deplorable and should not exist to-day. Eighty-two patients are crowded into one room where yesterday the temperature must have been nearly 100, and that condition added to the suffering of these wounded who have already suffered so much for our sakes overseas. I do not wish to amplify this, I have dealt with it on a number of occasions, as have other hon. members.

From what I have said and from the criticism in many other quarters I think the time has come when some other minister should be put in charge of this important department. Therefore, I am going to recommend to the Prime Minister that he relieve the minister of his office and get some competent, up-to-date earnest executive who will sincerely get about his job and provide what these soldiers require, that is, adequate, comfortable and modern hospitals and equipment to look after them during the trying time when they are recovering from wounds obtained while fighting for us overseas. I say again that I will never stop advocating proper hospitalization of the most modern kind for these wounded men so that their suffering may not be added to when they come back to what they will regard as an ungrateful country if conditions continue as they have prevailed under the present minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I think the real purpose of the address of the hon. member for Parkdale was contained in the last few sentences.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What was that again?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I say, his purpose was contained in the last few sentences.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I cannot hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I cannot be responsible for my hon. friend's lack of hearing facilities.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The gentleman's voice is so loud that it is difficult to hear him.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This diatribe was made by the man who was condemned for his own administration of the hospitals overseas, in Sir Andrew MacPhail's "History of the Canadian Medical Services,"—

Mr. GRAYDON: Was Sir Andrew MacPhail competent to do that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): — and commiserated by Sir William Osler in the same book.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order, I ask the minister whether the man whom he calls Sir Andrew MacPhail was not relieved of his duties as historian of the medical services because his first book was inaccurate and untrue.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If he was so relieved, he only shared the distinction of my hon. friend.

I should like to deal with this question with the greatest possible restraint.

Mr. BRUCE: It will be the first time you have done that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I feel it most difficult to do. I do not mind attacks upon myself personally, because any of us in public life must expect these things. But this is a campaign conducted by those sinister Siamese twins, the political Georges of Ontario.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): But I was through it before.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Just nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I remember when they said that the Bren gun factory was a disused boiler house, and it is to-day the finest arsenal of production in the whole British empire. This hon. gentleman and his political fellow-conspirators—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: On a point of order,—

Mr. BRUCE: Withdraw that remark.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am glad to see these protests.

Mr. BRUCE: This from the minister who has thumbed the rules of this house so much that he has nearly worn them out.

Mr. BOUCHER: On a point of order, I ask the minister to withdraw his statement. Where is the restraint, the equilibrium, the dispassionateness which he said he would like to have, when he calls members of the opposition "political conspirators"? I think he should forthwith withdraw his remark.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I certainly will so far as the hon. member for Carleton is concerned. I regard him as one of the finest men in this house.

Mr. ROWE: After all, Mr. Chairman, the rules of this house are for both sides. The hon. member for Parkdale was taken out of this house the other day because he used a word which you, sir, and the Speaker of this house said was unparliamentary. The word was about a bill, or an act. We accepted your ruling, naturally. But here to-day—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no; you protested.

Mr. GRAYDON: We protested, and then we accepted. We had to, under the rules.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member had to leave the house because the word "bribery" was used by him in reference to a bill or an act. Now we have a minister of the crown—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. ROWE: There is no point of order raised by the minister. I am on a point of order. The minister now speaks of the hon. member for Parkdale and "his fellow-conspirators." What about the rules of this house? Are they for one-half of the house only?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would say that it refers to the two individuals I mentioned outside.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): He has not referred to anybody here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I was not referring to any member of this house.

Mr. ROWE: The minister referred to the hon. member and "his fellow-conspirators." He knows that "fellow-conspirators" is unparliamentary.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

The CHAIRMAN: The minister is speaking to a point of order. An hon. member cannot raise a point of order on a point of order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is he speaking to a point of order? I should like to know what it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I said that my statement did not reflect on any hon. member of this house, therefore it is not out of order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): On the point of order: the minister said of the hon. member for Parkdale that he was a conspirator.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): He did say that. He said, he and his fellow conspirators. That is what he said, and, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman must withdraw his remark absolutely. There is no conspiracy. All you have got to do when you think about this thing is to pick up some of the papers and see whether there is a conspiracy or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the conspiracy.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No, sir. The hon. member must withdraw his remark.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If I cannot get order, gentlemen, I shall have to name someone, or report to the whole house.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We ask that the hon. member withdraw his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member for St. Paul's does not sit down when another hon. member has the floor I must exercise the authority of the Chair.

Mr. CASSELMAN: You cannot have it both ways.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The time has now arrived in a very lengthy session when it should be possible to conduct a proper discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think possibly, Mr. Chairman, I can end this right away.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister said in his statement that he did not refer to any hon. member in this house. We may judge that from what he said originally, when he said "you and your fellow conspirators"; then he said, "I did not refer to any member of the house." The hon. member for Parkdale likewise said when he spoke of political bribery that he did not refer to any member of the house.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. A decision was rendered on the statement made by the hon. member for Parkdale. This is neither the time nor the place to revive that matter; it can be done only when Mr. Speaker is in the chair.

Mr. BOUCHER: I am just referring to that, sir, as a means of guiding you, as a precedent for your decision on this point. On a previous occasion a member of this house—I need not mention his name—said that when he referred to an issue as "political bribery" he was not referring to an individual or any individual member of the house. The Minister of Pensions and National Health has said likewise. The statement of the hon. member who said previously that he was not referring to any member of the house was not accepted, but a retraction was exacted, and having been refused, the hon. member was punished by being expelled from the house.

Mr. ROWE: And the minister moved the motion.

Mr. BOUCHER: I should add, upon the motion of the Minister of Pensions and National Health himself, and the punishment was on the motion of the Prime Minister. I now say that, by virtue of a precedent already established, the Minister of Pensions and National Health must unequivocally recall the statement he made and the allegation he made, or he must be dealt with by the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I thank my hon. friend for his assistance. I think I am fairly familiar with the rules, and I say without the slightest hesitation that, if my remarks can be construed in any way whatsoever as reflecting on any member of the house, they are completely withdrawn.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): They certainly reflect on this hon. member.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think the minister should make an unconditional withdrawal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have made an unconditional withdrawal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after this breeze, let us discuss the situation which has been introduced here repeatedly by the hon. member for Parkdale. He said one thing and one thing only in his address with which I can agree; that is, that every member of the house desires to provide the best possible medical and hospital facilities for those who are coming back. That is the unanimous desire of the house. I do not mind public attack in the slightest; I have been under it before; but I deplore the breaking of a tradition we have had in this house for twenty-five years, in having the slightest suggestion—I am not referring to my hon. friend, so that I shall not be ruled out of order—of political attack in respect of the affairs of our returned soldiers. I think that that is the thing which is most to be condemned. We should agree to fight on questions of tariffs, of trade, of finance, of reconstruction policies if you will, but on this one question the house should be united at all times, and it always has been. Among the committees in which I have had the honour, sometimes in a private capacity, at other times in a public capacity, to participate, I have never seen a finer sense of trusteeship to the nation than in the returned soldier committees of this house.

The result of it all has been that we have to-day by and large, with certain flaws and faults and weaknesses, the finest fabric of returned soldier legislation of any country in the world. Let no party claim all the credit for that. It has come from the generous heart of this parliament, of the various parliaments since 1918-19. Look at Christie street. I hate to refer to it. It is a legacy from the old Tory union government. I did not found Christie street. When I became minister of the department I had to do the best I could with the institutions at our command, and I say this without the slightest hesitation to-day, that for brilliancy of staff work and medical care it is not excelled in the whole dominion, and has been rated number one by the American Medical Association.

My hon. friend referred to preparations made in the United States. What is the situation? The United States veterans bureau were unable to build sufficient hospitals two months ago and reported 200,000 beds behind. What is our situation? We are ahead in Canada. At the present time there are beds completed available for use, 8,317; under contract, 2,322; plans in preparation, 3,585; under advisement and approved in principle, 1,314; in Hamilton 200, in Victoria 250, or a total of 7,671. That gives a grand total of 15,988 beds, or available, to accommodate, between now and Christmas, 20,000 casualties in the dominion.

My hon. friend spoke about Deer Lodge. We have a committee for hospitalization, consisting of the four departments of government, which has recommended that 400 beds be put at Deer Lodge in preference to the conditions at the General hospital in Winnipeg, which was the occasion for condemnation referred to by the hon. member for Parkdale in connection with a certain journal in the city of Winnipeg. We have been working on this matter not for months but for the last four or five years. All departments of defence and the department of pensions have been working at it and we have a war hospitalization committee to deal with the recommendations from the various departments and pass upon them in the light of medical, surgical and hospital administration experience; and when my hon. friend sets himself up as a special authority on hospital administration, I do not find that borne out by the facts that have come to my attention. I say at once without the slightest hesitation that these distinguished medical men who comprise that medical hospitalization board are far more competent to advise me and my colleagues in the defence services, and to advise the country in regard to the actual necessities of hospital accommodation, the adequacy or inadequacy thereof in this country, than is my hon. friend the member for Parkdale.

I deprecate in the deepest possible way the intrusion of political considerations—I think I put it mildly—into this vital question. I would pray that this house be united upon this question. I should like to see, if you like, a joint committee of all the parties in this house to look into the question to see if our preparations are adequate, to advise us, to cooperate with us, and to satisfy themselves that all the arrangements we have made and have now in contemplation throughout Canada will be sufficient to carry out that sacred purpose of seeing to it that these gallant fellows overseas to-day who are making freedom possible for us at home shall receive every possible care when they come back.

Talk about delay in connection with Sunnybrook! I can tell my hon. friend, and he knows them, who the architects are. I assure the committee that not one single hour has been lost that could have been saved in regard to Sunnybrook.

Mr. BRUCE: I never suggested it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend in this house a few minutes ago suggested that we could proceed with buildings immediately without the slightest delay or hesitation, apart from plans and specifications. I wonder if there are any practical construction men in this house who know what is necessary in connection with plans and specifications. That is the most stupid and inane suggestion I have ever heard from a so-called intelligent man.

Mr. BRUCE: On a point of order, I would like to tell the minister that I have said nothing of the kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am glad to hear it.

Mr. BRUCE: I reported the opinion of Mr. Williamson and also of Colonel Reynolds, both engineers and capable of giving an opinion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I am only a layman, only an amateur, and I place myself within the judgment of the construction association of Canada or of the architectural association of this dominion when I say to you definitely, and without the slightest hesitation, that the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman—and I have seen it in some of the press—is entirely impossible of attainment. He referred to Christie street. I am not in order, but I have a letter signed by twelve patients of Christie street, with the names and regimental numbers, showing their gratitude for the treatment received at Christie street and calling the attack made by the hon. gentleman and by the Globe and Mail nothing but a political attack, which I believe it is.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: I would ask the minister if these testimonials to which he has referred are not testimonials to the excellent treatment these men have received from doctors and nurses at the hospital, and which I have not in any way criticized.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my hon. friend challenges me I suppose I can break the rules and reply to him. Let me quote:

> In our opinion the whole idea behind this publicity is nothing more or less than politics. They have taken a few bad aspects of Christie Street hospital and made it appear as though these aspects are typical of the whole hospital and of the hospital staff. Nothing could be further from the truth. The effect of this publicity—

I want to stress this, sir.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who signed those letters?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am going to come to that before I finish.

Mr. GRAYDON: Don't get uneasy about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is my hon. friend who is getting impatient.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member says that I am impatient when I allow him to get away with the word "political" when as a matter of fact there is nothing political about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): To continue:

> If it was the result of actual conditions, it might be justified, but when conditions are nothing like the Globe and Mail article would indicate, then it can only be taken for granted that politics, not the feelings of mothers, are the principal consideration.

That is signed by the following persons:

> Yours sincerely, Robert B. G. Gray, F. E. Grant, Reg. No. 296, Wm. Reeves, 186227, A. Patterson, G. A. Brown, D. F. Williams, Robert Stewart, C. Mellett, Fred Shier, W. D. Hunt, R. J. LeBlanc, G. Hamilton, J. Hemlam, G. G. Love, C. J. Gilmore.

Here they say that politics more than the consideration of the feelings of mothers is apparently what counts, What has worried me more than anything else is the effect of this discussion on the morale of the next of kin at home, and its effect, through the press, on the boys themselves overseas. If they believe these things to be true, Mr. Chairman, what will be the effect? This is a human parliament. This is a kind-hearted parliament, and this parliament would not stand for twenty-four hours for any condition of unkindness to these lads who have done so much for us, because this parliament is the judge and interpreter of public opinion in this nation and it has always been true and has stood true to these lads who have saved us and are still saving us. And when you find this sort of stuff coming out, just to attack a public man—well, that is not of the slightest importance in itself, but what are we to think of its effect on the boys? As an attack on a public man it is not of the slightest importance, because you must expect that from one side or the other. But when it has the effect of getting the mothers and the next of kin disturbed across the broad acres of the nine provinces of Canada, and when it has the effect of disturbing the morale of the lads overseas, the lads who this afternoon are in Florence and in Normandy—well, Mr. Chairman, I can find no words sufficiently strong to condemn it.

Regardless of our ordinary political battles—let us fight on other things—let us join together and cooperate on this question. If the leader of the opposition, who himself has a fine heart would like to have a committee come in with us, or my friends of the other parties, to go into the whole situation, I shall be very glad to have them do so. If they can tell us where we can correct the things that may be wrong, they will be corrected at once, because the united judgment and the united heart of parliament should work in the direction of tender loving care of those who are saving us by their examples and their heroism.

Mr. MacDIARMID: I am much relieved after hearing the minister's explanation of the situation at Christie street hospital. It makes the hearts of those who have loved ones suffering overseas in our behalf very heavy to read articles and to hear remarks made in this house to the effect that Christie street hospital is an old factory. I was very much perturbed about that. Since hearing the explanation of the minister a great load has been lifted from my mind. I accept his explanation and I congratulate him upon the great work he and his department are doing. He is the No. 1 minister of health in my opinion now.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): It seems to me that we have had sufficient discussion on Christie street hospital and I intend to change the subject. There is one matter in respect of which the ex-service men of the last war are, in my opinion, in my riding at least, not getting a fair deal, and I wish to direct the minister's attention to it. Under the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919, a great deal of land was acquired. Much of the land in my province is owned by the farmers outright. They not only own the surface rights but the mineral rights. They acquired everything in the land from the centre of the earth below to the sky above, with the exception of gold and silver in the land. The entire land, surface and mineral rights were acquired by the soldier settlement board. When they sold the land they carried into the contracts those same terms; but when it came to conveying title—it was sold under agreements for sale—they withheld the mineral rights. I suggest that is not right. The price paid for that land was an entire price. It covered the minerals in the land and the surface rights. To withhold the mineral rights is improper and unjust. I suggest to the minister that it is just as wrong for the government to confiscate the property of a private individual as it is for one private individual to confiscate the property of another. It is just as wrong to take the property rights from a soldier wrongfully as it is to take them from any private individual. This is a matter which should be set right.

I wish to refer to a couple of sections of the Soldier Settlement Act. Paragraph (a) of section 16 reads as follows:

> Where the parcel to be sold has been separately acquired the sale price shall be the cost of the parcel to the board.

[Mr Ian Mackenzie.]

Under that section the soldier settler who is purchasing the land would be entitled to the mineral rights as well as the surface rights. He is entitled to the entire land because it was bought entirely by the board. The two properties, mineral rights and surface rights, were not bought separately. They were bought as an entire deal from the board, and the government is doing wrong in splitting it up and selling one part to the soldier settler and holding back the other part and not allowing the soldier settler to have it. They are withholding that under section 57, which is inconsistent with section 16 (a), which I have read. Section 57 says:

> From all sales and grants of land made by the board, all mines and minerals shall be and shall be deemed to have been reserved, whether or not the instrument of sale or grant so specifies, and as respects any contract or agreement made by it with respect to land it shall not be deemed to have thereby impliedly covenanted or agreed to grant, sell or convey any mines or minerals whatever.

These are two inconsistent sections. Unfortunately the board is following section 57 rather than section 16(a). Can the minister not do something about it in order that the soldiers may receive justice under this section?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mining does not come under my department, but I shall be very glad to draw my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of the appropriate department.

Mr. ADAMSON: When was the rule changed? I understand that the McIntyre mine is partly on a claim called the Platt Veteran claim which is part of a farm of a veteran of the South African war, I believe. Has the policy of the department been changed with regard to the lands granted as farms to veterans?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend must realize that I know nothing whatever about mining; it is not under my department, but I am very glad the hon. member has brought up the question.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to know, because I know of cases where veterans have received proceeds from minerals.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be very glad to draw my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of the appropriate minister.

Mr. MacNICOL: I regret that I am compelled to bring up two cases that I brought up before. I do not like repetition, but if the minister will pardon me I shall try to present them once again in the hope that at this time the case of these two returned soldiers I shall refer to will be looked into by the minister. I feel confident that if the minister with his sympathetic heart would interest himself in these cases something would be done. Perhaps it is contrary to the act, but something must be done or there will be trouble in Toronto. We do not want that. Both these men are planning to parade on the streets. They have placards ready with printing on them about Christie street hospital and so forth. I have seen the placards. I feel it my duty to refer again to these cases to try to prevent if possible any further controversy over the treatment of the veterans there. I refer to William Robertson, No. 534262, 18 Somerset street, Toronto. The other day I saw a card from Doctor Ormston Smith, of 3 Regal road, who lives not very far away from where I reside. This card was addressed to William J. Robertson, Log Cabin, Muskoka, telling him to go on a milk diet again for the relief of stomach ulcers. I cannot understand it. Every time this man goes to the hospital he seems to say things which are resented by the doctors in that hospital with whom he comes in contact; I know the names of those concerned, but I do not care to use them. I am very much afraid he is not receiving the consideration he should receive. He is unwell. I have been to see him many times.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the complaint? Is it treatment or pension?

Mr. MacNICOL: He gets a small pension, $22 a month.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the complaint—not enough pension?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, it is not enough for his disability. In my judgment he is very badly disabled. On many occasions I have found him lying on his bed with froth running out of his mouth, apparently suffering from congestion through having been gassed, though when he goes to Christie street they tell him he has not been gassed. Well, his condition shows it. I have seen him when I did not think he was going to live very long. The fact is that to-day he is in Muskoka to try to recuperate not all at his own expense but partly at the expense of a friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is a veteran of the last war, I take it?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. I might add that he is a brother Scot, and he has that Scottish characteristic of resenting what he considers unfair treatment. He bitterly resents the treatment which has been given him. I am convinced that if somebody who has nothing whatever to do with Christie street hospital should examine him; if he could be sent to some other hospital where they do not know anything about him, he would be sympathetically treated and given the consideration to which he is entitled.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We can do that.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am satisfied that he is entitled to consideration which he is not getting. Furthermore, I do not believe he can live very long under present conditions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We can do that.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is fine. The other is that of a man named George Stevens, 57727, 416 Salem avenue, Toronto. I have known Stevens for the last fifteen or twenty years; he is a returned soldier. For some reason or other they are also down on him at Christie street. I am not blaming Christie street in either case, but for some reason or other neither of these men get on well when they go there. I have seen Stevens sitting on the sidewalk, trying to catch his breath and give his heart a chance to come back strongly enough to enable him to get home. He does not work, though the last letter I had from the department said he was working.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is he pensioned?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, he gets $20 a month, but he lives under conditions such as no returned soldier should be asked to endure. When I hear all this talk of the last few days about taking care of the returned soldiers, and think of these two men, I just cannot figure out why they are not treated as they should be. Stevens enlisted on November 11, 1914; he was wounded in action in April, 1916, and sent down to No. 18 general hospital. He was offered leave thereafter, but instead of taking the leave to which he was entitled he went back into the line and was captured at Ypres on June 2. The department has the record.

What were the circumstances in this man's case? He and some others were in a dugout when the trench was captured by the Germans, who told them to come out otherwise they would throw grenades and blast them out. They came out; they were lined up against the trench, and perhaps because there were too many of them to be handled safely the Germans debated as to whether or not they should be shot. As a matter of fact they were getting ready to shoot these prisoners when a higher officer came along and stopped them.

What these men went through from that time until they were released in 1918 was worse than hell; I cannot picture it. For days they were compelled to carry out their own wounded, and they went through a great deal. Why the departmental officials here in Ottawa or those at Christie street hospital have kept these poor fellows suffering all through the years, starving to death, subsisting on what was not fit for returned soldiers, is something I cannot understand, when the act says they should be given the benefit of the doubt. In behalf of these men I saw the late General McDonald, than whom there was no finer or better loved administrator in the department. The last time I spoke to him here in Ottawa was shortly before he died, and I was in his home town of Banff on the day of his death, intending to call upon him and thank him for what he had told me before leaving Ottawa, as to what he was going to do for these two men. Well, nothing was done for them. He was very kind to them; I believe he and some others paid their expenses while here and paid their way back to Toronto. I am going to appeal to the minister once more. The department will not do a thing for these men. Whoever is in charge of these matters, with whom these people have to get in touch, will do nothing for them. I believe there is in the department a file of letters several feet high concerning these men.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What was the reason given for turning them down?

Mr. MacNICOL: I imagine it was because of the language they used in their letters; the information I get from the department is that they do not like the way the letters are written. I can well imagine men who have been turned down but who know they have a good case writing letters which would not be very well received by the department. I must say the men in the department have always been very courteous to me, and I could not wish for better officials than those with whom I have had to deal. But I should like to see these two cases settled. They are the only two of the kind I know of in all my contacts with the department since the great war that have not been settled. The department has always done its best in dealing with any case I have brought up, with the exception of these two men, who I am convinced have a one hundred per cent claim. They are not getting what they deserve. I am not going to blame anyone for that, but I would ask the minister to interest himself personally in these two cases, and not to pay any attention to the letters that have been written in the past. Start all over again; if necessary bring them both to Ottawa, or send them to some hospital away from Toronto. I venture to say that the minister, with his sympathetic heart, will see that they get the benefit of the doubt, as they should under our legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to see that both cases are reviewed at once.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Parkdale wishes to conclude his remarks, I believe.

Mr. BRUCE: In view of some of the statements made by the minister a few minutes ago I should like to offer a few further observations. The minister spoke of this being a political attack. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that as far as I am concerned it has nothing whatever to do with politics. I am a humanitarian, not a politician, and it is only on humanitarian grounds that I have ventured to intercede in behalf of the returned wounded men. The minister has mentioned the number of beds available for these men. I would say to him that it is not a question of the number of beds; the question is where you put those beds. You need suitable buildings, adequately equipped with modern conveniences, in which to house our wounded; and up to the present that situation has not been met.

I just want to refer to one other thing the minister mentioned in his very impassioned address. He referred to my work in the last war. I have no hesitation in inviting anyone to review the work I did in the last war.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And no apologies to make.

Mr. BRUCE: I suffered then, as many people have at other times, from the politicians. And it was for political reasons and no other that I left the Canadian service and went to the British service. I say that because at that time my own party was in power, and the minister of militia was a Conservative.

When I was asked to investigate the situation in regard to the hospitals in England in 1916 I looked around and got hold of men who were familiar with the situation in England, in surgery, medicine, neurology, and other branches of the medical service. We made an investigation, and we reported the actual findings of our investigations, without colour. I asked the minister whether my report was to be a confidential one and he replied in the affirmative. As a consequence we simply stated bald facts, without any veneer. Somebody took my report and handed it to a Liberal newspaper in Toronto. From day to day they published a certain section of that report. As a consequence of that there was a good deal of criticism in Canada with respect to the medical service overseas; and the minister in charge thought that to quiet that criticism the best thing he could do would be to appoint a board to inquire into the medical services which I had investigated. He selected as chairman for that purpose Sir William Babtie, a British medical officer who had been in charge of the medical services in Mesopotamia, and who was severely criticized for the mishandling of the wounded there and was relieved of his office. Three or four other medical officers, then in France, were brought back to England to join him. They did not investigate the hospitals we had investigated, but they sat in a room in St. James square and investigated me and my report. And upon that investigation they wrote a whitewashing report which was submitted to the minister and duly reported to Canada. The object was to quiet the unrest which some people felt, lest the wounded were not being properly taken care of.

We made twenty-four recommendations in that report. Those recommendations were made to remedy the defects we found in that service. Each of those recommendations was adopted, which proved conclusively that the criticisms which the recommendations were to remedy were well founded. Later on a certain junior medical officer who was at headquarters in London, Captain Andrew MacPhail, came to Canada and was given the job of writing the medical history of the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: He was not even a doctor, was he?

Mr. BRUCE: No, not even a doctor.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. BRUCE: I am only replying, and I suggest I am quite in order. The minister made an attack upon me, and I am replying to his attack. I would not have mentioned this, had he not introduced the subject. Captain MacPhail wrote the first volume of what was to be the medical history of the war, and it was so prejudiced and so untrue that officers from all over Canada wrote to the press at that time complaining of inaccuracies and untrue statements contained therein. Amongst them was Colonel George Nasmith, of Toronto, who during the war rendered brilliant service in France, and was responsible for discovering the proper method of dealing with the first gas attack suffered by the Canadians overseas. I think perhaps the Minister of National War Services will recall that. He wrote a letter to the press in which he denied the accuracy of that so-called history. So many of these complaints were made to the department of government that they cancelled the commission to Captain MacPhail to complete the work with the result that he stepped out of the picture and did not continue to write the remainder of the history of the war. I think that is a complete answer to the criticism which has been made.

Following that I spent two years in France as consulting surgeon with the British army.

The minister has seen fit to dig up something from the last war which he thinks might discredit me. Therefore, although I dislike doing so, I shall refer to something about himself, found in the debates of the House of Commons of February 13, 1939, where this statement is made by Mr. Cahan—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I do not think it is in order for the hon. member to carry on this discussion. He has answered the minister, and I think that is sufficient. We are in committee. The debate must be relevant to the item before us.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order, the chairman has said that we are in committee, and I think the hon. member for Parkdale has the right to proceed for that reason. I do not think the chairman is yet in a position to assess what the hon. member is going to say in connection with the general situation under discussion.

Mr. BRUCE: I submit that what I am about to say—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The item before the committee is for departmental administration. What the hon. member is about to refer to has nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If the hon. member for Parkdale has something to quote which is relevant to the discussion, he would be at liberty to do so and, with all due respect to you, Mr. Chairman, I do not think you can make a decision until you hear what the hon. member is going to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Anything I said was connected with hospitals, and the matter we were discussing. It was therefore germane to the discussion. Anything else is entirely out of order.

Mr. BRUCE: I submit what I am about to say is relevant to the matter under discussion, which is as to the competency of his administration—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. BRUCE: —in respect of the provision of adequate hospitalization for our wounded.

Mr. Cahan says, as reported at page 886 of Hansard for 1939:

As I have already stated, the Minister of National Defence has proved inattentive and neglectful of his primary duties, and, on the whole, has shown himself incompetent for the efficient administration of the most important work of his ministerial office.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): More politics.

Mr. BRUCE: It continues:

If that minister is really sincere in the professions and protestations which he made to this house on Thursday evening last; if he really sincerely desires, despite his manifest ineptitude and inefficiency, that proper measures may now be taken, quoting his own words—

"—to provide such measures of national defence and security as will preserve the welfare and well being of our Canadian people—"

—then he should forthwith place his resignation in the hands of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The answer is that I was elected by the biggest majority of my life, and Mr. Cahan was licked.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a few words to say in connection with this matter. Criticism can be levelled at any man in public life, and criticisms certainly are levelled at the minister. Nobody can question the hon. member for Parkdale, so far as his knowledge of hospitals is concerned. He is a reputable surgeon, and has defended himself here to-day in this House of Commons.

Mr. MUTCH: What is this, a nominating convention?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Well, so far as that is concerned—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): —the hon. member needs no defence. He does not need any defence on medical grounds. I think everyone knows who he is; they know what he has done in a medical way. So far as the Department of Pensions and National Health and Christie street hospital are concerned he has not spoken in a partisan way. And neither will I.

There are none so blind as those who will not see. That is the whole point about it. It is true that there are vacancies at Christie street, but a good many of the boys would rather go home than stay there and have proper treatment. I go there quite often. One of my business partners was shot through the spine and could not walk, and he has been there for many years. I used to go there to see him and the living conditions were disgraceful. We do not need to go into the details of these things. I do not know anything about the administration of the hospital, but I think it is pretty good. However, I should like to say a word about the doctors. A great many of them are giving a good deal of their time free and they are just about the finest men you can find in this country.

This afternoon the minister referred to the hon. member for Parkdale and his conspirators. I do not know who the hon. member's conspirators could be in connection with this matter. All you have to do is see what is in the press. This is not good enough for our returned men. Hon. members have been quoting a lot of papers, but I have here one of the finest papers that is written. It is a weekly newspaper published in Orillia where my dear old friend Stephen Leacock lived, the Packet and Times. The minister is laughing. He is Highland Scotch just like I am. I wish I had as good a command of English so that I could go after him the way he goes after some other members in this House of Commons. The first picture in this paper shows the view from the bed of an amputation case in an annex at Christie street hospital. A travelling crane and a derrick haul steel girders to two electric saws. How can a man sleep with the bang, bang, bang of those machines all the time? They would be slamming back and forth all over the place and yet this fellow has had an amputation. Every twenty minutes a train passes this hospital. The caption of this picture reads:

The wall of the main hospital building can be seen beyond this freight train as it chuffs smoke and soot to drift in through open windows and to cling to screens.

From the picture the track would appear to be no more than thirty feet from the building. The next picture shows what happens to a hand when it is wiped over the window sill, despite the valiant efforts of the staff to keep things clean. This is not from the Globe and Mail, the Toronto Telegram or anything like that; these pictures are in an independent weekly newspaper. I know these fellows and I know they know what they are talking about. I am approaching the situation on a non-partisan basis. This hospital should have been out of there years ago. We should have done something about it.

We have been spending millions and millions and billions and billions, and yet we cannot find two or three million dollars to put up a proper hospital for these fellows. That is all I have to say about the matter.

As I said before, I am going there again on November 11 and the minister and I are going to dig up another sod. There will be a couple of bands around, although I do not know what we shall have this time. Somebody asks if there was any liquor last time, but I do not know because I could not find any. We shall have to have another little silver spade and all that.

These pictures show the conditions under which these returned men have to live. They are conditions which should not exist in any hospital. The hon. member for Parkdale who has just left will remember the great agitation we had in connection with the old general hospital in Toronto which was overrun by cockroaches and everything else. Finally, after a great deal of trouble we got our present fine hospital. It always seems to take so much work to get rid of the conspirators that prevent these things from being done. The next picture is a view of the roof ward where twenty-seven bed cases, some of whom have been on their backs for more than a year, are housed. It states that they share three electric fans. There are twenty-seven bed cases and they share three electric fans. Just think of that—three electric fans! We kick because it is hot in the House of Commons. We have no electric fans here in the chamber, but we do have in our rooms.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): You must speak for yourself about electric fans.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Haven't you one?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I have not one.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then I suppose you have one of the cooler rooms. Twenty-seven bed cases with only three electric fans! Then it states that the steel-beamed roof has no ventilator and pockets the hot air in it. Then another picture is a typical ward with eighty-two beds in one room. Just think of that—eighty-two beds in one room!

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): What is the size of the room?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What difference does that make?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): It makes a great deal of difference.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Have you been there?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I have been there and I have also been in a hospital.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Have you been there recently?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I have been in the hospital as a patient where there were a great many of us. Many soldiers would prefer being in a large room and have the companionship of other men than to be in rooms by themselves.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Oh, yes, I think you are probably right to a certain extent, but think of eighty-two beds in one room. Have you been there to see the hospital?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I am not defending the hospital; I merely asked my hon. friend the size of the room.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a friend in the hospital; I have been there very often and I know the condition. I am asking my hon. friend whether he has been there or not to see conditions as they exist at the present time?

Mr. GLADSTONE: Was the hon. member there between 1930 and 1935 when his party was in power?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What difference does it make whether my party was in power or any other party was in power? The hospital is a disgrace. As a matter of fact it was taken over as an emergency and carried on by all parties. It was carried on from 1921 when your party was in power and nothing was done about it. When your party came into power in 1930 why did they not do something about it? Why did they not do something about it from 1921 on? I am going on with my argument. Eighty-two beds in one room where the men in the centre of the room have to yell for an orderly because there are no signals except on the wall beds. When this picture was taken most of the patients were out of the room. All you have to do is to look at these pictures to see the conditions under which these men are living. Are these the conditions to which we are going to bring our men back? As has been so convincingly said by other hon. members, it does not take much money to build a real hospital. At Gravenhurst, the old tuberculosis establishment, there are German prisoners at the present time. Why not put the German prisoners in Christie street hospital and take our boys out to Gravenhurst? There's an idea, but for heaven's sake, let us do something about it. I am not talking in a partisan spirit; I am pleading with the minister to do something. Let us get Sunnybrook started.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is started.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What has been done?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The contract has been let.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It has just been let. We had something happen the other day, did we not, just for show?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Oh, yes. We had something happen the other day just for show. What happened was this. Someone went over and did a little bit of grading.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What does that mean? It does not mean a thing at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I must correct my hon. friend. The contract was let the other day, for $2,800,000, for construction, which entails at least four hundred beds and other units of the hospital. It is only fair to have these facts come out.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The contract has been let. I am glad of that, so that I shall not have to go there with the hon. member and dig another sod this year. But we have to do something worthwhile about the situation. We cannot continue to keep these men at Christie street hospital. If the minister had spent as much time as I have with the boys there he would know more about it.

I have taken many things up with him, and at this point I must congratulate him upon the fact that he has corrected some of them to a great extent. I give him that degree of credit. But the hospital must not be continued in Christie street. It is just no good.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have another appointment at five o'clock, and if my hon. friends will allow me, we will transfer back to the Post Office estimates now and resume those of my department as soon as possible.

Item stands.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

242. Departmental administration, $699,070.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I do not wish to thresh over any old straw this afternoon, but just to draw the minister's attention to the case of the Dafoe post office. There were returned soldiers who made application for that position. I think, if the minister would look into the situation, he could remedy what in my opinion is not a satisfactory state of affairs. I believe he would agree with me if he looked into the matter.

Mr. MULOCK: I am very glad to consider the hon. member's suggestion. I understand that no applications by returned men were received until after the position had been filled, and that the applicant referred to earlier in the day who was in the post office was not a returned soldier. It being Saturday, I have not been able to obtain the file, but I shall be glad to look into the matter as suggested.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Thank you very much.

Item agreed to.

243. Post offices, including salaries and other expenses of headquarters and staff post offices and supplies and equipment for revenue post offices, $18,998,373.

Mr. STOKES: Why is it that in the city of Belleville, where we have quite a staff of letter carriers, some of them have been classed as temporary for a number of years? They are veterans. I understood that there was an arrangement by which at least ten per cent of the staff would be classed as temporary, but in this case about thirty per cent of our staff is temporary. Also the salaries of these men are being kept down. I believe they have been working on salaries of about $1,060 a year. I should like to know why these men are not made permanent.

Mr. MULOCK: I am advised by my officials that the reason is that there are no vacancies on the permanent staff at the present time. So far as the salaries are concerned, I understand that as temporaries their salaries, following certain changes which have recently been made, can now go up to $1,320 a year if they have been employed for three years. Probably the difficulty is that there are no permanent vacancies in the staff at Belleville, but if the hon. member will be kind enough to give me particulars of the matter I shall be glad to look into it and give him a reply with full information on the subject.

Mr. BRYCE: Have any post-war arrangements been made for the replacing of post offices that have been burned down during the war? I have in mind post offices at Ashern and Winnipeg Beach. Is it intended to replace them with structures which will be a credit to the government of the day, or will the old rickels which are there now continue to be used?

Mr. MULOCK: Some time ago we completed a check-up and investigation of post office facilities right across this country, and recommendations have been made for post-war construction of post offices and improvements, not only to the buildings but to provide better working conditions for our staffs. I do not think that at this time I should go into any particulars. The hon. member will understand that if I mentioned one place and another was not mentioned there would be a certain amount of pressure that some things should be done immediately. A programme has been arrived at which we consider is in the interest of the post office service, according to the best judgment of the senior officials of the department, after discussing the matter with me on many occasions.

Mr. BRYCE: Could the minister give me privately what is contemplated in the constituency of Selkirk?

Mr. MULOCK: I shall be glad to give the general idea, but I have not disclosed that information, so far as particulars are concerned, to any hon. members.

Mr. BRYCE: If the minister is prepared to give it to me privately I shall treat it as confidential.

Mr. MULOCK: I think the hon. member will realize that recommendations, even of a minister, are not always followed.

Mr. GRAYDON: They may yet elevate the hon. member for Selkirk to the position of a defeated candidate.

Mr. BRYCE: This was brought forcibly to my attention to-day. I have repeatedly had letters and complaints from constituents who complained bitterly that the defeated candidate was being recognized. Being green and not experienced in political life, I wrote back and took the part of the government, and said they would not do a thing like that; but I have had my eyes opened this afternoon. I am still going to appeal to the minister for fair play. I want to take my seat satisfied that the minister will give me fair play as far as the constituency of Selkirk is concerned I am not going to bring up the matters about which I have written to him because I expect that he will thresh them out and reply to me in the near future.

Item agreed to.

246. Air and land mail services, $15,703,199.

Mr. GRAYDON: I return to the favourite subject of members like myself who have the honour to represent rural constituencies. I suppose there is no question that is brought closer to the average rural member, or that has been during the last few years, than the situation in connection with rural mail couriers. This is not the first privilege I have had of saying a word on behalf of the rural mail courier, or inquiring of the minister in charge of these estimates about his plight or whether his condition had been bettered throughout the rural parts of the country.

While the rural mail courier is an underpaid contractor of the government, I believe that a good deal of sympathy is aroused on his behalf because there are few people who really come to know more closely the lives of the people in rural Canada than the rural mail courier. I remember very well when I was on the farm the part which he played on rural route No. 2, Brampton, Ontario, and he has played the same part in other districts throughout the country. The advent and the departure of the rural mail courier to and from the farm was always an important event, and perhaps it was more important in those days when the means of transportation were not quite as speedy or as available to the average farmer as they are now.

The rural mail courier has always been a very intimate influence in the life of rural Canada. Not only has he carried the mails, but the obliging rural mail courier always went a little farther. He has always done something extra that has not been contained in his contract. It does not always appear in black and white, but if you were to add up the little services, and those that are more considerable, in fact, the multitude of services and favours which the average rural mail courier performs, you would have a most imposing total, and I think every rural member in this house would support me in that statement. He has been faithful on six days of the week, rain or shine, in the most inclement sort of weather, and that is why there are so many who are always ready to take his part and to say a good word on his behalf.

Apart altogether from the position he has held in the esteem of rural communities, the system under which he has operated for a good many years, indeed from the beginning of the rural mail system, has been the cause of constant complaint and difficulty and criticism from time to time. I must confess—and I have gone as far as this in the house before—that the solution of the rural mail courier's difficulties has not been very easy. I think the present minister and past ministers as well will bear that out.

Problems have arisen from time to time and a multitude of solutions have been offered, even sometimes by those who are themselves intimately interested. It seems to me that the rural mail situation constitutes a very real challenge to this parliament and government. It is not enough for members of parliament and the government, year in and year out, to say that nothing can be done, that no light can be shed on this problem, and that year after year, decade after decade, the rural mail courier must suffer in comparison with others from the point of view of the amount paid in urban sections for carrying the mails from door to door.

It is difficult to explain to the public why there should be a system whereby a man who carries His Majesty's mail along the sidewalks from door to door is paid on one basis—and I suggest that he has not always been paid very well at that—while the man who carries mail from farm to farm and from gate to gate should have to suffer in comparison as regards the remuneration he receives.

I do not wish to direct any special criticism at this time at this government any more than at any other government, although on this occasion the present minister has to take this responsibility, and I ask him to do so; nevertheless it is not sufficient to take refuge behind the old argument that there is no other way than the contract-tender system in connection with rural mail routes. I think that in many instances it has been little short of a national disgrace the way in which rural mail contracts have been whittled down to the point where it is hardly justifiable to allow a man to carry His Majesty's mail under the conditions that very often prevail.

I fancy the minister will say that there has been some improvement. Well, seeing that a difference has arisen in the cost of living as well as in operating rural mail routes, as compared with the situation that has existed previously, it would be strange indeed if something had not been done to alleviate the lot of the rural mail courier. I made a suggestion last year, but apparently the minister did not think very well of it because he did not take it up.

In view of the fact that many different solutions have been offered for bringing the rural mail courier up to the position where he should be, and while there were divergencies of opinion as to what should be done, we as a parliament should not simply lie down in the face of a challenge of this kind and decline to do anything about it. We should at least appoint a select committee of the house to investigate the matter thoroughly. There can be no real reason why that should not be done. I asked the minister to do it last session. I was hopeful that there would be something done during the session just closing. Surely we cannot simply take it for granted that the rural mail courier is to work under the same conditions as he has in the past. I should like to think that this parliament is at least big enough to measure up to its responsibilities. We should go into the whole matter and deal with it from the point of view of the public representatives in the house to see if we cannot do a better job and try to devise a better solution than has been offered by the Post Office Department. I ask the Postmaster General, if we are to have another session of this parliament, to see to it that one of the first committees to be set up at the next session will be a committee to go into the whole question of the rural mail couriers. I think that is something we can justifiably ask for, and something that the Postmaster General cannot justifiably refuse. If he decides that this is a move in the right direction and if this is to be the last session of this parliament he might have the preparatory work done so that the next Postmaster General will be able to carry on where the present minister has left off.

Mr. STOKES: I should like to make a plea to the minister on behalf of some of the best of our people who do not get as good service as the rest of the country. I speak particularly of those farmers who happen to live on what we call a "dead-end street" a little off the main line. Generally speaking, they are just as good producers as the men on the main line, but they have to travel out to the corner to get their mail. In some cases the routes have been extended. The rural mail couriers go down those lines and retrace their steps, but in several instances in my particular part of the province applications have been made and have been refused. We were refused on one line where applications in connection with stub lines were granted a few years ago. When I think of the conditions under which our farmers and their wives are working to-day, often with only two of them on the farm, I say that they should not have to walk out to the corner to get their mail. They all like to read the daily paper if they have time. If they receive a communication that requires a reply they must walk back to the corner again. They are the partly forgotten people of the country. I earnestly ask the minister to take the plight of those people into consideration because they are obliged to tramp out in all kinds of weather. It is not too bad when they have children going to school, but on most farms the children are away to-day. I do not see why this service, which is a real service, and which is brought to the doors of our people, should not be made available to the farmers who are on these less accessible farms. I hope that the minister's department will give some consideration to these people.

Mr. BOUCHER: I should like to say a few words on that question because it has come to my attention on numerous occasions. In the winter before last the snow was very heavy and it made it very difficult for the mail couriers to do their work. I believe that because of that hard winter some of the existing services were cut down last winter; but we did not have the same conditions last winter. There are two ways of looking at this problem. I believe the time is long past when every Canadian citizen should get the benefit of the privileges to which he is entitled. These people who live on the dead-end streets or the side roads have the same inherent rights as every other citizen and they are entitled to this service. The rural mail couriers who, under our tender system, have been putting in bids for certain routes have said to the department that they are willing to give their services at reduced rates. Those mail couriers have to carry the mail in fine weather and foul, winter and summer. They are rendering an excellent service for a paltry amount. I say emphatically that it is almost a disgrace to the government to have that excellent type of man doing that type of work for such a small amount. The amount they receive is a mere pittance. The government should give consideration to giving the rural mail couriers compensation which would enable them at least to make ends meet. I believe that a very great wrong is done to a great number of our people by the government being niggardly in its compensation to the rural mail couriers and in not extending the rural mail to the sections referred to by the hon. member. Rural mail delivery has been in existence in our country for a great many years, but the extension of it has not been in keeping with the times.

Item agreed to.

539. Departmental administration — further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask a blanket question covering items 539 and 540? Will the minister indicate why there is an increase of $100,000 in connection with departmental administration, and also why he is asking for an additional amount of $4,000,000 for air and land mail service? I think that item calls for a detailed explanation because it is a very heavy increase in the departmental estimates.

Mr. MULOCK: First I shall deal with the large amount of $4,000,000. In the main estimates for 1944-45 the sum of $6,788,494 is provided for mail service by air. That amount covers requirements for domestic air mail only. Since the main estimates were brought down, arrangements have been completed for the conveyance of mails across the Atlantic by Trans-Canada Air Lines for the Department of Transport, as authorized by order in council P.C. 5472 dated July 19, 1943. Canadian postage rates and rates of payment per pound were fixed by order in council P.C. 1790, dated March 16, 1944, and I have appended hereto an analysis of the amounts.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is all for civil account?

Mr. MULOCK: It is on civil account but it is for carrying the mails to the troops and bringing the mails back.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would that increase not normally come under the war appropriation measure?

Mr. MULOCK: A certain amount of civilian mail is included. It could not very well go under the war appropriation because these are partly civilian mails. Westbound figures have been received from the Canadian postal corps in the United Kingdom, showing the mails available for air carriage each week as follows: troops' free mail, surface, 6,000 pounds per week or 312,000 pounds per year; troops' air mail, 2,000 pounds per week or 104,000 pounds per year; British civilian air mail, 3,000 pounds per week or 156,000 pounds per year. That is a total of 11,000 pounds of air mail a week or 572,000 pounds a year. The estimated cost westbound if all carried by Trans-Canada Air Lines is $2,259,920. The eastbound cost is estimated at $1,847,430, making a total for both ways, if conveyed by T.C.A., of $4,107,350.

Item agreed to.

540. Air and land mail services, further amount required, $4,000,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before this department is finished I wish to ask the minister one further question, although I do not want to start a discussion on the matter. Perhaps the minister misunderstood the tenor of my inquiry in connection with the setting up of a special committee of the house with regard to rural mail couriers. When I asked the minister the question last year he remained silent as to the proposal, and he has repeated that performance this afternoon. I wonder if he would be good enough, before his estimates are finally carried, to indicate his position in the matter, because if he is going to agree to the suggestion I should like him to get the credit, or at least I should like to share the credit with him if I may.

Mr. MULOCK: The leader of the opposition will be glad to learn that the estimate for stage and rural route services has been increased this year by $981,000. He will be interested also to know that bonuses have increased some 2,183 contracts by approximately 32·9 per cent, while 1,012 contracts were increased by 41·4 per cent through new tenders. That is, where contractors were in difficulty and felt that they could not properly carry the mail at the rates they were receiving under their tenders, they applied to the department; the matter was investigated, and if their claims were substantiated they received a bonus to assist them through this time. The difficulty of going into the matter of rates at present is that there are great shortages of labour in certain areas, which make it difficult to get a true and fair picture of the actual cost of operation. The same thing applies in regard to equipment and everything else; that is the difficulty.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then can the minister foresee at the moment any difficulty in the way of having an investigation such as I have suggested, after we have entered the peace period?

Mr. MULOCK: I can assure the leader of the opposition that the assistant deputy minister and the senior officials of the department are going into that matter constantly. I know that to be a fact because I have discussed the matter with them on various occasions. If there are any suggestions as to how the present system may be improved, we shall welcome them. I want hon. members to feel free to bring forward any suggestions of that kind, and to be assured that they will receive the most careful consideration.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—
185. General administration, $975,845.

Mr. GRAYDON: I presume we are returning now to the main estimates?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Income tax division—
189. General administration, including authority to create positions and make appointments within the division, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act and the said positions and staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said act, $930,852.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister anything further to add to the information already conveyed to the committee with respect to a simplification of the income tax forms?

Hon. C. W. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): I have nothing further to add. As I have said before, with the tax structure as it is, the income tax division is simply compelled to prepare a form which will include all the features of the income tax act both to show the taxpayers what taxes are imposed and also what benefits or deductions they are entitled to receive. In order to include all this information quite a complicated form is required.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then I should like to mention another matter which I might properly have brought up under the estimates of the Department of Finance, but since it is only a suggestion and I have no desire to initiate any discussion, perhaps I may mention it here. The matter has to do with the vexed problem of the tax on incomes of merchant seamen. I bring it up again only because since the debate on income tax took place in the house this matter seems to have caught the imagination and to have excited the sympathy of the people of Canada perhaps more than any other single thing that has come before parliament for a long time. The public realize, I think, what the merchant seamen have done; and because the matter has been brought out into the open in the house, where the skill of debate has been utilized in behalf of these men, the public have become pretty thoroughly aroused. At this time I only want to impress further upon the minister how important it is that the government should not neglect to make some change in this regard at the earliest possible moment.

Another point I desire to mention is this. It has been brought to my attention that prisoners of war are liable for arrears of income tax if they have not been paying the tax in connection with their general income. Perhaps the minister will not be in a position to answer the question I am about to ask, but I would ask him to consider this matter which has to do with income tax.

Mr. GIBSON: A member of the armed forces serving overseas is not liable to income tax on his service pay and allowances. If he had any tax liability before proceeding overseas, that is still standing against him on the books. No action, however, has been taken. He is not being pressed to pay it. No soldier overseas is being billed, but I must say it is still standing against his name on the books of the income tax division.

Mr. GRAYDON: There may be cases where the government may want to keep the liability alive. I can readily understand where a wealthy man may have enlisted and, having regard to his position, it might not be fair to relieve him of arrears. Generally speaking, however, I cannot conceive of cases of that kind coming up. It does seem to me, however, that we might readily wipe off those arrears which are in smaller amounts. We might give the income tax branch authority to wipe out arrears for those who owed them before they left. I do not think we should be too niggardly, and I should like to see a generous attitude in this respect.

The senior hon. member for Halifax has mentioned another matter, one which perhaps he desires to deal with himself. It came to my attention through an observation he made, so that I shall give him full credit and take none to myself. I refer to interest on income tax liabilities charged against those who are in the armed forces or who are prisoners of war. Certainly that interest should be wiped out, regardless of what was done with the principal sum. I agree with the hon. member in that.

Item agreed to.

Income tax division—
191. District offices, $7,894,674.

Mr. GRAYDON: In view of the greater number of people paying income tax, are the district offices being increased?

Mr. GIBSON: No, we have not increased the district offices. It may be desirable to do so after the war, but at the present time there is great difficulty in getting persons with the required qualifications for senior positions. I refer to chartered accountants, and people with accounting experience. It has not been considered advisable to make any radical change at the present time.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask for the unanimous consent of the committee to introduce item 324, in the Department of the Secretary of State. That department has not been properly introduced on a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday. Therefore the unanimous consent of the committee is required.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is the last to come in?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

324. Departmental administration, $97,679.

Mr. KNOWLES: In his capacity as custodian of enemy property, would the minister make a statement as to the present status of the profits of the Bayer company, and others in a similar position? Considerable publicity was given in the press a short time ago to a court decision made affecting that company. I understand that the Bayer company in Canada has tried to secure for itself all the profits made here, rather than carry out its original agreement, whereby a portion of those profits was to be credited to a company with its head office in Germany.

It does seem to me that the Secretary of State, in his capacity as custodian of enemy property, might well make a general statement as to the general situation with respect to profits made in Canada, but which would go to the credit of companies in enemy countries.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): This matter goes back for several years and, as has been suggested, is now before the courts. A contract was entered into between either Bayer Aspirin or Sterling Products, I am not sure which, with the I. G. Farben company, whereby a certain percentage of the net income was to be paid by the Canadian company to the German company. Action was commenced either by Bayer Aspirin or Sterling Products, whichever name is correct, cancelling the contract on account of failure of consideration.

The case was tried in the Supreme Court of Ontario and judgment was rendered against the Bayer company. It has also been before the court of appeal, where the appeal was dismissed. The matter is still before the courts.

Mr. KNOWLES: It still stands that a portion of the profits made by the Bayer company is credited to the I. G. Farben company?

Mr. McLARTY: To be fair, it should be said that a portion of the profits is credited to the custodian. The ultimate disposition of those profits must await the terms of peace. It would not be fair to say that it is credited to the I. G. Farben company; rather it is credited to the account of the custodian, and the custodian will be bound by the conditions provided in the treaty of peace.

Mr. KNOWLES: If what the minister has said means that the money is credited to I. G. Farben company, but held in trust by the custodian of enemy property, it would simply mean that after the war we would be paying to ourselves a portion of the reparations payable to this country, out of profits made in Canada.

Mr. McLARTY: It would be entirely dependent upon the terms of peace arrived at at the conclusion of the war. I cannot anticipate those peace terms, nor do I think my hon. friend would ask me to.

Mr. KNOWLES: I trust that the matter is being watched closely by the department.

Mr. McLARTY: Yes, it is.

Item agreed to.

326. Companies branch, $43,034.

Mr. BOUCHER: I had intended dealing more fully with this matter, had it not come up so late in the session. It seems to me, however, that the dominion is lagging behind the provinces in its law in connection with the chartering of cooperative companies. The provinces have cooperative companies acts which, in my view, are superior to the Companies Act in the dominion statutes. In my experience as a practising lawyer I have encountered the difficulty of securing the right kind of charter for a dominion cooperative organization. There is provision for certain types of cooperative companies under that act. Those sections recognize the principle behind cooperative companies, but they do not go far enough. There have been cases where consumers or producers desiring to establish cooperative enterprises for the welfare of the community, rather than for profit-making, have found that the provision in the dominion statute is not broad enough.

The minister is probably acquainted with the circumstances I refer to and I need not go into further detail. I simply rose to ask his department to give their attention at the earliest possible date to the Companies Act and bring it up to date with the cooperative companies acts of the various provinces. I should like to deal with this matter more extensively because I have further arguments to offer, but I do not wish to delay the committee at this late day. I realize also that it would be futile to expect anything to be done to-day about it, but I think the time has come when something should be done.

Mr. McLARTY: Consideration will be given to the representations of the hon. member for Carleton.

Item agreed to.

Office of the chief electoral officer—

471. Salaries and expenses of office—further amount required, $25,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was an additional amount required last year, or is this to cover special services to be performed this year?

Mr. McLARTY: This is purely a contingent vote. The leader of the opposition will notice that there was no increase in the main estimates for the chief electoral officer, and this amount is put in the supplementary estimates as a contingent vote in possible anticipation of an election occurring within the next fiscal year.

Mr. GRAYDON: The position is something like this: if necessary there will be an election, but not necessarily an election.

Mr. McLARTY: I think that would be fair.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was a similar item placed in the estimates last year?

Mr. McLARTY: No; I believe no such item was placed in the estimates last year.

Mr. GRAYDON: This would indicate a little more danger perhaps from the point of view of the government?

Mr. McLARTY: Perhaps the lightning may be a little closer.

Mr. ADAMSON: Does this cover the returning officers for overseas?

Mr. McLARTY: No; this is only for the staff of the office of the chief electoral officer in the event of an election being held. It has nothing to do with the general expenses of any election.

Mr. ADAMSON: To be expended in Ottawa?

Mr. McLARTY: To be expended in Ottawa.

Mr. GRAYDON: How far has the chief electoral officer gone in arranging for the enumeration of electors in case there is an election in the offing?

Mr. McLARTY: I think it would be fair to say that no steps in that direction have been taken. The only steps taken so far by the chief electoral officer are in connection with the war services electors vote. Two special returning officers have left for overseas, but nothing has been done in connection with the procedure ordinarily followed.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have all vacancies for the position of returning officer been filled? In some constituencies I understand that the returning officers, no doubt on the instructions of the chief electoral officers, have sent out instructions to the various candidates in the 1940 election to have enumerators appointed where there are enumerators to be appointed within a certain length of time. I was wondering if those were general instructions that had been issued.

Mr. McLARTY: They would be general instructions. I believe there are seven or eight vacancies in connection with the appointment of returning officers. Any instructions that go out are sent to the returning officers in all ridings. Any instructions received in any one riding could be considered as being general instructions.

Mr. ADAMSON: An article appeared in the newspapers the other day about the returning officer in the riding of York West; his picture was shown and he was said to have received special instructions from Ottawa with regard to the forthcoming general election. Have any special instructions gone out recently?

Mr. McLARTY: No. Any instructions received would have been received by the 245 returning officers, less the eight that have not been appointed. There are no special instructions.

Mr. GRAYDON: If my understanding is correct, the instructions to the returning officers are that the machinery with respect to enumeration should be started at an early day so that should there be an appeal to the people the machinery will be ready for operation.

Mr. McLARTY: My hon. friend is quite correct.

Mr. ADAMSON: No special instructions have gone out to ridings such as mine where there were only 3,500 people in one district in 1940 as compared with 16,000 to-day?

Mr. McLARTY: I am aware of no special instructions. The instructions sent to one riding are sent to all.

Mr. GRAYDON: In other words, there has been nothing to arouse the suspicion of the Secretary of State with regard to an unduly early appeal?

Mr. McLARTY: The Secretary of State will not express his opinion on that question.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McLARTY: We are on the supplementary vote for the chief electoral officer.

Item agreed to.

Public archives—

542. General administration and technical services—further amount required, $7,466.17.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there some new development in the archives, that it requires a supplementary vote?

Mr. McLARTY: No. It is a matter of an archivist who has returned from the front, statutory increases provided, war risk insurance, and compensation for temporary assistance.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported

WAR SERVICE GRATUITIES

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES ACTIVE SERVICE PERSONNEL—PAYMENTS ON RETIREMENT OR DISCHARGE—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence)—for the Prime Minister—moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 184, to provide for the payment of war service gratuities and for the grant of re-establishment credits to members of His Majesty's forces in respect of service during the present war.

He said: The amendments made by the senate are to strike out section 25, which provided that the act should come into force on the 1st of October, 1944, and to substitute that this act shall come into force on the 1st day of January, 1945, or on any date between the 1st of October, 1944, and the 1st of January, 1945, as may be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council.

The reason for the amendment is that on consultation, particularly in my own department, with the officers this morning, I find that it will be extremely difficult, and I think really likely to be detrimental to the best interests of a smooth running machine, to attempt to be ready to pay gratuities and to provide the necessary computations for the provision of reestablishment credits by October 1. This proposal is, therefore, that the date for coming into force of the act be extended until the 1st of January, but a provision is contained which authorizes the governor in council by proclamation to bring the act into force at an earlier date, not before October 1. While there may be the odd case of disadvantage in connection with that postponement of three months, I am satisfied that it will be to the advantage of the scheme as a whole and of the great mass of men and women whom it is intended to benefit by this legislation.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in following the minister with respect to the amendment which the senate has made to this bill, I am in agreement with him having regard to the facts which he disclosed in his explanation. If, after consideration, the departments of government affected find that their machinery for the purpose of administering this very important measure is apt to be inadequately set up on the 1st of October, I am in agreement with the minister that the measure should come into operation at a time when applications from veterans can be received and dealt with and the machinery is in perfect order, because I could readily understand the disappointments and discouragements which might occur if premature word went out stating that the 1st of October was the time when operations would commence, some plans had been laid on the assumption that that was the date, and it was then found that the situation could not be taken care of until later. I think it is best to postpone the commencement of the measure to a time when the administrative machinery can be actually put into operation and effect given to the measure in a practical way for those who are to benefit by it.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

36. Departmental administration, $410,189.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, having one eye on the calendar and the other on the thermometer, I will endeavour to curtail my remarks. I will at least confine them to the one subject only, of great interest to the province from which I come.

When the Prime Minister, speaking the other day, announced his policy on that subject, I expressed my regret that I was compelled to speak without having seen his policy in writing, because the change of a word in a phrase might make quite a difference in the proper interpretation of the policy. I have now had an opportunity to study it carefully, and I wish to make one or two corrections or revisions of what I said the other day.

The Prime Minister laid down three principles in formulating his policy. The first one was, and I quote his own words, as reported in Hansard at page 5915:

> . . . it would be unwise and undesirable, not only from the point of view of the people of British Columbia but also from that of persons of Japanese origin themselves, to allow the Japanese population to be concentrated in that province after the war.

Further on, I quote again at page 5916:

> . . . a maximum can be set on the number of persons of Japanese race to be allowed to return to British Columbia, and persons of Japanese race can be given encouragement to move and remain elsewhere.

The whole matter is of so much importance to British Columbia that I want to emphasize certain points, because some people and perhaps some of the press have interpreted the Prime Minister's remarks in a way different from what he intended and rather in accordance with their own wishes, instead of giving a precise and definite account of what he really said—which of course is unfair both to the Prime Minister and to British Columbia.

For instance, let me note here that there is no guarantee expressed or implied, as some have translated it, that we in British Columbia would be allowed only to take the same pro-rated quota of Japanese to our population as the other provinces. Neither is it explained how either we or any of the other provinces can be compelled to take our due proportion, especially as regards those provinces which have written agreements from the dominion government that the Japs allowed into those provinces on account of war conditions shall be removed whenever a particular province asks for such action. This constitutes a vital point on which we have no statement. After the war is over and peace is made, if we now accept that idea, that they are loyal, definite Canadian subjects, there will be no longer any opportunity of preventing them individually from drifting back into British Columbia, which I am sure a very large number of them would do. Indeed, the Prime Minister himself foresaw that because he said:

> It would be most undesirable, I believe, to establish a permanent barrier to the movement within Canada of persons who have been lawfully admitted to Canada or who are nationals of Canada. Even the establishment of a temporary limitation would be undesirable in principle, but as a practical question of policy it may well be inescapable.

He then goes on to say:

> There is little doubt that with cooperation on the part of the provinces it can be made possible to settle the Japanese more or less evenly throughout Canada.

No doubt it could be done with the cooperation referred to; but, I ask the committee, have we not every reason to believe that this cooperation will not be forthcoming, especially when we see that every province which has up to date allowed them to go in on account of the war has exacted the pledge that they will be moved out again on demand or at the close of the war? One can hardly expect much cooperation from a number of provinces who have exacted that pledge, and from other provinces who have not been consulted. That I consider to be one of the greatest obstacles. As I said before, if Alberta wants them moved, to what place or province are they to be moved? British Columbia will stand strictly on its promised restriction, whatever that may be, and there is no reason to suppose that the other provinces would be willing to accept any quota at all. Therefore that leaves only one place that they could be moved to, and that is Japan.

But since I wrote those notes, I have received a newspaper from British Columbia containing an item to the effect that the acting premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. C. M. Fines, says that he is willing to cooperate with the dominion government in any reasonable way. However, he protects himself by so many qualifications that it practically does not amount to anything at all. He says that occupation might have something to do with it. He would not want fishermen, and that cuts out a good many. Then he said that he would not want them in colony settlements, and that is what the Japs want; and he would not want any absorption of Japs so as to reduce labour standards.

Well, he has named three of the objections that we in British Columbia have against them. I do not know if his promised cooperation amounts to very much more than lip-service, but an idea comes to me here. Is it not Shakespeare who said that "like draws to like throughout the boundless deep?" I think it would be a grand idea to put the Japs and the C.C.F. together in Saskatchewan. They love each other; they are devoted to each other. It would seem, therefore, most appropriate to have them together. What a new heaven on earth it would mean for those people—who are outside Saskatchewan. Think of British Columbia.

Looking down the corridors of time I envision two conditions in British Columbia which we might achieve if we adopted the right plans now. Under one condition the place would be flooded again with Japanese as of old, Japanese who had drifted back individually—and it cannot be said that a so-called British subject cannot go where he likes in the dominion. They would all come back again and put our white fishermen out of business. The labour unions in the province are now getting satisfactory and workable agreements looking toward peace with their employers. But there is something else that people do not see, although, in my opinion, it is one of the worst evils. It would stop the importation into British Columbia of foreign capital or investment. The man with money to invest, tired of war-worn Europe, might say, "I will transport my business, my factory and my employees to some place in Canada." Then he looks around him to see where he will come; but he will not come to a place where, from a cursory investigation, he is convinced that there is growing up in substantial numbers a political philosophy that preaches that any private enterprise, any man who earns money or obtains money or properly gets ahead by hard industry and toil, is a blackguard who should be liquidated. When the prospective investor sees these things—and he has only to glance at the propaganda of my hon. friends to the left to be convinced that these things are taught here, seeing that one gentleman went to New York the other day and made a statement to that effect—what will that investor say? No one knows how many million dollars of investment with consequent employment were diverted from Canada on that occasion alone, when the gentleman I have mentioned went to New York. But if investors abroad see that these things exist they will say to themselves, "Well, we have not gone there yet. Those who are there now will have to put up with it, but we do not have to go and therefore we will keep out. We will keep aloof." Now that is one picture that I envisage.

Let us now look the other way and consider the British Columbia that might be. Let us consider the Japanese and the C.C.F. happily liquidating each other in Saskatchewan—more power to them. But British Columbia is the scene and home of prosperous white fishermen employed in numbers. It used to be said that we could not maintain the industry without the Japs. But if anyone says that now it is nonsense, because there are more white fishermen now than there were before, taking whites and Japs together before the war, and the white fishermen are happy and contented. In this other picture that I envisage I can see the labour unions growing in numbers, able to make suitable arrangements by means of trade agreements, cooperative movements in the way of labour and capital management, and possibly sharing in profits. They know exactly what their rights are and can maintain them, and capital has come to realize that it is much more likely to make money when employees are contented, so that capitalists will work with employees and there will not be any temptation to engage cheap labour such as was knocking at their doors in the shape of orientals. In short, it will be a place to which capital will come because it can make money without having to live in a state of continual dispute with cheap labour or unscrupulous politicians.

It was Napoleon who said—he enunciated the principle and he carried it out—that every soldier carried a marshal's baton in his knapsack; that is to say, he was capable of rising to the highest rank in the French army. And Napoleon lived up to that principle. We could say to the poor immigrant coming from the United States or from the old country or from any part of Europe, "Leave the place where they have wars every twenty years and come here. We invite you to come. We ask nothing more than your honesty and integrity, your thriftiness and willingness to work; and to any of these houses which perhaps suggest luxury to you, remember you have the key if only you will apply yourselves here. You will not be penalized by cheap labour on the one hand or dominating labour unions on the other."

I leave it to the house and the country to say which of these conditions that I envisage is the more attractive. Surely no objection could be made to putting the Japs in Saskatchewan because we have evidence of the support that the C.C.F. obtained from and the support that they give to the Japanese. Therefore they could not very well object to having them. In fact, their acting premier, although guardedly, has expressed the desire to have some of them. By all means let them go there. Put them all in.

I wish to refer now to the suggestion that has been made that the presence of 25,000 Japanese among twelve million Canadians could not be a menace. That sounds all right on the surface. But I have no doubt the same argument was used when there were only 25,000 negroes in the United States. I can remember reading of when that argument was used. They could have been deported then and there was a demand that the negroes should be deported. Well, there are twelve millions of them now and it is too late; and when the Japanese-Canadian population reaches twelve millions in Canada it will be impossible to talk about deportation of Japanese. It will be too late then. The statesman that sees farthest ahead and outlines his policy in that regard is the one who is the most successful in the long pull, but perhaps not in the immediate future.

The second basic principle upon which the Prime Minister based his policy was that these Japanese who had remained loyal and refrained from active sabotage should be allowed to stay in Canada. The Prime Minister stated that he regarded that principle as fundamental. The obvious difficulty, of course, is, how are you to find out who amongst them are disloyal? A man may be utterly and entirely disloyal and treacherous, and there may be thousands and thousands of them, but until you find them blowing up a bridge or doing something of that kind you cannot convict them of sabotage and consequently of disloyalty. The method by which the Prime Minister suggested we could ascertain their loyalty or disloyalty in Canada was by an investigation by what he terms a quasi-judicial commission. I am fearful of quasi-judicial commissions. I have seen too many of them in British Columbia. Surely this matter is important enough to have the highest judicial courts settle it. We have had too many of these quasi-judicial investigations dealing with situations in British Columbia. We had one to which I referred the other day. Before that gentleman reached British Columbia he said that he knew what the trouble was, that it was due to mob hysteria of a few people of the province. That included, incidentally, all of the members of parliament from that province, with one exception. You have met them; you have seen them here. Do they give you the impression of being likely to fall victims to mob hysteria? They all belong to different political parties and are nearly all of different racial origin; yet they are united on this question.

I have on my desk a quotation from a Vancouver paper. It appears in big headlines and is as follows: "Mayor Insists on Deportation of all Japanese." He was supported in that by most of his council. Vancouver is the third largest city in Canada. They are not all likely to be carried away by mob hysteria. "Government missing opportunity our children's children will regret", Mayor J. W. Cornett said, and he was supported by most of his council. These men cannot all be subject to mob hysteria. You might as well say that the people and the mayor of the city of Toronto are all suffering from mob hysteria. Let us be frank about this.

I would have no confidence whatever in a quasi-judicial commission of that type. The question has been raised and it has not been denied that probably the method adopted to find out a man's loyalty would be to ask him if he would take an oath of allegiance to the king and to this country; yet we all know or we should know that to a non-Christian, and especially an oriental non-Christian, the white man's oath means nothing at all. It is no more binding than asking you to put a postage stamp on a letter. You would do it willingly, would you not, if it were the price of some advantage for you? The occidental oath to one believing in a different form of religion is of no effect.

I should like now to refer to two sessional papers that I hold in my hand as an illustration of how far we would go. These papers were laid on the table a short time ago. There is no feature of mob hysteria here. They are numbers 182F and 182G and were laid on the table on August 5. Number 182F asks the government the following question:

Was one Noboru Yamanoto, a twenty-one year old Canadian-born Japanese, charged with refusing to obey an order of selective service officials and sentenced to a fine of one hundred dollars and costs or in default four months in gaol?

The answer is:

Yes. Persuasive efforts to induce the man to enter useful employment having failed.

I now wish to quote from the same sessional paper a letter that this man addressed to the hon. the Minister of Labour. Here is the letter:

Naboru Yamamoto,
Registration No. 03283,
Canadian born Japanese,
Greenwood, B.C.,
May 22, 1944.

To the Honourable the Minister of Labour:—

I am very sorry to interrupt your precious time for stating my concerns, but I think you will be kind enough to listen and judge to what I state under the following order.

Now I am already twenty-one years old. Speaking from this standpoint I must be working or otherwise, be serving in the armed forces in this country, however, as I came here from Japan just before the war, 1940, after being educated eleven years school course there; I have no desire to be working for this country especially in this war time because such a work would be considered as though I were helping this country to win the war against Japan.

This is the Canadian loyalty that they are supposed to respect once they have taken the oath. I continue:

I feel very sorry to Japan if I do work, as you might have been already noted that the Japanese have very strong patriotism to their mothers country, especially in the war time; they are willing to offer everything that they have to their country even their life if they asked to do so.

You will notice that he classifies himself as a Japanese although he was born in Canada. He says so himself, but he must classify himself as a Japanese. I continue:

There is no exception in my case to this conclusion particularly as I had been under the military training while in the school course there.

Here is a Canadian-born Japanese who says that he has taken his military training in Japan. The letter goes on:

I know that there is left only two ways by which I can keep my living in this country. The first and best thing is to keep my studying until the end of war. By doing so, I would neither hurt Canada nor Japan. The next thing is to be interned or imprisoned until the end of war however this would hurt Canada.

Although I have no intention to hurt this country, there is no alternative course left for me, but to be interned or imprisoned if the selective service or commission (B.C. security commission) would force me to work.

I have professed my suggestion so that there will be left nothing indefinite between us.

Will you be kind enough to tell me if there is left any chance by which I could keep my study in the east? I hope to receive your answer as early as possible.

I have the honour to remain,
Your most obedient servant,
Naboru Yamamoto.

Apparently the Minister of Labour was not as speedy in getting a move on as this gentleman thought he should have been and evidently expected. He appears to have considerable respect for British law. He gets tired waiting for the minister to do something, so that he decides to do something about it and he writes another letter, this time to the national selective service officer, and it is as follows:

No. 3 Building,
Greenwood, B.C.,
June 26, 1944.

National Selective Service Officer,
Unemployment Insurance Commission,
Penticton, B.C.

Dear Sir:—

It has been long time since I received your order written on June 1, 1944, which ordered to me that I had have to go out to work the Midway sawmill from the June 7.

At that time I was still going to school and due to my special circumstances I did not go out to the work as I was directed.

Weeks later from the due date I was asked by the mounted police at Grand Forks the reason why I was not going. At that time I expressed my reason very clearly.

Then the two weeks passed but still there is no sign from the mounted police, also no sign from your office up to this moment.

I wonder what has happened.

He did not understand that he could play you for a sucker. I should not address that remark to the Minister of Labour because the letter is addressed to the national selective service officer. The letter continues:

Generally speaking if the man who refused the order of national selective service must be imprisoned at least six months.

I also have stated my reason fully to the Spanish consul general.

The Spanish consul general is the agent of the Spanish government, and the Spanish government is the nation that has kindly undertaken to look after the Japanese interest in the war, the same as we have Switzerland to look after our interest. They are allowed to do that. He is a Canadian-born

Japanese as he flaunts before the minister, but he does not go to the Canadian government to look after his rights, oh, no; he speaks to the Spanish consul general as a Jap appealing to that nation to look after his interests. It gives away the whole picture. You see the whole plan of these people who prate about their loyalty to the British empire, and when the time comes to fight they say they are not going to fight and they say they are loyal to Japan, although this particular man was actually born in Canada.

I go on with the letter:

Under these circumstances please notify me at once your regulation with regard to this case referring to my reason to the mounted police of Grand Forks.

Then he signs his name again.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is Spain the protecting power for us in Japan?

Mr. NEILL: I will come to that a little later; not having been there I cannot speak with personal knowledge, but the hon. gentleman should not expect that conditions in Japan will be the same as those here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Switzerland is the protecting power for Canada in Japan, and Spain is the protecting power for the Japanese here.

Mr. NEILL: This lad is twenty-one years of age and was born in Canada, and this is how he describes his loyalty to the country of his birth, to which I have no doubt he would swear allegiance if there were anything in it for him. He was born in Canada, but when it comes to a pinch he says quite openly that he owes his allegiance to the country of his forefathers. He says he has been trained to fight for it, and will not do anything else. I quoted the second letter, in which the writer asks the government why they do not take some steps in the matter. He says he has already stated his reasons fully to the agent of the country representing Japan, but he did not appeal to the Canadian government, as he should have done.

In speaking of this matter the other day, the Prime Minister said this commission would have to be careful in coming to a decision, that misunderstanding is not the same as traitorous intention. That is true, but I would pause here for a moment to put this definite question before the committee and the country. Would a man who would write letters such as I have read, as to which there can be no possibility of mistake or misunderstanding, expressing the sentiments that they did, be considered a loyal citizen of Canada? If he would, then you can pour your quasi-judicial commission down the sink for all the value it will be. If, on the other hand, you are of opinion that this quasi-judicial commission would decide that he was disloyal, this demonstrates the complete uselessness of having the commission, because it is obvious that they never would have heard of this man at all, and of thousands like him, if the matter had not happened to come up in this peculiar and unusual way. As soon as the Japanese hear that they are to be interrogated by this commission there is no doubt in the world that they will have their answer down pat: yes, they love the king and everything Canadian, and they will swear to anything. They will swear loyalty to the king as readily as they would give utterance to an expression about the weather. Even if this commission were a strictly legal body it would be impossible for them to look into the minds or souls of the Japanese; and the Japanese, who are no fools, will speedily realize this and have their answers all ready. There is only one remedy; that is, to deport them. Perhaps hon. members do not know what is going on. When the Prime Minister was making his remarks the other day, and I was feebly commenting upon them, two Japanese nationals were sitting in the gallery and one of them, a stenographer, was taking notes all the time that debate was going on, which is absolutely against the rules of the house. And they were occupying the room of a private member of this house, making it their headquarters. Did parliament or the government know that?

Mr. ADAMSON: There were actually five nationals of Japan taking notes. I was in the house at the time and I complained to the Speaker about it.

Mr. NEILL: And they were occupying the room of a member of parliament, making it their headquarters.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Who was the hon. member?

Mr. NEILL: These are not fictions, you know; these are facts.

Mr. MITCHELL: Who was the hon. member?

Mr. NEILL: It was the room of the hon. member for Vancouver East. He was not here; he was away at the time.

Mr. HOMUTH: They had the key?

Mr. NEILL: They had it, I presume from the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs. I do not know how they got it, but certainly they could not get into the room without it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the hon. member mind giving us the date when that room was so used?

Mr. NEILL: Yes; it was during the debate on the elections act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was there anything they could possibly take down that was not taken down by Hansard?

Mr. CASSELMAN: They were getting advance information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says they were taking notes and listening. Was there anything they heard or saw, or could possibly have listened to, that was not reported in Hansard and that they could not have obtained the next morning in printed form?

Mr. CASSELMAN: Hansard was not available until the next day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not rather absurd to be trying to make a sensation out of a few people being in the gallery taking notes when the whole proceedings of parliament are reported and published in Hansard? After all, this house is capable of protecting its own interests. If my hon. friends were frightened, all they had to do was ask Mr. Speaker to protect them.

Mr. NEILL: I know these gentlemen were doing something I would not be allowed to do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend was in any way intimidated, all he had to do was appeal to the chair and ask for the protection of the house.

Mr. NEILL: I have something better to do than look around the galleries and see who is taking notes, but the rules of the house were being broken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then why did somebody not appeal to the chair?

Mr. NEILL: Somebody did.

Mr. ADAMSON: I spoke to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the floor of the house?

Mr. ADAMSON: No; I did not know about it until afterward.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was my hon. friend frightened, or what was his reason? I am anxious to see the rights of hon. members and their property and persons protected, but after all the line has to be drawn somewhere.

Mr. ADAMSON: I understand that under the rules of the house you must not take notes in the gallery. I objected to the nationals of a country whose soldiers have murdered our men overseas taking notes and having rights which are denied to us. I maintain that stand, and I intend to keep on maintaining it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Why did you not rise in your place and say so?

Mr. ADAMSON: I reported it to Mr. Speaker, who told the protective staff. I thought that was the proper thing to do, and they were moved out. I still think that was the proper course for a member of this house to take.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I think you should have risen in your place and objected to it. Did the hon. gentleman think they were drawing pictures of hon. members?

Mr. BOUCHER: Some of the pictures on that side would not be very good.

Mr. NEILL: It may well be suggested that they were not doing any particular harm, as the Prime Minister says; they could have got it all the next day in Hansard, but the point is that until somebody protested they were apparently allowed to break the rules. They must have had some very special object to send three or four of their number to take notes and get the proceedings twenty-four hours before they could read them in Hansard; the matter must have been of considerable importance to them. I suggest that this is the significant point, that we have the representatives of an enemy nation—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In what way could they use that information to the detriment of anyone here? They cannot cable to Japan; they cannot send a message out of the country without that message being seen by the government, who could prevent it from being sent. What is the great danger my hon. friend sees in this?

Mr. NEILL: I know that when I write to my sister in the old country my letter is censored, and I do not write treason. This is not a case like that. The Prime Minister says that everything they do is known. Is it? They are allowed to publish a paper in Japanese in British Columbia. Can we read that? I believe that is going a long way. I do not know what was in their minds; heaven forbid that I should. I do know they thought enough of the importance of getting the early dope on what was going on —perhaps that is their national point of view —to take the trouble and risk being arrested, to sit in the gallery and take notes, which was against the rules. For all we knew they might have dropped a grenade or a bomb from the gallery. They should not have been there in the first place. Mind you, they are representatives of a country with which we are at war. If the Prime Minister thinks that is all right, why cannot an ordinary man be allowed to sit up there and take notes?

The third basic principle laid down by the Prime Minister, which I heartily endorse and have heard commented upon very favourably, is that the immigration of Japanese into this country should not be allowed after the war. But the people who so heartily approve perhaps failed to note the qualifying clause, where the Prime Minister said:

It is realized of course that no declaration of this type can or should be attempted which would be binding indefinitely into the future.

There is, of course, the well-known axiom that there is no law passed by man which subsequently cannot be repealed, unless we put it into the form of a constitution, and even that is liable to correction. I saw no necessity of putting that qualifying clause in there, unless, it was sort of to hold out a hope. I think it was regrettable that it was put in there, because there is plenty of time to make changes later on, and we all know that any law passed by man can be repealed by man.

I should like to conclude with a reiteration of what I said the other day. First, I said that we are not seeking to treat these Japanese with anything but strict justice, and as long as we do that we shall gain the respect of the oriental mind. On the other hand, if we show fear it will be worse instead of better for our soldiers and civilians who are at present within their power, because that is the mentality of their native race.

Also, as I said the other day, as reported at page 5948 of Hansard, we should not be influenced in the slightest degree by the considerations of what possible trade we might or might not lose in the future. If we are to be so influenced, if that is to be the way we look at it, we are going back into the old policies of the time when the last peace was made, when each nation was trying to get ahead of the other by some advantage in trade.

I hope and believe that there will be little or none of that spirit at the peace table. I say we should look much further into the future than a trade agreement, but rather look to the humanities of the human race. Perhaps I might put it in these words, "Ye shall not sell our children's birthright for a mess of trade pottage."

I wish to give a few quotations, and they are all true. Every one of these substantiates my statement, and most of them are statements from Japanese law—not Canadian law. I quote:

A male of full seventeen years of age or upwards does not lose Japanese nationality, unless he had completed active service in the army, or navy, or unless he is under no obligation to serve.

That is not a Canadian statute; it is Japanese law—the 66th, I think it is.

And again:

A male of full seventeen years of age does not lose Japanese nationality unless he has performed his military service.

And again:

You will especially note the terms of article 24 which prescribes that Japanese nationality is not lost unless military service has been performed before naturalization.

That is not military service in Canada, but military service in Japan.

And I quote again.

Prior to that time—

That was August 13, 1934.

—Japanese persons were frequently naturalized here who had not performed military service in Japan, and thus they became dual nationals.

Note that "dual nationals".

That order in council—

That was the order in council of August 13, 1944.

—provided, however, that no Japanese would be accepted for naturalization who did not have a certificate from the Japanese minister in Canada indicating that they had complied with Japanese military service requirements.

That last order in council is Canadian law. What would you think if Germany declared that we must not naturalize a man of German birth unless he had produced a certificate that he had performed his German military service?

It is said of one of the big religions in Canada—one of the great religions of the world—that if they have a child under their domination until he becomes seven years of age he will always live and certainly die of that same religion. It begins to look as though it was the same thing here.

This is no passing obscession; this is no mob hysteria. These are not the thoughts only of the member for Comox-Alberni. These are quotations from Japanese law supported by our order in council which was passed, and which provided—and this was in 1934, when the Prime Minister was not in power—that no one would get a naturalization certificate after that date unless he could produce a certificate of the Japanese consul in Canada, certifying that he had performed his military duty, and those military duties were in Japan. If you knew how intense the military training is in Japan you would understand how there is so much difficulty for the Japanese citizen to grasp the ideals of the white man's civilization and Canadian citizenship.

I have just one more word to say. It is beginning to dawn on me in the last two or three days that the people of Canada, even members of parliament outside British Columbia, are not taking this matter seriously enough. They seem to think it should be confined only to British Columbia members. If they are so indifferent, then why should we in British Columbia worry so much?

The other day the hon. member for Lake Centre made a very fine speech in which he outlined the policy of his party, and referred to the statement which had been made by the Prime Minister. The hon. member made an excellent speech, covering the whole ground—with the exception that he did not mention that one question which is such a burning question to us in British Columbia. Well, if that is so, and if that is the view they take, we can be satisfied, and we shall be satisfied. If the government—this government or any other government—declares British Columbia a complete danger zone and prohibits any Japanese from living there, we would be satisfied, or at least silenced.

That is the situation as far as British Columbia is concerned. What you do to keep them somewhere else which is a matter of indifference to other members, will satisfy British Columbia if you make British Columbia for all time a danger zone and cut out all residence by those of Japanese origin. The solution is a poor one. It would be only the path of expediency, rather than of statesmanship, because statesmanship involves looking ahead to see what is best for the nation in the long run.

But in the meantime if the Prime Minister and this government gave his announcement that he would declare British Columbia to be a danger zone, and keep all those of Japanese origin out of it, so far as British Columbia is concerned we would have very little kick. It is a poor thing, this path of expediency. But so far as we are concerned, it is the one we would accept. It would be easily enforced, and we would not be forever asking whether this man was loyal, or whether the other fellow was loyal. It would be just a matter of having a danger zone. And the history of international law would justify it, because British Columbia is the danger zone for all time against the intruder from the orient; it does not matter whether he is Japanese, Chinese, or anything else. If you keep them out of there you prevent them from presenting any danger in the future.

I have overstepped my time, and I thank the committee for giving me this extra time. However, I feel very strongly in the matter, and I do hope the Prime Minister will take into consideration these matters I have mentioned.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I on a matter of privilege have something to say here? I understand the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said that there were Japanese in the house, and that they used one of the member's rooms as headquarters. He named the room of the hon. member for Vancouver East. That room is in my charge at the present time. I have the key to it, and to my knowledge no one, other than my own secretary, has used it for any purposes. And he has never reported to me that any person of Japanese origin has been in that room. Therefore I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement. Obviously it is not true, because the room could not have been used without my knowledge. I have no knowledge of anyone of Japanese origin being in that room. I have seen no person of Japanese race or origin, myself, during this session of parliament.

Mr. NEILL: I have been in the house the whole session and I have never seen any Japanese, either. But that does not prove they were not here. The fact that my hon. friend did not see them does not say they were not there. I did not see those men in the gallery, but that does not prove they were not there, for the police officer went and spoke to them. If the hon. member believes that they were not, I will say he is simpler than I thought he was.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the hon. member says that the room of the hon. member for Vancouver East was used by these people as their headquarters while they were here.

Mr. NEILL: That is true but I will put it in another way, in a way that will be more definite. You know sometimes people are likely to make a big fuss and claim they are being libelled when they are only being labelled. I will put it more directly. I claim that there is a direct permanent connection in British Columbia between the C.C.F. and the Japanese.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not true.

Mr. NEILL: If that does not satisfy them—

Mr. COLDWELL: We are not filled with the hate that some people are.

The CHAIRMAN: I think it is a matter of interpretation of the statement made. I take it that there was no personal attack on any one, and I understand the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has stated that he was not aware personally that there were Japs in the room of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. NEILL: They were there but in order to save dispute and time, I will say, "Yes, dear, I will withdraw."

Mr. COLDWELL: I could not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. MITCHELL: He said, "Yes, dear, I will withdraw."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He said, "Yes, dear, I will withdraw."

Mr. KNOWLES: Why did he ever make it?

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that comes with singular propriety from the Prime Minister.

Mr. ROSE: Mr. Chairman, the comprehensive statement made by the Prime Minister shows that, generally speaking, our government has followed a correct foreign policy. It is obvious that under present circumstances the first objective of our foreign policy is to win a victory along with the united nations as rapidly and as decisively as possible. Secondly, I believe that our policy in the post-war period aims to assure security for Canada and for the world through collaboration with the united nations, to promote such machinery as will unite these nations and guarantee them political, economic, social and cultural well-being for them and for all other nations. The Labour Progressive party has on a number of occasions stated its position with regard to foreign policy, and I think I can give this in a few words as stated by Tim Buck, the national leader of the party:

> The ideal toward which Canada's foreign policy should aim is that of Canada playing a democratic role as a sovereign state in a world association of sovereign states.
>
> Such an ideal does not exclude or contradict continued Canadian membership in the British commonwealth; on the contrary, it envisages development of Canada's role in the commonwealth to one of increasing importance. A member of the British commonwealth of nations, next door neighbour to the United States and a friendly near neighbour to the great confederation of Soviet socialist republics, Canada can and should be a link between the great democratic powers. To do that effectively she must not be subordinate in any way to any one of them. Canada's foreign policy must be based squarely upon Canada's national interests and needs.

If we approach Canada's foreign policy from that point of view it is then no more a question of whether Canada is a small nation or is to be a big power within an empire scheme. The real problem as I see it is that we are going to be either a nation speaking up independently and showing an interest in Canada and the world or we shall simply mouth what others say. The only thing that will make us great will be our independent position, based on Canada's interest. We have reached maturity during this war economically, politically and in many other ways. That is recognized throughout the world, and it is high time that we all recognized that from the point of view of foreign affairs we must accept the stature of full maturity.

Looking at the world at the present time, I believe it is necessary that we notice what is happening throughout the world. We must do this not just because we may want to go travelling over the globe but because what happens throughout the world affects us. We cannot disregard what happens in any part of the world, and it is therefore necessary that we look at what is happening in the various united nations and consider how we may best achieve victory and a state of peace.

Through the conferences at Moscow, Cairo and Teheran we have been given a pattern of collaboration, referred to by the Prime Minister. I wish to make it clear that this pattern of collaboration includes both great and small powers. We should not try to create the feeling that the large powers are going to run away with things and that the small powers will be left alone or will be oppressed by the large powers. I believe that to consider it from that point of view is to create ill-feeling and suspicion.

There is a tendency at times to refer to the big powers as wolves and the little ones as lambs. I have not time to go back into history, but if I had I think I could show that there has been a number of wars fought by the little powers, wars that were inspired by reactionary governments. We must endeavour to see how we can collaborate best in the post-war period. The four powers in their declaration at Moscow indicated how they intended to include the small nations. Parts one and four of that declaration read as follows:

> 1. That their united action, pledged for the prosecution of the war against their respective enemies will be continued for the organization and maintenance of peace and security.
>
> 4. That they recognize the necessity of establishing at the earliest practical date a general international organization based on the principle of sovereign equality of all peace loving states and open to membership by all such states large and small for the maintenance of international peace and security.

This was repeated at the Teheran conference in the following words:

We shall seek the cooperation and active participation of all nations, large and small, whose peoples in heart and mind are dedicated, as are our own people, to the elimination of tyranny and slavery, oppression and intolerance. We will welcome them as they may choose to come into the world family of democratic nations.

Here is something else:

Emerging from these friendly conferences we look with confidence to the day when all peoples of the world may live free lives untouched by tyranny and according to their varying desires and their own consciences.

Has the situation become better or worse since those conferences? If one wants to be pessimistic he will say that things have not become much better. It is true that there are many things that have not been remedied, but in my opinion many things have been improved. The difficult situation that existed in Jugoslavia has been changed since the conference, and in his last speech in the British House of Commons Prime Minister Churchill made it clear that this matter is well on the way to a final solution.

There is also the situation in Italy where Badoglio and King Emmanuel insisted on staying in power, where certain reactionaries behind them insisted that they stay in power. Since then, a government representing all sections of the Italian people has been established. While that government has not yet been given all the necessary power, it is trying to bring all sections of the Italian people together to help to drive the enemy from Italian soil.

There was the situation in France. We in Canada feel especially strongly about France. No doubt many of us were distressed about the situation that was created by hoisting Darlan, Peyrouton and others into power. Many of us could not see any reason for the use of these people. The other day in front of this house we heard Charles de Gaulle speaking. We believe that the fact of his standing and speaking there may be regarded as symbolizing the victory of the forces of progress over reaction, the victory of the heroic people of France.

Then there is the Polish situation. I know that this problem has not been solved, but there are good signs that it will be settled in a way which will satisfy all the united nations and primarily the people of Poland. Not all is well as yet, but I am quite optimistic that even those things which are still wrong will be changed, because I have a lot of faith that the peoples who have gone through this war do not mean to return to the conditions which prevailed before the war.

There is the problem of Italy. It is true that the Italian people now have a government, but some of the actions of others who are now in occupation of that country are not so reassuring. In many places the allied civil administration does not act in a manner most encouraging to anti-fascists. The other day I read a story by Matthews in the New York Times, written from Rome, that partisans, men who have risked their lives to destroy bridges and tear up tracks to help the Canadian and British forces, have been disarmed and left helpless. That sort of thing must not happen. These men, who had the "guts" to fight Mussolini, must be encouraged. They must be formed into an army to help us in the fighting, and given an opportunity of coming to the fore in their native land.

Here is a story of civil administration. A town was taken by Canadian troops. The Canadian civil administration entered the place and, finding a committee of anti-fascists had been set up, collaborated with it. The British took over the town and continued the collaboration, until one fine day the committee, taking seriously the statements of the Moscow conference about clearing fascists out of important jobs, sent a letter to the local bank asking them to "fire" fascist employees. What happened? This committee found themselves arrested and given gaol sentences; their office was closed, and they were informed that they had broken the regulations, because they had no business to send out letters. Somehow the true spirit of collaboration is still lacking. Too often there are officials in the civil administrations who come from business circles. Their minds generally being not of the most progressive type, they cannot understand these anti-fascist committees. That is not the best way of dealing with the problem of occupied Italy.

I should like to deal for a few minutes with the situation in Greece. We hear very little about it. There have been several refugee governments, at least three, I believe, in the period of a few weeks. The government was to include representatives of the fighting forces of Greece, the EAM. There have been troubles. Both the army and the navy revolted. They did not revolt because they did not want to fight; they revolted against a regime for which they did not want to fight. The result was that twenty-four sailors have been sentenced to death. Is that going to promote the unity of Greece? I have a feeling that British imperialist interests still believe they must have a hold on that area and feel it incumbent upon them to tell the Greek people what sort of government they are to have or are not to have. That is not in accordance with the declaration made by the Teheran conference, that each people should have the right to the kind of government they wanted, and according to their own choice.

I do not know how soon the Polish situation will be cleared up. I have some personal knowledge of Poland, and I doubt whether Watson Kirkconnell, or Wilson Woodside, the C.B.C. commentator who, every chance he has, takes a crack at the Soviet Union as regards the Polish situation, or any other like-minded commentators, can tell me much about it. I remember as a young boy that there were many streets in my native city which we did not dare to go up, because stones were thrown at us. Jews could not pass along those streets. I can recall that Jews had to put handkerchiefs around their beards, because there were anti-Semitic specialists in beard-clipping who went around with scissors to clip the beards of orthodox Jews. Despite the fact that the present Polish government in London is made up of people from various parties, in the subordinate ranks of the diplomatic staff and among some of the officers there is a reactionary pro-fascist clique which we have to take into consideration when we speak about Poland. These are the people who want to carry forward the policy of pre-war days in Poland. You do not have to take my word for it. I am going to quote what Lloyd George had to say about Poland in 1938. Writing that year in his book, "The Truth About the Peace Treaties," David Lloyd George, former Prime Minister of Great Britain, said as follows, referring to the treatment of minorities:

> Poland is one of the worst offenders. She actually repudiated the minority treaty at Geneva in 1934 by unilateral declaration in which her delegate laid down that the treaty would no longer be regarded as applicable to Poland.
>
> One of her greatest breaches of faith relates to her treatment of the claim by the Ruthenes (or Ukrainians) to local autonomy for at least eastern Galicia. . . . There are some 6½ millions of this race on her territory.

Such is his reference to the Ukrainians. As to the treatment of Jews, I have not time to go into that, but I have come across a number of articles, in the Manchester Guardian, the London Daily Herald and other journals, dealing with anti-Jewish pogroms. I do not wish to dwell too much upon the past, but the fact is that anti-Semitism still exists in the Polish army. Only a few months ago the British foreign secretary, Right Hon. Anthony Eden, admitted to the House of Commons that an anti-Semitic situation existed and that a number of Jews were going to transfer from the Polish to the British forces, but he hoped that the problem would be solved, because all the troops were about to go into action.

There is a story in the New York Times, appearing on March 19, 1944, by James Alderidge, in which he tells about a colony of 134,000 Poles who had left the Soviet Union and gone to Iran. He writes:

> The Polish camp was divided into classes . . . conditions got progressively worse as one's station was lower. The Jews were scattered into a Ghetto, the camp was run on totalitarian lines and you did what you were told. . . . When more than 300 Jewish children had been fixed up to go to Palestine the Polish elite who were very anti-Semitic put pressure on the Iraqui authorities not to allow the Jewish children to pass through Iraq to get to their destination.

To verify this, Quentin Reynolds writes in his book "The Curtain Rises," which appeared only a few months ago:

> I knew, as everyone in Iran knew, what they did with some of our lend-lease and Red Cross equipment. I know that they cared for the Poles one way in Iran and for the Jewish people in quite a different way—oh, in quite a different way.

These are the words of Quentin Reynolds. I want to go a bit further and elaborate on this point because misunderstanding is created in Canada by people who are anti-Soviet on every occasion they get, especially in regard to the Polish situation. That is the thing they look for chiefly as a means of creating confusion. In this book "The Curtain Rises," Quentin Reynolds has a chapter called "Poland believed Goebbels." The story about the ten thousand Poles who, it was claimed, had been murdered by the Russians is commented on by Quentin Reynolds in these words:

> When we first heard this we yawned, and switched over to the Rome station. It was we thought just another of the good Doctor's bedtime stories. . . . Then we were shocked to see that the Polish government in London was actually taking the story seriously. Alexander Werth, Marjorie Shaw, Ralph Parker and two or three others who knew the Polish ambassador well hurried to his embassy. . . . He regretted the whole incident exceedingly but he emphasized the courteous treatment he had always received from the Soviet officials . . . he told Alexander Werth that he did not for a moment believe Dr. Goebbels' story of 10,000 dead Polish officers.

In this chapter, Quentin Reynolds gives other facts about Soviet-Polish relations since 1941. He writes:

> Soviet-Polish relations got off to a fresh and favourable start under the agreement of July 30 of that year. The Sikorsky government said, in effect, "Well, for the moment we're allies fighting the same enemy. Let's let bygones be bygones until we sit at the peace table." All embassies were stationed in Kuibyshev then. Moscow was too near the front. The Sikorsky government made the mistake of staffing its embassy and its military mission with diplomats and officers who had always been identified with the avowedly anti-Soviet policies of Josef Beck. These gentlemen entirely lacked the gift of reticence.

Reynolds tells them about Kuibyshev, the temporary capital, during those days. He said that the Poles hated Russia and made no effort to conceal their feelings. He tells the story about the army in the Soviet Union —a Polish army on Soviet soil:

Meanwhile, what of that Polish army that was training? General Anders had little faith in the ability of the red army to withstand the full impact of the German blows which were increasing in fury each week. It was stated repeatedly that the German army would eventually smash Russia.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these were people who were happy in the belief that the Germans would eventually smash Russia and they would save their hides by withdrawing to Iran. Such people cannot deal with the Soviet Union. We here on this continent understand very well, when we are concerned about what happens in the Argentine because any such event disturbs the situation in the Americas. But very many in this country refuse to understand why the people of Soviet Russia do not feel so happy about having on their borders governments that are always plotting against them. Let me emphasize that, if anything, we want to learn from this whole Polish affair that the calamities of the past, which were due in very large measure to anti-Sovietism, must not be repeated in the future.

Unfortunately, anti-Sovietism is something to which too many still resort. But if we are to have peace in the future we must wipe this out completely. Because of that I felt rather peeved the other day when a little book came to my attention, bearing the title, "When the Iron is Hot", written by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore). I do not know what he tried to prove. I gather that his idea was that socialism is not good, but I do not know why he found it necessary to seek his materials in the events of 1925, 1926 and 1927, and slander the Soviet Union. Why should he use the arguments that were advanced by the worst enemies of the U.S.S.R. at that time in order to prove his point? That is beyond me. It does not help good relations, especially when such a book is sent out with the compliments of a member of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A member of the government?

Mr. McLARTY: A member of parliament.

Mr. ROSE: I do not like to mention names, but the person in question was Ernest Bertrand, K.C., P.C., M.P., who franked it and sent it out.

I should now like to turn to another country which has not been given very much attention in this discussion. I mean China. China is one of the four great powers, but if we speak frankly I think we will admit that the war in China is not going very well. President Roosevelt not so long ago made that admission, and I would say that the fact that certain appeasing elements, certain reactionary forces, are still active in Chungking, speaks for itself. Inflation is running riot there. In fact, it has reached catastrophic proportions, and I think members of this house are old enough and responsible enough to be aware of these facts. The situation there is not very good. The rich refuse to lend their money, or they will not lend it except under compulsion, and there is little compulsion there. The other day a translation of a book written by Chiang Kai-shek came into my hands. I hope that Chiang Kai-shek has changed his mind since he wrote that book, because he does not express the kind of sentiment toward the western powers that one would expect. Generally, the situation there is not a healthy one. Vice-President Wallace visited him a short time ago and I hope that he was able to improve the situation there.

I should like to say a little about the eighth route and fourth route armies. Very little is known about it in Canada; we should know more about it. Here is what Lieutenant-Colonel Carlson of the United States marines said about these armies a few months ago:

In the early years of the Sino-Japanese war I spent a number of months with this group. I found that its military successes were due in large measure to the democratic political action of the people and to the solid integrity of its leaders.

Recently I had a report from Professor Michael Lindsay formerly of the faculty of Yenching university and now present with this group on the activities of the group up to the end of last year. Professor Lindsay tells me that the military agencies of this group, the eighth route and new fourth armies are containing about 350,000 Japanese troops. These Chinese armies operate for the most part in small mobile columns which engage the enemy daily. Activities have been extended northwest of Peiping and into southern Manchuria where they constitute a constant threat to the Japanese lines of communication with China. These armies with their militia units now number about one million men.

Hon. members may wonder why I am saying so much about China? I am saying it because I have heard hon. members ask, are we to participate in the war in the Pacific? Yes, we are. But we want everybody to fight. Everybody who wants to fight should be given an opportunity to fight. We want them to fight because that is the way in which we shall work better in the future—by speaking of these issues; by seeing that China is united; by seeing that the troops who are holding back half of the Japanese army are given support. If we are giving mutual aid then we should give mutual aid to these groups as well as to the forces of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek.

Madame Sun Yat-sen, the wife of the great leader of Chinese freedom, recently made an appeal to the American people and the American workers in which she said:

> Insist that the products of their efforts, and the gifts they make to China shall be equally distributed to every force wherever situated, that is actively engaged in operations against Japan, and to no force that is otherwise engaged.

I wish to say a few words in passing about this Japanese rumpus. We are spending too much time on a small group of people in this country. We are wasting too much effort when we do not know what the post-war solution is to be. If the Cairo decisions are carried out, and I have no doubt they will be carried out; if Manchuria comes back to China, if Korea is made independent; if Formosa is taken away from Japan; if the Mitsui-Mitsubiski industrial enterprises are smashed; if Hirohito and the small group of Japanese war lords are dealt with, there will be no Japanese danger and there will be no reason to persecute here in Canada a group just because they happen to be of Japanese origin. Why were some of the Japanese supporters of Hirohito feeling so cocky in this country before the war? They were that way because they considered their country invincible, and we encouraged them by shipping scrap iron to Japan. While in Vancouver in 1938 I was to be interviewed on the air about Japanese espionage. I went to the radio station, but I got as far as the door only. The man who was to interview me told me that he was sorry, the mayor of the town had intervened and the broadcast was cancelled. If we smash Japanese imperialism and the Japanese military clique we shall solve the Japanese problem in Canada too.

May I say a few words about another far eastern problem, India? I come back to the problem, shall we fight in the far east? Yes, we can send a lot of troops, but they cannot do as much as one-fifth, one-tenth or one one-hundredth as the solution of the Indian problem would achieve. Vice-President Wallace spoke about that part of Asia not long ago. He said:

> If the war ended to-morrow Asia would find itself divided into free and subject divisions.

[Mr. Rose.]

He declared that the latter would be India, the Dutch East Indies, Burma, Malaya, Indo-China and a great many small Pacific islands. Wallace said:

> It is to our advantage not to perpetuate this division but to see an orderly process of transition so that the area of free Asia will grow and the area of subject Asia constantly diminish.

A few days ago Mahatma Gandhi made some proposals—I would say those proposals were very moderate—calling for the setting up of a provisional Indian national government with the British viceroy retaining control over military affairs, and pledged not to renew the civil disobedience campaign during the war. He made separate proposals to the Moslems. There seems to be a means for solving the problem; and we in Canada, in the interests of the people of Canada and in the interests of the people of India and everywhere else, should say to the British government that we expect them to take up these negotiations and proposals. This is the finest way of cutting short the war in the far east; it is the finest way of having stability in the far east in the post-war period.

I wish to deal with one more area under British control. I have covered a large part of the world, and I shall conclude with this. I refer to Palestine. A number of hon. members have spoken on it and I wish to say a few words too. There are 600,000 Jewish people who live and toil in Palestine. People of various nationalities, Christians and others have travelled there, and they have come back and admired the things that were done by the Jewish people both agriculturally and industrially in that area. In the difficult days before El Alamein the people of Palestine looked after the repair of the machines of war for the British army. Tens of thousands of the sons of Palestine were fighting in the army. The Jewish settlement of Palestine has been cramped by the white paper. Jews have not the right to buy land, a lot that is worse than anywhere else in the world. They cannot emigrate to Palestine. Immigration is limited. I would say that Canada, together with the governments of Britain, the United States and Russia, should try to find a solution of the problem of those six hundred thousand people living in Palestine and those who want to go there. I believe that a solution can be found on the basis of collaboration between the Arabs and the Jews, and I believe that this idea is becoming more and more popular with both these peoples. It is true that there are a few extremist elements among the Jewish people who talk about Palestine as their own hunting ground, but they form a very small minority. I believe that we should do our best to help to find a solution of that problem.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How would you suggest it should be done?

Mr. ROSE: By suggesting that the great powers get together with representative groups of the Jewish and Arab leaders, trying to find some solution. I do not say it would be easy to get these people to come together, but at least we would be trying to solve the problem on a sound basis instead of on the basis of the white paper.

While I am on the question of the Jewish people in Palestine, I should like to say a word with regard to Jewish people in general and anti-Semitism, which must be driven from the earth once and for all. There should be no place for it in our world; and at the peace table, or whatever the conference is called, anti-Semitism and the oppression of minorities by any one nation should be made a crime against all other nations. Our government should take a stand on this matter. After all, Hitler has used the Jewish issue to deceive the German people, and there are many would-be Hitlers who would like to use it again to-morrow. I see by the newspapers that in the city of Lublin, where I was brought up as a child, of the fifty thousand Jews who lived there before the war not one was alive when the Russians finally recaptured it from the Germans. While the Germans held that city they killed all the Jews, and to that city they brought Jews from all over Europe. The Russians found huge stoves in which Jews had been burned. So that I say that the evils of anti-Semitism and oppression against minorities are things against which we should all speak once and for all, things that must be discarded from civilized society. When we are united we are strong; when we are divided one from another we are weak. I want to cite this one example. When the Red army launched its offensive in white Russia, which brought it so close to German territory, its armies were commanded by four generals.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. ROSE: Then perhaps I may finish what I was about to say. There was Bagramian, the Armenian; Chernyakhovsky, the Jew; Zakarov, the Russian, and Rokossovsky, the Pole; four generals leading one offensive, men of four nationalities fighting in white Russia, to help liberate the Polish people. That is the spirit we want to permeate throughout Canada; that is the spirit we want in the world. With such equality and such opportunities in the new world it will be a better place for us to live in, as it must be.

I wish to conclude with the following quotation from a very fine book which I read the other day and which I recommend to hon. members for their vacation reading. It is "They Shall Not Sleep", by Leland Stowe. He concludes with these words:

> Yes, yesterday is dead. But only the weak or the incurably greedy will weep for yesterday. To-morrow is a different day. It will belong only to those who are as clear of mind as they are strong of heart. To-day is dying as swiftly as those who fall and those who have fallen upon the fields of battle. If to-morrow is not a better as well as a different day, we can be sure that they shall not sleep.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member who has just taken his seat said something about supporting the movement of Jewish people from Poland to Palestine. That recalls to my mind a meeting I attended last winter in Toronto, a very large meeting of Jewish people at the Royal York hotel, one of the finest audiences it has been my pleasure to see. There were men from all over America, and I can say I was delighted to be there and delighted to meet the others who attended. At the conclusion of that gathering a very strong resolution was passed asking that Canada should support the programme of Jewish immigration to Palestine. I am entirely in accord with that sentiment, but I should not like to see all the Jewish people go to Palestine; I should like to see some of them come to Canada. In my own city of Toronto all I have to do is go down to the main business centre of the city, and there I see how much this country owes to the Jewish people who have come here. They have established great businesses. When I go to the university I see the great contribution they have made to education, to science and to music. In connection with the Jewish people I have always observed that when they come to Canada their first step is to learn our language and invest their money in business. I have seen many of them start very low on the ladder, and in their lifetimes rise to a very high position in business and all that go to make up this country. I have never had any animosity toward the Jewish people. There are Jewish people all around my neighbourhood; their sons have enlisted and are serving in the various branches of the armed services.

I cannot understand antagonism toward the Jews. I rose to say that from my own observation I have seen them make good in this country. I have seen them make a substantial contribution, in every walk of life, to the building up of this country. I have seen them participate in the defence of this country, and I would support a programme that might be initiated by the Prime Minister to help them. As I said a moment ago, I should like to see this government do something to help them migrate to Palestine, and to have some of them come to this country. I have not been to Palestine, although I am going there one day. I should like to see the city the Jewish people built there in a short time; I believe it is called Tel-aviv, and the wonderful gardens they have constructed out of a sandy desert, converting it into a prolific country by means of irrigation. I have said a great deal about irrigation, but I should probably learn something from what the Jews have done in turning the sandy wastes of Palestine into irrigated areas producing vast quantities of commodities.

This is what I rose to say to the Prime Minister. If he makes an effort along the lines of the resolution passed by the Zionist movement and endeavours to assist in the return of large numbers of Jewish people to Palestine, he will receive my support. I believe they deserve a great deal more from this country than they have been getting, in view of the vast contribution they have made to the progress of the world.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not wish to take a great deal of time on this item, although I must say I regard it as perhaps the most important we have had to discuss during the present session of parliament, in view of the times through which we are now passing. Yet I suppose it will be one of the least discussed of all items. Perhaps there is a reason for that for, after all, I believe most of us know very little about international relations.

In my constituency not long ago I made it a point, just as a matter of carrying out a little test, to ask a number of people what we were fighting for. I must confess that the answers they gave were not in the realm of superintelligence. One man would say, "Well, we are fighting a war against Hitler." Another would say, "We are fighting a war to defeat the enemy." Those were the answers I received. It seems to me that all international relations, so far as our people are concerned, are shrouded in a sort of mystery. We do not appear to know what is happening behind the scenes.

I can understand this, if that which goes on behind the scenes has to do with military strategy. But when conferences of a diplomatic nature are called, the people should be well informed as to what is happening at those conferences. Several very important conferences have been held within the last few years. There was the conference at Casablanca. I do not know what happened there, and I doubt whether anybody else does—with the exception of those who attended. We were told, of course, that some great military strategy was being planned. Well, it occurs to me that perhaps the generals, admirals and air marshals would be the ones who would plan military strategy.

Then there was the great conference known as the Atlantic conference which gave birth to what was called the Atlantic charter. Somehow or another the Atlantic charter seems to have fallen into disrepute. In some sections of the world it is said that the Atlantic charter has failed. I question in my own mind whether that really was the object of the conference. When I look at the four freedoms I have to ask myself whether or not it was necessary to hold a conference in the middle of the Atlantic to decide that the peoples of the world are free from this and free from that.

Then there was the great Quebec conference, at which Canada and our Prime Minister played host. Certainly we were not told what took place behind the closed doors of that conference. As a matter of fact, when President Roosevelt, who, I suppose, was the one delegated to tell the world what did not happen, made his statement, he said that this time the enemy would know in due course what they had talked about.

Then there was the Teheran conference. Some little publicity has been given to it, but I doubt very much whether the people know a great deal about it. It seems to me that what we want, if we are to have an effective democracy, is an informed people. We need an informed public.

I am tempted to ask myself this question: What sort of information are the people getting? Any information they are getting with respect to international relations does not seem to come from officialdom. Most of it seems to come from all sorts of other sources. Stand at a modern newsstand in a railway station or on a street and look over the publications there offered for sale, and one will see that there is a lot of trash as reflected in certain types of literature dealing with foreign policy of foreign nations. What do we find? Well, I am quite certain that all that is publicized with respect to international relations only tends to confuse the public mind. I wish that our leaders would take the initiative and really inform the public as to what is happening. Tell our people, so that we may see the public reaction, and consequently move according to the wishes of an effective democracy.

That, I believe, is something that will make democracy more effective. A good deal has been said with respect of certain announcements, and the timing thereof. Some little blame, rightly or wrongly, has been focused upon the Prime Minister. I must confess I am not interested in that aspect of the matter. I know that diplomatic relations are very delicate. Diplomats must be dressed properly; they must have their silk hats on properly, or they are not following the best form. I am not interested in whether the Prime Minister did rightly or wrongly in permitting an announcement to go out at a certain time. I am quite willing to leave it to him, and trust him to do the right thing in that respect.

But what I am concerned about is the basis of the announcement. What I am concerned about is the subject matter dealt with by the diplomats of the various nations. And I would say now to the Prime Minister, for whom I have some regard—although I am not a Liberal—that he would do well for this country and for himself, and would do well for his party—if party could be brought into it—and would do well for the nation, if he were to attempt to give the public the entire diplomatic picture, in order that they may be informed as to where this country is going.

Might I now turn to the role of the philosopher? Perhaps I am a very weak sort of philosopher. I never did major in philosophy, and I have often thought that common sense will take one where some types of philosophy will not. But I say emphatically, and I do not think I am wrong, that the way I see the picture in the world to-day is that the whole world is lining up into two camps, each one with a particular programme for a particular desired end.

It may be that some well-intentioned people are the victims of one programme or the other. As I see it, one camp fosters a programme of driving the world toward what I have termed world statism. The other camp has its programme of effective democracy, or a world of free men. The one that is driving toward world statism has as its guiding principle that of compulsion. The one that seeks to bring about a world of free men has for its main principle that of inducement. There is all the difference in the world between the two.

That programme which tends toward bringing about a world statism means dictatorship from the top. It may not appear so now, but that is the inevitable result. A programme to have an effective democracy in every country that so desires that sort of thing must be a programme which gives the individual absolute freedom along with absolute security.

I offer no apology for saying that I regard Holy Writ as authentic and indisputable. One of the principles of divine creation was to make the individual created in the image of God a personality with absolute freedom of will to choose. I do not think I need to take the time to repeat the story except to say that whether we want to take it as being symbolic or not, when man was created he was told that he could partake of all the trees of the garden. But we are reminded that the Creator said that there was one tree he should not touch. But the Creator did not place a fence around that tree and force man to stay away. Why? Because in the Great Almighty creative omniscience there was one principle that had to be realized, the dignity of man as a free moral agent. I will say philosophically that anything that tends to take away from or interfere with the dignity of a human being, to take away his freedom as an individual, is contrary to divine law.

I maintain that wherever the British flag has flown the great principles of freedom, equity, justice and peace have been its symbols. If we are to have an effective democracy it must be one where those great principles have free growth in our midst, the principle of the freedom of the individual, and the principles of equity, justice and lasting peace. I am quite aware that in many instances we have failed. I am quite aware that the privileges which have grown up under a free democracy have been abused. Nevertheless I say that any departure from the principle which recognizes the individual as a human being, as a free moral agent, will destroy democracy. When nations adhere to those great principles is what we mean by effective democracy.

An attempt is being made, and it has been going on for many decades, to destroy the British empire. The great underlying principles of British justice and democracy are as I have outlined and will always remain that. The one way to destroy freedom, the one way to destroy equity and justice in the world, the one way to take peace from the world would be to destroy the British empire.

The question is whether or not in our international relations we are to retain those vital Christian principles or whether we are to play into the hands of a world scheme for the setting up of world statism over which there will be, if the ultimate end is as I have pictured, a world dictatorship. I know the Prime Minister is well aware of this and we are all well aware that the old propaganda machine has been attempting to mould the minds of people to the bringing about of that international organization. It is all very well to talk about an international organization for peace, but we have to know what that international organization means, what its ultimate objective is, where it is likely to take us.

One thing is certain. If you delegate any power to an outside organization you cannot delegate that power without losing it yourself. When you delegate that power to an international organization, all that is really needed is someone, to put it in a crude way, some great personage with a little more brains than the rest of them. The result will be tantamount to world dictatorship. I am convinced that what is being built is a programme to bring about a world state whereby each individual nation will surrender a certain amount of its sovereignty and power and, in addition, give that international organization a police force to force its will upon the rest of the world.

Personally I am against that. I often ask myself the question, as I view the matter along those lines, "Are we going to give our sons to fight in some war that in reality has nothing to do with us; are we going to give them to fight just because we have become tied to some sort of international organization?" Supposing some skirmish broke out in South America or in some other distant part of the globe. Are we going to give our sons to fight there just because we are tied to an international organization of that kind?

I know I shall not be contradicted when I say that that is the idea. I know that what is being propagandized is that this is an organization to ensure peace and world security. That sounds all very well, but I am wondering if in the end the idea is not to destroy the effectiveness of the British commonwealth of nations. I believe that it is. One thing is certain that what we need more than anything else is to remove the causes of war. My own common sense tells me that to simply build up an international organization, to give it a police force to impose its will upon the nations that are not in line, will not strike at the root of the matter. Such a programme presupposes that you are not going to get rid of the causes of war.

I have always had great respect for the British diplomat. When Mr. Anthony Eden was in Ottawa last year I had certain thoughts, but I did not think that was the occasion to raise anything by way of criticism. We must always be courteous to our visitors. In the speech he made in this chamber, he said, as reported on page 1748 of Hansard of April 1, 1943:

> The League of Nations suffered, no doubt, from a number of human failings and shortcomings. We all do. However, what above all it lacked was a sufficiently wide international authority to express its decisions with conviction and an adequate force to see them executed.

Somebody has said that the failure of the League of Nations was because it did not have any teeth in it. Well, just as soon as you begin to put teeth in anything, something is going to bite and something is going to be bitten; that is all there is to it. He goes on to say on the same page a little lower down:

> It is essential that when this war is over the united nations should maintain sufficient force to ensure that neither Germany nor Italy nor Japan—

I do not know why he stopped there.

> —can ever plunge the world into war again.

The only redeeming feature about it is that he says "again." But why not include all nations?

The point I am trying to put over is that the term "force" is a very undesirable term, and the principle of force is simply anti-Christian. I say again that we must remove the cause of war. The hon. member for Cartier said he believed that each nation should be permitted to lead its own life in its own form, be it democratic or some other. All right. If that is so, why all this talk about international organization? It does not "add up," to me. I do not want anyone to think I am against international collaboration and cooperation. I believe that you might have some sort of organization whereby the nations of the world can be represented around a conference table and have their problems and difficulties dealt with. But to say that the conference must make decisions and then have a police force to enforce those decisions means that we are to try to solve our internal problems by handing them over to somebody else. Personally I am against that.

One other thing which I should like to say is that nobody seems to know anything about what the peace issues are to be. I read some time ago a news item that Mr. Eden told the British House of Commons that they were ready with their peace proposals, but he did not say what they were. I do not know the reason. I do not know why they should be shrouded in mystery, but we will give Mr. Eden the benefit of the doubt; it may be that there is something which it would not be advisable for us to know.

In the first place, I do not know whether there will be a peace table. If there is, I do not know whether there will be one or two. I do not expect that any peace conference is capable of disentangling international problems and settling the peace overnight. It will take a long time and the peace programme itself will stretch over some considerable period.

Since I have been functioning as a philosopher, although maybe a pretty poor one, maybe I can now turn politician. There is a question in my mind as to who will be at the peace table, if there is one, to represent Canada. I hope I am not sounding a false note, but we have to look into the future. I say that no peace proposals should be made until they have been brought before parliament and the whole problem discussed, so that whoever represents Canada will reflect the democratic will. I have said that I do not know who will be there. If one may judge from recent elections there is no guarantee that the Liberal government will be returned to power if there is an election this fall—and I imagine there is going to be one. Our Liberal friends lost heavily in Saskatchewan and Quebec, and I do not believe that our Conservative friends have been as "progressive" as they thought they were going to be, while our C.C.F. friends lost heavily in Alberta and Quebec, so that it is unlikely that they will form the next government.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is definite.

Mr. HANSELL: So nobody knows who will.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, yes, we do.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend has a sort of a fifth or maybe a sixth sense, but what he needs rather than that fifth or sixth sense now is, yes, a little sense, a little common sense. We do not know who will form the next government.

Mr. HOMUTH: Speak for yourself.

Mr. DUPUIS: Anyway, it is not worth "six cents".

Mr. HANSELL: What I am saying is that I do not know who will represent Canada at the peace table.

Mr. DUPUIS: We know.

Mr. HANSELL: But I must say this if I am to express my own sentiments. I do not want to see either the Liberals, the Conservatives or the C.C.F. returned. But I would not like to think the present Prime Minister will not be one to go to that conference. I am not to be understood in saying that as having gone over to the Liberal ranks. I do not believe that the Prime Minister is going to that conference to propose the philosophy which I have outlined. My view of what he will do—and I cannot say that he is doing it unconsciously because he is too intelligent a man to do things unconsciously—is that he, too, may be a victim of a philosophy which is not too obvious in these days, that he may be the victim of influences causing him to advance a programme for a coming world socialist state with a world dictator. I hope that is not so, but I also hope, no matter what government is in power, that by a gracious as well as a common sense act which will be pleasing to the people of Canada, the present Prime Minister will be at least one of the delegation which will represent this country. But he should not go without obtaining the views of the people, and I do not believe those views can be ascertained by means of an election issue, because election issues become confused. This is an important matter. I suggest that whoever is the responsible Prime Minister should call in the leaders of every political party represented in this house and, if necessary, take days to thresh out the questions involved and ascertain the views of the people, so that he may go to the conference to bring about effective democracy in Canada and assure sovereign rights to each and every nation.

Having talked along political ideas for a moment, I am going to make this suggestion. I cannot make it to parliament. I cannot make it to the leaders of any party. All I could do would be to make it to the people of the country, and that is that the leader of every party be given an acclamation to this house in any forthcoming election. I do not know why my hon. friend the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) should show forth his very hearty and pleasing laugh; but this, to my mind, is no laughing matter. I believe that the brains of Canada do not all repose in any one political party. I think we all have something to contribute in these days. If it were a peace-time election it would not matter to me whether one Prime Minister was thrown out and another put in, but we are living at a time when the war is gradually approaching its end and sooner or later, when the minds of the people are turned toward peace, we shall need in parliament the very best calibre of political leadership. That is why I am suggesting this. I hope that the Prime Minister returns to this house after the next election. I hope that Mr. Bracken will return.

Mr. McLARTY: Come, you mean.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, I know he will not "return". Then, of course, there will not be this little controversy about absenteeism. While I have opposed my C.C.F. friends, especially in the Alberta election—

Mr. GRAYDON: You can afford to be generous to them now.

Mr. HANSELL: —I should like to see my hon. friend the leader of that party return.

Mr. GILLIS: They kind of mangled the Tories too.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is a word we do not know anything about.

Mr. HANSELL: Of course, the leader of the Social Credit party will be here anyway, so that I do not have to do much hoping so far as he is concerned.

I close my remarks with an appeal to the responsible person, whoever he may be. At the present time it is the Prime Minister. I appeal to him to consider the few remarks I have made to-night as between these two great philosophies, these two ways of life. Responsible people in this country will be forced sooner or later to take their stand on one programme or the other because there will not be other issues. That will be the only issue before the people: whether we are going on toward world statism and be one nation within that picture, or whether we are to fight for a world of free men, where men will be free, where they will be given the abundance which their common Creator has given them. There is only one issue and that is it, and we had better stop squabbling and get down to business, because sooner or later we shall be driven to it. That is my observation, and I say that the Prime Minister must put himself in the position where he is fighting for a world of free men.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the last two or three days I have refrained from speaking on a number of items in which I was keenly interested—

Mr. MacNICOL: You certainly deserve credit for that.

Mr. KNOWLES: —and I had no intention of speaking further on the item that is before the committee at the moment, until eight o'clock this evening. I shall not follow the remarks of the previous speaker, although he dealt with many matters of considerable interest, but I feel that the remarks of the member for Comox Alberni (Mr. Neill) cannot be allowed to pass without a few comments in reply, especially since there is now no chance of concluding the session's business to-night. Before I take my seat, I will direct a question or two to the Prime Minister which I feel quite certain he will be glad to answer. They will not be embarrassing questions, and I am convinced that his answers will be such as I would give myself. The reason for asking these questions is that we may have from the leader of the government of Canada a statement which will be an effective reply to the kind of speech we heard at eight o'clock this evening. My questions to the Prime Minister will be based on his own comments in the debate on this item in his speech of August 11, as recorded at page 6276 of Hansard, where he said:

> May I say to this committee that if anyone wishes a battle on the question of whether we are to have one part of this country singled out as non-Canadian as against what of others is said to be Canadian, no one would welcome that fight any more than I would.
>
> And anyone who raises the question of race to prejudice anyone of another race in this country is doing the greatest disservice that can be done to Canadian unity and to Canadian nationality.

The question I wish to ask the Prime Minister first is whether, when he makes a statement of that kind, he is thinking of all the races that comprise our Canadian citizenship. When he spoke on that particular occasion his reference was to the fact that some of us are of French racial origin, and some of English racial origin or others of that group. But we have also in Canada people of many racial origins from Europe, such as the Ukrainians, and we have a few people of Japanese racial origin, some of Chinese racial origin, and some East Indians, who come from a part of the British empire. We have also in this country the descendants of the full-blooded Indians who were here before any of us were born, or before any of our ancestors migrated to Canada. In other words, Canada is a nation of a great many races. On this question of racial understanding the Prime Minister's record is pretty clear. He has just had a few commendations from the hon. member who has taken his seat, and I will not hesitate to add to them and say that so far as I know there is only one flaw in his record on the question of racial tolerance and understanding. I do not hold that altogether against him personally, because I still doubt whether he knew in the first instance about the inclusion of clause 5 in its original form in bill No. 135. That is the one flaw I refer to, for I still do not feel that the position the Prime Minister took in connection with that matter was consistent with his own life-time record and with the Liberal position both with respect to the franchise and with respect to racial matters. Apart from that I say that the Prime Minister has taken the liberal position—liberal with a small "l"—in this matter down through the years. I was very glad to hear his interjections to-night in the midst of the speech made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni when he pointed to some of the absurdities that the hon. member was uttering at that time.

Speaking of the Liberal position, I wish to quote from a Liberal newspaper. The day after we had the debate on the consequential amendments to the senate amendments to bill No. 135, the Winnipeg Free Press ran what I considered was a particularly good editorial, and I trust that the committee will permit me to quote a few sentences from it. It dealt with the amendments that had been made to bill No. 135 under this heading: "Better, But Not Right." I shall not go into the details so far as its comments on that issue are concerned because for the time being at any rate, that issue is closed and I am not anxious to antagonize the Prime Minister because I want his agreement with the position I am seeking to lay down. After recounting what had happened, the Free Press said this:

> This seems like a small gain, but it is an important one. The whole country has had a sharp lesson in what can happen if racialists are allowed to have their own way, and it will be hoped the lesson has been thoroughly learned. Racial discrimination is something Canada must do without if it wants to continue and to improve the strength and character of its democracy.

Later on, after referring to the history of that bill and what happened and to the way in which its iniquitous clause was slipped through, the editorial says:

> This will not meet with universal approval, but, on balance, there may be a case—

—for what the government has proposed by way of an amendment. Then comes this conclusion:

> But, the matter having been thus sharply raised, we invite our readers to consider whether the historic discrimination invoked by British Columbia should be allowed to persist when the war is over. It is bad enough in itself, but the racialists who sponsored it and to-day strongly defend it have imprudently revealed their hand. They are prepared, as the record now clearly shows, to pursue certain groups of citizens beyond the limits of their own province and to open the door to the virtual destruction of the generally universal nature of the dominion franchise. They consider it quite proper that, if any province takes a dislike to any group inside its own borders, it can so legislate as to deprive the members of that group of the franchise no matter whether they live in the discriminating province or not.
>
> This fragmentation of Canadian citizenship would carry us a long step forward to the destruction of the unity of the state and should not be tolerated in any form. When the war is over a most suitable project for liberal-minded men and women everywhere would be to advocate and support the extension of the dominion franchise to every citizen of Canada regardless of race and regardless of any provincial disqualifications that exist.

The Winnipeg Free Press, which has taken a strong position in this matter, is published in the city from which the Winnipeg Grenadiers went to Hong Kong. Few cities in Canada have as many homes in which there is anxiety because their loved ones are in Japanese prison camps in Hong Kong. Few cities have as many homes where there is possibly as much bitterness toward the Japanese war lords because of what has happened to their loved ones. I represent a riding of that city. While the Free Press and I are usually at opposite poles, we agree in this instance and we take the position that we do because we feel and we know that even in the homes to which I have referred there are many who believe that in Canada we must rise above the racial discrimination, racial prejudice and racial hatred which have been displayed in this house at times by certain hon. members. Canada, of all countries, should be interested in broad understanding among racial groups. I have not the census figures before me, but I believe that there is no one racial group, so far as origin is concerned, which constitutes a majority of the people of this country. There are two or three groups which are very large, but we are a nation of many different backgrounds, and one might say that it is almost of necessity that we learn to get along well with each other and understand each other from one end of Canada to the other. I look upon this situation not just as a matter of compulsion but as a matter of opportunity. Much more important than racial origin or racial background is the basic fact of humanity. We have an opportunity presented to us by the very fact that there are so many different races in Canada to build a Canadian nationality which will be distinctively human and will have in it no element of racial discrimination, none of the kind of thing we are fighting in our war against Hitler and everything he stands for.

I say again I hope that the Prime Minister will amplify the statement he made the other day, making it clear, as the one who for the time being is the Prime Minister of Canada, that so far as he and his government are concerned he is prepared along with others of us to fight for a Canada in which there will be no drawing of any line as between various racial groups. There were some other points that I felt I should like to raise but perhaps I should let it go at that and express the hope that the Prime Minister will join with others of us in making it clear that whatever our feelings may be toward the Japanese war lords, so far as the citizens of Canada are concerned, whatever their racial origin, they are all Canadians and should be treated accordingly.

There is perhaps one other comment I should make before I sit down. Those who speak in this house against Canadians of Japanese origin talk now only about the Japanese, but before the war some of those individuals were attacking not only our Canadians of Japanese origin, but Canadians of Chinese origin and Canadians of East Indian origin. Both of those groups have also been disfranchised in one province of this country. Therefore, what is being said now about those of Japanese background because we are at war with them is only a sample of the kind of thing that is possible on a larger scale and the kind of thing we do not want in this country. That sort of thing if it gets going knows no limits. It must be stopped before it gets started. I know the Prime Minister's instincts and sentiments are with me and with this group one hundred per cent on this matter; but I feel that because of the kind of speech that was made to-night and because of the speeches that are sometimes made by some hon. members of the Liberal party the Prime Minister should make a clear and definite statement along the line of the speech made a short while ago by his own parliamentary assistant, and along the line of the remarks made a short while ago by the hon. member for Trinity. In other words, the Prime Minister has many behind him, even as he has many on all sides of the house, who are liberal-minded so far as this issue is concerned and who want Canada to be a country in which no racial lines shall be drawn.

Mr. GRAYDON: At this late stage of the discussion, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up a great deal of the time of the committee. Perhaps the Prime Minister desires to make some reply before eleven o'clock—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to get my estimates through; that is all.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then I will try to help the right hon. gentleman. I had intended during this debate to make some extended remarks with respect to our position in external affairs and particularly in regard to the commonwealth and empire, but perhaps to-night I can confine my remarks within a very narrow orbit because of the time at which this discussion arises.

I should like to say to the Prime Minister and the committee that the views of our national leader, which are the views of this party, have been placed on record by the Prime Minister on at least one or perhaps two occasions already, by reading the questions and answers that appeared in Maclean's magazine. Those views I desire to endorse. In addition, I should like to say that I believe it may be properly said that there has been a great deal of loose talk and of woolly thinking in regard to the position of Canada in the commonwealth and empire. I believe there have been perhaps too many technicalities attached to the verbiage and phraseology used from time to time by public men in relation to our commonwealth relationships. And may I say further that a great many bogeys have been trotted out; a good many straw-stacks have been used to make straw men for various people and newspapers to knock down, particularly with respect to the so-called policies of our party in this dominion. So far as I know there is no one in Canada, at least I have heard of no one, who seriously proposes that, no matter what may be our relationship to the empire and the commonwealth now or in the days to come, the autonomy of Canada should be in any way impaired or prejudiced or interfered with. Anyone who advances a theory or policy of that kind must be thinking in terms of yesterday rather than in terms of to-day or to-morrow.

One reason why I asked the Prime Minister the question I did with respect to Mr. Curtin's proposal relative to an empire secretariat was that in my opinion very few people in Canada had any real conception of what Mr. Curtin meant. If the average person in Canada had understood the proposed secretariat to mean some suggestion of rigidity with respect to the position of the empire, then I do not think anyone would have considered supporting that idea. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister indicate—I have not his words with me at the moment—that at least one of the possibilities in regard to the secretariat was that it might take the form of an empire or commonwealth reference library or research institution, where some of the details with respect to commonwealth affairs might be investigated and information made available in greater detail than is the case under the present system. But so far as the delegation to any commonwealth organization that might be set up of any of the sovereign powers of Canada or any other part of the commonwealth, I am quite sure that has never been entertained, certainly not as far as the policies of this party are concerned, because Canada is first of all an autonomous nation, and parliament must always have the final say with respect to what Canada shall do. In a word, I believe that deals with at least one of the matters raised by some people and newspapers in an effort to show that this party, or certain groups in Canada, have the idea that there should be some sort of commonwealth arrangement which would interfere with the autonomy of this nation. As I said before, that idea belongs to a past era and may well be forgotten.

I mentioned these questions in a brief general way during the debate on the speech from the throne. I was going to elaborate those remarks to-night, but because of the lateness of the hour I shall not do so. On January 31, 1944, at page 20 of Hansard, I said:

It is well that the views of all sides should be carefully weighed and considered. The views of the government would be particularly welcome, but it is not our intention to embarrass our own Prime Minister, or the representatives of other parts of the commonwealth, by tossing controversial issues into this debate when common sense indicates that every effort must be made to secure a united front in a united Canada in a greater and more powerful British commonwealth.

These observations followed closely a similar statement of my leader, John Bracken, on January 25 of this year, in which he expressed the hope that such matters would not become the subject of small political discussion. The wisdom of public men generally adopting such a policy in a period as grave and critical as this I believe has since been abundantly proven. Prior to the meeting of commonwealth prime ministers my leader gave the considered views of our party. With the indulgence of the committee I should like to place those views on record, and with that I shall rest my case instead of elaborating the matter further, as I had intended to do if the discussion had been brought on at a more convenient time. This is what Mr. Bracken said on that occasion:

I am proud that Canada is a member of the British family of nations. The courageous and noble leadership given by the British commonwealth to the world in this the most terrible of all crises has surely added to the pride we have always felt as sharers in its traditions and its goodly heritage.

In 1926 Canada, along with Great Britain and the other dominions, accepted the following as a just and worthy definition of the mutual relations, rights and responsibilities of members of this commonwealth—

This is the quotation:

They are autonomous communities within the British empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

Then he goes on to say:

These words mean, if they mean anything, that the governments of Britain and the dominions, functioning in full freedom from anything in the nature of control, are to have the close association of partnership for common interests and common purposes. Our principal common interest and common purpose is peace.

This country is properly proud of its independent sovereignty as expressed in the above definition, and that independent sovereignty we ought to exercise. Up to now we have failed in many respects to do so. Our colonial days are long past. Further, this country realizes that it is only vanity to parade the glories of independent sovereignty and to ignore those responsibilities that independent sovereignty entails. This country also recognizes with pride the partnership and the duties of partnership involved in "free association" for common purposes. It is not only our duty but our interest to be loyal to that free association.

I believe also, and I am sure Canada believes, in world organization for peace. Experience has proved that an effective world organization for peace is an objective very difficult to reach. I, however, am convinced we can reach the objective best, not by weakening or dividing the commonwealth, but by even closer cooperation with the other commonwealth nations. It would be a terrible responsibility—a responsibility which we could not take with dignity, with prudence or with honour—to choose a course which would be likely to lead to the impairment or weakening of that cooperation.

The line of conduct I have just outlined for this country is in full accord with our autonomous and sovereign rights—indeed, it is the intelligent evolution of those rights, the expression of our maturity as a nation.

I am in favour, therefore, of Canada acting as an autonomous power, to strengthen the ties which bind the members of the commonwealth together, and to this end I believe that a plan for continuous consultation in matters of common interest should be worked out by us all. By that I mean consultation not just for purposes of talk whether described as "exchange of views" or a verbal "collaboration" but definitely with a view to a meeting of minds on matters of practical policy. It has not been suggested, and it could never be considered, that there should be such rigidity to any plan as would subtract from our sovereign rights. It has been suggested only that we, with other dominions and Great Britain, should frankly set forth our ideas or proposals and should seek to agree, if we can, on common principles of policy and especially of foreign policy, directed to the great purpose of world peace. On the rare occasions when in other years we have so tried we have succeeded. Surely it must be manifest that the failure of members of this commonwealth in the recent past to do that very thing has contributed to the catastrophe of this desolating war. No system, or lack of system, guilty of such a failure can set itself up as the highest evidence of our capacity to serve ourselves and mankind.

The Prime Minister has said that Lord Halifax asked us to make a "commitment", to fall in line, in any event, with a common policy for the commonwealth in all matters of our external relations. Lord Halifax made no such request or even suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt? Repeatedly it has been said that I have made certain charges against Lord Halifax. My words are on Hansard as to what I did say about Lord Halifax. Things that have been attributed to me as having been said about what Lord Halifax said are not correct—and that is one of them.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps I might just complete my remarks, and I shall deal with that later.

Lord Halifax made no such request or even suggestion. Very definitely he recognized our completely autonomous position. He asked us to seek to agree with the other members of the commonwealth, and invited our full cooperation at the table of British nations in the determination of those features of commonwealth policy in which all of us are concerned.

I say Canada should not refuse to sit and act at that table. Canada should emerge from colonial habits and should not fear to take her responsibility as a full-grown nation and as a partner in this freely associated commonwealth. We have no reason to distrust our partners and we have now grown to a stature where surely we trust ourselves.

Our failure to function as a member of the British family will not promote the organization of another and better League of Nations; it is merely to lapse again into the trough of isolationism. Canada herself proved just shortly before this war that it is possible to be a full-paying member of a league and to be isolationist still. The folly of isolationism is the great lesson that we and others must learn from the tragedy of these times. Sorrowful evidence of the consequences of this folly is visible daily in the mounting casualty lists.

To these principles thus elaborated by our leader, this party adheres. As he has from time to time stated, the government and parliament of Canada has a primary concern in all commonwealth and all other international relations, as well as in its own domestic affairs; and it should keep the interest and welfare of our own people in the forefront of all deliberations and decisions and, having this firmly in mind, put forth vigorous efforts to increase our international trade and promote good will and permanent peace among all nations.

One of the things which has engrossed some of the newspapers in our land, and has formed part of our debate in the house, has been the famous speech of Lord Halifax. The difficulty I see with respect to the matter is one which I think is of importance to a great many people, and that is that it is so difficult to see the difference betwen the position which the Prime Minister has taken with respect to commonwealth relations and that set down by Lord Halifax himself. I have not tried to find differences. I tried to see where these two statesmen dealing with these matters found agreement, rather than division, and I found agreement.

But it does seem to me that the statement in the British House of Commons by Prime Minister Churchill and by Right Hon. Anthony Eden—and the Prime Minister will correct me if I am wrong—must, of course, be a reflection and an echo of those who took part in the empire meeting of prime ministers. Having that in mind, and taking that for granted, namely, that it is a true reflection, and a fair statement in respect of the decisions arrived at in the meeting of commonwealth prime ministers, may I just give one paragraph dealing with this matter, and put it on record at the present time.

Opening the debate on foreign affairs in the United Kingdom parliament on May 24 last, Mr. Churchill said of the London conference:

> There was revealed a core of agreement which will enable the British empire and commonwealth to meet in discussion with other organizations in the world in a firmly knit array. We have advanced from vague generalities to more precise points and agreements and we are in position to carry on discussions with other countries within limits which we have imposed upon ourselves by this debate upon foreign affairs.
>
> We, therefore, embark upon the present debate with the backing and hearty good will from all representatives of the commonwealth and empire.

Then on Thursday, May 25, in closing the debate, the Right Hon. Anthony Eden prefaced his statement on post-war policies with these words:

> When the victory is won the first task will be close collaboration between the British commonwealth—

And I wish to stress this, because it is an important part in his statement:

> —collaboration between the British commonwealth, the United States, the Soviet Union and China—but in the main, so far as Europe is concerned, between the first three—to ensure that Germany cannot start this business again. I want to speak for a moment about cooperation between the three in particular—ourselves, the United States and the Soviet Union.

I had intended to go farther in connection with that, but I think it provides abundant evidence from the language employed in the debate by both of these statesmen that the deliberate use of the expression "British commonwealth" indicated that a full degree of consent and agreement on the course which they charted had been given and reached by all at the commonwealth meeting.

As I said before, I wish to close this debate without extending it too far. But I should like to say this, that there has been much loose talk about one voice, a single voice, a bloc, and so on. I have watched carefully in the press from time to time and have seen in some instances where it is even magnified to the position where there is an assumption that when such words are used, autonomy in Canada is in some way interfered with.

So far as this party is concerned, the statement of our position is, I think, definite, in the questions and answers which the Prime Minister placed himself upon the record, in connection with this debate, and as answered by John Bracken himself. I think that makes it abundantly clear with respect to the position which our party takes in connection with matters of this kind.

Before I conclude my remarks to-night I should like to make—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. GRAYDON: I would rather not. If my hon. friend does not mind I should like to go on with my discussion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am interested in what the hon. member is discussing.

Mr. GRAYDON: I seldom refuse to answer a question, but it is now ten minutes to eleven, and I wish to deal with the whole matter to-night, and perhaps might be able to close the debate.

On January 31, 1944, the Prime Minister took issue with the statement that had been made by Mr. Bracken to the effect that the Prime Minister had said that Lord Halifax had asked us to make a commitment, to fall in line in any event with a common policy for the commonwealth in all matters of our external relations. The Prime Minister's words are to be found on page 42 of Hansard of this year, when he said:

> What would seem now to be suggested is that the prime Canadian commitment should be to pursue in all matters of external relations—"in foreign policy, defence, economic affairs, colonial questions and communications," to cite the words of Lord Halifax—a common policy to be framed and executed by all the governments of the commonwealth. I maintain that apart from all questions as to how that common policy is to be reached, or enforced, such a conception runs counter to the establishment of effective world security, and therefore is opposed to the true interests of the commonwealth itself.

I wanted to put that on the record. That statement which the Prime Minister made there, and which I answered when he raised it in February or March of this year, is on all fours, if I may say so, with the statement which Mr. Bracken actually said he made in connection with the same matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I draw my hon. friend's attention to the words used, and they were carefully chosen, "What would seem now to be suggested." That does not say that Lord Halifax asked us to make any commitment. What my hon. friend said that Mr. Bracken in particular had said was that I had said that Lord Halifax wanted us to make a commitment in advance. I said exactly what my hon. friend has read.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no desire to enter into a controversy at the moment in connection with this. I have read this over very carefully, and my interpretation is that the effect of both statements is to represent a parallel sentiment and a parallel meaning.

In closing, I want simply to say, to the committee and to the Prime Minister that it is perhaps unfortunate that these matters should come on at the end of a very lengthy, busy and pressing session. I am attributing no special responsibility with respect to that to any one, but if I had an opportunity—and if we are to go on next week perhaps I shall have—I should like to go farther into some of these matters. But I wish to deal with this matter and to indicate to the committee the position which was actually reached and which was reflected by the speeches made by Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden in the British House of Commons. I think those are fair statements of the position which the commonwealth prime ministers took at their meeting some time ago. That is something which the Prime Minister perhaps may want to deal with, and in order that he may have that opportunity perhaps I may be pardoned if I end my discussion at this moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have made my statement repeatedly in this house as to my position and as to the position taken at the conference of prime ministers. I made my position very clear in the address I made before both houses in the British parliament, and all that I have said I stand by. As to what the conference of prime ministers agreed upon, that was clearly set forth in a declaration made at the conclusion of the meetings. That declaration was framed with the greatest care and agreed to by all the prime ministers. Anything that is in that declaration reflects exactly what was arrived at by way of conclusions at that conference. Anything that goes beyond that declaration is not made with the authority of the prime ministers as a whole.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the Prime Minister in agreement with the statement made in the British House of Commons by the Right Hon. Anthony Eden?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Many people place different interpretations upon the same statement. I am not here to interpret Mr. Eden's words. Hon. gentlemen may interpret them as they wish. As I say, my position was made perfectly clear and I stand by the position as I have stated it from time to time.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a few words to say in connection with this situation and so on. A lot of people think about this foreign situation in a different way. They think about the British empire and so on in different ways. I should like to quote from a Swiss paper in connection with Great Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wonder if my hon. friend would allow me to interrupt him just a moment. I do not often ask the indulgence of the house, but I have some very heavy duties to perform and my deputy has on his shoulders duties just as heavy. We have been here for a very considerable time, and I wonder if the committee perhaps would not agree to continue sitting until the estimates of the Department of External Affairs are disposed of? I have no desire to curtail discussion, but I must tell the committee that I have some very important matters to give attention to and I have not been able to give them any attention for some time past. I would appreciate any helpful cooperation in getting through these times unless there is some reason why they should not be passed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not in favour of having this item carried at this time and I am going to tell the committee exactly why. I believe more damage has been done to public morale by the disgraceful squabbles that have occurred between the Liberal and Conservative ' parties about relationships between Canada and the empire than by any other matter that has come before Canada for discussion in the elections. I do not believe that the leaders of these two parties should discuss this matter until they are either one hundred per cent in agreement or one hundred per cent in disagreement. Then the people will know exactly where each one stands. Then there will not be any fighting in the elections between these two parties on this issue.

I have listened with the greatest attention to the leader of the opposition and I have listened to the expressions of the Prime Minister. If there is any essential difference between the stand taken by the Prime Minister and by Mr. Bracken, the leader of the Conservative party, I must confess that I fail utterly to see it. If there is no difference, then why should not these two leaders say so on the floor of this house? If that were done, there might not be any disagreement over this matter in the election campaign.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What about Alberta?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Never mind about Alberta.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The leaders are in Alberta.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is all right; I am not talking about them. I feel strongly about this matter of imperial relations. From the time I was a boy, from the time I first took any interest in politics, I have noticed this different approach to imperial relations. I have noticed that when you really studied what had been said by each side it was exactly the same thing. For example, Mr. Borden made a pronouncement about imperial relations in words and expressions that were identical to the words used by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I could not see any difference between the two. Yet by the time they got out to the constituency where I was and I went to the meetings and listened to the representatives of the two parties, you would have thought the one stood for a united Britain and the other wanted to tear the British empire all apart. There is no sense in that sort of thing and we cannot hope to have a united Canada with that sort of thing.

It must be borne in mind that there are at least two prominent races in Canada. There is the Anglo-Saxon race and the French-Canadian race, and the Ukrainians have increased to the extent of about 600,000. How are we to get these people to understand what we stand for if we quarrel about things like this? If these two leaders are prepared to make a statement that there is no difference and then fight the election on something about which there is a difference between the two parties, if there is such a thing as a difference between them, I will feel that something has been done even this late in the day. So that I am not in favour of passing this item, even though I sympathize, I must say, from the depths of my being with the Prime Minister in the position he is in. I do not believe that there has come before the house this year a problem of anything like the significance and importance which is attached to this particular problem at this moment, when you consider Canadian unity and the welfare of the British empire and harmonious relations between the empire and the rest of the world.

I think I have spoken with a little heat, but I mean every word I have said. I should like to see unity. If there is a difference between Liberals, Conservatives and C.C.F., we want to know what it is, and if there is a difference between them and what the Social Credit party stands for, we want to know what that is. We need to be very definite in this matter. If there is any one subject we ought not to quarrel about in election time, it is this particular matter of the relationship between Canada and the other members of the British empire and commonwealth.

Mr. GILLIS: I appreciate the Prime Minister's desire to get his estimates through to-night—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say at once that I am not going to have it said that I have in any way caused any shortage of discussion in this house. I am quite prepared to stay here all next week if the house wishes to keep me here, but I want it understood that I am thinking about the war and not about an election.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, August 14, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ADDISON INDUSTRIES LIMITED—"WALKIE TALKIE" RADIO DEVICE

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. When was the audit of Addison Industries Limited, covering the first 776 sets of Walkie Talkie, made (as referred to in return brought down on August 5, 1944)?

2. What are the particulars of the administrative expenses amounting to $34,144, as referred to in the said return?

3. What were the amounts of expenses allowed in the said sum for (a) office salaries, including persons to whom paid and amount paid to each, (b) supplies; (c) legal fees, and to whom paid; (d) audit fees, and to whom paid; (e) travelling expenses, giving particulars?

4. What is the amount of the monthly management fee paid, credited or allowed to the said company, from the beginning of the contract to the 30th of June, 1944?

5. Is the said management fee included in or exclusive of the profits allowed to the said company?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What is value of parts going into the production and/or assembly by Addison Industries Limited per unit of each type of Walkie Talkie device?

2. How many employees has the said company?

3. What is the average rate of pay for each employee per day?

4. Are any royalties paid in respect of the said device?

5. Has the said company received any fee for engineering? If so, how much and when?

6. What facilities for development engineering did the said company have when given the first contract?

7. What is the value of all equipment and parts that have been subcontracted to, or sold by, A. Cross and Company Limited, Toronto, to Addison Industries Limited, for use in the assembly or production of Walkie Talkie, in each of the years 1942, 1943 and 1944?

8. What are the names and addresses of the directors of the said A. Cross and Company Limited, Toronto?

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the fact that these two questions have been passed as orders for returns mean that they are apt to be lost sight of until next session, or is it possible to have the returns tabled before we conclude?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid it will hardly be possible to have them tabled before the session is over. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has asked five questions on this subject. We have answered two or three as quickly as we could, and I am informed that with reference to a part of the first of the two passed as orders for returns to-day we have to send an officer to Toronto to obtain the information, while, with reference to the second, the information required is voluminous and we shall need some time to get the answer.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not know whether this is possible, but perhaps the information, when the department does obtain it, might be relayed to the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. I shall be glad to see that that is done.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Secretary of State if he has up-to-date a list of questions which have been passed as orders for returns and the returns to which have not yet been tabled? He did give a list the last week, but seeing that we are near the close of the session I was wondering whether there were many outstanding.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Does my hon. friend wish the number or the actual items outstanding?

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think I am especially interested in publication of the items themselves, but if my hon. friend, some time before the session closes, could give me a list of those which have not been tabled it would be helpful.

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be glad to do that. There may be some coming in later in the day and if they do, I might ask the consent of the house, to revert to motions in order to table them. The number of returns as of this morning is: 417 ordered, 398 tabled, 19 remaining untabled.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MONTREAL TRAMWAYS STRIKE—OPERATIONS RESUMED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I am glad to inform the house that street car service has been resumed in the city of Montreal. Information to that effect was given to me early this morning by telephone by the controllers appointed to take charge of the tramways system on behalf of the government. From the leaders of both parties in the dispute, Mr. R. N. Watt, president of the Montreal Tramways Company, and Mr. A. R. Mosher, president of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers, I have received assurances of full cooperation with the government in the step that has been taken.

KAMSACK CYCLONE DAMAGE

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. A. McNIVEN (Regina City): The Minister of Finance may have noticed in the press that last Wednesday evening the town of Kamsack in Saskatchewan was visited by a disastrous cyclone which demolished 250 homes and destroyed a large part of the business section of the town, with a result in monetary loss of between $1,000,000 and $1,500,000. First, would the Minister of Finance be good enough to arrange with the wartime prices and trade board for the immediate release of the necessary building material for reconstruction of the homes and business places in that town? Second, would the minister be willing to arrange for the application at once of the new housing act to the town of Kamsack so that funds may be available for reconstruction of that town? Third, would the minister take under consideration such further help as can be given to that town in the affliction which has fallen upon it?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I shall see that immediate consideration is given to the hon. gentleman's suggestion. That is about all the assurance I can give at the moment. There is always a question, as the hon. gentleman knows, as to the extent of the dominion's responsibility in these matters, and careful consideration will have to be given to that phase of the situation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Since the town is in my constituency, I have been in contact with the officials there and I understand that assistance is being given through provincial headquarters. Has any request come to the minister in regard to this matter?

Mr. ILSLEY: Through the hon. member for Regina City only.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN-YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 91, respecting banks and banking.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister whether the government is satisfied to accept the senate amendments? I know they are not very consequential; they are largely a question of change of date, if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr. ILSLEY: The senate amendments to the Bank Act are acceptable to the government. I believe there is a change of date in the schedule or form of notice which clearly should have been made. It was just overlooked. The other amendment is of little more importance, but it is quite acceptable. It is an amendment to section 92, defining a little more appropriately the court which will have jurisdiction over the claims of depositors. The wording in the section as passed by the House of Commons would have led to some difficulty, and by the consent of everyone concerned the definition has been changed.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS

EXTENSION OF CHARTERS TO SEPTEMBER 1, 1944—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 131, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

He said: In this case there is an amendment to a section in the Quebec Savings Banks Act which corresponds to section 92 of the Bank Act. There is the same alteration of wording in respect of jurisdiction of the courts as is found there, and it is quite acceptable. The other amendment is a more substantial one; but it is also acceptable. The amendment to which I have referred extends the list of classes of securities upon which the Quebec Savings Banks may lend up to 100 per cent rather than 120 per cent of the value of the securities. While we proposed 120 per cent on some securities and 100 per cent on others, we are quite agreeable to have the list extended as proposed by the senate to two or three other classes of securities.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

36. Departmental administration, $410,189.

Mr. STIRLING: I want to make an observation or two with regard to the long awaited statement of the Prime Minister that was contained in the Prime Minister's speech of August 4 dealing with the government's policy about the Japanese. At this late date in the session I am not going to expand what I have to say into a speech, but rather to endeavour to put on the record in a few words the reaction that I have to the statement.

I appreciate the fact that the government has definitely stated that it recognizes the Japanese question to be a national one. Whatever individual members of the ministry may have had in mind in the past with regard to it, there is no question that a considerable section of the Canadian public has looked upon this in the past as a provincial matter, as something with which British Columbia should deal. I therefore appreciate the fact that from now on it must be recognized that the dominion government looks upon it as a dominion question. I appreciate also the statement that in the Prime Minister's opinion the view of many in British Columbia that the Japanese should not be allowed to concentrate in that province was a reasonable one. The government's policy has been to endeavour to distribute the Japanese in the other eight provinces of Canada. In that regard I ask him not to forget that at the present time there are sixteen or seventeen thousand of those Japanese within British Columbia and that the smaller number has been distributed in other parts of Canada. Therefore whatever solution is arrived at, if we agree that it is not reasonable that a great majority of these people should still live in British Columbia, something will have to be done with the sixteen or seventeen thousand.

I would also remind the Prime Minister that the figures quoted—on which I cannot be accurate because I do not know exactly how many have been sent out—do not cover the Japanese resident in various parts of southern British Columbia who did not come under the movement of Japanese from the protected area.

I appreciate also the statement that in future there should be no further immigration of Japanese to this country. It stands to reason that if this problem is to receive satisfactory settlement that must be the case. The operative part of this policy is that a quasi-judicial commission is to endeavour to investigate the loyalty of the Japanese now in Canada, and that the policy is to be continued and extended of placing these Japanese in different parts of Canada. What a task the government proposes to give to a quasi-judicial commission to ascertain the loyalty of the Japanese! A great deal will depend on the personnel chosen for that commission. I cannot envy them their task. It would seem to me a most difficult thing to endeavour to ascertain the loyalty of the Japanese. In this morning's paper we have the considered opinion of President Roosevelt with regard to the Japanese as a nation and as a people. We are about to endeavour to ascertain the loyalty of certain thousands of Japanese. It is possible that some of them may help us.

Attention has been already drawn to the Canadian-born Japanese Yamamoto, who was convicted for refusing to obey an order of the selective service officer and who was fined with the alternative of a prison sentence. He took the prison sentence. In the course of the court's proceedings we were told that Yamamoto had written to the Minister of Labour stating that for him to obey such an order would be harmful to Japan, that his sympathies belonged to that country and that furthermore he would do nothing to harm her or assist Canada. If I could believe that the majority of the Japanese would declare themin such fashion I would not look with such doubt on the success of the endeavour of a commission to decide on the loyalty of the Japanese. I trust that those appointed to the commission will not have the frame of mind which was found in some who in the past have been chosen as advisers by the dominion government, that type of thinking which appeared to result in the view that the opinion of British Columbians on the Japanese question was the result of hysteria, and that they should be smacked and ignored. I trust we have progressed beyond that stage and that the commission to be appointed will be able to work on the information furnished by the mounted police and whatever they may be able to adduce from their interviews with the Japanese.

In 1937 a delegation of Japanese appeared before a committee of this house apropos of the Dominion Elections Act or the Dominion Franchise Act, The attention of one of them —and he, if you please, was a professor of English at Wisconsin university—was directed to this question of dual loyalty, the registration of children born in Canada, who are considered by a very great number of people to be Canadian citizens with no loyalty except to Canada. It was definitely ascertained that in his opinion the idea of registering children born in Canada with the Japanese authorities was not only desirable but convenient. I cannot look upon a child born in any part of Canada, whose birth is registered in the country of his paternal origin, as having loyalty only to Canada. I wonder what the commission would have said of the Japanese envoy who in Washington, in December, 1941, was smiling and hissing at the secretary of state. I wonder if the commission to be set up would have been perfectly sure of his sincerity. I wonder what that commission would say with regard to that man's father and his ancestors, all of whom were steeped in the religion of Japan which has induced that people to believe themselves sent by some god to this earth in order to dominate at least the western part of the world. How is it possible to suppose that people of that nationality can come to another country, Canada, and eschew all those doctrines which they have learned from the cradle? How is it possible to believe that these people can give wholehearted loyalty to this country? I find it very hard to place reliance upon the results of the work of a quasi-judicial commission. It should not be forgotten that these Japanese children who have now grown up and become parents have never entirely divested themselves of their loyalty to their ancestors; and as long as that is the case it seems to me impossible to believe that their loyalty to Canada now is something that can be ascertained by a quasi-judicial commission.

The remainder of the operative part of the policy is that the dissemination of these people throughout the other eight provinces is to be carried forward, and they are to be largely removed from British Columbia. The difficulty there, of course, and it was touched upon by the Prime Minister, is that when all these war restrictions are removed; when we return to a period when the inhabitants of Canada will be able to move about at will, what can be done to prevent these seeded settlers from finding their way back to British Columbia, which province they have favoured hitherto? The climate of British Columbia is always attractive, and they have made their opportunities in that province. This is a country of seasonal occupation, and unquestionably their desire will be to return west of the mountains. Therefore it seems to me improbable that the policy pronounced by the government for dealing with the Japanese question can possibly succeed.

[Mr. Stirling.]

At the peace conference, as the Prime Minister has agreed, it will be possible to make some arrangement with regard to the Japanese in Canada. I am glad he acknowledged also the difficulties in regard to the problem of assimilation. In my opinion these people are not assimilable. Many years ago I saw something of the results of mixed marriages in the near east, and we have all read a great deal with regard to the Eurasian question in India and the countries nearby, in the islands of the Atlantic and the islands of the Pacific, not to be more specific than that. The horrors of the Eurasion question are so great that I would be ready to do well nigh anything to prevent that question getting a start in Canada. These mixed marriages are frowned upon and tabooed by both nations, but that does not prevent them from taking place, or from children being born to them. As a result we see half-breed children being born in Canada who will find little opportunity to work out their lives in this country on an equality with our children. Therefore in my opinion we must do every thing we can to dispose of this Japanese question at the peace conference in a way that will be satisfactory to Canada.

Item agreed to.

Canada's Contribution to Maintenance of External Organizations—

44. Expenses of the League of Nations for 1944, including secretariat, international labour organization and permanent court of international justice, $214,600.

Mr. GRAYDON: We are now entering a period which apparently is regarded by the united nations, and particularly the four great powers, as a time when the creation of a new peace organization is imminent and necessary. That this is contemplated is evidenced by the fact that in Washington during this month there will be a preliminary meeting of the four great powers. In the course of a debate on foreign affairs in the British House of Commons on May 25 the Foreign Secretary had this to say with respect to the proposed peace organization:

I would like to leave with the committee just a few principles on which we suggest this future organization should be based. They are these: First, that the world organization must be designed, in the first instance, to prevent a recurrence of aggression by Germany and Japan and must be fully equipped with forces to meet the purpose.

In other words the organization was to have the strength and power for the purposes for which it was to be established. He continues:

Secondly, that to ensure this there must be close political and military cooperation between the United States, the Soviet Union, the Commonwealth and China—

An hon. Member: And France.

Mr. Eden: —and other powers; thirdly, that the responsibility in any future world organization must be related to power, and consequently the world organization should be constructed, on and around the four great powers I have mentioned, and all other peace-loving states should come in and play their part in the structure; fourthly, that the world organization should be flexible and not rigid, that is to say, that it should grow by practice and not try straight away to work to a fixed and rigid code or rule; and fifthly, that all the powers, great and small, included in the world organization, should strive for economic as well as for political collaboration.

On the basis of these quotations I wish to ask two questions of the Prime Minister: Does this vote No. 44, involving a sum of $214,600 for expenses of the League of Nations, mean we are going to make further contributions to the league? Will the League of Nations be disbanded, allowing this new organization to take its place, or will that new organization in some way work in conjunction with the league? I should like to know what the situation is, because we are here asked to contribute a large sum of money to the expenses of the League of Nations. At the same time I have no doubt in connection with the new organization there will be heavy financial and military obligations. And if my supposition is correct, the new organization for peace as envisaged by the Foreign Secretary will be on a basis entirely different from that of the League of Nations. It is my understanding that it would be built up, not from a great assembly of nations coming together in a time of peace, but rather in a manner which has now been planned, namely that of the four great powers getting together to form a core, to operate as a nucleus for peace, and then as time goes on other nations being permitted to come in as circumstances permit. As I see it, this procedure would mean one of two things. Either the League of Nations will have to be disbanded and this new organization take its place, or the two will have to be fitted together in some manner. It is my understanding that for the time being the league is simply carrying on until the new organization takes its place. There could hardly be room for both. I ask this question because there are many people in Canada who are making the inquiry.

I did not wish to extend the discussion on Saturday evening to any undue length, because I was desirous of giving to the government such measure of cooperation as I could in connection with the length of the session, but I believe I might be permitted now to repeat a question I asked some weeks ago, as to whether the representatives of the United Kingdom would also be in a position to represent the views of the British commonwealth, as well as those of the United Kingdom, at that conference of the four great powers. On the earlier occasion I understood the Prime Minister to say that the British commonwealth as such was not being represented, but that the representation was of the United Kingdom alone.

This brings me to a point discussed in Mr. Eden's statement. In every statement the Foreign Secretary has made concerning a new world organization he has been exceedingly careful, I think, never to use the words "Great Britain" or "the United Kingdom" in connection therewith. Coming on the heels of the statement of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, who spoke about the empire going forward in a firmly knit array, and that the prime ministers of the various parts of the commonwealth had reached what he called a core of agreement at the meeting, it was a normal procedure for the Foreign Secretary then to use words indicating that the four great powers were in cooperation to ensure that there must be close political and military cooperation between the United States, the Soviet union, the British commonwealth and China. I listened carefully to the Prime Minister's statement made a few days ago, when he referred to the fact that there was agreement and consent, and that there was no difference in the views of the various parts of the commonwealth on matters related to the setting up of a peace organization. At that time the Prime Minister did not indicate however whether the British representatives at the four-nation conference would go there with authority to express the views of the various nations in the commonwealth, and to speak on their behalf in the preliminary discussion.

It may be that when he used the word "British commonwealth" the Foreign Secretary had in mind the fact that the United Kingdom representative would go there, knowing well the views of commonwealth prime ministers, and would act accordingly. I think it is rather important because the whole problem of how Canada shall fit into the new peace structure is involved. It seems to me that Canada has two ways of going into the peace organization. One is through the British commonwealth, as mentioned by the British foreign secretary, whereby we would be one of the great powers, and the other is to go in as one of the smaller nations.

I think the matter must be cleared up. Perhaps there is nothing serious with respect to it, but when the Prime Minister answers me he might indicate just how Canada will eventually come in and what her part will be in the new organization. I am sorry to have asked so many questions at the one time but perhaps the Prime Minister has made a note of them. I will appreciate anything he can say at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all with regard to the position of the League of Nations and the new world organization that is to be created, obviously none of us knows how long the present war is going to last and we do not know how long after the war has concluded it will be before an international organization is set up for the purpose of maintaining peace throughout the world. Until the new organization assumes definite shape it may, I think, be regarded as without question that the League of Nations will continue to function, albeit to a very limited extent. There is no intention that I have learned of in the mind of any one which contemplates the coexistence of two great world organizations; one world organization undoubtedly is all that is expected, but just when the new organization will replace the other I cannot say.

Matters that are being considered at the present time in relation to the world organization do take into consideration the fact that already there is in the League of Nations a model on a certain scale and to a limited degree on which the new organization will be based and possibly in many particulars there will be a strong resemblance between the two. But until the world organization is actually in existence and approved by parliaments that will have to contribute towards its existence, the League of Nations will continue to operate as a world organization.

As to the other question asked by my hon. friend, I have made it clear that the conference which will be held shortly at Washington is a conference on the official level, that is to say, it will be a conference between officials of the four great powers. It is being carried out in accordance with what was set forth in the declaration of Moscow where only the four powers are mentioned, the United Kingdom, the United States, China, and Russia. So far as the pending conference is concerned the British commonwealth as such will not be represented. It is not a conference between ministers but, as I have indicated, between officials for the purpose of working out a plan of organization.

While it is true that the British representatives will be representatives of Great Britain only, I think I have made it clear that they will have in their minds the point of view of the nations of the commonwealth with respect to the questions that will be discussed there. Fortunately these matters were considered fully at the meeting between the prime ministers in London, and there was general agreement with respect to them between the representatives of the nations of the commonwealth, that is to say, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, with regard to broad essentials of the world organization that is to be brought into being. While it is true that the officials who will meet this month in Washington to discuss the world organization will be representatives only of the United Kingdom, it can be said that they are fully aware of the views of the nations of the commonwealth. I do not know whether there is any more my hon. friend wishes me to say.

Mr. GRAYDON: I fancy the nature of the conference between the officials of the four great powers will be such as not to permit the presence of observers from other parts of the world?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct.

Mr. HANSELL: Since the leader of the opposition has raised the question of the League of Nations perhaps being superseded by another organization I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it is his intention to come to parliament with any commitments that might have to be made to that new organization. I feel keenly about this. Our conception of democracy is that parliament is supreme, but somehow the mechanics of parliament are such that it seems to me that the government is supreme. I in my small way am going to insist that all commitments made by Canada with regard to her place in the post-war world shall be brought first to parliament.

These matters are very serious. It is not just a case of voting a quarter of a million dollars for the League of Nations. That is small stuff as compared to the ramifications and implications involved in Canada's place in the post-war world. Personally I do not think that the Prime Minister or whoever it is that represents Canada at any international conference—perhaps one man with a few aides—should be able to commit the entire nation to anything. We have nine provinces, each one of which is a supreme state within its own rights. I can see difficulty if the government makes any commitments without first laying them before parliament and allowing them to be discussed and our views to be presented. I said the other day that I thought that the leader of every political party in this country should be brought into discussion with the Prime Minister. I would go further and say that I think the premiers of all the provinces should be brought in too. Surely we are not going to commit twelve million loyal Canadians to a policy about which they know very little but which in the end, perhaps generations hence, may wreck our nation as a nation. I just wanted to ask the Prime Minister that one question which I think he is prepared to answer. I hope that he will make it clear that commitments will be made only after parliament at least has had full opportunity to look into the whole matter and have the fullest possible discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that so far as I may have to do with any of these matters the principle of responsible government on which the whole practice of government in Canada is based will not be violated in any particular. That, I think, answers my hon. friend's question. The principle of responsible government takes cognizance of the fact that parliament, being the body which votes the money which it is necessary to have to carry out any proposal, should have the fullest opportunity of considering and discussing all aspects of the matter which may be in issue and give the authority which is necessary before any final action can be taken.

Item agreed to.

473. Representation abroad—including salaries of high commissioners, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments—further amount required, $98,500.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the Prime Minister indicate the changes that have been made during the past year in our representation abroad? From time to time there are elevations in our diplomatic service in other countries, with ministers being raised to the status of ambassadors, and so on. I think the Prime Minister indicated on one occasion that when one nation desires to raise the status of its representative abroad, the other nation reciprocated, but I should like to know what is the underlying principle in these changes. When, for instance, is a nation entitled to an ambassador, and when not? The question is perhaps an elementary one, but perhaps the Prime Minister will be good enough to indicate just what the situation is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In a general way may I say this, that in the beginning of foreign missions or representation abroad concern was primarily for ambassadors. The representative of the sovereign or head of the state in a foreign country was an ambassador. There grew up the custom of having as well ministers to less important countries and on less important missions. As time has gone on, the distinction between the functions of an ambassador and of a minister has practically ceased to exist. An ambassador had certain special rights in the matter of direct approach to the head of the state to which he was accredited, more, I imagine, of a ceremonial nature than anything else, but as I have said the necessity of maintaining the distinction between ambassador and minister has been lessening as the years have gone by. So far as the United States is concerned, which next to the United Kingdom receives perhaps the largest number of representatives from different countries, that country for some little time past has completely done away with that distinction by appointing to other countries on this continent ambassadors only, and it has readily accorded to the representatives of other countries in the United States the status of ambassador rather than that of minister. The United Kingdom in its representation at Washington has not only an ambassador as its chief representative but, particularly during the period of this war, has added to its diplomatic representation several ministers. There are I believe five or six ministers at Washington attached to the United Kingdom embassy in addition to the ambassador. That has made it apparent that the status of ambassador is somewhat higher than that of minister and that the functions of a minister have come to be slightly different from what they were when a country was represented only by a minister or by an ambassador.

We have felt that Canada certainly should not be the only country on this continent whose sovereign is represented at Washington by a minister when the heads of all the other countries on this continent are represented by ambassadors. That was one of the reasons why the change was made at the time it was made, changing the status of our representative at Washington from that of minister to that of ambassador and the receiving of an ambassador from that country here. Of course the main reason was that we believed that the position of Canada as a nation holding a very high place among the nations of the world was being misunderstood by other nations in that we were represented only by a minister at the great capitals while other countries of lesser power and influence and standing in the world were represented by ambassadors.

In making appointments or in elevating the status of minister to that of ambassador the government proceeded by raising first the status of our representatives in certain nations which were our allies in the present war and were fighting with us, the United States being first, followed by Russia, China, and in South America, Brazil. The next group were from those other countries of the united nations which are immediately associated with us in the war. At the present time, as hon. members know, there are several enemy occupied countries which have their governments in London. Our representation to these allied governments is at present a single mission. Up to the present time, the character of the representation has not been altered, except in the case of Belgium. In the case of Belgium the minister, Baron Silvercruys, who represented that country from the beginning, was, as hon. members are aware, the dean of the diplomatic corps in Ottawa. He has been in the capital continuously, and it was felt that it would be a mark of recognition which we would like to give both to his country and to himself at this time to welcome him here as an ambassador.

What I have said will help to illustrate the necessity for the supplementary estimate we are asking for. It is just possible that the war may be over before the fiscal year is out, in which event we shall seek again to have diplomatic representation in some of the countries at present wholly, or partly, occupied by the enemy. Instead of having in London one representative from Canada to these various countries as a group, we shall be appointing representatives again to the countries themselves—to France, Belgium, the Netherlands and to some other countries in Europe in which up to the present time we have not had any representatives, but which countries have representatives in Canada at the present time.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. GRAYDON: Does our high commissioner in London deal directly with any of these governments in exile? Have not we other representation so far as they are concerned?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As a matter of fact, our high commissioner in London has nothing to do with the governments in exile. General George P. Vanier was the minister accredited to these countries, but since he was appointed to Algiers our representative in London has been a chargé d'affaires. Representation as between countries by legations or embassies is entirely in the diplomatic circle. The functions of high commissioners are confined within the circle of the nations of the British commonwealth. We shall require an extra amount to repoen or to open, as the case may be, other legations or embassies if the opportunity should come before the end of the fiscal year, and it is for that purpose that this amount is required.

Mr. GRAYDON: What are the salaries and allowances, and what financial provisions generally are made, for an ambassador or a minister? I have no special object in asking the question. I was simply wondering whether it was on the same basis as cabinet ministers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With reference to our representation abroad, I did when speaking a little earlier in the debate mention the appointment that had been made and my hon. friend will find the answer to his question in that regard at page 5917 of Hansard of August 4.

Mr. GRAYDON: I may have been out of the chamber at that moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The salary that is given a minister abroad is $10,000 with appropriate representation allowances to cover cost of residence, car and matters of that kind, varying somewhat in these last particulars as between different countries.

Mr. BOUCHER: Can I take it that generally speaking it is the policy of the government not to appoint ministers but ambassadors except on such occasions as other countries may require the appointment of a minister instead of an ambassador?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is right in assuming that. There might be an exception in the case of some small countries.

Mr. GRAYDON: With reference to Canadian representation abroad, and particularly with relation to Canada's trade, I do not know whether the Prime Minister or the government noticed a rather compelling editorial which appeared on July 29, 1944, in the Financial Post. I do not wish to read the editorial in full but it struck me as bringing to light an important matter. It inquired whether Canada's foreign trade machinery was ready in view of the uncertainty as to the closing of hostilities and the necessity for making arrangements for the post-war period, which considerations apparently prompted the article in question. The editorial says in part:

> But what about that most important supplementary instrument of foreign trade—the Canadian government representation abroad—diplomatic and commercial? Is it ready? Has it the management, the staffing, the inspiration necessary to help Canadian business men raise our foreign trade to new high levels?

One sentence struck me as specially worthy of comment and one that should be brought to the attention of the committee and of the Prime Minister. It reads:

> Canada's future depends on foreign trade. In the modern world trade and diplomacy are interdependent. The modern Canadian diplomat is no more only a tea-party lion than the modern trade commissioner is only a ringer of doorbells of prospective customers for Canada. It is high time that this critical issue of the organization of our foreign representation was taken up at once at a high government level.

I apologize for transgressing the rules in order to put that on the record, but it is a matter which I thought had an important bearing on the situation, and was stated more clearly than I might state it at the moment. That raises the question as to whether or not there should be a complete reorganization in the days to come of the whole matter of external affairs and trade and commerce because of the inter-relation of the two in our dealings with foreign countries. The Prime Minister mentioned some time ago that as time went on it would be necessary to divorce the Department of External Affairs from the office of Prime Minister. In making that move did he have in mind a complete reorganization which would carry with it a department in which the whole representation of Canada would be included—in other words, that it would not be simply a matter of handling the diplomatic affairs of this country, political and otherwise, but one that would have to do with the equally important, perhaps the more important, problem of international trade itself.

We are now utilizing two distinct channels of representation abroad, one through the Department of Trade and Commerce and the other through the Department of External Affairs. Would the Prime Minister care to comment upon this, and indicate whether it would be possible from the standpoint of efficiency and ordinary diplomatic common sense to have the representation of Canada channelled through a larger and more comprehensive department where the services of all who represent this country overseas, in all foreign lands, would be utilized to the best possible advantage both as to external affairs and international politics and in the obtaining of a much larger share of international trade for this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The matter that my hon. friend has brought up is one that is of importance and I am glad that he has raised the question. May I say first of all that what Canada should do will have to be considered in relation to what other countries actually do in the matter of their diplomatic and trade relations. My hon. friend has asked if we could not in reorganizing bring together under one department of government all those branches of administration that relate to foreign affairs or external affairs, in particular diplomatic relationships and the commercial relationships of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I do not think that that would be possible, for a very obvious reason. The diplomatic representation under external affairs has to do with representation between governments, representation of the head of the state. All appointments from external affairs are to governments of other countries. They are not to commercial institutions or business agencies or private organizations or bodies, but to the heads of the governments of the different countries. I imagine that all countries will find it necessary to have a special representative of their governments as distinct from the business interests. In the Department of Trade and Commerce the commercial agents are representatives in the nature of agents for the promotion of trade, and as such their contacts are primarily with the great business concerns in the countries to which they are sent, through individuals as well as organizations. It would not, so far as I can see at the moment, do to have those officials of the government, whose principal business is that of promoting trade, given the same status and position as the representatives of the government whose concern is with larger questions of policy that involve a consideration of many things that lie altogether outside of trade. Government policy has to take account of all aspects of governmental relations that have a bearing on an immediate subject. At the same time there is every reason why these two departments of government should have their functions interrelated in a manner that will further the interest of both. That matter has received careful study by our officials over a considerable period of time. Anticipating a possible question on the matter I am prepared to give the committee a clearer and very full explanation.

War conditions, and the need to meet post-war conditions in the field of international trade have made it necessary to reexamine the relations between the Canadian offices established abroad by the Department of External Affairs and the commercial intelligence service of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

The government, more than a year ago, established a special committee from the two departments to study the question and to submit recommendations designed to promote closer cooperation between the services. This committee made a report, after studying the experiences of the governments of the other members of the British commonwealth and of the United States of America, as well as programmes for reforms which are being considered abroad. As a result of the information thus brought to the attention of the government, a special administrative committee has been set up, including three representatives from the Department of External Affairs and three from the Department of Trade and Commerce, with the deputy heads of the two departments as additional ex officio members. The special committee is charged with responsibility for working out practical measures for cooperation between the two services. The effect of these plans so far as they have been developed should be clearly understood. They provide for the coordination of Canada's diplomatic and trade promotion services abroad —not for the merging of these two services into one. It goes without saying that there must be, both in Canada and abroad, the closest cooperation between the official representation maintained by the Department of External Affairs and the trade commissioner service. We are retaining the trade commissioner service as a specialized trade promotion organization under the full control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and with such closer association of this service with the diplomatic service as will tend to strengthen both. Announcement has been made in the speech from the throne in regard to the strengthening of the trade commissioner service. It is generally agreed that strong reinforcement of this service will be required in the next few years. In fact it is not going too far to say that in the post-war period it will be essential for Canada to have the strongest department of trade and commerce we have ever had. The plans which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has now in hand for strengthening both the trade commissioner service abroad and the departmental organization at Ottawa are, accordingly, being advanced as rapidly as possible.

The types of problems, which emerge and are being dealt with by the interdepartmental committee, vary in different parts of the world. We may have a high commissioner and trade commissioner's offices in the same country. In some cases the trade commissioner's offices may be situated in the capital and may occupy the same premises as the high commissioner's office. In others, they may be separated. In other countries there may be a Canadian embassy or legation, with trade commissioner's offices either in the same place or in commercial centres in other parts of the country. In other places there may be Canadian consular offices established or under consideration. Where the offices are in different places, arrangements are made for periodic meetings. Where offices of the two departments are in the same place, every effort is being made to bring them under the same roof and to provide for close association in the work in which they are engaged. The committee is concerned with working out the instructions, which are issued to the heads of missions by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and to the trade commissioner's offices by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. These are designed to avoid overlapping and to promote consultation and cooperation. It is not possible to draw a hard and fast line between the work of the commercial intelligence service and the work of the Canadian diplomatic service. Both services gain where there are frequent consultations and where there is close cooperation in dealing with practical problems.

At the same time, the departments are working together in recruiting personnel from our armed forces. There are many young Canadians, in the navy, army and air force, who, by education, experience and ability, are well suited for the work of these two departments. Some of them would be immediately available upon discharge, and others will require additional education under the arrangements for rehabilitation and reeducation which have been established by the Department of Pensions and National Health. It is expected that the expanding needs of the commercial intelligence service and of the external affairs service will be largely met by personnel obtained under this common recruiting policy.

As the young men come into the services, their work is being planned in such a manner, through interchange of personnel, as to ensure that they will have experience on both the diplomatic and the commercial intelligence side, and it is hoped that in the course of time there will be a large number of persons in both services suitable for senior posts for the diplomatic, consular and commercial services.

The development of a consular service and its special relationship with the commercial intelligence service will be a matter to be worked out carefully during the ensuing years. A consulate general has been established in New York and the arrangements there are working in a satisfactory manner. The office of the consulate general embraces the trade commissioner's office and the consular service proper. The trade commissioners in the office have been given consular rank and perform consular functions in addition to their usual duties. It is expected that the experience gained in New York will be of value, in the event that it is decided to open up consular offices at other points. Further, the experience which is being gained by the personnel of both departments under the arrangement for close cooperation, which has been in effect for some time, will mean that there will be a substantial number of personnel in the two departments sufficiently familiar with both commercial intelligence and consular work to facilitate the organization and establishment of other consulates.

I think my hon. friend will see that the government has seen very clearly what he has in mind and has left no stone unturned.

While I am speaking on Canada's relation with other countries there is one other matter that I would like to mention. Hon. members have no doubt seen items in the press concerning the arrival of Brazilian troops in Italy to join in the fight against the enemy. We in Canada, who have our own men fighting there, are proud to be able to welcome these soldiers from the south to the great battle that is being steadily and successfully fought. Our common participation in the war will do much to draw our two countries together, and our men, fighting side by side, will render firm and lasting the sense of comradeship between our peoples.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to join with the Prime Minister in the sentiments he has just expressed with respect to our South American friends.

I should like to conclude this discussion, having in mind what the Prime Minister has said with reference to the integration of our foreign representation, by quoting one sentence from the editorial in the Financial Post which I think bears upon what the Prime Minister has said:

> Complete integration of our foreign representation seems logical and indicated by modern need. A department headed by two deputy ministers, one on the trade job, the other on diplomatics, seems a realistic approach.

I leave that thought with the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have already dealt with that in my remarks.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder if the Prime Minister would explain one point in connection with our representation abroad. The details of the main item would indicate that the cost of representation abroad has gone up in every country but one, that exception being Russia, in which case I notice a decrease of nearly $40,000. Our connection with the Soviet Union, both diplomatic and commercial, is of considerable importance. Will the Prime Minister explain this decrease?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My impression is that some of the expenditures in connection with our representation in Russia have come out of the war appropriation; I believe some word to that effect was given at the time that matter was under consideration.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like the Prime Minister's assurance that there is no decrease in the actual expenditure there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish it were possible to even think of such a thing, but our expenses in connection with all these legations in foreign countries are very hard to keep down. I think my hon. friend may rest assured that there will be no decrease; I only hope we may be able to keep the increase within bounds.

Item agreed to.

International joint commission—

474. To provide for preliminary studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed, $50,000.

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East): Since the source of the Columbia and the first two hundred miles of its length are in East Kootenay, and a considerable portion of the remainder of the Canadian part of the river is in West Kootenay, I wonder if the Prime Minister could give us a little more detailed information with regard to these preliminary studies and surveys in connection with the Columbia river watershed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a joint undertaking between the government of the United States and ourselves. It relates to matters of irrigation, the distribution of power and other problems as between the two countries, each having an interest in the protection of what lies within its own territory as well as what lies within the territory of the other. I am just reminded that on March 9 I gave the house a full and detailed explanation of the nature of the investigations being carried on, and I think my hon. friend will get in that statement the particulars he is anxious to have.

Item agreed to.

Governor General and Lieutenant-Governors—

85. Office of the secretary to the governor general, including allowance of $2,500 per annum to the secretary to the governor general, $102,723.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask when the term of office of the present governor general expires?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe it expires in May or June of next year.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for Broadview made a suggestion in regard to the recommendation of a successor to the present governor general, making reference to one of our outstanding military men. If the recommendation is in the hands of this government I believe some consideration ought to be given the suggestion advanced at that time, at least in regard to the classification from which the hon. member chose one gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Naturally the government will be pleased to consider any suggestions that may be made. The recommendation does lie with the government that may be in office at the time the appointment is to be made. I should just like to add that I believe we have been particularly fortunate in the representation we have had in the person of His Excellency the Earl of Athlone.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think it would be a very appropriate step, and one that would meet the wishes and views of the people of Canada, if when a successor is to be chosen to the present governor general someone with a signal record of war service, coupled with the other necessary qualifications, should receive the post.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question as to whether in the appointment of a governor general its choice should lie between a representative with wide experience in civil affairs and one with great experience in military affairs has been the subject of much debate in the past, and will have to be considered in the future. Fortunately these are not necessary alternatives.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course there would not be much objection to reappointing the present governor general.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Do we make any grant in connection with the housing and living expenses of the lieutenant-governors?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a statutory amount for the salaries of the lieutenant-governors. The provinces make the necessary provision for the maintenance of government houses.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is being done in all cases, is it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

511. Departmental administration, including expenses incidental to organization, $1,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has not been possible to make any realistic estimate of what may be involved in the establishment of this new department. I have had the matter taken up with the officials of the Department of Finance and those who have had experience in making estimates of the kind, and they have suggested that this amount should be placed in the estimates. Of course, a full accounting will have to be made to parliament in connection with any expenditures.

Mr. GRAYDON: It seems like a great deal of money for the initial setting up of a department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it is.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could we have any further break-down of this amount?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just said that in establishing a new department it is impossible to say what the expenses are likely to be. This is a round sum that it is hoped will not be too small; but certainly it appears to me, as it does to the leader of the opposition, to be pretty large. However, it is the figure that has been suggested by experienced officials, without any suggestion from the government itself other than the provisions of the act which was placed before them for consideration.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is a similar amount provided for the Department of Veterans' Affairs?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; that has been covered in the main by what has already been voted for pensions and national health, which amounts will be transferred to the new department.

Item 567 deals with the establishment of the Department of Reconstruction, providing $1,500,000 for departmental administration, including expenses incidental to organization.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

125. Mineral resources investigations, $426,170.

Mr. HANSELL: I believe it is recognized throughout the coal mining industry, and in other industries related to coal mining, that Canada has not yet arrived at a point where she has a satisfactory fuel policy. It is strange that although we have been living in Canada under constitutional government for so many years and with vast quantities of coal deposits, we have not been able to present to our people an adequate and proper fuel policy. Some months ago the Minister of Munitions and Supply announced that the government was in process of setting up a royal commission to investigate coal mining, particularly in its relationship to the post-war world. I find that there have already been set up in Canada eight distinct coal commissions, and in addition there have been set up five industrial disputes inquiries. In addition there have been forty-four boards of conciliation and investigation in respect of the industry. Putting these together it will be agreed that this industry has at least been looked into. I am not opposing the setting up of another coal commission, but I do oppose the setting up at tremendous cost of commissions whose reports are laid on the table and then filed, with no benefit to anyone except that which may be derived by the mice from chewing on them.

Repeatedly since coming to parliament I have noticed that commissions have been set up, and that the results have been as I have indicated. Some years ago an unemployment commission was established. It went to a tremendous amount of trouble and expense, but I have failed to see where parliament or the government brought down one bit of legislation as a consequence of its deliberations. Another commission investigated the wheat problem, and in doing so travelled across Canada, involving considerable trouble and expense. That report was laid on the table, but nothing flowed from it.

Evidently there must be some difficulty in the setting up of this commission, because months have passed since the original announcement was made. No final announcement has been made concerning the meetings of the commission. Perhaps we will not have an opportunity to discuss this subject again until the next session of parliament; therefore I take this opportunity in the dying hours of this session to point out that if the commission is to do its work, and if any benefits are to flow from it, its report must be studied and acted upon. It will have to go into every detail of the coal-mining industry involving, as I see it, three distinct investigations. The commission will have to review the subject of markets—because if we do not have markets for our coal, the coal-mining industry cannot function, men will be laid off, and so on. That follows naturally. The commission will have to decide as to where permanent markets can be obtained. As I have looked into this matter for years I have been convinced that the market right at our door, our own Canadian market, is not being supplied with Canadian coal, and has not been for years. We realize of course that the war has made some difference in that condition. The commission must recognize that if the coal-mining industry is to be kept going we must have a market for our coal.

The second point is that the coal-mining industry must be kept solvent. My experience, which has involved my talking with coal-mining operators and interested individuals, has led me to note that financially the coal-mining industry of Canada is on the verge of folding up. A business should be able to realize at least a certain percentage on its investment. I am not free to say what the interest on coal-mining investments may be, but if it were known it would surprise many people in Canada. Therefore I say the commission should investigate whether or not the industry can remain solvent. If it were to fold up, an unemployment problem would develop in respect of coal miners.

We have talked about markets, and about keeping the industry solvent. A complaint came to me the other day which I would ask the minister to consider. Perhaps the responsibility would be that of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. There have not been railway cars available to transport the coal from the mines. I do not know how long this situation has existed, but I do know that in my particular area certain coal mines have had to close down in time of war. It is a rather strange thing that in time of war, when there is a national coal emergency, mines have to close down because they cannot get the railway equipment to haul their coal. I want the minister to find out just what is the trouble.

If the commission is to do its work properly it must discover where we can find adequate markets for our coal in order to keep the coal mining industry going. It must pay special attention to the interests of the coal miner. The coal miner must be kept employed, and at fair and agreeable wages. Not long ago there was a strike, and the commissioner appointed to look into the matter discovered that the coal industry could not afford to pay the miner what he was asking for. The commission agreed that the coal miners should have an increase, but it was passed on to the consumer. Perhaps that was the proper course to take, but I am contending that the commission should look into the problems facing the coal miner so that he may be kept regularly at work at fair and agreeable wages.

There is one other observation I should like to make. I would suggest to the labour organizations that they either have in their organizations or have access to the services of qualified actuaries and chartered accountants in order that they may examine the books of the industry in which they are employed. Because the manager of a corporation is able to get a new model car every year and is able to smoke big cigars the impression is that the company is making a mint of money. They may or may not be, and I suggest it would be beneficial to industry as well as to the labour organizations if management and labour could get together so that labour might have access to the books in order to see what profit is accruing to the company, what percentage is being made on the investment, and whether a raise in pay to the men would permit the company to remain solvent. Sometimes these corporations operate on a thin margin, and a decrease of a few cents in the price of coal may mean the difference between solvency and insolvency. I believe that many misunderstandings could be ironed out if this arrangement could be brought about.

That is all I am going to say on this item because I know we want to get through with the session. The royal commission should be directed to look into these aspects of the coal mining industry, paying special attention to the requirements of the coal miner as well to the solvency of the coal mining industry, so that we shall not have a repetition of what happened a few years ago, when the coal mining industry was operating only one, two or three days a week or sometimes not at all, and coal miners, who are qualified workmen, were on relief. Would the minister look into the matter of the supply of railway cars and see what the hold-up is? I have the promise of the Minister of Labour that there will be a representative of the miners on this coal commission. That promise will be found in Hansard, and I am going to ask that it be fulfilled.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend has made several constructive suggestions which will be considered carefully. There are only two points which he has raised upon which I think I should comment. The first was in regard to the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the production and marketing of coal in Canada, especially as the situation may arise after the war. Without doubt the war has created many disturbances economically as well as in other directions. It has already been announced as a matter of government policy that this commission will be appointed. I dare say there are some members who think that it should have been appointed ere this, and with that criticism I would not find a great deal of fault. However, the last few months, and particularly the last three or four weeks, have been very strenuous and the government feels that too much care cannot be given to considering the terms of reference to the commission as well as the personnel of the commission itself.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not criticizing the delay.

Mr. CRERAR: Now that we are close to the end of the session, this matter will be receiving the consideration of the government. Several weeks ago a large delegation from Nova Scotia headed by the minister of mines of that province and containing representatives of both the operators and the miners waited upon a committee of the cabinet and made certain constructive suggestions regarding the problem as it appears in the maritime provinces. They also emphasized the importance of having the terms of reference to the commission properly drawn. They were asked to get together and offer their suggestions as to the terms of reference, and I may say that these were received only, as I recall it, on the fifth of August. I am not criticizing the delegation at all for the delay because I do think that they gave very careful consideration to the matter. Their recommendations will have the careful consideration of the government when it is drafting the terms of reference.

In regard to the criticism of my hon. friend over the lack of railway cars for the transportation of coal at the present time, personally I have no knowledge of that. I presume that he has reference particularly to western Canada. This matter of course is under the direction of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I shall be very glad to draw to his attention the remarks of my hon. friend, and if there is a substantial foundation for his complaint I have no doubt that it will be remedied.

At the present time the government is spending a substantial sum of money in urging people everywhere throughout Canada to lay in their supplies of fuel for next winter. It is not always easy to get people to do that. A certain number of people are careful and think ahead and many of them without any prompting at all lay in their supplies of fuel, but there are others who do not. It is common knowledge that last autumn or even as far back as a year ago we were conscious of the possibility of a very difficult situation arising in the supply of fuel. Fortunately in western Canada we had an exceptionally mild winter, but we have no guarantee that we will have the same kind of winter this year, and so we are taking all steps possible to urge people to lay in their stock of coal well ahead of the coming of winter. It may be, although I have no knowledge of this, that for the time being the stock piles of coal in the hands of dealers are pretty substantial and that the coal is not moving from the dealers to the consumers as rapidly as it should. At any rate I will bring the point raised by my hon. friend to the attention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. GILLIS: I have no intention of going into all the ramifications of the coal industry because I think my opinions are pretty well known already to the house. I appreciate what the minister says as to this matter not properly coming under his department at the present time.

Reference to the delegation has been made, and I merely wish to say that I attended that meeting with the delegation, headed by the minister of mines for the province of Nova Scotia, and among the other representatives were members of the local assembly representing different political parties, and a citizens' delegation. For Nova Scotia the problem is an extremely serious one, because the coal mining industry is the basic industry of that province. The prosperity of the whole province is predicated upon the prosperity of the coal mining industry. If it does not prosper, the whole province suffers. I notice that in the estimates of the Department of Munitions and Supply the minister is budgeting for approximately $4,500,000 for subventions. That is fine, if and when we have the coal to ship into the Ontario and Quebec markets. But to secure those markets is going to be a very difficult matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: We will help you in Ontario.

Mr. BOUCHER: Ontario does the best for you.

Mr. GILLIS: I hope so, but you may not have much to say about it, because it is a matter for the federal government. When the Americans get their feet into a market it is a question whether you can ever get that market back. We lost the Quebec market in the last war, and it took us ten years to buy it back—and I say "buy it back" advisedly. The whole province of Nova Scotia suffered as a result. Getting our coal into the Ontario market was also a very difficult proposition. It required substantial subsidies to the railways to put the coal in there. Now that market has gone. But I am not going to go into all these things.

I merely wanted to say to the minister that one of the most important matters to the province of Nova Scotia at the present time is the appointment of this royal commission, and unless the terms of reference to that commission are all-inclusive its appointment will be just a waste of time and a repetition of previous commissions' reports. The personnel of the commission is very important. You must have men who understand the industry, and understand the marketing of coal. Otherwise the evidence presented to the commission will be wasted because they will not realize its importance. I believe that the government is giving careful consideration to the personnel of the commission. It should not be so difficult. I could stand up and offhand, without any reference to papers, recommend a personnel that I know would be fair to all concerned and have due regard to the best interests of the men. It may be hard, of course, to get men who will suit the operators. But so far as the men are concerned, the miners' union in Nova Scotia has nothing to hide. They are interested in this commission and in its final recommendations from the standpoint of the best interests of the industry in Nova Scotia as it pertains to the economy of that whole province.

Personnel is important. But perhaps equally important are the terms of reference. If the terms of reference are not adequate, if it means just another examination of the coal mining set-up, we cannot expect much. Dominion Steel and Coal controls the whole industry in the province of Nova Scotia. The organization has its ramifications throughout Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick. It controls timber limits, steel, coal and iron. The company has some twenty-nine or thirty subsidiaries, and unless the whole picture is examined into we shall not get a solution to the problem. I have talked to men who have sat on commissions in the past and they have told me: Yes, you are quite right as to the juggling of costs in that big machine, but we were examining one specific question, coal, and although we could see something wrong here and something wrong there, our terms of reference did not permit us to make an examination from those angles at all. I am in hopes, Mr. Chairman, that this matter will be settled this time once and for all through a thorough overhaul of the whole organization controlling coal and all its subsidiaries, and unless the terms of reference are all-inclusive to permit that it will be just repeating the performances of the past—another commission, another report, and no solution.

The hon. member for Macleod stated that the labour organizations should have competent officials to examine into all the ramifications of the industry. They have them. The miners of Nova Scotia, through the Canadian Congress of Labour, have some of the most competent research officials that there are in Canada. Getting access to the company's books is something that cannot be done through the medium of the labour unions, because, as a result of special legislation in Nova Scotia, the books are closed so that no one can get a peep at them. The Minister of Finance has closed the books so far as members of the house are concerned and they cannot get any idea of what the financial set-up is to-day.

A few days ago I put some questions on the order paper. They were quite innocent. I merely wanted to find out what assistance was given by way of subsidies to certain companies operating in the maritimes. I received an answer something like this: Yes; assistance was given, but owing to the fact that the Minister of Finance has declared a certain policy in this house with regard to making known any assistance given through the price stabilization board, no figures can be given. I did not get anywhere.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. GILLIS: When the committee rose at one o'clock I was making a few remarks on the coal situation. I was pointing out that in the matter of research into the mining industry, as far as Nova Scotia is concerned, the job is fairly complete, and in view of the fact that the federal government have definitely decided to set up a royal commission I think that the desires of the people of Nova Scotia should be given consideration in connection with the terms of reference. The mine workers' union, when they met the cabinet committee presided over by the Minister of Mines and Resources a few weeks ago, had a brief setting out their case, pointing out the possibilities of the industry, the difficulties that are to be faced in the post-war period, and offering a solution to the problem. But this was contingent upon proving to the federal government, through the medium of this proposed commission, that they have a case.

I do not suppose there is another industry in Canada that is subsidized to the same extent as the steel and coal industry in Nova Scotia, and that applies also to most of their subsidiary organizations. I think the time has come when, in addition to going into the public treasury to guarantee that these companies make a definite profit, the government must accept some responsibility to the public and see that the organization performs a public service.

It is only within the last few months that an exhaustive inquiry was made into the closing of the Trenton Car Works, a part of the Dominion Steel and Coal set-up. A brief was prepared in that case and it is a very informative one. The reason why I say that, in addition to subsidizing and guaranteeing profits, some regard must be had by the government to the question of guaranteeing to the people of Canada that the organization shall not only provide profits but shall perform a service to the public, is this. In this brief prepared by the steel workers union, examining the Trenton question alone—and that is a very small subsidiary of the Dominion Steel and Coal organization—it is pointed out, and I bring it to the minister's attention as an indication of some serious thinking on the part of the government in this matter of setting up a royal commission, that since April 1, 1939 a total of $40,019,015.99 had been paid to the Dominion Steel and Coal company by the dominion government in subsidies and for installation of plant and equipment. That is a good deal of money to have paid out since 1939. Operating subsidies amounted to $26,953,805.13, capital advanced on property, of which title is held by the dominion government, $7,750,776.22, capital advanced on property of which title is held by the dominion government $5,313,434.64, making a total of $40,019,015.99.

The thing I am concerned about is that while operating subsidies have kept the industry moving during the period set out here, the dominion government definitely has an equity in plant and equipment made possible by direct federal assistance. It is the responsibility of the federal government to see that that plant and equipment is utilized in the interests of the people of Canada as a whole.

An organization that receives so much money from the federal government is in my opinion responsible to some extent to those who are making it possible for it to operate. One of the main points in the miners' brief, and they went into the question thoroughly, is that the time has arrived in Nova Scotia for an examination of coal leases. A fact that was borne out very clearly in their brief was that in Alberta, where an examination was held into cost of production, when they got an increase in production they had a decrease in cost. That is a natural assumption, but in going over the figures for the Nova Scotia industry from 1929 to 1942 they found that while arguments were advanced by the company and others to show that, unless they could get a substantial increase in production, the possibilities were that they would not be able to continue operating, an examination of the figures for the period I mentioned, and the plotting of a graph from them, revealed that in Nova Scotia during that period when they got a fairly substantial increase in production they got an almost parallel increase in cost, and as production dropped, as it did in the last two or three years, they got a similar drop in costs.

There is an answer to that, I believe. At any rate, the miners' brief sets out an answer—obsolescent machinery, high cost mines, mines that are running out, where, in order to increase production it is necessary to step up the power, pumping facilities, and so on. All these factors tend to increase the cost, and vice versa as they drop off. That definitely tells us that if there is to be any prosperity in that industry new methods must be devised and new openings made.

I am glad to see in the supplementary estimates, and I might as well say it now to save time, that the minister has a substantial appropriation for the purpose of setting up a pilot plant for the hydrogenation process and getting everything from the coal that there is in it. That would partly solve the problem in Nova Scotia. It is essential that plants of this kind be established where the operation is carried on. Our coal should be coked. We should extract every valuable by-product that could be marketed in the province where the fuel is produced. The time has come for the conservation of fuel in Nova Scotia. New openings should be found and the by-product should be utilized to the greatest extent possible. That is something that we shall have to go into if the industry is to be operated on an economic basis. Because of our geographical position I cannot see how we can continue to drag our coal from east to west as long as the flow of trade is in the direction it is at the present time. The only way to make that industry in the province stand on its feet and compete with United States coal is to do as suggested by the miners, make a reciprocal agreement with the United States operators so that we might market our coal on the eastern American border in exchange for certain markets in central Canada. That principle could apply to the west as well. You are not considered patriotic when you talk that way, nevertheless it is an economic problem, and has a place in the discussions that take place on this problem in the future. I am going to let the matter rest because there is no need for me to try to prove to the minister that it is necessary. That has been done. The fact that the government has appointed this commission is positive proof that it recognizes the seriousness of the situation so far as Nova Scotia is concerned.

The western operation is something that I am not going to touch on. I am not familiar enough with it to discuss it. It is a totally different picture from that of Nova Scotia. In the west there are a lot of small operations; in Nova Scotia we have one organization, although there are some small ones. The solution of the problem in the east is an entirely different one from the west.

The last thought I wish to leave with the minister is that the personnel of the commission must be informed and capable men who will view the problem in the light of what it means to the whole of the country and not pull their punches in any direction. The miners are not asking for it, and the general public in the province are not asking for it. They want to see that industry rehabilitated to get the most out of it for Canada as a whole. The terms of reference of the commission must be broad enough to enable it to go into all the ramifications of the company that controls the industry in Nova Scotia.

Mr. ISNOR: I was pleased to listen to the hon. member for Cape Breton South once again bring to the attention of the Minister of Mines and Resources the question of coal production as it applies to Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Cape Breton South is perhaps the best informed member from Nova Scotia on this subject. Coming as he does from that particular coal area of Cape Breton he is well qualified to bring to the attention of the committee the questions that he has so ably dealt with.

I could not follow what the hon. member meant when he was talking of the subsidiary companies of the Dominion Steel and Coal company. I could not understand what particular reference it might have to the coal production; but if the reference is broad enough so far as coal is concerned then I believe the royal commission that is to be set up by the government will serve a very useful purpose not only in Nova Scotia but in the dominion as a whole.

As the hon. member said, coal production in Nova Scotia is confined largely to the four counties of Cumberland, Inverness, Pictou, and Cape Breton, and has been for twenty-five years. The hon. member drew attention to the fact that from the year 1924 up to the present time, while production has increased it is necessary to increase production if costs to the consumer are to be reduced. I would point out to the hon. member that in 1924, with 2,480,000 man shifts working, they produced 4,448,000 tons of coal, or 1·79 tons per man per day, while in 1942, with an increased production of roughly speaking 50 per cent, or from 2,480,000 in 1924 to 3,518,000 man-days in 1942, they produced 6,439,000 tons, or only a slight increase, namely, 1·83 tons per day. It has been pointed out that the smallness of the increase in production has to some extent been brought about by the miners themselves through absenteeism or staying away from the mines during different periods, particularly in 1941. The hon. member referred also to the guaranteed profits to the Dominion Steel and Coal company. I am at a loss to understand exactly what the hon. member meant by "guaranteed profits" to this company. It is a well-known fact that in 1941 the company, through its independent certified auditors stated that it had to put in something like $2,225,000 to keep out of the red. In other words they were in the red to the extent of $2,225,000 on their coal operations.

I was pleased to note that the hon. member for Cape Breton South was careful on this occasion not to deal with the question of subventions. I recall that on one occasion the hon. member made a statement on which he was checked from almost every corner in Nova Scotia, including the miners themselves. It was in regard to the subventions of something like—

Mr. GILLIS: You are just a hundred per cent wrong in that statement. I do not want to occupy the time of the committee, but your provincial minister of mines spoke. The question of subventions does not come into this.

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GILLIS: May I make this point clear? The statement made by the senior member for Halifax that I was checked from one end of Nova Scotia to the other on the statement I made on subventions is a hundred per cent inaccurate. What really happened is this. At two o'clock in the morning this house was in session and a sleepy reporter—there was only one in the gallery at the time—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. GILLIS: I know exactly what happened. That is exactly what happened. Very few reporters were in the gallery, just one, and he sent out a C.P. dispatch that was picked up by the provincial minister of mines, and he very inadvisedly made a statement on it which he had to retract later. He was thoroughly and roundly condemned by every miner's organization in Nova Scotia. Hansard spoke for itself and completely changed the picture. You are all out on your facts.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We should have reached the stage in the discussion now where we can go through the items and discuss them dispassionately.

Mr. GILLIS: That is what I tried to do. If anyone is looking for a scrap he will get it.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member for Cape Breton South says that he is always ready to look for a scrap. I have no intention of scrapping with the hon. member. I remember the days when I played baseball; the miners were all good scrappers, but at this stage of my life I hesitate to enter into a scrap with the hon. gentleman. My purpose was to bring to the attention of the hon. member, of the house and of the country, and particularly of the miners of Cape Breton, the fact that the subvention of $3,500,000 or $4,000,000 is a direct benefit to them.

Mr. GILLIS: It is $4,500,000, to be accurate.

Mr. ISNOR: Very well; add another $500,000 to it. I say this sum of $4,500,000 has been a direct benefit to every one of those miners, particularly those in the constituency of my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman emphasized the fact that this money is paid to the railways; but if the money had not been paid in this way the extra cost would have had to be borne either by the railway companies, the shippers or the consumers.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not all paid to the railways.

Mr. ISNOR: My hon. friend said very distinctly a few minutes ago that it was all paid to the railways.

Mr. GILLIS: No, I did not.

Mr. ISNOR: Well, the record will speak for itself. I repeat that this subvention has been of great benefit to all the miners, for without it we could not have sold the same amount of our coal in central Canada. I well remember, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South will remember, when our coal production amounted to only something like three and a half or four million tons. Back in 1929, when I sat as a member of the Nova Scotia legislature, we were very anxious to increase that production by another million tons. No doubt the hon. member was a party to trying to bring about that result; I know the united mine workers were very much concerned about the matter. I remember how gratified we all were, and how much credit was given to the provincial government of the day, when the production of that additional million tons was brought about. That has continued down through the years to the present time; and I want to say that we in Nova Scotia owe a debt of gratitude to both the previous government and this government for having provided these subventions which have made it possible for us to ship an increased amount of our coal to central Canada.

I am very glad to support the suggestion of the hon. member in regard to the pilot plant. We all know that coal alone is not going to solve our problem, that the by-products of coal are of great importance. For that reason I am glad to note that the pilot plant is being set up, so that research may be carried on in order to bring about the increased use of Nova Scotia coal. Except for the difference of opinion between my hon. friend and myself in regard to the value of these subventions, since he claims that they do not enter into the picture while I say very definitely they are of real value to us in Nova Scotia, I think I am in agreement with what he has said. Certainly I am glad to support his representation that every possible avenue of research be carried on in connection with this pilot plant.

Mr. GILLIS: When I rose to discuss this question I had no intention of going into all its ramifications, but if anyone in the committee wanted me to do so I could discuss the matter for a long time. I have the evidence right here, going back to 1917, covering the loss of markets, the regaining of markets, subventions, and all the rest of it. When the hon. member for Halifax gets up and draws upon his very vivid imagination in order to put on the records of this house, in the dying hours of this session, when he knows he is facing an election, something which is not true—

Mr. ISNOR: What part is not true?

Mr. GILLIS: I will tell you in a moment. When the hon. member says that at one time I made a statement in this house on subventions, and that as a result I was hauled over the coals throughout the province of Nova Scotia, I say that is not true.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. CRERAR: Put it that way, then.

Mr. GILLIS: If the hon. member for Halifax wants to be reasonable about this and discuss the matter, I will bring in Hansard, which after all is the official record of the debates of this House of Commons. The hon. gentleman knows, as every hon. member on that side of the house knows, that if I remained quietly in my seat and let that sort of statement go unchallenged at this stage of the game, they would make very effective use of it in the province of Nova Scotia. That is why I am challenging the statement at this time, because it is not in accordance with the facts. That was tried by the press of Nova Scotia and by the provincial minister of mines, but the official records of this house prove the contrary. I did not attempt to discuss this matter of subventions—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Surely at this stage of the session we should keep strictly within the bounds of the item under discussion. This item has to do with mineral resources investigation, and there is no mention of subventions here.

Mr. GILLIS: Perhaps the chairman was not in the house when we adjourned on Saturday night.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, I was here.

Mr. GILLIS: Then the chairman may remember that the item under which this matter could be discussed came up with the items of the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may correct my hon. friend, it was Friday night.

Mr. GILLIS: Very well; and those estimates were passed on the understanding that this matter could be discussed on the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Resources, that if necessary there could be a full discussion of the whole subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct, and it was on the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. When I rose this afternoon I had no intention of discussing subventions or any of the ramifications of the industry. I confined my remarks to the matter of the royal commission, because the evidence is now assembled to be presented to that body. These subventions are fixed by statute. We are not asking for them; they are guaranteed to us, and no hon. member of this house knows the benefit they have been, or how they were received, better than I do. I was on the first committee in Nova Scotia that worked on this matter, and I know the reception we received from the coal company at that time. We were told to mind our own business, that they had ways and means of approaching the government themselves. That first committee received no cooperation from the coal company. To say that the subventions are all paid to the railways is not correct. When you pay a subvention for hauling coal to the Sydney and Louisburg railway, for example, you are paying it to Dominion Steel and Coal, because that is their railway. When you pay a subvention to the Cumberland Railway and Coal company you are paying it to Dominion Steel and Coal, because that is their railway. When you pay a subvention to certain shipping companies to haul coal to Newfoundland or up the St. Lawrence, you are paying it to Dominion Steel and Coal, because those are their boats. That is why it is important to make an examination into all the subsidiaries of that company, in order to determine just what is the position of the coal industry. The subventions are fixed by statute, but very little was paid last year because the coal is not being shipped. To-day the problem is not to get coal into the markets of Ontario or Quebec; the difficulty is that you have not the coal to ship. That was the basis for the few remarks I made, and I endeavoured to point out the necessity for a reorganization of the industry itself. On the other hand, when you can produce more fuel the arrangements to take it to these markets are there, if the answer is subventions.

The hon. member questions the matter of profits. You do not pay a concern in Canada approximately $40,000,000 just for fun; it must be for a purpose. Those companies do not operate for fun; the subsidy must have been necessary to guarantee them a margin of operating profit. If they are making all they made previously, then the government was very foolish in pouring all that money into them. So that I say that amount of money must have been necessary.

Mr. CRERAR: Did the hon. member say $40,000,000 or $4,000,000?

Mr. GILLIS: I said $40,000,000, since 1939. They are found in three different items which I gave a moment ago. That has nothing to do with the subventions. That money was given to them in this way: First, operating subsidies to the extent of $26,000,000; second, capital advances on property, of which title is held by the government, $7,000,000; and third, capital advances on property of which title is held by the company, $5,000,000. That money must have been given to them because they were not able to handle the operations themselves and make what they considered a profit. Then, another thing: it would seem that in the coal industry they can build a shipping pier at Three Rivers, Quebec, and charge it to the operating costs of a colliery in Nova Scotia. Wages can be kept depressed on that basis. If an examination is not to be made of operations at outside points, then you are not making a thorough examination. They can charge some of the operations in shipyards at Halifax to operations in coal.

When the Dominion Steel and Coal company first came in and rehabilitated the old steel plant at Sydney, one of the first things they did was transfer $8,500,000 from Dominion Coal to Steel, and give it to themselves in blocks of stock. That money belonged to the Dominion Coal company. And with that $8,500,000 in the treasury of the Dominion Coal company the miners were justified in asking for a considerable increase in wages. When someone gives that money to himself and gives out blocks of stock, then the miners who produced that wealth have a right to question why it was shipped over there to rehabilitate the industry and to enrich others who had nothing to do with producing that wealth.

The plate mill was rehabilitated at a cost of $4,000,000, which sum has been provided at this session, and those steel mills were bought and paid for by the dominion government at the time of the last war at a cost of $11,000,000. All that machinery and equipment at the mill was shipped to Ojibway Falls in Ontario. The people of Canada owned it. They wanted to use it again in this war, and they had to go to the expense of refitting the mill.

These are things I want to see examined, and unless the terms of reference are sufficiently broad that picture will not be made clear. We have been doing this kind of job for the last thirty years, in a haphazard fashion. I would like to see it done once and for all, and done properly.

And on that matter of subventions, which the hon. member for Halifax knows is a very ticklish one in Nova Scotia, there has been a great desire on the part of some people down there to prove that I am not for subventions.

Mr. ISNOR: Are you?

Mr. GILLIS: I fought for them when you did not know anything about them.

Mr. ISNOR: That is fine.

Mr. GILLIS: I fought for them when you had no idea what their functions were. And as long as they are fixed by statute of the dominion government I have nothing to worry about. They are not taking them from us. But if the day ever arrives when someone on that side of the house starts to change the assistance given to the Nova Scotia industry, you will find me one of the first to fight against it. There is no danger to it now, because it is there; it is ours. That is not a problem to-day. The problem to-day is the industry itself, and an examination of it so that it will mean something in the future, rather than having someone coming to the government every six months with his hand out, saying, "I want my money. I do not do much about enhancing the business so far as selling the coal or steel is concerned. I sit back and put pressure on the government to do my business for me, and to give me subsidies to guarantee my profits, instead of being out working and rehabilitating the industry itself." I believe when it stands on its own feet it will mean something to Canada.

Mr. ISNOR: It is interesting to know definitely where the hon. member for Cape Breton South stands in regard to subventions. We in Nova Scotia almost as a unit are in favour of them because we realize their value. I could talk on the various angles of the subject of coal mining, but I wish to say only this, that every industry must show an operating cost sheet in regard to its operations. They are published, and that fact is well known and they are audited.

Mr. GILLIS: Where are they published?

Mr. ISNOR: I do not wish to go into this matter at length—

Mr. GILLIS: Where are they published?

Mr. ISNOR: I say they are available.

Mr. GILLIS: They are not.

Mr. ISNOR: I have seen them more than once.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Halifax has the floor.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not wish to pursue this matter further. I could go into the operations of the Inverness coal mines, for instance, which, as the hon. member knows have cost Nova Scotia $1,699,734.54 from August, 1925, to March, 1943.

Mr. GILLIS: And I know why.

Mr. ISNOR: That was a social need. And I would suggest that the same principle applies so far as many of our mines are concerned. I realize that the hon. member has a practical knowledge of coal mining, but I would not mind debating this question with him along general principles.

Mr. GILLIS: You know there is special legislation passed by Nova Scotia closing Dosco's books.

Item agreed to.

Mines and geology branch—

497. Bureau of mines; to provide for the fabrication, erection and equipping of a hydrogenation plant in the fuel research laboratories estimated to cost $770,000—amount required for 1944-45, $100,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand there is a similar item in the regular estimates?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What are the details of this item?

Mr. CRERAR: It is to provide $100,000 for an experimental plant to examine into and find out by scientific investigation what can be done in connection with the hydrogenation of Canadian coal. This will also apply to oil. By the hydrogenation process a more complete separation or break-down can be made of the various crude oils, and substances like bitumen, which is derived from the sands of northern Alberta. We never have had plants in Canada on anything like an experimental basis. Laboratory tests have been made. This however represents another long step forward in providing research facilities to enable this country to ascertain what it can do with some of its very important resources.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think they should be complimented upon the work they are doing. I have watched some of the work they are doing at the research laboratories and I know there is a pilot plant there and I was wondering if they are providing for further processes. Is it intended to build the hydrogenation plant this year?

Mr. CRERAR: Plans have to be drawn up first.

Item agreed to.

Lands, parks and forests branch—

499. Government of the northwest territories —general administration, operation and maintenance of services, including Wood Buffalo park—further amount required, $172,270.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Where is this park, and what is the nature of the work to be carried on under this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: I understand from my advisers that none of this vote is to be spent in the park, but it happens to come under that designation in the department. The vote is for the further development of the northwest territories. The hon. member is probably aware that there has been an increase of interest in mining development in the Yellowknife region north of Slave lake during the last few years. We are going to start an airfield in this district and there are also certain expenditures in connection with roads, extra staff and that sort of thing. My hon. friend will bear in mind that the administration of the northwest territories is under the northwest territories council, which gets the money it needs for any expenditure under votes like this that pass parliament. Any receipts from fur or mining royalties or similar matters are paid into consolidated revenue fund.

Item agreed to.

Surveys and engineering branch—

148. Dominion water and power bureau, including the administration of the dominion water power and irrigation acts, $241,300.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The people in my constituency and in Medicine Hat constituency are interested in the development of certain irrigation projects which would make conditions more suitable in southern Alberta. Has this item any application to the construction of either of these projects?

Mr. CRERAR: The matter to which my hon. friend refers has to do with the utilization of the waters of the St. Mary and Milk rivers in southern Alberta. There is a boundary waters agreement with the United States under which the international joint commission can allocate the waters which properly belong to Canada and those which properly go to the United States. When that is done it remains for each country to provide works and facilities by way of dams and so forth to utilize properly the water that falls to it as its share. As my hon. friend is aware, a few years ago a committee of inquiry was appointed with Mr. Meek of the water powers bureau as chairman, Mr. Spence, head of the prairie farm rehabilitation work in western Canada and Mr. Hunter, a representative of the Department of Finance, as members. In carrying on their work they had the advantage of the continual advice of the technical officers of the Alberta government who aided them considerably in their work. They made a report which has been printed and which I am sure my hon. friend has seen entitled, "The St. Mary and Milk Rivers Water Development Committee." They went into the matter of how the water could best be utilized and the general advantages that would come from such utilization. The development of this project in my opinion should be taken up immediately the war is over. We in this country have never realized fully the value of sound conservation measures. I am bound to say that the conservation of Canada's share of these waters will require a substantial outlay but great value will accrue to that part of Canada. I have no doubt that over a period of years the cost can be fairly well amortized.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is any of the money to be voted under this item to be spent in furthering interest in this project?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This committee recommended that the work be proceeded with as a post-war measure. Is any provision being made to proceed with it when the war is over? Can the minister tell us who is supposed to take the initiative and whether anything has been done to get ready for the construction of this work? My constituency is in the midst of drought. They are suffering terribly from lack of water. Much of this difficulty would have been overcome if the St. Mary's dam had been constructed a year or so ago. It is a very serious matter for my constituency. Back in 1921 there was a number of pious resolutions that we should proceed with this work, but they all vanished like the morning mist. What I am anxious to know is whether definite steps are being taken to proceed with the construction of the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project to safeguard Canada's interests in these international waters.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend will recall that when the war appropriation estimates for the Department of Mines and Resources were before the house an item was passed for post-war planning that had to do particularly with roads, parks and developments of the kind, but under that same vote and this vote a study is being made by the engineers of the department of all the data that has been gathered in respect to the surveys of these two streams. I assure my hon. friend that the matter has not been abandoned but that it is under study. What arrangement may finally be worked out between the federal government and the provincial government I cannot at the moment say. No matter how desirable this expenditure may be, it was obviously not practicable to proceed with it during the war, but it is a work—here I express my own opinion which I think is shared by all the officers of the department—that should be taken up seriously when we come into what is commonly described as the reconstruction period following the war.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I agree with the minister, and I think he appreciates the difficulties of the present situation. But here is one very serious aspect of it. The apportionment of the water presupposes that each of the two nations shall construct works to fit themselves to make beneficial use of their share of the water. The United States has already constructed works which enable them to use not only their portion of the water but all of Canada's portion as well, while Canada has simply neglected to do anything. The first thing we know we shall wake up one morning to find that we have lost an asset of very great value that will be wholly beyond recovery. Certainly something must be done by the members of parliament to prevent that, and what I would like to know is what can members of parliament do to get a little action so that the thing will be carried forward and that we shall not merely be speaking of "studies" and "the matter being under consideration". Studies were being made away back in 1900 and 1909 and nothing was done about them; the thing is to get some actual construction work done. I thought it as well to mention this matter, perhaps to strengthen the minister's hands in going forward with the project.

Item agreed to.

148. Dominion water and power bureau, including the administration of the dominion water power and irrigation acts, $241,300.

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East): I understand that preliminary studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed are being made by the Dominion Water and Power Bureau. Would the minister tell us just what is being done and what sections of the Columbia river are being studied?

Mr. CRERAR: An item in the external affairs estimates was passed this morning covering the investigation now being made of the waters in the southern part of British Columbia. That investigation is being carried on by the International Joint Commission, and if I remember corectly there was an item of $50,000 in the estimates to cover the expected cost to Canada of the inquiry for this year. I am not in a position to give my hon. friend very much more information than that. It is part of the work that is being carried on under the international waterways agreement, and the International Joint Commission are now examining the whole question.

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East): I understood that the work was being done by the Dominion Water and Power Bureau. That is why I asked the question.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. Some of the officers of the Dominion Water and Power Bureau of the Department of Mines and Resources are doing the work for the International Joint Commission. The estimate for that work was passed this morning.

Item agreed to.

155. International boundary commission, $35,080.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have the vacancies on the commission been filled?

Mr. CRERAR: There is one commissioner representing the United States and one commissioner representing Canada. Both positions are filled.

Item agreed to.

502. To provide for the expenses incurred under the agreement between the dominion, Ontario and Manitoba, confirmed by the Lac Seul Conservation Act, 1928, moneys expended to be largely reimbursed—further amount required, $2,839.20.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Why is this supplementary estimate necessary in addition to a similar item in the main estimates?

Mr. CRERAR: Certain claims were settled in connection with the flooding of the Winnipeg river arising out of the Lac Seul agreement. This further amount is needed for interest. These amounts are recovered through the province of Manitoba, from the private power companies and the Winnipeg hydro. The federal government acts as a sort of clearing house between Ontario and Manitoba.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The amount of $17,800, under item 150 of the main estimates, is also recoverable?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That has always been recovered?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, that is right.

Item agreed to.

506. Medical—Indian hospitals and general care of Indians—further amount required, $235,400.

Mr. NEILL: I assure this committee that the sound of my voice is just as distasteful to myself as it is to the committee at this day and date, but I feel it my duty to bring up the subject. I claim that the Indian department have adopted a principle—no, a lack of principle—in dealing with certain Indian hospitals. To put it bluntly, they are chiselling on them, or trying to as far as they can. Naturally I think of the hospitals in my own district. We had a fairly large hospital at Port Alberni which served a fairly large area. I remember that on a number of occasions we had to dig down into our own pockets because the hospital ran short of funds. I remember on one occasion putting up $75, and others put up more than that, because we felt that we had to keep the hospital alive, seeing that the charges were not adequate. That went on for a long time and these people we had to pay for were very often only recent comers or outsiders. That was all right, but the Indian department adopted the principle of not paying the ordinary standard rates for destitute Indians. They have no right to do that any more than destitute Scotsmen, if there are such, should demand a special rate for themselves. Scotsmen are not generally destitute; they only want and try to get what is coming to them. Owing to the increased population, saw mills starting up and so on, the town has grown to a large extent, and so they adopted the system of issuing contracts for individual workers in the saw mills and collecting the money through the payrolls, giving out private contracts to individuals like myself. I pay so much a year whether I need it or not, and then I do not get free treatment but only a reduced rate. In this way they were able to make both ends meet.

Time went on, however, and expenses rose. It is a union town now and the nurses belong to a union. They work three shifts a day and have to be paid accordingly. Well, does the department object to that? Will anyone object to that? The cost of living has gone up, the cost of running hospitals has increased. Again, does anyone deny that? The hospital had to do as everyone else has had to do; it had to raise its rates. They raised the contracts, and no one kicked about that. We have a board of control on which the ordinary contract holders are represented. They are represented and the mill people are represented, so that if there is any chance of overcharging you may be sure it will be noted and taken care of. But none of these people kicked. They realized that the increase was necessary. No one objected but our friends in the Indian department.

The fact is that they would not have to deal with more than four or five hundred Indians at the most in that neighbourhood, and at last the board, after showing a great deal of patience, called for a showdown. They said, "We cannot go on taking a loss on every Indian we handle and then piling it on to the workers." The result was that a delegation came from Ottawa to see the hospital board. I was present and I can prove these things. We were told a number of things. In the first place, it was said that the hospital was overpaid and overstaffed. Well, in a union town where the girls have a union rate you cannot talk about overpaying anybody, and a good many people would have kicked if they had been paid less. We were not out to pay any money that we did not have to, and we knew that we were not overpaying them.

Next they said that the institution was overstaffed, that those who were working there were not doing enough. They were working an eight-hour shift, and there is no complaint on that score. None of us kicked or said that there were too many nurses. We were satisfied to accept the situation that was caused by circumstances, but this authority three thousand miles away, who knew nothing about it, maintained that we were overstaffed and overpaid.

When this argument was disposed of, or at any rate when they could not find anything more to say on that point, they said that they could do it cheaper in dominion hospitals and we replied, "Go ahead, but where are they? Where are those hospitals in which you will take care of these people?" They talked about some place called Norway House and said that it could be done cheaper there. But Norway House is a long way from British Columbia and we did not know the conditions there whereas we did certainly know the conditions at home. Did they allow anything for capital expenditures which we had to pay in connection with the building of our hospital? I wonder if in Norway House they pay $7 a day for ordinary labour and sometimes up to $9. As I say, we do undoubtedly know what the conditions are at Port Alberni and neighbouring places, and we know that the costs could not be less.

Their next threat was that we had better be careful or they would take their patients elsewhere. We said, "Go to it, God bless you; but where will you take them?" The nearest place was Nanaimo, which is fifty-six miles away, and it would have been necessary for them to take patients there in an ambulance.

Now suppose they took an Indian woman in an ambulance at a cost of $25—and that would be the minimum—and paid the hospital costs for five or six days in addition to that, and perhaps the ambulance back again at $25, would there be much profit in that transaction? Would it not be better for them to pay the extra two bits a day or whatever it might be and leave them at Port Alberni than to take them in an ambulance at the cost I have mentioned, possibly bringing them back if they were not sufficiently recovered?

The final and damning argument was, "You had better be careful or we will build a hospital." Build a hospital there! I was agent there for years and I may say that there were never more than 1,800 Indians on the whole west coast at any time and the number has diminished since then. To talk about building a hospital there is nonsense; some people would call it bluff. There are not enough Indians near Alberni to justify the building of a hospital.

Then there was another threat held out—or rather an appeal to our dignity and manhood. We were told that there was only so much money for the Indians and that if we insisted on a higher rate some Indians would have to go without hospitalization. I do not think there is any subject on which you can make a more sympathetic appeal than the question of assistance to Indians. "Lo! the poor Indian" is always good for a sympathetic hearing, and we were positively told or threatened, or whatever you like to call it, that only so much money would be voted for Indians and that if we insisted on our rights some poor Indian would have to go without hopitalization or with less.

These were the arguments that were put up to us, and I leave it to the committee to say what weight there is in any of them. The fact is that we simply wanted a reasonable rate. The inevitable happened. Three of these hospitals, of which there are five in my district in that vicinity, simply said to the department, "We are sorry, but we cannot find it in our mind, or in our doctrine, or in our bible why we in particular should treat Indians for less than cost any more than we should have to treat poor people generally for less than cost, but these Indians are wards of the government." And so finally these people put their foot down in these three hospitals and declared that after a certain date they would not take any more Indian patients except at the regular rate.

Observe, we were not asking for something excessive. Indeed, we were willing to take less than the standard rate. If I went to a hospital to-morrow I would pay more unless I got a rake-off by paying in advance. But for the fictitious reasons that I have stated, the department wanted to pay us less than the reasonable and standard rate.

Now there is one argument that will be used and I had better combat it at once. The minister will say, "Ah! Destitute people in British Columbia don't pay that; why should we pay more than is paid by the destitute in that province?" The answer is very simple. The British Columbia government pay only $1.75 or something like that. The explanation is this. The $1.75 is not per destitute patient; it is per every patient day in the hospital. Even though a destitute never went there, we would get that low rate for every patient and in return we would have to treat all destitutes for nothing, no matter how many or few, It is a rough method of figuring throughout British Columbia, certainly at any rate in that area. The provincial government pays $1.75 for everyone who is treated, whether black, white, rich or poor, or anything else, and that makes the difference in the rate payable by the ordinary patient. You can understand that $1.75 per destitute patient is very different from $1.75 for every patient.

These hospital boards took it up with their people—in fact it was insisted upon by their constituents, so to speak—and notified the government that they would not take any more of their people except at the standard rates. What did the government do? They immediately climbed right down in the case of three. I have the records right here. They simply said: "Well, we think you have not made out a case; we think we could do it cheaper, and so on, but we cannot help ourselves. We will pay." It was too bad, was it not, asking them to pay the standard rates? In fact it was a little less than the standard rate. They did not give it to everybody. That is what I want to kick about. There are two hospitals, they are in that area run by the Catholics, and like all Catholic hospitals they are run very well indeed. No one has dared breathe a word about the way in which Catholic hospitals are run. I remember once when I was the Indian agent a Presbyterian missionary and his wife were contending with the Catholics about the schools, and there was a certain amount of ill will. The Presbyterian missionary's wife one day sent for me and asked me to call on her at a hospital, and when I went I was surprised to find that she was in a Catholic hospital. I said to her, "My, but I am surprised to see you here. I thought there was bad blood between you and the Catholics. How is it that you are here," She said, "Well, Mr. Neill, I am a sick woman and I go where

I get good treatment." That is a true statement. These godly Catholic women are serving there, ministering to the poor, and here we have the department cheaply and meanly trying to take advantage of them. It says to these people, "It does not cost you so much to run your hospital because the nuns work for next to nothing." That is a mighty poor excuse indeed. We have nothing to do with that. It is a well run hospital.

Then the other day I saw that one of them was written to in this manner:

"Come now, show us your costs." Well, the costs may not be very high, because instead of paying certain girls who belong to a union $125 a month, or something like that, they get nuns to work for next to nothing. "Show us your costs and we will think about it." They did not say that to Nanaimo or Port Alberni or Duncan. They simply said: "We will have to accept your price there." And it is a suitable rate. They settled the rate for these three hospitals but they are not giving these other people the rate at all. They bickered and said: "Show us your costs." Perhaps their costs are not comparable to the undenominational union run hospital. Nevertheless these Indians have to be taken care of. I do not think there is any cheaper form of chicanery than to refuse to pay these women the proper rate because they have not the vocal powers, or perhaps do not like to antagonize public sentiment by saying they will not take the patients. Of course that is part of their religion. They do not refuse to take in poor suffering humanity, and apparently the Indian department is taking advantage of them and refusing to pay the standard rates. If the Indian department or the minister can qualify that or dispute it, I shall be glad to hear it, because I have the data here. I have letters that were written; in one place they said they would pay the rates, but they wrote to the Catholic hospital and argued and deprecated the idea, and said, "Show us how you can justify rates like that." Let us hear the answer.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has brought up a matter that has given the Indian branch a good deal of concern and worry. I am not going to pass an opinion on the manner in which he stated his case from his point of view, but it certainly was not presented in a moderate way; I will say that.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, it was, very much so.

Mr. CRERAR: This difficulty with the hospitals in British Columbia is one that goes back over a considerable period of time. So far as the Indian administration is concerned, certainly I would say they should pay what are fair and reasonable rates. That is what we have endeavoured to do all across Canada. The rates we are paying in British Columbia to-day are $3 per patient per day except in some hospitals where we gave assistance in the capital outlay for the building of the hospital.

Mr. NEILL: Where you have contributed.

Mr. CRERAR: Where we have contributed to the capital cost of the hospital. We are operating a thoroughly modern and up-to-date tuberculosis hospital out from Sardis a short distance from Vancouver. The cost per patient in the Coqualietza hospital was $2.23 last year. It is quite true, as my hon. friend states, we do not provide interest on the investment out of that; that is not included. I do not think that depreciation is included. But even if we took those items and added them our per diem cost at the Coqualietza hospital would still be substantially below what we are paying other hospitals throughout British Columbia. I could give the committee the information on what our hospital treatment of Indians is costing in the other provinces if we care to take the time to do so.

Mr. NEILL: No, that does not matter.

Mr. CRERAR: No, it does not matter, but it matters a bit to the department.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. CRERAR: The per diem cost for the treatment of Indian patients in the other provinces is again substantially below what it is in British Columbia. It may be that there are special factors in British Columbia that increase the cost of operating a hospital; I cannot say as to that.

My hon. friend rather ridiculed the idea that we should ask for some information or data on the cost of operating a hospital, for instance. I do not know that that is an unreasonable thing. If we are being asked to pay an amount that we think is too much, is it unreasonable to ask hospital authorities to justify their figures? It may be so regarded by some. I do not think it is. All I do know is that we are endeavouring to increase substantially the medical service to the Indians of Canada. The committee knows as well as I do that we have been limited in the amount of money provided by parliament for this purpose. Naturally in those circumstances we have sought to make the money go as far as we could. At the same time I repeat to my hon. friend and to the committee that we want to pay and are willing to pay the costs that are fair and reasonable in all circumstances. I may say this for the information of the committee. It seems clearly evident that in future years the federal government whose wards the Indians are will have to spend considerably more money for Indian hospital treatment than it has spent in the past. I am bound to add that our experience to date indicates that we can provide that treatment just as efficiently, just as completely in hospitals operated by the department as we can in outside hospitals, and there is no question of the comparison in costs. We operate our Indian hospitals substantially lower than what we are paying other hospitals.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee except to deal with the argument—we will call it that for the sake of politeness—put forward by the minister in defence of the conditions which I have outlined and which have not been denied. One of his arguments was that the department had contributed to the cost of certain hospitals. Is that true of the Comox hospital? Is it true of the Campbell River hospital? The answer is no, so that we need not talk about it any more. Then the minister says, "We have spent considerably more on the treatment of Indians in recent years than we did before." Yes, we have done that. I have spent considerably more on fuel than I did a few years ago, but has that anything to do with it? Is that any precedent at all? How long has the Sardis hospital been running? What was the cost of it? What would be a fair amount for interest and depreciation? These are merely trifles, I suppose, but leaving all those out the minister says treatment can be given for $2.23 a head.

Mr. CRERAR: No. My hon. friend is not going to misrepresent me. What I stated was that you could include provision for all those things and the cost would still be substantially below what my hon. friend claims we should pay.

Mr. NEILL: That is a bald statement, without any substantiation. The minister gave the figure of $2.23.

Mr. CRERAR: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; it has been examined in the department and that has been established.

Mr. NEILL: I have seen no record of it at all.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course not.

Mr. NEILL: No, $2.23 was the amount the minister mentioned, not counting these other items, at which we can only guess. Then to buttress this figure of $2.23 and bring it up to the total of $3.50 the minister says these other items could be included. He is fond of saying, "What are the costs?" I ask him to show us the costs in this case, but he has not the figures and cannot produce them. I am reminded of the young man just home from university, who thought he knew all about farming. He told the old man, who did not know much about law or books but who knew all about farming, that he was not running the farm right; that if he would do so and so the farm would show a profit. The old man looked over the scheme and said, "Well, son, you have forgotten only one thing; that is the rent, which amounts to $3,000." If you leave out the cost of buildings and the depreciation of course you can show a profit at $2.23. The minister also makes the bald statement that he can substantiate his statement, and in an endeavour to do so he says that hospitals can be operated for less in other provinces. Certainly they can, but I am not talking about other provinces; I am talking about Vancouver island and British Columbia. The minister wants to know the details of hospital costs, but I suggest it is none of his business what they are. He has gone into the market to buy service. If to-morrow I go to a saw mill to buy lumber and am told that the price is $4,500; if I say, "I do not like that price; I want you to show me the cost of producing the lumber", they will tell me to go somewhere else for it. If I go to the saw mill around the corner, they will give me their price and no more. It is the competitive figure that counts. I have no doubt that in Hawaii or the Polynesian islands it could be done for less, but this is a matter of comparable cost. The Indian department is in the market to buy hospital services for destitute Indians. It cannot take these Indians to Quebec or Norway House or anywhere else; it can only compare the cost with that of some other neighbouring hospital.

The department did not like the cost at Port Alberni, and they said, "We will take them to Nanaimo." Well, if anything the cost there was a little higher, so the department said, "We are spending a lot of money for the hospitalization of Indians, and if we cannot get it at these rates we will have to cut down the hospitalization." I defy the minister to answer this question. Has he ever come to this house and asked for more money for the hospitalization of Indians, or any other aid for the Indians, when it has been denied him? The public are peculiarly sensitive in this regard; they are always willing to vote money for these purposes. If I wanted to do so I could go into several other matters in this department, but I do not want to hold up the minister too long. The Indian Act is due for revision, and I think the Indian department is due for revision in many respects as well. But this is one matter we have immediately before us. The minister is trying to chisel these poor Catholic women, or perhaps I should not call them poor. They may be poor as far as money goes but they are rich in the grace of God. But we are taking advantage of them because they have no money and they have to yield in the matter; they cannot make a fuss about it and say, "Take your sick somewhere else." The minister says the cost of hospitalization is lower in Quebec, but these Indians cannot be taken to Quebec. I say the Comox hospital and the Campbell River hospital are being unfairly treated; let the minister deny that statement if he can. I do not care what the cost is; it is comparable with Nanaimo, which is seventy miles away, and with Port Alberni, which is one hundred and seventy miles away. Now the minister says this one wants so much and that one wants so much, so we will chisel these nuns in this Catholic hospital. Shame on him.

Mr. CRERAR: I am not going to continue this controversy with my hon. friend, because I believe the committee wants to pass these items. But in respect to the last statement made by the hon. member, I hope he did not seek to give the committee the impression that the department were chiselling on what he described as poor Catholic women.

Mr. NEILL: That was what I said.

Mr. CRERAR: Then if my hon. friend made that statement he said something which is wholly out of line with the facts. There is no distinction whatever in the treatment afforded hospitals in British Columbia. If my hon. friend seeks to convey the impression that because some very worthy sisters are running a hospital we are trying to shave them down and beat them down, simply because they are unable to advocate their own case, then I say he is giving this committee an impression which is wholly unwarranted and wholly outside the facts.

Mr. NEILL: If I may interrupt, I will concede that perhaps I should not have said the minister was taking advantage of these women just because they were poor and non-vocal. He tried to chisel us all, but the other people stood up against him and said, "We will not stand for it; we will not take in the Indians." I suggest that if those in charge of this Catholic organization had been in a position to defy the minister as well, they would have done so. The others would not stand for the chiselling, but they have to take it; that is the difference.

Mr. EDWARDS: At this late stage I apologize for rising; yet as one who is proud to be an honorary chief of the Indians I do not propose to let this occasion pass without saying something on behalf of these, the least vocal and least pugnacious of all Canadian citizens. I am not going to traverse all the complaints that have been uttered, many of which in my opinion are entirely legitimate; but I do not know of any class of people in Canada more appreciative of the difficulties under which this government are trying to carry on the affairs of the nation, or more patient and tolerant in spite of the fact, which is quite true, that they are not treated as fairly as the situation warrants or as they deserve.

The minister has spoken about comparative costs of hospitalization. This prompts me to rise and say that on the reserve of the Stony Indians, of which I am an honorary chieftain, there is a very excellent hospital, on which the department is to be congratulated. It would have been difficult indeed to find a finer, neater, better equipped and, until a year ago, better administered hospital than the one on this reserve. But, alas, with the prohibition of the use of oil for heating; because of the cost of heating with coal; because of the difficulty of getting competent medical men and because of the shortage of nurses that very excellent hospital has remained with its doors closed, unless it has been reopened within the last week or two, and the several hundred Indians on that reserve have had no medical attention except in emergency cases, when a doctor from a neighbouring reserve some thirty or forty miles away has made special trips. I am sure this government will—and must perforce—give regard to the appeal of these poor people, many of whom are neglected and may die because of that neglect.

In the very fine memorial sent to the department by the Indian Association of Alberta there are a number of points to which they draw attention. I shall refer to only two, the first of which is the extension of social legislation to the Indians of Canada. In these days we have heard a good deal about social security, and measures we deem necessary and desirable for our Anglo-Saxon community and the other white citizens of Canada. Surely we should not forget our Indian brothers, and accord them the same or approximately the same consideration as we demand for the white population, by way of social security, old age pensions, care for the blind and hospitalization. Why should they not receive the same care and consideration?

My second point is that I think the whole system of education of our Indian population is one which ought to be carefully scrutinized and reviewed, in the light of the admitted fact that the nomadic life of the Indians in Canada for the most part has ceased to exist except in the northwest territories. I say our educational system, designed to fit the Indians for a modern style of living, is one which needs complete overhauling.

On two other occasions I have referred to this matter. Our educational system for Indians does not fit them for the white man's way of life, and at the same time entirely unfits them for the Indians' way of life.

I pass on to one concluding observation on this subject. Because of the retreat of the fur-bearing animals along the east slope of the Rocky mountains, the reserve which at one time sufficed to sustain and maintain the Indian population no longer does. If these Indians are to subsist at all they must of necessity revert to grazing and agricultural pursuits. At this time they find themselves with reserves wholly unfitted for these purposes, with the result that they are quite incapable of maintaining themselves. On three different occasions I have urged the department to buy or purchase suitable agricultural and grazing lands upon which the Indians who are now ready and, as they have demonstrated, able and willing to engage in agricultural and grazing pursuits, may employ themselves. But they cannot do this until they have the land.

In this connection I would refer to the Stony reserve, with which I am mostly familiar, and I would say that the land is available. No finer management could be given to an Indian reserve than now exists out there; yet the man who operates it is only a grade 3 clerk in the department, and receiving remuneration as such. I say that is not good enough. We ought to be willing to pay competent men to look after these people, particularly when they have demonstrated their anxiety, their willingness and their ability to profit by any help given to them through education, which would fit them for modern agricultural pursuits.

Item agreed to.

159. Branch administration, $60,183.

Mr. BRYCE: As everyone knows, the Indians are wards of the government. They have no vote and no representatives in parliament. As such they are dependent entirely upon a sympathetic government and the sympathy of the members in that branch of government which deals with their affairs.

Mr. MacNICOL: If they had the vote they would be much better treated.

Mr. BRYCE: I learn from different sources that Indians in eastern Canada are beginning to take their place in industry and agriculture. The Indians on the prairies, and especially in the northern parts, are still to a great extent sticking to their original habits of living by hunting, trapping and fishing. My information is that on the Pacific coast there are many instances in which they are fitting themselves into the white man's life, working as loggers and fishermen. From everywhere however one hears the same reports as to the desperate conditions of poverty under which they live. With the Indian population on the increase something should be done. It is neither possible nor desirable to treat them perpetually as alien enemies in our midst. Eventually they must be brought to a stage where they can mingle with the whites on terms of equality.

We owe a great deal to the Indians, because we got this great Canada of ours from them. In return we give the non-treaty Indians $5 per year in payment. This seems a very small amount, indeed in exchange for such a wonderful and rich country as Canada is. They are confined to their reserves, and the treatment handed out to them is far from satisfactory.

When the government made its agreement with the Indians they were promised education, medical care and living room as long as the sun shone in the sky, the grass grew and the rivers flowed. None of these promises has been carried out to the satisfaction of the Indians concerned. Changes take place rapidly these days, and since Indians live largely in the past and the present and give very little thought to the morrow, the mere process of making adjustments in methods of living made necessary by present-day conditions is beyond the powers of most of these men of the bush. Having been wards of the government for many years, they have grown accustomed to the care of the Indian Affairs branch. I would invite the committee for a few moments to consider some of the problems with which the Indians are faced. Their education is a difficult problem, but one which should not be incapable of solution if approached with intelligence and sympathy. Mother lore and later folk lore and the experience gained on the trap lines and the fishing grounds is the only education obtained on the reserves. There are two systems in operation, day schools and residential schools. Various religious bodies have cooperated with the Indian department in establishing residential schools where prices of about $200 per year are paid per pupil. The day schools on the reserves, more especially in the north, are somewhat similar to the one-roomed schools in rural areas. They are up against the fact that the parents of the pupils travel most of the time and they do not believe in education. They must travel to earn their living and regular attendance at the schools suffers in consequence. This does not give the teacher much of a chance no matter how good he or she may be.

The residential school was created to overcome the difficulties experienced by the day schools. In these residential schools the pupils live together during the school year; they are away from their parents on the reserves. The boys and girls selected to go to these boarding schools are checked over by the doctor, that is, the children of parents who are agreeable to letting them go. Only the healthiest of the children are allowed to attend these schools. The children suffering from tuberculosis and other diseases are left at home.

These boys and girls return to the reserves from the residential schools at the age of sixteen years. The boys cannot hunt, trap or fish and the girls cannot keep house. All they have to show for their years at school is a superiority complex and a grouch. The children attending the day schools on the reserves receive the same education as those attending the residential schools and they have the opportunity of learning how to live under conditions existing on the reserves. The boys learn how to hunt, trap, fish and do other things essential to future life in the bush, and the girls learn how to bake bannocks under the primitive methods of cooking prevailing in the bush.

The boys and girls who attend the residential schools learn about agriculture and domestic science in addition to what is taught at the day school. They are well taken care of, they are given good clothing and good food, but in the north country there is no agriculture or no need for domestic science. Those things do not fit into the reserve picture of to-day. These children learn to speak English fluently but their parents speak only the native tongue. They become accustomed to the white man's ways. The girls have learned how to wash and cook by electricity, they have learned how to use many of the devices used in a modern home; the boys have seen modern agricultural implements at work, but in neither case do these children have the opportunity to use the knowledge they obtain when they return to the environments they left.

I think there is a fault in this system which could be corrected by taking the more promising pupils and giving them further education. The boys could be taught trades in some of our trades schools and the girls could be trained as nurses or for some similar occupation. As men and women they could return as leaders in their communities. People who have studied the Indians assure me that there are some who show great promise and aptitude of becoming leaders in their communities.

The Indian will have to be fitted into our economy, and the sooner we start the better. It is to be hoped that the day is not far distant when every reserve will have its own day school. The best teachers should be encouraged to take up this work and they should be paid and treated so well that they will take on Indian teaching as a life work of a missionary nature. Outstanding Indian students should be helped to work for a university degree. They should have the opportunity to study and train themselves for the complex task of returning to their people who stand bewildered between two totally different cultures.

At the present time we have 260 Indian day schools and 80 Indian residential schools, with 16,876 pupils. From these figures it will be seen that there are not sufficient schools to start with. Indian children of school age number about 26,000, so it will be seen that there are 10,000 Indian children who are receiving no education whatever.

Coming to the matter of health on the Indian reserve, the Indians on the reserves appear to be incapable of protecting themselves against the white man's diseases. The prevalence of tuberculosis in all its forms is nothing less than appalling and largely accounts for the low rate of increase in the Indian population. You will find great numbers of children playing about the camps on the reserves, which indicates a high birth rate, but the departmental statistics show that the death rate is extremely high. Many of those babies and children will never reach maturity and those who do will have a poor chance of escaping the white plague.

In Manitoba, my own province, the Indians comprise only 2·2 per cent of the population, but the deaths from tuberculosis make up 31 per cent of the total deaths from that cause in the province. The reason is obvious. They have not built up immunity against the disease, and lack of intelligent maternal care, unsuitable and insufficient food produce the same results on an Indian reserve as they do elsewhere. They have no appreciation of the ways of tuberculosis, and they have no knowledge of the dangers of infection or the importance of isolation of infected cases. They know nothing about the accepted methods of sanitation. Infected mothers can be seen nursing their babies on any reserve.

The log shacks used in the winter are so thoroughly chinked that the pure air is completely excluded and they are so overcrowded that they provide the most ideal breeding grounds for the disease. Their minds are so rooted in the past and so suspicious of the motives of the white man that they do not readily accept leadership from their white neighbours, who might be able to inform them as to the best precautions to take against this disease. We find from the departmental report that tuberculosis is the leading cause of death among the Indians, the death rate being ten to thirty times higher than that of the white population.

The great trouble seems to be lack of hospitals. We have approximately 500 beds for the hospitalization of the Indians and from the department we find that two-thirds of these are occupied by T.B. patients. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni this afternoon spoke of sending some of the Indians to Norway House. I have already drawn the attention of the department to the overcrowded conditions there. I said in the house a while ago that it was a sixteen-bed hospital, but I was corrected; it is a twenty-four-bed hospital. In that twenty-four-bed hospital there were forty-three patients when I was there. I saw them myself. So that there is no need for the hon. member to look to Norway House to help him out with a few beds.

The average number of deaths annually from tuberculosis among the Indians over the last five years is 815. On the basis of three beds per annual death, there are 2,445 treatment beds needed. Because of this the public as a whole is glad that a good bit has been done to check tuberculosis among the Indians and would endorse the expansion of the work. This is as it should be, for in spite of what has been done much more needs to be done.

Still, not forgetting that there is a war on, which has taxed the supply of doctors and nurses, we can only look on and make suggestions for the future. What will be most needed will be more frequent visits to isolated reserves by qualified doctors or nurses, or both, and more sanatoria; some in the north as well as some in the south, because it would be hard to convince an Indian at the Pas that he should go to Winnipeg for treatment when he is sick. There should also be health education in the schools by visiting doctors or nurses and the medical officers should be empowered to compel the attendance of Indians at hospitals or clinics if necessary.

It will be very interesting to hear from the department when the nutrition programme being carried on at Rossville by the resident doctor, along with eminent doctors to the south of us, has been completed. What has been done to assure proper treatment of all Indians in Canada for trachoma and in the matter of nutrition? It is to be hoped that this may be the means of saving the eyesight of many Indians, and the nutritional work being carried on will benefit not only Manitoba but the whole north American continent.

Coming to the economic needs of the Indian, little can be done in any direction until a more satisfactory economic basis is laid for their life. As long as we have known the Indians they have depended for the means of subsistence on the bush and the lake. The coming of traders provided employment for them as freighters and enlarged their food supply by providing a market for their furs. These sources of food have gradually been disappearing. The aeroplane is supplanting the canoe for passenger and freight traffic. One makes a journey into the wilderness to-day in comfort in an hour or two which by canoe would require days, to say nothing of mosquitoes and black flies, portages and hard beds on the ground. There again the Indian has lost another source of revenue.

There are still plenty of fish in the lakes but should commercial fishing be encouraged in these lakes the Indians will have again lost a source of food supply. The distance from a market has kept these lakes from being a profitable commercial enterprise, but with the development of the aeroplane the fishing in these lakes may become profitable.

A great deal could be accomplished by teachers, missionaries and doctors if a community centre could be established in each reserve. If a hall were secured suitable for handicraft studies, health classes, adult classes in English, reading and writing and indoor sports, boy and girl scout movements, it would be a step in the right direction. The Indians, never having had such a thing as a community centre, have no conception of what an important part it could play in their future life. If the government could start something like this on one or two reserves where there is a good leader, I am quite sure that the Indians could be got to cooperate.

The problem of the Indians' livelihood is more complex and difficult, and what must be done depends in detail on the part of the country under consideration. But one principle unites all requirements, namely this, that while the Indian was free to roam at large he gained his living wandering freely where food could be found; now he is confined to a small area and must get the same living intensively.

One of the bright spots in the Indian situation to-day is the wonderful progress in establishing the muskrat areas. To Tom Lamb of Moose Lake, Manitoba, a trader, born and living there, we give the credit of being the man to start this first. Having leased an island from the province of Manitoba he carried on his experiments in increasing the rat population.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the beaver population, too.

Mr. BRYCE: It is a wonderful story which no doubt most hon. members know, and I refrain from telling it again except to pay tribute to Mr. Lamb for the great work which he started.

The provincial and federal governments took up the idea and are developing similar schemes for the benefit of the Indians. The results have been excellent, and I have no doubt that further areas are being surveyed with the idea of making the Indian independent and able to earn his own living. The results have been so good that the government no doubt in the future will be able to get back their original investment.

I might say that in connection with this work there were eight beaver taken up to Fisher river, Manitoba, and let loose. When given their freedom three went one way and five went another way. The group of five kept travelling to a point sixty-five miles from where they got their freedom. At this point they built a dam which it would have cost the department $3,500 to construct. There had been a dam surveyed there and these beaver selected the very same spot. I want to appeal to the Minister of Natural Resources to see that all beaver are protected for the next five years. Beaver doing work like that are worth $700 each. The fur or skin of the beaver can never be considered when they can do such work as this. It has been the draining of these marshes, the ruthless trapping by all classes of people that have helped to deplete the northern country. If the beaver are protected and allowed their freedom I am sure it will return dividends a thousand-fold to the government and provide a livelihood for the Indians.

I wish to congratulate the government on the policy they have adopted, both provincial and dominion, to handle the furs for the Indians and to divide this money over into twelve payments. This is going to be a great lesson to the Indians, to learn that by getting their money by the month they will have something to spend every month in the year. As I said before, it has been a failing of the Indian that he does not look to to-morrow. In this way the families of the trappers have known for the first time the security of a small but regular monthly income which still can be supplemented as usual, of course, by casual labour or the sale of hay and wood. I see no reason why the plan should not work in other districts. It protects the Indians and enriches the country at the same time. It is to be hoped that the project will be manned and operated almost entirely by Indians, who are showing a great liking for the work. Something can be done by way of gardens and the patches of soil in the rocks, but the Indians are hunters and eaters of meat rather than vegetarians and it is difficult to interest them in any form of agriculture. In the same way I believe that forestry and lumbering operations could be handled and developed and probably fisheries on slopes of the Rockies. It will be a matter of guiding them in the principles of preserving the resources entrusted to them so that they may become independent and take their place in Canadian life.

The Indian is not lazy and he will work and work hard at the kind of work that is natural to him. Canada owes at least this much to the people who are the true Canadians.

In closing I have one or two questions to ask the minister. I thought that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would have touched on this. The Indians in British Columbia are very much annoyed at having only $4.88 of groceries; that is to say, the Indian who cannot work is allowed $4.88 and no more. If he happens to have a wife and she cannot work he gets $6.30. I want the minister to look into that. That is a disgrace and there must be a slip-up somewhere. I went into this matter with the officials of the department and they have shown me what a man is allowed, and I know that the men on the reserves are not getting what the department says they should get.

In a recent speech the minister said that there were good agents and bad agents. I hope he will clean out the bad agents and advance the good agents. The Indians in British Columbia have another grievance. In selling their goods they consider that, if I might use a vulgar expression, they are gypped. It takes $3.50 worth of wool to make a sweater. The Indian has to sell that sweater for $4 and the product is sold in the stores for $7. That should be handled by the government.

I wish to call the attention of the minister to the deplorable conditions that exist in the northwest. I have here a quotation from Dorothy G. Steeves, M.L.A. of British Columbia, who said on her return from a visit:

> The church is the most imposing building in Moosehide. Since the missionary went away it is served by a blind Indian preacher, who is not very adequate, according to his fellow-villagers. On the wall are texts and written portions of the Scriptures, written in the Indian language, but in a different dialect from that used in the village. They cannot read them anyway so no harm is done. It seems symbolical of the stupid and illogical kind of Christianity we mete out to these people.
>
> Here is a cesspool to be cleaned out in Canada and it seems clear that the problem must be attacked by bold and drastic measures. These places of corruption can only be cleansed by proper housing, modern health services, and education. It will not serve to send the children to mission schools, only to return to the conditions of the reservation. We must train hundreds of nurses, doctors and teachers, preferably Indians themselves, to go among these people and teach them better living.

May I also direct the attention of the minister to what appeared in the Ottawa Journal of March 24, 1944. I want him to contradict it if it is not true, because it has had a detrimental effect on every reserve in the dominion. It was carried in every newspaper. It dealt with the visit of a bishop to the department; and I quote from it the following:

> "Most of the officials of the Indian branch," the letter continued, showed great sympathy but said nothing could be done without the high approval of a certain Mr. Jackson, executive assistant to Mr. Crerar (Minister of Mines and Resources), and who seems to be somewhat of a half-appointed dictator over anything concerned with Indian welfare."
>
> "Mr. Jackson told me the federal government was thoroughly acquainted with the situation among Indians on the upper Laird river and along the Dease river, and he readily admitted the Indians had been sadly neglected in the past. Yet, Mr. Jackson added, we must first win the war, and if I had any money to spare right now, I would have cannons built with it and let those Indians die rather than spend it at such a time on Indian welfare."

Mr. CRERAR: Is my hon. friend—

Mr. BRYCE: Wait until I am finished. It will save time. The hon. member for Calgary East claims to be an honorary chief and I thought he would have told us about this.

Mr. MacNICOL: He does not claim to be; he is one.

Mr. BRYCE: If he is an honorary Indian chief he should have reported this. I refer to two men named Fred Hudson and James Ward on that reserve. Their numbers are respectively 230 and 398. These men lived on the reserve for eight years. They were put there under the policy of Doctor Scott and now they have an order to leave the reserve by November after living there all that time. They are classed as non-treaty. I would ask the minister to look into that.

Coming back to Manitoba, I have the assurance of the department here that an adult receives for a month: twenty-four pounds of flour; six pounds of rolled oats; one pound of baking powder; one pound of tea; two pounds of sugar; three pounds of lard; five pounds of beans, two pounds of rice; one pound of cheese; one dollar's worth of meat or fish; salt and matches. When I was there I saw destitute Indians receiving: twenty pounds of flour; 4 ounces of tea; 4 ounces of bacon; 2 bars of laundry soap per month. There must be a bad agent somewhere, because the department assures me that the allowance for destitute Indians is as I have stated. In case the minister thinks that I am talking about someone who is not really destitute, in case there is any argument about it, I would refer him to Roderick Robertson, who was receiving that treatment, a blind man—stone blind.

I would ask the minister to be good enough to give to the Indians the answers which he promised eight weeks ago with regard to income tax and being called up for service. He knows that we have 1,800 now serving in the army. Many of them have volunteered. They are now being called up. The minister promised in his speech on June 7 that he would give the Indians an answer in three weeks, and he has not done it yet.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CRERAR: There is no one in this committee who would more gladly see those estimates carried than I, but I think it is necessary to take note of some of the remarks made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. With his general statement I have not very much fault to find. I do not think that his research into the history of the administration of the department has been complete or thorough; but there is no doubt that my hon. friend is genuinely interested in the welfare of the Indians and therefore I welcome his remarks to-day, some of which were constructive and some of which I might say were not very well founded.

On the general question of the welfare of the Indians, there has been, I am glad to note, a decided increase in interest throughout the whole country in the last few years. Not quite nine years ago when this government took office practically nothing had been done in the way of specialized study of the incidence of tuberculosis among the Indians. At the present time we are spending more than half a million dollars in that particular field. We have made surveys and studies of the problem. Very little had been done in the way of examination into the nutritional side of the foods that the Indians were using. Extensive surveys have been carried out in the last few years in northern Manitoba. Those surveys were made with the assistance and cooperation of the Hudson Bay company and the Millbank institute of New York. The studies were carried out in a definite and scientific way, and very interesting results were achieved. The department has prepared under expert direction a biscuit that contains the important vitamins. These biscuits are distributed particularly for the use of children in the schools. Much more can be done in that direction.

The Indians, particularly in the northern parts of the provinces, are the ones who have suffered and are suffering the most. Their mode of livelihood is practically gone. What the hon. member for Selkirk said is quite true, namely, that the mode of life of the Indian has changed greatly. These changes have been thrust upon them. They have seen their trapping grounds go and their means of livelihood disappear. One of the things that I initiated—and I take considerable pride in it—when I came into the department was a study of the possibilities of the restoration of fur-bearing animals in the northern parts of those provinces. I am not going to tell the story to-day. Hon. members of the committee who are interested in it will find it pretty well set out in the reports of the reconstruction committee. Officers of the department appeared before the committee and gave detailed information as to what had been achieved in that direction. I am quite confident that by wise policies—if we get the cooperation of the provinces, and we are getting it in a very large way indeed—the fur-bearing animals can be brought back, and we shall have a market for fur in the future that will afford these people a fair standard of living. The department is spending a good deal of money, and has spent a good deal over the last several years on this work; but it is perhaps the most useful expenditure that the department has made.

On the general question of Indian administration in Canada, there is no doubt in my mind that the whole Indian Act needs a thorough revision. That was apparent to me as long as five or six years ago. The departmental officials have been studying the act with a view to rewriting it and getting a new act. After all, the present act was passed many years ago when the problems of Indian administration were wholly different from what they are to-day. I hope that when the war is over and the preoccupations that engage the time of parliament and of members disappear with it, a revision of the Indian Act can be undertaken. It certainly should have the most serious consideration that can be given to it by the next parliament.

I do not know that I have very much more to add. I do not despair of the Indian problem. I admit that there is a problem. With improvements in sanitation, in medical care, in nutrition and ways of life the increase in the Indian population will accelerate year by year. It is simply a matter of common sense that the administration of Indian affairs take note of that fact and try by wise policy not only to give the Indians the means of becoming self-supporting but to bring about in his way of thinking, in his psychology, a desire on the part of the Indian to make himself self-supporting and become a full-fledged citizen of the country. These are problems that must be dealt with in the future. I wish merely to mention them briefly to-day in the consideration of those estimates.

Mr. BRYCE: The minister has not answered my question.

Mr. CRERAR: I am sorry. My hon. friend brought up two or three matters. If I understood him aright he gave an instance where an Indian paid $3.50 for wool in British Columbia, sold the product for $4 and it was retailed in the stores at $7. I should be very glad if my hon. friend would give the particulars of his information to the department, because I am advised that the sale of the products of the Indians—and it is substantial in quantity—is carefully watched by the Indian administration in British Columbia. That certainly is the case with fur in northern Manitoba.

My hon. friend was really not on very good ground when he did this. He read an extract from the Ottawa Journal of some day in March last purporting to give a statement by Bishop Coudert in Edmonton, I think it was, in which serious reflections were made on the Indian administration. I gave the press a statement about the matter. It may have escaped the notice of my hon. friend. Bishop Coudert was not correctly reported. When I read his statements it was quite evident that he had not been correctly reported. I deplore the practice of taking an article that appears in a newspaper and placing it on the pages of Hansard as if were fact. If my hon. friend had made inquiry of myself or of the department he could have been satisfied on that point.

Mr. BRYCE: All I want to know is whether it is true or not true.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course there has been a serious situation in the Yukon and the area from which the bishop comes, as well as in other parts of Canada. It has been difficult to get qualified medical men and nurses because in several instances they have not been available to send to these territories.

My hon. friend also referred to the case of two individuals in Alberta who he alleged were Indians and who had been removed from the Indian rolls; I think their names were Ward and Hodgson, on the Hobbema Indian reserve in Alberta. The fact of the matter is that these two persons were not Indians under the Indian Act, although they had come to live on the reserve. Years ago in the settlement they both accepted scrip, but they were half-breeds. I do not wish to criticize past administrations, but these people were living on the reserve and were regarded as Indians, although as a matter of fact they were not Indians under the Indian Act. The department has a serious trust in that respect. The Indians are wards of the federal government, and that wardship is clearly set out in the Indian Act. If those who are not Indians, for instance half-breeds, are allowed to be treated as Indians, to share in band funds and other Indian property, then it is a distinct violation of the trust; and if the department permitted these people who are not Indians under the act to continue to participate in Indian benefits, the department would be leaving itself in a very wrong position indeed, wrong not only morally but legally. I do not know if my hon. friend was interested in any other point.

Mr. BRYCE: I pointed out that these men were accepted by the Indian department and given numbers eight years ago, under Doctor Scott. I am not prepared to debate the point; I have not sufficient knowledge of the matter, but I am asking the minister to be good enough to look into it. They were accepted on that reserve eight years ago.

Mr. CRERAR: Let my hon. friend get this clear right now. It may be that some local Indian agent allowed them to live on the reserve and that they were treated as Indians, but the point I am making is that once the fact was established that they were not Indians we could not legally or morally permit them to remain with the status of Indians. It would be quite impossible. Once the department discovered the facts we could not permit them to remain as Indians and participate in all the benefits the Indians enjoy, because it would be a violation of our trust. I might, for instance, just as well call my hon. friend an Indian and let him participate in the band funds. I hope my hon. friend sees that point.

Mr. BRYCE: It was not a local agent who accepted these men; it was Doctor Scott, of the Indian department here. However, I am willing to let the matter drop. Have we got this straightened up yet? When I go back to that reserve in my constituency I am going to be asked, "Did Mr. Jackson make this statement or did he not?" I want to be able to answer the question. I want to be fair about the matter.

Mr. CRERAR: I can satisfy my hon. friend in a moment. Mr. Jackson did not make that statement.

Mr. BRYCE: All right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to add a word to what my colleague has said. I am very glad to hear the minister say that the revision of the Indian Act is under consideration, and I hope when that revision is under way, we may make some small contribution toward remedying some of the defects that have existed in the past. My plea is that the Indians be given an opportunity to make their own contribution to Canadian life, and I believe one of the first things that will have to be done is to give them some effective means of making their voice heard by the Canadian people. We know of things that have happened since this war began. The conscription of these men off Indian reserves, for instance, is something which I should say has hurt the attitude of the Indians toward the people of Canada. If these people had been taken into the confidence of the officials of the government, or if they had felt themselves worthy of even a vote in this country, then I think they would not have considered themselves mistreated. They have made several pleas to the government as to the status of the Indians with respect to being subject to conscription; and although we are now in the fifth year of the war, and the war is almost over, there has been nothing in the way of a satisfactory statement from the government which would contribute to a settlement of the matter. So that in the interval before the act is brought up for revision, which I hope will be next session, I trust that the officials of the department and the minister will study what our sister dominion of New Zealand has done in connection with the Maoris. In New Zealand they have Maori representatives sitting in the house of representatives. These people are educated; among them are doctors, lawyers and scholars, taking their place in the life of the community, given an opportunity to express themselves and make their contribution in a real way.

I maintain that the Indians of North America can show their white brothers many things that are wrong even in our economic set-up. I believe that the government policy of segregating these people on reserves has been wrong. Probably under the Indian Act the hands of the government are tied but, as the minister admits, the economic conditions on these reserves are far different to-day from what they were in the past. The opportunity to make a living does not now exist. I have been on these reserves; I have seen these Indians putting in their crops year after year. I have seen crop failures on those lands, and after three or four years the Indians began to wonder what it was all about. They are not all farmers; and I hope the minister has something more in mind than simply fur farming as a means of providing an economic livelihood for these people. The Indians of this country have proved themselves skilled workers; they have become mechanics, steel workers and so on. They have various talents, just as their white brothers have. Their women make good nurses, teachers and social workers. They have proved themselves. They have ability and culture, but they have no opportunity to express themselves. Unfortunately, their economic conditions do not permit them even to improve their health standards. The minister, who has referred to the nutritional report from northern Manitoba, must know that the health condition of the Indians in Canada is far from satisfactory.

What my colleague has said is quite true. These thirty-eight doctors, many of whom are only on part time, are catering to about 38,000 Indians. Then, hospital and other medical services must be supplied. It is my submission that medical services for Indians, and health conditions among them must be cleared up, first of all. Proper nutritional standards must be maintained among these people, and they should be taught to take care of themselves.

Had the government at Ottawa done what was done in New Zealand, our Indians could have formed themselves into a regiment of their own. Some of them could have become leaders, and from among them Indian officers could have been trained. That would have meant much to these people. The fact is, however, that the training they have received in Canada has been scarcely sufficient to render them available as officer material.

Indians have a great contribution to make. They are honest and, if given a chance, industrious. My colleague has said that next year when amendments are made to the Indian Act every effort should be made to straighten out the difficulties, and in doing so the cooperation of this group would be assured. Meantime something more effective should be done to remedy existing conditions.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not think it would be fair to let the item pass without tendering a word of compliment to the minister. From what one has heard to-day it might be thought that the department had been remiss in its duty. I know, of course, that improvements could be made, but I also know, after making an investigation into Indian affairs wider than has been made by most members, that the department, under the present minister, has advanced the position of the Indians. On the occasions I have made investigations in the last six or eight years, in respect of about twenty-five reservations, I have made a compilation of what in my opinion should be done, and while doing this I have seen considerable improvement in the position now occupied by the Indians in Canada.

Right along I have had in mind asking in due course for the setting up of a royal commission to thoroughly investigate Indian affairs in this country. Let it be understood that I am not finding fault with departmental officials. What I have in view is to improve the Indian set-up from beginning to end.

I have made surveys of these reservations —not just one or two of them, but no less than twenty-five, many of which were in remote areas. And this summer I am going to much more remote areas. I can say that since the present minister has taken control of the Indian affairs branch conditions have greatly improved, but there is room for more improvement.

Someone has referred to Indian representation, and with what was said I agree. In my view the time has come when they should be given representation. It has been pointed out that the Maoris have it. That is so, but they are an altogether different race from our Indians. Then, I believe the South African government has given representation to the Kaffirs to the extent of four members. So that when the minister looks into the matter he may come forward with a programme which will carry out what has been suggested by hon.

members to my left re Indian representation.

May I congratulate the hon. gentleman with the burr, the hon. member for Selkirk. Certainly he deserves credit for the research he has made in respect of the Indians. Then, too, the hon. member for Yorkton is deserving of commendation. These men have interested themselves in the problem of helping the Indians. The minister was right when he said it has been more particularly in the last few years—I am sure it was after I came to the House of Commons—that the branch has advanced the position of the Indians in Canada. It must be given credit for all it has done, and should be encouraged to go much farther.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the attitude of the Indian affairs branch toward the conscription of Indians under the present mobilization act?

Mr. CRERAR: From a legal aspect, the Indians are liable to military service. That is the advice given by the Department of Justice. They have the same liability as anybody else in the country, because they are British subjects. I have a good deal of sympathy with the request by the Indians that they be exempted from compulsory military service. However, that matter is being studied. The total voluntary enlistments from among Indians since the outbreak of war has been 2,462.

Mr. MacNICOL: They receive the vote, do they not?

Mr. CRERAR: They will when they come back.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there any understanding in Indian treaties, or any record of conversations between Indian chiefs and representatives of the Queen which would indicate that the Indians would not be called upon to fight the white man's wars outside Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot answer the question specifically at this time, because I have not the information. However, I doubt if there would be anything in the treaty which would change the opinion given by the Department of Justice.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It will be found in some of those treaties that, in speaking to representatives of the Queen, Indian chiefs said that the Indians did not wish their sons to be compelled to fight the white man's wars outside Canada. I know that applies to some of the western tribes, at any rate. I do not know the conditions in eastern Canada. I believe that there is no objection to their volunteering, but I also believe that assurance was given to the Indians that the Queen did not desire the red man to fight the white man's wars.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall have that point inquired into.

Item agreed to.

162. Indian hospitals and general care of Indians, $1,593,980.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand that we have in Canada about 118,000 Indians in the various provinces and the northwest territories. How many medical men have we to care for them? What is spent on medical services? What payments have been made to doctors caring for the Indians?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know the exact number of full time medical men employed by the department. I believe it is about twenty. In addition to that there are nurses. I am quite willing to admit, however, that the medical services are not nearly as extensive or as widespread as they should be for the Indians. I would hope that whatever administration succeeds this one might make provision for proper facilities for medical care of these people.

Item agreed to.

166. Grants to residential schools, $1,549,259.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the basis of these grants?

Mr. CRERAR: They are made on a pupilage basis and vary from $160 to something over $200 according to the district in which the school is located.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is that for a full year's attendance?

Mr. CRERAR: A full year's attendance, about ten months.

Item agreed to.

Immigration branch—

171. Field and inspectional service, abroad, $83,387.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. CRERAR: This is to provide the salaries of the immigration staff in London, England. We also have a man in Lisbon, Portugal, and there are also the necessary office and travelling expenses. This item has decreased greatly in recent years because many immigration offices abroad have been closed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is an increase this year.

Mr. CRERAR: There has been some additional expense at Lisbon where we had to send a man to examine certain cases that desire to come to Canada.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Have you a representative in China?

Mr. CRERAR: Not now.

Item agreed to.

508. Administration of the Immigration Act and the Chinese Immigration Act—further amount required, $12,385.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understood several times during the year from the Prime Minister that an amendment was to be made this year to the Chinese Immigration Act. My impression was that it would be designed to improve relations between this country and China, and I should like to know what has happened to the proposed amendment.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend will have to ask the Prime Minister about that because that is under the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. KNOWLES: But the administration of the act is under this department.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understood the minister to say that there is no representative in China, but according to page 126 you are voting $4,700 for a special immigration officer and controller of Chinese immigration.

Mr. CRERAR: The controller of Chinese immigration resides in Canada. I am advised that we had an officer in China but he is not there now. We are still paying his salary but he is on loan to another department.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There are no field and inspectional services abroad?

Mr. CRERAR: The position remains, but for the time being the man is in Canada but on loan to another department.

Item agreed to.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

336. Administration of soldier settlement, British family settlement, general land settlement and Veterans' Land Act, $1,440,290.

Mr. FAIR: This is the second time that this item has been called, and I hope I shall have a chance to have a little discussion on it. For the past seven years I have been asking questions in connection with this matter, and only two months ago, on June 14, I went into the matter in detail so that it will not be necessary to do so again. I think the minister will remember that on May 23 a delegation of nine, representing the soldier settlers' association of Canada, appeared before a committee of the cabinet. They presented a brief which, among other things, asked that clear titles be given to soldiers who still have land under contract with the soldier settlement board. I should like to know whether anything has been done by the committee in connection with this matter.

Mr. CRERAR: Much to my regret I must say that the committee of the cabinet which heard the delegation of ex-service men that waited upon them to ask for clear titles to their land has not yet had an opportunity to consider the matter. As the hon. member for Battle River is aware, the house has been sitting morning, afternoon and evening for the last three weeks. The brief presented was rather lengthy, and shortly after it was presented the director had to be absent from the city for a couple of weeks. I think this matter is one that should have careful consideration, and in the very near future it will be considered by the committee and by the government as a whole.

Mr. FAIR: I am glad to have that information because it is a contradiction of a statement that appeared in the May issue of The Legionary, apparently on the instructions of the Minister of Mines and Resources. I feel that when the house is in session no minister should entrust to any civil servant the making of a statement such as the one contained in this magazine. I feel also that this statement was made with the deliberate intention of priming the convention of the Canadian Legion at Vancouver against giving consideration to a resolution to be presented there asking for the granting of clear titles.

Mr. CRERAR: Before my hon. friend proceeds with that line I want to correct him right now. The article in question to which he refers to-day and to which he referred in the house on a previous occasion was asked for by the editor of The Legionary. It was prepared by the director at the request of The Legionary and sent to that magazine before anyone here knew that the delegation was on its way to Ottawa to ask for clear title to the soldier settler lands. Furthermore, my hon. friend has no right to attack the director. He has not so far attacked him to-day but he did on a previous occasion. I take full responsibility for what appeared in The Legionary, because the director spoke to me before the article was sent, and I authorized him to send it because I thought it was adding to the sum total of information on this question.

I do not care what my hon. friend may say about myself. He is free to criticize me in any way he likes, and I am free to have my opinion of his criticism, but I think that it is scarcely fair for a member of this house to make an attack on an officer of this government, and, may I say, a very successful officer. I want to add this, that the ex-soldiers of the great war and the soldiers of the present war have no better friend in this country than the gentleman who is director of the veterans' land settlement, and I will stand by that statement in this house or anywhere else despite anything my hon. friend may say.

It may be of interest to the committee, because this question has created some controversy in the country if I give a few figures. This problem of giving clear title to soldiers of the last war is not one that can be lightly embarked upon. That is why I stated a moment ago that we have not yet had time to consider fully the request of the delegation that came here. There are many aspects of that question which have to be considered.

I think it will be of interest to the committee to know that in the last five years since 1939 the total instalments due under soldier settlement sales were in round figures $5,230,000. Total payments made on those instalments due were $4,506,000. The prepayments made voluntarily, without any request or suggestion from the department, by these ex-soldiers who my hon. friend states were in a desperate plight and should therefore get free title to their land, amounted to $1,293,000. Furthermore, in the last five years 1,648 of these old soldiers have earned clear title to their land and have received clear title; and of those 1,648, 689 were granted clear title in the last fiscal year. These are facts that I wish to put before the committee because I do not wish it to get a wrong view of this whole matter.

Mr. FAIR: I am glad that the minister is feeling the pinch of his sins. He has already envisioned what I am going to say on this occasion. His statement just now reminds me of what the old politician said when he was talking to a young man about to embark on a political career. He said, "When you have something worth while to tell you do not have to talk so loud, but when you have a poor case, yell like hell." I think the minister commenced to yell a little early.

I have referred on other occasions to this statement that appeared in that magazine. I did not have an opportunity at that time to say very much about it, but I felt, as soon as the matter was brought to my attention, that I should make some objection to the article. I am objecting to it to-day. I say that it is a bitter pill and it would not go down very well if it had been printed, unaccompanied, entirely by itself. But in order that it might go down good we find that on the left-hand corner of the same page on which this statement appears there is a picture of the Governor General presenting to Carole Louise Hooey, of Toronto, the Distinguished Flying Cross won by her father, and she is proudly holding it in her hand. On the other side of the page is the winner of the Victoria Cross whom we had the pleasure of meeting in Ottawa a little over a month ago, Major Paul Triquet, V.C. That is a very nice setting for an article which is condemned from one end of Canada to the other, regardless of any statement which the minister or the director may make. Anything I have to say I am saying direct to the minister and to his director who is here. I am saying it in the house. I am not sending it to any magazine. The minister and the director are both here to question anything I may have to say.

I am now going to read the article and comment upon it as I go along. The article is headed, "Soldiers Settlement", by Gordon Murchison, director, Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act. It is found on pages 10 and 11 of the May issue of The Legionary and says:

> During the past several months a number of representations have been received by my minister, the Honourable T. A. Crerar, and by myself from or on behalf of an organization formed in Saskatoon last summer and known as the Soldier Settlers Association.

In case anyone should be in doubt about it, I want to say that other similar organizations have been in existence for a number of years. This is a brief from one that has been in existence since 1938. So that the organization which came to life in Saskatoon is not new by any means.

The article goes on:

> This association has declared its policy by a resolution, part of which calls for the cancellation of all unpaid balances due or accruing in the agreements between soldier settlers and the director representing the dominion government. I understand the dominion executive of the Canadian Legion has received similar representations, and so that the situation from the standpoint of the government and the administration may be placed fairly before the Canadian Legion and the readers of The Legionary, the Honourable Mr. Crerar has authorized me to furnish you with an official statement.
>
> First of all there is lack of evidence that the resolution and representations above referred to reflect the serious views of more than 10 per cent of soldier settlers, and, knowing the situation as I do, I am sure the great majority of the remaining 90 per cent must feel somewhat humiliated by the publicity being circulated by the few who for reasons best known to themselves and their friends endeavour to paint a dark and gloomy picture. What are the facts?

I question the figures given by the director when he says that he doubts that the resolution reflects the views of more than ten per cent of the soldier settlers. I say definitely that that is not correct. The article goes on:

I do not think that it is necessary to go further back than 1930 to review this situation in any detail. It is common knowledge that prior to 1930 successive governments had provided the means for the easement of soldier settlers' accounts to an aggregate of several millions by way of interest remissions, reductions in the cost price of live stock and land revaluation. In 1930 there was a horizontal reduction of 30 per cent in the indebtedness of every soldier settler in Canada on record at that time. This particular write-off totalled $11,302,127.56.

During the difficult days of the thirties when farm revenue reached an all-time low due to price or climatic factors, soldier settlers—like tens of thousands of other farmers—were unable to meet contract indebtedness of one kind and another. A year's interest charges were cancelled in 1932 totalling $1,308,492.16, and commencing the following year a bonus plan was introduced which provided for a credit of $2 for every $1 paid on matured instalments. This arrangement existed for a period of five years. Its value to the settlers concerned totalled $3,426,293.43.

Going over that paragraph, let me say that in 1932, the year in which these interest payments were cancelled, the farmers of Canada received five per cent of the national income. I ask the minister and the director, how in the world can any farmer pay interest when they receive only such a small proportion of the national income? It is utterly impossible and the condition was entirely man-made.

Again we come to the credit of $2 for every $1 paid on the soldier's indebtedness. This benefited only those who had money to pay on their debts; the man who had no money received no benefit from that reduction. When he got this legislation through the house doing away with the two for one bonus in 1938 the Minister of Mines and Resources did not have the support of one member of any party, but the policy of the government was put into effect.

The article continues:

In 1935 the Farmers Creditors' Arrangement Act came into force, and soldier settlers had the same rights under the act as other farmers. Up to the end of 1937 only a limited number of soldier settlers availed themselves of this right, but commencing in 1938 no fewer than 3,504 settlers had their affairs adjusted—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Chairman it is six o'clock.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say a word to the committee with reference to the question of adjournment. I believe hon. members are pretty well agreed that it should be possible to conclude the business of this part of the session before the day is over, but it may require something in the way of cooperation between the different parties. There is always difficulty in winding up the business of parliament before adjournment where bills require royal assent. In the first place, arrangements have to be made for the presence of the deputy of the governor general at a particular hour. This necessitates some notice. The other house must also assemble in advance. This procedure necessitates, in an endeavour to make the necessary arrangements, some preliminary and tentative undertakings on the part of the Prime Minister.

If there are any matters which hon. members think may involve discussion perhaps they could be mentioned at once so that they might be taken up before other items are proceeded with. If, however, the discussion is likely to be the regular discussion that is had on different items—and there are only comparatively few items left—there should be little difficulty in getting through fairly early to-night.

I might say that in the old days in this house, I have frequently known the house to sit until daybreak in order to conclude its business, and have seen that done two or three nights in succession. I take a little pride in the fact that I was the first one to bring forward in this house the proposal to adopt the rule that the sittings should conclude at eleven o'clock in the evening. That is a rule which is applicable from day to day throughout the entire session. However, in winding up the business of the house I think we must ask hon. members to cooperate with the government in seeking some finality, not for the advantage of anyone but for the convenience of all.

What I would suggest is that the house might agree to continue its sitting until seven o'clock, and meet again at eight, with the understanding that we would continue in session until business is concluded. If that were agreeable I should be very thankful and I am sure all hon. members would appreciate such a decision in almost equal measure. It would be most unfortunate, I suggest, if we had to continue over into another day or until very late to-night. If the house were agreeable I would suggest that we continue until seven and resume at eight.

Mr. GILLIS: So far as we are concerned, we are prepared to cooperate with the Prime Minister in that request and sit as long as necessary to complete the business. I would suggest, however, that the page boys be permitted to go home. It is not necessary to punish them more than we have to.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With all due deference to everyone who has spoken, I would point out to those who desire to see the session closed to-night that we recently had placed on the table $21 million of supplementary estimates. We have still 140 items to pass, and there are contentious matters such as the soldier settlement board and the whole of the Department of Finance. I believe it was said the other day that it is our duty as members to give the best attention we can to these items. We are sitting eight hours a day, and I think it will be agreed that the heat and humidity are unusual. We have a duty to perform and we should do that duty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that if there is anything the hon. member feels is being neglected or anything that is being overlooked, which should be discussed, I wholly withdraw what I have expressed in the way of a request. But simply to keep parliament going on from day to day, after the longest session this house has had in many years and where matters have been as far advanced as they have been in this session, creates I think a situation all aspects of which should be considered. My hon. friend mentions finance estimates. The estimates of the finance department have been before the house for months. We have discussed financial matters at great length throughout the entire session. If there is something in the estimates of the minister that is contentious we might be told about it at once so that the item could be brought on for discussion immediately. It does not follow that because sums of money are voted quickly members have not had an opportunity to consider the items to which they relate. I point this out only because I do not wish the government to be put in a false light before the country, while on the other hand I do desire, as leader of the government, to do all I can to accommodate the great majority if not all of the members of the house. To save public expense and the necessity of another day or two of sitting, if that involves having made now one or two addresses that might be delivered another day, the house might, I think, adopt the suggestion I have offered.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I suggest a compromise as regards the supper hour. Perhaps we could continue either until seven o'clock or until we have disposed of items 336 and 337, now under discussion, whichever happens first. That would mean that those who are not going to speak on those items could go out and eat.

Mr. HANSELL: Personally I do not care very much when we eat, but so far as this group is concerned there is only one matter now that we are vitally interested in, namely, the item being discussed by the hon. member for Battle River. After that is disposed of, so far as we are concerned we can adjourn at any time. This group has tried to form the habit of talking on big issues without neglecting the little ones.

Mr. GRAYDON: We have attempted to cooperate as best we could toward the closing of the session. I believe I made it clear on a previous occasion that so far as we are concerned it is a question of going as long as it is necessary in order to get the business of parliament done. There is a tendency sometimes to extend the sittings of the house, perhaps unconsciously and thoughtlessly, and sometimes not to the great advantage of the national interest.

My hon. friend mentioned amounts that were involved. I have never said this in the house before, but I shall say it now because, to my mind, the amount of money involved is a wholly improper basis of assessing the extent to which time should be consumed in debates on estimates. Sometimes some of the smallest items involve the biggest principles. In the largest amounts sometimes there is very little to do but let them go through, because they have been properly understood by the house and the house is desirous of seeing them go through without needless delay.

I have seen parliament criticized wrongly by some outside and sometimes by hon. members inside because large amounts have gone through in a few minutes. That gives the public a wrong impression; it confuses the public mind when they are not aware of the exact situation with respect to estimates of this kind.

I rose to say that I hope no one outside will feel that when estimates are going through at this time, particularly when we consider that the very same principles have been debated on the war appropriation bill at considerable length, they are going through without being properly considered. If there were to be any curtailment of a real character at this time I would not agree to cooperate with the government even with respect to a matter of this kind. It is only because I believe that we have practically completed a proper study of these matters so far as the public is concerned that I am desirous of recording myself and my party as being ready to cooperate to have the session closed to-night if possible.

I may say to the Prime Minister that I think with one or two items in the case of pensions and national health and one item in legislation in which I am specially interested which should only take a few moments, there is, from my point of view, nothing much more, that has to be considered at any length. Therefore I wish to put myself on record in respect of this matter at the moment.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the committee have unanimous consent to carry on until seven o'clock?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Chairman, had I been allowed to continue I believe that I would have been finished by this time and the committee would have had the pleasure of hearing the pleasant voice of the minister instead of this rasping voice of mine. I was stating that:

> . . . no fewer than 3,504 settlers had their affairs adjusted by total write-offs under this act of $6,754,851.28, made up of $3,281,990.92 in interest charges and $3,472,860.36 in reductions of principal. In the course of adjustment operations under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act extending over a period of approximately six years it was inevitable that some inequality of treatment would occur, either because the deterioration which had taken place was not fully taken into account or because in the alternative unsatisfactory farming conditions continued beyond reasonable expectations. Mainly, however, the break in the long spell of drought conditions and improved farm revenue closely synchronized with the outbreak of the war in 1939. There were some local exceptions to this, but that was the general situation.
>
> During the early summer of 1942 a select committee of the House of Commons made inquiry into the affairs of soldier settlers as a result of which the government by executive order authorized the director on application by settlers to review the accounts of soldier settlers who continued to be faced with an unduly heavy burden, and, with the approval of the treasury board, to reduce these accounts to reasonable levels. Adjustments under this heading are now nearing completion, and it is estimated that approximately 1,600 soldier settlers, principally in Saskatchewan and Alberta, will benefit to a total of approximately $1,075,000. In 1,336 cases adjusted to date the reduction in debt has totalled $841,437.37.

Let me point out here, since the director neglected to do so, that in most cases those settlers have been slaves of this economic system, slaves of climatic conditions and other things for the past twenty-five years. Under the agreement they are allowed to continue for at least another twenty years. This means that a number of those settlers will be eighty to ninety years old by the time they have their contract completed, provided that conditions allow them to complete them at that time.

There is another recommendation that was made by the committee, I believe, and the director also neglected to give it, namely, that the settler should have a certain equity in his land after this adjustment is made. That equity, I believe, exceeded fifty per cent. I am not sure about that. If I am not correct in that impression the minister can correct me a little later on.

I continue with the article, under the heading of "A New Situation":

> There is some realism about these extensive adjustments referred to above which no amount of argument can dispel, and there is abundant evidence that the realistic manner in which these adjustments were carried out, coupled with the general improvement in farming conditions, have, in fact brought about an entirely new situation.

Let me point out that improvements in farming conditions are not entirely responsible for the payments that have been made on soldier settlers' contracts.

It is generally agreed that a number of sons and daughters of those settlers are in the service, and a lot of their money has been used up to make good the contracts of their fathers who fought in the last war. It is also recognized by those who want to be fair that a number of sons and daughters of those same settlers took employment in munition factories and other places, and for that reason they have been able to make payments on their father's farms; otherwise we would have an entirely different situation. It took another war to bring about prosperity so that a small percentage of the settlers could claim titles to their land.

I continue:

> What is the new record of soldier settlers in meeting the terms of their agreements during the past few years? I set out below the official record, which furnishes factual evidence that soldier settlers generally are the kind of people I have always known them to be—honest, reliable citizens who believe in fair play and the payment of their honest obligations.

May I pause for a moment. I agree entirely with that. I believe those soldier settlers are honest to the last man, but I also believe that they were saddled with conditions, because of an improvised land scheme which made it impossible for them to live up to the terms of their contract.

I continue with the article:

> 1. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1942, 7,314 soldier settlers had current instalments due totalling $1,039,050.75. Six thousand three hundred and four of these settlers paid $957,227.59 or 92 per cent of the current instalments due, and 1,504 of them made repayments of an additional $213,520.50.

2. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, 6,860 soldier settlers had current instalments due totalling $983,103.54. Five thousand five hundred and fourteen of these settlers paid $841,110.25 or 85 per cent of the current instalments due, and 1,448 of them made prepayments of an additional $257,754.37.

3. In the fiscal year which ended March 31, 1944, 6,364 soldier settlers had current instalments due totalling $860,871.83. To February 29, of this year, 5,612 of these settlers had paid $991,508.04 or 115·7 per cent of the current instalments due, and 2,066 of them had made prepayments of an additional $443,619.39.

4. This record of performance means that soldier settlers are generally taking advantage of conditions and paying off their indebtedness. Since the outbreak of war, 1,528 of them have retired their loans in full and have secured the titles to their farms, and as time goes on the number will steadily increase.

I must give another fact that is not mentioned by the director in his article; that is, that a great deal of pressure has been applied on these settlers to make them pay up. A number of these men who have joined up for the second time, offering their all on the altar of sacrifice, as the result of an order in council have had to contribute a certain percentage of their dependents' allowance to be applied on their debt to the soldier settlement board. This may be denied once again as it was denied previously, on May 23. If that denial should be made this afternoon I should like to refer the minister to a particular case, M-42517, Corporal C. J. Lefley. I do not think the minister will take the trouble to investigate this case, however, because he will find that the result is against him. In this family there are eight children, six of whom are going to school and two of whom are too young to go to school. A short time ago their father was employed at the internment camp at Lethbridge, and $13 a month is being deducted from the dependents' allowance of that family to clear off the soldier settler's debt to the board. These facts were not given to the country by the director, and I think it only fair that they should be mentioned now. I continue reading:

In the face of the above factual information, what is the logic behind the argument that soldier settlers of record to-day should have their contract indebtedness cancelled, which means in effect legislation into ownership? Do the sponsors of the petition believe that this would be the end of the matter? Do they think for a moment that those who have paid for their farms, and all those who are meeting the terms of their agreements in full and on time or are prepaying their agreements, would stand quietly by and make no demand for a refund? I have received direct assurances that such demands would be made.

In all the discussions I have had concerning this matter with soldier settlers and others I have met only two people, namely the Minister of Mines and Resources and the director, who have taken this stand. I question here the statement that a number of these men have stated that demands would be made for refunds. In order to obtain definite information I placed upon the order paper the following questions:

1. From January 1, 1943, to May 31, 1944, how many requests from, (a) organizations; (b) individuals, have been received by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Mines and Resources, the director of soldier settlement and Veterans' Land Act, or any other department of the government, asking that veterans of great war one who now hold land under contract with the soldier settlement board be given titles without further payments?

The answer given was:

(a) 10; (b) 186 soldier settlers—60 other individuals.

My second question, on which I had hoped to get some information, although I was not disappointed when I did not get it, was

2. During the same period, how many letters or other communications were received by the director or other departments of the government stating that if clear titles, as above requested, were granted, requests for refunds by those who have already paid up or are continuing to make payments, would be made?

In asking that question I desired to get the names and addresses of those who had made such representations, with the intention of writing those people and finding out if they had actually done so and, if so, what was the basis for their argument. The answer was:

No record maintained. Representations have been made in confidence to the director and members of his staff.

If that information is available it should be produced so that we may know what is being done. The third question was:

3. What are the names and addresses of those from whom such letters and communications have been received?

The answer is:

Answered by No. 2.

I believe that questionnaire will take care of itself. Now I read the last paragraph of this article, under the heading "No Change":

In conclusion I am authorized to say that the proposal is not deemed to be in the public interest and, consequently, it is not being entertained by the government. Therefore, the best advice I can offer to the soldier settlers concerned is to get into step with those who manifestly prefer securing title to their farms by complying with the terms of their agreements.

That information was given before the convention was held, and apparently before the minister and his committee had a chance to discuss the matter, so that I do not know whether the government is behind this. I hope not, because I am quite satisfied that a very high percentage of the members of the cabinet are favourable to cleaning up the mistakes of the old soldier settlement board before embarking upon the new programme under the Veterans' Land Act. Two months ago to-day, on June 14, I went into this matter in detail and placed quite a number of figures on record. To-day I am going to use just a few of those figures. The total number of men settled after the last war was 25,017. The total amount advanced by the government was $109,034,331. The total amount of principal repaid, up to March 31, 1944, was $50,507,493.20 and the total interest paid to the same date was $25,381,060.13. That covered the payments by soldier settlers and civilians who later bought the land, I might add in a number of cases at much less than half the original price to the soldier settler. I believe this is sufficient to indicate that the men were settled on that land originally with a load they could never hope to carry under the conditions to which they were subjected. In the case of soldier settlers the principal cancelled, under five or six different schemes, was $24,867,637.64, and the interest cancelled amounted to $19,234,239.77. That made a total cancellation of principal and interest of $44,101,877.41.

The cost of administration—and this is of interest to the whole country and was not given by the director in his article in The Legionary—was $27,346,763.64, making a total including cancellation of principal and interest and administration of $71,442,641.05. At the end of March, 1944, which was the end of the last fiscal year, the soldier settlers owed the government $7,715,954.01. At that time, in spite of the figures given by the minister to-day in regard to arrears, and the figures mentioned by the director in his article in The Legionary, there were arrears on account of soldier settlers amounting to $1,054,269.30. At that time we had remaining on the land some 6,153 of these settlers. Here also, in spite of the figures given to-day by the minister, it is interesting to note that up to the end of March of this year only a little over 4,000 of these 25,017 settlers had obtained title to their land, so that the general picture is not nearly so bright as the minister would have the committee believe. At this time, twenty-five years after the inception of the scheme, we still have 6,153 of these settlers under contract with the settlement board. That is approximately twenty-five per cent of the original number of settlers after twenty-five years of persecution. The minister did admit on one occasion that the scheme was a hastily improvised one. I have claimed, and still claim, that the land, implements and stock were bought at highly inflated prices, and that grain and other products since that time have been down to all-time low prices. Yet the settlers were still expected to make payments, and live up to the terms of their contracts. The average original debt of the settlers was $4,358.40. At the end of March of this year we found that on an average they still owed $1,254, or twenty-nine per cent of the original amount. This is the figure, even after taking into consideration the cancellation of some $44,000,000. That is not a very bright picture. This amount of $1,254 is equal to approximately twenty-nine per cent of the original debt.

Another matter has not been touched upon before, one which I think I should mention at this time. I have in mind the soldiers who will come back from this war, and who will operate under the Veterans' Land Act. That soldier will have a grant of thirty-nine per cent of the total amount of his loan. I repeat that the soldier settler under the present Veterans' Land Act, if he takes full advantage of the legislation, will have a free grant of $2,320, which is equal to thirty-nine per cent of the amount of his loan. Under the old scheme there was no grant available, but we did have cancellations because of a faulty set-up.

I would ask the minister and the government to take these matters into consideration. I would also ask them to consider the fact that under the old act the settlers were charged five per cent on current loans and seven per cent on past-due accounts. So that in a very large percentage of cases the old soldier settlers from the first great war were paying twice the amount of interest that the veterans from this war will have to pay, because most of the payments of the old soldier settlers were in arrears.

I say to-day, as I said before, that 3½ per cent is still too high a rate. So that the veterans from the first great war were charged more than twice what they should have been charged. I do not know whether I should go much farther in this connection. I believe the government is well aware of all the conditions. After this article had been published in The Legionary, and after the writer had made this trip to the west coast, we find a committee was set up out there, and that that committee framed a resolution. The resolution did not come before the convention. I do not know why. There were, however, some other resolutions which I understand were left over. This is the resolution:

> Whereas any civilian at the age of 70 years, and burnt-out veterans at the age of 60 years, are presumed to be past the age where they may be expected to be self-supporting;
>
> And whereas settlers under the Soldier Settlement Act have in many cases been resident on their holdings for a quarter of a century and are fast approaching the age when they will be incapable of self-support;

And whereas under the new land act the new veteran is only called upon to pay 3½ per cent interest, and after ten years' residence 25 per cent of his indebtedness is cancelled;

And whereas the soldier under the Soldier Settlement Act has had to pay, and is still paying 5 per cent interest;

Therefore be it resolved that, in order to be fair to our aging veterans and to bring the old and the new settlement acts more into line, the dominion government be asked to readjust the debts of the 6,153 original soldier settlers who have not paid for their lands, such readjustment to take into consideration the difference in interest rates charged under the said acts; and that following such readjustment the government be further asked to cancel the debts of those original soldier settlers whose debt has been, or may hereafter be, reduced to 25 per cent of the original purchase price or the reduced purchase price, and that the interest rate to such veterans be reduced to 3½ per cent.

This is signed by:

Mr. R. H. Inglis, Alberta,
Mr. B. V. Cameron, Ontario,
Mr. J. J. MacIntosh, N.S.
Mr. G. A. Lauman, Manitoba,
Mr. George Noble, Quebec,
Mr. A. C. Stewart, Saskatchewan,
Mr. H. W. Ellis, British Columbia.

And the footnote says:

The committee wish to thank the comrades whose names appear below for their assistance in framing this resolution:
Mr. A. J. Sibley, North Battleford, Saskatchewan,
Mr. F. C. Highfield, Grandview, Manitoba.
Mr. A. R. Elridge, Ladner, British Columbia.

The two former were members of the delegation which visited this house recently.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FAIR: If these gentlemen are so anxious to have the item carried I would ask the Minister of Mines and Resources to rise and tell us now—because some day, sooner or later, by this or by some other government those debts will be cancelled. If he will rise and tell us now that these veterans are to have clear title, I shall sit down. Otherwise I have something further to say. I repeat that if the minister wishes to speak in reply, and say "yes," I shall sit down.

This is not, as some have been led to believe, the request of a few people around Saskatoon. On May 23, I tabled a petition signed by 12,500 residents of the four western provinces asking, among other things, that these clear titles be granted. That is not a local affair. Petitions were circulated in the four western provinces, and the expenses of the delegation that came here were made up by contributions of nickels and dimes.

Mr. CRERAR: I understand my hon. friend to state that the position was signed by 12,500 people. I am informed, and I think my information is correct, that there were less than 200 soldier settlers, people actually interested in the matter, who signed the petition.

Mr. FAIR: The effort was entirely a voluntary one. Good care was taken to see that these men did not settle where they could effect organization, with the result that it was not possible to reach a number of them. I think the minister realizes that the petition was circulated during the winter months, and that those in charge of the petition had no records with respect to soldier settlers. However, if he will be good enough at a later date to give me a list of those settlers I believe I can prove to him that more than ten per cent—perhaps more than ninety per cent—of those soldier settlers are interested in getting clear titles. The fact that not more than 200 signed the petition is no indication whatsoever of the number who are in favour, because if the petition was not presented to them their names could not be there. When those settlers go to a meeting they have to travel at their own expense. Sometimes they have to go by team and sleigh. They are not privileged, as are government officials, to travel at government expense, and to live in the best hotels in the country while doing government business.

I am making one final appeal to-day to the government, although I do not know whether there is any use in making it to the Minister of Mines and Resources, because he has told me that there will be so much complaint, and I know from his attitude that he will not see that those titles are granted. I am sorry he has taken that stand. I know he is familiar with conditions, from practical experience. I point out to him that the government is now about to embark upon another scheme connected with men coming back from this war who have offered their all on the altar of sacrifice. If the government is interested in the success of this new scheme, then I say, "For heaven's sake clean up the slums in the old one."

It will require $7,715,000 as at March 31 last to do this job. By doing that, the government will get away from the cost of administration, which cost has been so heavy in the past. Up to March 31 of this year administration costs as far as soldier settlers are concerned ran up to $27,340,763. Those are millions of the taxpayers' money, including taxes paid by those same soldier settlers. And there will be plenty of taxes still to be paid for the new programme. So that I am sorry the government has not seen fit to take more interest in the soldier settlers from the last war. I might say here that those old settlers say that it does not make so much difference to them, because it is only a matter of time until they will be pushed off the land, or occupying their six feet of mother earth. But they are interested in the success of the scheme under the Veterans' Land Act. I would also ask the government, however, to give clear title, without any further delay.

Twenty-nine per cent of the original amount involved still remains unpaid, after deductions. A number of the settlers are too old to work the land, and they certainly have suffered plenty in the past. The conditions which caused that suffering are man-made. Why continue man-made conditions and persecutions of those people to-day? Low prices for goods sold and high prices for goods they had to buy were responsible for their condition and, as I have said before, that was a man-made condition.

The bright circumstances outlined by the minister are entirely due to war conditions, and the fact that sons and daughters of those veterans, who are working in munitions plants, or in the services, are sending home to their mothers and fathers the money they earn, so that the bailiff may not come around and put those old people out on the road—something which has been done before in a number of cases. In the interests of Canada, in the interests of the soldier settlers of great war one and in an effort to pay only part of our obligation to the veterans of the present war, I ask the government to grant clear titles to those who hold land under the old scheme. I am going to suggest also what I have suggested before. If this scheme is to be a success you must have at its head a sympathetic administrator, and I do not feel you have that to-day. If the government want to make a success of this, then I suggest that they take cognizance of what I have said this afternoon.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister gave certain figures about payments this afternoon, but when he is answering the hon. member for Battle River I should like him to say how many foreclosures there have been in the past five years, particularly in the last year, and also how many men who settled on land were forced to give up. Sometimes their sons were able to take over, and sometimes they had to give up entirely. I want to know the number of cases where the soldier settler lost his equity between 1931 and 1940.

[Mr. Fair.]

I wish to endorse what the hon. member has said. As he has stated practically what I intended to say, it is not necessary for me to repeat. However, there are one or two observations I should like to make which bear out what he has said in regard to the attitude of the government toward these soldier settlers. If proper treatment had been granted to these people I think they would have lifted their burdens. The figures given this afternoon by the minister prove conclusively that these men wanted to pay their debts and clear their land. It was just utterly impossible for them to do so because they had no source of income.

The number of men who came back from the last war and lost their land is nothing less than tragic. I know of one community to which twenty-five young men came back after the last war to take up land. They put in everything they had; they worked and slaved long hours, but to-day only three remain on the land out of the twenty-five. In at least eighty per cent of the cases where men have been forced off the land it is nothing but pure tragedy because the government failed to recognize the human side of the problem.

It was treated as a straight business proposition: "We must have the interest; we must have the money paid back. You have made an agreement and although there is no crop, you are standing in arrears." That was always the story. The figures given by the hon. member for Battle River prove conclusively that the old soldier settlement scheme was neither fair nor equitable. It was a failure so far as rehabilitating the soldiers of the last war was concerned. It did not recognize human values at all. It was a cold business proposition on the part of the government. It was simply a question of getting the interest and the money.

Adjustments were made, but they did not solve the problem for the men because they still had a pile of interest around their necks. The result of all this is that there are dozens of intensely bitter soldiers of the last war who have lost their equity after fighting and working for Canada. They are now approaching the latter years of their life and the tragedy of their position is a responsibility that the government will have to accept. Surely in the name of what is right those who are still on their land are entitled to clear titles. We would then stop all this constant bickering and fighting. It is true that some of those men were able to make their payments, but some of them had three or four sons to do the work for them while others had none. In most cases the sons were not paid at all.

By an order in council passed on March 19, 1941, the government gave power to the director of soldier settlement to take part of the dependents' allowances from soldiers who had taken up soldier settlement board land. The order in council reads as follows:

Accordingly the board recommend that notwithstanding any provision to the contrary contained in any of the regulations providing for payment of dependents' or marriage allowances in respect of dependents' of members of the Canadian armed forces, that in all cases where the dependents of an enlisted person continue to occupy the farm for which such person is indebted to the director of soldier settlement and in respect of which the contract terms are not otherwise satisfactorily provided for, there may be deducted from the dependents' or marriage allowance amounts sufficient to provide for payment of taxes levied by the local taxing authority in respect of the property in question and interest accruing annually on indebtedness to the director of soldier settlement, such deductions to be made monthly and in no case to exceed $20 per month except with the consent of the dependents concerned.

The information that has come to me is that pressure was put on some of those dependents in a way that was not justified. The minister has probably received a copy of this, but I should like to refer him to two resolutions which were passed at the convention of the Canadian legion, British empire service league, held in Calgary from June 6 to 9. This reads as follows:

Report of Soldier Settlers' Committee

Your committee appointed to deal with soldier settlers' affairs has reviewed the many resolutions sent in by the various branches, dealing with settlers' affairs and we beg to submit the following resolutions dealing with same:

Resolution 1. Whereas the majority of original soldier settlers, who are still endeavouring to carry on under the soldier settlement scheme have now found it, owing to advanced years and the adverse conditions prevailing in agriculture, particularly the lack of parity prices, increasingly difficult to liquidate their indebtedness to the settlement board.

And whereas the settlers have struggled on through the years of drought conditions and low prices unprecedented in the agricultural history of this country and have now nothing to show for their years of toil and struggle but whatever equity they may have in the land which is liable to foreclosure.

Therefore be it resolved that we now petition the government to relieve the soldier settler of any further payments and that they be given the title deed to their land or, failing this, that a parliamentary committee in conjunction with representation from the dominion command of the Canadian legion, review the whole situation of the soldier settler with a view to alleviating their present financial difficulties.

Resolution 2. Whereas it has come to our notice that by order in council the soldier settlement board has been permitted to order deductions made from the pay and allowances of dependents of men now serving in the armed forces to be applied against land and taxes.

Therefore we ask that this order in council be rescinded immediately, and that any sums of money so deducted be refunded.

I would like to know the total deductions that have been made from dependents' allowances under that order in council. I have dozens of letters I could read citing actual experiences. There should be some clause whereby if a veteran comes back under the Veterans' Land Act there should be an adjustment so that he will have an equity on parity prices, and also there should be a crop failure clause to take care of interest and principal payments in years when there is no crop at all. Otherwise I am afraid that we shall have to look forward to a continuation of what we had after the last war.

I should also like an assurance that something else might be done to make this new scheme a success, namely, that provision should be made under the Veterans' Land Act so that these men who have fought together and who, we hope, will soon be coming back will be given an opportunity, if they so desire, of working together, under direction and after training, on a cooperative farm where they can pool their activities and each make his contribution according to his own ability. Some of these men are good cattle men; some are good mechanics; some are good field men. I would suggest that some such scheme be surveyed with a view to putting it to work, which would be a great improvement over what we had after the last war.

Mr. CRERAR: I might answer now one specific question asked by the hon. member for Yorkton. He referred to P.C. 138, passed in 1936, under which deductions might be made from allowances payable to dependents of the soldier who had enlisted. The number of those who voluntarily asked for a portion of the allowance to be applied on their obligations was 243.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Soldiers or dependents?

Mr. CRERAR: Soldiers. The payments under these voluntary deductions amounted for the month of May, 1944, to $3,842. My hon. friend made some rather strong criticism of the arbitrary action, as he called it, of the government in compelling these people to give a portion of their allowance to the director of soldier settlement to meet their obligations. The total number of cases in which the deduction was made from the allowance for that purpose was thirty-eight, and the total amount collected in those thirty-eight cases in the month of May was $511.84. In some of those cases the people were living on the farm. I recall one case that came to my notice where the wife of the soldier was receiving on his behalf and on behalf of her children a dependent's allowance of $79 a month and she refused to pay a modest amount in taxes on the place. It was then a case either of the government paying the taxes to prevent a tax sale or of letting the place go to a tax sale. I do not think anyone will say that the few dollars which were taken out of the $79 allowance that she was getting created a terrific hardship or was an evidence of a stony-hearted administration. That just does not add up to common sense. I wish to say right here that there was no case in which any hardship was imposed. All that was done was done in the interest of the soldier himself. There are people who, no matter how large an allowance of money they may be receiving, simply cannot spend it wisely.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does the minister suggest that the dependents' allowance in this case was too large?

Mr. CRERAR: Nothing of the kind.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister said that a deduction was made from the allowance and that that created no hardship.

Mr. CRERAR: There was no hardship in this particular case. In addition to the $79 a month allowance that she was receiving, she rented the farm and got a revenue from that as well; she also got her own vegetables from the farm, and because a few dollars a month were deducted from her allowance to meet the obligations on the farm this administration is described by my hon. friend as wholly oblivious to humane considerations. I say that that just does not add up to common sense.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The legion in Calgary thought it was of sufficient importance to pass that resolution.

Mr. CRERAR: And the dominion legion as a whole, having considered this matter and having had it before them frequently, passed no resolution about it.

Mr. HANSELL: What steps are being taken by the government to coordinate the post-war schemes under the Veterans' Land Act with the various schemes that may be undertaken by provincial governments? Have there been any negotiations between provincial governments and this government in that respect? What I have in mind is that the Alberta government have one of the finest land settlement schemes that have ever been offered to the soldier. Under that scheme a soldier is given what practically amounts to a gift of one-half section of land. He settles on it and for the first three years he pays nothing on it at all, not even the taxes. For the next seven years all he pays is one-eighth of his production, and if there is no production there is no payment due. At the end of that ten-year period he gets a clear title to the land. That is one of the greatest land settlement schemes that have ever been devised. I am wondering whether there have been any negotiations between this government and the provincial governments with a view to coordinating these different schemes. It may be that a soldier does not want to come under the Veterans' Land Act in its entirety, but he may want to come under a provincial scheme while still getting some little benefit from the scheme which the federal government is operating.

Mr. CRERAR: Discussions have taken place with officials of the provincial governments, and I have not the slightest doubt that we shall receive the full cooperation of every provincial government in this matter.

Mr. HANSELL: And vice versa?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. We are grateful to the provinces for their assistance and for the advice of their technical men in regard to soil conditions and everything else entering into this scheme.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I asked how many soldier settlers lost their equity through foreclosure or through turning over their land and becoming renters from 1931 to 1940.

Mr. CRERAR: I am sorry I have not that information. A great many of these people just got up and left their farms. I know of several cases of that in a certain district in Manitoba. If you include those, there would be a considerable number. But there were comparatively few cases where the settler left the land as the result of pressure put upon him by the department. In the great majority of cases they left and the department did not learn for months afterwards that they had left.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There were originally 25,000 settlers. How many have now received clear title and have everything clear?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend asked the same question when veterans' affairs were dealt with by the house and I put the whole information on Hansard—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That was a year ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): —absolutely in detail. My hon. friend had left the chamber before I had an opportunity of answering him.

An hon. MEMBER: It was this session.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. FAIR: Before we leave this matter am I to understand that the minister is not going to answer any questions I have asked or any statements I have made?

Mr. CRERAR: I told my hon. friend that a delegation of ex-soldiers had waited on a committee of the cabinet and that their representations will in the near future receive full consideration. Until they have received the consideration of the committee and of the government I am unable to say what the final action will be. I have stated that at least three times and I hope I shall not have to state it again. For the information of the committee I gave certain additional facts on the payments that had been made over the last five years for the number of soldier settlers who had received title. It is a matter for warm congratulation that these men have made the payments they have and that in that period over a million and a quarter dollars have been prepaid voluntarily, not asked for by the department. I do not think there is further information to give.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that consideration will be given by the government to the representations made by the soldier settlers?

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I join with my hon. friends to the left who have spoken on this matter and express the hope that sympathetic consideration will be given so far as the settlers' claims are concerned.

Item agreed to.

At seven o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CRERAR: I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government House,
Ottawa, August 14, 1944.

Sir:—I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excelleny the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day, Monday, August 14, at 10.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. L. Redfern,
Secretary to the Governor General.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

REFERENCE TO MR. LACROIX, FORMER MEMBER FOR BEAUCE

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. During the last election campaign in the province of Quebec a newspaper in an otherwise excellent report of a meeting stated that I had mentioned a letter from the Clerk of the House of Commons to the effect that the former member for Beauce had not said a word during this session from the month of January to the time of his resignation. I never mentioned the Clerk of the House, but I have a letter in my possession which I can show to any hon. member to that effect.

The point I am making, sir, is that I have already given a question to the Clerk of the House asking if the then member for Beauce had spoken once during this session. This is a matter of public information and public interest. That question has not been put on the order paper or on the Votes and Proceedings. My submission is that I took every precaution to get the information. I went to the Hansard office and checked the index which is made by an expert staff. There was nothing in the name of the hon. member for Beauce. My contention is that it is not only my right but my duty to inform the electors of Beauce and of the country at large that that great defender of the throne and the altar had not said a word in debate or discussion from the month of January until he resigned in July.

Mr. CRERAR: I would ask that we revert to motions for a moment, Mr. Speaker.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

CONCURRENCE IN ELEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Ottawa West for Mr. Moore) presented the eleventh report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask if this is the usual form of a report of this kind?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): As a member of the 1934 committee I can assure my hon. friend that this is the same procedure as was adopted with respect to the report of that committee.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Before this motion carries, I have to bring to the attention of the house this fact. The banking and commerce committee concluded its sittings immediately after the provincial election was over in Alberta. It might be a pure coincidence, I do not know, but it is a chronological fact that anyone can observe. Besides that, sir, with all due respect to everybody, I think that in these times when we are preaching thrift and economy of paper I cannot see why we are printing again the reports of a committee which has been absolutely useless. It has been a picayune discussion from beginning to end. I do not see why intelligent men have been arguing during the whole session on the supposed hidden reserves of banks when they knew very well that the trouble does not lie with hidden reserves. "Hidden" is not the proper word. These reserves were not hidden because they were familiar to the Minister of Finance. What is wrong in our finance; what is wrong in the finance of the United States—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The motion is that the report of the committee be concurred in. I hope the hon. gentleman is not going to go into the whole subject of finance.

Mr. POULIOT: It is elementary that I have the right to do that. I did that when the report of the civil service committee was brought in. If there is a time when we have a right to discuss what has been argued by a committee it is precisely when the committee, which is just a gathering of a few members of the house who have been appointed to study the matter of banking for the house, report to us. We are the judges. They are there to do the work which is assigned to them by the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. As I understand the report, sir—I may be in error—it asks for permission of this house to have the proceedings printed. If that is so, it does not raise any question of policy or any question of dispute or the various disputations before the committee this session. It is purely a matter of printing or not printing the proceedings.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall give reasons why this report should not be printed, but should go right away to the waste-paper basket. I am telling the house, sir, that the report of this committee is childish, that the work of the committee was childish from the start. They were arguing like children when everybody knew where the trouble lay. What is the trouble with Canadian finance? The trouble we have now with banking is precisely that of international finance which has been denounced in the United States. Canadian companies have been denounced by the attorney general of the United States and here we are discussing hidden reserves of the banks. The hidden reserves are a matter of a few millions while the debt created this year amounts to billions of dollars, and this is the work that serious members of parliament have done during the whole session. I know they have worked hard, but they have not worked any harder than members who were working on the election after Bennett was thrown out of power.

Hon. members worked for one whole session, if not two sessions, keeping at it day and night in order to improve the election act, but what did they do? They took the old one, after a year and a half or two years of work. The work done by the banking and commerce committee of this house this session is perfectly useless; it is childish. As one who had to fight with the potentates and pontiffs of finance in years gone by, when I had to denounce them in the caucus room—so much so that the day I told one of them to swallow what he had said about me he had a fit—I denounce the work of that committee. Now one of them is the boss of finance in this country and he holds the strings of international finance in his hands; yes, and he is not far from me now. He runs the whole show.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that committee should be instructed to reconsider its report, to make a new study of the matter in the light of what has been said privately by some of its members. Then its work will be useful to the country, because the Canadian people will know what is bad about finance. I do not mean to say that all banks are bad; not at all. Some banks are run in an honest way; but we see the president of one bank, who was chairman of the victory loan committee, becomes associated with the C.I.L. and then get away from the victory loan organization because he is too busy to look after that work; he is too busy sitting on the board of C.I.L. He takes advantage of the credit he got for the work he did in organizing the victory loan campaign, and now he sits on the board of C.I.L. to protect them. Against what? Against arrest? Against what has been done in the United States? Everybody knows this; it is in the press, so that I am not telling anything new. I am fed up with this situation. We must get to the bottom of it, and then we shall see that the marrow is rotten.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I realize that we are not in committee, but perhaps someone can answer this question. Does the motion call for the printing of the report only, or for the printing of all the evidence taken before the committee?

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes, all the evidence.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then in spite of the fact that the previous speaker has said there may be a great deal of piffle in the material, there is also a great deal that is worth while. In previous years I have had a good many requests for copies of the evidence taken by that committee when those copies have not been available, so that it seems to me desirable that this material should be in printed form.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I do not agree with the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that this evidence should not be printed. I believe that a great deal of very valuable information can be given the country by having the proceedings printed and made available. One valuable purpose that may be served is this. We can show how the Progressive Conservative party played its part by recommending in that committee anything that was progressive. If ever there was a chance in Canada for a party with the distinction of the Progressive Conservative party really to tell this country they were going places in the matter of reform, it was in the banking and commerce committee. But when the Canadian people read this report they will discover that it is the same old Conservative party with another name added.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. POULIOT: On division.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

571. Departmental administration — further amount required, $2,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister any comment to make in regard to the matter which I mentioned while the Prime Minister was piloting his external affairs estimates through the committee this morning? At that time I referred to an editorial in the Financial Post which called for some integration and planning in relation to our foreign representation with respect to both the usual matters of external affairs and matters of trade and commerce. I believe the minister was in the committee at the time I made my remarks, and I wondered if he had any further comment to make.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I listened carefully to the answer given the leader of the opposition by the Prime Minister, and I do not think I can add anything to that statement. It was made after very careful consideration of the whole problem, extending over many months, by a committee consisting of three officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce and three officials of the Department of External Affairs, as the Prime Minister pointed out. I believe the report was unanimous on the part of officials of the two departments, and naturally I am fully in accord with the statement made by the Prime Minister.

Item agreed to.

573. Commercial intelligence service—further amount required, $38,000.

Mr. POULIOT: In our dealings with other countries, especially Mexico and the countries of South America, we should not forget the patriotism that is burning in the hearts of those people. If we want to make a success of our trade with Mexico and South America, and even the West Indies, we should go there by ourselves, entirely independent of the United States. Canada should go there as mistress of her own destiny. Of course it is a good thing to be on the best possible terms with our neighbours to the south, but on the other hand they must never become the guardians of Canada. If we come under the tutelage of the United States in our dealings with other countries we shall share the animosity felt toward that country by various other peoples. There are reasons for that. Do you know, Mr. Chairman, that in the United States embassy in Mexico there are nine hundred people, and that it is impossible to secure travel priority even from one South American country to another without the permission of United States authorities. Therefore it is of the utmost importance that any propaganda we disseminate in other countries should be carried on in the name of Canada alone, as a country which is commercially independent. Once before in this session I emphasized the importance of commercial independence for Canada. We should be commercially independent of all other countries, without any exceptions, to fight our way ahead in trading on all the markets of the world. I will not insist more upon that, but I notice at this date—the most important day of the session—few remaining members of the Bloc Populaire of Quebec are shining by their presence while we are fighting the fight of the people. They were never here, and when they were here it was just the same as if they were non-existent.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

195. Departmental administration, $161,172.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, sir, I will tell the minister again what I have told him before, that I have the highest possible regard for him. He is one of the two or three most likable ministers in the cabinet. I say that with a great deal of pleasure.

On the other hand, how is it that last year the minister wrote me that Charlet would have his pension? He wrote that in August of last year—a year ago. He has received a small amount, but it is impossible for the returned man to get a proper pension from the Department of Pensions and National Health. I want the staff to be changed, from the deputy minister down. I have asked that before, and I ask it now, when they are in the house. I want a change of personnel in that department, so that the returned men may have justice.

I have been fighting for this man who came to me the other day and asked me to endorse a note. I am a poor man. A large part of my indemnity goes for the payment of taxes. We have no other source of revenue. I would like to be rich. I would like to be able to give money to those poor men, but it is not my duty to do that. It is the duty of the department. There is no excuse, when a man is entitled to a pension, according to the word of the minister, that this man should not receive a pension. I had to write a letter for this man, and address it to the bank manager, so that he may renew this man's small note.

How is it that it is impossible to get satisfaction from the commissioner? To-day I wrote a letter to the minister complaining about the information he has received from his officials regarding the case of a man suffering from a heart ailment. Afterwards this case was rearranged by the chairman of the board. When I brought this matter to the minister's attention for the first time he told me that this man had been examined by the army and that the case should be placed before the Department of National Defence.

But now it is not that, at all. It is a case where this man is refused a pension because of wrong information given to the Minister of Pensions and National Health by his officials, after consultation with the guilty parties—those who are responsible for the fact that this man was not looked after and that he died without the assistance either of a chaplain or a doctor. It is a very sad case. It is a case with which the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence is familiar. My letter will probably be transcribed to-morrow. But in that letter I told the Minister of Pensions and National Health that the thing he should do would be to get in touch by telephone or otherwise with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, so as to get a true picture of this very sad case.

I have been fighting for the draftees, and I fight also for the soldiers. It is absurd that a member of parliament should have to give so much time to cases which are as clear as crystal water, and which should be decided favourably. How is it that the officials of the Department of Pensions and National Health find it so hard to understand, when these are typical cases of men who are wholly deserving of pensions? I think there should be a change. It took twelve months, and in the meantime legislation has been passed.

I have given credit to the minister, because some cases have been settled satisfactorily for the men. That is why I was pleased to say a good word for him. It is most unpleasant to say disagreeable things in the house all the time. It is much more satisfactory to speak otherwise, when occasion arises, and to say things which are pleasant, when one is satisfied that things are working well. But there must be a fate attached to certain deserving cases, when the men cannot secure the pensions to which they are entitled.

This case of Charlet is a case with which the minister must be familiar. This man received a small amount the other day, but the amount of pension is not yet settled. I hope the minister will give definite instructions to have it settled. Otherwise I shall stick to this case, and he may be sure that I will bring down the file and read it—and it is a big one—for the edification of members.

It is a strange thing; there is a man who is a high official in the department, a man who is supposed to be infallible and whose word is all-powerful. He gets more important according to the size of his staff. Naturally the deputy minister is the big boss in the department, because he has all the department around him—all the boys who smoke, and all the girls who knit. They are all around him, to give him more power. But when it comes to the case of a poor fellow who has been badly wounded in an accident, and who is entitled to redress of his wrongs at the hands of the state, how is it that Jean-François Pouliot has to repeat the same thing so often in the House of Commons, without succeeding to make himself heard by the officials of the department?

I do not complain about the kind of correspondence I have received from the minister, because it is the finest of its kind. I do not complain about the style of it, but I regret that he is wrongly informed. I regret that he does not fire those who have been appointed as deputy heads in his department by R. B. Bennett.

When I must choose between the poor devil who has been wounded while serving his country and the big and powerful man who earns a big salary, I choose the weaker one. I choose the little soldier, and I fight for him because he is alone. The big man has the whole government to fight for him; he is all-powerful, because he has a big salary, one which amounts to several times the pension asked by the poor devil, who will not get it.

How many pensions were granted to men who were undeserving of them between 1919 and 1935? During this war we have had to fight to the utmost to get for those humble men who have been wounded in service what they are entitled to, according to the law—not the new law, but the old law which has been in existence since the last war. It is impossible to get justice for these men. We should fire the big ones; we should help the small ones and they should be helped right away. Why wait so long? Why say that we will wait for the benefits under the new legislation? There is the legislation which is in force and which could protect those poor devils who have been wounded, which should protect the mothers of dead soldiers, which should protect the wives and children of soldiers. Why not apply it now?

If the new legislation which is supposed to accomplish such marvellous things is enforced in the same way as the old legislation has been, no returned man will get any benefits from it. There is the case of Charles Pelletier, which I have mentioned. There are many others I could deal with, but I shall not impose on the committee to-night. These are cases of soldiers who have been wounded and who have written to me to ask that their wrongs and grievances be redressed. It is not a pleasure for me to do this; it is my duty and I do it now. I hope I shall have a satisfactory answer in connection with this young man who has been entitled to a pension since August of last year according to the word of the minister himself.

Then there is the case of Philippe Beaubien, one of the most shameful cases that occurred in Lauzon camp in Quebec city. In that case I asked the minister of pensions to see to it that a pension was awarded to the mother. I ask that this wrong be redressed by firing those who have been so criminally negligent. I know the feeling of members and I am not going to impose on the committee which has been most kind to me. However, these are things that cannot be left over. This is the time to discuss them; it is our duty to discuss them and I will fight for them as much as I can.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I wish to deal quietly with some of the observations of the hon. member for Témiscouata. I have not seen him here for the last three weeks. On frequent occasions he has submitted to me a list of twenty cases which I have personally investigated with the utmost sympathy and, if I may say so without any suggestion of boastfulness, some knowledge of pensions procedure extending over some thirty years. I may say that I want to vindicate the judgment of the pensions committee in every single case that was brought to my attention.

When my hon. friend suggests that there is any lack of human sympathy among those men I want to tell him that they are all men who fought with valour and distinction for their country in the former war. Six of the eight enlisted as private soldiers and fought as private soldiers. If any body of men in the Dominion of Canada would have sympathy and kindliness toward those claimants who come before them, it is the present members of the Canadian pension commission.

I wish to say a word also about the deputy minister. He also is a returned soldier who fought with great distinction in the last war. I have been in the department for only four years, but I must say about my deputy minister that I have never had from him anything but the utmost human kindliness and sympathy toward the case of the returned man. That is the situation with regard to my deputy and the Canadian pension commissioners.

They are all returned soldiers just the same as certain members in all parties in the house. Whenever they are able under the regulations and under the statutes which this parliament has passed during the last twenty-five years to give the benefit of the doubt to the returned soldier, that is done. Why should they not? He is one of their comrades and that is their duty. I must protest against anyone coming up with these observations and animadversions and casting missiles of malice around this chamber at those whose duty it is to serve their comrades.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege. I did not throw any missiles of malice. That is not one of my defects, and I may have many. It is forbidden by the rules to impute motives to a member of parliament. I have treated the minister as my colleague, and he has no reason whatever to impute motives to the member for Temiscouata when he is fighting the case of the underdog. He may praise his deputy as much as he likes because that is his business, but he has no right according to the rules to cast aspersions on any member. I think I am far from being touchy, but I submit that the hon. member is infringing the rules by saying that I am casting missiles of malice at any one. I did not do that to the minister and I did not do it to his deputy. We are free to hold our own opinions, but I was not inspired by malice of any one when I made my observations and I ask the minister to withdraw what he has said.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not see any point of order. There certainly is some rule that a member of the government's service should not be attacked on the floor of the House of Commons because it is not possible for him to defend himself. In this case the minister was defending some of his officials in his own department, and I do not think there is any point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: He was sheltering them.

The CHAIRMAN: I was not sheltering any one.

Mr. POULIOT: Not you, he.

Mr. KNOWLES: I shall not take the time to cast any compliments or brickbats at the minister because I think he has had his full quota of both this year, if not during the past few days, but there are two or three matters I should like to bring to his attention on the floor of this chamber. May I say that I regret that some of the matters I have to raise at this time concern individuals, but the only reason why I express any regret is that I know some hon. members object to our doing it. But these people are Canadian citizens, and they have asked specifically over a period of many months that their cases be raised in the high court of parliament because they feel they have not been dealt with as they should have been. I am sure the minister, the members of the government and all hon. members will agree that one of the principles of this parliament is that the case of the lowliest citizen in the land can be brought up for discussion here and for redress if it is possible to achieve it. Unfortunately these matters come up at a late time, but when the appropriate item is called is the proper time for such a discussion, whether it be the first or the last day of the session.

First, I should like to direct the attention of the minister to a case which has been brought to his attention frequently over a period of several years. This is the case of Miss Mary Turnbull of McMunn, Manitoba, in the constituency of the hon. member for Springfield, who among others has brought the matter to the attention of the minister and of the Prime Minister as well. This woman is the daughter of the late Acting Corporal John Turnbull, whose number was 859730. Miss Turnbull's father was a one hundred per cent pensioner for a period of many years. His illness was quite serious; in fact it affected him mentally. The result was that he was a very difficult patient to care for. He lived in an out-of-the-way place in Manitoba where his daughter cared for him over a period of a good many years. There is evidence which seems incontrovertible to me that her health was seriously impaired by the difficulties which she encountered in caring for her father during all those years. That his condition was attributable to war service was fully established by the fact that he was a one hundred per cent pensioner. I would say further that her claim to some consideration is supported by the fact that at the time of her father's death the balance owing to him was paid to her, and in addition she later was given a compassionate grant of $100. The information that I have in connection with that compassionate grant is that it was given without prejudice, but nevertheless it was given. The correspondence I have had, as well as other members, with the minister has brought out the technicality that this lady was not incapacitated before she reached the age of twenty-one. Apparently that is the technicality on the basis of which the commission finds it impossible to make any grant to Miss Turnbull.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Was the grant made by the Canadian pension commission or from the Scott fund?

Mr. KNOWLES: I will read from the minister's letter to me dated January 22, 1943, with respect to the $100 grant:

> She was also subsequently given a compassionate grant of $100, which was not intended as a payment to her for looking after her father as it is not the view of the commission that the state is under any obligation to pay children for looking after their parents.

I may say further that the most recent bit of material that has come into Miss Turnbull's hands is a recent issue of "Canada at War," in which she finds this sentence in reference to disability pensioners:

An additional attendance allowance for those needing the care of an attendant may be paid up to the sum of $750 a year.

Of course that is the present legislation. But the minister will appreciate the feeling of a woman in this position when she realizes that this kind of thing is being done now. When we are passing bills involving the expenditure of a good many hundreds of millions of dollars she cannot help feeling keenly that there is nothing for her after she has discharged not only her responsibility as a daughter to her father, but a responsibility for the country which he had served. For a good many years she took care of her father whose life was ruined by war service. Her own physical condition is impaired because of what she has done, and she feels that she has not been dealt with rightly because she has been simply told that technicalities stand in her way. She has also been told by the minister and by the Prime Minister that cases of her kind would be given consideration when amendments to the Pension Act were being drafted, but she has discovered that she has to wait a long while for any such changes to be drafted.

I appreciate what the minister said a few minutes ago in answer to the hon. member for Témiscouata that the members of the Canadian pension commission do their best within the regulations. We who are members of parliament and have some idea about laws and regulations can understand that, but it is a pretty cold answer to the woman herself, as it is to others in similar situations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was not meant to be cold.

Mr. KNOWLES: It simply means no.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to review that case at once.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am very glad to have that assurance from the minister. That was my point in raising this case even on this last night of the session. The minister has had the case before him a good many times, but I earnestly hope that in considering it further he will give as sympathetic and as favourable a decision as he possibly can.

Another case that I have been specifically asked to raise on the understanding that some people in this country have—and I say rightly so—that parliament is a high court where the grievances of a citizen can be discussed, is that of a wife of a soldier whose name I will not give but whose pension number is 104512. This is a case where the soldier is still living and is in Deer Lodge hospital. His case is bordering on the mental, if not a mental case. There was a separation between the husband and the wife back in the late twenties or in the early thirties. My view about this separation, as about many other separations that have come to my attention, is that it was attributable to the war. The kind of experience that men went through made them in some instances, one might as well admit, difficult for their wives to live with, or impossible for them to live with their wives, and there have been many troubles of this kind. In fact I have had instances somewhat similar to it of widows of veterans who have died to which Colonel Carmichael of the war veterans' allowance board has given favourable consideration. It is because there has been such favourable consideration given there that I mention this case, although it is slightly different because in this case the soldier is still living.

Although there was that separation the time came, about 1934, when by a court order the conjugal rights of the wife were restored to her. That was done by the court of appeal of Manitoba on November 12, 1934. In the meantime, unfortunately, the soldier had been admitted to Deer Lodge hospital less than a month before, on October 18, 1934. He has been in Deer Lodge hospital ever since. His condition is quite poor, bordering, as I have said, on a mental condition. The minister will notice, therefore, that it has been impossible for this man and wife to live together since the date of the court order. There again a technicality stands in the way. The regulations say that a wife in these circumstances can be given consideration only if husband and wife actually reside together. It seems to me that under these circumstances an effort should be made by the minister to find some way whereby the spirit at least of the law might be interpreted in favour of the wife.

There has been some recognition of the validity of the case because in the first instance the wife had nothing to live on, and in due course she was awarded five dollars a month, which was the pension that had been awarded to the soldier. The commission agreed to pay it to her. Later, after I came into the picture and began this voluminous file of correspondence that I have in my hand, that five dollars was raised to twenty dollars a month. The consequence was that this lady was able to go off Winnipeg city relief, which she was very happy to do, having a bit of commendable pride. But she finds herself now with a total income of only twenty dollars a month, which is less than she was receiving before when she received the pension of five dollars and city relief. It seems to me that it ought to be possible to pay a woman in such circumstances at least the $30.41, which is the amount paid to veterans' widows. In fact it has been suggested to her that if her husband were to die she might come into that category. That is a most unfortunate suggestion to have to make to a person, and accordingly I urge the minister to give favourable consideration to this case. I take it the minister's silence gives consent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am listening very carefully to my hon. friend.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think that particular cases should be discussed when the minister shows his willingness to deal with these matters collectively.

Mr. KNOWLES: I assure you, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take up much time. I do not wish to argue the point with you, but I suggest that this is in order under the item. This is the last night. If this matter had come on three months ago there would have been no argument on the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is the third time I have been before the house this session.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not under departmental administration, civil estimates. This is the first time these estimates have been called this year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not objecting.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why not argue on principles rather than individual cases?

Mr. KNOWLES: The principle underlying this, if the Minister of Labour wishes an answer, is that in these cases the department should not take the regulations as they stand as something final but should realize what these technical rejections mean to the people concerned, and should find a way of taking care of such deserving cases. However, this is the last of specific cases I will mention. This time it is a soldier of this war. I will give the number, 28222. In this instance the matter has been brought to the attention of the minister on several occasions by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). I raise it in his absence. In fact, it is the case which he mentioned in the house one night as a sample of something that ought to have been done without the intervention of a member, but which was taken care of after he brought it to the attention of the late General McDonald, who was formerly chairman of the pension commission. This is the situation with respect to this case, and the minister can look it up from the number I have given him. Pension was finally granted at a late date and it was made effective from May 1, 1942, which made it retroactive for a considerable period; but lately, within the past week or so, the pension has been discontinued.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I have the number?

Mr. KNOWLES: I will repeat it: 28222. It has been discontinued on a technical ground. The man's condition is quite serious —the case is one of tuberculosis—and he is in a very serious plight. The secretary of my colleague the hon. member for York South has been in touch with the commission by telephone but without a great deal of satisfaction. So much has been done in this case, and so many things have been pointed out in regard to the justice of it, that I hope the minister will give it immediate consideration.

May I deal with one other matter. I said once before, when we were on another item, the civil service superannuation act, I believe, that I had received a number of briefs from and on behalf of the non-medical employees of the staff of Deer Lodge hospital, Winnipeg.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Those would be orderlies?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, and people in similar categories. I will not go into the long list of grievances presented because I am sure these briefs must have been presented to the minister as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I hope he will give consideration to them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That has been done.

Mr. KNOWLES: There were two main matters, one with respect to superannuation. I dare to hope that those problems have been taken care of by the recent superannuation legislation. Some are temporary permanents and people of that class. One sentence will give an idea of the kind of complaint they make. I quote:

> Older employees are called upon to train newcomers whilst being classed as unsuitable for promotion.

That is a sample of the grievances which these people have.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is one of the biggest disappointments in our department.

Mr. KNOWLES: What does the minister mean by that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Well, we have been trying for three years to get it remedied and we are on the eve of attaining that end.

Mr. KNOWLES: Am I right in assuming that the minister has received all these briefs?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: And that they are being given attention?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, indeed.

Mr. KNOWLES: And they will continue to receive attention?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think I shall succeed.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the minister be good enough to revise the case of Charpentier and telephone to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence with regard to the case Beaulieu?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be only too happy to do anything I can in the service in which I am engaged.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister and I appreciate what he has done. When I speak as I have done I want to inform him that my only purpose is to bring to the attention of the committee some of the most deserving cases. I have not the time to bother about this or that individual. I want justice to prevail in the land and I want those who are in the army or have been in the army to be treated with fairness and justice and in a way that is satisfactory to them, which will bring in the social order that we hear so much about. But we shall get that only by looking after individual cases. We cannot help the soldiers by talking in the abstract; each man should have direct and immediate assistance. I thank the minister for what he has said. I appreciate it, and I will write to him again in regard to these cases. I hope that, as he has done in the past in some other cases, he will see that justice is done in the matter.

Item agreed to.

198. War veterans' allowance board, $169,771.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have had some correspondence from a person in New Brunswick who is interested in the extension of the terms and privileges of the War Veterans' Allowance Act. I raise this question largely because my correspondent has brought it to my attention. Has the minister considered the extension of the privileges under that act to those who have served not only in an actual theatre of war, which is the usual description, but in England or Canada as well? I will not pursue the matter further at the moment. I leave with the minister the suggestion that has come from my correspondent and perhaps when the time comes he will consider it in connection with prospective amendments to the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I can assure my hon. friend I shall pay particular attention to the observations he has just made.

Item agreed to.

Mobilization branch—

199. Branch administration, $62,039.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With regard to hospitalization other than at the larger centres where veterans are treated, what has the department in mind in connection with the use of local hospitals? In some cases the physicians are faced with an increase in the number of patients and they are becoming greatly concerned about their ability to provide the service which they anticipate on the return of the soldiers. Would the minister mind giving us a statement on the policy and what they intend to do?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In the last year the policy has been to identify the work more closely with local hospitals, especially in the smaller centres. One of the complaints we had in the Department of Pensions and National Health before I was identified with the department was that boys who were in local centres in the interior of the province had to come down to a coastal city or to the great centres of population in the provinces for hospitalization and treatment. So far as we can we are limiting that except for scientific and medical reasons where the case is more serious and we have to obtain the services of qualified specialists. We have developed as much as we can the assistance and encouragement of local centre treatment.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are you doing anything in the way of granting assistance to such hospitals to enlarge their accommodation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, not in every case. That is one of the difficult problems. We have done that provincially; we have not done it locally. We have done it in Edmonton, in Regina and in Ottawa by building a wing or a pavilion wing adjacent to very fine hospitals in each case where we have the benefit of the services of brilliant medical and surgical experts. That policy may be extended. In addition to that, of course, we have ten or twelve major hospitals of our own which are being vastly extended. In addition to that we are building two of the biggest hospitals in Canada, the Sunnybrook in Toronto and the Currie hospital in Montreal. They will be two magnificent hospitals when finished.

Item agreed to.

Direct payments to veterans and dependents—
207. Widows' compassionate allowances to be paid under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, $600,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister knows that this is another item that many of us in this house—I speak not only for myself—have been waiting for for many months during the present session, the item under which a grant is made to widows of veterans of the last war who died with a pension of fifty per cent or less. The first provision of something for those widows was made by a special vote last year to the amount of $20 a month, or in special cases up to $25. Under certain orders in council passed later that amount was raised this year to a maximum of $30.41 per month. A long battle was carried on by members of this house before I came here, and I have been glad to join in it. I am pleased that a start has been made. But I hope that the minister does not think that it is just a theme song on our part, when I say that the government really has not gone far enough.

May I ask this question: has the government given favourable consideration to the requests that were made following a meeting of the dominion council of the non-pensioned widows of great war veterans, held in Ottawa in the early part of March of this year? The requests made to the minister at that time were several. Perhaps I can state them briefly. They were, first, that the eligible age be reduced to fifty; second, that the allowance be paid to widows of veterans in this category irrespective of the place of service of the veteran. The point at issue there is the plight of the widow whose husband in the last war, shall we say, got to England and wanted to go to France but did not get there. It does seem most unfair to women in that position. The third request is that the amount be raised to $40 per month. Here again when these women realize the amount of money that we are able to find for other worthy objects, when they learn of the increasing acceptance of the concept of social security, they find it difficult to understand why they should be asked to exist on $30.41 per month. Remember that many of these women are in the age bracket of fifty-five to sixty, because the allowance starts at the age of fifty-five, and it is very hard for them to carry on on that amount.

The fourth recommendation is free hospitalization. The fifth has to do with a change respecting dependent children of such widows who at the present time are receiving allowances from provincial mothers' allowance boards. The next recommendation had to do with the plight of the deserted wives. This is very similar to the case that I was referring to a little while ago, except that now we are speaking of the widow who was a deserted wife before she became a widow. It is similar to the previous case because there are many of these women whose husbands left them owing to a complete upset that occurred in the soldier's life as a result of his service in the war, definitely, in my mind, attributable to the kind of experience these men went through, and it does seem to me that consideration should be given them. The seventh suggestion was that this legislation be made permanent. As a matter of fact from the way it was introduced last year I thought that there might be a bill this year making it permanent, but instead of that we have this item, which is called the last night of the session.

The eighth suggestion is that representatives of the non-pensioned veterans' widows association be asked to sit in with the war veterans' allowance board, on certain occasions at any rate, to discuss matters of general policy relating to the administration of those allowances. I think that the minister will agree on that point; and I am sure that Colonel Carmichael would. I think that the visits these women made to Ottawa at their own expense have have been worth while. The minister at times may have thought that they were rather a nuisance, but he will admit that they have helped the government to bring into effect something that will at least begin to meet the sort of thing that Canada would want done for these people. That being so I suggest that their request that they be called in in an advisory capacity is a commendable one and one that would help to improve this legislation.

The ninth request has to do with the plight of the widow of an imperial veteran where both the soldier before he died and the widow have lived in Canada for twenty years or more. I have had a number of cases in that category brought to my attention where the English ex-soldier and his bride came to Canada after the last war. The soldier had no pension. He died in the meantime and his widow is left without any chance to get any assistance either from the United Kingdom government or from this government, although they are Canadians by reason of the fact of twenty years' residence or more. I hope this matter will be fully considered.

There are one or two other recommendations, but perhaps they are not as important as the ones that I have brought to the attention of the minister. He knows that this is a subject on which the hon. member for Davenport, the hon. member for Trinity and many other hon. members of the house feel very keenly and have spoken on quite often. If it were earlier in the session the minister knows that this debate would go on all night. The way in which he could cut it short is by telling us that many if not all of the recommendations of these women are to be granted, or at least are being given active consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I very briefly refer to the point raised by my hon. friend. In the first place he mentioned the age of fifty instead of fifty-five. If he will read the order in council he will find that it says:

(a) that such widow has attained the age of fifty-five years or is so incapacitated by mental or physical disability as to be incapable of and unlikely to become capable of earning a livelihood.

So that there is very great leeway to deal with many cases.

Mr. KNOWLES: I appreciate that, but it does not meet the request for a lowering of the age for all concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The second point my hon. friend raised was in connection with widows of veterans who served only in England. The position is that we cannot very well extend that benefit to the widows until we extend it to the men themselves. I think that is clear; everyone should realize the situation. We must give it to the men themselves first.

Mr. KNOWLES: On that point I support the leader of the opposition in saying that that should be done without delay.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Possibly I might agree. The third point was the question of the deserted wives. That is a most difficult problem, and as yet we have not reached a solution, though we have tried our best. The next point was the matter of permanent legislation. My hon. friend may take my assurance that this will all become permanent legislation, no matter what government may be in power. All these benefits will be embodied in the statutes of Canada. The last point raised by my hon. friend was in regard to some grant to assist the representatives of the non-pensioned widows. There is an item of $1,000 in the supplementary estimates to assist these ladies to come down here and place their grievance or their complaint before the government of the day.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am very glad to hear that. The minister did not deal with the most important suggestion, however, which was that the amount of the allowance be increased to $40 per month.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That cannot be increased, of course, until the general range of veterans' allowances is raised. There must be some parity.

Mr. KNOWLES: I agree, but the general range should be increased too.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do I understand the minister to say that this grant of $1,000 to the non-pensioned widows is to assist a future delegation to present their case to the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right. These ladies had to come down at their own expense. We thought it was rather unfair to ask them to do that, so that an amount of $1,000 was placed in the estimates for that purpose.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is an excellent idea. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre advanced certain arguments in their behalf, and I should like to join in the plea that justice be done these women. A number of them came to see me last year, and possibly the year before. Many hon. members of this house have taken a kindly interest in their case. Last year I had an opportunity of speaking in their behalf, and it is only because of the circumstances of the moment that I am not speaking at much greater length this evening. However, I should like the minister to understand that he will receive very general backing and support in parliament for any scheme that will give justice and equality to these women whose case I think presents a definite challenge to this government and this parliament.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: I am glad indeed to see that the provisions have been widened and that the grant will be made to a greater number of women. I would strongly urge the minister to give consideration to those women who are not widows but who cannot live with their husbands, perhaps because their husbands are mentally ill or for similar reasons. There are a few women in this situation, and I think their case is exceptionally worthy of consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend has presented a new appeal with which I was not familiar previously, but I shall be glad to take the matter into consideration.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder if the minister would repeat what he said about the case of the woman who was a deserted wife before she became a widow. I realize that the bachelor minister does not understand these things, but I am pressing this point because of one case in particular that I had some months ago. That was the case of a widow whose husband had deserted her before he died. As a matter of fact she was a Salvation Army officer. It was a matter of deep regret that this should have happened but it was due solely to the condition of her husband, which arose from the last war. This widow was in the further difficulty that while she had two sons serving in the present war, each had a wife and neither could afford to assign any money to her, so she had nothing of her own to live on. I mention this fact because I took up the case and fought it hard with Colonel Carmichael and his board which, eventually found a way to grant an allowance to this widow. I was very glad. But I have others whom the board have not found it possible to help out, on the ground of the technicality. It seems to me the minister should listen to the representations that have been made to-night from this side and by the hon. lady member for Edmonton East and see if the regulations cannot be changed to cover fully the case of the woman who was a deserted wife before becoming a widow.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The regulation now is that such widow was living with or being maintained by her husband at the time of his death, or within a reasonable time thereof, provided that the board shall have discretion to waive this qualification in any case where circumstances exist which the board deem such as to make it just and reasonable so to do.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the date of that regulation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): August 13, 1943.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yet in March of this year the widows still found it necessary to protest this matter.

Item agreed to.

[Mrs. Casselman.]

Services to veterans and dependents—

212. Grant to Canadian Legion, $9,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is the last of the pension items, and I want to raise one question, though the matter is not covered by any of the regular items in the estimates. It is a point that was not brought to the attention of the government or the minister during the debate on the gratuities bill. I realize that the circumstances under which the gratuities bill was debated did not give time for the reaction of certain sections of the country to reach parliament before the bill was finally passed, so that perhaps at this stage I may be permitted to put in a word for the veterans guard, who as far as I know were not mentioned in the discussion on the gratuities bill. I think they deserve consideration by the government when any amendments are being made to that measure. The veterans guard is composed entirely of ex-service men, and I for one believe that they should be considered on an overseas basis with respect to gratuities and rehabilitation grants. These men are in a very special class, if I may say so. I mention this matter now because it is the only opportunity left at this late hour of presenting what I think is a case to be dealt with when amendments to the gratuities bill are considered by this or a succeeding government at the next session of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I appreciate the observations of the leader of the opposition, but of course there are two points to remember. In the first place the members of the veterans guard were all entitled, as we were, to the benefits of the war service gratuity following the last war, and under the modern scheme they are entitled to the home benefits, unless of course they are sent overseas, in which case they would be entitled to the overseas rate. In addition they are entitled to many other benefits. For instance, we extended the veterans' allowance and the provisions of the insurance act to cover them, so that I can say they have received more benefits than those who did not re-enlist in the present war.

Item agreed to.

Health branch—

213. Health branch administration, $59,277.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am anxious to have the minister indicate to the committee, if he will, what contracts have been let, and the details of those contracts, with respect to the Sunnybrook Farm hospital. This matter is engaging the attention of the public at the moment perhaps to as great an extent as almost any other of our many hospitalization problems. If the minister could give those details I would appreciate it, and it would be of great interest to the public generally.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I had information come to my hand a few moments ago that two contracts have been let so far. One was a grading or levelling contract for $14,000, let to a firm from Brampton. That is a purely preliminary contract. Then, a few days ago, on August 11, the main contract for the first unit was let, to the value of $2,887,000. That was let to the Redfern Construction company, and includes the preliminary units of a very great scheme which will amount to about $10,000,000 when it is completed. There will be a total cost, as I have said, of about $10,000,000, before all buildings are completed.

This first unit consists of a boiler house and engineering unit, what they call an up-patients building, and makes a provision for a total of 400 beds out of a total of 1,450 beds which will be finally developed in the institution when it is completed. When this hospital is finished it will probably be one of the largest in Canada.

As my hon. friend may know, we have acquired adjacent property for a health and occupational centre for that type of case which I have described on several occasions. We have bought eight or nine centres across Canada for the assistance of these cases who need some assistance to acquire again the desire for employment, and to develop fitness for employment. One is being built here in Ottawa—the Rideau occupational centre; one at Ste. Annes, one at London, Ontario, one at Toronto, one in British Columbia, one at Saint John, New Brunswick—

Mr. ISNOR: One in Nova Scotia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, one in every province; but at the present time we have started with a project of five. We have not developed the whole project for every province, but we are going ahead as fast as possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: When will the first patients be admitted to Sunnybrook Farm hospital? I believe one of the real criticisms made with respect to hospitalization in that area is that the Sunnybrook Farm hospital was not got under way as early as it should have been. I remember the minister's arguing in the house that one of the reasons why nothing could be done a year ago was the question of priorities. Then, following that, the priorities difficulty was apparently overcome, and late in the year the first sod was turned.

The real difficulty is that most people feel the hospital should have been commenced a good deal earlier, having in mind the possibility of casualties and the increased need for hospitalization in Canada. For that reason I would say particularly to the minister that one of the chief grounds of complaint at the present time is that the original move was made too late. It becomes of vast importance therefore that we should know when the first patients will be admitted to Sunnybrook Farm hospital.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Of course I cannot give a definite assurance in that regard; but I can say that the architects and contractors have been instructed to rush all work as fast as possible. I do not know if construction was commenced to-day, but I know it is to commence immediately, as a result of the contract I mentioned a moment ago. And I have every reason to believe that the second unit can be looked after very quickly indeed.

I can assure the committee that so far as this department is concerned, in cooperation with the defence services, and with the Department of Public Works, which is really in charge of construction, the purpose is to rush the construction of Sunnybrook Farm hospital as fast as it can be done. I am not a contractor or a construction man, and I cannot of course give a definite reply as to when we can have patients in there. But my hope would be that it would be as soon as possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to have something a little more definite from the minister with respect to time. I know how difficult it is to estimate time, and sometimes it is even dangerous to do so. Nevertheless I think the public will not be satisfied unless some estimate is given as to the time when Sunnybrook Farm hospital will be able to take in some patients.

I wonder if the minister would go back to the time the matter was argued last session, when he told the committee that the difficulty was one of priorities. He said at that time that priorities could not have been arranged before, and the hospital got under way at an earlier time. That seemed to be a really serious complaint and I must confess it is difficult for me to see the reason why the work could not have been commenced earlier.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): For the same reason that they would not permit them to construct veterans' hospitals in the United States of America—exactly the same reason as we had here. In company with my deputy minister I made a personal visit to Washington a year ago to urge the necessity of obtaining priorities, especially in regard to Sunnybrook hospital at Toronto. We got the finest reception, but we were told that they had the same difficulties there, and that these were world conditions. They were found there, and they were found all over. I am glad to say we have now obtained a first priority in regard to labour and materials. That will be helpful to us.

Mr. ROWE: Priorities are not holding it up now?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; it is just a matter of plans and specifications. Then, of course, there would be difficulty in regard to labour; but the Department of Labour has been very helpful to us and has promised to give us every consideration in regard to getting available labour.

Mr. ROWE: Has the minister any approximate estimate as to when it will be finally completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): All I can tell is that it is commencing at once. How long it will take to build is a matter for a construction engineer to estimate. I can only say that every single expedition will be used and every pressure brought to bear. That is as far as I can go.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has an estimate been given by any competent engineer as to the possible time of opening the hospital for patients?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, I have not any.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister will see at once my reason for being so insistent in my inquiries. The public will brush aside all technicalities as to estimates by construction people. What they want to know is when patients will be allowed into Sunnybrook Farm hospital. Will they be allowed in in November, or next May, or a year from then, or when? They have no idea as to whether it will be years or months, or how long it may be. That is one of the reasons why I am so insistent in my inquiry.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The only estimate given me was somewhere in 1945, but I should not like to be bound by it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Has the minister under his hand the amount of assistance given to this problem in that area in connection with making available space for consumptive patients. and space for critical surgical cases in Toronto General hospital and other hospitals in the Toronto area? Does the minister feel he has received the maximum of assistance from those charged with the responsibility of hospital administration in the Sunnybrook Farm area?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vanvoucer Centre): In reply to the leader of the opposition, first, I have received a note which states that the contract has been awarded for completion one year from to-day. I did not know that when I replied to my hon. friend before. That is the estimate made by the engineers.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that for the completion of the whole hospital?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; that is for the completion of the 400-bed unit. The rest will follow very quickly indeed.

The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) has asked a question, and I want to take this opportunity, on behalf of the members of the committee, to welcome him back to this assembly. I am sure that he, along with the hon. member for Wood Mountain who sits to his right, represented this parliament with great distinction when they visited our sister dominion. We are most happy to welcome them back here. In regard to the hon. member's question, I must say that he has been most cooperative with the Department of Pensions and National Health through offering the facilities of an institution to which he has devoted many of his years. I believe about 200 beds are to be made available in this hospital with which the hon. member has been associated for many years in a truly beneficent way. I want to express publicly the gratitude of the government for his efforts to assist us in that way.

Item agreed to.

Health branch—

214. Food and drugs, $187,299.

Mr. POULIOT: I would like to know if the compound de Kuyper's gin is still supposed to be gin?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I regret that I cannot speak with the expert knowledge of the hon. member for Témiscouata in regard to this matter. It is still before the courts for adjudication so that I cannot give any final opinion.

Mr. POULIOT: After the courts have decided, I will say it is rotten gin.

Item agreed to.

Health branch—
219. Immigration medical inspection, $49,621.

Mr. GILLIS: Am I correct in assuming that you have medical representatives at the larger ports in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: In addition to doing immigration inspection work they also handle the merchant marine and to some extent supervise the merchant marine hospitals. Am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister will remember that I raised this matter a few months ago. I think the departmental officials employed in this capacity have received a raw deal during the war. Their duties have increased and they are working longer hours. They are not in uniform and they have been refused the right to go into active service. Many of them volunteered their services but they were considered to be in essential work. When the war is over, those who are young men will be considered slackers because they are not recognized as being service personnel. In matters of promotion and so forth where preference is given to those who served in theatres of war, these young men who have been compelled to remain in their positions because the work they are performing is essential will lose out. Another thing to be considered is the matter of gratuities. The medical service is recognized as being entitled to these gratuities, but these men who render such valuable service at the ports, in many cases working harder than most other medical personnel, with the possible exception of those performing operations under fire, are not entitled. I think there should be an examination of their status.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am in substantial agreement with what my hon. friend has said. These men have not received the recognition to which they are entitled. With regard to gratuities, rightly or wrongly we have made the distinction that they are to be paid to service personnel as such. We have endeavoured to get permanent status for these men, and we have succeeded in many cases. I think it will be the duty of the department to see that there is no case of permanent injustice in connection with any of these matters.

Item agreed to.

Health branch—
220. Child and maternal hygiene, $45,381.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the excellent book, "The Canadian Mother and Child" by Doctor Couture, still available?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is being reprinted in both French and English. I have not the figures before me but a large number of copies will be available. It is one of the most popular books ever issued by the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. POULIOT: It is an excellent book and I congratulate the minister upon publishing it. If all the other publications were as good they would be most helpful. I suggest that the minister send a copy to the premier of Ontario.

Item agreed to.

Health branch—
222. Treatment of sick mariners, $330,907.

Mr. GILLIS: Am I right in assuming that the owner of a ship sailing out of a Canadian port must pay into this fund?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Based upon the tonnage of the ship.

Mr. GILLIS: There are some companies not paying into the fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I did not know that.

Mr. GILLIS: I have a case in point about which I have been writing the department for some three or four months.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is that in connection with coastal trade?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. It concerns two men who were torpedoed. The owner of the ship is the Dominion Steel and Coal company and they were not paying into this fund. As a result the hospital facilities at Halifax and Sydney were not available to the members of that crew. They suffered some hardship; there has been some difficulty in establishing pension rights and so forth, and I believe the case is in the hands of the department now. I merely bring this matter to the minister's attention because I think it should be looked upon as a compensation fund and all companies who employ men on ocean-going ships should be compelled to pay into the fund. In the case of the two men I mention I believe the hitch was that the company was not paying into the sick mariners' fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): When the act was passed it dealt with interprovincial trade and was not available for vessels in the coastal trade.

Mr. GILLIS: There was some friction over hospitalization because the company was not paying into the fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Would they not come under workmen's compensation?

Mr. GILLIS: No, they did not get anything.

Miscellaneous grants—
239. St. John Ambulance Association, $4,050.

Mr. GILLIS: The girls in this association are employed in Canadian hospitals only. Is that right?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Some of them are overseas.

Mr. GILLIS: Do they come under the Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; they are civilian employees. If they were attached to a R.C.A.M.C. unit they would probably come under that corps for the purposes of discipline, but they are not part of the service as such.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous grants—
240. Canadian Red Cross Society, $10,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the public ought to be made acquainted with the situation with which we are faced to-night and understand that if this committee has not said a good word for the various institutions and organizations which are mentioned under the head of "miscellaneous grants," comprising items 230 to 240, inclusive, there is a very good reason. Were the committee to be working under circumstances that would permit a lengthy discussion of these items, I am quite sure that hon. members on all sides of the house and in all parties would want to put in a word on behalf of these important organizations. To save time I want on behalf of the committee, not on just my own behalf because I have no desire to take any credit to myself or for my party, to pay tribute and to give credit where credit is so fully due to such organizations as are mentioned here, the Canadian Welfare Council, Canadian National Committee for Mental Hygiene, Health League of Canada, Canadian National Institute for the Blind, L'Association Canadienne Francaise des Aveugles, L'Institut Nazareth de Montreal, Montreal Association for the Blind, Canadian Tuberculosis Association, Victorian Order of Nurses, St. John Ambulance Association and the Canadian Red Cross Society. All these organizations and many others not receiving grants are deserving of the thanks of a grateful parliament and people, and I just want at this time to give a blanket approval and pay a blanket tribute to the work that they all have done.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I just wish in a word to associate myself with the very kind words of the leader of the opposition. My only regret is that we are not doing more for these splendid organizations.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—
241. Pensions payable to men on active service, Northwest Rebellion, 1885, and general pensions, $16,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask if this covers a full scale of pensions and allowances for all those who served in the Northwest field force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They have always been entitled to pensions, but in 1921 they were brought within the provisions of the Canadian Pension Act. What has been done recently has been to make them eligible for veterans' allowance. The rule had been that veterans' allowance was payable only to those who had served in an actual theatre of war, but now the veterans of the Northwest Rebellion are eligible, as well as the widows under the widows' allowance legislation that we passed last year.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does this dispose once and for all of all the claims that have been made from time to time on behalf of the men of the Northwest field force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Absolutely. There is no other claim that can be made now.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister is intimately acquainted with the programme of Mr. T. A. World, of Toronto. Has all that he has proposed been taken care of?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the government would only listen to the pleas of those of us on this side of the house in the same manner in all things as they have done in this we would be in a position to commend them a great deal more.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am glad to give my hon. friend any satisfaction that he finds in advocacy; we take satisfaction in performance.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the satisfaction in this case can be shared by us all.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With respect to the item "Militia Pensions Act, 1901," immediately below item 241, what is the reason for the increase of $300,000 in the item?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Men have been retired from active service.

Item agreed to.

Direct pensions to veterans and dependents—
523. Widows' compassionate allowances to be paid under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have the non-pensioned widows all been taken care of now?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, so far as I know. Speaking from memory, I do not think there are any deferred cases. There was a little trouble at the start because in some cases the application was not made, but through the cooperation of Colonel Carmichael pretty near all the cases have now been adjusted.

Mr. MacNICOL: I just want to thank the minister for having brought this case of the non-pensioned widows to a successful conclusion. It is some five or six years now since we commenced working on it and we all knew what the minister was up against, but he has been sympathetic at all times and I just want to thank him.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend the member for Davenport was the real pioneer in this movement.

Mr. GILLIS: Let us not kid ourselves that the whole question has been satisfactorily settled. One would be led to believe that from what the minister has just said, but in my opinion it will not be satisfactorily settled until the limitations in the War Veterans' Allowance Act applying to service personnel who have not served in a theatre of war have been removed. That would do justice to many widows who are certainly entitled to a pension, and until that is done the question has not been settled to the satisfaction of all.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the discussion on his main estimates the minister indicated that $1,000 would be available in the supplementary estimates to enable representatives of the non-pensioned widows' association to come to Ottawa. If that is a part of this $100,000, what is to be provided by the other $99,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That $1,000 is under item 515 of the supplementary estimates.

Mr. HANSELL: What is the regular amount paid to these widows? I suppose it varies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It corresponds exactly to the amount paid to veterans under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. The maximum is $30.41.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If I may revert for a moment to items 519 and 520, dealing with European war pensions and war veterans' allowances, are these items to provide for pensions and allowances arising out of this war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The amount in item 519 is for pensions arising out of the last war. The amount voted last year was not sufficient.

Health branch—
532. Child and maternal hygiene—further amount required, $14,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not sure that this is the appropriate item under which I should ask this question, but there have been newspaper reports from time to time with respect to the inroads of infantile paralysis or poliomyelitis in Canada. Would the minister indicate the extent of the disease—I do not think it could be described as quite an epidemic at the moment? At any rate there has been a good deal of news in the press about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There was widespread alarm some months ago that it might be an epidemic, but I am glad to say that, generally speaking, the disease has been allayed in Ontario and other provinces. It is a disease that is calculated to create alarm and a good deal of dismay not only to the medical profession but to the public at large, but I am informed by my medical advisers that the situation is not as serious as was feared at one time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has any progress been made recently in combating the disease and in finding a satisfactory cure? I am personally interested because seven years ago this August when the epidemic hit Ontario our own family was struck. For that reason, as I say, I have a very special interest in the matter and I should like to know whether any progress has been made. I know there has been a good deal of progress in connection with the type of treatments used, because at that time the treatment seemed to have been different from that which was finally applied to the disease. Has the minister anything to say in that regard?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In that respect I can speak only in moderate terms. Some years ago we made extensive researches in Saskatchewan and Manitoba when the disease was prevalent there but, unfortunately, I do not think we were very successful. I understand, however, that some of the scientific institutes of the United States are quite hopeful that at last they are on the right track and that a scientific discovery may be made which will be beneficial.

Item agreed to.

Health branch—
535. Medical investigation division—further amount required, $5,106.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister will remember that I brought to his attention two or three times the matter of probing the possibilities of a serum known as A.C.S., perfected in Russia. It is a cure for arthritis. I have had a good deal of correspondence and I believe the minister has been following up the matter. It is certainly worthwhile following up.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Departmentally, the department has been in touch with the organizations concerned, and I had the pleasure the other day of presenting to the Soviet government some orthopædic appliances in which Canada leads the world, in both invention and development. We were happy in having them accept these appliances. I had an opportunity of mentioning this serum to the ambassador from the Soviet union, and he was kind enough to suggest that he would take up the matter and give us all the information possible in regard to it.

Mr. GILLIS: Is that serum available in Canada for experimental purposes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. GILLIS: It is in Britain. I have an editorial from one of the Ontario papers to the effect that a certain doctor has been doing experimental work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We had a cable from the British ministry of health indicating that it was not available. That was two weeks ago.

Mr. GILLIS: But they are doing research work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We are following direct methods and trying to find out what we can.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Graydon.]

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Science service—
459. Entomology—further amount required, $76,700.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is difficult to understand why there should be an extra supplementary estimate after the increases which the minister had already indicated in his regular estimates. What is the nature of the work covered by this extra amount under this item?

Mr. CRERAR: The addition is for more extensive research work into the devastations caused by the spruce budworm. There is a certain amount in the vote for that and also for further investigations into the wheat stem sawfly. This is to provide funds to carry on a large scale field investigation into the seasonal life history of the sawfly. Then there is further investigation into the potato insects that affect production of potatoes. There is also an item for orchard insect investigation. That is the nature of the expenditures that will be called for. It is broken down as follows—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We have the details.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—
466. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $750,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What are the details of the various cold storage warehouses that will receive the $750,000?

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will turn to page 13 of the supplementary estimates he will find the details of this vote set out at the foot of the page.

Item agreed to.

Special—
468. Agricultural research special projects, $200,000.

Mr. FAIR: What is anticipated under this item?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not very familiar with these estimates, but the note I have here states that the item is to provide for a continuation of the work inaugurated in 1943 for which $200,000 was voted, including the construction of a pilot flax mill, salaries, et cetera. There is a pilot flax mill at Portage la Prairie. There is a western field wool laboratory at Lethbridge. These are the two items. I am informed that this item is to carry on work that was undertaken last year on a vote passed a year ago.

Item agreed to.

Special—

469. To provide assistance for the replacement of maple production equipment, $200,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the minister give us some explanation of this item?

Mr. CRERAR: This is a project that was started in 1940 to assist maple products producers to replace their equipment. As my hon. friend knows, normally a substantial amount of maple products produced in Canada is marketed in the United States. The equipment that was in use in Canada was not satisfactory in the sense that it did not permit the product to come within the requirements of the Food and Drugs Act of the United States. The United States authorities contended that there was a certain amount of lead poisoning from the type of utensils that were formerly used. This vote is to assist the maple sugar producers to replace their equipment so that it will come within the requirements of the United States law.

Item agreed to.

Special—

470. To provide for administrative expenses, agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, $25,000.

Mr. POULIOT: This reminds me of a long distance call that I made last year with regard to butter. The production of butter was large enough but it was rationed. The wholesalers could not buy more because the cold storage warehouses were probably not large enough and the butter was purchased by the government from the farmers and then sold at a much higher price to the United States without the farmer receiving any further benefit. It is quite strange that it happens in this country. There has been a severe rationing of butter within the last few weeks and I cannot understand it. How is it that the government has purshased a large quantity of butter from the farmers of Canada which has been sold to the United States at a much higher price than that prevailing in Canada at the time without the Canadian farmers receiving any more benefit? That question has been asked many times.

Mr. DONNELLY: I should like to say a word or two in regard to the price administration of agricultural products. I found on my trip to Australia and New Zealand that there was no subject that one heard more often than the price of agricultural products. Wherever we went and wherever I addressed a meeting the one question that was asked was: "How are you in Canada able to keep the price of agricultural products so high, so much above the world price, because we sell our goods at the world price and they are much lower than what you people in Canada are obtaining for yours?" I was obliged under those conditions to explain why; but before I go on to explain why, I wish to give the committee the prices which the people in Australia and New Zealand are obtaining for their farm products, so that we may be able to get some idea as to whether Canada is being legislated properly or whether she is being poorly guided and governed. With regard to the prices which they are obtaining for their agricultural products—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Have you the cost of production?

Mr. DONNELLY: Never mind the cost of production. I am giving you the prices that they are getting. You can find out the cost of production, you have plenty of time. In regard to butter, they receive for butter wholesale twenty-seven cents a pound or one shilling, sixpence. Butter retails at thirty cents a pound, or one shilling, eight pence. In Australia and New Zealand wheat sells for seventy-four cents a bushel. If they sell more than three thousand bushels they get a lot less; it runs down to sixty cents. I will not tell you, sir, what we are getting because you know as well as I do, about $1.25. They get three shillings and eight pence for barley, or about sixty-six cents; we get somewhere in the neighbourhood of seventy-nine cents. In Australia and New Zealand a steer weighing about a thousand pounds is sold for about $61.20. In Canada we get about $110 or $115 for a steer weighing that much, or nearly twice as much. In Australia and New Zealand a pig weighing 200 pounds sells for $21.60. It sells in our country for somewhere in the neighbourhood of $27 or $28. These are some of the prices which they receive for their agricultural products and they have a socialist government or a labour government, there. The only people who seem to be discriminated against in that country are the agriculturists or the farmers and not the labourers. They have a labour government. Wherever you go you find discontent. I never was in a country where I found more discontent among the farmers than I did in Australia and New Zealand.

I shall now give you what they pay for agricultural implements. The prices run something like this. These implements are manufactured and sold by the Massey-Harris company in that country. A hoe, 16-run small seeder drill, very few of which are manufactured in this country now sells for $375.30; a three-furrow disc plough sells for $412.20. An eight-foot binder, four-horse hitch, sells for $525.60; a mower, six-foot, sells for $202.95; a nine-foot rake sells for $79.65; a 26/36 horse-power 102 senior sunshine Massey Harris rubber tires sells for $2,187. In other words, the price of the agricultural implements that they have to buy is nearly one-third higher than in this country and the price of the goods which they have to sell is about one-third less. Is it any wonder that there is dissatisfaction in that country among the agricultural people with regard to the way in which they are being treated? On the other hand, some of our friends over in the corner do not seem to know that we sell our goods at the world's price too. The fact of the matter is that when England wants to buy wheat we ask her how much she is going to pay and we sell to her at the world's price. It may be 75 cents it may be seventy cents; it may be 80 cents; it may be $1.50. We sell it to them at the world price, whatever it is. Supposing the Englishman says he will pay us seventy-five cents; we take the other fifty cents, to make up the $1.25 that we receive, from the mutual aid appropriation. We do the same in connection with pork, beef, butter, cheese and all our farm produce. That is why we are able to get the prices we are receiving at the present time, regardless of what world prices may be. These are things I think we should tell our people, because they do not know how well they are being treated. In my opinion there was never a time in western Canada when the people had as much money as they have now. They should realize in what manner they are receiving the prices they are being paid for their products at the present time.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister please tell me why some Canadian butter has been sold to the United States at higher prices than those prevailing in Canada, without any extra benefit to Canadian farmers?

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend the information for which he is asking, although I will request the officers of the department to send him the explanation if there is one. To-night I am pinch-hitting for the Minister of Agriculture, who is away. As a matter of fact, the point raised by my hon. friend is not covered by any of the items in the list of supplementaries. If it had been so covered I would have endeavoured to inform myself as to the matter, but I really must ask my hon. friend to be kind to me to-night because I have not the information here.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister knows the regard I have for him. I could have brought up this matter under the floor prices measures, or it could have been mentioned under item 466, which has to do with cold storage warehouses. It was because the cold storage space was insufficient that this extra quantity of butter, which could not be stored, was sold to the United States.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

47. Departmental administration, $581,751.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the Minister of Finance be kind enough to inform the committee if it was the practice during the last war to have Sir Sam Hughes, the Minister of Militia, as perpetual acting minister of finance? I wonder how the present Minister of National Defence can find time to be also acting Minister of Finance. This is something I cannot understand, and I would ask the minister to give me some information about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Minister of National Defence was Minister of Finance for a period; and owing to his experience, as well as his outstanding ability and qualifications, it is thought desirable to have him named as Acting Minister of Finance in my absence. I am very grateful indeed to him for acting in my behalf when I am away.

Mr. POULIOT: That is the minister's view about it, and it is most complimentary to the Minister of National Defence, but the hon. gentleman does not touch the grave of the late Sir Sam Hughes, who was busy as Minister of Militia and who was never the perpetual Acting Minister of Finance.

Here is the reason I object to it. I believe that in time of war the job of Minister of National Defence must be a full-time job, and that a member of the cabinet who acts in both capacities must neglect one of them. Either the Minister of National Defence pays no attention to his duties as Acting Minister of Finance or the perpetual Acting Minister of Finance pays no attention to his duties as Minister of National Defence. I am reminded of a world character who has lost some of his popularity—Mussolini, who held five portfolios. The Acting Minister of Finance is the deputy Prime Minister, a full-time job; he is Minister of National Defence, a full-time job, and he is Acting Minister of Finance. It is none of my business to decide who is to be Acting Minister of Finance, but I can criticize what has been done. I believe that after the Minister of Finance himself the man best informed in regard to his department is his parliamentary assistant. I do not see why a member of the cabinet should hold three cabinet jobs, while the parliamentary assistant, who is a learned member of the bar and who has done exceptionally well in substituting for the Minister of Finance when he could not attend the meetings of the house or the committee of the whole, should be kept in the kitchen if not in the cellar or the attic. As one of the colleagues of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance I protest, as it is my right to protest. It is not my business to appoint, but I have the right to protest when an injustice is done. That injustice is made worse because at the present time the international commitments of Canada are not made by the Minister of Finance but by the Acting Minister of Finance. When the perpetual Acting Minister of Finance goes to Great Britain or anywhere else he makes the commitments, and then the Minister of Finance has to defend them. That is the point; that is what I protest against, and I do so because it is commonly and openly felt that Charlie Dunning is still the boss of the Department of Finance, through his friends who are there.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You are being silly.

Mr. POULIOT: I hear the minister say I am being silly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Absolutely.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not protest because I attach no importance to his remarks. But does he not remember the time when the then Minister of Finance, Charlie Dunning, decapitated him by taking away the right to make commitments for the Department of National Defence, by creating the national defence purchasing board?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Nothing of the kind; that was my personal recommendation and you do not know the difference.

Mr. POULIOT: I know very well. I have made the statement in the house, and it was never contradicted until the facts were forgotten by the minister. He must remember that I am the only member who defended him against the action of the then Minister of Finance who wanted to control even the purchases of caps and swords and bayonets.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, I am talking about a matter of finance, and about the purchasing board, which is now the Department of Munitions and Supply, but was for a time under the Minister of Finance. It was taken from the present Minister of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You do not know.

Mr. POULIOT: I know very well.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You do not know a thing about it.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister might say I do not know, but I know very well, because he is one of the clients I have defended without charge.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What an unusual thing!

Mr. POULIOT: He must remember that I defended him on that occasion, and I was the first one—not the only one—but the first one to defend him about the Bren gun. At the time I was the only one to defend the present Minister of National War Services, who was then deputy minister of national defence. I know my business and my past history, and I can compare it with that of the Minister of Pensions and National Health or with that of the Minister of National Defence, or all those who are not my friends in the cabinet.

I regret that at the present time commitments are made by the perpetual Acting Minister of Finance. I want to know one thing; I have already put the question to the Prime Minister on his estimates, and I was not answered. I want now to put the question in very clear language—and the Minister of Pensions and National Health has nothing to do with it. It is a question which might be answered by the Prime Minister, or might be answered by the Minister of Finance, or might be answered by the perpetual Acting Minister of Finance. It is a question of wide unrest, and it is this: What is the rule applied to cabinet ministers in connection with sitting on boards?

There seem to be various contradictory procedures. There was the late Senator Dandurand, who was minister without portfolio, and leader of the government in the senate. He was indicated in the Parliamentary Guide as president of a savings bank in Montreal, a director of the Sun Life Insurance company, and so on. It was all right for him to be a director.

My dear friend the Minister of Mines and Resources is described in the Parliamentary Guide as a director of the Great West Life Insurance company. I have no objection to that.

Then there is the Minister of Justice who said to me that he had resigned as a director of the bank of Montreal as soon as he was appointed Minister of Justice. I do not find fault with him. It was his right to resign, if he wished. It is the right of any minister to be director of any company, so long as it is known by the public.

But what I want to know is: On what date did the perpetual Acting Minister of Finance resign from the board of Barclay's bank, and from the boards of the other coal companies or steel companies, and so on, and so on, which appeared in the reference books, before he was appointed Minister of Finance? On what date did he resign? If it is the practice for ministers to resign from boards, then on what date did he resign from the boards on which he sat from 1935 to 1939, when he was sworn in again as Minister of Finance, and before he became Minister of National Defence, upon the death of Hon. Mr. Rogers?

It would be interesting to have an acknowledgment of his resignation from the companies concerned, banks and so on. Or, if he did not resign—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I have a perfect right to speak.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. This discussion has nothing whatsoever to do with the item before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: We are discussing item 47—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): This is the item for departmental administration in the Department of Finance.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. The minister is head of that department, and the perpetual acting minister is the acting head of the department, having control of the whole departmental administration, next to the minister himself. I want to know—and this is vital—what are the connections, if any, between the perpetual Acting Minister of Finance and the department? I want to know more particularly because the Minister of Justice resigned from the board of the bank of Montreal when he accepted his seat in the government—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —to be sworn in as Minister of Justice.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am speaking to the point of order.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The Minister of Justice should not be brought into the discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: No, no; I am not saying anything against him. I am praising him for being logical with himself. And I would tell you more than that, sir, that I do not object to any minister's resigning from a board when he is called to the cabinet. I will go even farther than that; I do not object to any minister being on a board, so long as it is publicly known and published in the reference books. But the very moment that publicity in respect of directorships is stopped, I find it wrong.

If it is right for the minister to be on a board, the public has a right to know it, and has more right to know it when it is the Department of Finance. That is my point.

To conclude, I should like to know from the Minister of Finance or from his acting colleague what the rule is regarding the holding of directorships by members of the cabinet. That is my question.

Mr. RALSTON: And would you like to have an answer?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: So far as I am concerned, I know of no general rule. But I know the rule I applied to myself, and that rule was that immediately I accepted the portfolio of Minister of Finance I resigned every directorship I held, except one, and that one was in connection with a small company. I happened to be the executor of the estate of a gentleman who was president of that company, and whose widow I felt I should assist for the time being by continuing to act on that board. I resigned the directorship soon after. I cannot say whether I resigned the others on the day I accepted the portfolio, but I am satisfied it was that day or the next day that I resigned every directorship, with the single exception I have mentioned.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the minister if the directorship he did not resign was in Barclay's Trust?

Mr. RALSTON: The directorship I did not resign at the time was in the Malcolm Furniture company, a company in which the Hon. James Malcolm, a late personal friend and colleague of mine was interested. I was on that board because I was a joint executor with Mrs. Malcolm of his estate.

Mr. GILLIS: I have received a number of protests with regard to the application of orders 184 and 284 which fix quotas for the distribution of certain commodities throughout Canada. These protests have come largely from cooperative stores.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think a discussion of wartime prices and trade board orders is in order under this item. That would have been in order under the estimates of the wartime prices and trade board which were war estimates.

Mr. GILLIS: Strictly speaking they may not, but is not the wartime prices and trade board under the administration of the Department of Finance?

Mr. ILSLEY: Wartime prices and trade board is responsible to the Minister of Finance, but it is a war-time agency and its estimates are provided for separately from the permanent, peace-time, non-war appropriations for departmental administration. When the wartime prices and trade board estimates were before the committee hon. members had an opportunity to discuss everything connected with those orders, and as a strict point of order I think the time has gone by in this session for discussing them.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to press it. This is just a technicality, and I merely wanted to point out to the minister that there is considerable friction in the country on this very matter which affects the general public. Small stores are having to close up because they cannot get goods for their customers.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think the point of order is well taken. I direct the attention of the hon. member to standing order 58 which states:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There are certain regulations with regard to the distribution of materials about which we are concerned in western Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, that is exactly the same point. We must decide whether we are going into the wartime prices and trade board estimates again. If that is decided, we will go into them, but I do not think it would be in order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It is not in order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It might be a considerable task for the chairman to outline exactly what is included in this item and be able to state what is relevant. I would like the minister to tell us the achievements of Canada at the Bretton Woods conference. Up to the present time we have had no discussion on that world conference, which I think is one of the most important matters coming under the minister. It seems to me that this is a proper question to ask.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I should answer that. The hon. member asks what were the achievements?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes. We have heard a lot about them but we have not had any report of any kind in parliament at all. I think this is the most important event of this year. There should have been a general statement, either by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance or some appropriate minister, but we have had no opportunity to discuss this matter to any degree in any way.

Mr. ILSLEY: Two long reports were tabled a day or two ago which embodied the proposals that were accepted by the delegates to the Bretton Woods conference. Those delegates were not appointed by the Department of Finance; they were appointed by the government of Canada. The delegation consisted of persons connected with several departments of the government, with the Bank of Canada, and it included some members of parliament. The agreements did not represent any commitments by the government of Canada, and they will have to be considered by the government before the decision with respect to them can be stated. In regard to the achievements of the Canadian delegation, all I can say is that by common consent they distinguished themselves by their outstanding qualifications and by the ability with which they approached the discussion of and decision on the various matters that came before the conference.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am sure the committee would be gratified if the minister would give us a little more detail as to how they distinguished themselves. We would like to know whether they distinguished themselves in the interests of the dominion government or in the interests of some group of people outside Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would be a matter of opinion and I do not know whether my hon. friend would agree with me.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think the hon. member should confine his remarks to this item.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the Chairman explain to what extent my remarks are not pertinent to this item?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): This item has to do only with departmental administration of the Department of Finance; it is the peace-time administration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Was the Bretton Woods conference under the direction of the Department of Finance?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If it was not, why was it not? Will the Chairman tell me under what department it was.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): What we have here is the peace-time administration, and I submit that the hon. member's problem does not come under that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am very much concerned about this thing and I think I know what I am talking about.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend asked for this report the other day, and I have a vivid recollection of the Prime Minister tabling a copy of the Bretton Woods proceedings and saying that as soon as possible they would be printed in English and French for distribution.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am asking a simple question.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The point the hon. member is raising has nothing to do with the peace-time administration of the Department of Finance; it is in connection with post-war procedure.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If it has to do with post-war, it has to do with peace.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not really under the Department of Finance. The hon. gentleman wants to know what is to be done with this report.

Mr. BLACKMORE: To know where we are at; that is all.

Mr. ILSLEY: These are draft agreements, one relating to an international monetary plan and the other to an international reconstruction bank. They do not carry any commitment on the part of the government. They were drawn up for submission to governments for rejection or ratification. Before agreements are ratified by the Canadian parliament, a full opportunity is given for discussion. I think we had better drop this discussion for to-night. I am not in a position to discuss it any more than the hon. gentleman is.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am well satisfied with that answer. All I want to know is where Canada stands.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

52. Old age pensions, including pensions to the blind, administration, $43,280.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to be getting in the nature of a tradition, Mr. Chairman, that this item should be called very late in the session. Two years ago it was the last afternoon, and last year it was nine o'clock of the last evening, and now it is a quarter to eleven o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me say this, that last year and this year there was full opportunity earlier in the session for a full discussion of this subject.

Mr. KNOWLES: The very fact that we did have a partial discussion of this subject on June 2 and June 5 when the war appropriation estimate relating to old age pensions was before us is, to my mind, an additional reason why a reasonable opportunity should have been afforded for further discussion of this matter. One reason why I make that point is that on that occasion hon. members from all sides of the house drew to the attention of the minister a good many matters relating to the administration of the Old Age Pension Act, which is the item now before us, and we dared to hope that by raising these matters at that time there might be some consideration of our points and some further adjustment made before we reached this main item. As a matter of fact, on June 5, as recorded at page 3542 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance said, and we appreciated it, that he would have the officials of the old age pension branch comb through the debate of those two days to see what could be done with a number of suggestions that were made at that time. I hope that the minister will indicate to-night whether anything has come out of the study of that debate.

Now that we are on this item, it seems to me that the committee should realize, even though it may hold up the proceedings in the other place for a few minutes, that this matter is of deep concern to very many people in this country. When on the 13th of March of this year I endeavoured to move an amendment to the motion to go into supply in order that we might discuss the matter at that time, I suggested that the time had come to raise the amount of the pension to at least $40 a month and to lower the eligible age to sixty. The motion that I then made was ruled out of order, so that there was no discussion of it in the house. But a few days later Canada's outstanding Liberal newspaper, which is published in the city from which I come, criticized me for being terribly irresponsible because I was making a suggestion that would involve an increased expenditure of $155,000,000 a year, raising Canada's total old age pension costs to $206,000,000. It seems to me now that I should apologize to the old people of this country for having suggested so small an amount, for we have found since that for other worthy and deserving purposes we have been able to find almost unlimited sums of money. It seems to me that if we can go in, as I am confident we can, for social legislation such as has been brought down in the house lately—I refer particularly to the bill providing for family allowances and to the bill providing for gratuities for service personnel—if we feel that money is no barrier to bringing about these two desirable objectives because we have found during the war that we can increase our production tremendously, I feel keenly that the time has come not to make just piecemeal changes in our old age pension legislation but to put it on a really proper basis. I know the minister will possibly remind me that during a previous debate the suggestion was made that this whole matter would be discussed at the dominion-provincial conference whenever it may be held. I would hope that if that is still the answer the minister would indicate whether the government has any proposals along the line of increasing the amount of the old age pension and lowering the eligible age to present to that conference if and when it is held. I should also be glad if he would indicate whether any further announcement is to be made as a result of the study by the officials of the old age pension branch which he promised on the 5th of June.

Mr. ILSLEY: This whole matter was discussed when the old age pension war estimate was before the house. With regard to the question whether the government has any proposals for increasing the amount and lowering the age, we certainly intend to make proposals to that end in so far as a contributory system of old age pensions is concerned, which we shall have to discuss with the provinces because that would involve a constitutional change.

With regard to the present system I explained clearly that it is not a satisfactory system. It is almost impossible to make any fundamental change in the system until we discuss a contributory old age pension system with the provinces, and we cannot do that until we have a dominion-provincial conference.

With regard to the suggestions that were made when the estimates were before the house previously, I have had a very long and carefully prepared memorandum made about all of these suggestions. It has been found impossible to do anything about them yet. We have not taken them up with the provinces. That involves an immense amount of correspondence, telegraphing and so on. I think myself that the conference is the most appropriate way in which to deal with the suggestions.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder if the minister is planning to provide copies of that memorandum to the provincial governments in advance of the conference so that they may study the suggestions contained in it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a memorandum for the minister from the officials. It is not for general circulation, but perhaps with some modifications it could be.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to me that would be highly desirable.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a very good memorandum indeed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Did I understand the minister to say that the present system was not satisfactory?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I said that before.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And it was not satisfactory because it was noncontributory?

Mr. ILSLEY: I said before that it was not satisfactory because of divided jurisdictions, because of the great difficulty in making changes and bringing about agreement in ten different jurisdictions when anything has to be done. I have had a very large amount of correspondence with the provinces during the last few years over changes in the old age pension regulations, and I think that a system where the jurisdiction is divided is unsatisfactory.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Did I understand the minister to say that the ideal system would involve contributions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day, so that I may move to continue after eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I move that the house be not adjourned at eleven o'clock to-day.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

52. Old age pensions, including pensions to the blind, administration, $43,280.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When the Prime Minister asked that he might have the floor I had just inquired of the minister whether he believed the ideal system of old age pensions should be one under which contributions were made from those receiving the pension.

Mr. ILSLEY: So far as possible.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Am I right in assuming that the minister believes that authority for old age pensions should be centred in Ottawa?

Mr. ILSLEY: The authority in respect of contributory old age pensions should be a federal authority, I think, just as unemployment insurance is.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I just want to make this comment. In my belief the minister is exactly wrong in this respect, for this reason. Any system of contributory old age pensions will involve a diminution of purchasing power in the hands of the people and such methods should not be resorted to. It is not necessary. Moreover, it is not sound that any more authority should be centred in Ottawa. We have too much of that already. In contemplating a contributory system, or taxation system for old age pensions, he is introducing a technique of socialism. In aiming to concentrate power in Ottawa he is introducing a technique of socialism and this will not give the best results. Let me tell the minister that while he is contemplating a revision of the old age pension set-up he will have my complete support only if he works for $50 a month pension to all people who are sixty years of age.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I would point out that in certain cases men receiving old age pension, although they were seventy-three years of age, found their services required in harvesting, seeing that there was a great shortage of help. The Minister of Labour may be able to assist in this matter. These men, in spite of the fact that they were past the age when they should have been working, went into the harvest fields and did their best to assist in garnering the harvest. The fact that they were paid a small remuneration resulted in a letter being sent to them from the old age pension authorities to the effect that if they earned more than $40 or $50 they must be sure to report accordingly to the officials; otherwise they would discover later on, that this amount would be deducted from the miserable sum they were receiving. Under war conditions, if for no other reason, that sort of thing should be discouraged. These people who are working beyond their years and energy, trying at the same time to render some service, should not be penalized and made to feel that everything they earn beyond a certain sum will be taken from them because their income may reach the terrific sum of $365 per annum. Is there anything the minister can do to prevent that?

Mr. ILSLEY: There has to be some means test if there is a non-contributory old age pension scheme. There is everywhere. You do not pay non-contributory old age pensions regardless of the incomes that people receive. If a person has an income it must be taken into account in determining his pension. It becomes an argument then how much income he should be allowed, and many views have been advanced in that regard. After a good deal of correspondence with the provinces we increased the allowable outside income two or three months ago.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is it now?

Mr. ILSLEY: The total is $425. The allowable outside income is $125 over the $300.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I suggest to the minister that he might as well begin to think in terms of social credit in connection with the old age pension. He had better regard it as a dividend to be given to everyone regardless of income. If he does he will overcome all this difficulty about a means test. The complexities and difficulties inherent in social services will become so great unless he adopts some principle akin to the social credit system that it will be impossible for him to carry on. I am not warning him, but giving him counsel which will save himself and the country a lot of trouble. There is no need of a means test.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask one other question about the memorandum to which reference has been made? The minister knows that I am keenly interested in the old age pensions regulations and everything relating thereto. I appreciate the fact that it was a memorandum prepared by his officials for the minister, so that he may not be in a position to make it public; but is there any chance of its being made available to members either in its present form or in such revised form as it may be presented to the provincial governments?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

475. Administration, National Housing Act and home improvement loans—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is a statutory item in connection with the national battlefields commission. Perhaps I should have asked this question when another minister was on his estimates, but I was wondering if the $75,000 covers any of the arrangements made at present in connection with battlefields either of the present war or of the last one.

Mr. ILSLEY: That has reference to Quebec, not even the last war.

Item agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

115. General administration—estimates of the Clerk, $448,660.

Mr. GRAYDON: On this item I wish to raise a question that I have raised before, of which I gave notice to His Honour the Speaker. On a previous occasion I brought to the attention of His Honour the Speaker the question of the uniforms of the protective staff. I think that has been rectified to some extent, although if one judges by the practical and physical results one still sees the same uniforms that one saw at the beginning. I realize that these things cannot be done overnight, but I believe there is justifiable criticism, if I may say so, of the length of time that has been taken to outfit these men in summer uniforms. Had we an up-to-date policy and one that is dealt with expeditiously these men should have their summer uniforms at least before the snow starts to fall around the building outside. I do not think it is good enough to say that the uniforms have been ordered; that there is difficulty with material, and so on, because if the proper prescience had been exercised in connection with it, surely there would have been no doubt that these uniforms would have been available by last April or May. Let us not forget that this is August and the men have now passed through the hottest period of the summer in their winter uniforms. However, I wish to say we appreciate the fact that they have been ordered. We are always thankful for small mercies. If the fact that the uniforms have been ordered does not cool off the protective staff it at least cools off the argument that one would normally wish to raise to a higher temperature than the temperature of the chamber at the moment.

But that is not what I rose to say. I rose to make some reference to the question of the protective service. I do not wish to make any reflections or any comparisons that may be odious, a course which seems to be very popular in some parts of the country although I do not know how far it extends. I have never seen much unpopularity in this chamber in regard to it, but in certain sections it does not seem to be very healthy or popular to say much about the other place. But whatever may be said with respect to that, I am going to venture a little into the realm of comparison to-night and indicate that I think the protective staff of the House of Commons and certain services of the House of Commons do not receive equal treatment with that of the Senate. Putting it most charitably, if I may say so, I think the working period in the House of Commons and in its precincts is at least as heavy, as burdensome and as important as that of the other chamber. I do not think anyone, no matter how careful he may be of the amenities, will be able to criticize my rather charitable and, I think, quite kindly references to a subject in connection with which other comparisons might have been used quite properly and appropriately. I will go no farther than that at the moment.

There are some points, however, in which my information would lead me to believe this house does not fare so well as the other place. I am not suggesting that those who are employed there are deserving of less than they are receiving, but I merely make this comparison to indicate that if the employees of another place are worth the money they are receiving, then the staff of this house ought to be paid at least equally well. I am not going farther than that, because, after all, it would not be quite fair to do so and I do not want to be facetious in my references to the other house. I should like some information, however, as to why the law clerk of the Senate, for instance, receives more than the law clerk of the House of Commons. That is only one illustration which comes to my notice in connection with the payments that are made.

Getting down to the protective staff, the information I have is that in the Senate there are six constables. while in the House of Commons there are twenty-four. The salary for similar work in the Senate runs from $1,740 a year to $1,920, and in the House of Commons from $1,460 to $1,680. The hours per day per constable in the Senate are six, and in the House of Commons eight. The patrols in sections of the centre block per day are one by the Senate and six by the House of Commons. No visitors are escorted through the buildings by the Senate constables; practically all of those who come to see these buildings are escorted by the House of Commons staff. The entrances policed in the Senate are one and in the House of Commons four. There are other points which might readily be brought in as well. My experience with the constabulary of the Senate and those connected with it leads me to pay them a compliment and a tribute.

Mr. RALSTON: How did you get over there?

Mr. GRAYDON: I saw my hon. friend inspecting the precincts of the Senate; I followed him, and in the course of my travels picked up a little information for myself. I do not want anything I have said to be taken as a reflection upon those who work in the other place; I think that would be unfair and quite unjustifiable, because I have found them as I found our own staff, not only courteous but rendering an excellent service in their own way, and I am quite sure that those connected with the constabulary in the other place would be the first to desire to see equality on our side of the building. That is the reason that prompts me to rise. As I understand it, the scale of pay for constables in the protective service of the House of Commons is on a lower standard than that of the Senate. Having that in mind, I should like an explanation from His Honour as to the inequalities that exist, and a statement on the whole situation. So far as the staffs in both parts of the building are concerned I think there should be some approach to equality as far as monetary returns are concerned. So that I am pointing out what would seem to be obvious difficulties which have arisen. On an occasion such as this I should have liked the opportunity to go into the matter a little further and give some additional information, but I believe the circumstances at the moment are such that perhaps this will do for this session, in the hope that it may be something of a tonic to His Honour and perhaps increase his appetite for doing something more to bring about equality for the benefit of those on our side of the building.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps first I should deal with the remarks of the leader of the opposition in regard to uniforms. For the last three months we have been endeavouring to obtain summer uniforms for the members of the protective staff. I have had a great deal of sympathy for them during these hot days, when I have been wearing my gown and vest and have seen them in somewhat similar circumstances. The difficulty in the first instance was to get the cloth. Priority had to be obtained; and although the cloth was ordered we found we could not get it. Finally we were able to get the cloth and then the difficulty was to find tailors to make up the uniforms. After having got in contact with three different tailors, who promised to make the suits, we found that they could not do so, and ultimately we had to place the order in the hands of one tailor. I can tell the leader of the opposition that I have inquired constantly when the uniforms would be ready, and the chief of the protective staff tells me he has been telephoning every day in order that the men may be properly clad for this warm weather.

With regard to the staff of the Senate and the House of Commons, my information is a little different from that of the leader of the opposition. In the Senate there are four senior constables who receive from $1,740 to $1,920 per annum. In addition, there are two other constables, one a full-time temporary who receives $5 a day and one borrowed from the messenger service as a war-time measure who receives $4.50 a day during the session and $4 a day during the recess. On the protective staff of the House of Commons there is an assistant chief at $2,040 per annum; four sergeants, who would correspond to the senior constables in the Senate and who are paid at the same rate; in addition, ten permanent constables who receive from $1,500 to $1,680 per annum, and, in addition, fourteen men employed continuously at rates of $4 and $4.50 a day. There is also one temporary who was taken on for the session at the rate of $4 a day. In the Senate six men are employed doing protective work; in the House of Commons twenty-six are employed in the same work and receiving approximately the same rates of pay.

What the leader of the opposition stated in regard to the duties of the protective staff of the House of Commons as compared with the protective staff of the Senate is perfectly true. There are onerous obligations upon the members of the protective staff of this house. But the leader of the opposition will realize that of himself the Speaker of the House of Commons cannot apply the remedy, or he would have done so long ago. However, I am glad indeed to note the statement made by the leader of the opposition and I will convey it to the civil service commission together with my request that a survey be made in regard to the officials of the House of Commons and of the Senate, in order that we may remedy whatever there may be in the way of injustice to some of our staff. It is only within the last two or three days that I have heard any complaints with regard to the rate of pay received by the members of the protective staff, and I have not been in a position to judge as to the merits of those complaints in comparison with the members of a similar force. I think I can say to the leader of the opposition, however, that I should very much dislike to find anything in the way of injustice to our own staff with regard to the pay they receive and the duties they perform, and I should be sorry indeed to find that the officers of the House of Commons were discriminated against in comparison with those of the Senate. After all, they are part of the same institution, and the same rate of pay between our staff and the staff of the Senate should prevail. I am obliged to the leader of the opposition for having brought this matter before the house, and I shall take all the steps necessary in order to see that rectification, if possible, is made as between rates of pay here and in the Senate.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wish to thank His Honour. I expected this courteous treatment, and that type of reply from the man who from day to day rules over us, who does it so very well and with such finesse. I should like to say to him that I think his move with respect to having a survey by the civil service commission would be the normal, the most practical and the best move. He will have my support in doing so. I think we all feel, as he does, that the officials and staff in the House of Commons do not wish to boast about being better than anybody else in the legislative field; but I think we must agree—and perhaps we shall have some support in this—that at least they are just as good. And if they are just as good they ought to be remunerated just as well.

Mr. BOUCHER: I hesitate to take further time, because my leader has explained the situation clearly. I, too, feel that our relationships with His Honour the Speaker have been very satisfactory, and I am sure he will look after this matter.

It seems to me, however, that his own statement illustrates one point, namely, that the Senate protective staff boasts of six members and has six senior officers or sergeants, whereas in the House of Commons there are twenty-four members and only four senior officers or sergeants. This illustrates the point I raised a little while ago in discussing the Civil Service Superannuation Act when I said that the government, as a model employer, should look carefully upon its classifications. I believe the illustration already given by His Honour to the committee shows what I have indicated, and if the matter is referred to the civil service commission for report and investigation they should look into classifications, as well as other matters referred to by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my appreciation of His Honour's statement that he will seek a survey of the whole situation brought to his attention by the leader of the opposition. I trust that when that complete survey is being made His Honour will see to it that the conditions of work and pay of the char staffs on both sides of this building will also be looked into.

There are one or two further matters I should like to mention under this item. First of all, I was glad to notice the report tabled in Votes and Proceedings of August 10 by His Honour the Speaker to the effect that the civil service commission had recommended to him an adjustment in the salaries of certain employees who come under the direction of Mr. Speaker or the Clerk of the House of Commons. It is always unwise to single out any person, because one could go on and mention all the rest of them. But I think I would like to single out the case of the Associate Editor of Debates and Reporter. I believe the incumbent of that office is Mr. Galbraith, and that all who are members of this House of Commons know of the heavy burdens connected with his work, along with the work of the others associated with him. We are glad to see that an increase has been recommended for him.

However, in my mind there are certain questions in connection with this matter. First, when will these increases become effective? I see no provision for such increases either in the main estimates or in the supplementary estimates. Perhaps when Mr. Speaker replies he might indicate that. I would hope that the adjustments for all these people would be made at an early date.

My next point is that it seems to me the time has come for a survey of rates of pay of all people employed as servants of this House of Commons. It bothers me a good deal to look into the details of the two estimates now before us, if I may group them together, namely the estimates of the Clerk and of the Sergeant at Arms, to find that we have people working for us for yearly salaries as low as $1,500, $1,440 and $1,320. Frankly, I do not know how a married man could live in Ottawa on those amounts. The sum of $1,500 is listed as the amount for the chief of the repair staff of the House of Commons. Also I am puzzled by the fact that in that case the amount is $120 less than was voted last year.

Our parliamentary doorkeepers, who render us a good deal of service here, are the ones who receive $1,440 and $1,320. How do they live in Ottawa on those amounts?

Then, the chief of pages receives only $1,560 a year. I was quite surprised to discover that these amounts were as low, and that they are the annual salaries for the work these people are doing.

Also in connection with the reporting branch, where the associate editor of debates and reporter is recommended for increase, I notice that the assistants in the Hansard office—I believe they are classified as principal clerks—also do very heavy work, and they do it the year round. They have not had any increase recommended, I am sorry to say. I hope they will be considered even yet.

I could go on with a great many other cases, but it does seem to me that the whole question of salaries we pay here should be worked out on a comprehensive basis. I welcome the adjustments which have been recommended for some people, but I feel the whole arrangement should be looked into more thoroughly, for we will all agree that things should be done properly on our own door-step.

I trust His Honour the Speaker will be able to say that the statement he has just made, to the effect that he would ask for a survey, may include everything I have asked for.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I have already said, I shall be glad to show the remarks of the leader of the opposition to the civil service commission, and I make the same promise to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, namely, that his remarks will be seen by the commission.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would His Honour answer my question as to when the adjustments referred to in Votes and Proceedings for August 10 will come into effect?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a matter which will have to be left until later. I cannot say definitely when that will take place. It is a matter which will have to be discussed by the government before it can be done.

Item agreed to.

494. To provide for the full sessional indemnity to members of the House of Commons—days lost through absence caused by illness, official public business, or order of the house, or on account of death during the present session—notwithstanding anything to the contrary in chapter 147 of the Revised Statutes, 1927, an act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, or any amendment thereto. Payments to be made as the treasury board may direct, $28,000.

Mr. HANSELL: It will be noted that we are asked to pass this item, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in chapter 147 of the Revised Statutes, 1927, an act respecting the Senate and the House of Commons. I do not quite understand why this stipulation is made. May I point out what I regard as a discrepancy? This item is based upon the fact that the old act allows a member of the House of Commons to be absent from the house for a period of fifteen days without losing any of his indemnity. If he is absent for more than fifteen days he loses $25 a day. Where the unfairness comes in is the fact that this applies to all members, when in fact all members are not equally situated. A member representing a constituency in Ontario or Quebec can go home over the week-end. He may be able to handle some of his business on Saturday and spend Saturday and Sunday with his family. He is able to return Monday without losing any time.

A member from western Canada or the maritimes cannot do that. If he goes home for any reason whatsoever the time spent in travelling must be considered. There are some members of the House of Commons who are known as T to T men, that is, Tuesday to Thursday men. They are able to leave on Thursday night and return on Tuesday and lose only two days. Of course, if they do that often enough they will exceed the fifteen days. The member who lives in the west or the extreme east cannot do that. We have been sitting in this session for over six months and one can imagine what that means to a member from Alberta or British Columbia or the maritimes who has not been able to go home very often without suffering the penalty of $25 a day.

There is another point in the act which I think is unfair. If an hon. member is sick he does not lose the $25 a day if he is within ten miles of Ottawa, but if a member happens to be out west or in the maritimes and becomes sick, that time is counted as absent time. The best place for a man to be when he is sick is at home. I happened to have had an experience just recently. I kept a record of the days I was absent and planned to be back here under the fifteen days. I was fighting an election campaign and with all the opponents I had, particularly my C.C.F. friends in Alberta—not these hon. gentlemen who are sitting here—and with all the advertising I had to read, it was no wonder that I took sick. The result was that I could not return to Ottawa when I expected and I was away for three extra days. Technically I should lose $75, and I cannot afford to.

The same illustration can be made applicable to many members of parliament. It just is not fair and I think there should be some change in the act. I am in favour of this vote because, if it does not pass, I will lose $75 through no fault of my own. This House of Commons Act was written years ago in the horse and buggy days and it is due for revision. There are a lot of other things I should like to say with respect to the life of a member of parliament while in Ottawa, but time is getting late and I do not want to hold up the estimates. I am in favour of the item but I think that some consideration should be given to making this act more fair to all members of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before this session is over, I feel I should say a word about certain difficulties I foresee in regard to the next general elections, whenever they may come. It is the difficulty of securing the best types of candidates. I have heard a great deal from all sides of the house about the difficulties which hon. members are experiencing in meeting their expenses when they are in the city because of the heavy taxation, and the difficulties they are meeting with generally because of the extent to which their practices and businesses have suffered on account of the time they are forced to spend away from home.

There has been a very full discussion in the house about treating the indemnity as something which should not be taxed. So far as this parliament is concerned I do not think the Minister of Finance would have been justified in adopting a course which he thought would not be justified or wise in regard to the indemnity. I cannot say whether I shall be in this House of Commons in another parliament; but if I am I will certainly be prepared to agree with hon. members who deem it advisable that in the interests of the membership of the House of Commons the indemnity should be regarded strictly as an indemnity and not as a salary and, therefore, not be liable to taxation.

I believe that the independence of parliament and the independence of the members of the House of Commons is something that we must seek to maintain at all costs. I regard the amount voted as an indemnity as something intended by parliament to help secure that independence. I have before me a copy of the debate in the British House of Commons on August 10, 1911, when a statement was made by the Prime Minister of that day that at the session following the general election he would arrange for members to be paid. I should like to quote what Mr. Lloyd George, who was chancellor of the exchequer at the time, had to say in reference thereto. I shall quote his words later, but in effect he said that he believed that the House of Commons should be as representative as possible of all classes in the community, not representative merely of certain classes. He said that the British House of Commons as then constituted was made up in a large part of those who came from the learned professions or who were wealthy; he felt that the house should be more broadly representative, that it should have members returned in larger numbers from the working classes, as they are sometimes termed, from the agricultural communities, that there should be as members more persons of talent and ability though in humble circumstances financially.

I feel strongly that at this time of all times we should seek to obtain the best possible representation in the House of Commons of Canada and have it broadened by having as many elements of the community represented as it is possible to have. The other evening I expressed the hope that, in a subsequent parliament, there would be not merely business and professional men, but members chosen from among those who are in the fighting forces to-day as well as a larger representation of labour, a larger rural representation and a larger representation of women, and representatives from no particular class but chosen because of their special gifts, talents and high character.

To make that possible in times like the present it will be necessary that those who are chosen as candidates shall feel that they will be in a position to exercise their duties in this House of Commons in a perfectly independent way, without fear and without favour. What was found in Britain when labour began to be represented in the house was that a string was tied to its representation; members came in as members of the Labour party, but they were bound in advance to support only certain measures and to refrain from supporting certain other measures. They were not free agents representing the country as a whole, or even their constituencies as a whole, but representing a class. Nothing could be worse than that we should have in this country a membership composed of those who represent classes, whatever those classes may be. A member of parliament represents the people of the nation at large, all classes. The danger is this, that unless there is an indemnity that is sufficiently large to ensure independence on the part of members we are going to have this House of Commons composed increasingly of those who are so independent in means of their own, or because of their associations with powerful interests, that they will come to constitute, as compared with others, a very large section of the membership of the house. In other words, we shall have a privileged class here at a time when the world is doing the best it can—in perhaps the worst possible way—to get rid of a lot of privilege and to recognize that there is a certain equality in men regardless of the particular class to which they may belong, or their particular calling.

There is another danger, and that is that we shall have men elected to this House of Commons who, through the inability to secure a different type of candidate, would not be able to earn an income outside of parliament comparable with that which would be secured to them by an indemnity, or coming here, may I say, under obligation, some of them, to corporations, others to special interests, but not free agents.

I feel that that is a very dangerous thing for the independence of parliament. I look upon the payment made to members of parliament in the form of an indemnity, as I have said, as something to secure the independence of parliament and the independence of members of parliament, and if part of that is taken away in taxation, then the purpose for which the indemnity exists is to that extent defeated.

Mr. Lloyd George made the following statement:

> But even now, membership of this house is very largely confined to four classes, apart from the other classes I shall point out later on. Men of means who have got an unearned income, and barristers with their practice in the London courts are members.
>
> Then there are those in well-organized and well-established businesses who have efficient, and, what is even more important, accommodating partners. Then there is another class who are "something in the city."
>
> The demand of the democracy is really for a free choice of doctors. Instead of confining as it were, those who were able to remedy their evils and cure them to a small class, they say, "We want an unlimited choice in picking out the men who will suit us best." It is the same argument we had last week. This demand can only be met in two ways. The first is by raising funds in connection with some great national agitation, or an agrarian agitation, or a labour agitation, which would enable members connected with the movement to be more or less adequately maintained during the time they are attending to the business of that movement. The second is by the organization of capital and labour, whose business is liable to be affected by legislation. These are the only two classes outside the four I have mentioned who offer any source of opening for democratic representation in the house, and both of them, in my opinion, are open to serious objection. One objection is that when the fervour of the agitation dies down, and when you come to humdrum parliamentary work, it is difficult to keep up the funds. Another objection is that I do not think it is desirable —and I agree here with my hon. friend the member for Leicester (Mr. Ramsay Macdonald) —that any man should come here to represent any organization except his own constituency, I do not care whether it is a trade union organization or any other organization.
>
> A man ought to be here to represent the general interests of his constituents, and it is only the necessities of the case which drive a man as an expedient, as the only alternative, as the only opening, to utilize the other method in order to come here to fight for particular interests, and I do not mean to say that I have not seen some of my hon. friends representing trade unions rather than the general interests of labour. That has been my view. But there is one thing in connection with the payment of members—it makes them not merely trade representatives, but representatives of constituents as a whole.

Then he makes this important statement which I think is correct:

> When we offer £400 a year—

This was away back in 1911.

> —as payment of members of parliament, it is not a recognition of the magnitude of the service, it is not a remuneration, it is not a recompense, it is not even a salary. It is just an allowance, and I think the minimum allowance, to enable men to come here, the men who would render incalculable service to the state, and who it is an incalculable loss to the state not to have here, but who cannot be here because their means do not allow it. It is purely an allowance to enable us to open the door to great and honourable public service to these men, for whom this country will be all the richer, all the greater, and all the stronger for the unknown vicissitudes which it has to face by having here to aid us by their counsel, by their courage and by their resource.

I have had some knowledge of this House of Commons for many years, and I wish to say that nothing causes me more anxiety at the moment than the risk which this country is running of losing from this House of Commons many of its present members at the next general election, not that they are going to be defeated, not that they would not be elected if they were to run again, but because they are unwilling again to become candidates and this only because they find that with the indemnity taxed along with the taxation on their incomes they cannot make ends meet; they cannot maintain their independence. I feel it my duty as a citizen of Canada, as a member of this House of Commons and as the leader of the government to say what I feel concerning the necessity of maintaining the independence of members, and how important it is to get into this House of Commons the best class of men and women constituencies can possibly secure as candidates, and to retain for the house what it has in the way of valuable experience on the part of members who have been here over a period of time. I say that regardless of party. What I am saying is as true of members of the parties opposed to the government as it is true of members on the government side.

I have already said that so far as the indemnity of members of this present parliament is concerned I think we have all been only too glad during the period of the war to have been able to make whatever in the way of financial sacrifice we could, realizing that it is small or as nothing compared with the sacrifices that are being made by those who are fighting the battles of our country at the front. But we shall hope that the war will be over before another parliament assembles. There will be great problems to be faced, much greater than the people of this country begin to realize, by the parliaments of the future. The problems from now on are not going to be local or mainly domestic problems. They are going to be increasingly world problems, and Canada is going to have a very difficult time indeed in doing its part to help solve these problems. We shall require in parliament all the experience that we can have that is of value from the past. We shall need to have here the best representation that we can get of the men and women who are prepared to present themselves as candidates. And so, in the next parliament, should I continue to be a member of this House of Commons, I shall be glad to join with hon. members of the House of Commons who feel the same way in recommending to the government of the day, whether I am a member of it or should be sitting opposite, that the indemnity of four thousand dollars should be regarded as a payment made by the country to enable members of parliament to be free from pecuniary embarrassment and to be perfectly independent in the discharge of their duties here, and I will advocate that. If I should not be in parliament but spared to speak my mind, I shall be only too happy to support from without on this matter any administration that will recommend the exemption of the indemnity from taxation as a means of helping to maintain the independence of members and the independence of parliament itself in the next parliament.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the reports of the committee of supply made to the house on February 18; March 3, 6, 17; June 28, 30; July 14, 18, 20, 21, 24, 25, 28; August 3, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, less amounts voted in interim supply, be now received, read a second time and concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1945, the sums of $161,199,849.17 and $21,459,077.59 respectively be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 186, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1945.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PROVINCIAL PREMIERS AND DOMINION GOVERNMENT TABLED—STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I should like to move that we revert to motions in order that I may table some correspondence related to the dominion-provincial conference and to make a statement in reference thereto.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg leave to table correspondence that has taken place between premiers of provinces of Canada and the dominion government with respect to the dominion-provincial conference. Some of this correspondence was tabled, I believe, on March 31 and I am herewith tabling the remainder.

Before the house adjourns, I should like to make a statement regarding the proposed dominion-provincial conference.

It was our hope that the conference might be held about Easter, but this was rendered impossible by the sessions of the provincial legislatures, and our inability, therefore, to arrange a date that would be generally acceptable. The inability to fix a satisfactory date was increased by successive provincial elections in Saskatchewan, Quebec, Alberta and New Brunswick. The wisdom of not calling the conference in advance of these elections has been made obvious by the fact that in two of the provinces where elections have been held, the governments have changed in consequence of the elections. The election in New Brunswick will not be over before the end of the present month. And, I might add, it has been publicly announced that the new government in Quebec will not take office until August 30. Without doubt the new government will wish to have time to prepare for a dominion-provincial conference. It is clear, therefore, that a conference could not be held suitably to all the provinces before October at the earliest.

It is desirable above all else that the conference when held should be a success. Canada cannot afford a repetition of what occurred at the last dominion-provincial conference. The whole purpose of the conference is to work out solutions of many difficult problems, which solutions will have to be implemented by the governments concerned.

It is obviously desirable that the conference should, if possible, be held between the governments that may be in office during the next few years, the governments that will be living together and will have to work together.

So far as the provinces are concerned, once the New Brunswick election is over, there will have been an election in six of the nine provinces since August of last year. In the remaining three, the elections were in 1941 and no further election is required by law in any of the three before 1946.

The date of the federal election is necessarily uncertain, but as I have repeatedly said, once the war is over, it may come at any time. It will not, however, be delayed on any account beyond the legal term of the present parliament. If we are to believe what we are told by our political opponents, it may be a C.C.F. government, or a Progressive-Conservative government, or some other government than the present one which will be in office after the general election. While I myself do not entertain any of these views, clearly all uncertainty should be removed as to the government which will have to carry out, on behalf of the dominion, the important decisions of the conference before those decisions themselves are reached. In no other way can there be a guarantee that the decisions of the conference will be effective.

There is, however, an additional reason why, if the conference itself is to be a success, it should be held only after a general election. What above all else is required to make the conference a success is a cooperative attitude on the part of all governments concerned. How far that attitude has thus far been in evidence may be judged from the correspondence which there has been since the conference itself was proposed.

The correspondence up to March 21 was tabled on March 31. To-night I have tabled the remainder of the correspondence to date. Perhaps the house will agree to have the entire correspondence printed as an addendum to the Votes and Proceedings of to-day.

Apart from the correspondence, which speaks for itself, I must draw the attention of hon. members to a statement made by the Premier of Ontario in a broadcast on the evening of July 21, a report of which was published on the following day. I quote from the Toronto Globe and Mail of July 22, 1944, a paragraph setting forth, within quotation marks, the statement which Mr. Drew made in his broadcast. It is as follows:

> My one ambition in the political field outside of Ontario is to see an end as soon as possible of the weak and incompetent government in power at Ottawa to-day, and to assist in every way I can to assure that John Bracken is the next Prime Minister of Canada.

Such being the declared aim of the Premier of Ontario, it must be apparent that any conference held before a federal election would have little or no hope of success, and would almost certainly prejudice the success of a subsequent conference.

Preparations for the dominion-provincial conference can and will be continued so that it will be possible to have the conference held immediately following a general election.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest to the Prime Minister—and I do not like at the end of the session to inject anything that is not strictly harmonious—that I think what he has explained as the reason for not holding the dominion-provincial conference may properly be described as an excuse instead.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry my hon. friend has found it necessary to be facetious at the last moment of this part of the session; but may I assure him that the facts speak for themselves. I have carefully refrained from making any comment. I have allowed the record to stand, as I think it will, on its own.

Mr. GRAYDON: You could not have said much more with respect to the premier of Ontario.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; he said all that was necessary.

Mr. GRAYDON: So did you.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I move that the house suspend its sitting until a message comes from the senate.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: The sitting of the house is suspended until 12.15 a.m. We shall need a quorum after we get back from the senate. I think I should tell hon. members that the restaurant will not be open to-morrow.

At 12.05 a.m. the sitting was suspended until 12.15 a.m.

The house resumed at 12.15 a.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act for the relief of James Russell Popham.
An Act for the relief of Norma Segal Katz.
An Act for the relief of Harold Almond Jelley.
An Act for the relief of Josephine Kurys Kulczycki.
An Act for the relief of Shirley Harte Harvey Payne.
An Act for the relief of Pearl Anneta Benn Russell.
An Act for the relief of Joseph Adélard Paul Bégin.
An Act for the relief of Eugène Charron.
An Act for the relief of Lillian Bessie Noall Salmon.
An Act for the relief of Joan Helen Gorham Glover.
An Act for the relief of Elsie Hollingsworth.
An Act for the relief of Louis Joseph Jules Laurencelle.
An Act for the relief of Freda Altman Scheien.
An Act for the relief of Ivan Walter Moore.
An Act to amend the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940.
An Act to amend the Judges Act (Annuities).
An Act to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act.
An Act to amend the Criminal Code.
An Act for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace.
An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act.
An Act respecting a certain Tax Convention between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Ottawa, in the Dominion of Canada, on the eighth day of June, 1944.
An Act to amend the Special War Revenue Act.
An Act to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act.
An Act to amend the Customs Tariff.
An Act for the support of the prices of fisheries products during the transition from war to peace.
An Act to provide for the insurance of veterans by the Dominion of Canada.
An Act to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936.
An Act to change the name of the Discount & Loan Corporation of Canada to Personal Finance Company of Canada.
An Act to provide for family allowances.
An Act to incorporate the Export Credits Insurance Corporation and to promote the revival of trade by the provision of Dominion Government guarantees to encourage exports from Canada.
An Act to amend the Income War Tax Act.
An Act to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940.
An Act to incorporate Workers Benevolent Association of Canada.
An Act for the relief of Everett Roy Clow.
An Act for the relief of Elmore MacLean MacKay.
An Act for the relief of Ruth Usher Garson.
An Act for the relief of Albert Daniel Joseph Doherty.
An Act for the relief of Rosie Vogel Blatt.
An Act for the relief of William McKenzie White.
An Act for the relief of Zoe Irene McFarland Craig.
An Act for the relief of George Henry Olaf Rundle.
An Act for the relief of Ruby Violet Gainsford Moorhead.
An Act to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, the improvement of housing and living conditions, and the expansion of employment in the post-war period.
An Act to encourage the provision of intermediate term and short term credit to farmers for the improvement and development of farms, and for the improvement of living conditions thereon.
An Act to incorporate the Industrial Development Bank.
An Act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.
An Act to provide for the payment of war service gratuities and for the grant of reestablishment credits to members of His Majesty's forces in respect of service during the present war.
An Act respecting banks and banking.
An Act to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.
An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1945.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 12.35 a.m. until Wednesday, January 31, 1945, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Wednesday, November 22, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

NOTIFICATION TO MEMBERS OF MEETING CALLED FOR THIS DAY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to report to the house that under and by virtue of a resolution passed by the house (Votes and Proceedings August 12, 1944, page 869) dealing with the adjournment of the house, I sent, on 15th November, 1944, a telegram to each member of the house notifying him and her of the meeting of the House of Commons this day, and on the same date I sent by air mail to each member the following notice:

In pursuance of the order of the House of Commons passed on August 12, 1944, I am satisfied after consultation with the government, that public interest requires that the House of Commons which was adjourned on August 14, 1944, until Wednesday, January 31, 1945, should meet at an earlier time and I hereby give notice that it shall meet on Wednesday, November 22, 1944, at 3 o'clock p.m., and transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that day.

J. Allison Glen,
Speaker.

Ottawa, November 15, 1944.

I also caused this notice to be published in the Canada Gazette of 18th November, 1944.

VACANCIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that during the adjournment I received communications from several members notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz:

Of Donald Alexander McNiven, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Regina City, by resignation;

Of J. Alphée Poirier, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Bonaventure, by decease.

I accordingly issued my several warrants to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts, respectively.

THE LATE J. ALPHEE POIRIER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Since the house adjourned on August 15 last one of the hon. members of this house in the person of J. Alphee Poirier has passed away. Mr. Poirier came into the House of Commons in the election of 1940. It was his first session in parliament, and being a modest man he did not seek to take any important part in the proceedings of parliament, though he was very faithful in his attendance and in his work on committees.

Mr. Poirier was born in the county of Bonaventure, Quebec. Throughout his life his interest had mainly been in the affairs of that county. He was primarily interested in the industry of agriculture. For ten years before he entered the house he was an instructor in agriculture in Quebec. During the time that he was in this house he was a faithful and loyal supporter of the administration. I personally feel very keenly the loss of one who was so true and constant a friend. I am sure that my loss will be shared particularly by all hon. members of my party, and I believe it will be shared by all hon. members of the house who had the pleasure of knowing Mr. Poirier. His career was cut off at the early age of forty-five years. Had he been spared, he might have been expected to take a large place in the public life of our country, more particularly in the public life of his own province. Through a heart attack he was taken suddenly away and is now no longer with us.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure it will be the wish of all hon. members that we should express to Madame Poirier, and her three children who have been left, the high respect in which the memory of our late fellow member is held by all hon. members, and that you will also extend to them in their bereavement the very sincere sympathy of all hon. members of the house.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire at this time to associate myself and the members of my party here with the remarks which have been so well made by the Prime Minister on this occasion, and to say to the government and to the Prime Minister that they have our sympathy in the loss of a loyal and faithful colleague. I wish also to join our party with the message of sympathy of such a genuine character to the widow and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): We never meet, Mr. Speaker, without having this sad duty to perform. I wish to extend to the government and to the colleagues of our deceased friend the sympathy of our group in the house, and I would join with the Prime Minister in the expressions of sympathy he has addressed to the family.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members of our group I wish to join with the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition in the words of sympathy they have extended to those bereaved, and in their appreciation of the work done by our deceased colleague.

ORDER OF BUSINESS THIS DAY—PROCEEDING TO ORDERS OF THE DAY AND GOVERNMENT ORDERS

Mr. SPEAKER: As this is Wednesday, the resolution (Votes and Proceedings 8th June, 1944, page 438) provides that the house shall meet on Wednesday at three o'clock p.m. and that the order of business shall be the continuation of business interrupted by the adjournment of the house on the preceding day, provided always that government business may be called on Wednesdays in such sequence as the government may think fit. The house therefore will proceed to orders of the day and government orders.

CANADIAN FORCES

REINFORCEMENTS—CHANGES IN THE MINISTRY—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND MR. RALSTON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the present meeting of the House of Commons has been occasioned by the controversy which has arisen out of the resignation on November 1 of the Hon. J. L. Ralston as Minister of National Defence, and the desirability of affording to hon. members an opportunity of discussing all matters in reference thereto, and in reference to the situation which has since arisen, and which is a matter of first importance to parliament and the people of Canada. I now wish to read the correspondence exchanged between the Hon. J. L. Ralston and myself concerning the resignation of Colonel Ralston as Minister of National Defence, including letters exchanged between us on the subject of the publication of this correspondence. Inasmuch as the correspondence contains references to discussions and deliberations in the cabinet, and is consequently subject to the rule of cabinet secrecy, it has been necessary for me to seek the consent of the sovereign to its publication. I have to inform the house that in accordance with the proper constitutional practice I duly advised His Excellency the Governor General that it was in the public interest that all of this correspondence should be made available to the House of Commons. His Excellency has been pleased to give his permission to this being done.

On November 12 the former Minister of National Defence issued an extensive public statement on the subject. But for this statement, there might have been reasons of military security which would have made it necessary for me to advise His Excellency against permitting the disclosure of certain portions of the correspondence. In the circumstances, however, these reasons no longer obtain, since the references in the correspondence to which exception might have been taken on this ground have already been made public in the former minister's statement, which has been widely reproduced in the press.

The first communication is one from Colonel Ralston to myself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have these letters been printed, and are they available now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to my hon. friend that I had anticipated that the house would wish to have the correspondence in printed form at as early a moment as might be possible, and I therefore arranged to have the correspondence printed. After it has been read in the house, printed copies will be issued from the distribution office, and hon. members will find them in their boxes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why not have them now, so that we can follow them?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it would be proper that I should read the correspondence in the first instance, so that it may first appear in the records of the house and then be distributed. May I return to the first communication, which is dated the office of the Minister of National Defence, Canada, November 1, 1944:

Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King,
P.C., M.P.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

When I returned on October 18 from a visit to the Canadian troops in Italy, in north-western Europe and the United Kingdom, I felt compelled to recommend as a result of my own observations and inquiries in the battle theatres, and on the information and advice received from my officers, that due to infantry casualties being much greater than had been forecasted on the best information available, it had become necessary to secure substantial numbers of additional trained infantry personnel in order to make reasonable provision for the reinforcement of our troops overseas.

Since it appeared clear to me that enough volunteer personnel could not be made available to meet the need, I considered that I had no alternative but to recommend that N.R.M.A. personnel be sent overseas as reinforcements. I felt that this was necessary to fulfil our pledges to our fighting men.

The whole question was discussed at very considerable length both at meetings of the cabinet and of the war committee of the cabinet. My recommendation was not accepted.

Alternatives were suggested such as reducing our commitments or breaking up units or formations. I felt I could not concur in this when these trained N.R.M.A. men were available; and that at this crucial period Canada's duty was to support our men in the line, and not to relax but to go on with the task to help shorten the war and speed the victory.

It was suggested that, if a further appeal were made to trained N.R.M.A. personnel by ministers of the crown and others, such personnel might volunteer for general service in sufficient numbers to meet the need. This suggestion involved delays which I considered would be serious if the appeal was not successful. Consequently I wished to be assured that it was government policy that if, after the appeal, the need for reinforcements overseas still existed and volunteers were not available, N.R.M.A. personnel would be sent. This was the course which I and some other colleagues had understood would follow from your speech in 1942. It was in effect what I, as minister, have repeatedly said in the house since then.

No such assurance was forthcoming. On the contrary it has developed in the discussions that the government as a whole (certain colleagues excepted) do not consider that your speech committed the government to this course.

I consider myself bound by what I have said in the house. Our differences are fundamental on the vital matter of reinforcing our troops, and consequently and as requested by you, I at once tender my resignation as Minister of National Defence.

In the stand I have taken I have considered that my first thought should be my duty to our fighting men in our overseas army.

I wish every success to the distinguished citizen who I understand will take up the duties of this department, and at the same time I want to express to you my very sincere appreciation of the opportunity I have had of serving in Canada's war activities.

Yours very sincerely,

J. L. Ralston.

To that communication I sent the following reply:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, November 3, 1944.

The Honourable J. L. Ralston, M.P.,
Mayfair Apartments,
Ottawa.

Dear Colonel Ralston:

I thank you for your letter of the 1st instant which I received while at a meeting of the cabinet yesterday forenoon. I regret that until to-day I have not had an opportunity to send you a reply.

You will recall that it was not until the 19th of October that you informed the cabinet war committee that you had received a report from the chief of staff at Canadian military headquarters in London, stating that the future effective maintenance of our forces in the two theatres of operations required that additional personnel be made available from Canada.

This was the first report made to the government that the army's reinforcement position was causing concern. You will recall the assurance given the cabinet during the first week of August, that additional military commitments then being sought would not adversely affect this position. During discussions at Quebec, at the time of the conference in September, when future plans for the Canadian army, navy and air force were being considered, no intimation was given of any prospective insufficiency of reinforcements for the Canadian army.

From the 19th of October, as you are aware, the cabinet has been giving its time almost exclusively to a most careful study of the whole situation, exploring every possible aspect of it, but without deciding upon any of the courses explored.

There is one paragraph in your letter to which I regret I must take exception. You say, "Our differences are fundamental on the vital matter of reinforcing our troops, and consequently, as requested by you, I at once tender my resignation as Minister of National Defence". Surely you are in error when you say that "our differences are fundamental on the vital matter of reinforcing our troops". From the outset, the government has been agreed that the matter of reinforcing our troops was "vital". I have never agreed to a single increase in our military commitments without first asking and receiving assurances that the additional commitment would not jeopardize our capacity to provide needed reinforcements. The only difference which exists is one of the method or methods of meeting this fundamental vital necessity.

In your letter you also say "In the stand I have taken I have considered that my first thought should be my duty to our fighting men in our overseas army". I need scarcely say that I have always had the same thought and conception of duty towards all of our fighting men. It is for this reason that I have striven as I have to see that Canada's effort in the present war should be the maximum of which our country is capable. That is why I feel so strongly that at the present time no course of action should be taken if it can possibly be avoided, which, while not certain of accomplishing its purpose, would divide the country and thereby prejudice much that has been so magnificently accomplished throughout more than five years of war—and this on the eve of certain victory.

I have made it clear that I am prepared to follow the course outlined in my speeches in parliament in 1942, if that course should ever be necessary, but I do not believe that it has become necessary.

There has not been a time since the war began that it has not been recognized that resort to conscription for service overseas would occasion the most serious controversy that could arise in Canada. I can think of no course of action fraught with greater danger to our war effort —to say nothing of the unity and strength of Canada to-day and for generations to come— than a general election at this late stage of war on the conscription issue. I believe that such an issue would almost certainly arise were the House of Commons to be asked to endorse an order in council extending the terms of service of N.R.M.A. personnel to include service overseas. Until it is apparent that conscription for overseas service is necessary to the full support of Canada's forces overseas, and that its application would prove effective, the government would not be justified in taking the risk of widespread national dissension.

As to any request by me for your resignation, you will recall that on several occasions you stated that if the recommendation contained in the report of the chief of staff was formally made to the cabinet and not accepted, you would feel compelled to resign, in view of what you had said in parliament. Subsequently you stated that you saw clearly that the cabinet were not disposed to accept your recommendation. In view of your possible resignation on these grounds, I felt it necessary to ascertain the views of General McNaughton. This I did, and ascertained that General McNaughton was not satisfied that compulsory service was necessary to provide full support for the army overseas. In reply to my further inquiries, General McNaughton indicated to me that, with the cooperation of the cabinet, he believed it would be possible to obtain the necessary reinforcements by voluntary means, and that in this belief he would be prepared to assume the responsibility of Minister of National Defence should you resign. In these circumstances, I expressed the opinion that there should not be further delay in reaching a decision.

I cannot express to you too sincerely my own thanks for your great services as a colleague in the years we have shared the responsibilities of office. Nor can I too warmly express my recognition of what your services in all war activities have meant to Canada in these most difficult years.

Yours very sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

On November 6, 1944, I received the following further communication from the Hon. J. L. Ralston:

Ottawa, November 6, 1944.

Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King,
P.C., M.P.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Prime Minister:

Your letter of November 3 came to my apartment very late in the evening of that date. On consideration I felt that it called for an answer, and I regret that over the week-end imperative matters which I could not escape have prevented my writing you earlier.

In the second, third and fourth paragraphs of your letter you appear to imply that the main issue was in some way affected by the fact that the need to provide for additional infantry reinforcements was not reported by me until October 19 on my return from my overseas inspection trip. I think this has really no bearing on the issue of sending N.R.M.A. men as reinforcements or on my recommendation to that effect. If it has any bearing it seems to underline the urgency of the necessity which I reported. I cabled you from London on October 13 indicating my apprehensions. I reported to you personally on the 18th, the same day I arrived home. I reported to war committee the next day. I do not think your letter represents all the information given by me to you or to war committee or to cabinet from time to time with regard to the reinforcement situation; but suffice it to say that I have not at any time withheld any information which appeared to require attention.

The point is that when I obtained information which led me to believe that the need for infantry reinforcements could not be met by departmental action alone, I so reported at the earliest possible date, and I presented this information as fully as possible with my recommendation for action. The fact that such information was not expected or was disturbing has no bearing, I think, on the essential question of the necessity which I presented.

Regarding the assurance as to reinforcements given in August: You refer to the combining of existing units in Italy into an infantry brigade. Any assurance on this point was given by the officers who knew the situation, and as I have already told you, the corps commander advised me when I was in Italy recently that the casualties sustained by this brigade were no greater than those which had been forecasted for the units if they had operated separately.

The discussions at Quebec, of which you make mention, had nothing to do with the reinforcement situation overseas, but were in connection with participation in the war against Japan.

The point is that we are faced with a practical situation which has to be met.

You take exception to my statement that "our differences are fundamental on the vital matter of reinforcements". I have given the facts regarding these differences in my letter of resignation. I think, when my recommendation has not been accepted, when there is disagreement between us as to what was the policy to which the government committed itself in 1942, and when there is disagreement as to what is the present policy, that these are fundamental differences.

You say you are prepared to follow the course outlined in your speeches in parliament in 1942 if that course should ever be necessary, but you do not believe it has become necessary. There is disagreement between us on the vital point as to the meaning of the word "necessary". Your view, recently expressed, is that you consider it means "necessary to win the war", "necessary to defend Canadian soil", "necessary to avert some great calamity or catastrophe". I took the word "necessary" to mean primarily "necessary to keep our overseas army reinforced". I always thought that this was the meaning given to the word in council and parliamentary discussions. There is, I think, a vital and fundamental difference between us on this point.

In my letter of resignation I said that my first thought was my duty to our fighting men in our overseas army. You say that for the proper accomplishment of this purpose nothing should be done which would divide the country, and in this connection you speak of a general election.

I must point out that when Bill 80 was introduced and discussed in the house, nothing was said about an election. The declared procedure, as appears from your speeches, was that if the government decided that it was necessary to send N.R.M.A. personnel overseas, it would go to parliament, announce its decision, and ask for a vote of confidence, and that there would be no second debate on the question of conscription. You said that debate would have to be curtailed and that only a short time, if any, would be allowed for discussion. The suggestion now of a general election on the matter is the introduction of a new condition not contemplated or discussed at the time Government policy was laid down two years ago.

You mention that you always received assurances that additional commitments would not jeopardize our capacity to provide needed reinforcements. I recall that I have repeatedly said that I could not undertake that reinforcements would always be available wholly from volunteers. My point now is that due to an unexpectedly heavy proportion of infantry casualties and the developments of the war we need trained reinforcements, which I consider on the best examination I can make of the situation are not available from volunteers. And we have unused man-power resources in the trained N.R.M.A. personnel, which I think we are bound to use.

In this connection I should remind you that all the formations which we are seeking to support to-day are formations which had been authorized by the government and approved by parliament previous to your speeches in 1942.

This brings me to your point about disunity in Canada. My speeches in the house make it clear, I think, that I have realized, from the first time the question was raised, the grave possibilities of division. That is why from the beginning to the end of my association with the Department of National Defence I have done everything I could to avoid it, and to maintain a wholly volunteer army overseas. I have had regretfully to come to the conclusion that to make reasonable provision for reinforcements it was necessary to recommend action to make N.R.M.A. men available. It seemed obvious that some measure of difference or disunity could not be avoided whichever course were taken. What weighed so heavily with me in the stand I have taken were our pledges to our fighting men and indirectly to their families.

I want to thank you most sincerely for your very generous references to any services I may have rendered to Canada during these difficult years.

Yours very truly,

J. L. Ralston.

To that communication I replied on November 10, 1944, as follows:

Ottawa, November 10, 1944.

The Honourable J. L. Ralston, K.C., M.P., Ottawa.

Dear Colonel Ralston:

I have duly received your letter of November the 7th. It seems to call for one or two observations.

The statement in my letter of the 3rd instant, regarding the assurance as to reinforcements, given in August, has relation to the assurance specifically given at that time by the chief of staff to the war committee of the cabinet that the reinforcement situation was satisfactory. You will recall that the matter arose out of proposals submitted by you on the recommendation of Lt.-General Stuart for the authorization of certain additional personnel for various units and formations of the army overseas, including the formation of the additional infantry brigade to which you refer. The assurance sought and given had direct reference to the state of the reinforcement pool.

The reference in my letter to the discussions at Quebec was not to any specific matter discussed there, but rather to the fact that no question of any possible need of additional reinforcements was raised at that time. If, on September 14, at the time members of our war committee and our own chiefs of staff were in conference with Mr. Churchill and the British chiefs of staff, and the probable duration of the war and the future employment of our forces were under discussion, there was any possibility of our having to resort to conscription to obtain additional reinforcements for the army, before the end of the war in Europe, surely that possibility should have been made known. In the absence of any such information, members of the cabinet were entitled to assume that the reinforcement situation continued to be satisfactory.

What was meant by the word "necessary" as used in my speeches in parliament in 1942, will I think be wholly clear from the context as it appears in Hansard. I think you are in error in attributing to me any different significance to the word "necessary" than that which it has in my speeches in parliament.

The reference to a general election in my letter, as in our previous discussion on the matter, was not to its being "a condition" to the application of conscription under existing legislation, but to a general election being an almost inevitable consequence of any such attempt to impose conscription at this stage of the war. I felt that this possibility must be taken into account as it bears directly upon the question of the best method of securing additional trained men for overseas service. In deciding upon the best method for the attainment of a given aim, it is imperative to take into account the probable as well as any known consequences of each and every possible course of action.

In your letter you recognize the grave possibilities of division resulting from the course you recommended. It is because I took so grave a view of the probable division which would result, and of the possibility that disunity and division in the country might seriously weaken our support for the army, as well as for other phases of our war effort, that I believed it was preferable to redouble our efforts to secure the required results by voluntary means, including a special appeal to the N.R.M.A. personnel and a review of the employment of the very considerable number of general service personnel serving in Canada and the United Kingdom.

Yours very sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

On November 10 I wrote a further letter to Colonel Ralston, which I shall now read:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Confidential

The letter is marked "Confidential", but, as I have already pointed out, His Excellency the Governor General has given his approval to the correspondence being made public. The letter is as follows:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, November 10, 1944.

Confidential

The Honourable J. L. Ralston, K.C., M.P., Ottawa.

Dear Colonel Ralston:

I notice that in a reply to a request for an explanatory statement on your resignation, which appeared in the press of the 7th instant, you are reported as having said that you feel "that responsibility for informing the public belongs primarily to the Prime Minister". With this, of course, I am in complete accord, and in the broadcast I made on Wednesday night (the 8th instant) I sought to discharge that responsibility.

The report added that you had said you recognized that in this matter the public and the armed forces were entitled to full information consistent with military security. With this also, I agree.

The report continues: "I would assume, said Colonel Ralston in his statement, that the Prime Minister would inform the public of the circumstances by making available my letter of resignation and any further correspondence between us in the matter. The correspondence will speak for itself. I therefore refrain from making any statement at present."

In addition to the obligation upon a member of a government to respect military secrecy in making information public, there is also the obligation of secrecy respecting cabinet deliberations, imposed by the oath of the members of the privy council, "to keep close and secret all such matters as shall be treated, debated and resolved on in privy council, without publishing or disclosing the same, or any part thereof, by word, writing or any otherwise to any person out of the same council, but to such only as be of the council."

The privy councillor's oath is not less binding upon the Prime Minister than upon all other members of the privy council. It is an obligation I am bound to respect, one of which I must take the fullest account in considering the course to be pursued in making available to the public the correspondence which has passed between us concerning your resignation.

I have the added responsibility for which I will be held accountable by parliament, of advising the crown as to the time and place at which publicity should be given to such communications. This responsibility is particularly great at a time of war.

In your letter of November 1 you say: "The whole question was discussed at very considerable length both at meetings of the cabinet and of the war committee of the cabinet". In subsequent paragraphs you proceed to set forth matters which were "treated and debated" in council.

I cannot feel that I would be justified, in the light of this obligation, in advising the publication of those portions of your letter relating to the deliberations in council or of those portions of my reply referring to what you have said respecting these discussions.

I believe there should be an exchange of letters between us with respect to which no question as to the propriety of publication could arise.

Yours very sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

To the first letter of November 10, I received the following reply from Colonel Ralston:

Ottawa, November 14, 1944.

Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King,
P.C., M.P.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have your letter of November 10 marked "secret", in reply to mine. (It refers to my letter of November 7; I presume you mean my letter of November 6.)

With reference to the assurances given by the responsible officers to the war committee, I had the same assurances as you, and as explained to me and to you the changed situation arises from the unexpectedly heavy proportion of infantry casualties.

Regarding the meeting at Quebec, I still think that this has, for the reasons mentioned in my letter of November 6, really no relevance to my recommendation.

You speak as if "any possibility" of having to resort to conscription for overseas service had not been in mind. May I point out that your speeches in 1942 envisage that very possibility, and the initiation and passing of Bill 80 was in the light of that possibility.

You will recall also that I went to you at Quebec, regarding certain reports I had heard as to your expressed attitude on this matter; and the fact that I asked you, and you gave me, your assurance then that you would stand by your speeches in 1942, indicates that, at least in my mind, the possibility still existed; although I must say that at the time I had no expectation of the developments which have since occurred.

As a matter of fact, it was, I think, at the next meeting of war committee following the Quebec conference that I did indicate, as a result of further information received in the meantime, the possibility of difficulties regarding infantry reinforcements and the necessity, in my view, for keeping N.R.M.A. personnel available in the light of the uncertainties.

May I again come back to the real crux of this matter, which is the actual and urgent situation which I reported instantly on my return from overseas, and which I considered left me no alternative but to recommend as I did.

Yours very truly,

J. L. Ralston.

In reply to my second letter of November 10, I received the following communication from Colonel Ralston, dated Ottawa, November 14, 1944:

Ottawa, November 14, 1944.

Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King,
P.C., M.P.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have your letter of November 10 regarding the release of my letter of resignation and the further correspondence between us.

I do not think there could be any injury to security whatever in publishing the letter and the correspondence, particularly in view of the information given to the public in the speeches by yourself and the Minister of National Defence and by the Minister of Justice.

Regarding privy council secrecy, I feel I ought to point out that your own speech of November 8 contains references to matters treated, debated and resolved in council discussions, and I am sure these references would not have been made had you not considered that they were permissible. Furthermore, you had no hesitation in May 1942 in publishing the correspondence regarding Honourable Mr. Cardin's resignation, which contained references to council discussions.

In any case, permission to make such matters public is vested in the crown, and since the matter is of intense public interest I beg most respectfully to suggest that you advise His Excellency to assent to the release of my letter and the further correspondence.

Yours very truly,

J. L. Ralston.

I might say that there was one additional letter which is not in this printed correspondence. It was one which I sent to Colonel Ralston a day or two ago informing him that His Excellency had agreed to the publication of the correspondence in full.

I need scarcely say that the severance of the relations between Colonel Ralston and myself as colleagues in the cabinet after an association of many years, including more than five years of war, has been one of the most painful experiences of my life. Let me repeat what already, on several occasions, I have said of Colonel Ralston: No man in Canada will question the sincerity of Colonel Ralston's motives, his personal integrity and his disinterested patriotism; no man in Canada has given more selfless and devoted service to our country throughout the years of war.

General A. G. L. McNaughton was appointed Minister of National Defence and sworn to office on November 2. Regarding General McNaughton I need only say that, from the moment of his appointment as commander of the First Canadian Division on October 5, 1939, the name of no man in Canada has been held in higher esteem or commanded more in the way of confidence in the minds of the citizens of Canada or on the part of members of the Canadian army and their relatives and friends. I should like to express my appreciation of General McNaughton's readiness to assume the responsibilities of Minister of National Defence at a moment when it is apparent that a last mighty effort is required.

I now table copies of the orders in council respecting Colonel Ralston's resignation and the appointment of General McNaughton as Minister of National Defence. I also table copies of the correspondence between Colonel Ralston and myself respecting his resignation. As I have already stated, in replying to my hon. friend opposite, copies will be made available immediately to hon. members through the distribution office.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the order of business to-day, as Your Honour indicated at the opening of the session, is a matter which is within the purview and the jurisdiction of the members of this house, because of the fact that, by way of resolution in the previous part of the session the business to be taken up on a Wednesday is a continuation of that which was under consideration at the adjournment of the Tuesday sitting.

I take this liberty, Mr. Speaker, with your permission and that of the house, to make just an observation or so, having regard to the period through which we are passing. What I say will be impromptu and very brief. As I understand the procedure proposed by the government with respect to this first day's sitting, I think I should indicate my stand as leader of the opposition and that of the party which I lead in the house with respect to the manner in which the business will be presented to parliament under the guidance of the Prime Minister and the government. I believe it is the intention of the Prime Minister, after these preliminary proceedings have been disposed of, to move the adjournment of the house and that the house shall meet again, under certain arrangements, to-morrow.

As I stand in this chamber this afternoon I would not want to have notes in front of me or words to read, because I do not think I have ever taken part in any public proceeding wherein I felt so keenly the seriousness of the responsibility which faces me, as it faces every hon. member in so stern, so trying and so grave a time as this. The crowded galleries, the interest manifested all over the land, the fact that in this house itself few if any seats are vacant, cannot fail to impress us and to show how deeply the issues which now confront us have burned into the very soul of the nation. All the little things which may have divided us in the past, all the small and petty issues which from time to time have occasioned controversy, seem smaller now than ever before, because, thrown up by public opinion like lava from a great volcano, is an issue which has to be faced by every hon. member, regardless of where he sits or to whom he may artificially owe allegiance—a testing time, for this parliament and this nation, such as it has never faced before.

I feel my situation very keenly. No one realizes more fully all the ramifications which an issue such as this presents to this parliament and to the Canadian people. Parliament owes it to the Canadian people to keep these discussions on the very highest plane of which we are capable. Sometimes we shall fail; sometimes we shall be misunderstood. But, Mr. Speaker, if there ever was a time when we should be Canadians first and everything else last, it is now. Our audience, outside this chamber as well as inside, is a stern audience.

It is watching and scrutinizing what we do, because the public is not merely interested but vitally concerned with every move we make. But more important than the public in Canada; more important, if I may say it to you, Mr. Speaker, than any member of this house, is that audience which to-day is so many hundreds and in many instances thousands of miles away. I make no apology for calling it that great unseen audience, made up of Canada's preferred number one citizens, those who are doing more than we who simply debate a great issue, those who are making it possible for us to be here even to debate that issue. Therefore I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of this nation, and particularly those gallant men of ours overseas, are anxious that this house from the very moment of its meeting shall sit through mornings, afternoons, nights, and Saturdays, until the issue that is before the Canadian people shall have been decided—and decided, may I say, sir, so that the reinforcements for our troops overseas will be on their way.

Parliament stands in the testing crucible of public opinion as it never stood before. In this session there must be action; there must be the minimum of talk, if I may say so. On an occasion such as this we should tackle the one problem that the people of Canada want us to tackle. And we must tackle it not tomorrow, not the next day, not the day after, but now. Public concern dictates that course as it never did before.

I take the position I do, Mr. Speaker, largely because the issue is so important, so vital, and carries such a tremendous weight of judgment of the Canadian people as a whole. We feel that immediately—and I call upon the Prime Minister to take this action—we should begin the debate which will bring before this parliament the real issue that the Canadian people want brought before it. In my opinion that issue is that the full provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act should be put into effect at once and that all trained troops in the Canadian home defence army should immediately be dispatched for reinforcements overseas. That is the issue that faces this parliament. All other issues are fads and frills and will be so regarded by a boiled-up public opinion throughout Canada which is so conscious of the issues which face this house.

Therefore in view of the fact that I understand the Prime Minister is not going to bring before this house to-day a confidence motion or any other kind of government motion with respect to this matter, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to allow me to move, seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That this house is of the opinion that the full provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act should be put into effect forthwith;

And that all trained troops in the Canadian home defence army should immediately be dispatched for reinforcements overseas.

Mr. SPEAKER: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) understands, I think, that there is nothing before the house at the moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is trying to get something there.

Mr. SPEAKER: Did I understand the hon. member for York-Sunbury to say, "He is trying to get something there"? There are certain rules which must be observed before that can be done. No notice has been given of this motion.

Mr. GRAYDON: No notice could have been given.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot decide that. All I can decide is that forty-eight hours' notice must be given and the rules so provide. Under the rules I have no authority to submit this motion to the house and therefore I must rule it out of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understand Your Honour has ruled that this motion may not be debated at this time.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no point of order. I am only stating what the rule is. There is no point of order involved.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to obtain the unanimous consent of the house to permit me to introduce this motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am vested with the authority to interpret the rules of the house. I have already stated the rule and the leader of the opposition is well aware of the rule. There must be at least forty-eight hours' notice before a motion such as this can be presented to the house. If there had been any intention—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot allow a discussion on my ruling. If there had been a desire or an intention to have such a motion presented there has been time since the last adjournment of the house to the present moment whereby the orders of the day could have been printed and brought before the house; but in the meantime I am discussing only the power of the Chair to accept the motion that is now submitted. In interpreting the rules may I say that I cannot accept the motion because it is not in conformity with the rule. The hon. member for—

Mr. GRAYDON: May I be allowed to appeal Your Honour's ruling?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is a matter that has already been discussed in the house. There is no appeal. I am not dealing with a point of order. I am dealing only with the interpretation of a rule. There is no point of order and therefore no appeal.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No justice.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I think every hon. member of this house realizes this afternoon the circumstances under which we are meeting. I suppose that seldom in the history of this country and in few other countries has a House of Commons met under similar circumstances. We are literally in the best historical sense of the word meeting in the capacity of the high court of parliament. A grave difference of opinion has arisen between the former Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and his colleagues in the government which has brought about his resignation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has called upon the gentleman who has, I think, earned the high regard of this country in organizing and leading the Canadian army overseas, as Minister of National Defence.

Mr. NEILL: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, what is before the house now?

Mr. COLDWELL: I think, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member asks what is before the house. There is a ministerial explanation given by the Prime Minister before the house. We have nothing in our rules to cover the situation, but it has been the practice in the British House of Commons that when a ministerial explanation is given remarks may be made upon it, but of course those remarks must be very brief.

Mr. NEILL: By everybody?

Mr. SPEAKER: By the leaders of the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to suggest that it is the duty—

Mr. BOUCHER: On a point of order, are the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) the only two who are granted official status?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. SPEAKER: A point of order has been raised concerning my remark that the leaders of the parties in the house should have an opportunity of expressing their viewpoints. It is true that there is only one official opposition, which is represented by the leader of the opposition, but in the course of our deliberations during these last four years recognition has been given those who are leading different parties in the house. We have always extended that recognition, and I would not now desire that those hon. gentlemen should not have this opportunity. I am proposing that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) shall have the opportunity of speaking, but I am asking that they be brief in their remarks.

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall be very brief. I was merely going to add that I think the procedure being followed, of presenting the correspondence to-day and giving members of the House of Commons an opportunity of reading and studying that correspondence and evidence before we make our individual decisions, is the proper course to pursue. No matter what opinions we may have formed I believe that at this time it is our duty as members of a high court to act in a judicial capacity, and not to judge a situation until we have all the evidence before us. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I hope the government will place before this house every available scrap of information, and I suggest that neither the government nor the official opposition should hide behind the excuse that certain information might give comfort to the enemy if made available to this parliament. If there is such information, and there must be, then I suggest that where it cannot be given in public because it would give aid or comfort to the enemy, we should receive that information in private on our responsibility as members of this house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And hide it from the public.

Mr. COLDWELL: No. Hide it from the enemy. I say that we as members of this house have no right to play politics at this time; that we are here in a judicial capacity; that we must receive all the evidence, and we have no right to act in any other manner. I hope that during not this new session, as the leader of the opposition said, but this resumed session of the house, we may all act in the very best traditions of our parliamentary institutions.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the proposal made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) struck me with astonishment. I came here to elicit all possible facts bearing upon this situation, and to form to the best of my ability a considered opinion as to the merits of the several cases. Imagine my amazement, then, when a proposal is made which would prevent me from forming such a considered opinion. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that thus far I am thoroughly in accord with the procedure being followed by the government in this investigation. It is only fitting that we should hear the correspondence read, and that we should have time to read it ourselves and be prepared to ask questions in regard to it if needs be. If we can just secure to-morrow a similar amount of information bearing upon the general question, and again have time to consider it, free from haste, then we shall take another step forward in our deliberations.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

RESCISSION OF ORDER OF JULY 13 FOR MORNING SITTINGS

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the house was seeking to bring to an early end the concluding portion of the session in the late summer we adopted certain resolutions which were designed to conclude the proceedings as rapidly as possible. Among others were resolutions providing for sittings in the mornings and on Saturdays. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has just said that he thinks that while we are considering this grave question, we should sit mornings, afternoons, evenings and Saturdays.

Mr. HATFIELD: And Sundays.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And some hon. member of the official opposition has just added Sundays. May I say that I think any such procedure would be most inadvisable, and would be so regarded by the people of this country. I believe it would be taken as evidence that we were not prepared to give to this question the thoughtful consideration it merits, as one of the gravest questions that has ever been before the Canadian parliament for consideration. May I put it in this way. If I had come forward with the proposal that this house should sit to-night, and again to-morrow morning and afternoon and evening, and do the same on Friday and Saturday, no one would have been on his feet more quickly than my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, to condemn me for seeking to hasten the whole procedure of this house.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The boys overseas are not laying off Saturdays and Sundays.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend would have said immediately that what was required, in a situation such as this, was opportunity for the fullest consideration of all aspects of the question and that, obviously, until there had been time to peruse the correspondence carefully and to hear all sides of the question, this house should not be rushed to a decision.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope my right hon. friend is not trying to put words into my mouth, because I am sure I would not have uttered quite those words.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not putting any words into my hon. friend's mouth, but I would say to him that it is not so much quantity of talk as it is quality of thought which counts in matters of this kind.

Mr. HATFIELD: And we are wasting time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say one word to hon. gentlemen opposite who are continually interrupting. If they have no regard for the order of debate as indicated by myself, and the manner of the conduct of the debate, perhaps they will listen to their own leader, who made quite a strong appeal to them just a few moments ago, in which he said that he hoped this house would deliberate on this matter in the most careful manner possible, and I think he added, on the highest plane.

In order to permit of that deliberation which I think is essential in this matter, it would be advisable to rescind the resolution which still stands that the house should sit in the mornings, and I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Crerar:

That the order passed on July 13, 1944, under which the house was permitted to sit at eleven o'clock a.m. until the end of the session be rescinded and that the house shall in future meet at three o'clock in the afternoon of each day as provided in standing order No. 2.

I have thought that this would be the procedure that would most commend itself to hon. members of this house, and in all that I am proposing at this session I shall seek, at every turn, first of all, to give the amplest opportunity for the discussion which is necessary. I shall seek to meet, as I have at all times sought to meet, the convenience and wishes of the great majority of the members of the house.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask whether notice has been given of that motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: Notice is not necessary. This is with regard only to the hour and not the day. It is only a change in the hour; it does not change the day. Therefore no notice is necessary.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Before the motion carries. I should like to reiterate the position which I took on behalf of the official opposition when the matter was previously mentioned in the house. I realize the underlying thoughts which the Prime Minister has on a matter of this kind. I am not overlooking any of them, because they were present before in his speeches, and no doubt they constitute factors in the decision he is now making. I do not treat them lightly. I know they are serious factors. However, I make this appeal to the Prime Minister and to the members of this house. The people of Canada expect us to deal with this question, which is so urgent, with as little delay as humanly possible, and for that reason I must oppose the passing of a motion of this kind, because I am afraid that throughout Canada the people will seriously misunderstand the fact that we are now shortening the period of our sessions as it stands under the rules at the moment. I would ask the Prime Minister, in view of the public alarm that prevails on this particular problem, not to press the motion which he is now making.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The public will be as anxious as hon. members of this house to read very carefully what is said here from day to day. They will not wish that the proceedings in this house shall be conducted at such a rate that it would be impossible for them to cover the matters that are being discussed here, and to cover them intelligently and in such a manner as they would consider advisable. The motion I have made does not admit of debate and I do not intend to debate it. I suggest that it is in the interest of the public and of the members of this house that it should be accepted at once.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. GRAYDON: No. On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

ADJOURNMENT—DEFENCE MINISTER TO MAKE STATEMENT TO THE HOUSE ON THURSDAY

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the business to-morrow?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As hon. members are aware, thus far it has not been possible to have the Minister of National Defence, General McNaughton, obtain a seat in this house in time to discuss any matters from the ministerial benches. I believe, however, that hon. members will wish to have from him a statement as to the present position, on which they can base their decisions with respect to the course which it may be most advisable to take at this time. I would therefore ask hon. members to permit the Minister of National Defence to appear in this chamber to-morrow afternoon to make a statement to the house.

The house is master of its own procedure and can grant the permission which I have just requested, and I believe that hon. members will wish that this course be taken. If that is agreeable to hon. members, then, Mr. Speaker, I would say that to-morrow afternoon after the opening the Minister of National Defence will be prepared to appear in the chamber to make a statement to the house, and at the end of that statement, if hon. members wish to question him, I am sure he will be quite prepared to give such answers as he feels he is in a position to give. That course I suggest as the one which it would be in the interests of the house and of the country to follow to-morrow.

Mr. GRAYDON: Lest my silence on this matter, which is so important, be misconstrued, may I say to the Prime Minister that I should not like it to be taken that his suggestion with respect to the programme of to-morrow, in its entirety, will be acceptable to us under all circumstances. I understand that if General McNaughton comes before the house in open session there may be some disposition on his part to indicate that the house might have to sit in secret in order to obtain some further information. In other words, the whole question of a secret session and of General McNaughton's coming to parliament, as proposed, is of course bound up together to some extent, and for that reason I should like to reserve any decision I may have to make in that respect, particularly as regards one matter about which we feel very keenly. This official opposition is opposed to anything being done to close the doors of this parliament or of any other deliberative assembly. Consequently I wish to have it distinctly understood that as regards a secret session, which is a matter of great importance so far as we are concerned, we are unalterably opposed to that procedure at this time when the country is asking for the information lying behind the whole problem that faces us.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should not like it to be thought that the leader of the opposition speaks for the entire opposition. I recognize at once that we must get every bit of information that will guide us. I recognize that there are matters which may be of military importance not only to ourselves but to those allied with us and under those circumstances we would be disposed to receive that information in secret session, with the right of course to question that information. I should like you, Mr. Speaker, and the house to understand that we do not associate ourselves with the leader of the opposition in that respect. We think, too, it is proper under the circumstances to have General McNaughton appear here in spite of the fact that it might be unprecedented.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.30 p.m.

Thursday, November 23, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

THE MINISTRY

ORDERS IN COUNCIL RESPECTING CHANGES AND APPOINTMENTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table certain orders in council respecting changes and appointments in the personnel of the cabinet: P.C. 7999, concerning the appointment of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) as Minister of Veterans Affairs; P.C. 7991, concerning the appointment of Mr. Howe as Minister of Reconstruction, and P.C. 8003, concerning the appointment of Mr. Claxton as Minister of National Health and Welfare. These appointments and changes have been made since the house adjourned in August last.

CANADIAN FORCES

PETITIONS WITH RESPECT TO APPLICATION OF N.R.M.A. ACT

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I desire to present a petition to this House of Commons from my constituency of Parkdale:

The undersigned citizens of the Dominion of Canada—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the petition was presented to him?

Mr. BRUCE: No, Mr. Speaker; this is a petition to parliament, signed by 139 men and women of my constituency.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it addressed to the houses of parliament?

Mr. BRUCE: It is addressed to the houses of parliament. I think it is perfectly in order.

That whereas the Prime Minister of Canada has pledged on behalf of his government to the House of Commons that if "circumstances should arise which would render the use of compulsion imperative, such for example as the maintenance of the necessary reinforcements for Canada's army overseas", the compulsory provisions of Bill 80 would become effective by order in council;

And whereas such circumstances have arisen;

And whereas your humble petitioners are of the belief that a grave emergency—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member may read the prayer of the petition, but not the whole petition.

Mr. BRUCE:

It is, therefore, the earnest prayer of your humble petitioners that this force shall be at once dispatched overseas to the aid of our men now fighting at the front;

And it is their further prayer that, since speedy victory can be gained at least cost of life only by a steady and adequate flow of reinforcements, and without such reinforcements lives must be needlessly lost, the policy of total conscription of man-power for overseas service to ensure support to our fighting forces now, and until victory is won, be made effective forthwith as provided by Bill 80, and approved by the great majority of the people of Canada recording their vote in the plebiscite of 1942.

Mr. McGREGOR: I desire to lay on the table a petition of a similar nature.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I desire to lay on the table two petitions of a similar nature.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): In view of the disagreement between the Prime Minister and the former Minister of National Defence about the meaning of the phrase "conscription if necessary," will the Prime Minister tell the house now precisely what he means by this phrase which he used in his 1942 speeches?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question must be placed on the order paper.

CANADIAN FORCES

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL RESPECTING EXTENSION OF SERVICE OF N.R.M.A. PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I understand that by agreement yesterday the house wishes to hear General McNaughton, the Minister of National Defence, and that he will be allowed to appear on the floor of the house and make a statement and be subject to questioning after the statement has been made. Before General McNaughton is asked to appear on the floor I desire to read to the house an order in council which sets forth the policy of the government with respect to the extension of service of N.R.M.A. personnel, which order is P.C. 8891, and has been approved by His Excellency the Governor General to-day.

At the Government House at Ottawa
Thursday, the 23rd day of November, 1944.
Present:

His Excellency
The Governor General in Council:

Whereas it is essential in the national interest and for the efficient prosecution of the war to provide for the adequate reinforcement of the Canadian forces overseas;

And whereas it has now become necessary, in order to ensure provision of adequate reserves to meet requirements for the reinforcement of the Canadian forces fighting in Europe and in the Mediterranean, to extend the locality of service of certain personnel who have been called out for training, service or duty, pursuant to the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940;

Now therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of National Defence and under and by virtue of the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and the War Measures Act, is pleased to order and doth hereby order as follows:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any other statute, law, regulation or order, the Minister of National Defence is hereby authorized and directed to dispatch to the following localities of service, namely: the United Kingdom and/or to European and/or Mediterranean operational theatres such personnel, in such numbers as may be approved by the governor in council (the number hereby approved being sixteen thousand) who are serving by reason of their having been called out for training, service or duty pursuant to the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, as are or may from time to time hereafter be required, in the opinion of the said minister, for training, service or duty within the said localities of service; such personnel to be detailed from such units, depots and establishments as may be designated by the said minister; and the Minister of National Defence is hereby authorized and directed to issue or cause to be issued all orders and to take all steps necessary to give effect to this authorization and direction; and all personnel so dispatched or to be dispatched are respectively hereby required (in addition to all other obligations for training, service or duty) to perform while in the said localities of service such training, service or duty as may be ordered by any superior officer.

Further, all personnel so dispatched or who may at any time be dispatched are, pursuant to section 64 of the Militia Act, hereby placed on active service beyond Canada for the defence thereof.

A. D. P. Heeney,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I ask the permission of the house to table a certified copy of this order which has been approved to-day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surrender.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. From the remarks that have been made by the Prime Minister I take it it is the unanimous wish of the house that the Minister of National Defence shall appear now.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I continue with what I said yesterday with respect to this matter? The Prime Minister indicated a few moments ago that consent had been given. I think I would be less than frank if I did not indicate that there were certain observations that should be made before consent is actually given by the house.

I wish to make our position clear in this matter. Yesterday I mentioned that this question might be bound up with the question of secrecy. Our party are unalterably opposed to any part of this session being conducted in secret, and I so indicated to the Prime Minister yesterday. We feel that any deliberations or any arguments that may be advanced from time to time by any minister of the crown or anyone testifying before a committee or in this house should place sufficient facts in the open to enable the members of parliament and the people of the country to form their judgment. If there were secrecy in this chamber it would perhaps give us a prior right over those who ought to know what is going on, and we are opposed to that. I am hopeful that the Prime Minister will not press it at any time General McNaughton is giving his report.

We are very anxious to hear General McNaughton. We are glad to extend our whole-hearted consent to his coming before this house. I understand however that in matters of this kind it has always been agreed that there shall be one sitting only, or a meeting for one day, as the case may be. Because of the irregularity of the proceedings, when General McNaughton comes in we are anxious that this shall not be simply a general meeting lasting for some days but rather that it shall be an orderly presentation of the facts by the Minister of National Defence and that we shall finish it up to-day. It is hoped that in accordance with the motion which the Prime Minister has on the order paper we shall have an opportunity to commence the debate to-morrow upon those premises. We are all agreeable and glad to have the opportunity of welcoming General McNaughton to our midst.

I should like to say something by way of criticism of the proceedings so far. I think we should get down to business just as quickly as possible. I am hopeful that to-morrow at three o'clock the Prime Minister will be able to proceed with the motion which stands in his name on the order paper. I am sorry that he was not able to bring it on to-day. I think the proceedings would have been more regular had the Prime Minister made his motion first; General McNaughton's statement could then have been made during the general course of the debate.

I should like to make one further observation with respect to the position which the Prime Minister has just announced in connection with government policy. This is a partial reversal of the position to which the government has adhered so rigidly over a long period of time. Having regard to public opinion it is not much of a surprise to us that the government has partly surrendered what we had thought for some time was an untenable position. In spite of the partial reversal of policy, in spite of the position taken by the government, we intend at a suitable stage of the proceedings to move an amendment or to introduce a motion so that this matter may come before parliament. I indicate this merely to indicate to the Prime Minister our position. We intend to move a motion along the general line that this house no longer has confidence in the present Prime Minister, and that the interests of our troops in Europe and the honour of Canada call for the immediate application of the full provisions of the mobilization act, and that another government should be formed without delay under leadership known to favour and pledged to take that course.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Replying to my hon. friend may I say that I agree with what he has laid down as the condition under which General McNaughton is to be permitted to appear, namely, that the discussion shall not be carried on beyond to-day in connection with anything that General McNaughton may say in his statement or which may arise out of the questions that will be asked later.

The question of a secret session is entirely in the hands of the members of the house. I recall that yesterday the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the leader of the Social Credit party both expressed the view that it would be helpful to hon. members to have the fullest information, even to the extent of information which if made public would lend comfort to the enemy, but which if disclosed in secret session would not be subject to that risk. General McNaughton will be asked questions, and I am sure he will answer them as fully as he can, subject to the one condition that when questions are asked which affect military security he will have to say that he cannot give the answer in public. I believe he will express a willingness to give that information to the house in secret session, but that will be a matter entirely for the house to decide for itself. I am not pressing for a secret session. For my own part I would prefer, like my hon. friend, to have everything completely in public, but I would not wish to have anyone disclose matters which would be of comfort to the enemy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That principle has been stretched to the limit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend referred to the proceedings to-morrow and to the motion, notice of which appears in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day, which reads:

> That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

I propose on that motion to make a statement and to have the debate thereon proceed. I regard that motion as being a motion of confidence and it will be so construed by all members of this house. I would point out, however, that I have given notice of another motion reading:

> That the order passed on July 13, 1944, under which the house was permitted to sit at 11 o'clock a.m. until the end of the session be rescinded and that the house shall in future met at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of each day as provided in standing order No. 2.

I would hope that there would be no objection to that motion in the light of what was said yesterday. If, however, there is to be objection in some respects, it is a matter of indifference to me whether the motion is brought up at the end or the beginning of the day. I would prefer to settle that question first thing to-morrow, and I hope the house will feel it desirable to pass it unanimously.

My hon. friend has spoken of the order in council which I have just tabled with respect to the extension of service of N.R.M.A. personnel as a partial reversal of policy. May I say to him that the government regards that order as being in entire accord with its policy. My hon. friend has paid me a further compliment on behalf of himself and his party by saying that they have lost confidence in me.

Mr. HOMUTH: We never had any.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the reply I was going to make, that they never had any confidence in me and I never expected any from them, although at times they have professed that they wished me to stay in office until the war was over.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not recall that.

Mr. HOMUTH: We never wished that at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think hon. members will agree that that expression of view has been given time and again, not only by hon. gentlemen on all sides of the house but by the people of this country. May I say at once that so far as I am concerned I intend to use all the power that I have to prevent the dissolution of this house while men are fighting in decisive battles at the front.

Mr. HOMUTH: And remain in office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is, of course, the condition I have expressed previously, that this parliament should not be permitted to carry on beyond its constitutional term.

I may say to my hon. friend, about his vote of confidence, that I have perfect confidence as to the confidence which will be expressed by this house in myself.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the Prime Minister whether it will be possible for us to get this afternoon copies of the order in council that has just been passed? It would be very helpful if we could have them some time to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall try to oblige my hon. friend. I shall send out word and ask if copies can be printed immediately and distributed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They should be distributed.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister if it will be possible for the members to have before them a copy of the report which General McNaughton is to make so that they may be able to follow his remarks as he goes along? We have always done that with the budget speech, and I think it would help with the discussion following the report.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure that my hon. friend will recognize that General McNaughton will wish to have perfect freedom in making his statement. I imagine that he intends to read it, but he may desire to vary it as he proceeds, and I think in reading his statement he should be permitted to speak for himself and that it should be read by hon. members from the official record.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I thought that perhaps copies had already been printed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the unanimous wish of the house that the Minister of National Defence shall have the right to appear on the floor of the house?

Several hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the Prime Minister was speaking he mentioned that after the Minister of National Defence had made his statement there might be questions and answers. There is a rule of our house, standing order 43, which says:

> No member may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood, but then he is not to introduce any new matter, and no debate shall be allowed upon such explanation.

It is necessary as long as the Speaker is in the chair that that rule of the house be suspended to enable questions to be put. I suggest that the Prime Minister might move that with the unanimous consent of the house standing order 43 be suspended.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it, Mr. Speaker, that that really means that with Your Honour in the chair hon. members will have the same freedom as they would have in committee of the whole?

Mr. SPEAKER: Quite so. Is it the unanimous wish of the house that standing order 43 be suspended as long as the Minister of National Defence is on the floor of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I mention one other matter, following the suggestion of my hon. friend. Under the procedure adopted in committee of the whole a minister is permitted to have his officials beside him to supply him with detailed information that he may not happen to have in his head. I hope the same privilege will be granted to General McNaughton if he should wish to have his officials nearby to verify his statements or supply information that he requires in answering questions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the Clerk to inform the Minister of National Defence that he may attend the meeting of this house.

REINFORCEMENTS—STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

HON. A. G. L. McNAUGHTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the reason for my being here to-day is to report to the House of Commons the facts concerning reinforcements for the Canadian Army overseas; to give the house whatever assistance I can in the interpretation of the facts; to state the problems which now exist; to indicate the action which has been taken and the further measures which are being instituted.

The problem is complicated because time is required to translate action taken in Canada into numbers of fully trained men in the reinforcement pools in the theatres of operations and immediately available for posting to units in the field.

In what I am to say to-day I have had to remember that the information I shall give goes out to all the world. I have to be very careful indeed that no word of mine will carry new information of value to the enemy. For if this should come about it would bring hazard to our troops in action and prejudice their further operations, which is the last thing any of us here would wish to do. I need not, I think, emphasize this grave responsibility. I recognize that this inhibition will result in there being important gaps in the full information I seek to give. I am completely at the disposal of the house should hon. members wish to examine me under circumstances in which I shall be free to give precise answers to questions relating to the Canadian Army. If this is arranged, I shall endeavour to give as complete information as possible.

It is perhaps needless to say that I am not at liberty, in any circumstances, to disclose information affecting allied armies which we have received under an undertaking that it should be kept strictly secret. Some of this would be interesting for comparison and to develop the basis on which our own figures have been estimated, but I do not think it is really necessary for an understanding of our own position.

Right at the start I would like to say that there is no difference of opinion as to purpose between my predecessor in the office of Minister of National Defence and myself. We, both of us, are determined with all the strength we have that our troops in action will not lack for reinforcements to carry forward our part in the war in northwest Europe and in Italy. We intend to march forward with our allies to crush Germany finally into defeat and to confirm the safety of the peace which follows. There is no doubt about this intent. That has been stated by the Prime Minister on behalf of all in clear, explicit terms.

There is agreement on the establishments of our army overseas which should be kept up in present circumstances. We are agreed as to where our several formations should operate and under which higher command and as to how our command should be organized. I have made no change in any of the arrangements overseas which were made by Colonel Ralston.

Where my predecessor and I differed was on the methods which should be used to provide the reinforcements needed. In October last he took his stand on the basis that we had outrun the possibilities of maintaining our forces overseas by voluntary enlistment. At that time I took the stand that our traditional system which we had used throughout this war and long before, was capable of producing the results we sought and of producing them in time, provided always that it was given the full public support which was requisite.

I submit that it would have been very dangerous indeed to hazard a change until all measures proper to the existing method had been developed to the full and it had become clear and evident to all that they would not suffice. To do so might well not have increased the rate of flow of reinforcements but might instead have reduced it most seriously. This is what I think would have happened if voluntary service had been abandoned for compulsory service in the late days of last month when the question had first come up. Since then, conditions have altered, public attention has been riveted on these matters. The paramount need of reinforcements in adequate supply has been recognized throughout our land from coast to coast. For myself I frankly state I prefer our present system in its application to the conditions we have in Canada, but I have not excluded the other method in circumstances in which it is absolutely necessary.

Since I took office early in November, I have pressed the application of the voluntary system by every means. At the same time I pressed forward the completion of the organization and training of the men in the N.R.M.A.

In my first public address as Minister of National Defence at Arnprior on Sunday, 5th November, I spoke of the last hard stretch we had to pass before victory was achieved—that there must be no relaxation of effort here at home or in the field. I told of the principles I had followed in the organization of our army in England. I stressed the advantages I thought we had. I hoped that the urgent need for support to the army being known, the public would support and encourage our young men to take up voluntarily the honourable obligation of service overseas to meet this need. The following day, to give greater emphasis to my appeal, I repeated these views before an audience in Ottawa.

At the same time I drew attention to factors which were deterring N.R.M.A. men from converting to general service. I undertook that these difficulties would be removed.

I told the men in the N.R.M.A. that fair play required that, in demobilization, our troops overseas would have the first call on all gainful employment and that those who did not convert to general service would have to wait their turn.

Then followed the radio address made by the Prime Minister on Wednesday, 8th November. He covered again the points I had previously been authorized to make. I thought that this appeal addressed to the men and the other measures we were taking would have the effect desired and that, as well, we would have the united support of all our people, and that shortly our difficulties in finding men trained as infantry would be largely over.

I drew the policy defined in the Prime Minister's speech to the attention of all our senior commanders in Canada. I directed that it be adopted forthwith, and I asked their help in every way.

Later these officers met me in Ottawa and I was able to explain to them personally the objectives which we should reach if the numbers of reinforcements for overseas were to be adequate to meet the army's needs. I was able to hear at first hand their views on the problem and discussed with them the means of removing the difficulties which had operated to deter N.R.M.A. men from converting to general service. I undertook that these matters would be corrected and this has in large part been done. The district commanders told me quite frankly they had not much hope that our requirements would be met, but they loyally undertook to make another effort. This they have now done, and I must admit that the results have not been adequate. I am advised that there are very many N.R.M.A. men who will not volunteer under present circumstances but who are quite willing to be sent overseas.

I think that I should now state our problem in terms of numbers and times.

First, let me say that in total for all arms and services overseas there is no present shortage. Moreover, no overall shortage is expected in the period for which the figures have already been forecast which extends well on into next summer. Unfortunately, however, it is not in totals that our present problem can be expressed, for men are not quickly transferable from one arm of the service to another, and even with time, there is a limit beyond which remustering cannot be carried out.

[Mr. McNaughton.]

The difficulty we have arises in the infantry, for it is in this arm that we have unfortunately experienced heavy casualties in Italy and in northwest Europe since D-day. In total for all arms the casualties have been very close to the estimates, but in infantry they have been heavier than the forecasts on which our plans for reinforcements were based. Should casualties continue at the higher rates, there is a possible prospective shortage of fully trained infantry, which may come late in January or early in February next. Against this there will be, at that time, large numbers of infantry in the depots whose training has approached completion and who will be available for posting to the units shortly thereafter in the following month. We must remember that our figures are forecasts and estimates and so we cannot expect a high order of precision. There are many uncertainties one way or another, such as sailing dates delayed by adverse weather, quarantine for minor contagions, etc., which may affect particular groups of the men concerned and for which allowance must be made. The figures I am using to assess the situation are very definitely on the safe side and I think it well that this should be so, for if there is any error it should be on the safe side. In all the figures which are used the rates of wastage and the scales of future activity are those which have been arrived at by our own officers in the field and confirmed by the theatre commanders.

Later on in the spring or early summer the forecasts show another period when the infantry reserves behind the troops might become low. In this period the intake into the pools of trained infantry reinforcements depends on the numbers now in the training stream and on the conversions to general service from the fully or partially trained infantry in the N.R.M.A. The number of volunteers in the training stream is known. The number of conversions from the N.R.M.A. to general service has been estimated at the average rate of recent months.

The forecasts have not as yet been carried through the summer, and all I can now say is that the situation then will depend on the rate of recruiting for general service in December and in the following months.

I look forward to placing before you the actual figures up to the end of May inclusive under conditions in which they can be disclosed.

Within the general infantry situation there is another which I frankly admit is giving great concern. I refer to reinforcements for our French-speaking infantry units. These, like our English-speaking ones, have had very heavy fighting for prolonged periods and our reserves are low. Special measures have been and are being taken to correct this situation and already there are some promising results for which we are indebted to our colleagues from the province of Quebec and others. We need all the help we can be given in this matter and I look forward to placing the full details before you for consideration.

To summarize the situation in respect to reinforcements: I would say that the actual dispatches during this calendar year in total will be very much greater than originally planned. Shipping is completely arranged till the end of December and while there may be some delays in sailings, I do not believe that the effect would be serious. Some additional shipping can be obtained in December if we should be in a position to make use of it.

I want to say, quite definitely, that all anxiety would be removed if we were able to find in December a total, above the numbers now arranged, of 5,000 infantry fully trained or in an advanced state of training, a similar number in January and a further 6,000 in the succeeding months.

Every possible economy in the employment of fit general service personnel in home establishments has now been made or is in process, and the men so made available are included in the figures of planned dispatches.

In consequence the only source from which this additional 16,000 can be secured is from the N.R.M.A.

If we are to dispatch any considerable body of these men in time to ease the anxieties in the situation, arrangements for shipping must be initiated forthwith.

To be realistic, our plans for the future must be strictly related to the nature of the task which remains to be completed and so I shall, if I may, give the house an appreciation of the nature of the battles which lie before the allied armies of which our Canadian troops now form an important part.

We now, both in Italy and in northwest Europe, are up against fortified zones of great depth and strength with every obstacle and device to hamper our advance which the German mind has been able to conceive. In northwest Europe hundreds of thousands of slave labour have been employed for years to create the fixed defences of the west wall. They have been carefully sited by the skilled engineers of the German army to give them every advantage of terrain. They are provided with all the accessories to make life easy for those in garrison: heavy concrete emplacements for machine and anti-tank guns, bomb-proof shelters for resting personnel, elaborate roads and railways for rapid transfer of reserves from place to place, deeply buried cables to maintain certain intercommunication, huge dumps of food and ammunition and spares and replacements for guns and tanks and other gear. We can take it that these defences are provided with everything which could be thought of which would be of use and every day they are being strengthened by the forced labour of the German people.

To break through these lines we must turn to siege warfare of the most intense character and above all else we must have guns and shells in lavish quantities.

We learned in the last war and again in this that in siege wafare there is little opportunity for manoeuvre. When we attack we must use vast quantities of shells to crush out of existence wide sections of the enemy's defence and to paralyse his garrisons and so free the way for the advances of our infantry closely supported by the fire of mobile guns. By reason of the immensity of the volume of fire required and the time taken to get the ammunition forward, these battles go in phases marked by short periods of intense activity and longer periods of quiet in between.

The conditions in northwest Europe will, I think, approximate very closely to those we experienced in France and Flanders in the later phases of the first world war. We will have to turn back to this period for guidance on the wastage rates to be expected in the various arms and services. It is probable that these rates will be more uniform throughout all troops in the forward areas. We must be very careful that the remustering from other arms which we have been carrying out to make up for the higher rates in the infantry in the mobile war since D-day is not carried too far. Fortunately, as I have said, we have no present anxiety as to the adequacy of the reserves in arms other than infantry, but the situation must be closely watched.

So with the business of siege warfare in front of us, it becomes most important to remember that the supply of shells and munitions is a vital necessity which must be met. The call has gone out to multiply the rate of production several fold and this must be done as a first priority on our industrial effort. I believe that the effort which is required can be made without diversion of men needed for reinforcements. We can divert men from less essential industries. We can use many more women. We can use some of the personnel in the armed forces who are not in the categories fit for service overseas. I have proposals in this connection which I hope to raise in later discussions to arrive at an effective use for large numbers of men who have come into the army in Canada, both general service and N.R.M.A., who never can be employed in battle.

The only other observation I would like to make in connection with this vital industrial effort in the production of shells and guns and certain other gear is that we in Canada are now a great source of supply for all our allies engaged with us in battle in Europe. In some things we are the only source and it is therefore most important that this industry be not disturbed for any reason, or otherwise there will be most serious consequences for all. In siege warfare you have to pay for victory either in shells or the lives of men, and very great quantities of shells must be expended if there is to be any progress at all.

Now may I turn to the N.R.M.A. Since I was called to office I have been investigating the situation in this department of the army. First, I find that this group of men has been held together for a multiplicity of purposes. Some of them have been trained as soldiers; others fully or partially trained as soldiers have been used from time to time as a sort of reserve of workers to move about and undertake construction and other tasks. Others have been similarly used to gather crops, to work in the mines, and in the woods.

I do not doubt that all these works are of national importance, but I do not think that they should be done by soldiers to the prejudice of their proceeding overseas.

I find that some of these men have been able to obtain remuneration on a scale which is extravagant, and I do not wonder that those who seek their personal advantage and who have had the chance to make large sums in cash would fail to come forward to volunteer for service overseas.

The policies which are to govern the N.R.M.A. in future are given in the statements made by the Prime Minister when he addressed the people of Canada by radio on 8th November. The particular points which it is my duty to develop now are in relation to the employment of that force in Canada.

In fair play to our men who have long served overseas and carried the heat and burden of the battle, it has been decided that they will have first claim on employment opportunities when the war ends. This means that the N.R.M.A. remaining who have not volunteered will be held until they can be demobilized without prejudice to the interests of our men returning from overseas.

These are all most important matters on which you will wish to be fully informed, and I shall do my best to give this information as briefly and as clearly as I can and to report progress as to the measures which have been adopted.

The position of those who volunteer for service overseas is straightforward. They cease at once to be members of the N.R.M.A. and pass to the depots and holding units to be given the final training and instruction which they require. They become in all respects an integral part of that great band who serve Canada by their own free will and whose pride it is to go where duty calls and needs dictate.

The position of N.R.M.A. personnel who do not convert to general service is not so simple. It had been my hope that once our vital need had been made clear—as it has been—and once opportunities had been given for considerate explanation—as they have been—that their number would have been very materially reduced.

The first business is to ensure that all who are physically fit and likely to become efficient soldiers are brought into units in balanced composition to act as a reserve to meet possible future requirements for combat operations. The arrangements for this require few changes in the existing organization and these can be effected quickly.

The elimination of units, formations, headquarters and local establishments which, in an earlier phase of the war, were required for strictly home defence, and the transfer of the personnel thus freed to other duties in keeping with our present need; the freeing of personnel in appropriate medical categories from home establishments, from extraneous employment, or their recall from leave are other matters to be attended to. This is being done as rapidly as individual cases can be reviewed and replacements provided wherever this is necessary in the public interest for the prosecution of the war.

For example, some hundreds of men were detailed some weeks ago to assist in the construction of the new hospital at Sunnybrook. These could have been ordered back to their units, but then this work, which is most urgent in the interests of our returned soldiers who have suffered wounds, would have been delayed. Therefore we have chosen to keep them on the job for the moment and replace all who are physically fit for combat duties by men in a lower category.

There are other tasks of national importance in the shell factories and in construction which are being dealt with in like manner.

The purpose is to concentrate in N.R.M.A. units for potential combat duties all men who are physically fit and deemed likely to make efficient combat soldiers. This is a first priority and it is being dealt with as such. The standard of training will be brought to the high level we insisted on in England.

There are a considerable number of men in the N.R.M.A. whose physical fitness is below the standard required for first-line combatant duties but who are, in all other respects, capable of rendering useful service in the field, in base installations, on the line of communications and in the forward area behind the battle fronts.

In the British Army these men are grouped into the corps of pioneers to act as a reserve of labour for the engineers for the construction of roads and railways and aerodromes and field fortifications and similar works; to man the base depots, to load the supplies of food and ammunition; to help in the repair establishments and generally to do unskilled labour wherever required to set free the combat troops from these ancillary tasks.

Canadian employment companies are also being organized. The military side of this training is not extensive. It is from this employment corps that we propose to discharge any requirements for help on works of national importance to the prosecution of the war which we are required to undertake.

In this arrangement you will, I know, agree that two safeguards are very necessary. The first that the tasks requested are really of national importance; the second that by undertaking to do them with our employment companies we are not depriving anyone in Canada of gainful employment they otherwise would have.

I am in no position in the defence department to give the consideration which is required to the application of these important safeguards to tasks other than those which are carried out under the defence department for strictly military purposes, and so we are asking the Minister of Reconstruction to undertake the first responsibility, and the Minister of Labour the second. Until we have certificates from these departments, the work will not be undertaken.

These certificates may be revoked at any time by the ministers concerned to meet the changing requirements and conditions and to open opportunities for gainful employment to men outside the N.R.M.A. as they may become available.

Since we must hold a considerable number of men in the N.R.M.A. in order to ensure that men returning from overseas shall have first claim on remunerative employment, I intend to give the men who are retained in the employment companies useful work to do which will be of benefit in their training and which will make a considerable contribution to our war effort. It is perhaps needless to repeat that only the pay and allowances provided for in military regulations will be allowed, and leave will not be on any more generous scale than is given our troops overseas.

There are a number of other categories of men in the N.R.M.A. who are neither suitable for combat units nor for the employment companies. I refer to those who have become physically unfit, and these I propose should be considered individually and that those who are below the category for military duty should be discharged.

There are others in the lower physical categories who, by reason of their technical or other qualifications, should be placed in industry to aid in this great effort which is required. These we propose to place in a reserve, which can be released from military duties subject to recall.

I have dealt with the N.R.M.A. in some considerable detail because it presents a problem of great difficulty which cannot be resolved by any single measure.

Now may I return to the great question which brings anxiety to all of us to-day. I mean the provision of the additional reinforcements required to ensure the effective support of our units and formations overseas in the field and to give them the reserves which they will need to carry forward the great battles which lie ahead.

It is absolutely necessary to the confidence of our fighting forces in the European theatres that there be a substantial reserve of reinforcements made available overseas. The absence of such a reserve might mean casualties that would not otherwise be incurred.

The lives of our men in the fighting lines must be guarded in every way that is dependent upon action which can be taken from here. The numbers required to make up the reserve that is necessary are larger than could be provided in time by the volunteer conversion of trained and fit personnel of our N.R.M.A. men to general service.

I have said that except for some 16,000 men we are able to meet all requirements from men who have come forward voluntarily. I have said that it is our purpose to maintain the voluntary system to the limit. I have stated that 5,000 additional trained infantry must be available early in December to safeguard the position at the end of January; that another 5,000 must be found in January, and some 6,000 in the succeeding months.

I have brought these facts before my colleagues in the cabinet. An order in council has been passed extending the service of this number of men to the European theatres of operations.

This power will be used only to the extent necessary to make up the numbers of reinforcements required.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I would just like to express my appreciation to my predecessor in office. He left me the most of his personal staff, without whose loyal aid I could not possibly have carried through the tasks and duties of these last three weeks. I am deeply obliged to him and to them for all that they have done to serve the public interest in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken the situation as I found it. I have tried with all my strength to work forward from there. I hope I am in some measure making some contribution to the purpose we all must serve—the effective support of our army overseas in the great task they still must do to discharge our just part in bringing the war in Europe to a successful conclusion, and to safeguard the peace which follows.

If we enter this new era united, we will be strong and we have all that is required to carry the happiness and welfare of our people to heights as yet undreamed.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that we are to be confined as much as possible to questioning the Minister of National Defence. Out of deference to a great Canadian I think I should indicate to Your Honour that I should make way for the hon. gentleman who represents the constituency of Prince in Prince Edward Island. I think this deference is due him in view of the importance of the matter and in view of the fact that at this time party lines and all divisions of opinion in the House of Commons are down. Therefore I am ready to give way to the hon. member for Prince.

Mr. RALSTON: There is quite a bit of information that General McNaughton could give, and it seemed to me that it might be regarded as bordering on the territory of security. As I have been listening to him it occurred to me that possibly the way to deal with any matters in connection with the information desired is, if there is to be a secret session or a hearing to deal with this matter, to decide there and then—

Mr. SPEAKER: Would the hon. member speak a little louder?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry. I have not yet made up my mind, but it occurred to me that possibly it might be more useful to the house and to the public if any information which is desired and which borders on the line of security could be elicited from General McNaughton with the galleries clear, and then such information as could be made public would be published.

I am obliged to my hon. friend for suggesting that I should be given the right of way; but I am not here as the public interrogator of this house. I am the humble member for Prince, and I know a little about the things about which General McNaughton has been talking. There is little difference between him and me. The only difference as I understand it, is that the general said there was a difference between us respecting policies. I think he rather attributed to me the policy of conscription for conscription's sake or conscription whether necessary or not. My policy has always been, and it has been frequently announced in this house, conscription when necessary, and I was following that policy when I made the recommendation I did which was not accepted by the government. I hope that the general will accept that correction, because there is no difference between him and me so far as the matter of policy is concerned. I understand his policy to be the same, that is to say, conscription when necessary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has changed like the rest of them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You will have to eat crow like the rest.

Mr. RALSTON: I will have to ask the minister to take the responsibility for warning us if there is any matter of security connected with the questions I ask. There are only two or three questions that occur to me. I have not a copy of his statement. I found it a little difficult to hear him. I was interested in something that he did not give, but perhaps he will regard it as a matter of security. I refer to the size of the pools that he proposed to maintain in the Mediterranean area, in the northwest European area and in the United Kingdom; that is to say, the target which he sets as a pool which should be maintained there in the two battle areas directly behind the troops. Could he give us that information? He has given us numbers and has indicated that reinforcement pools are very necessary. Perhaps he could indicate the size of them in view of the fact that he has mentioned sixteen thousand altogether.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: In answer to that question I would say that it would not be possible to give the information requested in open session.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why not?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The reason is that to be intelligible it would have to be broken down in such a way as to disclose the weeks of intense and other forms of activity. Since the period is not a very long one it might give indication of intention.

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder if that is quite the situation? I understand that when one is estimating casualties one estimates so many weeks or months of intense activity, so many months normal and so many months quiet. I am not talking about that. I am talking about the pool, and on the basis of a pool generally the estimate is on so many months or weeks of intense activity. I do not think there is any possibility of giving any information to the enemy if we estimate intense activity. Without giving the numbers of the pool, how many weeks of intense activity would you feel that you should provide for by way of a pool in Italy? I do not think the distinction you make applies to pools; I think it applies to estimated casualties.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: There is a set formula for that, and I think it would be very difficult to justify giving out information from which those rates could be calculated back. I do think that in discussing these matters in open session I must if anything err on the side of caution. We intend to give as much information as we can when there is no danger in discussing the matter, but in open discussion I am fearful that —

Mr. RALSTON: All I want to know is how many months of intense activity was calculated. I am not asking for the numbers; I simply want to know how many months of intense activity were calculated in planning the pool. Generally a pool is calculated on three months of intense activity, that is, on the basis of the casualties which would be suffered in three months of intense activity. Is that correct?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No, that certainly is not. The pool is built up upon the basis of the operation; it is assessed upon the nature of the operation. The casualties and wastage rates and so on are assessed and then provisions to replace the casualties are laid down. I do not think that the pools would be the same on any two occasions.

Mr. RALSTON: There would be a variation in the numbers, but is not that generally the basis upon which the target of the pool is fixed? You do not change the pool target every day or every month.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would not say that that is the case, because on many occasions in calculating operations I have had to take these matters into consideration. The size of the pool, the size of the reserve, is fixed according to the particular operation you have in front of you. Then your safety factor is worked out.

Mr. RALSTON: But you estimate for how long ahead?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It is related to the campaign.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the overall pool in the United Kingdom, is not the size of that pool based upon a definite number of months of intense activity? I am not dividing it into battle areas.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The reserves in the United Kingdom have to be figured on a different basis from that which would be the case if the troops came from the United Kingdom. We have to allow for the time of transporting troops across the Atlantic, and we must provide cushions against that. It is not the distance, it is the time taken to get our troops from this country into the forward area that counts. All those factors have to be taken into account.

The staff have prepared a most comprehensive table which is made up much in the form the hon. member for Prince has indicated. This shows what we have planned and laid out. There have been changes in some cases from the plans that were previously in effect and with which the hon. member is thoroughly familiar. I think this table would provide a clear understanding of the matter if we were free to take it from beginning to end. It has been so put together by the staff that the monthly requirements are shown, but it is hardly possible to work back to these specific rates. You could not give the different weeks of activity that were contemplated and then work back from that.

This table gives figures that the house would want in terms of men and it shows clearly the supply position that existed. I do not believe it is possible to give a clear understanding of this position at this time, and it is most important that we should all have a clear understanding of this very complicated position because it is basic to everything we do. We want to put that in front of hon. members in some way that will not carry comfort to the enemy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They would not be able to use it.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: But from the table they could draw general conclusions which could be used outside without using the specific figures. I would like to say also that these figures are unstable, if I can use that word, in that they are susceptible to many minor factors that enter into the matter from day to day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are really only an estimate?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: They are simply an estimate based on experience, with a factor of safety provided to be on the safe side.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of necessity they must be an estimate.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: They must be, because the effects of battle are uncertain.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are so many unknown factors?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The loss of a troopship, for instance?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Then on the ground of security you prefer not to give us what the pool was, say a couple of months back, and what number of months of intense activity was estimated in planning it. Could we have that information as of September 30?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I am not familiar with parliamentary procedure.

Mr. RALSTON: It is new to me.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I think the information the hon. member wants is a comparison of the reserves that are now in the plan with the reserves of some months ago?

Mr. RALSTON: What I really wanted to get was the number of the reserves or the number which should have been in the pool according to whatever formula was laid down, say on September 30, both in Italy and in northwest Europe, and also the number which were actually there at that time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To show the deficiency.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I must say frankly to the house that a person skilled in the art of debate might be able to give information of the sort that Colonel Ralston is asking for in open session and safeguard his tongue, but I have not such skill in that matter that I would care to take the responsibility. I have the figures under my hand; I see the way they are calculated, and I would rather not be pressed to give them.

Mr. RALSTON: Thank you. But you will not mind my making this remark. In the statement that you made I thought all the skill that could possibly be brought to bear was used in the way you worded your address. You said: "All anxiety would be removed" if we were able to find in December so and so. That was as skilful a use of words I thought as could possibly be made. In another case you said the infantry reserves "might become low". What "low" means I do not know. I suppose you do not want to go any farther than that? I have done the same thing. But I do not want to have bouquets heaped on me for debating skill because I think the general is proving himself pretty apt.

May I ask another question. You spoke about 5,000 needed to be in the United Kingdom in December.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No. I was saying we would like to ship during the month of December another 5,000; another 5,000 in January, and another 6,000 distributed over the months which follow. It is quite possible that these figures would have to be adjusted to fit in with shipping available. There is a margin one way or the other. You cannot in these things paint with a fine brush. You have to treat them generally.

Mr. RALSTON: The 5,000, and the 5,000, and the 6,000 are in addition to all the supplies of general service personnel available?

Mr. SPEAKER: While this meeting of the house is informal to a large extent it should not be so informal that those in the house cannot hear, and this will apply to the galleries as well as to the house. I would ask those behind the curtains for silence because it is not possible otherwise for the house to hear.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, may I also suggest that the press here has quite a responsibility, and I am quite sure that it must be very difficult for them to hear some of the remarks made by the minister and by the hon. member for Prince. I think I need only bring that to their attention to have them speak a little louder.

Mr. RALSTON: I was asking whether or not the 16,000, which is the combined figure for December, January and February, of dispatches which you desire to make is in addition to supplies of general service personnel whom you planned to dispatch in any case?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes, sir.

Mr. RALSTON: The 16,000 will be N.R.M.A. personnel?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No, I would not say that entirely. The real requirement is 16,000, eventually destined for the infantry. But there must be complete flexibility. Some of the personnel might be gunners converted to infantry; they might be existing G.S. infantry, people shifting from one place to another, but the net total increase which we wish to place in the pools on the other side of the Atlantic is 16,000 infantry.

Mr. RALSTON: Up to what date?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We plan, subject to adjustments to fit shipping, to send the first 5,000 in the month of December.

Mr. RALSTON: Pardon me. You said 16,000 would be the total. The total up to what date? That will last you up to what time?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Those figures carry us forward, so far as dispatch is concerned, to the month of May, up into the month of May. The movement will be complete in May.

Mr. RALSTON: The movement will be complete in May? And that is in addition—

Mr. McNAUGHTON: In addition to what had previously been planned, for which we made the personnel available by withdrawals from home defence establishments and so on in this country, by cutting down the progressive programme which had been instituted in the department before I took over, and which I have carried on as the chiefs-of-staff committee have told us of the possibilities under a lessened scale of attacks. It is a systematic programme of reduction which was in effect and which we have carried forward. We have saved some personnel in so doing.

Mr. RALSTON: When you first came into the department you found a certain plan ready of dispatching reinforcements from November until May; that is, so many each month, in varying numbers. Is that right?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is right.

Mr. RALSTON: Then you found also that an additional 5,000 men had been found—that was prior to your coming into the department—and had been found by way of (a) accelerating the dispatch of 1,500 infantry; (b) sending directly overseas 1,500 other arms to be remustered over there; (c) demoting N.C.O.'s to the number of 750 and paying them the pay of their former rank for a certain period although reducing them to the rank of private; and (d) using infantry tradesmen and paying them trades pay although using them as general duty men—that accounted for another 750. That makes 4,500. And then 500 more were obtained I think by taking reduced physical standards. Is that right?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is correct. That is the programme I found for those dispatches. The point I wish to make is that when I saw the proposal for reduction of physical categories of 500 for the infantry, I could not bring myself to accept that.

Mr. RALSTON: You did not find any approval of that proposal by me, I can assure you.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is right. There was a proposal for it, which I did not accept.

Mr. RALSTON: Therefore that 500 was out, so that there were only 4,500?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: There were only 4,500.

Mr. RALSTON: In addition to these regularly planned dispatches and the 4,500 found in this way, you propose now to send 16,000 more in the manner which you have, generally speaking, indicated. Is that right?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: And you think that will last up until May with the regular dispatch of general service personnel?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: As we all know, these are estimates based on the best experience that we can get and the best judgment that our technical and general staff officers can use. They are only estimates.

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: And they are subject to the chances of battle, the changed circumstances as they come on day by day. The figures might be absolutely valid and translatable into terms of individual men at this moment. A week hence they might be invalidated by circumstances on the field of battle. All we can do in planning is to try to keep the average rate running on correctly so that using our best knowledge and cool judgment we shall not face particular shortages at particular times. Just as dangerous to the conduct of operations as a shortage itself might well be the time at which the shortage occurs.

Mr. RALSTON: You are telling me!

Mr. McNAUGHTON: You know; so do I.

Mr. RALSTON: General, will you come back to the question I asked. The question I asked was whether or not the 16,000 plus the other dispatches which I have mentioned would see you through until May. You answered that these are only estimates. Of course, all these are estimates. But I ask you whether the 16,000 would see you through until May.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I can give no undertaking that it will. That is something which is beyond the knowledge of any person here or any place else. But these figures are the result of experience and knowledge of the rate at which troops can be moved; the probabilities based on experience of delays in shipping; the case of mumps which may hold back a whole group or may hold back only a few. All these have been taken into account and averaged out; and since we are dealing with very considerable numbers the statistical figures do have significance to guide us. Then we have our good staffs putting in, as all staffs do, a little cushion to be on the safe side.

Mr. RALSTON: I am asking you if, on that statistical position—I am using your word now—you anticipate on the estimates, rough though they may be and subject to contingencies, that the 16,000 plus these other dispatches will see you through to May? Will you have a surplus on hand at that time?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: What I would say is that the dispatches, planned as they are, and having regard to the time limits in the movements from this country to overseas, make it reasonably safe to hold that, if any extra incidents occur, we would have time to make them good.

Mr. RALSTON: But, on the figures which you have—I am not asking you the numbers—would you have any substantial surplus at the end of May, on the estimates that you have made?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: If everything went according to the figures the position would be satisfactory.

Mr. RALSTON: That means that you would have a substantial pool on hand?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: For the next month's casualties?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: And any more than the next month's.

[Mr. McNaughton.]

Mr. McNAUGHTON: In May we are going into the future beyond where the planned possibilities have been communicated to us. I have no doubt that in some sections of the supreme allied command plans have been made and figures are being prepared, but the time to carry them to us has not yet come.

Mr. RALSTON: And, with that 16,000 and the others, you would have a substantial pool in all three bases: that is to say, the main pool in the United Kingdom, the pool in the battle area in northwest Europe, which we hope will be Germany, and another pool in the Mediterranean?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The answer is yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Substantial?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Now then, without the 16,000 what would your position be? If you did not get the 16,000 in December, January and February would you be—shall I say—on the estimates, going into the red?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would say, far more than going into the red—quite deep.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is frank, anyway.

Mr. GREEN: General McNaughton, the order in council which has been tabled to-day limits the number of N.R.M.A. personnel that may be sent over to 16,000; and you have just told Colonel Ralston that, of the 16,000 extra men who will go over in December, January and from then until May, some will be general service personnel and some will be N.R.M.A. men. Can you give us any idea of approximately how many will be N.R.M.A. men and how many will be general service personnel?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would say to the hon. member that I think the best way I can answer the first part is by reading the operative clause of the order in council itself. It is restricted, as you know, to the operational theatres in the European or Mediterranean war zones, and the United Kingdom, of course, which is on our lines of communication; and it states that the minister is—

> . . hereby authorized and directed to dispatch to the following localities of service, namely: the United Kingdom and/or to European and/or Mediterranean operational theatres such personnel, in such numbers as may be approved by the governor in council (the number hereby approved being 16,000) who are serving by reason of their having been called out for training—

And so on. The order in council is general in its character, but the particular authority it has vested in me is sixteen thousand of the N.R.M.A.

Mr. GREEN: No, but you have said that the total number, over and above the previous commitments, that are to go over during these next few months is 16,000.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: You said that these will not all be N.R.M.A. personnel; some will be G.S. personnel. Now can you tell us how many N.R.M.A. men are to go over? I ask you that question because the Prime Minister in his statement over the radio said that there are eight thousand fully trained N.R.M.A. men in Canada who presumably are trained and fit to walk on the boat to-morrow. He said there are another eight thousand men who could go over in a very short time. Now I should like to know how many of these N.R.M.A. men you intend to send overseas during these months you have mentioned.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It is not possible to give an answer to the hon. member, because of this fact, that the shipping we shall have will be for 16,000; in the first instance those who volunteer for service will probably be selected, and we shall use the powers regarding these 16,000 N.R.M.A. men just to make good a deficiency. I want to say to hon. members right here, as I said in the formal address which I gave, that I am a confirmed believer in a system of voluntary service for the Canadian Army. In that, I make no invidious comparison with the customs and practices of other great nations who are allied with us. It happens that this system has been traditional, and hon. members of this house who were here of recent years will know the history of this question far better than I do. It has been traditional; it was the system we had in effect when I had the great honour and privilege of taking our first Canadian division overseas. The fact that our men were volunteers had a very material effect on the principles of organization and training and the development of leadership in the schools and all the way through. I am most reluctant to depart, in the Canadian Army, from that principle. I believe in the voluntary system. I have made a confession of faith in it for us and under our conditions, and I certainly am not the one to use compulsion any more than I can possibly avoid in order to make good the deficiency in the situation which otherwise would exist. I may be right or I may be wrong, but that is the view which I will implement to the limit of my capacity.

Mr. GREEN: Then the fact is that you intend to make up these 16,000 extra men as far as possible by sending general service personnel?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: And you will send N.R.M.A. personnel only if other men cannot be scraped up from the bottom of the pool in Canada. Is that correct?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is not quite correct, sir.

Mr. GREEN: Then what is correct?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: What is correct is this: where we have general service personnel, N.R.M.A., who have converted, if they are entirely suitable and are up to the standards of training which we require of them—and that cannot be stated in simple terms across the whole business, because some of the training will take advantage of facilities. We shall have people at certain stages in Canada, and certain places, and as regards others we shall want to use our facilities in England for working out. As long as there are suitable general service personnel available to fill the requirements, it is our intention to use them. We propose to make good whatever deficiencies there are from N.R.M.A. personnel.

Mr. GREEN: So that the government's policy means this, that there may not be any N.R.M.A. personnel sent over at all between now and next May?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Perfectly correct—if there were, as I see signs developing already to indicate, a most satisfactory start in the conversion of N.R.M.A. men. We would not use this authority, then, in any way, and I would be the most thankful man in this room.

Mr. GREEN: N.R.M.A. men will not be sent overseas if you can possibly avoid it?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I have no intention of using compulsion except to meet a deficiency, and having regard to the purpose we have of maintaining the strength of our armies overseas.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Answer the question.

Mr. GREEN: General McNaughton, are you aware that general service men in the Pacific command are being transferred to infantry, for example, from the ordnance corps, who have had no military training at all, who were put on as clerks immediately they enlisted? They are now being transferred and rushed overseas and other men, for example, carpenters, are receiving the same treatment. Are you aware of these facts?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I am aware of the policies which are in effect.

Mr. GREEN: But are you aware of these facts?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The men transferred from the other arms are put into the training stream and given the training appropriate to what they have been wanted for.

Mr. GREEN: Are these men being transferred now in that way and sent overseas?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: They are being remustered.

Mr. GREEN: And sent overseas?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes, when they have reached the appropriate stage of effectiveness; and the training is not necessarily complete here, because we have establishments in England which we must use to the best advantage.

Mr. GREEN: I am told that these men in some cases are being sent right off, shipped overseas, without receiving training here.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We cannot talk in generalities in this matter. We are dealing with tens of thousands. If the hon. gentleman will give me a specific case I will give him a specific answer.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There are thousands of them.

Mr. GREEN: What length of training will a man of that class get before he is put into the front line?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I shall be glad to give the hon. member that information. I take it he is anxious about those who are remustering. I will read the information in order to get it on the record:

> The first eight weeks of training for every soldier is in basic military subjects, which include grenades, mines, booby traps, rifles and automatic and other weapons. Hence on remustering, say from artillery to infantry, the gunner has had considerable training with the weapons and other subjects peculiar to the infantry soldier. The gunner will require a refresher and probably more detailed training in these subjects and will require training in infantry tactics and some conditioning by marching, although his general physique should be good. In the United Kingdom, where most remustering is taking place, a special syllabus calling for a minimum of six weeks' training is applied and has been found sufficient to adequately train a gunner as an infantryman. In such cases where it is found, at the end of six weeks' training, that the soldier is not proficient in the infantry arm, provision is made for an extension of one or more weeks to bring him up to the standard required.

Mr. GREEN: So that in the average case a man from the ordnance or artillery in Canada, who has had basic training, although it may have been three years ago, will get only six weeks' training before being put into the line.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would not say that is correct, because all through the courses there is going on a constant testing by experienced instructors, and wherever a man is found below par, below the standard, then what he has to take is adjusted accordingly.

Mr. GREEN: In the average case that man will face the enemy with only six weeks' training, according to your own statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. GREEN: How long will he have?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: You cannot say—

Mr. GREEN: Your order says six weeks, with a week or two extra in some cases.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: You are talking about the average case. It might happen that he would go forward after six weeks of training, but usually he moves forward towards his unit in progressive stages.

Mr. GREEN: He might be in the line after six weeks of training.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No. It would be something more than six weeks before he could possibly get to the line.

Mr. GREEN: How many weeks?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: There is a time required, after the six weeks' training, for transport forward from there, from the training schools in England across the channel and up through the pools in France, where training is kept on continuously, and the most important training which he can be given, when left out of battles with the units themselves.

Mr. GREEN: You are relying, then, on these men getting some of their training on their way from England to the front line?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: In the theatre, yes, very definitely so. Of course he has had eight weeks of basic training behind him.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, but that may have been two or three years ago. If you do not know it, some of the rest of us do, that in many cases these boys do not throw grenades or fire Bren guns when they get basic training in Canada.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: They would be checked on that, and those who did not have it would be detected by the instructor in the tests on elementary training, and would be given what was required.

Mr. GREEN: Then some statements were made earlier this week by some of your senior officers of the sixth Canadian division, stationed in British Columbia?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: In the press report I find this statement:

> The whole of the sixth division, a large proportion of which is composed of home defence troops, is stationed in British Columbia. The officers said virtually all the home defence troops in the division have received full combat training.

Is that correct?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would not answer that question, from my knowledge, quite as emphatically as the officer in question has done. I would say it stands very high.

Mr. GREEN: Have you any reason to question the statement made by this officer?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That they have had full combat training?

Mr. GREEN: Full combat training.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: They have had a very high degree of combat training, but under the circumstances, since my return to Canada, I have not had an opportunity to visit them, so that of my own knowledge I cannot state whether that is the case.

Mr. GREEN: Yet under your policy these home defence troops who have had full combat training will not be put into action, but boys who have had five or six weeks of training will?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No, I would not say that would be the result.

Mr. GREEN: Then have you any fault to find with that statement of fact?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I think all any of us can say is that the event will show.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, but this is not what the event will show; this is what the facts are at this very time. Do you question the accuracy of that statement? That is a simple question. Do you question the accuracy of that statement?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Would you repeat the statement?

Mr. GREEN: Under your policy men in the home defence army whom you admit have had full combat training will not be put into action, but young lads who have had only five or six weeks of training, or make it even seven or eight weeks, will be put into action.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not true, and you know it.

Mr. GREEN: General McNaughton should answer the question.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No, I will not answer that question in the affirmative.

Mr. GREEN: You will not answer that question?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I say I will not answer it in the affirmative. The answer is definitely, no.

Mr. GREEN: Then the Canadian people will see for themselves.

Mr. GRAYDON: Please let us have some order; I cannot hear what is being said.

Mr. GREEN: General McNaughton, with regard to the young Canadians in Great Britain who, without any say in the matter, are being remustered into the infantry, perhaps by thousands, what training will they get before they face the enemy?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I took the case of a man in a specific arm, the artillery, going into the infantry, for the purpose of giving the information. Of course it was in the United Kingdom that most of the remustering had to take place. There it was laid down that there should be a minimum of six weeks of training for a gunner going on to infantry.

Mr. GREEN: I cannot hear you.

Mr. GRAYDON: Be quiet while the general speaks.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; may I ask hon. members to listen for a moment. I cannot hear half the questions and answers, and we must have the record clear. There must be silence rather than the conversation that is going on all over the chamber. As I have said already, while this may be somewhat informal, still the Speaker is in the chair, and I expect the same silence to be maintained as would be observed during an ordinary session of the house.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The question I was asked was what training a fully trained gunner would be given before going forward, if he were converted to infantry.

Mr. GREEN: Does it make any difference whether he is a fully trained gunner or a partly trained gunner?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Very much. On being remustered he would be given a minimum of six weeks of training; then, if he had not come up to the test standards which were laid down and practised in the training centre, he would be given more training before being sent forward.

Mr. GREEN: In the average case that boy would get six weeks of training?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: He would get six weeks as a minimum.

Mr. GREEN: What would be the average; six and a half weeks?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Somewhere perhaps between six and seven, talking in averages.

Mr. GREEN: Supposing that boy had been given only two months of training in artillery; then how long would he get before being put into the line?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I have been asked as to a condition that could not arise, because he has all the training here behind him.

Mr. GREEN: That is what you think, but a great many of them have not. Supposing he is an army service corps man; then how long will he get?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That remustering course of which I spoke, which as a minimum runs to six weeks, is a standard which has been laid down for all remustering, and that is a minimum. Then the persons who are in charge of these units and responsible for seeing that the soldier is up to the standard will be required to check the training of the men in every subject laid down for them. It is their duty to ensure that before a man is passed out on remustering, he has reached the standard required, and I have no reason to doubt in any way that the mechanism is working satisfactorily. Like all mechanisms which deal with large numbers of men there will be occasions when individuals who are not up to standard physically, or not up to this, that and the other thing, will get through. We rely most of all on the final check; that is, where the man goes into the "left out of battle" part of his own units.

I take a chance on security, if there is a security question involved, but I do not believe there is. I wish to read a letter dated October 28 sent to all commanders in the field. It deals with the question of absorption of reinforcement personnel and is as follows:

1. Occasionally I have had instances reported to me purporting to prove that the training of reinforcement officers and soldiers on joining their units in the field, has been wrong, or inadequate. I am satisfied that most of the officers now responsible for training and testing remustered personnel, or drafts arriving from Canada, are officers who have had considerable infantry fighting experience in this war, know what is required and all are conscientious in their duty. I have discussed this problem with some commanding officers and senior formation commanders and I believe that the way in which reinforcements are posted within units has much to do with their unsatisfactory performance in cases where they have fallen short of expectations. I do not believe that commanding officers have given enough consideration to the human aspects of the problem.

2. Commanders and commanding officers must realize that when the reinforcement officer or soldier joins the unit with which he is going to fight, it is one of great moments in his life—comparable with birth, marriage or death. The position of a new reinforcement joining a unit is quite different from that of a soldier who has served with a unit for a considerable time and goes into battle beside officers and N.C.O.'s who have trained him and with men whom he knows. The reinforcement (unless he is a recovered casualty returned to his own unit) comes as a stranger. Regardles of how thorough his preliminary training may be, in the stress of his first battle, he may react in a way contrary to his training unless steps have been taken to win his confidence. It is well known, and only human, that the experienced fighting soldier is inclined to "lay it on a bit thick" in describing his battle experiences to the new arrival. This adds to the tension under which the inexperienced soldier goes into his first engagement. He may do things in the stress of the moment which afterwards he may well realize were contrary to what he had been taught.

3. Unless proper steps are taken within a unit, the reinforcement officer, or soldier, goes into action as an individual rather than as a member of a unit team.

4. Commanding officers will take steps to ensure that their unit arrangements for the reception and absorption of reinforcement officers' and soldiers are properly organized. Reinforcement personnel arriving at a unit must:

(a) be made to feel that they are part of the unit and no longer just individuals. A responsible officer who has served with the unit for some time must interview them and explain the practical side of soldiering in the field and make the new arrival feel that he belongs there. If this matter is properly handled, confidence is won from the outset and each man feels that he has become part of a unit which takes an interest in him.

(b) have a final check over of their individual weapon training and be given a few talks from experienced officers and N.C.O's, on practical pointers.

(c) be given time to adjust themselves to their new surroundings before they are faced with action itself.

5. I have previously issued instructions that every infantry battalion and armoured regiment shall have a strong "left out of battle" party, including 2IC's and selected officers, N.C.O.'s and men. From this "left out of battle" party can be formed the "unit reception school" to deal with arriving reinforcements. If properly organized within the unit, this party should be able to provide just the type of officer and N.C.O. needed to test and initiate the new soldier. I am satisfied that the means to handle this problem are there, if there is proper organization within the unit.

6. Except in extreme emergency, i.e., when it is a question of winning, or losing, a battle, reinforcements will NOT be posted into fighting echelons in infantry battalions, or armoured regiments until they have spent a minimum of forty-eight hours in the LOB "school". I stress forty-eight hours as the minimum. Four or five days is preferable, whenever operational circumstances allow.

7. Whilst during prolonged active periods, the urge may be very strong to bring up to strength depleted fighting echelons as soon as a draft of reinforcements arives, I am convinced that if the steps are taken, which I have outlined above, a far greater fighting value will accrue to the unit and casualties will be fewer.

8. I fully appreciate that during the period of intensive activities through which we have been going that commanding officers have had little time to think about things other than the battle in which they are engaged. But, once proper arrangements have been made for reinforcement absorption, and a "unit reception school" formed, the senior LOB officer can command it.

Mr. GREEN: You are relying a good deal on these young lads who have had six or six and a half weeks' training in England getting at least forty-eight hours' training when they get to their battalions?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I am relying much more than that on the testing by the officers as the men come up through the various echelons checking on the standards of qualifications which are required and physical fitness and so on. All of these echelons have authority to hold back in the training stream or in the depots people whom they consider to be unfit. I am satisfied, too, as matters have progressed, that we have a comprehensive number of officers and N.C.O's who have very great experience and who have been placed in these key positions where they can check the training and ensure the adequacy of people who are passing through their hands.

May I say one thing further? One of the things that I was always interested in and one of the things which relieved me most was to find, when I came to the department and asked what was being done with left-out-of-battle personnel, this information. I was relieved when the staff turned me up a copy of this letter from one of our senior commanders. I said: "At last we have this thing under control with the units themselves in place of having it left to chance." Once we have it checked at that point by the people who have to use and be responsible for the lives of these young men, they will very quickly bring the echelons up to standard, if they have been falling down. I was relieved to find that letter given as an order by one of our senior commanders in the field.

Mr. GREEN: In any event you are placing a good deal of reliance on the training that these young boys will get when they reach the battalion. What is to happen in the case of a boy going up to the Seaforth Highlanders of Vancouver as an example and meeting a condition where that unit has been reduced to fifty or a hundred men, and they are in desperate straits to hold their part of the front? How much training do you think that boy will get under those conditions—and some of us as infantrymen saw that happen in the last war—

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Quite so.

Mr. GREEN: Actually what will happen, as you know, will be that that boy will be put right in the line, and the chances are that he will be killed or wounded within twenty-four hours. If he is lucky enough to live he may learn something. We have had men back from the Seaforths, and that is exactly what has been happening in Italy. What do you do in a case like that?

Mr. POULIOT: Before the general answers may I say I submit that he is not a witness in court. He should sit down while such questions are being asked.

Mr. GREEN: What chance do you think a boy has to get training in the unit in circumstances like that?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The hon. member has described a specific case.

Mr. GREEN: I am sure that there are many of them.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It is a case where one of our battalions in an attack has been reduced to a strength of fifty all ranks.

Mr. GREEN: Or one hundred.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: If the circumstances of battle permitted, what would happen there is that the unit would be withdrawn.

Mr. GREEN: Suppose it is not withdrawn?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Some of us have been in like positions; no doubt you have; I have been myself. Under those conditions, when the fate of the battle depends on it, it is the duty of every man, regardless of his qualifications or training, to do the best he can.

Mr. GREEN: Government members are applauding. What does the general think the duty of the men who are in the home defence army fully trained in combat training should be?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The duty of the man in the home defence army is that he should take up his honourable obligation of service, and take it up at once, as other Canadians are doing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If he does not do so, then what?

Mr. GREEN: I suppose there is no obligation on the government to send him over! Under this proposed plan there will be two types of Canadian soldier, one who fights and one who does not fight.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is a statement of fact; I am not sure whether it is a question.

Mr. GREEN: I will put it as a question. Under your present policy will it be a fact that there will be two types of Canadian soldier, one who fights and one who does not?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I sincerely trust that these young men will come forward to take up their obligations. I am doing everything I can to persuade them to do so.

Mr. GREEN: I understood you to say in your statement that you had reached the conclusion that it is impossible to persuade these young men to come forward.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I said that under the circumstances as they exist at the moment there are not enough men with the requisite background of training coming forward to provide the essential reserves needed for our army overseas. For that reason, and for that reason only, I have been vested with authority, which I shall use, to see that the army is kept up. May I say that the organization in Canada is separate and distinct from the keeping up of our army overseas.

Mr. GREEN: But it is important.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I agree.

Mr. GREEN: The lives of young Canadians are at stake.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No one agrees more profoundly with what you have stated than I. One of the most difficult problems which faces me in the Department of National Defence is not the business of getting men to volunteer for service overseas, because once the unity and the will of the people of this country are established that will occur of itself. I have been given the residual problem of the N.R.M.A. personnel in the camps. Even with the most honest searching of our hearts as to how to go about it, we really do not yet know how to handle it. We have to study and investigate; we have to be sympathetic; we have to be human about it. We will find the answer, although I have not it yet to give you.

Mr. GREEN: Do you think you will promote unity by this policy of yours?

[Mr. McNaughton.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): To support the soldiers overseas?

Mr. GREEN: Mine is a fair question. Do you think you will promote unity by this policy of yours?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: My primary responsibility to this house is the maintenance of the army overseas. I try in my humble way to put first things first. My business is to look after the army, and that I will do. May I say to the hon. member that if we do that and do it right, a lot of fine consequences will follow and we shall not have to worry about the unity of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: That is all very nice, but you have not answered the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is on a high plane.

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre need not talk about things being on a high plane. Is your plan to continue asking N.R.M.A. men to volunteer for general service?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: You propose to carry on in Canada the two systems, general service and N.R.M.A.; is that correct?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I want to phrase my answer in words that are understandable. The policy is to have voluntary service, and there will be an extension of that principle only where it is necessary to meet deficiencies in our army overseas.

Mr. GREEN: But the two methods will still be carried on?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We have a problem on our hands. We have 60,000 men in the N.R.M.A. They are there physically in existence and something has to be done about them. The system must continue until it is liquidated, either by the men volunteering for service or by their going into some other form of activity. You cannot change an organization with 60,000 men in it just overnight.

Mr. GREEN: What about the young lads you are going to call up from now on? Are you going to continue calling up men and then asking them to volunteer? Are the men who are to be called up to be for service anywhere, or are they simply to go into the N.R.M.A. in Canada and then have to be persuaded to go active?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: There has been no alteration in the call-up system. Under that system we forecast the activities and needs for a long time in advance and then we requisition on the Department of Labour for certain numbers of personnel who are physically fit and in certain other categories to be turned over to the army. Those who volunteer after being taken into the N.R.M.A. depots count against the quota and are later diverted into the training stream, while the others are handled through the N.R.M.A.

Mr. GREEN: The others simply go as N.R.M.A.?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Until they volunteer.

Mr. GREEN: You said something about setting up a Canadian employment corps of N.R.M.A. men who are not in physical categories which would enable them to do any fighting. Is that Canadian employment corps to serve abroad or only in Canada?

Mr. POULIOT: While the general is looking up that information perhaps I might be allowed to ask one question.

Mr. GREEN: I do not mind permitting the hon. member for Témiscouata to ask one question if it is distinctly understood that it is only one and that I can then finish my questions.

Mr. POULIOT: It will take only a fraction of a minute.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has the floor.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I am afraid that I did not bring with me the particular table I wanted to deal with that question. The question was as to these employment companies that are being set up. What we propose to do is to gather into these employment companies the personnel of the N.R.M.A. who are in the lower physical categories, men who are not fit for training for the combat units, and it is from these companies that we will seek to discharge the requisitions for men to do work of national importance which are being passed on to us. They will be given a reasonable amount of military training, but from then on we propose to get work done by them to help out in all the business of the country in so far as we can. The hon. member will recall that I prescribed two very important safeguards with respect to that work. The first of these safeguards was that somebody other than myself who was in a better position to judge would say that the task was of national importance. The other was, because I am deeply concerned with safeguarding the rights of labour and getting back to our ordinary conditions as quickly as we can, that the Minister of Labour should tell us whether by doing the work requested we were interfering either with labour or with the standards of wages of labour. If so, we would clear out and do something else. But you cannot keep men in inactivity. If you have men and you have to keep them, which is the job which has fallen on my shoulders, you must have useful work for them to do or they will deteriorate.

Mr. BRUCE: Why not send them overseas?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That may happen, sir.

Mr. GREEN: General McNaughton, you said that in the British army these men were sent abroad and did work behind the lines.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Why cannot you do the same thing with this Canadian employment corps?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That may very well happen.

Mr. GREEN: But is it going to happen or is it not?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It depends on planning.

Mr. GREEN: Is it your intention to send them over?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: If they are required to do work behind the lines, if that is part of our commitment that we have assumed, as we balance things up from time to time, I would—

Mr. GREEN: Do you think they are required at present?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: You are asking me, if I may say so, to pass judgment on a thing which my present office does not require. To my great unhappiness I have ceased to be a soldier. I have come to a position where—

Mr. GREEN: I suppose you are now just a politician like the rest of us.

An hon. MEMBER: Cheap stuff.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I have come to a position where I take my advice from the competent military advisers who are provided me and I act on that advice.

Mr. GREEN: Did your military advisers advise you that these home defence troops should not be sent overseas?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Mr. Speaker, I cannot complete—

Mr. GREEN: You also said that some of these N.R.M.A. men in Canada are to be put on a reserve and apparently are to go into civilian clothes and go back into industry. Can you tell us just what number you think will be affected by that, and what use they will be?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The employment companies I admit are in an early stage of development as regards their regulation. The hon. member asked me, if I understood him correctly, whether these men would go into civilian clothes and be allowed—

Mr. GREEN: No, no. I understood you to say in your statement that you were going to have some of these N.R.M.A. men put into a Canadian employment corps, presumably working on government jobs in Canada.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes, hospitals and the like.

Mr. GREEN: I suppose they would be in a uniform of some sort. In addition, you said that some N.R.M.A. men are to be placed on a reserve and are to go back into industry. It is about the second group I am asking.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I think that is a most important matter because many of the men have special qualifications and can meet the needs, for example, in the munitions industry. If we have a man who is capable of helping us in that business, where we are very short, we are in duty bound, I think, to release him, and the simplest way to do so is to place him on a reserve and allow him to go and work in that industry.

Mr. GREEN: About how many men are to be dealt with in that way?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I cannot give the answer to that until I have a detailed analysis of the figures. All I have been able to state to the house to-day is a policy. We are working it out, and in due course we shall see what the needs of the situation are and how we can best meet them.

Mr. GREEN: Will it run into some thousands?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The skilled men will run probably into a few hundreds.

Mr. GREEN: About how many will be enlisted in the Canadian employment corps?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: In round numbers, somewhere about 9,000.

Mr. GREEN: So 9,000 are to go into these employment companies and just about the same number are now working out at different jobs.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It is a regrouping of people who are out and bringing them under more effective control.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. GREEN: This plan of bringing men who are out working in industry back into the army again does not amount to very much if they are simply to be brought back into this Canadian employment corps.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The hon. member said it did not amount to much. I wish to goodness it amounted to nothing.

Mr. GREEN: But that is the position, is it not? Thank you, very much.

Mr. POULIOT: I have a threefold question to ask of the general in regard to reinforcements. The general will probably agree that N.R.M.A. men are not the only source of reinforcements, and that the first source of reinforcements shall be the general service men who have never been in any theatre of war.

That is preliminary to these three questions, the last of which has not been written, but it is one which the minister will remember without difficulty:

First: On November 1, 1944, were there (a) at national defence militia headquarters at Ottawa, (b) at those of the various military districts, and (c) in all other army militia establishments, any G.S. officers who had not been sent to any theatre of war; and if so, how many at (a), (b), and (c)?

Second: were any of such G.S. officers and men fully trained, and if so, how many, at (a), (b) and (c)

Third: Precisely why those G.S. men, who have volunteered, are not clear on the way to the front—because they are not—before N.R.M.A. men are called?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: May I reply to the hon. member that I have not this detailed statistical information here, but we will do our best to get the figures and give him the answers to his questions. As regards the last question, regarding general service volunteers for overseas, it is a principle that an officer shall go where he is sent. There is no question that these volunteers are available for service anywhere as need dictates. It may happen, and I have no doubt does happen, that technical officers and others who have been used on special work may well have been retained even this long at one of the headquarters. I must admit that I have not information as to the number, but I will try to get it and give the answer at the first opportunity.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Macleod has the floor.

Mr. HANSELL: I shall not take much time. It is nearly six o'clock, and perhaps the hon. member for Lake Centre will be able to speak before the recess or immediately after eight o'clock. I have but one question to ask. Parliament has been summoned, I fancy, to discuss the reaction of this country to government policy with respect to the men in the forces now in Canada. I still feel slightly in a quandary as to what the government policy actually is. When we came here to parliament we were quite certain that government policy was against conscripting the N.R.M.A. men overseas. Now there has been passed an order in council which, when it was read, appeared to be a reversal of that policy. I pick up the evening paper, and the headline, which I believe you, Mr. Speaker, can read from where you sit, fifty or sixty feet away, is this: "Zombies to the Front." But since this headline was put in type we have listened to a little questioning of General McNaughton and it appears that that is not the case, that perhaps the press got its wires crossed a little bit. I am still uncertain as to what government policy is, and whether or not this order in council reverses the policy of a day or two ago. I take it that the reason for calling parliament has its basis in a conflict of opinion which occurred between the former Minister of National Defence and the government in respect of policy. Personally I feel that before we are through with this matter, the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston), the late Minister of National Defence, should make a statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: The former minister.

Mr. HANSELL: The former Minister of National Defence. It may be that I am addicted to the use of the expression "the late So-and-so", because in the course of my life time I have had to hold so many funerals, although the word is very ghostly to me. I thank hon. members for the correction. I personally think that the former Minister of National Defence should be the one to answer questions, so that from him we could gain some knowledge of this matter. He was in harness in Canada since General McNaughton returned from England, and should know the situation. I have said that the reason for calling parliament has its basis in the fact that there was a difference of opinion with respect to the policy of the former minister of defence and the government. When the former minister resigned his position this country was stirred; feelings ran high, so much so that pressure of public opinion caused the Prime Minister or Your Honour to feel it imperative to call parliament. I doubt whether General McNaughton can answer the question I am about to put, and therefore I do not ask that he necessarily shall answer it.

May I say in passing that I appreciated the suggestion of the hon. member for Témiscouata that General McNaughton should be seated. I appreciate, too, that General McNaughton is not a criminal on trial for his life. On the basis of his position as an honoured general of the army he should be treated with the utmost respect.

My question is perhaps more directed to the Prime Minister than to General McNaughton; or possibly the former Minister of National Defence would like to answer it. This is my question: Would Colonel Ralston's resignation have been necessary if this order in council had been passed upon his report to the cabinet after his return from overseas? That is my question, and I think the people of Canada have a right to know.

Mr. ROWE: Do not embarrass the general; page the Prime Minister.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That apparently was the $64 question.

Mr. HANSELL: Just a moment. I appreciate the fact that the hon. member for Lake Centre wants the floor. He will get it all right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have waited for three minutes.

Mr. HANSELL: I want an answer. The Prime Minister can accept resignations and can put in his cabinet whomsoever he chooses, but he cannot trifle with the feelings of the people of Canada, and, as my hon. friend the member for Bow River says, with the lives of our fighting men. I want that question answered. Surely the Prime Minister can answer it. If he cannot, we shall have to try to get it from the former Minister of National Defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the beginning of this afternoon's session, the leader of the opposition asked that General McNaughton's answers to questions be confined to to-day. I thought at that time that in regard to the questions to be asked, there would be a fair distribution as between the members on different sides of the house, and that the general would not be subjected to almost continuous cross-examination by members of one particular group. I am hoping that the chance will be given members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and those of the Social Credit group to ask questions as well as members of the official opposition.

I do not wish to take up time in answering questions at the present time. General McNaughton should be given all the time he can possibly have to-day.

But may I say a word with reference to the question. There are some things that can be done or which may be unnecessary at one time which cannot be done or which may become unnecessary at another, and if the government had attempted to do a month or two ago what at that time did not appear necessary or what has been done to-day, I venture to say that its action would have frustrated the ability of the defence department to give to the men fighting on the other side the reinforcements needed at the time they may be needed.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the Minister of National Defence one or two questions? Will the estimate for reinforcements allow for leave to be given to the men who have been continuously in the firing line ever since we invaded Italy, or more recently in France? Will the estimate of reinforcements to be sent overseas allow for proper leave for those men who have borne the brunt of the day?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I am glad that question has been asked, because that is a matter which has given me most anxious thought from the beginning. Some of our men have been over there for five years or more, away from their homes, and we are most anxious that those with such long service should have the rest that comes from returning to their families. The number for December is very small. We hope to have home before Christmas 450. That number was set purely by the exigencies of transportation. That is the limiting factor. I am in great hopes that we may have larger numbers and that we can increase them very materially as soon as transportation is available. We are certainly going to do that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is this estimate of the needs one that will allow, having in mind what the general has just said, a reasonable and proper margin of safety—

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: —making allowance for underestimate?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I may say to the hon. member that the figures were carefully studied by our military officers and the general staff, and they were studied from every angle. The figures with reference to transportation take into account reinforcements in the various progressive times that lie ahead, to the level which is recommended by our military authorities, and on top of that, while it varies from time to time, there is some margin of safety. Again, I may say to hon. members that many uncertainties enter into the picture. We do not know with certainty what the fighting will be; we can only base it on past experience. But that experience has been analysed and the greatest care has been put into these figures, so that we believe that on the average they are sound and safe.

Mr. COLDWELL: In his statement to the house, the Minister of National Defence stated that there might be important gaps in it which he could not disclose in public session, and he indicated one of those gaps. He said he had had comprehensive figures prepared, and he had a table under his hand. In the light of the two questions I have asked regarding leave and the margin of safety, I think this house ought to see those figures and that table. I would therefore ask the general under what conditions he would allow members to have access to that table.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That particular table was one which I felt that this house in confidential session would like to have. It has been prepared in such a way that I can use it complete without anxiety in a session of that sort.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) suggested, when I asked these questions, that I must have talked it over with General McNaughton. May I say that I have never spoken to General McNaughton in my life.

Mr. ROWE: I never said that.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member said I must have talked it over with him.

Mr. ROWE: Not with him.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have talked it over with nobody. I am asking these questions because of their importance, and I think that the further we get away from suggestions of that sort of political strategy the better it will be for the house and the country. I was going to ask a question, but I see it is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COLDWELL: Can the Minister of National Defence tell us what are the medical categories of the men in the home defence army, how many are in each category, and what categories are considered to be fit for duty in the line?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I was not able to catch the question in full, but I understand the hon. gentleman to be asking for a breakdown of the N.R.M.A. men by categories. The total strength of the N.R.M.A. as of September 27, the latest figure I have with me, was 68,489, of whom 8,743 were on extended leave, which leaves actually in the service 59,746. Of that number approximately 16,000 were trained as infantry and another 26,000 were of an age and category suitable for infantry training. So that the total potential infantry in the N.R.M.A. is the sum of 16,000 and 26,000, or 42,000. The remainder, namely some 17,746, are considered to be unsuitable and unavailable for infantry.

Mr. COLDWELL: And is the lowest category B-2? What will be the lowest category accepted as fit for infantry service in the line?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We do the categories on what is known as the pulhems system. With the exception of a few tradesmen the minimum pulhems categories acceptable for infantry for service in the line are 1-1-1 and 2-2-2-1.

Mr. COLDWELL: What does that mean, precisely?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The pulhems categorization is a most carefuly worked out system with the introduction of which our own medical officers, both here in Canada and overseas, had a great deal to do. It breaks the estimation of a man's fitness down into all parts of the body; for instance, "P" is physical; "U" is upper body; "L" is the lower part of the body, and so on. Unfortunately I have not with me at the moment the rather thick pamphlet giving all the details, but I have sent for it and it will be here in a few moments.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one question I should like to ask in connection with the number of voluntary enlistments and the discharges in each of the months beginning with last June. I ask for this information because in a return brought down some months ago, just before the house adjourned, it was stated that the excess of voluntary enlistments over discharges was some 5,400 during the months of March, April and May. So that I would like the minister to give the house a statement setting out the number who volunteered in each of the months from June to October, and the number of discharges in each of those months.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I have under my hand the figures for January, 1944, to September, 1944, by months which I would be very glad to give.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would you give them from June, 1944, to the end? We have had the other figures. What I wish to get is the figure for the last three or four months starting with June.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The total enlistments for general service in June were 6,282; July, 4,860; August, 5,256; September, 5,318; October, 4,710. That is the last figure I have. We have not November.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would you give the discharges for each of the corresponding months?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I have been able to give the enlistments in terms of precise figures. We have to give the discharges in round figures with the data I have available here. In June there were 4,000 discharges; in July, 3,400; in August, 3,500, and in September, 3,000. The figures I have here were rounded off for another purpose.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Have you October?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I have not October. I shall be very happy to get it for you if you would ask again.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to ask you whether in your opinion, or whether you so advised the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), that you believed or had reason to believe that you could secure a very large increase in enlistments among the N.R.M.A. troops? When was such a suggestion first made to the Prime Minister?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The answer that I would make to the hon. member is that if I had not believed that the measures which were open to me to take that persuasion would yield the results I would not have made that suggestion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When was the suggestion made? When did the minister first let the Prime Minister know that he believed that he could make the voluntary system supply the necessary reinforcements for the Canadian infantry? When was the first time you gave the Prime Minister that opinion?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I can only give the hon. member an approximate date from memory because I have not kept a diary of it. I would think from memory, subject to correction, that it must have been about the last day of October.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: About that time was the first occasion on which the minister had advised the Prime Minister—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I think the minister could give that information best by reference to the day on which he was made minister. The minister was sworn in on Thursday the 2nd of November.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes. I see I have a note in this little diary. The conversation took place on Tuesday, October 31.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did the minister at the time he gave that opinion have a full statistical record regarding the enlistments and the difficulties of getting men from the N.R.M.A. men in general as experienced by the department?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The answer to that question is, no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am asking these questions for the purpose of getting information. What change in attitude, what degree of different types of persuasion did the minister decide to use on the N.R.M.A. men that had never been used before? I mention in that connection the fact that the minister was quoted in the press as using words to this effect, that improper means or unjustifiable means had been used but that that course was to be departed from. What innovation or improvements did the minister suggest could be used on the N.R.M.A. men in order to induce them to enlist?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would say to the hon. member that I had seen a fair amount of what was going on in various parts of Canada, and I had formed the definite opinion that these men who were in the N.R.M.A. units had been pressed rather than led. It seemed an attitude of mind which had grown up towards them in all quarters. I heard it on all sides. From the earliest days when I was called upon to study these matters for the last war, to study, report and recommend what should be the basis of our military organization for the future, I had formed the definite opinion that in this country we should rely on the voluntary system. It struck me that these people had been put into the camps and that they were certainly not being encouraged to come forward the way I would like if I were the one responsible for them, and I felt myself emphatically that in an appeal to them, pointing out the part that they could play, we would have a considerable measure of success in persuading them to volunteer for general service, or, as I have put it on more than one occasion, to take up voluntarily the honourable obligation of service.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is far from an answer to what I had in mind. What were the coercive actions that you objected to? That is far away from an answer to that question.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The hon. member will forgive me if I do not agree. These matters of opinion and judgment are hardly susceptible of categorical answers in detail.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The question that I asked was this: What were the coercive actions that had been practised on these men that the minister decided were not going to be continued any more? What were those practices? I ask this only to ascertain what change has taken place.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: If the hon. member will give me a few minutes I shall have the memorandum looked up.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: While the minister is having that information looked up, will he tell me if, as a result of his examination or knowledge gained in various parts of Canada, he has come to the conclusion that coercion has been used on the draftees who were actually in the forces?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Since I came back to Canada I have been in the position of an onlooker and I have had very little opportunity to see the men except when they were out of their camps. The impression I have formed is that with leadership and persuasion and appeal these men will come forward.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did the minister conclude that there had not been leadership before?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would answer "No" to that question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What changes has the minister made since he became minister with a view to securing the enlistment of the N.R.M.A. men?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I covered this matter in considerable detail in the address which I had the honour to make to the house to-day. As I said then, this group had been held together for a multiplicity of purposes. Some of them had been trained as soldiers and others had been fully or partly trained to be moved around the country from time to time to work for farmers, picking tobacco and so on. I do not dispute that all these matters were of significance in the industrial and agricultural life of the country, but I submit that these men were called up primarily to be trained as soldiers and that they should be brought back to be trained as soldiers rather than be sent out to do other work for which they would receive high rates of pay.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister have any reasons other than those given this afternoon for the failure to secure the necessary volunteers from the N.R.M.A. ranks?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I think the reasons which I gave this afternoon were sufficient to form my opinion and judgment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many volunteers from other branches of the service have been transferred to the infantry since the minister has been minister?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: As I understand the hon. member's question, he wants to know the number who have been remustered since November 2?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I regret that I have not the figures broken down in that way; it has been prepared as a cumulative figure.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it possible to tell me how many there were as of the first of the month, and how many there are to-day? There would then be no difficulty in deciding how many there were at that time.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That would mean cabling our staffs in England, because most of the remustering has taken place on the other side.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Have you the figures for Canada?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We could not give figures for November at this time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did you give instructions to the district officers commanding of the various districts that men in other branches of the sevice regardless of their rank so long as they were non-commissioned officers or privates should be transferred to the infantry? Have you given such orders during the last two weeks?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The question of the hon. member, as I understand it, is, did I give those orders?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The particular orders for remustering fit men, non-commissioned officers included, were given before I took over the department. I reviewed those orders and continued them in force under the circumstances.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Any man who was a volunteer and who was remustered into the army, regardless of whether he had non-commissioned rank or not, was remustered as a private; is that not correct?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: As to the non-commissioned officers and the specialists who were remustered to infantry, the recommendation was and is that they should retain their rank during training and for six months after posting, by which time it was thought that if they were up to the standards of that rank they would continue to hold it. To make the pay side of that effective requires an amendment to Financial Regulations and Instructions, which amendment has been signed, has gone forward and will be effective for the men concerned from the date on which they were remustered.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And has authority also been sent out that all the non-commissioned officers in the N.R.M.A. who may enlist in the active army shall retain their rank?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes; the answer is in the affirmative; they are treated in the same way. It is in all cases men who have gained their stripes as N.C.O's. It is well to keep them before the commanding officer of the unit to which they go.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister stated this afternoon that he was hopeful that by proper persuasion the N.R.M.A. army would be very considerably reduced. May I then ask how many N.R.M.A. men have enlisted since the minister took over?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The hon. member asked me if I am hopeful that with a new approach the N.R.M.A. can be persuaded to convert to general service.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, I did not ask that at all. My question was, in view of the hopeful attitude of the minister as expressed earlier this month, have events justified it? How many N.R.M.A. men have since enlisted for active service?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: From the 1st to the 4th of November—a four-day broken week—96; for the week ending November 11, 173; for the week ending November 18, 280. In one camp where the work has been well organized there were over 185 converted to general service during yesterday and to-day. If the hon. member will excuse me, I have been busy with other affairs and have not been able to get the figures of the last few days together to be of use, but I shall endeavour to give the figures to-morrow.

Mr. SLAGHT: What help did you get from the hon. member for Lake Centre?

Mr. BROOKS: Are the figures you gave of N.R.M.A. men who have enlisted for active service those of men who have been in the N.R.M.A. for some time or of men who have just recently been called up in the draft?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I could not give the break-down with any certainty, but most of the men referred to in those figures as converting from the N.R.M.A. have been there for some considerable period.

Mr. BROOKS: The figures include both men who have been recently called up and men who have been in the N.R.M.A. for some time?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is correct. But the majority I believe have been there for some time. I have no statistical break-down with me.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have before me a clipping of a statement made by Major-General G. R. Pearkes with regard to the units in the Pacific command. I shall quote from the clipping and then ask the minister whether it is a fact. It is dated November 17 and quotes Major-General Pearkes as follows:

"There must be an immediate and unprecedented acceleration of recruiting among N.R.M.A. infantrymen if any adequate response is to be made within the short time General McNaughton intimated, in his appeals at Arnprior and Ottawa, was yet available."

Asked what new methods would be used to urge "Zombies" to go active, General Pearkes replied:

"God only knows. But we're going to have a try anyway."

What new methods have been put into effect since then beyond the order in council that was passed to-day?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would say to the hon. member that probably one of the most important methods was to see by the publication of the figures that the general public of Canada had knowledge of the particular problem of the N.R.M.A. which was growing up in our midst. The second fact is that members of the community whose voices are respected and carry far have in some instances been making appeals to these men, reinforcing the appeals which I myself have made. They were doing it and getting an effect. Previously we had little help from outside. The problem seemed to me to have been largely left to the army to solve. I believe that the problem of N.R.M.A., while it is true that it is the army's responsibility, is also the responsibility of the general public of this country, and I have not felt that we have had much real charity and support in this work.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Speaking of charity, and in all charity, do you think the government had no responsibility under its power? I ask the question in perfect courtesy, too.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: A courteous question requires a courteous answer. I think we all, government and people, bear a responsibility when a social problem of the magnitude of N.R.M.A. arises.

Mr. BROOKS: I think your appeal was to be made to the parents and friends of the people in the localities where the men's homes were. Is that not correct?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is right.

Mr. BROOKS: Well, is it not true that most of these men are miles away from their homes? Many men on the Pacific coast are from eastern Canada; many of those in the east are from the west; and how would it be possible for the parents or the local people to use influence on men who are not in their own homes?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: There are letters and other communications between the boys in the camps and their people at home.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If, as you stated this afternoon, you believe that the manpower should be secured by this new policy of persuasion, as you call it, why the introduction of this order in council at this time?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: When I made my appeal, and when the Prime Minister made his appeal, it was not only the making of the appeal that was required, but that there should have been a unity of public opinion behind that appeal. As it turns out, in place of getting support we got the opposite. I would say further to the hon. member that when I made my original appeal at Arnprior I said that it was conditional on the good will and support of the public. When persons are charged in war with responsibility for the armed forces, when persons are charged in war with responsibility for the leadership of the nation, and the public do not respond to their appeal—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): They did in 1942.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: —it is no wonder that, if we get no support, and with the responsibility which the Minister of National Defence and the government carry for the proper maintenance, the full maintenance of the army overseas, we should turn to another method in order to discharge our duties and responsibilities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I properly interpreted your remarks this afternoon, you frankly admitted that a mistake had been made and you did not get the big response you expected you might get? Is that not the substance of your statement this afternoon? It is the way I interpreted it, at all events.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: What I contended we should do was that we should make an honest and full endeavour to maintain our traditional system and to prove conclusively, to the satisfaction of ourselves and of all the country, that it could not be done, before we turned to measures which were more extreme.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What are the more extreme measures?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Read the order in council.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The measures to which the hon. member refers are those which were laid on the table of this house to-day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And which the minister said he did not expect he would ever have to use.

Mr. CRERAR: He said nothing of the kind.

An hon. MEMBER: He "hoped".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did the minister say he never hoped to use it?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: He said he hoped it would not be necessary to use it. But he said also that the forces overseas will be maintained.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh. So that we can take it as definite that the statement this afternoon that the minister did not expect to use the powers has been changed; his attitude has been changed?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would say to the hon. member that the answer to his question is, no. I still hope that the voluntary system will be effective, but my first duty, my first purpose is to maintain our forces overseas to the strength that has been decided; and those forces will be maintained, by any method.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: General McNaughton, I was very much interested in the coincidence which is evident in the figures which you gave this afternoon. You estimate that an additional 16,000 men will be needed for reinforcements, to see you through, I think you said, until May. The figures show that there are 16,000 men in N.R.M.A. either fully trained or very nearly fully trained for the infantry; and I notice that the order in council tabled this afternoon authorizes you to send at your discretion a number up to 16,000 overseas. Would you like to comment on that unusual coincidence of figures?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would say to the hon. member that it is a coincidence. It is fortuitous because there is no real connection between the figures in the sense that he means. We do require another block of infantry overseas, as I shall endeavour to show when I am speaking to the house under conditions where I can disclose these figures in detail.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Would you say that the 16,000 provided in the order in council was governed by the fact that there were 16,000 fully trained available, or by the fact that there were 16,000 needed overseas?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The figure of 16,000 of additional dispatches is the recommendation of the general staff, who are responsible for advising me on these matters. It is a statement of requirements.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I note from the afternoon papers that the press at least gained from the order in council the impression that the 16,000 trained in the N.R.M.A. would be sent overseas under the authority of that order in council. You would say that there is no justification for the press drawing that inference from the order in council.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The numbers sent over under the authority of the order in council will be those numbers which are needed to make up any deficit in the men who are coming forward voluntarily and who, of course, are suitably trained.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I understood from your statement this afternoon that that is your policy. I have not a copy of your statement, and this may be asking for the repetition of something that you have already given; but would you outline to us just how you propose to make up that complement of 16,000?

Mr. HOMUTH: Where are you going to get them?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would say that these extra 16,000 for dispatch—5,000 approximately in December, 5,000 in January, and speaking from memory, I believe, 2,000 in each of the months thereafter, making the total of 16,000—having been set by the staff and approved by the minister, it becomes the duty of the adjutant-general's branch, working in cooperation with the training branch, who know the training standards, to make selections of personnel. When these matters have been studied, specific proposals will be made by the adjutant-general as to where these men are to come from and who they are, and will be placed in front of the minister for approval. In the course of the two or three hours since that order in council became the law of the land, that process of distribution and selection has only just commenced. It will be some time yet before I can give a specific decision as to how it is to be put together.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the general is missing something that appeared in his statement this afternoon. As I understood the question, it was, where are we to get the 16,000? I understood the general to say that the deficit of the 16,000, over and above those who are volunteers, would be obtained from the N.R.M.A. Do I not understand that all these 16,000 are to be from N.R.M.A. men?

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Mr. RALSTON: I am talking about N.R.M.A. men, whether volunteers or under the order in council. Are not all the 16,000 from N.R.M.A.?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No.

Mr. RALSTON: The general is missing something, or I am hazy in my reading of the speech. He said:

> I want to say, quite definitely, that all anxiety would be removed if we were able to find in December a total, above the numbers now arranged, of 5,000 infantry fully trained, or in an advanced state of training, a similar number in January, and a further 6,000 in the succeeding months. Every possible economy in the employment of fit general service personnel in home establishments has now been made or is in process, and the men so made available are included in the figures of planned dispatches.

Which means other dispatches altogether—not the 16,000.

> In consequence, the only source from which this additional 16,000 can be secured is from the N.R.M.A.

Is that right or not?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: When N.R.M.A. men volunteer for general service and go into those quotas, then compulsion is not used. There are also certain individuals coming from other sources to make up that 16,000 requirement.

An hon. MEMBER: From what other sources?

Mr. RALSTON: I am more interested in the 16,000 men than in anything else talked about to-night, because they are the men to make up the reinforcements.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The substantial bulk will come from that source.

Mr. RALSTON: But does it not say that all the 16,000 will come from N.R.M.A., either as volunteers or under the order in council?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: There are other individuals who go to make up these drafts.

Mr. RALSTON: Surely your speech meant that all the 16,000 would be from the N.R.M.A., either by volunteering or under the order in council, and not from people who are general service men now.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We have taken most of the general service personnel who are free. Additional general service personnel are being freed from home war establishments every day, and as they are sorted out, if they happen to be selected for particular dispatch they will be included.

Mr. RALSTON: But I want to point out, if I can read anything at all, that this indicates that all men who have been planned for and sorted out, and who are expected to be sorted out, are to be put in the planned dispatches, which I understand to be the usual monthly quotas which are going over from time to time. This 16,000, I understand, constitutes a lump sum of 5,000, 5,000, and three 2,000 lots. These have to be trained men, and they do all come from N.R.M.A., whether they volunteer subsequently or come under the order in council.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The bulk of them will come from that source.

Mr. RALSTON: This says all of them:

> In consequence, the only source from which this additional 16,000 can be secured is from the N.R.M.A.

Is there any qualification to that?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No. There is no qualification to it whatever, but there are always people coming from various sources. There are additional general service people coming in, in addition to the planned dispatches which we had made up and formed before this additional provision was made.

Mr. RALSTON: You will find that the officer beside you has every man that can possibly be forecast as coming from any source at all, and that he and you are counting on N.R.M.A. personnel who volunteer as going in the regular monthly dispatches and not as part of the 16,000.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Substantially.

Mr. RALSTON: Practically all, to furnish the 16,000. While I am on my feet I should like to clear this up, because I think it is very important for us to know about these 16,000. I have read the minister's statement carefully, and I find there is not one word in it that indicates positively that these men are being sent. I do not think it is put in this way purposely at all, but this would seem to be the way whoever wrote it thought would best indicate what were the needs.

I want to say, quite definitely, that all anxiety would be removed if we were able to find in December a total, above the numbers now arranged, of 5,000 infantry fully trained or in an advanced state of training, a similar number in January and a further 6,000 in the succeeding months.

If that were the case all our anxiety would be at an end.

Every possible economy in the employment of fit general service personnel in home establishments has now been made or is in process, and the men so made available are included in the figures of planned dispatches.

They are out of the way. The next sentence is:

In consequence, the only source from which this additional 16,000 can be secured is from the N.R.M.A.

Still we do not say they are going.

If we are to dispatch any considerable body of these men in time to ease the anxieties in the situation, arrangements for shipping must be initiated forthwith.

There is not one word from start to finish to indicate that one of these men is going; it is all hypothetical. Now I want to ask about the shipping arrangements.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: If there is any doubt, due to my lack of mastery of phraseology, I say now to the hon. member that these additional shipments of 5,000 in the month of December, 5,000 in the month of January and 2,000 in each of the three succeeding months, subject to some variation one way or another, to fit in with the ships as we can get them—I say to him that these numbers of trained infantry will go.

Mr. RALSTON: When would the first 5,000 arrive in the battle area? That is the important thing.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The December shipments, having regard to the estimated state of training, should be available for use close behind the units by the end of January. They are well trained. That number is 5,000. Then, taking the point in the pools, there should be another 2,500 available in February, another 2,500 available in March, 3,000 available in April and 3,000 available in May.

Mr. RALSTON: That is, available in the battle area?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is right.

Mr. RALSTON: And shipping has been arranged, I take it?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Shipping is in process of arrangement.

Mr. RALSTON: Speaking of the number of N.R.M.A. men enlisted for July, you gave some figures to-night of the late enlistments. I think they show 117 for four days, 256 for the next week and 314 for the following week, which is 787 for a little more than half a month. I would just ask if you would check. The normal enlistments in July were 1,350, were they not?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The information requested is the number of N.R.M.A. men converting to general service in the month of June. That number was 2,976; for July, 1,342; for August, 1,350, and for September, 1,340.

Mr. RALSTON: Then for October the figure I have is 850.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The figure given here is 848.

Mr. RALSTON: So that the enlistments so far in November are on the order of the enlistments in July, August and September, and about fifty per cent higher than the enlistments in October?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to ask the Minister of National Defence one question, and I do not propose to hitch a speech to it. I want to bring up a matter which as far as I have heard has not been touched so far, and which I think would have a direct bearing on the success or otherwise of the policy laid down this afternoon by the Prime Minister and emphasized or brought into being by the order in council which he quoted. In order to make my question intelligible, however, I must be allowed to lay a foundation for it, in as few words as possible.

As I see it, the situation is this. The former Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), to whom I presume I must now refer as the hon. member for Prince, after some years in charge of the department, after several visits overseas, the most recent of which was within the last few months, and after a thorough investigation of the situation, comes to the conclusion that he must send overseas these men of the N.R.M.A., and that the situation is urgent. He comes home and so advises the cabinet, but he finds his advice ill received; in other words it is rejected. He presses it until he is asked to resign. In taking that action the Prime Minister was perfectly correct and only following constitutional practice. When a member of the cabinet is in disagreement with his colleagues on any major policy it is his duty to resign, because the cabinet could not profitably exist or cooperate if one section were working against another; there is no doubt about that.

What is the position now? After hearing the views of the followers of the former minister, perhaps, or for some other reason the cabinet reverses its policy, in part at least, and decides to send overseas 16,000 men; to make sure there will be no doubt about it an order in council is put through to-day specifically setting out that number. I highly approve that policy, except of course that in my view it does not go far enough; it should have been left open to send more later on. But I notice that the order in council puts the whole weight upon something the minister has to do; he may do this, or he may do that. It gives him a great deal of leeway. Now, to quote scripture, the position is that "the stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner", and what position does that put us in now? According to the correspondence and the speeches in this house and also the speeches over the radio by the Prime Minister, it was on your advice, Mr. McNaughton, that the government took the steps that were taken in regard to not sending these men overseas, which linked you up with the anti-overseas service policy of the government.

If any further proof were needed your own language this afternoon would supply it. You reiterated not once but several times with more force and determination than you have given to any other expression of your views that your full belief was and still is and would be to avoid force or conscription, and not one of those men would go over if you could possibly avoid it. That is strong language from a man who has just been sworn in a few weeks ago to carry out the policy of the governor general in council and the cabinet, who now place their faith in a policy directly and diametrically opposed to those that you gave expression to this afternoon. Your subordinates in Ottawa and elsewhere throughout the British empire or wherever our troops are will know those words of yours, will know the language forthwith. They will know and must know that, no matter what your written instructions may be, your real views are those you have so strongly indicated this afternoon. Your ideas, your wishes, your views are diametrically opposed to the policy you are now sworn to carry out. Failure would justify your action, and it would be pleasing to you if it proved to be that your policy was correct.

This is the question I should like to put to you. The question is really twofold. One part of it applies to your subordinates and the other part to yourself. In such circumstances can you as a businessman and a capable soldier expect strong cooperation from your subordinates throughout the army towards the policy towards which you have just now expressed such dislike, such hatred it might almost be called? I have been a soldier myself and I know how completely easy it is to receive instructions and to carry them out in such a way as to vitiate the whole intent of the written instructions. It is a long time since I was a soldier, but I can remember getting instructions and if they did not suit the officer or the colonel or the boys how easy it was to walk through them.

I will go farther and appeal to you yourself. In view of your former position does not the changed policy of the government and the fact that you have not changed, as you had a perfect right not to change—I give you honour for sticking to your opinion—justify and compel you as a man of honour to tread the same narrow path of self-sacrifice that was trod by your predecessor and force you to resign so that someone else can carry out the new policy of the government which now is so entirely different from that which you advocated this afternoon and this evening.

Just one word more. You may well say that it is not my business; that it is a matter for your conscience and your concern. But we are facing the greatest crisis since confederation. This may mean the breaking up of confederation and we have to throw aside any loyalty to party and courtesy itself indeed to an individual. We must ask ourselves only one question: What does this mean for Canada? I would hate to be anything but courteous to the hon. gentleman with his very fine record, but still there is something bigger and better than friendship or loyalty or anything else but the best interests of Canada. I ask you the question again as man to man. In your honest opinion would it not be better for the cabinet to which you now belong, for the Liberal party to which you now adhere or to the greater interest of the people of Canada whose interests I know you have at heart, and the welfare of Canada and the best interest of the war, if you gave way to a man who believes in the policies to be carried out by the government, who can tell us flatly that he is going to do everything he can to carry out the policies of the government, and whose whole record will be behind carrying out the new policy of the government which has been expressed to him to-day by the cabinet, by his party, and which is very much the opinion of the whole nation or at least eight-ninths of the nation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have to say to my hon. friend that if he has any questions to ask about resignations of ministers the proper person to ask is the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is the one who gives advice to the crown as to whether a resignation is in order, whether it should be accepted or not. No minister of the crown should be expected to answer a question such as my hon. friend has just addressed to the Minister of National Defence. May I say to him that he usually is very thoughtful and courteous and considerate. I do not know whether he has realized that this is the first day on which the Minister of National Defence has ever been on the floor of parliament, has ever had to address a great parliamentary assembly such as the assembly of the commons here to-day, and that he has a right to expect from hon. members when he comes into this chamber and is subjected to questions by experienced members, expert lawyers and others, in the nature of a cross-examination for the first time that he has ever had an experience of the kind, some due consideration. I would say to my hon. friend that due consideration does not consist—

Mr. HOMUTH: He asked for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This consideration is scarcely being shown to the minister when he is asked whether he does not think—when he is performing his duties in a magnificent way—that he owed it to himself and the government to resign therefrom. I say to my hon. friend that no minister of the crown that I have ever known has on the first day of his experience with the House of Commons shown the great ability in matters relating to government which the Minister of National Defence has shown to-night, to say nothing of his knowledge of military affairs. There is no man in Canada who has the knowledge and the lifelong contact with military affairs which the present Minister of National Defence has.

Mr. HOMUTH: What about the ex-minister?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.,): What changed you six months ago?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What change did you take in the last war?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.,): You change every time an idea changes.

Mr. HOMUTH: Stand up when you speak.

The SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has the floor.

Mr. NEILL: If the minister does not wish to answer my question he does not have to, but if he is the man I think he is, he will.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Mr. Speaker, may I continue my questions at the point at which I was interrupted. Am I to understand from the general that the answer to my question is, as the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) indicated, that there is to be no further recombing of the general service men for any part of the 16,000 extra men required for reinforcements?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The answer is that there is constantly going on a combing of the general service personnel in Canada, that men from the N.R.M.A. units who convert to general service will be in those figures that are going forward, and that any deficit in those figures will be made up under authority of the order in council from the men suitably trained under the N.R.M.A. There are several streams going in. I expect that the great bulk of the 16,000 men will be N.R.M.A. men, but I cannot say that that is the only source, because there will be other sources coming in to make up the stream.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Can you indicate at all the number that you expect to get by recombing the general service and the number that you will have to take from the N.R.M.A.?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The number from general service which will be included in these transhipments of 5,000, 5,000 and three lots of 2,000 is not large. There will be some, but not many.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: You would not care to indicate the actual number?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I was only able to announce the decision, and there is a lot of detailed planning and staff work to be done before we shall know who will be in what shipment and so on.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Do we understand that you expect to get part of the first 5,000 by volunteer enlistments from the N.R.M.A. and that the remainder will be called up under the authority of the order in council?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is right.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: How long do you intend to proceed with the volunteering before you ask for the first draft under the order in council?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It would be a matter of days, as soon as the detailed plans have been prepared.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Will the men to be secured by recombing the general service be as effectively trained for service as the men who have been trained in the N.R.M.A.?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The men who are being combed out from the general services will in many cases have to go back for retraining, and that is why they will be coming into the stream later on.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Will the application of the policy you have announced, that is, securing as many as possible by voluntary enlistment before applying the order in council, provide the 5,000 that are needed as quickly as would an immediate application of the order in council?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The hon. member wants to know whether we can get them more quickly by slapping on the order in council and pulling them out than we can by waiting until they volunteer. The action will be governed by the need. There will be no use in proceeding with drastic measures except to fill up a ship as it becomes available.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Can you state what delay there will be before the 5,000 will be available under the policy you have announced?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No, I cannot tell you.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: You will admit that it will require more time to secure those 5,000 men under the policy you announced than it would by applying the order in council?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Possibly, but the time element is fixed in relation to the sailings than can be arranged.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Is there any appreciable shortage of reinforcements at the present time on any of the fronts on which Canadians are serving?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would be loath to give that information in open session. When I give these figures to hon. members I plan to give them in great detail, but I do not think they should be made public.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the situation is as has been suggested, that there is a shortage?

[Mr. McNaughton.]

Mr. McNAUGHTON: As I said this afternoon, there is no shortage in any armed service with the exception of the infantry. In the infantry as a whole there is an anxiety about a prospective shortage in January because of the time required for training, the flow of the reinforcement stream and so on. I do not mind admitting that because, with the action which has been taken, that will be corrected before it becomes a menace to the continuity of our operations. Then there was another prospective shortage in connection with the stream flowing into the reinforcement pool.

Mr. HOMUTH: A complete change of policy.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Then there is a difficulty developing with the French-speaking regiments which have been through some very hard fighting.

Mr. HOMUTH: General LaFlèche will look after that.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: My next question may be similar to the last one which you felt you could not answer. Is there any remustering taking place overseas at the present time in order to make men from certain units available as reinforcements for the infantry?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The planned programme of remustering from the other arms to the infantry is approaching completion.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Am I to understand that at the present time men are being remustered overseas to be used as immediate reinforcements for the infantry?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: After retraining, of course.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: What is the minimum time that would elapse between the time a man is remustered from the artillery overseas and the time he goes into action with the infantry?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: There is a minimum of six weeks for remustering from artillery to the infantry, six weeks or more, depending on the ability of the man to pass the tests.

Mr. HOMUTH: Wait a minute. That is not according to the facts. That is not the truth.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am not going to sit down. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister, who has been given the privilege of coming in here, makes a certain statement with regard to the training of men who leave the artillery and go into the infantry, and I say to him—

An hon. MEMBER: Where were you in the last war?

Mr. HOMUTH: Where were you? All you have been interested in in this house is the baby bonus because you are the biggest man to get it. I want to say to the minister this, that what he has stated in the house is not according to the evidence that many of us have, because men have been taken from the artillery and other units and within three weeks have been shoved up to the front line. So that when the minister says it takes five or six weeks he is not telling the absolute truth.

An hon. MEMBER: Name a case.

Mr. HOMUTH: I could name a dozen. Wouldn't you love to have them? What a trimming you would give them!

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. As I just came into the house the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) was making a statement against the Minister of National Defence, saying that something he had said was not true. The hon. member for Waterloo South will understand that the Minister of National Defence, although he is not a member of this house yet, is a member of the government and offensive words cannot be said to him. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister is not a member of the house, actually I do not have to withdraw the statement I made—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, yes.

Mr. HOMUTH: Just you fellows shut up for a minute. You are in a hot spot and you wonder where you are going. I know darned well where you are going. You are going into oblivion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have made a request of the hon. member.

Mr. HOMUTH: And I am going to withdraw my remark, Mr. Speaker, that the minister made an untruthful statement. But I do want to register my objection to his statement, because it is not according to the facts that I have.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member withdraws the statement he made against the minister.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: General McNaughton, a parent informed me a few days ago that his son overseas was transferred from an artillery unit to the infantry and was a casualty within two weeks of the time he had been remustered. Would you say that that parent was misinformed and that such a situation could not possibly occur?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I could give no such assurance to the hon. member. I have myself in the last war seen men who have transferred from the artillery to the infantry direct from unit to unit. The case cited by the hon. member is an individual case that may and will happen, but it is not in accordance with the instructions which have been laid down. If he will give me the name, I shall have inquiries made and see what the facts are.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I have a telegram here which I shall be pleased to give to the minister, if necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would say to my hon. friend that if he is going to read from a communication on a public matter he will have, if requested, to give it to the house in full. I ask him to tell us to whom the telegram is addressed, and whom it is from?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Mr. Speaker, in a similar case last year I was challenged and instructed by the chairman of the committee to table a letter from which I read. I complied with his instructions. The next day I received the letter back from the Clerk of the House saying that since it was a personal letter it could not be tabled in the house. This is a telegram to a member of the house signed by a citizen, and I want your ruling, Mr. Speaker, as to whether I must give all the details if I read part of the telegram.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before you give your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I would refer you to the standing order and citation 289 on page 94 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition. Citation 289 reads:

> The rule respecting the production of public papers, quoted by a minister of the crown, is necessary to give the house the same information he possesses and enable it to come to a correct conclusion on a question. It does not appear that the English Commons have ever applied this rule to the case of private members citing public documents not in the possession of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. member wishes to ask any questions, he is free to ask them, but if he desires to quote from a document in his hand he is bound, if requested, to give the house full particulars requested concerning the document.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no rule on that point, Mr. Speaker. The rule cited refers to public documents.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no. The house is entitled to know the authority on which the statement is being made if one purports to use a document in making his statement. My hon. friend can ask his question without making any reference whatever to whom the telegram comes from or to whom it is addressed, but if he is going to use the document he must be prepared to table it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Assuming that he takes the responsibility for the contents of the document he does not have to table it. But if he is using a public document and is called upon to table it, he must table it. That rule is applicable principally to ministers of the crown who have access to information in public documents. There is no specific rule with respect to private communications. A member of the house should not use a private communication to quote from it to the house unless he assumes responsibility for the context. That is the rule and it is founded on logic.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Mr. Speaker, to save your ruling I will drop that. The telegram is sent to another member of the house. Were it sent to me personally I would ask your ruling and either table it or read it.

My next question is, would you tell us whether the need for reinforcements at the present time is a factor in determining whether men who have been wounded two or three times are sent back into the line? That is, would they normally be sent back as they are being sent, were there sufficient reinforcements at the present time?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The answer to the hon. member's question is, first, that before a man is returned to the front he must be physically fit to the standards which have been laid down. If a man has had three wounds, and certain periods of service, the particulars of which I have not under my hand at the moment, he is entitled to certain extra periods of leave. If the hon. member wishes the details I will send down to the department and have them sent up at once.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I ask my question, because a great many people are hearing from overseas and are under the impression that the boys overseas are being unduly used; that they are being sent back time after time from the hospital; that they are being used for unduly long periods of time in the front line; and that squadrons are going into action at part strength because of the reinforcement situation. That is the information I get from citizens who are receiving letters from overseas. I would like your comment on that situation.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The statement which I have made of the reinforcement situation is that in arms other than the infantry there is no problem as far as numbers are concerned. There always is and always will be in battle, particularly in the fast-moving type of fighting in which our men in northwest Europe have been engaged during the summer, the problem of getting reinforcements promptly to the units. When a casualty occurs a demand is made on the depots and it may be some days before the man gets forward. I myself served in units during the last war, and I do not suppose we ever were fully up to strength. That condition exists in arms other than the infantry. In the infantry there have been special problems which are being met by the theatre commanders from the resources at their disposal. Generally the situation has been reasonably satisfactory. In some units, unquestionably, there have been shortages. We are trying to correct those matters as promptly as we can.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Earlier in the evening you referred to the extent to which you appreciate the voluntary system and its advantages over a compulsory system. Do you not think that the system of remustering which is taking place at present is imposing a considerable degree of compulsion upon men who have volunteered and is actually taking advantage of the fact that they are volunteers?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I share the hon. member's dislike with regard to remustering from one arm of the service to another. Apart from the natural love and inclination that a man gets for his own service, there is the time of extra training and the retraining which is required. But when circumstances such as forced a remustering in this instance arise, when the battle must go on, there is no alternative.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "Necessity" is the answer.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Necessity is the law which governs.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In your opinion, General McNaughton, are there sufficient reinforcements in the pools for the infantry battalions?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I have repeated the figures several times. The numbers at present in the pools overseas, covering the whole of the infantry, are sufficient. I have spoken of the possibility of a critical position late in the month of January, and I have indicated the measures which have been taken to correct that position or to avoid its coming about. Within individual units there are always times when units are short; it cannot be otherwise, in battle.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: One other question, then, to follow. If casualties to an unknown extent may occur, is it the opinion of the general that we have a—contemplated—sufficient pool for possible casualties of the future?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I am not absolutely certain that I understand the question, but I think it is this. You have asked whether the provision we have made, and which I have outlined briefly, is sufficient for the future. I must repeat that the requirements of wastage are determined on estimates given by our own officers and countersigned by the theatre commanders, so that we may know they have been prepared to accord with the planned operations which are in prospect. Then, with the numbers in the depots, which can be calculated from that, according to the scales shown by experience to be necessary, and the numbers behind to maintain, we have made full provision, with a small margin beyond.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is it the general's opinion that the former Minister of National Defence and his advisers used incorrect figures or were ill advised?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The answer is, no, not under the plans that were before them. I have been over those estimates and I think that with the information then available they were correct.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Without disclosing secrets to the enemy—I do not know who they are—have you information since then which the ex-Minister of National Defence did not have? I should like to know that, as an old soldier—and the general is too. What information is there since Colonel Ralston was overseas which would offset his information?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Information changes—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: —when you are dealing with this fluid situation of reinforcements, a great stream of men moving forward. The situation changes almost daily as to numbers available.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Not volunteers.

Mr. BROOKS: I wish to ask a few questions. It may seem like repeating, but I do not think the situation is altogether clear to some hon. members with regard to these 16,000. The general said that the requirements will be maintained. I should like to ask him, first: Are these to be maintained by volunteers through ordinary volunteering, men coming up, and from N.R.M.A. volunteering? That is correct?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: That is one source. The second source is from mustering.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Subject, of course, to training standards laid down.

Mr. BROOKS: The third source of reinforcements is the wounded man who has recovered and who has come back.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The recoverable.

Mr. BROOKS: And the fourth will be from N.R.M.A. as a last resort. Is that correct? That is what I understood the minister to say.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The powers to compel obedience will be used to make up any deficit in the drafts that have been planned.

Mr. BROOKS: In the next three or four months there will be 16,000 reinforcements for infantry. We know that in the training camps in this country at the present time there are men who have volunteered, who are receiving their training. There are men who have been mustered out and who are receiving their training. These men will be part of this 16,000.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No. With reference to the 16,000 of which we have been speaking, in order to be specific I would point out that the number is to be made up of 5,000 in December, 5,000 in January, and then three monthly quotas of 2,000.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is the war to be over then?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: May I answer one question at a time. What I have said is additional to the plans which we have made before and which I am hoping to show you in detail later.

Mr. BROOKS: Will this 5,000 for the first month be taken entirely from N.R.M.A.?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Substantially, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You said "all", this afternoon.

Mr. BROOKS: Will any volunteers be taken in that first five thousand?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I cannot answer the question yet.

Mr. BROOKS: Will any of the mustering out be taken, men who have received their training?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The personnel who have been remustered are in the other stream which was arranged before we took this action.

Mr. BROOKS: They are not included.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No.

Mr. BROOKS: We cannot get a definite answer on that at the present time. As regards this 16,000 N.R.M.A. personnel, covered by to-day's order, we know that in reinforcing there are certain geographical areas which reinforce certain units at the front representative of those areas. Supposing one area has not enough men from the 16,000, will reinforcements come from some other geographical area, or will each area reinforce its own?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It has not been found practical to keep a one to one relation between areas in Canada and units in the field. We have tried always, whenever service conditions permitted, to put people in units that were in some way affiliated with their place of origin. An honest attempt was made in that direction, but it breaks down; you cannot sectionalize in that way.

Mr. BROOKS: In other words, you may have British Columbia men reinforcing Ontario, or Nova Scotia reinforcing Quebec.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It happens; but try to reshuffle them after they have been in the unit for a few days and you will find that they dig their toes in and do not want to move.

Mr. BROOKS: Are the men that are taken from ordnance and the other corps to be replaced by N.R.M.A. personnel who were in Canada?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: In some cases the answer would be, yes. We have to use hands and feet for labour wherever we can get them. In many cases there is a scaling down of establishments.

Mr. BROOKS: All across Canada?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: All across Canada, in accordance with the plan. At one stage, with the possibility of an attack on our west and east coasts, and in view of the possibilities of carrier-borne and other aircraft coming in, quite rightly for the safety and the peace of Canada, coast defence, anti-aircraft and other guards were arranged. But with the progress of the war these forms and scales of attack have become a remote contingency and we are justified in withdrawing men from them. It is a matter of common sense.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has that been done in any numbers? I am thinking about the gentlemen who are on Partridge island in Saint John harbour and have been there for three and a half years.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: This process is continually under way, and as soon as our advisers and the chief of staff say that there is no reason for a particular installation, then it comes to us and I act on their advice and tell the staff to disband or to reduce it, or whatever the decision may be. We do not want people sitting in idleness when there is nothing to be defended against.

Mr. BROOKS: What is the maximum age for infantry overseas?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The maximum is forty, but the man must meet the pulhem requirements.

Mr. BROOKS: I understand that; but men are being sent over from these other corps up to forty years of age for infantry if their pulhems permit?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The thirty-ninth birthday is the bar line.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not suppose the minister could tell me how many of those who have been mustered out of these other corps have been between the ages of thirty-five and forty.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The information I have is that there would not be many, but I have not that break-down.

Mr. BROOKS: Well, I happen to know there are quite a few. The minister stated that N.R.M.A. personnel would take the places of these men here in Canada, but I should like to ask whether he would not consider a well-trained N.R.M.A. man of twenty or twenty-one a better soldier to send overseas than these men between the ages of thirty-five and forty who were drawn from these other sources.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The answer is in the affirmative, but until to-day I had no such authority.

Mr. BROOKS: I understand your position. I should like to ask the minister also if at the present time his department is encountering any objections from men who have been home from overseas, such as men who have been on prisoner of war escort and others, to their return overseas, while they see in Canada so many young men of military age trained under the N.R.M.A.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: There may well have been complaints, but the conditions under which men are sent back on prisoner of war escort were prescribed and laid down, and selection for that duty is very much sought after.

Mr. BROOKS: They are home for thirty days, I believe?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes, free of transportation time.

Mr. BROOKS: I asked the minister if he had received many objections from these men to returning overseas, while there are under the N.R.M.A. young men who they feel should take their places.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: There were reports, but I am not aware of them personally.

Mr. BROOKS: I believe the department intends bringing home men who have been overseas for four and five years, which I believe is a splendid thing.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: These men have been away for a long time, and they are war weary. How long is it anticipated they will remain in Canada?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The minimum period is thirty days, clear of time taken up in transportation. As a matter of fact, although I cannot be specific on the point I think we shall find that a good many of these people with special experience will be kept here as instructors and so on in the training scheme.

Mr. BROOKS: You would not say that you could absorb four or five hundred of these men each month.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Our difficulty in working it out has been the availability of transportation from the theatres of war back to Canada. I believe the number we have this month is about 450. I am hopeful that in subsequent months the total may be very much greater. I should like to see them rotated.

Mr. BROOKS: Does the minister anticipate any objection from these men to returning overseas?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No; I should say most of them will be anxious to go back. The old soldier follows the call, after he has had a bit of leave. My hon. friend has been through it, and so have I.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to ask the minister one question—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Cape Breton South has the floor.

Mr. GILLIS: I listened to the discussion all afternoon, and in my opinion the information we have received to-day has added very little to the knowledge of hon. members, although it has provided the Minister of National Defence with a good deal of mental exercise. As to this matter of reinforcements, and whether or not the order in council tabled to-day meets the situation, we are not in a position to say until we know exactly what the situation is in the various theatres of war. To what extent are our forces depleted? To what extent do they require immediate reinforcement? To what extent must we create reserves in order to support them up if and when they move forward? The minister is not in a position to give that information to hon. members, but I think we must have it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Not publicly.

Mr. GILLIS: That is so; not publicly. That is why I say most of the stuff we have been given to-day has given us no information whatever. I am not interested in finding out whether the minister can raise 16,000 men next month or the month after or the month after that. That may not be adequate. We have met here to make some definite and complete arrangements to see to it that our men overseas are reinforced adequately, and we cannot determine what is required until we have the information which the minister can give this house only in private session.

I am interested in one point, and that is how this matter came about. Why are we in this situation at the present time? We have had competent staffs. The war has been in progress for five years. Our troops sat in England for four years. As soon as they go into action we strike a crisis in the matter of reinforcements. Someone fell down on the job, and if that is so, then in my opinion the answer for the future is to correct that initial mistake.

I rose at this time for the purpose of asking the Minister of National Defence if he has any knowledge of a statement contained in the Financial Post of November 18, 1944. If this statement is correct it is a serious accusation against certain people in Canada responsible for the management of military affairs; if it is not accurate it should be denied. This statement deals specifically with the reinforcement situation; it is written by Kenneth R. Wilson, and I am going to read that part which is germane to this discussion:

> It appears that the start of the crisis was a telegram from England to Canada early in August. This telegram expressed alarm at the shortage of infantry and urged that further steps be taken to increase the flow of trained infantry reinforcements to the European theatre. Early in 1943 and again in the spring of 1944 increases had been made in the proportion of infantry troops to total army manpower. Instead of being acted upon apparently the telegram was pigeon-holed. Not only was no action taken by the military, but what is now considered much more serious, the situation was not brought to the attention of the minister or the war cabinet. Presumably the cabinet staff officers were figuring on an early end to the war and ignored the overseas request. Only when Colonel Ralston arrived overseas in October did he learn about the matter. By that time nearly two and a half months had passed. Had the matter been dealt with in early August and a large number of men diverted into the infantry pool at that time the present crisis might never have arisen.

I should like to know if the minister has any knowledge of the truth or otherwise of that statement.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not imagine the minister would have any knowledge of it. That would have to do with my own administration. I know of no telegram that was sent from overseas with regard to a matter of that kind which was not brought to the attention of the minister. Any important wire on a matter of that kind would be brought to the attention of the minister. The real situation is that it was found that infantry casualties were "very much higher" —we have always used those words, although I could give the percentages—than had been anticipated, and that goes not only for the Canadian forces but for our allies as well. The over-all casualties were practically the same, but the infantry casualties were a much higher proportion of the total than had been estimated on the very best information available. The result was that the infantry pool became exhausted. Immediately vigorous steps were taken by Canadian military headquarters over there to remuster men from other arms and train them for infantry. I was going to tell the house at some time or another if it does not invade security—I do not think it does—that at one time our units were down by something like 3,000 in the aggregate. I think that happened about the middle of August, if I am not mistaken. By a very effective remustering programme they had built the units up to strength about a month later, and had a small margin. It was expected that the pool would build up through the remustering that was taking place, and that what had occurred was more or less a splurge in activities and that the pool would build up again. That expectation was not realized. The rate of casualties continued in view of the kind of warfare we were undertaking. The result was the losses continued, putting us in the position where we are—I am not going to anticipate what the general is going to say about the expected position at the end of November—in a situation where it seemed to me, after having gone over the situation in the battle areas both in Italy and in France and also in the United Kingdom, that we had to provide a very substantial lump sum number of additional trained infantry in order to reestablish the pool which was so depleted as to be almost exhausted at that time.

Mr. GILLIS: I am trying to get information because this story had been circulated in a paper as influential as the one I have mentioned. It is a very serious accusation.

Mr. RALSTON: I had not seen it or heard it.

Mr. GILLIS: It is a very serious accusation against a responsible military official in Canada and should be cleared up. I asked the question to get an official answer. I am very glad that the former Minister of National Defence has cleared it up.

There is one other point that I am interested in. I can understand the remustering of men who have had considerable military training in other branches of the service and are hardened up. I am concerned about the syllabus of training for service personnel coming in. Take a boy eighteen and a half years of age as an example. He is a young lad just out of school and is very soft. He is taken into the basic training centre. From there he goes to the advanced training centre. As I understand it, the syllabus of training is twelve weeks. I do not think twelve weeks are sufficient.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Sixteen.

Mr. GILLIS: I was at a basic training centre within the last couple of weeks. In talking this matter over with some of those responsible for training, I was informed that the syllabus had been changed and that it was now twelve weeks. I thought at that time it was rather unfair to take a young boy eighteen and a half years of age who is very soft and to run him through basic training and advanced training and consider him then fit for active combat service in an infantry unit with that amount of hardening, to say nothing about the knowledge of the weapons he has to use. I consider it totally inadequate. It might serve the purpose in transferring the men from one unit to another where there was some training and where the personnel were hardened up. Some consideration should be given to this young fellow coming in before he is put into combat service. The amount of training given is something that should be checked. Within the last three months quite a few young boys have gone to the trenches in the Belgian theatre of war too soon. I am not going to give any specific examples, but I have had examples given to me of men who have been killed in Belgium four months from the time they enlisted in Canada as general personnel. Of course that can happen in many ways. It could be an isolated case. There might be half a dozen isolated cases of boys being slipped into the reinforcement stream because they volunteered. They may have been asked because the ranks had to be filled. One can understand that it may happen in one or two cases, but it does not excuse the reinforcement officer who permits it to happen.

Mr. RALSTON: Did my hon. friend say only four months?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the general permit me to say this? Would the hon. member give the name to the Minister of National Defence and I am sure he would look it up.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I think it is most unlikely unless the soldier had some military training beforehand.

Mr. GILLIS: No.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We have the training record down to individuals. If we had the name the history of the matter could be traced and we could give you the specific information. No harm can come to the man by his name being given.

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly not.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I think Colonel Ralston and myself are most interested in having that information. If there is anything wrong we can check and audit on the stream.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. I have no hesitation in saying that it may be an isolated case. I would say that the individual I refer to slipped into the reinforcement stream by volunteering. I can give you many others who were wounded. I have had many people come to me within the last couple of months and ask me: Is this possible, or is it reasonable, or is this the system? I know that in my end of the country these boys are put through too quickly. I can give names.

Mr. RALSTON: May I say this in the presence of the general? I had referred to me by a mother what I thought was a very bad case, just before I went overseas. She claimed that the boy had enlisted in January and had been wounded in July I think, and further that he was under age. I was very much concerned about it. I said that I would see the boy when I was overseas. I did. I had him come up from the hospital to see me. I had thought it was a case of pressure—short-cut training, to put it bluntly. I went over his training with him myself first and asked what he was given, particularly his weapons training. It sounded as though he had had apparently good training both in Canada and in England. Then I sent for his papers. His record of training was such as would make any director of training proud. The record showed his basic training in Canada, the hours that he had spent on each particular subject, then his advanced training, his Bren gun, mortar, tommy gun and all other weapon training, with good reports as well on the rest of the syllabus. It gave the number of hours of training, the number of rounds fired with the different weapons and so on. It also gave the refresher training in England. It was as complete a record as I ever saw. This was a report of his training and I was very much gratified with it. I then asked the boy how old he was. He said he was eighteen and a half years. That was in July. I said: "What did you say your age was when you enlisted?" He said: "I told them I was nineteen." I said: "Did your mother say anything about your enlisting?" He said: "No. I went home on embarkation leave and she was sorry but she did not make any objection." He had been wounded at eighteen and a half. He will not be nineteen until December, and of course I gave instructions that he was not to return to his unit before that time. But that was a clean case. I just happened to get the name; I got the boy; I got the age and I got all the documents, and it was a perfect situation, except for one thing that people would say that fellow was pretty young to go in six months after he enlisted. That is all that could be said about that case. I know there are other cases. I have investigated quite a number. Generally if you look up the individual record you will find that the training has met the standards, and from the point of view of the requirements of the training regulations and the procedure which is laid down everything has been regularly observed. I wish to know if there are any cases where a man has been trained for four months only. I should like that for my own information. Can I have the figures on that?

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to be sure about the syllabus of training for the new personnel coming in; is it sixteen weeks?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The basic training is eight weeks, and the corps training runs from eight weeks in the infantry to sixteen weeks in the armoured corps.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Are Canadian forces being reinforced by nationals other than Canadians?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No, and they never have been.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): These are matters the public are concerned about, and I think they should be cleared up.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: If the hon. member would like me to give some further explanation I shall be glad to do so. The Canadian army overseas, which is now commanded by General Crerar, is made up of a Canadian corps and a number of Canadian divisions. In that army there is one British corps and possibly more, and they have their own British divisions. Then there are Polish divisions as well as other divisions which go to make up that first army. That army is made up of units and formations from other commonwealths in addition to our own units. Each of those commonwealths has its own reinforcement stream to replace its own casualties. Canada reinforces her own and always has.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The Canadian units are reinforced entirely by our own men?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Absolutely, and always have been.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There has been a lot of discussion about that point.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I was so much concerned about this the other day that I asked our public relations officer to issue a press statement which would be generally descriptive of what was going on and which would be purely for public information.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You have been referred to by the Prime Minister as the builder and the first commander of the Canadian army.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I was the first commander of the first Canadian army.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You never had any doubt at any time that the army was overexpanded and that there would be any difficulty in reinforcing it?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The army was designed on the basis of enduring in a war of long duration.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There has been considerable discussion to-day about reinforcement pools overseas. I would have judged from past experience that one of the best methods of reinforcement would have been to use what might be termed ad hoc troops, for instance, pioneer troops, forestry troops, and so on. Can you give us the percentage of reinforcements overseas that would be composed of those troops?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Again I must say that I am not skilful in deciding what figures should be given out and what should not be given out. Would it be possible for me to give that information when I give the other figures?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That will be satisfactory, although you might be able to give it approximately. If those pioneer troops were remustered, how long would it take to train them properly as infantry ready to go into action?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: They would never be up to the infantry level because they are in the pioneers owing to their being low in certain pulhems figures.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What about the forestry?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: In the early part of the war the Canadian forestry corps included a great many who were eventually transferred to the infantry.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Are there any there now?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Only a comparatively small number. Most of the Scottish woods have been cut down. There are some forestry people with the expeditionary force on the continent.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): How long would it take to train those men?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: As a matter of fact the forestry corps in Scotland formed an important part of the defence of Britain in the early days when we had not an adequate number of troops. General Thorne, the G.O.C., Scottish command, had a high regard for our forestry people. He helped tremendously in giving them a skilled training and they were really very well trained as infantry. They were a fine body of troops.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There has been considerable discussion to-day about the 16,000 men who will be called up under the new conscription policy which has been announced. In choosing those men or any proportion of them, will it be done on a per capita basis in the military districts across Canada from which they originally enlisted?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No; they will just be taken from any part of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I have the privilege of asking the minister a question in order to clear up more precisely what is meant when we talk about men being taken from the N.R.M.A. to be sent overseas. Let me put it to the house in a simple way. Assume that to-day, November 23, there are a thousand N.R.M.A. men in a certain camp. Then take the situation as it may exist a week from to-day with those same men. Assume that none of those men have volunteered in the meantime. The result will be that they will remain N.R.M.A. men just as they are to-day. But if in the period of that week the thousand men volunteer, they then are no longer classed as N.R.M.A. men, they become general service men—I am asking if I am right in this—if these general service men in a week from to-day were sent overseas the public might assume that they are other than the N.R.M.A. men of to-day. But they would not be, they would be exactly the same men. The only difference would be that they would be going as general service men instead of being N.R.M.A. personnel sent under compulsion and not thought of as general service in the sense in which most persons use that term to-day. Am I right in that?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Here is something that is bound to cause confusion in the minds of many. I know there was confusion in my own mind in some instances cited of general service other than N.R.M.A. personnel going overseas. When we begin to consider whether these N.R.M.A. men are going over as general service men—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Let us send them all over.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Supposing all the men in the camp volunteered before the commanding officer detailed them—they have that privilege—they would then go as general service men, they would be volunteers but they would all be the N.R.M.A. men of to-day many of whom have been in camp for years. It is important to have that perfectly clear in our minds. As I understand it, any N.R.M.A. man in a camp is free to volunteer up to the moment his commanding officer details him to go; is that right?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Up to the present time something like 42,000 N.R.M.A. men have become general service men through voluntary enlistment. Those men had been in the camps for some time and most of them were highly trained.

Mr. ADAMSON: If those thousand men refused to volunteer and were called up under the order in council, they would then become general service men.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON: It is exactly the same thing; once they go up for active service they are general service men whether they are called up or whether they volunteer. There is no difference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The difference is that the one is a volunteer and the other is not; that is the distinction.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to ask the minister one or two questions. First as to general service personnel who have been in the army for some time but have had practically no infantry training, are they being sent overseas to reinforce units that require trained infantry men?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: On occasion that may well happen. They would have to have the physical characteristics laid down for the infantry and be within the age limits. They would be selected for remustering and put through courses of training.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Put through courses of training in Canada?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: If they were here it would probably be done in Canada. On occasion we have sent certain personnel for remustering across to England to take advantage of the training facilities there. It would be either one or the other.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): What training will they receive? Will it be eight or ten or twelve weeks?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: If they have already done the full basic training of their own arm, they will get six weeks' training. Otherwise it would be longer.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Will general service men fitted for their present service but not fitted for infantry service have an opportunity to appear again before a medical officer to make certain they are fit for infantry service?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes, that is so.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Will it be necessary for the individual general service man to request this, or will it be done as part of the routine of the service before these men are dispatched overseas?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Part of the routine.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): My next question is somewhat different. We note that some 450 men who have given long service overseas are to be returned for a thirty-day leave; will they be permitted to bring back to Canada with them the families they have acquired while they have been serving overseas?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: If they have families I would think that the men would be keen to spend the leave with their families.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): A man may have married while overseas and his parents may be in Canada. Will he be permitted to spend his leave in Canada and bring his wife with him?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would say, no, because the whole limit on the business is the amount of transportation available.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): There is one point that was not made clear. I think the minister said, in correcting a statement made by one hon. member, that the training necessary before an infantry man was ready for the line occupied twelve weeks, and that was corrected to sixteen weeks. Which is the correct figure?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: In the infantry he would get eight weeks basic training and eight weeks in advanced corps training. That would make sixteen weeks in Canada normally. Then he would have refresher training, which would take at least two weeks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was it not twenty-three weeks at one time?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understood that it was twenty-three weeks.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Have you in mind trade training?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): What age must a boy be before he is permitted to go into the front line?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The age is nineteen, and there we always get into certain trouble because many boys who want to go forward exaggerate their age. That is constantly occurring.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The minister asked that any cases which came to our notice of boys who had not reached the minimum age should be handed over to him. I should like to hand this letter over to the minister.

Mr. WHITE: This afternoon when the general was giving certain answers to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) I understood him to say that on the first occasion when he interviewed the Prime Minister, namely, on October 31, 1944, he did not have full information or full figures, or representations to that effect. Would the general please explain just what information he did have before him on that occasion when he advised the Prime Minister, as stated in the letter of November 3 from the Prime Minister to Colonel J. L. Ralston, in which the Prime Minister says:

> I felt it necessary to ascertain the views of General McNaughton. This I did, and ascertained that General McNaughton was not satisfied that compulsory service was necessary to provide full support for the army overseas.

Will the general please tell the house what information he had before him as to the military situation on that occasion, bearing in mind what he has already said to the hon. member for Lake Centre?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I think that is a question I am not required to answer.

Mr. WHITE: I think you have answered it by telling the hon. member for Lake Centre that you did not have all the information before you. Is that correct?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I had sufficient information to form my opinion, and it was on my opinion that I took action.

Mr. WHITE: Am I correct in assuming that the answer you gave to the member for Lake Centre was correct when you stated that you did not have full information before you?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I have stated again and again that I gave my opinion. There was never a time when anybody had all the information before him; that is impossible.

Mr. WHITE: But am I correct in assuming that on October 31 in your interview with the Prime Minister you did have the information as to the required number of reinforcements going through the reinforcement stream each month, that you had knowledge of these required 16,000 that are to be sent over in December, January and the next three months? Did you have knowledge of these requirements on that occasion?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I had sufficient general information to form the opinion which I expressed.

Mr. WHITE: That is not my question. I am asking you if on October 31 in your interview with the Prime Minister you had knowledge of the required monthly reinforcements necessary to go overseas, plus this additional 16,000 that now have to go in December, January and the following three months? I think that requires only a yes or no answer.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The answer is that I had sufficient general information to satisfy myself in the opinions I expressed.

Mr. WHITE: And the opinion you expressed I assume is contained in this letter which I mentioned from the Prime Minister to Colonel J. L. Ralston. Will you now please tell the house what information you received since October 31, when you gave this advice to the Prime Minister, that changed your mind so that you recommended to the Prime Minister or to the war cabinet action which resulted in the order in council that has just been passed?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I think that in the address which I was privileged to give to the house to-day I gave my reasons in extenso.

Mr. WHITE: Will the minister state them now very briefly?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend realize that the minister was up until five this morning preparing his statement in order to give it to the house to-day, that he has been on his feet in the house here during the entire afternoon and evening, and that during the last couple of weeks he has had one of the most difficult tasks any man could possibly assume and has been giving his whole time to it? To ask him now to repeat something he has given to the house a couple of times already to-day is I think an unreasonable request. I wish to say this, and I say it in deep earnestness. All of us on this side of the house have been under very great strain, and are carrying very great responsibility. I am debating in my mind at the moment whether, after having had to sit here to-day and go through all that I have had to give attention to to-day, I shall not ask the house to allow me to wait until Monday before I address it. With the responsibility I have at the present time I have the right to take that step. I do not intend to assume the further responsibility I have in addressing the house, when I am tired out; nor, I think, would any man who has gone through what I have gone through during the past month in seeking to keep this country in unity. When hon. gentlemen speak of not having any confidence in myself I hope they will consider very carefully what alternative government they have to put in office if I resign this post within the next two weeks.

Mr. HOMUTH: Just try it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the right hon. gentleman think he is indispensable to the Canadian confederation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I do not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If he does, he never made a greater mistake in his life. There is not any man among us who is wholly indispensable; and I venture to say that the Canadian people are to-day in a temper that—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You said the same thing about the New Brunswick election.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Never mind about the New Brunswick election.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You said there would not be a Liberal elected in New Brunswick; and they swept the province.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. member for Vancouver Centre be good enough to keep quiet? I resent being lectured by the Prime Minister as to what our duty is in the circumstances. I admit very frankly that he has gone through a very trying time, but I tell him that it is of his own making and if he had followed the command of the people of Canada as evidenced by the vote on the plebiscite this thing would have been over long ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have the floor. I have not been taking up much of the time of this session since we reconvened here. I want to tell my right hon. friend very frankly that there is a great and rising volume of public opinion in this country that will be very glad to dispense with him and with his government. I tell him very frankly that as far as I am personally concerned I have no ambitions at all, but what I would like to have in this country is a government which would be representative of all the patriotic elements in the country, that would wage total war, once and for all, and achieve victory, irrespective of party concerns. I quite agree that General McNaughton has been subject to a very severe time, especially, as has been stated by the Prime Minister, in that he is not a man who has been through such a siege or a condition as we have had to-day. As far as I am concerned, General McNaughton knows that in the days gone by I have had nothing but the friendliest feelings toward him, and I have to-night. I certainly think he has put himself in an impossible position before the Canadian public; but that is his responsibility, and he is man enough, I am sure, to assume it.

Mr. MARTIN: And he is doing it very well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a matter of opinion, and one about which we could agree to disagree.

Before I conclude may I say, without wishing to worry General McNaughton because I know he must be weary, that there is one point which is still not clear to me, and that is this. No matter how many men you get from general service, no matter how many men you get from the young men who are coming of age, the eighteen years and eighteen and one-half years, are the 16,000 trained men in the N.R.M.A. to go overseas whether they volunteer or not?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The answer is, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what you said in your statement this afternoon, but from your answers to the former Minister of National Defence here to-night there is an inconsistency there, and I put myself on the judgment of this house.

Mr. SLAGHT: You are wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I may be wrong. I have never been so sure of myself as some other people are. I am not quite so sure of myself as the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) seems to be of himself. But there is great confusion in the minds of the membership of this house.

Mr. SLAGHT: Being out of order, the hon. gentleman must be entitled to have somebody tell him that he is wrong. When he makes a misstatement of fact—inadvertently, perhaps—it is none the less a misstatement.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Who are you to judge?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thanks for the lecture. That is all I have to say. It is quite clear that the 16,000 well-trained troops are to be sent overseas irrespective of who else may be sent or what other commitments there are? That is what I want to be assured of.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: In round numbers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, in round numbers. I am not going to quibble over one or two. Thank you very much.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: May I just express my deep appreciation to the hon. member for York-Sunbury for his kind words.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The house may wish to discuss one or two matters before eleven o'clock, and I would suggest that the further questioning of General McNaughton should stand over for another time. What I would like to suggest to the house is this. The Minister of National Defence has been dealing with these matters to-day, and there is some information he has not been able to give on account of not having the records with him, but he will be in a position to have the records looked up immediately. Unless we are to have all this ground gone over again and again, it would I believe be best to conclude with the questioning of General McNaughton before entering on the next order of business. In other words, if the house wishes to question General McNaughton still further it should I think have the privilege of doing so to-morrow. If there is to be a secret session—it has been expressed that some would desire it, after the general was asked to-day certain questions to which he replied that he could answer only in secret session—if, I say, the house may feel that it wishes to have further information in secret session, I think any such session ought to follow immediately on this discussion to-day, and not be left over until other things have been dealt with in the interval.

When the debate begins on the motion which I have placed on the order paper it will continue to the end; and at the end of the debate, if the resolution is not carried, of course the government will immediately make way for those who are responsible for its defeat. It will be their obligation to form at once an administration to carry on Canada's war effort. But I think there should be no intermission during the debate itself to get information in secret session. It should not be necessary to bring General McNaughton back again, because the debate ought to conclude matters; and while my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) said he would like to have it a condition before General McNaughton was admitted that the government would proceed to-morrow with the motion which is in my name, I feel I ought to ask him to-night, that, if there is any desire on the part of hon. members to question General McNaughton further, either in public or in secret session, that should have precedence to-morrow. Generally, when we have met after a long absence, we have made it a rule not to sit on a Friday evening. In view of the seriousness of the whole problem, and to give everyone an opportunity to reflect upon the information that has thus far been given, it would be advisable I believe to conclude with the questioning of General McNaughton to-morrow and to begin the debate on Monday. I have brought this matter up at the moment because there is still time to consider it before eleven o'clock, and for more reasons than one, I hope that this may be arranged.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not in the house when this discussion began, but I was rather afraid that there would be some further alteration in the arrangement that was made when we consented to the coming of General McNaughton to this chamber. I am told that there is very little further questioning, and from what I can gather, I think we ought to be able to finish to-night. Further than that, I think it should be possible for General McNaughton to file or table such answers as are confidential because, despite what has been said, nothing has been abused here which in my opinion would call for a secret session. If we had adopted the original suggestion that the session should be secret we would have had a lot of information denied the public which has been given. Perhaps we might go on past eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, indeed; we will not go on after eleven, when some of us have been up night after night, on towards dawn, in order that the house might get the fullest information at the earliest possible moment. There may have been a reason in the minds of some hon. members for seeking to rush this session rapidly when they felt that there was inadequate provision for reinforcements; but the order in council which has been tabled to-day completely removes any possible concern in the mind of anyone with regard to the reinforcements which our men overseas will have.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, it does so far as the minds of most are concerned.

An hon. MEMBER: It does not mean anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not surprised that it does not to the hon. member. May I say this, however. I take strongly the position that any government, at a time of war, is entitled to consideration. It is not expected to be badgered at every stage, and, as I have observed Mr. Churchill's actions in the British house, he spends so many hours in the house in the course of a week and the rest of his time is given to urgent matters relating to the war itself. What we have to consider here may be relatively small, but the principles at stake are the same, and there is like necessity for the Prime Minister and his colleagues to take up matters that are pressing in relation to the war. As far as I am concerned, if I can prevent it, and having regard to the responsibility I have to the Canadian people, I shall not allow hon. gentlemen opposite to break down myself or other members of the administration by forcing us at a pace which is absolutely unreasonable in the light of the circumstances of to-day and the responsibilities devolving on the members of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask one question? The Prime Minister spoke of consideration being extended to the administration. May I ask him, in all seriousness, whether during the sessions of 1940, 1941, 1942 and since, there has not been extended to him and his administration, every consideration having regard to the circumstances which have surrounded us? At any rate, that was my aim throughout that time, and the same is true to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will leave it to every hon. member and every citizen of the country to judge for himself how much cooperation this government has had from hon. gentlemen opposite during this past year and how much we are having at the present time. How much have they cooperated with us in this effort? In my public appeal I expressed the hope that men of all parties—and my hon. friend belongs to one—would play their part in supporting us in that regard. I cannot quite distinguish the words of the hon. member opposite. I hope he will excuse me, but there is so much noise in the house that I cannot catch what he is saying.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am telling the Prime Minister, do not let the little man from Vancouver, sitting behind, interrupt the proceedings.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think, Mr. Chairman, it is a fortunate thing that we have a certain amount of humour in the midst of our discussions. I do not think any of us could live long without a certain amount of that, but there are times and places for all things, and I do say that this particular session calls for the consideration of the most serious situation that Canada has been faced with, and there is something besides levity that should govern the house at this time. If the house is of the opinion that there should not be further questioning of General McNaughton, and if to-morrow I find it is inadvisable for me, with the responsibilities I have, to go on with the debate, I shall ask that the house adjourn until Monday. On the other hand, if it is desired that General McNaughton be further questioned by hon. members, then I would say, let us continue with that to-morrow.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, might I have the ear of the house for a few moments on this twenty-third day of November, 1944? I have been most appreciative of the kindness extended to me by members on all sides of the house. Sometimes discussion has been heated on both sides but no rancor has been left. Since I have been in politics I have been a Liberal and have been a true supporter of the present Prime Minister. I remember having stood alone in fighting the social legislation of Mr. Bennett. I carried on a campaign with Mr. Hepburn and with some of the present cabinet ministers in thirty-five counties of Ontario, and I spoke at the nomination of another minister and took part in the campaign. I did all that for the Liberal party because I believed in the Liberal party as led by the Prime Minister

I have been brought up in the respect and love of Liberal principles and traditions, and when I was young I learned English in the speeches made by great Liberal leaders of Ontario. Those speeches were translated into French as brain food in times of election. Since the beginning of the war I have done my best for the soldiers of my constituency and for some others even in this city of Ottawa. I have looked after the welfare of soldiers who, in virtue of the law, had the right to ask for postponement. Then I tried, and I succeeded, in having amendments to the national war service regulations and so on.

I regret that this session has been called to give major importance to a minor quantity. At the same time I congratulate the present Minister of National Defence upon his successful day. He has answered questions very well.

I regret very much that now it is impossible for me to agree with the policies of the government, for several reasons which I will give in due course. I have the most pleasant recollections of my dealings with the Prime Minister and most of his present colleagues, and I wish them the best of health and success in life. But when I have to make a choice between my constituents and the present government, I cannot hesitate; I stand by the people of my constituency, and this is my last word. Therefore, sir, I regret very much to have to cross the floor of the house right now.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before we adjourn, a few moments ago the leader of the opposition said that perhaps after all we had not got very much out of to-day's questions and answers, and I think that is not wholly untrue. Many or at least several of the questions which have a vital bearing on these matters have remained unanswered, because the minister stated, and I think quite properly, that he could not give that information in public session. I believe that every scrap of information we can get should be obtained in public session, but where the information is of such a nature that it might give some aid or comfort to the enemy I think it is the duty of members of this house, as representing the citizens of this country and as patriotic citizens themselves, to bow to the decision of the Minister of National Defence. I am strongly of the opinion that we should have this information, for without it we do not know what will be the condition of the reinforcement pools overseas from time to time, and we do not know actually what the situation is with regard to expected casualties. Therefore we cannot judge whether this order in council gives sufficient power to the minister to do all that is necessary in order to protect the men overseas. Therefore I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we ought to try to get all the information that will guide us, and since the minister could not give the information that was desired to-day in public, in some particulars, and stated that he was ready to give that information in private session, that the suggestion of the Prime Minister should be followed and that to-morrow we should get that information in confidence.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is after eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I do not want to say very much at this time, but I should like to say a word with respect to what the Prime Minister said a few moments ago. Since the beginning of this session I have made a valiant effort to keep our position on the highest possible plane, and I think most hon. members will say that I have succeeded. I am sorry that the Prime Minister took the time of the house to make charges in regard to lack of cooperation and so on, because it seems to me that at this time we should not get down to that sort of thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was my hon. friend who raised the question.

Mr. GRAYDON: If at this stage the Prime Minister will just try to follow my example I think we shall all get along very much better. I do not wish to have these charges stand as though they were of the kind that I should not or could not answer. I only want to leave that thought with the house, because I believe we should do our utmost to keep this discussion on a very high plane.

With respect to the question of a secret session to-morrow, I do not know why the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party and the government are so anxious to get us into a secret session. If we adopt that suggestion people will say, "Well, you must have some queer motive in taking that position." We do not want to sit in secret at all this session. See what would have happened to-day if we had carried on as was suggested in the beginning. I do not desire to be harsh with General McNaughton, but of course he did suggest a great many things that he could tell us if we were meeting in secret. I think, however, we have had the whole thing to-day, and scarcely any of it has centred around a single matter of security. I believe that justifies the stand I took in this connection.

I should like to say to the Prime Minister that I want to reserve my judgment with respect to the sitting to-morrow. We consented to General McNaughton coming in to-day under a very definite arrangement, as we thought. It is not our desire to prevent discussion or in any way to hinder the giving of information, but now it is suggested that we should meet to-morrow with the press excluded and the galleries cleared, and have a lot of talk about which the country will never know. I do not think we should have a discussion of that kind. It seems to me we can get in this house enough information that will not provide comfort to the enemy to enable us to determine the course of action we should take. I am very honest and sincere in my plea on that score, so that I would suggest that the Prime Minister adopt this course. I believe we are through with General McNaughton at the moment; I do not think there is anything more we need to elicit from him. I am prepared to have the answers to those questions that remain unanswered for reasons of security tabled in the house in a secret way. That will take care of the whole matter; General McNaughton will leave the house to-night and the job will be done. I offer that suggestion to the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that he speaks always as though he and his party were the only ones to be considered in the matter of getting information. I have not been pressing for a secret session, nor has General McNaughton. He has repeatedly said that there is information he would be glad to give but that he cannot give it except in a secret session of the house. And may I add that our discussion on the matter of the secret session I think took place before General McNaughton came into the chamber at all, so that I do not believe he was aware of the fact that there had been any discussion about a secret session. But my hon. friends of the C.C.F. would have the strongest reason in the world to complain about myself and the government if we refused to allow their group to get all the information they felt it was essential to have in arriving at a decision. The same thing would apply to my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party. He and the members of his party are entitled to the information which they may wish to have, and if I am not mistaken he also expressed a desire to get full information, some of which cannot be given in public.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If he Prime Minister would permit a question, is there any reason why the leaders of the groups or parties should not approach General McNaughton in his office and obtain any information they deem necessary for their guidance.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What good would that do the rest of us?

Mr. BLACKMORE: My question was addressed to the Prime Minister.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): All right, but after he answers I will ask a question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My answer is that every member of this House of Commons is entitled to information that is of general interest and concern. My hon. friend and myself have no rights over other hon. members in that regard. As leaders we have additional responsibilities, but our rights are not any greater than those of members of the house generally.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this eliminates the reason for a secret session. The members of this house, through their leaders or in groups, can obtain the information they need for their guidance by going to the minister himself. If that is not so, we may need a secret session, but my understanding is that this can be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think anyone has the right to assume that he has the privilege of getting information for himself or his group, which information is not available at the same time and in the same way to everybody. That is I think a sound position. There may be occasions where the leaders will have to confer together as to a course that may be most advisable, and when it comes to the giving of information that relates to war there may be some things that as Prime Minister it will be my duty to communicate to the other leaders which in a certain situation I think would help in the procedure of the house and in the guiding of the house in the matter of the way in which debate should be conducted.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then there would be no way in which the members of the house could obtain that information except through a secret session. Is that right?

Mr. HOMUTH: What about the public of Canada?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am asking a question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would say this: In the British parliament they have had something like 120 secret sessions during this war. These secret sessions were held in order that hon. members of the House of Commons at Westminster might get information which was of importance to them, but which could not be imparted to them in public. They have not thought in Britain, which is the home of freedom if there ever was a home of freedom, that the public were being denied something they were entitled to possess, because their representatives in parliament were being given very secret information which would help them and help the country at a time of war. There is nothing that I can see that is inimical in a secret session. I am not going to demand a secret session, but I will as leader of this house, if a large proportion of hon. members of the house wish anything of the kind, not impede them. I would leave it to the house to say whether or not we should have a secret session.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did the Prime Minister say that it was the intention of the government to sit only in the afternoon to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I said was this, that having the responsibility that I have had and have at the present time, if after sitting up after midnight to-night and for a good many nights I feel that to-morrow I should not make a statement in this house which would begin a most important debate, a debate which will determine whether this government is to continue in office or be replaced by another, I would not wish to start that debate to-morrow afternoon. I may feel very differently in the morning. I may decide it is not necessary to say more than a few words; but if my hon. friend insists on my proceeding when the house meets, with opening the debate, and I feel that I cannot do justice to the government or to myself and to the responsibility I have, I will ask the house to allow me to adjourn the debate until the following week. What I would suggest as an alternative and what I think would be preferable in every way would be that General McNaughton's examination or questioning might be continued to-morrow afternoon in open session, because some have not received all the desired information, and if the members wish to have a period of secret session then a part of to-morrow could be taken up in a secret session and we could adjourn at six o'clock and begin the debate on Monday.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is such a reasonable suggestion I do not think anybody would want to object to it. We are anxious that this should not be turned into a lengthy debate and that General McNaughton not be kept here for any great length of time. The Prime Minister will understand that. I think there can be no objection to the suggestion except that the Prime Minister had better be on the lookout for another suggestion with respect to secret sessions because I am afraid it will be opposed strenuously over here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all right. It is understood that to-morrow we shall continue with General McNaughton's answers to further questions. He will be ready to make further answers. If the house decides to do so, some information may be given in a secret session but in any event we shall sit only until six o'clock.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is definitely understood that the debate with respect to the motion the Prime Minister has on the Votes and Proceedings will go on at three o'clock on Monday regardless of what happens to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On Monday, yes. May I thank my hon. friend for his accommodation.

May I, before we close, clear up one point about correspondence that was raised. I have asked the Clerk with reference to what the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) said as to his having tabled a communication and of its having been sent back to him the next day by the Clerk. I asked the Clerk as to the circumstances, and he has given me the following statement which I think will be of interest to all hon. members:

> The well-known rule is that when a private member quotes a private letter dealing with a public matter he is bound to lay it on the table; and when debate is over the clerk returns the letter because it is not a parliamentary paper.

The Clerk informs me that he returned the hon. member's letter because the debate was finished. He has also directed my attention to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure which has the following paragraph at page 245:

> Papers are frequently referred to in debate which the rules of debate require should be laid on the table or which a minister of the crown or some member of the house desires should be laid upon the table for general information. Such papers form no part of the records of the house but are retained in the custody of the Clerk of the house for the purposes indicated and returned to the proper authorities afterwards.

I think that may clear up the point raised.

There is just one other matter to which I wish to refer. It is regarding my motion for Monday. In the printing of the Votes and Proceedings of to-day there was a misprint as they were issued in the first instance. The motion appeared:

The Prime Minister—On Friday next—That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war.

Through some error the word "effort" was not printed in the first copies. I am afraid these copies were distributed and were used by the press. The omission was corrected in a subsequent issue. The Votes and Proceedings as I have them here and as they were reprinted when the error was discovered makes it clear that the resolution is:

That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Clerk was good enough to correct it for me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And then there is the resolution about sitting on Saturday.

Mr. COLDWELL: On the point of order raised by the Prime Minister, may I say that we find it sometimes very difficult to follow these rules. If I turn to the second edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms at page 104 and I read a citation from May 316 I find the following:

It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the house, if it can be done without injury to the public interest. The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda. On the 18th May, 1865, the attorney-general, on being asked by Mr. Ferrard if he would lay upon the table a written statement and a letter to which he had referred on a previous day, in assuming a question relative to the Leeds Bankruptcy Court, replied that he had made a statement to the House upon his own responsibility, and that the documents he had referred to being private, he could not lay them upon the table. Lord Robert Cecil contended that the papers, having been cited, should be produced; but the Speaker declared that this rule applied to public documents only.

This was a private document to which my hon. friend referred. Apparently in the books you can find citations to prove anything.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Friday, November 24, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, from one of the last seats in the last row I rise to a question of privilege. I have been described by the press as an independent. An independent I have been during my whole political career. Saturday of next week will mark the twentieth anniversary of my election to the House of Commons for the county of Témiscouata, which I still represent. Sir, I have not changed. I am still a Liberal, as I have always been.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish the hon. member would come to his question of privilege. My understanding was that yesterday he explained his position. Now he is repeating it. I would ask the hon. member to state his question of privilege.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. But yesterday I only expressed my regret at leaving my seat. Now I am saying why I am here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no question of privilege in that.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid that is hardly a question of privilege.

Mr. POULIOT: Then if you will permit me, sir, I will go further and cite a precedent; it was when the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) was permitted to give his reasons for leaving the Conservative party some years ago. On that occasion he was listened to by the Chair. Now, sir, my point is that my Liberalism is a very definite doctrine, which may be entirely different from so-called Liberal policies.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is himself a student of parliamentary procedure, and he knows that what he now states, while it may be a matter for explanation to the house on another occasion, is not a question of privilege.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I will give it to the press, if they will take it.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. LaCROIX

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): I desire to state before this house that I am leaving the government side, where I have always sat while preserving my independence of judgment and action to take a seat on the opposition side where I will continue to maintain the same attitude.

An hon. MEMBER: Any more?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR RESCISSION OF ORDER PASSED ON JULY 24, 1944, FOR SATURDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the order passed on July 24, 1944, under which the house was allowed to sit on Saturday until the end of the present session, be rescinded, and that when the house rises on Friday, November 24, and every Friday thereafter, until the end of the session, it shall stand adjourned until the following Monday in accordance with standing order No. 2.

Motion agreed to.

THE MINISTRY

REPORTED RESIGNATION OF HON. C. G. POWER—STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention just one matter to the house by way of information. Some hon. members have asked me if the report in the press that the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) has tendered his resignation is correct and if the resignation has been accepted. I may say that the minister has tendered to me his resignation, but thus far I have not advised His Excellency that I think the resignation should be accepted. I wish further to consider the matter carefully.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if there has been any correspondence between the minister he mentions and himself in connection with this matter and, if so, will it be tabled in the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It all depends upon what is meant by "correspondence". There should be two letters to have correspondence, and so far there has been only one. Should there be correspondence to table I shall see that it is tabled.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would not like to see the Prime Minister limited. If he thinks the letter he has received from the minister should be tabled, we shall be glad to receive it even before he makes his reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend speaks about a letter that should be tabled. I have no letter that should be tabled because I have not as yet advised His Excellency the Governor General that the resignation of the minister should be accepted.

CANADIAN FORCES

PETITIONS WITH RESPECT TO APPLICATION OF N.R.M.A. ACT

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present to the House of Commons and parliament assembled a petition, the prayer of which humbly requests that the draftee forces shall be at once dispatched overseas to the aid of our men now fighting at the front. This is signed by H. C. Baillie and many others.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (Lambton West): I wish to lay on the table a petition signed by Neil McLeod of Sarnia and several hundred others praying that full effect be given to what is commonly known as bill No. 80.

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a similar petition signed by several hundred persons requesting that bill No. 80 be implemented at once in order that the lives of our men overseas may be saved and reinforcements given to our troops.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): I have a similar petition from the constituency of Rosedale signed by approximately two hundred persons, and another from the constituency of Spadina bearing approximately sixty names.

METHOD OF RAISING MEN FOR SERVICE OVERSEAS—REFERENCE TO PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON JULY 22, 1942

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When the Prime Minister speaks on his substantive motion on Monday next, notice of which is now on the order paper, I should like him to make clear a matter which is troubling me. At the risk of taking some time to explain the position I would direct his attention to page 4564 of the House of Commons Hansard of July 22, 1942. At that time the mobilization bill was under discussion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wonder if the hon. member could give me some idea as to the relevancy of the statement he intends to make?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have to lay the foundation. This is not intended in the slightest degree to embarrass the Prime Minister or anyone else.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, it is not, and I give my word of honour on that. On that day, in answer to a question asked by the then hon. member for Weyburn, Mr. Douglas, the Prime Minister said:

When the government decides that it is necessary and advisable to resort to conscription as a method of raising men for service overseas, an order in council will be passed dealing with members of the forces as a whole.

I am sure my right hon. friend will remember that.

It will not be a matter of passing a series of orders in council—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have I permission to go on?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am listening.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I continue:

—but one order in council will cover the entire force.

That is the basis of my question. In studying order in council 8891 which was laid on the table of parliament yesterday—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understand what the hon. member is now saying, he is really anticipating a speech which the Prime Minister may make and of which he is suggesting a text.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Quite the contrary, Your Honour. What I desire to know in brief is if there is to be only that order in council passed in order to give effect to what the Prime Minister said on July 22, 1942, or will it be necessary to pass subsequent orders in council having regard to the fact that the number ordered to be mobilized under this order in council is limited to 16,000.

Upon the passing of this order in council will these men be general service men from now on, or are they still to be home army men, and when will the transition period be passed? I think we should have some clarification of this position, because it is not clear in the order in council. I believe I am making a reasonable request. I think I have carried out my undertaking that there would be nothing controversial about this question. I am simply asking for an interpretation which the country wants to have.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I thank my hon. friend for giving me notice to-day of the question which he would like me to answer on Monday next. I shall read carefully in Hansard what he has said and will make as precise an answer as it is possible for me to make.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all I ask.

REINFORCEMENTS—QUESTIONING OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

(Hon. A. G. L. McNaughton, Minister of National Defence, having again appeared before the house):

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I do not want General McNaughton to believe that I am lacking in respect for him in any way. I would recall that on February 24, 1943, I was the one who suggested his promotion to full generalship. I did that for one reason, because of what had been said by the Prime Minister on November 14, 1941. I quote from page 4430 of Hansard of November 14, 1941, where the Prime Minister is reported as follows:

The general's last words to me were that I could depend upon it that he would take care to see that lives were not needlessly sacrificed. I remember those words very distinctly, that he as commander of the Canadian forces would take great care to see that lives were not needlessly sacrificed.

That is the action of a great man, that a commander in the field should not want to waste human lives. He knows the value of human life.

There is another thing that I would ask the general, and it is this, not to mention national unity in connection with conscription. I will qualify what I have said. It has been repeated over and over again that if conscription was not imposed in this country it was precisely to preserve national unity. What was meant by national unity? What was meant was that the province of Quebec was against conscription for overseas, and therefore conscription for overseas service should not be enforced?

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that we did not have from the very beginning of the war a well-balanced conscription, but a one-sided conscription. I regret very much the action of the Department of National Defence which has given emblems for service only to those who have volunteered, thereby indicating that all the others who were contributing to the war effort in other ways were slackers just because they had not enlisted in the army. That is a great mistake which was made at first.

Another mistake was to be afraid of the word "conscription". I prepared an article telling the draftees who were working in industries essential to the war effort what they had to do. That article was based on the regulations. But what did the director of mobilization say to me? He said: "The article is all right except that you call the draftees conscripts. They are not conscripts; they are mobilized." I have never played with words, sir, and I can never agree to that.

What I mean with regard to the disastrous effect of what has been said throughout Canada regarding conscription and national unity is this: The province of Quebec is not at all opposed to a well-balanced conscription where the value of the services of every man who is working in essential industry is recognized as a help to the war effort.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understand the procedure that is to be followed to-day, questions are to be asked of General McNaughton. So far the hon. member for Temiscouata is making a speech which in my judgment would be more relevant when the motion standing in the name of the Prime Minister is being discussed on Monday. The procedure that has been adopted for yesterday and to-day was to enable members who desired information to question General McNaughton. Questions and answers are in order.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I shall come in just a few minutes to the conclusion of what I have to say. When on the one hand conscription is described as a good thing, and on the other hand the province of Quebec is described as opposed to conscription, and when what is described as a good thing is not imposed in this country on account of the opposition in Quebec, that is a great mistake which results in the province of Quebec being misjudged throughout the world. I hope that in the future there will be no politics mixed up with this question. I ask the general also not to play politics, and I know that he will not, because as a soldier he has gained a very high reputation indeed. I hope with all my heart that politics will be left entirely aside, and I would also ask the general to do something in his own department. The Canadian Army has been divided into three, following the suggestions made by the brass hats, who at one time I was not even allowed to refer to as pompous. I would ask the general to start a reform in the Department of National Defence to separate the chaff from the good wheat, which will be to the great benefit of this country. I would ask him to make a reform in his department, particularly in the medical corps, so that men who are unfit will not be kept in the army just to make the number greater. That is a great mistake. These men may be able to do very useful service, more useful service outside of the army than in it, and I hope that a free hand will be given in that matter.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Now I want to make a request of the government. While I do not agree with their conscription policy, which was changed between four o'clock the day before yesterday and three o'clock yesterday, although no special danger during that short interval was indicated to us to account for the change, I hope, sir, that the present Minister of National Defence will be given a free hand to make in his department, in a spirit of justice, the reforms which have been so urgently needed since his predecessor took charge of the department, and in that he can rely on my full support.

Mr. MAYHEW: I would like to direct a question to General McNaughton. In this morning's Ottawa Journal the head line is "Volunteers to be Sent First—Use Zombies only to meet reinforcement deficiency." Yesterday when the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) was questioning the general he said, at page 6560 of Hansard:

> Before I conclude may I say, without wishing to worry General McNaughton, because I know he must be weary, that there is one point which is still not clear to me, and that is this. No matter how many men you get from general service, no matter how many men you get from the young men who are coming of age, eighteen years and eighteen and one-half years, are the 16,000 trained men in the N.R.M.A. to go overseas whether they volunteer or not?

The answer was definite: "The answer is, yes." There is a difference of opinion apparently between the head line in this paper and the answer that was given here. My question is this. Regardless of how many men you get from general service or how many volunteer, do you still intend to send over 5,000 in December, 5,000 in January and 2,000 each month thereafter until the full complement of 16,000 shall have been sent? In other words, are these from the N.R.M.A. to be extra to those that you recruit in the ordinary way?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I thank the hon. member for bringing that point to attention. Not only was it obscured in the press accounts, but there were certain other obscurities, for which I take full responsibility. Through my inexperience in parliamentary procedure I did not always convey what I intended. I should like, therefore, Mr. Speaker, to have the privilege of reading a short statement which I have made up following an analysis of the press reports. In reports which have appeared in the press there appears to be some confusion about one or two points which arose in a discussion yesterday, and I should like to make a brief statement to clear up those points.

I expressed a strong preference for our traditional voluntary system, and also my hope that it might not be necessary to use to the full extent the powers given to the Minister of National Defence in the order in council tabled yesterday. In some quarters my remarks have been interpreted as an intention on my part to scrape up men and use our general service men and to use them first even if they are not as well trained as N.R.M.A. men. That is not so. What I desired to convey was that I hoped trained N.R.M.A. men would volunteer for general service soon enough and in large enough numbers that it would not be necessary to send them overseas by compulsion. What I wish to make clear is that if adequately trained men do not volunteer in sufficient numbers the required numbers will be made up from the best-trained men we have. These will be detailed for service overseas under the order in council.

While the order in council extends the locality of service of all N.R.M.A. personnel, the maximum number the Minister of National Defence is authorized by the present order to dispatch overseas is 16,000. This power will be used to the extent that adequately trained men, whether now in the N.R.M.A. or not, do not come forward as volunteers sufficiently rapidly to meet the numbers required. The maximum was fixed at 16,000 in order to provide adequate reserves. In addition to giving the reserves required by the time they are required, these numbers will also enable increased periods of rest for individuals and will provide the increased number needed to compensate for the men given leave to Canada as these proposals develop.

I can now give the house the composition generally of the first 10,000 of the additional reinforcements being dispatched in December and January to which I referred yesterday: 7,500 are fully trained infantry; 2,500 are well advanced in infantry training, and this training will be completed on arrival in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered the question of the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Mayhew); and I, too, am in the dark as to just what is to be the procedure. A straight answer to the question of that hon. member would relieve the minds of many of us.

Mr. MAYHEW: I think we have come to the time when questions should be answered so that we can really understand. That question has not been answered. The point is, there is authorization for 16,000 to go over. Is that the total number of men who will be sent over between now and May? I think we should know whether it is or not. If it is, I for one would not be satisfied.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The 16,000 referred to are in addition to the presently-planned movements which are now being carried out.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not yet clear, Mr. Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacNICOL: Hon. members may laugh if they like. We are not all as smart as some of the other fellows are. What I should like to know is what was asked by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C.: are the 16,000 to be sent now?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We have a very considerable movement which was arranged and in full swing before yesterday. Since yesterday another planned movement of a total of 16,000 has been added to these movements. The planned movement—that is, the additional planned movement—comprises 5,000 in the month of December, 5,000 in the month of January, and 2,000 in each of the three succeeding months.

Mr. MacNICOL: The 16,000 who are to go in December, January and the succeeding three months are to be taken out of the N.R.M.A.?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is right, sir. There will be included a few other personnel, naturally, because the officers are not in that category. There are officers and non-commissioned officers who are general service and must go with them.

Mr. CLEAVER: Is General McNaughton at liberty to disclose in public session the total number of reinforcements which will be added to the reinforcement pool between now and the end of next March?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That information is something which I cannot give in open session.

Mr. JOHNSTON: (Bow River): I understand now that the 16,000 will be called up under this special order in council from N.R.M.A. personnel. I can quite see, if there were to be total conscription of all N.R.M.A. men, where officers would be authorized to pick certain individuals for the draft; but I am at a loss to know, and I should like the general to explain, what method is to be used to get these 16,000 from the N.R.M.A. It is general knowledge that in the past some of the methods used to get N.R.M.A. recruits to volunteer were not as they should have been. I was against any coercion or compulsion in that regard, and I am against that method now; I want to know how the general proposes to get these 16,000 out of the N.R.M.A. without conscripting "the whole works."

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The units to comprise the first 10,000 of the N.R.M.A. for dispatch, as I indicated earlier, were selected this morning. Those units will shortly be in process of moving to concentration areas in eastern Canada. The men who wish to volunteer will be given every opportunity to do so. The others, the whole units including those men, will be dispatched on the dates which at the present time are being arranged.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That does not answer my question, if the general will pardon me for saying so. I wish to know the method used in making that selection. It makes a lot of difference.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The first consideration, the thing that stood uppermost in the minds of myself and the staff who were assisting me in the matter, is that we should get men who were as fully trained in infantry as possible. We have taken the best infantry soldiers we could get in the time available between now and the date of the sailing of the ships.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Would that depend, then, on the officer in command of that certain section? He can choose any man he desires. There may be two who are equally trained and he may desire to take one and leave the other. That would be a fair conclusion to come to. Would that be the situation?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: If, in the opinion of the officer in charge, a man were not up to the standard of training which we have laid down that man would be struck off strength of the draft, naturally.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That was not my point. Here are two men equally trained under the same officer. Only one is needed. What decision will be made in the choice of that one out of these two men?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: These movements are in essence based on the sending of the best trained personnel we can dispatch up to the numbers for whom we can get transportation. Therefore I do not think there is any invidious discrimination in the choice of individuals.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In my opinion, the method which I believe will be carried out in the selecting of the 16,000 men is not the proper one. It seems to me that there will be more coercion and mistreatment in the choice of the 16,000 than there has been in the past in trying to get national defence men to volunteer. I am against that type of coercion and I can see plainly a great deal of disunity arising from such action. Let me give a vivid illustration. Suppose you have one man in Quebec and another in some other province. No matter which of them is chosen there will be discontent. It is time for us to quit fooling around with the subject. All other parties have the blackest of war records in this regard, and I am proud to say that the Social Credit party is the only one than can stand with its head high.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish to be clear on this point. There are 5,000 men going overseas in December, 5,000 in January and 6,000 later.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is right.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are these men to be volunteers or are they men who will be taken out of N.R.M.A.? As from yesterday, when this order in council went into effect, will the voluntary system be continued, or will there still be N.R.M.A. men shifted to the concentration point ready for overseas? If we are sending over 16,000 under the conditions indicated, 8,000 fully trained, we are told, and 8,000 partly trained at the present time, and who will be fully trained in due course, is it not a fairly good bet that they will all volunteer before they go over? In other words, what you are doing in forcing the voluntary system on men who are actually called for compulsory service. That means, it seems to me, some coercion, the coercion being that they will proceed overseas either as conscripts or as volunteers, and they have the choice right up to the moment they leave as to which they will be. This is a strange way of going about the obtaining of the 16,000 men. I do not know where this is landing the house or the government, and if we are to have compulsion in the sending of men overseas I cannot understand why the government does not go the whole way. Where you have 16,000 who know they are going overseas and who are told that they may still become volunteers, you coerce them into being volunteers. I am not yet clear as to whether the 16,000 who are going are to be men in the numbers of whom are included those who have already been told that they are going from general service. I am not clear on that point, and I believe some other members are in the same position. With regard to the other point, it strikes me as quite evident that men are going to be coerced into volunteering, and that is wrong. Let us be clear about what we are doing.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: May I answer first the hon. gentleman's second question in which he asks whether the 16,000 are included in those now going over, or are additional. This 16,000 which is engaging the attention of the house is in addition to the previous planned movements which include the general service personnel. The 16,000 is a new movement, on top of all other movements, which was initiated yesterday afternoon. The other point I can answer only by saying that under the authority of the order in council, and in order to provide the army in the field with the additional trained infantry reinforcements which are required in support of their operations, we are taking the 16,000 from trained infantry in this country and dispatching them. That personnel may, if they wish, convert to general service, that is, volunteer before they go.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are they not told that if they do not volunteer they will get no rehabilitation grant, and is not each commanding officer instructed to tell them that individually?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No, sir.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the information I have, that orders went out from your department to the D.O.C. of every district, that the commanding officer of every unit shall interview each individual personally, not through N.C.O.'s or otherwise, and tell them among other things that if they do not volunteer there will be no rehabilitation grant. That is the information I have from my part of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want an answer from the hon. member for Vancouver Centre but from General McNaughton.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That story is a complete untruth.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Call it what you like, but I asked General McNaughton a question and I do not want an answer from a flannel-mouth like the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): On a point of order, the hon. gentleman has no right to call any minister a flannel-mouth.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will substitute another designation; I will substitute the word "bluffer."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am going to ignore the observations of the hon. member, but I would say—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I rise to a point of order. We are questioning General McNaughton here and my question is directed to him. I want an answer from him.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have been responsible for the preparation of the rehabilitation legislation for the last five years. I am conversant with it and I should have the right to answer any question directed to the subject of rehabilitation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I stand by my point of order. I asked General McNaughton a question with respect to directions given through the Department of National Defence to officers commanding, and irrespective of what the legislation is, or of any minister in charge of it, I want to know whether the information I have is correct. I believe it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is not correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is being stated in the province of New Brunswick that these men are to be interviewed by the officer commanding in every unit and he is to tell them that if they do not volunteer they will not get any rehabilitation. I will not be howled down by any flannel-mouths or by anybody else.

Mr. SPEAKER: On the point of order, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) asked a question of General McNaughton and the Minister of Veterans' Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) proposes to answer. In the course of this whole discussion yesterday and to-day there have been questions asked of General McNaughton with which naturally he was not conversant and they have been answered by the Prime Minister and others. I see no objection to an answer being given to satisfy the questioner with the true facts of the case if they lie within the office of the department of the minister who now proposes to answer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With great respect, Mr. Speaker, General McNaughton has not said that he is not in a position to answer. If he says he is not in a position to answer, or if he says that the instructions were not sent out, that is a complete answer to my question. I want the information; I want it from General McNaughton because it is pertinent to officers of his department, not to the rehabilitation department. I am told that the D.O.C. office in Saint John has sent out instructions to commanding officers of every unit in New Brunswick that they are to interview these men personally, ask them to go voluntarily, and if they do not go voluntarily the officers are to tell them that they are not to get any rehabilitation grants. Surely that is within the purview of General McNaughton as Minister of National Defence. I leave myself in the judgment of the country. The country wants to know about this.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has raised a question with regard to the rights of any member in this house to answer questions. Yesterday questions were asked which the former Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) undertook to reply to because he was conversant with them. I could not deny the right of any hon. member of the house to reply to any question. If General McNaughton wishes to reply he may do so; but if any other hon. member who has an answer to the question wishes to give the answer he may do so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How could any minister other than the Minister of National Defence answer with respect—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know how.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How can he answer a question when the officers are not in his department? It is not suggested that any instructions have been given by him. According to the information I have they were given by the Department of National Defence. What knowledge could the Minister of Veterans' Affairs have of those instructions?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the Minister of Veterans' Affairs proposes to answer the question that the hon. member has asked, and does not satisfactorily answer it, the hon. member for York-Sunbury would then have the right to ask for an answer to his question; meanwhile I cannot deprive anyone of the right to answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I suggest that there are really two questions involved in what the hon. member for York-Sunbury has just said. The first question is one which pertains directly to the Department of National Defence; and as he said, the Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, should and will, I believe, answer in the name of the department. But to say "yes" or "no" to a statement as to what is correct or not does not meet the other question which will be in the minds of hon. members of the house and others as to whether the existing legislation would make possible any such instructions by an officer. The Minister of Veterans' Affairs is more familiar with that legislation, I should think, than anyone else, and he should be permitted to make a supplementary statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With your permission, sir, I am glad that the Prime Minister has clarified the position with respect to the first portion of the question. Certainly only the Minister of National Defence could answer that part of the question with respect to the proposal that I suggest has been made. I never asserted that that was the law or that they were within their rights in doing it. What I am asserting is this, that the information which reaches me is that those commanding officers have been instructed by national defence to interview these men and tell them this. Whether it is true or not is another matter, but I will emphasize the fact that this is a form of cruel duress to make these men volunteer.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would say to the hon. member he can be quite certain that no instructions of that sort would ever have been issued.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "Would ever have been issued."

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Or has ever been issued. If he is aware of such an order being issued I should like it brought to my attention.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will tell the minister that a high ranking officer, and I am not going to name him—

An hon. MEMBER: No?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I am not going to name him because he would be crucified by this government; make no mistake about that. I want the minister to understand this, that any man who talks to me talks at great peril to his personal position. Make no mistake about that. They are afraid to talk to me, General McNaughton, to give me factual information because they do not know what the gestapo might retaliate upon them. That is the situation in this country to-day. Private members of the forces are afraid to give me information. I hold in my hand information from an airman. He is in the gallery this afternoon. I do not know whether to produce it here or not, or to ask the question. I know that if I gave the name of the officer who gave me this information and told me that he had it from headquarters, he would be crucified by this government. He would be driven out of the service. That is the type of government we have in national defence under present conditions.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It has been denied.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has not been denied. He said it had not been authorized and I accept his word.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I add a supplementary word to the answer given by the Minister of National Defence? The suggestion advanced by the hon. member for York-Sunbury is an entirely impossible one, because this parliament has placed legislation upon the statute books of Canada and every hon. member, even the hon. member for York-Sunbury, should be aware of the nature of that legislation. The legislation provides that all rehabilitation benefits which we have made possible by order in council or by statute apply to those who have been called up as well as to the men who have volunteered, with one exception, the rates of benefits under the War Services Grant Act passed during the present session. Under that act the rates of benefits of men overseas is more extensive than for those doing service at home. There will not be the slightest discrimination against any member of the N.R.M.A. who goes overseas, whether by compulsion or by voluntary effort, in regard to any single benefit provided by this parliament.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): On this same point, I hold in my hand a speech broadcast by the Prime Minister recently. It dealt with this matter. He stated as follows:

> We shall make every effort to have all the draftees told individually of the need for their services. We shall also make every effort to have each draftee told individually the practical benefits to his own future of becoming a volunteer and enjoying full opportunities for successful reestablishment in civil life. In this we shall follow the principle set forth by General McNaughton.

I think this must convey the impression that they are going to have—

Mr. CLEAVER: I yielded the floor to my hon. friend as I thought he had a question to ask of General McNaughton.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): May I finish my point, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. CLEAVER: I do not yield the floor under such circumstances. Are you at liberty, General McNaughton, to disclose in public session the authorized numerical strength of the Canadian army overseas?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I say to the hon. member that is information I could not possibly give in open session.

Mr. CLEAVER: Would you care to disclose the percentage of infantry of the authorized overseas army?

Mr. ROWE: It looks like a request for a secret session.

Mr. CLEAVER: If you do not want any information I do. I know what some hon. members will say when the present session is over.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would have to give the hon. member information which I do not think is really very satisfactory. I will state that the infantry as compared with the total is, in round numbers, one-fifth.

Mr. CLEAVER: General McNaughton, I understood distinctly from your remarks yesterday, that the only part of the army in respect of which reinforcements have been found inadequate is the infantry; is that correct?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is absolutely correct.

Mr. CLEAVER: Are you free to disclose in public session the percentage by which the actual casualties have exceeded the projected or forecast casualties, in regard to infantry?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would not feel it right to give that information.

Mr. CLEAVER: Are the casualties for the other branches of the army—and I am referring to all branches of the army—greater or fewer than those forecast?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I think I had better summarize the whole situation. In our experience in operations in Italy and in northwest Europe since D-day the total casualties which have occurred are substantially the same numbers as were estimated. That covers all arms and all services. In the infantry the casualties were substantially in excess of the estimates in the forecast which was given. In all other arms of the services they were very materially less.

Mr. CLEAVER: Taking into consideration the percentage which the infantry bears to the total strength, and taking into consideration the other two points you have just mentioned, what do you say as to the present over-all strength of the reinforcement pool overseas? Is it equal to or greater than that forecast?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I must confess I am somewhat confused with the length of that question.

Mr. CLEAVER: Then I shall put one other question: Have your present forecasts as to casualties taken into full consideration the errors which have occurred in the past, in regard to underestimation of infantry casualties?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The revised wastage rates on which we are working have taken full account of the experience in Italy and in northwestern Europe since D-day. Our forecasts are projected on the basis of the higher rates which we found from experience unfortunately to be necessary with the infantry, and the lower rates for all other arms of the services.

Mr. CLEAVER: A final question—and perhaps an unnecessary one—but in view of the great misunderstanding which some parts of our Canadian press are creating in the public mind I am going to ask it anyway. In the light of all the facts will the order in council passed yesterday assure reinforcements—adequate reinforcements—and if so, for what period of time?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I should like to say to the house again that with the addition of the dispatch of the 16,000 trained infantry personnel, which was arranged, commencing yesterday, we have met the requests of our military advisers in the field—and with a slight margin over—in order to do those things which I mentioned in the statement I read to the house. That is, we shall be able to provide some additional periods of rest for individuals, and also to compensate for those men who are hoping to be able to withdraw, in order to give them leave in Canada.

Mr. CLEAVER: And for what period of time?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The present figures are forecast to May; and the 16,000 we have brings us up to the full scale considered necessary, as determined by our own officers in the field, and countersigned by the theatre commander.

Mr. CLEAVER: And do you agree in their report?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The officers in question are experienced and thoroughly reliable, or they would not be in the positions they hold. I can say this, that I know personally the officers who have signed this report, and I have every confidence in their judgment.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In view of the statement just given by the Minister of Veterans' Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), I should like to ask the Prime Minister what he meant in his speech of November 8 when, as set out at page 10 of the pamphlet, he is reported to have said:

> We shall also make every effort to have each draftee told individually of the practical benefits to his own future of becoming a volunteer and enjoying the full opportunities for successful reestablishment in civil life. In this we shall follow the principle set forth by General McNaughton.

[Mr. McNaughton.]

There is to me confusion there as between the two statements.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would say I meant exactly what I said.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What does that include? The minister said it does not make any difference at all. He says there is no difference between that received by the man who remains under the N.R.M.A., and that received by the other man under certain circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The statement is that the men will be told exactly what benefits they will be receiving, the same as anyone else.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What advantages?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are taking a particular course of action. He might wish to know just what result that course of action would have in relation to his future, and he would be entitled to be told. That is all the statement I made means. There is no difference between that and any other statement made in this house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If he does not receive special rehabilitation privileges, why that statement by the Prime Minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why should he not be told? Does my hon. friend say that the man should not be told what advantages he will get if he becomes a volunteer?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No, but I am asking what those advantages are. The Minister of Veterans' Affairs led us to believe that under certain circumstances there was not any difference. I am asking the Prime Minister if there is a difference in the two types of service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the minister made it plain that there were certain advantages for the volunteer which did not exist in respect of those under the N.R.M.A. who do not go overseas.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am just trying to find out; I am not objecting to it. But the Minister of Veterans' Affairs did not leave that impression with the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend has any doubt as to who is right or wrong, he may take what I have said, and can count on it.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to ask a question with respect to the point raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I refer to the methods employed to obtain volunteers from the reserve army. May I preface my question by saying that when coming to Ottawa by train I happened to be in a Pullman which had been set apart as a special car for service men. There were only two civilians in it. In it were men from British Columbia and Alberta, some of whom were officers. Some were connected with the reserve army.

Hon. members will appreciate, I am sure, what the discussion was about. During that discussion one of the officers stated that only recently a questionnaire had been sent out to the officers, with the instruction that it was to be presented to the men in the reserve army. The discussion indicated that these men were called before their officers and presented with the questionnaire, on which appeared several questions. I was told what those questions were. My question is this: has that questionnaire been sent out to men in the reserve forces? If so, what were the questions asked and what have been the results?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We have a large reserve army which is quite distinct from the personnel of the N.R.M.A. Was the questionnaire to which the hon. member refers directed to the reserve army or to the N.R.M.A.?

Mr. PERLEY: The home army.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The home army is in two parts.

Mr. PERLEY: The N.R.M.A.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: With the information before me I cannot say whether a questionnaire of that kind has been issued, but I will have inquiries made at our headquarters and the headquarters of the district which might have issued a questionnaire of that sort.

Mr. LOCKHART: I have one or two brief questions to ask arising out of what has been said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the hon. member for Davenport and others. Yesterday the general said, "I am doing everything I can to persuade these men to go active." I hesitate to bring signed statements before the house, but I should like to direct the minister's attention to some questions that have been asked these men which are similar to those which were apparently in the mind of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and perhaps others. These questions have been directed to men who have been called up by selective service, and to my mind they are of a most serious nature. Apparently the officers were lined up in the selective service office room by room. If the first officer could not break down the man, perhaps the next one could. The words which I give are not my own, they are those of a man who has been subjected to this treatment. He said: "I was asked why in h—— I had not enlisted before."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. member is going to make a statement based upon a signed document which he has, he is obliged to present that document to the house so that we may know—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This house has the right to know upon what authority statements are made if some authority is mentioned. If my hon. friend makes a statement on his own responsibility, we are obliged to receive it, but when he says that he has certain signed documents upon which he is going to base his question, when he says that he is going to refer to assertions made in the documents, then he must let this house know whether the person who signed that document is one in whom we could have confidence.

Mr. ROWE: On a point of order, only yesterday the Prime Minister said that unless a member did give the name, he must take full responsibility for the statement he was making. If the hon. member takes full responsibility he does not have to give the name.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But he is not assuming full responsibility.

Mr. LOCKHART: I will take full responsibility for everything I am saying. I say that I am told definitely—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not taking responsibility.

Mr. LOCKHART: I believe that the questions I am going to repeat to General McNaughton have been asked of this man. He was asked why in h—— he had not joined up before. Then he was asked what was wrong, was he afraid of the dark? was he yellow? This man told me in my office that he was prepared to sign an affidavit substantiating those statements if I thought it was necessary. If this thing has been happening in the selective services offices, I want to ask the minister if he will condone such questions being asked of men who are being coerced to go active as has been suggested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The definite instructions which have been issued are to the effect that the matter is to be the subject of considerate explanation to the men. We take the view most strongly that if the duty to the state is properly explained to the men we may rely on getting an affirmative answer that they will volunteer.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I have the minister's assurance that these tactics which have been outlined to me in good faith will not be used in an attempt to get N.R.M.A. men to go active?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I am sure that as soon as the orders are issued they will be carried out, and those orders will be to make this explanation from the point of view I have indicated.

Mr. LOCKHART: I should like to have a more explicit explanation of what is proposed to be done when these men are interviewed. Is there to be any limitation, or is it to be just a pleasant interview?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I can assure the hon. member that nothing of the kind he has indicated would be condoned by any of my officers. If he has specific instances I should like him to let me know of them. However, he must give me the names if I am to get to the bottom of them. If there is any substance in that man's complaint he will receive every justice and rectification. We are the people who want to know about these things.

Mr. BRYCE: Is it the intention of the Department of National Defence under the new regulations to call up men from the farms who have been granted postponements because they are essential to agriculture?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The hon. member will recall that yesterday I stated that we were establishing a reserve list under the N.R.M.A. of persons who might be posted and placed on leave in order to take part in industrial, farm or other activities. It is intended to review the cases of those men individually.

Mr. BRYCE: What is the policy of the Department of National Defence regarding the men in the N.R.M.A. who have been granted spring and fall agricultural leave in order to maintain food production? Will that leave be continued?

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOMUTH: You were not asked the question. I rise to a point of order. The hon. member asked the Minister of National Defence a question and he will expect an answer from the Minister of National Defence and not from the Minister of Labour.

Mr. McLARTY: It is not in his department.

Mr. HOMUTH: The Minister of Labour and his deputy know nothing about it either. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The question was asked of General McNaughton, and not of the Minister of Labour. The Minister of Labour can rise when he is asked to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the question related to the time before the minister was in charge of his department.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the hon. member is asking about the granting of farm leave to men who are in uniform, which is a departmental matter.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I take it that the hon. member's question is related to leave for farm employment to help in food production.

Mr. BRYCE: In the spring and fall.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Two types of situation may arise. The case of the individual who might be wanted back on his own farm or on some other farm will be dealt with on its merits, subject to the condition that the man in question can be spared from his military duties. In other cases a considerable number of men may be required to help in some particular operation, such as the getting in of the tobacco crop this fall, when if the personnel of the army had not been used the harvest would have been lost. We would deal with such cases through our employment companies which are now being set up.

Mr. BRYCE: If N.R.M.A. men who are unfit for overseas service are made available to agriculture, what is the basis on which they will be allowed to return to agriculture?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is a question on which I would take advice from the Minister of Labour.

Mr. BRYCE: The Minister of Labour got up to reply a moment ago, and I want to tell him now that N.R.M.A. men who are essential to agriculture are being recalled from the farm.

Mr. MITCHELL: In replying to the question I will adopt a more dignified attitude than that of the hon. member for Waterloo South.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the constant talk in the chamber it is impossible for me to hear what the Minister of Labour said or what the hon. member for Waterloo South said. Perhaps I may be told what the Minister of Labour said.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will say it again.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour, who knows so little about his own department, has just said that he is going to get up and handle this matter in a much more dignified manner than I would do. I do not think I have been particularly undignified in this house at any time, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark. I myself would be one of the judges of what is dignified, and the Minister of Labour would be a poor one.

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems to be a matter of tit-for-tat, and I hope I shall not be asked to decide on their aptness.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I know something about the dignity of British institutions, and if I remember, last night my hon. friend told an hon. member of this house to go to hell—and got away with it.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I did not last night tell any member of this house to go to hell, even though I might have thought such a thing. What I did say last night in the house, when somebody interjected "Where were you in the last war?" was: Where the hell were you? I ask the Minister of Labour to withdraw his statement that I said any such thing in regard to any member of the house, because I did not say it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the tone of the debate is being raised. If the Minister of Labour wishes to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Selkirk he may do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Might I take a second? I understand from some of my colleagues that there was some uncertainty with reference to the explanation I gave of benefits to members of the N.R.M.A. It is well known to everyone who has studied the legislation that they are not entitled to war service gratuity if they remain in Canada, but if they go on general service either voluntarily or by compulsion they receive the same rates as the volunteers. I want to make that very clear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am obliged to the minister for that information. My terminology was not exact. Then the N.R.M.A. are being told by their officers that if they do not volunteer there will be no war gratuity.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, they are not being told that, but that there will be no war gratuity if they do not go on general service.

Mr. MacINNIS: I would like to ask a few questions of the Minister of National Defence in regard to a point he made yesterday concerning the Canadian employment companies that are to be formed. First I would like to know whether these companies are to be formed of men now enrolled in the N.R.M.A. My understanding at the moment is that they are, but I am not quite clear on that. The minister was speaking of the N.R.M.A. when he mentioned these employment companies. Second, can the minister tell the house how many men will be included in these companies? Third, what will be the nature of the work that these men will be doing?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The hon. member asked me three questions, so far as I could hear them. First, whether these employment companies will be made up of men now in the N.R.M.A.; second, what would be the approximate number, and third, what would be the nature of the work. These employment companies are being set up in order to provide an establishment to take in from the N.R.M.A. personnel in the lower categories, below the categories which can be posted to units of the combatant arms. The number is as yet uncertain, until we have more information as to the analysis of the physical categories of the men in question. About fifteen companies, each of a strength of approximately four hundred, are now being set up. That four hundred is an establishment; the strength will be very much less. As regards the work, I explained in the formal statement I made to the house that it would be these employment companies which we would use to fulfil requests for work to be done which was of national importance, and I indicated, and I think I should repeat, two important safeguards in that matter. The first is that for works outside the Department of National Defence I am in no position to say whether they are of national importance, so that we will look to the Minister of Reconstruction to tell us whether the work in question is something which we should undertake in order to help Canada's effort in the war. Second, I am very much concerned that no labour from our employment companies should be used which competes in any way with workmen who might get work at prevailing rates constituting remunerative employment, and so before we undertake any work we shall ask the Minister of Labour to assure us on that point.

Further, if additional labour should become available in the localities, we will look to the Minister of Labour to tell us so, so that we can withdraw our men and get out of the road. Does that answer the question?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. I was going to ask another question but I believe the minister has answered it. I wanted to know whether these employment companies would be used if other workers were available; that is, particularly on work outside the Department of National Defence itself.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No. I assure the hon. member that that is absolutely not so; and as I say, since I am not as Minister of National Defence in any position to keep track of the labour market, I am looking to the Minister of Labour to safeguard us fully on that point, and, if we start work and additional labour becomes available, to warn us so that we can get out of the road.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is another matter which follows the minister's reference to the point I raised a moment ago. He said that there were a considerable number of men in the N.R.M.A. who were held in the army "in order to ensure"—I am quoting from Hansard, page 6523 "that men returning from overseas shall have first claim on remunerative employment." Can the minister tell the house how many men are in this position or in this category, and are they held in N.R.M.A. solely in order that, when demobilization takes place, they will not be competing with men who are now in the overseas army, upon their return?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: In the statement which I made, fair play on remunerative employment has been promised to the men who are overseas. They should have a preference on employment; they have earned that right, I think the hon. member will agree. They certainly have a prior claim to remunerative jobs over people who have rested in an organization in Canada and have not done the duty to the state which our men overseas have so gallantly performed. It is to implement that proper regard for our men overseas that I made the statement which the hon. member has quoted.

Mr. MacINNIS: I asked if the minister could indicate the number of men who were in this category. According to the figures given by the Prime Minister, there are in the N.R.M.A. at the present time some 68,000, and these have been split up into various categories. The holding of these men referred to in the service for the purpose for which they are held would not, I suppose, be of very much importance, although probably the principle is quite right. But there is another factor which perhaps this is not the time to mention. My understanding is that we are fighting for freedom from fear and freedom from want, and that means freedom of employment, or adequate maintenance whether the employment is there or not. These men, it is expected, are coming back to the same conditions which many of them left. But there is another point which I wished to raise. The minister stated further that the men who have been referred to are those who have been held in N.R.M.A. in order to ensure that men returning fom overseas shall have the first claim on remunerative employment; that they would be put at certain employment, and that the pay would be pay and allowances provided in military regulations. I should like to know if these men are working for private companies who will get the advantage of the additional pay, or where this additional pay will go?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The answer is that if there should be any difference of pay it will go to the credit of the public exchequer.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have one other question for the minister. If my memory serves me aright, when the minister was speaking yesterday he said that the men in the N.R.M.A. were willing to serve overseas but not willing to enlist voluntarily. Has the minister ascertained the reason or reasons for this attitude? Is there any information on that? He mentioned a moment ago that officers were told to explain to these men their duty to the state. Were the officers instructed also to explain to these men the state's duty to them?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It is the responsibility of our officers so to do.

Mr. QUELCH: Is any distinction to be made between men who enlist voluntarily from the N.R.M.A. and those who are sent overseas without volunteering?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would say no. The situation is that in Canada, as soon as a man volunteers, he is given a G.S. badge to wear on his sleeve, the "G.S." standing for "general service". That badge is not worn in Canada by N.R.M.A. personnel who have not volunteered. Overseas we do not wear any badges, and I see no reason for making any distinction once the man is overseas; in fact, I would be most averse to the institution of any distinction, because when a man goes on service we want him to become in all respects a member of the unit to which he is posted. I do not favour any distinction whatever.

Mr. ADAMSON: I was going to ask the minister that.

Mr. QUELCH: What about the individual who returns—?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I have the floor for the moment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member for York-Sunbury has been on his feet a good many times.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I believe I have Mr. Speaker's permission, and I want to ask a question.

Mr. QUELCH: I wish to ask another question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Acadia has the floor. He wishes to ask a question.

Mr. QUELCH: Will General McNaughton explain what will be the standing on his return of a man who was sent overseas without enlisting. Will he be allowed to wear the general service badge on his return?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We are looking some distance ahead. One hopes that the N.R.M.A. business will be out of the road and liquidated. Frankly, however, I have not considered that point.

Mr. QUELCH: Where you take a man from N.R.M.A. and send him overseas and he is wounded, surely he should be entitled to the general service badge on his return, although he did not enlist for overseas service.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The hon. member has posed me a conundrum. I will look into it.

Mr. QUELCH: Will General McNaughton also give us a break-down of the 68,000 in the N.R.M.A., showing the dates on which these men were drafted, the numbers of those who were drafted in 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944, so that we may get an idea of the core of resistance that is in there.

Mr. BROOKS: May I ask that they be given by military districts?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I have not by me figures compiled in that form. I must answer the hon. gentleman's question by referring to the totals for all Canada. In 1941 there were 31,500 enrolments. Owing to conversions to general service, transfers to other services and discharges of men, the 31,500 has decreased since then by 15,000, leaving still on N.R.M.A. strength, of enrolments of 1941, a total of 16,500. I must apologize to the house. I was giving the wrong figures, the figures at the end of the year, rather than the figure that now remains. May I give them again for the purpose of greater clarity. In 1941 there were 31,500 enrolments and during the year total losses of 15,000. The strength at the end of the year was 16,500.

In 1942 there were 69,500 enrolments, with a wastage of 27,500, so that the situation at the end of 1942 was that, up until that time, that is, the 1941 and 1942 figures brought together, there were 101,000 enrolments and 42,500 struck off the strength, leaving at the end of the year a strength of 58,500.

During 1943 there were 34,000 enrolments and 17,800 struck off strength, so that the situation at the end of 1943 showed that the totals were: enrolments to that date, 135,000; struck off strength to that date, 60,300, with a net remaining strength at the end of the year 74,700.

I have the figures for 1944 up to September 27. The numbers taken on strength were approximately 15,000; the numbers struck off strength were 21,200, so that the totals to September 27, 1944, were in round numbers: enrolments 150,000; conversions to general service, 42,000; to other services, 6,000; discharges, 33,500; or total decreases of 81,500, leaving a net strength, as of September 27, 1944, of 68,500.

Of that 68,500, which represented the net strength on September 27, 1944, there were 8,500 on extended leave from duty from the depots, which left the net effective strength on the payrolls at 60,000. If I can combine the two questions, perhaps the hon. member would like me to cross-analyse by districts. I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. BROOKS: Thank you; I should like to have that.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I am analysing the figure of 60,000 net strength as of September 27, and I am going to give the figures for Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes, the prairie provinces and British Columbia, by the years in which the men entered the camps.

First of all, regarding the men who entered camps in 1941, there were in that 60,000 to which I have referred, as of September 27, 6,200 men remaining. Of these men, 900 came from military districts 1, 2 and 3, that is to say, practically the province of Ontario; 2,900 were from military districts 4 and 5; 400 from military districts 6 and 7; 1,700 from military districts 10, 12 and 13, that is to say the prairie provinces; 300 from British Columbia. These figures should add up to 6,200, being the number of men who entered N.R.M.A. in 1941 and were still on strength as of September 27 last.

For 1942, there are 6,800 men from Ontario, 8,800 from Quebec, 1,800 from the maritimes, 6,200 from the prairies, 1,800 from British Columbia, or a total of 25,400.

Regarding the men who entered N.R.M.A. in 1943 the figures are: Ontario 4,900, Quebec 6,100, the maritimes 1,500, the prairies 4,200, British Columbia, 1,200, totalling 17,900.

For 1944, Ontario 2,400; Quebec, 5,000; the maritimes, 600; the prairies, 1,700; British Columbia, 800, making a total of 10,500. Therefore, if you cross-analyse your figure of 60,000 you will find that 6,200 of these men entered the N.R.M.A. in 1941, 25,400 in 1942, 17,900 in 1943 and 10,500 in 1944. I do not know whether the hon. member would like me to give these totals with respect to the provinces also.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Cross-analysing the figure of 60,000 in the other way you have Ontario providing 15,000 of the men; Quebec, 22,800; the maritimes, 4,300; the prairies, 13,800, and British Columbia, 4,100. May I say to hon. members that these are figures which I released to the press of Canada a few days ago in order that the public might have information in connection with this N.R.M.A. problem.

Mr. QUELCH: In view of the fact that in recent months our casualties have been considerably greater than we had anticipated and apparently that rate of casualties is now considered normal, and in view of the fact that over a million men have already gone into the forces, has any consideration been given to the advisability of breaking up the first division as reinforcements?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would say to the hon. member that no such project has been entertained.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Consideration has been given to the problem; it has been under consideration, surely. That was one of the alternatives. General McNaughton, as I understand it, to the course that is now being pursued.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No.

Mr. QUELCH: That was done in the last war, was it not? If the casualties continue to increase, to what extent are we to go in draining the manhood from this nation in providing reinforcements? Can the general visualize a time when the drain will become so great that we shall have to break up the fifth division or be prepared to drain every last man from this country in order to maintain reinforcements for an army that perhaps is greater than we should provide for? Have we bitten off more than we can chew? I think that is a question which is of vital importance to the people of Canada to-day. I am not suggesting that this should be done; I am wondering what the pros and cons of the situation are.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I say to the hon. member it is an extraordinarily difficult question for any individual to stand on the floor of the house and answer. It is a matter that must be decided by the government in the full light of the circumstances as they develop. To use our man-power for carrying this war to a conclusion must be decided by the government as a whole from time to time in the light of every consideration.

Mr. QUELCH: On a statistical basis do you know approximately what the rate of casualties is? They are considered normal, are they not? How long do you consider you can maintain the army at that rate? Can you carry on to the middle of next year if the war should go on for another year, or would you have to break up the fifth division?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Again that is a matter of developing policy in the light of circumstances when they come into existence, the progress of the war and so on. I would remind my hon. friend that the wastage figures which I gave were estimates and projections. It is true they are based on past experience which we obtained up to date, but there is no certainty about any of them. In fact I would say there is no certainty in anything related to war. It is a matter which those who are in charge must be guided by from moment to moment in order to bring about the result which the nation seeks, the defeat of the enemy who are threatening our civilization.

Mr. ADAMSON: May I ask an ancillary question to the one asked by the hon. member for Acadia with regard to N.R.M.A. personnel who are drafted and sent overseas? There is to be no distinction between the benefits they get and those the volunteers get so far as rehabilitation is concerned. That is correct? I agree with it. Then there is to be no distinction with regard to their uniforms. I entirely agree with that, because anybody who serves his country by fighting outside it deserves the highest credit, no matter how he is called. Will there be any changes in such things as regimental numbers, so that under no circumstances would there be any distinction whatsoever between the man who has volunteered, once he is fighting in any theatre of operation, once he goes overseas, and the N.R.M.A. men? As the minister knows, the N.R.M.A. men have boxcar numbers.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes. I have just learned one fact that I did not know before. I was under the impression that we gave the N.R.M.A. men when they came in a number to which they adhered. I am now informed that actually the numbers have been changed for those who volunteered. I agree with everything that the hon. member has said. Once a man goes overseas there must be no invidious distinction against him, and I will ask the officers to go into this matter and change these numbers immediately if that is an invidious distinction, so that anybody who may be sent overseas will have a number which is indistinguishable from anybody else's number.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With regard to those draftees who have been called up over a period of time since the National Resources Mobilization Act was brought into effect in 1940, there have been, of necessity, thousands upon thousands of medical examinations. Is it correct that, since the shortage of man-power has become acknowledged and apparent, those who are in the lower categories immediately below those who are considered satisfactory medically are now to be reboarded and are at this moment actually being reboarded medically, with the idea that many of them may be raised to a higher category medically? That is going on to-day. I am not objecting to it. I think it ought to be done. I wish to know if it is true.

The other question in my mind was whether the standard of medical fitness might not, in the early stages and perhaps during the years 1941, 1942 and 1943, have been too high. I know of one or two men being categorized as C something—I am not familiar with the designations—and they looked A-1 to me. They might have had some minor defect that was not noticeable. That is being done, is it not?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: They are being reviewed. People are being reboarded with a view to seeing that their categories are suitable for the employment we have for them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Reboarded into the various grades?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes, because a man's medical category changes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, quite so.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: And we want to have them adjusted to the realities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Some may go up and some may go down.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Quite so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are all being reboarded—those who have not actually gone into the army?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Well, actually it is just a medical examination; it is not a boarding.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I have not used the correct term. However, the fact is that they are being medically re-examined?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is one further question I should like to ask, one which it seems to me is of importance. Certain young airmen have been in the Royal Canadian Air Force. The British commonwealth air training scheme, which is now about to be disbanded, constituted a very large force. There are about to be released, and in fact are now being released daily, very large numbers of young men, some of whom have gone overseas and some who have not. These are men in A-1 physical category; and yet they are being discharged, we will say, this day. Let us say that many of them will be twenty-one years of age, and in that category from which they would be callable. Are those men now automatically to be called up for draft into the army?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Men discharged from the British commonwealth air training plan, so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, become members of the general public.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: And unless they wish to come forward voluntarily, and enlist as other members of the general public do—and if so, they will be welcomed—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: —they are not under our jurisdiction in any way, until they have been brought before us through selective service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I shall ask this question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) if he is here: are these men who are discharged from the R.C.A.F. immediately callable for draft into the N.R.M.A. army, in the event of their being medically fit? If the minister is not here, then perhaps his parliamentary assistant would answer—because I am sure he knows the answer.

Then, even if they are not medically fit, are they to be recalled and reboarded or re-examined medically, with a view to pushing them into the army? These young men were volunteers, and they are greatly exercised over the fact that they are not going to be permitted to function as airmen. To a degree their morale is shattered. They are suffering from chagrin—and I am not placing any responsibility. I am simply trying as best I can to state a fact and a position.

I have every sympathy with these young men. They are high-spirited and patriotic individuals. They voluntarily enlisted to enter the armed services of Canada, and enlisted in that branch of the service in which they wished to serve, and to which they wanted to belong. Now, through no fault of their own, physically, mentally or otherwise, they are being discharged. They now find that they are being discharged from that service and placed back in private life. They do not want to go into the army; they want to go into the air force. What is their position to-day? To my mind it is a tragedy that these young men after two years' service, or twelve months' service, or whatever the case may be, some of whom have been overseas, are now brought back to Canada on the theory that there are too many of them for employment in the service for which they volunteered. That is a tragedy, and I have the greatest sympathy for those young men.

I am wondering if the position is as represented to me, namely, that they are now subject to the draft for the army, and to be placed in with those men whom, in days gone by, they spurned to join.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I can answer that question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With all due respect, let me point out that I am asking the Minister of Labour.

Mr. MARTIN: That point has been discussed this afternoon. However, the minister will be back in the house in only a few minutes. I am not aware of the discussion which took place in the last few conferences and, in view of the importance of the point raised, and the further fact that it involves a matter of policy, I should prefer to have the minister reply.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And I am quite agreeable.

Mr. MARTIN: The minister will be in the chamber in only a few minutes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then at that time I shall take the opportunity to restate my question.

I now turn to the subject of remustering, to which the Minister of National Defence referred yesterday, when he illustrated the basic training of an artilleryman, among others. I now call the minister's attention to the situation with respect to the volunteer who joined the forestry service, and who has been overseas in Scotland doing, I hope, useful work in the army. These men were trained woodsmen. They have been ordered to go into the infantry, and have been redrafted. Not one of those men ever had a day's basic training; they went directly into the forestry corps. How much training are they to have before they are put into the front line of infantry, and what is the position in respect of them? Perhaps the minister would tell me the whole story.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The situation in respect of the forestry corps was that we had a considerable corps, as the hon. member knows, who were sent overseas, and were largely employed in Scotland.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I believe that is so.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The corps was developed quite early in the war—1940 and 1941. I echo the sentiments expressed by the hon. member in respect of the wonderful work performed by that corps in providing lumber and wood for all needs in the United Kingdom. We have had the highest compliments from all sides in respect of our forestry corps. It is an effort of which Canada may well be proud. Not only were those foresters, but those thousands of them in Scotland during the critical period of 1940 and early 1941 became an important part of the defence of that country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I dare say.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: And while those men did not have basic training in accordance with the syllabi laid out, they were given every help and assistance by the Scottish command, under General Sir Andrew Thorne, who commanded them. They were given instructors, practice in the use of the rifle, and so on, and were given every inducement to make themselves thoroughly efficient for defence. In fact at one time they formed the only reserve force in the whole of the Scottish command. So that they had a very considerable training in infantry.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They had some, at all events.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes, some, at all events. We knew that the work of the members of the forestry corps overseas, that of cutting down trees, would in due course come to an end, because they had made a pretty big hole in the woods of Scotland. So that they were always regarded as eventually coming into the reinforcement stream for the Canadian Army—some into the infantry, others into the army service corps, and others into the technical arms of the service.

When the time came when they could be released from forestry work they came down to the south of England, and into the depots. Their standard of training was checked, and the decision was taken as to where they should be remustered. Proper training schedules were arranged. I have no doubt that all this was effectively done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is giving me the assurance—and that is all I want—that before these men are put into the front line of infantry, in a branch of the service for which they did not enlist—although I presume that under the terms of their enlistment they were liable—they will have ample training in the use of the weapons they will have to use? If the minister gives me that statement I shall be content on the point. I do not wish to see anybody put into the front line unless he knows something about the implements of war he has to use—outside his knowledge of the use of an axe. Of necessity, the physical standards of those men must be very high because of the work they have carried on in Scotland. They should make good men.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I can assure the hon. member that we are taking every safeguard to ensure the adequacy of training of our reinforcements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is fair enough.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It will be our constant endeavour to see that there is no break in those safeguards.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour who has come into the chamber. A number of gallant young men, the very flower of our country—I say this without any disrespect to those who volunteered for service with the navy or the army—volunteered for service with the R.C.A.F. under the British empire training scheme. The announcement has just been made that this scheme is to be brought to an end and these men are being discharged daily, some having been brought back to Canada for that purpose. They are A-1 men, but they are discouraged by the fact that they are not to be permitted to serve in the service for which they volunteered. Their morale is down because of that. Once these men become ordinary citizens are they to be drafted into N.R.M.A.?

Mr. MITCHELL: I get clearly the import of my hon. friend's question. As a matter of fact, discussions took place to-day with regard to the policy to be pursued. If they are brought to a finality next week I shall be glad to make an announcement in the House of Commons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is telling me that the matter is under consideration but has not yet been decided. I want to express the hope that consideration will be given to these young men. I trust that the government will take these men back into the R.C.A.F. should the opportunity arise. There is another matter I should like to inquire into in connection with the personnel of the R.C.A.F. but I do not know whether the minister can give me this information. It probably comes under the Department of National Defence for Air, but I do not see any spokesman for that department in the chamber, not even the minister's parliamentary assistant.

It has been reported to me that subsequent to the arrival of some R.C.A.F. in Lincolnshire, England, they received what was termed commando training. This consisted of a course in the use of the Enfield rifle, the Sten gun and the Browning machine gun, as well as training with ack-ack or anti-aircraft guns. But it is reported to me that this training lasted for only ten days, when they were told by some one in authority that they would have to go to fight the Germans as guards around captured airports.

I want to know whether any men were put in the position of having to fight the Germans with only ten days training in the use of the weapons they would have to use in that capacity? I think I can produce creditable witnesses to the fact that those men were ordered into positions of danger without sufficient training. If that is so, I want to know if the government is going to correct the situation.

It may be that the minister had nothing to do with this, and I doubt if he had. I would think it would come under the Department of National Defence for Air or it may be mixed up with the R.A.F. I am making what is more or less a summary of the whole situation. If the facts are as they have been represented to me then all I can say is that it is cruel to send men into positions of danger who have had only ten days instructions in the use of the weapons they would have to use in case they came into conflict with the enemy. If the minister does not know about this perhaps he will have some one else look into it and give me an answer.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I am not aware of the circumstances.

Mr. HATFIELD: Have instructions gone out in the last three weeks to the different officers commanding the military districts to cancel all leaves, including farm leave?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No.

Mr. HATFIELD: How many of our Canadian boys have been loaned to the British army?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: There are really two schemes. There are 673 young officers on loan to the British army at the present time. Then there would be an additional number which would be variable and which we would not know of in Canada. These are individuals who are loaned to British staffs to help out from time to time in the various theatres. If the hon. member would like me to get the figure for any particular day I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. HATFIELD: I am more interested in knowing whether those young officers can get back into the Canadian army by making application. They are serving under most trying circumstances at the present time.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Those officers were never off the strength of the Canadian army. They were posted for minimum periods of three to four months but they would be eligible to come back to the Canadian army on the expiration of the tour of duty which had been arranged for them.

Mr. HATFIELD: I have a boy who has made application two or three times to get back to the Canadian army. He has been wounded twice since D day and he wants to get back to the Canadian army because he has not received any mail or parcels from Canada. Although we have sent him over fifty parcels, the only one he received was one sent from the United States. Letters have been returned but the parcels have never been returned. Other boys in that pool are in the same position.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Would the hon. member give me the particulars in order that I may investigate the circumstances?

Mr. HATFIELD: I will.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It is only by having specific instances and carrying out thorough investigations that we can check on the system, particularly when our young men are away from our own formations.

Mr. HATFIELD: When he came out of the hospital a few days ago he went down to the orderly room and they told him he was neither in the Canadian army nor in the British army. They said they had just sent twelve letters back home which had been received that morning.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Page the Postmaster General.

Mr. HATFIELD: Can the Postmaster General give me any information?

Mr. RALSTON: Was my hon. friend referring the case to me?

Mr. HATFIELD: No, I was referring to the Postmaster General. Letters and parcels are not getting through to these young officers who have been loaned to the British army. We have sent our boy over fifty parcels and he has received only one, and that was sent from the United States. He has never received one from Canada, and over one hundred letters have been returned.

Mr. MULOCK: We shall be only too pleased to look into this matter at once, but may I say to the hon. member that we do not handle mail for officers attached to the British army after it arrives in England or other destined country. The army postal corps and the Royal Canadian Air Force postal corps look after the mail for our troops, but if men are posted to other armies the hon. member will understand that the services of the army to which they are attached must be utilized.

Mr. HATFIELD: That is the reason why this boy wants to get back into the Canadian Army. I would ask General McNaughton what procedure he must go through to get back into the Canadian Army if there is any chance for him to do so.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Would the hon. member give me his full name and the unit in which he is now serving?

Mr. HATFIELD: I should also like to ask the Minister of Labour a question. He told us last session that farm boys were not being called up. Actually farm boys are being called up all over this country, so far as I can learn; I know they are from my own constituency. Furthermore when they make application to selective service or to the registrar when they are called up, even in the case of a family where three sons are serving and only one boy is left on the farm, no answer is received from the registrar until after the date to report. Then the boys have to go into the army and they are not released from the army. The general has told us that no order has gone out to cancel farm leaves, but all farm leaves in my constituency have been cancelled in the last three weeks and they have never been renewed. These boys have all been called up and have been granted no exemption.

Mr. MITCHELL: I endeavoured to answer that in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Selkirk, but the hon. member for Waterloo South apparently did not want me to answer it. Let me say without qualification that we have the most liberal policy with respect to agricultural workers of any of the united nations. My hon. friend may have received complaints. I often get complaints from the industrial side. A man might say, "I am a machinist," and he may be the only man in the world who would say that he was a machinist. But if my hon. friend has any case in mind where he thinks that a real farmer is being called up, I would like to know the details.

Mr. RALSTON: There are two or three questions I have been trying to ask. One was in reference to a remark made by General McNaughton with regard to the order in council when he first spoke. I thought I understood him to say that the order in council covered all the men in the N.R.M.A. I do not think he was putting a legal interpretation on the order in council, and I just wondered what led him to make that statement and just what he had in mind. Did I misunderstand him?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The answer is yes, to the best of my legal knowledge, although I do not claim to be an expert.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to understand just what the situation is, because, as I understand the order in council, it covers only N.R.M.A. to the numbers approved by the governor in council. It covers only such members of the N.R.M.A. as are specified and approved by the governor in council. It does not cover all the N.R.M.A. There is no action with regard to any of the N.R.M.A. except the 16,000, as I understand it. It does say that if further number of the N.R.M.A. are specified by the governor in council and approved by them, then the minister may require them to serve. But there is no action taken with regard to the N.R.M.A. beyond the 16,000 mentioned in this order in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is not the point this? The order in council is broad enough to cover all N.R.M.A., and the minister is now given by the order in council the right to deal with the numbers mentioned there and to deal with further numbers subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. RALSTON: I say that that power always existed under the act. You did not need an order in council to authorize the governor in council to approve the numbers. That power has always been there. The only action which was taken in the order in council is the approval by the governor in council of N.R.M.A. personnel to the number of 16,000 who may from time to time hereafter be required for training, service or duty within the United Kingdom or in European or Mediterranean operational theatres. That is all that the order in council does, as I understand it. I do not want to argue a legal question, but I thought from a remark made by General McNaughton that he was misapprehending the terms of the order, or that there was something in it perhaps that I had missed.

Just one thing more. The suggestion was made I think from the other side of the house that all rehabilitation benefits should be extended to the men called up under this order as are extended to general service personnel. I wonder if that is quite right, when the men under this order are required to serve only in the United Kingdom and European and Mediterranean operational theatres whereas general service personnel have to serve the world over.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend is quite correct. "Service" under section 2 of the War Service Grants Act, 1944, is defined as follows:

> "service" means time served on active service in the forces while enlisted or obligated to serve without territorial limitation, or time served on active service in the Aleutian islands.

That might have to be amended in the light of the statement made by the hon. member.

Mr. RALSTON: The point is that these N.R.M.A. men get no war service gratuity whatever under the order in council at the present time. The second is that if they enlist for general service they will get full war service gratuity. That brings me to my next question. Do I understand that the procedure is that, let us say, the Elgin battalion—I do not think there is such a battalion but we will take that name—is selected by you as one of the battalions which is to be included in the 16,000, and a notice goes from headquarters to the district and from the district to the battalion that the battalion and all the personnel therein are hereby required to serve? That goes. Then do I understand that after I, who happen to be a rear rank private in that battalion, receive notice that I am required to serve, and compulsorily, overseas, and am being dispatched overseas under this order in council, may then come in and volunteer? Do you think that is very much like "volunteering"? I did not see what the point was about it; that was all. I thought they were going to be given an opportunity to volunteer before they were told that they were conscripted. Can they now volunteer right up to the time they go into the line overseas?

You see what I mean? I want to see when the privilege of becoming a volunteer ceases. He is conscripted; he is dispatched overseas under this order; he is put on a boat and sent over there; he is still required to compulsorily serve; but somebody says, "Oh, but you have the right to volunteer". When does that right to volunteer end? Does it ever end? Can he volunteer after he is wounded and back in hospital; can he then be turned into a volunteer?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I must say the hon. member is posing a legal conundrum that I would want some legal advice on.

Mr. RALSTON: No, it is not a legal point.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would think the actual extension of the man's service, which is what this is, to a new area, would take effect from when he went on board ship.

Mr. RALSTON: No, extension of service surely takes effect the minute he receives this requirement from the department, from the district: he has then become liable to serve since he is a person "to be dispatched" under the terms of the order. Do you intend, then, shall I say—I am not posing any legal question—that at some stage the right to volunteer should cease?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Well, I would think the actual extension of service would take place when the man went on board ship. He was beginning to go out of the territorial limits of Canada, and I would envisage that he had the full right to volunteer up to that time.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: I do not see why there is a "full right" any time, as far as that goes. I do not know that it is any right at all. You have to stop it some time, surely. I must say that I never thought until the general spoke that there was any thought that after I had had my service extended and had become liable to and ordered overseas, then after that that I could be "converted"—that is the word they use—from N.R.M.A. to general service. I could hardly be said to be a very genuine "convert." I take it that there is no time at which that cannot be done? You have not decided on that?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No; I think that in a matter like that, which is one of precise definition, I must get the law officers of the crown and the department to advise me. I am not skilled on that matter.

Mr. RALSTON: But it did seem to me it was quite inconsistent that a man who had actually been ordered overseas under the order-in-council could then become a "volunteer". It is like a man after being arrested by the sheriff saying, "I will go voluntarily", because the sheriff is right with him.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I say, with regard to the question dealing with gratuities, that if there is any doubt with regard to the statute—drafted by the Department of National Defence and not by the Department of Pensions and National Health—immediate action would be taken to ensure that these men would be entitled to gratuity.

Mr. RALSTON: The statute was drafted by the officers of both departments in collaboration. What I want to know is, even if immediate action were taken, is it right that men who are made liable by order in council for service only in the United Kingdom, Italy and northwestern Europe shall have exactly the same service gratuity as the men who voluntarily pledge themselves for service the world over? I do not know that it is right that it should be the same.

Mr. MITCHELL: He is risking his life, is he not?

Mr. RALSTON: He is risking his life, but in half the theatres. The volunteer who is now in Italy could be ordered to Japan or anywhere else. I suggest that my hon. friend consider it.

Mr. MacNICOL: We ought to have an answer to that. That is very important.

Mr. RALSTON: General McNaughton, as I understand, you are training the additional 26,000; that is to say, there are the 42,000 who were mentioned by the Prime Minister and of these there are the 16,000 we are talking of here to-day who are infantrymen practically ready, and others who will soon be ready, for combat.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Very close to it.

Mr. RALSTON: That leaves 26,000 who are in the medical category for infantry and could be trained as such. Are those being trained?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We are going ahead with those, with all the training we can.

Mr. RALSTON: In order to provide for any possible contingency; is that right?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Absolutely right.

Mr. RALSTON: When you mentioned that this estimate was up until May, that was simply a planning date?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is the planning date, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Just a planning date. And the planning dates—

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It is as far ahead as we need to make provision at the moment, because as the plans become available we have plenty of time to affect the situation.

Mr. RALSTON: Planning dates are generally advanced or extended as the developments occur?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Quite so.

Mr. RALSTON: That is, you may probably review the situation in January?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Absolutely.

Mr. RALSTON: You spoke last night of the pools for May; I do not know whether it is the end of May. I wonder if you would look at your figures, because you mentioned that those pools for the United Kingdom, for Italy and for northwest Europe would be substantial pools at the end of May. I have in mind figures which I know about when I happened to be in this thing, and I do not think the figures could have changed very much. I understand there is some difference in respect of casualties. But is there really any substantial pool at the end of May? I mean, there may be a few thousand men, but that is all. I am not asking you to give the figures, but I want you to check on that word "substantial" when you are referring to three different pools.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: These, of course, are figures which, as the hon. member knows, I cannot give in open session.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not ask it.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The table has been re-set since I took over the department, and the figures differ in several respects from the ones previously in effect. As the hon. member knows, we have been able to substitute actuals for forecasts, and we are thankful that the actuals were less than the forecasts in several respects. Then there are those additional dispatches we are talking about; the 16,000 comes in on the beneficial side of the ledger. What I would say to the hon. member is this, that the staffs are satisfied that the figures are sufficient. On top of the recommendations of the staff, small additions have been provided in order to free our hands in the matter of leave to Canada, and, if they wish to use them, for additional rest periods for individuals where there might, I think quite rightly, have been some doubt as to whether we were able to keep people out of the line for a sufficiently long time. I cannot say that was the case, that they were being sent back too soon, because I am assured it is not so; but I wanted to be abundantly certain that men were not under any conditions being rushed back into the lines too quickly.

Mr. RALSTON: I come back to my question which was with reference to the use of the word "substantial" when you assented to my question yesterday as to whether or not the pools in Italy, in northwest Europe and in the United Kingdom were substantial at the end of May. By the pools I mean what is over and above the number necessary to bring the units up to strength. Does the word "substantial" apply to all three pools?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Of course, as regards the distribution of the reinforcement reserves overseas in May, that is farther ahead than the break-down figures have been projected for. I am dealing with them here as a total overseas.

Mr. RALSTON: Total overseas, having regard to the possibilities. Suppose you had to provide a pool for one month's intense activity in Italy, two or three weeks' intense activity in northwest Europe, and for activities in the United Kingdom for six weeks, would you have anything like that at the end of May after bringing all units up to strength?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: We are getting pretty close to things which it would be dangerous to discuss except under security.

Mr. RALSTON: I am considering the word "substantial". You are looking at the figures. I cannot see them, but I have an idea what they are, if they are anything like the figures I have seen, and I must say that I questioned whether, when you looked at the figures, you would think that the word "substantial" really applied to them.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The hon. member will take it from me that the figures are in accordance with the recommendations of the military advisers of the government. I have taken their recommendation absolutely without any influence by myself.

Mr. RALSTON: With the idea of the war ending in May?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No, sir.

Mr. RALSTON: With the idea of carrying on?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: If it is required, and with the idea that in those periods, so far ahead as May, if in accordance with the developments of the situation we have kept at each stage a sufficient flexibility to bring the situation into balance should there be any indication of its going out of balance.

Mr. RALSTON: What do you mean by flexibility?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Flexibility in the posting of reserves as among the three places where we must maintain reserves, namely, behind the forces in Italy, behind the forces in northwest Europe, and reserves in the United Kingdom; as well as, in the fourth place, the men who are being trained in Canada for dispatch forward.

Mr. RALSTON: When you spoke of something being countersigned by officers in the field, did you mean the rates of activity, the periods of activity?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: What I meant there was the expected wastage, in that case the periods of activity, to ensure absolutely that there was no doubt as between what was in the minds of our commanders as to what they were expected to do, and what the theatre commanders from whom they received orders had in mind, so that we would be quite sure that full provision should be made. That was an arrangement entered into by the minister in his regime and I was very glad to see it in effect. I had therefore double assurance.

Mr. RALSTON: It had nothing to do with numbers; it had to do with the projection by the commanders in the field of the number of months or weeks of probable intense activity, the number of months of normal, and the number of months of quiet.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It was to ensure that we who have to make provision in Canada to meet calls for reinforcements without any possibility of doubt knew what was in the mind of the man who had to order those operations.

Mr. RALSTON: And the request of the military advisers is practically the same as the request made by the chief of staff, Canadian military headquarters. His request was for 15,000 and you provide for 16,000.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I have not analysed recently the particular request to which the hon. member refers, because we have been dealing with the actual situation as it has developed, but I understand the figures are the same. Ours is a somewhat higher provision, about a thousand additional.

Mr. RALSTON: You have started making arrangements for shipping the five thousand, have you?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I would like to say this, and I think the hon. member who is speaking can take it as great credit to the organization which he set up. I called the staff in the department together yesterday morning before I came up to make this announcement here. It was in the strictest confidence, naturally, and I outlined what was the intention, namely, that there should be added to the troops dispatched from Canada some 16,000 infantry, 5,000 to go in December, 5,000 to go in January, and 2,000 in each of the months thereafter. The highest priority was to be given to those who were fully trained and the next to those whose training could be completed as infantry in the shortest possible period in our establishments in the United Kingdom. I met those officers this morning and the proposition was completely worked out as regards the selection and dispatch of the first 10,000, namely, those to go in December and January. Knowing, as the hon. member does, the tremendous amount of detail which is required in working out a movement of that sort, it creates a wonderful feeling of confidence on the part of the minister who, after giving a general order of the kind, can go back the following morning and find that the thing is complete and is placed before him so that he has merely to say, "Yes, that is satisfactory."

Mr. RALSTON: That is what some people call "military red tape".

Mr. McNAUGHTON: It is an amazing tribute to the organization you left me, Colonel Ralston.

Mr. RALSTON: I can say that I have had just the same experience of their excellent staff work, general. In this time table—I am not talking about sailing dates—what time do you expect it will take, beginning with medical boarding until the men are ready at the transit camp? What do they give you as the time table?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: The movement must start at once.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the time table? How long will it take—all the preliminaries?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: About a month, and that enables us to provide embarkation leave and the usual privileges. There is no hysteria at all in the movement. That was what I was anxious to determine when I looked over the plan this morning. It is quite orderly.

Mr. RALSTON: Did you find that it had been organized for some time?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I suspect that is true.

Mr. RALSTON: I think you will find they had all their plans made for three weeks. You mentioned in your statement yesterday a possible prospective shortage of fully trained infantry which may go late in January or February next. I take it that means at that time, whenever the acute period comes, there will not be in the aggregate sufficient trained infantry immediately available to bring the units all fully up to strength.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No. The references as to the prospective shortages which I have made were references to the situation as it was forecast before we could count on this additional 16,000 to which I have referred.

Mr. RALSTON: I know that. Do not let us get the two things mixed up. I am talking about your reference as to the need. I am saying the shortage which you foresaw was a shortage indicated by the fact that without the 16,000 men that you would need in January or February, or whatever time it was, you would not have sufficient fully trained infantry available to keep the units up to strength.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is right.

Mr. RALSTON: And the same thing applies in respect of the situation which you predicted later in the spring or early summer.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is right.

Mr. RALSTON: You said there was another period when the infantry reserve behind the troops may become low, meaning they would not be sufficient to bring the units up to strength.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: That is right. The anxiety regarding that situation has been relieved. Our minds are relieved of the anxiety by reason of this additional dispatch.

Mr. RALSTON: I was trying to get the same thing exactly. I had the same anxiety that you had.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Do you think, General McNaughton, it is wise to send men back into the front line after they have been wounded three times? I know you will say that you have a rule in connection with that which reads something like this, that a man may apply for leave if he has been wounded three times but not trivially. A man may be wounded a half a dozen times or more and I have noticed in the casualty lists boys in my own riding some of whom have been wounded more than three times. I do not think it is good for them. Many of them have written me and said: "For God's sake, get us out of the line; we have had enough."

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I share the view that the hon. member has expressed, and I shall make it my business to go into that scheme so that people who have been wounded the number of times he indicates will not be sent forward. They undoubtedly have played their part in this conflict. You will find some of them that you cannot hold back. They are wanting to go forward again.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Has there been any definition of the word "trivially"? I understand that "trivially" may mean one or two toes off or a few fingers off. Is there any definition of the word?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: I am not aware of the definition, but I shall have it checked up right away and let the hon. member know.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is it not true that these pools of reserves or support overseas that you say are sufficient include men who are in hospital? You count them as your reserves and support.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: No, sir. Let me say very definitely to the hon. member that the numbers on which we are working and to which I have referred as adequate reserves are people who are immediately available to go into the units in replacement or people who would be able to come in in the early part of the following month. There is a pool. We are breaking it down now for purposes of calculation into blocks of a month's length, setting the casualties not day by day but month by month, and therefore we have to put on the available side a double figure; that is, those who are available at the beginning of the month and those who are becoming available. Therefore the two come together. The staffs are satisfied as to the adequacy of those figures. That is, the units can be kept fully up to strength.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The reason I asked the question is that two or three letters have come to me which I believe I have on my desk. In those letters the boys have mentioned that they have to go back into the front line within the next week. They say they know they are not ready for the front line. They say they have the jitters and their wounds are not healed, but they are classed as men who must go into the front line. Is that right?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: There may well have been some doubt on that subject. The statement has been that the periods have not been too short. I am putting in some extra figures on these numbers. There is provision for both periods of rest and recuperation being extended for those. I wish to thank the hon. member for bringing up that point, because we must be abundantly careful to see that these men are not asked to take up the load again until they are fully fit so to do.

Mr. RALSTON: May I ask one more question as to the need, without giving figures at all? You described the position of prospective shortage late in January or February, and then further down late in the spring or early summer. In between, as I remember it, the position was gradually worsening, was it not?

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: You described it as being deep in the red when you got to May.

Mr. McNAUGHTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Is there not already in respect of young airmen a policy to the effect that those who have been in the service less than two years are automatically placed under the Department of National Defence and are callable?

Mr. MITCHELL: This afternoon I forwarded to the Minister of National Defence a communication referring to the point raised by the hon. member. It is still a subject of discussion between him and me. It will be appreciated that under present circumstances it is very difficult for him and me to get together. He is of course busily engaged in this chamber in connection with the matter now before us.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The position is that there is a policy in effect under which young men who have not had two years in the service are automatically notified by national selective service that they are draftable by National Defence. It is my understanding that that position is being reviewed. Is that correct?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: When are we to have answers to the questions which the minister stated he could not answer in public session? It seems to me, particularly after the examination by the former minister of the present Minister of National Defence, and the replies to the questions asked, that we are leaving this house without getting all the information we ought to have. I know there has been objection. But I notice this, that on the part of those who objected to a secret session there has been no attempt to press for replies. I do not know why this is; but the fact is that there has been no pressure by the official opposition for replies in connection with vital information. I have asked on a number of occasions that we be given an opportunity to get that information. Of course there has been opposition to it. However if we are to rise at six o'clock, until Monday afternoon we shall enter upon the debate on the motion of the Prime Minister without having the vital information which the former minister of national defence and the present one have together indicated we should have.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before the Prime Minister rises may I remove what is obviously a misconstruction of the whole situation in the mind of the leader of the C.C.F. One of the reasons we did not want a secret session was the very reason he has suggested. He says he wants to use the information in debate, but he must know he cannot use it.

Mr. MARTIN: He did not say that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said no such thing. The leader of the opposition knows very well that information gained by a member in a secret session can guide him in what he says subsequently, without his divulging what that information is. He knows that as well as I do.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the information possessed by General McNaughton. There are certain statements of which I have copies, which were made while I held his position. All those statements have been somewhat revised, and I have been examining General

McNaughton to ascertain what change had been made in the situation, having regard to new figures and new adjustments.

Mr. COLDWELL: And you did not get those figures, either?

Mr. RALSTON: No; and I should like very much to have them.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the hon. member for Prince if it is secret information, and if it is information which he desires to have divulged at this time?

Mr. RALSTON: I was thinking only of one thing—and the general knows about it; so does the government. I had in mind a table which has been made showing the situation month by month, and setting out the situation both before and after. Perhaps I should say that it sets out the situation as it was and as it should be. I take it from what the general has said that a new table has been made, showing what the situation will be after the adjustment or distribution of these 16,000 men.

Mr. ROWE: But you have not asked for a secret session?

Mr. RALSTON: No, I have not.

Mr. COLDWELL: And the minister refused to give it, except in secret session.

Mr. ROWE: The man who knows the most about it is not asking for a secret session.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, yes; he is.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 6.10 p.m.

Monday, November 27, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

THE MINISTRY

RESIGNATION OF HON. C. G. POWER AS MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that on Friday last I mentioned that a report which had appeared in the press to the effect that the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) had tendered his resignation was correct. I also intimated that I was very carefully considering the communication which I had received from the minister before taking any action upon it. My hope was that in the course of the week-end I might find it possible to persuade my colleague to reconsider his decision to tender his resignation, having regard to the exceptionally valuable service which as a member of the government he was in a position to render at this time of war. Unhappily I have not been able to persuade him to withdraw his letter of resignation, and in the circumstances I have had no alternative but to ask His Excellency to assent to its acceptance. I ask the house to grant me permission to read the letters which passed between the hon. member and myself with respect to his resignation and to table these communications at the end of the reading, and, also, to table copies of the order in council which has been passed to-day with respect to the minister's resignation. I quote:

Canada
Minister of National Defence for Air

Ottawa,
23rd November, 1944.

Rt. Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

My dear Prime Minister:

It is with the deepest regret that I ask you to accept my resignation as a member of your cabinet.

I am unable to accept the policy which the government has now adopted with respect to the National Resources Mobilization Act. I do not believe such a policy to be necessary at this time, nor will it save one single Canadian casualty.

I parted company with Colonel Ralston after the most mature consideration largely on the grounds that the number of troops which he reported as being required was comparatively so small, the means to remedy the situation without placing undue strain on the men at the front so readily available, and the end of the war so imminent that weighing everything in the balance we were not justified in provoking a national scission.

I cannot accept now from a new minister General McNaughton a recommendation which I reluctantly felt obliged to reject when made by an old comrade and tried associate Layton Ralston.

May I add that the task which you confided to me in May 1940 of organizing the British commonwealth joint air training plan has now been completed and the plan is being wound up. The Royal Canadian Air Force overseas has reached the peak of its expansion.

I shall always treasure the years of association with you and my colleagues and I thank you and them for all the kindness and consideration they have shown.

Yours sincerely,

Charles G. Power.

To that communication I replied this morning as follows:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa,
November 27, 1944.

The Honourable C. G. Power, K.C., M.P., 157 Daly Avenue,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Power:

I duly received, on the 23rd instant, your letter of that day tendering your resignation as a member of the government.

Since its receipt, I have, as you know, hoped that you might find it possible to reconsider your decision. I have felt that the importance of the service which, as a member of the government, you might have continued to render Canada's war effort would have outweighed the other considerations on which you felt it necessary to resign. As, however, you have come to the conclusion that you must adhere to your original decision, I have most reluctantly been obliged to advise the Governor General that your resignation should be accepted; to this advice His Excellency has given his consent.

I need not say how great is my regret that so trusted a colleague and so close a friend should leave the ministry at this time. This regret will, I know, be shared by all members of the government.

On my own behalf and on theirs, I would like warmly to reciprocate the feelings you have expressed as to what the years of our association have meant to all of us personally; also to express appreciation of what your services in the ministry at a time of war have meant to our country and to the cause of freedom.

Yours sincerely,
W. L. Mackenzie King.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, it is a well known and clearly established custom for a retiring member of the ministry, if he so desires, to crave the indulgence of the Speaker and of the house to say a few words in clarification of the attitude which he has taken and I do now ask that the house permit me to make a few brief remarks on the subject matter which has been brought before it.

I thank the Prime Minister for his kindness and consideration. It is consistent with his character and tradition, and with the relationship which has existed between us for a period of over twenty-five years. I part with him in sorrow, not in anger. I shall never forget and never regret the long years of our association.

With respect to my colleagues—my ex-colleagues, I should say—in the ministry, we have been bound together by ties of amity and of friendship and I know that no difference of opinion on political matters will break or bend those ties of friendship. With respect to the officers, N.C.O.'s and airmen of the Department of National Defence for Air and the civilian employees of that department as well as my own personal staff, I leave them also with regret but with thanks for the kindly cooperation which they have always extended to me. It has been a privilege to serve with them in the accomplishment of a great task, a privilege that I shall always hold dear.

In 1940 the tragic death of Norman Rogers would have been an irreparable loss to Canada's war effort if we had not had Colonel Ralston to replace him.

No two men could have worked more closely together than he and I did. Our fortuitous association was cemented into a close and intimate friendship by days of intense labour and white nights of anxiety. I am convinced that the course which my ex-colleague took was embarked upon after the most serious consideration and charted by the compass of honest, conscientious conviction.

When his recommendation was made it became the duty of the cabinet as a whole to deal with it as they deal with any matter brought forward by any minister in the interests of the department which he represents. The cabinet must take into consideration not only the departmental viewpoint but the effect of the recommendations made by the minister on the country as a whole.

It is in order that the divergent views and diversified interests inevitable in a country of the size and composition of Canada may find expression in the councils of the nation that all prime ministers endeavour to have as members of their cabinets representatives of every class and of every section.

It is clear that cabinet did give serious consideration to the recommendations of the minister. Discussion was continuous and lasted during many days. On November 2 the Prime Minister announced that Colonel Ralston had been replaced by General McNaughton as Minister of National Defence.

The former minister could not accommodate himself to the views of his colleagues and as an honourable man, and in pursuance of the doctrine of cabinet solidarity, took the only course which was open to him.

The decision of cabinet has now been changed. I, for opposite reasons to Colonel Ralston, but following his example, am leaving the cabinet also.

I do not propose to discuss the number of available reinforcements, nor the times and places where and when they will be required, nor at any length the method of raising them.

The strategy of General Eisenhower, the Supreme Commander of the allied forces, publicly proclaimed, is to strike the enemy again and again, and to give him no rest and no respite. We are informed that in order to carry out this Eisenhower plan of war, reinforcements must be available and at hand to refill battalions and units within twenty-four hours after the casualties occur.

I think I should draw to the attention of the house, and of the thousands of mothers, wives, sweethearts and dependents of those now in the front line, that this repeated return to battle, instead of making for fewer casualties among their loved ones, might very easily make for more. No commander will take his experienced men out of the unit and undertake an engagement with only the newly-arrived, however well trained they may be.

It seems to me that the logical thing, the reasonable thing, is to take the men out of the line temporarily to refit, to reequip, to rest, to recuperate and to refill the gaps in their ranks.

By all reports, the number required even of infantry, in which arm alone there is said to be a threatened deficiency, is comparatively small. The lowering of the rate of casualties by periods of comparative or total inactivity would wipe out the margin of deficit, if any exists, and restore the balance.

Neither ultimate victory nor national honour requires that Canadian troops should be in action every hour or every day, or even take part in every battle necessary to bring about final victory, especially when thousands of Europeans, fresh freed from the tyranny and the unspeakable terror of nazi occupation, are panting for vengeance on the oppressor.

It might be feared that the course I have suggested would lower the prestige and glory of Canada. In my opinion that glory and prestige has been for ever established by the deeds of our fighting men in every branch of the service. I cannot believe that this suggestion could be regarded as anything but common humanity and common sense having regard to all the circumstances.

It has been stated that casualties amongst the troops of some of our allies are greater than ours. Surely this war is something more than a competition in casualties amongst the allied nations.

I too have at heart the interests of the men at the front.

I shall not refer to my relations with the veterans of the last war. The records of this House of Commons during the past twenty-seven years are there for all to see.

With regard to my attitude towards the overseas forces in this war, the story is in the records of the Department of National Defence for Air. It is in the files of the British Air Ministry. It is in the instructions given by me to the commanding officers of the R.C.A.F. overseas; and it deals largely with leave from the front, repatriation to Canada, and with representations for relief from the undue risk involved in lengthened or repeated tours of duty of the R.C.A.F. aircrew, whether serving in our own Canadian squadrons or attached to R.A.F. This attitude with respect to the R.C.A.F. is consistent with the views I hold with regard to the army.

If the course of systematic recuperation were taken, then the voluntary system which we have been following, which yielded more men last year than was ever estimated or even anticipated, and which in the words of the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. McNaughton) has not failed, would have sufficed at this stage of the war when by the most authoritative accounts victory is certain.

I gave to Colonel Ralston's report my most sincere and conscientious consideration.

I remained with the government and held firm to the policy to which I clearly understood it to be unreservedly committed. It was the policy on Wednesday morning last. It was the policy until Wednesday night. I could not change my matured consideration in a matter of minutes.

Conscription may be justified in moments of national crisis and in defence of one's country; and in the discussion of Bill 80 of 1942 I said so. It might have been justified at certain periods and phases of this war when we were on the brink of almost certain defeat. It might have been justified if D-day had been a smashing catastrophe instead of a brilliant success. But these days are now past. We have no right to tear this country asunder at this stage, and in this state of the war.

A word as to the consequences of this controversy. Millions of honest, decent people in all parts of Canada and of all shades of opinion are in the process of hating and reviling one another. Reason and sincere conviction have given way to hysteria on both sides. Cleavage between classes and between races has been driven deeper and deeper. The most tragic thing of all is the weakening of faith and confidence in public men—not only by the people of one province, but in all provinces; not only amongst those who hold one view, but in men and women of all sides of this unfortunate debate.

As to the cleavages to which I refer, I cherish and hold fast to the ideas of the chieftain under whose aegis I entered this house, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He could not and would not believe that as a Canadian he could belong to a party of one province only. With him, I cannot and will not subscribe to a purely isolationist provincial standpoint.

It may be that for some time to come the day has gone when men of similar ideas and principles can meet and join in common action across the Ottawa river.

My hope, my prayer is that there will be no such outcome, and that with the advent of external victory and peace, peace and understanding may come within our own country.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

REPORT UNDER PARAGRAPH 3 OF SECTION 21

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I lay on the table the report I am required to make pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 3 of regulation 21 of the defence of Canada regulations. Number of persons detained during the period from August 11 to November 22, 1944, under any order made pursuant to this regulation: none. Number of cases in which the Minister of Justice has declined to follow the advice of any advisory committee: none.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO ADJOURN TO JANUARY 31, 1945, ON COMPLETION OF CURRENT BUSINESS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns, on completion of current business of the session, it stand adjourned until Wednesday, January 31, 1945, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with His Majesty's government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time.

Motion agreed to.

THE WAR

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN MAINTAINING VIGOROUS WAR EFFORT—MOTION, THE PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if anything were necessary to emphasize the gravity of the issue that has so suddenly arisen, it would most certainly be found in the words of my former colleague and all-time friend, the former minister of national defence for air (Mr. Power). He has given to the house, in a very few words, the real nature of the question which is before this House of Commons at the present time. In a word, the issue of conscription has, once again, come to the fore, and it has brought to the fore once again the most serious kind of controversy which this parliament, has had, at different times, to face. The minister has drawn attention to the fact that he has resigned from the government for a reason diametrically opposed to that of the former minister of defence who resigned a short time before. I hope that this will make clear to the house, perhaps clearer than hon. members have realized thus far, the nature of the position in which I, as Prime Minister of Canada at this time, have been placed in seeking to carry out what has been, above all else, the purpose of my work in public life. the maintenance of unity as far as that might be possible in the government of this country and in the Dominion of Canada itself.

Perhaps, owing to the fact that the question before us is of such great gravity, hon. gentlemen in different parts of the house will allow me to proceed with my remarks without interruption. If I should make a misstatement, I should, of course, wish to be instantly corrected, but, otherwise, I hope that hon. members will allow me to answer such questions as they may wish to ask at the conclusion of my remarks rather than in the course of them.

As the issue is one which is related almost exclusively to the question of the adoption of a measure of conscription at this time, it might be well, for an understanding of the reasons why some members of the government have taken different views, were I to review very briefly the development of this question since the beginning of the war. Here may I say that, from the outset, I have been conscious that what has been a source of division in the cabinet was but a reflection of what was certain to be a source of division in this House of Commons, and that—again—this House of Commons would be reflecting a source of division in all parts of this country. That is what has made and still makes the present question the most serious one with which this parliament, I believe, has been faced at any time.

Hon. members will recall that, before Canada entered the war, there had been much consideration of the attitude that should be taken by any government that might be in office should war come. It was anticipated that war might break out suddenly, and members of the government, and members of parliament other than those in the government, had to consider very carefully what attitude they would take in that event.

When the moment came, in September, 1939, and the house was brought together, it became my great and grave responsibility to ask members of this house unitedly to enter the war. I gave my reasons at the time why I believed it was a war that threatened human freedom and Christian civilization. I said that, in my opinion, it was a war which might spread to vast proportions and that nothing in history would be comparable to what we might be called upon to experience. When I asked this house to enter the war hon. members were all, I think, of one mind with respect to one of the conditions under which we would be prepared to take part in the conflict. It was that there should be no conscription for the sending of men overseas.

That was the position in September, 1939. Parliament met and had its discussions and the government was given and assumed the great task. But we had not been under way very long before we met with opposition from outside sources which, in my opinion, would have undermined any confidence which the public had in the administration. Realizing, therefore, that confidence was of the essence of the power of the government, I thought it advisable to seek that confidence from the source of our power, and to have parliament dissolved and an appeal made to the people.

When that appeal was made members of all parties appeared before the public and stated, I think, for the most part, what their position would be with regard to conscription. At any rate, members of the administration took the position that there should not be conscription for service overseas, and we took that position, not because of any statute, but because most of us, if indeed not all of us, had a moral obligation which we appreciated very deeply. We had given our word, no one more strongly than myself, speaking before the war broke out, that if war came the government would not resort to conscription for service overseas.

The government was returned by a very large majority. It had a mandate to carry on the war and to carry it on without resort to conscription. In the same year, early in the summer, the country received an appalling shock. France fell. And the world wakened up to the fact that the enemy we were fighting was an enemy whose power was vastly greater than the power required to dominate any one continent. It was a power which, unless it were overthrown, might dominate the world.

We, in Canada, were, at that time, supremely conscious of the fact that our own country might some day be invaded. Indeed, there was reason for the belief that, unless the might of Britain were able to protect us, we would most certainly be invaded. In those circumstances, this parliament deemed it necessary to enact what is known as the National Resources Mobilization Act. That act was based on the principle of conscription, but it was conscription for service within Canada. The principle of conscription was certainly settled at that time and in that way so far as service within Canada itself was concerned.

That measure having been passed and the country having accepted it, the government continued with its great responsibility, seeking to avoid even the consideration of adopting the principle of conscription for service overseas. However, agitation arose in the country, an agitation for conscription. It was being represented that the government would resort to conscription, except for the moral obligations which some of its members had assumed. That was being given as the reason why this government was not in a position to carry out the power which it had under the law of the land. There has never been a moment at which the government has not had the legal power, but there was, up to that moment, a very strong moral obligation. Now may I say that, as between legal obligation and moral obligation, if I find the two in conflict I shall, with God's help, maintain the moral obligation. Feeling very strongly that there might come a time, in the light of the developments of the war as they were then proceeding, when this moral obligation, so long as it lasted, might come to impede what was essential to the saving of this country and of human freedom throughout the world, I had my colleagues join me in proposing a plebiscite which would free us from any moral obligation that had existed up to that time. A plebiscite that would free our hands as individuals, a plebiscite that would free the hands of this parliament, as such. We sought to remove any question as to resorting or not resorting to conscription if that became necessary, because of some prior moral obligation.

The plebiscite was overwhelmingly carried. I have never been able to understand why any hon. members and newspapers should since have maintained, as some of them have maintained—not many but some—and great organizations throughout the country, even an organization as important as the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, that there was as a result of the plebiscite, a mandate on the part of the country to the government to carry out conscription. That is an entire falsification, Mr. Speaker, of the interpretation of the plebiscite. Need I go farther at the moment than simply to quote a paragraph or two from a speech of my own to the people of Canada and one to this House of Commons in regard to the matter? On April 7, 1942, I made a nation-wide broadcast on the subject of the issue of the plebiscite. In the course of that address, as will be found on page 7 of the publication issued by the director of public information, I made this statement. The heading is "Canada's war effort being placed in false light."

And that brings me to the last of the questions to which you are awaiting a reply: "Why, after two and a half years of war, has it become necessary to have the restriction removed?"

The restriction therein referred to was the restriction which was attached to the National Resources Mobilization Act, which was that its provisions would not apply to the sending of men overseas. The government was asking that that restriction should be removed so that if the occasion should arise where the government believed the time had come when it was necessary to send men overseas it would be free to do so, free from all moral obligations, and of anything that could be cited as a moral obligation. Speaking on that point I said:

And that brings me to the last of the questions to which you are awaiting a reply. "Why, after two and a half years, has it become necessary to have the restriction removed?" One answer is that this restriction is being represented as the bar to an all-out effort on Canada's part. It makes no difference whether conscription for service overseas would add to Canada's total effort or not, the fact that the government is not free to consider its adoption is made to appear as limiting Canada's war effort.

At that time we were being told from certain sources that we were not going fast enough, that our war effort was restricted and limited. The alleged limitation was attributed by those who were back of the agitation at the time to this moral obligation not to resort to conscription. I was anxious, certainly, that the country should see that, if there was any limitation, it was for other reasons, national reasons. I was anxious also that the country should see that we were achieving a total war effort just as rapidly as a total war effort could be brought into being.

The truth, of course, is that our army to-day is just as large as it would have been if conscription for overseas service had been adopted. The absence of conscription for overseas service has not limited our war effort. The lack of power to impose such conscription has, however, placed our war effort in a wholly false light before our own citizens, and, what is worse, before our allies. In other words, conscription has been made the symbol of a total effort regardless of all Canada is doing to help win the war.

Then another heading: "Issue not conscription—but powers of government":

The issue at present is not conscription;—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

This was said to the people of Canada before they cast their votes on the plebiscite.

The issue at present is not conscription; it is whether or not the government, subject to its responsibility to parliament, is to be free to decide that question itself in the light of all national considerations. The government is not asking you to say whether or not conscription should be adopted. That responsibility the government is asking you to leave to itself and to parliament, with entire freedom to decide the question on its merits.

The question of conscription, properly viewed, is a military question. The place to discuss it is in parliament. What the government now seeks for itself and for parliament is freedom to consider and debate and decide this question, like all other questions connected with the war, unrestricted by any pledge and in the light only of the needs of national security.

That was what was said to the people. I shall now quote what I said in this House of Commons in the presence of the then leaders of the different parties and of the members who were members of the House of Commons at that time. I shall cite only one or two paragraphs. When I was speaking on Wednesday, June 10, 1942, I said:

Let me now deal with the relationship of the plebiscite to conscription, and in particular as to whether a "yes" or "no" vote was a vote for or against conscription. On this point I should, first of all, remind hon. members of what was said in the course of the plebiscite campaign. Both in this house and throughout the country, it was made perfectly clear by myself as leader of the government, by the leader of the official opposition and by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and by members of their respective parties, that an affirmative vote was not a vote for conscription. I am afraid I cannot tell the house what stand the leader of the Social Credit party took. I have, however, found nothing in any of his utterances which would enable it to be said that he regarded an affirmative vote as a vote for conscription for service overseas.

The question on the ballot is, however, the best answer as to whether or not the plebiscite was a vote for or against conscription.

The question on which the people of Canada were asked to express an opinion was:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

Clearly the plebiscite merely released the government from its obligation not to resort to conscription for service overseas. It did not commit the government to conscription for service overseas. The result of the plebiscite leaves no doubt as to the freedom of the government and of parliament to discuss the question of conscription for service overseas upon its merits. It equally leaves no doubt as to the freedom of the government and of parliament to decide, for or against conscription for service overseas, either conditionally or unconditionally.

I will not refer further to that subject, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to say, once and for all, that I do not think any good purpose is served by having the result of the plebiscite referred to a couple of years later in terms other than those which were not contradicted in this house at the time I made the statement to which I have just referred.

I come now to the next step, which was the introduction and enactment of Bill 80. Bill 80 grew out of the discussions in this house following those that had taken place on the plebiscite. I should like to recall that Bill 80 was discussed in this house in June, 1942; that is, over two years ago. Bill 80 was introduced into the house in order to make it perfectly clear that the government would have thereafter the right to take such steps and actions with respect to conscription as it might be necessary to take, either conscription in whole or conscription to a limited extent. That bill recognized the principle of conscription. At the time this house debated the whole question of conscription. We had a lengthy debate, and it was made very clear then that we were discussing the question of conscription and its possible use should that become necessary at a later time.

Why did the house take that step? The house, I believe, took that step just as it has taken every other step since the beginning of this war, in the light of the changing conditions of the world under the impact of war. The situation in 1941 was very different from what it was in 1940. In 1942 it was much graver than in 1941. No government with a sense of the responsibility that it should have would have wished to be left in any doubt as to its powers, should the necessity arise, to take any steps which might be needed in order to prevent a worse condition arising in our own country and throughout the world. That is why that measure was enacted.

May I make it clear that, in the course of that debate, different views were expressed by hon. members as to what the particular situation would be which might make it necessary to take action under that measure. Some, and I think I myself was one, spoke particularly in reference to the winning of the war. That was broadly the view which, I believe, a large number of us on this side took, that it would relate to the winning of the war itself. But specific references were also made, references which I shall mention a little later on, relating immediately to the reinforcement of troops, our own Canadian troops who would be serving in actual theatres of war overseas. Any statement that related to the winning of the war would necessarily, thereafter, have to be considered in the light of the particular pledge given at that time. I think I can best express the policy of the government, under that measure, by saying that it represented not necessarily conscription but conscription if necessary; and may I add that in the minds of those who thought in terms of conscription if necessary, there was also the thought, "and to the extent that might be necessary."

I shall leave that, at this point, and pass on to what followed after the bill was passed. The year 1942 went by and no action was necessary under the measure. All of 1943 went by and no action was necessary. The first seven months of this year, 1944, went by and there was no suggestion that anything was necessary under that measure by way of sending troops overseas in accordance with its provisions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the Prime Minister permit me?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I prefer not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not a correct statement, because in this house I moved an amendment to the address in the session of 1942, calling for complete national selective service. I want to correct a misstatement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Complete national selective service, as I understand it—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For the army in any theatre of war, for agriculture and for industry. That is a matter of record.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, perhaps I may speak for myself and allow the hon. member to speak for himself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I say the record speaks for me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking for what was understood, certainly on this side of the house, in reference to the matter to which I have referred, and by the government as to the possibility of there being need for reinforcements.

That brings me to the immediate situation that has arisen, and here I wish to give to the house the sequence of the discussions that took place. As far as the government is concerned, there was nothing before it at any time up to October of this year which suggested that there would be any need for conscription to provide further reinforcements overseas. Let me make this perfectly clear. Colonel Ralston, the former minister of national defence, for a long time has believed that it might become necessary to resort to conscription for service overseas to provide necessary reinforcements. At different times when we have been discussing this matter he has made it clear that while not pressing anything of the kind as a matter of immediate need, he himself had a mental reservation as to the possibility of its becoming necessary to resort to conscription at some time. It is due to the former minister that this should be known; it is due to the government also that it should be known that at no time, up to the period of which I am speaking, did the minister bring forward any recommendation, express or implied, for the sending overseas of further reinforcements under conscription. There is one point I wish to make clear—and here let me say that I am not going to try to go over the ground covered in the communications between Colonel Ralston and myself. What is set forth therein can be read by hon. members and need not be repeated at this time. But I do wish to make this statement, with which I am sure the former minister of national defence will be the first to agree: that when this question did come up, he and I were determined that it should not become a King-Ralston conflict or battle, as I have seen it since described in the press. What has taken place in the discussions has been the consideration, the most careful and thoughtful consideration, of two opposing points of view, points of view that were opposed at the time of and have been opposed since the days of the South African war: whether men should go overseas under voluntary enlistment, or whether resort might have to be had to compulsion. In all the discussions that we have had, there has been nothing personal between the former minister of national defence and myself. To the extent that each has stood for a certain point of view we have been standing for points of view that we know are held in this country at the present time.

On August 7 of this year a recommendation was made to the government by the chief of staff that some seven hundred additional men should be made available for service in Italy. When that recommendation was made, I immediately asked if its acceptance would have any effect upon our man-power resources, whether it would result in any shortage of men in the event of some special demand coming for the reinforcing of men overseas. The government was given the most direct assurance at that time by the chief of staff, with the Minister of National Defence present, that there was no need for considering the question of additional reinforcements for overseas by compulsion.

Let me go a step farther. In September, from the tenth to the seventeenth, if I recall aright, a conference was held at Quebec between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the President of the United States. During the period of that conference there were meetings held between our own chiefs of staff and the chiefs of staff of the United Kingdom. There was also a conference held of the members of the war committee, at which our own chiefs of staff were present and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, Mr. Churchill, along with the chiefs of the staff of the United Kingdom. That conference discussed questions related to the armed forces. It discussed matters related to the army, navy and air forces. The discussions were both particularly and generally mainly in reference to the war in the Pacific and what in that connection might be necessary.

One would have felt that, at a time when discussion was taking place on the reduction of the forces—because that obviously was one of the matters that was being carefully considered, if there had been a possible inadequacy in regard to needed reinforcement abroad for our army, that something would have been said of such a possible need. Nothing was said at that time which could give any member of the government of Canada reason to believe that we were nearing the time, or that we were fearing the time, when it might be necessary to resort to conscription to provide men for service overseas as reinforcements to our army.

I mention all this in order that the house may realize the impact of the shock that came upon the government a little later on, just as hon. members themselves must have felt the impact of the shock which has come to them in the last few days when they were told that they would have to face this question of sending men across the seas by conscription at this stage of the war.

After the Quebec conference there were persons in this country who began to make representations which were, to say the least, very distressing to the mothers, fathers and relatives of those who were fighting overseas and which must have been doubly distressing to the men who were serving in the armed forces. It was alleged that men in the army were not sufficiently trained and that, as a consequence, men were obliged to go into battle not adequately trained, or supported by men who were not adequately trained. I have always regretted that an immediate reply was not made to those statements, but it was not. I am inclined to believe that it was because the Minister of National Defence wished to be doubly sure before he made any reply. He had planned for some time to go overseas to visit the armies in Italy and Europe to observe matters for himself. Hon. members will recall that the minister had not been long overseas before he sent back word that he did not think there was any justification for the statement that men insufficiently trained were being sent into battle.

There the matter stood until October 13. At that time I received a cable from the Minister of National Defence giving me reassurance about the training of the men and stating that he felt perfectly satisfied with regard to the adequacy of the training which they had had. He stated, however, that he had become greatly concerned about the possible need for reinforcements and asked that I should see him as soon as he got back and arrange to have the war committee meet to hear his representations. He arrived back on Wednesday, October 18. That afternoon we had a conference in my office at which the minister told me that he had come to the conclusion that unless men could be secured very quickly by the voluntary method it would be necessary to invoke the National Resources Mobilization Act to send men overseas under compulsion. The next morning the same statement was made by the minister to the members of the war committee, and in the afternoon it was made to the members of the cabinet.

That was the first time that the members of the cabinet as a whole had had any thought of there being a probable necessity of men having to be sent overseas under Bill No. 80 to supply needed reinforcements. That explains why it took some little time before the discussions could get far enough for a decision to be reached one way or the other.

I want to make clear that the minister assured us that, as far as the records showed, the probability was that a critical situation would not arise until the beginning of the new year, but that he thought it might become acute at that time. I want that to be clearly understood so that hon. members in the house and people throughout the country will realize that, while the government has been giving this matter all the mature consideration that its great importance and grave significance necessitate, we have been running no risk so far as our fighting men overseas are concerned. I hope that it will be a complete assurance to their friends and relatives at home, to know that the time devoted to the discussion, which has taken place thus far, has not in any way prejudiced the position and security of our men overseas.

May I point out, as the former minister of national defence for air reminded us this afternoon, that this discussion came after five years of war under the voluntary enlistment method, and that it came on what was believed at the time to be the very eve of victory, of what we are being told from all sources would be ultimate victory, and that we were coming nearer to it every day. Do hon. members wonder that there was a difference of view in the cabinet at the time as to what was the best course to adopt? Let me say this, that the cabinet was quite prepared, once the facts had been la'd before its members by the minister, to accept the view that there was need for additional reinforcements being sent across. The difference that arose was one of method, whether in order to supply the additional numbers of men to reinforce the armies overseas we should abandon the voluntary enlistment method and accept full conscription under Bill 80, or intensify the existing system of securing the necessary reinforcements by voluntary enlistment. The question was: which of the two methods was preferable, or was there some way of meeting the situation other than by resorting to one extreme or the other.

I need not say that members of the cabinet gave their most earnest thought to the consideration of that problem day after day, and may I say that we were all conscious, at the time, of what failure to find a solution might mean.

I ask this house if it can conceive of any obligation that a ministry ever had placed upon it which was more onerous than the obligation to find some solution of this problem which would not involve a break-up of the government itself in a time of war. As I speak, I want hon. members to realize this, that new situations were being created within Canada which were very unsettling. A degree of unrest was being organized the like of which has not been seen in the history of Canada before, not even in a political campaign. One may condemn this movement; the day will come when it will be exposed and will be fully condemned. But in a ministry, unfortunately, one cannot escape the responsibility that attaches to coping with every situation that may arise, and a wholly new condition of affairs has arisen in this country as a result of the organized propaganda for conscription in Canada. A new condition and a very serious condition had arisen and it was one with the possible consequences of which the government has had to deal.

I want hon. members, in judging the action of the administration, to keep clearly in their minds what it was that we had to take account of. In speaking of what we might have to do if we had to act under bill 80, I used in this house the words that the government would act under that measure only when it deemed it was necessary and, I added, advisable so to do. Those two words carry great weight—necessary with regard to what was essential to the maintenance of our forces overseas, and advisable in the light of conditions not only in Europe but here in Canada and of what might be the consequences if we acted in any particular way. That brings me to what led to the resignation of the then minister of national defence.

May I pause to say this. It may appear to hon. members that I am disclosing matters that took place in cabinet council. I would not be going as far as I am this afternoon in these statements in disclosing what has taken place in cabinet council were it not for the fact that disclosures bearing on this matter have been made by the former minister of national defence, and were made known in a communication which was given to the press on the evening of Sunday, November 12. Up to that time, as hon. members will see by reading the correspondence between the minister and myself, I had felt that, following the constitutional practice with regard to the conditions under which matters in council could be disclosed, I would have had to advise His Excellency against permitting some of these matters to be made public. But once the disclosures were made in public my only decision could then be to ask His Excellency to permit the letters between the former minister of defence and myself to be published in their entirety. What I am saying to-day is based only on what has appeared in the publication of those letters and what had earlier been given to the public.

I might go at length into what was in the minds of the members of the cabinet in discussing this matter but it will be largely apparent to members what the arguments were. Naturally the members of the cabinet who felt that resort to conscription at this stage was not necessary supported that point of view by drawing attention to the five years of success that we have had under the voluntary system and to the fact that the war was obviously drawing near to a close. They called attention to statements that had been made by the Prime Minister of Britain that we were on the last lap of the war, and to statements made by other leaders as to what they believed would be the further duration of the war. I should perhaps make it clear that it was about this time that Mr. Churchill added to what he had previously said that the war might take very much longer to finish than was anticipated. That again had its bearing on the discussions. But what I think members of the cabinet felt in particular was that Canada after all, as the former minister for air has pointed out this afternoon, had played very fine and noble part in this war, that we had carried our just burden in the war very well, and that we had failed in nothing that was possible to make Canada's war effort a total war effort. What seemed hardest to understand was how, after all we had done and were doing to make Canada's effort a total effort, we should suddenly have either to accept or to reject this obligation of sending additional men overseas under conscription, with all that any decision was certain to mean. We felt very strongly that up to that time nothing had been denied the army from the beginning of the war which the minister of defence had requested as necessary for the fighting men overseas.

I can say this, and I am proud to say it. While I am not a military man I have relied with absolute confidence on the exceedingly able men of military experience whom I have had around me in the departments of defence. When they have come forward with recommendations, while I have asked time and again whether we might not be going a little too far, I have always, after the assurances had been given that we were running no risk in regard to the question of our army being too large or the man-power problem coming to be critical later on, sought to have the recommendations met. Along with the rest of my colleagues I have accepted these representations in the best of faith, just as, I believe, they were given in the best of faith. I have done all that any man in my position, I believe, could do to make our army as complete, and the position of every man in it as secure, as it was possible to make it. This government has not only done all that could possibly be done with reference to the army, but the same is true in reference to our great contribution in the air; the same is true of our great contribution on the sea; the same has been true in respect of our great contribution in the supply of munitions; the same has been true of what the people of this country have done in the matter of supplying food and other commodities that were necessary; the same is true in regard to the tremendous financial obligations we have assumed—obligations, may I say, much larger than most people have even begun to realize at this time. It is true with respect to what we have done in the matter of mutual aid to our allies, something which no other country has done in comparable measure; also of what we have done in the contribution to UNRRA to help to meet relief which is needed by those countries that have been under the heel of the conqueror and the oppressor. In no particular relating to the war effort anywhere have we done other than seek to make it a total effort, a maximum effort. Having done all that, naturally the ministers of the crown asked themselves, why must we run the risk of dividing this country over the particular request which is being made now and which may have such serious consequences; and that, as I have said, on what we are being led to believe is the eve of certain victory?

There was another argument which was very carefully considered, and it was this: what is the position of the war in Europe to-day? My former colleague the minister for air has said what I have said repeatedly, that if at the moment of the invasion, when everyone contemplated the possibility of life being unavoidably sacrificed on a great scale, a scale which at the time none of us could bear to face even in thought, our men had suffered great loss, lives had been sacrificed on a large scale and there had obviously been before our men the prospect of fighting on in Europe with their ranks depleted to liberate the countries there, I would not have lost one hour in bringing this House of Commons together and asking hon. members to support the government in sending the needed reinforcements at once, and I believe those reinforcements would have been granted without any division in this house. But what is the situation? Since the landing, which relatively speaking was carried through with amazingly small loss, France has been freed, Belgium has been freed, part of Holland has been freed, a still larger part of Italy has been freed, Greece has been freed; in Yugoslavia the forces which were opposed to and fighting one another have been brought together and are working against the enemy; the satellite nations of Germany—Roumania and Bulgaria—instead of being at her side, have turned against her and are fighting against her to-day. Add to all that that Russia has driven the enemy off her soil and has invaded Germany and is fighting on German soil to-day. More than that, United States troops, British troops, Canadian troops, French troops, all of them to-day in some measure are fighting on German soil and conditions in Germany itself must be appalling. Do you wonder that some members of the cabinet found it difficult to appreciate why we should be asked to make this further contribution; and that particularly in the light of the experience of the introduction of conscription for overseas which we had in the last war? The adoption of conscription at that time was responsible for more disunity in this country than any other step which has been taken in the history of Canada since confederation. With that example before us, do you think it was easy for any of us to come to the point of view that it was necessary at this time to adopt even a limited measure of conscription?

That, I think, gives a fair idea of what were some of the thoughts in the minds of members of the cabinet.

May I say further what was particularly in my own mind. I think it was true in some measure of my colleagues generally, but it was particularly true of myself because I have had to look at these questions as they relate to our national problems and our international relations. I had to think of what effect the taking of a step such as we are proposing to take at this moment might have on the future condition of this country in relation to the solution of its own problems and as regards its relations with other parts of the British commonwealth and other countries, and with all parts of the world. We are facing post-war problems on a scale that no man's imagination in this house, I believe, thus far has been able to grasp. We have the problems of the world organization of peace after the war is over. I have had to ask myself the question, what is going to be the effect of resort to conscription for overseas service at this time on the efforts that are now being put forward by Prime Minister Churchill, by President Roosevelt, by Marshal Stalin, and those associated with them, the greater and the lesser powers, to bring about that form of world organization which will keep the peace of this world, if our country, Canada, which has played the great part that we have played in this war, becomes divided. Our voice is not going to be a voice that will carry with it the weight and the influence which it was hoped, until a very short time ago, it would almost certainly carry in the solution of some of these great questions. This matter had to be considered in its bearing upon international problems as well as upon the problems of Canadian unity.

Let me continue with the discussion itself. As I have said, the cabinet were convinced by the minister as to the need of sending more men overseas. The division has arisen not over the question of need but over the question of method, as to how the needed reinforcements could best be supplied. A number of members of the cabinet believed they could be supplied by an intensification of the voluntary method; others did not. I will not labour the matter by seeking to outline the discussion or to explain why it was we took time and yet more time in consideration. Let me come to this. We had reached the point where we were agreed, at least, that we would make a further appeal by the voluntary method for men and see what response we would get to that appeal. But the point on which we could not get final agreement was whether, before we began the appeal, we should fix a date within which the numbers would have to be supplied, and make that date known, or keep it secret to ourselves.

May I say that any appeal that begins with a confession of doubt as to its success is never likely to succeed. If we had been obliged to advertise to those whom we were seeking to have come in of their own accord the fact that if they did not come within a certain time they would be conscripted, does anyone think that we would have obtained an adequate response as a result of such an appeal?

There are only two methods of obtaining results in matters that require governmental action; one is the voluntary method and the other is compulsion. When the Minister of Finance seeks to raise money for the country in order to carry on the war he takes advantage of both methods. He seeks to raise money in large sums by voluntary subscription, by voluntary loans; and if he does not succeed in getting money by voluntary loans then he has to raise it by taxation—compulsion. I have never heard an appeal being made under the victory loan campaigns—and we have had seven magnificent loans—which has been carried through by threat, the threat that unless the money was obtained by a certain date the people would have to bear extra taxes up to a certain amount at the end of that time. The same principle exactly was at stake in this matter. That was where, I think, we parted, where the minister and myself felt that we would have to part company. The minister repeatedly stated that he had not much faith, or any faith—I think I could go that far, that he had not faith, let me put it that way—in the voluntary method succeeding; and as day after day went by and we were still seeking to reach a course that would secure the needed reinforcements and keep us united, I was being told almost each day that unless we got a settlement the minister would have to resign, and would resign.

Now I come to the position in which I found myself as Prime Minister of Canada under those circumstances. Unfortunately, my good friend the Minister of National Defence for Air was suffering from an illness, followed later by an operation, and for the most part he was unable to be in the cabinet while these discussions were on. I missed him very much at my side throughout that period. I had to face the fact that if the resignation of the Minister of National Defence took place, the Associate Minister of National Defence would not have been here to take his place. But I had to face something more than that. I had to face this fact. All of us revered our colleague the Minister of National Defence, and may I say that many of us, including myself, personally loved him, and I had to face the fact that if he were to leave the cabinet his resignation would probably be followed by the resignations of other ministers. This is not something fanciful; this is something real, because the intimation was made very clearly that if Colonel Ralston went others would have to consider whether they would not have to go as well. I ask this House of Commons; I ask the people of Canada, where this country would be, at this time, if one minister after another, more particularly those who carried the greatest part of the responsibility of our war effort, had left the cabinet and I had been left thus handicapped with so great a load of responsibility for carrying on the war. The situation clearly was becoming one of utmost gravity so far as Canada's entire war effort was concerned.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that until I knew that it was only a matter of hours, at the most one or two days possibly, though I believe it was more nearly a matter of hours, that the Minister of National Defence would tender his resignation because we had not been able to agree on the last point to which I have referred—it was not until then that I asked myself: Is there any way of helping to save the appalling situation that may arise if the minister resigns? That situation I have just described. It was then and only then that I though there was one man in this country who might help to save that situation. Could I find as minister of national defence someone who the country had reason to believe had a knowledge of military affairs and knew the needs of the army, a man who understood relations between the state and the army which would also have to be considered? Until I thought of the one I did, I can tell hon. members that I had well nigh begun to despair of what could be done to save the situation.

It was then that I called in General McNaughton and told him the plight I was in, and the position of the government as I saw it, and asked whether he felt that by a voluntary appeal, which there was still time to make, we could find the necessary men. He told me he believed that they could be found, the numbers not being large, as my hon. friend the former minister of national defence for air has just said, and that an appeal launched in the proper way and carried on in the right spirit would bring forward the men. I asked him on the following day, or the same day, I have forgotten which, I had only two conversations with him, whether he would assume that responsibility himself if a crisis arose, whether he would come into the government and take on his shoulders the burden of making an appeal, with faith in it, believing that it might be successful.

I did not know then, and I do not know yet, what General McNaughton's politics are. I do not think he has been identified with any political party. I know him as a man of fine liberal outlook, of rare scientific ability and of great military experience, and I felt I owed it to the people of the country never to let this country get into the position, if it were possible to avoid it, where at a time of war Canada would be left without a minister of national defence and, possibly without several of the members of the cabinet who had carried on so large a part of the war effort.

It was when I told the cabinet that General McNaughton was prepared to assume this responsibility, that I thought that if we were going to make a public appeal we should lose no time because time was rapidly going by, that the minister said that if that was the case he thought he ought to tender his resignation at once, and it was tendered in the presence of my colleagues and myself. I received the written communication the next morning and I arranged to have the new minister sworn in on that morning as well.

Those are the circumstances of Colonel Ralston's resignation.

May I emphasize this fact to this house: That was crisis No. 1, a crisis which involved the possibility of Canada being left at a time of war without a ministry. I want to emphasize that. If one minister after the other had gone, if I had not been able to secure General McNaughton, who instantly brought confidence, I think, to the general public as he did to the ministry as a whole—had I not been able to do that, then I say this country would have found itself in a position where there would have been no government. Let me emphasize this fact further—this is something that this House of Commons and the country ought to know. I took great care to ask one colleague after the other, would he take the responsibility that was mine? I asked the minister of defence himself, would he take the responsibility of heading the government and putting through this particular measure? I was told by him that he would not. It is very easy, may I say, to oppose a position hitherto assumed by a government and to propose new measures, but unless men are prepared to back their policies by taking responsibility for their enactment and carrying them out, they have no right, if members of a ministry, to leave a ministry in circumstances where as a consequence of their action the whole structure is almost certain to collapse.

We all have responsibilities. It is not the Prime Minister only that has responsibilities. I have made it plain that my power as a Prime Minister rests on the power and support that I can get from my colleagues, and the power and support that I can get from my colleagues of the cabinet, in turn, rests upon the power and support that this House of Commons is prepared to give them. The power which this House of Commons has rests upon the power and the will of the people of the country. Any man who takes responsibility must be prepared at all times to carry that responsibility, support it to the last degree or else make his appeal to the people themselves.

Then I asked myself the question: Shall I dissolve parliament; shall I ask for dissolution and appeal to the people? What was the answer to that question? The answer was this: Will a dissolution of parliament help the men who are ready to sacrifice their lives at the front, in order that we may preserve our freedom; will a dissolution help to get the reinforcements which we have been told by the minister of defence are necessary at this time? I could not see that it would. Indeed I have made it plain from the start that I hoped that until this war was over it would not be necessary to have a general election.

Colonel Ralston had not been out of the government for half a day before some of the papers carried the headlines: "Is Mr. King thinking of a general election?" Yes, I could have swept the whole province of Quebec, carried every seat in it. I could have carried seats from one end of this country to the other, and I have not the least doubt that I could have come back to this parliament as prime minister with a good majority as the result of an appeal in circumstances such as these. Would that have helped the men overseas? Would we not have had in this country the most bitter, the most cruel kind of political campaign? And let me say this, because I think this is important. Hon. members should remember it. This parliament has fixed a particularly long time for a political campaign, a particularly long time, over two months, according to the legislation we put through at this very session, before the writs are issued and are returnable. Then there remains the further time for bringing parliament together. I hope that hon. members will keep these things in mind. Two months and more of political warfare while we have international war raging at the same time. Can you imagine a situation more cruel to the people of this country than to have anything of that kind take place at this moment, more cruel to our fighting men overseas? I had to consider that; but I had to consider most of all—and I am going to speak of it again later this afternoon—whom I would advise His Excellency to call upon to form an alternative government. If I were to recommend that parliament dissolve, because I could no longer hope to carry on, the first question I would be asked by His Excellency the Governor General would be: Whom do you recommend? Well, I could not find one of my own colleagues who was prepared to take that responsibility. I do not know whether any gentlemen opposite would have been prepared to take it. I wonder if they would.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You mean "resignation", do you not—not dissolution?

Mr. MACKENZINE KING: I mean this, that I certainly would have had to resign if I could not carry on, and that—

Mr. ROWE: You said "dissolution".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry, I mean resignation which probably would have been followed by a dissolution. The two are almost inseparable in my mind under the conditions of things as they are at the present time. And it is important that, as I say, hon. members should keep that in mind. The Prime Minister cannot hold office if he cannot get the support necessary, and I had to consider that situation at that time.

Well, having been fortunate enough to secure General McNaughton as Minister of Defence, the government then started to see what could be done in the way of a public appeal. General McNaughton himself began the appeal. Within two days after he had been sworn in he spoke at Arnprior, and he spoke at Ottawa the next night. I prepared an address that I hoped might help to clear the situation a little by making apparent how untrue and misleading were the statements that were being made about the N.R.M.A. men, the numbers that were involved, and the allegation that it was the Quebec men that were falling behind rather than that the situation was general as related to all the provinces. I tried to clear up some matters and to put the facts before the people, believing in the people. We appointed a committee of the cabinet to work with others to make plans whereby individual appeals could be made and made in an effective way. General McNaughton brought his officers from all parts of the country and explained to them that the policy of the government was a policy of voluntary enlistment. They have tried—or I believe many of them have, but I also believe some of them have not tried to get voluntary enlistments. That was the policy of the government. To make it succeed, all would have had to work for it for all they were worth.

How was the public appeal supported? The moment that we started on the public appeal, that moment the opposition to anything of the kind on the part of the interests that lie behind this organized effort to force conscription began to make itself felt in every direction—in the press, by meetings, resolutions by veterans' organizations, representations to members and so forth, with the result that instead of the appeal reaching the ears of the people, the ears of the people were dinned by the efforts that were being put forth by those who were determined they were going to have conscription no matter what the cost might be.

In the meantime I felt that it was desirable that this parliament should assemble. There has not been a day or a year since this war started when this parliament has not been kept intact. There has been no prorogation of any session until the time for each new session. There has been a continuing on and on so that the parliament of Canada would be ready to be brought together at any time. We have passed another motion this afternoon which means that this parliament, when it is adjourned after this debate, will not have been prorogued but will continue until January 31 unless dissolved in the interval, so that hon. members can be brought together again if another situation develops which calls for their presence.

I felt the moment had come when the people's representatives should know that there was a very critical situation. We could not take chances on all that was involved in this situation. What was more we had come to the place where we could not longer take responsibility ourselves without sharing it with the members of this house. And that is what hon. members are here for this afternoon—to share the responsibility either of supporting the present government in its prosecution of Canada's war effort or of rejecting it. That responsibility is just as great upon every member of the House of Commons, no matter from where he comes, as it is upon the Prime Minister of this country at this time. Every single member is either helping to make it possible for a government in Canada to be maintained in this time of war without a crash in the middle of war, or he is helping make it impossible for the government to carry on.

We assembled here on Wednesday of last week. Up to that time I had thought that our public appeal would succeed. Here again I wish to make clear that we were further encouraged by the fact that some little progress had been made; men were enlisting, it is true in small numbers, but once the move started I believe it would have followed through very rapidly. We were getting indications of what public opinion, if it were rightly guided, would have helped do, but we had to consider whether or not we could afford to run on much longer. As I have said, I believe with all my heart that a public appeal would have succeeded if we had received the support of hon. leaders opposite, if we had received the support of their following, if we had received the support of their press. Does anyone doubt that for one moment? I say we would have had the necessary men through voluntary enlistment but for the organized opposition that was taken to voluntary enlistment. From this time on, those who have been responsible for this organized opposition will have on their heads the responsibility for what may follow in the present and over the years.

It was in these circumstances that the cabinet met parliament and that I asked my colleagues to meet me the evening after we had concluded the first day's sitting. I had a special reason for that. It was that General McNaughton himself, in conference with his staff, had come to the conclusion that it might be taking too great a chance not to act immediately. That presentation was made to the government, and with it I made a passionate appeal to every one of my colleagues—I think I may so describe it—not to press for any extreme position; to be as united as they possibly could, yielding up the extreme position, whether it was for all-out conscription under Bill 80 or whether it was for no conscription, realizing that there and then we were face to face with a situation which meant that if we could not agree and could not meet parliament the next day in as united a position as was possible, the only result would be that I would have to announce, on behalf of the government, that we were not in a position longer to carry on because the division in the cabinet was so complete as between those supporting the one point of view and those supporting the other.

That was crisis No. 2; and it was in those circumstances, as a result of the deliberations of that night, with members of council responding to the appeal to do everything possible to come to an agreement, that we were able to agree on the passing of an order in council which, without resorting to all-out conscription, would ensure the men at the front being guaranteed the necessary reinforcements. We were able to give this house that assurance immediately by passing an order in council under bill 80 which would enable the government to take such men as were needed, men highly trained—and others that might later be needed—and send them immediately overseas. That agreement was reached, and when the house opened the next day I was able to lay on the table the order in council which gave it expression and effect.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am interested in giving to the house a statement which I think will be illuminating. This is not the first occasion on which a Prime Minister has had to tell the country how very critical a situation has become and what is needed to meet it. One of the most critical situations with which Canada was ever faced was just prior to confederation, when Sir John A. Macdonald was Prime Minister of Canada—the united Canadas, Upper and Lower Canada. Sir John in his day, at a very early stage of his career, was in the position that he had to consider whether it was possible for government in Canada to be carried on at all.

I have in my hand an extract from a speech made by Sir John A. Macdonald on February 6, 1865, to the parliament of Canada, when, on behalf of the government of the day, he submitted the scheme of the confederation of all British North American provinces. Sir John began by observing that the scheme had been received in Canada with general if not universal approbation. The subject, he said, was not new; for years it had more or less attracted the attention of every statesman and politician of the provinces and had been looked upon as being the means of eventually deciding and settling very many of the vexed questions which had retarded the prosperity of the colonies as a whole and particularly the prosperity of Canada. The matter had first been introduced into the realm of practical politics by Mr., later Sir, Alexander Galt, in 1858. The subject did not begin to assume its later proportions until the summer of 1864.

Let me now quote textually from the speech which was made by Sir John A. Macdonald.

It will be found in the debates on confederation of the British North American provinces, in the legislature of Canada, third session, eighth parliament, 1865, at page 26:

> Then, men of all parties and all shades of politics became alarmed at the aspect of affairs. They found that such was the opposition between the two sections of the province—

Canada under the union act, what is to-day Ontario and Quebec.

> —such was the danger of impending anarchy, in consequence of the irreconcilable differences of opinion with respect to representation by population between Upper Canada and Lower Canada, that unless some solution of the difficulty was arrived at, we would suffer under a succession of weak governments—weak in numerical support, weak in force, and weak in power of doing good. All were alarmed at this state of affairs. We had election after election—we had ministry after ministry—with the same result. . . . None were more impressed by this momentous state of affairs, and the grave apprehensions that existed of a state of anarchy destroying our credit, destroying our prosperity, destroying our progress, than were the members of this present house; and the leading statesmen on both sides seemed to have come to the common conclusion, that some step must be taken to relieve the country from the deadlock and impending anarchy that hung over us.

I give to the House of Commons to-day, Mr. Speaker, these words of Sir John A. Macdonald, as applicable to the situation in Canada at this hour. And when I speak of anarchy I use that term with the same meaning and significance that was given to it by Sir John A. Macdonald—a country without government. I say that unless this House of Commons can unite in reasonable measure to support an administration that can carry on at this stage of war we shall have to face the possibility of anarchy in Canada while our men are fighting overseas, giving their lives that we may maintain our free institutions and that we may have peace and concord through the years to come. Hon. gentlemen may belittle those words, but they are words, no matter to what party the one who uses them belongs, which are entitled to the greatest consideration that can be given. If, at a time when there was comparative peace throughout the world and Canada was on the threshold of her national life, there was danger that anarchy might develop in this country because the men of Quebec and the men of Ontario could not unite to compose their differences and no government could be found to carry on the administration of the country's affairs, how much greater is that possibility after five years of war, a war that still continues and at a time when we are in the midst of the most appalling phase of the struggle? How can you believe that there might not arise a situation much graver than any of us can begin to realize?

As I have said, that was the position under which the government decided to take the step it did. Let me make it clear that the step we took was taken under Bill No. 80. All that we have done is in accordance with what the government had said at the time would be done if a situation arose where it seemed to be necessary and advisable that such a step should be taken. We have been advised by the military authorities—as I have said, this question of conscription is a military question—that the step is necessary. I cannot speak of its being advisable except in the light of all the circumstances, but when I think of what may follow if this step is not taken, I think it is advisable.

Let me give to the house the statements which caused me to believe, and will, I think, cause the house to believe, that in this step which the government has taken we were carrying out our policy as announced to this house in 1942. So that there may be no doubt I will ask the house to bear with me while I read what I said at that time. I am sure that as I read hon. members will be somewhat impressed by what in all humility I believe was a measure of foresight as to the conditions that might arise before this war was over. What I am about to read was said over two years ago. We have been able to tide over some five years, but we come now to an hour of the war when I think this particular step is necessary. The policy was set forth in June, 1943, and it has been defined in the words, "not necessarily conscription, but conscription if necessary." And I might add the words, "to the extent only that it is necessary."

I spoke first in this house on this subject in the discussions on the plebiscite. What I said then will be found on page 826 of Hansard of February 25, 1942. I ask hon. members to note that date; it was as long ago as that. We are getting on to the point where it was nearly three years ago. I said:

> For our programme this year, and up to March, 1943, there is an honest belief on the part of the government that we will be able to get the men by voluntary enlistment for service overseas, and will not have to resort to conscription. But no one can say how long this war is going to last. No one can say what particular turn it is going to take.

Then on page 3234 of Hansard of June 10, 1942, I am reported as follows:

> Nothing, I think, could be plainer than that. It was made perfectly clear that the government had no thought of resorting to conscription for overseas service so long as the voluntary system continued to produce the necessary recruits; also, that we honestly believed the voluntary system would suffice to secure the necessary enlistments for the 1942-43 programme. The government, however, wished to be free, without any breach of faith, to resort to conscription for overseas service should that become necessary to our national security and to the effectiveness of our war effort.

If the bill is amended as proposed, it is not the intention of the government to resort to conscription for service overseas unless circumstances should arise which would render the use of compulsion imperative, such, for example, as the maintenance of the necessary reinforcements for Canada's army overseas.

That is the statement that I made in the presence of hon. members as long ago as June 10, 1942, during the debate on Bill No. 80. I have said already that I am not a military man, that I have to rely for these matters upon the advice of my military advisers. That is the advice I have received, that it is necessary at this time for the maintenance of the necessary reinforcements for Canada's army overseas that we do resort to a measure of compulsion. Then on February 25, 1942, as reported on page 830 of Hansard, I said:

The government is asking the people for a free hand in order that it may do in the circumstances as they may arise what is most in the interests of the people of Canada. We wish to make Canada's war effort as effective as it can possibly be made. What we shall do at any particular time will depend upon the course which we think at that time is necessary and advisable and most effective in Canada's war effort. That decision is not going to be made in the light of any one factor. It is going to be made in the light of all conditions as they exist and as they are known to the government at the time . . . that the government is going to do the thing that it believes is going to further to the uttermost Canada's war effort, all circumstances considered. May I say that when I say "all circumstances considered" I have in mind the conditions as they may exist in respect to the war in different theatres and the conditions that may exist in Canada itself.

Then I quote from page 832 of Hansard of February 25, 1942:

When we find that we cannot raise the required numbers of men for enlistment overseas by the voluntary method, and it is absolutely necessary to raise more men by other methods, then we will make our decision, present it to parliament and have it discussed on its merits.

Then page 3227 of Hansard of June 10, 1942:

While full and complete powers for the exercise of compulsion are given to the governor in council by the act, under its provisions, it is left to the governor in council to decide when, and to what extent, it may be necessary or expedient to exercise the powers thus conferred. This will be equally true of the powers of the governor in council under the act as amended. The discretion of the government will remain precisely what it is at the present time.

Then page 3223 of Hansard of June 10, 1942:

The government does not believe that, to serve that end, conscription for overseas service is necessary at the present time. Moreover, it may never become necessary. But, in case it should ever become necessary, it is surely the part of wisdom that there should be no doubt whatever of the power of the government to take the necessary action the moment the necessity to do so may arise. There should equally be no doubt that this power is derived from the present parliament rather than from a statute enacted in 1914.

The next paragraph contains the expression of our policy which I have used. This is to be found on page 4011 of Hansard of July 7, 1942, and it reads:

If, in reference to the very difficult question of service overseas, anyone can conceive of a policy which is better calculated to serve the national interest than the one the government has formulated, and which is clearly and concisely expressed in the words: "Not necessarily conscription, but conscription if necessary", I shall be the first to advocate its acceptance. I can only say that nothing of the kind has been proposed by any hon. member in the course of the debate. Nor do I believe that anything better can be suggested. Indeed, the events of the war, as well as all that has been said in the course of the debate, should have made it wholly apparent that, all circumstances taken into account, it is the only sound policy.

Having made clear the declaration of policy at that time, may I say that all we are doing at the moment is to carry out all that we were then pledged to do if the particular situation there set forth should arise, as it has now arisen.

There is one aspect which relates to the present discussion I want to make plain, and it is this. It was made clear by the government at that time that there should be no second debate on conscription. The question of conscription was settled in the debate on Bill 80. What I made very clear at that time was that if the government felt that it was necessary to act it would act under order in council, but that before the order in council would be put into force I would, if I were the leader of the government at the time, come to parliament and tell parliament that the order in council had been passed and ask parliament to give its support to the administration—not on all its policies but with respect to its war-time policy, so that, certainly in the case of one like myself who has been known to stand so vigorously for the voluntary method, I might know that there was no doubt in the mind of this House of Commons that I would see that what might be necessary would be duly carried out. To that extent I would wish to have from this House of Commons some expression of its confidence.

Let me read what in this connection I said in the House of Commons on July 7, 1942, as reported at page 4012 of Hansard:

If, at some future time, it became necessary in the judgment of the administration to apply conscription for service overseas, that step, it is to be presumed, would be to meet a situation which would permit of little, if anything, in the way of debate. Debate would involve delays at a moment when time had become a vital factor. Knowing that this is likely to be the case, had the government sought to postpone debate on overseas conscription until the hour of an emergency, hon. members might well have complained that on so controversial a question they were not being treated with the consideration to which the representatives of the people were entitled. It might have been said that their hands were being forced.

There is an additional reason why the debate on conscription for service overseas should take place upon the present bill rather than at a time—should the situation so demand—that the government may have reached the decision that the application of the compulsory method to military service overseas has become necessary. That reason is that the need would almost certainly arise in circumstances in which military considerations would prevent the disclosure in open debate of the factors on which the decision of the government was based. The government's judgment in the matter will necessarily depend, in very large part, on military information of the highest degree of secrecy. There is nothing more important in the movement of troops at a time of war than that all matters pertaining thereto should be surrounded with the utmost secrecy. Moreover it is not only Canada's position, and considerations of special interest to Canada, that have to be taken into account. Very careful account has to be taken of the hostile use the enemy may make of information disclosed, and of how far any disclosures on military matters may affect the position of every one of the united nations.

It has, I think, been made abundantly clear that, so far, at least, as the present administration is concerned, any decision respecting conscription for overseas service will not rest solely with the military authorities, but that any action taken under the present bill must and will be authorized by the Governor in Council. In other words, the decision will be the decision of the cabinet, subject always to its responsibility to parliament.

I have also already given to hon. members an assurance that all relevant factors would be taken into account by the cabinet in reaching a decision.

Then in the same debate, at page 4013 of Hansard, I said:

As to the right thing being done by the government at the right time, and in the right way, that, it seems to me, as I said in opening this debate, necessarily comes to be a matter of the degree of confidence which parliament and the people have in the administration charged with the responsibilities of carrying on the war. This does not constitute a reason for a second debate on the conscription issue. It is, however, the strongest of reasons why a government, once it has reached a decision that the needs of a situation demand a certain course of action on which opinion may be divided, should take the earliest possible opportunity of making perfectly sure that it enjoys the confidence of parliament, and that it may rely with certainty upon the support of parliament in giving effect to the decision reached.

I want hon. members to catch those words because they are significant. What the government is seeking to-day is not an expression of confidence in all of its policies, but we are asking the house to support the administration in giving effect to what has been decided. I went on, at page 4013 of Hansard:

Especially is this the case where widely divergent views have previously been expressed in the country, and also in parliament, on the wisdom of any discretionary power being given the administration; and where it is to be expected that differences will still exist concerning the wisdom of the decision.

If an administration is to begin to carry out its duties in the prosecution of a war, it cannot afford to be left in any doubt, at any time, as to the adequacy of its support by parliament, and least of all in a time of peril. The assurance of the confidence of parliament is particularly necessary to the leader of a government where there is the slightest reason for him to doubt the extent to which he may be able to rely upon the support he will receive in the House of Commons.

I followed with these words, which appear at page 4014 of Hansard of July 7, 1942:

I intend, therefore, if the time should come when the government decides that it has become necessary to send overseas men who have not volunteered for general service, and I should be in office at the time, to ask my colleagues to join me in seeing that parliament is immediately informed of the government's decision. If parliament is not in session, I would do whatever lies within my power, to see that parliament is informed as soon as possible after the decision has been reached.

I intend, at the same time, to see that, before the administration assumes the additional responsibility of enforcing its decision, hon. members are given an opportunity, not for any second debate on the question of conscription, but of showing their confidence or want of confidence in the administration.

In following this course, I hope it will be agreed that I am fulfilling the spirit of an earlier undertaking given to parliament on February 25, that "when we find that we cannot raise the required numbers of men for enlistment overseas by the voluntary method, and it is absolutely necessary to raise more men by other methods, then we will make our decision, present it to parliament, and have it discussed on its merits". The debate on the merits of conscription has, of necessity, come on the present bill. What really is important hereafter is that the government's decision should immediately be presented to parliament, and that the government should be prepared to stand or fall on its decision.

Just a few words more. I regret to quote at such length but the quotations do make clear to parliament the thought and the care with which a situation such as is presented was anticipated, and they leave nothing that is not definite and clear in regard to the government's duty in the course it is pursuing at this time. Again, at page 4564 of Hansard of July 22, 1942, I said:

When the government decides that it is necessary and advisable to resort to conscription as a method of raising men for service overseas, an order in council will be passed dealing with members of the forces as a whole. It will not be a matter of passing a series of orders in council, but one order in council will cover the entire force.

That is what has been done at this time, and it answers the question asked by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) a day or two ago. I went on at page 4565 of Hansard of July 22, 1942:

There is no submission to parliament with regard to conscription. Let me make it perfectly clear that, so far as coming back to parliament for any purpose is concerned, there will be no coming back to parliament for a second debate on conscription, nor will there be any coming back to get the approval of parliament of the decision made. When the government makes its decision that decision is made, and it will be carried out either by this government or by some other government. It will not have to be approved by parliament first. The question whether or not a ministry headed by myself will enjoy sufficient confidence in the minds of hon. members of this House of Commons and of the people of this country to administer conscription, once it has been decided that conscription for service overseas shall be enforced, is a separate matter, and it is a matter on which I shall wish to have an expression of confidence.

Then, at page 4625 of Hansard of July 23, 1942, I said:

If that is the case let me say that I do not wish to assume any obligation that hon. members of this house have not full faith in my carrying out to the letter. May I say this to my fellow-members of the House of Commons: I have shirked no responsibiilty of any kind since this war came on that I believed to be in the national interest. I have not hesitated to ask this House of Commons for any measure that I thought was essential in the national interest. . . .

I was taking a very grave responsibility when I came into this chamber and asked this House of Commons to support a policy which would carry Canada into the war. I had taken the greatest responsibility that any human being on earth can take, that of bringing his own country into the war. I did not shirk that responsibility because I believed it was in the interest of our country that we should take that step. And after three years of war—

It was three years then; it is after five years now:

—I ask my friends in this house to-night whether they think I was wrong in taking that step at that time.

I feel exactly the same about this matter of conscription for overseas service. Up to the present time I have not felt it necesary to conscript men for service overseas because our Canadians were doing honour to themselves and to their country by enlisting for training for service anywhere in larger numbers than we could prepare them. But I say to-night that, with the world situation what it is, with the situation between Germany and Russia what it is at this moment, the situation in Egypt what it is at this moment, the situation on the Pacific as we know it to be at this moment, I would be derelict to the responsibility which I bear to the country and to my fellow-members if I did not say to them that I believed it was absolutely in the interest of the country that the government should have power to take any step at any time that it deems necessary, so long as it takes that step in the light of its responsibility to parliament. If I am persuaded that it is necessary and desirable to resort to conscription of men for overseas service, I am going to support that view. But the minute I support that view, if it is the view of the cabinet, I wish to be able to come to this House of Commons and say: The cabinet has reached this decision; the next step will be to enforce it. Before that next step is taken I want this House of Commons to declare whether it has confidence in me as the head of the administration that is to carry out this policy of conscription or whether hon. members prefer to have another government in the place of the administration now in office. That is my conception of carrying out my responsibility to parliament. . . .

The people of this country will want to know two things: first, whether the head of the government that is carrying on this war has the confidence of the majority in this House of Commons, and second, where the members of this House of Commons stand, each one of them, not by their words but by their vote, on the question of the course that may be thought necessary by the administration in the winning of the war. And I intend, if it lies in my oower, to see that this House of Commons gets that opportunity, so that the people will know exactly where each and every one of us stands.

Then finally these words, as reported at page 462 of Hansard:

When this bill pases both houses, as I believe it will pass, and is assented to, the government will have been given by parliament power to conscript men for service overseas. That power will rest in the government. It will be there. The policy of the government is to exercise that power when it believes it necessary to do so, when it is necessary to resort to conscription to make Canada's war effort more effective. When the decision is made by the government—if and when it is made—that settles the matter as far as conscription is concerned. Conscription will have been enacted; the government will have declared that it is necessary for the carrying on of the war.

But the carrying out of a decision once it is made is a very different thing when a decision has been reached which places additional responsibilities on the ministry, responsibilities which must be faced by a responsible ministry in the light of all that has gone before, in the light of all that has taken place during this debate in this House of Commons, in the light, as my hon. friend the former Minister of National Defence for Air said this afternoon, of what is going to be the result of the enforcement of the order not only in the immediate future but through years to come.

I say, when all that responsibility is added to the responsibility already on the shoulders of the ministry, it is absolutely necessary that this House of Commons should say whether it is prepared to give its support to the administration to enable it to carry on with that extra responsibility, or whether it is going to withhold its support just at the time that support is most needed.

That, hon. members, is the position that we are in at this hour. This House of Commons will have to express its views as to whether it is prepared to support the present ministry in carrying out the provisions of the order in council which has been passed. Hon. members will have to take the responsibility which is theirs, with all the consequences that may flow from withholding support from the present administration, in the situation in Canada and in the world what it is at the present time.

That there may be no mistake as to what the order in council really does require, I shall give particulars as to its scope. I need not repeat the words of the order which is P.C. No. 8891; I think it will be found on examination that it contains precisely in its terms what in 1942 I said I would do. That order in council P.C. 8891 applies to all personnel who are serving or may serve in consequence of having been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Its enactment consequently accords with the procedure laid down in 1942, namely that the order in council deals with "the members of the forces as a whole". That is, one order in council covers the entire force. It was in reference to such an order in council that it was stipulated that the government would place the order before this house and that I would wish to be assured that I had the support of parliament in administering the order. The order in council authorizes the Minister of National Defence to dispatch overseas a maximum of 16,000 N.R.M.A. personnel. In calculating the number of N.R.M.A. personnel so dispatched of reinforcements men will be counted as N.R.M.A. personnel only if they have embarked on board ship without converting to general service. All N.R.M.A. personnel who convert to general service before embarkation will go overseas as volunteers. The additional numbers estimated to be required total 16,000, regardless of their status on leaving Canada.

The government, I contend, has surmounted successfully two crises. There have been two occasions on which the ministry itself might have been obliged as a whole to resign, with what consequences I leave others to contemplate. The decision of this house will determine whether or not there is to be another crisis at this time of war, and that, a crisis greater than any other that has ever been on the horizon of Canada. I hope this House of Commons will keep in mind what it is they are here being asked to do. Let me follow my notes closely in this: It is to support the men overseas, and nothing more than that—these men, some of whom have been absent from their homes for over five years, these men who have been fighting in Europe under conditions of horror the like of which has rarely been known in the world's history, these gallant brave young men of Canada who are offering their lives that liberty may be preserved, that human freedom may be preserved, that Christian civilization may be preserved. None of us can afford under any consideration ever to let any one of them down. When I asked this country to come into the war, I placed one solemn obligation on my own soul. It was this, that as long as it was in my power to do so, I would never fail to support the men who went to the front to fight; I have never failed them, and I am not going to fail them to-day.

It will not help the army to defeat the present government and possibly force a general election. I for one will not take that responsibility. Some one else will have to take it if I am obliged to resign. The government and the former Minister of National Defence are agreed that the army cannot wait for reinforcements for two or three months while any question is being decided at the polls. In the present situation every member with a sense of responsibility, who differs with the decision of the government, must therefore ask himself this question: "If I help to defeat the present government, do I believe that a majority of members can be found in this house who will support an alternative government which can carry on effectively the war-time duties of government?" For a responsible member, it is not enough to be prepared personally to support an alternative administration. He should also be satisfied in his own mind that an effective alternative government is possible.

There are only two possible ways of supporting the army; one is to follow the course proposed by the government, which we sincerely believe to be the right and effective method; the other is to replace the present administration by a government which can find sufficient reliable support in the present House of Commons to carry on Canada's war effort. Moreover, such a government would have the most solemn duty to see that conscription was enforced effectively before plunging the country into a general election.

That is the issue before the house. It is not the question of conscription; it is the question as to whether the present government should continue to conduct Canada's war effort, or whether the direction of that effort should be handed over at this stage of the war to another administration. In destroying the present government no one can tell who will compose an alternative government. No one can even say who would preside over the new government. We can be sure that a considerable number of the ministers in such a government would inevitably be new men without experience of our war-time administration; some would probably be men without any administrative experience; some probably would be without seats in parliament.

Any change in government involves a great deal of dislocation and inevitable delay in administration, and such dislocations and delays in every aspect of our war administration would be bound to be serious at this critical stage of the war. But it would be even more serious if it were found, after present government had been defeated, that the various elements which had combined to destroy it were incapable of agreeing upon an effective government to replace it. The country would then be without a government in war time. An election would be inevitable, and what would happen to Canada's magnificient war effort while an election of probably unparallelled bitterness was being fought?

The issue I have suggested is not a fanciful one. I have given a solemn and realistic picture of the alternatives which face this house. The government has made a decision we believe to be the right one in the light of our responsibilities. Hon. members must now make the decision which they believe to be right in the light of their responsibilities. In making our decision, we of the government have not been concerned about our personal or political fortunes. We have tried to make the decision which in the long run will best serve Canada and Canada's fighting men. The decision which rests with this House of Commons may determine the fate of our country for generations to come.

The hour has come to rise above considerations of party advantage and to rise above the emotions, often strong and honest emotions of the hour, and to make a decision, without regard for our own futures, but solely in the interests of Canada. Let us not forget that, apart from giving the aid they so much need, it will be the poorest support we can give to our fighting men to weaken or destroy the country to which they will return. We must support our fighting men in war, but we have an equal duty to safeguard their future, and the future of their country.

Now I wish to emphasize what I have said about the undesirability of having an election in war time. If I had been looking for the political successes that sometimes come by seizing a particular moment to make an appeal to the people, I would not have waited until almost the last hour of the last session of parliament to bring on a general election. I have told my followers over and over again, when they were pressing me to bring on an election because it was then the moment to succeed, instead of waiting until the last hour, at the end of the last session, that such was not the course to follow. When I came back from England after being present at the conference of Prime Ministers and, again, after the legislation set forth in the speech from the throne in this session had been enacted, they urged upon me very strongly that it was then the moment to go to the country. But to all such overtures I replied, "This is not a time to think primarily of the success of a political party. It is a question of what is best for Canada, best for our fighting men overseas. We cannot afford, if we can possibly avoid it, short of running beyond the period fixed by the constitution, to bring on a national conflict of opinion while this great war continues."

That is not a new decision. When I spoke to members of my own party as long ago as September 27, 1943, over a year ago, and as I have said to them on different occasions since, and emphasized, both in this house and out of it, I said that in my opinion an election in war time was not advisable and, above all, an election that might involve the question of conscription. May I read some of the words which I used on the occasion to which I have just referred. Speaking to the National Liberal Federation at the Chateau Laurier on September 27, 1943, I said:

> Speaking in the House of Commons on the morning of the day of adjournment,—
>
> 1943.
>
> —I gave to the members of parliament and to the people of Canada a very clear and definite statement of the position as I then viewed it. I knew that before parliament reassembled in the new year, there would be much speculation as to what the government's course in relation to a general election might be. I was anxious that political controversy, certain to develop in the then approaching Ontario elections, and the federal by-elections, should not, regardless of results, be allowed, if at all possible, to divert the minds of the Canadian people from an utmost effort in the winning of the war, until final victory was achieved. Accordingly, I set forth in unequivocal words, my own view as to the course which I believed it to be the duty of the government to pursue. This view I expressed in the following words:

"While our fears about its outcome have lessened, the war, in a more immediate way, has been brought closer than ever to us. All arms of our fighting services are now in the thick of the conflict. Our fighting men are certain to continue in action on many fronts, until the enemy has surrendered. No one can say for how long that may be. Our men face a terrible ordeal of battle. Until victory is achieved, above all else, they must command a singleness of purpose in our hearts and minds, and the utmost that our country can give in their support."

I see no reason whatever to alter the course there outlined because of anything which has taken place, in either the federal or provincial political arenas, since these words were spoken. Indeed, all that has since taken place, in the arena of war, affords to my mind the strongest of reasons for adhering with greater determination than ever to the resolution there expressed. Let me repeat its words:

"Our men face a terrible ordeal of battle. Until victory is achieved, above all else, they must command a singleness of purpose in our hearts and minds, and the utmost that our country can give in their support."

It was in that light, and in that light alone, at the time of parliament's adjournment on July 24th—

1943.

—that I felt any question as to the time for a general election in Canada should be viewed. I hold to that opinion more strongly than ever to-day.

And then the following on page 27:

I am most anxious to take the country as completely as I can into my confidence in a matter so all-important as a general election at a time of war. All I can honestly say is that I trust it may not be necessary to hold a general election before the hour at which we may look forward to welcoming back, to their homeland, those of that great company of the sons and daughters of Canada who have survived the ordeal of battle in the different theatres of war. Whether a general election can be delayed until that time, I cannot say. I have indicated to you, as far as, at the moment I am able to foresee them the circumstances that will govern the decision.

We owe it to our fighting men to ensure, by our united support, the success of their arms. We owe this no less to the memory of those men who at sea, on land and in the air already have given their lives; and to those also who have given their strength or their liberty that we may continue to enjoy the freedom we have, and to provide for others a larger freedom than most men have yet enjoyed. This can, I believe, be realized, if until victory is achieved, our fighting men command a singleness of purpose in our hearts and minds and the utmost that our country can give in their support.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I heard my hon. friend the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) laugh when I indicated that it might be difficult to find another government to carry on. He was not the only one, but his voice and accents are familiar to me and I caught it. But I did hear others along the same line. Perhaps they will not listen to any words of mine, but in reading the Conservative organ in this city shortly before the meeting of parliament, I think it was about the time the notice was sent out, I was very much impressed by an editorial which was published, and it seemed to me it was intended as something in the nature of an admonition addressed to hon. gentlemen opposite. I shall read it because they may listen to that voice where I am quite well aware they are not prepared to listen to mine. The article is pertinent to the present situation in this House of Commons. Hon. members will realize that, but do not think for one moment that I agree with what it says as to the position of the Progressive Conservative party; I do not, or as to the position of the government. What I am anxious about is that hon. members of that party should see how those of their friends who are looking in from without regard the present situation in this House of Commons. The editorial is entitled "Danger of Third Parties", and I have had something to say about that at different times, Mr. Speaker, which I do not take back. It is as follows:

One good may come from this crisis over reinforcements. The good of our people being shown the danger of third parties. And of groups.

Under a straight two-party system there would exist in parliament at the present time a single trained opposition, an alternative to the government strong enough to take over and carry on with the war in the event that the government resigned—or were defeated. As it is, what we have under this third party system is three opposition groups, plus other factions, with not a single one of them commanding enough support in the house to form or maintain a government.

It is no answer to say that the existing parliament is no longer a reflection of the mind of the country; that the Progressive Conservative party is vastly stronger in the country than in the house. For while that undoubtedly is true,—

And this is the part that I said I did not agree with.

—with the government's numerical superiority in the Commons hopelessly out of line with its position in the country—

There again I do not agree.

—that could be no help in a situation under which, in the event of Mr. King refusing to carry on, the Governor General would be called upon to name somebody to succeed him. In such a contingency, and assuming that the Governor General found it necessary or desirable to name a successor from some party other than the Liberal party, an immediate election would be necessary—necessary because no one of the other parties could by any stretch of the imagination command enough support in the house to carry on.

Under a third party system, under groups, it must always be that way. Either one party must have more supporters than all the other parties combined, or you have government by minority—which means government by log-rolling, by appeasement, by hand-to-mouth strategy.

Such a thing, bad under any circumstances, must mean impotence in time of crisis.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): There is impotence surrounding the Prime Minister now, all around him. Just look around you.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not responsible for all that the editorial contains, but it does bring home to this House of Commons and also may help to bring home to the country the situation with which we are faced. Let me say at once—

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The impotence is around you.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me at once make it perfectly clear to the house what the position is. It is a position that may arise this week. It may arise the moment that the vote has been taken. I have said, and I want to make it clear, that I will not for one moment seek to carry on with my colleagues the administration of affairs unless I am supported by this House of Commons in connection with the motion that is before us. That motion, as I have already said, does not, as I have been careful to state, mean that the government is asking for confidence in all its policies; it does mean very clearly that we are asking for the support of the House of Commons, which we shall need, to secure the needed reinforcements to support the men overseas at this time of war as well as our other war-time policies. That is all that it calls for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That motion was put on the order paper before you changed your face.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I come back at once to the position that will arise if the government is defeated? I think I have given this house strong enough reasons to see the situation that would have arisen at the time of the resignation of the former Minister of National Defence if I had not been fortunate enough to be able to enlist the services of General McNaughton as Minister of National Defence. I have given this house ample evidence of what would have been the crisis that we would have had to face had my colleagues and myself not been able to join together in the manner we did in bringing forward the policy on which we are asking the support of the House of Commons to-day.

I am happy beyond all words for one thing; it is that the responsibility from now on is largely off the shoulders of the ministry and is in an even greater degree upon the shoulders of hon. members of the House of Commons. They will be the ones who will have to determine whether or not this ministry is to continue to carry on the war effort of this country for a further period of time, and administer this order in council, or whether some other ministry is to take its place.

Now, then, as to another possible ministry. I want to show the house where I stand and what my responsibility is. I have a first duty should I find that I have not the support of this house—and let me pause and say this: I am not going to attempt to carry on with the support alone of groups opposite. If I cannot get enough support out of my own party to feel sure that the men of my own party are behind me without depending on those who are politically opposed, then my resignation will go in to the Governor General the very moment that my own—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Now you are cracking the whip.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. May I come to the situation that will arise when it becomes my duty to advise the Governor General that I have come to the conclusion that I should resign? How will I reply to His Excellency's question: Who is to be called on to form a government? May I just—

An hon. MEMBER: Bring in Bracken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. Did I hear someone say "Bring in Bracken?" I do not wish any word of lightness to enter into this debate. Am I to advise His Excellency to call on Mr. Bracken? Mr. Bracken is not a member of parliament—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Neither is the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —has never been in this House of Commons.

Mr. ROWE: Neither has McNaughton.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. As I said, has not been in the House of Commons. And when I think that what we are seeking above all else is to help men overseas in what is needed at this time, I have to ask myself this: Would His Excellency feel that I was justified in making such a recommendation for one whose duty it would be immediately to form a government?

Now may I turn to hon. gentlemen, first on this side; to my colleagues in the cabinet? I am quite prepared that any one of you should take this responsibility if the house has greater confidence in you than it has in me. No man in the world would be more relieved to be free of responsibility at a time like this than I would, after carrying on for the years that I have, at the age I have reached; no one would be more relieved to have someone else carry my responsibility for a time. Unless, however, you are prepared to form another administration, I ask you to consider my position as leader of the Liberal administration. Now I ask my hon. friend the leader of the Progressive Conservative party opposite; I ask my hon. friend the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth party; I ask my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit group, each the leader of a body of members in this House of Commons: If I go to His Excellency the Governor General and tell him I can think of no one but the leader of the opposition or one of these other leaders to take on the responsibility of government, are you prepared to assume that responsibility? Unless you are, unless you feel that you can present to the country an alternative government worthy of its support at this time, I think you owe it to this administration to support it in carrying on the wartime administration and supporting the army overseas.

Let me make this perfectly clear, because we are all here as the representatives of the people of Canada. I ask you, what position will this country be in before many days have passed if the ministry of to-day is obliged to resign because it has not the support of the House of Commons? I have gone through two experiences within this past fortnight which caused me to realize that there was a possibility that the pillars of the temple of our Canadian national life might be drawn out from under and the structure come down, bringing disaster to the whole nation. I do not intend ever to go through that experience again. If anyone has ever gone through such an experience he will realize something of what it means to carry the load of responsibility that has been mine in this time of war. I am not going to plead with any man to give me his support. Every man must answer to his own conscience, as I must, but I owe it to this country to let the people know in the clearest and most unmistakable manner what the situation may be if this administration is not supported.

Now may I say just a word in conclusion to my hon. friends from the province of Quebec. I have been told time and again that in my political actions I have been seeking to appease the province of Quebec or at all costs to retain its support. May I say that I have never, in any act of mine in this parliament, sought to take one step to please one particular province rather than another. Any step I have taken in any public act I have performed has been taken in the interests of Canada as a whole, not in the interests of any particular province. It is true that, to the best of my limited abilities, I have sought to have the people of Canada understand the province of Quebec. I have not reminded them very often, but I should like to remind them now, of the fact that if it had not been for the French-Canadian people this Canada of ours would not be a part of the British Commonwealth to-day. If the French-speaking people of Canada had taken the stand that was taken by the English-speaking people of the thirteen colonies at the time of the war of American independence, and had joined them in declaring for independence, there would have been no Canada under the British flag to-day, and there would have been no separate Canadian nation. That is something it is worth while for the rest of the people of Canada to remember. More than that, if the French-speaking people of Canada had not successfully opposed with force the armed forces that came against Canada at that time, this country would not be under the British crown to-day. And may I go a step further and remind this house that not only at that time was Canada saved to the British crown. In the war of 1812-14, when forces from the country to the south invaded Canada, again the French-speaking people of Canada shouldered their muskets, went out and met the enemy and defeated him, and saved this country to the British crown. So I say for this, if in nothing else, something is owing on the part of the other provinces to the province of Quebec. Something is owing to them on the score of chivalry, a people who have been in this country for three hundred years and more, who were settled here for a hundred and fifty years before any number of British settlers came to the country. Look back over the history of those three hundred years, during which they have lived peaceably and quietly, always helping to do those things which would further the prosperity of their people and of this country. Those people met the situation that had to be met at the time of the transition of this country from the French flag to the British flag, and surely something is owing to them for the way in which they have played their part ever since as a part, a large part of the dominion as a whole.

May I say further that if at times, though not as often as I should, I have sought to defend the men and women of the province of Quebec from the ruthless, unprincipled and often brutal attacks that have been made upon them by some people from other parts of the country who ought to know much better, it has not been merely because of my desire to see fair play and justice and to prevent a course of action which is indefensible in every way; it has been in the firm conviction that one who belongs to the majority cannot do too much in protecting the rights of the minority. This country is composed of minorities. Canada cannot be governed unless the rights of minorities are respected. This country cannot be held together as a nation otherwise. It is not only the French Canadians who compose a minority. We have large minorities here of other races as well; and the responsible leader who has to do with the administration of affairs of this country who does not consider the rights of minorities will never be capable of holding this nation together. Think of their position in relation to the war; let us speak very frankly of what some of our French-Canadian friends have come to fear. It is not conscription as such that they are afraid of. They have submitted to conscription already under the National Resources Mobilization Act. They have accepted that situation, and they are obeying that law. But they look upon overseas conscription as a symbol of domination by the majority. I hope my fellow Canadians will look at that aspect of it. They see, I think, the fact that for the most part they are French-speaking and of the Roman Catholic faith. On the other hand they see that those who are asking for conscription, those who will more or less have to do with command on the field of battle, are for the most part Protestant and English-speaking. Those are simple facts, but they express and account for a very great deal. If we want to do something that will keep our country together, we will keep that in mind all the time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a democracy, is it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to go any further with that subject. Speaking of my seeking to appease Quebec, let me say that in this parliament two or three steps have been taken which have been very difficult steps for me to take; they were certainly not taken to get the support of Quebec, but they were taken with the support that I had from the province of Quebec.

One of these was in connection with redistribution. I was responsible more than anyone else for asking this parliament to allow the question of redistribution to stand over until the war was over. Who stood to lose by that? The province of Quebec did, relatively to the rest of Canada. They accepted it. That was not an effort to appease Quebec; that was asking Quebec to join with the rest of Canada to prevent disunity and bitterness and discord. The members from Quebec and the Province of Quebec accepted it, and they accepted it in a graceful way.

I was the one who had the responsibility and duty of bringing in bill No. 80, the amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act. Bill No. 80 had as its principle the possibility of conscription for overseas. In bringing in that measure was I seeking to appease Quebec? was I pandering to Quebec? Look over in the opposite corner and you will see what happened after the bringing in of that measure. That measure was accepted by the great body of my friends here on this side of the house, but there were some who were unwilling to accept it. With that measure began the little rift within the lute of the Liberal party so far as this house was concerned. One minister from Quebec resigned; one member after another began voting against us, and to-day that rift has become wider and may become wider still in the course of this present discussion.

Am I seeking to appease Quebec when I ask this House of Commons to support the government after it has adopted this measure?

I hope I am not appealing in vain to my friends who have trusted me so firmly through the years that have passed to trust me again on this occasion. I think I know what is in their minds. They will ask me how I reconcile my attitude as a follower of Sir Wilfrid Laurier with my position to-day. They will ask me how I can take this action in the light of speeches which have been delivered from this very desk by the man who was my truest and closest friend through my whole political life, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. May I answer, not in my own words but in the words of St. Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe.

Let me quote from the first public address made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier after election to the leadership of the Liberal party. This address was delivered on August 2, 1887, at a political picnic at Somerset, Megantic county. I quote from page 355 of the "Life and Letters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier" by Oscar Douglas Skelton:

French-Canadians, I ask you one thing, that, while remembering that I, a French-Canadian, have been elected leader of the Liberal party of Canada, you will not lose sight of the fact that the limits of our common country are not confined to the province of Quebec, but that they extend to all the territory of Canada, and that our country is wherever the British flag waves in America. I ask you to remember this in order to remind you that your duty is simply and above all to be Canadians. To be Canadians! That was the object of confederation in the intention of its authors; the aim and end of confederation was to bring the different races closer together, to soften the asperities of their mutual relations and to connect the scattered groups of British subjects.

Again, speaking at the Monument National in Montreal on June 3, 1916, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

This, my compatriots, is what I ask—this is the entente cordiale I would have us achieve by service together. I have followed the ideal of conscience as prompted by my heart. Do not let us waver from the right line of conduct. I am older than most of you, and I am more than ever convinced that there is no real success but that which is based and has its foundations on right and justice and the generous instincts of the human heart. Let us unite to allay and, please God, to extinguish the prejudices that pull us apart, and do our utmost like real men and women to bring together the two elements in our country.

Come, my young compatriots, with these brave young men who offer their services—their lives—that France may live, that Britain may continue her noble and generous role and that heroic Belgium may be restored to her standing as a nation.

Those words were spoken in the course of the last war. To-day the call to my French-Canadian friends and colleagues is to a still wider service, to service not only for the salvation of France and Belgium but for the salvation of this world from domination by an enemy that would destroy human freedom and our Christian civilization.

Mr. Lapointe even before the war began, made a most realistic statement in the house to which I would ask you to listen. He was giving a word of guidance to his fellow citizens of the province of Quebec and to our country. It was given in relation to this very war, the fires of which even then were visible upon the distant horizon. This statement will be found on page 2469 of Hansard of March 31, 1939. It reads:

Canada is part of the world, and this planet unfortunately cannot be considered to-day as an earthly paradise inhabited only by benevolent and rational beings of an altruistic turn of mind. It is not an oasis rich in natural resources used only to benefit mankind but never to excite the covetousness of predatory powers. The seven thousand mile flight from Egypt to Australia of three British service bombers is fresh in the memory of everyone. It is quite evident that Canada is now well within the possible sphere of action of any military power of the first rank, should that power deem the action worth while. In this troubled period of history, Canadians cannot be mere spectators; they are vitally interested in the outcome of the tragedies enacted before their very eyes. Much of the bloodshed and misery that history records has been the direct result of honest, idealistic but impractical wishful thinking. There is no reason on earth why pious aspirations, unsupported by anything more substantial, should be more effective protection for us than they proved to be for Abyssinia or China; and we must remember that even the excellent Czech army proved inadequate when left without support. So I say this, and I want my colleagues to hear and understand me: if there is one chance in a thousand that what our experts say could happen may occur, I should be a traitor to Canada, to my own people, if I would not help to provide against it.

That was said in 1939 by the closest, the truest and the most devoted friend I have had in my political life. With how much greater emphasis would he, were he with us at this time, repeat his words to-day.

Mr. Lapointe at another time also said something that comes very close to home so far as I am concerned. His words are reported on page 961 of Hansard of February 24, 1941:

Perhaps I am more at liberty to speak than other members of the government because I would gladly give up my own place to someone else if that were the better course to pursue. I feel sure that those who know me well, realize that it is only a sense of duty that keeps me in the position I now hold.

I hope I can say that with equal truth myself. I should be happy indeed to have had some one take the responsibility that has been mine for so long a time. In years of membership I am now, excepting one, the oldest member of the privy council of Canada. I am to-day, excepting one, the oldest member in years of service in this House of Commons. For the past twenty-five years I have been the leader of my party and I am now in my eighteenth year of office as Prime Minister. In another few weeks, I shall have reached my seventieth year. As long as I can continue to serve my country in any capacity I shall do the best I can toward that end. But I tell you, honestly and frankly, that the load is getting heavier and heavier day by day, and to carry on at this time, I need all the support I can get from men who are like-minded in their thoughts and aims.

Let me read what Mr. Lapointe said about an expeditionary force. This was on September 9, 1939, as reported at page 67 of Hansard of that date:

. . . Much has been said about an expeditionary force. Let me say first that I agree with what the Prime Minister said yesterday. Applications are pouring in—and they are coming from Quebec also—from people who want to enlist. Far from urging people to do so, we have so far taken the position that it is better to act in an orderly way, to avoid confusion and consult with those whom we want to help. But if the need comes, does any member of the house think any Canadian government, whether this or any other, could stop the thousands of volunteers who would like to fight for Britain and France? Does my hon. friend from Beauharnois-Laprairie believe that a government, even if he were a member of it, could resist the pressure from all parts of Canada for an expeditionary force? Unfortunately, or according to my own view, fortunately, this country has to be ruled by one government, and no government could stay in office if it refused to do what the large majority of Canadians wanted it to do.

All that Mr. Lapointe prophesied there has been fulfilled. There is not a word there that is not even truer to-day in its application than it was then. No government could stay in office if it refused to do what the great majority of Canadians wanted it to do. This was an appeal made in connection with an expeditionary force. Here the appeal is for the necessary reinforcements for those who have volunteered and who are prepared to sacrifice their lives that our country may be spared the curse of nazi domination.

I have spoken much too long. Without further delay, I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by Mr. Crerar:

That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

Let me say of this motion, it does not ask for approval of order in council P.C. 8891. That order was enacted in strict conformity with Bill 80, and the government's authority to take such action was specifically approved by the vote on Bill 80 in 1942. The issue of conscription is not being decided by this vote; it was settled two years ago.

The motion does not ask for an unlimited vote of confidence in the government. To do so would be unfair to political opponents of the government who nevertheless are willing to aid the government in the vigorous prosecution of the war.

As I have said, the motion is not to be construed as an endorsation of government policies generally. So far as it relates to confidence in myself, that confidence is being expressed in relation to myself as one charged with responsibility of seeing that the policy set forth in the order in council P.C. 8891 is duly administered.

The motion does ask, and asks only, whether members are prepared to support the government in continuing to carry on Canada's war effort at this time.

Any member who votes against this motion is asking to have the present administration resign, and another administration immediately take its place.

Mr. Speaker, I am indeed grateful to hon. members for permitting me to continue until after six o'clock. We can probably arrange to have the evening sitting commence at 8.30 instead of at 8 o'clock.

Before we adjourn, however, I have one further quotation which with the permission of hon. members I should like to give to the house and then to repeat its words on behalf of myself.

This question of Canadians serving overseas which we have been discussing anew to-day came up for consideration for the first time in this parliament as long ago as the South African war. Even prior to that much earlier in a smaller way in Sir John A. Macdonald's day. But at the time of the South African war Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking in different parts of Canada, made to the country in a confession of faith a statement of what he stood for and sought to stand for in Canadian life. I should like to conclude by reading these words uttered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier forty-four years ago. They will be found in the "Life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier," by Peter McArthur, at page 97. The words were uttered by Sir Wilfrid on March 18, 1900:

If there is anything to which I have devoted my political life, it is to try to promote unity, harmony and amity between the diverse elements of this country. My friends can desert me, they can remove their confidence from me, they can withdraw the trust they have placed in my hands, but never shall I deviate from that line of policy. Whatever may be the consequences, whether loss of prestige, loss of popularity, or loss of power, I feel that I am in the right, and I know that a time will come when every man will render me full justice on that score.

May I repeat those words as my own, having in mind at this moment all that Sir Wilfrid Laurier meant to me as a leader, all that he meant to me as a friend, all that he meant to me as a great Canadian and a great statesman. I wish to address these words to this House of Commons to-day and I want them to be words that will be remembered of me by my fellow-citizens when I also am gone:

If there is anything to which I have devoted my political life, it is to try to promote unity, harmony and amity between the diverse elements of this country. My friends can desert me, they can remove their confidence from me, they can withdraw the trust they have placed in my hands, but never shall I deviate from that line of policy. Whatever may be the consequences, whether loss of prestige, loss of popularity, or loss of power, I feel that I am in the right, and I know that a time will come when every man will render me full justice on that score.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at 8.30 p.m.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is perhaps the most important and momentous debate that any of us who sit in this parliament have participated in. I think I made it very clear in my first remarks at the opening of this adjourned session how serious I feel are my responsibilities and how important are the decisions which we are to make in this parliament, both to our men and women overseas and their dependents, and to the nation as a whole. I do not know how long this debate will last, but I hope that so long as it lasts this house will behave in both word and action as though every act were seen and every word heard by the troops who are fighting overseas to-night. This is peculiarly, I think, a parliament of those who fight for Canada, and indirectly of their dependents as well. Nowhere else and in no other section of our people is the interest keener or the concern greater than in that section which fights for us and that other section which waits for our fighters to return.

If I may add this personal note, it always seems to me unfortunate that we of, shall I say, middle age are refused enlistment in the army because of physical disabilities, and that the flower of our manhood, people who can be spared so much less easily than we who have reached the midday of life, have to pay the penalty and make the sacrifice and give the dangerous service for those of us who have to stay at home. It is one of the tragic circumstances of war. It seems to me it is too bad that some way cannot be found whereby those of us who mean so much less to this nation could be sacrificed, instead of those who mean so much more. I dare say that every man and woman in this house have felt, at one time or another during this war, the sentiment I am expressing now.

This crisis, which is of course the reinforcement crisis, is one which the government itself could have met and solved had it taken the courage to do so without allowing it to reach the proportions that it has reached or disturbing and distressing our people, both here and overseas, in the long and tragic process. It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that a debate is now in prospect on a subject which arouses this nation's passions and emphasizes in some respects, perhaps, its divisions. But this is a democratic assembly. We, the representatives of the people, have a right to be heard. Whatever may be the quantity of talk in this debate, let us hope at least that the quality will be high. From the very depth of my convictions I express the hope that when this parliament rises it will be possible to say of all of us, irrespective of where we sit in this chamber, that when it came to a matter of dealing with the troops overseas, parliament was able to let the party bars down once and for all and deal with this question on its merits for them and for the nation as a whole, rather than have any of its decisions influenced, even in the slightest, by artificial party divisions.

Due care and concern for national unity should be manifest in all our speeches. We have to make a fresh approach to this matter. For some considerable time, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said this afternoon, the question of national unity has loomed large in the eyes of our people. I should like every part of this nation to know—perhaps they might be more difficult to convince than my neighbours in the House of Commons, because we know each other personally—that those of us who take part in this debate—and I should like to think that this is the unanimous consensus of the house—have no hatred in our hearts for any single section or part of Canada. Let us see that on all sides we do our best to keep any fissures in the national unity or any national divisions from growing deeper or wider because of things which we may carelessly say. Let us not forget that our enemies in this war do not happen to be Canadians; our enemies are the cruel aggressor nations of Germany and Japan; and let us conduct this debate with that thought definitely and properly in our minds.

Without indicating what in my opinion this debate should produce, or how it should be conducted, I would repeat the words of Mr. Churchill: "Let us keep our eye on the ball." There is still only one issue before this nation and that is the winning of the war. I have heard the Prime Minister speak of victory being a certainty and I saw in the papers that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand), addressing an audience in his own province, is reported to have made the statement last week—he must have had some information which the Prime Minister did not have, certainly information which we have not had—that the war was won. That seems to me to be repeating a fallacy which I think we have committed on previous occasions in Canada, because this war has not yet been won. Victory is not here yet, and the Prime Minister himself this afternoon went so far as to speak of the appalling phase of the war that has yet to come.

The public want us to do a job in this parliament and they will not be satisfied with a half-finished job. I think they will demand that the job be cleaned up and completed once and for all because they do not like crises any more than the government does or we do. They do not want any more cabinet trouble. They do not want any more delays in providing help for our hard-pressed troops overseas. I thought in some of his remarks this afternoon the Prime Minister appeared to contemplate the possibility of another crisis such as this. But as regards the order in council which has just been passed and which is now law, if we leave this parliament with just that order, restricted as it is to 16,000 troops for reinforcements from N.R.-M.A., I do not think we shall have completed the job.

Moreover, I think it was quite clear from the Prime Minister's remarks this afternoon that when further troops are required for reinforcements, over and above the limited number of 16,000, other orders in council will have to be passed in order to provide those necessary reinforcements. The order in council itself contemplates that very thing. How many there will be is of course a matter of speculation so far as I am concerned, but let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that when we leave this parliament with an order in council such as we have now, which the Prime Minister says covers all those men, but which does not dispatch them or direct the remainder of them, then we are running ourselves right into a headwind again and it is quite possible and indeed probable that we shall have more cabinet crises for this nation to take care of in the future, as we have had in the past.

Having that definitely in mind, while the Prime Minister said that it was not his intention to bring these orders in council before parliament for ratification, nevertheless if we are to have a cabinet crisis each time orders are extended, and if they are to be the same kind of cabinet crisis as this one, you may rest assured that we shall be very fortunate in this country if parliament does not have to be called upon to settle the dispute once more.

I say therefore that the job has not yet been done. More than that, the present government surrenders to a partial policy of overseas compulsory service which some have labelled in the newspapers as controlled conscription; but so far as the Prime Minister is concerned, with this change in policy on the part of the government, it seems to me that this order in council is very much like an unwanted child, particularly as regards the Prime Minister—and I make no personal aspersions in that comparison. Not only is it an unwanted child but it is in the hands of a parent who is reluctant to look after it.

I listened this afternoon with a good deal of interest to the Prime Minister's remarks, and I could not help thinking at times that we were almost intruders on the scene, because it did seem to me the Prime Minister was not always talking to parliament but was talking to a caucus of government supporters. As I listened to him I could not help feeling that his very attitude indicated a frame of mind, so far as this order in council is concerned, which I think is the kind of attitude from which one would not expect a very vigorous or enthusiastic administration of the order. It was not the bold, vigorous position taken by a man whose heart was in the order in council or in the legislation. A part of his speech I did not like because it looked too much like an apology rather than a support of the new legislation. Having that in mind, it seems to me that the question of confidence in the Prime Minister to carry out properly the terms of that legislation was left more in doubt this afternoon by his words than by anything that might be done over here to throw doubt upon it.

As regards the order in council, it is not very much wonder that we on this side of the house are desirous of having a full and complete job done. I shall not take the time of the house now to read the order in council which was passed when the expedition of Canadian troops went to Kiska. That order in council calling for troops from N.R.M.A. to go from Canada to the Aleutian islands and Alaska, including Kiska, was an all-out order, an order in council that did not deal only with 16,000 trained men. It was an order in council that did not pull any punches whatever. It was an order in council that put the entire N.R.M.A. personnel to whatever use was necessary in that territory or theatre of war. Why was it that the government did not do the same in this instance as they did in the Kiska incident? Why did they limit it? Why was not the same application made in this instance? I believe we are entitled to the same kind of order in council for Europe and the United Kingdom as we had for the Aleutians and Alaska. It would seem to me that we are in a much graver and more urgent position with respect to our forces at this time than we were on that occasion. When this order in council is contrasted with the Kiska order in council we find that this government has for some reason or another definitely pulled its punches and we, Mr. Speaker, are opposed to the pulling of punches in this last phase of our struggle in the war.

I believe it has been properly said that the present order in council establishes three armies for Canada. We have had a two-army system, a home defence army and a general service army. This order in council divides our home army until to-day we are faced with not two armies but actually three armies in Canada. As a matter of fact the time has gone when we can fiddle and fool with this kind of legislation. We should have one army in Canada, not three as the order in council now makes it. Therefore I wish to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Prime Minister that I join with those who have already expressed doubts as to where this piecemeal and appeasement policy is to land this nation.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Where were you in 1940?

Mr. GRAYDON: I was here as you were. Would my hon. friend, who is a good-natured interrupter, please allow me to finish my address. I tried, so far as I could, to avoid even interrupting the Prime Minister. If my hon. friend will only do the same for me I will appreciate it. I do not want my hon. friend to think I do not wish to answer the question, but he knows as well as I do that it interrupts my train of thought.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): You cannot answer it; that is why.

Mr. GRAYDON: In so far as the 16,000 covered by the order in council are concerned there is no real guarantee that if more than the 16,000 are required we shall be free from cabinet trouble or more convulsions of public opinion or more crises. I believe that the present policy is confusing; the whole nation has great difficulty in even understanding the purport and the language of this order in council.

There is another matter. After the dizzy whirl which produced a certain government policy last Wednesday, still another one on Thursday and still an extension of that again on Friday, I believe the public will be glad, if I may say so without offence, that the Prime Minister seems finally to have come to rest. But the lightning changes in government policy make it difficult for the people to keep abreast. It must be difficult for General McNaughton to keep abreast of the changes that have been initiated, because in the shuffle and various changes this government has lost two valuable ministers within one month and both for opposite reasons of policy. No single bold step has been taken with respect to this matter at any time. It has been a government retreat from trench to trench and from trench to trench.

I do not like to hear too much emphasis laid upon minimum requirements with respect to reinforcements. Too much emphasis has been laid upon the minimum and not enough upon the maximum. In mutual aid we went the whole hog, but on a more important issue we have gone only step by step and in a piecemeal fashion. It seems to me that this nation has not waged what one could call total war, despite what the Prime Minister suggested this afternoon, and this order in council does not completely cure that situation. It actually lowers the ceiling of pressure upon 16,000 men in the home defence army in the hope that some cabinet minister will be able to go into his riding and say that these have volunteered. It amounts to compulsion through pressure, or, as some have already said in the house, conscription by coercion.

It has been said, too, that the old policy of conscription if necessary but not necessarily conscription has now been changed to draftees if necessary, but not necessarily draftees. It may well have gone far enough into the area of overseas compulsory service to alienate those parts of Canada opposed to it and not far enough to satisfy those who see in its provisions a failure to go all out in solving the problem.

There is another problem that ought to be faced by this parliament and with which the Prime Minister has not dealt. When this war is over or when action in the Pacific arena gets under way, are those Canadians now serving in the European field of conflict to be asked to go to fight in the Pacific while men drafted under the N.R.M.A. remain in Canada? That is a problem, and that is a question which is being asked in letters which members of parliament generally receive from the battlefronts. The present shortage of reinforcements for units now in Europe prove conclusively, I believe, that another army for the Pacific war cannot be raised in Canada from the number of men available unless we use men now in service under the N.R.M.A. I think the government owes an answer to this question to the men now fighting overseas and to those who have been away so long in service.

I should like to make one reference to that long-term service. I fancy that many members of this house have from time to time received letters from overseas with respect to that. Some of these men are celebrating their sixth Christmas overseas. At least a dozen of my close friends, unless they are in this next group that come over, will have spent their sixth Christmas in parts other than Canada. It is perhaps a matter for criticism that only 450 men should be coming back on Christmas leave; I believe a great many more who are facing their sixth Christmas overseas should be allowed to return on leave. To those at home this may not seem such an important matter, but I want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that most of us do not like to spend one Christmas away from home even though we are still in this country. Think what must be the feelings of a man who has been overseas for five years, now facing the prospect of spending his sixth Christmas away from home!

Now if I may I should like to refer to a matter which was mentioned this afternoon by the Prime Minister. He dealt with a number of matters, and on one or two occasions I thought was somewhat careless and unfortunate in the language he used. Only a few days ago the Prime Minister asked to have expunged from the record certain statements made by an hon. member of this house; then this afternoon he went so far as not only to leave the suggestion but to make the statement that one of the alternatives to the defeat of this government and his resignation was anarchy in Canada. I do not know whether the Prime Minister had in mind the usual meaning that is attached to "anarchy," but in the public mind it might mean anything. Therefore I would ask the right hon. gentleman to have that word expunged from the parliamentary records, as a dangerous statement to make, because it seems to me anything could be taken from such a statement by a certain section of the public, anxious to pick up such statements made by prominent public men. The word carries two or three suggestive meanings which, even as leader of the opposition, I do not think I would be justified in using in this House of Commons. Of course that is nothing new for the Prime Minister. I do not want to hark back to 1935, because it may not have very much to do with this debate, but in the last week of the election campaign of that year the Prime Minister caused to appear on great billboards across Canada advertisements reading: "Elect the Liberal party. Let Mackenzie King have a working majority. It is King or chaos." We had to wait for nine years, but in the end we got both. I do not think the Prime Minister should use the House of Commons as a sounding board for another election cry, "King or anarchy in Canada."

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Nothing could be worse than bigoted Toryism.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I could just proceed with my speech, without my hon. friend interrupting me—

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): I repeat, nothing could be worse than bigoted Toryism.

Mr. GRAYDON: In this debate, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to keep on as high a plane as possible, and I should like the cooperation of the house in that endeavour. I did not think the government benches would deny me the right at least to present my case, without interruption, on such a major issue. Surely in what I have said so far in this address I have done nothing more than simply present the case as I see it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): There is nothing worse than bigoted Toryism.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman who has the floor has asked that he be not interrupted, and I must ask the hon. member not to interrupt.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Then let him watch his step.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am sorry there are hon. members in this house who desire to conduct themselves in this way at this time. I believe the great majority of hon. gentlemen take this matter very seriously, and I wish that could be said of all, because even in the opposition we have some rights to present our case.

The Prime Minister has brought into this house a motion of confidence in himself and his government, with respect to which motion I should like to say just a word. The right hon. gentleman made a strange suggestion regarding that vote of confidence. He said, "Of course it is not a complete vote of confidence; it is only a vote of confidence with respect to the administration of this particular order in council." I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Prime Minister that according to the Prime Minister himself this order in council now is law and in full operation, as far as it goes. The vote with respect to the order in council is a vote of confidence in those who are to carry out the terms of that order in council. I think we who observed the Prime Minister's attitude this afternoon were left with very grave doubts in connection with the present position. In the first place the government in its motion intimates that a vigorous war effort is being conducted by the government and speaks of the maintenance of that vigorous effort. But as far as we are concerned the policy of this government does not go far enough in the direction of total war. I believe the wording of the motion should be altered in accordance with the terms of an amendment which I shall shortly offer this house. More than that, I believe the course which has been followed by the Prime Minister in regard to this whole matter has caused him to forfeit the confidence and faith of this Canadian parliament. It is rather difficult to know just what the government has in mind with respect to this motion of confidence. The motion was placed in the Votes and Proceedings by the Prime Minister while the government's policy was the voluntary system; it was introduced in the house after the government had adopted the new policy of compulsory overseas service. That in itself, I think, is enough to cast suspicion upon the whole question of the position of the government with respect to the confidence of this parliament.

I want to make it clear and plain, so plain that it cannot be misunderstood, that we in this party always have been ready and willing to cooperate with the government in every possible way relative to the war effort. In a war-time period, with one party carrying on the war, there is a duty and obligation placed upon the opposition to see that the government gives the maximum service and efficiency in the prosecution of the war. The very fact that that is the position and the relationship sometimes leads to misunderstandings as to the motives of both. I want to say to the Prime Minister, and to you, Mr. Speaker, that this opposition is prepared at all times to give to this government, or to any government that may have the direction of affairs in this parliament, the cooperation and help to which it is entitled in order to carry on the war. But our great difficulty has been that this government has not gone far enough in the direction of total war. Our criticism has been directed largely in that direction and it will continue to be directed in that direction.

We want total war, but we have not been getting it from this government. I think the underlying reason for the lack of confidence in the administration of the Prime Minister is that he has not his heart in the legislation which has just been passed by order in council. It seems to me that he has lost the confidence of the house at this time. I should like to bring my remarks to a close by quoting the favorite newspaper of the Prime Minister. He used the Ottawa Journal as part of his argument this afternoon, and I wish to quote with approval from an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal this morning. I quote:

> If Mr. King and General McNaughton still don't believe in the compulsion principle, then are they the people to be carrying out this order in council? Here we have a minister of defence coming to parliament and saying to it in effect: "I am going to carry out this policy, but I don't believe in it—am against its principle". We say as plainly as we can that General McNaughton would show more of integrity, certainly more of logic, if he said instead: "I don't believe in the principle of this policy; you had better get somebody to carry it out who does believe in it." And that goes for Mr. King.

Mr. ROWE: What paper is that?

Mr. GRAYDON: The Ottawa Journal. The Prime Minister introduced the Journal into the debate this afternoon and I thought there was no harm in quoting it again to-night. I intend at this stage to move an amendment to the motion of confidence moved by the Prime Minister. This motion is seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and reads:

> That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and the following words substituted instead thereof:
>
> "This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice."

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, when we assembled a few days ago we endeavoured to approach the problem which faces parliament with open minds. We have listened to the evidence that has been placed before the house and have endeavoured to reach an opinion which will be in the nature of an intelligent appraisal of what we have learned during the days we have been assembled. To-night I shall try to place before the house what we believe as a result of the discussion we heard during the three days of last week.

I want to say at the outset that in our opinion the issue before parliament is reinforcements, not conscription. When the National Resources Mobilization Act was adopted in 1940 the government was given authority to conscript men, their property and resources for the purposes of war. In varying numbers and classes and for various purposes young Canadians have been conscripted already. As we predicted at the time, the government has not used the wide powers conferred upon it by the act to impose a total war effort by conscripting the financial institutions, the war industries and accumulated wealth. The outcome of the long investigation earlier this session into the chartered banks resulted merely in the confirmation of their special privileges and charters for another ten years.

Let us be clear then that the problem before parliament is not whether men shall be conscripted, but whether men already conscripted are needed and shall be dispatched as reinforcements for our armies now engaged in war, in Europe, the Mediterranean and Great Britain. Let me repeat, because I want to get this as clearly as I can before the house, that the issue is not conscription; it is reinforcements.

The principle of conscription was adopted in 1940 when the National Resources Mobilization Act was passed. As the Prime Minister suggested this afternoon, the plebiscite gave approval to the members of this house as well as to the government to send conscripted men beyond the boundaries of this country if necessary. When bill No. 80 was adopted subsequently the government was given the right to use reinforcements if, as and when needed.

We have held the view throughout that when human beings are compelled to lay their lives on the altar of our national sacrifice, industry, the financial institutions and accumulated wealth should be compelled to do the same thing at the same time and on the same terms. But parliament has not accepted that policy which, may I say, had we been in power would have been put into effect several years ago, and should be put into effect now to secure some equality of sacrifice to win the war and to ensure adequate preparations for full employment when the war ends.

Because this was not done, the present situation faces us. Total war at least would have demanded that a thorough inventory should have been taken long ago of all our resources. We should have decided the best contribution that this country could make and then decided what man-power we should need to expand our agricultural and industrial activities and to maintain an army, navy and air force at an appropriate strength in the theatres of war. This was never done.

A gesture was made when Canadians were compelled to register in 1940, but no effective use was ever made of the result and no comprehensive appraisal was ever made of our economic resources or of our anticipated contributions in the economic field. For many months we received orders for goods from our own armed services and from our allies, while our military commitments were expanded regardless of what might be expected of us in other fields. We have now reached the position in which, under similar circumstances, Canada found herself in 1917.

But all that is gone and done. We are now faced with an immediate problem. When, shortly after the member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) resigned as Minister of National Defence, I urged the calling of parliament. I did so because I regarded the matter of reinforcements as so vital that parliament, and not alone the government, should be apprised of the situation in all its aspects and take responsibility for all that should be done. In other words, the problem is the responsibility not of the government alone but of this parliament as a whole.

I think members of the house will agree with me—and perhaps we have received some criticism because we have remained silent—that we took no part in the recent discussion throughout the country based on supposition and on rumour. We joined in no chorus of the hymn of hate against conscripted men who had not volunteered for service overseas. We know there are among those young men ones who should have come forward. But let us not forget that there are some among them known to me, and I am certain to some members sitting in all parts of this house, whose sick or aged parents on the farm or in other circumstances require their assistance at various times and at various seasons. As long as they remained in Canada, leave for such purposes was always a possibility. To my certain knowledge some of these men have been torn between their duty to their country and the necessities of their homes, sometimes involving, too, a consideration of the needs of the country in the production of foodstuffs and other supplies. It is quite possible that under the order in council passed last week such men will still be torn between their sense of duty in one direction or the other. They may still wait until the vital decision is made for them, and in the meantime I am afraid they will be subjected to all the epithets which some persons and some sections of the press may hurl at them. I have no desire to defend men who are not doing their duty, but I must in justice to-night draw the attention of the house to a condition which we know to exist in the defence army.

Then, too, the order in council extends the service of the home defence army to Britain, Europe and the Mediterranean area. What the decision was that was arrived at Quebec regarding the use of Canadian troops in the Pacific area, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) implied a few minutes ago, we simply do not know. We have learned from the press that we are to take part in the war against Japan. But what Canadian troops are to be used there? Are the men who have spent five years abroad going to proceed to that theatre of war, and how large a force is contemplated? In any event whatever army is sent, reinforcements will be needed for it. Where and how are they to be secured?

The government says that it hopes to obtain the 16,000 reinforcements needed now from volunteers from the N.R.M.A. men. But some may not volunteer because by compulsion they will be available for service only in the United Kingdom, in Europe and in the Mediterranean area and will not be obliged to serve in the Pacific war as general service volunteers may be. The question of the Pacific war and the part we are expected to play in it was one I intended to ask about in a private sitting because it obviously is a problem which has a bearing on the problem now before us.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that too many questions remain unanswered as it is. General McNaughton told us that 16,000 reinforcements would take us up to the month of May, and in reply to the hon. member for Prince he said that in May the reinforcement pool would be substantial. He told us that he had a table which he wanted to place before the house but could not do so in a public sitting because the enemy could deduce from it our expected casualties and hence deduce also the plans of our armies and indeed those of our allies during the next few months. The former Minister of National Defence, who of course is in possession of figures not available to private members on the government benches, although they may be later figures than those used by the present Minister of National Defence, which are not available to hon. members, was I thought obviously not satisfied with General McNaughton's assurances. Yet because the official opposition objected to receiving vital information in private sittings of the house we are not in possession of all the facts. To say that in war time this house should have no more information upon which to base its judgment than the general public has is in my opinion a view which is utterly irresponsible. Since the government is but the executive responsible to parliament, logically the official opposition should also refuse to allow the government to withhold any secret information regarding military operations from the house in public session. But the public examination of General McNaughton convinced me that reinforcements are needed and that for various reasons, some of which I have already given, the voluntary system of raising reinforcements for our forces overseas is inadequate. Let us be frank about it. All parties represented in this house repudiated in 1940 the policy of conscription of men for overseas service—all parties. There were no exceptions.

An hon. MEMBER: The Social Crediters.

Mr. JAQUES: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is wrong. I fought an election on that question.

Mr. COLDWELL: We shall see if I am wrong. I have in my hand two statements issued by my hon. friends to the left. One was issued in Edmonton on October 23, 1939, after a caucus of the Social Credit members of which my hon. friend the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) was chairman. He issued the statement, which contained three points, and the third point was this:

To this end the conscription of money and material wealth as defined below—

And a definition is given below.

—be made effective without unnecessary delay and before the conscription of man-power is considered.

Afterwards the leader of the party, Premier Aberhart of Alberta, thought it necessary to issue another public statement. This is what he said on May 1, 1940:

The Alberta followers of the New Democracy movement were definitely opposed to conscription of man-power and so declared themselves.

It was Major Herridge's persistence in this national service idea that placed him outside the New Democracy movement and lost him his election.

Major Herridge is no longer regarded in Alberta as the New Democracy leader, and he will be obliged to seek other followers for his national service policy outside the ranks of New Democracy supporters.

The New Democracy movement is definitely opposed to Major Herridge's national service proposals, and the conscription of man-power.

Let us be frank about it; all parties represented in this house repudiated conscription of man-power for overseas service in 1940. There were no exceptions. Now, the support we owe the gallant men in the firing lines demands immediate reinforcement. Whatever that support entails must be undertaken. That is our view; and we therefore place it before the house in the form of a subamendment, moved by myself, seconded by Mr. MacInnis:

That all the words of the amendment after the word "that" in the first line thereof be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"The following words be added to the motion: which in the opinion of this house requires the immediate removal of all distinctions between drafted and volunteer personnel, thus making the entire home defence army available for reinforcements overseas, and requires further the total mobilization of all the resources of Canada, material and financial as well as human, to ensure a total war effort, adequate reestablishment of the members of our fighting forces, and full employment after the war."

From the discussion last week we cannot accept the order in council as a sound or proper policy to meet the needs of the armed forces. If 16,000 trained men are required between now and next May; if, as now seems likely, the war against Germany is prolonged beyond that time, and if, as has been intimated, we are obligated to play some part in the war against Japan, further reinforcements will be needed. Why then pass an order in council which fails to do all that may be necessary and satisfies no one? To my mind it looks less than adequate and certainly is not statesmanlike in this grave hour. If it is done to placate the anti-conscriptionist followers of the government, it fails miserably; and if it is done to assure our armies of vigorous support in the war effort, it fails equally. To my mind the government has merely invited the obvious criticism that it is trying to play politics through a great war crisis when statesmanship of the highest order was demanded. If the government had come to parliament and stated frankly that unexpected casualties in the infantry had made it necessary to make available the N.R.M.A. army for immediate and subsequent reinforcement and presented the facts as they were partly given to the house by General McNaughton last week, they would have had the respect of the entire country and of all hon. members who have come to this house with unbiased minds. As it is, they have largely forfeited that respect.

The leader of the opposition said that instead of having two armies, we were going to have three. No, we are not. Instead of having two armies we are going to have four. First, there are the general service men who have already volunteered for service anywhere. Second, there will be those among the 16,000 trained men in the home defence army who, under the threat of compulsory service, will volunteer now for service. Third, there are the men of the same army who do not volunteer but are going to be drafted for service in the United Kingdom, Europe and the Mediterranean. Fourth, the fifty-two thousand or so who are in the home defence forces in Canada. Then, there will be three types of service men actually in the battle line. There will be general service men; there will be new volunteers from draftees, and there will be men drafted to the fighting front. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is confusion worse confounded and is a policy which neither this house nor the country can support. That is why our amendment seeks to change the policy into one which removes all distinctions as to service and to benefits, and that to some degree is where our amendment differs from the amendment of the official opposition. Indeed, it differs in other respects too, because we leave the government's main motion in and amend it, giving particulars of what we think is a vigorous war effort. The government's policy is bad because it discriminates between men who have been called to serve under the same law and under the same conditions. This will cause endless confusion now and, in my opinion, grave difficulties in the future.

Since it is obvious that sufficient reinforcements can be obtained only in one way, why not place all the men on the same footing? If we are ordering 16,000 home defence personnel overseas, all in the same category should be liable to the same service and should be treated on exactly the same basis. Then there could be no sense of discrimination. But if parliament exercises such a power it merely emphasizes anew the obligations which it has to all the fighting forces and which it has made no proper preparations to fulfil. So far no adequate steps have been taken to ensure a total war effort, nor has this parliament made adequate reestablishment proposals involving plans for full employment when the war ends. Indeed, certain men are being led to believe officially that their return to civil life now will give them the first choice of jobs which will be difficult to obtain, when general demobilization takes place and the labour market becomes congested. Throughout the war fear of post-war conditions has interfered with recruiting and the government has neither plan nor policy to remove or even to mitigate to a sufficient extent this fear. How, then, can this house be expected to vote confidence in the government's policy—for that is what the motion says—to maintain a vigorous war effort when its proposals in all respects fall far short of obvious requirements?

I have said something regarding the government's policy, and I have tried to sum up the conclusions to which we came after having listened to the questions and the answers thereto last week. As to the official opposition as the alternative to the government, may I say, Mr. Speaker, that their own irresponsibility during this controversy and this debate makes it impossible for this house or the country to place any confidence in their intentions or ability. Personally, I think theirs has been a really shocking display of political manoeuvring. Some of their highly placed friends and a section of the press supporting them have done their best to inflame sectional differences and hatreds. Some of their pleas for support of the splendid and brave men who are serving this country on land, in the air, and on the sea have to me a hollow sound. They and their friends said the same things after the last war, but when the war was over how did they treat the boys who came back? They were in power, too, from 1930 to 1935. How did they treat the thousands of boys, the men who are fighting this country's battles to-day?

Seven weeks ago to-morrow two of my colleagues and I visited the Canadian cemetery at Dieppe. There, on a pleasant slope looking toward the setting sun, we saw hundreds of white crosses row on row. The place was beautifully kept, but not all of the crosses had yet been lettered. I knew that some of the boys whom I had known and taught had found their last resting place in that foreign field. We walked up and down the rows reading the names, and I noted this. They lay together there irrespective of race, tongue or creed. Here was a boy whose name told of his British origin while next was a lad whose name was of French or Ukrainian or even of German origin. There were many, many names, Mr. Speaker, that told me the boys that lay there came from the province of Quebec; many, many names of boys from my prairie province and other parts of Canada; and of course I was particularly interested in the names of those who perished in the South Saskatchewan Regiment and in the Winnipeg Rifles. I knew that among them were boys who had probably been condemned to the relief camps and had ridden the rods. Some perhaps in their bitter hunger and distress had joined the trek to Ottawa in 1935 when my hon. friends of the Conservative party were in power. Then they asked for the right to live, the right to earn their daily bread, and the government of my hon. friends gave them tear-gas bombs. Thus, knowing the record of the Conservative party, I assess their present pleas and I rather think the country and our fighting men and women will assess them too.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Another thought I had as I viewed those crosses. Here I saw young men, the very flower of our manhood, lying together united in death. There was no distinction there of race or creed or colour. They were just Canadian lads who had died for their country. Why, oh why cannot we who are left behind in this country, to enjoy the freedom for which they died, live together? Those who in the midst of war engage in the setting of race against race, creed against creed and colour against colour in this land are in my opinion unworthy of the living and the dead.

Before I sit down may I say something else in connection with the visit we paid across the seas two months ago when we saw those splendid Canadian boys. We saw how brilliantly they were led, we saw how finely they behaved. We heard from Belgian and French people whom we met how highly they were respected, and we got a great thrill as we drove all the several hundred miles from Brussels right through the battle areas to see everywhere signpoints with the arrow on the maple leaf of Canada.

May I say here, too, Mr. Speaker, that these boys whom we are talking of reinforcing overseas, suffering as they are, are well cared for when they are wounded or sick. Our hospitals are a credit to Canada, to the doctors who man them, to the stretcher-bearers and to the gallant little nurses who do the job of tending the wounded at the battlefront. I thought I should just like to interject these words.

In conclusion, let me say this. For ourselves in this party we intend to give all the support we can to those who are fighting our battles overseas, in regard to reinforcements, whatever that involves, then to provide decently for those loved ones they leave behind and to prepare for those who return a Canada in which they may find security and opportunities for the free and abundant life for which they believe they fight beyond the seas.

Mr. Speaker, if we fail in this, their sacrifices, their suffering and their victory will have been again in vain.

Mr. SPEAKER: It has been moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar:

That all the words of the amendment after the word "that" in the first line thereof be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"The following words be added to the motion: which in the opinion of this house requires the immediate removal of all distinctions between drafted and volunteer personnel, thus making the entire home defence army available for reinforcements overseas, and requires further the total mobilization of all the resources of Canada, material and financial as well as human, to ensure a total war effort, adequate reestablishment of members of our fighting forces, and full employment after the war."

May I point out to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that this is really an amendment to the motion and not a subamendment to the amendment that has already been moved.

The hon. gentleman has moved an addition to the motion without dealing with the terms of the amendment which has been moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Graydon). I should like his comments on that.

Mr. COLDWELL: My amendment reads:

That all the words of the amendment after the word "that" in the first line thereof be struck out—

That removes the amendment to the motion except the word "that." I then go on to say:

—and the following substituted therefor: The following words be added to the motion.

These words restore the main motion which Mr. Graydon's amendment has struck out, and then the other words:

which in the opinion of this house . . .

And so on are added to the motion when it is restored.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak on it? If not, I will consider the matter further in the light of what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): We are really discussing a resolution which reads as follows:

That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), wisely took pains to define what he meant by government policy. He made it clear that he meant only the order in council which undertakes to send overseas by coercion some 16,000 N.R.M.A. men. Had he not so specified the house would have taken the resolution at its face value and it would have concluded, I would presume, that we were to support the whole of the government's policy in connection with the conduct of the war. Now, what apparently does that policy mean, Mr. Speaker? It is really altogether too bad that the Canadian people have been exercised so deeply over the conscription issue. Let no one imagine for a moment that we do not stand for the adequate support of the boys overseas. But it is a terrible pity, with all the other monstrous dangers which are threatening the Canadian people at the present time and which ought to be exercising them to the very depths of their being, that not a word is being said about any of those things, but the attention of the people is being concentrated on 16,000 men. This, I am afraid, indicates pure politics. As I said when we first arrived at Ottawa we were going to listen and endeavour to find out what was underneath all of this. The behaviour of the Progressive Conservatives has impressed me also, as it did the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

I must say that there are several things about this whole situation that fill me with misgiving. I believe it was on November 14 or 15 that, according to press reports, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) journeyed to Chicago and made a remark which certainly indicated to me that there was a good deal more politics under this whole crisis than there was real need for men; the speech of the former Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) this afternoon gave a certain amount of support to that idea, and the speech of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) not very long ago gave another hint that there were men in the cabinet who were not very much impressed by the urgent need for men. I do not know and the ordinary citizen on the street in the Dominion of Canada does not know. He has to depend on the men in public life to inform him regarding these matters. But on the face of it, it does look strange that this nation should have been exercised from coast to coast over the matter of conscription at the present time when issues which will affect our lives and liberties for generations are not even being mentioned in the press.

What would government policy apparently stand for if the Prime Minister had not accurately defined it to-day? Here are some of the things: the debt structure which he mentioned this afternoon as having already attained alarming proportions. Yet almost at the time when this crisis developed over conscription we were adding to the indebtedness of this nation in terms of billions and everyone was being led to believe that by so doing we were performing a patriotic act. What were we doing? We were building up a vast debt which the boys will return from overseas after fighting the war and pay for. Yet we are supposed to be doing these things for the boys overseas. It needs some explaining.

Then the government stands for a taxation structure which is tyrannical and destructive. Yet we are not agitated against that as you would think the papers should agitate us. The newspapers seem to feel that is all right, and the public men seem to think it is all right.

Yet we are being told in stray radio speeches by someone every once in a while who gets to use the radio that we must be prepared to keep the income tax just where it is after the war. That is serious. Another aspect of government policy is insecurity. Apparently it is going to prevail after the war for no provision has been made up to the present time for any change whatsoever in our economic or financial system which would justify anyone in supposing that conditions are going to be better after the war than they were before. Also centralization of power has proceeded in Canada and is being advocated in the world at a rate that would alarm anyone if he could only be allowed to see how serious it is. Yet never a word is uttered in the newspapers about that, and it probably will take away from the boys the very thing they are fighting and giving their lives for. This is a dreadfully serious matter. Why is it that we are not told all over this country by the newspapers that Canada's sovereignty is to be destroyed? Why is it that the newspapers are not telling us that the government is apparently definitely aiming to destroy the British empire, to disintegrate it? We hear nothing about that. Why is it that we do not hear anything at all about the fact that when we finish with this war, as far as the set-up which is now being erected is concerned it will be so nearly like the League of Nations' set-up after the last war that we shall begin immediately preparing for another war, or at least our enemies will? We will wait until they strike before we are prepared. Why are not all these things told? They are all in government policy. Before the Prime Minister took pains to define this matter clearly I was genuinely alarmed lest this was the sort of thing for which we were going to be asked to vote.

When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) mentioned the way the Conservatives had dealt with the lads who were marching east when they reached Regina, I was led to think of the way the government at present in power treated the boys in the Vancouver post office. They asked for bread; they were given tear-gas bombs, and then perhaps some of them died at Dieppe. These are serious matters, to which everybody who wishes to get this tangle straightened out should be giving some attention.

Since we are discussing the whole question of conscription at the present time, I think it is perhaps fitting that I should refer to the stand that has been taken by members of our group since the beginning. First may I point out that in February, 1936, members of this group, and I as the leader, made an announcement in Edmonton, which I believe can be found in the Edmonton Journal and Edmonton Bulletin of February 12 of that year, in which we pointed out that this country ought to begin to prepare for war. If we had time to go through the newspaper comment of that time we would be quite surprised to find that those loyal newspapers, which should have been on the watch to warn the people of the coming conflict, instead of saying, "Here is a voice calling for something sound," endeavoured in their headlines and their editorial comment to discredit those who had thus manifested vision and courage in warning this country that we should be prepared. If we had started to prepare at that time we could have saved perhaps thousands of lives which have since been lost owing to the fact that we were not adequately prepared. That is the stand this group has taken. We have never consciously played politics in the matter of war or conscription. We have always endeavoured to discover the truth and to make that truth known, regardless of what it cost. So that when we were confronted with the war in 1939 we took a strong stand in favour of national selective service which would guarantee equality of service and sacrifice. May I read from the records of those days. At page 48 of Hansard for the special session of 1939, during which war was declared, I find these words:

> A good deal has been made of the fact that the Social Credit organization in Edmonton and the social credit organization here, with New Democracy, have announced that they support conscription. I have noticed, however, that all too few have observed that the conscription is of the three distinct elements of our national life. The first is finance, with all that the word implies; the second is industry, with all that this word implies, and the third is man-power. The three must go together. Each of these is as necessary to the other two as is the third leg of a three-legged stool. If one is applied without the other two, only inequality, disaster and chaos will result. In conscription, in universal service, we will find the only way to avoid injustice, discrimination and class distinction.

That, I believe, indicates pretty clearly the stand taken by the Social Credit group. Here is another excerpt from the same page, for those who are interested:

> Therefore, the New Democracy declares that justice, equality and effectiveness depend upon conscription of finance, industry and man-power.

And again on page 49:

> We must do all we can and go where we are asked to go, in order to meet the enemy of religion, of freedom and of race. It is stupid and insincere to draw a distinction between home and foreign service. There can be no distinction.

I think those excerpts place the stand of the Social Credit group at the outbreak of war before the public with sufficient definiteness. And though the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar read some statements made in Edmonton, let me reaffirm that in parliament the Social Credit members have never receded from the stand they took in 1939.

One matter, I believe, does require some attention. A measure which might have been sound when war broke out may not be sound now, after the war has been conducted by false methods for four or five years. I am not, therefore, arguing that the policy we advocated at the outbreak of war would necessarily clear up the difficulties which the government has encountered as a result of pursuing a false policy. So many injustices have taken place during this war; so much bitterness has been engendered by reason of knowledge of those injustices, that the temper of the Canadian people both in and out of the army is genuinely dangerous at the present time. Had the government adopted the methods which this group advocated I believe they would have avoided many of the things which now threaten national unity as well as our peace and happiness. I am not saying, therefore, at this time how we of this group are going to vote. We are still going to watch and study, to see, if we possibly can, what it is that lies under this whole thing.

A few moments ago I stated that the policy of the government apparently involved some very objectionable things. May I just refer to one or two of those things. First is the post-war programme of the government. During the last few months I have come into contact with a number of boys who have been overseas, who have been injured and who are in receipt of pensions. I have talked with the boys about their condition, physical, mental and spiritual; then I have regarded the pensions they have been given, and I have hung my head in shame to think that boys who fought engagements like the Dieppe affair should be turned off with such meagre pensions as must simply fire the minds of the men in the service to madness. Yet this government, in charge of a man who talks about a "new order", is condoning that kind of thing and apparently is contemplating it for the after-war. That simply is not good enough. When we hear about boys out in British Columbia and in other parts of the country staging parades, tearing down and burning the union jack and so on, let us remember that the cause of that reaction is partly this shameful injustice to which they have seen their fellows subjected already. I will not go into details in this regard tonight, but may do so at a future time. If we want this war conducted as the resolution says, with vigour, I tell you we shall have to change our ways with respect to the boys who are coming home from overseas, or their comrades will arise in wrath and do something for which we shall all be sorry.

May I again direct your attention to one statement I made and which perhaps may be challenged. I said a while ago that there was a definite aim apparently on the part of this government, or the powers that are behind it whatever they are, to destroy the British commonwealth of nations. I believe that that statement will need a little elaboration. As evidence of the truth of what I said may I refer to the Bretton Woods conference. Some will say that that has nothing to do with the war effort. Can it be conceived that men who are fighting and giving their lives to rid us of abominations such as are contemplated in the Bretton Woods conference can go forward and fight with the courage and confidence they would have if they had not read of such things? Therefore, I believe that this Bretton Woods question has a vital bearing on our war effort. It is going to affect the war effort more and more as the days go on and people generally get to know what is being done.

I should like to read some excerpts for the information of hon. members who do not happen to have read an article by Paul Einzig, a famous writer on economics in the old country. This has been reprinted with the kind permission of the Daily Express of London from its issue of Thursday, August 10, 1944. It is entitled, "1925 and All That—Only Far, Far Worse." I quote:

> A plain man's guide to the menace of Bretton Woods.
>
> It must be clear to those who understand the meaning of the report of the Bretton Woods international monetary conference, published in a white paper before the Bank holiday, that the experts of forty-four nations have agreed on a return to the gold standard after the war.

How do you suppose the boy in the battle line will feel when he knows that he is fighting for the return of the gold standard? How do you think the fathers and mothers of the boys who have given their lives will feel? An inspiring prospect, is it not? Let me go on:

> Unfortunately, very few laymen can possibly understand the report. If the public were to realize what it is being led into it would raise its voice in a powerful protest, instead of allowing the experts a free hand to do their worst as they did in 1925.

Why is it that we did not read any protest against the Bretton Woods conference in any of the great papers in the Dominion of Canada? Why is it that no government spokesman found it worth his while to tell us about this thing over the radio? Why was the report couched in language which the ordinary man would be unable to understand? It just does not look very good, does it? Yet it seems to be part of the government policy, for no protest was lodged against this conference. They sent the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and a number of others there. They apparently took part in the conference and came home satisfied; yet this is what Paul Einzig has written about the conference. There are many things in this pamphlet which I am sure hon. members would like to read; I shall not take the time of the house to-night to read it in full. However, may I read a little farther on:

> Yet, once the plan is translated into intelligible English and is denuded of all camouflage, every layman of normal intelligence is bound to realize that it is the gold standard, the full gold standard, and nothing but the gold standard.
>
> Admittedly, it is a different gold standard from the one we abandoned in 1931, just as the gold standard adopted in 1925 was different from the one suspended in 1914. But the changes are, for the most part, considerably for the worse.

How does that make the members of this house feel whose boys are fighting and dying? Yet apparently this government is quite in sympathy with the Bretton Woods affair. May I read another passage which should impress all members, as follows:

> Worst of all, the British experts have agreed to the insertion of an entirely new provision into the final draft of the plan, under which it will become impossible for this country to escape the consequences of their folly by withdrawing from the fund.
>
> Under article XI the board of international financiers is given powers to declare economic war on Great Britain should she devalue sterling against the board's wishes!
>
> All the united nations (including, let it be noted, the British dominions) will have to undertake to boycott and blockade this country in such event!

How do we feel about an agreement under which at the instructions of an international board, consisting of men like Sir Otto Neimeyer and others, this Dominion of Canada would have to boycott Great Britain and declare economic warfare on her? Can anyone by any stretch of the imagination conceive that that is a thing worth fighting and dying for? I continue:

> Is it really conceivable that parliament could pass such a suicidal measure?
>
> It all depends on whether the public overcomes its natural reluctance to penetrate behind the smoke-screen of the experts' findings, and discovers for itself what is being planned against its vital interests.
>
> The return to the gold standard under a cloud of obscurity must be prevented if this generation and the next are to enjoy the hard-earned fruits of victory.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Hon. members will now understand why I protested a few moments ago against arousing public opinion from coast to coast in Canada for political reasons over the matter of conscription in order to send 16,000 men overseas while matters of this kind are left in obscurity.

The Prime Minister will say in extenuation, "We will bring the matter to parliament." Should this government bring in a measure embodying the findings of Bretton Woods, every last one of those on the Liberal side would stand up and bow and vote for the thing no matter what it meant. It will be impossible to stop it; the steam roller will operate. It will not matter a particle how much anybody in parliament knows about it; when he rises to explain it Liberals and others will not listen. What guarantee of the people's protection will be given by bringing the Bretton Woods matter before parliament? A similar steam roller process I suppose will be employed over in England too.

Bretton Woods is one of the elements of government policy. I do not want to spend too much time on this sort of thing. What we are concerned with in this house is to get men overseas. I still believe that a great many of the men who are reluctant to-day to go overseas have been embittered by reason of the things that are occurring right in this country, that are being advocated or condoned by the government of Canada, such as this gold standard proposal. So that we ought to give a good deal of attention to this matter, too. I think I have shown from the quotations I have read from Paul Einzig, if he is an authority—and I think he is—that Canadian sovereignty is being threatened by this monetary agreement. It would be different if it were necessary, but it is not necessary, as those who are well informed on monetary matters know full well. The sovereignty of Canada is being threatened not only by the monetary agreement but also by that iniquitous meeting at Dumbarton Oaks not very long ago. Do you know what Dumbarton Oaks stands for? It stands for the building up of an international police force which will be able to move in and subdue Canada if she wants to introduce, let us say, social credit or any other measure that her people want to introduce. This international police force will be under the dictates and direction of this group of international scallywags that will have charge of the international financial arrangements; I will wager that these international scallywags will get themselves appointed without any member of this house being able to do anything about it; and they will keep themselves in office in spite of all the efforts of all the members of this house. Once we allow this thing to be fastened upon us our freedom will be gone. This is a serious matter.

The Prime Minister this afternoon spoke of building up organizations to prevent wars in the future, and I presume that a part of these organizations will be this international monetary stabilization scheme and organization proposed at Bretton Woods and the international police force proposed at Dumbarton Oaks.

Let us examine this Dumbarton Oaks affair a little farther. Let us suppose that we get Russia with her 192 million people, China with her 400 million people, Japan and India with their teeming millions, and a few more countries all going into this big international organization and that they have votes in proportion to their populations. The Anglo-Saxon peoples will then be binding themselves up in an international organization in which other peoples will be able to outvote them ten to one. The Anglo-Saxon peoples are paying with their lives for the winning of this war to bring about a situation of that sort!

These are serious matters. I am not detracting for a moment from the seriousness of the conscription issue and the conduct of the war. I am just urging the members of this house to be warned that we look beneath the surface before it is too late. It is easy to see how the British commonwealth would be destroyed if the members of the commonwealth are under this international organization and have to do what they are told to do rather than what they want to do, in order to pull together.

There is one other serious matter. There is the possibility of another war. After the end of the first great war we lulled ourselves into security with slogans and catchwords that were used during the war. It was "a war to save democracy," "a war to end war," and the boys of my generation went into it and gave their glorious young lives in that war to end war. Then we built up a League of Nations to guarantee "collective security," so that we would never have war any more. All that the League of Nations did was to lull the Anglo-Saxon peoples into repose, so that they neglected to be prepared while their enemies prepared. That did occur. There is no guarantee that this united nations scheme, which is only a glorified league of nations, will not have the identical result. We have just barely saved ourselves in this war, and that by the grace and assistance of God Almighty. Let us go on for another twenty years in which more diabolical instruments of war are perfected and the art of using them learned by other nations, and then imagine what will happen if they strike while we are unprepared. It may be argued that an international police force will take care of that. But what kind of international police force would it have taken to stop Hitler when he struck? It would take a pretty tidy sized international police force. Who are to be the members of this international police force, and who is to pay for its upkeep? I sat in this house when it was next to impossible for this house to get through a paltry sixty or seventy million dollar appropriation for war preparations. Is it to be supposed that the members of the united nations organization will contribute any more generously to the upkeep of an international police force than they formerly did? I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we are not heading towards international security by building up a supra-national organization, called a "United Nations" organization. What we shall be doing by building up an organization of that kind will be heading inevitably into chaos because it will mean the destruction of everything we hold dear.

There will be members of this house who will disagree with me when I say that there are three distinct types of international power, each and every one of which is seeking to destroy the freedom of all mankind. I will not name those three in public, but if any member cares to ask me privately I will tell him the names of the three. It is these three that we can expect to be working through the agents who are organizing the Bretton Woods affair, Dumbarton Oaks and the rest of them, and they are putting out propaganda all over this land which fairly screams at you through the pages of the press and over the radio, to prepare the people for this international organization that will take away all our liberty. Is it to be supposed that the boys in the forces do not know about some of these things? Is it to be supposed that my boy does not know when I know? Of course they know, and it takes away a lot of the enthusiasm of these young men, especially of those who have not yet enlisted or gone over.

These are some of the things that Social Crediters think about when we are called upon to vote in support of the government's policy in conducting a vigorous war effort. I say, Mr. Speaker, that much remains to be uncovered yet. The people of Canada have not begun to learn what is behind this crisis. Social Crediters will watch a little longer and listen a little further and perhaps we shall learn even yet what lies underneath it all. I promise you, Mr. Speaker, and I promise the government and every member of this house and every man and woman outside it that when we do find what is the right thing to do we will do it regardless of politics.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You do not know where you are going.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Oh, yes. We know a whole lot more than we are telling.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are very skilful in concealing what you know.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is altogether becoming that members of parliament should be skilful. I commend that thought to my hon. friend. I have no more to say upon this subject at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. A. JOHNSTON (London): I move the adjournment of the debate.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not eleven o'clock.

SECRET SESSION

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, this evening the house has heard the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) complain that he has not been able to get information which he thinks it is necessary he should have because that information can be given only in secret session. Many hon. members have made a similar representation to me. The other day, as the house will have heard, the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston), ex-minister of defence, stated that he himself would have liked to have some information which could not be given out except in secret session. In these circumstances I am going to ask that to-morrow the house shall meet in secret session before the doors are open. I have taken care not to ask this until all the leaders of the various groups on the opposite side had had an opportunity to speak.

As to procedure, all that is required to have the house meet in secret session is for an hon. member to spy strangers in the gallery, and the galleries may then be cleared. It would be preferable, I think, that the doors should not be opened until after the session is over. I therefore would hope that to-morrow, Mr. Speaker, when the house assembles, you do not declare the doors open until hon. members have had a chance of meeting in secret session and obtaining information of vital importance in connection with the further discussion of the question which is before us at this time. I would hope that at the same time the minister of defence would be permitted the same courtesy which was accorded him the other day, of appearing on the floor of the house to give the very necessary information to which the house is entitled at the present time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it not the case that under the rules forty-eight hours' notice must be given for a secret session?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One minute's notice, I think, is sufficient. I shall read standing order No. 13:

> If any member takes notice that strangers are present, Mr. Speaker or the Chairman (as the case may be), shall forthwith put the question, that strangers be ordered to withdraw, without permitting any debate or amendment: Provided that Mr. Speaker, or the Chairman, may, whenever he thinks proper, order the withdrawal of strangers.

This is the procedure which is followed at Westminster, and which we propose to follow here.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I point out that that may be all very well for the galleries, but the press cannot be regarded, I think, as strangers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will realize that where there is a doubt on any matter of procedure, the rules of this house oblige us to follow the practice which is followed at Westminster. We intend to follow that practice.

Mr. ROWE: Does the Prime Minister intend to move that he spies a stranger in the house, instead of giving forty-eight hours' notice?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Any hon. member is free to take the course which has been indicated. If there is a disagreement on the matter, Mr. Speaker, of course will ask the house what its views are, but I have indicated that we propose to-morrow to meet before the doors are opened and to have the house sit in secret session at that time.

Mr. HOMUTH: You cannot see a stranger, then; the doors will not be open.

An hon. MEMBER: There will be no strangers present.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): What is before the Chair now?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister has made the suggestion that when the house meets immediately after prayers, I should not direct that the doors be opened, but should keep them closed for a secret session. He also pointed out that if the public are admitted to the chamber, some hon. member may call attention to strangers in the gallery. If that is done, the question will be put to the house whether they should be asked to withdraw; and as the house decides, so will the Speaker act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I just wish to add that the government does not expect that the secret session will occupy much time. My hope is that it will be a very brief session.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister if it would be possible to confine the discussion at the secret session to the answers to those questions? This is the difficulty I have found in connection with a secret session: we did not want to have the whole of the debate in secret when General McNaughton was here, and I think there is a good deal of justification for that attitude. We do not want to be dogmatic about it, but on the other hand we were afraid there would be a lengthy secret session, and I do not think that would be a good thing from the point of view of the country or of parliament. Perhaps we can wait until to-morrow and see what the situation is, and at that time the matter can be decided.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with my hon. friend that it is desirable that the session should be brief, and if he will seek to influence his following in that particular—

Mr. ROWE: We did not ask that any questions should be answered in secret.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I want to register my protest now against any secret session of this house at this time.

Mr. ROWE: I want to register my protest against it, and I would like the Prime Minister to-morrow, either in secret or open session, to give the house a list of the names of hon. members who asked for a secret session, besides himself and the leader of the C.C.F. party. This is the most ridiculous spectacle we have seen in the life of this parliament, now that the galleries are full, that we should wish to exclude the public because some pretence is made that there is something strange that the country should not know. I asked the hon. member for Prince the other day if he had requested a secret session, and he said, no. To-night the Prime Minister says that he has heard from all sides. I challenge him to tell us of one member of our group who have done so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I refer the hon. member to Hansard of February 4, 1944.

Mr. ROWE: I have the floor, unless the hon. member is rising to a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On that date the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked for a secret session.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a motion to adjourn the debate.

Mr. ROWE: Very well. The Prime Minister can close the debate to-night and have a secret session to-morrow, because the galleries are too full for the type of spectacle which he and his government have led the country into at this time.

An hon. MEMBER: Several members asked for a secret session.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Look up the records of February 4, Hansard, page 188.

Mr. HOMUTH: The present Minister of National Defence was not a minister then.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): He was not even a member of the house.

Mr. ROWE: General McNaughton may still not be a member by February of next year. You have your months mixed up.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps one registration of our objection and repetition of it would be sufficient to cover our group, now that other hon. members have spoken. I think our position is pretty well known, and it has been supported by the two hon. members who have spoken. I merely meant to indicate that this matter could be dealt with to-morrow, and our protest, whatever it may be, may be registered at the time suggested by the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that immediately after prayers the doors will be opened in order that some hon. member may spy strangers?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: If that is so, I would direct that after prayers the doors will be opened, and the question will be whether there shall be a secret session and the public will be excluded from the chamber. If the proposal is carried the galleries will have to be cleared. Is that the understanding? I wish to know definitely what is the mind of the house on this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might point out that the suggestion that the doors should not be opened until the secret session has been held was to meet the very obvious fact that there is no necessity of filling the galleries for the sake of emptying them. It is really for the convenience of the public and the convenience of hon. members that we should proceed as proposed, but I have no objection to Your Honour putting the motion at the moment, that to-morrow we meet in secret session and let the house decide.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not necessary to make a motion. To-morrow prayers will be read, the doors will not be opened, and the house will decide.

Motion (Mr. Johnston, London) agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

Tuesday, November 28, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

SECRET SESSION OF THE HOUSE

The house went into secret session.

At the conclusion of the secret session, the following report of its proceedings was issued under the authority of Mr. Speaker:

"The House of Commons held a secret sitting from 3 o'clock p.m. to-day. General the Honourable A. G. L. McNaughton, Minister of National Defence, was present and gave information respecting the Canadian forces.

J. Allison Glen,
Speaker."

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, November 29, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN ARMY

AWARD OF VICTORIA CROSS TO MAJOR DAVID VIVIAN CURRIE OF THE SOUTH ALBERTA REGIMENT

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, after the sharp differences of viewpoint that have arisen in recent days, the house I believe will turn with relief to a matter on which there will be only one viewpoint, and that one of pleasure and of pride in the achievements of a young Canadian army officer overseas. I refer to Major David Vivian Currie, of the 29th Canadian Armoured Regiment (South Alberta Regiment), who has been awarded the Victoria Cross.

The record exemplifies the opportunities for advancement available to young men in this democratic nation. Born in Sutherland, Saskatchewan, he graduated in due course from the Moose Jaw technical school, and for ten years prior to appointment to commissioned rank in the active army in January, 1940, was employed as an expert automobile mechanic and welder. Through merit, his promotion has been rapid, and he attained field rank early in the present year.

I should like now to read, on behalf of the Minister of National Defence, who is not here, the official citation:

The King has been graciously pleased to approve the award of the Victoria Cross to:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Major David Vivian Currie,
29th Canadian Armoured Reconnaissance Regiment (South Alberta Regiment).

In Normandy on 18th August, 1944, Major Currie was in command of a small mixed force of Canadian tanks, self-propelled anti-tank guns, and infantry which was ordered to cut one of the main escape routes from the Falaise pocket. The force was held up by strong enemy resistance in the village of St. Lambert sur Dives and two tanks were knocked out by 88-mm. guns. Major Currie immediately entered the village alone on foot at last light through the enemy outposts to reconnoitre the German defences and to extricate the crews of the disabled tanks which he succeeded in doing in spite of heavy mortar fire.

Early the following morning, without any previous artillery bombardment, Major Currie personally led an attack on the village in the face of fierce opposition from enemy tank guns and infantry and by noon had succeeded in seizing and consolidating a position half-way inside of the village.

During the next thirty-six hours the Germans hurled one counter attack after another against the Canadian force but so skilfully had Major Currie organized his defensive position that these attacks were repulsed with severe casualties to the enemy after heavy fighting.

At dusk on the 20th August the Germans attempted to mount a final assault on the Canadian positions but the attacking force was routed before it could even be deployed. Seven enemy tanks, twelve 88-mm. guns and forty vehicles were destroyed, three hundred Germans were killed, five hundred wounded and two thousand one hundred captured. Major Currie then promptly ordered an attack and completed the capture of the village, thus denying the Chambois-Trun escape route to the remnants of two German armies cut off in the Falaise pocket.

Throughout three days and nights of fierce fighting Major Currie's gallant conduct and contempt for danger set a magnificent example to all ranks of the force under his command.

On one occasion he personally directed the fire of his command tank on to a tiger tank which had been harassing his position and succeeded in knocking it out. During another attack while the guns of his command tank were taking on other targets at longer ranges, he used a rifle from the turret to deal with individual snipers who had infiltrated to within fifty yards of his headquarters. The only time reinforcements were able to get through to his force he himself led the forty men forward into their positions and explained the importance of their tasks as a part of the defence; when during the next attack these new reinforcements withdrew under the intense fire brought down by the enemy, he personally collected them and led them forward into position again where, inspired by his leadership, they held for the remainder of the battle. His employment of the artillery support which became available after his original attack went in was typical of his cool calculation of the risks involved in every situation. At one time, despite the fact that short rounds were falling within fifteen yards of his own tank, he ordered fire from medium artillery to continue because of its devastating effect upon the attacking enemy in his immediate area.

Throughout the operations the casualties to Major Currie's force were heavy. However, he never considered the possibility of failure or allowed it to enter the minds of his men. In the words of one of his non-commissioned officers, "We knew at one stage that it was going to be a fight to the finish but he was so cool about it, it was impossible for us to get excited." Since all the officers under his command were either killed or wounded during the action, Major Currie had virtually no respite from his duties and in fact obtained only one hour's sleep during the entire period. Nevertheless, he did not permit his fatigue to become apparent to his troops and throughout the action took every opportunity to visit weapon pits and other defensive posts to talk to his men, to advise them as to the best use of their weapons and to cheer them with words of encouragement. When his force was finally relieved and he was satisfied that the turnover was complete he fell asleep on his feet and collapsed.

There can be no doubt that the success of the attack on and stand against the enemy at St. Lambert Sur Dives can largely be attributed to this officer's coolness, inspired leadership and skilful use of the limited weapons at his disposal.

The courage and devotion to duty shown by Major Currie during a prolonged period of heavy fighting were outstanding, and had a far-reaching effect on the successful outcome of the battle.

PRESS REPORTS AS TO DISTURBANCES ON THE PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I desire to direct to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, who I presume is representing the Minister of National Defence, or to the Prime Minister, an important and urgent question with respect to a matter of urgent public importance. In view of the alarming reports in the press of mutiny among the men of the home army that are coming to us from the Pacific coast I desire to ask what the government has done or proposes to do to meet the situation that has developed. The press reports indicate that these men are armed and have live ammunition in their possession, and irreparable damage and loss of life may ensue unless prompt action is taken. I suggest that action, and prompt and immediate action, is imperative in the circumstances.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would say that the Minister of National Defence has taken cognizance of the reports that have appeared in the press and he has assured the government that the situation referred to is being carefully watched and completely controlled. May I say that the use of the word "mutiny" in the communications I think is most unfortunate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what it is, is it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not a mutiny, most decidedly not, and may I express this opinion to all hon. members of the house, that at a very critical time such as this is it becomes the most imperative duty of every member to do all he possibly can to refrain from making a very difficult situation more difficult and particularly from using any word or expression which may be calculated to create a situation that might be very serious but which without such reference would never arise.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thank the Prime Minister for his lecture. However, I shall have to proceed on the basis of my own understanding, and that is that it is mutiny.

REPRESENTATIONS OF TORONTO CITY COUNCIL RESPECTING REINFORCEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I want to table two documents, a long telegram from the city council of Toronto, signed by the clerk of the council, and a letter from the board of education. I am not going to read them.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know under what rule the hon. gentleman can submit letters and telegrams received by him.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are from responsible bodies, and are to the effect that the government should proceed with an all-out war effort to provide sufficient reinforcements overseas.

Mr. SPEAKER: If they were in the form of a petition I could understand it. But as they are in the form of letters I am afraid there is no method by which the hon. gentleman can table them. They are not addressed to the houses of parliament; they are addressed to the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. MacNICOL: They expect me to present them.

Mr. SPEAKER: That cannot be done.

ARTICLE WRITTEN BY DREW PEARSON RESPECTING ETHIOPIA

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): This morning I received by air mail from Vancouver an article written by a famous journalist, Drew Pearson. It is entitled: "British Accused of Wanting to Occupy Ethiopia". I wonder if the government contemplates sending reinforcements to the British in Ethiopia if there is trouble over there?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend I am not able to give him any information in reply.

Mr. POULIOT: Then they will go.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HANSON (YORK-SUNBURY)—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT MADE IN DEBATE ON NOVEMBER 23

On the orders of the day.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, on Thursday of last week, the day that General McNaughton was first in the house, I made certain assertions and allegations as to the representations that were being made, or were supposed to have been made, according to the evidence and information I had, by commanding officers in the various units with respect to voluntary enlistment. It will be recalled that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and myself had a somewhat heated exchange, which personally I much regret. I wish to say that because I do not want to live in a battle of that kind all the time. In the course of my remarks I stated it was my understanding that when these men were asked to volunteer it had been represented to them that rehabilitation grants would be denied them. I want to say frankly that I was wrong in my terminology. What I should have said, and what I now desire to say, is this: that the representation that was to be made to these men was that they would get no war gratuities if they did not volunteer.

I say this because a gallant officer who is the district officer commanding military district No. 7 feels that my remarks have misinterpreted his position. I know that gentleman, and know the service he has rendered in this great cause since he was appointed by my friend the former minister of national defence, over the heads of perhaps higher officials, to be the district officer commanding that military district. I make this explanation in justice to him as well as to myself. I understand that my improper use —I am going to take as full responsibility as I can—of terminology led me into error. I did not mean what I said; I meant something entirely different, namely, that they were to be told they would be refused the cash gratuity. Having said this, I hope the whole position will have been made perfectly clear.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have noticed, as many members of the house have noticed, that the Minister of Public Works has not been in his seat since the tabling of the order in council on Thursday last. He has been within the purlieus of the house, because the press reported that he was behind the curtains when the Prime Minister spoke on Monday, and I myself saw him there. I wish to know, and the public will wish to know, whether this gentleman is still a member of the administration, or whether he has resigned. Just what is the position?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works has not resigned his portfolio.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a complete answer.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

REHABILITATION GRANTS, ETC., ON VOLUNTARY DISCHARGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs as to the discharges which are taking place in the R.C.A.F. under the British commonwealth air training plan. A number of these men have written me to secure a ruling from the minister on this question. If after serving more than two years as ground crew personnel they ask for discharge, are they then entitled to rehabilitation grants, gratuities and education, and do they qualify under the Veterans Land Act? The reason I ask the question is that if they are discharged other than at their own request they are entitled to these grants. With the plan practically completed, many of these men have no other course than to ask for discharge. It is a matter of great importance to them.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): In reply to the question asked by the hon. member, notice of which he was kind enough to give me this morning, may I say that because they are discharged they are entitled to all benefits under the rehabilitation order and under the war service grants.

PRESENT STATUS OF CATEGORIES OF PERSONNEL NOW BEING DISCHARGED

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Will the Minister of Labour make a statement to the house explaining the present status under the National Resources Mobilization Act of various classes and categories of personnel now being discharged from the Royal Canadian Air Force?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) asked a similar question last Friday with reference to R.C.A.F. men being discharged. I think that I should cover it in a broad way and include both the navy and the R.C.A.F. so that there can be no misunderstanding.

The classification of discharges will be made by either Royal Canadian Air Force or Royal Canadian Navy authorities for recall to the army as follows:

Personnel not subject to recall. With service overseas, on the high seas, or over the erritorial waters of Canada, provided that services have not been terminated on grounds of misconduct, or inefficiency, prior to engagement in actual operations. All ranks who have served three years or more in Canada only, and whose services have not been terminated on grounds of misconduct or inefficiency. Discharge on compassionate grounds. Discharge to return to civilian positions of high essentiality. Discharge on grounds of being medically unfit.

Personnel liable to recall. Personnel including those who have had service overseas as well as in Canada, who were discharged on grounds of inefficiency. Services terminated on grounds of misconduct by sentence of court martial or disciplinary courts, resignation to avoid court martial, or on grounds that services are no longer required.

Personnel definitely subject to recall. Those who are not outlined in the preceding paragraphs and who are not considered permanently unfit. Discharge of probationary officers (resignation accepted or failed to qualify)—Royal Canadian Navy. Discharge—unlikely to become efficient, or are unsuitable.

In connection with personnel subject or liable to recall, the Royal Canadian Air Force and Royal Canadian Navy will supply full explanation regarding the discharge, including the pulhems profile or the medical category. These cases will be considered individually and decision will be based on the particular circumstances of the case.

Mr. ADAMSON: Did the minister say "three years"?

Mr. MITCHELL: Three years.

Mr. ADAMSON: It was two some time ago.

Mr. MITCHELL: I just said three years. May I say also in that connection that in Great Britain there is a continual exchange between the army, navy and air force, and the same situation exists in the United States except that there are very few transfers from the United States navy to the United States army or air force.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When was that rule promulgated? Would the minister say in a word, if he can, what the change is?—because I think there is some change.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, there has been a change.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understood from the exchange that took place between us and from some conversation I had with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air that the whole position was under review. Is this a declaration of policy as it is now or as it was; and if it is a declaration of policy as it is now, what in a word are the changes? I cannot follow it.

Mr. MITCHELL: From two to three years; that is service in Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When was that change made?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is made now.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION MADE FOR UNEMPLOYED WINNIPEG AIRCRAFT WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction, based upon a communication sent to him recently by two machinists' lodges in the city of Winnipeg, and also a similar communication from the Winnipeg city council, containing a resolution, a copy of which I sent the minister a day or two ago, requesting that steps be taken to provide immediate employment for workers being laid off in the aircraft industry. I would ask the minister whether any steps are being taken by the Department of Reconstruction to meet the request set out in this resolution.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is taking steps to place any men laid off in Winnipeg in similar employment, either in that city or in other centres. There is an over-all shortage of man-power in industry, and there is no difficulty about transferring men.

THE WAR

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN MAINTAINING VIGOROUS WAR EFFORT—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION OF THE PRIME MINISTER

The house resumed from Monday, November 27, consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort, and the proposed amendment of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to give my ruling with regard to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The motion before the house, moved by the Prime Minister, is:

That this house will aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) moved in amendment thereto:

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and the following words substituted instead thereof:

"This house is of the opinion that the government has not made certain of adequate and continuous trained reinforcements by requiring all N.R.M.A. personnel whether now or hereafter enrolled to serve in any theatre of war and has failed to assure equality of service and sacrifice."

To this the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) moved in amendment:

That all the words of the amendment after the word "that" in the first line thereof be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"The following words be added to the motion: which in the opinion of this house requires the immediate removal of all distinctions between drafted and volunteer personnel, thus making the entire home defence army available for reinforcements overseas, and requires further the total mobilization of all the resources of Canada, material and financial as well as human, to ensure a total war effort, adequate reestablishment of the members of our fighting forces, and full employment after the war."

It will be noticed that the leader of the opposition moved that certain words dealing with the same subject matter of the main motion be added to that motion. The leader of the C.C.F. group moved that certain words, some of which such as "and requires further the total mobilization of all resources of Canada material and financial" introduce other features, be added to the main motion. As this is foreign to the subject matter of the main amendment it cannot be moved at this stage of the proceedings, though it is relevant to the main motion. May says, page 285:

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed.

The amendment to the amendment is in the nature of an amendment to the main motion, and the hon. member must wait until the first amendment be negatived before his amendment can be offered. If the main amendment, instead of a substitution, was an addition to the main motion, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar might move another addition different from, but relevant to, the main amendment. This often happens on the address in reply, where the wording of the main motion is unalterable; but in this case the house is asked to aid the government in its policy of maintaining a vigorous war effort, and the official opposition objects on the ground that the government has not provided for adequate and trained reinforcements. The leader of the C.C.F. party asks that this proposition be eliminated, and he gives certain reasons for voting against the main motion. He cannot adopt that course; he must first endeavour to have the amendment negatived or amended in a substantial manner, or otherwise disposed of, before moving his own amendment to the main motion. This theory is confirmed by May (page 291) who says:

An amendment to a proposed amendment cannot be moved if it proposes to leave out all the words of such proposed amendment, but in such a case the first amendment must be negatived before the second can be offered.

My attention has been directed to the amendments moved on 9th March, 1943, which will be found at pages 142 and 143 of the Journals of that date. The motion was made for the Speaker to leave the chair. An amendment was moved to the effect that government-created money be established, and a subamendment was proposed declaring that the banking system be nationalized. There were other considerations in both propositions, but they were akin and relevant to each other. They were allowed. In the question now under consideration the amendment proposes a substitution of the main motion, and the subamendment proposes an addition to the main motion. The question is not the same as in March, 1943; the two propositions are separate motions, and must be voted upon accordingly. I was also referred to the debate on the address in reply, this session, pages 42 and 43, Votes and Proceedings, and to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition and the subamendment moved by the leader of the C.C.F. party. The same objection applies as I have stated with regard to the amendment and subamendment of 9th March, 1943.

In the question now before the house, if the house accepts the subamendment the main amendment would be eliminated and the only question before the house would then be the main motion as amended by the subamendment. The result would be that the mover of the main amendment would be deprived of his right to obtain an expression of opinion, either original or in an amended form, by the house on the policy stated in his amendment. For these reasons I rule that the subamendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. J. A. JOHNSTON (London): Mr. Speaker, in continuing the debate on the motion now before the house I should like first to say what a pleasure and privilege it is once again to attend this Canadian parliament after four years spent on active service with the Canadian Army.

I was in England in September and October of 1940. I saw the German planes attacking by day and night. I saw the small but gallant R.A.F. force the Germans to resort to night bombing only. I saw London, that long-suffering city, burn at night, the last Sunday of the year 1940; and then that last big German attack in the early summer of 1941 when the House of Commons at Westminster, the mother of parliaments, was destroyed. During that same period the destruction of Coventry and Plymouth and the burning of Bristol were suffered by the people of Britain. Then the organization of the air defences of the British isles forced the attackers slowly but surely from over England, and air superiority was gained over the much battered island. Then Germany attacked Russia, and Russia was called upon to take her share of the load so as to lighten the burden resting on the shoulders of England. The result was that only hit and run raids at long intervals came to the people of England. Then came December of 1941, Pearl Harbor, and the entry of the United States into the conflict; the arrival of the Americans and the Flying Fortresses in England; and the building of greater airports, which the Canadian engineers helped to construct so rapidly. Then followed August, 1942, and Dieppe, where the second Canadian division shouldered the great attack on the fortress of Europe, and made history and undying glory for Canada.

I saw the Canadians being trained for the job to come, where brigades were moved swiftly and smoothly from the south coast of England to the rugged hills of Scotland. I saw the Canadian Army move their artillery in one scheme after another. And then one day in the early morning broadcast of July 10, 1943, the world was informed that an allied army had landed in Sicily, the British on the right, the Americans on the left and the Canadian troops, consisting of the first Canadian division and the first Canadian armoured brigade attacking in the centre. Then followed September 3, and at daybreak the First Canadian Division landed at Reggio di Calabria, on the Italian mainland. Then in quick succession Pottenza, Spitzenola, Foggia, Motta, Campobasso, Castropignano, Torella, Molise and Agnone. Then a rest before the great battles along the Adriatic. A year ago now, on the part of the first Canadian division and the first Canadian armoured brigade, there was a rustle of preparations for that big show which was coming. Orders were issued and a quick move was made to the Adriatic. Then followed in succession the Sangro, San Vito, the Mora, Ortona and the Arielli. Then followed that long period of holding the winter line, that cemetery at the southern approach to Ortona which the Canadians left behind when they moved to Caserta in preparation for the battles that still were to come. Again there followed in quick succession the Gustav line, the fall of Cassino, the crashing through of the Hitler line, Pontecorvo, and onward to Rome —history written by Canadians in Italy. Then came the news on the radio on D-day, that morning in June the whole world had been looking forward to. While this initial attack was taking place on the Normandy coast the Canadians in Italy went into a rest period. After that short rest there was a quick push to Florence. The great 8th Army moved to the Adriatic and into the Gothic line, over the Metaurus beyond Pesaro and onward toward Bologna.

I served with the first Canadian division. I know the work that our infantry men have done. At this time I would like to draw to your attention an item that appears all too frequently in press reports of the world, "Slight activity—only a few patrols sent out". If you, Mr. Speaker, were one of the members of that patrol, you would not think it slight. Day in and day out infantrymen and engineers are going forward, clearing the way for the army to pass. Those are the men we must reinforce; those are the men who carry the load; those are the men who swept Jerry out of his dugout. They are the men who advance against the nazi war machine with nothing but the air and their skill to protect them from German fire. When this war is over, may the infantrymen hold the place of honour. They are the men who have been doing and are doing it the hard way.

In fairness, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say at this time that I have spoken at some length respecting the activities of the first Canadian division because that is the one with which I served. It is an infantry division, and in a short time many of those soldiers will be starting their sixth year overseas. They are looking to the day when they will be back with their families. That is why it is necessary to send the required reinforcements to support our troops overseas.

I should like to place on record at this time some of the things I saw and heard when in England in September of this year. I saw the damage done by the robomb to communities in the south and east of England, the same area which received such a heavy bombing in the early years of the war. Once again that area is under terrific strain and pressure. I saw the damage, the havoc, the destruction and hardships the people have been suffering. V-day was coming even closer—and then came the robomb. The people of London will long remember the tragedy at the Guards' chapel, the robombs at Waterloo Station and the Lewisham market,—all incidents in the suffering of the civilian population of England.

Anyone who has seen action in the combat areas, anyone who has seen the suffering and devastation in southern England, wants to see the war finished as quickly as possible. Speaking as a service man, and only for myself, I should like to give my impressions of the support the army has received from the official opposition in this house.

On Monday of this week the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) interrupted the Prime Minister, and those interruptions and the replies are reported at page 6597 of Hansard. Let me read a few lines to show what was said:

> Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): That is not a correct statement, because in this house I moved an amendment to the address in the session of 1942, calling for complete national selective service. I want to correct a misstatement.
>
> Mr. Mackenzie King: Complete national selective service, as I understand it—
>
> Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): For the army in any theatre of war, for agriculture and for industry. That is a matter of record.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Well, perhaps I may speak for myself and allow the hon. member to speak for himself.

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): I say the record speaks for me.

I should like hon. members to look at that record. I have looked up the amendment moved by the hon. member for York-Sunbury on January 26, 1942, and I want to read it. This is what I find:

> And the question being proposed:
>
> Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), seconded by Mr. Stirling, moved in amendment thereto: That the following words be added to the address:
>
> "This house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers, instead of giving to the country the leadership so essential at a time properly described in the speech from the throne, as the gravest crisis in the world's history, on the contrary, have sought to evade their responsibility by holding a plebiscite, which, in the view of this house, is the negation of responsible government.
>
> And this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have not seen fit to recommend to parliament without delay additional measures designed to:
>
> (a) completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war.

I thought it desirable to look up the amendment moved on February 1, 1943, by the present leader of the opposition, after Mr. Bracken became leader of the Progressive Conservative party. It is in these words:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed (a) to provide an adequate plan for the effective use of Canada's man and woman power; (b) to adopt and carry through a national labour policy which will ensure maximum production and give to labour its rightful position as one of the major partners in our Canadian democracy; and (c) to provide adequate measures whereby Canadian agriculture can make its maximum war contribution and receive a fair share of the national income.

That is the record. To me as a soldier those are weak motions. They are facing both ways. They are trying to give the impression to one side that the Conservative party favours conscription and to the other side that it is not in favour of conscription. The Conservative party now seeks to get credit for wanting total war, but its record shows that it has never come out directly for conscription.

What has been the position of the government? At every stage the government has given the army the support it needs without cheap heroics. They are doing that to-day. The government avoided conscription for overseas as long as it was possible to do so without endangering support for the army. But since 1942 the government said that it would use conscription if necessary. The Prime Minister has never hidden behind smoke screens like selective services or other phrases which mean different things to different men. The Prime Minister has been straightforward. He has called things by their right names. When he means conscription he calls it conscription, not something else. When conscription for overseas became necessary the government took the responsibility and passed the order in council.

But that is not all. The government has done everything necessary in all directions to make Canada's effort an all-out effort. Let me remind the house of what Mr. Churchill said on that subject. I quote from page 72 of "Onwards to Victory" by the Right Honourable Winston S. Churchill:

March 6, 1943.

(A Message to Mr. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, who had congratulated Mr. Churchill on his recovery from illness):

I am deeply touched by your very generous message, and I send to you and to all members of the parliament of Canada my heartfelt thanks. I recall with gratitude the warmth of the reception which you all gave me when I visited Canada in December, 1941. In the darkest days Canada, under your leadership, remained confident and true. Now the days are brighter; and when victory is won you will be able to look back with just pride upon a record surpassed by none.

Then in a radio address from Quebec on August 31, 1943, Mr. Churchill said:

I have also had the advantage of conferring with the Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Mackenzie King, that experienced statesman who led the dominion instantly and unitedly into the war, and of sitting on several occasions with his cabinet, and the British and Canadian staffs have been over the whole ground of the war together. The contribution which Canada has made to the combined effort of the British commonwealth and empire in these tremendous times has deeply touched the heart of the mother country and of all the other members of our widespread family of states and races.

From the darkest days the Canadian army, growing stronger year by year, has played an indispensable part in guarding our British homeland from invasion. Now it is fighting with distinction in wider and ever-widening fields. The empire air training organization, which has been a wonderful success, has found its seat in Canada, and has welcomed the flower of the manhood of Great Britain, of Australia, and New Zealand to her spacious flying fields and to comradeship with her own gallant sons.

Canada has become in the course of this war an important seafaring nation, building many scores of warships and merchant ships, some of them thousands of miles from salt water, and sending them forth manned by hardy Canadian seamen to guard the Atlantic convoys and our vital life-line across the ocean. The munition industries of Canada have played a most important part in our war economy. Last, but not least, Canada has relieved Great Britain of what would otherwise have been a debt for these munitions of no less than $2,000,000,000.

All this, of course, was dictated by no law. It came from no treaty or formal obligation. It sprang in perfect freedom from sentiment and tradition and a generous resolve to serve the future of mankind.

That will be found at page 224 of the same publication. I should like to quote from the Ottawa Evening Citizen, Tuesday, November 28, as follows:

Canada's Effort "Magnificent"—Churchill

London, November 28—(CP)—Prime Minister Churchill to-day told the House of Commons he realized "the magnificent character of the Canadian war effort."

This resolution is not a vote on conscription. That is water over the dam; that issue was settled by the government on its own responsibility. The government is now asking for support in continuing the war effort—to finish the job. I believe that this government is incomparably better than any alternative to finish the job. I want a Liberal government to guarantee the future of Canada; no hybrid Union government, no soulless, heartless, conglomeration of office holders can do this. Our aim is to destroy the barbarism and error of nazism and take steps to prevent their rise again. Our aim is to strengthen and advance civilization and justice and assure security to all mankind.

Change is the law of life. We are living in a period of great changes, but any change must be in the right direction. Twenty-five years' leadership have given the Prime Minister experience without destroying vision. As proof let me quote from his speech before the members of both houses of parliament at Westminster on May 11, 1944:

Let us, by all means, seek to improve where we can. But in considering new methods of organization we cannot be too careful to see that, to our own peoples, the new methods will not appear as an attempt to limit their freedom of decision or, to peoples outside the Commonwealth, as an attempt to establish a separate bloc. Let us beware lest in changing the form we lose the substance; or, for appearance's sake, sacrifice reality.

Those words are applicable to the situation in this house to-day. What has already been done at this session in making provision for the future of the service men, in advancing social security for everyone in Canada and in laying foundations for full employment and enlarged opportunities, give concrete evidence of the aim of the government to make Canada a land where the four freedoms will be the birthright of all who live within its borders. I am therefore supporting the motion now before the house.

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for London, (Mr. Johnston) who has just preceded me, and I know I voice the sentiments of all the members of this party and the house as a whole when I say we are delighted to see him back after his wonderful service overseas during the last four years.

The hon. gentleman has said that the issue to-day is not conscription, that that is water over the dam. Literally we cannot help but agree with him in that statement, but there is no doubt that the administration of a form of conscription is the burning issue to-day. This is a serious session. It is as unexpected as it might have been made unnecessary. I agree to a considerable extent with what was said the other day by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and with much of what has just been said by the hon. member for London. In many respects Canada's war effort has been magnificent. In many respects it has won the admiration, the esteem and the respect not only of our allies but of the whole world. Of the gallantry of our men at sea, in the senior service; of the fearlessness of those gentlemen of the air who fought against great odds at the beginning of the war and are still doing such a masterly job; of the sturdiness, the stubbornness and the bravery of our infantry and our army generally, there is no doubt. I realize as I speak that there is not an hon. member but who has a direct and personal interest in this war. I know there are members of the government who have lost what they valued most.

These are indeed serious times. The courage of the mothers of this country at this time should not be forgotten. The determination of our people in general, their attitude from the very beginning of the war, their determination to enter upon the side of Britain, the bulwark of civilization in those dark days, will be remembered and recorded in the pages of history in the years to come. The genius of our mechanics and artisans in industrial production has enabled us to attain productive capacities beyond the imagination of the most optimistic at the beginning of the war. These things are written indelibly in the history of our progress in these last five awful years.

But we are not here to boast about our achievements. We are here to finish the job. We are here to face the last desperate test of a struggle which will decide the fate of civilization itself. I cannot put the issue in better words than have been used by Mr. Alexander Walker, C.B.E., dominion president of the Canadian Legion, whose statement contains these words:

> Only one thing matters now and that is getting reinforcements into the front line just as speedily as it is possible to do so. Anyone who still doubts this vital issue for reinforcements has only to look at the daily casualty lists and remember that, for every name appearing, a reinforcement must be found or an already war-weary soldier must do double duty.

He further states:

> It is a vital burning issue, upon the immediate solution of which will depend first, the lives of our sons and brothers overseas, and second, the honour of Canada, both in relation to her self respect as a nation and to the degree of esteem in which she will be held by the governments and people of the united nations when the war is over.

He concludes:

> The fate of our army overseas, and indeed Canada's future as a united nation, is now hanging in the balance.

That is the issue. It far transcends advantage to any party. It far transcends the dickering and manoeuvring for position or the clever strategy of the government which is now in power with the lopsided support of enormous numbers in this house. Having that in view, and realizing the seriousness of the situation this afternoon, I speak to this house and to this country for the Progressive Conservative party, with which I am associated; and I say that no suggestion which I am about to make has any reference to what the hon. member for London (Mr. Johnston) has intimated with reference to a national government, but is wholly an offer of cooperation provided the right leadership is found, and is made without any request or suggestion of union government.

The Progressive Conservative party, with the full authority of its leader, John Bracken, and with the unanimous voice of its representation in this parliament, hereby declares that in this hour of national crisis, when the fortunes of political parties must be subordinated to the national weal, it stands prepared to cooperate with any government which, under leadership that will ensure equality of service, offers proof of will and determination to send to our soldiers overseas the reinforcements which our war commitments demand.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the position of the party to which I belong. I am proud to say that we stand foursquare for a policy which will equalize conditions among our armed forces, which will equalize conditions of self-respect, of honour of service and of sacrifice, and give to the remainder of this war a united front in the battles overseas through that united stand here in Canada.

I listened with much interest to the remarks the other day of the Prime Minister. I have for the right hon. gentleman keen respect, and for almost a quarter of a century he has reciprocated this attitude. But may I say that his speech on this vital issue bristled with fear, doubt and uncertainty as to where this country was going, and I would point out, with the keenest respect, that we have only to look back and realize where the government has been standing to understand why he was nervous, why he almost shivered and shrank from his duty on this occasion. The hon. member for London has just told us that when the Prime Minister speaks about conscription everybody knows what he means. That is news, let me say, to a distressed Canada at the present time. I well recall the statements which were made before the war by the Prime Minister and his supporters. However, last year he informed us in this house that he had told Mr. Hitler himself that if he ever attacked Britain, Canada would be at her side.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: "Hear, hear," my hon. friend says. Did he tell you?

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes.

Mr. ROWE: He did not tell Canada.

Mr. GIBSON: He showed Canada.

Mr. ROWE: What is the hon. member's authority? My hon. friend from Toronto seems to have known. It was evidently between him and the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend heard Mr. Eden speak in this house with reference to what I said to Hitler.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, I heard Mr. Eden speak, but I did not hear the Prime Minister speak—not at that time. I heard him only four years afterwards. I look back and I see that some time ago, away back in 1939, the Prime Minister stated, as reported in Hansard at page 22—and I agree with what he said:

> If Britain goes down there will in time be no freedom on this continent.

He further said, in a broadcast on October 27, 1939, just after the beginning of the war:

> We see forces loosed upon the world which, if not subdued and conquered overseas, sooner or later would be at our very doors.

With that also I agree. Later, on June 13, 1941,—Hansard, page 3931,—he stated:

> This war will be won or lost . . . on the shores and in the skies of Britain. The battlements are in the Atlantic and the English channel. Freedom falls only if Britain falls.

Again I agree with him. In September, 1941, speaking in the Mansion House in London, the Prime Minister said:

> The policy of the Canadian government is to have our troops serve in those theatres where, viewing the war as a whole, it is believed their services will count most.

These are statements with which one cannot disagree. In fact, with most of the right hon. gentleman's statements one cannot disagree, and I am not disagreeing with them. But I am condemning his lack of action. On November 12, 1941, the Prime Minsiter said, in spite of these facts:

> So far as I am concerned, without any consultation of the people on that subject, I do not intend to take the responsibility of supporting any policy of conscription for service overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What did Meighen say at Hamilton—

Mr. ROWE: If you had listened to the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen years ago you would not have developed the disunity that has been created in the country by your opposition to him over the last twenty-five years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What did he say?

Mr. ROWE: The Prime Minister also said:

> It is always well, however, to be prepared as far in advance as may be possible for any contingency. . . . To defeat the enemy overseas is the objective of Canada's armed forces.

But, Mr. Speaker, later on the Prime Minister said: It is clear that the need for home defence has passed. And then we had the famous plebiscite, and the Prime Minister said the other day in his speech that there has never been a time since 1941 that this government has not had the legal power to enforce conscription if necessary. The hon. member for London has said to-day, however, that that is water under the bridge; conscription has been passed; and, as he intimates, the Prime Minister passed conscription. Indeed, it was his conscription that took the boys from the farm and the factory, from the forest and from the store, from the school and from our mines and from every enterprise in this dominion. He put in conscription, he brought on a plebiscite and had a substantial majority on it. As he said the other day, he has had that power from 1941, but he had the moral obligation, and he wanted to be relieved of that moral obligation in 1942. He was then released from the moral obligation, as he stated, so that it would leave him free in every way; and evidently he was released in every way, because by order in council

P.C. 1867 he authorized the dispatch to Jamaica of personnel called out for training and service under N.R.M.A. Again on March 12, 1943, by order in council P.C. 2003, he authorized the dispatch of troops to Newfoundland. On April 20, 1943, he authorized the dispatch to Alaska of personnel called out for training, service or duty pursuant to N.R.M.A., not restricting this to any specific number of men. Then there was an order in council extending the above to include the Aleutian islands, and there was also the famous order in council that has been passed recently. I say, therefore, that we have had no great conversion to any new administration of this policy.

I regret as deeply as does any other member of this house the resignations that have been handed in to the government. I regret the resignation of the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston), a gallant soldier of the last war and a gentleman who has served diligently in this war. I regret the resignation of the former minister of national defence for air (Mr. Power). It is regrettable that at this period in the war it should be necessary for two of the most important men in the cabinet, the two fighting men to resign. But the ex-minister of national defence has struggled with this problem, and no doubt struggled all the harder because of the uncertainty that has surrounded him by reason of the policy of his government. He went overseas expecting, as it was rumoured, to spend six weeks there, but he rushed back in three weeks—why? Because he realized that the situation was critical. He rushed back straight to his government and to his friend the Prime Minister and urged upon the right hon. gentleman the need of men. He had seen at first hand exactly what the picture was and he knew that we must depart from the policy of the voluntary system.

One would think that the old slogans of the Prime Minister would have been reviewed in the light of events—that we should have conscription if necessary but not necessarily conscription, that we should have conscription when we needed it and when we knew what the need was. The man who had stood beside him for a quarter of a century, a man whom he trusted, his friend, the ex-minister of national defence, on whom he had depended in this crucial year, offered his advice and that advice was rejected. Why was his advice rejected at the eleventh hour? Why did the Prime Minister forsake him? The Prime Minister said that one of the reasons was that the ex-minister of national defence had assured him previously that this would not happen until after the new year. In his speech the other day he said: I was assured there would be no such need until after the new year. He went further and said: I want this house and the country to know that we have been thinking about this. We have been thinking about it for a long time, but Mr. Ralston said that he would not break the news to us until after the new year. I do not want to be unfair to the right hon. gentleman, but those were his statements as I understood them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has not the connection at all. The reference to the new year was this—that there were ample reinforcements for the army up to the end of the present year and the critical situation would not arise until next year. It was in reference to the position of the men overseas. There was no need for any relative or friend to be anxious, because there was provision up to that time.

Mr. ROWE: I understand the issue, perhaps not as well as the Prime Minister understands it but better than he thinks I do, and I will say with all deference that I have learned to follow his words cautiously and carefully. What he has just said is true. No man can tell the truth more skilfully than he. Let me say this. The Prime Minister knows what the situation is, as does every member of this house. But the ex-minister of national defence resigned from his government because in his opinion the crisis would arise so soon that plans for troops to go must be made now. The issue is so clear that it must appeal to every Canadian, just as it appeals to every member of this house. It pleads for a solution.

We know that troops could not be dispatched and disembarked overseas before the end of December and therefore the month of December was not the immediate problem. But should we wait until January to be told of a shortage of reinforcements? No. The Prime Minister said that another reason why he did not take the advice of the ex-minister of national defence was this, and I quote: I want the house and the country to know that we have been thinking about this all along. He said he wanted the people to know that the reason why he did not accept the advice, after five years of war, was that we were now on the very eve of victory; therefore why should we do as suggested. He said we were on the very eve of victory; why should we do it now? Further, he said: What we had to decide in the cabinet was not only the necessity overseas but exactly what conditions existed right here in Canada. He emphasized that. I say therefore that the speech bristled with fear, doubt and uncertainty. Am I unfair to him?

An hon. MEMBER: Surely.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member says, surely. Well, I am not going to be sidetracked by my hon. friend, who is always more vociferous while sitting down than when standing up. But I will say this. The Prime Minister is unfair to Canada when he says that what we had to decide was not the necessity overseas but the uncertainty here in Canada. What a reflection on the intelligence and loyalty of our Canadian people!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend—

Mr. ROWE: The necessity right here in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that no remarks of mine are capable of that interpretation. They are on Hansard. I did indicate to the house what were the difficult considerations of which account had to be taken in reaching a decision.

Mr. ROWE: I do not want to be unfair to the right hon. gentleman, because he has never been unfair to me. There has always been the most courteous relationship between the Prime Minister and myself. If I have copied his remarks wrongly, I am sorry, because I copied them from Hansard. I did not put in the many frills here and there, but I took the meat out of them—and it is difficult to find much meat when there are so many words that mean so little. I say again, Mr. Speaker, such a statement as that is a reflection on the Canadian people. I leave it to the public, as he who runs may read. I leave it to any hon. member in this house or anyone out of the house who wants to read Hansard. If that statement is not found in Hansard I will apologize to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the right hon. gentleman. I remember it well. It rang in my ears as an insult to the intelligence of the people of this dominion, to say to the world that we are not so much concerned about the necessity over where our boys are fighting and dying for freedom as we are about our politics at home.

An hon. MEMBER: The Prime Minister never said that. Who says that?

Mr. ROWE: I am saying that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: —as we are about the political and other uncertainties in Canada. You cannot blow hot and cold. You cannot say on the one hand that you have made such great strides, as the Minister of Finance can well say with respect to the sale of victory bonds. Every loan has been oversubscribed. How can you talk about what the Red Cross has done in this country; how can you say that our industrial enterprise has done marvels in providing munitions and supplies; how can you boast about the determination and industry of the Canadian people, the genius of our mechanics and the soundness of the business executive across the country who have made our war effort the success that it has been, and at the same time talk about the uncertainties in Canada? These people have led the government instead of the government leading them for the last five years. How can you boast about that on one hand and say to the world on the other hand that so far as the necessity for man-power is concerned we have to think of conditions at home and then try to escape the responsibility for those conditions?

The man who has been in power in this country for so long says that the conditions are caused by an organized conspiracy. A conspiracy by whom? The press of Canada? The Canadian Legion? The boys who have returned from overseas? Who are the conspirators? Where is this conspiracy?

An hon. MEMBER: A Tory conspiracy.

Mr. ROWE: Somebody says, "a Tory conspiracy". Yes, I have heard you say that before. It is not worthy of an answer, Mr. Speaker, because the hon. member knows where this party has stood. He knows where it stands to-day, and if there was any doubt about it I have made it clear to you now. We are not seeking power; we are not seeking authority. What we are seeking is to have this government do the duty that lies clearly before it, and get on with this war. We did not call this session of parliament. It was called because one of the senior cabinet ministers left the government because it had faltered in its duty. It was called when another cabinet minister left because you floundered in your compromise. That is why they left you. One left because you compromised; the other left because you faltered. There is no organized conspiracy against this government, Mr. Speaker. There is an organized determination across the country that we shall finish this job. I think this afternoon of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill. Would not the Canadian people prefer that the Prime Minister should come out and tell us: All I can offer you at this time is blood, sweat and tears, than that he should say on the floor of this house that the necessity makes him throw the responsibility on parliament?

Who has replaced the hon. gentleman who has resigned as minister of national defence? A man who said he had faith in the voluntary system the day before he came into the house and now asks us to support him in a compulsory policy. He came into the house with unanimous consent. This government cannot hide behind such smoke-screens. You cannot hide behind secret sessions of parliament. The public of Canada know where you stand. They know about the vacillating, twisting, squirming, floundering and faltering policy of this government. Everybody in Canada knows. The boys in service overseas are almost weeping about it. They write back home and ask us what is happening in Canada. Why should we humiliate them in their hour of greatest crisis?

The Minister of National Defence—and I have every respect and regard for him—has been a great scientist. He is a cultured gentleman. He was nervous the other day. I say that because after he left us the first day we were more confused than when he came into the house. It was not any fault of his. It was because he was making his first appearance in the house under such peculiar circumstances. But I remember one thing he did say—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I—

Mr. McGREGOR: Oh, sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the hon. member who interrupted me will stand up. May I say that my hon. friend in speaking of confusion is quite within his rights in expressing his own frame of mind. I hope he will not regard it as representing mine.

Mr. ROWE: I do not assume the Prime Minister ever thought that I was expressing his opinion. I hope we can be clear on that. If he thinks that, I have spent a lot of time here in vain. But there is one thing that the Prime Minister and I both heard the Minister of National Defence say the other day. After the Prime Minister had stated that we were near victory, that it was almost within our grasp, at the very eve of victory the ex-commander of our forces stated that we faced a most serious situation; that the fortifications are more difficult than we ever expected to contend with and a hard road lay ahead.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The Prime Minister said the same thing.

Mr. ROWE: Does the hon. member for Brantford City need to speak for the Prime Minister; the Prime Minister is capable of speaking for himself. The Prime Minister said that we were on the eve of victory. Will the hon. member for Brantford City say that victory is right at our door now and that we do not need to make any further effort?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What did Mr. Churchill say, and everyone else?

Mr. ROWE: Yes, Mr. Churchill said that victory may not be achieved until well on into next summer. The Prime Minister is thinking about the first statement Mr. Churchill made. The Prime Minister is six months behind on this particular issue.

The new Minister of National Defence spoke to the house and said for five years he had faith in the voluntary system, and then in five hours admitted that he had been converted to the compulsory system. We are now asked as a people to endorse and support him, to endorse a policy for which the former minister of national defence was let out. It is the most ridiculous spectacle that this country has ever faced—toying and flirting with our destiny while our boys are dying. Yes, Mr. Speaker, he said that the fighting was much heavier than we had expected. He now comes in and asks us to endorse the sending overseas of only 16,000 men. He says the loss of life will be great. The future is dark and difficult, yet the other day another minister of the crown, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) said that the war is already won.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Oh, he is at sea.

Mr. ROWE: Well, there is the old saying that there are better fish in the sea than have ever been caught. One minister says the war is over. The Prime Minister says he has victory within his grasp. Another minister says the war is not nearly over yet, that the fortifications between us and victory are far greater than he expected, so how can we have confidence in this government? Then we have another minister, that gallant gentleman who has struggled so hard and has been responsible for a great part of the organization, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), saying over in Chicago that this is only a political issue, that there is no real necessity for it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: I will not deal with that further; the statement aroused the whole United States, but if I were sitting where hon. gentlemen are sitting I would not laugh very heartily at that one. Then we have the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) another gallant supporter of the government. If anyone thinks there is consistency in this government let them listen to what that hon. gentleman said in 1942:

> I am convinced that we all want to win the war and that we are all prepared to submit to any measure which may be absolutely necessary for that purpose. . . . No thinking person can, therefore, have any objection to the government resorting to conscription for overseas service in the event of absolute necessity.

Then only the other day the same hon. gentleman said:

> Mr. Ralston has visited the battlefields overseas and upon his return has communicated to his cabinet colleagues reports of an extremely serious nature. . . . We in conscience could not accept what he recommended us to do. . . . If the federal government had decided to send draftees as reinforcements overseas, the majority of the people of Quebec would have deemed themselves deceived by their English-speaking compatriots.

Mr. CARDIN: Never mind about Quebec.

Mr. ROWE: But this is your own Minister of Justice. I have as much regard for the province of Quebec as my hon. friend has. Never within or without this house have I reflected upon your province. I have said that your noble people, who win Victoria Crosses just as other people do, have been misled and fooled for twenty-five years by the right hon. Prime Minister. I ask the hon. gentleman, or any other hon. member from the province of Quebec—

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): Is that what you have always said?

Mr. ROWE: Oh, get up or shut up. If any minister from the province of Quebec can speak for the Minister of Justice in his absence, I ask him to rise now and tell us where the minister stands at the present time. Does he want to change his mind again? Does he support this degree of conscription, or does his silence indicate another resignation coming up? We have even heard from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), who said it was possible the time might come, and that if it did the government would adopt without equivocation the same method of raising men for our overseas forces that has been followed in connection with the home defence army. I ask the minister if he now supports this policy, as this is something else again. This is the third time he has changed. Does he stick with that, or is he waiting now for a fourth policy? Then in 1942 I heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) say in this house:

> When in my view conscription for overseas service is essential to the safety of the state and the preservation of our way of life, I will express my opinion in no uncertain terms.

Why does he now remain in conspicuous silence, while his colleagues bid him a last and loud farewell? Then we have the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the famous champion of the middle of the road. Where does he stand to-day? Does he still stand in the middle of the road? Does he stand for sending more men overseas, or is he going to confine it to just this 16,000? These are the last shreds by which this faltering government hangs; from crag to crag they flounder; from one point of despair to another they hesitate, and from one national humiliation to another they retreat. I would remind them of one awful advertisement in connection with these gallant young men—and I say gallant young men advisedly, for I have every sympathy for these boys who have been so often rudely termed "zombies." These boys have been misled; they have not been approached fairly, but they have as gallant hearts for battle as many of the men overseas. They are waiting for uniform conscription, as they said this morning in Vancouver. In that connection I think of that advertisement, paid for with the money of the taxpayers, pleading with them, intimidating them, coercing them as well as conscripting them: "Have I the guts?" Then I say to these hon. gentlemen who are left, these lesser lights of the former cabinet: when this house adjourns, go out and get a mirror, look at yourselves and ask yourselves the same question.

Was it any wonder the Prime Minister, in his speech the other day, turned his back to those of us who understand his motives, and talked to his former colleagues? Is it any wonder that he pleaded: now, at my time of life, you should support me. Is it any wonder that he resurrected from the graveyard of the political life of this dominion the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the great Sir John A. Macdonald, to take what they did in days of peace in order to justify him for what he has done in time of war? Is it any wonder that he fears anarchy may follow his regime? We have anarchy in this country now, Mr. Speaker, and the Prime Minister has lost the confidence of the people of this dominion. The other day he spoke as though he were indispensable, but in that regard let me say that I have seen governments come and I have seen governments go. I know the right hon. gentleman knows, and he knows that I know, that he does not have to name his successor. In this house he turned and asked his colleagues which one would take on the job. He has not the right to ask anybody else. The governor general has the right, though he has not the duty, to ask the Prime Minister to recommend, and the governor general does not have to accept that recommendation unless he sees fit to do so. Surely no one is indispensable. This is not a dynasty; this is a democracy. The Prime Minister pleads for a rubber-stamped approval by a colossal majority before his government is smothered by the avalanche of dissension so obvious throughout the country.

Then we have the Japanese situation; I see my time is going, but not long ago in the city of Quebec a conference was held. Mr. Churchill said:

And Mr. Mackenzie King and his cabinet likewise have insisted that they should take the part assigned to them.

I have not time to deal with that matter now, but some three years ago we declared war on Japan, and now Canada still waits for a policy in connection with its execution.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. ROWE: I wanted to say just a word or two with reference to my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. party; I will detain you but a moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. ROWE: I think, Mr. Speaker, if you make allowance for all the interruptions I will still have time to say a few words.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. ROWE: I thank hon. members for their courtesy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. leader of the C.C.F. is just as much entitled to that as I am.

Mr. ROWE: I thank the right hon. gentleman. Let me say in all sincerity, without any sense of levity, that when the Prime Minister believed he had a home crisis which we did not think was quite so grave as he stated in comparison with the war, I was amazed to hear the leader of the C.C.F. party tell the Prime Minister and his party what he would have done. The other night the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) told us how when overseas he had stood amidst those little white crosses and had thought that some of them were for boys who had ridden the rods during the days of depression. I am sure we all felt that very keenly.

Mr. MacINNIS: What did you do about it?

Mr. ROWE: What did you do about the little white crosses?

Mr. MacINNIS: Your party was in office at that time.

Mr. ROWE: I have a few of your statements too, but I have not time to put them on record. Let me read the official C.C.F. war policy, however, as it was stated in this house on September 9, 1939, right at the crucial hour:

This is the policy which represents the consensus of the leaders of our movement from coast to coast. . . . Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores, but her assistance should be limited to economic aid and must not include conscription of manpower or the sending of any expeditionary force . . . no military participation overseas.

An hon. MEMBER: You did not believe in it then?

Mr. ROWE: Oh, yes I did. We do not know yet what you think, and you never knew what I thought. Then again the leader of the C.C.F. is reported in this way in the Regina Leader Post:

We should make up our minds that never, so far as we are concerned, will we let our sons go across the sea to war again.

Mr. DUPUIS: Who said that?

Mr. ROWE: The present leader of the C.C.F. said that. In all I have said about the present government, I say to the house and the country I must admit that, despite its shortcomings, I have not heard a member of the government say that. And this was the man who said, further:

If this house decides that we are going to prepare for war . . . I would not support them.

And his party member further said:

In my opinion our British connection is our gravest danger.

And again:

I am quite convinced of this, that a large number of young men of this land will refuse to bear arms in a cause in which they feel they have no interest.

And again, after months of war had passed:

In the event of war, Canada's maxmium contribution would be the supplying of foodstuffs and material, and that under no circumstances would conscription be instituted to provide an expeditionary force overseas . . . we did not approve the sending of an expeditionary force overseas—

And this was at the time of the fall of France. So I say to the leader of the C.C.F. party: Did he kneel among those white crosses and repent of having taken that position, to assume the changed position he described the other day in this house?

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the house for its attention. The issue, sir, is clear. The challenge is definite. Our duty is at hand. We must keep faith with our boys. We must not flirt with destiny. We must not fail our boys and humiliate our country. Our national dignity is at stake.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has asked the house to aid the government in maintaining a vigorous war effort. He asks for an endorsation of the government's general policy in that regard. He made his position clear when he spoke on November 27, as reported at page 6617 of Hansard in these words:

> As I have said, the motion is not to be construed as an endorsation of government policies generally. So far as it relates to confidence in myself, that confidence is being expressed in relation to myself as one charged with responsibility of seeing that the policy set forth in the order in council P.C. 8891 is duly administered.

And again:

> Any member who votes against this motion is asking to have the present administration resign, and another administration immediately take its place.

No matter what the Prime Minister may have said, I believe that in many parts of this country a vote for the Prime Minister's motion will be regarded as a vote in favour of sending the personnel of the N.R.M.A. overseas—and vice versa, where a vote is against the motion.

We have now a situation where reinforcements are needed overseas immediately, and I believe that P.C. 8891 is sufficient to meet the needs of that situation. Furthermore we have had the assurance of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. McNaughton) that the 26,000 of the N.R.M.A. personnel not covered by the order in council will be put immediately into the training stream, and made available if and when required.

This group would have preferred an order in council which would have made all men called up under the N.R.M.A. available for overseas service. We realize, however, that an urgent situation has developed, a situation in which reinforcements are needed overseas immediately, and we are prepared to support the government in seeing that those reinforcements are sent. We are also prepared to support the government in averting a crisis which might very well bring on an election which would split the country from one end to the other. An issue such as this should not be placed before the people at this time. It would be my hope that when an election does come it would be on an issue which is clear-cut, so that the people may vote with some degree of intelligence.

It has been suggested that we could support the amendment offered by the Progressive Conservative party, which would ensure that the whole of the personnel of the N.R.M.A. be sent overseas. I think it is clear, however, that support for that amendment would in many places be regarded as showing confidence in the Progressive Conservative party—and members of this group have absolutely no confidence in that party. We have not forgotten their record between 1930 and 1935, their policy of belt-tightening in the face of actual physical want and destitution. We have not forgotten that that party failed to give leadership early in 1940. Furthermore, after they were defeated they immediately began to embarrass the government, and they have been trying to embarrass it ever since that time, throughout the period of the war. Their sole purpose seems to have been to capitalize on the crisis that has developed.

P.C. 8891 is being blamed for the wave of discontent sweeping the country to-day. I would say that the order in council has merely brought the matter out into the open. For some years, since the beginning of the war, discontent has been spreading, and that situation has been largely the result of the manner in which policies have been administered, and especially those policies relating to recruiting.

The government's policy from the very beginning in connection with this question has been one of appeasement. A policy of appeasement, whether national or international, is in reality a policy of cowardice; it neither satisfies the appeased nor does it satisfy those who are attempting to appease. It earns the contempt of the appeased and the wrath of those who are sacrificed as a result of the appeasement.

From the beginning the government has consistently opposed conscription for overseas service. Apparently it is a strong supporter of the voluntary system. But let me stress this fact, that it has indulged in what I would describe as despicable practices, in an effort to compel people to volunteer. In addition to that its policy has, from the very beginning, been one of flogging the willing horse.

What has been the consequence of that policy? The result has been this, that in various parts of Canada we find families in which the whole of the manhood of those families has been wiped out; and then across the road you may have a family that has made no contribution. That is bound to be the result of flogging the willing horse with your so-called voluntary system. It is that kind of thing that is stirring up so much resentment in the country to-day, when you see these families bereaved of all their sons and perhaps the husband as well.

The policy of the Prime Minister, or perhaps I should say of the government, created a problem in the men that were called up under the N.R.M.A. Ever since those men were called up a campaign of abuse has been carried on against them. The reason why so many of those men are refusing to enlist to-day is not that they are cowards, it is that they are burning with resentment because of the policy which has been applied.

Do not let us forget that in the early stages of this scheme many men were obtained under false pretences. I think it was in 1941 when the four months' training plan was first put into operation. Men were asked to leave the farm to serve under that scheme, to take up four months' training and then be in position to return to the farm in the spring. Many boys, wishing to cooperate with the government, refrained from asking for postponements. They went into the training stream, and what happened? After they were in there the government froze them there for the duration. Many of those boys would have been eligible for postponement had it not been for the fact that they were asked to cooperate with the government and they did cooperate. But they were penalized for cooperating. That is what happened at the very start of the scheme. Men were got in under false pretences and they have been burning with resentment ever since. When you have a few men in a crowd burning with resentment, that resentment grows and filters through the rest.

We are told that volunteers make better soldiers than conscripts. Are we prepared to say that the Canadian soldier is a better soldier than the United States or Russian or British soldier? I do not think any one of us would dare to say that. Under this policy a man will be considered a volunteer up to a certain hour, but after that he becomes a conscript. Will you say that if a man volunteers before twelve o'clock he will be a better soldier than he would if he were conscripted five minutes later? That is the situation as we have it to-day.

We are told that conscription failed in the last war. I can speak only from personal experience, but I do know that on September 2, 1918, just before we launched an attack on the Drocourt-Queant line I received a large number of reinforcements. I did not care whether those men were conscripts or volunteers. I and the company were glad to welcome them. We were not of the opinion that conscription had failed. The only fault we had to find was that these men had received only a comparatively few weeks training. That was because conscription had not been put into force early enough; it was not as a result of conscription.

I agree that the voluntary system is the best method to use in order to obtain men for a raiding party or a small expeditionary force; but when you are going into a total war which will require every man that is available, then I do not see how the voluntary system can be maintained on an equitable basis. Certainly you cannot expect to have equality of service and sacrifice under the voluntary system which may result in all the men of one family going overseas and none from another.

Under P.C. 8891 the government still supports the voluntary system; it is still going to try to get N.R.M.A. men to enlist. Will the man who is practically forced to enlist be a better soldier than the man who is conscripted? As I have already pointed out, that is bound to be the situation which will develop as a result of the order in council. In spite of the fact that men are being called up you are still going to flog the willing horse. There will be nothing to prevent the last remaining son in a family from enlisting for overseas. That boy may have lost two or three brothers and want revenge. If two or three sons from a family have gone overseas the remaining son should not be allowed to go. Instead of doing everything to make it possible for that son to enlist, we should refuse to allow him to enlist. Under the present system all the boys in one family may be enlisting while other families will be permitted to continue to disregard their obligations or responsibilities.

The Liberal party is continually emphasizing the fact that Canada has made a magnificent war effort. I think we will all agree that our war effort has been a glorious one, but I take issue with the statement that we should support the Liberal party in an election because the Liberal party has made a magnificent war effort. I think in many cases our magnificent war effort has been in spite of the government's policies rather than as a result of them. I will give two or three examples to prove my contention.

Let us go back to the early days of the war and remember that for the first three years agricultural prices were maintained at a ruinously low figure. In spite of that injustice, agriculture cooperated and expanded its production. I would say that agriculture made that effort in spite of the injustices that it had suffered rather than as a result of the government's policies at that time. The same thing may be said with regard to labour. Since the start of the war labour has suffered many injustices, but in spite of those injustices labour has made a tremendous contribution to the war. Again you can say that that contribution was made in spite of rather than as a result of Liberal policies.

I should like to refer to the treatment that our soldiers and their dependents have received since the start of the war. The mistreatment which some of our soldiers and their dependents have received has caused a great deal of indignation. At the start of this session I referred to many cases and asked that these injustices be remedied before they caused further resentment. Apparently the government has no intention of altering certain policies which have proved so detrimental to the welfare of the soldier.

Let me refer to the order in council which was passed in 1940 and which amended the Pension Act. That order in council removed the insurance principle. I understand it was introduced on the recommendation of the Department of Finance. Up until the passing of that order in council a soldier was insured from the time he put on his uniform until he took it off. After the passing of that order in council a man serving in Canada was insured only against disability incurred as a result of military duty. As a result of the policy incorporated in that order in council many thousands of soldiers have been refused pensions on the ground that their disabilities were incurred while they were not on military duty.

Take the situation in the last war. During the last war those men would have been eligible for pension. Then again, thousands of soldiers have been refused pensions, and perhaps their dependents as well, on the ground that their disability was of pre-enlistment origin. That is not the law in England. There the category of the man upon enlistment is recognized as his real condition, and if that condition deteriorates he is pensionable. Should a man in this country enter the army as A-1 and his condition deteriorate, if it can be proven that that deterioration was due, say to an accident which happened prior to his enlistment, we refuse to give him a pension. If so, it is not the law in England, and I think it is high time that that law should be changed in this country. Many of these men are put through a form of third degree in order to try to prove that the disability they suffer from upon their discharge was incurred prior to enlistment. The only reason for passing either of those orders in council—the one regarding pre-enlistment origin and the one regarding the insurance principle—was to save the country a few million dollars, and to do so at the expense of the soldier and his dependents.

Then, one might refer to the condition of the old soldier settlers of the last war. I believe every hon. member is familiar with that situation. I do not think any member is proud of it. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) has brought this question forcibly before the house on several occasions. I am reminded that when a delegation came here to interview the cabinet last summer they were given the assurance of the cabinet that every consideration would be given to their request. I was there when they met the cabinet, and afterwards, and the men were jubilant. They said, "That is good; we are going to be given free title to our land." I told them then and there not to be over-optimistic. I told them, "Governments have a peculiar way of failing to carry out promises which you think they have been made". It was only a short time afterwards that a statement appeared in the Legionary magazine under the pen of the director of the Veterans Land Act which told the men that the government had no intention of giving them clear title to their land. It would have been far better if the government, when they met these soldiers, had explained that situation then and there instead of encouraging them to believe free titles were going to be given; because that is merely storing up future resentments.

All the things I have referred to have created a great deal of dissatisfaction throughout this country as a result of the injustices. So again I stress that the glorious war effort of Canada in many regards has been in spite of the policies of the Liberal government rather than as a result of them.

Before I sit down I intend to move an amendment which, I believe, would largely rectify the condition that I have referred to; but before I propose the amendment I wish to make a statement in clarification of a certain situation that exists in this country:

We, the members of the Social Credit party in this house, in 1940 were elected entirely from the province of Alberta. At that time no national social credit movement had been launched. However, in April of this year a national convention in Toronto set up the Social Credit Association of Canada, which is not a political party machine but is an association of autonomous provincial and federal constituency organizations, as the name implies. This association has not had an opportunity of submitting its policy to the people of Canada for their endorsation; hence no member is among us to speak for the Social Credit Association of Canada.

In all that any of this group have said in this house, in all that I have said in this address, and in the contents of the amendment we are about to propose, we simply have represented and do represent the policies of this group of Social Credit members of parliament and not necessarily those of the Social Credit Association of Canada.

On this question of Canada's war effort this group has been entirely consistent from the earliest days of our presence in this house. In what we now propose as a sane and sensible policy to be followed by the government of Canada from this day forth to ensure a maximum war effort, we believe we are voicing the will of the vast majority of Canadians, and certainly the will of the majority of the Social Crediters who elected us. But we realize now that there may be groups of Social Crediters in various parts of Canada not represented here who may not entirely agree with our proposals, hence we cannot presume to speak for them until they have been given memberships in our caucus through the mechanics of an election.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), the following amendment:

That all the words after the word "house" in the amendment be struck out and the following words substituted instead thereof:

"requires the government to give immediate effect to the following policy:

1. The unqualified assurance to our men on the battle fronts that they will receive at once ample material supplies, and adequate reinforcements; and the use of all persons in any of Canada's armed services in any theatre of war in which they may be required.

2. The unqualified assurance, backed by appropriate action, that:

(a) Upon demobilization the active service men and women in the armed services, together with their families, will be ensured economic security, together with adequate grants and proper opportunities for training to enable them to reestablish themselves in the country's economic life;

(b) Adequate pensions and free medical care will be given to all persons whose health has been impaired during active service in the Canadian forces from any cause whatsoever;

(c) The dependents of all men killed in action or who have died in active service in the Canadian forces will be provided with economic independence for life.

(d) The foregoing will constitute a first charge on the nation.

3. The assurance to the people of Canada, by immediate action to that end, that following the war the abundant productive resources of the country will be used to the full, and that the resulting goods and services will be equitably distributed to ensure every Canadian economic security with full freedom.

4. The assurance that government wartime controls, bureaucracy regimentation and oppressive taxation will be discontinued as rapidly as possible after the war, and that the peace-time economy will be based on a proper democracy free from state domination of the people's lives.

5. Immediate steps to establish the necessary reforms to our financial system without which the foregoing will be impossible."

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): My remarks will be brief. I do not need to speak at any length to repeat what I have stated a hundred times in and out of the house. I foresaw long ago the events which are now taking place and I have frequently warned the government and the people. During the sessions of 1937 and 1938, I consistently opposed the increase in military estimates, maintaining an unyielding opposition to any attempt to drag us into foreign wars. I have fought unremittingly for the repeal of section 64 of the Militia Act, at the very time when an attempt was being made to lead us into believing that the increase in military estimates was intended for the defence of Canada and of Canada only. On September 9, 1939, I denounced with all my strength Canada's participation in the war, and I even moved an amendment to that effect.

Alone the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) supported my efforts against participation which necessarily was to bring about the unjust and disloyal conscription which has been in force since 1940 and, finally, the present disaster.

As the result of Canada's participation in the war, the government has spent sixteen billion dollars; agriculture has lost over half a million workers, male and female; families are broken up, while mothers and daughters are toiling in factories, and thousands of our young men are being sacrificed on foreign soil. And who are responsible for this appalling situation? Those who failed to support our amendment against participation in the war and our amendments against mobilization, on June 18 and 19, 1940.

Protests are being heard against conscription, not only from Quebec but from all sections of the country. I am still opposed to conscription with as much strength as I deployed in opposing the increase in defence estimates, participation and mobilization. I cannot find words sufficiently scathing to condemn this new reversal of policy by a government which, at the end of its term of office, imposes this evil and anti-national measure. Never has a government broken so many pledges. Never has it thus sowed doubt and suspicion. A self-respecting administration, if they have any regard for the people, do not resort to all possible roundabout means to abuse the good faith of those under their jurisdiction. In whom will our people repose their trust if they lose confidence in the government?

One last word. Since Canada has started participating in the war, we have lost all our prerogatives. We have reverted to century-old colonialism. Our country, thanks to the acts and errors of the government, is now trailing for good in the wake of the Empire to the great satisfaction of our partisans of colonialism. Let us hope that we may forsake this chaotic situation to unfurl at last a Canadian flag in an independent country, mistress of its own destinies. Whether we wish it or not, the deep reactions of the post-war period are bound to bring about the independence of Canada.

At last, because they have camouflaged the facts, the government who have willingly declared war must inevitably be led to conscription. Let them shoulder their dreadful responsibility in this matter, which they share with those who have refused to support the amendment I moved against participation in the war, on September 9, 1939. Their attitude at that time has been and still is the main cause of conscription. If, in 1917, a similar measure was a tremendous mistake, to use the expressions of the former Minister of Justice, it is doubly wrong to-day. The experience of the last war should have been a warning to the administration. The Canadian people, after seeing the economical structure of their country threatened, besides shouldering too heavy a burden of taxes and loans must, by the expressed will of their government, pay the blood tax. Such are the deferred, but dire results of the military and financial imperialism laid down as a creed by the very people who claimed they were opposing it.

Personally, I shall maintain the attitude I have taken, resolved to fight to the end against this unjustifiable measure.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): From what has been said it is obvious that we all agree that the country and the people are faced by a very grave crisis. It is the crisis of reinforcements and also the crisis of national unity, and this crisis of national unity is one that we should consider seriously because of its effect upon the people of Canada and upon the morale both of the people at home and of the troops overseas.

My party, the Labour Progressive party, has done everything in its power, in whatever it has said or written, to encourage the greatest number of men to join the army, to undertake general service. Our party has no N.R.M.A. men. We in this party, in the course of the plebiscite, carried on a campaign for a "yes" vote, and I believe that if at that time the necessary steps had been taken of explaining to the people of Quebec the character of the war, the people of Quebec would have looked upon the war through different glasses.

When we speak of reinforcements, I suggest that we should stick to the issue of reinforcements and not try to introduce any other questions. I am referring, for instance, to the issue of the conscription of wealth, resources and machines. By introducing these additional phrases, by raising these additional demands we are helping to create doubt in the minds of young people whether or not it pays them to join. We do not need any additional frills. There is a problem before us, the problem of reinforcements, the problem of men needed for overseas. That, as I understand it, is the issue before the house to-day.

In considering the problem of reinforcements it is necessary that we should look upon Canada as it is and not as we might want it to be. It is unfair to try to compare Canada with Britain or the United States. We have in Canada a two-nation state and it is about time that every member of this house recognized that fact. There are French-Canadian people and English-speaking people in this country and we have to recognize that. It is something which of course does not exist either in the United States or in Great Britain. We have French-Canadian people who have reason to be very suspicious of wars because of what has happened in the past when they were forced to participate in wars that were not among the most popular of conflicts. We have to realize that, but we must also realize that these same people have grievances that have not been corrected. If those problems had been faced I would say that our approach to the problem of reinforcements and conscription would be a different one from what it is to-day.

The French-Canadian people and the province of Quebec have been slandered in the past few months as never before. The press in the eight provinces of our country has been carrying on a vicious campaign about Quebec and Quebec zombies. That is all we have heard. Having travelled a bit in Ontario I can appreciate the fact that this terrific un-Canadian agitation is bearing fruit. When you meet the average man or woman you hear nothing but insults against Quebec. I would say that campaign is not an accident. It is not a spontaneous campaign. It is an organized campaign. I do not believe in the theory of spontaneity. Things do not happen just by themselves; they are organized. They have been organized in the eight provinces by the leaders of the Progressive Conservative party. It started a few months ago on the issue of family allowances. At that time Premier Drew of Ontario said: "Ontario will not pay for Quebec zombies". Then came a terrific intensification of this sort of thing in which he nearly broke his neck. He then decided to go overseas and to come back with a new issue, the issue of reinforcements. I am not denying the issue of reinforcements, but I do not like how it came to be raised. Premier Drew came back to this country, and at about the same time Major Connie Smythe came back and in a public statement told the country that untrained men were sent to the front. If I understand military law I should think it would have been more proper for the major to take this matter up with the proper authorities than to go into politics, but that was not done. When N.R.M.A. men parade we hear talk of mutiny, but when officers break every rule nobody says anything about mutiny or treason.

When the people of Quebec are attacked—and of course it is always a French-Canadian problem—it is time that we tried to understand that the isolationist feeling of the people of that province is not something that has just happened. It was nurtured. It was nurtured not only by French-Canadian leaders, but by English-Canadian leaders. I am not trying to raise any issue between the two, but let us have the facts. When French-Canadian workers wanted to join a union of fellow workers of other nationalities, English-speaking or others, along came big trusts, controlled not by French-Canadians but by English-Canadians—Dominion Textiles is an example; you know the names connected with that firm, Sir Charles Gordon, the late Sir Herbert Holt and others—and told them to join the Catholic syndicates. They were isolated not only from the rest of Canada but from their fellow workers in the same province.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Who told them?

Mr. ROSE: The companies. Again, the Aluminum company, a new industrial giant, did the same thing. The workers were told that the company preferred to deal with the Catholic syndicates to keep those workers isolated and pay them lower wages. When we look at our province we see the following: If our people's health is not as good as it is in the other provinces, or if their educational levels are not as high we find that an English-Canadian has always held the purse-strings of the province. Let us know the facts. I give those facts not to excuse a single individual who does not join the army, who does not leave the N.R.M.A. ranks and go voluntarily, but to show that poison has been spread throughout the country against the province. That is the work of the same Tory elements who have profited in the past by the isolationism of the people.

The people of our province have had a bigger dose of fascist propaganda than any other people. Here again I am going to make a very serious charge. I was a candidate in the general elections of 1935. I followed the election campaign quite closely. Some literature was distributed at the time by the Conservative party. The heading of the bulletins issued was, "Renaissance Nationale". In eight provinces it was the Conservative party and in Quebec it was the nationalists and the "Renaissance Nationale". These bulletins which were spread around every part of the province were edited by no other than Hitler's aide in Canada, Adrien Arcand. Was that the way to prepare the people of Quebec to be ready to participate in a just war? The Hon. Sam Gobeil, leader of the Conservative party in Quebec, wrote some of the most open pro-Hitler pamphlets written by any politician in this country. These are facts. Nobody can deny them. I am not trying to cover up the weaknesses of the Liberals in our province in helping to create confusion, but I say it is necessary that we know all who have been responsible for the way in which the people of our province think and act.

We have had other fascist materials, of the type of La Nation, one of the worst fascist sheets in our province, edited by a young man named Paul Bouchard, from whose writings I have had occasion to read previously. Paul Bouchard ran in a by-election in Lotbinière in 1937, at which time his campaign was financed by the leader of the Conservative party, Maurice Dupre. What is more, at a libel trial in connection with some item that appeared in La Nation, Pierre Chaloult testified that he received support for that vicious sheet of his from none other than the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), who was at one time linked up with the Conservative party and whose policies, I would say, are just the other side of the Tory, anti-reform policies. I do not care if the new party organized by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay is called les Groupements des Independents; from past experience in our province, and after looking at some of the people in that new movement, I would say it is exactly the other side of the Conservative party in this country, with one sort of party in Quebec and another sort of party in the other eight provinces.

I am going to give more facts. During the last provincial election campaign Maurice Duplessis issued posters throughout the province showing men coming back to this country on crutches as a result of the Liberal war policy. The same Montreal Gazette which is now so loudly demanding conscription did not mind what was being done by Maurice Duplessis because that served certain interests. I am going to go farther and say that I wonder if the expropriation of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power company had anything to do with contributions from English-speaking Canadians going into the coffers of the Duplessis anti-war machine. I have very little doubt in that regard, and the time may come when I will give more facts in that connection.

While talking about the sort of confusion being spread among our people due to power politics, by the Tories, I do not want to cover up the faults of the Liberal party. In a pamphlet which I wrote in 1942 I set out what I thought should be done in our province in order to have our people become willing participants in the war. I said:

> It is necessary that the government enact measures to remove the grievances of the French-Canadian people in regard to lower wage standards, in regard to the need for rapid training of large sections of workers in war industries to be able to do skilled work, and to help influence a change from the present outmoded and inadequate educational system to a modern and compulsory system; that it remove all inequalities with respect to the French language in the armed forces, set up special French-Canadian units officered by French Canadians and a special French-Canadian military college.

While some improvements have been made, many of the statements I made in 1942 still hold good to-day. If these things had been done we would have had French units; we would have had greater numbers of men enlisting voluntarily instead of remaining under the N.R.M.A. While pointing to these weaknesses of the Liberal party and many more criticisms I have heard, I want to say that if there is anything wrong with the Canadian situation or the Quebec situation, surely the Tories cannot remedy it.

Despite such a background and some weaknesses of approach to the French-Canadian people, they have done splendidly in this war, and it is about time we recognized that fact. Who will deny the heroism of Lieutenant-Colonel Triquet? Who will deny the heroism of Colonel Menard? Who will deny the heroism of the French-Canadian units overseas? I have here a book entitled "French Canadian Wings," which gives the names of fifty-one French Canadians who have received the distinguished flying cross, the air force cross and the distinguished flying medal. On a number of occasions in this house I have also emphasized what Quebec is doing in connection with giving our men the weapons with which to fight to victory. We have done a great deal. Not very long ago General Eisenhower spoke about the need for more and more shells, but somehow in the Canadian press, in the midst of this fight, it became "man-power." I saw the original statement in one of the United States papers, and all that Eisenhower spoke about was the need for more shells with which to pulverize the Siegfried line. On a number of occasions in this house I have pointed out what Quebec is doing in regard to the production of shells, guns and all those things that make for victory. When our men have plenty of equipment they are more confident in battle. I want to read part of a letter I received from a friend of mine whe has since been reported killed in action. He said:

> I have been writing this sitting comfortably in my carrier, taking in some sun, and to the symphony of our artillery giving hell to the jerries. We have lots of artillery that is playing havoc with him. One really has to listen to the ceaseless fire from an endless number of guns to appreciate what it means. There are stories that German prisoners have asked to be shown our "automatic" artillery. . . .

Then he says:

> We have complete mastery of the air, planes, planes and more planes. We are well equipped and there are many of us. We have lots of everything—including guts.

These are the words of a man who has been in action, a man who on August 13 of this year was reported killed.

An hon. MEMBER: On what front?

Mr. ROSE:: In France. We of Quebec have helped give our men these weapons. Let me read from the Financial Post about the role of Quebec as a producer of the weapons of war:

Quebec builds four of Canada's nine types of aeroplanes; both types of tanks, all our aerial bombs. The province has the largest plant in the British commonwealth completely producing 25-pounder guns from the scrap pile to the finished products, two of the largest shell-filling plants and two great small arms ammunition plants. Some half dozen shipyards are producing cargo vessels, corvettes, mine sweepers and torpedo boats. Most of the boots worn by the Canadian armed forces are made in Quebec. A large part of the uniforms are also made in the province. In addition Quebec turns out parachutes, shells, cartridge cases, trench mortars, trench mortar bombs, and a large part of Canada's chemical and explosives output, electrical and radio equipment, fuses and primers. The province has the largest aluminum smelter in the world.

And the men and women of our province are toiling daily, not always under the finest conditions; but they do not kick. We have had very few strikes in Quebec. The people have been happy to produce these things, in order to make sure that our men have as much amunition as they need.

I want to emphasize that the conditions under which they work are difficult. Only last week, while I was in Montreal, a woman came to see me. She told me she had been working on the Mosquito aircraft. The exposed parts of her body were covered with a rash, which followed as a result of her work. That was not very pleasant. But those people keep on working. Many more like her suffer similarly as a result of these new types of work. And all this is done, Mr. Speaker, by those people who are being insulted by elements that are trying to play politics.

Let me return to the question in connection with the shortage of shells. Since I came to the house I have always insisted that we should have more rather than less of everything; that we should plan to have a surplus, rather than that our men should run short. In connection with shells I said this on June 13, in the discussion on Mutual Aid.

Why the reduction at this time? When men of the united nations are involved in the hardest of battles why should we at this time decide that this reduction is justifiable? Materials will be expected at a great rate and we should have no illusions. At Cassino we learned that planes were good but that we need more and more guns and shells. We learned at Sicily that we need a lot of automotive equipment. It is better to have more than less.

That was the attitude I took in June. Of course there is only one misfortune, namely, that Canada sometimes takes pointers from some of the other powers as to what we should produce. We do not have all the say; but I believe we would have even less if the Tories were in power. They would follow the dictates of London without a murmur. I would say that at least we have tried to speak up much more as an independent country.

One thing further: in attacking Quebec people say that that province has given a smaller share of recruits, that they have not given enough. I would again refresh the minds of some hon. members in respect of something I said when we were discussing the estimates of the Department of Labour. These were my words:

This house has become practically a missing persons' bureau with people wanting to find out exactly how many have not reported for military service. It has become a battle over figures. I hold no brief for men who do not report for army service, but I rather detect an attempt to slur the province of Quebec.

Of course this process of slurring Quebec has been intensified since that time. Then I continued:

Apparently very few hon. members of this house took any notice of the figures in regard to the number of men in the province of Quebec who are not fit for military service. In the city of Montreal only thirty per cent of the men were in category A, while in Toronto the figure was 49·6.

I appeal to all hon. members to try to understand these facts. People in Quebec are victims of certain conditions for which, to a great extent, English-speaking Canadians are responsible.

While giving all these facts, I do not wish for one minute to have anyone get the idea that we do not need the reinforcements. We do need them. Our men deserve to have a rest, and they deserve to have those reinforcements as soon as possible. The only problem is: should we at this stage of the war, when leaders of the united nations who should know more than we do about these matters have said that this is the last lap of the war in Europe, create the worst possible spirit of disunity in an effort to get those reinforcements? Should we not try to get them in the best possible manner?

I like the methods used by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFlèche), who has gone out to get French Canadians to volunteer, much better than those of hon. members who sit here and attack, attack, attack, every attempt to induce such men to come forward as volunteers. Much more would have been achieved if we had taken seriously the appeal for volunteers. Those 16,000 would have come forward if some had not played politics. Has politics been played? Let us see. An appeal was made after General McNaughton took over the job. The answer was immediately one of insults against a great man, against a general.

I now turn to a quotation from the Windsor Star of November 7, which tells the following story:

"General A. G. L. McNaughton's appeal to war veterans to support him in getting the younger generation to take up this 'honourable obligation' and volunteer for active service is so outrageous that I can hardly speak about it", Major Everett Bristol, past dominion commander of the Canadian Legion said yesterday; "Veterans are not going to lend themselves to such an ignoble task."

That is the way they regard the process of having people come forward as volunteers—an "ignoble task". They were not interested in reinforcements. They were interested in bringing down the government, and in having an election so that they could ride to power, not for the good of the men who have gone overseas, but so that they could bring us back to the old iron-heel Bennett days. This was the answer of some of the people who are inspired by the Tories. And there was a similar response from Tories throughout the country—nothing but insults.

We had a reflection of it in the house the other day. I would say that last Thursday was one of my saddest days in this chamber, when men in it treated a great general as if he were a traitor.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And a culprit and a criminal.

Mr. ROSE: Yes, and a culprit and a criminal. I said to myself, "How would they treat a simple worker?" I know how they would treat him. But how many people are there who do know? This is the way they have treated the architect of our army, a man who kept up the morale of our men during a long period of inactivity, and kept it at the highest pitch. I was told, in letters, that when the men heard General McNaughton was coming to visit a unit they were always happy to see their father. It was General McNaughton who, in those dark days, came forward with the slogan that the Canadian troops were a dagger pointed at the heart of Berlin. How encouraging that was to all of us! It was he who, through Dieppe, was able to give the united nations those lessons which saved hundreds of thousands of lives. It was he who, after Dieppe, when some of the great so-called military specialists were saying that it would take millions of casualties to invade the coast, said, "If we had gone there to stay, we could have made it stick." I may be wrong in this, but I have read in the press that it was also he who advocated that we ought not to split the army, and that we should have one powerful Canadian unit to go into action. If his advice had been taken, maybe we would not be faced to-day with the reinforcement crisis.

We need reinforcements. We now have the new order in council which will give us 16,000 men. I think everybody should be satisfied; that is, if he really wants reinforcements and does not want to force an election on the conscription issue. We all want to see our men reinforced and provided with the necessary equipment in this final stage of the war. We are the only country where such a crisis exists at this time. This does not help morale; it simply tears it down. That is why I and my party will support this order in council and work for its success.

I did not act like some hon. members. Over the week-end I spoke at one time to about 2,500 people, and then on Sunday afternoon I went up to speak in the French-Canadian part of Montreal. I told those people that if they had friends or relatives in the N.R.M.A. they should tell them to volunteer. We want a solution that will give us a united Canada to-day and a united Canada during the post-war period, not a solution that will force a conscription election and rip our country apart and maybe keep it apart for another twenty-five years.

The only ones who would gain from such an election would be those whose interest it is to keep us apart. Whenever the English and French people have stood together, all the people benefited; whenever they have been torn apart, every one has suffered with the exception of those who wanted them to be torn apart. There must be greater national unity if our men are to get needed reinforcements, and if the people of Canada are to achieve security and peace in the post-war period.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Prince): I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that I may, and if the house permits me I shall have to exceed the forty-minute rule limit—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly.

Mr. RALSTON: —in order to say all that I feel should be said on this particular occasion. I have tried to condense—although perhaps hon. members will not think so—what I have to say, but I hope that the house will give me indulgence in letting me proceed longer: if not, I can deal with the matter in, perhaps, two stages—on the amendment and then on the main motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I am perfectly sure the house will give him all the time he wishes to have.

Mr. RALSTON: When I came home from overseas, Mr. Speaker, I reported to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not hear exactly what the Prime Minister said, but I understood him to say that the hon. member would be entitled to whatever time he needed, if the house agrees to that, and I assume the house is agreeable.

Mr. ROWE: Let them agree now.

Mr. RALSTON: I was saying that when I came home from overseas I reported to the Prime Minister and to my other colleagues in the war committee and the cabinet that we needed an additional 15,000 trained infantry as reinforcements overseas as quickly as we could get them there. That immediate need still exists. That is the issue to which I intended to direct exclusively any remarks I had to make. I shall not forget it, and I shall not let the house forget it.

In his address the Prime Minister devoted considerable attention to my humble self. I know I am only a very minor incident in connection with this discussion, but I feel that these matters—which were quite extraneous, and added nothing, I thought, to assist the house in coming to a conclusion on the paramount question—ought to be dealt with, because the Prime Minister, by bringing them up, must have thought that they would in some way influence the vote of some hon. members. I do not think so myself, but I may be wrong. I feel, therefore, that hon. members should have what I can give them about the facts as I know them. I will mention, then, those points first, not because they come first in order of importance, but just to get them out of the way so that we shall not stumble over them in seeking the path to be taken on the main question. Please do not think for an instant that I am going to be deflected by them.

One of the points the Prime Minister mentioned was the matter of council secrecy, and he suggested that all he was saying was based on the fact that the member for Prince had in a public declaration made some statements with regard to what had taken place in council, and said he felt that he would have to deal with the same matters from his own point of view. Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that what I said in my public statement on November 12 was as the result of what the Prime Minister had said in his radio broadcast on November 8 with regard to matters which had taken place in council. In other words, his statement, his disclosures, did not follow mine; mine followed his.

I am not going to take very much time except just to refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the speech made by the Prime Minister on November 8 to indicate to you that the Prime Minister felt it was permissible in a public speech to refer to what had taken place in council; and, as I told him in the letter which I wrote to him on November 14:

> Regarding privy council secrecy, I feel I ought to point out that your own speech of November 8 contains references to matters treated, debated and resolved in council discussion, and I am sure these references would not have been made had you not considered that they were permissible.

Now, as regards those references in the Prime Minister's speech to which I will refer, I am finding no fault with him, but I ask him and I ask the house to find no fault with me if I dealt in my statement of November 12 with the same matters that the Prime Minister had already dealt with in his radio speech of November 8—matters which took place in council. I have here the pamphlet of his speech of November 8, and on page 5 I quote:

> Colonel Ralston's report to the government—

That must have been a report to council.

> —disclosed an immediate problem which had to be faced.

That certainly is giving the contents in a negative way of a report to council.

> That problem—

That is, the problem which Colonel Ralston had reported.

> —is to find the means of speeding up the flow of fully trained infantry reinforcements—

That must all have been in the report.

> —to meet, not an actual shortage—

Which would indicate that the report had indicated that there was no actual shortage.

> —of reinforcements now but a possible shortage in the next few months.

Now that in brief immediately puts on the public record what the Prime Minister says that Mr. Ralston reported to council, and I submit—and I had no difficulty in coming to a conclusion—that if it were permissible for the Prime Minister to publish that summary to the public, it was equally permissible for

Mr. Ralston to publish what he did say to council in connection with these very matters; otherwise it would mean that someone would state that So-and-so did not say so-and-so in council, and the other man would be barred absolutely from contradicting it because of council secrecy. A statement of the negative is just as much a statement of what took place in council as a statement of the positive. If there is a statement that Mr. Ralston disclosed, not an actual shortage of reinforcements, an opportunity must be given for the man whose statement is referred to to say what he did say. Also, the term "possible shortage in the next few months" gives, I should think, the individual referred to an opportunity to say what he did say about that.

On page 6 I read:

> Colonel Ralston had grave doubts of our ability to keep up the flow of reinforcements in the next few months by voluntary means.

Where was that said—in public or in council? That is a statement of what took place in council.

> He considered therefore—

And this must have been in council.

> —that he had no alternative but to recommend that draftees should be sent overseas as reinforcements.

I am skipping a part of the paragraph.

> Days of anxious deliberation were devoted to an exploration of all possible alternatives.

All that must have taken place in council. Then he goes on:

> The recommendation made by Colonel Ralston was not accepted.

Which of course was in council. Then on page 7 I quote again:

> Let me give you some facts and figures which were before the government in reaching its decision.

Then the Prime Minister proceeds to give to the public what he says are the facts and figures which were before the government in its deliberations. Those are all matters which were "treated, debated and resolved" in council, and those were all made public by the Prime Minister to the public of Canada. I do not think one can be reprimanded for dealing with the same matters and giving one's own version of what took place.

I have not much more to say on that because I shall be dealing with the matters to which the Prime Minister referred in his address, but the two things that struck me as needing correction were, first, the statement in effect that Mr. Ralston had reported that there was no actual shortage of reinforcements and, second, the statement that Mr. Ralston had reported that there was a possible shortage of reinforcements in the next few months. Both those statements, I felt, left an impression which was not in accordance with what I had stated. With regard to the matter of an actual shortage at the time, I have indicated to the public, as I indicated to my colleagues, that there was an actual shortage, that the reinforcement pools were down very much, if not wholly depleted. You cannot say that there is not a shortage simply because you may have fifty men on one side of the ledger or the other, so far as the strength of units is concerned, because in both theatres of war they are supposed to maintain pools, and the situation which I reported was a short-term position in November which showed that they were nothing more than just about square in actual unit strengths with nothing for the pools, while the situation in December showed that, taking all the men who would be available in the reinforcement pools and everywhere else, trained men in the United Kingdom and in both battle areas, and adding them all together, there would still be a considerable shortage before you could fill up the strength of the units, without allowing anything at all for the pools. It seemed to me that was a situation which indicated an actual shortage of reinforcements, and second, indicated that the "possible shortage in the next few months" was really a "probable shortage at the end of December." These were the two points that I made in the statement which I issued to the press; and I make no apologies to the house or to my former colleagues in the cabinet for having done that in view of the fact that the Prime Minister attempted to epitomize my report to council in that short paragraph to which I have referred. In other words, Mr. Speaker, I think in this debate so far and especially in the Prime Minister's speech the other night the doors of the privy council have been pretty well opened and there is not very much that has taken place there, which one recollects, that has not been revealed to the house and to the public. What I wish to say is this: that what is all right for the Prime Minister of Canada, I am sure he will admit, ought to be quite all right for a humble ex-minister.

Mr. ROWE: All right for Canada, too.

Mr. RALSTON: One of the other points is the matter which was mentioned in the Prime Minister's speech and which was contained in his correspondence, namely, the fact that there had not been sufficient notice to the cabinet or to the war committee of the reinforcement situation and of the likelihood of N.R.M.A. men being required. I am dealing with this now as an extraneous point because I do not think it has anything to do with the debate. In the first place and in the last place I submit that it is wholly irrelevant to the question which this house is called on to decide. The question is whether or not troops for reinforcements are going to be sent. If there was something wrong, something reprehensible, if there was bad faith on the part of the minister, that is a thing for which he should incur the odium and the opprobrium which come from it. But to say that has anything to do with the debate and should be introduced here is, I think, wholly wrong. But I do wish to say that in connection with some of the statements made the Prime Minister is not quite accurate and I should like to correct them in justice to the officers and in justice to myself. He said that there was nothing before the cabinet or the war committee at any time up to August of this year, suggesting that there would be any further need for reinforcements overseas. I think I have quoted him correctly. Well, Mr. Speaker, Hansard, which I have in my hand, gives it differently from the way I took it down and perhaps I am wrong about this. I thought the Prime Minister said that the cabinet had nothing at any time up to August of this year suggesting that there would be any need for further reinforcements. I see that Hansard at page 6597 says:

> As far as the government is concerned, there was nothing before it at any time up to October of this year which suggested that there would be any need for conscription to provide further reinforcements overseas.

I think the Prime Minister is wrong about that. In June I brought to the attention of the war committee advice which had been received from the chief of staff that further forecasts had been made into 1945 and that they would indicate the necessity for a heavier call on reinforcements. He did consider that we were all right up to October, but he pointed out that the question would arise as to whether we would have to break up a formation or send N.R.M.A. men over. He considered that we could await developments of the war before reaching a decision, and he suggested additional efforts, mentioning infantry particularly. Then steps were taken by the three defence ministers to arrange so that air force and navy recruiting would be slowed down for the benefit of the army. That was in June, 1944, and the Prime Minister suggests that so far as the government is concerned there was nothing before it with regard to the need for conscription, no suggestion that there would be any need for conscription to provide further reinforcements up to October. The Prime Minister has forgotten that telegram. I think I mentioned it at another session.

[Mr. Ralston.]

He said we received direct assurance on August 3 that there was no need for considering the question of additional reinforcements for service overseas by compulsion. I think those are his exact words. Yes; at page 6598 of Hansard the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

> The government was given the most direct assurance at that time by the chief of staff, with the Minister of National Defence present, that there was no need for considering the question of additional reinforcements for overseas by compulsion.

All I can say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Prime Minister is that I have quite a distinct recollection of that meeting, and I myself—and I can only give my word for it—am satisfied that the reference to reinforcements by compulsion was not used in any way on that occasion. My memory is just as fallible as anybody else's, but I am quite satisfied—and I have made some inquiries about it—that the Prime Minister is mistaken in connection with that, and that there was no discussion at that meeting with regard to reinforcements for overseas by compulsion. There was a proposal at that meeting to constitute an infantry brigade by combining certain existing units in Italy; that is to say, they were existing units and it was proposed to put them into a brigade instead of having them operate as they were operating at that time separately or within other formations. The proposal involved something under six hundred additional, and it might involve up to March, 1945, something like nine hundred additional reinforcements. It is quite true that the chief of staff in making that recommendation and in making his recommendations to the war committee that day did report the over-all reinforcement position as entirely satisfactory. I am sure that he did so in the very best of faith. The Prime Minister has been good enough to acknowledge that, because at page 6600 of Hansard he says:

> Along with the rest of my colleagues I have accepted these representations in the best of faith, just as, I believe, they were given in the best of faith.

I want to stop here to say that I inquired about the formation of that brigade when I was in Italy, and the corps commander there assured me that the casualties suffered by that brigade operating as infantry had been no higher than the casualties which had been estimated for them when they had been operating as separate units.

The chief of staff at that time indicated that the only part of the reinforcement problem which concerned him at the moment was reinforcements for the French-speaking infantry battalions; and the chief of staff's explanation, both to the Prime Minister and to the war committee and myself since that time is that the unexpectedly high proportion of infantry casualties which have occurred threw his calculations and expectations out and that the fact that this high proportion continued so long rendered it impossible for him to re-establish the pools by remustering from other arms. I wish to say this for the chief of staff at Canadian military headquarters, General Stuart; I know of no officer in the Canadian army with a finer reputation or who has more loyally, more faithfully and more efficiently carried on his duties. He has recognized what the policy of this country was. He has endeavoured to carry it out to the very best of his ability. He has remustered men; he has seen that N.R.M.A. men were put in the place of general service personnel; he has pulled general service personnel out of every position from which they could possibly be spared, and replaced them with either low category men or men of the N.R.M.A., and generally he has endeavoured to make the voluntary system work to the very limit. He was in charge in England at the time, in August. He had to be vested with that responsibility there. He accepted that responsibility and in my judgment made the very best contribution that an officer could make to meet that situation over there. It was absolutely essential that the administration be left in his hands and in the hands of Canadian military headquarters. It could not be done from here. I know General Stuart feels that if he had to do over again what he has done in the last year, in endeavouring to maintain Canada's army and generally in connection with the administration of Canadian military headquarters, he would do exactly the same thing.

The Prime Minister also mentioned the Quebec conference and suggested that some notice should have been given at that time if there was an apprehension with regard to the reinforcement situation. I point out first that the Quebec conference had not the faintest thing to do with the battles going on in Europe. The Quebec conference was a meeting between the representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada with respect to Pacific operations. I have examined the minutes of the war committee and there is not a reference—except one that has anything to do with Europe. That concerns Italy, and it has no reference to reinforcements or to anything which would affect reinforcements. There is no reference whatever to any thing or any subject which was brought up which would give an opportunity or afford a place for the discussion of reinforcements if an apprehension existed. As a matter of fact, of course, reinforcements would be a domestic matter which would be discussed at meetings of the war committee. We held meetings of the war committee every week, and that was the place to discuss the matter of reinforcements or anything else which had to do with the Canadian army.

So much for the Quebec conference. At the same time, however, I had a report that the Prime Minister had made some statement which I felt might indicate some change of policy with regard to N.R.M.A. men. This is mentioned in the correspondence, so that I am not disclosing anything I should not. I went to the Prime Minister at Quebec with regard to that very matter, because I have always been insistent that the N.R.M.A. men should be held as potential reserves; and I was assured by the Prime Minister at that time that what he had stated in 1942 still stood with regard to N.R.M.A. men and the possibility of their being used as potential reinforcements. I mention that to indicate that perhaps I have been a nuisance more than anything else in connection with this matter, mentioning it so frequently, but certainly if there has been any red light to hold out I have endeavoured to hold it out. In September, after the conference, a situation did develop which gave me concern. A report came from overseas as to the number of infantry reinforcements on hand. I was disturbed by it. I made calculations with regard to how many would be in Italy and how many would be in the United Kingdom. I should pause here to say that we in Canada do not keep the records of the pools in the United Kingdom and Italy. Those are dealt with in the United Kingdom, because they are close to the battle line; they know what the needs are; they know what the forecast of activity is, and they are the ones best able to judge what dispatches should be made to Italy and what dispatches should be made to the United Kingdom. I endeavoured to make a calculation, and I took that calculation with me when I went to Italy.

As I say, a situation did develop in September, after the Quebec conference, as I was advised by the then adjutant general. I did not withhold that from my colleagues. I was at the war committee, I think the day before I left for the United Kingdom, and at that meeting of that committee there was a discussion about the N.R.M.A. men. I advised them there that on account of our heavy infantry casualties I could not consent to the release of any trained N.R.M.A. men, that they must be maintained in order to provide against the uncertainties then existing on account of that report.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On what date in September?

Mr. RALSTON: That was September 22, I think; and a day or two before that at a meeting of the cabinet I believe the matter did come up incidental to some other matter which had been mentioned there. Those are the matters to which I refer, and they indicate that the situation was not altogether unmentioned to the cabinet, although I admit quite frankly that had the situation been as I discovered since, and as I reported it to the cabinet after I came back, certainly I would have reported it at once. All I can say is that the fact that I did not know it and did not report it sooner means that I did not sooner recommend the action that I did. I would have done it just that much quicker had I known what was the situation.

I want to say that there was a telegram which came to me in August and which I did not bring to the attention of the cabinet. It is my own fault. I brought it to the attention of the cabinet when it came to my attention the second time. It was a telegram which advised that there was a serious shortage in the strength of the infantry units and that remustering was rapidly going on. It indicated that two-thirds of the shortage would be made up in six days, I think it was, and the balance in about two weeks, and asked me to authorize the use of general duty infantry tradesmen for the purpose of helping to clear up the situation on account of these heavy casualties. If I remember correctly it was a Sunday morning, and I simply initialled the telegram and handed it back to the chief of the general staff. The telegram concluded by stating that everything would be all right in three weeks. As a matter of fact, if I had known as much then as I know now I would have realized that this meant it would be unlikely that the pools would be built up, although if it had come to my mind at all I would have thought that the men who were being trained in England would be coming in again in three weeks, and that this was simply a situation to be tided over at that time. I say quite frankly that I did not tell the cabinet about it. There was no possible reason for my withholding it, but I want to mention all these matters so that the house may have no doubt as to the exact position. I did bring it to the attention of the cabinet when it was brought to my attention again, but that was after I had come back. As a matter of fact, I brought it to the attention of the cabinet when I asked for approval of the paying of the infantry tradesmen.

I want to say that the department has carried its own load in connection with the administration of the army, as every department has to do. The department has tried to solve its own problems. I have hung out the red light whenever I thought it was necessary, and I think some people have an idea that I have been almost too anxious to hold out the red light sometimes, that perhaps I have cried "wolf, wolf," when there was no wolf. Nevertheless I have consistently maintained the position, as the Prime Minister was good enough to say the other night, that I could not undertake that the Canadian army would be always wholly reinforced by volunteers, but that the time might come when N.R.M.A. men would be utilized. I have not hesitated to say that in this house time after time, I think in the minds of some people almost ad nauseam, because I wanted it distinctly understood that this was what I was banking on. The Prime Minister has been good enough to indicate that; and I feel that he and my former colleagues will accept my assurance that I have not withheld anything from them which I considered required attention from the cabinet or the war committee. As soon as I was really concerned about this matter I told them promptly. I cut a trip which would have taken six or seven weeks, at least, down to three and a half weeks. When I got back to London from the continent I stayed only three days, in order that I might come home immediately. On October 13 I wired the Prime Minister to let him know I was coming, having left Canada only on September 23, and asking if I might have an opportunity of meeting my cabinet colleagues at once, indicating to him generally what was the nature of the trouble. I say it is all very well to be wise after the event. But I can only say that if I had had hindsight I would have recommended this action just that much earlier. After having said all that, I am coming back to this—and hon. members may wonder why I am dealing with it so fully. I did not expect the Prime Minister would have made so much of it himself. But the Prime Minister took time the other night—and quite a bit of it—to impress upon the house the fact that the cabinet had not known about this matter, and made a very positive statement about it. I believe in justice to myself and in justice to my officers I at least ought to make an explanation about it, even though it is a matter which is irrelevant.

I understand the point the Prime Minister was making was that it came as a great shock, and it took the cabinet longer to consider it. I am only pointing out that at least a month before I had mentioned it to the war committee, directly, I had indicated that there were heavier infantry casualties, and that in view of the uncertainty of the situation these men might be needed. I had gone over and I had found that uncertainty had become a reality.

I think all hon. members will remember what I have said in the house from time to time. I have stood in my place and defended the voluntary system. I have worked just as hard as I possibly could to support it. I started out in 1942 at the time of the plebiscite, speaking about it. As a matter of fact, before that one hon. member on the other side mentioned it just on the eve of a recruiting campaign, and I think I was the first man on this side of the house to stand up and take a member in this house to task for having advocated conscription in the earlier days of the war.

Mr. BRUCE: I have reason to remember that.

Mr. RALSTON: I have ever since defended the voluntary system. I wish to say that if in fact the voluntary system has failed, as I feel it has failed, so far as being a dependable source for infantry reinforcements at least—and do not understand me to say that it has failed entirely, but failed to be a dependable source for infantry reinforcements for the army at this stage of the war, and having regard to what is ahead of us—that does not make me take back what I have said with regard to the desirability of having a voluntary army, if we could have one. The very fact that over 500,000 men have enlisted voluntarily in the Canadian army, and that in these there are 42,000 N.R.M.A. men is some indication someone has done some work in connection with the matter. Then of course, as someone has reminded me, there are enlistments in the navy and the air force. The air force is something in the neighbourhood of 200,000, and the navy about 75,000.

This is not the main issue in this matter—the matter of notice to the cabinet. But it did come as a shock to the Prime Minister, and I can understand that, with the many things he has to consider. Those who are running the departments have these matters laid on our shoulders, and we endeavour to carry them. I wish to say to you that it came as a shock to me, too, when I went to the battle areas. And when I came back to C.M.H.Q. and went over the figures there with the officers, and found what I believed was a situation requiring radical measures, I came home and so reported. So much for the reference the Prime Minister has made to what I said to the cabinet.

I wish now to mention a matter which gave me some real concern. The Prime Minister in his statement—I really do not know why he did it; I am at a loss, frankly, to understand it, because it is not like him—said:

> I took great care to ask one colleague after the other would he take the responsibility that was mine. I asked the minister of defence himself, would he take the responsibility of heading the government and putting through this particular measure? I was told by him that he would not. It is very easy, may I say, to oppose a position hitherto assumed by a government and to propose new measures, but unless men are prepared to back their policies by taking responsibility for their enactment and carrying them out, they have no right, if members of a ministry, to leave a ministry in circumstances where as a consequence of their action the whole structure is almost certain to collapse.

That is the strangest doctrine I have ever heard enunciated in this house. If I were not respectful of the Prime Minister I would call it just plain nonsense; I will call it rhetoric, instead. I do not think anybody could imagine what the effect of a policy of that kind would be. In the first place if there was any impression that the Prime Minister asked all his colleagues, since he has told what took place let me say that he asked three colleagues. He did not ask any more. I do not know whether the fact that—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to my hon. friend at once that I asked if any member of the cabinet would take the responsibility.

Mr. RALSTON: I am corrected. What I am saying is that he asked three colleagues, specifically.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was when he was trying to bluff them.

Mr. RALSTON: And the Prime Minister in his speech gave the impression that he was in genuine search for a successor. I want to say that nothing of the kind occurred. The Prime Minister was not in genuine search for a successor. He asked a purely hypothetical question, going something like this, "If I went down to the governor general to-night and offered my resignation, and recommended you to take on, would you accept?" That was rather hypothetical. As a matter of fact I said "no", and neither of the others consented. After he had asked the other two I said, "I assume you are only asking that out of curiosity?" And in the course of discussion he indicated that he had not intended to go to the governor general, at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just bluff.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to my hon. friend that we were discussing very seriously at the time whether the government could be carried on, and the only reason why I asked the question was that I wished to make sure as to whether or not I would have to continue to carry this load under the circumstances.

Mr. RALSTON: I say to the Prime Minister it was not so taken by the members who were asked. When I asked the Prime Minister if he was asking out of curiosity, he either assented to that or indicated that he had not any intention of going down to ask the governor general.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, that is not correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to say this, that I am going into this matter because in reading the castigation by the Prime Minister of Canada what does he say? He says:

> It is very easy, may I say, to oppose a position hitherto assumed by a government and to propose new measures, but unless men are prepared to back their policies by taking responsibility for their enactments and carrying them out, they have no right, if members of a ministry, to leave a ministry in circumstances where as a consequence of their action the whole structure is almost certain to collapse.

Let us see what the situation was? Was anybody opposing a position hitherto taken by the government? I was proposing to carry out the policy of the government, which was the policy of sending N.R.M.A. men, if necessary. I was not opposing any position which had hitherto been taken by the government.

Then the other suggestion is that I was proposing a new measure, a measure which had not been proposed or had not been contemplated by the government. I was not proposing any new measure. I was proposing a measure which had been forecast by the Prime Minister himself in 1942. It was a measure stating that conscription should be imposed, if necessary. When the Prime Minister of Canada rises in his place and takes me to task for having indicated that I would have to resign if the policy were not carried out, I submit he is taking a position which is absolutely untenable. It simply means that if a man proposes to carry out the policy of the government and his colleagues do not agree he must stay in the government or else be prepared to accept the prime ministership of Canada. I say that that position is a position which cannot be upheld or supported. It means that a man joining the government enters into an obligation that once there he has to stay, no matter what policies are adopted, even though it means repudiating his own convictions and pledges. The only way he can get out is to agree to accept the prime ministership and form and lead another government.

